Smith: What were the kids like?

Abbruzzese: Susan was a real teenager. She didn’t like school work and all that.

Smith: She liked her jeans.

Abbruzzese: Yeah, and she was a lot of fun to be around. Mike was already out of the house. I think he was finishing college about that time. And I think he very quickly began teaching in Winston-Salem. And I think now is the dean or something. Jack, after he got out, he wanted to travel. He did some travelling and he got on television. He had a long time booking on a television show. I did not get to know the other boy.

Smith: Steve. He was on a soap opera.

Abbruzzese: Steve was the one on a soap opera. But Jack had moved out also. But Steve also was a great deal of fun and actually he gave them a little bit of heartache, too. He didn’t get in serious trouble, but he gave them a little bit of heartache.

Smith: What kind of parent was Jerry Ford?

Abbruzzese: He travelled a lot and I personally think he felt guilty about his travelling. But he accepted it. And they had a housekeeper who was wonderful and was really a member of the family. But she was very social. She didn’t run around a lot, but she was very pleasant. She was just nice to be in the neighborhood. When she came out of the house, she would always talk to somebody. You know, conversations. It’s just actually at that time and even now, my wife will go out in the street and if she sees somebody driving by, she’ll go out to talk to them in the car. A car would come by and stop. After five minutes, that car would go down. A second car would stop. They would have a conversation. This went on all the time. And, until I resigned myself that that was part of life here, I just couldn’t believe that that’s the way people live. And it’s always been that way.

Smith: Was the Secret Service disrupting the neighborhood at all?

Abbruzzese: No, they were pretty good. On a couple of times when the Fords came over, my wife would feed them. When Susan came over, she would make pizzas for the Secret Service. And so, coming over was a good deal.

Smith: Tell us about the week when I assume everyone’s life changed forever.

Abbruzzese: There was a lot of rain that week and you couldn’t move the Secret Service and the press. They had the press stand across the street and because of the rain, I felt as a matter of self-protection, my garage at that time, I was new to the house, was still empty. So I would pull up the garage in the morning, make a pot of coffee and put it out there. And they could use the downstairs bathroom. And in my little den down there, they made telephone calls. I never got charged a dime for a long distance call or anything like that.

Smith: That’s pretty gracious on your part.

And you had network people as well.

Abbruzzese: Yeah, and they were really always, I never heard a word. I think on the second or third day, we paid for a beach house at Delaware so I gave a neighbor the key and she would come up in the morning and make the coffee and put it out. Then I’m ashamed to say this, but in the afternoon, I would make a pitcher of martinis. I suppose I shouldn’t be saying that anymore, but that’s what I did.

Smith: But they were well received?

Abbruzzese: Oh, yeah.
Smith: That week did you see the Fords or did you talk with them at all or any members of the family?

Abbruzzese: Well we were gone for the whole week. And, of course, he was here for a week while he was President. The only thing that happened that was really out of the way was that, on one occasion, I backed out of the driveway and I hit his car. I spent $90 to have it repaired. I didn’t even report it because, if I did that, other things would’ve come up and I didn’t want to bother with it.

Smith: So the night that Nixon resigns and he has this little impromptu press conference you were out at the beach?

Abbruzzese: Well, he was mobbed. When he came to the house, we couldn’t get close to him. I mean, early in the morning, I think that first morning after Nixon announced his resignation, I went out to the house and Betty came to the door in her housecoat. And we chatted for awhile and somebody got a picture of that. But Louise spent much more time with them.

Smith: Did she seem—?

Abbruzzese: She was smooth. She took everything well. She could’ve been an army wife. I mean, she put up with so much of his travelling.

Smith: That’s an interesting characterization.

Abbruzzese: And, for her, it was just like being an army wife.

Smith: Did you sense that she had “a problem” however you define that?

Abbruzzese: No, I didn’t. I have to say, I really didn’t know it until I saw it in the papers. My wife saw it, but she didn’t even say anything to me. But that’s my wife. She won’t say anything either. One time before it was reported, a neighbor’s wife mentioned, “You know, she drinks.” And I would talk to her on the phone several times, frequently, when she would call to ask for Louise or something like that. I could understand everything she said, but every once in awhile, on reflection, I may have heard a little slur in her voice, but she still spoke clearly. To be honest, I don’t think it was one of those very big, drunk all the time problems. It was just that she had taken medication for her neck pain and she would have a couple of drinks to get through the day.

Smith: And she was in pain, wasn’t she?

Abbruzzese: She was really in pain. Now, I had a similar condition with my neck. I still have it in fact. And I was taking three Motrins a day, 800 milligrams. And I went to my doctor and told him, “I can’t do this anymore.” So I took some three or four weeks of traction. And then I discovered that if I was in the shower and the shower was over my neck, I would get relief. Now, I do that and I don’t have any trouble anymore. I’m fixated on that and every time somebody tells me they have neck pain, I peddle that to them.

Smith: So, the night that Nixon resigns and he comes out of the front door to tell everyone, among other things, that Henry Kissinger is staying on, were you in the house while that was going on?

Abbruzzese: Yes. I might’ve been outside, too. I don’t think I stayed out that much, but I could see all the TV lights set up.

Smith: I mean, there’s not a lot of room. Was the street closed off at that point? I’m just trying to imagine where they put reporters.

Abbruzzese: Cars did not come down the street. They would go up to Vassar, the next street, and go around and come up to their house the other way. I must confess to one of my crimes at that time. When I came in the neighborhood, they would let me in to get in my driveway. And I couldn’t get in the driveway, so I parked on the street facing that way and I got a $50 ticket from the Alexandria police.

Another thing that happened was, a woman in that house, while he lived there, her house was broken into and she was attacked. And the police came around asking. The detective was asking us what kind of a person she was. I said, “What do you mean? She just lives a normal life. She doesn’t do anything. She’s a working woman and comes home.” He said, “Well, do you know that she drinks and has parties?” And I said, “Gee whiz, are you telling me that if she drinks and has parties, it’s alright to rape her?” He says, “Well, thanks a lot” and he left. Being paranoid, I always connected that to the $50 ticket I got afterwards.

Smith: That’s interesting. Well, who knows?

Abbruzzese: Yeah. I don’t know that there’s any connection.

Smith: Once he is sworn in, do you remember your first conversation?

Abbruzzese: Well, my daughter was born in ’74 in September. He was already President. And my daughter was born on the day that Betty Ford was operated on for melanoma. I mean her skin cancer.

Smith: Or breast cancer?

Abbruzzese: Yeah, breast cancer. You’re right. And I did not know that she’d gone into the hospital, but the next day, when I got up there, it was in the papers, so I knew. And when I went up to the hospital, the chief nurse in the ward said, “We’ve broken rules. We’re really sorry, but we had a problem.” I said, “What it is?” He said, “The press has been calling.” It was at Bethesda Naval Hospital which is a military hospital. We were using it for that. And they said, “They kept calling all day.” They wanted to know what my wife is doing in the hospital. And he said, “Having a baby.” And they said, “What entitles her to be in the hospital?” Because someone had an idea that we know. They got her into the hospital because of a personal relationship. And he says, “Well, after a while, we just finally told them that she’s a member of military family.”

Smith: As I recall, I think Mrs. Ford took your wife a present for the baby.

Abbruzzese: Well, that was before then, when we were new to the neighborhood. In ’72, she came over. My son was born in March of ’72. We moved in October of ’71. She brought over a present then for the baby. They really looked upon things alike and they both found each other likeable.

Smith: Did they have any interaction during that period when they both were at Bethesda?
Abbruzzese: I don’t think so because, after another day or so, my wife came out of the hospital and Betty Ford stayed in for several more days.

Smith: Did you go to the White House during the Ford presidency?

Abbruzzese: Yeah, we went there several times. My wife took the children up there for Thanksgiving in ’74. We went there for a couple of dinners. I think at least two. I think for the president of Ireland and for the president of Italy.

Smith: That’s appropriate.

What was the reaction in the neighborhood to the pardon?

Abbruzzese: Well, I thought it was a mistake. I figured he had to do it, but other people in the House, I think, most of them opposed it at the time. I didn’t oppose it. I thought it was a mistake. I was looking at it in political terms. But the people I knew on Capitol Hill all of them said, “We’ve got him now.” By the way, his autobiography is one of the few autobiographies that I’ve read which is better than most of the biographies of him, because of the straight way he tells it. He doesn’t defend himself by attacking people. He’s never on a counter attack. I have a shelf of biographies if you want to look at them afterwards. I think that I have only one biography that I’ve read in which a man said, “I did something. I did this. And I was wrong and I’m ashamed of myself.” And that was General William Dean who commanded our forces in Korea when they were captured. He was captured with his division in Korea. And he said, “I didn’t behave the way I should’ve and I’m ashamed of that. So the only thing I can say is, don’t ever surrender your character.” I admired that greatly and Ford was like that. In his biography, when he talks about his actions, you would almost think that it’s a third person who’s completely disinterested who’s just relating events and his straightness really is a great tonic.

Smith: Did it bother you that he was caricatured as clumsy, physically - the kind of a guy who fell down a lot?

Abbruzzese: I used to have unpleasant conversations and my view was a guy that could play football that well is not clumsy. He was a very graceful man.
Smith: Now, you said you had conversations with him?

Abbruzzese: Oh, no, no, no. On Capitol Hill. Young Democrats, they loved seeing that stuff. They were entertained by that. But I just felt bad for him.

Smith: You had that whole crop of Watergate Babies that came in, in ’74, who changed the whole tenor of the House in many ways.

Abbruzzese: Well, since that period, the sense of civility and courtesy has declined, but didn’t really go down then all at once. He really restored civility to that Congress and also in relations between the departments. He was absolutely wonderful in that respect. For me, I think they started the decline in the early 80s when Newt Gingrich came in. And I hope I’m being honest about this. And he had the philosophy that, “We really can’t win on the issues. Now, we know they’re sleazy,” and he meant that sincerely, “and that’s the way we’re going to get him.” And some of his own members said to him, “But, you know, if we go after that character, it’s going to cost some of us our jobs, too.” He said, “That’s alright. There are more of them than there are of us, so they’ll lose more seats.” And he was completely right. But it went down after that frequently.

I had arranged a lunch between him and three British MPs, I think, in 1982. They were three people with economic interests. They came over and the embassy asked me to set up a meeting with some members of the House. So I set up a meeting, then I also set up a private lunch with Newt Gingrich. They had a long, very good conversation. Very intelligent. And one of them said and he was not a Labor member, you know, I think he was a liberal Democrat, “But your proposals on economic issues, you know they’re going to hurt people.” He says, “We know that, but it’s the only way we’re going to get our program through.” But he never emphasized that in his presentations.

Smith: Bob Michel was sort of the last of his kind. I mean, he was very much in the Ford tradition.

Abbruzzese: You don’t know how many times I had people tell me, “I wish we had Michel back.” I left in September of ’94 before the election where the Republicans took over because the unpleasantness had really gone too far. And I’d had enough time and I felt I don’t need this anymore. My wife was working, so we were wealthy. Not really. But I just didn’t want to stay there and watch all this unhappiness going on. And even Republicans couldn’t get along with each other to a certain extent. And I always thought that the Democrats were really terrible at internecine warfare. Just unbelievable.

Smith: ’76 campaign, did you have any contact with them at all?

Abbruzzese: No, not at all.

Smith: And after they left the White House, did either through the kids, I mean, for example, Susan—?

Abbruzzese: Well, we went to Susan’s wedding. A year or two later, we went out to the West Coast to her wedding and had a wonderful weekend there. I think he was quite happy. I really would have liked to have seen him reelected even though I was a Democrat because, well, you know, when it comes to the presidency, I have voted for Democrats and I’ve voted for Republicans. I’m not good at, “He may be a crook, but he’s ours.” I’ve never been good at that philosophy. My classmates and I have frequent debates on this, you know. And three quarters of them are Republicans.

Smith: But when you saw them out on the West Coast, they both seemed happy with their new life?

Abbruzzese: Oh, yes. They loved it. They loved it out there. And Susan’s wedding was a wonderful affair.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him or had any contact with him?

Abbruzzese: I think it was some time later in the 80s, I’m not sure when.

Smith: When he died, were you surprised by the reaction? I know a lot of colleagues in the media I think were. That there was as much as there was. I know the family was blown away by the number of people who were out on the streets in Alexandria when they came back that Saturday night.

Abbruzzese: I was slightly surprised. I thought it was going to be that way, but it was even more so than I ever expected. He’s just a very beautiful guy. Did a lot for the country. And I think the more things progress the way they are, the better his reputation will be.

Smith: Did you hear from anyone at that time? Because, Susan, of course, told us we should talk with you.

Abbruzzese: Well, I think Susan talked with my wife about that time. And I think every once in awhile, they would hear about the house. It went through a couple of owners.

Is that thing still on?

Smith: Yeah, sure.

Abbruzzese: Well, I’ll tell you. After he was in the White House, the fellow who owned that house was a bachelor. He decided to have a birthday party for the President. Invited a whole bunch of people, all the neighbors, all the Cabinet and all that. A couple from the Cabinet went, but no one else came and I didn’t think they would. You know, he’s a perfect stranger. We went over and the backyard was decorated with tables all around the swimming pool. I just can’t imagine how much it cost. He had a giant birthday cake in the middle of the pool held up by straps on all the sides. And, for the people there who were Cabinet members, it was a very painful evening.

Then we had a person move in who rented the house, who had his family living in the area and he rented this house with his girlfriend. I don’t want to get into that. I can’t get into that.

Smith: Had a somewhat checkered history?

Abbruzzese: Every once in awhile, Betty would say, “Is there something that can be done?” And they said, “Just ignore it. That’s the best you can do.”

Smith: But it sounds like they took a continuing interest in the neighborhood.

Abbruzzese: Yes. The most recent owner put it on the market about three years ago, I think, for a $1,025,000. It sold 6 weeks ago for $735,000 and even that was a lot because of all the work that has to be done. The swimming pool was neglected and it was in such bad shape that it would cost more to fill it in than to repair it. And if you repaired it, they would have a lot of trouble with that even afterwards. So they just filled it in. And what a mess that was because it rained every day. Streets were filled with mud. But now the people who are there are just wonderful, an English couple. Really very nice.

Smith: I take it are there still occasional tourists who drive by here?

Abbruzzese: I would say once or twice a week when the weather’s good, somebody will drive by and slow down, look at the sign over my garage and look at the sign and they would walk across and look at the plaque on the house.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Abbruzzese: I think that he was a much better President than he’ll ever get credit for. I don’t think it’s possible for him to get the credit he deserves because so much of it was in terms of the feeling in the country. And that was really because his qualities of leadership. Intellectual capability. He was very intelligent. But that’s not why. Intellectual ability, understanding, knowledge, they’re necessary for good Presidents, but qualities of leadership are what count and personal judgment. And there’s no relationship, in my view, between intelligence and good judgment. And he had all those things. And that’s what he will be admired for. And I think Lou Cannon has done a good biography of him, too.

Smith: And how do you remember him?

Abbruzzese: I think he’s just a very fine person. Glad to know him. By the way, when Ford was vice president, Wayne Hays in the fall of ’74 went to a television station for an interview. And I went with him and I’ve told you before that we were not really that close. And we went in and he introduced me and said, “This is Peter Abbruzzese. He’s on my staff. He’s a good friend of Jerry Ford. In fact, he’s his only friend.”

Smith: Would Ford have laughed at that?

Abbruzzese: Oh, he would’ve loved it because he understood Wayne Hays. His best friends would say to me, “Pete, why does he do those things?” “Well, I don’t know.” I mean, Wayne Hays.
Smith: And whatever happened to Hays?

Abbruzzese: He went back and he immediately in the next election ran for the state Senate. He was elected. And in 1980, he lost out when Ronald Reagan was elected. But that seat was held by a Democrat for another 20 years.

Smith: Is he still around?

Abbruzzese: Oh, no, he died several years ago. I don’t even know if his wife is still in the house. I think he sold the farm after he left. And after he sold the farm, he gave half the money from the farm to his ex-wife. I mean, all of a sudden, he just found himself a gentleman. So there was a very decent person trying to get out.

Smith: Were there people in the neighborhood who were, not on the personal level, but let’s face it – the circus moved on - were there people in the neighborhood on some level glad to at least see their lives return to normal?

Abbruzzese: No, all the neighbors at that time liked them and were happy with them in the neighborhood. Their politics didn’t matter.

Smith: And they would put up with all the disruption…

Abbruzzese: When it comes to a house or two away, it wasn’t so bad.

Smith: You wonder what the security would be like today. It’d probably be a lot worse.

Abbruzzese: They’d probably move him out right away. They’d move him to the Hay Adams or across the street.

Smith: This is great.

Smith: Peter, first of all, let me ask you, did you live in Grand Rapids all your life?

Cook: Yes, born and raised in Grand Rapids - south end of town. Born on Shamrock Street and raised on London Street.

Smith: It presumably has changed a great deal in 94 years.

Cook: Well, you know where those two streets are. They’re both one block long dead end streets between Clyde Park and Century, down by the old Kelvinator plant that doesn’t exist anymore.

Smith: We’d love to try to get a sense of what Grand Rapids looked like, felt like, when Gerald Ford was a boy, say in the 1920s-1930s, before the Depression, during the Depression. Talk about what the town was like in those days.

Cook: I can remember this. The southwest side of town where I lived, down where London and Lynch Street and Crofton, Hogan, all that, by the old Kelvinator plant – they were all Dutch. On the other side of the river were the Polish. But it was all Dutch down there. In fact it was so Dutch there was a church there, and they would have a Dutch service at nine o’clock and then an English service at ten o’clock.

Smith: Really? So when you say it was all Dutch, there were people down there who spoke Dutch routinely?

Cook: Oh, yeah. They spoke some English, too, but you’d have some of the older people – we kids – when the older people didn’t want us to hear what they were talking about, they’d talk in Dutch.

Smith: English was a second language – that’s interesting. What was the economy – was it basically all furniture? Was furniture the mainstay of the local economy?
Cook: And all of that goes way back and I think – and of course, Grand Rapids was the furniture capital of the world. Remember that? That was before your time. We had a lot of old trees in Michigan, the wood and everything. All these different furniture plants – we were the furniture capital of the world – remember that – Grand Rapids.

I remember South – there were three major schools – well, four major schools. There was South High School, Union, Central and Catholic Central.

Smith: Now tell me, because over the years I got the impression that there was a bit of a rivalry particularly between Central and South.

Cook: Oh, South and Union. Big rivalry. Every Thanksgiving Day they’d have a football game on Island Park, which is in the middle of the river – Grand River down there. It’s gone now, but there was a little ball park down there in the middle of the river – Island Park. Every Thanksgiving Day South and Union would play – it was always for the city championship and sometimes for the state championship.

Smith: So I take it from that, that being a football player was a big deal in Grand Rapids.

Cook: Oh, yeah, sure.

Smith: What school did you go to?

Cook: South High School – with Jerry Ford. He was the Class of ’31 and I was the Class of ’32.

Smith: Because we’ve been told over the years, his parents in particular wanted him to go to South High because they thought it was a much more diverse range of people that he would be exposed to. That Central High was a little bit more upper crust.

Cook: Upper crust – I’d say upper crust. That’s a good term. Upper crust.

Smith: And tell me about South High. What was it like, what was the student body like? Was it, in fact, very diverse?
Cook: You know, I can remember this. There were only three African-Americans. Siki McGee was a black guy – he played football and everything; then there was a female, I can’t remember her name. She was a four-star student. There were three black people in South High School – three black kids.

My folks had five boys in a two bedroom bungalow. Before I went to South High School there was a football player at South that got hit and got paralyzed, and my dad said to us kids, “You kids can’t play football, you’ve got to play instruments. Play in the band.” So I played trumpet, Art played clarinet, trombone, baritone, flute, and piccolo. We had a Cook orchestra. When we started dating, all my dad wanted to know – does she play piano? The girl we were dating - he needed a piano player.

Smith: Did you know Jerry’s parents at all?

Cook: No. See Jerry had two sets of parents and…

Smith: There was Dorothy and Gerald Ford, Sr. here in Grand Rapids, whom he always regarded as his dad.

Cook: I knew his brother Dick. Dick Ford. But I didn’t know his parents. I remember visiting Jerry several times in Washington. I’ll tell you a little story. I belong to this DOCA organization and we’d have our annual meetings in Washington. And so my wife and I invited Jerry and Betty to come to our dinner in Washington. Well, he said, “Peter, I can’t because I have to speak Saturday morning at Cedar Springs.” Back then we had a corporate airplane. I said, “Well, Jerry, you come and after dinner we’ll fly back to Grand Rapids, so you can be at Cedar Springs.” He said, okay. He came, but he said, “Betty can’t come because our dog is sick and she has to take care of the dog.” After, we found, she was drunk. This was when she started to be on alcohol. But he didn’t tell us that. We found that out afterwards.

That’s a little story in the background, anyhow.

Smith: Did you know her from your early days in Grand Rapids? Or was it much later?
Cook: Only after they got married, when they were in Washington. I danced with her several times in Washington.

Smith: Did you? She was a good dancer.

Cook: Good dancer, real good dancer. I was not a good dancer, but all I had to do was hold her hand.

Smith: Tell me again, South High – he was a football player. Was he kind of a big man on campus?

Cook: He was because he played center on the football team. In South and Union, I think that year we were state championship football team.

Smith: Was he a popular guy?

Cook: Yeah, he was. He never felt he was popular, but he was popular. Everyone liked him.

Smith: Tell me about the Depression in Grand Rapids. How did it make itself felt?

Cook: Oh, boy. I remember that for sure, you know. What that was, you had the little chips that you could buy bread and milk with?

Smith: Like scrip?

Cook: Like scrip or something. Because my folks were poor and so you’d get so many scrips and you could go to the grocery store and get bread and milk with it. That was in the Depression, oh boy.

Smith: What did people do? How did they get through it?

Cook: I don’t think a lot of them did. I remember as a kid going downtown in the night and there were a lot of guys sleeping under the bridges and stuff by the river. Only did that a couple of times. My folks took me down to see that.

Smith: Now, he put himself through college.

Cook: Who?

Smith: Jerry.
Cook: Oh, yeah.

Smith: And he sold his blood along the way. Got a scholarship. But it was tough.

Cook: Yeah.

Smith: What did you do after high school?

Cook: I got a job at the Kelvinator plant. I remember, seventeen cents an hour and then the minimum wage of thirty-five cents an hour came in.

Smith: That was a New Deal measure?

Cook: Right. New Deal, yup.

Smith: So you doubled your income.

Cook: Doubled my income. But, here’s the good thing, there was a guy in charge of the paint mix room. There were three coats of paint on those refrigerators: primer, intermediate and finish coat. He was in charge of the big tanks – the chemist. After the whistle would blow, the spray gunners would drop their guns and head out. He had to come out with a bucket of paint thinner and clean the paint out of those spray guns. I’d stay and help him. I wouldn’t get paid for it, but I’d stay and help him for fifteen or twenty minutes. One day he came to me and said, “Peter, they are putting on a night shift. I’m recommending you be in charge of the paint mix room.” Oh, boy. He said, “You’ll go from thirty-five cents an hour to a dollar and a quarter an hour.” Oh, jeez, great, I did.

Smith: You must have felt like a rich man.

Cook: I did! Then I decided I didn’t want to work at Kelvinator all my life so I went downtown to Davenport and started going to Davenport during the day.

Smith: Let me ask you before I leave this: downtown, were there movie theaters in the ‘30s?

Cook: Oh, there was the Majestic, I remember the Majestic, the Regent, yeah. There were two I remember, I think there were three.
Smith: Where were the places that high school kids hung out? There must have been restaurants or theaters or places where your classmates would congregate after school.

Cook: There was Houseman Field, Central High School Houseman Field there, and a lot of times there would be events there. And then there was – I can’t remember – South High had a park about three blocks from South High School, too. There was a big park there with a stadium. And then, you guys don’t remember this, Island Park in Grand River. That was great. Right in the middle of Grand River – there was a park out there. It was small, but there was a football field.

Smith: And the movie theaters – did you go to the movies?

Cook: The Majestic and the Regent, I remember when, way back, of course this recently when Jack Loeks started the theater downtown – what’s the name of that? The what?

Nelson: [inaudible]

Cook: That’s still downtown, but…

Smith: Tell me about Frank McKay. He ran this town, didn’t he?

Cook: He ran the state.

Smith: He ran the state?

Cook: Oh, yeah. And of course, I knew him as a kid, I knew who he was. He was the governor, wasn’t he?

Smith: Well, no, he was the political boss here in Grand Rapids.

Cook: That’s right. Yeah. I remember my dad was a mechanic for a road contractor, and Claude Loomis said I’ve got to buy, I forget the brand of tires, because Frank McKay owns that tire company. And if you don’t buy those tires for trucks, you’ll never get a state job.

Smith: That’s power.
Cook: Yeah, that’s power.

Smith: Where did this power come from? Do you know? What made him able to dictate to people like that?

Cook: I don’t know. I was a kid.

Smith: Yeah. I take it Grand Rapids was a very Republican town in those days?

Cook: Yeah, it was.

Smith: And he was the boss, I mean the political boss.

Cook: Yeah.

Smith: When Ford came back after the war and decided to run for Congress, do you remember Bartel Jonkman, the guy he ran against? The Congressman he ran against?

Cook: I do remember that name. Yes I do, because I supported Jerry Ford.

Smith: Can you describe Jonkman?

Cook: No. I know the name, I remember the name.

Smith: He was an isolationist, and Ford was an internationalist. How much of that, because we’ve been talking to other people, how much of that was a generational fight? All these young vets who just came back from the war, sort of taking on the old guard, the MacKay machine. That sounds like what was going on.

Cook: Do you remember – you know John McCain?

Smith: Right.

Cook: Admiral McCain – do you know Admiral McCain?

Smith: No.

Cook: Yeah. Well I belonged to DOCA group - Defense Orientation Conference Association. They were a group of civilians who supported our military. Way back then a lot of the civilians didn’t want to support our military, but this DOCA group did. Admiral McCain talked to us. This was when his son John McCain was a prisoner in Vietnam. Vietnam was it?

Smith: Yeah.

Cook: Never forget him talking to us about that. He was telling us what the Vietnamese people, if he would do a lot of favors, they would release his son. He said, “I can’t do any of that stuff.” He never did. Finally, they did release his son.

Smith: Yeah. Why did you support Jerry Ford when he first ran for Congress?

Cook: Well, I knew him. I went to South High School with him. He was Class of ’31, I was Class of ’32. Oh, I knew Jerry Ford.

Smith: What did you like about him?

Cook: I just liked him. Then of course he became our Congressman.

Smith: And what kind of Congressman – he was back here a lot as a Congressman, wasn’t he?

Cook: Oh, yeah. Right, yup he was. A good Congressman.

Smith: Good constituent service?

Cook: Then he became vice president, president. Yeah.

Smith: Right.

Cook: Nixon. Was it Nixon? Yeah, then he became president. I’d go to Washington several times and visit Jerry Ford.

Smith: When he was in Congress, did you ever go lobby him for something – for Grand Rapids?

Cook: No. I remember he pardoned Nixon, remember that?

Smith: How unpopular was that, even out here?

Cook: To me it wasn’t unpopular because I supported Nixon, but then it made Jerry Ford unpopular with the media people. Yeah.
Smith: You do you remember arguments at the time?

Cook: I remember a lot of arguments, I can’t remember how they go on, but yeah. They accused Jerry of pardoning the bad guy or something like that. I don’t know what they were talking about.

Smith: And there were people who thought there was a deal.

Cook: Yeah, well, it wasn’t Nixon, what was the name of the guy that he supported – Agnew?

Smith: His vice president was Agnew.

Cook: That’s vice president.

Smith: Who Ford replaced.

Cook: That’s right, Agnew.

Smith: How was it decided that this museum would be in Grand Rapids? What was the process whereby it came to be here? The library was going to be in Ann Arbor, and were there people here in Grand Rapids who were campaigning to have the museum?

Cook: I remember – I felt that the library ought to be in Grand Rapids, too, instead of Ann Arbor, but then they talked about this museum. I can’t remember the details, but I’ve been a supporter, of course, for a long time.

Smith: What was on this site before the museum? What did this neighborhood look like back then?

Cook: Jeez. I can remember land, but there were some old stores, I think there were some stores along here, too.

Smith: And downtown – this and the hotel, and the new art museum, really began the renewal of downtown?

Cook: The restoration or whatever it was downtown. Yeah.

Smith: What was downtown like before that?
Cook: Of course, as a kid, it was just small. I remember the streetcars downtown. Streetcars would run down Grandville Avenue, over to Warner Park.

Smith: And was anything open on a Sunday?

Cook: Hardly anything. Oh, no. That’s right. Everything was closed.

Smith: Was that the Dutch influence?

Cook: I think it was mostly the Dutch people, oh, yeah.

Smith: For people who don’t know, when they hear Dutch, what does that mean? What impact did they have? What was their outlook? They are fiscally conservative, presumably. Pretty traditional in a lot of ways? What does it mean?

Cook: To be Dutch?

Smith: Yeah, to be Dutch in West Michigan?

Cook: I remember the Dutch came over and they settled in New York and Michigan and Iowa. I remember in Holland.

Smith: Conservative?

Cook: Very conservative, yeah. Very conservative. In Grand Rapids, remember, the Dutch were on this side of the river and the Italians were on the other side of the river. The west side were Italians, the south side were the Dutch.

Smith: Was there a black population in Grand Rapids, to speak of?

Cook: Very few. In Grand Rapids, in South High School there were three blacks. Siki McGee was a ball player, then there was a gal, and she was a real sharp gal. And then there was another gal, I can’t remember her (inaudible). But Siki McGee and there was another guy…

Smith: And did he play football with Jerry Ford?

Cook: Oh, yeah. Yeah.

Smith: You saw Ford at the White House?
Cook: Oh, yeah, several times.

Smith: Did you go to a state dinner, or what kind of things would you…?

Cook: Oh, a state dinner up in his office? We were both from South High School, and I told you, when we invited he and Betty. Did I tell you that?

Smith: She has really made a lot of history in her own right though, hasn’t she?

Cook: Oh, afterwards, sure.

Smith: With what she has done in terms of the Betty Ford Center.

Cook: Yeah, with the Betty Ford, uh…

Smith: Center.

Cook: Center. Yeah. I guess you go through stages in your life, she went through one stage, but then afterwards she really, she did a lot of good.

Smith: When they left the White House and did not come back to Grand Rapids, did that cause a lot of comment?

Cook: Comment, I don’t remember. I remember, though, I went twice – I flew to California – what was the place in California?

Smith: Rancho Mirage.

Cook: Yeah, Rancho Mirage.

Smith: Right near Palm Springs.

Cook: Near Palm Springs, yeah. I visited him out there, twice. I remember the last time he was getting pretty weak. I remember he stood up, he had a – somebody sort of had to help him stand up. He talked to us holding on to the table with his hand. Everybody knew he was in pretty ill – or whatever.

Smith: That wasn’t too long before…

Cook: He couldn’t walk. I remember when they took him over to the other side of the room, they had two guys took him by the arms and took him over to the other side of the room to talk or something like that.
Smith: What do you remember of the funeral? Were you surprised at the local response? The numbers…?

Cook: Surprised? No, he was so well known…I remember, was it the funeral or something where all the highways were closed, I mean the people standing on the highways and roads – was that the funeral?

Smith: Yes. And the long lines.

Cook: Oh, long lines, yeah.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered? What about Jerry Ford, besides the offices he held, what about him as a person?

Cook: As a person? He was a great person. He was willing to help people, and he got the high office and everything, but he never became an imperialistic guy, no. He was always, ordinary isn’t the right word, but he was always an ordinary guy. Normal guy.

Smith: Accessible.

Cook: Yup.

Smith: Do you miss the old days, the old Grand Rapids, is this better than it was? Or just different?

Cook: In some ways it may be better, I don’t know. I miss the old days.

Smith: What do you miss about the old days?

Cook: I guess I miss the people. Just the people. The economy, of course, it used to be the furniture capital of the world, remember that? People would come from all around the United States to these furniture shows and all these, it wasn’t furniture companies we had, and then I guess we ran out of woods in Michigan pretty soon. So, the stuff moved down to the Carolinas. Remember – you’re too young – we were the furniture capital of the world, Grand Rapids. The furniture capital of the world. I can’t remember the names of the furniture companies.

Unknown: In 1985 President Ford came to the opening of your business.
Smith: Oh really?

Cook: Yup, he did.

Smith: 1985? How did you start your business?

Cook: How did I start my business?

Smith: Mazda – you were ahead of the curve. You were selling small cars before anyone knew they wanted small cars.

Cook: That goes way back. Way back. Started with Volkswagen and Porsche-Audi for twenty-five years, and then in ’77 the Japanese cars started coming to market – Mazda – so they came to me, and I became the only independently-owned Mazda distributor in the United States. I had Mazda Great Lakes. They gave me the five Great Lakes states. So I set up all the Mazda dealers in the five Great Lakes states. Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Ohio and Wisconsin.

Smith: And today you look at what’s happening to Ford and General Motors, it’s the small car that everyone wants to buy.

Cook: I know. But to me it’s something – I can remember I knew way back in the Volkswagen days, we had about a year’s wait for that little Volkswagen Bug. And I knew a guy who worked at General Motors, I said, “Why doesn’t General Motors make a little car like that?” I forget what he said, but it was something like, “Well, they’ll never sell more than two percent of the cars in this country, so we’ll never do that little thing – make that little thing.”

Smith: Well, I suppose when gasoline was fifteen cents a gallon, that attitude was understandable.

Cook: Well, I suppose so.

Smith: But when it’s four dollars a gallon…

Cook: Yeah, but that little car with the air-cooled engine in the back…

Smith: Did you sell many cars in the beginning? I mean, Volkswagens and the like – were you a success from the beginning?
Cook: Oh, sure. I can remember we had a year’s wait list for those cars. I remember one year’s wait list. We got to set up dealers, and then the Allies bombed the plant out in Wolfsburg, Germany during the war. And after the war, remember, all those German soldiers needed work, so the Allies rebuilt the plant in Wolfsburg so the German guys had something to do. Dr. Porsche was the guy that designed the little Volkswagen. It was the one good thing Hitler did. He said, “Dr. Porsche, we need a small car, a people’s car,” he said. That’s why Dr. Porsche designed this little Volkswagen and they made it in Wolfsburg.

Smith: I wonder how much of that success had to do with Dutch thrift? If the Dutch in West Michigan are as thrifty as I think they are, they would appreciate a small car because it’s a lot cheaper to drive than a big one.

Cook: I can’t remember, but remember, we had a year’s wait list for that little Volkswagen. A year’s wait list. The Allies had bombed the plant out over there…

Smith: And I think history repeats itself. I think there still a year’s wait list for small cars. Was there anything we haven’t covered? Anything about Jerry Ford?

Cook: Jerry Ford – yeah, of course, I remember him a couple of times in Washington, remember he was a football coach for – when Davenport started that University of Grand Rapids, or something like that? Jerry Ford was a coach there for a couple of years. After the war, all the soldiers come back from the war and they all had scrips or something to go to college, see? So Davenport started this university and had Jerry Ford as their coach out there. Then the scrips ran out.

Smith: Did you know Phil Buchen?

Cook: Oh, sure.

Smith: What was he like?

Cook: Phil Buchen?

Smith: They were law partners together, weren’t they?
Cook: Yeah – I’m trying to think. Yeah, they were law partners. Phil Buchen. Yeah.

Smith: Along with a man named Julius Amberg, I believe.

Cook: I remember that name, too. But I remember Phil Buchen. I used to see him quite a bit, way back. Phil Buchen. Yeah. I think I’ve outlived most of those guys.

Smith: Well, it’s not a complaint – maybe it’s a lament.

Unknown: There is one story you tell. He’s supposed to not say about Betty, he was supposed to tell...

Cook: About what?

Unknown: Your story that we’ve told you many times – the story is supposed to be that President Ford came in and one man met him at the airport, and then a few weeks later Air Force One came in and the streets were all blocked off. That was your story about taking him on your plane that you really wanted to tell, Peter. You got off on the Betty tangent rather than telling about how only one man was at the airport.

Smith: This would be before the vice presidency?

Cook: The title – it’s the same guy, only one guy meeting him at the airport, now he’s got a title, now the whole place is jammed. You get a title and, yeah. I said, he’s the same guy.

Smith: Now, walk me through that. You met him at the airport? This was before the vice presidency or…?

Cook: Oh I knew him in South High School.

Smith: Okay, but when he came to town, and you said one person met him at the airport – was that when he was still a Congressman?

Cook: Yeah. I flew him to town, didn’t I, from Washington?

Unknown: Well, this was the story with the Red Flannel Days.

Cook: Yeah, that’s right.
Smith: But you flew him – he was coming home for the Red Flannel Days…

Cook: Yeah, he had a speech. There was only one guy at the airport to meet him. Was it a month later and he’s vice president or something? And he had to speak at Calvin College – yeah, that’s right. He was to speak at Calvin College. My gosh, there was a thousand people out there to meet him, now because he’s vice president. Same guy, but different title.

Smith: But you know, it’s the same guy – that’s the key. Because he didn’t change.

Cook: He didn’t change at all, no. He was always the same. When he was president I would visit him in Washington. He was always the same guy.

Smith: That’s the key. He didn’t change.

Cook: No. He had a lot different responsibilities and everything.

Smith: That’s what we want. Thank you.

Unknown: I didn’t know if you wanted him to elaborate on when he came – you asked him to come to your grand opening at their new company and he came with the head officials of Japan – you had a party at the Amway Grand.

Cook: Oh yeah.

Smith: He came back a lot, as a former president. He came back to Grand Rapids quite a bit.

Cook: He did. This is sort of his home town, really – his home town. Grand Rapids.

Unknown: The President called him on his birthday.

Smith: You’d get a birthday call?

Cook: Yeah. I don’t know if he knew, but his secretary knew.

Smith: But he was the one on the phone.

Cook: Yeah. Sure. I remember the last time I visited him in Santa Barbara, was it? Santa Barbara, California?

Smith: Oh, Palm Springs?
Cook: Palm Springs. He was getting very weak, like I told you. They had to help him up.

Smith: Was that toward the end of his life?

Cook: Toward the end of his life. Maybe about a year before he passed away.

Smith: I think he was very frustrated once he could no longer travel. That was a real source of pleasure for him, including coming back here. I think the last time he came back here was his ninetieth birthday, and they had the big crowd outside the museum.

Cook: I think so. We were there. Yeah. Well, life is great. Wait until you young people get to your nineties and all.

Smith: I was going to say, I should live so long, but, thank you.

McPherson: I knew Ford growing up. He and my father were friends and I saw him from time to time. I saw President Ford many times when I was working for him as Deputy Director of the Presidential Personnel. At those meetings I developed some understanding of President Ford’s decision making.

Smith: Excellent.

McPherson: I also saw President Ford when I was Jim Baker’s deputy in the President’s fight for the nomination in 1976. Baker was responsible for “delegate hunting” for Ford at the convention.

Smith: That’s gold. I mean, all of this is gold. Let’s talk about West Michigan, because it is a distinctive place. One senses it has changed considerably over the years. The influence of the Dutch, and the Christian Reformed Church were clearly significant. Sometimes, there’s a semi-comical element - the stories about people buying a Sunday paper on Saturday and not reading it until Monday. I’m trying to get a sense of what made West Michigan stand out. Was it not the place that most influenced Gerald Ford; and why were they such a good match during those years where he was in the Congress?

McPherson: The Dutch were a cultural influence since they arrived in large numbers around the turn of the century. My grandmother came from Holland about 1900 when her father came to Grand Rapids to work in the furniture factories. She married a local farmer, my grandfather, and so I was always very aware of the Dutch community, though my grandmother became a Methodist when she married. The Dutch community and their churches were not a dominate political influence in Kent county until probably the late ’50 early ’60s.

Smith: We’ve been told that they tended to shy away from political involvement.
McPherson: I think they did for generations, but they began to get really active in the late ‘50s and into the ‘60s. I hope someone has or will do a careful study of why and how the Dutch moved into an active political role. I am talking here about their role in Kent County (Grand Rapids). In Ottawa County (the other county of Ford’s congressman district) it is my impression that the Dutch were a larger portion of the population and the Dutch were politically active much earlier. In Kent County, as the Dutch became more prominent economically and the immigrant generations passed away, the Dutch community apparently began to feel that they could and should exercise more of a direct political role and should elect leaders from their own community to public offices like the State Senate and House. The big change was the Dutch organizing aggressively through local Dutch churches (mostly the Christian Reform Church I think) to control the primaries. Of course it was the Republican primary that was generally important in Kent County. Jerry Ford was already in Congress before this degree of involvement by the Dutch. I am not aware of the role of the Dutch churches when Ford won the primary for Congress in 1948. Ford defeated an incumbent who I think was Dutch, Congressman Yonkman, though I never heard he was the Dutch candidate. I had the impression that Ford always had strong Dutch community support but also had strong support from others.

For example, Ford, I think, developed a close relationship with many in the Catholic community. Grand Rapids has a large Polish-Catholic community. There’s an African-American community. I grew up on a farm in the Vergennes Township in Kent County. The Dutch were there – people like my grandmother, but not in huge numbers. So, major rural parts in Kent County generally were not very Dutch. The board of supervisors for Kent County was divided about equally into the 1940s between greater Grand Rapids and the rest the county. In brief, the full county was not politically dominated by the Dutch as I was growing up in the 1940s and 1950s.

Smith: Did the broader culture have more of an influence?
McPherson: Yes, but it depended on where in West Michigan you lived. As I said, I grew up in rural Kent County. I didn’t grow up in Ottawa County, and I think if I’d grown up in Ottawa County it might have felt differently. Or if I’d have grown up in one of the dominantly Dutch communities in Grand Rapids, it would have no doubt felt differently as well. The Dutch definitely were more socially conservative than much of the rest of West Michigan. I remember being struck by the fact that the Christian Reform high schools did not have dances after football games. We had those dances at Lowell High School.

Smith: Clearly the nature of conservatism evolved during the Ford years. When he was in the White House he was regarded as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. And then almost overnight with the rise of Ronald Reagan, conservatism was redefined. Certainly with the advent of the religious right as part of the governing coalition. So when you say social conservative – that almost has a…

McPherson: Social and economic conservatism.

Smith: Certainly fiscal conservatism.

McPherson: Absolutely. In West Michigan when Ford was growing up and then a Congressman, most everybody thought that you should not spend money you didn’t have. We didn’t think abortion was a good idea. On the other hand, growing up I remember a couple of girls in my high school that I think had abortions. But it wasn’t as if these young girls were forever bad girls if they were otherwise good people. This was in the late 1950s.

Smith: That raises a really important point. Because my sense is that Ford is of a generation that practiced economic conservatism and a healthy skepticism about what government could do to bring about Utopia, through social engineering.

McPherson: Ford generation clearly thought it was the job to individual hard work. It was about individual merit and hard work. We were expected to be responsible people. Working hard and taking responsibility was a key value of West Michigan culture.
Smith: By my sense is that along with that went, for lack of a better word, a decent reticence about subjects that you didn’t discuss. Certainly you didn’t see them as part of the political agenda.

McPherson: Yes.

Smith: We were talking with Justice Stevens. He was never asked about abortion in his confirmation hearings. But to go back to West Michigan and that generation - America in the ‘50s, for lack of a better cliché, there were a lot of things below the surface; a lot of things that are now part of the daily conversation.

McPherson: I think, by the way, that kind of view was the Kansas that Bob Dole grew up in too. In my view, the old Midwest had a set of strong convictions and no doubt, if you didn’t work hard, if you were a derelict, you were kind of an outcast, and if you weren’t responsible for your kids and your family and so forth. But it wasn’t so much a political issue, it was a social question.

Smith: How did your path first cross with that of Gerald Ford?

McPherson: He was our congressman. My family lived in Kent County, and therefore I lived in Ford’s Fifth Congressional District. My father was politically active and always worked for the Republican Party and therefore worked for Jerry Ford. I periodically saw Ford in that context. He’d always had his trailer that he took around the district including to the city of Lowell, the little town where I went to high school. As I think about this, that time seems like America of a long time ago, an America without drugs and without the kind of crime and so forth that we now have. At least that was the way it was in my little community.

Smith: Isn’t it interesting that someone who was as politically secure in his district spent as much time in the district?

McPherson: I thought that Ford gained energy from his conversations with people. I felt he was interested in what I, as a teenager, had to say. And I remember walking across the Kent County Fair with him one time when I was in college. I was taking him from one place to another, and people stopped him all along the way and asked him things. I was impressed by how he would ask them questions back and really want to understand. He seemed curious about people and problems. I was impressed by his range of interest in people and practical issues.

There was an old Dutch farmer in our township; he was one of the smartest people I’ve ever known. No education, but really smart and wise. And he had this regular letter writing relationship with Jerry Ford. Orie Gronabone was his name. I remember Ford telling me, “You know, he gives me a real common sense perspective on things.” Ford clearly read his letters. As I came to know Ford, I admire him and thought him a very good and sensible man. That’s the way my father thought of him - sound, predictable, and caring about his district.

I went to the Peace Corps for a couple years right after Michigan State, and when I got back I went to law school at American University in Washington. I went to Ford and said I’d like to work on Capitol Hill. Ford got me a job with a Congressman Zion of Indiana. I of course maintain some relationship with Congressman Ford.

Smith: That’s interesting.

McPherson: I always felt that Ford had a relationship with members of the Catholic community. Many of them probably voted for his Democrat opponent but everyone liked Jerry personally.

Smith: There must have been, I can’t remember the name, I guess there was a gadfly…

McPherson…who ran against him for Congress lots of times and Ford beat him fairly easily as I recall. There was a difference in political views, but almost everyone thought that Jerry Ford was a good person. It is true that some, especially Democrats, thought that he was aggressive enough or did not propose enough new ideas.
Smith: You mentioned the Catholic community – I wonder if you have any sense what his relationship was with the African-American community.

McPherson: I don’t know any details about it. But I think that he knew their leadership and many individuals and he wanted to hear their views. I am sure that he was too conservative for many in the African-American community and they became more vocal in the 1960s. Still Ford did not think of himself as a congressman for 60% of the population of his district. He was the Congressman for his whole district.

Smith: So when you saw him in the Minority Leader’s office, he was basically the same man?

McPherson: He was the same man. He was elected to Minority leader by members like Mel Laird. Laird was a brilliant, capable and a somewhat Machiavellian individual who made great contributions to the country. Ford clearly was not Machiavellian as that term is generally used, though Ford did plan. I think Laird saw Ford as a person he could perhaps control. It was a mistake for Laird or anyone to think that ultimately Ford was going to be somebody else’s man.

Smith: We had a great interview with Laird. Bob Dole says Mel Laird’s the guy who puts poison in the stream a mile up river and then runs into town to save everyone. Pretty good line.

McPherson: Now, Ford also had relationships with younger people, for example, Congressman Rumsfeld, who supported Ford when he ran for leader. Ford had this great capacity for friendship. Most people have friends, but Ford had friends with a much broader range of backgrounds than most people realized. I say that when I was working in WH Personnel and came to have a broader understanding of Ford’s relationships.

Smith: That’s an interesting observation. Plus the Republican Party was a different party then. It was a party centered in the Midwest. And you had a northeastern wing; and you had parts out west. Initially, you didn’t really have much of a southern contingent. That didn’t begin to develop until after the Goldwater…
McPherson: Eisenhower picked up a number of states in the South, but the Republican Party really began gaining strength at a state level in the South in ’64 and thereafter.

Smith: There has been criticism over the years that the Republicans were of a get-along, go-along permanent minority mindset. Now, that clearly doesn’t dovetail with Ford’s ambition to be Speaker of the House. But there is that persistent criticism…

McPherson: about Ford and Michael.

Smith: The older I get, the more I am convinced the single biggest political factor – trumping ideology or anything else – is generational. And certainly if you look at this subject, each generation of House Republicans tends to look over their shoulder and to some degree, condescend to an earlier generation of House Republicans.

McPherson: But I think it may also have been generational with the Democratic Party. I think that if Michael, and Ford before him, could work with the majority and could get at least some things done. But by the time you had people like Speaker Jim Wright running the House – his idea was to say, “We’re just going to do it and you Republicans shouldn’t even complain.” The Democrats got to be so entrenched in their hold on the House. It does seem to me that it was generational both with Republicans and the Democrats.

Smith: Consider the ‘74 Watergate Babies, and all that. One of the great ironies was that Gerald Ford, who spends his adult life on Capitol Hill, as president finds himself defending the rights of the Executive against these newly empowered, energized, aggressive lawmakers.

McPherson: Much of this was a mistake.

Smith: The War Powers Act is the classic example.

McPherson: During a presidential crisis and their aftermath a lot of unwise things can happen. We had the Anti-Impoundment Act, which stopped the future use of the very helpful quasi-line item veto. We lost presidential impoundment in the last year of Nixon’s presidency. The country would have been much better off fiscally if the Anti-Impoundment Act had never been passed. We also got some unfortunate court decisions during the Clinton years e.g. body guard to the president can be forced to testify, etc.

Smith: Now where were you as Watergate unfolded?

McPherson: I was a tax lawyer at the IRS during those last Nixon years. The Nixon WH wanted me to come over and work in White House legal office, as part of the impeachment defense. It was a great career decision not to do that.

Smith: So, how did you come into the White House?

McPherson: Over the years, I had been very active in the Young Republicans, and I’d come to know Sen. Bill Brock very well. Bill Walker was then head of the White House Presidential Personnel and needed a clear conservative for his office. Brock urged that I be hired.

Smith: Bill Walker or Ron Walker?

McPherson: Bill Walker. Bill Walker was a protégé of Rumsfeld from Illinois, and he was the Director of WH Presidential Personnel at the time. When Walker offered me a job, I said I wanted to do it but that I thought he probably ought to know that I had grown up in the President’s congressional district and I knew the President some. That’s exactly the way I phrased it. I not sure Walker took much notice because I said it so causally. I never mentioned it to anybody else again. It’s unwise in the White House, unless you really have lots of access to the president, to talk about how you know the president. However, I thought it was fair for Walker to know.

Smith: You were in an ideal position, then.

McPherson: So Walker a few weeks later, ran down the hall past my office and said, “Peter, you are working on this personnel problem. I want you to go with me over to see the President.” So I walked into the Oval Office and the President said, “Peter! What are you doing here?” It was fun, actually. I got a big kick telling my father about Ford’s comment and Walker seemed pleased too.
Smith: Clearly, one of the conundrums that Ford faced from day one was how to balance his sense of fair play and justice toward the vast majority of the Nixon holdovers, who had nothing to do with Watergate and who in many cases were highly competent. Plus he had a government to run, so there was an element of continuity. How do you balance that against the need, political and otherwise, for change? For people to see that this is a Ford administration and not an extension of the Nixon. Rumsfeld has been pretty explicit, and others have backed him up, that he strongly urged the President to clean house early. And one senses that the President, for a number of reasons, was not inclined to take that advice. Over time, clearly, he put in place a Cabinet of his own, and a very impressive group of “Ford people.” How did that play itself out in the personnel shop?

McPherson: There was a feeling that there needed to be a break between the two administrations. Certainly Presidential Personnel had the impression we were supposed to do. It’s also true that the Nixon people had been there for many years. The fully productive life of a senior government official generally isn’t a full eight years, and so there was some turnover in the nature of things. In any case Ford wanted to recruit some new strong people. That is reflected in the careers of so many of the Ford people. When you go back and look at the Reagan and the two Bush administrations, there are a lot of Ford people.

Smith: Let me just nail down: how early in the Ford presidency did you go to work there?

McPherson: I think I went to work in February.

Smith: Of ’75?

McPherson: Yes.

Smith: The other side of this coin, of course, is the criticism that the people Ford brought with him, mostly from the Hill, were not quite presidential caliber. That may not be fair, but I would be interested in how you mesh out of your kind of local circle, with the demands of this very different job. Plus you had the Nixon holdovers.
McPherson: Well, of course, it’s a person by person question. Some of the people Ford brought with him from his Hill experience were excellent. There was of course Don Rumsfeld. Another excellent example was former Congressman Jack Marsh who provided advice to the President on a range of issues. He was one of the wisest people I have every worked with and I suspect history will not give him full credit because he was so self-effacing. Some of the other people the President brought from the Hill were not prepared for the much more demanding jobs at the WH. Bob Hartmann is the person people usually talk about in that context but I personally never had much contact with Hartman.

Smith: Why was Hartman such a polarizing figure?

McPherson: Maybe a little bit because of personality. I had the impression that Hartmann was sort of gruff and not very communicative. The reason there was a vacancy for me to fill at the WH, by the way, was because Hartmann insisted my predecessor be fired. My predecessor continues to be a great friend of mine over these years. He did something that Hartmann didn’t like and Hartmann insisted that he be fired. Hartmann exercised authority such as in this case some felt it was unfair and arbitrary. I stayed out of his way. I knew enough to not get involved with him.

Smith: Is there a thin line between protective and possessive?

McPherson: Oh, sure. Ford trusted Hartmann and needed to have somebody like that around. Hartmann had no agenda in terms of getting a better job personally. His agenda was President Ford. I think that Hartmann’s biggest problem was that he had lived and professionally grown up in a single and not-large world, and all of a sudden he had real power in a much bigger world. And he didn’t have time to adjust and perhaps did not want to. There is not much time to adjust to the bigger world of the WH. Others will have more developed views on Hartmann.

Smith: Very well put.
McPherson: There are a few people in most WHs who have time to think about things more and talk to more people. Jack March is a good example of a person who did this.

Smith: Enough critical things have been said about Hartmann…in Hartmann’s defense, he played a critically useful role at the very end of the Nixon presidency, with Haig and making certain that Ford didn’t even accidentally leave an impression regarding the pardon and all that.

McPherson: That was a historically important role, and I think that Hartmann doesn’t get enough credit for his role. The older I am, the more I’m disinclined to make final and complete judgments about individuals. I tend to take them in pieces – this works and that does not work.

Smith: And I wonder - Hartmann having seen Ford on the Hill, knowing him in ways that other people didn’t…for lack of a better word, the Eagle Scout quality about Jerry Ford, the fact that he was genuinely shocked that anyone would lie to him. It’s a hugely admirable, human trait, but it may not be the best outlook for a president. And you wonder whether Hartmann, in his own mind, was compensating to some degree by being the SOB.

McPherson: He’d probably always played that role with Ford. I assume but I don’t know for sure.

Let me mention something that goes back to Ford’s relationship with his community. I was the young man who of course wanted to impress the President. I soon found that when I went to see the President on something, that if I told a little news about Kent County, he just loved it. I remember there was a man who was a pillar of the community in Lowell by the name of Norm Borgensen, who had just died. And I said, “Mr. President, did you know that Norm Borgensen died?” And he said, “Is that right? Nobody told me. Norm was a wonderful friend of mine.” He loved his community and the individuals in his community.

Smith: So the congressman never wholly went away.
McPherson: The congressman never completely left. I had the impression he was always the congressman from the Fifth Congressional District, in at least some part of his soul. That was true, even after he left public life. When I saw him after he left office, he always wanted to hear about or talk about people back home.

Smith: And yet presumably the trajectory of those two and half years is the degree to which he was able to master a very different set of leadership skills.

McPherson: And he was the person to do it.

Smith: Could you see that?

McPherson: Yes. Absolutely. Look at the Nixon pardon. I’m thrilled yet when I think about his wonderful speech to the convention. I’ve never seen him give a better speech. It was a very presidential speech. I think he thought about national issues because of his roles on the Hill – but he understood what he had to do to be the leader of the nation. It could not have been easy to go from a brief time as Vice President and years as Minority leader and then to President of the United States. It’s always irritated me that people did not understand how smart and knowledgeable Ford was on a great range of issue. They mistook lack of flashiness…

Smith: Plus, Midwesterners talk slow.

McPherson: They talk slow and they don’t try to impress with brilliance. In fact, if you are trying to be brilliant, you are viewed as somebody from New York or somewhere like that, back in those days anyway. It’s a little different now because Grand Rapids and Michigan are more cosmopolitan. But that’s not the Grand Rapids that Jerry Ford grew up in.

At the WH I became the chief operating officer of the Presidential Personnel and from time to time gave the office’s recommendations directly to the President. Ford always knew so much about people, about government organizations, about history. I of course felt that I better really know what I talking about when I went to see the President because he was likely to know a lot more than I did about the some part of the issue a hand. And he was thoughtful about people and issues but he definitely had his own developed opinions on lots of topics. There could be no assumption that he was going to accept what we told him he ought to do.

Smith: That’s interesting. We’ve talked with Cabinet officers and others who have related wonderful stories about the budget process, where he would get both sides into the Oval Office. You can’t imagine Richard Nixon making decisions that way – but he liked to have the protagonists, in this case, the antagonists.

McPherson: He liked to talk about it and think it through. He liked other people there. In some ways it wasn’t a debate forum. It was a let’s discuss it forum.

Let me tell you a story about Ford’s decision making. Kissinger is brilliant and certainly Ford felt he was. I said to Kissinger just before a big dinner the other night and said, “I bet you never knew this story about your appointment of Rodgers to be Undersecretary for Economic Affairs at the State Department.” Henry did not know the story. WH personnel and Chief of Staff Dick Cheney did not think the President should appoint Rogers. This was the spring of ’76 and the convention was a few months away. The Cuban community was strongly opposed to Rogers. We thought why do we need to do this now?

Smith: Now, this was the appointment of?

McPherson: Of an Undersecretary for Economic Affairs at the State Department – Rogers was a competent good man by the way. He was Assistant Secretary at State for Latin America. So the appointment is before the President for his decision Cheney, Doug Bennett, who is the head of the office, went to see the President to lay out why he shouldn’t make the appointment. I am told by the others to make the case and I did so. Ford ponder the question a few moments, and said, “Well, Henry wants this, I know. But I have also thought about it, and I am going to go with Rodgers because it is the right thing to do.” And we all sat up straight and said, yes sir. I really respected President Ford.
Smith: Did it include the political ramifications in Florida?

McPherson: Yes. I argued to the President that he could do this for Rogers in another day, another time. Rodgers was already an Assistant Secretary; he doesn’t need to move up. Besides Rogers was particularly an economic policy person, he was a foreign policy person. I think Ford made the decision because he thought it was right and did not want to take politics into consideration. So, after I told this story to Henry, Henry stands up at the dinner and says, “Ah, Peter McPherson told me a great story about how he tried to roll me and he never told me about it until tonight’ which wasn’t quite the way I phrased it. And Cheney came up to me afterwards and said, “Peter. We all experienced those situations from time to time, didn’t we?” This was about two months ago.

Smith: Let me ask, how was the White House different with Rumsfeld in the chief of staff job and Cheney? Or was it?

McPherson: Well, it didn’t seem to change immediately. Rumsfeld had his so-called snowflakes – brief memo on directions or ideas - that were always coming. Cheney was more of an institutional manger, from where I sat, than Rumsfeld. Does that sound right?

Smith: Yeah. We’ve also been told that there were people, including the President’s personal secretary, who thought it was a more relaxed atmosphere under Cheney.

McPherson: Oh, I think probably.

Smith: Certainly not in terms of relaxed professional standards or work product, but a somewhat…

McPherson: Easier personal relationships.

Smith: Exactly.

McPherson: As far as I was concerned, Rumsfeld did very well. Overall Cheney’s way of operating did not seem that much seem that much different from where I sat. I am certain that I do not have a full view however.
Smith:  Was the White House slow on the uptake regarding Reagan? Because there have been stories about efforts being made which, in retrospect, seem a little off the wall - appointing him to a Cabinet position, for example.

McPherson:  Yes. There was a crazy idea. Reagan wasn’t going to accept secretary of transportation.

Smith:  It would border on insult.

McPherson:  Exactly. I’m sure that that’s what Reagan must have thought.

Smith:  Was the offer made?

McPherson:  I believe so. I was told it was.

I thought there were two key decisions which were not good policy and hurt our relations with the conservative. Not meeting with Solzhenitsyn - and Kissinger always understood international politics better than he did domestic politics – that was a real mistake. And, too, the supporting of the Secretary of Labor on the common situs.

Smith:  John Dunlop.

McPherson:  Dunlop is a brilliant man, but he’s an organized labor person. The Republican Party is not the party of organized labor. You go to Oklahoma, you go to Texas, and other parts of the country that were the center of conservative Republican strength and the President’s support of the common situs legislation really made critical people mad.

Smith:  Explain it for people who are not familiar with the term.

McPherson:  To be simplistic the common situs legislation essentially requires union workers for large portions of construction work even if it was not a government paid for construction. It flew right in the face of the right to work legislation of many states. How we ever got into this mess…those two decisions, in my view, gave legs to Reagan that he never would have had otherwise.
Smith: Interesting.

You get this checkerboard approach to foreign policy, where, on the one hand, détente is being pursued, but then you’ve got confrontation in Angola, and other parts of the Third World. You’ve got the Soyuz-Apollo mission going forward, and Helsinki.

McPherson: Foreign policy almost is never totally coherent in any administration because of the complexity and differences in the world. Tidy minds find foreign policy very frustrating. The world is too big and complex.

Smith: And primary campaigns are all about tidiness.

McPherson: The world is too complex to be totally consistent so you have to do the best you can. On the other hand, I never understood why Henry felt so strongly – and I’d be curious, if you ever talk to him, which you no doubt will or have – why he was so against the President seeing Solzhenitsyn. First Ford should have seen him as the right thing to do on human rights. Moreover, the Russians understood that we had a political campaign going on. It not as if they never did anything to irritate us.

Smith: And then, remember, this sort of Africa split…

McPherson: This common situs legislation – I would be very interested in what people like Jim Baker say – but it was my view then, it’s been my view ever since, that those two decisions caused Reagan’s base to say they had to do something. The pardoning of those who left for Canada during Vietnam upset conservatives but that decision had begun work itself out by the summer of 1976 in my view. Moreover, that those pardons probably needed healing. Just like the Nixon pardon, the decision was sound.

Smith: Of course there’s an irony here. Jump forward a year to the convention, and instead of picking a really emotional hot button issue to try to shake those last delegates free, Sears embraces this procedural issue about naming your vice president…
McPherson: Let me talk about the convention. Jim Baker asked me to go over and work for him and be in charge of the team of people working on delegates for the convention.

Smith: Leading up to the convention?

McPherson: Yes. I went over a few months before the convention. Baker was in charge of the delegate hunt, which was much of the campaign at that point in time.

Smith: Someone, told us that if Her Majesty ever got a look at the guest list for the Bicentennial dinner at the White House, she might have been surprised at how many uncommitted delegates and their families were there.

McPherson: Certainly. We worked the delegate problem from all legal angles. We had the person in charge of each of the regions in the country – most of them with a lot of convention experience. Over the years I had been involved in a number of party conventions and this was a particularly exciting for me. Reagan’s operation was run by Sears, who was a great technician and strategist, and had great credibility with the press, mostly because he spent a lot of time with them and could tell a great story. He was to be able to persuade the press like few I have known. Reagan announced Sen. Schweiker of Pennsylvania as the Reagan vice president nominee and that immediately put Pennsylvania in play. Sears then convinced the press that Reagan probably had the Penn delegation and it was plausible. Ford and our team really worked those delegations. However the person that delivered the delegation for Ford was Drew Lewis of Pennsylvania. Drew later made history as Reagan Secretary of Labor. Drew’s gone, isn’t he? He was a good man.

Smith: I don’t know.

McPherson: I’m almost sure he is. But Drew pulled that delegation together.

Smith: Did Sears think that by picking Schweiker they could bring Lewis with him?

McPherson: Yes, they certainly hoped so, because Lewis was a political creation of Schweiker. Sears clearly felt that they had something to do with the Schweiker move because Ford was winning. Ford was lining up the delegation one-by-one. Both camps more or less knew where the delegates were going. There were some major uncertainties like Mississippi but the trend was clear and Sears knew that sooner or later the press would figure it out. So he pulled out Schweiker and created enough uncertainty so he was able to have another few weeks of uncertainty. By the convention it was fairly clear Ford had Penn but Sears was not though, as we will discuss later.

But there was no question that we used state dinners and various kinds of stroking of delegates.

For example – it sounds astounding, but Hawaii was uncertain enough, that we recommended the President call every delegate in Hawaii – every delegate – that was a total of eighteen or nineteen people. And, of course, true to form, one guy when he is talking to the President says, “Okay, I’ll vote for you if you appoint me to this Presidential commission.” It was a commission at HEW as I remember. Of course the President did not commit anything.

Smith: Dick Cheney told us about a family who came from Brooklyn or the Bronx or something. I think it was a woman. And she would go back and forth; one week she was for Reagan and one week she was with Ford. Finally, “So what is it going to take?” And she said, “I want to meet the President in the Oval Office and bring my family.” And a meeting was arranged and on the day in question, this really disreputable looking bunch of people show up and had their visit with the President.

McPherson: All of the delegates weren’t model citizens. Cheney was very involved in all this. He was the key and of course was the gatekeeper to the President, ran the President’s schedule and so forth. The President was wonderful. The President understood the politics but never made any personnel or other such commitments.

Smith: Yeah, it’s congressional.

McPherson: It’s lot like congressional politics. So we get to the convention and there’s a problem. We had the majority of delegates including those states that were bound by their state primaries to vote for the President. For example Indiana primary bound the delegates from that state to vote for Ford. But when Indiana party selected their delegation they created a problem. The Ford people who had won the primary were party people and they did not want to be too confrontational. They wanted to work with the Reagan people after the convention. So Indiana’s party put some Reagan people on the delegation on the theory that they would vote for Ford pursuant to the binding primary requirement. Unfortunately for Ford, that primary did not bind Reagan supports to vote in support of Ford on procedural matters. On the other hand, when delegations bound to Reagan, his people usually did not allow any Ford supporters as delegates e.g. in New Mexico Sen. Domenici, a Ford supported, was not allowed to be a delegate. So when you look at the formally committed delegates, Ford had the majority but it was still close. If you look at the vote on procedural matters the outcome was not so clear. So John Sears came up with his famous 16-C proposal, which was something about the candidate naming your vice president.

Smith: You had to name your vice presidential…I’ll show you mine if you’ll show me yours.

McPherson: Of course but it was in fact a test of power. Test of strength.

Smith: But a procedural test as opposed to…anything gut, emotional.

McPherson: There was an emotional/public policy move Sears tried later and I will talk about that in a few minutes. But back to the procedural vote, the afternoon before 16-C, I suggested to Baker that I get together Cliff White, Dean Birch, and Bill Timmons for one more look at the formally committed Ford delegations in which there were Reagan supporters. Our regional political people were working hard but I thought these old hands might have some ideas. The group mapped out some additional ideas on how to deal with some of these problem delegations like Indiana. In that case the former Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz was on the Indiana delegation as a Ford supporter. Butz was a powerful man in Indiana. This went reasonable well. We went to Butz and he had an impact on some of the Reagan supporters using a moral argument of the primary vote.
But we still had the problem with Mississippi which was remained uncommitted as we the evening session of the convention approached. The 16-C vote was to take place that night.

Smith: With the famous Clarke Reed.

McPherson: Famous Clarke Reed. Clarke Reed had committed to both sides. He certainly had committed to President Ford.

Smith: Probably not the first time.

McPherson: But Reed apparently thought Reagan wouldn’t be in the race to the end and so it was freebie to commit to Reagan as well. I know Reagan thought he had Reed’s commitment. His approach in the time leading up to that night was to tell both camps that he could not go public yet but rather he would work quietly. But then the convention came with an approaching 16-C. Mississippi caucuses that afternoon to decide how to vote on 16-C. Reed cannot keep stalling both sides. Mississippi has what is called unit rule – there were 60 votes, and whoever had the majority gets all 60 votes. If you got 31 votes to 29, you got all 60. In the end Reed fell apart, latterly crumpled. He just kind of folded up in his bed and could hardly move. Ford had this excellent convention man who became a preacher, the southern strategist for Nixon.

Smith: Harry Dent?

McPherson: Yes, Harry Dent. He worked Mississippi for Ford before and that night. As the evening session was approaching, we did not yet know the outcome of the Mississippi caucus. At that time I delivered the delegate vote count for 16-C to Cheney who in turn took it to the President – I delivered it at about five o’clock – the convention was beginning at seven – The vote count showed an undecided convention, with Mississippi being the swing. Well, Mississippi, as I said ended up voting all their 60 votes with us, and Ford won the procedure vote with some votes to spare and people saw what was happening. And there are a lot of other things that impacted that vote, but the Mississippi was critical. I’ve still that vote count chart we used in the trailer.
Smith: To what do you attribute Mississippi’s decision?

McPherson: Harry Dent’s good work was the key on top of the relentless work leading up to the convention. I know of no other time that Mississippi had so much attention at a Republican convention.

Smith: Did Reed become less of a factor?

McPherson: Yes. As best I can tell he was not a factor in the Mississippi vote on 16-C. He literally was crumpled up on his bed and was inoperable.

Smith: A Nixonian turn of phrase. And that was a bitter convention, wasn’t it?

McPherson: Yes for some of people most directly involved.

Smith: To people watching, the First Lady, the wives and friends.

McPherson: I was sort of the day to day operator, if you will, of the trailer. Timmons was there, but Timmons was doing a lot of things. Timmons is a very good man.

Smith: We had a great interview with Timmons.

McPherson: My friend Charlie Black was my counterpart over in the Reagan trailer, just a few yards away. We won the 16-C and that was the critical vote at the convention. Ford might have won the nomination if we had lost 16-C but it would have been real struggle.

Smith: Plus, you would have had to name a vice presidential pick.

McPherson: Most important, we would have lost the momentum. The next day was the platform day and Reagan folks proposed a full platform, including a plank on the Panama Canal, several hardline and anti-détente positions. And Rockefeller and Kissinger were up in their box extremely upset about the Reagan platform and demanding that we tell the floor organization to vote against the Reagan platform. The process was moving quickly on the floor for a single vote on the whole Reagan platform. So the question was, as Timmons and I are sitting there in the trailer with our floor network – our communication network – should we tell our people to vote against the resolution. Maybe Cheney and others had already worked out a position but we could not get a clear direction on what to do. So we decided to tell our floor structure to tell the delegates to vote their conscience. Timmons will remember this. Have you talked to him?

Smith: Yeah.

McPherson: No one told us anything, so we just said to vote your conscience. It passed by a voice vote and that was it.

Smith: And you know the famous Tom Korologos story about this? Kissinger threatened to resign, not for the first time – and you can hear Korologos saying this, he said, “Henry, if you’re going to resign, do it fast, we need the votes.”

McPherson: Korologos is a wonderful guy. So the thing went by and it was so smart not to oppose this because there was no gain among this group of people to argue about the Panama Canal.

Smith: But it goes again to your point about Kissinger’s grasp of geo-politics being much surer than domestic politics. Plus he saw it in very personal terms, as a repudiation of his legacy.

McPherson: And maybe another way to think about it is when your responsibility is international, you don’t take other areas into consideration as much as you might. Maybe that’s the way to say it, because he’s enormously clever. If he had the responsibility for domestic affairs, he might have had a different view altogether. I never told Henry that story. He probably knows it.

Smith: What made Baker so good at what he was doing?

McPherson: Baker is organized; Baker is an extraordinary tactician, even in working on problems new to him. Baker is very good with people; people like Baker. He’s an extraordinary effective within government and Congress. More than that however he sees the big picture and gets it done.
Smith: And obviously good with the press.

McPherson: And great with the press and has credibility with the press. He engenders confidence. He may be the best of anyone in modern times in getting things done in government.

Smith: The confluence of policy and politics; some people are good at one, but not both.

McPherson: Baker always talks about himself as a politician who works the policy, instead of the other way around - a policy person who worked the politics. He was able to accomplish most things he has sought out to do – I saw it, for example, in the Canadian Free Trade Agreement when I was his Deputy at Treasury. We just would not had the Canadian Free Trade Agreement without Baker and that agreement led to the three party trade agreement with the US, Mexico and Canada. The economics of this country would be different if the US hadn’t done the Canadian trade agreement.

Smith: Yeah. The whole question about the vice presidency. I’m satisfied after many conversations, that those closest to Governor Reagan, in advance of the convention, made it crystal clear that he was not interested in the vice presidency, and that it should not be raised.

McPherson: You’re talking about the Ford convention, ’76?

Smith: Yeah, when they met after the nomination. And yet Reagan supposedly told Baker once they were both in the White House that, had Ford asked him – I almost sensed he was trying to have it both ways because the real Reagan, not to mention Mrs. Reagan, would have opposed him going on that ticket.

McPherson: I don’t know, I think that Reagan was a patriot. And that if Ford had said, “We need to patch everything together here. We can’t have Carter for four years, would you do this?” I think he might have done it. Now there would have been some debates about Henry Kissinger’s status and other questions.

Smith: Do you think it was ever seriously considered?
McPherson: I just don’t know. I think the biggest issue was Kissinger. And Kissinger brought some problems to the President, but he also brought some huge strength too.

So the more interesting issue was what happened at the convention in 1980 when Henry and Greenspan tried to get Ford to be a co-president to Reagan. Fortunately sound judgment prevailed on this. On the other hand, if Henry and Alan had not tried to reach for so much control of the Reagan Presidency, could Ford and Reagan have worked it out with Ford as Vice President?

Smith: Would Mrs. Ford have been willing to – at that point in their lives?

McPherson: Who knows? It was a bad idea anyway.

Smith: Exactly. It is your sense that it was something that Kissinger and Greenspan were promoting?

McPherson: Yes, absolutely. It was their ticket back into the game. And of course both had much to contribute to the county. Nevertheless the whole idea was unrealistic.

Smith: But it’s fascinating, on the other side of the coin, people today forget Reagan’s willingness to be pragmatic in pursuit of victory. They claim Reagan would be a Tea Partier. Interesting. Is that the Ronald Reagan who put Richard Schweiker on his ticket in ’76 and was willing to put Gerald Ford on his ticket in 1980, and who did put George Bush on his ticket in 1980.

McPherson: Absolutely. Ronald Reagan had this wonderful capability of articulating a vision and a spirit, but the capacity not to be so constrained by such that he defeated his own ends.

Smith: That’s great. And if you could bottle that…you’d be a wealthy man. And I suspect our politics would be a lot healthier.

After the convention, were you involved in the campaign?

McPherson: Yes. I ran several of the states in the Midwest for the campaign and then after the election I came back to the WH.
Smith: And of course, the rationale for putting Bob Dole on the ticket was, going into that convention, you didn’t even have your own base. The farm belt was, at that point, literally up for grabs.

McPherson: It was a problem because we should have had that base. But we did not and it goes back, in at least some part, to decisions like the common situs decision. I’ll bet you when you talk to some of these other people like Baker – ask him – he’ll probably complain about the common situs decision.

Smith: It’s a great line of questioning. Did your heart sink when you watched the Poland debate?

McPherson: Oh, when he talked about Poland? Absolutely! I’m sitting there and my friend Don Sundquist, who later became governor of Tennessee – “Ah jeez, did he say that?”

Smith: It reinforced all the doubts about his capacity to be president.

McPherson: I certainly had no doubts but it surely hurt the President. On the other hand, I love those polling data, day by day, as we approached the election. Each day Ford was stronger. And we damned near won that election.

Smith: What did you think at the end?

McPherson: That we might win it. We were climbing a point a day. Ford was steadily more presidential. We don’t like these long campaigns in this country, and I think for good reason. But I also think there is enormous growth in candidates as they run for president. They became more sensitive to a set of people, to a set of the issues. They become bigger people because they must.

Smith: That raises one quick question: on balance, do you think the Reagan challenge made Ford a better candidate, and therefore, a stronger candidate in November, or did it contribute to his defeat?

McPherson: I think if we hadn’t lost North Carolina, the Reagan Challenge would have helped. If Ford had won NC, Ford probably would have been able to wrap it quite quickly. Ford had to fight on too long. North Carolina probably insured the convention and the convention just was too much.

I wanted to tell you one other story. Ford, after he left the presidency, was always very helpful to me, which he was to so many people. When I was President at Michigan State University, I brought the Detroit College of Law from Detroit to Michigan State at East Lansing and built a new law school building. Ford gave the speech to dedicate the building.

Smith: I think I wrote the speech.

McPherson: Did you? It was a great speech. I sat in a little room just before his speech for about 30 minutes. He wanted to tell me about my grandfather. My grandfather was a political leader who more or less ran rural Michigan for about twenty years just before Ford went to Congress. It was great fun. And then I said to Ford, “Now, tell me about your primary against Jonkman?” And he said, “Well, you know, he was really an isolationist. I’d come back after the War.
I’d seen the world and did not agree with Jonkman. I couldn’t get Sen.
Vandenberg to be publicly for me, but Vandenberg did a whole lot to elect me.” I’m sure that you’ve heard that before.

Smith: I heard something like that, yes.

Smith: First off, Peter Pocklington, thanks so much for doing this, we really appreciate it. Tell us a little bit about you, and how your path first happened to cross that of Gerald and Betty Ford Pocklington: Well, I was an owner of a hockey franchise in Edmonton, Alberta, and bought the Oilers in 1976 when it was in the World Hockey Association, and by ’79 we’d joined the NHL and started to amass some pretty incredible talent. One of them being Wayne Gretzky, who I bought when he was seventeen. He flew into Edmonton, I sent my plane for him. They came into Edmonton, he was a young guy that I doubt had even started to shave yet, and yet he was probably, looking backwards, he was certainly the greatest hockey player that ever was.

Smith: Did you have any idea at the time?

Pocklington: I knew he was damn good but I didn’t know he was as good as he turned out to be, obviously, and bought Wayne and then we assembled, through good management, and maybe a lot of good luck, probably the greatest NHL team that ever was – really did great things during the Eighties – and early Nineties – we won five Stanley Cups and, at one time had five players on the team that scored at least more than fifty goals each. Which is incredible now if you get one, you’re in great shape. So we really had one of those fairy tale teams, and I also did other things – bought and sold businesses and, one of the things that I championed was the thing called Junior Achievement, because I wanted youngsters to learn some of the things that I had been fortunate enough to learn – business wasn’t all bad and, it is kind of exciting, actually, and to raise the profile of that I brought in speakers. And this would be in 1979 or 80, and I’m trying to remember exactly when I did phone President Ford.

But I phoned his office and asked for him and they wanted to know who I was, this audacious character wanting to talk to the president. And finally they put me through to President Ford. And I said, “Mr. President, I really want to have you up as a speaker.” I gave him a little background of me and said, I’m trying to bring in people from the…number one, with integrity, and some conservative thought, poor old Canada is pretty Socialist, and he agreed to do it. So, I sent my airplane down to Palm Springs and picked him up and brought him into Edmonton and I believe we had thirteen or fourteen hundred people show up at the speech that President Ford put on and he did a great job and stayed the next day and we had him for dinner at our home and met various people. But I charged them all to come to dinner to meet President Ford because of the fact we needed the money for Junior Achievement.

So he kind of set the model for what I did with many, many speakers and he also helped me, by the way, and introduced me to many of these speakers. One was President Bush ’41, who I had up, and also Maggie Thatcher and Kissinger, and the list is long. And raised millions for Junior Achievement, in fact, because the strongest Junior Achievement chapter in Canada, really because of Jerry Ford. Jerry Ford got the thing rolling and gave me a few ideas on it. And part of meeting him and I really enjoyed him, he was kind of down to earth and…

Smith: What did you expect? Was this the first time you met him?

Pocklington: Oh first time I met him! I met him at the airport when the guys brought him in and I was a little reticent, you know, and poor little broken down Canadian kid with the President of the United States coming in, but he made me feel very much at home and warm and got to know him over the next two days – more than maybe I thought I would and ended up making a deal with him that I would like to kind of use him as my mentor and pay him an honorarium and arrange the odd speaking engagement for a couple of my companies. And he agreed to that and we became pals ever since and starting, I think it was that year, it became a tradition, I had the team down to Palm Springs, and then finally Pebble Beach with President Ford. He would play golf with the players and after the game, we’d all go to his residence for a cocktail party and meet Betty. Kind of old home week, he loved to be around people and sports.

Smith: Now, did that include Gretzky?

Pocklington: Oh yes, of course.

Smith: Did they hit it off?

Pocklington: Oh, they really did, and he was just a kid at that time, of course, 20-21. They were all pretty young. He really, really, really, enjoyed being around the players and then after the cocktail party at his home we went over to a place called Wally’s Desert Turtle, and we rented the whole restaurant, and it was kind of a charming restaurant in Rancho Mirage, and after dinner he’d get up and give a ten or fifteen minute speech and motivate the guys. Part of my reasoning was that if these kids could hang around with prior presidents rather than, whatever, raise their self-concept. In building the team, I brought in a fellow from Los Angeles called John Boyle, who ran a thing called Omega. It’s a four-day seminar. You become what you think about. If you want to raise your behavior and ability to do things, you don’t worry about practicing that, you raise your self-concept – kind of like the inner game of tennis, the inner game of whatever. And with Wayne it was very easy – he took to it and that’s really the reason the team was so damn good, because it was programmed. So Jerry Ford was part of that.

Smith: He was in effect the motivational speaker?

Pocklington: Oh, but in a different way than rah rah rah. It was more strength and integrity, and never say die, and we’re going to win regardless. He was almost Churchillian in the way he hung in.

Smith: I didn’t know if you heard, again the notion of him as tongue-tied…he had a practice of going back to Ann Arbor, usually before the big, I guess, game with Ohio.

Pocklington: Right.

Smith: And he would go out on the field with the team and give them a pep talk.

Pocklington: Yeah.

Smith: And I never had a chance to see it, but I’ve talked to a number of people who did, and they were all of the same mind. In that setting, there was a kind of eloquence, free-flow, beyond articulate – I mean, almost a sermon, pushing all the right buttons…

Pocklington: Oh, no question.

Smith: And connecting, you know, emotionally.

Pocklington: He had an alter ego that nobody knew about that just popped into, as you say, with youngsters that were going to win. And man, could he get them going. But not in a rah rah sense, but more in a, “you’re not going to beat us,” sense, and damn it, they won continually. And we all looked forward to our yearly meeting with President Ford and the golf and, finally, we took it over to Pebble Beach, and for years did it at Pebble Beach and played two days. Played Pebble and then we’d play Spanish Bay and then maybe, Pobby Hills.

Smith: And how long, do you remember the last time you did it?

Pocklington: Well the last time, I sold the team in 1993, so it would be ’93. So every year, we didn’t miss a year. And every time we won a Stanley Cup the guys would present President Ford with his Stanley Cup ring and so he’s got five Stanley Cup rings in the safe somewhere.

Smith: Did he know hockey?

Pocklington: Well, he sure got to know it. Growing up in that part of the country there was lots of hockey, and, being close to the Canadian border, and of course, the great hockey in Chicago and Boston and New York, when he was young, of course he saw it.
Smith: Did he seem knowledgeable about the game?

Pocklington: Yes and no. I don’t think he was a student of hockey, but he loved sports and loved the players and loved to be part of the action.

Smith: Do you think it applied to all sports?

Pocklington: Oh, no question. But, maybe strongly football. As you know, he was a football fanatic. In fact, we flew him into Ann Arbor – and they presented him with his sweater – they retired his sweater and there had to be a hundred thousand people in the place. I’ve never seen anything like it. And they drove him around in a golf cart, and of course everybody cheered and went mad and so it was very exciting.

Smith: Very emotional for him?

Pocklington: Oh, absolutely, and emotional for me, because I love sport and I love that kind of theater, which it was. But he was very instrumental in, believe it or not, helping us win five Stanley Cups. Nobody knows that.

Smith: No, that’s great. Did you get to know Mrs. Ford?

Pocklington: Very well.

Smith: Was there anything about either one of them that surprised you as you began to get to know them?

Pocklington: Well, let me give you a little background with Betty, because being in the sports business with guys that love to drink, I had seven of them go through Betty Ford. Sat them down and said if you want to clean up your act and be part of the team, you're going to have to go dry out. So we sent them to the Betty Ford Center and straightened every one of them out, strangely enough. One died afterwards from cirrhosis of the liver, but they really enjoyed the Betty Ford Center and through that association I became a board member on the Betty Ford board and got to know, obviously, Betty very well, because she was there at every meeting. She ran a tough ship.

Smith: How so?

Pocklington: She – I mean the reason it is so successful is because of Betty Ford – no other reason. They put on a great program, but she oversaw everything. She was very detailed, she was there every day, visited every day, talked to the patients, made sure that the board did what they had to do. It was very tightly run and professionally run. I was surprised that she had that acumen. She was pretty outstanding.

Smith: She ever have to fire people?
Pocklington: Well, she did through the president of the place – a guy named John Schwartzlose – and John did a good job in doing her bidding, very strong and good at it and to this day it has a rating of – check it out with people - 96% of them refer to the Betty Ford Center. So it’s like Kodak – it’s got a pretty strong branding. So she saved a lot of people, turned a lot of people around and I enjoyed being part of it, and now that she no longer – now that her daughter has taken over – I’ve now become – I think they call me emeritus – no longer go to the meetings. They are bringing on a bunch of younger people.

Smith: And how frequently were those board meetings?

Pocklington: While I was on their executive committee and the finance committee, every three months, and finance meeting, every six weeks.

Smith: And I take it she was involved in everything?

Pocklington: Absolutely. There is no question. That’s why it reached the pinnacle of turning people around. I think it has the, in fact I know it has the highest, turnaround rate of any bunch in that it is also very well priced. It is medium priced, it’s not way up in the sky like most people think because of the few celebrities that went through. They gave it a celebrity status.

Smith: And does that reflect her wishes as well?

Pocklington: She wanted to make sure that, in fact they give away ten percent of their tuitions to people who can’t afford them. So she makes sure that everybody gets looked after. But we do have or did have a lot of celebrities that went through, that quite frankly gave it a profile that a small, new business needed.

Smith: The general public wonder, what if any, ongoing relationship any of those people might have with Mrs. Ford.

Pocklington: Oh, I don’t think any of them ever had, other than people that maybe she knew before they came in. I know she had two or three or four people that she knew well that went through, but one of the things that we instituted in Betty Ford was an ongoing follow-up with the patients who had come through, because, as you know, a lot of them fall off the wagon afterwards and to raise the level of keeping people sober we contacted them a couple of times a month for a couple years to make sure that they were behaving themselves and stuck to the program. So that’s one of the reasons it was very successful.

Smith: And I assume, because of its visibility, there must be more people who want to get in than the place can…

Pocklington: No, it’s – Betty wished to keep it small and private. She didn’t really want to get to the point where it was some great big hospital that lost its personal touch. I think when I left a month or two ago, it was at 115 beds and they are always full. And one of the things I helped institute was – they’d get all these calls but they weren’t closing them – so we put together a bunch of people to train them on how to close when people phoned and not only just phone, they get put together and made sure we got them in. So, that’s why it’s always full. It’s very well run, even from the business end of it. They have everybody that phones, we put the full court press on them to make sure we bring them in because they are really just reaching out – we need some help and before they weren’t closing enough of them. And it’s 50/50 men and women.

Smith: Age diversity there?

Pocklington: Oh, anywhere from 20 to 70. It’s amazing, and now, of course, the drug of choice is, I guess alcohol is still the strongest, but I tell you there is so many other things now, from crack cocaine to meth to some…..

Smith: So it does address drug issues.

Pocklington: It does address those others, but mainly alcohol was easier to do, because with drugs, especially meth, it takes a while to bring them down to where their system is almost normal to get them turned around on the Twelve Step program.

Smith: There must be instances that, I’m not looking for names, obviously, but there must be cases where friends, or friends of friends, approached her directly.

Pocklington: Well, that has obviously happened a few times and she simply addressed the situation, says come with me and takes them to the hospital and they put that particular person in and two or three of the high profile celebrities just that way.

Smith: Were you surprised, or was she surprised to know that she has turned into this administrator?

Pocklington: Oh, I think she probably looks at how it all started. As you know, President Ford did an intervention on Betty with the family. He said, Sweetheart we love you dearly, but you’ve got a serious problem here and the family is going to implode unless we correct this. And they did and she went to, I think it was a Navy hospital, and within a few months she and Leonard Firestone decided to put together the Betty Ford Center. And because she is so strong and dedicated, there is no question that it was going to be successful.

Smith: But it must have been an extraordinary process of self-discovery for her to learn that she could do all of these things, that she could meet all of these challenges. That there were such untapped abilities.
Peter Pocklington

June 2, 2008

Pocklington: Well, you know most successful marriages, you marry someone certainly with equal abilities and strengths, and there is no question that Betty was certainly Jerry’s equal as far as abilities and she was amazing, and their marriage was one of the best I’ve ever seen.

Smith: Do you think there is a secret to that? If you could bottle it, and market it, what was it?

Pocklington: I think number one was strong loyalty, because they’d been through a lot of, you know, bang-bang – he was on the road a lot, he was away a couple of hundred days a year.

Smith: Do you think he felt any degree of guilt about that? Let me ask the question differently. My sense was that he really made an effort in later years to spend quality time with the kids, and obviously with her as well. And that he was certainly aware of the fact that he had been on the road.

Pocklington: He was aware by the time she got into trouble with the drugs and the pain killers and the alcohol, and I think it was kind of a, wrong expression, “come to Jesus” meeting, but it was kind of that, “let’s get things back under control” and he even quit drinking when she did. Not that he drank a lot, but had enjoyed the odd cocktail and he said he quit and became dedicated to helping her remain sober, which she did and never lapsed. But he was part of her strength and vise versa – they really complemented one another in their endeavors and he went to a lot of, in fact he went to all the social gatherings for the Betty Ford thing. The yearly alumni dinner, he would always come and be present and go to a lot of the meetings.

Smith: I’ve heard stories of him on the grill cooking hot dogs.

Pocklington: Oh, absolutely. During the day when, it’s really a two and a half-three day effort, and he became very involved. No question. Cooked hot dogs and got involved with the people. And I think that is another reason – that’s part of the glue that held the whole thing together, because she was so involved and brought him into these things, people loved to be part of it.

Smith: Did people feel at all, initially, awkward, about interacting with the Fords?

Pocklington: Well, there’s no question, because I know how I felt when I first met, then he was President Ford to me, now he was Jerry, but, when you meet a former president, you figure he’s God – he is elevated to we, the folks, so I’m sure most people feel that way. I know when we introduced him to people, when we brought them as friends of the hockey club to these things, part of our deal every year, I’d bring in twenty or thirty business friends, and the first time meeting they were all kind of awed, and it meant a lot to them. So he really was the glue that helped me put all this together and keep it together. So people do feel, no question, feel awed by him. And he’s kind of a striking character, he’s kind of patrician.

Smith: Interesting you should say that because it’s an interesting observation. I mean he was very approachable, very accessible, in many ways down to earth, but there was also a dignity…

Pocklington: Oh, without question.

Smith: …about him.

Pocklington: There was another strength. Absolutely. So many people felt that, and a lot of them couldn’t get by it and I didn’t know any better.

Smith: How so?

Pocklington: Well, he radiated kind of a strength, and they really never got by it to know who he really was – the kind guy behind the patrician sense. He really was, he really had a soft spot.

Smith: Tell me about that.

Pocklington: Between all of these crazy meetings we’d fly around and I always had to make sure we had ice cream on the plane, which I wasn’t supposed to tell Betty about.

Laughter

Pocklington: And that was a secret – I could have the ice cream on it and he’d eat it as long as I wouldn’t tell Betty.

Smith: Did she watch out for – watch his weight.

Pocklington: Oh, without question.

Smith: Really.

Pocklington: So we had to keep the ice cream thing fairly quiet.

Smith: He seemed like a pretty self-disciplined guy.

Pocklington: Oh, he sure was. Yeah he really was. But other than the ice cream he would devour newspapers – he’d go through three-four-five newspapers before he really started to chat and then we’d talk about the events of what he had just read about. And then often we’d go back and talk about some of the things he did when he was president and before he was president. I was always curious about the Warren Commission. And he said that, with the information we were given, this is the conclusion we came to. And he would never vary from that statement, because I always tried to wiggle around behind and see if he thinks there really was a conspiracy, etc. But he felt not and said again, with the information that they were supplied, this was the conclusion they had to come to. I think that its showing that that was absolutely correct.

Smith: He wasn’t happy with Oliver Stone, was he?

Pocklington: Oh…..many times, playing golf, because I ran, too, for the leadership of the Conservative Party in Canada against Brian Mulroney – he ran and I ran and four or five other did – but I really ran because we had this character Pierre Trudeau who Jerry obviously knew and …

Smith: What did he think of Trudeau?

Pocklington: Well, he was a Socialist – an absolute Socialist. And the reason I ran for the leadership of the party was number one, a New Year’s speech he did with CBC and he said, “I will guide the ship with such skill that the destination will not be known until we arrive.” I mean you know he was going to dismantle the whole damn thing and create a Socialist society, which he was trying to do and came close to. I mean it is still pretty far left. It seems what they like to do down here, the politics of envy, they got it and we want and we’re going to pass it out. But Trudeau was a very charming character and I…

Smith: There is a kind of Kennedyesque aura that attaches itself to that whole era.

Pocklington: The press did that. It was kind of Canadian’s Camelot – similar to Jack Kennedy. I took Trudeau skiing one time – I owned a ski mountain in western Canada in Kamloops, and skied with him for the day, and he’d just gotten back from visiting Castro. And talked about Castro using the French word lumière, light bulb. I mean, “Pierre, the guy’s a Communist,” “Oh, no, no, no.” I mean he was, Pierre liked to think he was above all this – that we commoners didn’t understand and he had had a tough time in that, if you remember he had a wife, Margaret, who was a bit of a character, in fact…

Smith: Decidedly unCanadian?

Laughter

Pocklington: Kind of decidedly very common Canadian. She loved to carry on with, in fact, two or three of my hockey players – had carried on with her. But Pierre was not very happy – they had just come back from Cuba and I’m sure that Castro had had a roll in the hay with Margaret and he was not very happy. But he is a great skier and we didn’t stop for lunch. I was beat by three and he was still wanting to go. I said, “Pierre, we gotta calm down.” He was twenty-thirty years my senior. But it was because of that outing that I got involved – wanted to get into politics and change the way things were. I was an egotistical pup and thought, damn it, we can’t let this guy destroy Canada. So I ran for the leadership of the Conservative Party and got to know Brian Mulroney, obviously very well, running against him. And we had, at that time, a fellow by the name of Joe Clark who was…

Smith: a short-lived prime minister…

Pocklington: a short-lived prime minister, thank God, ‘cause he was way to the left and not that Brian was much more to the right, but it was maybe center. But I ran on flat-rate tax of twenty percent, get rid of all crown corporations, 45% of Canada’s industry was owned by the federal government, and promote free trade with the U.S. and free trade with anybody that cared to trade with us. So I was, at that time, a bit of a radical as far as the press were concerned. But I really enjoyed politics, and that’s why I enjoyed Jerry Ford so much. So many times when we were golfing, just before I was going to hit a drive, he’d start talking about Trudeau, and I’d say “For god’s sake Jerry, shut up!” He knew he’d get me roiled and…

Smith: What did he think of Trudeau?

Pocklington: Oh I think personally he enjoyed him. He liked Pierre, because Pierre was a charming guy. And, as you know, President Ford wasn’t as far right as I was, he was pretty centered, but Trudeau was pretty left, and he’d really get me going when we’d chatted about that.

Smith: Was he knowledgeable about Canadian politics?

Pocklington: Oh, absolutely. He was unbelievably well-read. I mean, as I say, every time we’d go somewhere he’d devour his five or six newspapers before we went…
once we took off he’d get into the newspapers and you couldn’t bother him until he ate a little ice cream and read his damn newspapers. But he spent an hour on them. He’d go through the Wall Street and the Washington Post and, I’m trying to remember what other papers he had.

Smith: He read The Times?

Pocklington: The New York Times. He also had the British The Herald, but he was really very well read. I don’t think most people really understood that he was as knowledgeable as he was on everything. You could talk to him about anything and everything – once you got to know him, but most people didn’t realize that.

Smith: What other subjects, what other interests or kinds of things that might surprise people.

Pocklington: What did surprise me was that he didn’t like fishing. I love to fish. I used to go fishing a lot up to the area, could take a bunch of businessmen, always tried to get Jerry to go along. “Naw, I don’t want to go fishing.” He didn’t like roughing it, he was, he liked to be in good surroundings and civilized.
Smith: He wasn’t a camper.

Pocklington: He wasn’t a camper. Wasn’t a shooter or a fisherman – that was the other part of him that was very different, because to me, most men that I like to be with like to hunt and fish and golf and sports and so on. But Jerry wasn’t that, and it was interesting.

Smith: As you got to know him, did he talk much about his colleagues, did he talk much about Nixon?

Pocklington: I asked him a lot about Nixon, because I wanted Nixon to come up and speak and Jerry wrote him a letter on my behalf, but he said Dick had a bit of a dark side to him – he said he was very bright – knew what he was about – but he really had a dark side that he didn’t, I don’t suppose he’s told many people that, but he said there is that dark side.

Smith: Did you sense that Watergate surprised him – or the language, for example…

Pocklington: That hurt him, because Jerry doesn’t use profanity – I’ve never heard him – oh a time when he misses a putt or something – but no, he was very eloquent, well-spoken at all times, always a gentleman. I know he was shocked by Dick Nixon and the tapes and the fact that he had to lie and didn’t need to and said he’d still be there if he hadn’t lied.

Smith: Ford really was a bit of the Eagle Scout, wasn’t he?

Pocklington: Yeah. Oh he really was – all the way to end, he was an Eagle Scout. No question. Loved that, that upbringing really meant a lot to him.

Smith: Did he talk about his parents? Or his upbringing?

Pocklington: Well, he sure loved the folks that adopted him. He was very close to them. And they obviously did a good job on him. And I met his brother when we went to Ann Arbor to the football thing and they’re all pretty conservative, laid back people. But yeah, he talked about, told me the whole story of when he was adopted.

Smith: You know that’s interesting, because he from boyhood, he had a temper.

Pocklington: Oh, I’ve seen that two or three times. There is no question. He could really get, you could just see him seething.

Smith: What would cause him…

Pocklington: What would set him off, I’m trying to think what did set him off. I tried to look around it, because he was, he’d get pretty upset.

Smith: Red-faced?
Pocklington: Oh, very red-faced. You could see him having to try to control it and he always did. You knew he was really pissed off at something, but he always controlled it. So he did have a temper. There’s no question.

Smith: Beyond missing a putt?

Pocklington: Beyond missing a putt when it came to serious stuff, yeah, he really got teed off, but always controlled it.

Smith: I only heard him speak negatively of two people. I’ll never forget, he said, the ultimate epitaph was, “He’s a bad man.”

Pocklington: Yes, I’ve heard him say that.

Smith: He’s a bad man, and there were only two people I’ve ever heard him say it about. One was John Dean and other was Gordon Liddy.

Pocklington: Yeah, I’ve heard – he told me about Gordon Liddy. He didn’t think much of him, but, I tell you one fellow we brought to one of these golf outings was Alan Shepard, and Alan Shepard played golf with Gretzky and Jerry and I and what a charming, wonderful guy he was. So Jerry asked him what his experience of being on the moon was, and he said, “You know the thing that was really interesting was the fact, when you look up from the earth in the sky and see the moon, when you look from the moon, looking at the earth, it’s four times as big.” He said that was the thing that really impressed him the most. And Jerry was awed by that, as I was.

Smith: Of course he was on the original NASA committee in the House. There’s a reason that if you go to the museum in Grand Rapids that it’s a spaceman out there. He didn’t want a statue of himself.

Pocklington: Right.

Smith: So that was one of his interests.

Pocklington: Very much so. So he was, we really enjoyed Alan Shepard – and when we played then, he had cancer at the time, I don’t recall what brand it was, but it was obviously fatal, and…but what a sweet man he was. One of the most charming guys and very eloquent. He made a little short speech after Jerry made his that evening.

Smith: You’d think that to go through life forever being thought as the first American in space, in some ways would be very limiting. It obviously would open a lot of doors, but would also be the first, and in most instances, the only thing, most people knew about you. I suppose it is similar to having been President of the United States.
Peter Pocklington  June 2, 2008

Pocklington: That’s very true, but he was more than that. I tell you, he really impressed me a lot.

Smith: Were there other people who impressed the President – or people he became friends with or, frankly, didn’t impress the President?

Pocklington: I don’t think he was really enamored by Bill Clinton. He never said anything that was untowards, but I knew him well enough that that kind of behavior wasn’t acceptable.

Smith: The latter half of the Clinton presidency and the whole scandal.

Pocklington: That’s right. I mean that did not impress him “a-tall.” Jerry was a straight arrow, he didn’t fool around ever on Betty and he was always straight and very loyal.

Smith: Plus, you think of him as someone who was of a generation that had a reverence for the White House and the presidency.

Pocklington: Oh, absolutely. And that really upset him. That really bothered him.

Smith: Did he talk much about his years in the White House – did he tell war stories?

Pocklington: Well, he did. I was always interested in his war stories. He was very strong on the Mayaguez thing, he was bound and determined that no one was going to pull any wool over his eyes and always was incredibly strong and got it handled immediately. I also asked him about his meeting in Russia and, as you know, a lot of people thought he was weak-kneed on it, but he said he enjoyed it and got a lot done and he thought positively and had a bit of an admiration for the Russians, even though they were obviously not what we wanted.

Smith: Maybe the hardest thing of all is for somebody in that position is to see someone across the table in human terms and not just as the leader of another system.

Pocklington: And not the enemy. From my point of view, he looked at most people as, he checked them out, tried them out and see if they were real people, regardless of what side of the aisle they were, or what crazy country they were from. So he had a bit of a respect for the Russians in the fact that that was their culture and we had to deal with it and I think he did so very successfully.

Smith: Did he form judgments about people quickly? My sense was that he was a pretty optimistic guy.

Pocklington: Oh, he used the word optimist, optimistic, I think in every speech he made. He said I am an optimist. And he was. I think that was one of the reasons we got along so well. Because I love optimism, I love to see people win win win.
You become what you think about. He was always optimistic, I always believed that good was going to overcome evil. And that was really what he was about and that was who it was – always optimistic. I always gave someone an extra chance, an extra yard.

Smith: Did he harbor regrets about ‘76, about not having that full term?

Pocklington: I think he was very disappointed, like really disappointed. He said to me, it really came down to, “you know if we just had thirty more days the economy was turned around, we missed by such a small margin.” I think he got to know Jimmy Carter when he went over to Egypt to the funeral and I’m not so sure he was his best pal until then, but he did get, obviously closer, and spoke nice things about him after that. But, he was really disappointed. I think he was heartbroken deep down that he didn’t have that second term. And one that he had won legitimately in his mind, that he had gone to the voters. I also asked him about the pardon of Dick Nixon. He said, “Peter, I had to do it,” he said it was taking up “forty percent of my time. Talking to the press about that problem, and he said, “You know, the guy was human, there’s no sense hanging him up,” but he said, “I had to clean up the office. I had to put it behind us, closure. Let’s get on with building America and not worrying about what this character had done.” And that’s the reason he did it. He said, “I know it was going to harm me politically, but that’s too bad.”

Smith: You know, the wonderful thing that was unlike someone like Lyndon Johnson, who only lived four years – in fact, literally died the day before the peace treaty was announced – President Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking…

Pocklington: No question…

Smith: I’ll never forget that day at the Kennedy Library, when the Profiles in Courage Award that was the cherry on top of the sundae. He must have taken real satisfaction in knowing that…

Pocklington: Huge. In fact, he invited even me to the Profiles in Courage thing, and for some reason didn’t go. It’s a long damn way to go to Boston, but I wish I’d gone because it really meant a lot to him. And he spoke of it afterwards that this was pretty good stuff.

Smith: He didn’t ever seem like someone who would think in terms of personal vindication.

Pocklington: No…

Smith: But you’re only human, it must have been…
Pocklington: You’re only human, he was almost egoless from the point of view of “I have to be better than you.” He just wasn’t that.

Smith: Which is so unusual in a politician.

Pocklington: Ah! It’s huge!

Smith: And a president!

Pocklington: A president! I mean, I’ve known a few of them and they are pretty egocentric folks. Jerry wasn’t ‘a-tall’ – just wasn’t. And I think that’s one of the reasons that I really came to admire him. I learned from it and had to grow up and get over the ego nonsense. So, from that point of view I got more out of the relationship than he obviously did.

Smith: Did they have a lot of friends?

Pocklington: They had a lot of acquaintances.

Smith: I was going to say, the whole apparatus has got to get in the way of a kind of natural, relaxed, you know. My sense, at least from the time I was around them, that they consciously tried to have younger people around them. That it was almost a deliberate effort.

Pocklington: It certainly was in my case, because I was twenty-five younger, thirty years younger. And I’m trying to think of some of his other people that he would call friends. I’m not really sure that he got too close to too many people. Lots of acquaintances, lots of people that he was obviously very polite to. But he certainly had lots from the White House years and a lot of the people on his board – they were all pretty good pals.

Smith: Let’s face it, there is also a sense that there are a lot of people out there who would like to use you. He would spend, to me, and I think most people would agree, an obscene amount signing autographs. Baseballs, footballs, pictures, you know, whatever. Virtually setting a day a week aside just to do that sort of thing. Maybe it goes with the territory, but there must also be people out there who would like nothing better than to attach the prestige of former president.

Pocklington: Oh, there’s no question.

Smith: And yet he was criticized, particularly early on, for commercializing…was he sensitive about that?

Pocklington: Well, I remember one time when we played golf with a couple of fellows and I think Jerry and I lost ten bucks each to them and they said, we’ll take a five, but you’ve got to sign it. I mean, that kind of crap and he wasn’t particularly impressed with that, nor was I, quite frankly. I mean they tried to use the fact that they’d rather have, that they could show their pals they played with President Ford. So there was a lot of that and I’m sure he had to suffer that. But never suffered fools well. He just didn’t.

Smith: Can you think of an instance?

Pocklington: Oh, there were a couple of instances. I had him up to Toronto to do a speech, I had him, three or four other things that he did and people that tried to get too close too quickly, you know, he would become very professional…the guard would go up and that really incensed him when people tried to close in on him too quickly, unless he wanted to be there. So he kept his guard.

Smith: I guess you almost have to, don’t you, as a former president?

Pocklington: Of course, no question. I mean, that’s a balancing act, too.

Smith: Do you have a sense of how the Fords related with their Secret Service?

Pocklington: Oh really well, in fact, one fellow, damn, I’m trying to remember his name, because they always went on these golf outings and he always had, at least a couple of fellows in the front of the plane that were Secret Service, and this one guy, oh goodness…Lee Simons, and he really got to know these fellows and they became almost friends, it seemed. Yeah, he really related very warmly with his, people who were around him for a while. And was very kind to them. Maybe kind is the wrong word. Very respectful of them, but liked them a lot.

Smith: He had been the target of two would-be assassins.

Pocklington: Oh no question, that crazy broad in California, Weezie, or…

Smith: Do you think he had an extra sort of sensitivity about such things?

Pocklington: Well, I also had been through something like that. A guy came to the house to kidnap my wife and at the end of the day I ended up getting shot. So, there’s always, with a profile, he had a world profile, I had a Canadian profile because of sports, but after that I was a little bit wary of, and I’m sure he was, had to be, having been tried to get shot a couple of time. A lot of crazies out there.

Smith: Did he talk about Reagan?

Pocklington: I sensed there was a – that he thought – he, Jerry, thought he was just as good a president as Reagan was. That there was a bit of a, how would I say, yeah, there was something there. Because I was Jerry’s friend I really didn’t want to find out an awful lot about it, but there was a sense of why him and not me?

Smith: And the whole challenge in ’76 had to have been….
Pocklington: Ah! No question.

Smith: Yeah.

Pocklington: So there was an underlying something there that I really didn’t never discussed.

Smith: Can you think of anyone he held a grudge against?

Pocklington: No, I don’t think so, he really let bygones be bygones. No, well, maybe not. I remember, George Will, I always enjoyed. A pretty smart guy, in my opinion. Jerry didn’t like George Will.

Smith: Why?

Pocklington: Oh, I’ve got a feeling that this goes back to something George Will said about Jerry when he was president. So he had no time for George Will. Or for that other clown that was on Saturday Night Live.

Smith: Chevy Chase.

Pocklington: Chevy Chase – no time for Chevy Chase.

Smith: Because, you know, they appeared together at a conference on humor. I mean, he was a good sport.

Pocklington: Oh, that’s right. Yeah.

Smith: He was a very good sport.

Pocklington: He went beyond it. But, I’m not sure he was very impressed with Chevy Chase. He kind of, I think in Jerry’s sense demeaned him a little and he didn’t like that.

Smith: There is a school of thought that says, you know, that his health was extraordinarily good, up until about his 90th birthday…

Pocklington: And then he failed.

Smith: My sense was, once he was no longer able to travel, that was a kind of death.

Pocklington: Oh, without question.

Smith: He loved being on the road.

Pocklington: Loved to be on the road. Loved to be doing something. No, I remember the last two or three years he wasn’t Jerry any more.

Smith: How? For someone of his will, and self-discipline and all of these qualities, it must have been an extraordinarily difficult thing for him to go through.
Pocklington: Well, it was tough because he loved to golf and then he got down to nine holes, and, the fact that he could only play nine holes, and then very slowly, really bothered him. He didn’t like to ever make an excuse about ever letting go, never letting up.

Smith: The only time I ever saw his temper, and he really was blowing up at himself, he came back to Grand Rapids for a speech, and he wouldn’t wear glasses. And and the lighting wasn’t what it should have been…

Pocklington: Right.

Smith: And the paper wasn’t at the angle it should have been, and he stumbled over a few words, and he was visibly angry, and I think he was angry at getting older. Did you sense that?

Pocklington: No question. He said, Peter it’s no fun to get old. And I said, well, Jerry, it beats the alternative. He said, “I’m not so sure.” And this was when he was just playing nine holes.

Smith: When did he give up golf? How long did he continue to play?

Pocklington: Oh, he played until he was – how old was he when he died? – 93?

Smith: Yes.

Pocklington: 91? Yeah, he could, he still wanted to, his heart was still there.

Smith: He continued to swim.

Pocklington: Oh, yeah. He needed that conditioning. Every morning get up and did his lengths and made sure – it was his routine – he had to – it was what kept him going. Because he was a strong guy.

Smith: And he wanted to keep going.

Pocklington: He sure did. He never wanted to give up. One of the last memories I had, I got him an aircraft carrier, a model aircraft carrier that’s now in the museum, and it was an absolute detailed 1 to 350, and he just was so proud of that ship and the reason I knew he would like it, I met him in Grand Rapids, oh, twenty years ago and we went through the museum, and he showed me the original ship that he was on during the Navy and said he damn near fell off the thing. He was really into that ship and into the Navy and loved the Navy and loved the whole experience. So when I got him this aircraft carrier, he was delighted and it was not far before he died. I’ve got a good picture of it. So he had that sense – that he loved the Navy, loved that part of his life – very much so. Talked about it often.
Smith: Their friends, of course, the last couple summers, would all try to get them to not go to Vail.

Pocklington: Well, you get up there and you have to go on oxygen, I mean, it’s 7,000 feet where they lived. And he loved it, he seemed to want to go.

Smith: Tell me about the place in Vail, and the place they had in Vail. I mean, it seems like they were First Citizens.

Pocklington: Well, they were. He invited my wife and I to AEI, that first year he started the conference. And I think it was in 80 or 81.

Smith: And tell us, for people who don’t know, about the annual conference.

Pocklington: This thing was really well attended and people loved to go. He had people from all over the world, business people from all over the world, plus ten or fifteen, there would be always seven or eight people from the House, sitting members, either Senate or House, and he always had five or six or seven ex-world leaders. He had Giscard d’Estaing, Jimmy Callaghan, Helmut Schmidt, what a character he was.

Smith: Really? How did they get along?

Pocklington: Well, you know, they all got along famously. Especially Giscard, that silver-tongued Frenchman, who to me is an outright Socialist, which really bothered me.

Smith: Well, you look at Schmidt, and you look at James Callaghan, old Labor…

Pocklington: Oh, no question – they all got along famously. It was fun, I enjoyed meeting them all. In fact, I flew Giscard d’Estaing back to Canada, he was staying at a ranch near where we lived, and we lived in Edmonton, up near Calgary so I flew him back and spent a couple of days horseback riding with him. Charming guy, very charming.

Smith: Did they say what it was about Ford that…

Pocklington: They all loved Jerry Ford. He was the salt of the earth to them, and that’s the only reason they came all the way to Vail, because of Jerry Ford. For no other reason, they wouldn’t have done it for anybody else, so he had cemented a strong relationship when he was president with these people.

Smith: It clearly transcended ideology.

Pocklington: Without question – no question, because Jim Callaghan, as you know, is a very, very, very, left Socialist, but a charming guy.

Smith: Sunny Jim.
Pocklington: Sunny Jim. Charming guy. He had Maggie Thatcher there one year. The Iron Lady.

Smith: What was the chemistry there?

Pocklington: Well, I’ll tell you, she’s very, very different. I’m not sure they were, I think AEI brought Maggie in, and I had her up to Edmonton for a couple of days. I have a cute story about Maggie, she did her speech and taking her back to the hotel with her, I don’t know what they call their Secret Service guys, a couple of cops, actually. And she leaned over across to Eva and said, “Like to come up for a wee noggin?” And I said, what the hell’s a noggin – so it turned out to be a bottle of scotch. Christ, we coiffed the whole thing between the three of us in two hours. But she was – she’s always been my hero.

Smith: Larger than life?

Pocklington: I mean, Eva said if she’d been ten years younger I would have tried to run away with her, I mean, to me she was – I liked Maggie. But I like that kind of strength, I’m really a Libertarian myself, and tend to be conservative, but in strength and create wealth and let’s get at it, but these guys who want to take it and distribute it, I have no time for. But Jerry said nice things about Maggie Thatcher, although he was out of office by the time, I think, when she came in. When did she come in? ‘78?

Smith: ‘79

Pocklington: May of ‘79, so she was new, but…and who else did he have there that was interesting? Oh, he had the premiere of Jamaica, I can’t remember his name. Anyway, he all these interesting people to this AEI, Seega, that’s the guy’s name. He wanted me to build a fish plant, or some damn thing in Jamaica. So we flew down and spent three or four days having a look at – it’s too wild and wooly for me – Jamaica. It’s nuts. Who the hell else did he have?

Smith: Was Ford involved in dealing making?

Pocklington: Only from the point of view to introduce you. He was strictly a catalyst. He wasn’t a dealmaker businessman from that point of view, although he was on the board of Travelers and really respected. What’s his name, that ran…

Smith: Sandy Weill?

Pocklington: Sandy Weill, he really respected Sandy Weill. I remember a couple of times on the golf course he should have been on a board meeting, and he’d be half on the board meeting and half on the golf course, a lot going on in one of them. And he said, “Peter, I’m going to have to take nine holes off, because this is important.” I said, “You go right ahead, do what you have to do.”
Smith: What was your take? Because, again, he took some criticism. Every president, in effect, invents the job of ex-president and it shouldn’t come as any surprise that they tend to project their interests and personalities and priorities. You knew Richard Nixon would spend the rest of his life crafting a comeback.

Pocklington: No question.

Smith: You knew Jimmy Carter would pursue, from whatever pulpit he could create, the causes that mattered to him.

Pocklington: That’s exactly right.

Smith: It’s not terribly surprising.

Pocklington: Not at all.

Smith: And I wondered, again, about Ford who left office with virtually nothing.

Pocklington: He had zero. I remember the first AEI meeting, and he had a rented house in Vail near the hotel where we put on the conference, and within a couple of years, of course, he had a $5 million house that was beautiful and was very well done. But he worked hard, after he left the presidency, as I say, he was on the road a couple of hundred days a year, did a lot of speeches, and not for the kind of money they pay now, but maybe fifteen, twenty, twenty-five grand a shot. But he worked hard and made a lot of money. Did well.

Smith: And wasn’t apologetic about it.

Pocklington: Oh, absolutely not! And I don’t think he should have been. Because he had grown to that lifestyle in being the President of the United States, and being with, obviously, people who had a lot of money and were very successful, and he wanted to continue that. He wanted to be part of that structure that he had become used to. And he never had his hand out, he always worked hard for everything he did. So I was always very impressed with that. That was one of the things that impressed me about Jerry Ford.

Smith: And also, presumably, wanting to leave something for the kids.

Pocklington: Absolutely – and did a good job of it. I don’t know how big his estate was but it was certainly ample. And he earned it all. More power to him.

Smith: How…did you see him with the kids?

Pocklington: Played golf a few times with Steve. I enjoyed his son, Steve. Always up, optimistic like his dad, and he got along well with Steve. I’m not sure he was very close to Susan or Jack, oh, maybe Jack. Jack’s kind of an entertaining, nice man. Very bright. I have a lot of time for Jack, he’s the best of both his dad and mom. Yeah, he’s a charmer. And I think Jerry felt the same way, but I’m not sure he was really close to his other son, or maybe Susan. But, of course, he was always on the road, and you can’t build a family life, a strong family life, unless you’re part of the family.

Smith: I want to talk about the guilt – whether, he felt that, in some ways, Mrs. Ford, because of that, had had to bear an extra portion of responsibility.

Pocklington: Oh she did. There’s no question. She had four kids to bring up and she worked hard. He was never there during his years in Congress and the Presidency. I mean, he was always busy. And she, that’s why, I guess, she took a drink and she hurt her back or something and got on those damn pain pills. And between the two of them, it got her. But that’s understandable.

Smith: She turns out to be almost a representative figure, I mean, there are lots and lots and lots of women of her generation who were in the same situation, and certainly could relate to her.

Pocklington: No question.

Smith: The kind of quiet desperation.

Pocklington: Yup, there’s no question. I remember one of the speakers we had up to Edmonton was a guy – that was Hague – and his wife came with him and I felt she was in quiet desperation, without question. And she was kind of a mummy compared to…I felt badly.

Smith: Did you get so you could detect the signals?

Pocklington: Oh, without question. Very much so.

Smith: What is it about political wives that make them so vulnerable? I don’t know if that is still the case, but certainly at that time – is it because they are relegated to the shadows and are expected to play this kind of one-dimensional role?

Pocklington: Well, I think most strong men that get into politics, and obviously the ones that win get to the top are the strong ones – they become so much of what they’ve done in the office, that they are the present and, I don’t want to say, but you’re my little wife, but that’s really what happens. In very few instances, except when now, Brian and Mila Mulroney – they’re both friends. Mila is as strong as he is, maybe stronger. And she’s a pistol. But unless these women are as strong and tough as the guys, man they do get pushed down, very quickly. It’s a tough life – real tough. Look at the Kennedys, I mean she suffered from having a character like Jack around.

Smith: Did Ford ever talk about JFK – apart from the Warren Commission?

Pocklington: Because he was so straight, he wasn’t impressed with the carryings on, and he wouldn’t talk much about it. It’s too bad that you have to do that.
Smith: You are absolutely right in what you say about his own moral standards, and yet it is interesting because over time, influenced in part by her, you know obviously we know what his position was about a woman’s right to choose. He is remains the only president who ever signed his name to a gay rights petition. Was there a sense that he sort of moved? Did he change, or was he what he’d always been and it stood out by contrast with the party’s move to the right?

Pocklington: Well, he was pulled. Because I asked him about abortion, because I ran for the leadership of the party in Canada. And he said, as far as he was concerned, the way to answer that is abortion is intimate domain of family. And leave it there. Then you don’t get on either side of it. And I thought about it and I said, “Jerry, you are absolutely correct, that’s what I believe.”

Smith: To me, he is of a generation of mid-west conservative, who were defined first and foremost as economic conservatives, who had a very healthy skepticism about the role of government, especially when it was promising to re-engineer society. And at the same time, want government out of the board room, out of classroom, out of the bedroom. It was a generation that wouldn’t discuss these subjects that were frankly too personal, too intimate to be part of the public discourse.

Pocklington: The other thing that bothered him was the fact that we were becoming a society with little or no shame. As you just said, he grew up an Eagle Scout and, you know, there was right and wrong. Doesn’t seem to be much of that, much anymore. He and I, one of the things we disagreed on, was he figured all these drug felons should be thrown in jail. I said, Jerry, we can’t do that. Our prisons are too damn full now, I said, in fact, we should let 70% of them go that are there because of drugs and I said, I’d rather, because I’ve now got involved with your wife, that we’ve got to get people off drugs, help them, that’s one place I will extend them their help, and get them off drugs and alcohol and so on, because they are not bad people, but they’re sure as hell going to be if you throw them in jail with the felons. And we disagreed on that.

Smith: In many ways he remained a rock ribbed conservative. Certainly, fiscally, he was…

Pocklington: Oh, absolutely. He said to me one year in his presidency he ran a $60 billion deficit, and he was just appalled. It hurt him to his heart. He said, we can’t do that, we’ve got to run a balanced budget. And we got to cut spending, and…

Smith: And that raises the Republican Party. Clearly, the flipside of living as long as he did was, he saw the party twist its form.
Pocklington: Quite frankly disintegrate. It just upset him to the end. Especially in the last few years, it really bothered him. As you know, I think Jerry had the strongest veto pen of any president ever, and this character has none, and that’s… he always stood his ground where… that’s too bad.

Smith: He is probably the last president who was really going to spend his political capital on behalf of some kind of budget balance.

Pocklington: Oh, without question. We talked about that a lot, because that’s why he asked me why I tried to get involved in Canadian politics. I said, Jerry, the place is mad, they want to Socialize everything. This damn Socialized health care is going to destroy the country. I said don’t ever get it in the U.S., it’ll break you. He said, I know. He said, try to tell that to the people on the other side. No, he was always strongly, fiscally conservative and wanted to uphold those values.

Smith: And what about his sense of humor?

Pocklington: Oh, he had a good sense of humor. We used to tell mild stories, never the far out jobbies, you know, you’d try to save the ones that weren’t too far away from who he was. No, he had a good sense of humor. He chuckled and get a good smile on his face.

Smith: And if he ever was a just a little bit full of himself, Mrs. Ford had a very gentle way….

Pocklington: She brought him down to earth. Yeah, there’s no question. Like, “Take the garbage out, Jerry.” Yeah, she was a great mellowing influence, that’s why the marriage worked so damn well. I mean, she was, in her own rights, strong enough to keep up with Jerry, especially in the latter years.

Smith: It wasn’t opposite attracts, was it?

Pocklington: Oh, no, no, no. No, I think, early on, she was a pretty good looking outfit – looking at the pictures way back, and, chatting with him over the years, he was pretty enamored by her, and they got married very quickly and it was a great marriage. But then he got drawn away a little bit because of the politics, but brought back in when he saw the damage that was done. He couldn’t have done without her.

Smith: You almost wonder, on the downside, if he’d won in ’76, if there hadn’t been this intervention…

Pocklington: Oh! God only knows where it would have gone, because he would have been pretty busy, obviously, if he’d won in ’76. But, no, it worked out, maybe there was a greater calling – a great spirit heading for Betty and Jerry.

Smith: I think of her as something of a free spirit.
Pocklington: Oh, she is, very much so. He’s a little more regulated, but she’s uh….

Smith: Outspoken?

Pocklington: Oh, can be. Yeah. But she’s very smart, also. She’s got pretty good judgment, you know, on some of the things in the early years of Betty Ford, when we were trying to find other revenues. She said, “Peter, there must be other ways we can make money.” And I said, “Well, what if we sold underwear with Betty Ford across it.” And she looked at me and she said, “You’re out of your mind.” I said, “Betty, you asked.” I said, “The younger kids have these BFC parties and they all, a lot of them, their bathing suits…” and she thought that was a little bit out of….anyway.

Smith: Was she open to new ideas?

Pocklington: Very much so. Oh, we’d discuss everything. And you could discuss everything with Betty. She was a little, uhm, she had her raunchy side. (Laughter) She was fun. I got a kick out of Betty. You know, she’s not as prim and proper as…

Smith: She didn’t need to drink to be…

Pocklington: Naw, yes…you’re absolutely correct. She’s got a real laughable, folksy side to her, too. Yeah. I like Betty. In fact, I love Betty – she’s very special. Loved them both.

Smith: Have you seen her since his death?

Pocklington: Yes, I have. A couple…

Smith: How is she?

Pocklington: Oh, according to Penny, she’s getting better, but the first two times she was pretty frail, she came out to the alumni thing in November, was it November?, yeah, November, and man, she was very, very, very frail. I mean really frail. I think she had just gotten over a bout of bronchial pneumonia, and she was, I didn’t think she was going to make it. But apparently, Penny said she is charging back now. But she also said that Jerry, in the last few years kind of forced her to do more than maybe she wanted to. But she was always bright and front and center when he was around.

Smith: One sensed that it was really difficult for her. I mean, first of all, there was this ongoing debate, people pressing them to get trained medical care in the house. Because that’s not their job, the Secret Service.

Pocklington: You’re right.

Smith: I think they both resisted it as long as possible.
Pocklington: They did – no question.

Smith: And I think it hurt…and you can understand why, but, my sense was, in her case, there was an extra element, which was, I’m going to take care of my husband.

Pocklington: Yes. I remember when I took the aircraft carrier over, and he had a nurse then and he kind of didn’t want me to see him in that position, where he had a nurse. He was such a proud son of a gun, you know.

Smith: He was always immaculate.

Pocklington: No question, immaculate. Yeah, he was a very proud guy, he didn’t want me…anyway, we knew each other well enough that he knew I’d understand and vice versa, but it bothered him.

Smith: Was that the last time you saw him?

Pocklington: Yes, it is.

Smith: How…?

Pocklington: It was a couple of months before he died. It was in September, September – yeah.

Smith: And was he still going to the office at that point?

Pocklington: No, no, he was sitting at home. The nurse was there and he had his kimono on and slippers and, then he went in and put on something for this picture, a pair of slacks and, and his eyes started to light up when he saw the ship and I’ve even got the proper airplanes, I phoned the Navy Department and told this character that built the thing what fleet, what wings should be on the deck, and good God, what a model. So he was really excited about that, and it seemed to bring him out of his weakened self to become the old Jerry I had known for about fifteen minutes and then he lost his energy again. And so you could see he was clearly on the way out. It was tough to see.

Smith: How was Mrs. Ford?

Pocklington: Oh, god, she was right there, you know. “Okay, Jerry, now you go in the living room with Peter, and let’s get this picture taken.” She took command again. Yeah, right up until the time he died, she was very strong. Even during the funeral she was very strong. I was shocked.

Smith: Remember that last walk – to the grave site?

Pocklington: (Exhale)
Smith: Where I thought, my god, is she going to be able to make it? We’d been told at ABC, with the very first ceremony in California, don’t be surprised if she is in a wheelchair. Of course we didn’t see her in a wheelchair.

Pocklington: No.

Smith: Until, very briefly, and then I think she was on Steve’s arm. Everyone was urging her to sit down and, you know, she wasn’t…

Pocklington: Not a chance.

Smith: She wasn’t going to do that, you know?

Pocklington: No, that’s true.

Smith: And someone asked her later on, how she managed to do that, and she said, that’s what my husband would have wanted.

Pocklington: No question. That’s a good point. That’s true. Yeah, that’s true. She was the ideal gal for Jerry Ford. Perfect couple.

Smith: What made her the ideal?

Pocklington: Just that one comment – that’s what Jerry would have wanted me to do. I mean, how many wives would go outside of herself and make sure that he was looked after first. And she was that way, as I said, “No ice cream, Peter, don’t give him ice cream.”

Smith: How do you remember him?

Pocklington: Well, I’m not sure…my dad and I were really close, I was probably closer to Jerry than I was to my own father. And he was kind of, if I had something to chat about, I remember in ‘82 or 3, the Canadian government wanted me, I was in the meat business, I owned Swift in Canada, they wanted me to go to Cuba and help the Castro government set up some abattoirs. So I phoned Jerry and he said, well, Peter, you know if you do, you and I are going to have to maybe distance ourselves. And I said, “Enough said, Jerry.”

Smith: Really?

Pocklington: So I phoned the Canadian government and I said, I don’t think I have any interest in wanting to go to Cuba.

Smith: What do you think he meant by that?

Pocklington: Well, because of the American position on Cuba. He couldn’t be seen hanging out with a character who built a meat plant in Cuba. So that was enough said – and done. So he and I were pretty good friends. Very close. I could really ask him anything, period.
Smith: Personal issues?

Pocklington: Oh, absolutely. He was, we were pretty close.

Smith: Do you miss him?

Pocklington: Oh a lot. I look at that damn shelf and I get a tear – and I’ve got so many pictures of he and I on the golf course, or he and I during these Oilers things, because we always hired that great big tall bugger from Palm Springs, what the hell was his name, the photographer, umm, he was at all the events.

Smith: Oh, Kennerly. Was it David Kennerly?

Pocklington: Um, Mark.

Smith: Okay.

Pocklington: Mark, um, he’s about eight feet high and he always there with his camera. So we’ve got some great pictures. About a week ago I got them out and looked at a few.

Smith: Imagine talking to someone who didn’t know him, and maybe only thinks they know him … what would you tell them that they don’t know?

Pocklington: Well, in my opinion, I don’t think he was, and I should never use a negative, but to me, when you look at what is a politician, he wasn’t a politician. He was really just a strong friend that you’d want through thick and thin. If you wanted somebody at your back in a fight, man, he was it. He was always there, didn’t matter the circumstance, didn’t matter the – he was going to win – he was that positive – that strong – and that’s why I wish he’d won the second term. Because America needed him at that time, not Jimmy Carter, who was to me a patsy. But, we needed a Jerry Ford and everybody lost because he didn’t make it. All because, I think of that damn interview on TV and Poland – I mean, to me, that really hurt him. And I saw that before I knew him. I thought, oh my goodness, Jerry.

Smith: Did he talk about it?

Pocklington: No. No, I didn’t want to go there.

Smith: We actually, maybe I got away with murder, on occasion, when we re-did the museum…

Pocklington: Right.

Smith: and we had the Polish gaffe playing…what other former president would think it was a good idea to get the staircase from the embassy in Saigon…

Laugh
Smith: I mean, you know, who would think of that?

Pocklington: That’s true.

Smith: Not only was he comfortable with it, but, he insisted on it. Anyway, there is this gallery, and it plays over and over again, and, the way we would handle this thing…”Mr. President, you weren’t wrong, you were just ten years ahead of your time.”

Pocklington: That’s exactly right.

Smith: And he laughed.

Pocklington: Well, he was self-deprecating. There’s no question. And he didn’t mind that. Golfing, he hit some awfully bad shots, and of course we’d rib him about it.

Smith: Would any ever hit a spectator while you were playing?

Pocklington: Well, as he says, he turned golf into a contact sport, he used that line in his speeches. No, I never saw him tee off into somebody …..

Smith: When we were working on the funeral plans, it’s very revealing, the one thing he was adamant about was he didn’t want a caisson through the streets of Washington.

Pocklington: Oh really? Why?

Smith: I never really could pin him down, but it was very clear, you knew when Gerald Ford felt strongly about something…

Pocklington: Yeah, you didn’t want to go there.

Smith: You didn’t go. One particularly inept individual who clearly didn’t know the president very well, tried to change his mind by shaming him into the…..

Pocklington: Oof…

Smith: And actually said something to the effect of, “Well now, Mr. President, you wouldn’t want people to think of you as a second rate president.”

Pocklington: Oh, you’ve got to be kidding. The guy said that?

Smith: Can you imagine? Talk about exercising self-control.

Pocklington: Wow.

Smith: But they just, literally didn’t, didn’t understand. First of all, he felt strongly enough about it, he didn’t go there.

Pocklington: I always knew where his bounds were. Absolutely.
Smith: But he was adamant about it. And, you know, the way it turned out—I thought very moving, coming in that night, that Saturday night, going through Alexandria where there were thousands of people…in a neighborhood where they hadn’t lived in thirty years, and then stopping at the World War II Memorial and then up to the Capitol. And the whole point was, it was a very individualized ceremony.

Pocklington: Very much so.

Smith: Reflecting his …..

Pocklington: It was who he was.

Smith: Yeah.

Pocklington: Yeah. It took me a few years to understand where the bounds were. Once I knew where the bounds were…you just didn’t go beyond. Well, you could tell in general conversation where his bounds were, and I would come to a halt at that point, because the friendship meant more to me than irritating—going somewhere that obviously he wasn’t going to be too pleased about. And to me the relationship was more fun than trying to test him. I didn’t need it and he didn’t need it. Because I respected him a lot, the position in life that he had attained and also, I must admit, he added so much to what I was doing that I didn’t want to interrupt that. He did such a job with the team, in helping me to win, and the more you won the more money I made, obviously.

Smith: One last thing. He was not the sort of guy who lay awake at night wondering about his historical legacy. Although as we’ve said, he was very gratified by the fact that, particularly on the pardon, people had come around to his way of thinking. But beyond that, it may very well be that the Betty Ford Center makes the case that what she’s done has impacted ordinary people and how they’ve lived their lives as much as most presidents.

Pocklington: Oh no question.

Smith: And my sense was, he was inordinately proud of her.

Pocklington: Oh! Hugely proud!

Smith: There was the joke, that for fundraising purposes, he had east of the Mississippi and she had west of the Mississippi.

Pocklington: Oh—I did and it was all rot. I remember we were going to put on a hockey game up in Ottawa for Mila Mulroney to raise—we raised a million, seven or eight, for cystic fibrosis, and I’d phoned the Montreal characters and said come on down, and we’ll have this game and I charged everybody $5 grand a couple to go to 24 Sussex, which is our White House in Canada. And charged the hell out of them, played Robin Hood. And wanted to do that here for the Betty Ford Center, so I phoned Eisner, at the time, who had the Ducks. And he’s a raving bloody socialist, but I didn’t know this going in, so I took Jerry and Betty and we flew them over to a game, and we sat in their box and we watched Edmonton play the Ducks. And thank god we beat them. But maybe we shouldn’t have, they should have said, let the Ducks win tonight, and we’re going to do the same thing there. And Betty said, look, you’ve got to make sure that you split this thing, not all for the Betty Ford Center, but split it to make sure that his charity gets half. And, anyway, he (Eisner) said to me, you know, this isn’t quite my politics. And I said, what the hell you talking about? And I found out he was a raving bloody Democrat and…

Smith: But what’s political about the Betty Ford Center.

Pocklington: Well, that’s what I thought. I said, “Goddamnit, we’re saving Democrats as well as Republicans here, I need your help.” And he pulled out, the son of a bitch. God, I was not very happy with that. But they came up with some lame excuse where I had to get Celine Dion to come and do part of the show, and so I phone her manager. And at that time they were busy, which was probably so. But, he then kind of pushed it away and that was it. And there was another time that I didn’t realize the political divide you have in this country. I wanted Jerry to be on the NHL board of governors as an advisor. And talked to two or three of the guys and then talked to a couple that were very Democrat – are you kidding? Man, they deep-sixed that so fast, they had more power than I did….and I, unfortunately told Jerry before I brought it up that I was going to try and do that and he thought for sure I could probably get it handled, and I couldn’t. I was very embarrassed by that.

Smith: How did he handle it?

Pocklington: Oh he said, yeah, I understand. He didn’t say much. He was a very understanding guy, and I guess he understood what I didn’t understand – that kind of tough going there with a strong Republican against a bunch of Democrats. But Billy Worts from Chicago was obviously a Democrat and he deep-sixed it.

Smith: One last thing, we’ve gone full-circle. You said he really enjoyed, obviously loved sports, did he have friends who were athletes? We all know about people like Jack Nicklaus.

Pocklington: He had lots of golfing pals. I’ve got a few pictures – one of them he’s coming off the beach at Pebble Beach – he’s playing with Arnold Palmer and I had it blown up and put some comical remark coming out of the mouth of Palmer, and Jerry said, “Hhm.” And I got a kick out of it, wasn’t going to say much, but he did, his ball erred a lot on the…Pebble Beach is a tough course, too.

Smith: Was he no-nonsense on the course?
Pocklington: Pretty much so. He was always, with other people around him, he was always all business. He was the President and that was it. And he was fun when you got away from the rest of the folks – he lightened up a little. Yeah, he was a good guy.

Smith: This has been fun. I can’t thank you enough.

Pocklington: Well, I’ve enjoyed it, too. It’s brought back a lot of good memories.

Smith: Well, that’s the point of the whole exercise. And we’ll make sure, once we get it, we’ll share it with you.

Smith: Let’s start with: where did your paths cross for the first time?

Secchia: We crossed paths during his Congressional re-election campaigns. 1963-1964 I knew of him and he knew of me from meeting at local Republican gatherings. Back then the Lincoln Day dinner might be a $15 ticket. Everybody went to those and he was the main provider of guest speakers. He would bring in friends like Nixon, who was a cohort of his in the Congress. I have photos of us together, which was the typical $12-15 ticket. This low price doesn’t exist anymore. It would be “How are you?” “How are you Peter. Good to see you”. Boom…gone!

We really became better friends sometime in the late ‘60s when he would come to Grand Rapids and would give me a call. Mildred Leonard was his secretary at the time. I remember one call I got from her. She said, “I don’t know who you are, but I have a long list of people here who want to have lunch with the Congressman, but he wants to meet with you, and he’d like to meet with you at some club. I can’t remember where it was – the Penn Club, or some restaurant. I remember I said, “No, why don’t we meet at the Starboard Tack (Now the Great Lakes Shipping Company)?” It was a restaurant I had just opened in 1969. She said, “I’ll check with him,” and we met there.

I gave him some ideas on his re-election campaign – how to meet younger people. He was receptive.

Smith: Let me interrupt that, because that raises a couple of things. One, I’m intrigued that you said, how to meet younger people. In ‘69 this is a time when the whole country is going to hell and campuses are exploding and so forth. Was there a connection there? Curiosity on his part?
Secchia: It was “worry” mostly on my part, because whenever I did see him at an event, he would be off in a corner talking to people older than he, or at least his generation. Those who were of my generation were standing on the other side of the room, sort of like the fourth grade school dance – the boys were here and the girls were there. I thought he needed to meet some of the younger, upcoming people from our community. Now that is the story of the first lunch. The relationship actually goes back before that when he asked me if I’d like to come and work with him at the Republican convention in Miami in 1968. There were two conventions I traveled with him, at my own expense. We stayed at the [Hotel] Fontainebleau – in ’68 and again in ’72. In 1968 the “Vietnam Veterans Against the War” were miserably obnoxious, it was almost violent.

He put me in charge of the Ford kids. I really don’t know how I got invited to be there, but maybe I was just a nanny, or maybe I was someone he trusted with his family. He would go in the morning for two or three hours before the conventions began, because as the Minority Leader, he was chairman of the convention. There were times when he would leave the hotel and say, “Pete, get the kids to these seats,” then give me the tickets. We were given a security officer/driver who was a retired sheriff from Miami – Dade County? I don’t remember his name. But that driver drove our car. Susan might have been sixteen at the time and the boys were older. There were all kinds of problems that could occur, so I was invited to come along and observe. This all came about and I’m sort of getting out of whack here, because the question, “How did it all start?” comes back to me as I go through this process.

But now I go back to the ’68 convention and I can remember Sen. Jacob Javits from New York, making a speech on TV that angered me about my Republican principles. It caused me to get on the phone and talk to Mildred Leonard, or whoever it was at that time was his administrative assistant. I said, “This is crazy, can you ask Jerry to get me a ticket to the convention?” He called to say, “Yes, come on down.” So I went down and I ended up staying there with them and he ended up using me to help get the kids to the conventions and attend various functions with him.
Smith: Was Betty there?

Secchia: Yes. But she went to the convention with others. Mrs. Nixon’s car had been urinated on by the Veterans Against the War, fruit was being thrown at the windshields and there was some minor riots – it’s hard to sort them out over the 30+ years that have passed, but it was not a comfortable situation. I remember Ford had a pool cabana next to Barbara Walters, and Barbara Walters had a African-American woman assigned who was taking care of the Walters’ children. She treated that person with a very mean-spirited attitude. It annoyed Congressman Ford at the time – that this would be happening at his convention and he displayed dismay very obviously with her over the way she was treating that woman. I was observing, as a young man – maybe 31 years old at the time, and watching. From that point on he would then confide in me, ask me to come up to the room and go through some of his speeches with him. “What do you think about saying this?” He was always good at that, “What do you think? You think I ought to do this – think I ought to say this?” The relationship developed – and it was then, after that ’68 trip, and after a couple years of seeing each other around town, that we became good friends.

Then he would come to Grand Rapids. He would visit with Joan and me. I think at the time he was making $36,000 a year. He had holes in his socks, he was traveling all the time, he didn’t have any spare money whatsoever. He would confide in us. It was almost like he didn’t have a very close relationship with his own children at that time. He was busy and Betty was taking care of the family life, but he was focused on Minority Leader work – traveling, electing, re-electing, the Ev and Jerry Show, all the things that he did. So I became the go-to guy in Grand Rapids.

Smith: Do you think after the White House years, particularly the later years, that he had a certain amount of guilt over having missed, not only part of his kids growing up, but burdening Betty with the responsibility for their upraising? It was a generational thing, like a lot of ambitious men, not only politicians, but others of his generations. He had a goal – a professional goal – and that tended to shape his life.
Secchia: I think he had guilt feelings, but I also think he had a secondary issue, with Betty’s health. The term “alcoholic,” “over-drinking” wasn’t really the issue. She had a lot of pain and the painkiller with one drink… I would stay with them upstairs in the White House. I was often the only guest. I’d sit by her bed for hours and Dr. Lukash used to call me up and say, “Can you come out to D.C. and sit with Betty? The president has to go on a trip, and he would like someone here.” I would sit by her bed and talk to her. She had some very serious discomfort, and all the time we entertained or had an evening together, I never saw her have more than a drink and a half. There wasn’t any over consumption of alcohol, it was a combination of the drugs. He felt guilty that he wasn’t able to be there for her. I think the fact that he never developed a close relationship, and that might be hard for his kids to hear now, but in those days, and it might have been a generational thing, parents didn’t talk to children like they do today. Parents led children, disciplined children, but didn’t talk to them, didn’t have the “get inside your head” kind of attitude. That’s another role that I played.

He asked me to fly out and stay with the kids and then he would get on Air Force Two, which was an old prop driven Convair, I’ll never forget that, and take off and say, “Look, I want you to talk to Susan about this and talk to Mike about this,” and so, I was a big brother, or a son that he never had in politics. Because he didn’t have any in politics, he taught me my politics, so we had a lot of political conversations. I don’t want to upgrade my position in this thing, but we had many conversations about what I could do for him, generated by him, by the way. Not me saying, “What can I do for you?” It was him saying, “Would you mind doing this for me? I just haven’t got the time.” (Mostly in Grand Rapids.)

Smith: This brings up a couple of things. You wonder, let’s face it, most people in parenting tend to reproduce their own experiences, their own memories from childhood and I’m wondering how much of that approach reflected the norms in the Ford household when he was growing up. Kind of a hierarchical…

Secchia: Because of his tragic background with what happened with his birth father.
Smith: But also, the kind of discipline and structure that an earlier generation took for granted.

Secchia: I think there was no question about it. He loved his new father, (the “Ford” father) very much. Respected him immensely. He told me the story about Leslie King many times. Shortly after Ford was nominated to be the vice president, he was on the west coast, maybe Washington or Oregon. I believe he might have been with Congresswoman Edith Green who later had helped (it would have been a friend, if I’m not mistaken). He was scheduled to give a speech in Knoxville, Tennessee where I was involved. I had arranged for him to be the speaker. Nobody in my industry at that time, (manufactured housing) ever heard of this Congressman from Michigan. He was the Minority Leader, and if you watched the Ev and Jerry Show, you might know who he was. But I convinced them to have him as their keynote speaker.

When he was named V.P. the previous months, I thought he would cancel. He called me and said, “I’m coming,” and when he came in as the Vice President of the United States they knew. When he still came in I noticed right then and there that – (I had expected a big change) – but there was no change whatsoever. He was still the same Jerry Ford. But my phone started ringing off the hook. I was there for a tradeshow and I’ll never forget the first call was from a British tabloid, (speaking with British accent) “Hello, Governor,” he said, “is this true that your vice president has an assumed name?” I’m thinking, oh gosh, what am I supposed to say, what do I say I know? Do I not know it, do I know it? Is it going to be a problem? Has it been released? Do I talk of this? I was just a nervous wreck. I said, “Well, I really can’t talk about those things.” They made a big splash out of Leslie King, Jr. – not being Gerald R. Ford, Jr.

There was a story he liked to tell about his birth father visiting him when he was working at the local drug store. He took me there to show me the neighborhood, his old family house, where he worked, where he went to school. He told me the story about this – (you’ve heard it over and over again) – but it had an impact on him because he had to make a decision right then. He told his birth father...“I love the father who has given my mother a home.
I love the father who has given me his name.” I thought then that if it were me, I would have said, “Where have you been, you son of a bitch?”

He was much more gentle and kinder than that. Much more Christian. He always said it in kinder terms, but I think he told me that he was very firm that he didn’t want to see Mr. King again – and that he’d hurt his mother. So that is probably part of what built the kind of life model he has, you need to be good to your wife and kind to your mother, and kind to your family. But he also had this drive to be good at what he did. Not to be a statesman, he never used that term, but he wanted to be the man who had the frequent flyer mile record for dedicated traveling, or “nobody can outwork me…I work hard,”

Smith: You wonder what sort of mix from the parents, because the sense I get, is that his dad was the person who influenced him the most, of anyone - the values and the qualities. His mother had great drive. The famous story about when she died in church and they found her appointment book - it was filled for a month, or whatever. You can see him as the perfect product of these two different, yet very complementary, personalities.

Secchia: You’ve got to remember, he was of the generation, wrongly or rightly, who didn’t give a lot of credit to the mother’s role in raising family. We all grew up with that, in that generation of Charles Atlas kicking sand in the face to show the woman he controlled the world. Jerry was a gentleman in a world that didn’t have too many gentlemen. He created a role that allowed him to disagree without being disagreeable. I’ll never forget one day, I was at the White House. I came downstairs after breakfast. The president was out playing golf and I read the Washington Post. Tip O’Neill called GRF everything but a decent human being in the paper. When GRF returned from golf, he buzzed me and I came down to the Oval Office. He was in his golf clothes. He was in the Oval Office chair and I said, “Did you see this?” I laid the paper down. He said, “Oh, that’s just Tip. That’s politics.” I said, “But he called you all these terrible names!” Jerry Ford looked at me and he said, “Well, that’s who I was playing golf with this morning.”
I said, “I don’t get this!” He said, “Peter, in Washington, you must learn to disagree without being disagreeable.” That sentence is really what everybody is talking about today, the old-fashioned politics that people could get along. They disagreed, but they disagreed without being disagreeable. That was his mantra. That all came about from the raising and the discipline that he had, and that he understood, and from his family.

Smith: He was, to put it mildly, fiscally conservative. How much of that do you think was a product of the Depression? Because, clearly, there is a whole generation of kids who went without, and who have a whole different idea of the meaning of money.

Secchia: He was of a generation where a job was important and loyalty to the boss was important. The fact that, like my grandmother used to say, “Your cousin works over there at that gas station – it’s a very good company, his paycheck cashes every week.” That was important in telling that child of the Depression that it was important that you just didn’t get a paycheck, but you get a paycheck that was cashable. Jerry Ford wasn’t just fiscally responsible – he was tighter than a second coat of paint. You couldn’t get him to spend a nickel for anything. The people who traveled with him had to carry small bills.

I remember very well when we had these cars in Miami for the two Republican conventions that I attended (’68 and ’72), I would ride with him and we’d go to events. We’d come back and we’d say goodnight to the driver and the driver would be standing there with his hand out – a retired officer – I’d have to find some cash to tip him. Jerry never thought about that. I don’t know whether he avoided it, but he didn’t do it. It got to be, I would rag on him constantly about being tighter than a second coat of paint. He’d just laugh, “I’m from Grand Rapids and that’s the way it ought to be.” He also prided himself on his knowledge of the budget and the defense appropriations. He understood better than anybody where the money went, and he would get very concerned about certain issues.

Smith: Let me go back because it’s remarkable that a Congressman who was as entrenched as he was in this district, would, particularly with all of his other obligations and travel, still take seriously the obligation to come back as frequently as possible. The fact that, at that point in his career, twenty years on the Hill, he was still curious about reaching out to new audiences and the like. It wouldn’t happen today. If you had a safe district, you wouldn’t be home. I heard him talk about Guy Vander Jagt as an example – a cautionary example - of someone who was a great guy, but who “went Washington” and who got so caught up in the national scene that he neglected the district. Now here is someone who is even more caught up in the national scene, and yet one senses, he never neglected the home front – even if the home front was as safe politically as anything could be.

Guy Vander Jagt was an orator. Jerry Ford was a legislator. Guy enjoyed the social circuit. Jerry Ford didn’t enjoy the social circuit. So Guy had a reason to extend a trip or a visit where Jerry would not. So, that was one difference. Another difference was that Vander Jagt had a district that you couldn’t fly to. His district went from, I believe Traverse City down to the southwestern corner of Michigan, then you had to fly to Grand Rapids and drive three or four hours either way. Where in the case of Jerry Ford’s district, most of it was right here, to Holland and back. It wasn’t that different. Jerry Ford had more of a root base than Guy had. Guy was a little more of a party boy. Jerry would drink his martinis and he’d have a good time, but he’d never over imbibe. He had a little button on his chair at the White House and I can remember we’d talk and he’d press the little button and they’d bring him his drink. He enjoyed the dialogue but not the speaking. He wasn’t the speaker Guy was. Guy got standing ovations and adulation with his speeches. Jerry felt, “Well, I’m glad its over and time for me to leave. Okay.”

Was he sensitive? I remember him saying that if he’d had the chance to relive his live, he would have spent more effort on developing his communications skills.

Well I think that learning came at the ’76 election when he was having difficulty explaining his position. When in fact, he was misinterpreted sometimes by just his choice of delivery – not even the words – just the way he delivered it and it became – Stu Spencer used to talk to me about this and say, “The guy is good at what he does, but I can’t get him to be the communicator that he needs to be.” Of course, being challenged by the Great Communicator in the ’76 primary, was very threatening to Jerry Ford because he was, as in the case of McCain – white skin, melanoma-threatened - fighting this good-looking, thin, eloquent, preacher-kind of opponent. I think McCain…

Smith: It was an oratorical mismatch.

Secchia: Yes, and I think McCain is being forced to go a little bit negative early to try to balance out that mismatch. Obama is a rock star, but can he lead? Jerry Ford had the same issues – “Why is this man challenging me? I am the sitting president.”

Smith: That raises a question. I assume the competitive juices kicked in, and that must be one key to understanding Ford. He was a very competitive guy, wasn’t he?

Secchia: He was very competitive, but he was also very concerned that people didn’t understand that he had a job to do, to clean up the mess that had been left by the Nixon administration. And at the same time go out on the street and debate or fight from a podium, this “Great Communicator.” Why is he [Reagan] doing this? Why doesn’t he just wait his turn? Why? This is a very complicated story and if I may take it chronologically…

Smith: By the way, one thing, then we’ll get into this because you’re right, it’s a huge, important one. I’ve heard Stu Spencer say, and imagine what it tells you about Ford that someone like Stu Spencer or anyone could say this: they were coming up with the Rose Garden strategy, and Ford, being Ford, wanted to get out on the campaign trail and he wanted to eat rubber chicken and he wanted to do all those things that he loved. I don’t think anyone wanted to tell him to his face why they wanted him to stay in the White House. Certainly the White House staff didn’t want to, but Stu Spencer, being Stu, he didn’t mind. Finally, he said, “Mr. President, you don’t understand, you’re a fucking lousy campaigner.” Secchia: Well, that very well could have been discussed. The issue that really was the problem was that this man had such a goal-oriented composition that he knew what he had to do was Whip Inflation Now. He had to get the budget under control. He had to get us out of Vietnam. I mean, there was a list on top of list that had to be done. And that didn’t include flying to Oshkosh, Wisconsin and talking to the local Caterpillar factory workers.

I can remember having the arguments with him that Reagan provided him a chance to be re-elected because the challenge of the primary forced him to go to places where he had never gone. He had a hard time recognizing that he was the Fifth District Congressman of Michigan who wasn’t known in the Sixth, Fourth, and Third Districts very well, and yet he wanted to run in Wisconsin, California, Oregon, Washington. He had to get out and he had to spread his message. He had to just be seen back then. The message wasn’t as important as being known and paying homage to the local politicians, because back in those days the Republican Party headquarters in this county or that village or that community, was the office for the re-election.

I want to backtrack to this because when he pardoned Nixon on a Sunday night, I had no knowledge that this was going to happen. Like everybody else, it caught me by surprise. Jerry terHorst resigned and I was bewildered, as was everyone else, wondering what was going to happen. On Monday morning I got a phone call from somebody, I can’t remember whether it was Nell Yates or Mildred Leonard - it might have been Bob Hartmann, I can’t recall, said, “Would you come out to Washington tomorrow night and have dinner with the President?” I said, “Why, sure.” “He needs to be with someone – a friend.” It turned out that Monday when I got that call, we didn’t have this twenty-four hour news cycle of Fox and CNN, Jerry Ford had been in Pittsburgh to give a talk and had been booed. Demonstrations had begun and the accusations were flying. The internet and the blogs weren’t yet created, but the fervor was just growing – the fire was being stoked. It was not comfortable. On Tuesday I flew into Washington and I waited for him to come upstairs to have dinner. Betty decided not to join us. She wasn’t feeling well, so I sat and talked to her. I read the paper and I went back in and talked to her, then I read the paper.
Smith: How was she? Did she talk about the pardon?

Secchia: No – if she did, I don’t recall it. It wouldn’t have been my place to bring it up and it didn’t come up. I tried to make her feel good and feel happy. She was going through a rough period. I can’t remember what it was we talked about, but she was happy to have a friend from home who sat next to her bed and got her things if she needed them, or made calls for her.

Smith: Do you think the transition to the White House was a difficult one?

Secchia: Yes. But I want to finish this story. So Ford finally came upstairs and it was pretty late – it might have been close to nine o’clock. He had a series of newspapers that were lying on a credenza just behind the television set, sort of in the center of family quarters. He would pick up the paper and go to the editorial page and he read both of them, the Washington Post and New York Times. He came in, sat down in his chair, and I was sitting there on the couch. He pressed his button and ordered his martini and turned to me and said, “Nixon really fucked up the pea patch.” That’s the first time I’d ever heard him use the F word. He said, “I had to do it and it will cost me the ’76 election, but I had to do it.” Like a dummy, I had the vision that I was way over my head. I was a thirty-seven year old young business guy trying to sell lumber, and I just felt like I was over my head. I really didn’t need to be told anything I shouldn’t be told. It was like – I hadn’t even started reading spy books yet, but I was scared that I was over my heard. I said, “Look, you don’t have to tell me about it.”

I regret to this day I did that because we then changed the subject and we went to dinner. But he was very concerned about that and was very upset that there was not even a doubt that it wouldn’t cost him the ’76 election. There wasn’t even a doubt in his mind. Later on he had second thoughts about what it was and the little things, but that was a telling moment for me.

Smith: In later years he must have returned to the subject. Was he hurt that people suspected a deal? Was he surprised at the ferocity of the reaction?

Secchia: He spent a lot of time – you’ve got to remember, Jerry Ford’s viewpoint, because he was so goal-oriented, and dedicated to accomplishing what he was supposed to accomplish – a lot of time wasn’t a lot of time in your world or my world – in his world it was a lot of time. He called a few people and said, “Look, get this straightened out – they don’t understand this.” Yeah, he was hurt. He was not very happy with some of the people – Alexander Haig and others who had said things that got people going in different directions.

Smith: And, of course, he lost a press secretary.

Secchia: Right – who over-reacted in an emotional moment – probably because he wasn’t counseled. But then again, when you’re a new president, you don’t realize that…what your obligations are: “I’m supposed to discuss this with him.”

Smith: Ford later on said… he understood terHorst was upset that he hadn’t told him, but he said, “Stop and think. If I’d told him, he would have had, in effect, a Hobson’s choice. Either he would have had to tell others, which he [Ford] obviously didn’t want, or he would have had to lie.” It tells you so much about Ford, that those are the two choices and neither one is acceptable. So, he, in effect from his viewpoint was saving terHorst from being put in an impossible situation.

Secchia: Knowing Jerry Ford, I’m not so sure that he made the final decision until the last moment because Ford was always one to jump back and forth and listen to different ideas. In many cases we all felt that the person who talked to him last impacted his thinking the most. I don’t know who that was in this case, but I don’t think he made that decision on Tuesday and then kept it until Sunday night. He obviously went through this, what would work, what wouldn’t work, pros and cons and came up with a decision. But, that isn’t the guy that I knew.

The guy that I knew was your basic Midwesterner who drew out the thousands of people you saw at the funeral procession, who was enamored by both sides of the aisle, the First World War, the Second World War, and Vietnam vets. He just appealed to a great number of persons because his ‘steady as you go’ ship was something that wasn’t rocking in the rough seas of ’74 and ’75, the Housing Community Development Act, the wild inflation, Jimmy Carter shooting rabbits in ponds. Jerry Ford was just steady as Steady Eddie, and he built a confidence around himself. So as that circle of understanding of him in the Fifth Congressional District started to expand out into other areas, and over the years of his retirement, it got stronger and stronger. It built to the point that he was a very popular figure. And rightfully so.

Smith: I think I heard him say, or at least it was attributed to him – very uncharacteristic and I don’t think it was for public consumption – he was known to have observed that Nixon never said thank you for the pardon. That he never really thanked him.

Secchia: Well, there was a comedy skit made about that and I bought the painting by the artist of where, if you remember, there was a skit where he was playing poker with Nixon and Nixon sneezes and said, “Pardon me,” and Ford said, “I already did.” I bought that painting and I had it hanging in my office for years. But he never said to me anything about the thank you. I don’t recall that.

Smith: Did you have a sense of what his relationship with Nixon actually was in later years?

Secchia: Yes, in 1972 or 73, he came to Grand Rapids and we had dinner. He gave a talk somewhere and he said, “Meet me after.” I met him in the Old Pub, which was a restaurant in the old Pantlind Hotel. He and I had dinner - they were famous for their Sizzler, which was a terrible cut of beef, but on a hot sizzling plate, with a piece of buttered toast. I’ll never forget that night. We sat there, the bartender was behind the bar, we were the only table – the hotel was about to close. Nobody talked to him, other than the waitress who took the order. Nobody came up, there were no autograph seekers. He was a pariah to many because of his support of Nixon’s Vietnam policy.

After dinner we went up and sat at the bar and had a nightcap. These were his drinking days, not over drinking, but days people don’t realize he participated in. We had a drink at the bar and the bartender gave us the perfunctory “Hello, goodbye,” and Jerry said to me, “I promised Betty I wouldn’t run again. I wasn’t going to, but I have to run one more time or it will appear I’m deserting Nixon in the middle of this terrible period, and so I owe it to Dick Nixon to stay on as Minority Leader, and run again.” That must have been the ’72 election. He ran for re-election and that was to be his last – and his respect and admiration for Nixon was strong.

Smith: I wonder if it survived later events. He must have had a different outlook, or at least an outlook that had to have been affected by what both of them had been through.

Secchia: I think the line that he used that night about the pea patch is – there were other issues that he didn’t realize were going on.

Smith: That gets to the heart of him in so many ways. There is a quote out there that says, “I always was truthful in my dealings with other people, and I expected other people to be truthful.” On the one hand, you can say, thank God we have people like that in public life, but in certain circumstances you can also turn that around and say, “Boy, he’s naïve.” He was genuinely astonished that Nixon lied to him. That’s the sense that one gets - that he was genuinely outraged by the language on the tapes and he was genuinely surprised that Nixon would lie to him.

Secchia: I think so. He didn’t like anybody lying to him. He didn’t think he would do it to people, why would they do it him? In the case of Nixon, again, I wish I could say that he told me something that would reveal a new light on this, but so many things he told me and so many things we talked about, I just automatically purged from my mind, because he was The President of the United States, and I was a lumber salesman from Grand Rapids. I really didn’t expect to be involved in that level and the fact that our friendship flourished and the calls became more frequent and my visits became more frequent. We were his special guests for the Bicentennial Dinner. He said, “Betty and I have a surprise for you,” and I didn’t know what he was talking about. Then we got the invitation and turns out that, according to them, we were allowed to sit together at the same table, which is very unique and supposedly, per Betty, that “each time you have a state dinner, you allow one couple, and that’s a special significant award that we give to people we love. And you and Joan were given that honor.”

Now this is the Bicentennial Dinner. I couldn’t even rent the right kind of tuxedo. I had to call Maria Downs, who was the social secretary and say, “Maria, what is a white tie?” Maria looked in the book and found pictures from the Kennedy events years ago and said, “Well, it looks just like a white tie.” So I went to see Gus Afendoulis, the Greek tailor, and he said, “Peter, I’ll take care of you.” I went on a road trip to sell lumber and I came back and he had a white tux for me with black piping – a white tuxedo! I said, “Gus, I can’t wear this!” He said, “Ah, they’ll love ya!” I said, “Gus, I’ll look like the Platters, you know, shaboom, shaboom, I can’t do that!” He said, “Well, what is a white tie? This is a white tuxedo.”

Well, we finally found out that I needed a dickey, but nobody ever told me I needed a white vest [dickey]. So we got to the Hay-Adams and we were reading the paper as we were flying in, and the guest list is printed. It says people are paying a fortune for an invitation. The Queen of England is going to be there, and this is a big deal. So we get there – (I tell this story because there is humor in it). I go to the room and get dressed. If I pull my pants up to where they are supposed to be so that my stomach isn’t showing, my ankles are hanging out, if I drop them down, my stomach is hanging out. Something is wrong with this outfit.

I go downstairs, my wife has got her hair all done, had an original outfit made. I go downstairs and bump into Bo Callaway. That ought to be on your list – a person to talk to. Bo Callaway had resigned as chairman of the Ford re-election campaign over the Crested Butte scandal where he had been former Secretary of the Army and had bought this giant ski resort property from the Army Corps of Engineers, so he felt it in his best interest to get out. I see Bo, and Bo comes from a very wealthy, successful family, so I say, “Bo, you want to ride over with us.” “Why sure Pete.” Well, it went downhill from there. Everybody else has limos coming up to the Adams. I’m flagging a cab. It’s a hundred degrees, it’s raining, it’s humid – oh, it was awful! The cab driver I get is from someplace – Southern Africa, where it’s warm. He’s wearing a winter ski cap, a jacket, no air conditioning, three fenders on a four-fender car, a dirty cab – it’s a mess. Bo gets in, I get in the front seat, my wife and Bo and his wife get in the back seat. We get in - limousine, limousine, limousine, cab, limousine, limousine, one cab.

They re-route us around through the south because they are going to take it from the lawn, where it was going to be, to come into the east side of the White House. When we get there the bright lights are on and all the TV anchors are there and everybody is… I’m still not in the right kind of outfit, so I go to see Chief Justice Berger. I get out of the cab about fifty yards or thirty yards before the exit and I go up there and I look at Chief Justice Berger, and he looks at me like he’s seen me before, and obviously I’m going to the event. He had on a cape, top hat, cane – I said, “Would you open your jacket so I can see? – I’m from Grand Rapids, I don’t know what…” He opens his jacket – oh my God, there’s a vest that you wear with a white tie, and I didn’t have a vest, so that’s why my dickey ended here and my stomach was there. So I go in the White House, Bo Callaway is just mortified, by the way when our cab pulls up.

I go in the White House and I find Rex Scouten, who was then the Head Usher, and I said, “I need help, Mr. Scouten, I need help.” So he says, “What’s the matter, Mr. Secchia?” “Oh my God,” I said, “Do you have a fat waiter who’s off duty tonight that I can borrow…?” Well, this whole thing was backwards. We were wearing white ties, and the staff was wearing black ties. So they take me in there and they unbuckle my studs (back then we wore these studs), and I had all this stuff and suspenders and cummerbund. They take me all apart, I’m sitting there with nothing on, they went down to get this vest – this Secret Service agent comes into the room. He points at me and says to his wrist microphone: “Keep them there, keep them there! There’s some guy in here with no clothes on.”

What happened was the Queen and the President had decided to come down the back elevator, through Mr. Scouten’s office and I’m holding them up, right? So they are trying to put me back together. They can’t put me outside the door because then I’m in where the Marine Band is playing, in the lobby.
They can’t put me in the other end, because I’m at the elevator, so they are trying to get me put together. “It will be a minute! It will be a minute!” So finally they get me out and everybody had already gone out and they are waiting for the President and the Queen.

Well, we go downstairs and we present our invitation and it’s got a table number. We do not know that we’ve got the same table number that’s unique, because we go to parties in Grand Rapids. The Marine won’t let us in. He says, “Something’s wrong here.” So he dials and says, “Who is this guy – what’s the deal? And he’s the guy.” So they have us at a table with Alice Roosevelt Longworth and some other people, and I don’t know anything about this. So finally, the Marine says, “Okay, go,” and he announces us. We go out, and just as we go out all the lights are bright, shining on us. Loud applause. I said, “Joan, is my stomach showing?” “No.” I said, “Joan, Jerry said we have a – this is a surprise – is something going on I don’t know about it?” She says, “I don’t know.” “Do we wave? What do we do?” She says, “Just keep walking.” Okay, so we kept walking.

What happened, is we came out in the Rose Garden, and the President and Queen came out upstairs on the portico right above us – so all the people were looking over us at them and applauding. And so we’re standing there saying, “Oh my God, what’s going on?”

So Ford thought this was funny because he liked this kind of humor. He loved to scorch friends, and did it twenty years later when Betty had her 20 year anniversary for the Betty Ford Center. I bought a table, and I couldn’t find persons from Grand Rapids who wanted to fly out west to attend the dinner, so I gave the table back to the Ford staff and she seated my wife and me at a table of ten, with eight prominent Democrats, and one of them was Hillary Clinton. And all the first ladies arrive, except Hillary. She was late. She made a dramatic entrance and came to our table. The minute she sat the conversation began. [Joseph] Califano was next to me from Lyndon Johnson’s years. The staff comes over from Betty Ford’s table and says, “Mrs. Ford wants to know if you are enjoying your table?” I mean, it was like, always trying to have fun, but do it in a very subtle way.
Smith: He was impressed by Hillary Clinton. One sensed maybe he thought more of her than he did of her husband – in sheer intellectual ability.

Secchia: Jerry Ford might have thought that this was his coming out party for political correctness to be in admiration of a woman because, in his years of politics there were, other than Hale Boggs wife [Lindy], who came in and he was a friend of Lindy Boggs (that’s another one you might want to interview). Lindy Boggs and he were friends. I don’t know that, he probably said that to me, but I can’t remember that.

Smith: Tell me about his sense of humor.

Secchia: Oh he had a great sense of humor. He didn’t know how to laugh boisterously, or out loud, but we had a lot of fun. We had bets on Michigan-Michigan State. He went to China and the White House called me and said we don’t have a copy of the music for the Michigan fight song. I said I’d get it to them right away, and I sent them the Michigan State fight song (their rival). I wasn’t there, but supposedly it was written up in newspapers and magazines that when the plane arrived, he was greeted to the wrong fight song.

When we dedicated the Gerald R. Ford Freeway (US196), we had University of Michigan blankets and I was chairman of the dedication. So I put a Michigan State blanket under it, and when he pulled the rope, the University of Michigan blanket came off and the Grand Valley Band started to play Hail to the Victors. I had paid them to change over to the Michigan State song and I have a video tape with him turning to Governor Milliken and saying, “Where’s Secchia?” I mean, to the point of when we dedicated this museum, his brothers had a policeman assigned to me to make sure I didn’t do anything to embarrass him( at this event.

Smith: Now he did return the favor at the dedication of the airport.

Secchia: Yes, he was funny. (Oh, did you wrote the line? - obviously). That was a very funny line, and that’s another issue. When I suggested that Kent County rename the airport, I had been given a tip by somebody out in California that Palm Springs was thinking about naming their airport Gerald R. Ford. I said, wait a minute, we can’t do that, we’ve got to…so I started talking to the commissioners and it was a fast-tracked project.

There were eighteen letters to the editor calling me everything but a decent human being – that I was being selfish doing this for my friend. That it was an ego trip for me – and it was not a pleasant situation. I lost three votes on the county commission – two of them were Republicans, actually, but we carried the day. When we flew home with Air Force One and the casket, and we landed at Gerald R. Ford International, it all came back to me that, as miserable as I felt and as awful as those letters were, we did the right thing. I remember, because the casket was in the compartment right in front of where I was sitting and I looked at it and I said, “You’re coming home, Bubba.” I used to joke around with him because he was a football player – he’d say, “Why do you call me Bubba?” I said, “Football players are all Bubba.”

We had a lot of fun. His sense of humor was great. I know there are conflicting stories on this but, and you might have been here – I don’t think so, I think it might have been Will Jones - I called him up and tried to convince him to come home to be buried here and his answer was, “Well, let me talk to Betty about that.” A few days later he called me back and said, “We’re going to do it, Peter. Can you give us some more information?” So I got a catalog for diving and there was a ‘his and her’ wet suit advertisement. I said, “We checked the water tables, and I’d ordered this matching suit for them so they would be very comfortable.” Well, he called me back with, “You’re kidding, aren’t you?” He’d take humor to a certain point, but then he really got a little bit lost as to what, “Was it really supposed to be funny?”

Smith: He was a very literal guy.

The subject of religion, it is interesting, because people drew the contrast in ’76 between a Carter who was very vocally born again and really came out of a southern, evangelical tradition. And yet my sense was, much more than the public knew, religion mattered, faith mattered to the Fords.

Who was Billy Zeoli?
Secchia: Billy Zeoli was – oh boy, this is one of those ones I’m going to have to read about – Billy Zeoli was a preacher who had an organization that, to this day, has some support from friends of ours. I think Doug DeVos happens to be the head of his organization. He spent most of his time with Christian athletes, and doing meetings and really got very big. Got divorced. Was a friend of Ford’s. I never really could figure out why, but I think because Jerry Ford was who he was, when someone offered to come out and pray with him, or be with him, he accepted that offer. Probably because he didn’t know how to deny it.

They were friends, but not close friends. They were friends because they shared that Christian issue. I remember when Jerry Ford became president, the night we were at his house in Arlington and he said to me, “What do you think I should do?” I said, “Why are you asking me? You’ve got Kissinger here, you’ve got all these people here.” He said, “You’re a friend.” I remember my comment back to him was, “Don’t F it up. You’ve got a chance here to do something.” He said, “Make me a list of what you think I should be concerned about.” I went back to my room in Washington that night, and I dictated nine points, one of them was: don’t bring God to you in the White House, like Nixon did, go out and go to church. Go out to be with the people in their churches. Two: Split Henry Kissinger’s job, he can’t be National Security Advisor and Secretary of State, it just isn’t going to work and it isn’t going to work for you when you get into campaign time. There was three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine and I used to get notes from him from the White House, number two is gone, number six is gone, number four is gone. He actually kept it and he would X it out and drop me a note. They weren’t any great tidbits of wisdom, they were just obvious to me that they would be clumsy for him.

Billy Zeoli offered him something that allowed him some Christian moments privately, because of what he did. But since I’m not part of their prayer circle, I can’t really comment on how it came about. But Billy was a friend of mine from just being somebody I saw around town. There were others he wasn’t friends with. He was a very, very different individual who built his organization and made religious films and sent out documents that Jerry Ford thought were wonderful, that they were teaching the gospel all over the world.
We never discussed that relationship. There were certain ones, I could ask you the same question, there were certain relationships you didn’t discuss with him because they really weren’t something you’d be interested in, or you were afraid you might say something that would make it difficult for everybody. This was one that I never really understood or got close to.

Smith: Did you sense that religion mattered? Presumably, coming out of his upbringing in the Ford household…

Secchia: No, I sensed that he had a strong faith, and that he did pray. I think Mike is a perfect example of that upbringing. Jack was on the other side of that. One of my tasks was, the night of the Bicentennial Dinner – I got a call from the President – he said, “I want you to watch Jack. I don’t want him in Georgetown tonight, standing on a table smoking grass, or reading in the paper that he embarrassed the Queen of England and his country.” That is another humorous story, but when it came time after dinner to (at that time, almost everybody smoked). I saw Jack go out on the south portico to have a cigarette and I went out to talk to him.

My message to Jack was, “Look, tonight’s a very important night for your father.” Now you remember, we’re in the middle of the campaign - we are talking about July of the re-election year and I have been given the assignment to take care of the delegate (Mr. Reed) from Mississippi. Clarke Reed was his name.

“Peter, you’re in charge of him. If he needs a coffee, get him a coffee. If he needs a drink, get him a drink. Ashtray? Yes, sir! I want Mr. Reed to have a wonderful time, but I want you to watch Jack.” So I go outside on the south portico to talk to Jack. I said, “Jack, now look, this is a very important night.” Jack had just started visiting Washington and going out and he was getting a little negative press. He was eighteen or nineteen or twenty, maybe twenty-one, but he was just at the stage where the president was concerned. So I went out to talk to him. I was thirty-seven, he was twenty-one. I thought, why am I doing this?…but just remind him not to do anything that would be embarrassing. So I go out to remind him. I don’t know that he ever smoked. I don’t know that he ever caused trouble, but I was just to remind him that this was a special night and it could make a difference on a lot of delegates because we were very close in the delegate count for the August convention. Of course, the next month was the convention in Kansas City, where we had Jim Baker who was going to count our votes and we didn’t know if we had the votes.

I went out and I’m talking to Jack and this British staffer came out wearing a black tie, and asked if I had a light. I did, so I lit his cigarette, and just to make conversation, I said, “Excuse me, what do you do for the Queen?” He says, “That’s a rather personal question?” It was Prince Philip. I said, “I’m sorry, I’m from Grand Rapids, I didn’t recognize you.” He said, “Oh, I can deal with it, I have an agreement with the Queen mother and her daughter, that whoever was in the family…that I would never wear a white tie to one of her stuffy kind of…” Oh my God, I couldn’t dig my way out of that hole, so meanwhile Jack is out there laughing and Prince Philip is thinking I’m a fool, and I couldn’t wait to tell Jerry Ford that story. But we did get through the night and there were no problems. We did have a wonderful evening.

Smith: There was the famous incident when the Marine Band played The Lady is a Tramp.

Secchia: Right. That’s because Jerry Ford, who loved to delegate to the people he cared about – he said, “Susan’s in charge of the music tonight.” Susan picked this, and I’m sitting there with Clarke Reed, “Would you like a cigarette? Would you like a drink Mr. Reed? Can I get your ashtray cleaned?” I could not believe it when that music started to play and my wife looked at me and I looked at my wife, “I can’t believe this.” That was that famous night. It was a long night, but it was a wonderful night and they did very well. The Fords were magnificent.

Smith: Were you surprised at all? There was a certain amount - Washington can be a pretty insular town – of condescension. Doubts about his intelligence, doubts about his athletic ability, etc, etc, etc. And she was condescended to in a different sort of way. The notion that this Cub Scout den mother from Grand Rapids was going to be in Jackie Kennedy’s place. Did they ever talk about that? How did they deal with that? Except simply to just do the job and disprove it.

Secchia: That didn’t bother them – they recognized the criticism as based on East Coast values, but the fact that they were Midwesterners was a point of pride. Midwesterners might always have a problem getting in the club at Harvard, but he had gone to Yale, so he felt that he had earned whatever it was that they were in search of finding in their president. So it never really got to him. He never really let the letters to the editor, or the personal issues bother him.

Smith: Or Chevy Chase?

Secchia: Well, Chevy Chase was a – he laughed at Chevy Chase. He did not get mean about that. I chaired the Humor in the Presidency when we had Chevy Chase here in Grand Rapids and I can remember sitting with Tip O’Neill at Tootsie Van Kelly’s - a little bar and pub that I owned here - for an hour and a half talking about the Chevy Chase issues and how he felt Ford was misjudged by people.

Smith: Was there real affection there between Tip and Ford?

Secchia: Without a doubt, without a doubt. A mutual admiration society. Both respected the opposition who can get the job done. It’s funny, you can go to a football game and watch the linebacker from Michigan just totally destroy the running backs at Michigan State, and then watch the Michigan State quarterback just pepper the Michigan defense with completed passes. That quarterback leads one team and that linebacker leads the other team and they both lead them to the conclusion of the game, which might be a win or a loss, but they walk off the field with their arm around each other. They lead the opposition while you were throwing well. You made twenty-seven tackles – I mean they respected each other for what they were able to do for their team.

That mutual respect was based on knowledge, effectiveness and ability – where today the vitriolic discourse in D.C. is based on personality, church, past history, what you did in high school or college. Really – when is the last time you read about the debate of the effectiveness of a leader in the legislature rather than, well, he’s one of them? Ick! So they had that respect, and I would say I never saw a better relationship between two totally opposite political visionaries. That relationship is one that will someday be written about – how the odd couple they were. They were the odd couple. I could tell you more stories that he would tell me about Tip.

Smith: Tell us another one.

Secchia: Well, they would call each other when they had a problem on the floor. They would discuss an issue. Tip would say why I can’t go here, but I can go here if you’ll go here. And they worked those deals. Today, it’s the pork barrel that’s being offered by Senator Reid, or Nancy Pelosi – we’ll put twenty million into your peanut farm subsidy in Georgia if you’ll vote against the surge in Iraq. That’s not the same as the relationship that Ford and Tip had. But while you need this for your caucus, there were little tweaks that they were able to work that got them both where they had to be eventually. But it wasn’t so polarized and so vitriolic and so publicized and there wasn’t a reporter standing behind every bush like the paparazzi would do a starlet.

That was a genuine affection, and maybe just a mutual respect that you didn’t attack. If you told Jerry Ford you were angry at Tip O’Neill, keep it to yourself, “I’ll work with Tip.” I heard that. I remember a wonderful story when he told me that Jim Baker was going to be the next chairman of the Republican National Committee and I said, “I’m not getting that information.” He said, “Well, what is your information?” I said, “Well, Bill Brock and his secretary, Muffett, (I think her name) [Secchia note: Muffett may have been his last name. The Sec. may have been Orror(?) Browning] are working very hard. I think they are close to getting the votes.” He said, “Cheney (C.O.S then) tells me that Baker’s got the votes.” I said, “Well, you’d better count again, just so you don’t get embarrassed.”

Well, that night I had dinner with him and the two of us were upstairs. He had removed Mary Louise Smith (from Iowa) as the chairman of the RNC and he was going to replace her with Baker – get the election and replace her with Baker. We all know that Baker later became a very competent statesman, but at that time, he was not well known – he was a deputy secretary in Commerce and had been involved a little in the ’76 campaign by counting delegates. He was in charge of that. But, Ford called that night after dinner. Ford and I got into it and he asked me to leave the White House. That’s the first time – he didn’t just say, “let me get you a car and take you to your hotel,” or you go on upstairs to sleep, whatever. He actually wanted me to leave the White House.

Smith: Over what?

Secchia: Over our discussion that he was wrong, that he shouldn’t be backing Baker. It was going to blow up on him, and the fact that he had screwed up with Mary Louise Smith. That he never told – if you remember correctly – he never discussed it with Barry Goldwater, who made a big stink that the conservative wing of the party had been ignored on this switch, and they shouldn’t have been. Well Reagan had his own candidate, Dick Richards, to be the chairman of the party because Reagan was running in the primary that summer and my discussion was coming from a chubby, chunky lumber salesman from Grand Rapids wearing jeans and a flannel shirt at the White House. So Gerald R. Ford said, “You don’t know what you’re talking about, we’ve got the votes. Baker’s going to win. If I screwed up on Mary Louise Smith, it was….I think it’s time for you to go.” Boing. I left the White House.

It was snowing and I didn’t have a coat and I was staying at the Madison so I had to walk several blocks up Connecticut. I’ll never forget that night. I laughed because I’d just been thrown out of the White House. My friend had asked me to leave – what did I do wrong? I only told him – and I’ll never forget – I was freezing, there was snow coming down, there were no cell phones then, no cabs, dark – get to the Madison and walk into it – back then they had a small bar, very small. I went into the bar to get a beer and bartender says, “How you doing? How’d your night go?” I thought, “You don’t want to hear it.”

The next morning the phone rings. It’s Nell Yates. I’ve got a 9:30 plane at DCA, which isn’t far – 15 minutes from the hotel. “President wants to see you right away.” I said, “I’ve got a plane at 9.” She says, “Now. There’s a car downstairs at the curb to pick you up.” “Yes, ma’am.” Quick, get up, shower, downstairs, in the car to the White House. Someone is meeting me, right inside – right to the Oval Office. President Ford is sitting there like this – writing. Doesn’t even look up. Says: “I checked with Cheney, I checked with Baker, we counted the votes, Baker is dropping out today, Bill Brock does have the votes. I’ve talked to Barry Goldwater and we put that to bed – that issue – and how the hell do you get so much information when you are out in Grand Rapids selling lumber? Now get outta here.” And I left. He hardly even looked up.

The friendship, of course, rekindled, but he was already beginning to be out of touch as a president, getting information fed to him that wasn’t really what was going on. I think then he found that he had to have more Pete Secchias in his world that he could talk to about what was really going on back home. After the election decided to move his voting registration to California. He asked me to do it quietly and carefully so that it wouldn’t alarm people. It was basically based on two reasons. One is, he came back home and we went to dinner at the 1913 Room, he couldn’t eat his dinner, between autographs, everybody who came to the table, “I went to high school with your brother’s cousin’s sister-in-law, and we’re old friends and do you remember so and so,” and we were trying to eat dinner and it was just awful. He said, this was right before he left the White House, “You know, I don’t know that it’s going be easy for me to be in Grand Rapids and Betty’s health can’t handle the climate.” So then they went to California, and then they went there just, supposedly part-time.

Smith: But I take it that there was some local backlash.

Secchia: Big time. We had a family here, the Dilley family, and I don’t know if you want to interview them, but they were always writing letters to the editor. They were the loyal opposition to Jerry Ford. Whatever he did, one of the brothers in the Dilley, Dilley, and Dilley law firm would have a letter to the editor. As recently as a few years ago on the airport naming, just vitriolic, they just could not stand him.

Smith: Do you know where that started?
Secchia: That started back in the ’48 campaign through the family, but I didn’t know that because I didn’t get to be his friend until the ‘60s, so I don’t have that information. Did you ever get hold of Maury DeJonge?

Smith: Yes, I’m going to see him Friday.

Secchia: There’s where you’re going to fill in the ’48-’78 gap. He’ll be great because he’s got that newspaper mind and he’s got that memory. He’s probably got boxes of info. I have all these photos in my computer of Betty Ford in my kitchen making dinner for Jerry and Joan and me. She and I making…

Smith: Was she a good cook?

Secchia: Well, she was a good cook in the sense that she didn’t often cook. It was the fact that she was comfortable in the kitchen – she put an apron on and helped me. I was making veal parmesan and I had an Italian recipe and she was chopping – she was doing okay. But we were friends and we were having fun, and that was more important than whether – but we had a nice time.

Smith: Tell me about that love-match. Because it was clearly a very close marriage. I think a lot of people were – I don’t mean to say surprised – but I think a lot of people learned a lot of things at the time of his death. I think, particularly for younger people who were being introduced to him for the first time, there is one reason why, as the week went on, it built and built and built. Because people were contrasting what they were seeing with what we have. For a lot of folks, it came as news that the Fords had been married as long as they had. Everyone knows about Nancy and Ronnie, in part because Nancy and Ronnie wanted people to know about them.

Secchia: You’ve got to remember that period of time. You’re coming after Jackie and President Kennedy - both accused of having their own little flings. Then you have the divorces of the Reagans and then you have the issues that go back to the Lyndon Johnson wild days. The relationship that Nixon had was not one that anybody ever really understood. So you add up all those years of the monarchy being a queen and a king are not – who’s wearing the clothes, who’s the boss?
Jerry Ford had this, in my judgment, this value of the worth of his wife that was very high, without being obsequiously subservient to the public. Privately, it was also, “Well, I want to talk to Betty about that.” There was never a major decision without, “I want to talk to Betty about that.” Now, not presidential decisions, and I’m not so sure that she was involved in the pardon, she may have been, but the issues that had to do with their life, she was “Mother says this, that’s the way it will be.” And that may be the result of that relationship that also forced him to feel comfortable saying to his real father, “I don’t want to see you again. My mother, my new father are very important to me. Mother rules.”

In his house, she, Betty, ruled because he was committed to being a legislator. And it is no different than many of the businessmen in my era – I go to the office, don’t call me, don’t bother me, let me do my work and I will try to get enough treasury to build, to get our kids’ teeth fixed, to get our kids into college, to get us a good health plan, to find us a nice home – and it was sort of an understanding of, “You do this, and I will do that.” It was a division of labor in that generation. This generation, the division is a battle between, well, I want to be a working wife and you can be the house husband, or you can do it a different way. But that changed. Betty and Jerry Ford – they were the post-World War II poster children. We’ve been through a war, our parents went through a Depression, we’re going to stay together no matter what. Nobody is going to come between us. But he was not a good husband. I mean, he was not home very often. He was on the road doing what he thought he had to do.

Smith: Maybe that’s when she developed some of her problems, particularly with alcohol, and the drug dependency, which really is an offshoot of the pain that she was going through.

Secchia: No question about that.

Smith: But the fact that he wasn’t there then.

Secchia: Where he really felt guilty – one of the things that he used to talk to me about was, he would say that he had to be somewhere, and he had to be somewhere because he had jerks like me, who were running the Kent County Republican Party. “You’ve got to be at our dinner.” She was having pain and suffering, and he wasn’t going to share that with county chairman, but he had to be to an event because there were people attending. He would leave her alone and he would need somebody to be with her. Dr. Lukash, which I don’t know if he is still alive or not…

Smith: No, he’s passed away.

Secchia: Dr. Lukash would have been a great interview because he knew the inside of a lot of things and he was a very dedicated friend of theirs. GRF knew that he had to have somebody, a surrogate person – sometimes it was me, sometimes it was somebody else there but that wasn’t really guilt as much as it was defensive. He felt: “I have to do what I have to do, so I’d better find somebody else to be there.”

Smith: But go down the road, after they left Washington and the intervention takes place. I’m just wondering whether by that time he felt any sort of responsibility, simply for the fact that he let this creep up on him.

Secchia: There were issues that bothered the family. One day I received a phone call from Betty Ford and it was a very difficult conversation because she said, “Peter, this is Betty.” “Hi, Betty.” “They did it to me again.” I said, “What are you talking about?” She said, “They did it to me again.” I said, “I’m sorry, what did they do?” She replied: “I went to this doctor and he gave me too much medication. They just don’t want me to leave their office and be able to say that they weren’t able to help me. So they are over-compensating me with pain killer.”

I had been aware of the issues with a couple of drinks, maybe one, maybe two, and the combination of the pain killer, and I immediately hung up the phone and called their C.O.S. Barrett. I didn’t want to call him and say, “Hey, I just got a disturbing call from your wife.” So I said to Bob, “What do we do about this, guys? Here’s the phone call I got.” But I think Barrett was working with the kids and developing this intervention. I don’t even know what happened because I wasn’t that close to Bob. But, I was probably a threat to Bob because I was very close to the president. Penny Circle told me that Bob didn’t want anybody else close to the president. But that’s okay because I was here and I didn’t want to be flying back and forth to Palm Springs.

That call was a telling moment that Betty was out of control and she had no way to handle this. Then when I got into it, I found it was a pretty common occurrence that a doctor had Betty Ford as a client and would try to reduce her pain. He surely didn’t want her telling the neighborhood in his market that he wasn’t competent – or unable to improve her health, so he gave her a little extra medication. That was the part I knew about. Susan discussed the intervention with me and what they were going to do as a family. Susan was the one who called me to tell me he was going to be vice president and she wasn’t supposed to tell me. That’s another funny story about the Ford relationship.

I was home and she called me. She said, “Peter, I’m not allowed to tell you this, but Mom’s getting dressed.” “Mom’s getting dressed?” “Yes, she’s getting dressed up. She’s been invited tonight to the White House.” I thought, “What’s going on here, what’s she trying to tell me?” She said, “I can’t tell you anything more than that.” I thought, “What is she talking about?” So I hung up the phone. We were watching the six o’clock national news or what we saw in Grand Rapids then, and they were talking about going to be in the East Room tonight and Nixon is going to announce his choice of vice president, I thought. “Mom’s getting dressed – I’m not allowed to tell you this.” Oh my God, he’s going to be the vice presidential nominee. I’m going to make some money on this deal.

So I call three guys who I knew were interested in politics, or involved - friends of mine (not activists). Calls: I found a babysitter, got a voice mail message, and had a no answer. I couldn’t make a single ten dollar bet that Ford was going to be Vice President of the United States. Well, twenty minutes later they opened up the TV at seven-thirty or eight o’clock, whatever it was, and Nixon came to the podium, and I’m watching with Joan, and they announce that Jerry Ford would be the vice president. I said, “I didn’t make a buck on it. I could have had more fun with that.”
Smith: My sense was, he was so proud of her. First of all, for what she had overcome, but secondly, for what she created with the Betty Ford Center. She got the Medal of Honor long before he got the Medal of Honor. She probably had higher poll ratings than he did, etc., etc., etc. And yet my sense was, that was wonderful.

Secchia: His self-deprecating humor about how the fact that Betty was more popular than he was when he was campaigning, was always a very effective line, I thought, because it endeared him to all those other women of that generation who were never recognized as being the competent leaders they were.

Smith: What does it tell you also about, just the White House climate, when the Sixty Minutes interview aired, the immediate reaction was, “Oh my God, this is terrible!”

Secchia: After what?

Smith: In the White House, when she did the famous interview with Morley Safer, and talked about what she would do if Susan said she was having an affair, and she talked about, what if her kids were smoking grass – and abortion, etc., etc. First Ladies never talked about those things before and it really was a watershed moment in many, many ways. Not surprisingly, the political team in the White House thought, “Oh my God, this is terrible!” It took a few days for the polls to come in and to their astonishment, there were a lot of people who found it very refreshing. It really was, in many ways, the beginning of her reputation as a bit of a free spirit, someone who actually, without maybe deliberately trying to, contributed to the openness of the Ford White House. It actually advanced that storyline. But the immediate reaction was, “Oh my God, this is a disaster!”

Secchia: And his reaction to that was the most surprising. He could have used one of the trite, “Well, that’s Betty being Betty.” The typical answer many of us husbands might use, but he said, “That’s her opinion, and we don’t agree on everything.” They had the same discussion about women’s rights and the ERA, and he had to be careful in his re-election campaign. But his reaction to what she said was very supportive of her, and really that might have been a watershed moment for his presidency, rather than her statement being a watershed moment for the First Lady.

Smith: Jump ahead, because in later years, they’d go to every Republican convention, and every four years they were more and more isolated in a lot of ways.

Secchia: Are you talking about the Philadelphia convention in ‘92?

Smith: Whether it was abortion or gay rights or issues where the party went this way, my question is: did he change, and how much of it was her influence – or was it simply that the party went this way – because, let’s face it, when he was in the White House he was viewed as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. But in many ways, conservatism was about to undergo a redefinition, particularly on social issues. There were things that weren’t on the agenda in the Fifth District in Michigan. Tell me if I’m wrong:
conservatism, first and foremost, was a matter of matter of economics and foreign policy. But there were a host of issues that, frankly, you just didn’t discuss. Let alone regard as part of the public agenda.

Secchia: Well, the Right to Life and the ERA were already being discussed quite openly. But Jerry Ford never really was a straight party guy – a partisan kind of House Speaker. I tried to explain this to John McCain when he was at my home last week (spring of 2008). I said, “You know, you and Jerry Ford have a lot in common in the way you approach things.” I wanted him [McCain] to come to the burial site, but he flew into Muskegon and it was too long a drive, but he will be here, I’m sure. I don’t think he even noticed, or has read enough to realize that he and GRF are similar. But Ford did speak out against his party on several issues, and I don’t think GRF changed. I think the party changed. But again, it’s part of the Internet, the information, the 24 hour news cycle. We now discuss all these issues 24/7. While you and I are sleeping, somebody is blogging away and some Drudge report being written about what you, or somebody said. And somebody else is running with it and using it.
Jerry Ford really never changed. He might have been more vocal on some issues that he didn’t want to make front page with when he was in the White House.
Smith: How much of an influence do you think she was?

Secchia: She was a strong influence, and I don’t think the influence diminished. I think she was a strong influence pre the White House, during the White House, and after the White House. It’s just that he was so busy pre the White House, being a Legislator and a House Leader that he didn’t spend a lot of time discussing family issues with her. When he was in the White House, he really felt it important because he needed to hear other viewpoints than just his palace guard. That’s how his relationship with Rumsfeld and Cheney started to develop, because he found those two to be two that he could always count on to tell him the truth. But in many cases, not what he wanted to hear – but the truth. There were others that were not so close because they weren’t seen that way by him.

Smith: Was it awkward for him in later years? Particularly, let’s face it, over the last eight years, in terms of the alumni from his administration like Paul O’Neill, or Cheney, or Rumsfeld. Did you discuss it?

Secchia: We did. He would talk to me about, in the case of Paul O’Neill. He thought Paul was a great public servant and a wonderful, bright young man, who may have said a few things that he shouldn’t say. But Jerry Ford was never one to be vitriolic against somebody who spoke what they felt they had to say (including his wife). It was like, well, that’s what she thinks she has to say. That’s what Paul thought he had to say. He kept his faith in Paul and his friendship with Paul throughout all of that. So, was it difficult for him? No. But there were people who had served in his administration who, at times, had to explain their actions to him, without him demanding the explanation. It was just sort of an automatic camaraderie amongst that group of people. “You know what I just said was written up, I think I’d better call.” Henry Kissinger was a perfect example. He was always chewing on some piece of foot leather that he had in his mouth, and he would call the president and explain it. The president was always very good about that. “Well Henry told me what really happened, and…”

Smith: Was he too nice to be president?
Secchia: Could he have been re-elected if he hadn’t been so nice? Probably. But, he and I had this discussion many times. When you run for the Presidency and you lose by one voter precinct in Ohio, a couple thousand votes in Hawaii or Washington – it boils down to: what cost you the election? Was it the pardon, was it the stumbling, was it the knee that collapsed on the airplane, was it the Chevy Chase mocking you every night, was it the comment you made about “Drop dead New York.” None of these. All of these impacted (each of them) the election by a tenth of a percentage point. But if you have eight or ten of these, you have a percentage point, and percentage point is a 51-49, and you get close, but you don’t get closure. None of them by themselves, Betty’s position on the ERA, that’s one of my 10-15 items, they all cost him a little.

Smith: And the Reagan challenge.

Secchia: Well, the Reagan challenge, I think, helped him. I think if Reagan hadn’t challenged him, he wouldn’t have campaigned in Minnesota and other non-Ford states. He wouldn’t have turned out the vote.

Smith: That’s interesting, because I’ve also argued this, that it made him a better candidate.

Secchia: It made him a better candidate, but it made him a more understood candidate. To get people out to the polls they have to be pumped, you just can’t depend on a party mechanism getting people to the polls. You have to believe in the candidate. If they’ve never met him, they’re not going to believe in him. I often would say to him, “Look, say thank you to Ronald Reagan.”

Now going to the convention in 1980, when they were talking about – when they said Jerry Ford might be vice president. A rather funny story that night. He gave me his phone number for his suite, and said, “Call me if there is anything you think I should know.” I had promised Guy Vander Jagt that I would keep the Michigan delegation in their seats when he spoke. He had the keynote address that night (postponed one day). I had made a promise to him that I would keep the Michigan delegates in their seats. I was, at that time, the Republican National Committeeman, and soon to be elected Vice Chairman of the Party, but he felt I had some influence and I said I’d do that.
We ran a full page ad for Guy Vander Jagt for Vice President. Jim Sparling, who was his administrative assistant, and I and a few others paid for that, and we tried to get Guy consideration. It’s not unusual that you do that for a vice presidential candidate. In fact, I was on the phone with Cheney trying to convince him to consider Engler when Cheney flew to Texas and Bush convinced him to take the VP job. I mean, this is always something you’re doing if you have friends that are involved. At this particular (Detroit) convention, I had the phone number and Bob Griffin asked me for it. I said, “I can’t give it to you. He told me this is just to use if I need to talk to him.”

And, of course, the word was then out. In 1980 the TV anchor guys carried giant backpacks with antennas and they wanted interviews. Pettit, (Tom Pettit) from NBC came to me to interview me because he said, “I hear that you say that Jerry Ford will not be the vice president of the United States. I’d like to interview you to find out why you say that.” I said, “I can’t talk right now, we’re getting ready for Vander Jagt’s address, and when he’s done, I’ll be happy to talk to you, but right now I’ve got to keep the delegates in their seats.” Well, people were not in their seats because the word was Jerry Ford was being considered. Vander Jagt was trying to get that same job. Vander Jagt was the keynote speaker. Ford was up in his room and this current back and forth – who’s doing it – who’s orchestrating it – I’m on the floor as a delegate. So Pettit’s there and I can hear him telling his control booth, “Well, Vander Jagt spoke for forty-five minutes and never stopped, never ended.” By the time it ended, Pettit was gone.

Smith: By the time that ended, it also ended for Vander Jagt.

Secchia: By the time the speech ended. But, I saw NBC’s Tom Pettit the next morning in the gift shop in the hotel. He asked me, “Why were you so adamant with everybody who asked you, that Ford would not be the vice president? I said, “Well, it’s pretty obvious to me because Ford lives in California, Reagan lives in California. One of them has to move, and I don’t think you’re going to ever convince either one of them they should move for the other. But I thought I learned in fifth grade constitutional studies that that was the deal.” Pettit says, “Oh my God, that never came up last night.” You go back and you look at all the transcripts and it never came up in all the discussions. Then 30 years later Cheney moves back from Texas to Wyoming to run for vice president. He got a lot of heat for that. But even though he was from Wyoming, and he’d only temporarily gone with Halliburton to Texas, when he moved back home, it appeared to be the kind of move that Ford - and you know from your interviews with Ford and Reagan, that that relationship would have had a hard time understanding, well, who is moving? You can’t ask Reagan to move – that was not going to happen.

Smith: Was it ever really seriously – my sense is that it’s been exaggerated over the years.

Secchia: Here’s what happened that evening. I gave that suite phone number to Senator Bob Griffin because he convinced me he had to talk to Ford. Told him to tell no one. About an hour later I’m walking – you know how you fight your way through a convention – I see this gathering and all these antennas sticking up from all those backpacks. Bob Griffin was having a small press conference – I’m watching from the back. He says, “I have his private number up in his suite and I’ve been talking to them.” I thought, “You #@% (mumbling). That was terrible. I was offended. I told him later I thought that was a cheap shot. “That was not what I gave it to you for.” I don’t think the idea was ever serious, but Barrett or Kissinger could tell you that they didn’t tell me. I don’t think it would have worked. I don’t think Jerry Ford would ever be the architect of it. He might have used it to negotiate from his congressional days, learning how you negotiate it. And he might have been to help some of his friends who were in his cabinet become part of Reagan’s leadership group.

Smith: I can’t image Mrs. Ford would have been thrilled about the idea.

Secchia: I don’t know where it came from. I was so adamantly convinced that it wasn’t going to happen, I didn’t give it much credibility.

Smith: Remember who was doing the negotiating supposedly for the Ford team – Kissinger, Greenspan, one other, I don’t remember.
Secchia: You’ll probably interview one of them and you’ll find out what really happened, but I don’t think it had any credibility whatsoever with the delegates. In my judgment they wanted to be “back in the action.” Ford group (individuals) may have.

Smith: Let me ask you, because you mentioned Barrett’s name, when the President first left the White House, he signed up for a lot of things which were actually beyond criticism. He had a deal with NBC, obviously was going to write his memoirs and all that – and even going on some boards that would have passed muster. But there was criticism that he was “cashing in” on the presidency. People didn’t know that he had to raise nine million dollars to build this Gerald R. Ford Museum building, which he said later was the toughest thing he ever did.

There are a lot of things people didn’t know, but the deals like the Franklin Mint – there were commercial ventures that in retrospect might best have been passed. I always wondered about the dynamic of that, because a really good staff person is counterintuitive, and they protect you from yourself. I wondered whether that was not the case at that point. Whether basically, for the first time in his life, he [Ford] saw how easy it was to make a lot of money. He hadn’t made money and he had family he wanted to take care of, he had kids he wanted to leave…

Secchia: I think those first four years were tough because, first off, the house that was his office was gifted by Firestone to the University of Southern California (USC), and it was, at his death, to go back to them. So they had, in actuality, a charitable remainder trust where they had made their gift to the University and it was their building on a sublease to the Ford people. There were overhead expenses that had to be met, and that’s where Sandy Weil comes in and some of the American Express boards that were always questioned.

But now you have to put it all in perspective. Four years later when Jimmy Carter lost and then he went into the post-presidency period, building Habitat for Humanity and not being the big board member and not making the big bucks, staying in Plains, Georgia. He was fitting a mold that would put pressure on another former president to go out and not do things. The staff is trying to be the balance. But then you have the Herbert Walker Bush victory, and the post-'92 when fifteen years ago Ford is still alive and healthy, and ’74 Bush making a million dollars to give a speech. I don’t know if it was a million, but he got paid big bucks to go to Tokyo and give a speech.

Smith: Reagan. Reagan famously goes to Japan – gets two million dollars for two speeches.

Secchia: Right. You see what other past presidents are now doing and you say, “Wait a minute,” I was worried about Ford taking this $80,000 a year as a board member, or this $50,000 to give a speech, and another former president is making two million. Everything that you do seems less destructive to the image of the presidency if others have already violated it to great extremes. And it wasn’t just Reagan and wasn’t just Democrat vs Republicans. Clinton was just out hustling – Ford, Reagan, the money they raised for their museums. Ford’s money that he raised was from people who aren’t part of that Washington scene. We (Ford administration) didn’t have any relationships with Kuwait, or some of these countries that made big Bush ’41 contributions. So I think a lot of what Ford did in his later years was a little more open market acceptable.

It’s really now out of control when you look at what Clinton has reported he’s earned since his presidency – what his wife as earned since her First Ladyship. It’s just like “Wow, how could anybody ever say Ford did anything wrong.” If the Franklin Mint made him a couple hundred grand, it’s nothing compared to what these people make now. I think all of that changed over these years (1976-2006).

Smith: In fact, correct me if I’m wrong, but a lot of those Ford speaking fees actually came back to the Foundation.

Secchia: Toward the end, a lot of the speaking fees came to the Foundation because we arranged it where it was convenient to do that. Where, rather than Jerry Ford by himself, with very little staff, Barrett or Penny, or someone saying, “He needs to have a private plane and $25,000 or $50,000 written out to the Foundation.” That was a way to keep it out of the mainstream of concerned citizen dialogue. It made it easier for all of us because it was money for the Ford Foundation.

The other side of it – making the money the legitimate way – was dwarfed by his successors, whether it be George Herbert Walker Bush or Reagan, and they both did very well. Bush didn’t really need the money, he just did it because it was what Reagan had done, and it seemed okay. But that was ten-twelve years after Ford.

Smith: It’s another chapter of that whole ex-presidency story, because people looked at Jimmy Carter and said, “Boy, isn’t this admirable?” This guy’s out there building houses and eradicating disease and off negotiating peace settlements. My sense was Ford could, on one level agree that was admirable. At the same time he had a much more, shall we say, traditional view of an ex-president’s responsibility. That basically, if a president asked him to do something, he’d do it. But he also took very seriously the fact that there is only one president, and only one secretary of state. And that with the best of intentions, an ex-president, no matter who it is, could really gum up public policy.

Secchia: You have to also remember that when Ford left the White House, Jimmy Carter was the bain of his existence, and that over the next several years they leaned on each other and made some “you help me, I’ll help you” kind of deals and they became good friends. So, even though, yes he would say that was wrong because there is only one secretary of state, he would also just, as Jerry Ford would, look the other way and worry about something else.

Smith: I shouldn’t express an opinion on this, but I thought that the worst part of the Mike Lloyd excerpts was very little context. They left out that long period when Carter and Ford, in fact, really were friends. He campaigned in ’80 against Carter, but after ’80 there was a quarter century when they became good friends, and had a lot of respect for each other. The wives, clearly, became very close – had a lot of shared interests, and the like.

That was all left out because that wasn’t headline material. I thought at the funeral, one of the images that will remain, was when I was standing up there – you’re in a fog – and you don’t really notice a lot of things, but I read afterwards that Roselyn Carter was weeping in her pew. Who would have predicted that thirty years earlier? And what does that tell you about these people and the friendship that existed? Yet none of that found its way into the post ex-post facto reconstruction of those thirty years.

Secchia: It is a friendship that will endure. The Bo Schembechler empty seat and Roselyn Carter weeping – all the little things you saw, that you knew if you were close to him – they weren’t a surprise to me. I mean, that was just expected. It was vintage Jerry Ford.

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the reaction – the outpouring, not only here, but elsewhere?

Secchia: When I flew to Washington, I was just part of the turtles coming home. You gravitate to where that is going to be, but then to be invited on Air Force One to come home on Air Force One. I never left my seat – I watched the casket, I didn’t go to the window and look at Michigan stadium when the plane flew over. I was sitting there trying to think, (in that hour and a half) about “how we got where we are,” and “what would happen when we got home.” When we first hit Patterson Avenue, (we came out that back road and we went down Patterson Avenue) I saw people three and four deep, parking their cars up on the lawns of industrial buildings. Then we came to 28th Street and we turned right and they were four, five and six deep. I started to read the signs, “Welcome home, the gentleman from Grand Rapids,” “Thank you, Mr. Ford.” Boy Scouts saluting, veterans in their uniforms, and then we turned on the 296expressway and the traffic was stopped in both directions – it wasn’t supposed to be stopped on the eastbound lanes, but all cars stopped.

They had on the radio, and they had their kids – this is the middle, or first week of a Michigan January – they had their kids up on the roof of the car – they had cameras out – they were waving, and as the procession got closer to town the traffic and people were hanging off the overhead bridges, and the thicker the crowd got, the closer we were to downtown. We pulled up on Bridge Street to cross over to the Museum, and they were twenty people thick - including World War I veterans. This was not an organized crowd. I’ve turned out crowds for presidential visits and vice presidential visits – candidates’ visits. I’ve got pictures of Reagan and me and Ford and the campaign in 1976 and 1980, and beyond. I’ve got all these pictures. We had to work the crowd. You get these people out, you’re in charge of that. You get the uniforms, you get the Scouts over here. We’d bring in bands to fill up space. We hung banners to keep the camera picture right. None of that was done – there was no organized effort. This all was spontaneous.

Closer to the Museum (where he was going to lie in state), the crowd was thicker and thicker and thicker. It got more quiet – it was respectful. The surprise wasn’t just the turnout, the surprise was the line to go by the casket. To walk that line as I did the next morning and saw Jack Lousma, our candidate for Senate in 1984, an astronaut who had resigned his Marine Corps to come home, and Jerry Ford endorsed. To see people – the Secretary of State (Michigan) – to see these people who waited in line for three, four and five hours, to proceed past the casket and pay their respects was just an unbelievable turnout.

As we drove into town in the car, I was thinking to myself, I’d ridden this path many times with him when nobody paid much attention and I just felt like DaVinci or Michelangelo. Like you’ve completed a piece of art – you wrote a symphony of your life that is now being applauded – the applause is deafening, and I hope you are looking down and you’re seeing this because this the way they are saying, “Thank you for what you did, what you stood for.”

I know the family was just unbelievably impressed by that crowd and the continued fervor into the next day, and then the procession to the church and the way back. I remember seeing a Scout standing outside in the cold in a short-sleeved shirt saluting. And then we went to the church and that was a long process – getting the casket out – the service. By riding by that same Scout and the same people still standing out there, saluting. It was just marvelous. Was I surprised? Yes. Was I grateful? Yes. Did I feel that he was out from under the joke of being the yokel, being the uncoordinated, being not the president people wanted? I think the whole world saw a whole new perspective on that.
Smith: Yeah. I was wearing two hats that week. The first part of the week I was with ABC, and I sensed the media, in particular, were astonished at the reaction and how it grew and grew and grew as the week went by. I think part of it was the timing – it was after the election and people desperately wanted to feel good about their government and Ford, as I said, was being introduced to a lot of people for the first time, and they were contrasting his qualities and the kind of politics that he practiced with the ugly and personal today. All of that. There is a little bit of misplaced nostalgia because people forgot, there was no era of good feelings in the 70s. Anyone who remembered Vietnam and Watergate and the stridency of that period, but the difference was that Ford never joined that. He never had an enemy, at least he didn’t think he had enemies. Again, the contrast – I think that’s part of – it was kind of Trumanesque phenomenon that was going on as the week unfolded, and there was some contrast with the grandeur, understandable, the elegance of the Reagan funeral, which was truly an occasion of state.

Secchia: I think we have to remember that if you were under the age of 45 in 2006 you had no recollection of Ford’s years. Maybe 50? If you were ten years old, do you pay any attention to Washington politics? So, forty years ago, fifty years ago, basically the kids who were coming by the casket and families were the older generation, sort of like taking my family back to my roots in Italy. When you are bringing people back to your roots, this is the kind of man that represented us. So half of America didn’t remember that. But they were taught it and I think the media was shocked that that happened. I have no question about it. The next day was just an awesome day. I don’t remember much of it because I was in a fog. I did a lot of crying. Did you already interview Leon Parma?

Smith: Yeah.

Secchia: They were in a car with me. It was the most disappointing moment I had the whole week. I was riding in the motorcade - Jack Nicklaus in the middle and Leon Parma on the outside. I was looking out the window. I saw these emotional signs and kids and people in wheelchairs and knew they had been waiting for hours. It was a clear day, but it was cold. Parma kept saying to Nicklaus, “I remember in ’94 when you missed that putt on the 17th hole in the…” and I’d say “Look at that sign – look at those people,” and I was losing it. I thought, “This is amazing, it was just amazing.” And then Parma would say, ( Jack was a polite guy, nice guy that he is) “You know, I remember you and Fuzzy Thurston on that interview.” We were almost to downtown; the people were hanging off the bridge rafters of the overpass. I shouted, “This is absolutely amazing,” and Parma came up with another golf story. I turned to the two of them and I said, “You know, we’re home to bury our friend. Would you pay f---ing attention to what’s going on and stop talking about golf?” And there was silence. I was so angry – not at Jack, but at Leon.

The next morning Jack Nicklaus came up to me and he said, “You know, I found out why you were so concerned.” I thought, “Well, good for you.” He said, “You don’t like golf.” “No, that isn’t it…I like the man we were here to honor and I didn’t think the conversation was appropriate.” I’ll never see him again, and I’ll never get to talk to him again, but I’m sure that kind of activity went on throughout the week, and I’m sure you were in the media wagons and you heard some conversations.

Smith: His health really remained pretty extraordinary up to his ninetieth birthday. It seemed to me, because I wasn’t here then, that when he concluded or was no doubt told, by his doctors, “You really can’t travel anymore.” That that was like switching a switch – that part of his life was over – a part that he really cherished. That was right about that time.

Secchia: I chaired his ninetieth birthday party, and, have you seen the photo where we took with him with all the kids? We put together a committee. Others didn’t want to do this, but I thought, we’ve got to do that because these kids, I think we allowed eight years and under or ten years and under, these kids will never meet a president, so let’s have a picture that’s a “forever picture.” We sold it here at the museum, and thousands of kids and ten thousand people showed up for that birthday party, and he was speaking very clearly. But, he was eloquent. He was tired.

We had him in a golf cart, but he did a marvelous job. He and I spent a lot of time together on that particular trip. We had a chance to reminisce about some of the things that we had done together, or that he had done. He got a big kick out of the Cabinet Room that I had funded for the museum. I said, “I did that for you. I didn’t do that for any archivist or for anybody else. That’s for you because I was in that room with you and you told me what happened in that room.” (sometimes)

He was still pretty lucid, and I visited him shortly thereafter in Palm Springs and he was sitting in a chair, watching the University of Michigan game. It was basketball season and I had Governor John Engler with me because my company had a board meeting out there. The others (Directors) all went to play golf and we made arrangements to go over and pay our respects to President Ford.

Michigan was playing basketball that day on cable TV. We three sat in his office… and had a nice chat. I looked at my watch and I said, “Well, you know, if you’d spring a few bucks you ol’ tightwad, maybe you could watch the Michigan game on cable,” (you had to have special pay-per-view rights). He said, “Oh, I do.” I said, “Well then, why are we sitting here?” Well, he got up instantly and we took the path over to the house. He forgot his cane. Judy came running down the path and down the sidewalk after us. “Mr. President, Mr. President, you forgot your cane!” He was so intent on watching his Wolverines play that he forgot that he needed a cane (or his walker). We went quickly and Engler followed us, we went in the house (in that back door through that little narrow area where they had their personal goodies). We went inside and watched the game. He sat in his chair right in front of the screen. He knew every player, what they had done, what their record was. We sat there and watched that game, and he didn’t take any phone calls. He got to watch his Michigan Wolverines. After the game, we left and I said to Penny Circle, “I can’t believe he spent the money to get that extra package on cable TV.” She said, “He didn’t, somebody gave it to him.” We all know he didn’t change.

I know the last time I came to visit him, he was not going to the office much.

Smith: Do you know how close that was to the end?
Secchia: No, I don’t know.

Smith: Within the last year?

Secchia: I never admitted the end was coming. I could look it up and research it but, he got out of bed and came out and gave me a hug. Betty was in her robe – probably the hundred times I saw Betty over the years, she was in a robe 80 times – she loves being in a robe and a pair of slippers and just hanging out. She too came out and we chatted about a few things. You don’t measure it – you don’t want the end to ever come, so I never did that to the end. It was always, “Remember the time we did this, remember the time we did that?” We’d laugh about things. It was the way I wanted to remember him.

Smith: This may be speculative, but that ninetieth birthday, I think that’s the last time he was in Grand Rapids.

Secchia: See, I don’t even know that.

Smith: Yeah, I think that was the last time, and I wonder if he realized that that would probably be the last time that he’d be here.

Secchia: Richard, you’re the historian, I don’t know that. I don’t know that he didn’t come back again. He was ninety-two when he died, was he?

Smith: Ninety-three.

Secchia: He probably didn’t come back because – that was an outpouring – they ran thousands of people through the museum that day.

Smith: He was very proud of this place, wasn’t he?

Secchia: Yes and he was really proud that his friends made it happen, but it was not an easy thing for him and he said it was difficult. It was difficult for him. When Bush calls Kuwait and he gets a pile of money for his museum, or Clinton calls so and so. If we asked Ford to call somebody like a Max Fisher, we might get a hundred grand out of him, not a hundred million or not a fifty million. I would call Ford and say, “Hey, you know Max is getting old, you’d better call him because we’re soon going to lose him.” And we lost him. We never got that big gift that Max said was going to come to the Gerald R. Ford Foundation. We had a lot of people like that, because Ford didn’t want to ask. And he didn’t have a right-hand man who was a fundraiser.

We can all go back and look at who raised the money for this guy and that guy. We didn’t have that. Carl Morgenstern was the first financial chairman for this, and then he went to Florida all winter and we didn’t have funding to pay the bills. So I took over and then I was asked to resign because we needed the Democrat legislature’s approval to fund the money to buy the land, and Tom Mattieu, a legislator at the time, went to one of the Ford brothers and said, “As long as Secchia’s name is on that committee we’re not going to appropriate the money.” So the brother came to me, and I said, “Well, I’ll be happy to resign.” So I resigned and then later I continued to raise the money.

Smith: Was there ever any doubt – I understood he was offered other building sites. There were parcels identified on the outskirts of town?

Secchia: Yeah. Out there by the East Beltline and there were other community leaders who wouldn’t accept that. I think Mary Ann Keeler was one of the people who insisted it be downtown. Mostly wanted it to be downtown. I don’t think there was any real movement – there was some consideration, either Fred Meijer or somebody had the land. I’m not so sure Fred knew him that well early in the years, because Fred was trying very hard to not be partisan, not to be involved with anyone personally.

Smith: Was it seen, in fact, as a catalyst for downtown revitalization?

Secchia: It was one of the keys. The Celebration on the Grand was started year we opened the museum, and I was its first chairman. We had a salmon fishing contest, a bike ride, fireworks, the opening of the museum, the opening of the art museum, and the opening of the DeVos Performance Hall, and we had all that thrown together. We dedicated the hotel. So we put all that into a package and we called it “Celebration on the Grand,” and we just had our twenty-seventh or twenty-eighth Celebration on the Grand. Well, the salmon contest is gone, the bike race has been moved to a different time of year, and we try to celebrate ourselves. The museum, the hotel, and the art museum were the catalysts, because we ended up – we really dedicated the DeVos Performance Hall the year before.

Smith: He must have been impressed when he would come back in the later years, and see what had happened downtown.

Secchia: Oh, he was enamored with that. It was his parade – in 1976 we scheduled a parade – the one that the guy who wrote the book, “Say It After I’m Dead.”

Smith: Tom DeFrank.

Secchia: Tom DeFrank. When Tom DeFrank came here he referred to the fact that he has a press badge that Jerry called himself Jerry when he was president. Well, this was an event I put on, and I called it Jerry’s Hometown Downtown Celebration. All the press credentials said, “Jerry’s Hometown Downtown” or “Jerry’s Hometown Downtown Celebration” and Tom DeFrank made a big ing about how GRF was this humble guy. I’ll never forget the event. We held it at the Calder Plaza, and he was vice president at the time.

Then in ’76 his staff wanted me to host a parade. He came home to vote the night before, and they refused to allow me to have the parade because there were so many empty buildings between the Pantlind and Jefferson Ave and they didn’t have enough police to man the empty space. Of course, this is only thirteen years after Kennedy’s assassination in Dallas, and so empty second and third story buildings were a big fear of the Secret Service. It took a lot of negotiations and I found off-duty policemen and off-duty retired to wear their uniforms and pack their, if they were allowed to carry, heat. They took all the positions and I was able to go back to the Secret Service and we did it. Then we got a call that night from Bob Teeter and he wanted to cancel the parade.

He said, “If we go back to Ohio, we can win Ohio.” Betty got on the phone –
(they were in Air Force One) – she said, “Peter, we’re coming home. Jerry’s tired. There’s no voice left.” I had a broken leg at the time and I was in a golf cart, and I had forty-some bands and I had a big parade – thousands of people to welcome them home that night. After that night I had a meeting with the leadership in the community about how we had to do something about all these empty buildings and how we almost lost this Presidential homecoming and it was a blight on our downtown and they all said, you’re right, and they all committed, and that’s why we have a lot of the buildings today with the Van Andel Museum, the Meijers Heart Center and all the buildings along downtown that have names of philanthropy.

Grand Rapids, in that thirty years, from ’76, the night of the parade, until 2006, became designated the number two philanthropic city in America, because the families all gave money for all this redevelopment. Jerry Ford always saw this as important to his legacy and it was, because little did he know that his downtown procession would be through those same streets.

Smith: It’s ironic, you can bracket the story between two parades, one that almost never was and then the ultimate homecoming and it’s a very different city.

Secchia: That’s right, and that was those thirty years of great development and progression, including this museum and AD, which was four years later. Then what happened the fall of his funeral, I got a call from John Wheeler, who was my partner. He and I had done forty some buildings, cleaned them up, took out pigeon poop by the wheelbarrow load, and did everything we could do to hang awnings, and plant flowers. The town itself had the Downtown Development Authority and the Downtown Alliance, and we have people who sweep the streets. Marvin Hamlisch came here and said, “How do you keep your city so clean and so happy?” I said, “Well, we work at it.” Everybody was part of this, so when he came back home and the procession went up those same streets, right up the hill of Fulton Street, it went right down the same streets that were empty – I hadn’t thought about that before – that all because…and there it was.

Smith: Let me sort of wrap up with a couple of things. Tell us something that might surprise people about Ford.

Secchia: I think he was an administrative genius. He always struck me as the kind of guy you could take all the papers of different issues that were pertinent and as they floated to the ground, he’d be able to pick out the two or three that needed to be decided first. That, combined with the fact that he was probably the most athletic president we ever had. I would say that if we could ever convince America that he was an administrative genius, and the most athletic, they would have hard time believing that because they read the media reports and I always felt badly for him that he was perceived that way. I think everybody now knows that he was a good bipartisan, working gentlemen who could disagree without being disagreeable, but they probably will never know that he was the most athletic and administrative – I can see him dozens of times, just sitting back and sucking on his pipe and picking out those issues that had to be dealt with – and he dealt with them. He made decisions and he surrounded himself with people who fed him those papers.

Smith: Talk about a good life – here is someone, I think I may have mentioned – poor Lyndon Johnson, who literally died the day before a peace agreement was announced in Vietnam, and who during that very short period of his ex-presidency, was virtually a recluse. Driven into exile. Ford, who had a very different temperament anyway, but nevertheless lived long enough to have the satisfaction of knowing that most people had come around to hold a very different view – not only of the pardon – but I think in a broader sense of his presidency.

Secchia: I think he was who he was, and it never bothered him other than the Profiles in Courage turnaround of that issue, but he was always comfortable with himself. He was one of those kind of guys that had the skin that he knew what he lived in, and people read about those kind of people today as unique. He was always comfortable in his own skin.

Smith: Comfortable with having big egos around him – comfortable with the debates that would result from all of that.

Secchia: And comfortable with having a Kennerly or Secchia who could pop in and tell him he was full of bologna, and, naw, you shouldn’t do this, and give us the comfort of knowing that he was still our friend. David and I have had many conversations about how we were unique in living through that period. David did it every day. I didn’t do it every day. Another thing about Ford that people won’t know is, Jimmy Carter’s big claim – the big success of his presidency was the Camp David Accords. I can remember Jerry Ford telling me in the fall of ’76 that everything was in play to create the Camp David Accords. And that he thought it would be best if we postponed the meeting so that the next president could host it. He made that decision in the summer and postponed it to the winter/spring of the next year. When Sadat came here I was having breakfast with Ford at a small meeting of people over here in the Black and Silver Room that no longer exists in the George Welsh Civic Auditorium, and the phone rang and one of his staff said, “Mr. President, this phone call, you should take.” He said to me, “Sadat. Come on with me.”

So I went with him and we went in the back room and of course I only heard his end of the conversation. Then later he told me that Sadat was calling him from the airport – that they just concluded the meetings and that he wanted President Ford to know that he was very thankful for all the work that Ford had done getting it ready and making it happen. Jerry Ford, I heard him on his conversation saying that he was very happy that “Anwar, you’re a great man and you’ve done this.” I remember afterwards reading about how Jimmy Carter’s great claim to fame was that particular event. Never once did I ever hear Jerry Ford say, “I set it up, I did all the work, I yielded to it in the fall of ’76 to postpone it for the next president.” Never a word.

So that falls in the category of coordinated athlete, administrative genius, and visionary – whether it’s Vladivostok and the basket, that he wanted approval or the Anwar Sadat meeting, who he loved dearly, by the way. He felt that Sadat was one of the world’s great leaders. And when he was invited to go over to the funeral, that was a tough trip for him because that was certainly one of his closer friends and allies.

Smith: That’s a perfect note on which to end.

Smith: We talked yesterday with Bill Gill and got some great stories, some of them understandably embargoed probably during the president’s lifetime. He talked about this little - he didn’t use the phrase “kitchen cabinet” - but this little advisory group of four people who met with him from time to time, particularly during the vice presidency. When he would come back here they’d meet at some coffee shop. Two of them are gone which means two of them are still around. One of them is a Republican leader of some sort whom he didn’t identify, and himself. Are you the fourth? (Could be Walt Russell?)

Secchia: I have no idea. One of Jerry Ford’s unique talents was to meet with little groups of people and each one of them thought they were the only group, you’ll find as you get through all these interviews. Well, “there was one special group and I was part of that.”

Smith: It’s interesting, though, ego aside, he walked us through the conversation in a way that sounded pretty credible. These folks - this was about two months before Nixon quit - basically, they were beating up on Ford. They were pressing him to put more distance between himself and the White House.

Secchia: Local people?

Smith: Yes. And he was in, I don’t think it’s too strong to say, some degree of anguish, caught between his loyalty and what might be in his own, and for that matter, the country’s interest. Clearly, this conversation took for granted that the time was coming when he would be in the Oval Office, which is why, according to Bill, it was off the record, at least during his lifetime. But at one point he quoted Ford as saying, almost his head in his hands, “But, you don’t understand. No one else is defending this guy.” And their sort of collective response was, “That’s admirable as a human trait, a personal trait, but you’ve got to look beyond that at this point. You have larger obligations.” Does that sound credible to you?
I suspect he was getting that advice from other sources as well.

Secchia: Let’s work our way back to 1974. I don’t think there were four people in Kent County who understood what was going on in Washington outside of Jerry Ford. So I would doubt that he would put much stock into what four locals had to say about this issue. When the pardon was given, I believe it was on a Sunday night. If I’ve done this interview before, stop me.

So I went to D.C. for dinner that night. He would usually come upstairs for dinner at 7:00, 7:30, sometimes 8:00, but very seldom later than that. And that night it was almost 9:00 and he hadn’t come up yet. He was busy reacting to all of the pressure that he was receiving. When he came up, he pressed the little button on his chair and asked for his martini. That was the only time I ever heard him use the f-word. But he said to me, “Nixon had really f’ed up the pea patch and it had to be done.” And I recall just saying, “Why am I in this conversation, it’s above my pay grade?”

And so I (regretfully today) shut him down to end this high level tone and said, “Why don’t we talk about something else?” And he said, “This will probably cost me the ’76 election.” (The first time I had heard him mention’76.) And I tended to sort of agree with this, but you have to remember at this point in time, I was not a Republican “Leader.” A lot of people think I was born that way, but I was not involved in active party politics in ‘75. I was helping Jerry Ford and some like-minded candidates in a very minor way. I was a young, I mean, I still dressed the same as I am, i.e., in jeans and a plaid shirt. I was just hanging out at the White House helping him and didn’t deserve to be there, but he kept inviting me.

That night Betty wasn’t feeling well. She was in bed with her neck propped up and her brace on. We talked a little bit, but she wanted to rest and read. So I went out to wait in their sitting area. When the President came upstairs, he picked up the papers and the first thing he did was go to the editorial which was his way of devouring a newspaper. He’d open up the paper and look at the letters to the editor in Grand Rapids, but when he was in Washington, he’d open up the Washington Post or New York Times and take a peek at the editorial.

This day they were brutally attacking his “pardon” decision and that just made the night go deeper and deeper into the darkness of despair, kind of, “What did I do?” and “Why did I do it?”

But his mind was made up. There was no question in his mind that he did the right thing then. I watched him receive the Congressional Medal of Honor. And the Kennedy Profiles in Courage Award. The pride was abundantly clear.

Smith: The Kennedy Profiles in Courage award?

Secchia: Both, the one from Congress and the “Profiles” award.

Smith: The Congressional Gold Medal.

Secchia: The Congressional Gold Medal. I watched him when he received that and I think that happened after the Kennedy. But he reflected on the fact that “finally I am proven right.” It was like a weight was lifted off his shoulders. I don’t remember him ever mentioning this when I was home. Now I’d ask Jack, remember Jack Stiles, jack was his closest friend that he took to Washington?

Smith: Jack Stiles? Who was Jack Stiles first of all?

Secchia: Jack Stiles, Jerry Ford respected early in his career because Jack got things done for him. It was a funny relationship. (It was sort of the kind of the relationship I had with him.) He depended on me to get things done for him and I think Jack had filled that void for him in his early congressional years.

Smith: But who was Jack Stiles? Where did he come from?

Secchia: He was a local man. Nobody really knew much about him. The night he died, he was supposed to have dinner with me. He had called me at 4 pm...to say he had arranged a lady friend to meet with him and he went to Grand Haven. On his way home he rolled his car. They found his car the next morning in a ditch in the creek off West River Drive. Jack lived a fast life and was a small problem for the president in Washington. During this negotiation was the Midnight Massacre. All of these things happened fast. I believe President Ford was trying very hard to keep Jack out of the spotlight because there were some strange feelings about him, whether it be here or there. But I had dinner with Jack several times and I have a picture of us having a dinner on Ford’s first trip home at the old Harley Inn. The hotel’s not even there anymore, but I have a picture of that dinner, just the four of us. But I don’t remember anything about Bill Gill’s four-person group, but knowing Jerry Ford, I don’t doubt it.

Smith: One thing Bill said…

Secchia: This is Bill Gill the television guy?

Smith: Yeah. He didn’t say it, critically, he said it almost matter of factly, he said, “Jerry Ford was not without guile.” Now, that obviously runs counter to the popular impression. I don’t take it as criticism. I mean, anyone who wants to be Speaker of the House has more than simply ambition.

Secchia: Well, you know what, there’s good ambition and there’s bad ambition.

Smith: Well, sure. Sure.

Secchia: Jerry Ford wanted to be Speaker of the House because he believed that was the ultimate position for someone who had dedicated many years to legislative reasoning. He’d studied the budget, he understood the administrative procedures of the House. He was like John Engler as our governor. He understood the insides facts and workings of the government.
Smith: Let me ask you about Jack Stiles. As I may have said earlier, Nelson Rockefeller didn’t age well. There was a streak of, it’s not too much to say, of paranoia. As vice president he saw enemies, and he had convinced himself that Rumsfeld was his ultimate enemy.

Secchia: Rockefeller?

Smith: Yeah, but he had literally also convinced himself that Jack Stiles’ death was no accident.

Secchia: Did he?

Smith: Yeah, he believed that the president was surrounded by people who didn’t want him to get reelected in 1976, and that somehow Stiles’ death factored into - that they started the campaign very late and so forth and so on.

Secchia: If they did a sperm check on Jack’s body, they would have found he was short a few gallons. No one knew at 4 p.m. that evening where he was going. I mean, he was out drinking and rendezvousing. I wouldn’t refute that. But the campaign started late because President Ford had wanted to wait, to no get into the primaries…However, the next day after he received the Kansas City nomination we all met in Vail with Stu Spencer, Cheney and Baker (5-6 of us) to plan the campaign.

Smith: So, he had a local reputation?

Secchia: I don’t know if he had a big reputation because you have to remember that these men were 25 years older than me so I didn’t know about their younger days, (their prowling days). I just knew Jack was a loyal friend of President Ford’s from years gone by.

Smith: What was his professional background?

Secchia: I’m sorry…I forgot.

Smith: But it’s interesting that the president had him for such a close friend and in effect as a political ally given the vulnerabilities that went along with that.
Secchia: And I think those vulnerabilities really approached this risky status when Jerry Ford’s role became more important. When Jerry Ford was a congressman and later, the Minority Leader, nobody really paid attention to who he hung around with, or who he had dinner with when he came back to town. I can remember taking Jerry Ford to an old hotel in D.C. where the piano player (Mark Russell), used to play. It’s the old Shoreham Hotel, right on the river by the parkway, off of Connecticut Ave. a couple blocks. It’s where Mark Russell used to play in the early ‘70s.

Jerry and I went in there and we had dinner and a few drinks. We were talking and I was proud of my relationship with Jerry. I went over to Mark Russell and said, “Do you realize the Minority Leader of the U.S. Congress is in this room?” Russell played all this political satire and he looked at me like, “No, which one is he?” And I had to point out “The Minority Leader.” Now, if Mark Russell, who is a 24/7 full-time political satirist and humorist and musician, didn’t know who the Minority Leader was, then who was paying any attention to who he was having dinner with, me or Jack Stiles. It just didn’t matter to most.

Rockefeller had this paranoia and he was also involved in a lot of intelligence operations that I wasn’t involved in. I would challenge his thinking. I think Jack was just a party boy whose time had come. Great guy, fun to be with, and maybe drank a little too much, but he didn’t talk a lot and he was loyal to Ford and that was important to Jerry Ford. Now, with your experience you know more about Jerry Ford than anybody and you’ll find that more than half of us think they were Jerry Ford’s best friend.

Smith: That passes for guile. I mean, beyond individual ego, there are successful politicians - all have the ability to make individuals think that they have a unique place in their lives.

Secchia: The good ones.

Smith: The good ones, absolutely.

Secchia: And I don’t think Jerry Ford could be called a manipulator as I would say John Edwards was, or some other people who had issues to hide, but it’s hard to get a good interview out of people like me because I love the guy like a big brother. Do not want to hurt his legacy.

Smith: Tell me how broad a range of friends he had.

Secchia: Well, you could start with Jack Stiles. I think one of the questions you’ll find in Maury DeJonge’s interview that was never shared was one of the questions was, “My editors can’t quite understand it, why do you consider Pete Secchia as one of your closest friends?” And that’s right in the interview.

Smith: Really?

Secchia: Uh-huh. I have a copy of the interview because Maury told me 30 years ago that he would give me a copy some day. He gave me one a few months ago. I don’t know where it is, I think I have it at the office, but you’ll get it eventually. It was because he had this broad range of friends that he knew where to go for answers. Jerry Ford was the consummate politician in the sense that he wasn’t being partisan political, but he knew how to work the halls of Congress. And if the lobby system worked as it did when Jerry Ford was in Congress from late 40s to the 70s, when you needed to know something about airplanes or military aircraft or civilian aircraft, you had to call somebody who knew that product or industry. Someone who could find the answers for you, so you could make a better decision.

So that was Jerry Ford’s way of operating. He could call somebody or ask or tell somebody to get the answer from a person, but he liked to do that himself. He loved to talk to you about what you do and why you do it. So he had different friends from different sectors. I know that Bob Sheiffer (CBS) and Jones and some of those TV guys were his contacts. I remember when GRF hired Ron Nessen and he thought it was sort of neat that he was able to get this national press man to come and be his press secretary. He was a bit naïve in some ways. He was enraptured by certain musicians or entertainers, but we all are. Wouldn’t you love it if Abraham Lincoln was resurrected and came walking in the room? You’d want to run up and ask him a dozen questions before he disappeared again.
Smith: How much of that was the Eagle Scout in Ford and how much of that was Grand Rapids?

Secchia: I think there’s a lot that has the same values. I don’t think there’s a big difference between Eagle Scouting and the culture of Grand Rapids. There are people who will see us as country bumpkin-ish and there are others who think that our sartorial splendiferousness is lacking. The fact is, that we’re Midwesterners. Scouting teaches kids to have goals, earn them, wear a badge. Always Jerry Ford wore that badge of honor when he was in the legislature. He was our congressman. He defeated an isolationist. He had his points.

Smith: It’s interesting. We spent two fascinating hours yesterday with Dorothy Dowton and it was interesting because she volunteered what others have sort of grudgingly yielded up, which was the extent to which, even when they were in the vice presidency, the Nixon people didn’t want them around, looked down on them, saw them as Grand Rapids. Now, some of that you can understand, some of it’s unavoidable given their roles, but some of it’s cultural condescension. He obviously had to be aware of it.

Secchia: Oh, he was aware of it. He was well aware of it. When he brought Bill Seidman in to the vice president’s office and Phil Buchen who was his attorney, these were people he knew he could depend on and that’s who he wanted around him. If you look at the Nixon White House and you have the California boys and the fast movers, fast talkers, somewhat shifty manipulators and then you bring in Bill Seidman and Phil Buchen and Jack Stiles and Pete Secchia, it was…“Who are those guys?”

Smith: I want to talk about Phil Buchen. One of the things that Bill Gill said yesterday was that part of the burden, Phil Buchen talked to Duncan Littlefair and they both communicated to the President their views on the advisability of a pardon. And I don’t know Duncan Littlefair except from a distance by reputation. But I would have thought that he was a political liberal who would not necessarily look favorably upon a Nixon pardon. Bill insisted that in this particular case, he did and he communicated those views through Buchen and apparently directly himself to Ford. Does that sound credible?
Secchia: I can’t challenge it nor can I confirm it. Was Buchen in agreement with Littlefair?

Smith: Yes.

Secchia: There’s been so many years gone by…

Smith: You know, it sounds basic, but it’s basic for a reason. Tell us about Phil Buchen.

Secchia: Well, Phil’s relationship with Ford had gone back to the pre-congressional days. Jerry Ford always felt that they had an honorable legal partnership and a good personal relationship. Therefore, when Jerry moved out of the legal business, when he needed legal help, he went right back to where he would’ve been nurtured as an early member of the bar. So they had a quiet but strong relationship. Phil was, I think, wanting to be a little more involved in the exciting side of Washington. But because of Phil’s physical condition, and his health deteriorating quite rapidly towards the final years there, I just think they were very happy to come back and draw down from the deals or D.C.

I can’t say specific incidents I might be reminded of, but when someone, you see it now, too, because you’ve been through several of them, but if someone goes from being your newspaper editor in Grand Rapids, to being a congressman, to being speaker, to being president, or they make their way up any ladder of success, you expect changes and sometimes you don’t get changes. Everybody expected changes. But those who knew the man (or his bride) know there were few changes except the fact that there were more demands on time, more demands on their ability to attend events, more babies to kiss, more funerals to attend. So a lot of people change because their life clock starts ticking faster.

I knew a lot of these people back when we were all nothing. I mean, I’m still a country bumpkin and I’m proud of it. I don’t even like to go to Washington, never did like to go to Washington (even when GRF was president). G.H.W. Bush asked me to be in his administration, I said no. I mean, that’s how I ended up being ambassador to Italy. I didn’t want to go to Washington.
Smith: Did Ford change?

Secchia: No. Where he did change, he changed for the better. He learned, he became more understanding and expansive on issues that I would never claim to understand. I don’t know if I told you this story about, Golda Meir - do you remember reading this one?

I was upstairs with Ford one night in the residence and he said to me, “Peter, what do you think about Golda Meir coming to visit?” It had been in the press that she was going to ask for - in today’s standards it’s probably minor – “million in aid.” And he said, “What do you think?” I said, naively, “Well, you know, we have inflation, we have a big deficit, people don’t like it when the government keeps giving away money to other governments. Maybe you ought not do it.” He said, “Well, that’s specifically why she’s coming.” And he says, “But that’s what you think?”

A few minutes later, a buzzer goes off, I don’t know whether it was in the chair or if the steward came out of the kitchen, but the call comes through and he says, “It’s Henry Kissinger. He’s in Tel Aviv and he’s about to get on the plane with the prime minister.” Then President Ford picks up the phone and says, “Henry, I’ve been talking to Pete and I don’t think we’re going to do it.” And I’m sitting there with this vision that the Mossad is listening in and I’m going to find out that there’s somebody in my hotel room when I get back to the Madison Hotel. I don’t know what I’m talking about, I was just making conversation. But after you get into it, you find out that he’d talked to a dozen other people who’d had similar advice.

Smith: So it wasn’t the fact of doing what the last person who’d advised him to do?

Secchia: No, and he got that bad rap. I don’t think that was the way it was. It was just that he had a great memory. I used to describe him as an administrative genius because everybody thought he was an administrative dum-dum and that he didn’t know the issues. But, this is a guy you can take a whole bunch of papers on different issues, throw them up in the air, and as they float to the ground, he’ll pull the one out of the pack that needs attention. And then he’ll know who to call to ask their thoughts and maybe he won’t agree with you, he’ll just ask your thoughts. And you might think, “Well, I just talked to him and I told him this and that’s what he did.” That’s bullshit. He’d talked to dozens of other people.

Smith: Over time, all those years in Congress…clearly people evolve. They learn. They grow, presumably, the more they’re exposed to what's unfamiliar. His conservatism: Did that change?

Secchia: I think it diminished. When he first was in Congress, I didn’t know him. I didn’t meet him until later in the 60s, but I don’t think he would’ve ever supported the ERA and some of the issues that Betty was strongly in favor of if he still lived in Grand Rapids. He still talked to all the people here that he talked to back then. I think his conservatism diminished on some of these social issues. I believe if today he was making a decision on civil unions or same sex benefits, he would’ve been a pioneer on that. Too, I think that he’s probably similar to the current governor of Utah on how he would’ve viewed those issues.

Smith: I realize this is speculative, but how much influence did Mrs. Ford have on those kinds of issues? How much was simply being exposed to a broader range of opinion and reality, living longer, which has a way of playing havoc with ideology. Because he did seem to become in some ways more liberal, for lack of a better word, with age.

Secchia: Well, I think America has become more liberal and I think he was a strong barometer of the public sense. So as he became more entrenched and more familiar with the issues facing the country and the world, I mean, I doubt he’d put up with the Republican Party that we have today.

Smith: Could he get nominated in this district today? If he were running for the first time, if he wasn’t the Jerry Ford of legend, would his kind of conservative - if you want to call it that.

Secchia: Well, his kind of conservatism probably doesn’t exist today. There are still conservatives here, but it’s like engineering and computer work. Everything is now for niche markets and what used to be conservatism was everybody who was over here who might agree with the majority of these ten issues.
Today you have fiscal conservatives, social conservatives, religious conservatives, it won’t be the same. If he was running today as the attractive candidate that he was, you have to remember, in this district, the election is the primary, the Republican primary. So if you were able to get the Republican primary vote…

Smith: That’s the question. In today’s Republican Party, would he win a primary?

Secchia: I think so, but I wouldn’t know enough about 1948’s comparison. He ran against Jonkman who obviously was out of step. There again it is Jerry Ford the barometer, he read that shift before anybody else read that and he wasn’t supposed to win. At least those who were entrenched in the leadership here thought that he didn’t have much of a chance.

Smith: Describe then, if you could kind of encapsulate, when you really began to know him…give us a sense of the political culture, in this town and then maybe the broader culture. We’re trying to trace, among other things, impact of the Christian Reformed Church upon the broader culture of West Michigan. But also, invariably, spilling over into the political culture. Clearly it has evolved, but where was it when you first really begin to know Ford? How much of it did he have to take into account? How much of it found reflection in his voting record?

Secchia: When I first got to know Ford, I was afraid he wouldn’t get reelected. That’s how I came to know him. I had met him at a few events and told him I thought we ought to talk. I reminded him that when he was home, he was only seeing people his own age and nobody was developing any contacts with the 30+ year old set which was the decade of people in their 30s that I knew. He was listening to that and said, “You know, I hadn’t thought about that.” I watched him make some adjustments in his campaigning, but I think that you have to understand that as he has changed and his personality has changed, and Grand Rapids has changed, but you still have the same old problem.

Grand Rapids is a Democrat city; it is not a Republican city. It has been voting Democrat in most elections for many years. But it was a part of the 5th District then, (the 3rd Congressional District now), and it is part of Kent County which is Republican. We have had as many as a 18 to 3 majority on the county commission. When Jerry ran for office, it was about 17 to 4 and now there’s only 19 commissioners because they’ve changed the structure. The county is still a Republican county, but it’s an entrepreneurial region. And there’s an inherent respect, I mean, there is a story in today’s Grand Rapids Press where I’m quoted as saying, “You’ve got 300 greedy bastards in New York who give a bad name to the CEOs of America and in West Michigan, I don’t know a West Michigan CEO who would fall into the category they are criticizing on Wall Street.” (2008)

That’s a point of pride we’ve always had here. I think Jerry Ford had an admiration for the Sandy Weill’s and the local corporate leaders because he wasn’t one and he always had respect for successful business people. He thought that success was an admirable quality and I think he had the same respect for the competent legislator who did his homework, was prepared, didn’t only come to a hearing because there were television cameras, but came to make comments on certain provisions in the legislation.

Smith: You have to believe that those values were implanted early.

Secchia: Yes, and you see them with the young Scouts who were lined up at his funeral procession. You see their pride. I was at the recent scout fundraiser and that hasn’t changed. So, you know, you hear that derogatory comment every once in awhile that “They’re nothing but a bunch of Boy Scouts,” and it’s sort of like it has become a negative because there are those who don’t want to see the values of that. It’s like a child holding hands with a parent. When I grew up, that wasn’t very macho. And I can remember when National Geographic came to Grand Rapids back in Ford’s early days as President (1974-75) and they wanted to know “why Grand Rapids was different.” They talked to a lot of people, but one of the quotes they had in the article, I remember (it was from me) and I said, “Well, I’m in the restaurant business and it’s not unusual here to see a teenage boy come here holding hands with his mother and nobody laughs at them. They respect that parent-child relationship.” And Ford having had the early problems in his childhood watched and admired everybody else who had a business and principles like his stepfather - a good businessman, a proud businessman, an honest businessman - that was very important to Jerry Ford.

Smith: Do you think, again it’s speculative, maybe he talked about it, maybe he didn’t, I heard a little about it from time to time, but do you think that the circumstances of his early days gave him a particular empathy with not only broken families, but some other… I mean, you’re looking for this counterintuitive, fiscally conservative as orthodox as they get, he was tight, fiscally.

Secchia: Personally… Also…” tight fiscally.”

Smith: Do you have any stories to illustrate that?

Secchia: Well, I mean, I would kid him that he was “tighter than a second coat of paint.” I used to kid him, but I’ll tell you one funny story. We were out in California for a board meeting and I took Governor Engler by to say hello to then 90 year old Jerry Ford. We met President Ford in the office and we were sitting there chatting. It was getting dark. And when people get elderly they start to keep the lights down in their office, and there’s piles of crap and newspapers everywhere, and stacks of things, letters to sign, and autographs to sign. I realized that University of Michigan was playing basketball at that time, and I knew he never had the specialized signal cable because back then you had to pay extra to get these basketball games. I knew he wouldn’t pay for that. And I said, “You know, too bad you don’t have…” He said, “Oh, I do! I do!” He said, “Well, let’s go.”

So he got up so fast he forgot his cane and he started to head for the door. Well, Judy at the time was working and Penny Circle or someone came running out, “Mr. President! Mr. President, you forgot your cane!” She gives him the cane. We get to the house, he’s got the TV and this special hook-up and I said, “Jerry, I can’t believe you pay for this.” He just smiled at me.

He loved his University of Michigan sports. He knew the players name, who could dribble, drive, _________ a perimeter shoot. Well, later on, we say goodbye, we’re going through his office and I said to Penny, “I can’t believe he bought that.” She says, “He didn’t. Somebody gave it to him.”
Smith: How much did he talk about money? I mean, he took some hits for particularly the early days of his ex-presidency. We’ve had occasion now to talk to a number of people who were on boards with him, and it was very clear he took it very seriously and he never just lent his name to something. But nevertheless, he was going to come home because he had no money and he was going to practice law and was going to make a little bit of money for his family. Was he proud of his success?

Secchia: On his board service?

Smith: Yeah, and just as someone economically successful?

Secchia: I think he was dedicated to being a good board member, just as he was dedicated to being a good Scout, a good lawyer, or a good legislator. He studied for meetings and he told me a few times about the trip out east would give him a few hours and a plane where he could read, but he was said to be an excellent board member. I heard that from several people.

Smith: Do you think he was sensitive to the criticism on public speaking?

Secchia: No.

Smith: No?

Secchia: I tried to get him to be more sensitive to this criticism because of what he did. He just evolved into a “Well, if you want to pay me 50 grand, fine, but put 25 in the Ford Foundation,” and then, “Do this and this.” This minimizes the actual fees reported, but, you know, he was only out of office four years and, I guess it was eight years before anybody started selling their time for big money. Let’s see, Carter lost after four years to Reagan, so it was twelve years then, because, you know, the big dollars weren’t made until Reagan and Clinton and Bush ‘41.

Smith: But you know Ford took heat for being the first.

Secchia: Yes, he did, but I don’t think he was sensitive to it. I don’t think he did much of it then. It didn’t take a lot of money for Jerry Ford to feel wealthy. I mean, he’d never had any wealth at all.
Smith: Do you have any idea what Jerry Ford was worth when he died?

Secchia: Nope, and he wouldn’t talk about it.

Smith: He wouldn’t.

Secchia: He had a chunk of stock from Sandy Weil, the early Traveler’s Insurance, the early parts of CitiCorp Building that empire was exciting to him. I mean, today he’d be mortified at the CitiCorp fiasco, but he was a good board member, dedicated to that group. He had “Founders Stock.” I mean, he referred to it as “Founders Stock.” I don’t know what founders stock is other than maybe back in the 70s you were able to give a certain class of stock to people that could be converted or split or had special dividends, I don’t know.

Smith: What would be a luxury to Jerry Ford?

Secchia: Watching his University of Michigan football team or basketball team or visiting the campus and talking to the players. That would be a luxury. Private jets, I don’t think so much.

Smith: It is astonishing and it became a matter of discussion internally that, at least as long as I was here, I was appalled that he was flying commercially and subsequently Rich said of course he could use their plane.

Secchia: I helped put that deal together.

Smith: I wish it had been done earlier, but he kept up.

Secchia: But you know how this came about? Rich said to me, “You know I’ll always be happy to send a jet to pick him up.” But I hated to ask Richard because somebody else might’ve asked him last week. He said, “Anytime he wants to go anywhere, I will have a plane there.” I said, “You mean, anytime, anywhere?” He said, “Yep.” I went to the president with it, and he still didn’t use it very much.

Smith: That’s fascinating. Tell me about the relationship between the president and Rich DeVos. Was it any different between Rich DeVos and Van Andel? Was it closer to Rich? What’s your reading?
Secchia: I think when they were both alive, it was similar. There was a mutual respect. Jerry had that consistent admiration of successful business people who did it the right way. Jay’s been gone for awhile now, so the DeVos side is certainly closer, but when Jay was still alive and active in the business Jay and Rich were both friends and conservatives GRF admired, but not close friends. Jerry was still wrapped up in Washington. The early friends, the Jack Stiles days, were the old-fashioned “congressional hometown politics begins at home” crowd.

Smith: Is there anyone left from those days?

Secchia: Maury DeJonge or John Malinowski. You know the family, the guy that was his chief of staff who ended up a judge. I just read a book written by one of the Malinowski family members (about the family) and I forget some the names now, but he had run his office here in town…By the way, I think Bill Gill got fired from his TV station… he lost his job, let’s just say that was for fabrications and self delusions, I think.

Smith: Tell me about the kids. What was your relationship? Maybe it’s a large subject, but what was your role?

Secchia: My role was whatever he wanted it to be. You know, one time he called me up and asked me to come out and talk to Steve. “What for?” He says, “Well, I can’t afford to send him to Duke and that’s where he wants to go.” Or University of Virginia or some expensive school.

Smith: Now, this was when he was in Congress?

Smith: He was vice president because I think the day I arrived, he flew out on Air Force Two. It was then a prop Conair.

Smith: With all due respect, why would he have you talk to Steve?

Secchia: He had a hard time talking to his kids about tough issues and money issues, I think for the same reason he admired people who had done well in business. He was a bit embarrassed that he hadn’t done well. This is just my own personal judgment.
Smith: Yeah, makes perfect sense.

Secchia: It was nice to have someone else who had done well in business to come talk to Steven. He had arranged for Steve to work at a dude ranch, (Brown’s?), out in Utah somewhere. And that’s how Steve ended riding horses and now he’s still raising them and he was breeding them for awhile, so that was one. I also remember the 1976 bicentennial dinner, my job was to watch Jack, make sure he didn’t get into trouble. That evening I had to talk to him. But they were just kids. You know, Susan was dancing with some people she shouldn’t be dancing with. He wanted me to talk about that. I don’t think he had a close relationship with his kids in the early days. I don’t think they paid much attention to anything he did and he didn’t pay that much attention to things they did.

Smith: Was part of that just because he was away physically a lot?

Secchia: I think he was just dedicated to doing what he did.

Smith: Wrapped up in his work.

Secchia: And, we’re all guilty of that. I went through my younger days of my children and I was busy building my business and just hope you catch a hold of the life raft before you sink.

Smith: Did he ever say anything in those later years to lead you to believe he felt that and/or felt any degree of guilt either toward the kids or toward Mrs. Ford for all those years when he was either physically absent or emotionally absent because of work?

Secchia: I think he had some guilt for not spending more time with Betty and not spending more time with the kids. But you know, when you have a friend who is president of the United States or “former president” of the United States, or minority leader, you don’t just sit down and say, “Why aren’t you treating your kids better?” or “Why aren’t you treating your wife better?”

Smith: But if he, you know, had earlier involved you in these kinds of family discussions, I just wonder if in later years, that continued.
Secchia: Later, he didn’t involve me in family issues. He asked me to deliver a message or to watch or talk to someone. He didn’t have many family discussions. I don’t think as a unit they did a lot. Betty ran the house and ran the kids and took care of everybody and kept it all going. And he was busy. He had that old-fashioned model that his father, Ford, had. I go to work in the morning and when I come home at night, I want my slippers and I want to eat and I want to sit down and read the paper and I don’t want to be bothered. He had that slipper and pipe kind of “unwinding” culture.

Smith: Sure. And in one way he did evolve. I mean we talked about a change and evolution. I mean, certainly, he was so proud of her and her feminist credentials. You know, he certainly didn’t need to put himself, for reasons of ego, at the center of attention. When she got the Medal of Freedom, when she got recognition, it was almost better than when he did. One sensed that in those later years.

Secchia: It was always, “Betty is more popular than I am.” His self-deprecating humor wasn’t as fine-tuned as some others, but he used it effectively and he was fair to her and he cared about her and he’s the one guy I’ve met in my life who I’d say without a doubt was always faithful.

Smith: When was the last time you talked with her?

Secchia: I talked to her a few months ago. I don’t like to call, but Jan (her assistant) says, I don’t know how the staff works, because the staff says, “Call me” and then they filter everything through staff. Steve says, “Why don’t you call Mom?” And he says, “She says you don’t call very much?” And I don’t want to go through staff. I had that problem with Barrett for awhile and I’ve been through lots of staff.

Smith: Did he put up walls?

Secchia: Well, everybody does when you’re the gatekeeper. You have to. Because, in your judgment, “He doesn’t need to talk to Pete Secchia right now, he’s got to focus on that speech” or “He’s got to get ready for this interview.” And that’s your job, I mean, that’s the gatekeeper (the chief of staff). I respect that because I know how difficult that is. I occasionally would hear from some of them when they were down and out and disappointed and it was easy to work for Jerry Ford and easy to think he didn’t love you because he didn’t spend a lot of time giving hugs or telling you that he really cared about you. But when it got right down to the nitty-gritty, you knew that he loved you because he wouldn’t put up with your crap if he didn’t. He just had a way about him that said, “I accept you.”

Smith: Did you read, in part or in whole, Tom DeFrank’s book?

Secchia: Yes.

Smith: What’s your reaction?

Secchia: Well, after I read it, I had two or three facts I challenged. I didn’t think it was a Pulitzer Prize book and I don’t think he knew him as well as he claimed to have known him. I chaired that Jerry Ford’s Hometown Downtown celebration. He said he still has the badge from that. I got to believe that wasn’t, as he said it was. It was not a cold winter day, it was outdoors at the Calder Plaza and I remember we gave him cookies from this African-American lady friend of my family who used to make cookies for him at the store where he worked. We gave him the cookies. I’d have to go back and research, but I can’t believe we were outside in January in Grand Rapids. There were a couple of little __________- there were a few revelations that I wasn’t aware of.

Smith: You wonder what the president’s motive was. There are people we’ve talked to that believe absolutely he knew exactly what was going on and he was saying all this because it was going on the record and this was part of his legacy. And there were other people who felt that to some degree he was almost used. And I emphasize, not just by Tom, who really did care about the president and who is a good reporter. But it raises the question about whether it’s a good idea for former presidents to have that kind of…

Secchia: I think, knowing Jerry Ford, I think he might have done the former and just figured, “Well, it will come out after I’m dead and I’d like to set the record straight and this is how it really happened.” Because he’s reading other columnist’s stories on how it happened.
Smith: Did you ever hear him talk about the second Bush or Iraq? What was his take?

Secchia: He thought there’d been some mistakes made. He told me he told the president that, too. You’re talking about ‘43?

Smith: Yes.

Secchia: Yeah, he said, “He doesn’t call me very often, but when he did, I told him.” And I said, “How’d he handle it?” And he said, “Fine” and he thought that ‘43 was pretty good about taking that criticism. But GRF was always quick to tell you that he doesn’t know everything the current president knows.

Smith: But it must have been awkward - forget Bush, forget the policy, look at the personalities, with Cheney and Rumsfeld and Paul O’Neill, all those folks - I mean, that must have been difficult for him.

Secchia: It was very difficult for him because he didn’t know where to put his shoe down there, which path to walk.

Smith: I presume it didn’t undermine in any way his respect for O’Neill.

Secchia: No, not at all. And that’s why Jerry Ford was still Jack Stiles friend in the end when other people were saying Jack was useless, or often drunk and saying things about people that they shouldn’t say, but it gets them in the gossip columns, the potpourri columns. People talk.

Smith: That’s one of the remarkable things about Ford. He was often a victim of that. He doesn’t seem to have harbored any particular resentment. He often laughed it off. Did he have an enemy?

Secchia: Oh, he had quite a few back in the early days.

Smith: Did he think he had?

Secchia: Yes, he had a few people that he didn’t like and he was pretty sure they didn’t like him. But I don’t think he had an enemy or he would have been paranoid about Rockefeller. He didn’t have that conspiracy theory deal. You know, to this day he felt on the Warren Commission they did the research they had to do. That’s why I can’t believe some of these things I’m hearing about what really happened with him. I think he was a pretty basic guy. And, if you’re a basic guy, you don’t have a lot of devious plans and plots.

Smith: He certainly didn’t waste any time nurturing enmities, unlike Richard Nixon who almost drew strength from them.

Secchia: You know, some of us have strange personalities, some of us know what we’re going to say is going to anger. You know, Jerry Ford and I used to debate the ’76 primary where he would get pissed off at Reagan and the Reagan people and I would remind him that, we made a dozen mistakes that each cost us a quarter of a point. There was no one mistake; there were just the little ones. And had he not gone out and campaigned in the primary in Minnesota and some of those small states, he would’ve lost worse because they didn’t know him. He thought he could just stay in Washington and be the good Doobie all his life that he was and the Rose Garden Strategy kind of feel. It wasn’t going to work that way.

I miss him. I proudly tell you, I miss him. I sit here looking out the window (here in his office) and I remember building this museum and trying to get the cash appropriated. I was often talking to him about raising money and the guy he was, in the sense he wouldn’t bother a friend. I said, “Call Max Fischer, we’ve got to get this money.” “Okay, Peter, I’ll get to it.” And he delayed it too long. Max passed away without getting the “big ask.”

Smith: Great.

Smith: We talked yesterday with Bill Gill and got some great stories, some of them understandably embargoed probably during the president’s lifetime. He talked about this little - he didn’t use the phrase “kitchen cabinet” - but this little advisory group of four people who met with him from time to time, particularly during the vice presidency. When he would come back here they’d meet at some coffee shop. Two of them are gone which means two of them are still around. One of them is a Republican leader of some sort whom he didn’t identify, and himself. Are you the fourth? (Could be Walt Russell?)

Secchia: I have no idea. One of Jerry Ford’s unique talents was to meet with little groups of people and each one of them thought they were the only group, you’ll find as you get through all these interviews. Well, “there was one special group and I was part of that.”

Smith: It’s interesting, though, ego aside, he walked us through the conversation in a way that sounded pretty credible. These folks - this was about two months before Nixon quit - basically, they were beating up on Ford. They were pressing him to put more distance between himself and the White House.

Secchia: Local people?

Smith: Yes. And he was in, I don’t think it’s too strong to say, some degree of anguish, caught between his loyalty and what might be in his own, and for that matter, the country’s interest. Clearly, this conversation took for granted that the time was coming when he would be in the Oval Office, which is why, according to Bill, it was off the record, at least during his lifetime. But at one point he quoted Ford as saying, almost his head in his hands, “But, you don’t understand. No one else is defending this guy.” And their sort of collective response was, “That’s admirable as a human trait, a personal trait, but you’ve got to look beyond that at this point. You have larger obligations.” Does that sound credible to you?
I suspect he was getting that advice from other sources as well.

Secchia: Let’s work our way back to 1974. I don’t think there were four people in Kent County who understood what was going on in Washington outside of Jerry Ford. So I would doubt that he would put much stock into what four locals had to say about this issue. When the pardon was given, I believe it was on a Sunday night. If I’ve done this interview before, stop me.

So I went to D.C. for dinner that night. He would usually come upstairs for dinner at 7:00, 7:30, sometimes 8:00, but very seldom later than that. And that night it was almost 9:00 and he hadn’t come up yet. He was busy reacting to all of the pressure that he was receiving. When he came up, he pressed the little button on his chair and asked for his martini. That was the only time I ever heard him use the f-word. But he said to me, “Nixon had really f’ed up the pea patch and it had to be done.” And I recall just saying, “Why am I in this conversation, it’s above my pay grade?”

And so I (regretfully today) shut him down to end this high level tone and said, “Why don’t we talk about something else?” And he said, “This will probably cost me the ’76 election.” (The first time I had heard him mention’76.) And I tended to sort of agree with this, but you have to remember at this point in time, I was not a Republican “Leader.” A lot of people think I was born that way, but I was not involved in active party politics in ’75. I was helping Jerry Ford and some like-minded candidates in a very minor way. I was a young, I mean, I still dressed the same as I am, i.e., in jeans and a plaid shirt. I was just hanging out at the White House helping him and didn’t deserve to be there, but he kept inviting me.

That night Betty wasn’t feeling well. She was in bed with her neck propped up and her brace on. We talked a little bit, but she wanted to rest and read. So I went out to wait in their sitting area. When the President came upstairs, he picked up the papers and the first thing he did was go to the editorial which was his way of devouring a newspaper. He’d open up the paper and look at the letters to the editor in Grand Rapids, but when he was in Washington, he’d open up the Washington Post or New York Times and take a peek at the editorial.

This day they were brutally attacking his “pardon” decision and that just made the night go deeper and deeper into the darkness of despair, kind of, “What did I do?” and “Why did I do it?”

But his mind was made up. There was no question in his mind that he did the right thing then. I watched him receive the Congressional Medal of Honor. And the Kennedy Profiles in Courage Award. The pride was abundantly clear.

Smith: The Kennedy Profiles in Courage award?

Secchia: Both, the one from Congress and the “Profiles” award.

Smith: The Congressional Gold Medal.

Secchia: The Congressional Gold Medal. I watched him when he received that and I think that happened after the Kennedy. But he reflected on the fact that “finally I am proven right.” It was like a weight was lifted off his shoulders. I don’t remember him ever mentioning this when I was home. Now I’d ask Jack, remember Jack Stiles, jack was his closest friend that he took to Washington?

Smith: Jack Stiles? Who was Jack Stiles first of all?

Secchia: Jack Stiles, Jerry Ford respected early in his career because Jack got things done for him. It was a funny relationship. (It was sort of the kind of the relationship I had with him.) He depended on me to get things done for him and I think Jack had filled that void for him in his early congressional years.

Smith: But who was Jack Stiles? Where did he come from?

Secchia: He was a local man. Nobody really knew much about him. The night he died, he was supposed to have dinner with me. He had called me at 4 pm…to say he had arranged a lady friend to meet with him and he went to Grand Haven. On his way home he rolled his car. They found his car the next morning in a ditch in the creek off West River Drive. Jack lived a fast life and was a small problem for the president in Washington. During this negotiation was the Midnight Massacre. All of these things happened fast. I believe President Ford was trying very hard to keep Jack out of the spotlight because there were some strange feelings about him, whether it be here or there. But I had dinner with Jack several times and I have a picture of us having a dinner on Ford’s first trip home at the old Harley Inn. The hotel’s not even there anymore, but I have a picture of that dinner, just the four of us. But I don’t remember anything about Bill Gill’s four-person group, but knowing Jerry Ford, I don’t doubt it.

Smith: One thing Bill said…

Secchia: This is Bill Gill the television guy?

Smith: Yeah. He didn’t say it, critically, he said it almost matter of factly, he said, “Jerry Ford was not without guile.” Now, that obviously runs counter to the popular impression. I don’t take it as criticism. I mean, anyone who wants to be Speaker of the House has more than simply ambition.

Secchia: Well, you know what, there’s good ambition and there’s bad ambition.

Smith: Well, sure. Sure.

Secchia: Jerry Ford wanted to be Speaker of the House because he believed that was the ultimate position for someone who had dedicated many years to legislative reasoning. He’d studied the budget, he understood the administrative procedures of the House. He was like John Engler as our governor. He understood the insides facts and workings of the government.

Smith: Let me ask you about Jack Stiles. As I may have said earlier, Nelson Rockefeller didn’t age well. There was a streak of, it’s not too much to say, of paranoia. As vice president he saw enemies, and he had convinced himself that Rumsfeld was his ultimate enemy.

Secchia: Rockefeller?

Smith: Yeah, but he had literally also convinced himself that Jack Stiles’ death was no accident.

Secchia: Did he?

Smith: Yeah, he believed that the president was surrounded by people who didn’t want him to get reelected in 1976, and that somehow Stiles’ death factored into - that they started the campaign very late and so forth and so on.

Secchia: If they did a sperm check on Jack’s body, they would have found he was short a few gallons. No one knew at 4 p.m. that evening where he was going. I mean, he was out drinking and rendezvousing. I wouldn’t refute that. But the campaign started late because President Ford had wanted to wait, to no get into the primaries…However, the next day after he received the Kansas City nomination we all met in Vail with Stu Spencer, Cheney and Baker (5-6 of us) to plan the campaign.

Smith: So, he had a local reputation?

Secchia: I don’t know if he had a big reputation because you have to remember that these men were 25 years older than me so I didn’t know about their younger days, (their prowling days). I just knew Jack was a loyal friend of President Ford’s from years gone by.

Smith: What was his professional background?

Secchia: I’m sorry…I forgot.
Smith: But it’s interesting that the president had him for such a close friend and in effect as a political ally given the vulnerabilities that went along with that.

Secchia: And I think those vulnerabilities really approached this risky status when Jerry Ford’s role became more important. When Jerry Ford was a congressman and later, the Minority Leader, nobody really paid attention to who he hung around with, or who he had dinner with when he came back to town. I can remember taking Jerry Ford to an old hotel in D.C. where the piano player (Mark Russell), used to play. It’s the old Sheraton—______, right on the river by the parkway, off of Connecticut Ave. a couple blocks. It’s where Mark Russell used to play in the early ‘70s.

Jerry and I went in there and we had dinner and a few drinks. We were talking and I was proud of my relationship with Jerry. I went over to Mark Russell and said, “Do you realize the Minority Leader of the U.S. Congress is in this room?” Russell played all this political satire and he looked at me like, “No, which one is he?” And I had to point out “The Minority Leader.” Now, if Mark Russell, who is a 24/7 full-time political satirist and humorist and musician, didn’t know who the Minority Leader was, then who was paying any attention to who he was having dinner with, me or Jack Stiles. It just didn’t matter to most.

Rockefeller had this paranoia and he was also involved in a lot of intelligence operations that I wasn’t involved in. I would challenge his thinking. I think Jack was just a party boy whose time had come. Great guy, fun to be with, and maybe drank a little too much, but he didn’t talk a lot and he was loyal to Ford and that was important to Jerry Ford. Now, with your experience you know more about Jerry Ford than anybody and you’ll find that more than half of us think they were Jerry Ford’s best friend.

Smith: That passes for guile. I mean, beyond individual ego, there are successful politicians - all have the ability to make individuals think that they have a unique place in their lives.

Secchia: The good ones.
Smith: The good ones, absolutely.

Secchia: And I don’t think Jerry Ford could be called a manipulator as I would say John Edwards was, or some other people who had issues to hide, but it’s hard to get a good interview out of people like me because I love the guy like a big brother. Do not want to hurt his legacy.

Smith: Tell me how broad a range of friends he had.

Secchia: Well, you could start with Jack Stiles. I think one of the questions you’ll find in Maury DeJonge’s interview that was never shared was one of the questions was, “My editors can’t quite understand it, why do you consider Pete Secchia as one of your closest friends?” And that’s right in the interview.

Smith: Really?

Secchia: Uh-huh. I have a copy of the interview because Maury told me 30 years ago that he would give me a copy some day. He gave me one a few months ago. I don’t know where it is, I think I have it at the office, but you’ll get it eventually. It was because he had this broad range of friends that he knew where to go for answers. Jerry Ford was the consummate politician in the sense that he wasn’t being partisan political, but he knew how to work the halls of Congress. And if the lobby system worked as it did when Jerry Ford was in Congress from late 40s to the 70s, when you needed to know something about airplanes or military aircraft or civilian aircraft, you had to call somebody who knew that product or industry. Someone who could find the answers for you, so you could make a better decision.

So that was Jerry Ford’s way of operating. He could call somebody or ask or tell somebody to get the answer from a person, but he liked to do that himself. He loved to talk to you about what you do and why you do it. So he had different friends from different sectors. I know that Bob Sheiffer (CBS) and Jones and some of those TV guys were his contacts. I remember when GRF hired Ron Nessen and he thought it was sort of neat that he was able to get this national press man to come and be his press secretary. He was a bit naïve in some ways. He was enraptured by certain musicians or entertainers, but we all are. Wouldn’t you love it if Abraham Lincoln was resurrected and came walking in the room? You’d want to run up and ask him a dozen questions before he disappeared again.

Smith: How much of that was the Eagle Scout in Ford and how much of that was Grand Rapids?

Secchia: I think there’s a lot that has the same values. I don’t think there’s a big difference between Eagle Scouting and the culture of Grand Rapids. There are people who will see us as country bumpkin-ish and there are others who think that our sartorial splendiferousness is lacking. The fact is, that we’re Midwesterners. Scouting teaches kids to have goals, earn them, wear a badge. Always Jerry Ford wore that badge of honor when he was in the legislature. He was our congressman. He defeated an isolationist. He had his points.

Smith: It’s interesting. We spent two fascinating hours yesterday with Dorothy Dowton and it was interesting because she volunteered what others have sort of grudgingly yielded up, which was the extent to which, even when they were in the vice presidency, the Nixon people didn’t want them around, looked down on them, saw them as Grand Rapids. Now, some of that you can understand, some of it’s unavoidable given their roles, but some of it’s cultural condescension. He obviously had to be aware of it.

Secchia: Oh, he was aware of it. He was well aware of it. When he brought Bill Seidman in to the vice president’s office and Phil Buchen who was his attorney, these were people he knew he could depend on and that’s who he wanted around him. If you look at the Nixon White House and you have the California boys and the fast movers, fast talkers, somewhat shifty manipulators and then you bring in Bill Seidman and Phil Buchen and Jack Stiles and Pete Secchia, it was…“Who are those guys?”

Smith: I want to talk about Phil Buchen. One of the things that Bill Gill said yesterday was that part of the burden, Phil Buchen talked to Duncan Littlefair and they both communicated to the President their views on the advisability of a pardon. And I don’t know Duncan Littlefair except from a distance by reputation. But I would have thought that he was a political liberal who would not necessarily look favorably upon a Nixon pardon. Bill insisted that in this particular case, he did and he communicated those views through Buchen and apparently directly himself to Ford. Does that sound credible?

Secchia: I can’t challenge it nor can I confirm it. Was Buchen in agreement with Littlefair?

Smith: Yes.

Secchia: There’s been so many years gone by…

Smith: You know, it sounds basic, but it’s basic for a reason. Tell us about Phil Buchen.

Secchia: Well, Phil’s relationship with Ford had gone back to the pre-congressional days. Jerry Ford always felt that they had an honorable legal partnership and a good personal relationship. Therefore, when Jerry moved out of the legal business, when he needed legal help, he went right back to where he would’ve been nurtured as an early member of the bar. So they had a quiet but strong relationship. Phil was, I think, wanting to be a little more involved in the exciting side of Washington. But because of Phil’s physical condition, and his health deteriorating quite rapidly towards the final years there, I just think they were very happy to come back and draw down from the deals or D.C.

I can’t say specific incidents I might be reminded of, but when someone, you see it now, too, because you’ve been through several of them, but if someone goes from being your newspaper editor in Grand Rapids, to being a congressman, to being speaker, to being president, or they make their way up any ladder of success, you expect changes and sometimes you don’t get changes. Everybody expected changes. But those who knew the man (or his bride) know there were few changes except the fact that there were more demands on time, more demands on their ability to attend events, more babies to kiss, more funerals to attend. So a lot of people change because their life clock starts ticking faster.
I knew a lot of these people back when we were all nothing. I mean, I’m still a country bumpkin and I’m proud of it. I don’t even like to go to Washington, never did like to go to Washington (even when GRF was president). G.H.W. Bush asked me to be in his administration, I said no. I mean, that’s how I ended up being ambassador to Italy. I didn’t want to go to Washington.

Smith: Did Ford change?

Secchia: No. Where he did change, he changed for the better. He learned, he became more understanding and expansive on issues that I would never claim to understand. I don’t know if I told you this story about, Golda Meir - do you remember reading this one?

I was upstairs with Ford one night in the residence and he said to me, “Peter, what do you think about Golda Meir coming to visit?” It had been in the press that she was going to ask for - in today’s standards it’s probably minor – “million in aid.” And he said, “What do you think?” I said, naively, “Well, you know, we have inflation, we have a big deficit, people don’t like it when the government keeps giving away money to other governments. Maybe you ought not do it.” He said, “Well, that’s specifically why she’s coming.” And he says, “But that’s what you think?”

A few minutes later, a buzzer goes off, I don’t know whether it was in the chair or if the steward came out of the kitchen, but the call comes through and he says, “It’s Henry Kissinger. He’s in Tel Aviv and he’s about to get on the plane with the prime minister.” Then President Ford picks up the phone and says, “Henry, I’ve been talking to Pete and I don’t think we’re going to do it.” And I’m sitting there with this vision that the Mossad is listening in and I’m going to find out that there’s somebody in my hotel room when I get back to the Madison Hotel. I don’t know what I’m talking about, I was just making conversation. But after you get into it, you find out that he’d talked to a dozen other people who’d had similar advice.

Smith: So it wasn’t the fact of doing what the last person who’d advised him to do?
Secchia: No, and he got that bad rap. I don’t think that was the way it was. It was just that he had a great memory. I used to describe him as an administrative genius because everybody thought he was an administrative dum-dum and that he didn’t know the issues. But, this is a guy you can take a whole bunch of papers on different issues, throw them up in the air, and as they float to the ground, he’ll pull the one out of the pack that needs attention. And then he’ll know who to call to ask their thoughts and maybe he won’t agree with you, he’ll just ask your thoughts. And you might think, “Well, I just talked to him and I told him this and that’s what he did.” That’s bullshit. He’d talked to dozens of other people.

Smith: Over time, all those years in Congress…clearly people evolve. They learn. They grow, presumably, the more they’re exposed to what’s unfamiliar. His conservatism: Did that change?

Secchia: I think it diminished. When he first was in Congress, I didn’t know him. I didn’t meet him until later in the 60s, but I don’t think he would’ve ever supported the ERA and some of the issues that Betty was strongly in favor of if he still lived in Grand Rapids. He still talked to all the people here that he talked to back then. I think his conservatism diminished on some of these social issues. I believe if today he was making a decision on civil unions or same sex benefits, he would’ve been a pioneer on that. Too, I think that he’s probably similar to the current governor of Utah on how he would’ve viewed those issues.

Smith: I realize this is speculative, but how much influence did Mrs. Ford have on those kinds of issues? How much was simply being exposed to a broader range of opinion and reality, living longer, which has a way of playing havoc with ideology. Because he did seem to become in some ways more liberal, for lack of a better word, with age.

Secchia: Well, I think America has become more liberal and I think he was a strong barometer of the public sense. So as he became more entrenched and more familiar with the issues facing the country and the world, I mean, I doubt he’d put up with the Republican Party that we have today.
Smith: Could he get nominated in this district today? If he were running for the first time, if he wasn’t the Jerry Ford of legend, would his kind of conservative - if you want to call it that.

Secchia: Well, his kind of conservatism probably doesn’t exist today. There are still conservatives here, but it’s like engineering and computer work. Everything is now for niche markets and what used to be conservatism was everybody who was over here who might agree with the majority of these ten issues.
Today you have fiscal conservatives, social conservatives, religious conservatives, it won’t be the same. If he was running today as the attractive candidate that he was, you have to remember, in this district, the election is the primary, the Republican primary. So if you were able to get the Republican primary vote…

Smith: That’s the question. In today’s Republican Party, would he win a primary?

Secchia: I think so, but I wouldn’t know enough about 1948’s comparison. He ran against Jonkman who obviously was out of step. There again it is Jerry Ford the barometer, he read that shift before anybody else read that and he wasn’t supposed to win. At least those who were entrenched in the leadership here thought that he didn’t have much of a chance.

Smith: Describe then, if you could kind of encapsulate, when you really began to know him…give us a sense of the political culture, in this town and then maybe the broader culture. We’re trying to trace, among other things, impact of the Christian Reformed Church upon the broader culture of West Michigan. But also, invariably, spilling over into the political culture. Clearly it has evolved, but where was it when you first really begin to know Ford?
How much of it did he have to take into account? How much of it found reflection in his voting record?

Secchia: When I first got to know Ford, I was afraid he wouldn’t get reelected. That’s how I came to know him. I had met him at a few events and told him I thought we ought to talk. I reminded him that when he was home, he was only seeing people his own age and nobody was developing any contacts with the 30+ year old set which was the decade of people in their 30s that I knew. He was listening to that and said, “You know, I hadn’t thought about that.” I watched him make some adjustments in his campaigning, but I think that you have to understand that as he has changed and his personality has changed, and Grand Rapids has changed, but you still have the same old problem.

Grand Rapids is a Democrat city; it is not a Republican city. It has been voting Democrat in most elections for many years. But it was a part of the 5th District then, (the 3rd Congressional District now), and it is part of Kent County which is Republican. We have had as many as a 18 to 3 majority on the county commission. When Jerry ran for office, it was about 17 to 4 and now there’s only 19 commissioners because they’ve changed the structure. The county is still a Republican county, but it’s an entrepreneurial region. And there’s an inherent respect, I mean, there is a story in today’s Grand Rapids Press where I’m quoted as saying, “You’ve got 300 greedy bastards in New York who give a bad name to the CEOs of America and in West Michigan, I don’t know a West Michigan CEO who would fall into the category they are criticizing on Wall Street.” (2008)

That’s a point of pride we’ve always had here. I think Jerry Ford had an admiration for the Sandy Weils and the local corporate leaders because he wasn’t one and he always had respect for successful business people. He thought that success was an admirable quality and I think he had the same respect for the competent legislator who did his homework, was prepared, didn’t only come to a hearing because there were television cameras, but came to make comments on certain provisions in the legislation.

Smith: You have to believe that those values were implanted early.

Secchia: Yes, and you see them with the young Scouts who were lined up at his funeral procession. You see their pride. I was at the recent scout fundraiser and that hasn’t changed. So, you know, you hear that derogatory comment every once in awhile that “They’re nothing but a bunch of Boy Scouts,” and it’s sort of like it has become a negative because there are those who don’t want to see the values of that. It’s like a child holding hands with a parent. When I grew 13 up, that wasn’t very macho. And I can remember when National Geographic came to Grand Rapids back in Ford’s early days as President (1974-75) and they wanted to know “why Grand Rapids was different.” They talked to a lot of people, but one of the quotes they had in the article, I remember (it was from me) and I said, “Well, I’m in the restaurant business and it’s not unusual here to see a teenage boy come here holding hands with his mother and nobody laughs at them. They respect that parent-child relationship.” And Ford having had the early problems in his childhood watched and admired everybody else who had a business and principles like his stepfather - a good businessman, a proud businessman, an honest businessman - that was very important to Jerry Ford.

Smith: Do you think, again it’s speculative, maybe he talked about it, maybe he didn’t, I heard a little about it from time to time, but do you think that the circumstances of his early days gave him a particular empathy with not only broken families, but some other… I mean, you’re looking for this counterintuitive, fiscally conservative as orthodox as they get, he was tight, fiscally.

Secchia: Personally…Also…” tight fiscally.”

Smith: Do you have any stories to illustrate that?

Secchia: Well, I mean, I would kid him that he was “tighter than a second coat of paint.” I used to kid him, but I’ll tell you one funny story. We were out in California for a board meeting and I took Governor Engler by to say hello to then 90 year old Jerry Ford. We met President Ford in the office and we were sitting there chatting. It was getting dark. And when people get elderly they start to keep the lights down in their office, and there’s piles of crap and newspapers everywhere, and stacks of things, letters to sign, and autographs to sign. I realized that University of Michigan was playing basketball at that time, and I knew he never had the specialized signal cable because back then you had to pay extra to get these basketball games. I knew he wouldn’t pay for that. And I said, “You know, too bad you don’t have…” He said, “Oh, I do! I do!” He said, “Well, let’s go.”
Peter Secchia  August 5, 2008

So he got up so fast he forgot his cane and he started to head for the door. Well, Judy at the time was working and Penny Circle or someone came running out, “Mr. President! Mr. President, you forgot your cane!” She gives him the cane. We get to the house, he’s got the TV and this special hook-up and I said, “Jerry, I can’t believe you pay for this.” He just smiled at me.

He loved his University of Michigan sports. He knew the players name, who could dribble, drive, ________ a perimeter shoot. Well, later on, we say goodbye, we’re going through his office and I said to Penny, “I can’t believe he bought that.” She says, “He didn’t. Somebody gave it to him.”

Smith: How much did he talk about money? I mean, he took some hits for particularly the early days of his ex-presidency. We’ve had occasion now to talk to a number of people who were on boards with him, and it was very clear he took it very seriously and he never just lent his name to something. But nevertheless, he was going to come home because he had no money and he was going to practice law and was going to make a little bit of money for his family. Was he proud of his success?

Secchia: On his board service?

Smith: Yeah, and just as someone economically successful?

Secchia: I think he was dedicated to being a good board member, just as he was dedicated to being a good Scout, a good lawyer, or a good legislator. He studied for meetings and he told me a few times about the trip out east would give him a few hours and a plane where he could read, but he was said to be an excellent board member. I heard that from several people.

Smith: Do you think he was sensitive to the criticism on public speaking?

Secchia: No.

Smith: No?

Secchia: I tried to get him to be more sensitive to this criticism because of what he did. He just evolved into a “Well, if you want to pay me 50 grand, fine, but put 25 in the Ford Foundation,” and then, “Do this and this.” This minimizes the actual fees reported, but, you know, he was only out of office four years and, I guess it was eight years before anybody started selling their time for big money. Let’s see, Carter lost after four years to Reagan, so it was twelve years then, because, you know, the big dollars weren’t made until Reagan and Clinton and Bush ‘41.

Smith: But you know Ford took heat for being the first.

Secchia: Yes, he did, but I don’t think he was sensitive to it. I don’t think he did much of it then. It didn’t take a lot of money for Jerry Ford to feel wealthy. I mean, he’d never had any wealth at all.

Smith: Do you have any idea what Jerry Ford was worth when he died?

Secchia: Nope, and he wouldn’t talk about it.

Smith: He wouldn’t.

Secchia: He had a chunk of stock from Sandy Weil, the early Traveler’s Insurance, the early parts of CitiCorp Building that empire was exciting to him. I mean, today he’d be mortified at the CitiCorp fiasco, but he was a good board member, dedicated to that group. He had “Founders Stock.” I mean, he referred to it as “Founders Stock.” I don’t know what founders stock is other than maybe back in the 70s you were able to give a certain class of stock to people that could be converted or split or had special dividends, I don’t know.

Smith: What would be a luxury to Jerry Ford?

Secchia: Watching his University of Michigan football team or basketball team or visiting the campus and talking to the players. That would be a luxury. Private jets, I don’t think so much.

Smith: It is astonishing and it became a matter of discussion internally that, at least as long as I was here, I was appalled that he was flying commercially and subsequently Rich said of course he could use their plane.

Secchia: I helped put that deal together.
Smith: I wish it had been done earlier, but he kept up.

Secchia: But you know how this came about? Rich said to me, “You know I’ll always be happy to send a jet to pick him up.” But I hated to ask Richard because somebody else might’ve asked him last week. He said, “Anytime he wants to go anywhere, I will have a plane there.” I said, “You mean, anytime, anywhere?” He said, “Yep.” I went to the president with it, and he still didn’t use it very much.

Smith: That’s fascinating. Tell me about the relationship between the president and Rich DeVos. Was it any different between Rich DeVos and Van Andel? Was it closer to Rich? What’s your reading?

Secchia: I think when they were both alive, it was similar. There was a mutual respect. Jerry had that consistent admiration of successful business people who did it the right way. Jay’s been gone for awhile now, so the DeVos side is certainly closer, but when Jay was still alive and active in the business Jay and Rich were both friends and conservatives GRF admired, but not close friends. Jerry was still wrapped up in Washington. The early friends, the Jack Stiles days, were the old-fashioned “congressional hometown politics begins at home” crowd.

Smith: Is there anyone left from those days?

Secchia: Maury DeJonge or John Malinowski. You know the family, the guy that was his chief of staff who ended up a judge. I just read a book written by one of the Malinowski family members (about the family) and I forget some of the names now, but he had run his office here in town…By the way, I think Bill Gill got fired from his TV station… he lost his job, let’s just say that was for fabrications and self delusions, I think.

Smith: Tell me about the kids. What was your relationship? Maybe it’s a large subject, but what was your role?

Secchia: My role was whatever he wanted it to be. You know, one time he called me up and asked me to come out and talk to Steve. “What for?” He says, “Well,
I can’t afford to send him to Duke and that’s where he wants to go.” Or University of Virginia or some expensive school.

Smith: Now, this was when he was in Congress?

Smith: He was vice president because I think the day I arrived, he flew out on Air Force Two. It was then a prop Conair.

Smith: With all due respect, why would he have you talk to Steve?

Secchia: He had a hard time talking to his kids about tough issues and money issues, I think for the same reason he admired people who had done well in business. He was a bit embarrassed that he hadn’t done well. This is just my own personal judgment.

Smith: Yeah, makes perfect sense.

Secchia: It was nice to have someone else who had done well in business to come talk to Steven. He had arranged for Steve to work at a dude ranch, (Brown’s?), out in Utah somewhere. And that’s how Steve ended riding horses and now he’s still raising them and he was breeding them for awhile, so that was one. I also remember the 1976 bicentennial dinner, my job was to watch Jack, make sure he didn’t get into trouble. That evening I had to talk to him. But they were just kids. You know, Susan was dancing with some people she shouldn’t be dancing with. He wanted me to talk about that. I don’t think he had a close relationship with his kids in the early days. I don’t think they paid much attention to anything he did and he didn’t pay that much attention to things they did.

Smith: Was part of that just because he was away physically a lot?

Secchia: I think he was just dedicated to doing what he did.

Smith: Wrapped up in his work.

Secchia: And, we’re all guilty of that. I went through my younger days of my children and I was busy building my business and just hope you catch a hold of the life raft before you sink.
Smith: Did he ever say anything in those later years to lead you to believe he felt that and/or felt any degree of guilt either toward the kids or toward Mrs. Ford for all those years when he was either physically absent or emotionally absent because of work?

Secchia: I think he had some guilt for not spending more time with Betty and not spending more time with the kids. But you know, when you have a friend who is president of the United States or “former president” of the United States, or minority leader, you don’t just sit down and say, “Why aren’t you treating your kids better?” or “Why aren’t you treating your wife better?”

Smith: But if he, you know, had earlier involved you in these kinds of family discussions, I just wonder if in later years, that continued.

Secchia: Later, he didn’t involve me in family issues. He asked me to deliver a message or to watch or talk to someone. He didn’t have many family discussions. I don’t think as a unit they did a lot. Betty ran the house and ran the kids and took care of everybody and kept it all going. And he was busy. He had that old-fashioned model that his father, Ford, had. I go to work in the morning and when I come home at night, I want my slippers and I want to eat and I want to sit down and read the paper and I don’t want to be bothered. He had that slipper and pipe kind of “unwinding” culture.

Smith: Sure. And in one way he did evolve. I mean we talked about a change and evolution. I mean, certainly, he was so proud of her and her feminist credentials. You know, he certainly didn’t need to put himself, for reasons of ego, at the center of attention. When she got the Medal of Freedom, when she got recognition, it was almost better than when he did. One sensed that in those later years.

Secchia: It was always, “Betty is more popular than I am.” His self-deprecatng humor wasn’t as fine-tuned as some others, but he used it effectively and he was fair to her and he cared about her and he’s the one guy I’ve met in my life who I’d say without a doubt was always faithful.

Smith: When was the last time you talked with her?
Secchia: I talked to her a few months ago. I don’t like to call, but Jan (her assistant) says, I don’t know how the staff works, because the staff says, “Call me” and then they filter everything through staff. Steve says, “Why don’t you call Mom?” And he says, “She says you don’t call very much?” And I don’t want to go through staff. I had that problem with Barrett for awhile and I’ve been through lots of staff.

Smith: Did he put up walls?

Secchia: Well, everybody does when you’re the gatekeeper. You have to. Because, in your judgment, “He doesn’t need to talk to Pete Secchia right now, he’s got to focus on that speech” or “He’s got to get ready for this interview.” And that’s your job, I mean, that’s the gatekeeper (the chief of staff). I respect that because I know how difficult that is. I occasionally would hear from some of them when they were down and out and disappointed and it was easy to work for Jerry Ford and easy to think he didn’t love you because he didn’t spend a lot of time giving hugs or telling you that he really cared about you. But when it got right down to the nitty-gritty, you knew that he loved you because he wouldn’t put up with your crap if he didn’t. He just had a way about him that said, “I accept you.”

Smith: Did you read, in part or in whole, Tom DeFrank’s book?

Secchia: Yes.

Smith: What’s your reaction?

Secchia: Well, after I read it, I had two or three facts I challenged. I didn’t think it was a Pulitzer Prize book and I don’t think he knew him as well as he claimed to have known him. I chaired that Jerry Ford’s Hometown Downtown celebration. He said he still has the badge from that. I got to believe that wasn’t, as he said it was. It was not a cold winter day, it was outdoors at the Calder Plaza and I remember we gave him cookies from this African-American lady friend of my family who used to make cookies for him at the store where he worked. We gave him the cookies. I’d have to go back and research, but I can’t believe we were outside in January in Grand Rapids.
There were a couple of little _________ - there were a few revelations that I wasn’t aware of.

Smith: You wonder what the president’s motive was. There are people we’ve talked to that believe absolutely he knew exactly what was going on and he was saying all this because it was going on the record and this was part of his legacy. And there were other people who felt that to some degree he was almost used. And I emphasize, not just by Tom, who really did care about the president and who is a good reporter. But it raises the question about whether it’s a good idea for former presidents to have that kind of...

Secchia: I think, knowing Jerry Ford, I think he might have done the former and just figured, “Well, it will come out after I’m dead and I’d like to set the record straight and this is how it really happened.” Because he’s reading other columnist’s stories on how it happened.

Smith: Did you ever hear him talk about the second Bush or Iraq? What was his take?

Secchia: He thought there’d been some mistakes made. He told me he told the president that, too. You’re talking about ‘43?

Smith: Yes.

Secchia: Yeah, he said, “He doesn’t call me very often, but when he did, I told him.” And I said, “How’d he handle it?” And he said, “Fine” and he thought that ‘43 was pretty good about taking that criticism. But GRF was always quick to tell you that he doesn’t know everything the current president knows.

Smith: But it must have been awkward - forget Bush, forget the policy, look at the personalities, with Cheney and Rumsfeld and Paul O’Neill, all those folks - I mean, that must have been difficult for him.

Secchia: It was very difficult for him because he didn’t know where to put his shoe down there, which path to walk.

Smith: I presume it didn’t undermine in any way his respect for O’Neill.
Secchia: No, not at all. And that’s why Jerry Ford was still Jack Stiles friend in the end when other people were saying Jack was useless, or often drunk and saying things about people that they shouldn’t say, but it gets them in the gossip columns, the potpourri columns. People talk.

Smith: That’s one of the remarkable things about Ford. He was often a victim of that. He doesn’t seem to have harbored any particular resentment. He often laughed it off. Did he have an enemy?

Secchia: Oh, he had quite a few back in the early days.

Smith: Did he think he had?

Secchia: Yes, he had a few people that he didn’t like and he was pretty sure they didn’t like him. But I don’t think he had an enemy or he would have been paranoid about Rockefeller. He didn’t have that conspiracy theory deal. You know, to this day he felt on the Warren Commission they did the research they had to do. That’s why I can’t believe some of these things I’m hearing about what really happened with him. I think he was a pretty basic guy. And, if you’re a basic guy, you don’t have a lot of devious plans and plots.

Smith: He certainly didn’t waste any time nurturing enmities, unlike Richard Nixon who almost drew strength from them.

Secchia: You know, some of us have strange personalities, some of us know what we’re going to say is going to anger. You know, Jerry Ford and I used to debate the ’76 primary where he would get pissed off at Reagan and the Reagan people and I would remind him that, we made a dozen mistakes that each cost us a quarter of a point. There was no one mistake; there were just the little ones. And had he not gone out and campaigned in the primary in Minnesota and some of those small states, he would’ve lost worse because they didn’t know him. He thought he could just stay in Washington and be the good Doobie all his life that he was and the Rose Garden Strategy kind of feel. It wasn’t going to work that way.
I miss him. I proudly tell you, I miss him. I sit here looking out the window (here in his office) and I remember building this museum and trying to get the cash appropriated. I was often talking to him about raising money and the guy he was, in the sense he wouldn’t bother a friend. I said, “Call Max Fischer, we’ve got to get this money.” “Okay, Peter, I’ll get to it.” And he delayed it too long. Max passed away without getting the “big ask.”

Smith: Great.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this.

Were you in the Nixon White House?

Wallison: In a sense, I was. I worked for something called the President’s Advisory Council on Executive Organization, also known as the Ash Council. And that was during the Nixon period, but I was then a young squirrel, little chipmunk and did a study of the transportation agencies, as I recall, for that group. But it gave me my first entry into that whole scene.

Smith: Even if you’re on the periphery, obviously you could not escape the kind of enveloping mood that presumably Watergate created.

Wallison: I was out before Watergate really hit.

Smith: You were?

Wallison: Yes, I did this in 1969, 1970. I was only three years out of law school at that point so it was really just a nine month period during which I sort of immersed myself in what was going on in Washington. I did get to meet a lot of the people who became important in the Nixon period. I mean, Roy Ash was one and John Connally was another, both of them were on this Ash Council. But I was really just someone’s bag carrier without a bag.

Smith: Do you have a theory as to what it was about John Connally that so impressed Nixon?

Wallison: Affirmative. He’s a very affirmative man. He was charismatic, knew what he wanted, stated what he wanted very clearly. I think Nixon admired people like that. So that was never a mystery to me.

Smith: One of the stories we’ve been told, someone was told to call John Connally, who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time, and indicate to him that the President would like to have him at an event the next day. And as this story unfolded, Connally made it very clear that if the President wanted him at the event, the President would call. You do wonder if Nixon, for all the talk of the bundle of insecurities that was Nixon, looked at someone like Connally and saw a kind of brass-plated—

Wallison: I think that would be a perfect little paradigm of the relationship between the two of them. And there was a little episode which involved the Ash Council that I thought actually encapsulated this whole thing, because one of the proposals of the Ash Council was to create a domestic council. We’ll talk about that when we talk about Rockefeller. Nixon assembled his entire cabinet. It wasn’t a public meeting, but it was a large meeting. The Cabinet was there and some of the subcabinet people were there and the White House staff and Roy Ash was going to explain to them what this domestic council was all about and, of course, they were not happy. The cabinet was not happy with the fact that there was going to be some intervening body between them and the President.

Roy Ash was not an articulate person. He was probably a very bright person, but he was not articulate. And he stumbled around and stumbled around and Nixon was there sort of in the doorway watching this whole thing. And then John Connally, who was a member of the Ash Council - after Ash had made a mess out of his description of the idea and the Cabinet was even more disturbed that what they originally thought was the problem was actually worse than they thought - John Connally stood up and in about four or five sentences, outlined what it would be, reassured them all, and everything sort of quieted down. And I always thought it was at that point that Nixon really took the measure of Connally and thought to himself, “Hmm, this guy could be a successor to me.” So, that’s what I saw in that little vignette.

Smith: Well, clearly we know that left to his own devices, he would have installed Connally as his successor. Other people at that point were making that decision for him.

How did you come back into the White House?
Wallison: Oh, well, of course through Rockefeller. I came back - actually the Ash Council had something to do with this because one of the people on the Ash Council was a person named Walter Thayer. Walter Thayer was a very well known business person in New York, a close ally of John Hay Whitney.

Smith: The heart and soul of the Eastern Establishment.

Wallison: Right. Exactly, in every respect.

Smith: How would you define the Eastern Establishment by the way at that stage? Did it still exist?

Wallison: Today?

Smith: No, did it exist then?

Wallison: Did it exist? Oh, yes, I think it existed at that point and it was largely a WASP establishment. These were people who ran major businesses or were major investors or very wealthy people like John Hay Whitney, they were movers and shakers in a sort of informal government. I mean they were the people who would be consulted by the people in the government. Not only because they were rich and well known, but simply because they were considered people who were above the usual concerns that the rest of us might have had in our daily lives. You know, they spoke from a different level. They were probably in a sense disinterested, but had a long-term view of things.

Smith: Wise men.

Wallison: Wise men, sort of, yes. I think that would be a good way to put it, and that was a time we actually believed in wise men.

Smith: More hierarchical society.

Wallison: Yes, it was a lot more like that. Of course I’m not a sociologist, but that would be my way of thinking about it, and I think Rockefeller was, in a sense, part of that group for obvious reasons.
Smith: In ’64, the California primary campaign was not going well, so Stu Spencer, who’s just tried everything else, he says, “Governor, it’s time to call in the Eastern establishment.” And Rockefeller says, “You’re looking at it, buddy. I’m all that’s left.” Which is a great line.

Wallison: It doesn’t really sound like Rockefeller, but, yes, he could well have said it and it might have actually been in part true. But in any event, I was working for the Ash Council and we did a study, as I said. And then Rockefeller decided that he wanted to do a study himself called the Modern State in a Changing World. And he consulted Walter Thayer - this is how I understand it - about who should run such a study. And Thayer said, “Well, there was this young kid on the Ash Council who did a pretty good job and he lives right here in New York. In fact, he’s at Jack Wells’ Law Firm.” Jack Wells was the senior partner in the firm I was with and Jack was one of my mentors.

Smith: I don’t mean to throw you off, but this name—

Wallison: Easily done.

Smith: Well, no, it’s just that. Tell me about Jack Wells, because he is important behind the scenes.

Wallison: Well, Jack was not of the Eastern Establishment because Jack was a real New York kid. The only difference was, he was not Italian, he wasn’t Irish, and he wasn’t Jewish. He was, as far as I could tell, a WASP but he had a very thick New York accent. He was very gruff. There were no sanded edges about Jack Wells. He told you what he thought right to your face and he expected you to tell him what you thought right to his face. So, he was a special guy from my perspective. But he was the guy who brought me into his firm. He was running Rockefeller’s gubernatorial campaign in 1966, and I had just graduated from law school. I was in the Ripon Society, one of the founders of the Ripon Society, and the group of us went to see Wells about helping out in the Rockefeller campaign. Ripon and Rockefeller all worked together. And somehow Wells sort of took a liking to me in the course of that meeting and he asked me whether I would like to work on the campaign. I had no job at that point, I’d graduated from law school, but I’d had no association with any law firm. And I guess you could’ve done that at that time, but I don’t know. I had no particular plans for what I was going to do that year. I probably was hoping for a job, but I didn’t have one. Jack asked me whether I’d like to help out on the Rockefeller campaign, specifically he paid. “I’d like you to go and see a lot of the academics in New York State. The Ripon Society is very interesting to these people and you are a founder of it. They’d like to talk to you and maybe, in talking to these academics, you can convince them that Rockefeller is a worthwhile candidate.”

Smith: It’s interesting that the campaign would care.

Wallison: Yes, I was amazed. Now, I’m amazed. Then it didn’t seem so crazy to me but it showed how much money they had to spend.

Smith: They could worry about academics.

Wallison: They could worry about academics. So they paid me enough so I could buy my wife a wedding ring, which I didn’t have the money to do otherwise. Spent everything they paid me on that ring, which she fortunately still wears. And I traveled around New York State. I first sent out books that the Ripon Society had written called, oh, I forget even the name right now. But we had written a book. I think it was on the 1964 campaign. And I sent copies to all academics whose names I could find. I guess we had mailing lists or something like that and I got a lot of letters back saying, “Gee, I’d like to know more about Ripon. I’d like to know more about Rockefeller.” And so I traveled around New York and met a lot of people and talked to them about it. I don’t know whether I got a single vote for Nelson Rockefeller.

Smith: Did you report to Wells?

Wallison: Yes, I did. I would write him memos every week and he liked my memos. I guess I was able to write clearly enough so that he thought something good about me, and at the end of the campaign he asked me if I’d like to join Rogers & Wells, which I guess was called Royall, Koegel, Rogers & Wells at the time. And I said, “Oh, yes! Oh, absolutely.” Or otherwise be unemployed? And that was the beginning of our relationship.
Smith: Before I forget, was Frank O’Connor really a bad candidate?

Wallison: I don’t remember, frankly.

Smith: I mean, clearly Arthur Goldberg was an atrocious campaigner and Robert Morgenthau wasn’t much better, but in between is the forgotten.

Wallison: That’s right. Rockefeller I think was always pretty lucky with his opponents, but Rockefeller was also a superb politician during those years. He was really an extraordinary guy for a person who couldn’t remember a name – or, maybe more accurately, he had 15 names that he could remember and every time he added one, someone fell off the other side. So he was a guy who could say, “Hiya, fella” and you actually believed that he knew your name, but just was being very friendly to you. And he would eat everything, every ethnic concoction that could be put together and did a wonderful job of making people feel as though he is one of them. So he was really a superb politician. So I thought he probably would’ve beaten anyone in New York at that time.

Smith: I don’t expect you to know the answer to this, but I’m just curious whether you’d heard anything at the time. Remember the Liberals put up Franklin Roosevelt, Jr. and, to this day, there’s uncertainty as to whether that was a put up job, whether he was there to draw votes away from O’Connor.

Wallison: That I don’t know. Rockefeller was not above those things, but I don’t know much about that. And that campaign, as I say, I was very far down in the apparatus and in addition, I traveled the entire time. I was never even in the headquarters except for a weekly or maybe monthly meeting with Jack where I would report to him, give him a memo about who’d I’d seen and what we’d discussed and what these people thought the issues were. That might’ve actually been of some value to him, to know what some of these academics thought about what some of these issues were.

Smith: It’s interesting because I get a sense from all the people I’ve talked to was a policy wonk. Long before the team caught on. And he was always looking, not only for talent, but clearly was also looking for ideas. And I wonder if in fact that this was part of that process.
Wallison: It could’ve been. It really could’ve been that the notion was to bring some more ideas into the campaign but, you know, with all the money that they had available, they could have gotten real academics instead of a kid right out of law school.

Smith: I take it money wasn’t that large of an object.

Wallison: Not that they paid me munificently, but I didn’t notice that there was ever a problem with money. I have to mention one more thing. How did this occur? And I think it was this, exactly in chronological order. After I’d done this campaign work, Wells invited me into his law firm. I worked for two years, really three, then I went down to the Nixon White House, The Ash Council. Then came back to the law firm and then Walter Thayer was asked about who could run this study of a Modern State in a Changing World and he apparently suggested me. I went to Wells and Wells said, “Yes, sure, that’d be great for you. Rockefeller’s a powerful man. He’s going to continue to be a powerful man. It’d be good for someone in our law firm to know him.” I remember this conversation very well. So I said, “Okay, I’ll be happy to sign on to help get this study started.” The idea is I would be a special assistant to the governor, but I’d work out of 22 West 55th Street, which was their office in New York.

Smith: When we said the ‘State’, are we talking about the state in the sense of the diminutive? One of 50 states or as opposed to--?

Wallison: Yes, good question, but not state in general. This was New York State.

Smith: Federalism, in effect.

Wallison: Yes, this is the Modern State, the Modern State, this is what a state like New York would do in a world that is changing. He loved ideas and he wanted to do this study.

Smith: He loved studies.

Wallison: He knew New York State would be paying for it as they were paying my salary and I was supposed to be running it. I mostly worked out of 22 West 55th Street.
Smith: People comment here’s a man with resources and taste and almost a persnickety need to have everything just so. And yet, the stories one hears about the work quarters at both 20 and 22 West 55th suggest almost a rabbit warren.

Wallison: Well, it was, but it was not that bad. I mean, we all had offices, small offices, and the place was cleaned every day and there were sufficient file cabinets and bookcases and things like that. It wasn’t as though papers were strewn around. And his own office was of very large size, very substantial. He had a desk and a big conference table. We used to meet around his conference table. In the back, he had a private office beyond that where he would go to take phone calls, so that the rest of us had no idea what he was talking about or with whom.

Smith: And then across the way was West 54th, the two houses—

Wallison: Yes, that was important. That was probably one of the two reasons he wanted to stay at 22 West 55th Street because behind it, on West 54th, was the original Rockefeller house in New York. And, that, he used as a dining room and that kind of thing. So I said I’d be interested. Rockefeller wanted to meet me, so I went to 22 West 55th, a car picked me up, a limousine, and we drove up, around, and came down 5th Avenue to where his apartment was. But when I got into Rockefeller’s I was a little surprised because there was Louie Lefkowitz, who was the New York attorney general. Again, you can’t imagine how impressed I was by this. I’m four years out of law school and this man was the most important lawyer in New York.

Smith: The people’s attorney.

Wallison: So I get into the car and Rockefeller gets in and he starts the conversation with me. We talked for a while, and I said to him, “You know, our families” - I don’t know why I said this, but this was true - “You know, our families have something in common.” And he says, “What is that?” And I said, “Well, my grandfather was the fumigator at Pocantico Hills,” which was true. And to me, that was always a wonderful example of what this country is really like, because my grandfather, of course, was not of the Eastern Establishment. Far from it, but he had this little trade, one of his many, many trades that he tried to earn a living as be a fumigator. He was the fumigator for Pocantico Hills.
Rockefeller got a big kick out of that. And I think it meant the same thing to him as it meant to me, because the fact that someone who had done this sort of menial work at Pocantico could now be, et cetera. And that was a wonderful thing about Rockefeller, he got what America was really about.

Smith: I’m told he was almost corny in his patriotism. I mean, really kind of old-fashioned, unabashed, almost sentimental love of country. And more than that, what the country represented.

Wallison: That’s right. Absolutely. That was one of the more attractive things about Nelson Rockefeller. So, in any event, he did hire me right after that. Then I went to work at 22 West 55th, and it was interesting. We started on this state-based program, but he then decided at some point that this was not going to work, that this whole idea of the Modern State in a Changing World was really not going to be sufficiently grand or cover sufficient territory, couldn’t probably figure out how to work in foreign policy, so he decided to resign as governor and enlarge the study. In order to run this study and he got Brooke Astor to contribute quite a lot of money to it and he threw in some money and a few other people threw in some money.

Smith: And that became the Commission on Critical Choices. Is that sort of a step up from the existing? It became, in fact, what he really wanted it to be.

Wallison: That’s right. Then he was able to bring in all kinds of really major heavyweight people to be on the Commission on Critical Choices. And through that, he met Gerald Ford in a way that he had never had an opportunity to meet him before. I think Ford was quite impressed with Rockefeller and what Rockefeller was doing with this project.

Smith: Did you have any sense that this was a springboard for another run?

Wallison: Sure. I mean, not that Rockefeller told me this, but I’m not so naïve as not to understand what he was doing, because he had and I think the Rockefeller Brothers Fund—
Smith: Oh, sure, the studies in the late 50’s.

Wallison: Had done studies, exactly. And they had catapulted him to some prominence and so I think he was thinking, “I’m going to be prepared to make a run and show what I have done, the ideas that I have developed here that are important for our nation’s future.”

Smith: There’s something that is in one way touching and in other ways extraordinarily naïve. He thought until the day he died, you know, the way to run for president is the best ideas, the best staff, the most innovative programs. At the very least, he was in the wrong party.

Wallison: I don’t agree with that.

Smith: Really?

Wallison: Of course not. Reagan is the premiere idea man. Reagan really had ideas. And he was in the right party.

Smith: I guess, okay, then—

Wallison: In fact, it’s now Reagan’s party.

Smith: Oh, absolutely. But to the extent that Rockefeller’s second commission was in any way an outgrowth of the first, there is this debate over the extent to which he “moved to the right.” Whether a lot of that was in fact the product of a pragmatist’s experience discovering the limits of power, of government alone - although, the drug program argues against that and the Energy Independence Corporation argues against that. How much of it was an attempt to chase the caboose of conservatism as it headed off to the Right?

Wallison: Well, you know, it wasn’t so clearly defined at that point. The fact is that, until Reagan, we didn’t really know what conservatism was. Conservatism meant something like a strong military and a balanced budget and maybe smaller government, but there wasn’t a tying it all together in an ideology or philosophy. And so Rockefeller probably attempted to make himself look more conservative in certain ways. He had to in order to overcome his liberal reputation as part of the Eastern Establishment.
Smith: There are cynics who believe there’s a connection with Attica. When I set out to do this book, you’re playing head games in terms of, “Okay, what are the subjects that people aren’t going to want to talk about?” And I assumed it would be the women. But what it is, is Attica. They don’t want to talk about Attica. The people who at least believe they were closest to him or fairly close to him find it hard to understand this man who was so inclined to put himself in the middle of events, to put his stamp upon events, why he was so reluctant to go to Attica?

Wallison: To go to Attica?

Smith: To go to Attica. I mean then there’s a whole story of how the thing was bungled and it’s all been conflated into the question of whether Nelson Rockefeller went to Attica or not. And you can debate what impact that might have had. The fact of the matter is the horse was out of the barn long before that became an issue. I’m no apologist, but the question remains what the motive behind it was.

Wallison: I can’t really speak to that. My recollection is that Attica did not turn out to be anything helpful to him unless you thought that what he had to project was an image of a toughness.

Smith: Yes.

Wallison: And so in that sense, maybe that was what he was trying to do. I mean, that’s the way one would look at it. But I always thought Attica was an interesting example of the way Rockefeller’s mind worked. He was willing to go some distance toward a compromise, but if he found the person on the other side still intransigent, he would switch over and then he would take some very radical step. I experienced that in working for him and maybe we’ll get to that when we get a little bit further along in the chronology. But when he was vice president, we had an episode like this. I saw it happen. He could’ve created a catastrophic situation for himself. Do you want me to cover that now?

Smith: Sure.
Wallison: We’re a little bit out of time, but this had to do with the Commission on CIA Activities Within the United States. Rockefeller was the Chairman and there were several major figures at the time on that commission, including Ronald Reagan. That was the first time I’d ever seen Ronald Reagan in action and I became a Reagan person watching that.

Smith: Really?

Wallison: Oh, yes.

Smith: You were impressed?

Wallison: Yes, compared to Rockefeller, yes. I was Rockefeller’s counsel at that time, when he was vice president - I was 34 years old at the time. The CIA’s activities in the United States had become an issue. The so-called Family Jewels had been revealed. Right after Watergate it was revealed that the CIA had been spying on the American people. Rockefeller was appointed Chairman of a commission that was supposed to look into this and there were several congressional hearings going on.

Smith: Was it also designed to some degree at least to head off or at least steal the thunder, say, from the Church Committee?

Wallison: Oh, I think so, yes. Look, that’s standard Washington procedure. I mean, if you can, you get a backfire going in order to see if you can outdo the publicity that those other people are doing and I think that worked. But Rockefeller got a very good group together, and Reagan was one of them. I’m not going to remember all the names. The president of the University of Virginia, the head of the AFLCIO. Doug Dillon from Dillon-Reed. These were really top-notch people. Oh, and Erwin Griswold, who was then I think he was Dean of Harvard Law School. And so, that was the group and they hired someone recommended by Ford named David Belin. David Belin had been on the Warren Commission. Ford was impressed with him and told Rockefeller, “He’s the guy you ought to hire to run this program.” Rockefeller did.

And for some reason, at some point, Rockefeller asked David Belin whether he was going to write a book. I think maybe he had written a book about the Warren Commission. And he asked Belin whether he was going to write a book about this and Belin said, “Yes, maybe I will.” And Rockefeller said, “Well, you can’t.” Belin said, “Sure, I can. Who are you to tell me I can’t?” That went back and forth. Rockefeller then went to the commission, and he told them it was a terrible idea if this guy was going to be sitting there the entire time and then write a book about what they were doing. They all agreed with him that that couldn’t happen. Rockefeller would press Belin and Belin got more and more intransigent. Pretty soon, he was no longer simply the chief of staff at the commission.

In his view, he was now a tribune for the American people. He just happened to be running this study but he’s actually doing this for the American people. So it got pretty bad at one point. The way we used to work, Rockefeller and I would go home every Friday to New York. Belin would go to Iowa where he lived. At some point, I walked into the office of Rockefeller’s chief of staff, when he was signing some letters and I said, “Well, I’m going to be going, governor.” We all called him ‘governor.’ We didn’t call him vice president. “Governor, I’m going to be going, so I’ll see you Monday” and he said, “Peter, I’m going to fire David Belin this weekend.” And I said, “You’re going to fire David Belin?” And he said, “Yes, I’ve just had enough of this. He won’t agree not to write a book and I don’t think anyone in this position should write a book, so I’m going to fire him.” And I said, “Well, wait a minute. Let’s stop for a second here, because there would be an enormous firestorm if you did that. If you tried to say that you’re muzzling this guy, then he will defend himself and say all the things he said about his being free to say whatever he wanted about what happens in this commission and so forth. It is going to be a disaster.” And he said, “Well, I’m going to do it because I just can’t take this kind of behavior.” So I said, “Well, give me the weekend to see if I can do something about this” and he agreed. “Okay, alright. We’ll talk again on Monday.”

And I don’t know what would’ve happened if I hadn’t walked into his office at that time, but fortunately, I called David Belin and I said, “Look, things have gotten really bad on this business with you and Rockefeller. Could you come in on Sunday?” And then I called Ford’s counsel, Phil Buchen and I said, “Phil we’ve got a terrible problem here. Belin...” and so forth, “I think this can be worked out but you have to be involved in this in some way.” So Phil said, “Sure, when can we meet?” And I said, “Well, can you come in early on Sunday and Belin will come in from Iowa and I’ll come down from New York and maybe we can talk this out.” We did; we worked it out. We suggested to Belin that he was actually counsel to the commission in addition to being executive director and as counsel he had certain responsibilities as a lawyer, there were certain privileges that his clients had with respect to what he could say. Lawyers are bound by this attorney-client privilege and he agreed that, “Well, okay, Yes, I am a lawyer and I do have to abide by attorney-client privilege and, yes, many of the things I’m going to be hearing are privileged, so I don’t think I can say it.”

Smith: So he was willing to be reasonable?

Wallison: He was willing to be reasonable. And so by Monday morning, we had an agreement. And that averted this problem, but I saw that Rockefeller’s judgment at that point was not of the best, because anyone would have seen, given what had happened during Watergate and how sensitive everyone was to government abuses of various kinds at that point, the idea of firing this guy would have been really catastrophic, I think, politically for Rockefeller and for Ford.

Smith: How did the Domestic Council work?

Wallison: It worked in different ways during different administrations as you might imagine, but once it was established under Nixon, the underlying theory was wrong, I think. The underlying theory is that you could have a Domestic Council that was the analogue of the National Security Council, so that you could have a staff that remained over administrations. When a new administration came in, normally, the files were empty, everything was gone. It was cleaned out. They had to start from scratch. Except in the Security Council. For the National Security Council, probably because politics ended at the water’s edge, you still had a professional staff that was there. You might have a new National Security Advisor, but you had a professional staff with an institutional memory and so forth.
Not so in the domestic area. And the underlying idea was, “Yes, we could have this professional staff in the domestic area.” It doesn’t work. It doesn’t work. In fact, politics would dictate that you can’t have people involved in your domestic policy discussions who are not ultimately loyal to you, completely loyal to you, because the stakes are just too high. And so it never worked, but it started out that way. The person who was head of the Domestic Council during the Nixon administration was John Ehrlichman.

Smith: Ehrlichman?

Wallison: Ehrlichman, that’s right. Ehrlichman became head of the Domestic Council. That’s right. And that was really a serious effort to develop a staff that had specialized skills and would be able to advise the President, take what came in from the cabinet and advise the President about what policies to adopt.

Smith: You mention a name that I just want to stop for a moment. Because you mentioned Rod Hills, he said he came on whenever he came on, about the time Phil Arelda had left following a dispute between him and the Vice President.

Wallison: Well, it wasn’t really a dispute. Here’s what happened. Rockefeller had been told that he would be the vicar of domestic policy, or at least he believed he had been told he would be the vicar of domestic policy. And the question is, when you have this domestic council, what does that really mean? There’s a chairman of the Domestic Council and that could possibly be the vice president. The members of the Domestic Council were all the cabinet members, so it wasn’t a crazy idea that the vice president would be the chairman. Or, you could be in some way much more involved rather than just a chairman, a non-executive chairman. You could actually be involved in the day-to-day development of the policy. Rumsfeld was the Chief of Staff. Rumsfeld was a very clever fellow. And he said, “Well, I can’t have this. I can’t have Nelson Rockefeller in charge of domestic policy and Kissinger in charge of foreign policy. What am I supposed to be doing? And what is the President supposed to be doing?”
And so, he somehow worked it out that he would give Rockefeller a choice. That is, Rockefeller could become the chairman of the Domestic Council or, if he became chairman of the Domestic Council, then Phil Arelda would become the Executive Director of the Domestic Council and he would have his hands directly in everything that was going on.

Smith: Was Arelda seen, correctly or not, as a Rumsfeld person?

Wallison: Oh, yes. Yes. And Rockefeller for some reason thought about that as though the real question was whether the person who was running the Domestic Council was loyal to him or not. You can’t blame him, because he’d always been the executive, right, so he thought the important thing is the staff guy. If the staff guy who’s in charge of it is loyal to me, then I’m in charge.

Smith: Someone to look over his shoulder.

Wallison: Whereas if I’m just the non-executive chairman, that’s a titular position. I don’t really have control of anything and Phil Arelda is going to be in charge. And so, the choice he made was for him to not become chairman of the Domestic Council and Jim Cannon, who was his man, would become Executive Director of the Domestic Council. And the President then became chairman of the Domestic Council. That was the titular role there.

Well, that was a disaster from Rockefeller’s point of view, because even though Jim Cannon was loyal to Rockefeller - Rockefeller’s closest aide without any doubt - when you’re in that position, you understand where your loyalties are going. Your loyalties are not still going to Nelson Rockefeller; they’re going to Gerald Ford. And Jim did exactly what anyone with any sense would do, or any patriotism or anything else, you have to work for the President. And so, Jim’s line of communication ran through Rumsfeld to the President. Rockefeller was outside looking in. So, although he thought he would have control over the Domestic Council, he lost all control over it.

Smith: That raises a question, a large question and maybe an unanswerable question, but a guy who had spent as much time in Washington as he had in different administrations, in different roles, who had demonstrated, particularly in his early days, exactly this kind of ability to read the signals and to see where the real power locus lay, and to cultivate the right patrons and to work the system. Was it simply that he’d been governor for 15 years and I won’t say it dulled his instincts, but it reprogrammed him in a sense that he brought that self-image into this situation?

Wallison: Yes, I think that’s probably the best hypothesis of all. I think he had been the emperor and he lost track of court politics. I mean, you forgot what court politics is like when you’re the emperor, naturally, because everything revolves around you. He never really got used to the idea that everything revolved around someone else in the Ford White House and that was Ford. So, I think that ultimately was the problem.

Smith: And then there is this huge cultural shift early on. Early in ’75, I guess, it’s announced. We talked to Jim about this, how he told the governor, it’s announced from the White House that there are not going to be any new programs until we get a handle on what we’re doing, budgetary reasons, so forth and so on, you know, for administrative of reasons. And Jim, I guess, flew up to New York and broke the news to the governor who had not heard about this before and who was literally scratching his head because where he came from, it’s not only a test of how you govern - the acid test of getting reelected is new programs, new ideas.

And he literally couldn’t grasp the rationale, the logic behind this. Plus the fact that he wasn’t consulted. And a couple of people have suggested to us that one of the generative factors in at least the timing of this was that the Vice President every week made it his practice to go to lunch with the President with a new idea. Usually with lots of enthusiasm and sometimes paperwork at the same time and that this was at least in part an attempt to send an unmistakable signal that that’s not the road we’re going to travel on this administration.

Wallison: Well, you know, I don’t remember that he went. I know he had lunch with the President every week, but I don’t remember that he had new policy ideas each time. The only new policy idea that I remember was the Energy Independence Authority, which he did get Ford to adopt as an idea.
Smith: There is a story, stop me if you’ve heard this, that this was debated more than once in cabinet meetings and Bill Simon was vociferous in his opposition and I guess somewhat cutting as he could be in some of the remarks he made. And the President indicated, well, that basically the debate was over and he was endorsing Nelson’s proposal. And Simon continued the debate in private and the President said, “Bill, you and I both know Congress is never going to adopt this, but I’m not going to embarrass Nelson.” Does that sound credible?

Wallison: Oh yes, absolutely. Absolutely credible. Rockefeller had done a tremendous amount of work on this and was very, very serious about it.

Smith: And the basic concept was?

Wallison: It was that the government would throw money into the business of developing alternative fuels. Guess what? It was very similar to what our current President is talking about, right? And I thought at the time it wasn’t such a good idea. I don’t think it’s a good idea now.

Smith: Because?

Wallison: Because the other fuels that we already have tend to be cheaper than the fuels that are developed through these artificial processes. What we’re going to do is gasify coal, liquefy coal, so that you could use liquid coal for powering cars. And things like gasified coal could be used for heating homes instead of natural gas. A lot of this stuff came out of the notion, and it was very common at the time that there were limits to natural resources. This was the global warming of that era, the climate change of that era.

Smith: And being the futurist that he is, this is far-sighted—

Wallison: Yes, that we’re soon going to exhaust the natural resources of the earth and so on. We’re never going to discover any new oil, and we’re not going to discover any more natural gas. So we really have to do something about this. Well, it turned out that wasn’t right. And as soon as oil was decontrolled, gas was decontrolled, we had so much of it prices plummeted.

Smith: Could it be argued that he was way ahead of his time?
Wallison: Well, you could argue it, but we still haven’t, maybe at some point in the future, we will come out of this, but if you’ve been reading the newspapers and listening to some of the news, you realize that now we’re going to have a lot of natural gas. They’ve discovered new ways to crack some of this shale that underlies almost all of the eastern United States and much of the western United States and much of Canada. And they can crack that with certain new techniques and produce so much methane, natural gas, that we have hundreds of years of natural gas even at increased use and much cheaper than we’ve had it before. So, yes, he might have been a thousand years ahead of his time, but what use is that?

Smith: I don’t think he would’ve been insulted if he had been told he was a thousand years ahead of his time.

Wallison: Probably not. Actually Carter did finally adopt the Energy Independence Authority. That did get passed, that got adopted by Congress under Carter, a Democratic Congress. No surprise there. Democrats, not only did they like the idea of limits to growth, but in addition, they liked the idea of spending money to create jobs. And Carter liked it because we had the oil embargo and that sort of thing, so we wanted to avoid, if possible, being held hostage to the Middle East. So, it was adopted. It started. Some plants were built, but they were producing this stuff at a cost that was more expensive, and no one wanted it. When Reagan came in and decontrolled everything, it was gone. Those things are probably abandoned right now. Maybe they’re used for shopping malls, but they’re not producing anything.

Smith: Was there an evolution in his relationship with the President, his attitude toward the President during those two years?

Wallison: I didn’t really see that. He always expressed loyalty in my presence to the President. He would sometimes criticize the President in the sense that, “Oh, poor Jerry, he’s not getting good advice from these people.” But that’s true of just about everybody. When I worked for Reagan, you certainly heard that. Every time Reagan made a decision that someone didn’t like it was that he was getting bad advice from somebody, but you had to let Reagan be Reagan.
Smith:  What was he like as a boss in those days?

Wallison:  Difficult. Very, very difficult in that he did not brook disagreement from his staff, in fact. I assume you have interviewed Dick Parsons.

Smith:  Right.

Wallison:  I hope you have interviewed him at length.

Smith:  Yes, I had a lunch discussion with him. I need to go back and do another one.

Wallison:  You should go back and interview Dick Parsons. Not only is he a fabulous guy, a great character and brilliant and perceptive, but Dick was my deputy when I was the Vice President’s counsel. Dick then went over to the Domestic Council as the counsel to the Domestic Council. Dick and I had a running joke and I forgot what we labeled it, but the idea was, if you told Rockefeller what he wanted to hear, he didn’t think you were of any use; and if you told him what he didn’t want to hear, he didn’t want to hear from you anymore. So, either way, you were out in the cold if you ever got into a situation where he actually asked you for straight from the shoulder advice. This guy was not Jack Wells - and if you watched all the people who circled around him, and I did, over many years.

Smith:  Hugh Morrow, for example.

Wallison:  Yes, those people hardly ever, I was not actually thinking specifically of Hugh, but that’s not bad, there was—

Smith:  Bill Ronan.

Wallison:  Bill Ronan, Oscar Reubhausen, and then the guy who was George—

Smith:  Hinman?

Wallison:  No, there was another George who had been head of the World Bank.

Smith:  George Woods?

Wallison:  George Woods.

Smith:  Yes.
Wallison: And I used to sit there in frustration because, you know, Rockefeller would be asking them for a decision on some issue and they would go all over the lot trying to avoid actually telling him what they thought, trying to send signals about what they thought, which Rockefeller, it seemed to me, didn’t seem to pick up. But he never seemed to get straight from the shoulder advice about a lot of things for that reason.

Smith: Do you think part of that, too, is 15 years as a governor of New York?

Wallison: Well, sure. I mean, there is a disease, a CEO’s disease, and that is, after awhile, you believe that your decisions, by and large, are the correct decisions. So you’ve already kind of got some idea of what you want to happen, and then when a person tells you exactly what you want to hear, well, that just reconfirms you in your position. In fact, the best executives are the ones who say, “I have my position. You don’t know what it is and I’m not going to tell you what it is, but I want you to tell me what your position is and why. And I promise you, if you articulate your position well and with reason, you will not be hurt if I don’t agree with you.” That’s the person who really gets good advice.

Smith: Was there a time at the beginning when he first took the job, when you were first down here together, when he sat either you or everyone down or when he sort of outlined how he saw the job and how he envisioned things unfolding?

Wallison: Yes, well, at the very start, we had meetings like that and especially around the question of who was going to head the Domestic Council.

Smith: Was that a defining chapter of his…?

Wallison: That was absolutely the defining chapter. The decision that was made to put Jim Cannon in as executive director, while Rockefeller would not be involved directly in the Domestic Council, was the decision that changed the whole relationship he had with the President and with domestic policy in this country. I’m quite sure of that. And I thought it was the wrong decision at the time, but that’s not how he saw it. And maybe, of course, if he’d made a different decision, Rumsfeld would’ve found another way to go around him if he had actually become Chairman of the Domestic Council. Well, then the Domestic Council might never meet, or a number of other things might happen and Areeda might be doing what Cannon was later doing, and Rockefeller would’ve been cut out anyway. But I think if he’d had a title of some kind, or convening authority, and messages would have to go through him to get to the President, things would have been different.

Smith: Did he vocalize his unhappiness with Rumsfeld?

Wallison: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. Oh, yes. Rumsfeld became an enemy and throughout the rest of the administration, even when Rumsfeld went over to the Defense Department. As late as the 1976 campaign, Rockefeller was complaining that we had high unemployment because Rumsfeld was not spending the money that the Defense Department was appropriated for the various defense things and that had caused the economy to be weaker than it needed to be. If he had taken that money and spent it on the things he was supposed to spend it on. The implication was Rumsfeld really didn’t want to see Ford elected.

Smith: Which again gets into this sort of quasi-paranoia on Nelson Rockefeller’s part.

Wallison: Yes, there was that.

Smith: Now, it’s interesting, I’ll tell you quickly a story Bill Seidman told me originally, and I didn’t bring it up per se with Rumsfeld, whose instincts are still very quick. He’s still got a very keen antenna about sensing danger. The story was of Rockefeller as the good soldier. When Reagan was about to take the lead in delegates, Rockefeller made sure that New York and Pennsylvania were in the President’s camp and that’s really what gave Ford the lead. And, according to Seidman, who got the story from Rockefeller, at one of their weekly luncheons, shortly before the convention, Rockefeller told the President he wanted one thing. And that was he didn’t want Rumsfeld at the convention in Kansas City. And that if Rumsfeld was at the convention, he, Rockefeller, could not vouch for the loyalty of the New York and Pennsylvania delegations. And as the story was told to Seidman, Rumsfeld chose to have some elective surgery done that weekend, missed the convention.
When we talked to Rumsfeld it’s as if some sixth sense kicked in, and he detected the story that’s out there somewhere. And so he on his own said, “Oh, another one of Nelson’s paranoid fantasies was…” and he proceeds to tell all this. And it turns out he did have elective surgery, he went to Kansas City. He was there the last day of the convention which was when the President wanted the whole Cabinet there. To me that’s a non-denial denial. But in any event, Rockefeller was utterly convinced that Rumsfeld had been responsible for his removal and for deep-sixing George Bush at the CIA, basically to clear the field in the hopes that lightening would strike and he would be on the ticket. He went to his grave convinced that Rumsfeld was responsible for that.

Wallison: Or that Rumsfeld wanted to see Ford defeated because then he would be the leading candidate or one of the leading candidates in the next election.

Smith: But I’ll tell you how far that went, I mean, you may already know this. There was a guy, Jack, I don’t remember his name, from Grand Rapids, kind of a two-bit local pol who was in the early phases, kind of the exploratory campaign, working on it for his friend Jerry. And he was killed in an auto accident. Rockefeller was convinced that he was murdered. I mean, it’s that level, you know what I mean?

Wallison: I saw that, sure.

Smith: Did you sense that?

Wallison: Yes, I saw it with Bill Colby, having to do with the “family jewels.” Bill Colby, you know, in Rockefeller’s view was a traitor to the country by disclosing this.

Smith: And what was Colby’s explanation or rationale for doing what he did?

Wallison: Oh, I can’t remember, but I think what he said was that this was something that had to be exposed at some point and couldn’t be kept under wraps anymore. We were in a different era and that kind of thing. But, you know, I think a lot of it had already been discovered by the journalist, Seymour Hirsch. And so probably I think Rockefeller actually thought that Colby had given it to Hirsch for whatever reason. I don’t know what he might have thought was the rationale for this, but he disliked Colby enormously. Thought he was disloyal to the country and so forth. And it was Rumsfeld and then Colby and you just hoped you weren’t third.

Smith: And I take it he really was a Cold Warrior. Stu Spencer said, “Of all the candidates, including Ronald Reagan, Nelson Rockefeller was the hardest line anti-communist of anyone.”

Wallison: Yes, I would think that’s right. He really was. And that was one of his good features as far as I was concerned. He really was a strong person on military matters and could not be moved on that.

Smith: When he was dumped, people always ask was he pushed or did he jump? And he was pushed.

Wallison: Oh, yes.

Smith: Did it come as a surprise?

Wallison: My impression is that it did. I don’t remember how I got that impression. I think maybe just talking with him afterward or having been in the room when he was talking to someone else about it. Or maybe it was just the fact that I was privy to enough of what was going on in his office that at that point late into 1976, that I would’ve heard if he had actually known this was going to happen. So I do think it was a surprise.

Smith: Did his mood change? I mean, in the remaining year, was there a difference?

Wallison: Yes, there was a big difference. Well, I lost track of him, really, because I went to the Dole campaign. I was the liaison between the Dole campaign and the White House staff and the Ford campaign. Right after the Republican convention, when Dole was nominated, he was looking for someone to be the liaison person. And I seemed like, I guess, the ideal candidate from his point of view because I was on Rockefeller’s staff, I wasn’t on the White House staff, but I knew everyone on the White House staff because I used to attend all of the senior staff meetings on behalf of Rockefeller. I was the guy who attended all the senior staff meetings in the morning, the 8 o’clock staff meeting that was, in fact, presided over by Ford. I was the person who represented Rockefeller on those things, so I knew all those guys.

Smith: That’s interesting, I didn’t know the President himself presided.

Wallison: Yes.

Smith: And how did he preside?

Wallison: He’d go around the room. It wasn’t like under Reagan. In the Reagan administration, Reagan ran the 8 o’clock staff meeting, the major staff meeting in the Reagan White House when I was there. What that focused on was the news of the day. I always thought that was a mistake because you’ve got off-message immediately. You started talking about what the Washington Post was saying, what the New York Times was saying. Ford didn’t do it that way. He would go around the room, “What is your objective for today?”, “What news do you have to tell me?” and so forth and we’d all sit around the table and if we had something to report, we say it to Ford.

Smith: It’s interesting, one story line of the Ford presidency - a guy who becomes President, in some ways has to outgrow his congressional training, has has to become an executive. It’s been said that, whatever other faults he had, Don Rumsfeld was a very effective coach in some ways about that. One of the poignant aspects is that Ford, I think, himself felt that in ’76 he had just about mastered the job and then he lost it. Did you see an evolution or a growth in the President?

Wallison: I can’t really say that from those contexts, which were just these morning meetings - those were the only ones where I really saw Ford in action - that I saw much change. I was impressed with Ford from the beginning. He was a very serious man and a person that took his job very seriously.

Smith: I assume you saw a dichotomy between some of the public image - you know, whether it was the kind of stumbling around, that as a euphemism for, “You know he’s not intellectually up to the job.”

Wallison: I never saw that. I saw a lot of very interesting issues debated among the senior staff and Ford was a participant in that and knew the facts. He was up on what the issues were and he raised a lot of the issues himself. I was impressed with Ford as an executive and as a president in a way that I’d never been as impressed by Rockefeller.

Smith: Really?

Wallison: Oh, Yes. Sure. Rockefeller did not have what you would call a critical intelligence. Rockefeller really didn’t know how to analyze a problem and go behind the first order description of it and go back and say, “Well, what if this fact changes or that fact changes?” and so forth. That’s just not the way his mind worked.

Smith: Was he a creature of enthusiasms?

Wallison: Yes, he was enthusiastic. He would’ve been a great salesman. He had that kind of marketing skill, marketing himself, marketing his ideas, but you couldn’t expect him to go back and see the weakness in the things he was talking about.

Smith: I’ve often thought it’s ironic that he’s remembered today for the Rockefeller drug laws. The fact is that was his third attempt to eliminate the scourge of drugs. I mean, the notion there’s no such thing as a problem that can’t be solved.

Wallison: Yes, he certainly believed that, and even though he couldn’t necessarily solve these problems, he could convene people who could solve problems, or at least get them together to talk about it, and out of that discussion would come something. But Nelson Rockefeller had very, very little idea about the basics.

This Commission on Critical Choices was an awful experience because he didn’t really understand how studies are done. When you do a study, you have to start with a hypothesis of some kind, a theory. What do you think the problem is? Let’s attack that problem. Rockefeller seemed to think that if you knew all the facts, the problem would present itself in some way as though you didn’t really have to have any theory. If all the facts were accumulated in front of you, then you’d know everything you had to know. There was no effort on his part to say, “We need relevant facts.” And how do you make facts relevant? You make facts relevant by saying, “Well, here’s my hypothesis about what has happened or what should happen. Let’s collect the facts that are relevant to that hypothesis.” He would not have a hypothesis. He wanted the facts to be prepared and then for some reason he thought if he just had the facts, he would eventually have a solution. You get a lot of smart people together, but it never worked.

Smith: It’s interesting that you put it that way. Because my sense is also there was never an ideology. I mean it’s one thing to say, “I’m a pragmatic problem-solver,” but there really was no framework that I can discern. I mean there were certainly, it was the cold war era, there were priorities. But again, the drug problem’s a classic example. I mean, he would swing from one extreme to another. “If this didn’t work, we’ll do the opposite.” And in some ways, someone who’d read part of my book in manuscript the other night said to me, “You know, he didn’t leave very much. He didn’t leave much behind.” And I thought about it and, you know, aside from buildings and legends and an example - for some people an example to avoid - he didn’t leave much behind in a philosophical way.

Wallison: Right, because he was very, very pragmatic. That was the phrase at the time.

Smith: I wonder to what extent the dyslexia was a factor. And the reason I mention that is because, clearly, he said to people, “The best way to read a book is to get the author to come in and tell you in 15 minutes.” I mean, he really was absolutely dead serious about this. And he said, “When we ran the reports, the special studies, people would digest the book and the author would come in and in 15 minutes tell you the essence of what the book was.” There is something frightening about that in terms of doing anything in-depth. I wonder whether that is part of this, unwillingness, perhaps an inability, to go deeply beneath the surface, in part because of the dyslexia?

Wallison: That would be my explanation because he was not a person who was deep. He was not deep. And I had a couple of experiences with him that were just amazing. One was, and this doesn’t necessarily talk about depth, but it talks about a guy who, for all his involvement in policy and in current events, seemed to have missed some pretty obvious things. At the time, there was real concern about a layer in the atmosphere, I’ve now forgotten the name of it, but it was being destroyed by hydro fluorocarbons.

Smith: The ozone?

Wallison: The ozone layer, that’s right. Guy Stever, who was the head of the National Science Foundation, came in one day to brief Rockefeller on this subject. Now, I happened to be Rockefeller’s one substantive person on his staff. I did all the substantive work that there was to be done on the Rockefeller staff and that says something about what involvement Rockefeller really had in policy issues.

Smith: Particularly given his reputation for attracting talent.

Wallison: Right. And so, I was invited to sit in on this meeting with Guy Stever and Stever was telling him about the scientific work that was going on and what the National Science Foundation was doing. They got onto the subject of chlorofluorocarbons and Guy Stever was telling him about how dangerous all these spray cans were. Then Stever left and Rockefeller says to me, “Peter, wait a minute.” I was leaving, too. He says, “Peter, wait a minute.” I said, “Yes, governor.” He said, “How do all those spray cans get up there?” And I thought at first he was making a joke and so I hesitated, not knowing whether to laugh or cry. And I said, “Well, governor, it’s not the cans, it’s the chemical in the cans that floats up there because it’s lighter than the air down below and it goes up and it has an effect on the ozone layer.” He said, “Oh, oh, okay.” Now, either his sense of humor was exceedingly subtle, so he played me on that and later on said, “You know what he said to me?” But I don’t think that was the case.

Smith: You know that answers itself.

Wallison: I don’t think that’s what happened. But another time and when he was still governor, in fact, we were talking about a policy matter and this was completely unbelievable to me. Someone came in and said, “Well, Governor, there are a number of trade-offs in this whole area.” Then the person left and he turned to the rest of us who were there and he said, “This guy kept talking about trade-offs. What are trade-offs?” I thought to myself, “Wow. Here he’s been involved in policy as governor of the state of New York for all these years. People must have used the word trade-offs before because that’s the essence of policy. One side or the other and you have to find a balance for the consequences of the things that you are doing. How could he not know what the person was talking about when he referred to trade-offs?” And yet, he didn’t appear to.

Smith: Yes, there were strange gaps. Ron Maiorana, who was a press secretary told me this story. One day, he came into the office and Rockefeller was furious, just furious. He had the New York Times. He said, “Do you know what he said about me? Can you believe he did this?” Well, it was Lindsay and the headline was Lindsay Chides Rockefeller. Rockefeller bought that chides was semi-obscene and he didn’t know what chides was. And you know some of it’s cultural. In the ’58 campaign he’d never heard of the term bar mitzvah or take-home pay. Well, that’s kind of almost endearing. You know, it’s a cocoon. But 15 years later, and you begin to say, okay dyslexia goes so far.” But then the other thing it raises and I don’t mean to keep beating this, but I wonder if other people in the office ever, did anyone say anything to lead you to believe that they thought - I use the euphemism he wasn’t aging well - but that he wasn’t what he had been?

Wallison: Well, you know, Richard, it could be that someone did say these things to you, but I just don’t remember anymore. And I don’t remember my having that impression at the time until the Republican convention. At the time of the Republican convention when he put on that terrible show, I thought to myself… Oh, oh, no. I guess that was the beginning. Afterward in the campaign it was really bad, especially that one day when he flipped the bird at all the protestors in an airplane hangar during a rally and then he denied that he had done it until someone produced a photograph. But I came back one day after being on the campaign trail for awhile, I came into his office to say ‘hello’ and he’s signing photographs of himself going like that (flipping the bird). And I said, “Wait a minute. You’re the Vice President of the United States.” Now, of course, the Vice President of the United States can do anything he wants, but in that period, in 1976, we were a little bit more starchy and that was not something that the vice president would do. And plus, he’s a Rockefeller.

Smith: At the convention, are you referring to the telephone incident?

Wallison: Yes.

Smith: Did he yank the telephone?

Wallison: Yes, he yanked the telephone away from the guy who was the head of the delegation or something like that. Tore down someone’s sign, someone was carrying an anti-Ford sign, maybe a Reagan guy or something like that. A sign was waved in his face and he grabbed it and pulled it off the stick. We were all sitting in the gallery. I and Susan Herter and Dick Allison and a couple of other people and we all looked at one another, “Oh, man, this is terrible. This is really terrible what he’s doing. He’s really acting out.”

Smith: I take there was no one to call that to his attention.

Wallison: Well, I wasn’t one.

Smith: Would Ann Whitman have done it, do you think?

Wallison: She might have. Susan Herter might have done it. Susan Herter was a very out-spoken woman. I’m a little surprised that she wouldn’t participate. Susan was an outspoken, tough bird and if you want to talk about “of Rockefeller’s class,” she was of Rockefeller’s class, and talked the way Rockefeller is accustomed to women talking. I mean she’d talk like this. She was definitely WASP upper-class and the wife of Christian Herter.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Happy?

Wallison: Oh, yes! Oh, yes, she was very nice to me. She was a lovely woman, and I liked her quite a lot, but we were not in any sense friends. But whenever she saw me, she was very effusive and remembered my name and so forth.

Smith: There’s still uncertainty as to whether she really didn’t like politics. She was obviously very devoted to the kids, I mean, that always came first. And he said himself that he’d made his mistakes with his first family and a number of people said he was much more attentive to the boys than he had been to his first family and all of that.

You had a whole year, in effect, when you knew he wasn’t going to be there after January ’77. Did he talk at all about the future?

Wallison: If he did, I don’t remember at this point whether he talked to me about it or whether in general he passed some remarks. I just don’t remember at this point. Memories do fade. Mine may be faster than others.

Smith: Oh sure.

What was it like to be the liaison of the Dole campaign after the Democrat wars?

Wallison: Oh, that was an amazing experience. Bob Dole is an amazing character himself and we will not probably see his like again, as they say. But fantastic sense of humor, some fantastic timing, but not a morning person. Now, if we had a 24-hour news cycle as we do now, then things wouldn’t have been so bad, but at that time, all the stories in the evening were made in the morning. And Dole was a bear in the morning. And if the news people could possibly throw a question at him and get him to answer, it was a catastrophic answer, because he was always bitter and angry in the morning. And so he played right to type. The narrative about Dole, he was a hatchet man. You’re not doing anything on Dole, here.

Smith: No, but we’ve done a Dole oral history project.

Wallison: Really?

Smith: Because I ran the Dole Institute for a couple of years, put it together.

Wallison: Oh, that’s right.

Smith: So I always am looking for stories.

Wallison: Well, I have a story about “Democrat wars,” because I accompanied him everywhere and we used to go living room meetings with twelve Republicans in someone’s living room in Minnesota. And he would talk and he would mention Democrat wars. And no one said a word. And I thought, “That’s really bad. I mean, he can’t really be saying this publicly.” And so, the night of the debate, I was in charge of briefing him for the debate. And I didn’t brief him on everything, but I brought in a lot of people like Alan Greenspan and other people to brief him on the things he had to know about the economy and so forth. But there were certain things that I knew that I had to talk to him about as he was being made-up. And I had a long list of things. The campaign wants you to say this, but you shouldn’t say that. He’s listening to me. He doesn’t take advice very easily.

Smith: He’s not easily handled.

Wallison: Not easily handled. I had a long list and he wasn’t reacting particularly well. I came to Democrat wars and I thought to myself, “No, I won’t say this because he’ll never say this in the debate. Naw.” So I skipped over it and I went on to some other things and then, of course, that was the thing that he said.

Smith: Sunday C-SPAN will be airing one of our Dole interviews, they’ll be airing the interview I did with Walter Mondale. And I said to Mondale, “You must have been standing there saying, ‘Oh, thank you, Lord’.” And he laughed, and he said, “Well, you know, Bob had an off night.” He said, “You know, we pols aren’t very bright. We’ve got a few applause lines and if they work, we reuse them.” And he said, “Bob used that line out there and it got applause.” He also said, in his preparation for that night, someone brought up the likelihood that Bob Dole would use that and Mondale said, “Oh, he’d never say that.” He said the same thing. You and Walter Mondale had the exact same reaction.

Wallison: That is fascinating.

Smith: Complete the circle thirty years later.

Wallison: That is fascinating.

Smith: Isn’t it something?

Wallison: Yes. Amazing.
Smith: Was there blowback at all? With the Ford Polish gaff, I mean, clearly we can document that went on for a week because he was so stubborn and wouldn’t concede that he’d screwed up.

Wallison: Uhm, Yes, there was a lot of blowback in the press about that and I think it put us on the defensive for a long time. I mean, Mondale’s response, if it was off the cuff and hadn’t thought about it, was great.

Smith: It was.

Wallison: And Dole really recognized that he shouldn’t have said it. He recognized it was a big mistake to say it. But the Dole campaign was great fun even so. I mean, even though, we travelled.

Smith: Ad hoc?

Wallison: Yes, a lot of it was. And you know we stayed in the worst possible places and we went to the worst possible places.

Smith: There’s a famous story that one day, supposedly, he pointed his finger to somewhere on the map and said, “Let’s go there.” I mean, it was that level of improvisation.

Wallison: It might have been. I don’t know but it was fun because he was so funny. And even the travelling press liked to be with him because he was always funny and kept them amused. And in fact, at one point, he would be giving speeches and there was a certain joke that he would tell every once in awhile and the press loved that. The press would be standing in front of the podium in the little pen that they’d set up for the press and they’d say, “Tell them the bear story! Tell them the bear story!” It was a very funny joke, but he told it in a way that everyone broke up whenever he told it, even though we’d heard him tell it 25 times. It was about a bear that goes into a bar and he puts a five dollar bill down on the bar. And the bartender says, “What can I do for you?” And the bear says, “Give me a beer.” And the bartender says, “I don’t know.” He goes in the back and he talks to the proprietor and he says, “You know, a bear just came into the bar, sat down on the stool, put a five dollar bill there, and said, ‘Give me a beer’ What should I do?” The proprietor says, “Give him his beer.” So he gives him the beer, takes the five dollar bill and the bear’s sitting there nursing the beer. Finally the bartender can’t resist anymore. He says, “You know, we don’t get many bears in here.” And the bear says, “I don’t wonder why at $5 a bottle.” Now, when I tell the story, no one will fall on the floor, but the press would just break up and, of course, the audience who’d heard it for the first time would break up. He had a way of telling a joke unlike anyone I’ve ever seen.

Smith: I’ve always thought that behind that very dry, sometimes sardonic wit is a very healthy sense of the ridiculous.

Wallison: Oh, Yes. Absolutely.

Smith: And if you don’t have that in this town, you know…

Wallison: He’s very smart, a very smart guy. And he saw the ironies of life but he couldn’t really control his anger; there was an element in him that was very bitter because of some of the things that happened to him. But he was smart enough to see all of the ironies and all of the posturings and everything else. But unfortunately he had that one problem that he couldn’t restrain himself. And if he could’ve done that, he could’ve been a really great pol, he might have been elected President.

Smith: Time, in many ways for both Dole and President Ford, time was good to them. I mean, Dole went on to become the face of the WWII generation and a kind of national grandfather. In a curious sort of way, people voted for Clinton but they admired Dole more.

Wallison: Yes, I think that’s right.

Smith: And Ford lived long enough to see people come around to his way of thinking on the pardon. When the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles in Courage award, he said, “You know, for 25 years, everywhere I go people ask the same questions. Since then, they don’t ask the questions anymore.” So, you know, he had that. Rockefeller didn’t have that satisfaction in his last years.

Wallison: Well, I’ve always thought that Rockefeller never quite got it. He got that, in order to be president, you have to sacrifice. He was not prepared to sacrifice.
And anyone else who really wanted to be president would not have divorced his first wife. Nowadays you can divorce three wives and be elected president, but Rockefeller thought that he could—

Smith: Happy says, when I interviewed her, she said, “You know, I don’t know how much Nelson really wanted to be president, because every time he got close,” as she put it, “he would go do something stupid like marrying me.”

Wallison: It was an amazing thing. I mean, he wanted it, but he wanted it on his own terms.

Smith: That’s the title of my book - On His Own Terms.

Wallison: Really?

Smith: Yes, because it does capture - whether it was art, women, life, death - I think he thought he could take death on his own terms. The last part of the story is more poignant and less sordid than it seems, because I really thought he thought he could control that, too. It’s a sad story in a lot of ways.

Wallison: Oh, Yes, definitely a sad story about this man.

Smith: Did you see him at all after he left the vice presidency?

Wallison: I don’t think so.

Smith: He really did kind of pull up the drawbridge.

Wallison: Well, I mean, I’m sure he saw others. I was just not one of them. I went back to New York. I was practicing law. In fact, I was living in Washington for a year or two. Then I went back to New York and practiced law in New York so, even though he was there, I’d lost touch with him. I don’t remember that there were any reunions or things like that, although I did keep in touch with some people like Jim Cannon and others. This also came up while he was vice president, this business of on his own terms because we were talking before about Rockefeller being interested in ideas, in policy and so forth.

Now, the traditional role of the vice president is to go out and eat the rubber chicken and whipped potatoes and endear himself to county chairmen - raise funds for them, praise them, keep in touch and send them letters and so forth. Rockefeller would hardly ever do that. He wanted to stay in Washington and have some involvement, whatever that involvement was, in the policy-making in Washington. So, of course, when Reagan started to be a threat to Ford, hardly anyone in the party knew anything about Rockefeller, who he was or what his real views were - what they had in mind was the old Rockefeller.

Smith: Yes, what they remembered from ’64.

Wallison: Right, the guy who just showed up a year before the election with a lot of money and thought he was entitled to get the nomination. He didn’t really help them. He didn’t really show the party how interested he was, and I thought that was always part of the same problem. That is, he thought he could do it on his terms and it didn’t work.

Smith: Did he have enough to keep him busy?

Wallison: I don’t think so. Maybe that’s why he was engaged in a dalliance, as they used to call it. But I don’t think he, I couldn’t imagine what he was doing.

Smith: That art reproduction business, I mean, it was really kind of make-work. He put a lot of money into it. He was in hock to his trust 14 million dollars. So he decided he would write a memoir. So he sat down with Hugh Morrow and he did 1200 pages of oral history which I have. He had very harsh things to say about Eisenhower, for example. And some of them are off the wall.

Wallison: Really?

Smith: Yes. Of course, FDR was his great hero. George Hinman said to Ann Whitman, when they had this discussion about does he really want to be president, Hinman had an interesting take. He said, “It isn’t that he doesn’t think he’s more qualified than Richard Nixon or Jack Kennedy or Hubert Humphrey, but he was raised by FDR. To him, FDR is a model of what the presidency is and Hinman believed that that, among other things, contributed to this on again, off again. It’s one reason why in some ways his legacy is so thin.
Wallison: Well, a lot of talent there, a lot of political talent, but not the full package, as they say. He just didn’t have the full package to be president. And actually I had concluded that he would not be a good president at all, because he had a dangerous quality of being able to convene people, but then not to fully understand what they were saying and what consequences of it would be. And so, he could’ve made a mess out of things.

Smith: Last thing. How do you think, thinking about Gerald Ford historically, how do you think he should be remembered?

Wallison: Ford, in many ways, had the qualities that I so admired in Ronald Reagan without the ideological stuff that I also liked. I am a Reagan person. But Ford had this Midwestern solidity, honesty, straightforwardness, at least as far as I could see, very little ego. Reagan was the same way. And I was just reading something, someone quoted Lincoln as having exactly the same kind of view of himself that Reagan and Ford had. “You know, I’m just an ordinary guy.” I favor, in Reagan’s case, he’d say, “Yes, they say I’m a great communicator but that’s because I communicate great things, it’s not me. It’s the ideas.” And Ford had much of that. I always thought that, this is a little bit of an aside, but Edmund Morris, who was Reagan’s biographer, so to speak, the guy who had the unique opportunity to watch a president operate, never could figure out Ronald Reagan. He couldn’t figure Ronald Reagan because Ronald Reagan was brought up in an era where you didn’t talk about yourself. I heard one about George H.W. Bush that his mother told him, “Not the great I am, you don’t talk about yourself.” I’m sure that was the case.

Smith: Edmund’s a friend, but I’ve often thought Edmund is also a romantic. He’s a great romantic and that’s why he and TR - particularly the first volume. Now the second volume - it’s a very different book because Edmund’s really not very interested in government.

Wallison: Right. Exactly. He’s interested in personality. And TR was perfect because of that.

Smith: And I think he, being a romantic, convinced himself early on that Ronald Reagan was somehow TR’s lineal descendent. And he was bound to be disappointed given Edmund’s almost Henry Jamesian literary approach. That’s not Ronald Reagan. But the notion that Reagan is unfathomable or so distant, I mean, it’s—Wallison: It was right on the surface and that is Reagan. Reagan was politics or policy. Reagan was policy and philosophy and that’s what he thought about himself. That’s why he was special because he, from his point of view, had been imbued with wonderful ideas, great ideas for this country. Just like Lincoln didn’t think of himself as a great man but just an ordinary man.

Smith: And both came almost as an instrument of forces larger than themselves.

Wallison: That’s right. And I thought Ford was of that kind. So I’d put Ford with Reagan and with Lincoln, but not with Nixon, not with Clinton and certainly not with the current person.

Smith: I think that’s a perfect note on which to end.

Smith: First of all, obviously, we’d be interested in knowing about your life before you crossed paths with Gerald Ford. What happens before this story begins?

Jones: Well, in many ways, I was just like Gerald Ford – a Midwestern boy. I lived on a farm in Indiana. Used to milk cows by hand and drove the tractor, and I was a farm-son. When I was on the farm I wanted to be a broadcaster, and I wanted to be a newsman.

Smith: This would be roughly when?

Smith: Was it Murrow who inspired this?

Jones: I don’t know what inspired it. Suddenly I had this desire to do it. The fascinating thing is that, at Fairmont High School, Fairmont, Indiana, a little town of 2,500 people. Just a word on that later – but I had senior cords. All the seniors wore yellow cords – that was a big thing when you were a senior. And then you had them painted with cartoons and names of people and so forth. And I remember taking my yellow cords to the artist up in Marion, which is ten miles away, and telling her that I wanted a leg a trombone player, because I’d been in the high school band playing trombone. And on the other, I wanted a broadcaster. Now I remembered telling her and I wore those yellow cords throughout my senior year. You seldom got them dry cleaned because they might fade. But many years later, after I had ended up at CBS, I still had them, and I took them off the hanger one day and looked. And this broadcaster is standing at the old-time microphone, and on the microphone it says CBS. But anyway, I think being from the Midwest really did help me understand and appreciate President Ford much more. All these Midwesterners tend to stick together.

Smith: And there is a bit of a cultural condescension toward the Midwest, isn’t there?
Jones: Oh yes, and we all have the little – I have the Hoosier twang, and Gerald Ford had all these little things where he used to talk about gar-an-teeing instead of guaranteeing.

Smith: And judg-a-ment.

Jones: And judg-a-ment. And I must say that I have a lot of the same, so I never really it found it too funny to make fun of him. But, anyway, I had that background and I did some years in local television in Terra Haute, Indiana, and then I went on to WCCO in Minneapolis-St. Paul, which was the best CBS affiliate at the time. And I ended up at CBS because I was at WCCO.

Smith: Now that wouldn’t have been, by any chance, the sort of stand in for the Mary Tyler Moore affiliate in Minneapolis?

Jones: Well, I think that part of the history of that TV market, not necessarily WCCO, but the whole market, was a very energized news market and it was so because it was a major-league state. It was major-league – we had a football team – the Vikings – and we had the Minnesota Twins baseball, and we had two major-league politicians, by the name of Hubert Humphrey and Eugene McCarthy. That’s where I really did get accustomed and used to, and enjoy politics – because they were so involved. I said, I really want to do that. But anyway, I ended up at CBS because I was at WCCO.

Smith: And when did you come to the network?

Jones: In 1969. April of 1969. I was one of Cronkite’s kids. CBS was the name of the game – sorry NBC and ABC. That’s where you wanted to be.

Smith: Was it still the house that Murrow built, or had Cronkite made it his own?

Jones: No, I never worked with – I had met Murrow – but he was legend, and Walter moved right in. The transition was seamless. It was where news was done. And not made. And that’s where the networks have all gotten into trouble, because they have become news makers.

Smith: That’s interesting, because one of the criticisms that modern news people make of that generation is that it was supposedly too Washington-centric.
Remember the amount of time – I bet if you went back and looked at the old Cronkite broadcasts – the amount of time that devoted – and NBC with Brinkley was the same way – the amount of time that was devoted to what was happening on the Capitol Hill. Process. Less celebrity journalism and more political journalism, if you will.

Jones: And shorter pieces. Keep in mind, the newscasts started out, at least Huntley-Brinkley at ABC, and Douglas Edwards, started out as fifteen minutes. And so they didn’t have time for a lot of long things. Plus, back then, journalism was all about – much like newswires AP and UPI, and that’s pretty much where we got our news from. It was developed from there, but the first go would be from a wire story. And at CBS, Walter, being an old wire service reporter, he loved process and was not ashamed at all of it. Other correspondents and producers in New York ridiculed him a lot for that, and made fun of the broadcast – “Oh, my God, another Washington piece – another political piece.” But, back then, politics, political stories and government stories got on because Walter Cronkite thought they were important. And in the generations that have passed since then, it’s a superficiality of the producer - who cares about the process – we just want – what’s the bottom line? As a result, they’ve destroyed it.

Smith: I remember the first time I was doing PBS for the convention was in 2000 and I used to gripe that, at that point, the networks were being overly influenced by cable. And now, it’s the internet that in many ways is defining the standards, which is an oxymoron when you are dealing with the internet. Networks have abandoned coverage to cable. But even where they are still covering it, they’ve got an eye over their shoulder at what cable is doing, and to some degree, the web.

Jones: The networks of today, and I’m speaking broadly, there are some exceptions, but they are conceding news to everybody – to the internet, to the local, whatever. And they don’t care anymore. It is all about the bottom line and never in the history of this country, have we needed experienced journalism like we do now. And they are not there because they have either been worn down and left on their own, or they were making too much money and they were put out to pasture by the networks.

Smith: And also it was a water cooler nation. The fact is that what Cronkite covered one night, people talked about the next morning around the water cooler. That’s really gone. What gets people talking – a celebrity divorce – it’s a much more ephemeral, superficial, in many ways, celebrity journalism - if that’s not an oxymoron.

Jones: No. It’s cable. Cable ought to be the most wonderful thing that’s ever happened to this country. They’ve got time. They’ve got twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. And, again, I’m making a generality here, but what did they do with that 24/7? They don’t cover the news, they talk about the news. And they’ll pay the Lou Dobbs and Bill O’Reilly these enormous amounts of money – but that’s still cheaper than putting together a staff big enough to uncover the news.

Smith: Now there are two things, because I remember at one point during the convention coverage, Judy Woodruff made a very shrewd observation. I’m sure other people have said it, but it’s the first time I’ve heard it said quite this way because it goes to the heart of what’s happened, particularly to the conventions. “Cable needs a new narrative every twenty-four hours.” The dirty little secret is there is not enough news to fill a 24/7 news cycle, but you need a new narrative. You get the story line and you get a new twist which you can debate endlessly until the next twist comes along. Black hats, white hats, it’s much more about opinion than it is about journalism.

Jones: Exactly, and that new narrative, that new lead for the next half hour is determined by some kid just out of journalism school, who is cheap and has no experience, and they hype like you wouldn’t believe. And as a result, I think the major networks have gone a long way to destroy news and their credibility. But right there are the cables, too. And people are not stupid. They’re watching this stuff and they have determined that it’s sort of irrelevant.

Smith: It’s showbiz.
Jones: And they are live and there is not much credibility, and that their lives are swirling around and they have to prioritize. It used to be when they were cutting that pie three ways with ABC, CBS, and NBC. Those days it was appointment television. The evening newscasts were an appointment. You planned your day, and I planned my day, so I would be there to watch the evening news. Why? Because I learned that if I wasn’t [there], I might miss something. The water cooler – that I wouldn’t be able to talk to somebody at the water cooler the next day. Well, once the networks started softening their news with some producers saying, “Well, you know we’ve got to get rid of process stories and politics and government, and all of this, and we’ve got to put more human interest…” Once it started doing that, well, the consumer, the viewer, detected that and said, “Well, after five minutes, why am I watching this? I don’t need it.” And now they don’t need it, and they are not there. It’s really tragic.

Smith: Here’s a segway…because there was never on the planet, a more assiduous newspaper reader than Gerald Ford. As long as he was traveling he had a half dozen newspapers – that was a ritual – that’s how the day began. You didn’t bother him until he was done with his newspapers. How did your paths first cross?

Jones: Well, I had gone to the Washington bureau from Vietnam and Hong Kong. I had been gone for a year in Hong Kong and I was assigned to the legendary Washington news bureau. We had twenty-seven correspondents there.

Smith: Was there jockeying for the post-Cronkite era?

Jones: Oh, yeah, sure. Roger Mudd and Dan Rather. And that was in the Washington area. Of course back then Bob Shieffer thought that he should have been considered, too. He was sort of disappointed at the time that he wasn’t. But he got the last laugh.

Smith: Yes, he did.

Jones: But, anyway, in New York you had Mike Wallace and Harry Reasoner, and these big guns who also thought that they ought to replace Walter. And Walter had to fight all these people all the time. Other names in Washington were David Schumacher, who really thought that he…anyway, there were a long list of people who said, “I’m the next Walter Cronkite.” And he hung around and he hung around.

Smith: And would have liked to hang around longer?

Jones: He got pushed out. And the real irony of all of this is that he was eased out to make room for Dan Rather. Roone Arledge at ABC had decided he was hiring as many people at CBS as he could. Even at one point, in one of my contract cycles, I was wooed by Roone to go to replace Sam Donaldson at the White House. So it was a big deal. Roone offered Dan the contract – not to anchor their evening news, but as a sort of roving correspondent. Well, CBS panicked and they had their audience research people go out and they determined from that, that they could afford to lose Roger Mudd. No big deal, but they couldn’t afford to lose Dan Rather.

That’s when they made the decision and that’s when they went to Walter and said would you please retire and step aside and we’ll still use you. Walter did it reluctantly. But he also did it because he had been assured that he would continue to be a force on the CBS Evening News. That didn’t work out because, for some reason, Dan thought that the change should be made, the transition should occur, and that Walter hanging around would be nothing but trouble. And once Walter wasn’t used, that’s when he started to get his bitterness over CBS.

But, the tragedy here, again Walter, as part of his enticement to leave, they put him on the CBS board of directors. And he had a big say. When Larry Tisch bought managing control of CBS and did the first slaughter of the CBS news budget, I contend, never could prove that, but I contend that, had Dan Rather and Walter Cronkite gotten along – had Dan treated Walter better, and had they been allies, Larry Tisch would have never been able to pull off that gutting of the CBS News.

Smith: And you stop to think, for Paley – I think there must be nothing worse than to outlive your creation. I mean, here he is convincing himself that Larry Tisch is his white knight and living long enough to see the consequences of that.
Jones: Of course, he was weary. Paley was weary at that point between Jessie Helms and Ted Turner who were trying to…Jessie Helms was running around Washington saying, “I’m going to become Dan Rather’s boss.” So, the whole thing had to be tragic for Paley. These people who replaced him, every one of them hadn’t even been close to the class act that Bill Paley was. And some of them have very specifically done everything they could, to destroy the reputation and name of Bill Paley.

Smith: You don’t hear CBS referred to as the Tiffany Network these days.

Jones: No. It’s somewhere in here (referring to bookshelf) is, “Who killed CBS?” has got a book. But that’s a complicated answer and it would take more than one volume to do that. On the other hand, you can sort of cut to the bottom on who killed CBS. Larry Tisch – I’m sorry, he’s gone now – but he should have been, when he was alive, he should have been taken to Times Square and publicly executed on the CBS Morning News.

Smith: Which Mr. Paley would have seen.

Jones: Yes.

Smith: When you were in the Washington bureau, where were you assigned, initially?

Jones: In 1972 I was assigned from Hong Kong to the Washington bureau. And I came as a general assignment reporter. I was at the bottom of the heap. Bill Small was the legendary bureau chief at the time, always made sure that he reminded young upstarts like me of where I stood in that bureau, that I was behind the likes of Eric Sevareid and all these people. And so I did general assignment. One day I was called in by the bureau chief and he said, “We, at CBS, are going to take over the television part of Watergate. We’re going to be the television version of the Washington Post. I want you to immerse yourself and I want you to know everything you can about Watergate.”

Smith: Was that something that presumably would have originated with Cronkite at that point, as the managing editor of evening broadcast?
Jones: Oh yes, absolutely. Bill Small and Walter Cronkite were very, very close. Just parenthetically, Katherine Graham, when she was alive, every speech that she would do after Watergate was over, she talked about how CBS had saved the Washington Post, because, at one point, they were, the Washington Post, was under heavy, heavy heat. And we had Deep Throat and Katherine Graham and Ben Bradlee – they were dancing around – they were shaky on it, but they stuck with it. But when the CBS Evening News with Walter Cronkite and the entire Washington bureau of twenty-seven correspondents, resources, started weighing in every night, it became more of a legitimate story. And in journalism, you always say, you want to be ahead, you want the scoop. And that’s great, but within an hour or two, you’d better hope that somebody is there or you start to get nervous.

Smith: In some ways it’s almost a parallel between the famous story of LBJ saying, “Well, if I’ve lost Walter Cronkite on Vietnam, I’ve lost the country.”

Jones: Yeah. So, anyway, I was assigned to do Watergate. And I arrived in Washington in December, right after Richard Nixon had been re-elected in November of ’72. So this thing was really popping and I spent most of my time at the Federal Court Building – for months, doing that. One day I got a call from the bureau chief to come in and he says, “You know, we really like your work, and we want to see more of you on TV and we want to see more of you on Saturday. Every day, as well as Saturday. So I’m going to change your days. You’re going to be working on Saturday.” Well, I came from Indiana, the heartland, and where I had been taught that if you ever amounted to anything, you had Saturday and Sunday off. And Bill Small says, “How do you feel about that? Changing your days off and you’ll work on Saturday. You’ll have Sunday and Monday off.” And I said, “Well, I really don’t care much about it.” And he said, “Well, what makes you think I care if you care?” I said, “Well, when you put it that way, to start.” So, I said, “Okay.” And that was on a Friday morning, and on Friday night there was a prime time speech by Richard Nixon announcing his choice to be his new vice presidential designate, Gerald R. Ford, replacing Agnew who had gone out in flames.
Smith: Let me interrupt for one second, because we did an interview with Jerry Jones, who was Al Haig’s deputy, who told us something striking. At that point he was, at Haldeman’s behest, reorganizing the personnel office. This is before Haldeman and Ehrlichman leave, so it’s going to be no later than April of ’73. He gets a call from Haldeman, who wants to know how many people report to the vice president, and Jerry does some figuring and he comes up with a number of about fifty. Haldeman says, “Fine. I want letters of resignation from all of them.” Meaning, before Haldeman left, he knew Agnew would be facing some problems significant enough to warrant replacing his entire staff. Now, I’d never heard that before, that’s in April of ’73. What I’m asking is: the Wall Street Journal story in August of ’73 is when the world heard about Agnew’s problem. Had you picked up anything beforehand?

Jones: No. I had not. I mean, I was so focused on the Watergate part of it, and I didn’t get involved in that. The only area where I got into the Agnew story was that I worked in Minnesota for a while, at WCCO, and while there, I became friends with Dick Moe who was Mondale’s chief of staff. Back then, Mondale was attorney general. So now it’s Senator Mondale, one day I get a call from Dick Moe. He says, “Are you aware that they are plea bargaining with Agnew?” And I said, “No.” He said, “Well, long story short: I have a friend who was just at the Justice Department meeting somebody on some business, and this guy was sharing an office with another attorney. And he heard this conversation. The other guy was saying on the phone, ‘There’s no way. Absolutely not.’ And the other attorney said to Moe’s friend, ‘You know what that’s about?’ ‘No.’ ‘Well, that was Henry Peterson of the Justice Department and he was talking to Agnew’s people. He said they are trying to plea bargain.’”

Smith: So what do you do with a tip like that?

Jones: What do I do? I was new in town. I had one very good source, but I couldn’t get the second or third source, and back then you had to have those. It doesn’t happen too much anymore. So I went to the bureau chief and told him what I had and he called in Fred Graham, who was our legal correspondent, and said, “Tell Fred what you have.” So I told him and Fred worked on it for two days, three days, never could get anything. And then finally on Saturday the Washington Post hit the street, big front page story: Agnew Plea Bargains. So, anyway, that’s as close as I got to the Agnew thing.

But anyway, I’m doing my first Saturday duty with my change of shift for CBS news. And Friday they just announced that Jerry Ford, and I am told, your first assignment for Saturday is go do a day in the life of the new vice president designate. So I showed up like at five-thirty, six o’clock in Alexandria, and stood out there and waited for something to happen with Jerry Ford. And that’s when I first met him. I traveled with him for the next ten months, spent more time with him than I did my own family, and then when he became president, I moved to the White House.

Smith: That period is fascinating. In some ways it’s the dark side of the moon. It’s the part of the story that I think has escaped detection until now. Because, clearly, there was a strategy which was to stay out of town as much as possible – to stay on the road as much as possible. It beggars belief to think that, in the course of those ten months, he, or those around him, did not seriously contemplate the prospect of his becoming president – something that he could never publicly acknowledge, and something that I sensed to the end of his life, he really tended to minimize. But there must have been conversations, off the record, about how this thing was evolving.

Laird says by the spring of ’74 he was talking to Ford about the kinds of people he should have in his cabinet, and taking for granted that this would, in fact, come to pass.

Jones: But, did Laird say that he, Ford, was engaging in this back and forth conversation? See, this is the thing about Gerald Ford. He set the tone. And he had never planned on being president – never dreamed of it. All he wanted to do was to be Speaker of the House. That was his golden light. And then, all of a sudden this thing happened, and all of the intellectual folks, the historians sit back and journalists, and say, how could he not be thinking about that? He might have been thinking about it, but he didn’t focus. He was not focused on it because his job was to be a good vice president and he liked Dick Nixon. So I don’t think there anything where he was being disingenuous.

I think he honestly did not think it would happen, as it started out. As it progressed and these people started coming to him, I think he probably had to think a little bit more about it. But I don’t think he thought about it. I think a whole lot of the political junkies, and in some ways Ford was a political junkie, and in some ways he wasn’t. Compared to Mel Laird, he’s a novice. And I think – remind me to talk about this later – but as I look back Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney, and everybody says, “How did they turn out the way they turned out?” And to those of us who were covering the Ford White House, we loved Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney. Well, we respected Rumsfeld and we loved Cheney. We all were saying, how could this happen? Well, I think I have a reason for this.

What happened was, they were different people inside that Ford White House, and they were different people because Gerald R. Ford set the tone, and he was a nice guy who believed that democracy was based on compromise. He’d fight like crazy, and the end of the day he was ready to shake Tip O’Neill’s hand or any Democrat and say, “Okay, it was a good fight. I lost.” And get back the next day. Jerry Ford, when he became president, he said, “This is the kind of relationship I want with the Hill and with Democrats.” If he didn’t say, by God, they knew – Rummy and Dick Cheney knew that if they were going to work for Jerry Ford, he’d better not get a call from some Democrat about them running roughshod over. So they had to play that way.

So then, Rumsfeld goes off and into the private sector – Searle Drug, and he’s very successful, and his basic instincts, even when he was at the White House is, to be a bully. He is a bully management guy. And so he has success.

Then Cheney, he leaves after Ford has left, and he’s on the Hill for a while. He’s from Wyoming and those conservative instincts begin to come out, because that’s his constituency. But still, even on the Hill, a guy, a Republican who worked with the Democrat, but he always wanted to be as successful as Rumsfeld. Wanted to make as much money as Rumsfeld. Cheney once told me, “Rummy has made more money than God.” So then, he goes off and has his big success at Halliburton. And he’s changed – he’s a different guy.

This is what’s happened. Both of these guys were kept in line by Gerald R. Ford, who said, “By gosh, we’re going to get along.” His favorite line always was, “We can disagree without being disagreeable.” And they knew they’d better toe the line. And once he was not there to snap the whip, they reverted to their tendencies. And that’s why. That’s it. And George W. Bush was not Gerald R. Ford.

I don’t know – I went off on something here.

Smith: That’s an important part of the story.

Did you have fun times on the vice presidential plane?

Jones: Fantastic. They called it the slingshot airline. It was a twin engine prop plane, and that’s all the Nixon White House would give him.

Smith: Everyone knows he wasn’t Nixon’s first choice. He wasn’t Nixon’s second choice. There is a story, and I’ve come across it in the Rockefeller research, that supposedly he tells Rockefeller (they are in the Oval Office, Nixon and Rockefeller), and he says, “Can you imagine Jerry Ford sitting in that chair?” Nixon believed, and it tells you volumes about how out of touch Nixon was, Nixon looked at Ford as insurance against his impeachment; whereas in fact, it was exactly the opposite. Did you ever get a sense of Nixon’s attitude toward Ford at that point?

Jones: No. I think everybody had the same attitude on Ford. He was viewed by politicians on the Hill, by Nixon, by Hugh Scott, by all these people, that Ford was a nice guy, but not really smart, too smart, and would sort of do anything that you wanted him to do. And he did do a lot of that stuff. And I think there was a lot of ridicule of him. As Lyndon said, he played football without a helmet too much – which is sort of interesting. Your question – did he feel that?

Smith: Yeah, did he sense that on the part of his own nominal allies?
Jones: You know what? I don’t think he focused on it. It didn’t register with him because his ambitions were somewhat limited. Now you say, he wanted to be Speaker of the House, that’s a pretty big ambition. But he was a celebrity, he’d been a celebrity – all-American football player, and married this beautiful woman who was a dancer, and he was a handsome guy. He was just having fun doing what he…

Smith: And, of course, remember he had already promised Mrs. Ford they were going to go home at the beginning of ’77, so the vice presidency is sort of this unexpected capstone to a career. He realized he was never going to be Speaker, and I’m sure it made perfect sense.

Jones: But I think other people talked about Jerry Ford, worried about him and were more preoccupied with how smart he was or how stupid he was, or whatever, more than he did.

Smith: Over and over, you hear people talk about how comfortable he was in his own skin, which certainly set him apart from Nixon - and probably most recent presidents.

Jones: Yeah, and he was a guy who believed, as I said before, Jerry Ford believed that democracy was the art of compromise. And in the end you had to come together. Oh, he was fiercely partisan on lots of things.

Smith: Did you hear him express regret or not for the whole Douglas impeachment business?

Jones: No.

Smith: One sensed that was a sore subject.

Jones: The only thing I ever heard Jerry Ford express a sense of regret was basically dropping Nelson Rockefeller as his vice president. He told me after he had left the White House. He said, “I am really sad about that. It was a huge mistake, and I have thought about that and wish that I could do it over many times.” Once he became president, he really wanted to stay president.
Smith: There is a sense, too – he said something to the effect that – just as he had learned to do the job was when he lost it.

Jones: Yeah.

Smith: The transition from the Hill to the Oval Office is a big one, and not everyone is Barak Obama. Just as he felt that he kind of mastered the job, he lost it.

Jones: After he had lost the election to Jimmy Carter, as you remember, he had lost his voice in that whirlwind eleven day tour, where he almost pulled it off. I mean, he literally grabbed all of his campaign staff and his White House aides and he said, “Come on, let’s leave Washington. We’re going to go out and win this thing.” And he almost pulled it off, but he lost his voice, couldn’t speak. Betty had to give his concession speech, and after he was able to speak, he’d walk around the White House and he’d say, “I lost to a peanut farmer. A peanut farmer.” He could never, ever get over that. It was, in many ways, sad, because I thought that he was a good president. And I don’t know anyone else who could have done as good a job as he did in healing the country.

At the time of his death, I went back and looked at some of the news conferences and things that he had right when he became president, and he was good. The press, we all portrayed him, I guess, I’m not guilty of that, but he was portrayed as this bumbling, fumbling, inarticulate guy. I looked at his first press conference and he stood up there – he’s six three, six four, stands with great stature, and he spoke of budgets and things like that with great authority. He knew them. That’s what everybody said, well, he was an accidental president. Yeah, he was in a way – but in many ways, the most prepared president that the country has ever had. For years and years he slogged through those budgets that came up there, and intelligence matters, and whatever. He knew what he was talking about and he was just as good as – as I looked at that news conference – and it wasn’t a time for humor during that period – but he was just as good on the facts as the great John Kennedy, or anyone.

Smith: You know, it is interesting you mentioned the press conference. Because it was the triggering event – the first press conference on the 28th of August, and I think you can accuse him of a certain naiveté. There was a quality, some people said Boy Scout-ish, but he went into that press conference really believing, three weeks after Nixon left, that reporters would want to talk about Cyprus and Turkey and inflation – and of course the only thing they wanted to talk about was Nixon. And he left that press conference angry. Angry at himself as much as at the press corps. And they, as much as anything – who knows when and whether the pardon would have come – but I think he, at least said that that news conference as much as anything else triggered the schedule.

Jones: Absolutely. He told me that. There was no question. He was mad as he could be after that because all the questions were on Nixon. That’s when he went to the office and started the whole process. And he was right. And we have found out just how right he was. Back at the time I was shocked and upset with what he had done, but we found out he was right. Even the Kennedys, the Profiles in Courage [Award], recognized him. Ted Kennedy went to the ceremony.

Smith: Transformed his life. Ford said, after that ceremony, he said, “For twenty years, everywhere I’ve gone, they’ve asked that question. You know what? They don’t ask the question anymore.”

Jones: Exactly.

Smith: The Kennedys, in effect, made it ‘okay’ to move on.

Jones: Now, let me tell you something – what I think is more concrete on why he’s been vindicated. I think we found with President Clinton’s impeachment and trial, exactly what happened to this country and to a president when he is impeached and is then tried. With Nixon we had the luxury of him resigning. With Bill Clinton we had a guy who said, “Well, let’s just go out and win.” No shame, hung in there, [he] should have done what Nixon did, but didn’t. And we went through, the whole country, went through a trial.

Again, you can’t prove this, but I have always wondered if we would have had 9/11, because during that second term, and during that trial, Bill Clinton was totally preoccupied with saving his presidency, and he was not taking care of things. And we find out that he was, in some of these national security meetings, he would stay up all night and he’d read these books and he was coming down with these off the wall, out of the box, thoughts about Bin Laden, and had he been able to totally focus on that and not worried about saving his presidency, I wonder if it would have happened.

Smith: We know for a fact that now, because people around him have said, he had actually hoped with the mandate that he had from ’96, to use ’98, because he wanted desperately to be a great president, or a near-great president anyway. Short of a war, he was prepared to spend some of his capital to go after entitlements. Which if he’d done it, and brought his party along with him, would have ratcheted him up that much higher in terms of historians, and their assessment of his consequence as a president. And that whole thing disappeared.

Jones: Yeah, I think he would have done it because, look, there was welfare reform. He did get welfare reform. That’s not anything that his liberal Democrats had any interest in. They were mad at him over the whole thing. He had the talent, Clinton had the talent to take on Social Security, welfare reform, entitlements, you name it. He had the smarts, and the gift to have pushed these things through, but he got involved in this and he didn’t have the guts, the sense to resign so he decided to take this country into a trial. We think that we’re so resilient in this country, or we used to before the current crisis, but back then…I don’t think we can ever go through the impeachment trial of a president of the United States.

Smith: That’s fascinating. The Ford aspect of this, and I’ve never really talked about this, but you may remember, it was before the House voted impeachment – it was in October of ’98, a month before the off term elections, and of course, Republicans were – there was hubris on both sides. Ford – I wrote it with him – we wrote an Op-ed that appeared in the Sunday New York Times, which the impeachment managers were furious about, because they thought it pulled the rug out from under them. Gerald Ford proposed a unique punishment for a unique offense. And it wasn’t a censure.
The President of the United States would appear in the well of the House, wouldn’t speak, would accept a formal public rebuke from an unanimous vote of the…and it would be televised and it would be dignified. And when it was over the country could go back to its business and people would have been assured that their elected representatives had risen to the occasion. And he took hell, as you can imagine, from his fellow Republicans.

Now, the White House, at that point, thought this was manna from heaven. And they were actually seriously considering this – until, of course, come the midterm elections. And the Republicans of the House Committee weren’t going to consider it. Then come the midterm elections, and guess what? The shoe’s on the other foot. Lindsey Graham, I know for a fact, said, “Well, maybe we should dust off Jerry Ford’s idea,” and by that time, of course, the Clinton White House had no incentive to do so.

Jones: Now, as I understand, President Ford had a telephone conversation with Bill Clinton, with President Clinton, and that Bill Clinton told him, “I can’t do that.” And it was at that point that ex-President Ford said, “Well, good luck.”

Smith: My understanding is, you are absolutely right, but part of the problem was that Hillary was in the room. So it was just…but anyway, but he gave him all these reasons why he couldn’t do it. Ford said, “Bill, let me tell you something. I spent twenty-five years up there, and in my experience they can do pretty much anything they want.” But at that point Clinton was feeling his oats because he had come through this and everything was political. And, of course, the great irony is – again, it illustrates these two sides – right after the piece appeared, he got a six page, single-spaced, rant from Tom DeLay, outlining all the reasons why this idea wouldn’t fly. He was echoing everything Bill Clinton said, only from the other side of the political spectrum, and basically lecturing Ford on all the Constitutional impossibilities of this proposal. Two weeks later he got another letter from Tom DeLay, wanting his help in getting into some golf club in Rancho Mirage. Neither letter was answered, which is very unusual for President Ford.

Jones: President Ford’s retirement, yes, he got very wealthy. There was some controversy about whether or not he should have done the things he did to make that money, but I went to visit him constantly because my daughter lives out there and every time I was in California, I’d go over to Rancho Mirage and say hi.

Every time I visited him, it was sort of sad in so many ways because he was such a party man and he believed in Republicanism. He believed in compromise and he believe in treating the Democrats with respect. He watched his party shoot itself in the foot time after time after time. And nobody cared. Which sort of leads me to one observation about the Ford presidency; I watched Ford over his retirement and felt sort of sad about what he must be going through, because he was a guy who believed in Washington, who believed in the political process, who believed in fighting for your partisan way, but believed in compromise in the end. And there he was, sitting out in California…

Smith: And he believed in government, in governing.

Jones: Believed in government, and not big government, but he believed in governing, as you said. And he believed that government had a role. And every time I’d go see him, there was something – Republicans in Congress had just shot themselves in the foot on something else. They were so partisan, and so anti-his motto, “Can’t we disagree without being disagreeable?” And it had to be a real downer for him. But I’ve always said of the Ford presidency, it is the forgotten presidency. And I say that because all the historians, or most of the historians, every time they write, every time they talk on the talk shows or whatever, they jump from Richard Nixon to Jimmy Carter, as though Ford never existed. I thought, at least in his death, that that would change. And it has a little bit, but not really. It will always be the forgotten presidency.

Smith: And I would modify it slightly – they go up to the pardon, and then they skip to Jimmy Carter. The first month - but that’s all Nixon. They see Ford as a coda, Ford’s an add-on, an accidental coda to the Nixon presidency. One of the points I tried to make in the eulogy was, if you step back far enough, you realize that Richard Nixon is the last New Deal president. Because he’s the last president accommodating himself to the Roosevelt consensus. Whatever you think of economic deregulation, it began under Ford. Block grants to the states – there are a whole host of initiatives. And then you stop to think of the talents that Ford recruited. Again, it goes to being comfortable in his own skin – to surround himself with people who were sort of militantly bright, extravagantly sometimes egotistical, and he was perfectly comfortable. And he seemed to be particularly comfortable having people argue things in front of him.

Jones: But did he – I don’t recall any ideologues surrounding him.

Smith: No. And in fact, people who were ideologues, like a Bill Simon, toned it down.

Jones: They knew they had to. And you know as I was saying with Rumsfeld and Cheney. Their tendencies were sort of to be bullies and ideologues, but that wasn’t going to hunt with Jerry Ford.

Smith: Just to finish the vice presidential period…I see the picture of the…

Jones: Well, the travel group with Vice President Ford was interesting. There were maybe half a dozen of us. And he had two or three aides with him. The travel group included the three networks. I was for CBS, Ron Nessen was for NBC, and Bill Zimmerman was a correspondent for ABC. One of Ford’s very favorite reporters, ever, was Maggie Hunter of the New York Times, a southern gal. She covered Congress when he was there, and then when he became vice president, she was out covering him. He loved her, and David Kennerly, and Bob Leonard from the Voice of America. So those were the hard core, every trip. It was this slingshot airline and it was part of the presidential fleet. We would get on first, and then the vice president and his staff would come on. Well, they had to pass us to get back to the vice president’s cabin in the back. It was always banter back and forth and we might have done something that he would needle us about, but it was fun.

Smith: He liked reporters, didn’t he?

Jones: I argue that Gerald R. Ford was the last president who really liked reporters.
I’m not sure about Obama yet. He seems to have some of these tendencies, but certainly up to Obama, Jerry Ford was proud to say that some of his best friends were reporters. And he enjoyed having fun with us – poking at us – we felt comfortable poking with him. And I, as a journalist, as a correspondent, always when I worked was very careful to try to put this little distance between the politician and me. I must say that I was never afraid to say publicly that I liked Gerald Ford, and he was my friend. I didn’t worry about some Democrats coming along and saying, “Well, you’re in the tank.” But I could do that – and he was a rarity – the only other politician that got close to that, that I felt that comfort zone with, was Howard Baker, Senator Howard Baker, when he was Majority Leader. But as president, I knew that I could do any story that I had to do. If I were out at some dinner or social event, which I didn’t do a lot, but what I did, I didn’t worry about, because I knew the next day if I had to do a story critical of him, he’d understand because he understood journalists.

Smith: Did he ever go after you on a story?

Jones: Me? No. Would he needle me about something with a smile? Yeah. But ironically, the other person who had that same personality is Ted Kennedy. Now, all the people around Kennedy, all the staff – oh, God, are they sensitive – and a lot of the people around Ford were sensitive, but as far as him being sensitive, no. He knew I had a job to do. I’ve also argued that Jerry Ford was probably the most open vice president/president I have ever known. Without at doubt.

The reason I say that is that, when I started covering him right after he was selected, designated, he went back to Michigan – Grand Rapids for a trip. And while there we were the only crew with him, the CBS crew, and I’m ashamed to tell this story, but I’ll tell it anyway. He had a dental appointment and I asked him if I could bring the crew along. And he says, “Sure, Phil, no problem. Bring them along.” And so we went to his dental appointment with him and we’re in there, and the dentist starts working on him and he’s got him back like this, and he’s got his mouth open like this, and there is this CBS camera shooting into his mouth, and I’m saying, “Oh, my gosh.” Never made the air, but I don’t know any politician who would ever allow something like that. He was open – literally – to us and that’s what got him in a lot of trouble, too, i.e., his skiing. Probably the best president skier in the history of the country, and he was so comfortable with himself, he would say to the camera crews out in Vail, “Come on. Come on along.” And he’d go, and all skiers fall from time to time.

Smith: And he had the bad knees which were…I don’t think it was well-known at the time. That contributed to the image.

Jones: Yeah, they were tricky, tricky knees and they would go out and so forth. As Ron Nessen, his press secretary made the argument once, he’s the most athletic president in history, and I think he was. He had his golf balls that would hit spectators and things like that, but they could have put up a curtain and said no, no cameras. But he said, “No. Come on.”

When he became vice president, his first Christmas, he went to Vail with the family and they had a condo in Vail, and again, I was the only crew there with him. I really got to know him a lot during this period, and he didn’t have his press secretary with him. I said, “Look, can we bring the crew by on Christmas Eve and shoot pictures?” – because they opened their family gifts. He said, “Sure, sure.” And we went there and shot everything – them having all their gifts. It was great.

I got all sorts of kudos from CBS. This is from Gordon Manning, who was a vice president at CBS News at that time, says, “That was mighty nice going on your part and the part of your crew with Vice President Ford and family in Colorado over the Christmas weekend. The scoops you produced one after the other, greatly enriched our holiday broadcast. We are most grateful for your enterprise for these exclusives.”

And, guess what? I got a letter from Gerald R. Ford on vice presidential stationary and he says, “Dear Phil, a belated thank you note to let you know how much I appreciated the way you and your camera crew handled your assignment in Vail. I particularly appreciated your thoughtfulness in allowing the Ford family so much to enjoy our vacation in privacy. But a lot of people have said they saw it and they liked it a lot.”

Smith: You can’t imagine the Nixons doing that.
Jones: No.

Smith: Or any other president, for that matter.

Jones: And there is also the famous picture of me chasing President Ford.

Smith: Tell me - because that’s a critical moment surrounding the fall of Saigon. You’d been in Vietnam, so you presumably had some strong feelings about what was going on. And let me preface it with something that Mel Laird said yesterday, which I understand - as kind of the architect of Vietnamization – where Laird is coming from. But Laird has never forgiven Ford and the Congress for, in effect, pulling the plug. As if, given the political mood…

Jones: As if Ford could have made a difference.

Smith: Exactly. Yeah. At that point…

Jones: Let me tell you the genesis of this picture. 1975 – Saigon is falling. The Ford White House is shut down. No comment. Ford is really upset because going through his mind is: here I am, presiding over the United States of America losing its first war – and there was nothing he could do. His hands were tied. And the press secretary would say nothing, nobody would have any comment. So he leaves town, he always did that a lot to get away from it. In crisis, he’d leave town, which is what he did during the whole vice presidential thing – stay away from Nixon.

But he leaves town and goes to California on an energy trip, because keep in mind, we were in deep trouble on energy at that point – oil. And he goes to the Bakersfield, California airport, and then he gets off of Air Force One and gets on Marine One, and goes out to an offshore drilling rig. The press corps has left, the pool went along, but the rest of us are left at the Bakersfield airport. I told my crew, “Give me a wireless microphone, and I’m going to go over and stand in line with all the other people who are out there to wave at him,” and all this. “Because my bet is that he is going to come off of that and come directly and walk the proverbial rope line.” So, I’m all set up. I’m in line just like everybody else, but there are no ropes. Security was different back then.
And so he gets off Marine One and goes immediately to the crowd. And there he is, going right down. And he finally gets to me and he says, “Phil, what are you doing here.” And I said, “Well, Mr. President, I wanted to ask you about Vietnam.” And he says, “Ohhh nooo, you don’t,” and he takes off running for Air Force One, which is probably a hundred feet away. And as he takes off running, he looks at me and he says, “Come on!” So we take off and that picture shows my camera, my soundman, you don’t see the camera man because he’s taking the pictures. You see Helen Thomas and the pool that had gone with him – they’re all running, and the Secret Service agents – and we’re all running. It looks like we’re having great fun, all smiles. It was a disastrous thing on television because all the way, I’m asking him questions about the fall of Saigon and he’s not answering. And he looks, on television, like a Vietnamese refugee, running like crazy. Finally he gets to the point where I respectfully stop, and that’s how that whole picture started.

As you look at it now, in these days – that was back in the days before Sam Donaldson yelled at Ronald Reagan – I took after him and he allowed it. It shows the dramatic difference between two presidents. You had Richard Nixon who had used the Secret Service to cut off the White House press corps. Used them as a political tool, really. And you couldn’t get close to Richard Nixon. The pool couldn’t even get that close. So he used the Secret Service, and the Secret Service knew that that was their mission to keep the press away. To a new president just in, and they know that he likes the press, he likes reporters, and so when he said, “Come on!” they were running with us. You couldn’t anymore do that today.

Smith: And it also illustrates – for lack of a better word – naïveté about how this would look on television.

Jones: Never thought about it.

Smith: It would be terrible.

Jones: And the White House got a lot of letters over that. Why was he running, and so forth and so on. But, you know, to all the handlers of future presidents, yeah, it looked bad, but you know what? It also made him look human. It will make your boss look human. It’s not half as bad as just, “No comment.”

Smith: I thought this week when the president went up to speak to Congress and someone called to do an interview and I said, “I’ll tell you one thing you won’t hear tonight. You won’t hear the president get up and say, as Gerald Ford uniquely did in 1975, ‘The state of the Union is bad.’” Which was, again, politically boneheaded, except, in retrospect, it seems amazingly honest and authentic. And today we would appreciate it in theory, I’m not sure we would, even now, welcome hearing it.

Jones: The interesting thing about Ford and his speeches, of course, the greatest speech he ever gave was, “Our long national nightmare is over.” “The state of the economy is bad.” But these speeches were all done by Bob Hartmann, the late Robert Hartmann, who was a former LA Times newspaper guy.

Smith: And I take it, a rather polarizing figure.

Jones: He could be. He was very protective of Jerry.

Smith: Possessive?

Jones: No more than any presidential aide. They all have those tendencies - that I find. But Hartmann was a newspaper guy who believed in candor. And there was a great struggle over – Hartmann wrote the line “Our long national nightmare is over.” Ford didn’t want to deliver it. He told me this in the final interview, I did with him before the obituary interview. He told about this whole thing. And he said, “I just thought that President Nixon had gone through enough, and I didn’t want to say it. And Bob Hartmann pounded his fist on the table and said, ‘President Ford, you’ve got to say it, because that’s the way the country is feeling right now.’” And so Jerry Ford talked to Betty and they decided, okay, to deliver and he said, “Am I glad I did it. I’m really glad I did it.”

Smith: Tell me about Jerry terHorst, and that brief period that he was press secretary.

Jones: It came and went. He arrived and was three weeks or so, and I think we, in the White House press corps, all liked him. He was a fellow scribe with the Detroit Press, and he was comfortable with Ford because he had covered Congressman Ford from Grand Rapids. And Jerry was a good personality, so we all liked him. I think those of us in television were a bit frustrated because he knew nothing about television, and the needs of television. So we were going through an education program at the time.

Smith: There has been an argument over the years, a debate – I don’t mean to be critical, but you hear this – there is a school of thought that says, yes, indeed, he was deeply offended by the pardon and the fact that he wasn’t taken into Ford’s confidence. But, at the same time, he also felt that the job was overwhelming, and that this was the perfect way out.

Jones: You know, I’ve never talked to Jerry about that, but I think this is absolutely possible. Keep in mind that Ford’s vice presidential press secretary, Paul Miltich, who had been with Ford when he was in the Congress and when he was Minority Leader, and all that. And Paul was an old press guy and he did not have the tools to deal with a presidential press corps. So he was sort of pushed aside – a little bit rough – he was made communications director, I think at the time. Promoted up. And that’s when they brought in terHorst, and I think that probably Bob Hartmann, who was an old LA Times reporter and had been a colleague of Detroit Press Jerry terHorst – that’s how the name that came. He was a friend, and that’s how that happened. But Jerry terHorst would not have lasted, and did he use this as an excuse to cut his losses? I don’t know. It’s possible – I don’t know.

Smith: Was it a mistake for the White House press secretary to go on Saturday Night Live?

Jones: Yes. You are talking about Ron Nessen?

Smith: Yeah.

Jones: I think Ron was not ready to take the job. He was a network correspondent and he was a bit of a showman. He liked to be in the headlines. So I think that much of what happened was caused by that, by his wanting to be…

Smith: Sure.
Jones: Look, I don’t have any problem with Ron as a person, but I said at the time that he was press secretary, I said, “I think that Ron Nessen, like many press secretaries before him - and he will not be the last - Ron Nessen found it more glamorous to be a senior aide to the president than do the grubby day-to-day press secretary. And that’s the fine. You look at the good press secretaries and they all have managed this. Marlin Fitzwater for Bush, but there are lots of those who have come and gone with a lot of fanfare. They had the same problem: it’s about me.

Smith: Were you with or around the president during the two assassination attempts?

Jones: Yes. In Sacramento I was, oh, about nine-ten feet from him, following right as he was headed to the state capitol. I saw this scruffy looking woman, whom I didn’t recognize at the time – later turned out to be Squeaky Fromme of the Manson clan – I saw her there. And I saw the Secret Service adviser, Larry Buendorf go after her, and I saw her go down. I think I was the first one on the air. I had heard no shots, and rushed off with him as they had her down. As a matter of fact, before I ever knew her name, I ran back to the hotel, which was just off the capitol grounds to the press room and filed a bulletin that there had been an attempted assassination on the president. But I didn’t know her name at the time.

Smith: And the extraordinary thing is, he goes on with his visit to Governor Brown and never mentions what happened outside.

Jones: Exactly. And talks about crime.

Jones: And then in San Francisco, I was outside the hotel when those shots rang out. Having gone through the Sacramento thing, why, it was spooky.

Smith: You ask yourself, of all the people in the world who you wouldn’t think of as an assassination targets, Gerald Ford tops the list.

Jones: I know.

Smith: Two in a month.
Jones: Then he had his presidential motorcade accident, so there were lots of little things.

Smith: Did you know at the time, and/or others know at the time, about Mrs. Ford’s problems, however defined?

Jones: As they say in Washington: “with specificity?” No. I was aware that there was something wrong because, starting in Vail, his first trip out as vice president designate, and we did our Christmas Eve thing there, she was always late. At that particular event, it was half over before she ever appeared. So I knew there was something, and my conclusion was that it was alcohol. Didn’t know about the pills and it was a combination of things. But, you know, after he became president, I got a call one day in the White House press room and it was Mrs. Ford’s secretary and she asked if I would please come up and see Mrs. Ford. I said, “Sure.” So I was cleared and went up in the residence. I’d been in the residence in the White House, and she was looking for suggestions on a press secretary for herself. She had interviewed and was about to hire Sheila Weidenfeld, who became her press secretary. And I spent, oh I’d say a half hour. Had a coke and talked and it was…I didn’t sense any huge problems there.

Smith: Did he feel guilt about all those years when he was away?

Jones: Yeah. He felt guilt, and you could see at times when she was late, or they would be late, his jaw would…

Smith: Because he was such a pro. He was on time, it was almost military precision.

Jones: But he was loyal to her and there was love. Always was. He was a handsome guy, but we’ve all heard stories about the carousing around of other presidents, but I’ve never heard anything.

Smith: There is that wonderful story, I’d heard it before, but I think it’s in Tom DeFrank’s book, of the time of the Frank Gifford affair. They were good friends, and the Fords called the Giffords to let them know they were praying for them. And someone happened to be in talking with the president, who had been in the White House and who made the observation, that of all the people this person had ever worked for in Washington, Gerald Ford was the only one who would remain faithful to his marital vows. And the president had a wonderful response, because Ford could surprise you. He said, “Well, you know, you have to stop and think. If something like that happens there are nine bad things that could happen and one good thing. And the one good thing you can get taken care of at home.” Which is pretty wise, if you stop and think about it.

Jones: Well, it was a love story, on both their parts. It was sad on Mrs. Ford’s part, though, because there were so many years there that could have been better.

Smith: Then the breast cancer surgery came along and it’s hard to try to make people today understand why it was such a big deal. It’s hard for people to believe that there was time when women didn’t discuss that openly. And the impact that that must have had upon the country.

Jones: Oh, the lives that that saved – who knows? That was history-breaking. And they dealt with it in a public way. For the most part, I never found them afraid to deal with the issues, be they personal or public in the White House – except the one. That was the pills and the addiction. But in the end they handled that spectacularly.

Smith: Yeah. Remember, your network had the Sixty Minutes interview, and I go back and I look at that interview and I tell people, Hillary Clinton could not have said, when she was in the White House, what Betty Ford said in ’74 or ’75, whenever it was. But the fascinating thing was what it tells you about her mindset…

Jones: You’re talking about her daughter, Susan?

Smith: Talking about the daughter, talking about marijuana, talking about abortion. Pretty extraordinary stuff. And the fact that it was a Cub Scout den mother from Grand Rapids who was saying this. I’d love to hear your sense of this: my sense is that the initial, the good grey political types of the White House gasped, and thought, oh my God, what has she done? And they hadn’t calculated how the world was changing around them. And particularly post-Vietnam and Watergate, people found her candor refreshing. In many ways, she actually advanced the Ford agenda of openness and restoring trust to the White House, just by being herself.

Jones: And you know what? She was an extension of him in that neither one of them ever planned, wanted to be, in the White House. That’s what made them different. All the other first ladies and presidents – they were all calculated, and they had changed their lives over the years to get there. And the Fords had not.

Smith: And the kids – we now know that they weren’t quite as vanilla as maybe they appeared to be at the time. They were members of their generation.

Jones: I speak as one White House correspondent, I never paid any attention to the kids. The times were too hectic. There were too many issues that were relevant. So I had nobody at the CBS bureau in Washington saying, “We need to do a story on the kids, and what are they doing? What’s this I hear about so and so?” Susan was young and she was dating and all that kind of stuff. There was no pressure back at the office to do stories on those kids, and those of us who were White House correspondents had too many other issues. I thought about this since all those years, I didn’t know much about the kids. You’d see them at events and say, “Hi, Susan, hi, Jack.”

Smith: Jack Marsh told us a story. That first month when he is getting ready to go out to the Chicago – typical Ford – anyone else would announce a Vietnam amnesty program on a Friday afternoon – but he goes to the VFW convention to make the announcement – knowing that it is going to be less than rapturously received. The day before he goes, Jack Marsh comes into the Oval Office and says, “I’ve got some bad news for you.” And Ford says, “What is it?” Steve hadn’t registered on his eighteen birthday for the draft. And he said his dad look gob smacked, because he thought when the press finds out…here he is out here doing this speech and his own son…Well, anyway, they kept it out of the press. Before the day was over they got the head of Selective Service into the Oval Office – they got Steve signed up, they wrapped it all up. They took care of it. The story never surfaced. But the face that the president’s own son…
Jones: What I’m curious about – I never heard this story – did some reporter get on to it and ask questions?

Smith: No. Ford’s immediate reaction was what the consequences are going to be if and when a reporter does get on to this story in the supercharged climate. And here he is about to go out to the VFW and make this speech. But the fact that it never did – that they could still keep a story like that under wraps…

Jones: Which is interesting. How times have changed, because can you imagine – I’m asking myself – why weren’t we, as reporters back in those days, finding out if all those kids had registered, if they had any deferment? I think it was because there was just a general feeling of our editors that it was not news and the other issues were too big. We’ve had too much time in the end of the Cold War. We’ve had too much time as a journalism headquarters – too much time to fill. So they’ve sent us out, sent their reporters out doing these inane, irrelevant, things.

Smith: Did they underestimate Reagan, both in terms of the likelihood that Reagan really would run, and the seriousness of the threat that Reagan would pose?

Jones: I don’t know whether they underestimated it or not. But I’m on shaky ground when I head into this area because you never want to say anything critical of Ronald Reagan, it seems, within Republican circles. I don’t have much good to say about Ronald Reagan because of what he did to Jerry Ford. Ronald and Nancy Reagan seized on the pardon and ran in the primary, figuring that Ford was vulnerable and this was their chance to get to the White House. And they gutted him. 1976 was the last time that either of the major parties actually nominated their presidential nominee at a convention. That has never happened since 1976. It’s always been chosen by primaries and caucuses and all that stuff. And Reagan almost pulled it off. That convention was wild. But I thought it was just very unfair, what Ronald Reagan did, and I was never able to forgive him for it.

Smith: The counter argument is, without dismissing what you say, that unintentionally Reagan made Ford a better candidate. That Ford was a better campaigner in October of 1976 than he was in October of 1975.
Jones: He wouldn’t have had to be that good if Ronald Reagan hadn’t wounded him. In my obituary interview that I did with President Ford, he talked about Ronald Reagan, and what Ronald Reagan and the Pentagon did in the ’76 campaign. There were high ranking people, inside the Pentagon, who were feeding fodder for criticism to Ronald Reagan so he could use it in his primary campaign. That’s about as scary as Eisenhower leaving and warning about the military industrial complex.

Smith: Was that a factor in the removal of Jim Schlessinger from the Defense Department?

Jones: Frankly, in retrospect, I think the removal of Schlessinger was that he was insubordinate. He was a problem, but I think Ford could have worked that out, had it not been for Rumsfeld. I think Rumsfeld wanted to be Defense secretary.

Smith: You think Rumsfeld also wanted to be vice president?

Jones: Yeah. Absolutely. He was involved in that, too. And I hate to say that because I like Rumsfeld.

Smith: I’ve heard from so many people, they say it in tones of admiration, that Rumsfeld never left his fingerprints – you won’t find his signature. That he was masterful.

Jones: Oh yeah.

Smith: And, again, they sort of admire the skill with which he went about the operation.

Jones: And I think he was probably able to manipulate Ford a little bit. I talked earlier about how Ford set the rules and the tone, and I think he did. But I also think, around the fringes, a guy like Rumsfeld and Cheney, guys like them, were able to maneuver.

Smith: And because Ford famously said he was genuinely surprised that Nixon lied to him. Ford really believed that he was truthful with people and people were truthful with him. Until he was proven otherwise, which would be a weapon in the hands of skillful couturiers.

Jones: Ford got in the last jab on the Reagan thing. To his death, he was upset with Reagan, and Mrs. Ford, even now, today, can’t tolerate them in many ways. But I thought it was very interesting that in 1980, when Ronald Reagan was the nominee, and Reagan was really fumbling on the campaign trail, and he was losing his momentum, and his nomination was in jeopardy at one point, who was it who came onto the campaign trail with vigor, gusto, and tirelessly campaigning for Ronald Reagan, saying, “We have to get Jimmy Carter out of the White House. It is incumbent that we do that.”

Smith: Did you know at the time how unhappy Rockefeller was as vice president?

Jones: No.

Smith: He was a good soldier.

Jones: He was. And, here again, I think if you talked about – to every White House correspondent during that period, we didn’t have time to do anything except focus on President Ford and the issues. They were so overwhelming. The country was in a crisis. Not only a Constitutional crisis, but we were in an energy crisis and an economic crisis. We’re all caught up with our current problems here in 2009, and holding on for dear life, but in some ways it wasn’t as bad – it’s not a Constitutional crisis right now.

Smith: And, let’s face it, Barak Obama has the legitimacy of the ballot box, which Gerald Ford didn’t have.

Jones: Yeah. But I just think that Jerry Ford had earned the right to be president in his own way.

Smith: Do you think at the end of the campaign, did you think he thought he was going to win?

Jones: Yes, I think he did, because he was seeing big crowds. They went to airports and they got everybody in, and he’d crawl off of Air Force One and do his thing. They looked enthusiastic, and he was enthusiastic, and the stories were good and the polls were closing. I think he thought it was still a long shot, but I think he thought maybe they just might have done it.

Smith: You have to tell this story before we finish of the poster that you presented to him after the ’76 election, when you went back out to Vail. The conventional notion was that he was kind of down and…

Jones: He was. As we all recall, President Ford had lost his voice because he’d been speaking at all of these rallies, and he’d been going around the White House sort of mumbling and saying to his aides, “I lost to a peanut farmer.” So finally he grabs himself by the bootstraps and we pack up and we go to Vail for his final holiday visit as president. So, one day he was out skiing and I was walking around with a dear friend of mine, Dick Growald, who was with Helen Thomas and his White House correspondent for United Press International. And we go by this store and we see this big poster, and it shows these skis up against an outhouse, and it says, “Ski Poland.” And we said, “Oh my gosh, we’ve got to get this,” because it was his remarks about the freedom of Poland in the debate that had really cost him. Possibly could have been the one last thing that did make the difference. And he had said that basically, that they are free. And of course, the Soviet Union still existed.

So we got this poster and brought it back and where it said, “Ski Poland,” if you look, we have inserted in here, “Free Poland.” So we have this last party with the White House press corps and Mr. and Mrs. Ford, and I present him with this poster. You see in the picture, the guy just breaks into laughter. It’s like it’s almost sort of broken the ice. It was the one image that I will always remember of Gerald R. Ford. Good, decent, hardworking, and who did one hell of a job as president of the United States in a crisis. And I don’t know anyone else who could have done as well, what he accomplished.

Ford was working so hard to try to get the country back on track, and sometimes he was really too serious for his own good. And he had David Kennerly, who was a former photographer for Time Magazine, who he had named his White House photographer. It was David Kennerly and Don Penny who had been hired as a speechwriter, primarily to write funny lines for the president. Don is a short fellow, and Kennerly and Penny decided they needed to relax the president a little bit. He’d had a day, made a speech one night, and so the next morning, Penny and Kennerly went to the Oval Office and Penny got underneath the president’s desk, right at the knee hole and hid under there. He was a small guy. And Kennerly, of course, is there. At every move that Ford makes, Kennerly is getting pictures of him. So Ford comes down and he’s got his pipe and it’s “Good morning,” and he used to say, “Wide-eyed and bushy-tailed and ready to go.” And, “How you doing, David?” and they have some small talk and the president goes over and sits down in his chair and scoots into the thing, and as he gets just about there, suddenly Don Penny jumps out and goes, “BOO!” Just to make him laugh.

Smith: Did it work?

Jones: It worked. Here again, what president, what aides could do that with any president?

Smith: The great story – when he fell down the steps in Vienna, in the rain, holding an umbrella for Mrs. Ford, and there is a famous photograph of him. And later on people around him, of course, were all lashing out at the photographers, how dare they take his picture? And his response was, “Well, of course they took them. If they hadn’t they would have lost their jobs.” Which again, tells volumes about the guy.

Jones: He understood.

Smith: What I’d love to do for just a few minutes is get a picture, kind of a local color of what this community, what this area was like when you and Jerry Ford and veterans came back from World War II. What the political climate was. And tell me about Frank McKay. Who was Frank McKay?

Hauenstein: Frank McKay, of course, was a political person who headed up the Republican Party. He had a tremendous influence – he had an organization that was more than just a political party. It seemed that it was a question whether or not it was more political than it was off limits, so to speak.

Smith: Peter Cook was talking about this. A couple of other folks as well, that suggested that if you wanted to do business in this town or this area, you needed to have Frank McKay’s imprimatur.

Hauenstein: Frank McKay had his tentacles all through the state, not only Grand Rapids, but everywhere. He was an extremely powerful man. I might say that he probably was a quasi-organized crime type of organization.

Smith: What was the source of his power?

Hauenstein: The individual. He was the head man who ran everything. He was a hardnosed man and, of course, I think that probably people had rumored, and it was known in the press at times, that charges against him, even for murder cases, were brought about, as you probably have known or read about. But he always got out of things very nicely.

Tape shut off

Smith: You mentioned Arthur Vandenberg. For generations who don’t know anything about him, tell us about Arthur Vandenberg. Who was he, and why was he significant, here and later in the Ford story? What was his significance in Michigan and ultimately the Jerry Ford story?
Hauenstein: Arthur Vandenberg was purely a man who brought himself up virtually by his bootstraps. He was a newspaperman. He became, as a very young man, I remember my city desk – he had engraved his name one time – had been city editor of that newspaper. As had Frank Knox, incidentally, of the Chicago Daily News. Having become editor he really recognized the power of the press and became a hardworking Republican. As you know, he was ultimately appointed to the U.S. Senate and was a great speaker. He was a dynamic type of guy, but he was highly conceited. I remember even as a reporter some years before, he had called the editor of the paper and said, “I’ve got a story, send one of your reporters down.” I went down to his office. Boy, here I go, I’ve got a real one – got a good story this time. So I went down to get the story from him and he had it all typed up. He said, “Here, no changes necessary.” This was the type of man Vandenberg was.

Smith: He was an isolationist in his politics.

Hauenstein: He was pro-American – 100%. But ultimately, after the war, he did become an internationalist. There is no question about that. I remember one time he made a remark after the war that if we didn’t do something pretty soon with Russia - get it solved - we were going to go to war against Russia. He felt that that was a great possibility. I heard him say so. Obviously it didn’t come about.

Smith: What was his relationship to the McKay organization?

Hauenstein: They were friends. We never knew how close, but they were friends and they knew each other and they did communicate. There was no economic link, you might say, or a link above and beyond the possible political link.

Smith: When Ford comes home from the war, he also has undergone this conversion.

Hauenstein: Yes. Jerry came home – do we use the term President Ford rather than Jerry?

Smith: Whatever.

Hauenstein: We called him Jerry. He came home and he went into the law office, but we have to go back to the fact that we had a congressman by the name of Barney Jonkman, and in 1940 Barney really led in the House of Representatives a bill to defeat what was then known as the Selective Service law. We had had a one year induction, similar to a draft, induction of young men into the service for one year only. The renewal of that law was absolutely essential to the survival of this country from the military point of view and anyone who was in the service knew about it because it was chaotic. We needed that renewed. The man that led the fight against it was Barney Jonkman. He was not going to have this renewed. He was going to allow the OHIO, Over the Hill in October, to take over.

So those of us who came back from the service, I was in the service at the time, but those who were not in the service were cognizant of it certainly. And we decided that Barney Jonkman, who was proclaiming himself to be a great hero and savior of the world - we were going to put him down where he belonged. There was a man, he had been a former judge here, but he was also a retired adjutant general colonel out of the service...and we organized the Army-Navy officers, and we had some meetings and we decided we were going to get this guy, Jonkman, out of office. We had very, very well organized men who went out and made speeches because all of us in those days were asked to make speeches, everyone who was in the war, of course. And we pushed for Jerry Ford very heavily, and of course we had the backing of Arthur Vandenberg. Arthur was for Jerry Ford because we wanted Jerry Ford. We selected him because he’d be the best man for the job.

Smith: Now were there other candidates examined?

Hauenstein: No.

Smith: What was it about Ford? Did he come to you and say I’m interested in this?

Hauenstein: No, he was a member of our organization, so to speak. He was very popular, very popular in Grand Rapids before the war. Everybody knew him – he was a friendly sort of person, which was unusual - to find a bunch of Army officers and Navy officers who were very friendly in those days. His father, of course, had a great deal of influence because he was the chairman of the Republican Party – Kent County Republican Party.

Smith: His dad was?
Hauenstein: His dad was.

Smith: Although he and his dad were no friend of McKay’s.

Hauenstein: No, none at all. Not a bit. No, he was as clean as a whistle. He owned a paint shop here and he was a very fine man. He was really a decent guy, as was Jerry that type of person.

Smith: How much of this, because clearly it’s driven by this idea – the internationalist idea – but how much of this was a generational thing? The younger generation taking on the old guard?

Hauenstein: I think it was acceptable. I remember Frank Sparks, editor of the Herald, and Lee Woodruff with the Press. They supported Jerry one hundred percent - he was a popular guy - and I don’t think there was any question but to beat Barney. To beat Barney Jonkman was not particularly easy because, as I said before, five terms and he had also been the prosecuting attorney before that in Grand Rapids. We were a little nervous about it. But the job was done.

Smith: How conservative was this district? Culturally conservative? The story is that early that year he proposed to Betty – but he really couldn’t tell her when they were going to get married and he couldn’t tell her why. And it’s pretty clear that the real reason was – the story over the years was that he wanted to take Jonkman by surprise, at the last minute, and there is something to that. But it’s pretty clear that there was real concern in his camp that his marrying a divorcee would have damaged his prospects in the Republican primary.

Hauenstein: It was an era in which a divorce was not particularly acceptable in this area. That was very true. It was a highly conservative area, highly religious people, and the ethic background of the old school in Europe. It was a factor to be considered. But he was popular enough to carry it.

Smith: Clearly Ford out-campaigned Jonkman.

Hauenstein: Oh he worked day and night. He had a little, I’ve forgotten what we call that, automobile, whatever it was, going from town to town. And it didn’t make any difference whether he was up in Cedar Springs with the red underwear - he was a popular guy. Everybody remembered him from his days of being such a football star. Even I remembered because I played football against him in high school. He weighed 190 pounds and I weighed 135 wet. I was a half back and he was the center. He clobbered me.

Smith: But I assume he played fair. I assume he clobbered you fair.

Hauenstein: Oh yes. Well, in those days, playing center for a football team was different than it is today. You’d play offense and defense both. He was the guy that ran the team because the center could also catch passes – he could do everything. He could play both ways and Jerry was in every play there was. 190 pounds in high school in those days was a mountain man – and he carried on in Michigan and Yale.

Smith: Did you know Betty back then?

Hauenstein: I’d met her but I didn’t know her. She was kind of in the background a great deal. She stayed in the background very much.

Smith: Were you surprised when he beat Jonkman in the primary?

Hauenstein: No. I think he would have beaten Jonkman other ways, we were so fed up with him. Particularly when we came back. I remember, it was right after the war, it was one of the big first meetings and we asked Barney to speak to us. He told us about how he flew over Alaska and the beautiful sight of Alaska and how they had done when the war was over. We could hardly stand it. So he wasn’t a very popular guy. We had him. I don’t think there was a club in Grand Rapids that some of us didn’t speak to – I don’t care how low down or high it was, but we did the job pretty well.

Smith: What happened, in the end, to Frank McKay?

Hauenstein: I don’t know.

Smith: Was his political power broken?

Hauenstein: Yes. They started going after him, indeed they did. But I don’t remember how he died, exactly. Don’t remember that because I was traveling internationally pretty heavily in those days and I wasn’t around too much.
Smith: So your friendship with Ford obviously evolved over the years?

Hauenstein: Well, actually, we didn’t live too far apart in early days. But the dividing line was such that I went to Central and he went to South, went to a different school.

Smith: Was South as diverse as people make it out to be? The story is that South was a place where, a little bit on the wrong side of the tracks, but you got a lot more diverse student body than maybe you did at Central.

Hauenstein: Much more so. It was diverse – you are exactly correct on that. Central was elite – I was thinking about that the other day because I think we had only one colored man in the whole class at school at that time. His parents were servants across the street to people over there. Today I guess it’s 90% black, but South was somewhat of a mixture.

Smith: Do you remember the Depression in Grand Rapids?

Hauenstein: Very well.

Smith: How bad was it?

Hauenstein: Terrible. It was really very, very bad. Even those who had something, had nothing, so to speak. I remember, I worked for the Press, in the early days, I remember the great big cop on the corner of Sheldon and Fulton. His job was traffic and it would be winter time – ten below zero and he had to go out there. All they had in those days – there were two traffic lights – only a little signal – he’d have to turn it “Go” – “Stop” – “Go” – “Stop” in freezing weather. The guy would come into the office as a place to get warm and back and forth. He’d say, “I just can’t wait to retire, can’t wait to retire.” I said, “What’s your retire pay?” He said, “My retire pay is going to be $50 a month!” Big stuff – that was big money to be able to retire with $50 a month. But during the Depression things were bad, we had riots. We had people marching on city hall, they turned over automobiles, they burned them.

Smith: Really?

Hauenstein: It was a very serious matter. It was indeed.
Smith: And the main employers in town – I assume at that point were the furniture makers?

Hauenstein: Furniture was the main industry.

Smith: And that suffered along with everyone else?

Hauenstein: Absolutely did. We were identified as the furniture capital of America, as you well know, at the time. No one was buying expensive furniture. It really was very bad. Then it’s about the time the unions decided to organize and they came into Grand Rapids to organize. Then there would be people against them and riots would carry on. Some of the union people would get smashed up and go back to Detroit and Lansing and so forth.

Smith: Has there always been a kind of east versus west rivalry in Michigan? Kind of a cultural divide?

Hauenstein: It’s a very minor degree now, but indeed, there was. Yes, you are quite right. There was, yes.

Smith: And this was always sort of a Republican town?

Hauenstein: Always, although I understand that sometimes we get a few Democrats once in a while – personalities. Yes. The Dutch have had a great influence in the development of the city in every major…

Smith: That would be great, Ralph, if you could describe for people, people who don’t know west Michigan, they’re a little confused to hear about the Dutch and they really don’t know what that means. Describe for someone who doesn’t know this area - who the Dutch are and what their impact on this place has been?

Hauenstein: You can’t say the Dutch without saying the religious – the Christian Reformed Church and the Reformed Church. They were two branches – most of them came over, actually from the first settlement. They were in New Jersey and they came back into Grand Rapids, and then some later came directly from what they called the Old Country. It was not unusual on the streets to hear Dutch spoken with a great deal of frequency. I don’t know exactly the proportions of their populations overall, but it was a pretty good percentage in any event. They carried their influence religiously to a great extent. And the laws of the city sometimes were predicated on exactly how the religious aspect might be from the religious point of view.

Smith: And that was carried into politics?

Hauenstein: Absolutely carried into politics. It was indeed.

Smith: For example, you couldn’t find anything open on a Sunday?

Hauenstein: No. I can’t put this in here because he was here the other day. I remember when I was having dinner years ago with Pete Cook and he was so mad at this guy Fred Meijer. I said, “What?” And he said, “He’s opening his stores on Sunday.” Today Fred Meijer and Peter Cook are very good friends. I remember when that happened.

Smith: So how did Ford in his political career adapt himself to that?

Hauenstein: Fortunately he could kind of be above the whole thing. You couldn’t say anything bad about Ford because he didn’t do anything bad. He was Episcopalian of course, but he went to church on Sunday and Ford was a political wartime hero. He was a star of great fame and we didn’t have many in those days.

Smith: Did you know Phil Buchen?

Hauenstein: I know Phil, yeah. Not well, but knew him. His partner in law – they started law together.

Smith: Did you ever think that Jerry Ford would wind up in the White House?

Hauenstein: Oh, no. Nor did he. Absolutely not. That was the furthest from his thoughts, I’m sure. It’s always been published that he always wanted to be the leader of the House of Representatives.

Smith: When he was in Congress, did you every lobby him over anything? Ask for anything? The story is told that folks here in Grand Rapids, there was group that wanted a military base and he politely, but firmly discouraged them, saying that that wasn’t a stable enough element from which to build an economy. I suspect he probably upset a few people. They were thinking, here was Jerry Ford on the Appropriations Committee, with all of his connections with the military.

Hauenstein: I do remember that during the Arab-Israeli war that great factor there. Of course we couldn’t get gasoline – we’d line up for gasoline for miles because the Arabs had shut us off for six months from any fuel. And at that time I remember Jerry proposed a great thing – history has recorded that – I suppose you have that some place – but how many nuclear plants, a couple of hundred, or something like that and drill for oil and a lot of other proposals that he had to make us self-sufficient. Had his suggestions or requirements at that time been fulfilled, we’d be exporting it today. We’d be exporting oil. But that’s how far ahead he was in thinking, so to speak, of the present generation, of people we have now in Washington.

Smith: Let me ask you something, when he was in the White House, he was seen as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. And yet, long before he died, he’d go to convention after convention and he and Mrs. Ford were increasingly almost marooned – pro-choice, sympathetic to gay rights. A whole host of things… the rest of the party went this way, and they went this way. And you wonder whether it was just the party that changed, did they change, how much of an influence was she on him? He seemed like a more, dare I say liberal, at least culturally, socially.

Hauenstein: I probably would give him the identity of being an independent individual. More independent, irrespective of liberal or conservative. He was an independent. He had his own thoughts, of his own mind, of what he wanted to do. He always talked in terms of what would be better, not for himself so much for but for the country. That’s reflected in all the things he did.

Smith: Did you see him in the White House at all? Did you visit?

Hauenstein: Oh yeah.

Smith: You obviously saw him, I assume, after the presidency he came back here a lot.
Hauenstein: He came back here a lot. You have to realize that Jerry hadn’t spent a lot of time here in Grand Rapids. He didn’t have much chance. From high school he went on Yale, and then he got out and he had less than a year I guess and he went into the service, then into the House of Representatives. So he wasn’t in Grand Rapids that much, really.

Smith: How much resentment was there when it was announced that he was going to California, when he was going to live in California after the presidency? Were there people here in Grand Rapids who thought that that was some sort of betrayal?

Hauenstein: Some people did comment on it, but I don’t think it became a major issue. I don’t think so. Some people felt badly about it because he could have carried his influence from here into Washington, and probably to a greater extent that he could from California.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Hauenstein: I hadn’t thought about that, no. Betty, of course, after the funeral. I was one of the military honor guards in Washington, Betty sent us some discharged caissons from the 75 mm gun – beautifully engraved stuff. Very thoughtful of her, very nice of her to do that.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction to his death, here and elsewhere? The numbers of people and the media coverage.

Hauenstein: Yeah, I was surprised. I remember, of course, the campaign when he was running for office, and the presidency, and I remember Barbara Walters, she was number one of all television at the time. I remember watching, she was interviewing somebody and the individual said he was going to vote for Ford and she said, “How could you vote for Ford? How could anybody vote for Ford?” And she raked him over the coals. Now, Ford was the greatest that ever was to hold the presidency. That’s how things changed so much.

Smith: Of course, in the White House Mrs. Ford was pretty outspoken Hauenstein: Oh, yes.

Smith: She got into trouble with the Sixty Minutes interview and all that. How did that go over – her comments about Susan having an affair or the children using marijuana or her own support for pro-choice?

Hauenstein: I think it followed very much the trend of the city itself. Once we were so conservative, as I spoke about before, but we’re no longer that type of people. We’re far more liberal, far more acceptable of things as they exist and accepting them as they are. I think virtually everything has taken that vein today.

Smith: Which was much less provincial a place – west Michigan has opened up to the world.

Hauenstein: Very much so.

Smith: If you were going to tell people something about Jerry Ford that maybe they didn’t know, for someone who didn’t know him, what would you say – how would you describe him?

Hauenstein: You have to take it to a different context. As a friend, you could say “Jerry” to him. If he’s not the friend you have to say, “Mr. President.”

Smith: Did you call him Jerry?

Hauenstein: Yes, I called him Jerry. Ralph and Jerry. As a matter of fact, he signed his letters to me, always “Jerry.” Never president and so forth. He appreciated that – he liked that. He said he knew immediately where he was when somebody said “Jerry.” If he was in a crowd of people, then Mr. President. Somebody would say “Hi, Jerry,” he knew they were from Grand Rapids. His old football team or something like that. He knew exactly where he was. He appreciated it. There was nothing highly sophisticated about Jerry Ford. Nothing.

Smith: That’s just what we’re looking for, Ralph, thank you.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this. Would you tell us a little bit about your life before you crossed paths with the Ford White House?

Cavaney: I guess I would say my beginnings of interest in public policy -- and the politics that are necessary to implement it -- started in high school and college. It was then that I got involved in service organizations and the governance of student bodies. I went to the University of Southern California and a lot of my college friends and fraternity brothers were all involved in campus politics.

Smith: Was that Haldeman’s group?

Cavaney: Yes, Dwight Chapin directly and, yes, Haldeman’s group. I could probably give you a dozen names and they could be recalled by anybody who was familiar with the Nixon administration. And, so when we all graduated, I went off to serve three combat tours in Vietnam to satisfy my NROTC commitment. So, from ’64 to ’69, I was not a part of this group. Many of them, went into the Nixon gubernatorial race in California, which proved to be a political loss.

Smith: Which was reluctantly undertaken?

Cavaney: Yes. But they were around for the makeover and the campaign drive in ’68. When I finally left the Navy and took a civilian job, it was in Orange County, CA. Nixon had bought the Western White House in San Clemente, which was just down the road from where I was working in Orange County. So, my relationship with many of these former colleagues was started anew. I sort of panhandled around and became a volunteer advance person, which I did for four years, while working for Security Pacific Bank.

Smith: Was this for both the first and second terms?
Cavaney: In the first term, yes. And then I went on the White House Staff full-time for the second term, following the 1972 election. And that is where a most interesting thing happened. I got to know Jerry Ford when he replaced Spiro Agnew as Vice President. Jerry Ford never really had to campaign for himself, in the truest sense of the word except his first run for congress. So he didn’t have a campaign mechanism, campaign apparatus, or anything like that. The White House got an agreement with the RNC for Dean Burch and Jerry Ford to be referred to us for logistical support in the advance office, which I was in charge of at that time. Their charter was, “Okay, you’ve got to go on the road and you’ve got to take care of all the Republicans who are nervous about what’s going on.” So that was my first exposure to Jerry Ford and it was during that time that I got to see the large differences between the personalities of Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford. And, I sort of fell in love with Jerry Ford the person and would’ve walked around the world, if he’d asked me to.

Smith: It’s fascinating that you say that because it opens a number of questions. It also reminds me of one thing Rex Scouten said. Rex, of course, had been with the Secret Service and accompanied Vice President Nixon on a number of trips. The family had a room for him out in California. I mean he literally became that close to the Vice President. Rex, who is appropriately discreet given his position, was very candid in drawing a distinction between the Nixon he had known in the 50s and the Nixon he saw in the White House. He said something that absolutely dumbfounded me. He volunteered the observation, “I can’t tell you how many times we’d be on a plane, sometimes just the two of us, and out of the blue this he just sort of pounded his fists and he said, ‘I’m not tough enough. I’ve got to make myself toughen up,’” which is a fascinating window on a surprising side of Nixon. And implicit in what Rex had said was that he had succeeded by the time he’d became President, perhaps to the detriment of his presidency.

Cavaney: His force of will and his self-discipline was extraordinary. An example - I think he always wanted to be one of the boys; that high school and college athlete; the person who was recognized as being part of the “in crowd”. His persona, presumably, wasn’t quite that in his younger days. He worked hard and went out of his way to be seen with so and so or wanting to do this or that, which did not necessarily come natural to him. You could almost see him say to himself, “I want to make myself more like this and therefore I’m going to do it,” “I want to make myself tougher,” or “I’m going to dedicate myself to making sure that nobody out-studies me in terms of things that are really important.” And, he was incredible in that regard.

Smith: He famously said, “I’m an introvert in an extrovert’s profession,” which suggests a degree of self knowledge that you wish in some ways had extended beyond that observation.

Cavaney: And the other thing then that was so interesting from this perspective where I was, is watching Jerry Ford come into play. Nixon enjoyed thoroughly the idea of studying through books and research papers and having materials brought to him as he’s evolved before he engaged heavily in discussions.

Smith: He’s been called a closet intellectual.

Cavaney: Yes. I think he was. I even heard him say once something to the effect that, “Nobody’s going to out study me on things that are important to me.” So he took great pride in knowing all the details. And then you see Jerry Ford come in and employ his method of learning; that was totally different. He would look to people who he respected, as experts in certain areas, and have group discussions with them, and he would absorb unbelievable amounts of knowledge, principally through the give and take of discussion and interaction. And then, of course, you see the papers and all, but it’s sort of almost the polar opposite of Richard Nixon in terms of how you acquired your knowledge about what you were going to do in leadership. The style suited the man.

Smith: Think what else that reveals, too. One is, basically a loner, inner-directed, solitary in his pursuit of knowledge and as in most things. The other is a much more gregarious “people person.”

Cavaney: Extroverted guy.
Smith: Yeah.

Cavaney: Yes, it was quite interesting to see that contrast.

Smith: It’s interesting because, this period was so awkward, obviously, for everyone. We’ve picked up on a number of people who suggested that there were those in the Nixon White House who looked at the Vice President - who was out of town more than he was in town, who was really walking a tightrope - and perhaps resented what they thought was a less than full throated defense of an embattled president. Did you sense those tensions?

Cavaney: There were some. There were clearly people that didn’t understand what the strategy was. And the strategy, having sat there through all this - and we made many trips with Dean Burch on the plane - it was to give people a sense of reassurance and confidence that everything was coming along okay. Well, if you are in a purely defense mode, that may not necessarily be the messages you would want to be delivering to people. It’s almost by design the reverse side of that. So, as the President would want to do, he would give an order and he was very good at doing that. So it really was not fair for people to criticize unless it was to advance another agenda, or they just clearly didn’t understand what was being asked of Jerry Ford at one time and what that role was supposed to be at that period of time.

Smith: We talked to Benton Becker. There’s this wonderful little anecdote that I’d never heard before that says volumes about both men. Earl Warren died during that period and Benton, who politically was to the left of both Nixon and Ford - nevertheless, Benton said to the Vice President, “You know, it might be a really nice gesture for you to go up to the court and pay your respects.” And Ford sort of mulled that over and said, “It probably wouldn’t sit well with the White House, but I’ll think about it.” And Becker learned later on, that the Vice President on his own had gone up to the court and had placed a wreath at Earl Warren’s casket. And sure enough, he was chewed up by Nixon. It was a nether world he was in. We’ve been told by a number of people he really did not enjoy the vice presidency.
Cavaney: He didn’t. I think as we later got to see him in his element, as the very relaxed individual when he was around people; he just loved people, he loved it all and you would see it in him. In that period of time, as I said, it was his duty to do this, and it wasn’t a role I think he was fully comfortable in. However, he did it and he did it I think reasonably well given the times. But you’re absolutely right, he was not the same person, and he had to feel a little bit awkward about that, and a lot of times he would say, “Glad that’s over,” kind of thing. In a sense that one would say “duty done.”

Smith: And a later consequence of that was that Jerry Ford probably tended to be a little bit more understanding of Vice President Rockefeller’s travails in office than a different President would have. During that period of his vice presidency, Tom DeFrank in his book made a great deal out of a slip of the tongue. Putting that aside, did you ever hear him say anything that even by inference – I mean, look, he’s a pro and he can read the papers. At some point, he’s got to be weighing the possibilities. Was that in the background? Was it ever discussed?

Cavaney: The best thing I can say about that is that other people would mention it in his presence, and he would sometimes give a slight wince or something. Clearly, you could detect his sensitivity was heightened. And then he would try and move off that topic as fast as he could through a joke or something like that. Clearly, thought had been given, clues were there, and he had concluded that there was nothing he could really say that was going to help. And I saw that repeated time and again. It was almost like being able to see into his soul.

Smith: And presumably that would include, when you were out in the field, Republican candidates?

Cavaney: Absolutely, yeah. Because, of course, coming and speaking on behalf of the party, as he was doing in being the vice president, people assumed he knew everything. So people came up, I mean I heard it brought up a number of times, but sort of almost the “Gee, you’d be great!” type of comment.
Smith: For a guy who was by nature pretty open, that must have been one of the things he didn’t like about the job. I mean, having to be artificial, or closed mouth, in that sense.

Cavaney: He was a man who enjoyed the give and take. You could see, he’d get four or five of his old friends like he used to do up in the House and they’d talk, and you just knew he’d keep going. I can remember when we were doing the trips we went on, you had to pull him out of events because he just relished the give and take and would stay long past the scheduled conclusion.

Smith: He loved the House, didn’t he?

Cavaney: Absolutely.

Smith: That was his real home.

Cavaney: That was so great at his funeral that The House returned that love by letting him have that very special treatment that nobody else had gotten. And I think it was just evident in everything about him. You heard him talk about old friends, he would see somebody who he’d served with but had been out of office for three or four terms or something like that, and we’d go to a town and that person would be there, and about ten minutes after he’d be there giving a speech. And he’d go, “So and so’s out there” and “Go get him. I want to talk to him!” Always that embodiment of camaraderie and good will.

Smith: It really was bipartisan.

Cavaney: It was, back in those days, no question. That’s the shame of what’s happening nowadays. It used to be there were as many people in the political middle as there were on the ends, and even more so, and you worked around in the middle, requiring you to be bipartisan. But now our political process has changed so that the extremes, shall we say, the ends of the ideological spectrum, these groups have all the weight, and there’s nobody in the center. And now if you try to occupy the center, you tend to get demonized from both directions. So it’s really a very challenging political environment.

Smith: You’d know this better than most. I often think of Ronald Reagan, certainly a principled conservative, yet people forget Reagan was going to put Dick Schweiker on his ticket in ’76. And in the White House, the old union boss always said, “If I get 80%, I call it a victory.” I mean, he may have been fixed in his principles, but he was certainly pragmatic in how he went about realizing them.

Cavaney: I think what he learned was that one classic: If you’re going to be successful in politics, you’ve got to have wins. You’ve got to keep restoring that political capital that you use up, and the only way you can restore it is to use it again and prove it. And I think he had that view up here. I marvel at how certainly in those first two years with him -- watching him, who I didn’t know as well as I’d known the other two presidents -- to see what a master he was of being able to understand the geopolitics of what was going on, just like this! It was incredible.

Smith: Yet in many ways still a mysterious figure, an elusive figure.

Cavaney: Very much was his own man, he and Nixon. And think both of them are from California. California always prides itself as sort of hanging out there in public and doing this and I’m from California. And they both kept their own counsel to an extent much greater than any other president we’ve seen in this modern era, so to speak. And yet they were very different in how they exercised power and the like.

Smith: You’re absolutely right. You know a Freudian could have a field day with Reagan’s boyhood, and yet there’s a security about Reagan and an optimism about Reagan and he just liked people.

Cavaney: He knew who he was. Yeah, and at times, you can see both of those two. They would be against some piece of legislation that was purported to help some disadvantaged folks, and the Administration would be against it because it obviously pragmatically wasn’t going to work. But then one of those people from that impacted group would run into him and they’d tell them a story and both of them would tear up and they’d write the check or go back and tell their staff “Let’s be sure they’re taken care of.” So they did have that basic connection with the human condition.
Smith: I’ve often thought - and in some ways it was unavoidable, ambition made it unavoidable, a lot of things made it unavoidable - but that Ford and Reagan had more in common than the public ever guessed or even the party pros suspected.

Cavaney: I think yes. I think its root is in this understanding of the human condition and a simpatico nature towards that. And both of them went through that full circle from starting with not much, having worked hard, been scoffed at on occasion for various kinds of things and finally, they could see if you follow your precepts, both of them could see how you could be successful working in the system. I think that connection was the bond you’re talking about and I would agree.

Smith: It’s interesting. We talked to reporters who were on that vice presidential plane and it’s funny because, while he may not have been having a whole lot of fun, it sure sounds like they were having a ball. What was the mood like on Slingshot Airlines?

Cavaney: The Vice President, he was one of those who just loved people and he liked making people feel at ease. I think he probably had difficulty, although I can remember a few occasions of him really coming down strong on somebody. Just because that really wasn’t his nature, you would see him later joke with the recipient - with the idea of making them feel at ease and that they have a new chance. Whether it was on the plane or it was in the car or at the hotel, the overnight or whatever it was. I just think that was part of his persona - to create an environment around him where people felt comfortable, would speak their mind, and have fun, even when you’re working hard.

Smith: I’d love to have an example or two. We’ve asked people about his temper, which was a lifelong thing, and it is to his credit that most of the time he controlled it. One of the gals who worked at the office out in Rancho Mirage said they could tell if it was a two god damn it day or a five god damn it day.

Cavaney: I’ve got a Jerry Ford temper story that Dick Cheney tells a lot on the stump, but we actually saw it happen. We happened to be at this event. It was going to be staged as you typically do in smaller towns in a big, huge room, like a gymnasium. And, the people were in there for 2 hours, in wait for a series of reasons, notably a long motorcade instead of a helo ride. So, all these people are jam-packed to the gills, in this gritty environment. But what happens, of course, is the room just heats up and then the humidity does weird things. So, we arrive finally, he goes into the gym and the people are going nuts and they’re yelling and screaming and doing this and that and he was in his element, at his very best – very glad to be out of this motorcade and on to this thing. As he finishes his speech and starts to leave the stage, we did the balloon drop. Well, the humidity and the long time with the heat created static electricity and all the balloons stuck together. So, it’s now referred to as the famous balloon “plop” – coming down, huge, all massed together. You can’t see the President because all of these are six to eight feet tall and he’s fighting his way to the crowd and the exit, where he just ripped Dick Cheney. “That’s the last balloon drop we’re ever going to have at any event.” I can never forget the embarrassment because Dick reminds me often of it when he’s out speaking.

Smith: People say it was like a summer thunderstorm; it happened and it would be over.

Cavaney: Absolutely, which is again a very nice attribute, because you can’t be nice to everybody all the time and be an effective leader. You’ve got to set conditions and tell people what the boundaries are and hold them to it.

Smith: What about the people who say he was too nice? I think that’s maybe a euphemism for a certain element of naiveté. On the one hand, we admire the fact that in this cynical town he wanted to believe the best of everyone and was inclined to do so. Is that a luxury a president can afford? In some ways that’s another parallel with Reagan.

Cavaney: I think that that was the skill set, or the approach, that was very appropriate for the times. If you were a politician, you played in the middle. That’s how things were made to happen, by playing in the middle. You, by definition, wanted to be friendly with everyone. You wanted them to feel easy coming to you and being with you. So, I don’t find that as a shortcoming or a liability. I think that would be a great frustration in today’s political environment, because it is very hard to go off line, I think, and continue to think the best of everybody when the next moment they’re up there delivering their caucus’ line, which can be very brutal and over-personal. So, it would’ve been different if he’d have grown up in one of his sons’ or daughter’s generation and been playing in that same arena right now.

Smith: That’s interesting. Was there a moment when you concluded or you sensed that he concluded that Nixon wasn’t going to make it? The so-called smoking gun tape, or the Supreme Court ruling about turning over the tapes - there were obvious kinds of milestones along the way.

Cavaney: I think, for all of us who were there at that time, it began to take a toll on you, these various, as you say, judicial decisions, this sentencing decision, this/that, and it did monopolize you some what. I’ll give you an example from an advance office perspective. President Nixon would get really down in the dumps. He’d say, “I’ve got to get out there and see the people. I’ve got to get out there. They give me energy.” And so the call would come in, “The President wants to go on the road. Let’s go do that.”

Well, there was only about four or five states where we could guarantee that he would get a hugely receptive crowd and that the demonstrators couldn’t overwhelm you. And so the last year we did a fair number of events, but they were always to the same geographical locales where he actually had contact with people. And we went to a lot of fixed forums where the audiences were selected.

Smith: Largely in the South?

Cavaney: Yes, largely in the South. Kentucky was about as far north as he went and one in West Virginia, but down South. And there really wasn’t a whole lot of what I thought there should’ve been of a “tomorrow focus”. And, you knew this is just not fully sustainable. This is not going to go on. And I don’t think any of us had any idea when or exactly how or when or what or however it was, but [we] definitely had that sense of “this course will not run its full term.”

Smith: Were you in the White House on the 9th of August?
Cavaney: I wasn’t. As a good advance man, I was on the road, so I missed that.

Smith: We’ve been told by a number of folks - again it’s understandable - after the swearing in, there was a receiving line and then a reception in the State Dining Room. And more than one person has said that you could watch the Nixon people kind of peel away rather than – and again, in the context of the time, it’s perfectly understandable. What was your sense in terms of melding these sort of disparate elements together? One senses that the first year of the Ford presidency was overhung by these unaddressed personnel issues.

Cavaney: No question that the people that were not part of the Nixon White House and key administration slots - they came in with President Ford - wanted to put everything they could behind them. And therefore anybody who was a carryover really needed to move on. There was an awful lot of that. And, of course, because many of those folks had never served in these roles in government, the flip side of that is, well, trains have to run on time and somebody’s got to manage the process. So that tension, and I was not privy to the President’s decisions per se on these things, but that had to be a constant play in those personnel selections about how far we’re going to go.

I can remember it was Dick Cheney who called me in and talked to me as they were going through those various personnel considerations. I assumed like so many of those Nixon folks, I was going to be gone. And Dick appropriately asked me a lot of tough questions about things I’d done and where I was and all. And, I think I was helped by the fact that we had President Ford so much in our office and because of the advance and the travel and all that contact, you got a chance for him to know you.

So I was asked to stay and I was very, very grateful. But there were a lot of friends that weren’t in a similar situation. And, it’s interesting, we actually saw this thing play out. If you fast forward to George Bush 41, when he finally won his own election in his right, you had that same sense of – “Is it all new, or is it some mix of people?” It would be interesting if somebody who was part of that process could write about the perspective of how those people made those decisions, how they selected the mix and how they went about it.
Smith: Contrary to what people would assume, there’s nothing harder I think internally than taking over for a president of your own party, particularly if you’re thought of as a protégé with obligations.

Cavaney: Yeah, that’s right. Your future is basically tied to this decision made in your favor.

Smith: And yet people elected you in part to represent at least a modest course correction - the kinder, gentler business. I’m sure it created problems.

Cavaney: Yeah, it was always tough and that’s some of the funny little things we were joking about before about the ghost speechwriting team. And the little thing about, “Well, don’t distribute the seating chart of Air Force One around here until the last minute because then you’ll spend all your time deciding who sits next to who and all.” It’s just all these little manifestations of the fact that the problem didn’t really settle in until later in the term.

Smith: And I assume Ford found that a source of frustration.

Cavaney: He didn’t want to hear about it and appropriately so. He shouldn’t be bothered about it. But on occasion, somebody would come up with one of those, “Well, I’m supposed to be going to such and such.” “Talk to Dick” or “Talk to Red” or something like that. And I couldn’t blame him.

Smith: Why was Hartmann a polarizing figure? Let me rephrase that. Isn’t it possible to look at Hartmann and see a guy who in effect was overly - but also maybe usefully - protective, but also possessive?

Cavaney: I think if you look at his role that he tried to shape for himself, it was essentially to protect the president and preserve all the best of what made Jerry Ford who he was politically. And Bob Hartmann was the kingpin when Jerry Ford was at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. I think it is just natural, when you try and fit yourself into an extraordinarily complex environment - where you go from an almost bottoms up kind of process, which is Congress - particularly the House, to the White House where it’s definitely got to be organized. And I think he just had difficulty understanding why you needed all these systems and all these aides and why you had to talk to all these people. And the people on the other side just couldn’t see why he had to be so free wheeling and why people would do the other. So I think it was a conflict of those two worlds coming together, and I think Bob Hartmann probably was very frustrated. I know he was frustrated by it, but he probably hurt himself like Don Quixote by just tilting a little too often at some windmill and then it became sort of a drag or a problem. But there’s no question that it had to be painful. Anybody in that position, I think, would have encountered that same thing.

Smith: You’ve been in several White Houses. How would you characterize the level, for lack of a better word, of intrigue? I won’t say backbiting, but clearly jockeying for position is a polite term. It’s just part of the process. But how would you characterize the Ford White House in relation to the others that you’ve either been in or observed closely?

Cavaney: There’s always the transition part. If you take out the sort of mixing bowl that always happens at the beginning of service because it doesn’t involve a change from the same party, it isn’t clean cut. You’re starting anew but the transition takes time. I would say with the Ford White House, if you took anything after the first year, you saw a very, very different environment than you saw before. By then, those that had come new, those from the Hill, everybody understood how the President liked things, and he’d settled into this framework. He and Dick had worked out a methodology for all this stuff.
And, then there was the serious policy differences. But in terms of getting along and doing what it does to make the trains run on time and to make people look good and doing all that, I think that the Ford White House’s last year and a half, and maybe a little bit more than that, behaved and played with the very best of them.

Smith: Think what was unique about the beginning about the Ford presidency. You had no transition, you had no preparation, you couldn’t even acknowledge the possibility that you might need a transition. So you were literally starting cold.

Cavaney: Yep, it hadn’t been done before.
Smith: No model at all, yeah. This is not to criticize Rumsfeld, but a number of people have suggested that it was somehow - relaxed is a loaded term - comfortable, maybe, that there was a notable difference between the kinds of environments.

Cavaney: There was, yeah. We oftentimes forget that Don Rumsfeld was a very powerful political figure in his own right and a very close friend of Jerry Ford’s and a comrade in arms, shall we say, in many of the battles that took place up on Capitol Hill. So when he was chief of staff, he just had that bravado - his style and his mannerisms of leadership and what he wanted to do - his force of personality. It may have created a bit more friction at the margins than otherwise would’ve been the case, but the trains ran on time and things got done.

On the other hand, Dick at the time was the able, willing, and a very, very superb #2, if you will, just beginning to sort of make his mark. And he calls them as he sees them. So it’s very easy to see Dick, but he doesn’t do it in a harsh public way. So I think what happened was, Don was - the transition enabler. I would say he would be about as close to somebody that understood the essence of the presidency, because of his experience, because of his demeanor, and because he’d been battle tested time and again at the polls. All those things. He just managed in a different kind of way, and he instructed in a different kind of way, and he was a masterful leader in getting the “new” up to speed.

Smith: I’ll be careful about how I phrase this, but I think Ford would be the first to say this, but he had to learn to be president. I mean, 25 years in the House is one kind of education and it served him well in many ways, but it’s not the same as being president. In some ways, Rumsfeld’s singular contribution was to be part of that instructional process.

Cavaney: Yes, I think Don was very directive. “We’re going to do it this way.” “We’re going to do it that way.” I think that kind of discipline was very helpful in those early years because so few knew what it was going to be like. Dick’s style was more the collaborative “This is what I need, and I trust you’re going to do it right” kind of thing. And those are two very different styles of leadership. And I think by then, the President himself had pretty much settled into how he liked it to work. I think that coming together of Dick’s style and where the President was, turned out to be an easy effective mesh. It was just different from before, but it worked, likely beyond many’s expectations.

Smith: And, let’s face it, Congressmen don’t manage anything bigger than an office staff. The sort of hidden story about the Ford presidency was that I think he himself said, “Just as I learned how to do the job, I lost it.” There’s the sense that he was in fact, as Rumsfeld said, “Every day he was becoming a better executive.” Could you see that?

Cavaney: Yes, absolutely. And, again, I think Don provided an incredible service to the President in those early times where nobody really had a template on how we were going to manage this. He was forthright and strong and gave guidance, and people took that. And I think that, as you’ve mentioned, it helped the President because things were getting fixed around him, and he was learning and observing things that worked and didn’t work. And I think that was probably one of the President’s best decisions, putting Don in that position, because, when I think back on it, who else really could’ve done that job at that time?

And that’s the interesting thing I’ve learned over my times of watching politics. Its incredible how many times either the voters or people who get elected to office end up putting the right person in the right spot at the right time, even though there may be a lot of critics about such a choice. Don Rumsfeld and then Dick Cheney provide good leadership team regarding the office of the Presidency, as the perfect metaphor. This was needed at that time to get the President to where he needed to be. And the thing I hear from my friends, Democrats and Republicans, enemies and friends, is that there probably is no greater example of love and people hanging together than the Jerry Ford alumni group. We still have a fabulous get together every year; every June. It has to do with the bright strong people that were brought in. They all saw exactly how this all worked, and it worked on the collaborative model. The kind of thing that “We’re all in this together.”

Smith: Which must have added to the pain of losing in ’76.
Cavaney: Oh, to be so far behind, for good and sufficient reason, and yet to come that close. I remember that last weekend when the polls actually went Bing! And, Ford was ahead. It just didn’t hold. But I think the other part, sad as that was, is that I am so happy for Betty and the Ford family and all the people who worked so hard and selflessly. The pinnacle of Jerry Ford was embodied at his funeral. But you could see the re-evaluation beginning ten years before that, the acknowledgment of the right person in the right job at the right time for what Jerry Ford did. In that two and a half years, took America from one of its worst leadership moments back to normalcy. We had a real election horse race – our country had survived in a healthy manner.

Smith: I’ve often said, by the time of the Bicentennial, there was something to celebrate more than just the calendar. Contrast the mood in the summer of ’74 and in ’76. I’m jumping ahead, but there’s a wonderful Rex Scouten comment on election night, about two in the morning and it wasn’t over but it was not looking good. And the President finally said, “I’m going to turn in.” It was not a concession, but people could all read the body language. So Rex was up there on the second floor with the family and he went across the hall into the President’s room because he wanted to say something consoling. And, you know, what do you say? He said, “You know, Mr. President, just stop and think. You have devoted your entire life in service to this country, the war, and 25 years on the Hill and what you’ve done as president, it’s really a shame. You really deserved to win, but you know, Mr. President, maybe it’s just time for you to take a well earned rest.” And Ford said, “I don’t think so.”

Cavaney: I’ve never heard that. How beautiful. Perfect!

Smith: “I’m willing to make the sacrifice.”

Cavaney: “Try me!”

Smith: He really was down for awhile wasn’t he?

Cavaney: It was tough.

Smith: Can you talk about your observations?
Cavaney: Yeah, it’s sort of like the wind went out of your sails. I mean, he was there, of course, but all the things that filled the room, his laughter, his jokes, his easy demeanor, they just weren’t there.

Smith: He was in mourning?

Cavaney: Very much so. I think, again it goes to that point, if you’re a practiced politician, in almost every case, you’ve got to love being around people, you love the adulation, not so much from an ego perspective per se, but in the validation that what you’re doing is the right thing to be doing. And then all of a sudden to have that - even though by the smallest of margins - pulled away from you is almost like a repudiation. So, many internalize it all, as opposed to saying that there were forces greater than me that were out there; the forces that he had to face in going through that campaign. I’ve never heard anybody say that the pardon of Nixon didn’t cost him the election. Even if it was the smallest of all those estimates, he would’ve been president, had it otherwise been the case.

And then to think, coming out of a bitterly fought and contested convention, 33 points behind and close the gap in of a couple of months. Unprecedented, even to this day. That’s something you don’t see. And almost to pull it out. And, so there’s a part of you that says, I think, he had a greater appreciation for it, as time went on. A real pride. I think he did a great service for the country. If you think of where we would’ve been if we had not had that 1976 Bicentennial – during which President Ford’s leadership and poise brought back a sense of pride. The people were now going to vote for what they thought was the right thing for the times, and they did. It just didn’t quite come together for Jerry Ford. But I think it’s a huge, huge accomplishment. Probably the singular, stellar thing that he did for the country.

Smith: Did he bounce back before the inauguration?

Cavaney: I think there was still some essence of that disappointing feeling hanging around. I remember we were on the helicopter after the “changing to the guard” up on the Capitol – the Inaugural swearing in of Jimmy Carter. We got on the helicopter and we’re flying out to Andrews, and President Ford was commenting, Dick [Cheney] was sitting next to him, and they were just looking down. He couldn’t take his eyes off that crowd, that place up there on the Capitol where he’d spent much of his life, and then flew over the White House on the way out to Andrews Air Force Base. So I think there was that nostalgia. That sort of “letting go” was actually happening. But I did not go out on Air Force Two with him after that, so I’m not sure how they worked through that withdrawal process. But I’m sure he had to be reflecting on some of those memories because that looked to me like a very personal moment.

Smith: What was Mrs. Ford’s demeanor after that point?

Cavaney: I think she was, I’m sure a lot of people would say, the “rock” in that marriage. She held firm when firmness was needed. I think she was trying to make it a little bit light, but you could see that she wasn’t quite there herself. She was just very gracious and endearing to him. She gave him a little pat when we came on the helicopter, and a few of those little touches that say, “I hurt for you.”

Smith: Non-verbal.

Cavaney: People would understand if they’ve been with somebody for a time that they’d know that “I feel your pain” or “I understand where you are” sentiment. You know the mood, when it’s not appropriate to say something, but “I get it.” And you know all those little gestures they had as well as that wonderful capacity to do what was needed with one another, and joke and laugh.

Smith: They had almost a bantering relationship.

Cavaney: Yes, exactly. She could give him as good as she got. It was to her credit. She’s was a great lady.

Smith: She would be the first to admit that punctuality was not her defining characteristic. How much of an issue that? How did they deal with that? How did you deal with it?

Cavaney: One of the things the President would do when the wait got a little long was “Well, I guess I’ll have to have a second drink,” because he would be out and ready to go and he would be sitting down, relaxed, and every so often he would make a little comment about that. “Well, it was a two drink wait.” Some little thing like that, in his own little way, he would give her a little verbal “poke”. But not very often did he ever get mad.

Smith: But it was the norm. I mean, you factored that in?

Cavaney: Yes. exactly. And I think after that long period of time you’ve been married, you just kind of say to yourself and act it out as though, “It ain’t worth falling on my sword for this one.”

Smith: Were you aware that she had a problem, however defined? Was it something people knew about? Suspected?

Cavaney: Not really. I mean, people that are under that much pressure and having been there and seen the Nixon group and all, you are different than you are otherwise. Speaking for myself, I thought a lot of it was attributable to the pressure, the loss of privacy and all the little things that you take for granted that you don’t have anymore. But then it’s always at the back of your mind even though you try and put it away. It’s not something you’d dwell on. The thing that I think put her at such incredible standing with the American public was the way she handled the alcohol issue and then her cancer in a public, “teaching” moment. To this day I get, “You worked with Jerry Ford? Ah, what she did!” Women say this to you, my wife and my mother-in-law being classic examples of working tirelessly for “the cure”. And I’m amazed at how many thousands and thousands of people that I’ve been able to meet would say, “Had she not done that, I wouldn’t have been concerned” or “I wouldn’t have gone” and “It made a difference in my life.” And it’s just…wow! Talk about transformative!

Smith: It’s hard to explain to a younger generation that, not so long ago, breast cancer was a subject that you literally didn’t discuss. And she made it possible to do so.

Cavaney: Yeah, she did.
Smith: It’s funny because when she did the famous 60 Minutes interview, one senses that the immediate reaction - because people always fight the last war - was, “Oh my God, what has she done?” And it took a little bit of time, there was a little bit of disconnect, until the polls started coming in and the mail came in. And all of sudden you discovered that, yes, some people were P.O.ed, although a lot of them weren’t going to vote for Ford anyway. But there was this audience out there that perhaps hadn’t been identified before – what later might be called soccer moms or whatever - for whom she was giving voice to their innermost feelings.

Cavaney: Yeah, she’s a silent champion to a lot of things that occupied their minds. As I say, I hear that mentioned so many times, I couldn’t even begin to count it the mentions. Whether it was her independence - you know, here’s the most powerful person in the world as president and here she is doing her own thing right next to him, even though sometimes he’d give a little look like “oh, there goes Betty”. This empowers people to think in ways they didn’t before and speak out about how, “Wow, what a great role model she was for the times.”

Smith: And people did sense that, for them, she was totally genuine. He wasn’t simply resigned to her doing things the way she was; but that’s the way it had always been. That’s part of what he always loved about her, and he wasn’t going to try to change her.

Cavaney: That’s love. And, I think it worked the other way. One of the great stories I told on a number of occasions is we were down in the primaries fighting “tooth and nail” in Texas in every little town we could get to, and in this instance in East Texas. We were at a “small” football stadium. We got the idea that “Geez, if we can go there, then we can go to Tyler and Longview and all the towns. We can engage the Kilgore Rangerettes.” And, each little town had their own wonderful, fabulous 250 Rangerettes.

The first time we got to the one of these “Rangerette Rallies”, the President said, “Oh, I didn’t realize quite what Texas…” He didn’t realize the massive crowd and all these people. So he’s going along, and they’re doing all these acrobatic moves and the President is throwing kisses in appreciation and, well, by the time we get to the second and the third town, the “Rangerettes” were collapsing in on him and giving him these big red kisses on the cheek. And, of course, click, click, click! All that’s making the wires are the “kiss” photos. And then Lee Domina, the Marine aide to the President, and a few other people, started as we got back on the Marine One helicopter to head back, “Oh, Mr. President, I’m already hearing stories back in the White House. Betty wasn’t exactly sure what you were doing out here.”

And, of course, all of us were picking on him which was routine. Next thing you know an aide has a big bouquet of flowers ready for the President, so when he came off the helicopter on the South Lawn, he had the flowers to give Betty and it was so funny. He just felt like the young kid that had been caught doing something he shouldn’t have been doing, or maybe, should’ve used better judgment. And the President just knew he was going to get it. Again, you saw that little magic between the two of them - the sort of unspoken love they had for one another.

Smith: And then there’s the famous Vickie Carr story.

Cavaney: Oh, yes.

Smith: Did you have much contact with the kids?

Cavaney: Yes, a fair amount. They’d come and go on their own. I think that was another thing that made the Fords so human was they had at that time what could be called a typical American family. Where you had all these kids doing something, somebody wanted to do this; somebody else is doing that. Very different kind of White House occupants. They didn’t try and hide who they were or make it anything it wasn’t. And, I think, people appreciated the honesty and the earnestness with which they didn’t go out and take political advantage of the children or try and use them for anything. They just let them do their own thing, and I think that was pretty well handled. I remember Susan probably had the roughest transition. Because she was going through that year becoming a woman right in front of our eyes, and that’s got to be a difficult process for anybody, let alone have Secret Service agents following you and people around you constantly, setting up expectations.
Smith: What a transformation. I mean, here’s somebody who said, “I’ll go to the White House but only if I can wear my blue jeans.”

Cavaney: Yeah.

Smith: To that extraordinary scene where her mother has her cancer operation and Susan puts on white gloves for the first time and stands in for her mother at a diplomatic event.

Cavaney: Yeah, she’s become quite a lady and then a real leader in the Ford Foundation effort and all that’s been going on there. As you watch all this, I think of how all those kids have turned out to the point that I’m sure the President’s told them a number of times how proud he was of them. Often you watch your kids go through different stages. You know you have to push yourself away from your parents in order to find who you are. And then, if the system has worked well, you’ve been brought up well, you tend to return once you got to where you were going, then you move back in and you get close to family again. And, I think that not only inside the White House we were able to observe that, but the public got to see touches of that as well. And again, it’s so humanizing, I think. Maybe back in the FDR days, you learn about some of the things when he started to use the radio to an extent that others hadn’t done before. Maybe you were reaching masses with a little slice of it, but certainly with the Ford family, you were very much seeing that out in front in ways you hadn’t seen it before. With Jack Kennedy, as brief as his White House tenure was, you were able to see perspectives in ways that we hadn’t seen much before either.

Smith: Everyone’s heard the term ‘advance man.’ But they have only a vague idea of what they do. Walk us through - if you were putting together an event for President Ford. Obviously there’s a wide variety of those, maybe what you do depends upon the venue and everything else, but it’d be interesting to hear you talk about what you do as an advance man and what are the pitfalls and the satisfactions?

Cavaney: Well, the first thing you want to do is ask, “Okay, where are we going to?” either very specifically or generally, and “What’s the objective?” That gets you going. And then there’s the step, if you have the time, to do some assessment - travel, shall we say, going out and looking for those two pieces of information at an area to say “Well, here’s a place where two or three options might work.” And then you would come back and take that raw data and say, “Okay, I’ve put these things in the four quadrants and slated four possibilities. One of them has really too high a risk element to it, so let’s eliminate that. That leaves us with three and, if I had to rank order the three, ‘We’d do this one and here’s why and the advantages and here’s this one.’” And you methodically go through this process. Now, if you’ve been in advance for awhile, you’ve been to many of these places and you don’t even need to do this special pre-advance trip to develop the options. You can assess pretty well from your own experience. So, you capture what you’re going to do.

Smith: Now, there’s an element of political judgment as well as logistics.

Cavaney: Exactly. What you want to do is you want to be able to go in to an environment, have a successful event by the standards that you are asked to achieve, either on policy message or a special occasion -- a dedication or something of that nature that’s significant. You want to leave the people, elected officials locally and the Congressional members that are from those districts or those states, you want to leave them feeling good about the experience, feeling that they and the people who are their constituents are the better for it. So, by definition, you’re playing politics with a lower case P, not necessarily a political party P, balancing off and trying to optimize what 1.) you wanted to get out of your objectives, 2.) what the local folks wanted to get out of their objectives; and then, of course, how do you execute it? I would say you spend about equal time between working all these various elements in measuring the value of the experience.

Smith: And egos.

Cavaney: And egos. Setting up conditions and setting up the site. We’ve done some unbelievable things “over” in advance work, because you want to be creative and you want that one picture to tell the story, even if without a headline or a tag line. And, if you can get that and leave town, and the people were happy you were there, you’ve achieved the “A.” for your grade. You also have to meld in locally the institution of the President, so you’ve got to deal with the Secret Service and their needs and demands. You’ve got to deal with the White House Communications Agency and their needs. You’ve got to deal with White House press corps as well as the local press corps, which don’t always see eye to eye on how they ought to be covering the event. And then you’ve got to deal with the Congressional Delegation that’s around from there, as well as state and local officials. So you spend a lot of time, and one of the skills you have to be pretty good at is empathy.

To be a good advance man, you’ve got to have a big dose of empathy, because you need to get a feel for where the sensitivities are and what they are early on enough that you can get the local contacts to buy into being a part of the process rather than come in to them and say “Well, here’s what we’re going to do.”

Smith: Which also presupposes checking your own ego or agenda at the door?

Cavaney: Absolutely!

Smith: You’re an instrument.

Cavaney: Yeah. Your ego is that “I want to do an “A” event and if I do an “A” event, and I meet the other objectives, that’s all I need.” And so you really do, you are the bottom man on the totem pole when you’re working through who gets taken care of and what gets done. And the secret to an advance man back in the old days, it’s a little less so now today, is that you should take none of the credit for anything and you shouldn’t be seen around because it’s not about you. You’re the facilitator. It’s all about the people who are the “set pieces in this play”, if you will, that should be on the camera, should be the ones that get to do the handshaking and get the kudos.

In the advance annals, if you go back a long time ago, there were times when people with strong personalities tried to play in that role and you could, to a degree be successful. But one of the things that President Ford stressed is that “I don’t ever want to hear that we went some place and that we caused a lot of damage or we left a lot of people with broken hearts or felt we were heavy-handed.”

This goes back to the model he was comfortable with. In the Nixon administration, you had very detailed, very, very precise and to the minute schedules. Most everything was signed off at a higher level. It’s the model that they used. That was the Nixon and Haldeman approach; it worked for them.

Jerry Ford, going back to the Congressional experience is, “This is what I need and I trust you’ll do this and so make it happen.” So you never really had to go back and get all the details approved, once you knew what was going down, except for some rare cases or for an individual who wasn’t going to quite fit in, but was going to be a problem if he didn’t get it taken care of properly. But by and large, that’s what made the President so loved by folks -- he had this view of inclusiveness, this idea that we’re all part of this. And another thing that’s interesting as an advance man is that Nixon and Reagan, to a degree, always wanted some private time, always wanted “Give me two hours right in here. I want to work.” Well, we started this approach with President Ford, and it didn’t take long until where he’d take fifteen minutes off this and off that and when you were in the last year in office, you couldn’t put private time on the schedule or in the holding room. He’d invite people in. He just was so charged up – he got his energy from being with folks.

Some of the best events that I did as an advance person, having done it for both presidents, were the Jerry Ford events because they just turned out exactly right. And some of them were done a little more on the fly than one would like to admit. Some of the Nixon highly measured events turned out less successful for me because you can’t control everything. So it really is this idea of facilitating and making happen what the objective is for taking the trip in the first place. And there are certain kinds of things that are more poignant, better understood, if they’re done in the White House because you want the mantel of the Presidency to add to the significance of the event. And then there are other things, because of the symbolism, become bigger than they might otherwise be, if the President was there and you did something “on site” so to speak.

Smith: One event sticks out, because nobody except Gerald Ford thought it could be done, including Dick Cheney. The event in Russell, Kansas. Were you part of that?

Cavaney: Absolutely. Wasn’t that a great thing?

Smith: Describe that improbable homecoming because, clearly, Cheney said they’d been through this incredibly difficult process and all were exhausted. Russell’s in the middle of nowhere. How are you going to get a crowd? And from there, what happened?

Cavaney: As soon as they started to talk about it, we sent somebody out there because you needed every single moment of time. So that’s the way we got started. And then we got calls, “Well, we can go over here” and “We can do this.” And so, we’d get on the phone and say, “Well, you can’t really do this because that house was moved about two years ago,” or something. So there were all these little things that had changed or were changing that weren’t quite what was envisioned. and there wasn’t time for people go out, and not many people had made a pilgrimage to Russell, Kansas to have any idea what was there.

I remember the guys that were there, all of a sudden, they were getting overwhelmed because the phone lines were just burning up. The old farm phones, you know, seven people, ten people on a party line, you know. “Guess what, we think the President’s going to be coming!” And the town just went crazy. It just went nuts. And I remember driving around to the back door of this one place and Dole saying, “Oh, come on, we’ve got to go do this and that.” Again, it was one of those kinds of things that I think if you went through it you thought, “Wow. This is real, and this is good.” And I think they left after the bruising convention, after the tension-filled period of time when we were in K.C., and still a lot of hard feelings were felt as you left. I think the call on that trip to Russell ended up being perfect because it just worked. And it worked because the people that were there, and their view of the honor being bestowed upon them by having this stop, was wonderful beyond words.

Smith: And, remember they went to Dole’s mother’s house?

Cavaney: Yeah, to the back door, literally.

Smith: Because the key wasn’t there.

Cavaney: Yeah, that’s what I’m saying. It just sort of all played itself out, because there wasn’t time to structure it and the goodness of the people that were there and the President’s not being an uptight person and just sort of going with the flow. It worked perfectly Smith: It’s hard to imagine with Lyndon Johnson. It wouldn’t be quite the same reaction to the unexpected.

Cavaney: That’s true. Very, very true.

Smith: Were you thanked after great events? Was there acknowledgement of what you’d done?

Cavaney: Yes. The President was very gracious to everybody, and he always went out of his way to thank folks. I know one of the things that we were always asked to do is have the senior leaders of the police and the fire and the local event organizational leadership come by and be at the steps of Air Force One at the end of the trip, so he could come by and say thank you. Their job was done at that point, yet he always would do that. He would go down there and thank the speechwriter if they went along on the trip. It was just his nature. It was very good.

Smith: Painful as it may be, can you think of an event that didn’t really go well?

Cavaney: Well, the balloon plop that I referred to earlier, that was one. It was a great event except for the damn balloons, which I will never forget. Another cute incident from the Japan trip. The President, was the first American president to go to Japan – significantly very, very big recognition for the Japanese, very much planned. There are two little events that stick in my mind that occurred there. The first one was when we went to Kyoto to enable Jerry Ford to see some of the precious treasures and Japanese antiquities there. We were staying in a certain hotel and we’d practice everything that you were to do, and there was this cute little Japanese girl in a kimono who was going to be the operator of the elevator when the President got on. So, she’s standing, she can’t be more than four feet tall at most, and here’s the President with his pipe in hand and he just walked in to the elevator. And, of course, when you get in the elevator, everyone backs away, and there’s already one agent in there and the President comes in. And this little girl says in broken English and shaking her finger at President Ford, “No smoking! No smoking! No smoking!” And he looks around and just taps his pipe in his palm and puts the pipe in his pocket. It was just one of those little things that captures you in a special moment.

And, of course, the other one is the famous “short pants” episode. We’d gone over the formal greeting and what made it bigger than anybody really fully understood is the advance people were going to do that. That’s our job, working with the valets and having all that attire always there and proper. Ambassador Cato, who was the Chief of Protocol at that time, insisted that he was going to do it because in the Japanese culture it was the right thing to do, and he wouldn’t share that or let anybody do it. And I can just remember, “Damn, you just can’t. You’ve got to have it done right.” In our own minds, we check it two or three or four times. Well, it didn’t happen with this, because he kept the formal attire and, for whatever reason, either it didn’t arrive quite on time or something. “Let’s see it. We want to take a look at it. Does it need to be pressed?” So it arrived at the 11th hour with only minutes to spare. There was nothing, nothing you could really do at that stage to fix it. And the rest is history. The president was none too happy at that, nor was anyone else around him about that. That was an interesting time in so many words. Ambassador Cato, in his function of a Chief of Protocol changed that day. And, the advance office, we inherited all the international trips and took over the role of negotiating logistics and protocols with all the governments visited, because of what had transpired. And, luckily, the rest of the international trips worked out. We didn’t have any other problems like that.
Smith: It tells you so much about the change in media culture. The enormity of the trip itself, the historical significance of the trip was overshadowed by a photo.

Cavaney: Yep, that’s right. That’s what the essence of what advance work is all about. You want the “A” photo, and the “A” photo ought to, without words, say what this whole trip was about. And the whole thing was, not ruined in a sense, but the opportunity to tee up that relationship and the incredible historic significance of the trip was diminished hugely by a faux pas.

Smith: What are your memories of the ’76 convention, because we keep hearing from people that it was bitter? It was tough.

Cavaney: It was. When we first heard about it, we thought, “Well, how are we going to take the advantages that the President had against somebody who was one hell of a campaigner, which Ronald Reagan was.” So we came up with an idea, and we talked to Dick Cheney about it, and he talked to the President about it. And it was “Let us replicate the Oval Office in this suite in the Hyatt there at the Hallmark Center.” And so, what we did is we went and put the flags and the pictures. You got the same kind of desk, and the only difference in the setting “feel” was an orange colored rug. You ushered people in like you would to the Oval Office and they felt almost as though it was the Oval Office. However, you’re still going back and chasing each individual delegate. And “How many are undecided?” and “Which delegations are there with us?”

President Ford spent several days bringing these people in. They’d get ushered in like they would get into the Oval Office. There’d be a photographer there to take pictures. They’d sit down like they would in the Oval Office. And so what we were trying to do there was to gain a comparative advantage, let’s say. It was tough. People were working very hard. There was a lot at stake. Working around the clock trying to gain intelligence as to what was going on over at the Reagan side. What should you be doing here in terms of where you stage people? What delegations did you think you could control and, therefore, you’d have a positive outcome?
Smith: And then you have those dueling entrances of the candidates’ wives which touched off strong emotions.

Cavaney: Yeah. I mean, as we later learned, those emotions had been there for a long time, they were sort of teed up in a fish bowl for the American public, world-wide to see. And after it was over, the political fissures between the sides never would dissipate to the extent that they never fully went away. I mean, we all recall Texas sat on its hands, so to speak, and a few other places like that where you just couldn’t make the breakthrough, possibly costing the election.

Smith: That raises an interesting question. Jim Baker’s the classic illustration, but you also… was there any awkwardness initially in demonstrating to the Reagan people your bonafides? Having been a Ford person, was there a period of transition of proving yourself?

Cavaney: At what time?

Smith: When you went to the White House, obviously they hired you, so they were comfortable. But over the years, maybe it’s an urban legend, but there were a lot of people in the Reagan White House who, let’s just say, didn’t always return calls from the Ford office. Lingering sentiments.

Cavaney: I’m sure there was some of that.

Smith: How did you view it?

Cavaney: Interestingly just the way I was hired by Jim Baker. I was the Deputy to Elizabeth Dole, so both of those people had incredibly close ties to President Ford. So I was, in my daily work, somewhat sheltered a bit from some of that. But at that point, having won, it really was all about moving on and doing things, and I think the calibration was “What do we need going forward?” Not necessarily, “what do we need going backwards?” So, I wouldn’t say there was a widespread view that “We won’t learn anything from the Ford group, let’s just go forward.” Again, it was more, “Look, we think we’ve got the right people in the right place and we’re only going to get this opportunity once. Let’s go for it.” And that’s what they did. But any lingering was transitional.

Smith: Were you on either or both of the California trips with the assassination attempts?

Cavaney: I was at both of them, yes.

Smith: What do you remember of those?

Cavaney: I still have it to this day; we drew a map, a walking map from the hotel that we stayed at across the street from the Capitol. The map covered the grounds where the President was to go in Sacramento where Squeaky Fromme was. And where just for the sake of, literally, Larry Buendorf and that little small piece of skin that fits between those two fingers, got his hand down there at the critical moment, so that the hammer basically couldn’t fire.

Smith: You could clear up something. Was that a spontaneous decision by the President to just walk over?

Cavaney: Yes.

Smith: It wasn’t something planned?

Cavaney: Well, we talked about it as a contingency, and we had said dependent upon how things are; it would be a nice thing to do.

Smith: You, the advance planners, not the President?

Cavaney: No, not the President. We told him, “Look, we’re all set. We could go either way and here’s sort of a drop dead time where you’ve got to be at this side, to take the car,” and it was a beautiful day. The Secret Service obviously were not all that comfortable, but it wasn’t a predetermined route. There was no evidence of where it was going to go, so you didn’t have those concerns.

Smith: As spontaneous as a modern President could have it.

Cavaney: Yes, absolutely. Again, because there were obviously demonstrators still around and doing things that were still in vogue a bit, not hugely, but still in vogue. Obviously, you picked up some people like that and Squeaky Fromme among them, who sort of trailed in and then obviously innocent people trying to go to work and walking through the park, they came along. To this day, I feel terrible about, you know, I say, “Gee, if I hadn’t had made that decision to go that way and recommend that President Ford could do it if he wanted, and it’s a nice day and a good photo,” it’s something that really, dramatically happened badly. And I really felt terrible about it. That was a burden it took me a while to get away from.

Smith: So, I take it that a sort of impromptu crowd assembled? Was that it?

Cavaney: No, we were walking about people; they would flow into the crowd. We weren’t going to stop and work the crowd. He was walking across, and people would flow in. Then you’d walk up and then there’d be a few people, and we would move into those and they would sort of, obviously, say on recognition, “It’s the President!” You know how all that goes. So it was clearly a moving kind of a group and that’s why I say that the fact that they were able to stop anything happening is a tremendous credit to the role that the Secret Service plays. They are good at what they do.

Smith: Did you see her?

Cavaney: I didn’t recognize or know who she was when she was moving around, but we could see people moving in. You could see the agents moving to provide the wedge that was their best security, since they didn’t have a lot of sight angles.
And as I said, it was when she started moving close, and it became obvious and Larry Buendorf, the lead agent, made his reach and got this little piece of skin wedged between the hammer and the firing pin of that gun. And that stopped what would’ve been a shot.

Smith: Did you see that?

Cavaney: I could see something going on. I probably conjured I saw something happen.

Smith: Was she wearing a red dress?

Cavaney: Yes, some colored dress, very clear, because you could see the movement, a very quick movement because you’re always attuned to seeing something like that, but its advance or Secret Service or whatever. We then just, you know, moved like crazy to get out of there and inside the Capitol.

Smith: On foot?

Cavaney: On foot. That’s the way you did it, yes.

Smith: And then a great follow up to that question of course is when he went in to see Jerry Brown, he never mentioned it.

Cavaney: Yeah, I know, I know. The other thing to show you how incredible he was; he took one of those maps that showed the route he was going to walk on and he signed it and he says, “Here, give this to Red.” So, I still have that map of that almost tragic walk around there and there he is, you know, right after almost being assassinated, moving on. I mean, just quite a person. Quite a person.

Smith: And then, three weeks later, in San Francisco.

Cavaney: We were out at the St. Francis Hotel in San Francisco. At the St. Francis, there’s a side street - a pickup entrance where you park the limos along the curb, and the crowd is held on the sidewalk across the street. Well, it’s a very narrow side street, very narrow. And, obviously, with the car there, it’s pretty evident to people who want to cause mischief what’s going to happen and where the President’s going to be. And the agents, you could see them. When you came out you always looked around, and they obviously are doing that a lot more than we are and you could see all these people in the crowd and [they’re] doing what they do best. There didn’t appear to be anything that looked strange and there’s nothing that would’ve been. We were moving fast, because I think we were five or ten minutes late at that time, so we’re moving really fast and then he stepped down.

You came out the door and then you had to go down a bit before you actually could get into the door of the car and away. It happened so fast, I literally was right in the line of fire because I had gone out in the street, to make sure I could see the end of the motorcade, and all the rest of the people get in their cars. The President was always taken care of at these moments. And, all I remember is hearing this crack over there and you could see almost the instantaneous move of pushing the president in the car. One wonders, had that shot been done a few seconds earlier when he was a few steps away from the car and at a slightly higher elevation. But, it’s very hard, as most people know, for somebody particularly one not trained to fire a gun at that range and in those particular circumstances.

Smith: Also, she had been deflected by someone.

Cavaney: Yes, somebody who saw what was happening and all. It was interesting. I remember warnings and discussions with the Secret Service about potential problems, but in all the things that he did and the many, many, many campaigns that he had to go through and expose himself so much, I don’t remember any other instances at all that even came close to those two. And they both happened in California, in the northern part of the state.

Smith: Did he wear a bullet proof vest?

Cavaney: Later.

Smith: Later.

Cavaney: Yeah, I think he may have had one on for that event because the first one had already happened. He didn’t care for that. There were a few discussions about the vest issue.

Smith: Really?

Cavaney: Yeah. But I think it was Kevlar, it was very modern, and so it wasn’t too bad, hardly visible.

Smith: It might as well have been a hair shirt.

Cavaney: Exactly.

Smith: And, of course, Mrs. Ford got back on the plane and knew nothing about it.

Cavaney: Yeah. Because she’d been off doing her part of the trip. Again, you think of the significance of those kinds of things and how, but for a small split second of time, like in the Reagan experience, they had early on. Again, but for half of a split second, it could’ve been a totally different world.

Smith: A couple of quick things and we’ll let you go. In the campaign, the famous Polish gaffe.

Cavaney: Yeah, that hurt.

Smith: Where were you that night?

Cavaney: I was there, right at the spot, and that was my alma mater of all places, which really hurt - a place I’d been to many a time. We had also had later that night the captain of the Mayaguez, the President thought this guy had become a great and heroic soul and he wanted to meet him and said, “Have him over at the place afterwards, and have him come in, and I’ll see him and have a chance to have a drink” and all that. But… it happened and right away you could see what was going on. We picked up and traveled. And we headed back out to the house to make sure everything was all set there. So, we arrived there, and the trip colleagues are all there. And President comes in feeling “Alright!” and then in comes Scowcroft and then they had to tell him and of course it didn’t sit well with him because that wasn’t what he meant, and he wasn’t going to say so. We went through that - I guess it was seven or eight days, where the polls had been going up before all that happened and then they just laid flat for 10 long days and then they went back up. But it just froze everything for a time, too long a time as history is our judge.

Smith: He had a stubborn streak.

Cavaney: Oh! I can remember Dick would come back and go, “Nope!” You didn’t need to say any more than this because you always went in with, “Here’s a great opportunity where you can go ahead and do this…”

Smith: It’s interesting to hear Stu Spencer talk about all that because he thought he was going to get fired and then Dick thought at one point he was going to get fired.

Cavaney: Oh, absolutely, this was a matter of principle to the President and if there was one thing he felt strongly about, it was his principles. Yeah, it was tough and go. That poor captain of the Mayaguez, he just couldn’t believe it. We finally had to just tell him what was going on. A whole new world took over, and we finished off that trip trying to do that. The other thing I think – you’ve probably heard this from other folks – but I thought one of the great cameo stories which made his homecoming to Grand Rapids so poignant was the deal that was worked out between Dick Cheney and the political people and the President. The President, of course, wanted to go out 24/7 and loved to campaign. So in his mind’s eye, he ought to get out, but what the polls showed of course was the more he stayed in and acted Presidential, the better it was. So it was this constant tension, the back and forth, and finally they worked out that deal where, “Okay, I’ll do what you do, but with two weeks left, we’re closing the doors, shutting off the lights and not coming back until we win!” And he went off and did that two weeks constant on the road, and that’s when he really put the talking car into motion. He loved the talking car!

Smith: Describe that.

Cavaney: There had always been speakers in the grillwork of the limousine, that you can’t see. Of course, that’s just like a lot of police cars and other kinds of emergency vehicles but the White House Communications Agency worked out this system - there was a microphone in the car and they said, “Mr. President, sometimes we can go to these spots that we couldn’t otherwise get to because there isn’t a stage or anything and you could just stand up in the car and talk from there.” And he went, “Really?!” God, he just thought that was the greatest thing in the world. And I can’t tell you how many towns he went to and that’s what he did. And then sometimes he’d get all fired up, we’re on a long ride and then these farmers along the side of the road or something and he’d go, “Hey there! How are you?” And it was like a whole new toy, and he was this perpetual motion machine at the campaign’s end.

And what it ultimately cost him, of course, was his voice. And it really was painful and the doctor took care of him all the time, but the President was able to get through it all. But, as I said, I think it really made poignant that night that I’ll never forget, that night that he finally went home to Grand Rapids. To go through all that, and he came in at night. The place was absolutely jammed, and he really couldn’t say a thing. Jerry or Betty wouldn’t come out to greet the massive crowd, as he’d break down in tears because of both the significance of what was happening as well as the frustration of that I’m sure was welling up. And, he just can’t tell these people how much he loves them and how much they mean to him. Later on, he talked about it, but it was quite a deal to see somebody on a sustained basis at the Presidential level to just go out and show no let-up. You could not have a blank spot in that schedule that he did not fill. He got up early in the morning and started and stayed up late at night.

Smith: We’ve heard it from a couple of people - there were those who wanted him to go to Ohio at the very end of the campaign, particularly southern Ohio, which is where in the end he lost the state, barely. And for whatever reason, the decision was made to go to Grand Rapids rather than Ohio. Does that ring a bell?

Cavaney: Yes. We actually had some people in Ohio just in case, again, it was pulled out of the bag. Having seen Grand Rapids, it’s very difficult to think of what Ohio was going to be like and then make the case to do Ohio. From my standpoint, you would’ve had to explain to the President that your Grand Rapids homecoming would be even better and that meant, how you were going to do it. It wouldn’t be at night. It wouldn’t be in the candlelight. It wouldn’t be all those things.

Smith: So it was never a question of not ending in Grand Rapids. In other words, one way or other, the President and Betty were going to go home to Grand Rapids.

Cavaney: Yes. Yes. He wanted to go home, and they wanted to go to this favorite breakfast place where they always went when they were there, which we did and that was sort of their way. So, I was not a part of what was a pure political discussion about Ohio. We got wind of it and had some people on the ground, but that’s all we could have really done. So I’m not sure how viable it would’ve been had we done it, and what would’ve changed. But obviously those were key stops.
Smith: And I’ll never forget the election eve broadcast, which had obviously been taped. It was on Air Force One with Pearl Bailey and Joe Garagiola and the President, which is really thinking outside the box.

Cavaney: Yes, it is.

Smith: One senses that those two people, he really enjoyed. They brought out the best in him.

Cavaney: They did. Garagiola was the old jock and the two of them and, of course, Joe can tell stories like very few can and then the President was always “Ha ha ha” while puffing on his pipe, and he would sit there and just be regaled by Garagiola. And then Garagiola did a lot of rallies and things for the President, and the President just loved the man. So it was just a wonderful, wonderful circumstance that they came together, because I think they both so enjoyed one another that it was one of those nice little relief moments. You know, campaigning is really hard work when you’re out there. Not only just being in the limelight all the time, but it is hard on the body. And you can see the President, when he would get that time to be around somebody -- it was a little bit of a lift and somebody that he wanted to be with, it was like pumping a whole new shot of adrenaline into him.

Smith: Again, the difference between him and Nixon.

Cavaney: Yes, he [Nixon] enjoyed being by himself. That’s what made him feel comfortable, being by himself. And again, Ford just enjoyed hearing things and being with others.

Smith: And Pearl Bailey was a real friend of the family, wasn’t she?

Cavaney: Yes, she was, and she was also one who had a sense of humor and could poke fun at the President and he’d go “Ha ha ha”. I mean, people who were like those two must have thought Jerry Ford was one of the best audiences you could ever have because he didn’t ask for much. He would just sit there puffing away at the pipe or just sit there with a drink and always react laughingly to whatever one had the punch line or a funny comment or something like that. He’d give you feedback. He’d let you know that he got it and he appreciated it.

Smith: And obviously he and [Bob] Hope were good friends.

Cavaney: Oh, yes. Yes, very much so. He was like a lot of lifelong politicians in those days who didn’t have to “protect” his district so to speak. And, he was moving into the leadership, he obviously spent a hell of a lot of time on the road. And you just can’t help but run into all these different kinds of people, including celebrities. And so when you finally get elevated to this job, and go to a town, like when he was vice president, we were advancing him and the advance guy would go, “Geez, I got 70 phone calls from people that say they’re Jerry Ford’s best friend here.” We’d always joke about the 340 men who were on the University of Michigan football team, because there was always “another” classmate of Jerry’s that was on the team with him. But they were just people he’d touched or knew in one way or other over the years, and they remembered him, of course.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Cavaney: I do. I do. The saddest day I’ve had in years and years and years. I had hoped the last time I saw him was going to be at his funeral. And I had been part of the group that put together the ceremony and everything like that -- and all the planning that had been going on for several years. My first wife had passed away from a stroke a few years before, and I was going to get remarried. The day of the funeral was the day of my wedding ceremony. But Betty told me I belonged at my wedding and Jerry would have had it no other way. It was the right choice, and I’m sure the President would’ve appreciated that, but I wanted to say ‘goodbye,’ that one last time like everybody else did, and I didn’t get that chance.

Smith: Were you at all surprised – I mean, I was wearing two hats –with ABC for part of the week and then with the family. And I can tell you the media were surprised at the extent of the public response, which seemed to build as the week went on.
Cavaney: Well, the whole thing that we had talked about was this frustration that he was there for only a short window of time, but accomplished a great deal. Then we went through tough times, and then Reagan became a bigger than life person. The Ford history had occurred and was pretty spectacular. So, the whole thought of how do we do things that capture the essence of what Jerry Ford was to remind people that he wasn’t a Reagan, but he was the right person at the right place at the right time and did extraordinary things? And I think having seen tons of historical references and whatnot; you didn’t have to do a lot of prompting to see that. It just sort of came out, and I know from the family and conversations we still have about that experience, the way the country reacted to who Jerry Ford was and what he meant in his service as President couldn’t have been written better. It didn’t happen by chance; or saying, “Gee, he wasn’t elected and he didn’t get to do much. Why are we doing this?” There were two big extremes, and I think, in part, it was because many of the old line media who’d been around for a while and served with him, in talking to some of them, they would talk about these stories with the new generation of press – you know, the media role had changed, we were covering different kinds of things in different ways. But I think a lot of that treatment that Jerry gave to the press, never feeling any animus towards them or anything at all, but treating them as equals. And, I think that treatment redounded to his benefit as those people talked about their days with Jerry Ford. And they said, “Whoa”, and gave him back credit. Because, we’ve been through a lot of different presidents since then and he served his country well.

Smith: One thing I want to ask you about at the time of the fall of Saigon, there was a trip to Tulane where the president in effect said our role in this war is over. Apparently, there’d been a real tug of war about that speech with Dr. Kissinger. What do you recall about that trip and the reaction?

Cavaney: I remember the to-ing and fro-ing about how it was going to go, but it became pretty evident to us that that was going to be “the war is over speech” kind of a thing. And we tried to do all that we could to create a serious environment. We had some demonstrator problems and a few other things like that. What we were trying to do was to have him walk in the building with a feeling that this is a special moment without telescoping it - but not the dancing bands and all those kinds of things. And I can remember people after that. The impact was so great that afterwards people went “Oh my God, did I really hear what I heard?”

And so, in that regard, he hit the right chord. I think he didn’t overplay or over make it by trying to do something big and sensational, which goes to the point that we talked about earlier. It was the right place to begin to heal the wound and do it in a way that it wasn’t so hyped up and so built up that no body felt happy with the way that it ended. I think it’s one of those things that actually turned out better than anybody could’ve hoped, when you really thought about how we were going to do this and what the significance of it was. So, again, just a touch about who Jerry Ford is and his capacity to capture the essence of the moment, be very empathetic, himself, and realize what needed to be done and how to do it.

Smith: You know, the flip side of that is he is the least self-dramatizing of presidents and in the short term that hurt him. In the long term that did redound to his benefit.

Cavaney: It did serve him well. I think it did. And he was very conscious about that. He would say, “Oh, we don’t need to be doing that. That’s not me.” Just very much a regular person. And, I think by the time he was in the campaign mode and proved himself through some number of things, that’s what attracted people to him. He was a regular person, and I think that, again, the few amount of votes, the pardon, and where we ended up going - I think a lot of people wish they could’ve taken that vote back again. I’ve heard that said many, many times.

Smith: I’ve often thought if there’d been a full term, then we’d be looking at this man with almost a Trumanesque cult because there were those similarities, the plain-spoken, unflashy, Midwesterner with solid values who knew who he was.

Cavaney: I think he was a person who wore better with time, and I think he could’ve successfully done another four years during a challenging period. To your point, I think we would’ve had no less luster and probably a good deal more accolades for what he was able to achieve during that really short time.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: One of the things we’re trying to do with this series is to get a sense of the context of the times and the culture, political and otherwise, that produced Gerald Ford. And we’ve heard some wonderful stories about West Michigan 40, 50 years ago - how it was then as opposed to how it is now, as I say, politically, culturally, maybe even spiritually. Where do you begin in all of this? Where are your roots?

DeVos: My roots are right here in Grand Rapids, Michigan. I was born on the East end of Grand Rapids near Diamond and Fulton Streets on Helen Street in a little dinky house in 1926. My grandparents lived a couple of houses away and this was an area of Grand Rapids known as the Brickyard. I never knew that until recently, but I’ve always heard them talk about it. But the other day I saw a plot map of the section and it was all 30 foot lots, I think. Nothing bigger than that. And all these little houses all stacked together. And the reason for that is that right near there was the area where most of the immigrants went to work. They worked in the brickyard making bricks. They had no skills, they didn’t speak the language and so there was a good old Polish element and a Dutch element nearby, but both working in the brickyard.

Smith: So the Dutch were working in the brickyard as well.

DeVos: Oh, yes. Absolutely. We were the poor Dutch. The Dutch didn’t come over here with money, they were fugitives like everybody else. The Holland culture was that the oldest son got everything. It wasn’t split because if you split a farm, it couldn’t survive. So the oldest boy got it and everybody else understood that. So they would move away. Many of them picked up and left and came to America. They just said, “That’s the only chance I have.” So they’d pack up and they’d come over here. So there was the beginning of the whole period of transplantation of people.
Smith: What was it about West Michigan that proved so attractive?

DeVos: It was a religious thing. Just like the city of Holland here was settled by Van Raalte. He had taken a whole bunch of Dutch of his church, literally transplanted a whole church group who all wanted to come to America. And they came together as a unit and they traveled on a boat down Lake Michigan and they saw the Holland area and they thought that would be a good spot to start a town and a community. And so they came and settled Holland, Michigan as a religious group and that whole college was a breakout from that because of the church group. They needed a school and Calvin College and Hope College were transplanted here that same way. And that ended up being the Reformed Church in Holland and ended up being the Christian Reform Church in Grand Rapids. There ended up being no real theological difference.

Smith: I was going to ask you what it was.

DeVos: But there were cultural differences. They argued in those days over unions, whether one church would allow it and the other church, if you joined the union would not, because you were pledging your loyalty to something besides God.

Smith: But you could use that argument for the Jaycees or the Kiwanis or almost any other fraternal organization, couldn’t you?

DeVos: It was like the Temple of Saladin group. You had to take an oath to that organization, and to some that was wrong. And those were the kind of arguments, but all those arguments have disappeared and they’re not important. But they’re not really theological arguments. Everybody tried to make them theological, but they were not. I’ve been working to try and combine those two denominations of late. I decided it was foolish in a lot of ways to keep them apart and the powers that be finally convinced me to let it gradually go together. They started to worship together. The cultural differences disappear and so it’s all kind of washing together anyway.

Smith: As a boy, were you very aware of the ethnic diversity around you?
DeVos: You’re very aware of the fact that there’s the Dutch and the Polish. The Protestants and the Catholics. And Catholicism was very close by with the Polish group and there was a, “If you aren’t Dutch, you aren’t much,” was our slogan and they had some other ones that were worse. But there was a lot of tension between the Polish and the Dutch, just competitiveness amongst them.
They lived right almost across the street from each other in the East end of town where I lived, but we played with them and worked with them and everything else, but we always fought with them a little bit, too.

Smith: What school did you go to?

DeVos: I went to Christian schools all my life, all parochial schools, all parentally controlled schools. The difference in our schools here is that they’re all run by the parents and not by the church. And it is still true to this day. Our whole Christian school system here is parentally controlled. It is not controlled by the pastors. The Christian Reform Church endorsed the Christian school, but did not run the Christian school. There was a lot of closeness in working together, but the controlling factor was with the parents.
The parents were on the board, the parents saw to the money, they managed the system and everything. That’s still true to this day.

Smith: There’s been over the years, at least I know in the context of the Ford story, a lot said about the different character, if you will, of South and Central. Is that exaggerated or was there a time when in fact they were very culturally distinct?

DeVos: The South always had a distinct, a different culture, a little tougher culture, I thought, a little roughness about it. And that, again, was a little bit farther out of the Dutch area as we would think of it, and a little mixed group and a lot of Catholic into that group as well. But, you see, the Christian group, therefore, many of them were in Christian schools, so it was not just between Catholic and Central. Central was up in what probably was considered a little better area, closer to the city. The other was kind of a union type area of town. I lived right near Central and there was always a split between all of us against South. South, there was nothing classy about the South, at least we never thought. And Central would’ve thought themselves as a little bit better. I didn’t go there, but it would probably be that way.

Smith: I get it. Do you have any memories of the Depression?

DeVos: Yes, I have very clear ones because, although I was born in ’26 and the Depression hit in ’29. From four years on, you’re growing up in that period. My father and mother had to move out of their home that they had built; out of probably a $4,000 house in those days, but they couldn’t afford the $25 a month payments and had to rent the house to save the house, which they did. We stayed out of that house for five or more years. My father was unemployed for many of those years. We lived back on Helen Street, the street I was born on, with my grandparents in an attic upstairs.

I remember at one time they wanted to put me in the Horatio Alger and they said, “Well, you aren’t poor enough.” So finally somebody made them realize we were pretty poor. We were poor enough so therefore we qualified from rags to riches. But we lived upstairs in an attic and got along. They were tough days but they were good days. From a kid’s standpoint, you didn’t know the difference. Everybody around was in the same state. A big deal was to exchange Sunday’s puzzles with your cousins. You would bring a puzzle over and they would give you a puzzle back so you had something new to play with or work on. Getting a penny for candy was a big event. I remember a night when somebody came to my grandparent’s house and tried to sell them a Liberty magazine for 10 cents and the kid said he couldn’t go home until he sold it. It was dark and he was weeping on the porch and our grandparents said, “We don’t have 10 cents.” And I presume that’s true.

Smith: President Ford was a real fiscal conservative, I mean a real traditional balance the budget, don’t spend what you don’t have conservative. And you wonder whether a lot of that came from the personal experiences that he had during the Depression, particularly going off to the U of M and on occasion selling his blood and, you know, borrowing. I think he had an aunt or uncle who helped him out. He obviously didn’t get anything from his birth father. there has to be a whole generation who was poor.
DeVos: There was. Just like now, some banks are closing, but here all the banks closed except one, Old Kent. Old Kent survived. Forever after that it was known as the bank that hadn’t closed. So when you went into your savings account and you have ten dollars, you could get the ten dollars out. But all the other banks closed and your money was lost and it was never regained. And so the loss in the banking system and keeping the money close and staying current. But you didn’t have the facilities of borrowing you have today. There was no offer to you, so we all think we’re really good people, but you really didn’t have the option. Even when I built my first home, it was a 50% down and a very careful check on your credit and whether you paid your bills and so forth. And it was accepted at 50%, but that was the standards of the day and it all was born out of those Depression years. But it was also part of the Dutch Christian culture of paying your bills and being worthy citizens and thriftiness is next to godliness or something.

Smith: We were talking to, I think, it was Seymour Padnos who told us about the prevailing Dutch Christian culture in and around Holland. illustrated by THOSE WHO would buy a Sunday paper on Saturday night, but wouldn’t read it until Sunday.

DeVos: That’s right. That was true. We would run down Saturday night if we could afford a paper to buy it. Yeah, you wouldn’t buy it on Sunday because every store was closed. You couldn’t find it. If you went to Holland, you’d better be careful because there were no restaurants to eat in. even many years later in my life, when you come to Holland, there was nothing to eat in. But Grand Rapids was closed up pretty tight and respect for the Sabbath day was serious and real and arguments as to whether you could even use scissors on Sunday was part of the joke of the day. You certainly could not go out and throw a football around. You could not go swimming, but it might be okay to roll up your trousers and wade, but you could not go swimming on Sunday. That was recreation. Sunday was set aside to go to church and to prayerfully think about your life and go home and play games with your family, if you wanted to. But you didn’t go out and do things other than maybe take a ride if you had a car.
Smith: Well, let me jump ahead because that’s fascinating as a background. For years, the story has been sort of muddled regarding the sequence of events in 1948 when Jerry Ford decides he wants to run for Congress. He wants to take on Bartel Jonkman. He also wants to marry Betty Bloomer and he tells her in the spring he wants to get married, but he can’t say when, and he can’t really tell her why he can’t tell her. The consensus is that, given the prevailing climate of the time, for him to publically announce his intention to marry a divorcée would have been politically very disadvantageous.

DeVos: I never thought of that, but I could see why.

Smith: Yeah.

DeVos: That would’ve been almost scandalous to marry somebody who’d been divorced in those days. He obviously got elected despite the fact he married her, though.

Smith: But he did wait until after the primary.

DeVos: Yeah, well, the general wasn’t as tough, once he got through the primary, it was okay. She was a pretty lady and everybody accepted that.

Smith: Did you know Jonkman at all?

DeVos: I did not know Jonkman. I was just turning 20. You see, in ’48, I would’ve been 22, having been born in ’26. So I was just of voting age, really. We were all just coming home from the war, just starting our first businesses, trying to get going, totally uninvolved in politics. Bill Seidman is the man who got me involved in politics. Bill was our accountant and when President Ford asked him when he became President if he would come to serve in the White House, Bill acknowledged he would and I went and saw him in the office. He was our accountant at that time and we had just started Amway and it was a very little company. We started Amway when I was 23, so we were really young and Seidman was our accountant. And he said, “Yes, I am and it’s something you should think about and you should certainly become politically active and involved. They have the ability to make you or break you.” And he said, “So you ought to start paying attention. Your business is growing, so you’d better pay attention on what is going on down there.” And so we started and never stopped. Got involved, as you know, in many ways through President Ford.
Rich DeVos August 21, 2009

Smith: Was this starting in his congressional days?

DeVos: We weren’t involved in his congressional days, but when Seidman talked was when he went to the White House. But we had been involved with the President before that as a congressman, and, you know, talking contributions to him, but not nationally involved.

Smith: What made him a good congressman?

DeVos: He was known. He was good-looking. And he was a man of integrity and in this community that’s all it would take. He was honest and they respected him and respected him all the years. There’s never any question about his ethics and in those days, you never found him coming home with big money from Washington to help the city or help the city build something. He said that wasn’t the ethical thing to do, to take advantage of his position.

Smith: There’s also a story - at one point, he had risen in the Armed Services Committee and was not yet Minority Leader, but he was on his way up. And a group from Grand Rapids approached him about getting some sort of military installation for West Michigan. And he argued against it, saying that that’s really not a firm foundation on which to build your long-term economy. That it’s subject to boom and bust and in effect could be yanked at any time. Which is, you know, a politically courageous position because it would’ve been an easy thing for him to have done.

DeVos: We did have a weather training station in our hotels. The Pantlind Hotel was a training [station] for weathermen and so forth but that was during the war. But that’s as close as we ever came to it. And there was never a base per se. They took over the whole hotel and ran a weather training school there.

Smith: Did you know Frank McKay at all?

DeVos: No.
Smith: Known by reputation.

DeVos: Only knew that he was considered to be unethical, but never knew the details of it. Knew George Welch pretty well as the Mayor at that time.

Smith: Now, was he part of the McKay organization?

DeVos: Well, nobody ever quite knew. Assuming he was because my wife remembers the days when she went out and got signatures signed to get George Welch thrown out of office and they did.

Smith: For what?

DeVos: I don’t know. I’m not sure my wife knows why. It was just he was seemingly crooked. George lived out near Ada and he used to come over to my office when Amway was young. And he’d sit and chat, developed a very nice relationship in his later years. But I never found out, I never probed him on the rest of it. But he was fun and he had good ideas and he was encouraging.

He built the Civic Auditorium which is now DeVos place on that site. But that was all done by George Welch and he built the pipeline to Grand Rapids from Lake Michigan. He got that done. He was a forward thinking guy and he was moving the city ahead. I think he contributed a lot even though a lot of the people wonder how he did certain things. But that was a part of the era.

Smith: Desperate times call for desperate measures.

DeVos: We ended with an auditorium ahead of a lot of cities and used it. I went there as a child to go to lectures on milk and the importance of drinking milk and we’d all get a bottle of milk when we left. We had many Amway conventions there.

Smith: It’s funny, you know, just sort of parenthetically, why did it take so long for the city to discover the river?

DeVos: I have no idea. When we built the DeVos Performance Hall and what’s expanded beyond the Civic Auditorium, our slogan was that all paths lead down to the river. The stories were of how the Indians came down to the river from Ada and Cascade, those cities were outposts for Indians. That’s why Lake Drive runs down like it does because they followed the easy way downtown. Ada came down sort of that track into Grand Rapids from that direction. Nobody ever made anything of the river, but it had been used industrially. Right where the Ford museum is were flour mills and furniture plants [they] were located all along the river.

Smith: Your personal friendship with President Ford, did it precede his presidency?

DeVos: Oh yes, but not in any personal way beyond he would come out to Amway - I remember we put a new line in to make cans like shaving cans, pressurized containers. He came out and it was a big deal. We opened the Center of Free Enterprise – that was a big day and he came out and celebrated with us. That’s probably when we took the most pictures and made a big deal out of that building and his presence there.

Smith: Well, I would think that would be something close to his heart.

DeVos: He was very cordial and hung around and would visit with people; so that’s how our relationship really began. Guy Vander Jagt was a congressman from Holland, got me involved in helping raise money for Congress and so we formed the Republican Congressional Leadership Club. And I would fly in an airplane load of people here and pretty soon we had four or five hundred people giving $2500 a year for Congress. That’s the first efforts of bigger fundraising efforts that we were doing.

Smith: When he becomes House Minority Leader, let alone vice president and president, there must have been people around here who thought, “This is great for us. I mean, there’s going to be something in this for us.”

DeVos: I didn’t get any of that feeling. I didn’t have any feeling of anybody around here saying, “This is going to be good for us,” other than the honor it would bring to us and how proud we were of having our famous congressman become the Leader of the House. When he became vice president, we said, “Wow.” We threw a party for him.

Smith: Tell us about it.
DeVos: I called him up one day and I said, “Mr. Vice President, anyone throw a party for you?” It happened kind of quick, you know. He said, “No.” I said, “Well, can we throw a party for you?” And he said, “Yeah, that’d be okay.” And I said, “You invite 25 people and I’ll bring 25 people down from Grand Rapids.” Our airplane would hold 25 at that time, so it worked good. So we got a room and set it all up and that was the night the story broke on the tapes and it became quite obvious he might go from vice president to president overnight. And in fact, I talked to him about that that night. And he said, “We really can’t talk about that at this time.” But it was the night that he was late coming to his own party because he had been detained in the White House because of this break on the tapes. Betty was there and our wives were there.

Smith: And how was she?

DeVos: She was fine. She was doing good at that time.

Smith: By the way - did you know, did people around here have any idea about her problem however defined?

DeVos: No. It was never an issue. The only time I came onto it once when we held an event at the White House with Billy Zeoli with Gospel Films, because Billy was pretty close to Ford and would go in and be kind of a spiritual encourager. Never written about, but would go regularly and Ford always would welcome him. And he was involved in athletics and so we had a big pro sports, a lunch at the White House to get these people to get behind him and support him. Planned to get him a little more political at that time - for that next reelection phase. And we had a nice deal and Betty came down to say ‘hello’, but she was a little shaky and that was my first time of wondering if she had a problem of some type.

Smith: Tell us about Billy Zeoli. Who was he and how did he fit into the Ford story?

DeVos: Billy ran Gospel Films in Muskegon. A good Italian who had a lot of flair and was a good leader. They would make films and rent them to churches. We would raise money to make a new Christian film. So we would make them and then we would loan them out and rent them to churches which produced the revenue to keep that going. Later on, we got around to where we shipped them for free to high schools all over America.

That was the kind of stuff he did. I don’t know how he got close to Ford other than through the sports side of it, I think. And we used to hold prayer breakfasts with ball teams and one time we were holding one, I think when he was still a congressman in Washington and he came to it with the Washington Redskins. And at that point he acknowledged his Christian faith. Billy felt that when he could, he would ask the players, “If you want to be a Christian, or you believe you’d like to accept Christ, put your hand up.” And he said President Ford put his hand up that he believed. So Billy continued the relationship with him beyond that and then he would go to the White House very regularly. And he was always cordial with him. Sometimes Billy would stay overnight. Rumsfeld never liked him very much, because he didn’t like anybody who got closer to the President, than he did, as you know.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that; you know I’ve been working for years on this biography of Nelson Rockefeller and Nelson went to his grave convinced that Rumsfeld did him in.

DeVos: Yeah.

Smith: And not only Rockefeller, but, of course, George H.W. Bush felt that he’d been deep-sixed at the CIA at the same time. But one of the remarkable things about Rumsfeld, his reputation is you’ll never find his fingerprints on anything. He doesn’t sign things, you know.

DeVos: He was careful.

Smith: He was very careful.

DeVos: He was a pretty crafty guy. I don’t know if he ever aspired to be president, but everybody aspires to be president. I know and they all are pulling whatever angle they can. It’s a vicious disease when you get close to that throne.

Smith: That’s interesting. It seemed, once Ford became president, he decided, “I like this job and I’d like to keep this job.” And Lord knows he worked his heart out, but unlike most presidents, he’s not someone who was defined all his adult life by the drive to be president. That set him apart. In some ways Reagan had that same—although Reagan wanted to be president, it didn’t distort his—

DeVos: He got involved with Goldwater and that tempted his interest in it. Then, of course, he decided to run for governor and succeeded and so he gradually got into it. Reagan wasn’t hanging around Washington where he got the fever as the other hangers-on. Cheney never seemed to have a strong hankering to become president. He was a real faithful servant, I always thought, in serving Ford and Bush as well. He wasn’t afraid to tell the President his views on things and that’s what you have him there for, though, he was criticized severely for it, but he never had a big yank to move ahead. He served well and he eventually would have loved to be one if fate had brought it to him.

Smith: People tend to forget that it was really Jimmy Carter in 1976 who sort of brought evangelical Christians into the process in a major way. And I’ll bet you there are people who still don’t know what Gerald Ford’s religious convictions were.

DeVos: I’m sure.

Smith: But I take it they were genuine.

DeVos: They were genuine, but they were private and kept that way. And Billy working with him swore to him that he would never talk about it and never did. He finally wrote a book with the President’s permission on some of the things about it, but it was long after he was out of the White House and had left there.

Smith: Did you have a discussion with the President about faith?

DeVos: I never did personally. When we had him on the boat, he was on the boat with us for a trip. We had Bill Simon, Admiral Owen, who was the head of the Navy in Italy came with us on that trip. That was the first time with the Admiral. Also Peter and Joan Secchia was his ambassador to Italy.

Smith: Was this as a former President?
DeVos: No.

Smith: He was in the White House?

DeVos: After he was out of the White House.

But then he was very much a part of the devotional periods at dinnertime and so forth. And when it was time to have prayer, he would offer prayer. Simon was a very open Catholic and was one of the few people who could offer communion. Did you ever know that he could give the Eucharist right in the prisons?

Smith: Really.

DeVos: Bill Simon would spend almost every Sunday in the prisons talking to the people on death row, offering them the Eucharist for the forgiveness of their sins. It’s an amazing story, you know. It’s unknown about that guy.

Smith: Absolutely. And it runs so counter to the popular image that he had.

DeVos: But he was a very devoted guy. So, Simon, we became big friends with Bill Simon and his wife. His second wife, as well. You speak of uniqueness about people, Simon, if you go to his house, we went to his house once for lunch, we were chartering his yacht, so he says, “You’ve got to come over and talk. We’ve got to talk about it. You’re the only guy I’ve ever lent my boat out to.” I said, “Well, okay.” He said, “Come over to the house. We’ll talk about where you’re going to go.” And so we had a nice lunch and his wife served a nice lunch, soup and everything, and he put his food on the table and it was a peanut butter sandwich, peanut butter and jelly. And I kind of commented and I laughed a little bit about it. "Yeah," she said, “that’s all he eats.” And so then we were cruising with him in the islands in the Greek Islands and we’d go out for dinner. And he’d carry a paper bag with him and he’d have a peanut butter and jelly sandwich. And he’d sit at the table with everybody and when it came time to eat, he’d eat his peanut butter and jelly sandwich.

Smith: A wonderful ending.
DeVos: Not an adventuresome eater and yet a guy who’d serve Eucharist. One of the few people given that. Was very religious, very faithful in his service. Personally, Ford, I think was faithful in his devotions, just very private.

Smith: He was in many ways, a private person.

DeVos: Well, he didn’t want to use those things for good or for evil. Carter used it publically. I don’t know if he meant it for good, for his advantage probably, and it served him, I think, well. But it took away for some his credibility of serving all Americans. And I think Ford understood that when you get in the White House you serve everybody. I think our present President lost that completely. He never understood the importance of the office of saying, “I’m here. I serve you all.” He says that, but he doesn’t do that.

Smith: Did you ever ask President Ford for a favor?

DeVos: Not that I know of.

Section edited out.

Smith: This is out of sequence, but I cannot let it go without thanking you. One of the frustrations that I felt, I’ll phrase this carefully, when I was at the Museum. I always thought it was, to put it mildly, unfortunate that, particularly as he aged, he was forced to fly commercial. And I, and so many others of his friends, are grateful to you and those around you who particularly those last few years eased the rigors of travel.

DeVos: Absolutely.

Smith: It never should’ve come to that in my opinion.

Smith: You know, President Ford took a lot of heat after he left the presidency for going on boards and making some money, of which he didn’t have any.

DeVos: That’s right, he needed it.
Smith: Of course he originally intended to retire to Grand Rapids and make a little bit of money for Betty and the kids. Now, subsequent to that, presidents make a lot more money for speaking and serving on boards and the like.

DeVos: But in those days, they were criticized pretty much for speaking fees.

Smith: Yeah. Speaking fees and the boards.

DeVos: Oh, yeah, the board thing was a hot issue for him when he went on American Express and of course Bill Seidman was there. See, I knew how poor he was and Seidman tells this story of when he first went to the White House, maybe you know the story. The first question was, “When do I get paid?” He said, “I’ve got a son going to college and I don’t have the payment to send him off to college. And so I need to know when I get paid so I can write a check.” Seidman said, “The ethics of the man, after all those years of public service, he never put any money in his pocket.” And Seidman says, “When he left the White House he still didn’t have any money so he had to do all these things.” It’s a lesson people should know - that the real devoted people in government don’t come out of there with anything. And Al Haig said to me, “I was in charge of 5 million troops and I ran this huge operation, but I made $150,000 a year,” he says, “and you’ve got to pay for your own bread and butter, practically.” You’re surprised when you finally go to the White House you’ve got to pay for your meals. It’s always a shocker to them.

Smith: Did you see Ford at all during the ’76 campaign? For example, were you at the convention in Kansas City?

DeVos: No, I was not at that convention. No.

Smith: He wound up the campaign back here in Grand Rapids. Were you around then?

DeVos: Yes.

Smith: What was that like?
DeVos: Well, it was an exciting event in Grand Rapids. I’m trying to remember the timing, whether we had the hotel then or not.

Smith: I don’t think you did. I think that was just a few years before.

DeVos: Yes, before we stepped into that role. Grand Rapids was a sad city in those days. Secchia tells stories that the Secret Service would not allow the parade down Monroe Avenue because all the stores were closed and it would be such an opportunity for people to sit and get lined up to shoot him and they didn’t want a parade because of the vacant stores in our community. Our downtown was - a lot of little cities like Grand Rapids were hurting in those days. But, you know, after WWII, the euphoria in our country was so great when Ford decided to run for office for the first time, I’m sure, it was such a positive time. You guys are all young and you missed all that, but after serving in the military and being gone for several years, the pent up excitement and belief in ourselves was so overwhelming that we could do anything. And those were great days. You know, we had our glory days, that was when Jay and I started our first little flying school and our first business after WWII. They were good days, but they were nice, simple, less regulatory, less complicated days.

Smith: Well, there’s got to be a joy in the sheer act of creating.

DeVos: Yes.

Smith: I mean, you were creating something.

DeVos: Yeah, but, you know, we fought every government in the world, but nevertheless, that was part of the joy of prevailing in those conditions, whether you’re dealing with the Chinese government, with Russia, with the Indian authorities which we fight now. (section edited out)

Smith: Gerald Ford when he was in the White House was considered the most conservative president since Coolidge. Yet he lived to be seen by many within his own party as some kind of liberal. In part because of his views on some social issues. But that tells you less about him than it does about how the party evolved. Particularly under Ronald Reagan, but post-Reagan as well. What kind of conservative was Gerald Ford?
DeVos: He was what we would call a fiscal conservative and a more social liberal. More a liberal status on the social issues, that’s all. Tolerated today much more so than tolerated in the days he was there. The difference was, there weren’t as many other big issues. I mean, you don’t have big issues, you focus on the small issues, so abortion and those issues became huge. Today, Afghanistan and wars and things are the issues, but in Ford’s day, we fought over little things that were important to a lot of people.

Smith: Well, it’s interesting, the older I get the more I come to the conclusion that ideology, philosophy – I’m not dismissing them for a moment - but that the biggest single factor in political change is generational.

DeVos: Yes.

Smith: And each generation has its own outlook, its own set of conventions, its own set of issues. And Ford, it seems to me, is someone with a very Midwestern sensibility, a profound decency, a real fiscal conservativism, but that co-existed with compassion toward people who were victims, genuine victims, in life. And as far as most social issues, he sort of came of age in a culture that basically didn’t talk about, I mean, that viewed these things as intensely personal. And certainly not subject for government action or even political debate. And all that changed almost on his watch. John Paul Stevens told us that when he was nominated for the court in 1975, no one asked him the question about abortion.

DeVos: Really?

Smith: Not a single question.

DeVos: In ’75?

Smith: In ’75, late in ’75, which is probably the last time that would ever happen. This is two and a half years after Roe v. Wade and yet no one asked him a question. But, by 1980, it was clearly a significant issue and a defining issue for conservatives.

DeVos: Well, it still is, isn’t it?
Smith: Well, sure.

DeVos: It’s one of those issues that will probably stay alive for forever and probably should stay alive because I’m opposed to it, you know. The casualness with which you take a life - argue when it starts if you want to - but it is life and especially when you get into late term abortions when they kill them as they’re practically born and you stab them to death. I mean, it’s just staggering the extent to which they go today. The casualness with which they treat life, and that begins to extend all the way over after awhile and we’re seeing that today. And that’s what I think a lot of us will always fight against.

You see the fear that Obama brings today isn’t just one issue, it’s all the people he’s got around him and as you evaluate it and you see the string of it, you wonder where it leads us. And so you might not fight quite as hard on the health issue, but it’s only one big step in controlling a huge chunk of the economy. But the crowd that’s in the streets are really talking about capping trade and they’re really talking about the union issues and forcing unionism on America. And it’s all the issue of government takeover. The historical issues - they talked about it, they all talked about it a long time ago that that was the normal progress of society. But it just seems like it’s happening in front of our eyes.

Smith: It seems as if the traditional economic issues have yielded to cultural issues and to many people, moral issues. It’s not surprising that that should give rise to a more intense debate, perhaps an angrier debate because you’re not talking about dollars and cents, you’re talking about what many people hold absolute as their core moral convictions. It’s a differential between the two and that maybe helps to explain the ferocity of the modern political back and forth. People feel with an intensity that goes beyond purely economic issues.

DeVos: Would the dismissal of the Nixon thing that Ford did, giving him a pardon, would that be an issue today?

Smith: Do you mean, if we went through a Watergate today and the president pardoned his predecessor? I’ll tell you why in some ways it would be more intense. Because of cable TV and the internet. I mean, nothing has done more to coarsen the political discourse or to oversimplify. Cable TV is the classic example. You have a 24/7 news cycle. Every day you need a new story. You need a new twist to the narrative. It’s all black hats and white hats. It’s all about conflict. Conflict sells, which is why you have a liberal channel and a conservative channel. And then the internet, which obviously can be wonderful and does many wonderful things, but it also provides a cloak of anonymity for on-going character assassination which has really poisoned the well, in some ways. So in that sense, I think it would be an even bigger story.

DeVos: Would that be because people know less?

Smith: Well, that is very interesting. If you stop and think, in theory, people said this when television was new. They said it when cable was new. They said it when the internet was new. In theory, we have access to more information than ever before.

DeVos: Than we should have?

Smith: Well, there’s free will and if we’re concerned citizens, we make it our business to continually educate ourselves. But the point is, does anyone really believe that this is a more informed electorate than in the past?

DeVos: No, maybe not.

Smith: I doubt it.

DeVos: But the issues seem to be a lot more fierce, as you say, and maybe a lot more complex.

Smith: That’s interesting. You’re absolutely right. They are more complex and so much about our lives and particularly the media all drive in the direction of simplifying, oversimplifying. I mean, it’s red and blue.

DeVos: And the government is so driven to complicate, complicate, complicate. I just talked to a physical therapist and she said, “You know, I used to get a new patient and now it takes me two unpaid hours just to get a new PT patient registered in the system. It’s a 50 page thing I’ve got to document, sign, and read, and study and find out.” Just silliness.

Smith: That’s the kind of thing, we go back to Ford as a conservative. He really began the deregulatory movement. And although it’s funny, you know, he didn’t like the phrase deregulation. He liked regulatory reform much better. Which, when you stop and think about it is politically smart. It doesn’t sound like we’re taking away protections; we’re reforming a system that’s gone awry. But certainly he was the kind of conservative who found excessive government and regulation objectionable.

DeVos: Well, the corporate cost today in trying to keep up with it is - any one of us can be charged with a crime today and that means you as well as me. There is something, some law you’re breaking that you’re not even aware of. And if they want to find you and hang you when somebody gets mad at you, they can dig up something on you. And so a little bit of a fear that lives in all of us that the lawyers are bad and good today.

But I tell you, the ones who are vindictive and they want to hang you, this guy on Wall Street going after the AIG people and all that stuff, all for his glory to become governor is the total abuse of all this little nitty-gritty crap. And so we dealt with AIG as a company and successfully and positively, they were a good organization and Greenberg was considered a good, honest guy. But this other guy got mad at him for some reason and maybe it’s because he wouldn’t support him and he was a big player, but the abuse of the regulatory process by the government has become bad. But we’re not here to talk about that. We’re talking about the changes that happened during the Ford time. You’re talking about the transition. He was in that period, I think. You’re a historian, so you look at that as a sequential thing in how that occurred. But our country has certainly become - and in those days, Ford and O’Neill would get together and have a beer or whatever after they’d argued, but like good lawyers would, they’d fight over it and knowing there were different viewpoints on it, but there are contrasting viewpoints that you can argue on today, fiercely, but they don’t have a beer afterwards.
Smith: How right you are. There’s a wonderful story. Someone had just joined the White House staff. The President and Tip had had a meeting in the Oval Office. It went very well, and then Tip went down into the driveway and proceeded to lambast his host and this guy, of course, is very literal. He sees the contrast between the two and he goes back in and tells the President, “You won’t believe what the Speaker is saying,” he goes on, chapter and verse. Ford has his pipe in his mouth and he says, “Oh, Don, that’s just politics.”

DeVos: Well that was because he and O’Neill had that relationship. They could laugh about it and didn’t carry the bitterness over into a lingering hatred. O’Neill was a good Irishman, you know, a little bit of Reagan in him.

Smith: You’re absolutely right. Yeah.

DeVos: But President Ford, you know, I can only reference it from our experiences with him, but he was also a man able and willing to listen. Bill Nicholson, if I was in Washington, I’d call him up and say, “Hey, I’m in town. Just wondering if the President’s in town. I’d like to come over and say ‘hello’.” Now, that compared to today didn’t seem to be a challenge for me. I knew Bush better in a lot of ways, but I would never do that with him. But I felt comfortable enough to just inquire. I had no idea who the other people were, but I knew Bill and what’s his name over there and I’d call up and I look back today and say, “What a lot of guts you had to even try that.” And their answer would always be, “He’d like to see you.” He liked to see somebody who didn’t want anything. He just wanted to see someone from Grand Rapids to say hello. And usually he’s say, “Oh, he’s got 10 minutes here, so why don’t you drop in.” So I would come on in and they seemed to be easy to get in, in those days. I don’t know why it seemed easy, but it was. And you just go in and spend a few minutes and then I’d say, “Time’s up. I’ve got to get out of here.” If we were on something interesting, he’d say, “No, sit down a minute. I want to hear more about that.”

And one of the things that I’d get into with him is I talked about how to get him reelected. I said, “You’re not the greatest speaker in the world. You don’t have time to go out and tend to the business of speaking and then running right now. And I have an idea for you. I want you to set the 200th anniversary of America. I want you to appoint 200 Americans to become ambassadors to America. From all walks of life, you can get union people, you can get whatever leaders you can find, doctors, lawyers, everything, a mix of people. And they’re going to be your advocates for the next time until the election or whatever. But it isn’t for the election. It’s just to help inspire Americans to celebrate on the 200th anniversary.

And give these people half a dozen speeches and when the White House gets a request for speaking, say, ‘The President can’t come, but I have an advocate, I have my ambassador from that area who’d love to come and he’ll present my latest views to you and he will speak on my behalf.’ And tell this person to say, ‘On behalf of the President of the United States, as his ambassador, representative, I’d like to present to you his latest message which I just got today from the White House and try to fill you in as best you can.’ And you can do new speeches as fast as you want or whatever.

Whatever message you want to get out, all 200 of us are delivering speeches all over the country in every little two-bit rotary club and every little place. 200 people, you’d never think would take the time to go to and we can go and advocate for you all the time and you can do away with the campaign issue. Have nothing to do with the campaign issue. Just give us all a nice little kit, simple speeches, and give us a button and send us on our way.”

He said, “That’s a great idea. Write it up for me, will you?” So I was flying to Australia and writing it up, I remember it well, sending it in. And I didn’t hear anything for a while. Next thing I got a letter from the White House saying, “We already have a speaker’s bureau. Thanks.” And they totally missed the significance of having these laypeople, these citizens out advocating every day, in little places, you know. I said, “If you want 2,000, take 2,000, but it’s the 200th anniversary and you have 200 people speaking for you.”

Smith: He was well aware of the fact that he was not a great communicator.
DeVos: I told him, “You can win if you just start the campaign right now. You’re just in here, let’s get the campaign started and this would be my view of how you get it started. Celebrate the 200th anniversary.”

Smith: It’s interesting, because there was criticism internally that he waited a long time. That first of all, they didn’t take Reagan as seriously as they should, but that he just waited a long time to get the campaign started.

DeVos: Well, he was afraid to get too political too quick. But I said, “This will be non-political. This is just the 200th anniversary of America and this is your way of celebrating it.” I said, “You’ve appointed ambassadors all over the world to represent you. Why can’t you appoint 200 ambassadors to America?” And, later on, I kidded him, I said, “If you’d listened to me, you’d be President by now.” He laughed and all that. Who knows? But he could’ve got a jump on the game.

Smith: Did he talk about what might have been? He struck me as someone who really lived pretty much for the future. I mean, he would reminisce if you’d bring things up.

DeVos: He never dwelled on what might have been, but you got that when he lost how serious it was and what a hurt it was. But when my son lost the governorship, it was a hurt. But not that kind of hurt. In fact, said, “Come over this morning, Dick. Let’s have a cup of coffee and see how you’re doing.” He said, “I’m doing okay.” He said, “I never had so much fun. All of you are worried about me but I had a ball. I met the nicest people. I traveled this state. I’ve been to every county in this state. I’ve done every little prayer breakfast, every little county GOP meeting you can imagine. So I’ve been there. I’ve met the people. I’ve listened to them.”

In fact, the people running has campaign got mad at him because he’d take too long listening. They’d say, “Come on, Dick. Move along, Dick. Shake some more hands.” And he said Dick would always take his time and listen. Ford had a great ability to listen. At least he’d listen to me if I came in and I was nothing, I was this little business guy, but he was always respectful and listened and very cordial.
Smith: I want to ask you because it’s almost as if you were teaming up to revitalize Grand Rapids. He was, as the story goes, offered a site outside of town for the Museum and made it very clear that he wanted to put it downtown. I think, in hopes of sparking some renewal. And then, of course, you refurbished the Pantlind.

DeVos: At the same time, it was all coming together.

Smith: Was it all coordinated?

DeVos: It was not as coordinated as it might have been, but Fred Meijer wanted to get it out of town. That’s what it came down to. In any case, Fred’s a great guy and a good friend, but he really wanted to get the Museum and his planned garden out there. He thought that would be neat. It would’ve been. There would’ve been nothing wrong with it. It would’ve been just fine, but Fred finally said, “Okay, let’s get it downtown

Smith: Now, what lead you to buy the hotel?

DeVos: That fundraising for that music hall. That lead me to being involved in the new convention center expansion at the same time. The city was doing the convention center expansion. The hall had to be done privately. They wanted it to be done privately. So we raised the money for the hall. So then I got to working on trying to get a hotel downtown. I said, “If we’re going to have a new convention center we ought to have a new and expanded hotel.” Well, we couldn’t find anybody. I went to Hyatt and Hilton and I talked personally to all those people about bringing a hotel to Grand Rapids. They all said, “No, we don’t do hotels in cities like that. We aren’t going to put a hotel on an old city like that.” So we were directly turned down. And then Marv DeWinter, who designed the Ford Museum, came to me one day and said, “I’ve got an idea. Let’s put a hotel right in the river.

Section edited out

We had hired a research firm to look at it and they said, “Well, putting up 200 or 300 rooms, it might break even.” But we got caught up with working with the mayor of Grand Rapids at that time and we were using the Pantlind Hotel fairly good for our conventions.

Section edited out.

Well, I don’t think we paid that much for it, but they told us we could fix it up for six million. They said, “For six million, you could restore this hotel and make it really nice.” And we accepted on that basis but that was not accurate. Twenty million dollars later, we got it done. After closing the place up and really going at it; getting in the basement and finding out how bad it was. It was bad. But we restored the whole place and made it a beautiful hotel. But we were holding back the tower which is the tower end of that hotel. That was the next step if we were comfortable with the first step, and we were comfortable with the first step.

Conventions were beginning to come back, the city had a nice hotel and I guess our vanity got to us, “Aw, let’s finish it up. We’re this far. See what happens.” So, we did it. It was a turning point for the city and the President was there when we opened it. I said everything that is important is going to happen in this place. But we did the hotel, the Ford Museum came on, the art museum came on, new buildings happened up around us. We have a beautiful city today.

Smith: He was so proud of what had been done and he was so interested. You know, the night before the funeral, I went out like everyone else and just walked around the crowds and went back and rewrote the end of my eulogy. And this quote which actually came from Tom DeFrank that, you know, in the last months of his life, when he couldn’t sleep at night, he would say, “I go back to Grand Rapids.” That wasn’t just a figure of speech. I mean, in some ways, he never left. And I think, well you would know much better than I, I’m sure there was criticism at the time when he left the White House and didn’t come back here, but he came back often.

DeVos: He was so faithful to Grand Rapids, it was unbelievable. He did so much more for Grand Rapids than was expected or whatever. Whenever we asked him for anything at the hotel, he came.
Section edited out.

Smith: Did you see him at all out in California? Did you visit with him on Rancho Mirage?

DeVos: Oh, we’d stop in there occasionally. We’d land in there and go to the house and have a cup of coffee and visit with him periodically. I think we did it three or four times coming through there. Or if we had a meeting or something in that area, we’d stop by.

Smith: They seemed happy out there.

DeVos: They seemed to enjoy it out there and he loved his golf, but, why not? It was a beautiful set up and it was much better than coming back to Grand Rapids. The criticism about not coming back was momentary.

Smith: Oh, no, absolutely. And I know as long as I was down there at the museum, just as you said, he would come back. The 25th anniversary, remember when we had Billy Graham in town?

DeVos: Wasn’t that a great event?

Smith: I just thought this is the perfect event for Grand Rapids and what a wonderful tribute to President Ford if we can get Reverend Graham to do it. And he rearranged his schedule and he was spectacular. When he’d get behind that podium, it was like God was speaking to him. It was just extraordinary the transformation that took place. And to see the two of them together, it was a once in a lifetime event. But, you know, it was a lot easier not to do anything than to do something that might be criticized.

DeVos: That’s what keeps most people from progressing in life, in my opinion. Fear of doing something is what stops them. In Amway when I’d start with people, maybe a truck driver or worker in a factory and I’d try to get him in Amway, they can’t get over the fact of just going out and asking somebody to buy a bottle of soap. That fear of what they will say, fear of being criticized for being in Amway, for example. None of that was true around the rest of the world. I was just on the phone this morning with Billy Graham’s grandson. He’s a preacher at a church I go to in Florida. He’s a young guy, just 37, but he’s a nice young guy. But we were fairly close to Graham, that was a great move.

Smith: But that year, we had a number of people in conjunction with the 25th anniversary of the presidency. One of them was Justice Stevens and President Ford came all the way from California to introduce Justice Stevens. Which he didn’t have to do, but he did that for everyone who came in that series. Alan Greenspan and others. Anyway, I remember asking him, “Mr. President, when was the last time you remember talking to Justice Stevens?” He said, “When I appointed him.” I said, “Really?” And it turned out that Justice Stevens had always dreamed of playing golf with President Ford. So that afternoon, after the event, they went out and they played golf. Which was just a wonderful—DeVos: He knew he was President but it never went to his head. He remained true to himself all through those years.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

DeVos: No, I don’t. Saw him a couple times in Colorado.

Smith: They loved it there, didn’t they?

DeVos: That was a nice house they had there.

Smith: Yeah.

DeVos: That was a nice view for them. But, you know, Firestone helped him and took care of him nicely. You know, that was just a grand thing of Firestone to do. To help him because he didn’t have any money, you know, when he came out of there. And where does an ex-President go? To rent a garage? He didn’t have all the back-up all the other guys had, the years of money-making and so he needed a guy like that. I was just glad to be there on the airplane thing. You mentioned the airplane thing and I’m glad you did because I was honored to. You just realized they were struggling and he didn’t have the money to just go out and do big things. And so Firestone I’m sure helped him with his house and so we threw an airplane in. You know, it’s nothing. It’s not a big deal, but it is a big deal for them.

Smith: Yeah, it meant a lot to him.

DeVos: And so it was one of those things you look back at with fond memories. I would have to sit and just recollect my schedule a little bit as to when I saw him the last time.

Smith: Were you surprised at the time of his death at the amount of the public reaction? Not just here but around the country?

DeVos: I think so. You know, as the years went by, he looked better and better as a president. People came to appreciate what he did and his courage and the fact that he saved this country at that time from what could’ve been a real disintegration. And people didn’t appreciate it at the time, but as time goes by, they realize his courage and his integrity. Even like having a little party for us for him, he and Betty came and just like old shoes, you know, and he’d sit and he’d laugh about things and do things.

Smith: He was very comfortable to be around.

DeVos: Yeah.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

DeVos: About as we are talking about. As a really, truly great American. One of our greatest presidents if for no other reason than his ability to do what had to be done, knowing it would cost him the presidency. There aren’t any I know of who would do if they knew what they were going to do would cost them the presidency, they would not do it. But he did. And so I think as people look back at that history, they’re going to say, “This is a man who loved America and served it at the highest level” for him. And that sort of went from I seen him gone downhill. I didn’t respect Reagan or like [?] Reagan, but after that it was all, “What’s in it for me?” and “How can I help my buddies?” and “How can I get my agenda through?” Ford didn’t come with an agenda. See, everybody else has an agenda. Present guy especially. It seemed like somebody wrote the book for him before he came, in some ways, I think to destroy but to move it to a socialistic, an evening, which is his dedication, to even out everybody.

Smith: The great thing for President Ford - I mean, poor LBJ, whatever you think of him, but God, he died the day before they announced the Vietnam peace agreement? Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon. And when the Profiles of Courage award - when the Kennedy Library made that award - he said, “For twenty years, everywhere I go people used to always ask the same questions. Now they don’t ask them anymore.” It’s almost as if having the Kennedy imprimatur absolved him of the old allegations. Life was good. Physically it got tough at the end.

DeVos: They had a nice life afterwards, didn’t they? They seemed to have. And he enjoyed doing the public things he did. He enjoyed coming to Grand Rapids.

Smith: And I’m told really right up until the end, the last time he came back here, he would tell the agents, “Drive me through this neighborhood.” And he would go back to where he used to live or went to school. Or just to drive around downtown to see the latest buildings under construction. He never lost his interest in his own congressional district.

DeVos: It was more than living, he lived here. It was the beginning of his career. And so I’m glad he’s buried here. This is a special place and the people treated him admirably when the end came. But he was one of us. Yeah, he was just one of us. He didn’t put on airs. Today, that’s it made out of a kingdom cloth [?] and I don’t know, he must have a nice airplane to fly but it wasn’t put up at the level today of the airplanes they fly. And Pelosi and her demands for an airplane, the lack of quality in the person of favored treatment for her. And Reid’s latest effort to finagle the health bill so it would exempt Nevada of certain tax penalties. I mean that is gross abuse of privilege. That, Ford would never do.

Smith: That is a perfect note on which to end. That is great.

Smith: Thank you so much for doing this. I want to get into your pre-Ford history, but I’d like to ask you first, something that I ask a lot of people upfront. Can you tell us something about Gerald Ford that might surprise people?

Keiser: I don’t know people’s perception of President Ford. I found him to be very gregarious, pleasant. My contacts with him led me to believe that he was very self-confident. He was very happy with who he was, and I’ll tell you why. I think that getting into the stories a little earlier, when Mrs. Ford had her surgery at Bethesda, cancer surgery, there was a photograph of President Ford and I coming out of Bethesda Hospital and it was just us – the two of us. Some reporters looked at that – “Look how Keiser looks like Jerry Ford. Keiser’s a decoy.” Obviously the Secret Service has assigned a decoy to Jerry Ford. I was there before he came and stayed after he left, but nonetheless that came out in the Washington Post.

And I remember vividly when I read it in the paper we were at Camp David and I thought, uh-oh, this is going to be a problem because most politicians, most famous people would not want someone around them who was getting some publicity as well. Especially an outside staff-type person who they did not necessarily hire or choose. And so I really thought this was going to be a problem for myself and the Secret Service. I heard on the radio that he was out taking a walk in Camp David. So I purposely went out to encounter him – I knew where he was. I said, “Good morning sir.” He said, “You seen the papers?” I said, “Yes, sir. I have.” He said, “Well, what did you think?” I said, “More importantly, sir, what did you think?” He said, “I thought it was funny.” Didn’t bother him a bit. He was so self-confident and happy with himself that it didn’t threaten him in any way and it was lost between he and I.

Through the months there were times when it could have become an issue. I remember in Japan, we arrived and I got off Air Force One first and you could hear the cameras clicking, clicking, clicking. Threatening, but it was just something that didn’t bother him a bit, and I think it would have other people who were less secure, or something about their personality would not have accepted that. I always respected him a great deal; still do.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Keiser: Yes.

Smith: It’s been described to us as akin to a summer thunderstorm. Something that would erupt out of nowhere and very quickly subside.

Keiser: The only place I would see it is on the golf course.

Smith: Was it verbal?

Keiser: Yeah.

Smith: He never wrapped a club around a tree or anything?

Keiser: No, not the times that I remember. But you knew it was coming. The back of his neck would get red, and the more senior staff members would suddenly disappear. And all of a sudden, it starts. Yeah, I remember vividly several times at Burning Tree. We had a little caddy one time; it was a neighborhood boy who was very aggressive about clubbing for the President, he was going to be a good caddy. And he [Ford] was having a bad round – I think he was in the sand probably about seven out of the first eight or nine holes, and he hit a shot that was obviously going in the sand again, and he exploded. And you had to push this little caddy up to him, “Go, go, go.” He said, “No, he’s mad.” I said, “Well, no idea. Yeah, I saw it. In my mind, it would have been inappropriate.

Smith: It was directed as much against himself rather than other people.

Keiser: Oh, yes. Right.
Smith: Penny Circle tells wonderful stories about how out in Rancho Mirage they could tell if it was a three “God damn it” day, or a four “God damn it.” That was the worst.

Keiser: My experience with President Ford was just the White House – just his two years in the White House. When he left for California, I stayed in the White House and moved on in my job to President Carter.

Smith: Let’s back up. Tell us about the world that led you to cross paths with Gerald Ford. Because obviously, you’d been in this very responsible position before he ever showed up.

Keiser: Yes. I was assigned to widow Jackie Kennedy in 1963. She moved to Georgetown after ten months. Then she moved to New York. I didn’t have to go to New York. I went over to the White House, LBJ’s time, as a very junior agent. I spent two and half years traveling at that time with Lynda Bird Johnson, the eldest daughter. Then I moved off of that assignment.

Smith: That was before she was married to Chuck Robb?

Keiser: Indeed, yes.

Smith: That must pose unique challenges.

Keiser: Historically, well, that’s when she was dating.

Smith: Her and George Hamilton.

Keiser: You’ve done a lot of research, haven’t you? Not fair. And, yes, went on their honeymoon – she and Chuck. Still friends. And I moved off of that assignment and to President Johnson. Moved through several promotions within the Secret Service at the Presidential Protective Division. And President Nixon came in – I continued to move through several positions, without being specific on what they are, because of my seniority. And in 1973, I think it was, I was promoted to Special Agent in charge of the Presidential Protective Division. That was under President Nixon, and in terms of that assignment, it was just about a year before he resigned. And so I held that position all through the height of Watergate and saw pretty vividly the impact that it was having on President Nixon.

Smith: Did the wheels of government, at least at that level, grind to a halt:

Keiser: I’m going to say the contrary. I was impressed. I saw the continuity so close that I remember the day that President Nixon resigned. I came to work that day, to protect the President. I saw him get on the helicopter, I heard his speech, I saw him get on the helicopter and fly out. I went to the Oval Office to see President Ford sworn in. I’m still protecting the President of the United States – it’s just a different president. The transition to me, within the White House, is remarkable. You come to work in the morning and there are people in the West Wing; phones are ringing, people are sitting at their desks that you are familiar with. You come in the next morning, the phones are still ringing, the desks are there, but there are all different people. It literally happens that quickly.

Smith: Let me ask you because on that morning, you had these two extraordinary, historic events. Each took place in the East Room a couple of hours apart. One was the farewell; the other was the swearing in. What was the mood?

Keiser: My personal mood was very emotional. When it’s happening, it’s just happening today. That is what today is bringing. Now, you reflect on history – it’s amazing what happened that day. I felt what you were seeing was one man’s life and career crashing, and another man’s life and career changing completely, beyond perhaps what he even imagined. But for me, it’s just – you’ve got to keep them safe.

Smith: Because of the incredibly emotional feelings around the country, the polarization, the animosity, the crowds outside the gate and all that – did Watergate and particularly the end of the Nixon presidency pose unique challenges in terms of protecting the President?

Keiser: It’s hard for me to say. More reclusive, less public - in that sense it made it easier. At times I feel as though he was willing to take greater chances security-wise than I was totally comfortable with.
Smith: The trip to Egypt – were you on that?

Keiser: I was, indeed. He and I had words about that. The way those things happen is – I knew it was going to happen. My advance agent in Egypt told me it was going to happen, so we’re trying to fight it back at this level, back in Washington. At that time General Haig was the chief of staff and was my main point of contact, day to day. You don’t go to the president every time, you just don’t do that for a lot of reasons – staff reasons. You start to threaten the staff – who was this guy – we didn’t hire him. So there was a sense of relationship you have within the staff. If you let the staff think that you think you are staff, then you’ve made a mistake in my impression – because you are not. And for them to accept you – they can push you aside, you could miss meetings, you could miss information you were going to get. You want them to accept you, but not as a peer. I don’t think I’m a staff member, he didn’t pick me.

But anyway, I had several discussions with General Haig and literally, on the flight over there, again – I went to General Haig and said, “You know, this is really a very bad situation for us to be in. There are going to be a million people – this is going to be an open car. It’s going to be like we’re sitting in the inside of a beehive, and there is something that we consider – he is sitting side by side with President Sadat – and it may not be our president who is the target.” He said, “I agree with you, Dick, I agree with you. But the President is the court of last resort.” So General Haig and I went in and we talked to President Nixon. And my best recollection of some thirty years is, “You’ve got to understand this,” he said, “This trip is good for your president. And I’ll do anything, I’ll do anything, to make it a success.” And your comment is, “Yes, sir.” And you do the best you can, and we came through it. That whole trip was one of great concern. So much so, that he sensed our tension so that we didn’t have words beyond the other stops.

But on the plane coming back, returning home, he came back to the section where we sat and made a point to say, “Gentlemen, thank you very much. I appreciate what you did for your president. And I appreciate how you felt and I felt very safe and I thank you very much.”

Smith: That was Haig or Nixon?

Keiser: No, that was Nixon who came back to our area. So it was obvious he knew it was tense between us. And I think, knowing President Nixon, I think that was the best he could do on an apology.

Smith: Do you think he was a shy man?

Keiser: Yes.

Smith: He once said, famously, that he was an introvert in an extrovert’s profession. Which suggests a degree of self-knowledge that is not universal among politicians. I’ve often thought the most remarkable thing about the Nixon presidency, given that temperament, was not how it ended, but that it happened at all. There are those who think he really was a closet intellectual who didn’t want people to think of him in those terms. But the whole retreat to Camp David, even the funeral…his hero was Charles De Gaulle. And I thought in so many ways he patterned himself after De Gaulle. Vietnamization was Algeria, Camp David was Colombay. Even the funeral with limited official participation, replicated De Gaulle’s.

Keiser: I’m not a professional analyst, but during the height of Watergate, the last several months, he spent a lot of time in San Clemente or Key Biscayne. And an interesting relationship that I saw was between he and Beebe Rebozo. Beebe could play President Nixon like a piano. I’m not comfortable putting this out, but what would be normal – President Nixon would call for a car. He’d say, “Bring the car around, Beebe and I are going to take a ride.” We’d bring the car around and I’d say, “Where would you like to go?” He’d say, “I just want to be back in an hour.” Which meant he didn’t care – about thirty minutes wandering, turn around and come back. Now, there would be times in that car when he and Beebe would sit there for an hour and wouldn’t say a word. There would be other times and they would sit and talk continuously. I don’t know how Beebe knew that – how to do that. On the houseboat that Beebe had, on Key Biscayne, the same thing. They’d go for a cruise, President Nixon sometimes would go up on the flying bridge and sit by himself and Beebe would be down. Other times, they would be together. I don’t know how Beebe was able to sense that relationship. It was mysterious to me.

Again, it would not be uncommon for the President to say, “Keiser,” President Nixon never called anybody that I remember by first name. Haldeman, Erlichman, more privately he may call him Bob, something like that. But always out, it was, “Hey, Bull.” And he’d say, “Get the music on the radio, you know what I like, see what you can find.” And we’d say, “Yes, sir.” We find something. “That’s fine, that’s great. I like that a lot. That’s good music. Now, listen you, when the news comes on, you turn that radio off. Do you hear me?” I said, “Yes, sir.” He said, “I mean it, not one word.” “Yes, sir.” So therefore, I think he had isolated himself from the news.

Smith: Let me ask you - the portrait, and particularly the one Woodward and Bernstein created in The Final Days – I don’t know if you ever saw the Oliver Stone movie, which was over the top, even by Oliver Stone standards. The caricature of the barely functioning and semi-alcoholic president - is that, in fact, a caricature?

Keiser: I’m not sure what their caricature was, to be honest with you, Richard. The only movie I allowed myself to see was Nixon-Frost. I wanted to see just how they portrayed him, and I thought they did a fairly good job. They picked up some aspects of his personality that I thought were unique to him. He appeared uncomfortable with people, okay? And I think the way he tried to make himself friendly to people is small talk.

Smith: And he really didn’t excel at small talk.

Keiser: No, that’s right. And sometimes it was inappropriate. But that’s the way he dealt with people, and I sensed they picked that up in that film. The fact that he was trying to make himself –

Smith: One of the boys –
Keiser: With Frost.

Smith: Exactly. Trying to make an instant connection.

Keiser: That’s it. And bring himself into his world. And I think, frankly – we’re getting way beyond President Ford – but I think frankly, that explains some of the profanity. “Expletives deleted.” My memory is that he did talk like that, but it was not hardcore. Never in public. I thought well maybe that’s the way he thinks men talk to each other.

Smith: Exactly.

Keiser: And he’s trying to do that. That was my analysis of it, and as I say, I have no training and no right to say that other than just observing it.

Smith: Did you see him happy? I mean, he doesn’t seem to be someone who…

Keiser: No, I don’t know how to assess that. The thing that amazed me is that the relationship between he and Mrs. Nixon; very respectful of each other, but I don’t remember seeing a great deal of emotion between the two. And yet he broke up at her funeral. He just couldn’t handle it. I was sorry to see it, but I was glad to see it. Because they obviously did have a relationship.

Smith: Let me ask you, in those final months [of the Nixon presidency], Gerald Ford is in this situation, an almost impossible situation where he’s walking a tightrope, wanting to defend the president, and yet not totally sacrifice his own reputation in the process. He can’t overtly prepare for what he hopes won’t happen. Informally, was there speculation? When you go off duty and you see what’s going on, do you allow yourselves to imagine where this may be going?

Keiser: That’s an individual thing. I did. There is an inevitability about it. You knew it was going to happen; you just didn’t know when or how. The one thing I do remember is during the hearings, some of the staff members, Mr. Haldeman – I never had any problem with Mr. Haldeman or Mr. Erlichman – but they were not warm and fuzzy. And my dealings with them were - I never had a problem. But during the hearings – and you understand, the agents are
But you can hear behind the doors – so all the TV sets were on and you could get a sense of if the hearing, if Mr. Haldeman was doing well – “Hey, that’s it, this is great.” Cheering.

Smith: Almost like an athletic event.

Keiser: And so our people were starting to get involved in that. And I had a meeting – I remember vividly – I said, “Hey, gentlemen, we don’t have a dog in this fight. We don’t care how it’s going. Our responsibility is to protect the president. These people behind these doors are now very, very sensitive, and the world is dividing us as who is with us and who is against us? And we are neither. So you keep any comments you have to yourselves.”

Smith: That raises a huge issue that obviously affects every agent at some point. How do you define and maintain that relationship? To outsiders, you appear to be almost part of the family – but you are not part of the family. And that’s important.

Keiser: Yes it is.

Smith: But you have this unique bond that is developed. Yet there are lines that you do not overstep. Is that something taught? Is it something you are trained in? Is it just a question of judgment and experience?

Keiser: That would be my answer. There is no manual.

Smith: And presumably, it is somewhat different with each president.

Keiser: It is.

Smith: Depending on their temperament.

Keiser: What I touched upon earlier, what I was trying to say is – first of all, you don’t want to be their friend. You want their respect. And how you get that is just by being professional because they don’t select you. Interesting – one time I was a very young agent and I was being criticized very harshly by someone that I was protecting, and my boss, at that time, heard the same discussion. I had made a decision that they didn’t approve of. And after it was all over, my boss came to me and he said, “Dick, here’s the situation. You work for me, not them. And I say you made the right decisions. That’s all you have to worry about. And if you are going to be in this business for very long, you just have to understand that. And there will be times when you may think you are being criticized harshly or unfairly – that’s the job. That’s the job – protect them.”

President Ford, when he became president, he had vice presidential detail agents with him, and when the transition was made, they stayed with the new vice president, Rockefeller, and the Nixon people just went around President Ford. That’s just the way it happened. No one even asked why it’s happening, it just happened. When President Carter came in it was the same thing. Now it might be perceived publicly to be more critical because there was a political – there was the Republican-Democrat issue. That’s not an issue to the Secret Service. That is no issue at all. It should never be. And that’s the reason they make the transitions the way they try to make them, so you are not identified with an individual or a party.

Smith: Let me ask you: you are right, once he became vice president he had agents, but he was unique in not having spent a life trying to become president. With Did it take time for the family to get used to this relatively new transforming presence in their lives?

Keiser: I don’t know. You’d have to ask them. I didn’t sense any friction or tension between he and I, or he and the Secret Service. He was the sort of individual, I think, that handled our presence. And you have to understand, the presence of the Secret Service is sometimes relatively negative. We’re the last people who see him at night, and the first people to see him in the morning, other than the house staff. And obviously, our presence could be considered morbid. “The only reason they are here is because someone is going to try to hurt me today.” And that’s a perhaps “morbid” reminder. But if you are going around perhaps “apologizing” for that presence, that’s not good either.
Smith: Let’s face it, having been on the Warren Commission, he had a keen appreciation…

Keiser: Oh, he and I…

Smith: Did he talk about…?

Keiser: Yeah, we got along very well. I liked President Ford a great deal; very easy to get along with.

Smith: I was going to say: what did you like about him?

Keiser: I’m not saying I disliked the others – he was just a gregarious fellow. And I think he was very easy to meet and a lot of people were intimidated by the fact that he was president. But if he was in a room with one person who he didn’t know – one agent, he would walk up to the agent and say, “I’m Jerry Ford.” I think that is his way of dealing with people’s presence. I feel it made him uncomfortable to be in someone’s presence he didn’t know. Just a simple handshaking. Other people could deal with our presence more abstractly. Nixon – he didn’t do that.

Smith: He liked people.

Keiser: Oh, he did, and he showed it very, very visibly. And therefore, you like him – you felt very comfortable in his presence, beyond the relationship of agent/president. Yeah, several times we’d be out on the road or something like this, and the Secret Service would get in his way, or something we were doing he didn’t like, and I’d say, “Mr. President, that’s a recommendation of the Warren Commission.” And he’d say, “Really?” And I’d say, “Yes, sir. That’s our bible.” When I did that – I mentioned that about two or three times one day and he said, “Dick, are you sure?” He said, “I don’t remember that.” I said, “I dipped into that well.” That was the end of it.

My great memory of President Ford – you know, we had the two assassination attempts – I was not there, at either one of them. The first one, Squeaky Fromme, I was on annual leave. Came back and he went to Sacramento, and at that time I was at the Federal Executive Institute, going through a schooling. I felt very bad I was not there. The Secret Service – nobody ever understood that – to this day. Why President Ford? He was the good guy, he was vanilla ice cream, an Eagle Scout, going to make us feel better about ourselves. Why women; why President Ford; why California?

Smith: Well, maybe, in retrospect, it was just the radical climate of the times and a couple of kooks, who, if it hadn’t been him, then it might have been someone else.

Keiser: Well, you don’t know. But why he became a focal point, comparing his image to President Nixon’s, you wonder why President Ford became the focal point. No one can ever explain that to my satisfaction. I remember – you have a lot of conversations with the president – and I remember the inaugural day, an interesting thing – the right rear seat of the limousine is the seat of protocol. That’s where the president always sits. I don’t know who decided that, I don’t know why, but that’s the way it is. It could be changed if anyone wanted to, but it doesn’t seem as though it ever has. And so you know how the ceremony takes place; the incoming president comes to the White House around eleven, eleven-thirty, they have tea, coffee, this sort of thing and then they come out the front – the North Portico – which is the formal entrance.

And by this time the press and everybody are there and the two presidents and their ladies walk to the limousine, where the limousine is sitting with its door open, agents standing there. There are these two presidents, the outgoing and the incoming, and President Ford turned to me and he says, “Dick, where do I sit?” And I said, “You’re still president, you sit here.” And he said, “That’s right. Jimmy, you walk around.” I thought, I’m glad I came up with that answer – that is the answer, but there is nothing that trains you for that.

Smith: We’ve been told one of the most emotional moments in any presidency is on the morning of the 20th – or in some cases, it may be the day before – when the president and first lady say goodbye to the permanent staff. Did you witness that?

Keiser: Oh yes. I rode in the limousine with the two to the Capitol.
Smith: Did they talk?

Keiser: Yeah, nothing…

Smith: Small talk?

Keiser: Yeah, I don’t remember anything significant. It was only a five or ten minute drive up there. I walked. I made a point to walk with President Ford to the helicopter, knowing full well that I was going to go back to President Carter and make the inaugural. But I made a point to walk with him and tell him goodbye and wish him well and thank him for everything. He did not like losing, and from what I remember, from the outside on election day, the anticipation was that he would win. That seemed to be the way the emotion was going.

Smith: He had all the momentum.

Keiser: At least in his presence. Because you know he voted in Grand Rapids and flew back. So I sensed that the emotion with everybody was, this is going to be great. And I’m not saying he was a bad loser, I’m saying he did not like to lose. And if you look through his life pattern, he did not lose that much.

Smith: We’ve been told by more than one person that he said afterwards, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Keiser: I don’t know that, I don’t remember hearing that.

Smith: It’s been suggested that it took him a while to bounce back.

Keiser: I think that – that’s my impression – although I didn’t see him. I don’t think I saw President Ford after that day, from my memory. Mrs. Ford I saw some time later. But President Ford – oh, I’m sorry – I saw him when he came out to the Crosby Golf Tournament in California. I did come out there a time or two to see him play golf and renew the friendship.

Smith: But the period between the election and the inauguration, you were with him, just as you had been. Was that a rough time? We sensed that it was harder for him than it was for her.
Keiser: I was not with him as intensely as I was before the election. The day after the election, myself and the director of the Secret Service flew down to Plains to meet President Carter. And the transition, as far as the Secret Service was concerned, took place that day. “This is Dick Keiser. From now on, he and his people will be responsible for your protection. He will start to move his people into your detail.” In essence, he has to share his people between President Ford – the transition was not made – everybody moved to Carter – we moved in slowly and filled in from the top down. And the presidential White House people would move in for short periods of time and go home. So, in that time, to answer your question, my mind was focused on President Carter, still watching President Ford – but I mean, it was not as intense. But it was very emotional telling him goodbye. It really was.

Smith: And how did he acknowledge that?

Keiser: He just said thank you for everything. But he is very sensitive. My wife could tell you – shortly before he did leave, he said, “Dick, I would like to meet your family. Would you bring them in? I took you away on a lot of holidays and I’d like to say thank you.” And so, yes, the family came in and he spent a very nice time with them and gave me a football that his boys had had and gave it to my boys. So, yeah, very personable fellow.

Smith: We were told that the Fords on holidays and especially Christmas time, when they’d go out to Vail, would try to be as sensitive as possible to the fact that their agents had lives of their own and families, and would try to minimize the demands.

Keiser: That’s true. As a matter of fact, every president that I remember had a similar sort of concerns. The last thing I felt we could do is to show in any way that we felt that way, too. We are here because we want to be, it’s our assignment, and you don’t owe us that. But you try to be humble and say thank you very much. I’ll tell you a famous story about President Ford skiing. The first trip we made to Vail as president we were en route flying to Colorado and he calls me up to his compartment, and he says, “Dick, I really like skiing.” I said, “Yes, sir, I understand that.” He said, “I’ve skied there for a lot of years and I really, really enjoy it.” Now I know what is coming. And I said, “Yes, sir, I understand that.” And I said the agents have a ski team and they are all agents who can ski, better than you. They will be around you, we’re going to ski patrol every morning. Every morning the agents in the ski patrol are going to go out and they are going to choose the lift and they are going to choose the run. There will be a different one every day; we’ll choose it, you just go.

“Fine. Oh, that’s a good idea.” And I said, “Another thing I would like you to do, if you can, if you have the chance, change your outfit. Don’t wear the same clothing every day. Change with the boys – jackets and all that.” “Oh, that’s a good idea. Good idea.” So Larry Buendorf was the skier – very good skier – and he had bought a brand new ski outfit. I’ll never forget, it was a bright yellow jacket – canary - and he wore that every day. So on the way back, we were flying home after vacation and President Ford called me up to the compartment and he said, “Dick, I really, really enjoyed skiing. I felt very safe. I thought the guys did a great job. I really appreciate that. It was just great.” He said, “I do have one question.” “What’s that?” “Well, you know, Larry wore this yellow coat.” And I said, “Yes, sir.” And he said, “Well, it was a good idea that I change mind periodically, but all you had to do was see the guy in the yellow jacket and you’d know I was the guy next to him.” And I said, “Yes, sir.”

My point is, they are watching. They are sensitive to what you are doing.

Smith: We heard there were lots of agents who really liked Vail. Vail was a popular destination.

Keiser: Oh, sure. Just like Key Biscayne or San Clemente. I would say that Plains…

Smith: Had its shortcomings.

Keiser: But, yeah, every place has its charm.

Smith: Did you know about the pardon before it happened?

Keiser: No, I don’t think I did. I don’t remember that I did. You kind of tune out. That’s one way to make your presence acceptable is this fact that you are not listening. You are not hearing a lot of things in the back of the car and this sort of thing. I don’t remember hearing stuff like that or thinking it was significant or anything of it. It didn’t affect my ability to perform my job.

Smith: And the reaction?

Keiser: I don’t remember there was one. I just don’t remember. You know, the people around him were so professional – I really liked Mr. Jim Baker and Dick Cheney. Dick Cheney is still one of my favorite, favorite people. And I’ll say that to anybody at any time and defend it.

Smith: And when you think he was only thirty-four.

Keiser: I know.

Smith: When he became chief of staff.

Keiser: Oh, yes. But very bright and very self-confident. Again, as I said, he was my daily point of contact for any issues that I had, and despite the youth, Dick, we won’t do it that way, or Dick, we won’t do it this way, or that’s not a good idea. “Okay.” Now you have to understand, there are times, there are ways that I can get alone with the president, very easily. Very easily I can walk him home at night to the colonnade to his room. You’ve got him alone there, to his apartment, you can pick him up in the morning, walk him to the office, you’ve got him one on one there, you’ve got him in the car – nine times out of the ten, you’re pretty much alone unless he’s got a staff member with him. If the staff perceives that you are taking advantage of that time alone, then it threatens them because there is a system that they want to impose for their way for you to deal with them.

Smith: What about the other side of the coin though? Some people are just kind of, as you say, gregarious. And “good morning” and chit chat on the way to the office. If he initiates – and again, I don’t know whether he did or didn’t…

Keiser: I remember vividly with President Ford, he was living in Alexandria and it was several weeks before he actually moved into the White House. And the first couple of nights that he was in the White House, I walked purposely, to make myself present - if there were any issues that he was having, make myself available - I’d walk with him to the living quarters, that short distance. And I remember several times when he said, “Dick, come upstairs, let’s have a drink.” And I said, “No, sir. Thank you very much, but I’ve got to get home,” or something, and after several times the invitations stopped. But that, in my perception, would have been improper. That’s too close. That’s closer than I want to be with him. And that’s closer than I want other people to see me with him.

Smith: Interesting. Because we’ve been told on weekends he’d tell the butlers to come on in and watch the football game. That kind of thing. He was just that way.

Keiser: That’s right. And I’m sure had I gone upstairs it wouldn’t have meant anything at all between he and I. But to the people who were aware of it – that’s not normal. That’s not the relationship that the agents had with the people they protect.

Smith: What do you think is the largest public misconception about the relationship between agents and those that they protect?

Keiser: I’m not sure I know.

Smith: I think the public is fascinated by the Secret Service.

Keiser: I think probably the biggest perception is, in thirty years I’ve made talks, I talk about going to Lynda’s wedding. You see an awful lot and you hear an awful lot. And you become aware of these people’s warts, so to speak. But that’s yours. And I think sometimes agents coming out and talking about presidents who are dead, they’ve still got children, they’ve still got grandchildren. I do not want to be part of that. I don’t know of any warts. But I think the biggest perception that the public may have is that the Secret Service is a violation of their privacy. How could these people…

Smith: Particularly teenage children.
Keiser: But when you are part of that circle and you see how Americans treat their politicians and their famous people, if it were not for the Secret Service, beyond the safety thing, there is the fact of privacy. You ensure by your presence that the president is going to be handled in a certain way. He is not available for just every Tom, Dick, and Harry to come up and shake hands with him. If he wants to, fine; we can control that. But I think we are a privacy fence, if nothing else, around him.

Smith: That’s fascinating. The trip in Sacramento, he was given the option that it was a nice day, do you want to walk through the park? And he did.

Keiser: He started it.

Smith: Exactly. After the second attempt, I’m curious as to what, if any, changes were made – would they have been less likely to give him that option?

Keiser: Yeah, right. And he became…

Smith: Did he become more conscious of…

Keiser: Not outwardly. We were in Ohio during the campaign at a university which I don’t remember, but it was a gymnasium with seating up above the gymnasium floor. And after the talk the students just kind of crowded around him. Suddenly I remember some of the coeds jumped up on their boyfriend’s shoulders and were taking pictures. He standing at the podium, very casual, and all of a sudden – POP – and something hit me in the face and I saw him kind of flinch. And I turned my body in front of him and pushed him down. He went down relatively easy. In the meantime, someone said on the radio, “It’s okay, it’s okay. It was not a shot.” So I said, “Mr. President, it’s okay. There’s no problem but we want to leave right now.” He said, “Okay.”

What it was is some girl had a camera, these magic cubes, this plastic thing had exploded and some of it had caught me in the face and caught him, but it was a very sharp “POP,” and I do remember that. Every day you are concerned, you want to bring him home. I remember that. But I don’t remember that he ever, ever showed any sense that he didn’t trust us and that we weren’t doing our best. He was not fearful.

Smith: We’ve been told that he would sometimes, not uniformly, wear a bulletproof vest.

Keiser: Sometimes. This was before the magnetometer and some of the aids that we have now.

Smith: But in terms of the agency, were there any changes implemented as a result of…or was there just a kind of general ratcheting up one’s sensitivity, for lack of a better word?

Keiser: I think, internally, we had to do some things because there was a Congressional investigation, [Peter] Rodino. You had to say you were doing something, I’m sure from the active White House division, where I was, there was not a great deal that we had to change. We might have worked closer, we might have kept him out of the crowd more often. At campaign times they get hyper. If you’re behind you try harder, and therefore are willing to take more chances. And that part of the relationship - no, they reviewed their intelligence gathering, they reviewed their intelligence analysis.

Smith: I guess Sara Jane Moore’s name was at least in somebody’s file.

Keiser: Yeah. She was interviewed by an agent the night before, who decided she was not of interest. Which was determined by the Secret Service at that time; not of interest, not of protective interest. And you look at the profile – she was in her fifties, married to a doctor – externally, she didn’t fit the profile. However, after she acted, then you say, well, wait a minute, she does have some problems that we didn’t know about. And that’s the pattern of the people we dealt with through those years. They are the grey people, the people that you walk by in the street and don’t notice.

Smith: Yeah, exactly.

Keiser: And they function marginally in society. But you can’t go around arresting everybody who is like that. And after they’ve done something – there’s the pattern right there – this is obvious. But no, I found in my relationships with all the presidents, I don’t know whether they know this, but you need to test the temperature of the relationship between you and he. How do you do that? I don’t know. Again, there’s no manual. I know how I did it; he would ask to do something and I would, in some cases, say, “No, sir.” Now, you have to understand the environment when you are out in public. You’ve got the president, you’ve got the White House staff, you’ve got the White House press. If you’re out in public, you’ve got the local press, you’ve got the VIPs, the people that he’s greeting, you’ve got the police, you’ve got the agents.

So if he says, “Dick, I want to go over and shake hands with those people.” And I say, “No,” and he acquiesces, he can’t do that – I mean, the press knows he’s weak. The White House staff is going to say, “What is he doing?” The locals say, “They let the Secret Service push this guy around.” So, no, you don’t do that. You try to set it up to where he asks you to do that. “Dick, can I go do this, can I go do that?” And if it is extemporaneous, that’s what you want. I don’t remember any time where I wasn’t asked. And it’s not “Can I?” It’s, “Dick, that’s a nice looking crowd over there, some nice people over there.” “Yes, sir,” or you say, “Well, no sir, Mr. President,” this is where I’m trying to apply my test of the relationship. “No, sir, we’re behind schedule,” or, “This is a very small police department and we don’t really have enough security there with that crowd.” It’s giving him any reason to acquiesce to my request and still save face and not appear weak. It’s “Okay, Dick, I understand.”

Smith: It’s diplomacy, it’s tact. Let me ask you just to make sure. I think I know what the answer is, but is it accurate to say that Larry Buendorf, at the very least, prevented Squeaky Fromme from getting off a volley?

Keiser: Oh, indeed. I was leader of that detail at that time, but I was not present. But I will tell you this, in both cases, the agents reacted exactly the way they should have. If you look at Sara Jane Moore, in San Francisco, they got him down in the armored car. The agents that were with him didn’t leave. They didn’t go across the street and attack her. That’s somebody else’s responsibility. The agents with him, cover and evacuate, evacuate, evacuate. Get out. So you look at him standing on the car and as soon as he was in, they were gone.

Smith: And then, is it safe to say, that the bystander who saw Sara Jane Moore, saw the gun, in some ways played the role of Larry Buendorf in deflecting – I mean, he got to her physically?

Keiser: Yeah, you can say that. That’s the way it happened. But in terms of the agents who were with the President, the inner circle, that’s another issue. That’s for someone else, very frankly, to deal with. Their responsibility is the body; cover and evacuate. Get him in and go with him. And they reacted just as they should have. The question I think can’t be answered is why was Squeaky Fromme in that area with this gun? Did she have an idea of his itinerary, and she was going to attack him in front of the statehouse when he got out of the car? Was that her intention? Or did she hang out in that park and always had that gun and she had no intention? Or did we smoke her out by him walking, changing his schedule and surprising her to where she couldn’t react as she wanted to?

Smith: It’s the classic coincidence versus conspiracy.

Keiser: And of course, she’s not going to say. No one knows the answer to that.

Smith: I remember seeing Sara Jane Moore on the Today Show. I guess she is harmless at this stage in life – but I was struck that no one ever asked about the Ford family. The questions were all about her and where she was coming from. And no one ever asked, “Have you ever written to the Ford family?” or “What would you say to the Ford family?”

Keiser: Yeah, I don’t think – it’s been so long that I was out – I don’t look for a pound of flesh. I’m sorry, I don’t understand why those women did that to President Ford. There’s nothing in my knowledge of President Ford’s life or conduct that would have…

Smith: And that’s it. I think it was just that randomness. And to try to construct a logical theory…
Keiser: There is none.

Smith: Let’s back up. Let me ask you: I take it that it’s safe to say that he was a pretty even tempered guy.

Keiser: Oh, my daily contact with him? Oh, he never lost his temper to me.

Smith: But I mean in terms of highs and lows. I would think Lyndon Johnson would be a very mercurial figure.

Keiser: What would make you say that?

Smith: And I would think they would be very different temperaments.

Keiser: President Ford from my aspect – I’m sure he had good days and bad days – and I know that politically there were issues he was dealing with that were emotional to him and very difficult.

Smith: The fall of Saigon – that must have permeated the White House.

Keiser: Yeah.

Smith: Do you have general memories of that period?

Keiser: What I remember more is him flying out to – where was it, someplace – meeting an airplane of orphans that they brought back.

Smith: In San Francisco.

Keiser: Oh, gosh. Yeah, stuff like that, even as an outsider, is very emotional to me.

Smith: Was it for him?

Keiser: Yeah, I’m sure it was. Things like that I remember more than anything.

Smith: Remember, after Saigon fell, Congress wanted to pull the plug. I think everyone wanted to try to forget that we’d ever been there. And he put together this crazy quilt coalition and said we have a moral obligation, as a nation of immigrants and refugees, to open our arms. And they brought out the first wave of 100,000 or so of Vietnam refugees. And part of that was Operation Baby Lift, I think it was called.

Keiser: Oh, yeah, I remember that. I remember getting on that plane. I didn’t involve myself with politics that much in that sense of what he was doing. It was just another day that I came to work in that sense. Do you understand what I mean? You’re not in all those meetings that were taking place. In that sense, anything you hear about that you might have heard in the car, or picked up from talking to staff members, or something like that. But you are not in those meetings where that’s really taking place.

Smith: You must have observed that because he was a jock and really enjoyed being around athletes - meeting athletes, that sort of thing.

Keiser: His old teammates – he’d have them back. And I think that’s one thing – I had through the years, I think, overheard some conversation – things that did bother him. Number one: I think that there were inferences made publicly that he wasn’t very smart, and that he was clumsy. And his retort, not publicly, but around his _________, he said, “I’m a graduate from Yale. I’ve got a law degree from Yale. And I was an all-American football player.” The criticism that he was getting, he obviously thought was unfair. But he was not going to come out publicly and say that. He was too great for that.

Smith: The whole Chevy Chase caricature – the stumbling, and all that kind of thing. Were you with him in, I think it was Austria, where he…

Keiser: Yes.

Smith: Can you describe that? It was raining, wasn’t it?

Keiser: Right. I do remember it. Larry Buendorf, Larry was the advance agent in Austria, so I got off the plane first. Got down and I’m talking to Larry – what’s going on, what do you have going, this sort of thing. Right at the base of the steps – and we’re talking. And all of a sudden I could tell that Larry’s not looking at me, he’s looking over my shoulder, and he goes, “Holy, Christ.” And I turn around and there’s President Ford, and he got up. What happened was he tore the heel off his shoe, kind of stepped down on the step and the heel came off. So he tried to maintain some dignity, and we’re all kind of thinking, this didn’t happen….And he went through reviewing the troops with his heel. And the thing I do remember is trying not to make a big deal about this thing. We get him in the limousine and we start to move and this German police officer comes up to me with his heel – his shoe heel. Awww – and I said, “Get out! Get out of here. We don’t need it.” This thing will just go away. But that’s the memory of it. I don’t understand it.

Smith: Well, part of it was he was holding an umbrella over Mrs. Ford.

Keiser: Right, yeah. He just mis-stepped, which we’ve all done and the steel caught the heel and literally tore the heel off his shoe. But I felt bad that I didn’t see it and wasn’t there. He probably would have knocked us both down. But it was just one of those awkward, awkward situations that you wish didn’t happen. Yeah, I do remember Larry going “Ohhhh.” He couldn’t believe his eyes. It was not funny at the time.

Smith: Was he grim? Was his mood affected in the immediate aftermath of that?

Keiser: We didn’t have words about it. We never talked about it, and nobody else did.

Smith: I’m sure. Did you have much contact with Mrs. Ford?

Keiser: Then? Well, just daily – well, not daily, but when they were together. She had her own detail of agents and I supervised – those people reported to me.

Smith: They gave her a flag for a car – the Bloomer flag?

Keiser: Oh, I don’t remember that.

Smith: She had once, joshingly, complained, “How come he gets a flag and I don’t?”

Keiser: She was a very lovely person, and I respect her to this day and I wish everyday that she does well and feels well. And the whole family; Michael and Jack and Steve and Susan were nice people. Maybe it’s the Midwestern in them. I’m Midwestern.
Smith: And you had the sense – if he was ever tempted to forget where he came from, he was surrounded by people to remind him.

Keiser: Very nice people and pleasant to be around. I don’t remember – he and I never had words, angry words. And he’s a very humble man, I think – Midwestern, I guess.

Smith: Would you accompany them to church?

Keiser: Yeah, if I was working. I didn’t work every day. You talk about flags – President Carter – you went through his campaign. He did not like the imperial presidency; didn’t like big black limousines. President Ford never questioned anything about that environment. On Air Force One he just took it in, accepted it. But the inaugural night – I’d been with him [Carter] eight-ten hours, personally. And in those days we had a little Lincoln street car that was armored. But we brought that up for the limousine – no big black Lincolns or Cadillacs – and had the flags on the fender. We hadn’t even left the south grounds yet. “Mr. President, I need your guidance on the flags.” “What do you mean?” “Well,” I said, “they are symbols of your authority and your office, but it’s your option whether or not you fly them. I just need your intent, your desires.” What did President Ford do? “President Ford flew those flags every time he left the White House.” He said, “I won’t need them after tonight.” “Fine.”

So the first trip we make out of town some weeks later, he’s got a local politician with him – I don’t remember who – but it was the first time as president that he’d been out. We got in the same car, were driving it, we got a motorcade, no flags. Schools were coming out, intersections, and it’s in crowds and shopping centers, and this politician says, “__________” I said, “Mr. President, they’re not waving at you. They’re waving at the police car and the Secret Service car,” and he said, “But they aren’t waving at you.” And President Carter said, “You know, that’s a shame. I bet some of those people have been out here an hour to see their president go by, and I’ve disappointed them.” He said, “Dick, they don’t seem to see me in this car.” I said, “Yes, sir.” He said, “Well, what can I do?” I said, “Well, let’s try the flags, sir.” So, we used the flags every time after that. It was never discussed, but I have an idea in my memory of President Carter; President Carter flew those out of humility. “I don’t really want to do it, but the president ______. President Ford might have flown his out of arrogance.” Nothing was ever said, but that was my analysis.

Smith: Well, that’s the way it was done.

Keiser: That was my analysis of the situation – that’s how he rationalized doing something that President Ford had done.

Smith: That’s funny. A couple things and we’ll wrap up. The ’76 campaign - were you at the convention?

Keiser: Oh, yes.

Smith: I realize you aren’t political, but going into that convention, they were not sure that they had it nailed down.

Keiser: My memory was that it was one state, wasn’t it? If one state went one way…

Smith: I know Mississippi became very important.

Keiser: One thing I remember; one night, one of the first nights, I remember Governor Reagan coming to meet – they met, they had a meeting.

Smith: That’s right - that was after the nomination.

Keiser: Was it? Okay. They had a meeting and my memory of it was kind of intense. I think President Ford’s staff was a little bit edgy. I don’t know – but my feeling was that it was not all that good old boy feeling. But it all took place in a room out of my presence.

Smith: I think that is a very accurate rendition. Reagan’s people had made it absolutely clear that the condition of meeting was that he not be offered the vice presidency.

Keiser: Oh really? That’s not a dimension that I was aware of. But I just sensed that between the two staffs and that sort of thing – you stand back.
Smith: That was a bitter convention. A hard-fought convention.

Keiser: Yes it was – I guess. I guess it was – from the outside. I’d been through several other conventions and you don’t pick up on that.

Smith: So you really are divorced from the political currents.

Keiser: You try to be. And as a matter of fact, when I met President Carter the first time, we were told that from then on – he said, “I know Dick. Oh, I know you from the debates.” He knew I had been with Ford. He knew that. And the debates were kind of an interesting thing because you’ve got Ford coming and his staff, and you’ve got Carter coming and his staff. But both of them have Secret Service agents who all know each other. We’re friends – “Hi, how you doing?” Our rooms are down the same hall. These two staff are really staring down the aisle and the agents are saying, “How you doing? Good to see you. How’s it going?” And I think sometimes that through the years the Secret Service was accused of passing on the schedules and that sort of thing. I guess it’s not a good idea to be too friendly with guys you see.

Smith: That’s interesting.

Keiser: Again, an interesting environment.

Smith: It was the second debate, of course, where the famous Polish gaffe occurred.

Keiser: I do remember that, and I remember afterwards, even amongst his staff he was trying to explain what he meant.

Smith: I want to get your reaction to this, because instantly there were some people, Brent Scowcroft, Jim Baker, and others who knew “we had a problem.”

Keiser: Yeah.

Smith: But Kissinger called him and told him he was wonderful, just kind of laid it on thick. And I’m sure that’s what you want to hear. But a week went by with this increasingly strenuous effort on the part of – Cheney became involved. He told us, “I was thrown out of the compartment of Air Force One.” Stu
Spencer from the campaign was trying. There was that stubborn streak in Ford’s makeup. What is your memory of that period?

Keiser: From an outsider, I was of the impression that he really didn’t think he had made that big a mistake. In other words, in his own mind, what he was trying to say – he might have said it poorly, but from his point of view, it was not that wrong.

Smith: He knew what he intended through those words.

Keiser: Yeah, exactly. And the frustration was that it was misunderstood. But in the time – from the memory of hearing him say that – that was his impression. I understand, this is what I was trying to say.

Smith: Could you see that stubbornness in his makeup?

Keiser: Yeah. But he had a very professional staff. He really did. There were some people that were superstars, yeah. Still are.

Smith: And he had a particularly impressive Cabinet.

Keiser: He did, I think, as an outsider. You talked about this transition – there was a time in our history when we had three presidents in two years. Transitions in terms of our constitution and the United States of America, never once during those transitions were we considered weak or disorganized, or worthy of attack. It just happens. It’s a marvelous thing to see.

Smith: The Bicentennial takes place the summer of ’76. He was incredibly busy around the Fourth and all that. He went to New York, went to Monticello or a ceremony…

Keiser: And he started in Boston at the church, then he went up to – I forget, but he made a speech…

Smith: Well, actually, it was ’75 because I actually was there. He went to the Old North Church and then Concord. It sort of kicked off the whole celebration. Did he enjoy that?
Keiser: I think so. I don’t know, but I think so. Those were long days. I have something I want to say – way out of context. Including President Ford, people at that level, at that degree of professional politics, feed on crowds. The campaigns, be it when Nixon was campaigning or be it when President Ford was campaigning or Johnson – those are long, long days. And sometimes, as an agent, you get caught up to where you were there the whole day. And we are exhausted at the end of the day. But if they have a good rally at night, they feed off of it. They are ready to go. It is amazing to me where they find that.

Smith: You have the classic definition of an extrovert who feeds off of others; wherein an introvert feels that they are being drained by others.

Keiser: That’s one thing unique about President Ford – he could catnap.

Smith: Really?

Keiser: Oh, yeah. In the back of the car, he could catnap five-ten minutes.

Smith: That’s a blessing.

Keiser: Oh, I think so, yeah. He could do that and be awake. You’d look in the rearview mirror something like that. He usually brought papers with him or autographs, pictures to sign. He was always doing something. Yeah, he’d catnap very easily.

Smith: We’ve been told a semi-famous story where he was down in Texas and I think they had the Kilgore Rangerettes, or whatever, all lined up – all these pretty girls. And he got kissed by all these pretty girls. And I think he sent flowers to Mrs. Ford that day. Because he said, “Betty is going to see this in the news.”

Keiser: Well, the only think I remember in Texas was eating the tamale.

Smith: Tell us.

Keiser: I never thought it was a big deal. It was Mexican food and he ate a tamale. And I guess he didn’t take the shell – they made a big deal about that. Again, that’s just clumsy stuff. God, give the guy a break. Things like that I felt were very unfair. I felt sorry for him.

Erik: Were you with him on the day - Donald Rumsfeld told the story about being in the limo driving somewhere, and some kids crashed through a barrier and hit the presidential car?

Keiser: No.

Smith: That’s right, that was up in Boston.

Smith: Hartford, that’s right.

Keiser: Again, I was in school.

Erik: He had to go face down on the floor with somebody on top of him. It was a funny story when he told it.

Keiser: My deputy was with him. No, those things happen.

Smith: Those things seem to happen to President Ford.

Keiser: Indeed. It’s not funny. To the Service, it was a very serious thing. Yeah, it crashed through, came through an intersection.

Erik: He said they were kids, and when you looked out the window, he said you were face to face with these kids and their eyes were big as saucers when they realized what they’d done.

Keiser: This is not good. To the Secret Service it’s why have they done it and what’s next?

Smith: Oh, sure. Can you imagine in today’s security climate?

Keiser: Well, strategically, the Service made some changes. The limousine that was behind him as a spare was moved up in front, as a result of that accident. Had they needed the spare car, it could not have gotten around the curb.
Smith: He had a sense of humor?

Keiser: Oh, yeah, I think so. Not that he went around telling jokes, but he was just a gregarious fellow that would think it impolite if he didn’t laugh. But he met my father one time at Notre Dame and was so, so gracious to my dad. My dad was a Mason and my home town is near Notre Dame, and I called and said there might be a chance to meet President Ford. So he was telling my mom, “I’m going to give him the secret handshake, Masonic handshake.” My mom says, “Don’t do that. He may not remember, or you may get it wrong. Just don’t do that.” But he spent a good thirty minutes with my folks that were just priceless. And my father is Midwestern, and my father, every summer, they own a cabin up on a lake in Michigan – President Ford’s Michigan. “Do you know such and such lake?” Of course, Ford, being a politician, “Yeah, I know that Mr. Keiser, great lake.” At any rate, they got along well. And so the parting comment to my dad was, “If you are ever in Washington visiting Dick, come by and see me.” Now, that is very President Ford.

And so several months later my folks are visiting. I’m getting dressed and I’m at the breakfast table going to work, and my dad says, “You going to work today?” I said, “Yes, sir.” He said, “I may go upstairs and put on a tie. I may go downtown with you and see the President.” I said, “Well, Dad, you have to understand, their schedule is all organized weeks in advance.” And he said, “Well, he told me to.” And I said, “I understand that, and he meant it. But it takes some time.” And finally my mother said, “Leave Dick alone. You stay here.” That’s the way he felt comfortable with President Ford, in just that thirty minutes they were together.

Smith: Next to last question. Maybe one way of beginning to know Jerry Ford is, above all, as a Midwesterner. What does that mean, in your mind? What it is about the Midwest that is distinctive, defining?

Keiser: That you are gracious to people, you’re glad to meet people, you have basically simple needs. Simple things are important to you – church, family. And all the things that he did – the football, the college, Boy Scouts – those are things that I grew up with and that’s important. That’s not to say that President Nixon was not that sort of thing. But I do think that where you come from does change you a little bit. President Carter was southern. That was pointed out to me; I was very comfortable with him.

Smith: I’ve often thought there is an unspoken bias on the part of people against Midwesterners. Because talk slow it’s assumed that they think slow. Whereas, in fact, they are being deliberate.

Keiser: And we’re simple people that don’t really, really know what the real world is like. And we need to be told.

Smith: I think he suffered from some of that bias.

Keiser: Well, that’s what I said. I think, in his own mind, it bothered him, the fact that: hey, I got a law degree from Yale. Now he wouldn’t say that publicly, but I heard him say it. “I was an all-American football player.” A pretty superior individual in every respect.

Smith: Last thing: how do you think he should be remembered?

Keiser: As a good man, as a good president, a good American. And the right man at the right time. I think he was perfect for that time. I’m personally sorry that it only lasted a short period of time, but I think that’s part of fate, too. I think he came and did what he had to offer, and I think he’d have been a good president if he’d won. That’s not the point, but I think it would have been a different presidency. I think he would be remembered for some really great things, decisions that he made. Hard decisions.

Smith: I have to ask you because there are some famous stories grown up around it, and that is the night when Queen Elizabeth came and the dinner at the White House, and the Marine Band played The Lady is a Tramp when they went out to dance. And I think there were repercussions afterwards. And again, counter to this image – because I think she suffered from it worse than he did. Initially there was this patronizing view - this Cub Scout den mother from Grand Rapids, a Sunday schoolteacher - and all of a sudden she is welcoming the world for the Bicentennial. And by all accounts, she rose to the challenge admirably. But when you saw them in that role, did they seem perfectly comfortable?

Keiser: Yeah. And I think if that were the case, they had strong staff members that were giving them day to day good advice. That’s beyond my mandate. But by appearance they were a very good couple, a very loving couple, got along very well.

Smith: You mentioned at the very beginning, about at the time of her cancer surgery.

Keiser: Oh that bothered him. He was frightened. Oh yeah. In those days, what I remember – it may still be – but in those days, if you had that type of surgery, you didn’t know if you were going to wake up in the morning with a mastectomy or not.

Smith: And it was a subject that wasn’t discussed.

Keiser: But he was very attentive and very concerned. Oh, yes, from what I remember.

Erik: Were you in the helicopter coming back when he had to speak at the Economic Summit?

Keiser: I don’t remember the incident. That photograph, I told you, with he and I, we’re coming out of Bethesda just after he had visited with her. So, I remember those times, I don’t remember a particular helicopter incident, no. Oh, I know he was very concerned, as was the whole family. The kids showed up.

Smith: It’s been great.

Smith: Back us up to how your life’s path first crossed that of Gerald Ford.

Wennekamp: Well, it was really pure coincidence and nothing I can take credit for as far as a plan. I had gone back to Washington, DC; accepted a political appointment in the summer of ’74 when President Nixon was still in office. And I can’t take credit envisioning anything interesting happening.

Smith: What was the appointment?

Wennekamp: The appointment was a political appointment in the Office of the Secretary of Commerce doing some management consulting work, really.

Smith: Who was secretary then?

Wennekamp: Secretary Dent. At the time, as I mentioned, President Nixon was still in office and I didn’t envision an impeachment or resignation, but I saw that the Democrats would probably win the White House in ’76. So I thought two years back there would be good experience; learn about the legislative process and everything and then come back to California.

Smith: California was home?

Wennekamp: Yes. And interestingly enough, I accepted the job and then ten days before reporting to work, President Ford was sworn in as president. And so my resume, if you will, has always been connected with the Ford administration. I wasn’t back there very long and happened to meet some people who worked at the White House, Warren Rustand for example, was the President’s appointment secretary. And he suggested that I start – I did some part-time work with the White House advance office, and seemed to have a knack for that. It went very well.

Smith: And what did that entail?
Wennekamp: That entailed domestic events arrangements, advancing for the President’s attendance at a conference or meeting. And being a junior person, I assisted White House staff advance people; you’ve probably have met some of them, Red Cavaney and Frank Ursomarso, and Bob Goodwin and others.

Smith: Is Frank still around?

Wennekamp: Yes. Frank’s still around. He’s back east. As a matter of fact, I saw he’s a trustee now on the Foundation.

Smith: Good. Remember that name: Frank Ursomarso.

Wennekamp: He was around there a long time.

Smith: One of the people we talked to, who I think was even more junior than you, was Mary Fisher. She told wonderful stories about of course being the first and only woman. And if there was a place below the bottom of the totem pole, she occupied it.

Wennekamp: Yeah, Mary and I worked a lot together. With the passage of time I was offered a full-time position at the White House, and a commission as staff assistant to the President and started working over in the OEM, next door in the Advance Office. I got involved in a lot of the international trips, fortunately. A very, very wonderful experience.

Smith: For people who have heard the term but don’t know what it is, what does an advance man do?

Wennekamp: An advance man is, in essence, the President’s personal representative in coordinating all the details associated with his visit. And what you would do once a particular site was selected – a good example, I think, would be, he’s going to meet with President Sadat in Salzburg, Austria. And so you go over there and you are the President’s representative in negotiating everything. When it comes to toasting, who toasts first and in what language and in what room? Who enters first? Who’s last? And you coordinate this with the press, the Secret Service, the White House communications, local media, the embassy. And so you are responsible for coordinating all of these details and making sure that everything goes off to the minute. You are faxing back – we didn’t have faxes - but telexing back communications and memos to the White House with diagrams of what’s going to happen, when it’s happening, etc. So it’s literally thinking of every minute detail that could affect the President’s visit and making sure that it runs smoothly.

Smith: And then, of course, ironically, at the end it was the rain slicked staircase.

Wennekamp: Well, interesting you bring that one up because I happened to have been, and maybe in President Ford’s eyes, maybe responsible for that. But Air Force
One had just pulled up and it was an exterior arrival – no gates or anything.
So he came down the steps, but before the steps – most of the steps were put in place, the red carpet was rolled out, and I escorted the Chancellor and the Bürgermeister from Salzburg out; put them in position and then stepped back at the end behind them with the military aide and watched President and Mrs.
Ford come down.

As you probably know, as the nation knows, the mistake he made was, he’s holding an umbrella with one hand and her arm with the other and not the rail.
He came down and his foot slipped; it tore off the heel of his shoe and he went down on hands and knees. When he went down and he got up, he looked at me and he’s just red as a beet. He is so frustrated, so embarrassed, but it was like he was looking at me like, “Why did you allow this to happen?”
There was nothing I could do. But he recovered; kind of limped down, greeting everyone and went on to the press conference.

But I will say that that was the beginning of the clumsy reputation because that was an international event and the whole world sees it - the President planting on all fours. He was really irritated.

Smith: Was there any sequel? I mean, did you hear from anyone?

Wennekamp: No one – because it was obvious what had happened when you saw his heel still sitting there on the steps of the ramp and it’s all wet.

Smith: He was carrying the umbrella over Mrs. Ford?

Wennekamp: He was holding it up for both of them, and then holding her arm as they came down. And I still have that picture.
Smith:  Do you think he got a bum rap?

Wennekamp:  Oh, absolutely. When it comes to his clumsy reputation – the guy was an athlete. He was a jock and took great pride in that, as he always had. And so that really bothered him. But like in so many other things, he shrugged it off, like water on a duck. There were a few times when he would get irritated. We were down in Texas and a reporter tried to report that President Ford had raised the wrong two fingers for the football team.

Smith:  The hook ‘em horns?

Wennekamp:  Yeah. And he heard that and he was really irritated, to the point that he would not talk to that particular reporter again.

Smith:  He had a temper he spent a lifetime controlling, and pretty effectively for the most part. We asked Mary and she had a couple of amusing examples. Did you ever see his temper?

Wennekamp:  Oh, yes. He had a temper like any CEO would have a temper. The worst time that I had with him from a temper perspective was – this was when he was a former president – jumping ahead in the sequence. But when he was a former president, we were on one of his infamous trips. We were on the road about twenty out of thirty days a month. We were in, I think it was Kansas City and we had to fly to Chicago for a speech. We’d put the trips together so that they were a mixture of his participating in a charity golf tournament, doing something political, doing an honorarium speech, and that honorarium speech would usually be the vehicle that would provide the transportation. And then he would usually try to do as many times as possible, an academic visit to one of the universities.

So you’d put this combo together, but transportation is provided by the association or the corporation who he is doing the honorarium speech for. And so we were leaving for breakfast, going over the day’s schedule, and he happened to ask me what kind of aircraft do we have going to Chicago? I told him that we had a Learjet, which to me is a nice aircraft. And he went ballistic. He said, “That’s ridiculous. I can’t even stand up in that plane. If they want me to speak there, they should give me a plane that’s decent, good transportation.” He was really angry and I was really disappointed and angry, too, that he could be that spoiled. And so we stopped talking and it was silence – like a husband and wife. We get to Chicago and we get in a limo and we’re driving into downtown from Midway, and like a husband and wife, he breaks the silence by some innocuous comment about the weather. Just to break it, and then everything came back to normal. But, yeah, he had a temper, but I didn’t see it that often. He had great control.

Smith: When you started at the White House – let’s see, you started at the beginning of the Ford presidency?

Wennekamp: Yeah, I started working over there in ’75.

Smith: In ’75 – so this is post-pardon?

Wennekamp: Exactly.

Smith: Where were you when the pardon – were you still at the Commerce Department?

Wennekamp: Yes, I was still at Commerce.

Smith: Were you surprised?

Wennekamp: Absolutely. But at the time – my only question was why he didn’t do it sooner? But then I realized why he couldn’t. Then over the years of listening to him answer the question over and over and over again, I became so thoroughly convinced that what he did was the right thing. And not in his personal best interests at all and he knew that.

Smith: Contrast him with poor Lyndon Johnson, who died the day before the Vietnam peace agreement was announced – at least Gerald Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking. And the real tipping point, or maybe it was just a cherry on the sundae, was the Profiles in Courage Award from the Kennedy Library. He said, “Everywhere I’ve gone for twenty years, people ask the same question. They don’t ask it anymore.” It’s as if the Kennedy imprimatur made it go away.
Wennekamp: Yeah, it’s interesting, I hadn’t thought about the timing, but you are right. You are very right.

Smith: The first several months of the Ford presidency you were at the Commerce Department. Like everyone else, you watched him from a distance and presumably formed some opinions about the man and his approach to the job. Once you actually became part of the White House and saw it up close, were any of those assumptions challenged?

Wennekamp: To the contrary. I found that he was as real and as down to earth and as engaging as he came across in press conferences or in meetings, etc. Almost to point that you had to be careful that you didn’t become too familiar.

Smith: Really?

Wennekamp: Yeah, because he made it so easy to be his friend, you had to remember what your job was, and that you were dealing with the President of the United States. But he made it so comfortable. And that, I think, gave rise to an environment, an association, a cadre of people that worked for him that were of like-mind. Very, very decent, hardworking, highly ethical, great morals and values – that thread just ran through.

We had the annual meetings back in Washington, the reunions, if you will, and we often reflect on that. What a great group of people that happened to come together. I’m not saying that he did it, because he didn’t handpick, but just by association of the type of people. It was a phenomenal, phenomenal experience.

Smith: Everyone knows he loved to be on the road. What was it about that experience that he found so enjoyable?

Wennekamp: Yeah, I know. But you’re right, it was back when he was a congressman. He was on the road all the time. He just loved the mobility. I think his family paid a price for that. But again, as a former president, I would travel with him and ask him, “Why do you need to do this?” The honorariums, the corporate boards, everything. He’d just built the house there in Rancho Mirage, and he had a mortgage on it, and he said, “I want to pay the house off.” It was a Depression mentality there, and I talked to him at one time about the tax advantages of a mortgage, the investing, the funds. “Nope, I’ve got to pay this house off.”

Smith: He must have enjoyed the process of going to those events and talking, I suppose, to local pols, and eating rubber chicken – just the whole ritual of life on the road. He really traveled until around his 90th birthday, and then his doctors told him basically to lay off. And one senses, without being melodramatic, that part of him died before he died, because he was denied that which gave him such pleasure.

Wennekamp: Exactly. And you could see it when he would give a speech. If he stumbled he’d be angry with himself afterwards. Penny was good at building it back up, if you will. But when he had the ceremony for the anniversary for his inauguration in Statuary Hall, he stumbled a little bit there, and I could tell that he was angry with himself; he was frustrated.

Smith: Let me add a sequel because I wrote that speech.

Wennekamp: Is that right?

Smith: Yeah. He said afterwards, “That’s the last time I’m speaking in public.”

Wennekamp: Yeah, you could see it.

Smith: And the only time I ever saw a temper was exactly that. He wouldn’t wear glasses. He’d come up with something like the lighting angle was wrong, or the placement of the speech on podium was off, or something. But I know exactly what you mean. He had standards.

Wennekamp: Exactly, high standards. He was funny because, like a lot of politicians, I guess, and a lot of celebrities - comedians particularly, he could turn it on. He loved people. He could be engaging, a man’s man. It’s like he never met someone that wasn’t a friend. But when he was alone, he liked to be alone. He wasn’t this bubbly gregarious kind of guy. He made it very down to earth, very serious, and you see that in a lot of people. I find that interesting, how that works.
Smith: That is interesting. When you were in the White House, were there particular foreign trips that you remember? Were you on the trip to Japan?

Wennekamp: No, I was not.

Smith: So you had nothing to do with his short pants?

Wennekamp: No. I went to Japan with him later, as a former president. I think the Salzburg trip, primarily because he took such great pride in that, in dealing with President Sadat. He had a great respect for President Sadat, as a lot of us do. But he hit it off so well with the President in negotiating the Sinai II agreement.

Smith: Why do you think that was? They would seem to be two very different kinds of people.

Wennekamp: I don’t know. I think they were both true statesmen. They didn’t have hidden agendas. President Ford never did – that was obvious, anyway. He was very shrewd.

Smith: I assume Ford, whether you agreed with him or not, did instill a sense of trust.

Wennekamp: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: And that’s probably not universally the case among public figures. But when you stop to think about the people he became very close to - Giscard D’Estaing seems to be a temperamental opposite. Lord Callaghan was an old line Labor Party Socialist, and yet they seemed to have become very good friends.

Wennekamp: Exactly.

Smith: Even Jimmy Carter in later years.

Wennekamp: Particularly interesting to me because if you’re looking at anecdotal situations, after the campaign, after the ’76 campaign, you know as everyone, how truly disappointed President Ford was that we didn’t pull it off. And it was so close, none of us expected that outcome. We thought it was a great possibility, but our expectations had risen to the point that we thought it was really going to be President Ford’s election. And he was very, very disappointed.

Smith: Was he down?

Wennekamp: He was down. At first I could see he resented who he lost to, an outsider.

Smith: We’ve been told he went around the day after, and for some time saying, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Wennekamp: Exactly right. But at the same time, this is one of those things that rank way up there relative to what impresses me about President Ford, given that feeling, given the disappointment and resentment etc., the first time President Carter calls and asks for President Ford, President Ford takes the phone, and without missing a beat, says, “Yes, Mr. President.” The respect, he’s gracious, he’s kind, and he’s professional. He listens to President Carter and then says, “Okay, this is what you do, call Tip O’Neill…..,” and goes through A, B, C, D, giving guidance on how to deal with the situation, or move this particular issue.

Smith: Is it your sense this was still early in the Carter presidency?

Wennekamp: Oh, yes. This was right after President Ford became a former president. And I had such respect for him for that reason. Knowing how he felt personally, and then to step back and divorce himself from that and deal with the President of the United States as he should be dealt with.

Smith: Now the story always has been that the professional relationship began during the Carter presidency when President Ford helped out lobbying senators on the Panama Canal treaties, which was something he didn’t have to do. And probably didn’t win him a whole lot of points among some in his party. But supposedly, the personal relationship really began on that long trip to and from the Sadat funeral.

Wennekamp: That’s what I understand. And that was after I had moved on. I’d left in late 1980 and they were not, at that time, good friends. But like you said, he was fully supportive on Panama, which didn’t win him a lot of friends in the Republican Party; and then the recognition of China versus Taiwan was the other thing that a number of people in his own administration, like Dr. Kissinger, wasn’t real happy about.

Smith: Really?

Wennekamp: And I think that maybe the most challenging intellectual exercise I ever had was that he walked in the office and told me what he had just committed to do relative to Panama, for example, with President Carter. And I didn’t personally agree with his taking that position, but my task was to write up the response to the letters that would be coming in the next day of why did you do this? What are talking about? How could you do this? So I had to write up the letter, if you will, that would be used in correspondence to explain.

Smith: Did he have input into that?

Wennekamp: Oh I drafted it and had him look at it and we were good to go. But it’s an interesting exercise that I’ve used several times with people – you can have your own convictions, but you have to be open minded. And I had to be very open minded.

Smith: Were you at the Kansas City convention?

Wennekamp: Yes, I was.

Smith: What are your memories of that?

Wennekamp: Oh that was phenomenal. The backroom shenanigans, if you will, relative to Ford and Reagan and the caucuses and the delegates.

Smith: And because it was still not nailed down…

Wennekamp: No, it was not. It was not nailed down at all. So it was really very, very interesting to watch that and be a part of it. His winning the nomination was absolutely great. His selection of Senator Dole surprised a lot of us. Surprised me. As a matter of fact, I remember, I mentioned Frank Ursomarso earlier, but one of the things that Frank and I had to do was go over and get Senator and Elizabeth Dole and sneak them into the Crown Plaza Hotel. And it was not easy because the media was all over everything, and we had these cars that were like bubbles, an old Pacer. There were big windows all around the thing and we drive over to the Crown Plaza and there’s a long queue to get down to the parking lot. I couldn’t wait in the queue so I just drove down the ramp and waited for the car that was waiting for the gate to go up and just slip right through with it. The media saw that and they are running down the ramp and we spirit the Doles out and into the hotel. Some of them had gotten the clue.

Smith: Who else was on the list, because various names have been bandied about over the years in terms of people who were seriously considered? Howard Baker, being one. There is some debate over whether Anne Armstrong’s name ever was actually tossed around.

Wennekamp: I’m not sure. I do know, relative to the Vice President, I know that he was very disappointed to have to drop Nelson Rockefeller.

Smith: I don’t know if he told you, but I’ve been working for nine years on a biography of Nelson Rockefeller.

Wennekamp: Oh, I saw that, yes.

Smith: I’m always interested in anything that anyone can add. I mean, was he disappointed at the time, or was he disappointed after the fact?

Wennekamp: Disappointed at the time. Particularly when he had to tell Nelson that they were not going to be able to be on the ticket together. And it was so painfully obvious that it was the conservative wing of the party. But it was very hard for him, because he had great respect for Mr. Rockefeller.

Smith: Did you see Rockefeller at that time?

Wennekamp: No, I did not. No.

Smith: You wonder if the White House waited too long to take Reagan seriously.
Either thinking he might not run at all or underestimating just how potent a challenger he would be.

Wennekamp: In ’76?

Smith: In ’76.
Wennekamp: Okay. Yeah, I think so. I know a number of them did in 1980. I don’t know if you’ve ever heard the stories about President Ford’s scenario, if you will, relative to 1980.

Smith: I’d like to. I know that there were those on the outside who were urging him to run in 1980.

Wennekamp: Yeah, and he was doing a lot of traveling, which was done for exposure and charity and personal gain, but in essence, he was in Rancho Mirage. And now this is somewhat my personal interpretation – he really thought that the party would come down Sand Dune Road and give him an invitation to be the nominee. And so he kind of laid back. Carter was still doing very well in the polls. The economy was still doing well in early ’80. Reagan was throwing his name around and a number of President Ford’s friends on the Hill advised him, “Look, don’t muddy the waters right now. Carter’s doing very well. Let Reagan run around and do the primary things kind of be beneath you, as a former president – get out there in New Hampshire in the snow, etc.” So he listened to that. Well, then with the passage of time, he had the confluence of a couple of events, like the economy and the Iranian hostage situation; Carter’s popularity dropped severely, Reagan started picking up in the polls, and now President Ford is watching this and saying, “Wait a minute.” He goes back to his friends and they, in essence, told him now it would be divisive of the Party for you to come in, so just wait. And so he saw this come and go, and it really bothered him. It really did.

Smith: But the bell rings and the old warhorse responds. I assume there must have been a complex series of layers because Mrs. Ford had only recently had her intervention, and there is good reason to believe that she would not have encouraged him to do this.

Wennekamp: That’s right.

Smith: What was your sense of that?

Wennekamp: I would totally agree with that. As you know, better than I, their intention was to go back to Michigan and she was happy with that. And then moving out to Rancho Mirage after that stint as First Lady and President was a total course change. It was a sea change for them to their personal lives. And she wasn’t real happy out there.

Smith: Really?

Wennekamp: No, because she didn’t really have a lot of friends there. And like I said, he was traveling 20-30 days a month and she was pretty much alone.

Smith: Because by that time the kids were pretty much grown up. And I don’t mean to put words in her mouth, but one can imagine her thinking, the one good thing about losing the election is, I’m going to get my husband back. Only to discover that it really wasn’t very different from what it had been before he was president.

Wennekamp: No, because he didn’t change. Exactly right. And he wasn’t going to change.

Smith: Were you aware that she had a problem, however defined?

Wennekamp: Yeah. It was painfully obvious. I think it’s unfortunate that it went on so long. It dates way back to when he was in the House. It’s unfortunate.

Smith: Was it an issue during the White House years?

Wennekamp: Not as much as it was when you got into Rancho Mirage. And again, I think that’s in large part because of the loneliness, the absence of responsible activities and things like that. That can get everybody up. And when you have really nothing to look forward to, you can let yourself go a little bit more. But it was unfortunate that it took as long as it did. But I personally was pleasantly surprised that the intervention worked as effectively as it did.

Smith: Was this something that was sort of sprung on everyone. We’ve heard that Susan was instrumental in trying to organize things. Was her dad on the road, or was this planned in advance?

Wennekamp: He had been on the road. I can’t remember how many days he was back before that. I think it was on a Sunday. But we hadn’t been back a long time. I know he was on one trip – everything that really brought it to a head – he was on a trip back east. I was not with him on this trip. And Secret Service notified me that Mrs. Ford was very upset and wanted to leave the residence and they were not allowing it. And so we contacted the President and he changed his trip. As a matter of fact, he got Dr. Kissinger to take his speech in Virginia, I think, and flew directly home. And then from that it really developed. Which thank God that happened.

Smith: What was the mood while all of this was unfolding? For those of you who were on the outside but close observers, and in some ways participants in their lives?

Wennekamp: Of great, great concern. Because if they weren’t able to pull off the intervention, what next? How do you deal with this without getting so terribly public that it would be counterproductive?

Smith: I can imagine her feelings at the time – what are people going to say? Just that sort of natural reaction. Was there concern about that on the part of all of you who were really, first and foremost, concerned about her well-being?

Wennekamp: Foremost, absolutely. And with her, I think there was a degree of denial, as there usually is.

Smith: Denial that a problem existed.

Wennekamp: Exactly – to the depths of what it was. But it was challenging. I sometimes wondered if – just personal reflection off-record, if you will – he wasn’t escaping with his travels and his trips.

Smith: That’s an interesting observation. Over the years it’s been suggested that he felt a certain degree of guilt for being away as much as he was, and perhaps inadvertently contributing to the situation. But that’s a valid theory.

In the immediate aftermath, did it take a while for this to be judged a success? She went to Long Beach for X amount of time.

Wennekamp: The Naval Hospital in Long Beach. Right, which is a very difficult time, because, even when that happened, as I’m sure you’ve heard from Susan and others, that everyone underestimated the severity of the problem. When they put her on detox, it wasn’t right because they made some calculations that were wrong and it was nearly disastrous. They had to unwind that and start over. But I think the family - I think it really brought the family a lot closer because they were off all doing their own thing. Now Susan was young and she’d just gotten married. But I was proud of them and I was proud of him.
He really did everything that was necessary.

Smith: People talk, understandably, about the courage she displayed at the time of the breast cancer surgery.

Wennekamp: I was just thinking of that myself.

Smith: But I was thinking, just as she set an example for countless women, so did he, for husbands. How to respond to this, and likewise with the drinking issue, because he stopped.

Wennekamp: Oh, yeah. Stopped cold. And he loved to have a drink just like most of us, whether it is a martini or Jack Daniels or something. But he went cold turkey because he knew it wasn’t the right thing to do – wasn’t fair.

Smith: One sense he was a man of great self-discipline.

Wennekamp: Yes.

Smith: Because I know later on he was upbraiding Susan for smoking. And she sort of threw it back in his face with his pipes. And he got rid of the pipes – sent them off to the Library, I think. All the ceremonial pipes, the gift pipes, he just – cold turkey again.

Wennekamp: He was disciplined. Very much so. Yeah.

Smith: And what about the relationship with the kids? How did that evolve over time?

Wennekamp: You know, I don’t know. I wasn’t that involved with the kids – to the degree they came around the compound, if you will, in Rancho Mirage. But not that much involved, not as much as Greg Willard who worked with them during the campaign and became personal friends with the kids. I dealt really primarily with the President and Mrs. Ford.
Smith: Let’s go back to right after the election. There are a number of things going on: wanting to have a successful transition; smooth handover; and at a certain time, to get on with your own life. Was there ever any doubt that on January 20th they would be going anywhere other than Southern California? By then was that decision pretty well taken?

Wennekamp: I think it was pretty much taken. I remember right afterward a lot of us going out to Palm Springs where they had been spending the winters, if you will, when they weren’t at Vail. And they had a place there. We all got a bunch of places to stay and started working on our resumes because we hadn’t anticipated the fact that we were going to be unemployed, and none of us had a clue what we were going to do. But the fact that he was going to end up out there was pretty much concluded. The disadvantage he had, unlike so many other former presidents, is that he didn’t anticipate being a former president, and therefore had not set himself up, if you will. Hadn’t got his house built and all the security issues taken care of. As you look back, in more contemporary times, all the presidents knew – President Nixon had himself all set up in San Clemente and Johnson – everyone had pretty much set it up.

Smith: And let’s face it, some of the criticism he took for “commercializing” the former presidency - he didn’t have much money when he left office.

Wennekamp: Oh, no, as a matter of fact – I think it’s been written that he didn’t have a savings account until he was a former president. As a congressman, they lived hand to mouth, and the presidency was such a short period of time, and so then he became former president and had the benefit of the pensions and the honorariums and stuff like that. And finally, financially, he got it together.

Smith: Now, when they went out there initially, where did they live?

Wennekamp: They rented a house up in the hills by Palm Springs near Rancho Mirage. And we rented another house for offices, etc. And then, as you probably know, he was able to work out a deal with Ambassador Firestone, who owned part of a lot right next to his place on the 13th green at Thunderbird. And he was able to buy that lot and then friends of Ford, if you will, bought the house next to that and had it converted into facilities that would accommodate the office for Smith: Was that the Ginger Rogers house?

Wennekamp: That was the Ginger Rogers house, right. Ginger Rogers bought that for her mother, I think.

Smith: Which is now the office complex.

Wennekamp: And then she owned half a lot next door, so Ford bought half a lot from Ambassador Firestone and half a lot from Ginger Rogers and put that together for his residence, and then that became the compound.

Smith: So they built their house there?

Wennekamp: Yes.

Smith: And presumably were involved in its design and layout and everything else.

Wennekamp: Oh yeah, very much so. The interior design and everything, yeah. That was a full time job for Mrs. Ford, too.

Smith: Is it more his house or her house?

Wennekamp: It’s more her house. Yeah. But it turned out beautifully.

Smith: It must have been fun to design a house after all those years.

Wennekamp: You have the pool and the dog run; Ambassador Firestone had the tennis courts, so they didn’t have to worry about that. But it was nice, it was very nice.

Smith: I take it Leonard Firestone was a very pivotal figure in that his story and Mrs.
Ford’s become enmeshed - that they are almost co-founders of the Betty Ford Center.

Wennekamp: Oh, yeah. The financial support that he provided for the Betty Ford Center was phenomenal. Very gracious, a true gentleman.

Smith: That’s what I’ve heard.
Wennekamp: I really admired him.

Smith: In those early days, would the kids come back for visits or were they at that point pretty well on their own?

Wennekamp: They were pretty much out on their own. I think the biggest time the family got together would be during the winter time up in Vail and then subsequently Beaver Creek.

Smith: Tell us about the house in Vail, because I’ve never been in it.

Wennekamp: They built that and now I’m gone again. In Vail they always rented the Bass residence and then they built in Beaver Creek, and I’ve never been in Beaver Creek.

Smith: I’m told they loved Vail, but I’m also told they were beloved in Vail.

Wennekamp: Oh, yes. Matter of fact, one of the runs up at Beaver Creek now is named after President Ford. They couldn’t do enough for him, the community as a whole. It was beautiful, it really was.

Smith: Did you ever have the feeling that you wished more people could know them as you knew them?

Wennekamp: Oh, absolutely. Even today when I talk about what kind of a person he was, particularly him, people are just amazed that he was so real. So touchable, if you will. He was stubborn, but he was still open-minded. He would listen if the two of you were doing the pros and cons on something, he was very open-minded and he loved to listen to the debate, and hear the exchange and the advantages and disadvantages. And then make the decision. Stubborn and tenacious.

Smith: And fiscally conservative, is it safe to say?

Wennekamp: Yes. And I remember when we would be traveling and he’d get off the plane and the press would be there and he’d make comments. He’d want to go to the mike and make some comments, and then he’d go to the event that evening, and it would be the same comments. So we were at one stop – as a matter of fact it was in this hotel, I remember, we were in the suite - and I told him,
“You may or may not appreciate this but, I think that you would be better off if you’d reserve your comments for the dinner, because you are saying the same thing at the airport. So everybody has already heard your one liners, your bullet points, etc. And so you could cut down on that…” And he said, “No. I have something to say and I’m going to say it. I’m going to get the point across.” I said, “Okay. Go for it.”

Smith: As time went by, the party moved further and further to the right, particularly on social issues. And it wasn’t just abortion; it was a number of issues where they [the Fords] really were at variance with where the party was going. I’ve often wondered whether that was simply the party moving as he stayed the same; how much of that was that my imagination, how much it was her influence; or was it just him growing, listening to different sides, whatever. For example, he’s the only president ever to sign a petition on gay rights. And that’s not what you would have thought of Gerald Ford in the White House. In the White House he was the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. Well, then came Ronald Reagan and it sort of smashed all those records. But he just seemed, as he got older, to become more open, more…

Wennekamp: Broadminded.

Smith: More broadminded is a very good way of putting it.

Wennekamp: My own personal speculation is that as he got out of Washington, got away from the Beltway – he had a juxtaposition of exposure to corporate America through the boards, academia, charities, and the combination. I think it was a broadening experience. Because he heard a different perspective than I think he had. Yes, you have economic councils, and you have summit meetings and everything, but for him as an individual to be exposed and have those interchanges, I think was a broadening experience for him.

Smith: But you first have to have a mind open enough to hear that and not reject it a priori.

Wennekamp: And that goes back to the comment I made about him loving the debate. He really had an insatiable appetite for information.
Smith: And the newspapers - my experience was, you never traveled anywhere without…

Smith: How so?

Wennekamp: You think of him as this big jock, but then you have this law student and you have this coach and you’ve got this politician, and you have this gregarious guy that could work the crowds, but still intellectual when it came to his curiosity. And I think the thing that disappointed me the most was the bad rap he got for his intellectual capacity, because he was so much brighter than people gave him credit for. And his instincts were phenomenal on what to pursue and what not to pursue.

Smith: How would you illustrate that?

Wennekamp: Well, something would come up, I think it had something to do with the Warren Commission, but something hit the news and we were getting calls from AP and everybody for a comment. I can’t remember all the details, but he suggested that I call Kelly, who was the director of the FBI at the time, ask Kelley a question. I apologize, I can’t remember the details, but I responded and President Ford said, “Okay, no comment. It will die.” And he was right on. Great instincts and the advice that he would give – like I said with President Carter and how to handle things. His instincts on how to deal with the Hill.

Smith: And the irony is, at that point in his life his relationship with Tip O’Neill was undoubtedly much closer than Jimmy Carter’s ever was.

Wennekamp: Oh yeah. Absolutely.

Smith: You mentioned the Warren Commission; again, that must have been another question that dogged him wherever he went. He did an oral history with someone at the Kennedy Library about the Warren Commission, and he said something quite remarkable. One of the theories that was discussed among the commissioners was that Lee Harvey Oswald was sexually impotent, and he was going to show Marina, who apparently had been taunting him, just how much of a man he was. And it was apparently discussed seriously among the commission members, but it wasn’t put into the report, I think for reasons of taste.

Wennekamp: Yeah, I can understand that. It’s interesting you say that because when I look back, we talked about the pardon and how that was such an issue that dogged him. When I look back at the correspondence, there were things that just never went away. Not that they were the most voluminous, but just consistently over the years - the pardon, of course, the Warren Commission, and Roswell, Arizona and the aliens and whether or not he knew. Is this what they look like? It just went on and on.

Smith: What did he think about the alien question?

Wennekamp: Finally I couldn’t resist it. I said, “Could you just do me the favor – is this true or not?” And he said, “Aw, there’s nothing to it.” But the little twinkle in his eye…made me still wonder.

Smith: You know, for all of his openness there are people who think he took some secrets with him.

Wennekamp: I believe so, and maybe for good reason.

Smith: It probably goes back to that self-disciplined nature. He was capable of keeping a secret.

Wennekamp: Exactly. And I’ll tell people today that people complain about not knowing enough, or not understanding, or the media not giving enough information, etc., that from the time I started with him, I came to the personal realization that most of us are better off not knowing everything. I had the good fortune of reading the security briefings that would be brought out to him on a weekly basis – the military would bring them out literally handcuffed to a briefcase, and you’d get the briefing and then he’d read it and then I’d have to literally burn it and flush the ashes down the toilet.

Smith: Really?
Wennekamp: Because there weren’t shredding machines and stuff like that. But what I read told me that there are a lot of things that we don’t need to know because a lot of it is speculation and why scare people? But to your point, I think that’s the case, he probably did.

Smith: I assume he appreciated the fact that President Carter took pains to keep him informed.

Wennekamp: Oh, yeah. Which was obviously to President Carter’s advantage, to keep him so. Keep him abreast of what’s happening.

Smith: When did you move into the offices? Was it a while?

Wennekamp: Yes, it took a good nine months to reconfigure everything. I stayed in Washington for the first six months following the inauguration and managed the office across the street in Jefferson Square, where we put together a small staff of about thirty-nine people.

Smith: And how did that work?

Wennekamp: We literally had a mini White House, if you will. There was a correspondence office, a scheduling office, a legal, a press. The former president’s budget runs for six months and then it significantly drops down. So what we had to do was, once we were in a position of doing it, would be to hire people at significantly less salary than the executive secretary was getting at the White House. Take the executive secretary out, have her train the individual in Palm Springs or Rancho Mirage, bring this one back, let her go and then move forward with a significantly reduced staff at a reduced overhead relative to salary. And then in six months close the office.

Smith: What would you say to people who think “the imperialist presidency” - they get all this money, they get all these staffs – and what are they doing to earn it?

Wennekamp: From the contribution that I saw him make, it was money well-spent. I remember in the budgetary discussions on the budget for the former President after the transition, I’d get calls from senators asking questions about the volume of correspondence, etc. Trying for justification of why do we need to continue to have this staff and this much of an expense? And everyone is amazed at how many of the citizens of this country were communicating, not because they wanted to make him wealthy, but because they had questions, they wanted his opinion. Of course, there was scheduling, there were invitations, and things, but the number of people who wanted a card for their mother turning 100 years old - it’s a position that goes on. That’s why he’s still called President Ford. I mean, that’s why he was. That’s a position that goes on.

Smith: I assume as a former congressman, for whom answering the mail promptly was the sine quo non of official success - that carried over to his post-White House days. The mail was your tyrant.

Wennekamp: Exactly right. And we had a great staff handling all of that.

Smith: In those early days, how was the operation organized?

Wennekamp: Basically scheduling and correspondence were the two key functions.

Smith: Now, Bob Barrett was chief of staff?

Wennekamp: Yeah, Bob Barrett was chief of staff. He was involved a lot in the negotiations for the NBC contract and the book and things like that. And I did a lot of the traveling, a lot of the scheduling – the details – the old advance work, if you will, and pretty much managed the office. But it worked very effectively, it really did. President Ford had his personal secretary. Now Mrs. Ford was not happy that the former President’s budget did not include anything for the former First Lady. And so she resented the fact that there was nothing in there for an office for her, stationary and all this kind of stuff. Which does make sense, because she was highly regarded and respected and she got a lot of correspondence. And so we were able to design the offices in such a way that she had an office right next to his, and we got stationary, which he paid for, but appeased her, too. She had her office, but she kept busy in that regard, too.

Smith: Was there such a thing as a typical day there in those early years right after he had come out there? If he was there?
Wennekamp: If he was there, a typical day: he’d eat breakfast, go for a swim, and come over to the office, probably around nine; read; and then go into the correspondence. Then go into answering phone calls and meeting on the schedule and planning events, planning the next trip, if you will. But he was good at maintaining contact with people, much better than I am. He was on the phone or writing to people all the time. I don’t think he ever got into emailing. I don’t think so.

Smith: Penny said apparently he learned to play solitaire on the computer. And people could email him, and he understood that; he just didn’t understand responding in kind. And he was famously not adept with phones?

Wennekamp: No.

Smith: They were technologically and mechanically beyond his…

Wennekamp: He’s like me and a lot of guys that, if it weren’t for my wife, the VCR would still flash twelve. He was like that.

Smith: There was a large volume of mail?

Wennekamp: Oh, yes, tons of mail. It really, really kept us busy. We developed what I thought was good boilerplate responses that you can personalize. But again, that was before computers, so it was on an old mag card, IBM typewriters. It seems so antiquated now.

Smith: I’ve heard that as the staff became progressively more populated with females that the word went out from on high - “I don’t want gossiping, I don’t want backbiting.” I assume he’d seen it on the Hill and he just didn’t want a staff that was wasting its energies in that kind of back and forth.

Wennekamp: When you talk about the staff, and this is not anything of profound record, but given how personable, how engaging he was, he wasn’t comfortable walking around and talking with the staff. You know how a very effective way to manage is to manage by walking around, but he stayed in his office. He wasn’t comfortable, and I don’t know why.
Smith: As you know, most politicians love gossip, it’s a second language. And I don’t mean just political gossip, I mean just gossip. And my sense is he was visibly uncomfortable, to the point where he would find a way to change the subject. A waste of time, or sometimes bordered on malicious. I don’t know how to describe it, but he was just visibly uncomfortable.

Wennekamp: I think in large part because he knew how damaging malicious rumors can be in the political environment, and he had no use for rumor and innuendo and hearsay.

Smith: And Oliver Stone.

Wennekamp: Yeah, exactly. True. He took life very seriously, but could have a good time. Golfing, and as a matter of fact, I’ve got to share with you one of the funniest visions I ever had in my life, and I can still see it today. He was in a golf tournament, and he had this bad reputation for hitting people. He was in a foursome, probably with Arnold Palmer, or somebody like that at the Riviera, and got up to first tee off. I remember I was standing back off of the first tee, and they were announcing the players, and you look down the gallery and it’s just tight. You can’t imagine. Being a golfer myself, I can’t imagine hitting a ball down that. And so they announce the golfers and then they announce President Ford to the tee, and I look down the gallery and the fairway, and the whole gallery just whewwwww, just like the water opening.

Smith: The Red Sea parting

Wennekamp: It was beautiful.

Erik: Did he see it?

Wennekamp: Yeah, he did.

Smith: Non-verbal communication.

Wennekamp: Funniest thing I’ve ever seen.

Smith: What is it about the game of golf that you derive such pleasure from? I’m told that you empty your mind of anything else, so it’s a form of mental relaxation.
Wennekamp: Yeah. It is truly an escape in such a beautiful environment. The combination of those two things, particularly like here. You go up and play golf at Palos Verdes, looking out over the ocean. I mean, it’s just breathtaking and it’s just so peaceful – if you don’t let it get to you.

Smith: That’s it. And yet at the same time, my sense is that he was a pretty competitive guy.

Wennekamp: Oh yeah. He got irritated with himself, as we were talking earlier.

Smith: A couple quick things. Autograph seekers must have been more or less constant wherever you go.

Wennekamp: Yeah.

Smith: And during this time, too, we had the rise of the commercial dealer. These were not all eight year old kids spontaneously wanting an autograph. How did he deal with those demands of celebrity?

Wennekamp: Pretty well. He wasn’t really excited about it, but he would accommodate it. Most of the time it would be people sending in pictures that they happened to get of him, or of them in the picture with him, or them shaking his hand or something. When you’re in the White House, the staff automatically takes care of that. If you meet him, that’s logged, and its recorded and the whole thing. But as a former – you don’t have that official photographer following you around and somebody taking notes. And so a lot of pictures would come in. But he was accommodating. He’d usually keep it to just a signature as opposed to a note or annotation or something.

Smith: You know what Ronald Reagan did to frustrate dealers was to personalize. Which when you stop to think about it, is pretty shrewd.

Wennekamp: Oh, yeah. To Jane…

Smith: Exactly. Most people have no idea that a former president would spend as much time as he did on such things. He would set aside an afternoon every week. Say it’s Tuesday afternoon, and there’s that long table in the conference room, and there would be two piles of stuff, one for her, and one for him. He was her goad. He would say, “Now come on Mother,” so they would sit down and they would sign together. But he was the one imposing his discipline in terms of carrying out their responsibilities.

Wennekamp: Yeah, I can see that.

Smith: When they went to a restaurant – they must have had favorite restaurants – were they left alone?

Wennekamp: In the two communities, yes, generally speaking, they were just respected residents. It was quite nice in that regard. It really was. It’s visiting Ames, Iowa or someplace – for good reason, people would take advantage of the opportunity. But he respected their right, if you will.

Smith: It goes with the territory.

Wennekamp: Yeah, exactly.

Smith: Did he enjoy the campus visits? He did a lot of them, didn’t he?

Wennekamp: Oh, my gosh. He really did.

Smith: People talked about commercializing the presidency – some things were left out of that discussion, one was the charity work that he did; three things, really. The second was all of the campus visits that he did, and third, which apparently was one of the things that brought he and Jimmy Carter together, comparing notes the fact that they had to raise all this money to build their presidential libraries - and to Gerald Ford, nine million dollars or whatever it was, was Mt. Everest.

Wennekamp: Yeah, it really, truly was. But you’re right. The academic experience was exciting and interesting, for everybody. For him, he loved it. He loved going in and teaching a law class or a political science class or just a lecture, doing a Q&A. He just thrived on it. And with the American Enterprise Institute, putting that together and supporting that, he just absolutely thrived on it. I remember when he was at UCLA, the mixture of events. He taught for a couple of days and then went over and played the Glenn Campbell Open, and then came back and did some more teaching, and then we flew out on the Friday night after a reception with the trustees, and flew to Florida and did the Jackie Gleason. It was just – the mixture.

Smith: How I would have loved to see he and Gleason together. Did they hit it off?

Wennekamp: Yeah. Gleason was a piece of work.

Smith: Was he? How so?

Wennekamp: The way he’d play golf. He would be in this cart, and he’d hit the ball and get in his cart – no practice swings or anything – drive up the cart, get out, click, get back in the cart.

Smith: It was not an exercise in exercise.

Wennekamp: No.

Smith: Who were his friends? Who were the people that President Ford really enjoyed being around?

Wennekamp: Oh, my gosh.

Smith: The thing with Hope was real. They were genuinely buddies.

Wennekamp: Yeah. To my surprise, because President Ford is such a real honest guy and Bob Hope was not so real and honest.

Smith: I think I know exactly what you are saying. To know him was not necessarily to buy the public image.

Wennekamp: But people like Firestone, I think, a true friend. And then he had friends in Vail. No one comes to mind, really. Not that I recall.

Smith: And the corporate boards, was it exaggerated the number of boards that he was on, or were they sort of rotated over time? Were there things that he did for many, many years?

Wennekamp: He tried to maintain those for many, many years. And like I said, even though it was reported as a lot of boards, he was selective and he played a role I’ll never forget the fact that when I talked to representatives at the corporations, like American Express or something, they, to a board, were always amazed at how prepared he was. You get the board books – I’m on a board and I have trouble getting ready for the board meeting – getting through the board book.
But he was always prepared and had input, he wasn’t there just for the monetary ride, if you will. Or the exposure. He took great pride in those responsibilities.

Smith: That dovetails with what we’ve been told by a number of other people. Do you think he was sensitive to the charge that he was cashing in?

Wennekamp: Not too. I don’t think he was too sensitive to it because he knew that he was contributing, that he wasn’t just prostituting himself, if you will. And the fact that people didn’t understand, he’d just say, “Well, that’s their problem.”

Smith: And obviously people had no idea of all the things that he turned down.

Wennekamp: No, that’s right, oh absolutely.

Smith: When was the last time you saw him?

Wennekamp: The last time I spoke with him would have been probably the spring of ’06 when I was down there working on the plans for his possible demise. I had responsibility for everything that took place here in California, prior to going back to the cathedral. That was the last time I spoke with him. And he was doing fine.

Smith: He was?

Wennekamp: Yeah. He had aged, but he was still the same guy.

Smith: There is a wonderful story one of the agents told us, I guess it was the last time that he came out of the hospital. He got in the car and the agents were going to drive home, and he said, “No, we’re going to In and Out Burger.”
And not only did he insist they were going to In and Out Burger - they park there, he gets out of the car and he goes and stands in line to get his In and Out Burger.

Wennekamp: But, it’s like he loved to drive people crazy because people over at Eisenhower Medical Center, they went to great pains to have code names and numbers and everything. So after the President came over, they’d basically slip him in the side door, have a different name so they don’t have to register, announce and have the media pick up on the fact that he’d checked in. But what would President Ford do? With all these plans, he’d grab Secret Service, “Let’s go over to the hospital,” and he’d walk right in the front door and everybody would see him. He knew what he was doing. He was playing with people.

Smith: Was it frustrating to have, in effect, a death watch going on? Anytime he was in the hospital. My sense was that Mrs. Ford, and he both valued their privacy. But in some ways that’s almost naïve. You can say I’m no long President of the United States, but the fact is, you once were President of the United States.

Wennekamp: I think the family probably handled that very well in curbing that feeding frenzy of the media, when he’d go into the hospital – Walter Reed or whatever – and just basically maintain a radio silence, just say no comment; as opposed to playing it up. When it got toward the end, it was difficult because there was a death watch and there were people trying to rent houses in the gated community that’s right over the wall, so that they could put their satellites up on the roofs and stuff like that. But the community there handled it. Law enforcement, in coordination with Secret Service, really did a great job, just a phenomenal job.

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the degree of public response when he did die, because he’d been out of the public eye for a while? Whether it was here, out at St. Margaret’s where people would line up by the thousands, or back east. You’d expect it in Grand Rapids, but not necessarily on New Year’s weekend in Washington, DC.

Wennekamp: Oh, I know. I was truly taken aback, not only from the tributes and the accolades and the positive response that you heard over the airwaves, but like you said, the people that came out. The public repose that went on all night. I’ll never forget; I went over about three in the morning to see what the experience was like for the people that had gone to Indian Wells to park to get the bus to come down to the church, go through the sanctuary. Two things, one I’ll share with you real quickly was in planning, it’s like doing advance work on a party you hope you never have. And you’re taking it from zero.

And so I didn’t know what to anticipate relative to the necessity of ushers, controlling people and the public repose – putting ropes and stanchions up to keep the pews closed so people wouldn’t sit down and linger, etc. I was truly amazed. People were so respectful. I hardly needed anyone. Just show them the way and people came in. I went over there at three in the morning and everybody was smiling and saying, “Nah, it’s no problem. It took us about three hours to park and get over here. But no problem.” And one couple came through with their about nine year old son. He’s dressed in his coat and tie at four in the morning. Just beautiful. The respect and admiration was just phenomenal.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered? More appropriately, how do you remember him?

Wennekamp: No, I think your first question is probably the same. But for me, what he was able to do in coming in and healing a nation. I was very, very fortunate to find myself in DC at that point in our history, and to see what was happening and be part of that, if you will. But to see how effectively he took the reins and guided the country in such a way, so obviously not for his own personal gain, and what he was able to accomplish, I think was just phenomenal. To bring us back from the depths of where we were in ’74, to where we found ourselves in ’76, was just phenomenal. I don’t think he gets nearly the credit that he should, and he did it only because of the kind of guy, the kind of person, the kind of man that he was.

Smith: First thing. Did you come into the Justice Department at the beginning of the Nixon administration?

Smith: Oh gosh. Okay.

Bork: I was just in time for the explosions.

Smith: What were you doing before?

Bork: I was teaching at Yale. And when Nixon offered me the job as Solicitor General he said, “The politicians have had their turn. Now we’re going to let the professors have their turn.”

Smith: Really.

Bork: Yeah.

Smith: Now, who was attorney general at that point?

Bork: Well, Richardson was attorney general. He’d just become attorney general and I don’t think he was too pleased about it.

Smith: Really?

Bork: He might’ve preferred to be the secretary of defense.

Smith: That’s an interesting observation. Let me back up. We did an interview with a man named Jerry Jones who, early in ’73, was fixing the personnel office at the White House for Haldeman. He got a call one day from Haldeman saying, “The President wants to know how many people work for the Vice President.” And Jones did some mental arithmetic and said, “About 50.” Haldeman said, “Fine. We want undated letters of resignation from all of them.” Now, this was before Haldeman left, obviously, so it’d be before April of ’73. It raises the question: Did the White House know in advance, could they have known that early, that there was an investigation of the Vice President going on in Maryland? When you arrived at the department was it public knowledge yet?

Bork: Oh, no. No, no. The first I heard of it was when Al Haig called me and asked me to resign as solicitor general and become Nixon’s chief defense attorney. And, as part of his persuasive pitch, he told me the Vice President was on the take, which was kind of a shock, I might say. But I had just enough sense to ask for twenty-four hours to think it over and after twenty-four hours, I knew I didn’t want the job. I began talking about it. I had to see the tapes and listen to the tapes and Haig said, “You can’t.” He said, “This President feels so strongly about the institution of the presidency that before he hands the tapes over to anybody, he’d burn them first and then resign.” I started to say, “Well, in that case, why doesn’t he burn them right now?”, but I had a vision of him burning the tapes in the Rose Garden, saying, “We’re doing this on the legal advice of the solicitor general.” So, I did not make that statement.

Smith: That’d be quite a niche in history.

Bork: But, anyway, that’s how I first heard about Agnew. But, you don’t want my history.

Smith: Well, the background to Ford’s becoming vice president is really significant because the Wall Street Journal went with the story; I think they broke the story. It was in August of ’73, so it would’ve come very shortly after you began work at the department?

Bork: Well, yeah, I wrote the brief against Agnew. He claimed he was immune from prosecution.

Smith: As vice president.

Bork: Yeah, and I wrote the brief with two assistants against him and he quit. On this timeline business, when did I write that brief?

[Off camera]: I’m not sure. It might be in the book.
Bork: It is in the book. I’m just not sure. Certainly it was not public knowledge when I heard about it.

Smith: Did Richardson like the job even less once that landed on his lap?

Bork: Oh, sure. Who wants that? Agnew, of course, was a character who had made enemies everywhere as part of his job as a hatchet man for Nixon.

Smith: Right.

Bork: See, Agnew said he wanted to see me at the reception line the day of the inauguration. As I went through, Agnew was there and he said, “I want to see you.” I didn’t know the man. I figured out, and I’m pretty sure it was accurate, that he was trying to put together a team for his own run for the presidency. But then, when the time came to meet with him, I still didn’t know about his being on the take, but I went to the meeting and he had nothing to say. Seemed a bland meeting in which, I think, the exciting part was when he handed me a photograph they’d just taken of the two of us sitting at his desk. It’s amazing what they quiet the troops with.

Smith: Publically, at least, it seemed to be this was the norm in Maryland. This was how politics operated.

Bork: Well, sure, but they got ____ Max and if you look at the pay scale, you can see why they did it. I think the governor made $12,000 per year or something like that.

Smith: Yeah.

Bork: So, you’re forced into graft if you’re going to keep the job.

Smith: And, was he continuing to take money as vice president?

Bork: Yeah. He wasn’t earning the money, but he was getting paid what was due to him under the bribe. It was being handed to him in his office in the White House. And there was some discussion about whether or not to indict him because the claim of immunity was taken seriously by some people. Richardson and I went over and argued with the President about it. There’s no need to go into that because it has nothing to do with Gerald Ford.
Bork: Well, but there should be a date at the end of the brief.

Smith: I’m just curious. Was Nixon genuinely surprised, appalled?

Bork: He seemed surprised. I wouldn’t say he was appalled. I mean, how can you be appalled in this town? He seemed surprised and felt sorry for Agnew because he said, “He always did everything I asked him to do.” But he finally agreed that he had to indict him.

Smith: Really?

Bork: Well, there was really no choice. For one thing, if you didn’t indict Agnew, and everybody’s sworn to silence about it, it wouldn’t do any good because they’re going to try those contractors in Baltimore who paid the bribes. So Agnew’s name would be all over the front page of the papers whether or not he was indicted. So, there was political damage to the administration either way.

Smith: So, did Richardson handle the negotiations, for lack of a better word, with the vice president?

Bork: I’m not sure whether it was Richardson or Haig. They both spoke as if they had done it. Haig spoke of a need to decouple the proceedings against Nixon in the Senate impeachment from the criminal charges against Agnew. Elliot did, too, because he said that the country wasn’t ready to have him as president be on trial in the Senate for impeachment and a vice president be on trial in the criminal courts simultaneously. It would leave a bad impression.

Smith: Was there any dissent within the department? Or feeling that Agnew was let off?

Bork: I don’t know. My initial feeling was that he was let off, but when they explained to me this scenario with the two proceedings going forward simultaneously, I began to see their point.

Smith: So Agnew is gone, and very shortly after that; I mean, it’s astonishing when you look back, it was, I think, within two days that Ford is nominated to become vice president. Had you had any contact with him at all before then?
Bork: Yeah, but it was casual, nothing substantive. I was acting attorney general when he was nominated and people in the Senate committee wanted all the papers. They always do. And I was reluctant to turn them over, but I was dealing from a weak hand. They had every right to get the papers and I didn’t have any reason to stop it. But I turned them over and one of the senators called me up and said, “You needn’t worry. It’s the dullest reading you’ve ever seen.”

Smith: Was this the FBI investigatory material? What papers were we talking about?

Bork: I think these were Ford’s papers. But he said he couldn’t stay awake reading the thing. There wasn’t a scandal in sight.

Smith: Pretty squeaky clean. By the way, I’d be interested in your opinion, I realize you weren’t involved in it, but you certainly were more than an informed observer. His attempt to impeach or at least start impeachment proceedings against Justice Douglas, which many people interpreted as pay back for the rejections of Hainsworth and Carswell. Would a Supreme Court Justice today be able to conduct himself as Justice Douglas did then and not have a problem?

Bork: Yeah, you mean having a bad temper and so forth?

Smith: Well, I mean, the consulting fees, I think, that he was receiving from the foundation—?

Bork: That was to fire Cox.

Smith: But Douglas had a relationship, I thought, with another—

Bork: Maybe he did, but I’m not aware of it.

Smith: But I think what offended Ford, to be honest, was the articles that he [Douglas] wrote for Evergreen. I mean, that is what offended Ford. He thought it was an inappropriate, quasi-pornographic venue for a justice of the Supreme Court.
Bork: Well, he was right about that, but the political reality is, you can’t get them out of office on those grounds. I used to say that the case for impeaching Douglas was impeccable, but you couldn’t make it.

Smith: That answers my question perfectly. Let me ask you. Let’s jump ahead to the Saturday Night Massacre because we’ve been told by people who were in the department that one person said point blank that you’d never forgiven Elliot Richardson for how he conducted himself.

Bork: I had never?

Smith: Someone said that and I just wanted to give you an opportunity to respond to that.

Bork: I wouldn’t say that in those terms. I was disappointed in him for awhile, because he, for awhile, didn’t mention the fact that he and Ruckelshaus agreed I should do it. And, I remember Elliot called me us and asked me if he could use the department’s auditorium. It seemed kind of silly because I was acting attorney general and he was out. So, I said, “Yeah, but would you mind mentioning that you and Ruckelshaus thought I should do this?” He said, “I will if it comes up.” Well, it never came up. I was a little irritated by it, but then later on he became much more helpful. I think once his presidential ambitions were shot—

Bork: He had presidential ambitions?

Bork: Oh, God, yes. Who doesn’t in this town?

Smith: Yeah.

Bork: He did, but I think he testified in the Senate in my confirmation hearing. He said he had asked me to do it, to fire Cox, and stay on.

Smith: The White House at least believed, I mean, Haig said this very publicly - to back up - they believed that they had an understanding with Richardson to fire Cox. Were there discussions about this before it transpired?

Bork: Elliot came back from the White House that night just before I went over and said the one thing he was sorry about was perhaps he hadn’t made it plain to the President that he couldn’t fire Cox. And, indeed, he couldn’t. He was sworn on that charter he gave Cox to fire him only for cause and there was no cause. A little bad taste here and there, but no cause. But Richardson seemed to recognize he’d let Nixon get caught by surprise and Haig, of course, insists that it was Richardson’s idea to give Cox an order. And somebody asked him, “What will Cox do?” “He’ll resign.” Why he would resign? I don’t know. I wish I’d been at that meeting as I was at the Agnew meeting because I would’ve asked that question, “What happens if Cox doesn’t resign?” Nobody thought of that.

Smith: Was the White House guilty of wishful thinking in convincing itself that Richardson would go ahead and fire Cox?

Bork: I don’t know. Maybe so to some degree, but Haig’s version of it was that Richardson said that Cox would be fired if he didn’t do something. But Richardson denied that. And I don’t have any way of judging the thing except my estimate of the two men.

Smith: What would that lead you to conclude?

Bork: I owe each of them something I don’t want to talk about.

Smith: Okay. Fair enough. Where was Ruckelshaus in all of this?

Bork: He was involved in all of the discussions, but did not take a strong position except when Haig tried to get him to fire Cox. He said he wouldn’t do it.

Smith: Which leaves you.

Bork: Yeah, I was third in line by department of regulations, but there’s nobody after me in succession. So, if I left, the department would’ve been headless and I think there would’ve been mass resignations, because who in the hell in the department is going to take that job after three resignations?

Smith: Right.

Bork: One of the senior section heads said, not to me, but said to somebody else that I had saved the Department of Justice that night because it would’ve flown apart. I think what would’ve happened if I hadn’t done it would be that Nixon would have to appoint somebody from outside as acting attorney general and the most likely candidate would be Fred Buzhardt.

Smith: Really?

Bork: A knife fighter if ever there was one.

Smith: And the guy who had been listening to the tapes.

Bork: Yeah.

Smith: Mel Laird told us that when Laird came into the White House, rather reluctantly, to lend a hand to the defense - Fred Buzhardt had been his legal counsel at the Pentagon - and Fred Buzhardt called Laird about a month after he started back at the White House and cautioned him to be very careful because Buzhardt had been listening to the tapes. And he said, “The President’s in this up to his neck.” That is Laird’s version of what he was told by Buzhardt. Haig told us, because I assumed Haig had listened to the smoking gun tape, and Haig said, no, he never did. He said, “Fred Buzhardt gave me some very good advice, which was never be alone in a room with a tape.” So, there you have it. But all roads lead back to Fred Buzhardt.

Bork: Well, Buzhardt was rather odd. I remember he said at one point, “What’s all the fuss about? People leave the federal service every day.” So, Cox left the federal service.

Smith: Ford becomes vice president. Did you have any contact with him during that period before he became president?

Bork: Yeah, I had contact with him in the sense that you know the guy and you sort of say ‘hi’ when you pass, but that was about it. And then, of course, when he was up for vice president and the question of his papers came up, I think I cleared that with him. But I had more to do with him when he was president than I did when he was vice president.

Smith: Quick question before we get to the presidency. When the Supreme Court came down with the unanimous ruling on the tapes, was that the death knell of the Nixon presidency?
Bork: Well, there’s so many knells going off around there that it’s hard to say which one was the death knell.

Smith: We’ve been told by a couple sources who were with the President at the time that the initial reaction was, can we defy the Court?

Bork: Haig called me up at that point and said, “We’re thinking about not obeying the order,” and I said, “That is instant impeachment if you do that.” And they didn’t do it. I don’t know why they didn’t do it. Whether my opinion had any influence or not, I don’t know. But I was convinced that you don’t defy the Supreme Court, particularly you don’t defy it when the Supreme Court is riding high and your fortunes are pretty low.

Smith: Right. Ford becomes president August 9th. What was the first contact you had with him?

Bork: I don’t remember.

Smith: Was there any discussions of the pardon? Were you part of any discussion with anyone before the Nixon pardon?

Bork: The Nixon pardon caught me by surprise.

Smith: It did?

Bork: I thought it was the right thing to do, but I thought he could’ve led up to it in a way to prepare the public for it. As it was, he dropped it like a bomb on them.

Smith: In the supercharged climate of the time, how could he have prepared the public and the political community for it?

Bork: Well, I think he’d have to get people to engage in an argument as to whether the president should or shouldn’t be pardoned. But, as it was, there had been no discussion, I don’t think, outside the White House maybe. And I was driving in a car up in New Haven going to visit a friend of mine who was dying, and when the news came on over the radio, I damn near ran the car into a ditch. It caught me by complete surprise. And you don’t want to do that. It may have cost Ford the presidency.
Smith: It’s interesting. Mel Laird told us he had a plan. He loves Ford, but he said the same thing. Laird thought he could bring a bipartisan delegation from both houses of Congress at the right time to, in effect, petition the President to grant a pardon. It’s an interesting theory. I just wonder whether, again, in the atmosphere of the time—

Bork: Whether you could get five people from each party.

Smith: Yeah.

Bork: I think if I were a congressman and were asked to participate in that thing, I’d say, “I’m terribly busy. I’ll see you around.”

Smith: You have a new attorney general. Bill Saxbe becomes attorney general. He was a bit of a character, wasn’t he?

Bork: I like to believe he was a character and a half. I first met him when I guess I went over to his Senate office. My recollection of that is not too clear, but he came over to the Department of Justice to be shown around and I was the senior guy, so I showed him around. And I quickly decided I didn’t want to spend too much time in his presence because he kept a coffee can with the lid removed on the floor between his feet and he chewed tobacco and spat into the can. Actually, he drooled into the can and once you see that, you didn’t really want to go back. I was in there sitting to his left and then we brought in the division heads to meet him, I was a senior man, I was supposed to be going first. I wouldn’t go in first, because if I went in first, I’d end up sitting where I could see this vision of loveliness. So, I didn’t. I went in last and I watched the guy who was sitting where he got a good view of the tobacco drooling episode and he was not happy.

Smith: Presumably, that was not a custom that Ed Levi continued.

Bork: No, not at all. Saxbe, I don’t think, had much to do with anything. I remember Larry Silverman claimed that when he was deputy attorney general - you could never get a hold of Saxbe because he was off someplace - and when it came to a tough decision, he’d said, “This is a call the attorney general has to make.” And he would go out of the office and down the hall.
and into the bay for the elevators and smoke a cigarette and come back and say, “The attorney general says...” and he went with it.

Smith: What kind of contact did you have with Ford during his presidency?

Bork: Well, a couple that were substantive. One was Levi wanted to clean up the practice of surveillance of US citizens and he put me in charge of that. So I spent a lot of time with the CIA and the NSA and so forth. NASA. But that was warrantless wiretapping, you understand.

[Break in conversation, taping stopped; when it resumes, the subject is the Saturday Night Massacre.]

Smith: Did you go to the White House that night?

Bork: Yeah. Talked to Nixon.

Smith: What was his mood? I mean, was he business-like?

Bork: He was very wistful. He hadn’t planned on losing his deputy attorney general.

Smith: Was there anger?

Bork: No. Well, he was angry with Ruckelshaus.

Smith: You were talking about the wiretapping.

Bork: Yeah.

Smith: Did it come as news to you how extensive it was?

Bork: Yeah, in fact, shortly after I became acting attorney general, my secretary rang through and said, “Two men from the FBI are here to see you.” I thought, “Oh, my God. What have I overlooked?” All my free floating anxieties came to a point, but they came in and they explained about this warrantless wiretapping. They’d broken into buildings and placed bugs, all without a warrant. And I asked them why they didn’t even get a warrant. He said, “Well, you’d have to get one for each of the areas where they’re taping Somebody.” They just described to me the district court judge to whom they handed the classified documents - some of some real sensitivity, and this guy, to show what a big deal he was, read them aloud in a courtroom. So they were disinclined to rely upon district court judges after that.

Smith: Did it make you uncomfortable?

Bork: Oh, yeah. It made every attorney general who came up against it uncomfortable.

Smith: Including Richardson?

Bork: Yeah, and Levi. Anyway, when Ford was president, we wanted to protect him from God knows what because of the warrantless wiretaps, we hit on the strategy of controlling strictly the access to the wiretap products, so that only people with a real need to know could see it. Before that, those transcripts were just floating around the administration. I remember one of the Soviet ones. Our folks were wiretapping the Russian Embassy and at night there’d be blips which was a small message, so condensed that it had to be unraveled. That worried us in a way, because we didn’t know what on those blips, that it could be Senator Kennedy told us he says to do this and that and the other thing to do with the Ford administration or something, I don’t know. In effect, we were listening to Americans who weren’t targets in any usual sense. That made us nervous, so we had gone on with the wiretaps and surveillance. We didn’t like it and me and Levi talked to Ford about it and arranged that Ford would not see anything of that sort, which was the best we could do. And it worked pretty well. The ACLU, of course, raised a stink that we were invading citizen’s privacy by listening to the Russians. But that didn’t catch on very much.

Smith: What kind of attorney general was Ed Levi?

Bork: I don’t know if you know that I go back a long way with Levi.

Smith: I did not know that.

Bork: Well, he was my first law school professor and my last attorney general. But, he was a very thoughtful guy who sweated over decisions. For my taste, he was a bit too timid, but only a bit, and I’d prefer that to the alternative. For example, the Socialist Labor Party had a platform that specifically called for violence in the service of revolution and I thought that was worth having somebody listen to them, but he didn’t think so.

Smith: He and Ford would appear at first blush to be very different.

Bork: They were. Levi was a very fast mind and a very subtle mind and Ford was a straight ahead, off tackle type of guy. But Ford was always terribly honest with Levi and Levi admired him for that. They got along beautifully.

Smith: Was part of Levi’s job to basically make certain that the Justice Department was out of politics?

Bork: Yeah.

Smith: And that the public perceived it to be out of politics?

Bork: That’s right. But he was a little more subtle than that. That is, he could’ve come in and started firing people right and left for having confrontations and he didn’t. He sat down with Clarence Kelly from the FBI and chewed over the problems and he got what he wanted by process of reasoning. And he had sort of a special panel consisting of Dick Thornburgh, because he was head of the criminal division, Scalia, and me. They had a tough case about whether to put a hearing device into a Russian photocopier. He called and asked us together for an opinion. And indeed one of the things I most admired about him is he refused to indict a guy who had been in the CIA and had done everything we expected the CIA to do in that era, but now mores were changing. Thornburgh kept saying, “We can indict him. We have the evidence to indict him,” but that wasn’t quite enough for Levi and he called his group together, plus a friend, old law school professor from Columbia, and had a long discussion and decided not to indict him because the guy was doing what we expected him to do. And, as I said at the time, “One way to establish a new standard of conduct is to burn somebody who was living by the old standard.”

Smith: In this town, a very popular method, too.

Bork: Well, yeah, but I was advocating burning people.
Smith: Understood. How would you characterize the different relationship between the Nixon White House and the Justice Department and the Ford White House and the Justice Department? I mean, is Ed Levi the answer to that question?

Bork: No, not entirely. Elliot deserves some credit for resisting some of the worst impulses of the Buzhardt types. And I deserve some credit in my own mind, at least, for the two and a half months I was acting attorney general and before that. No, before, it was a rough, tough crowd who took pride in being hard and that no longer worked when they were replaced.

Smith: The replacement for Justice Douglas was, of course, John Paul Stevens. Were you involved in that process?

Bork: Yeah, but more as a spectator. I think one night about five or six of us were invited to the White House with our spouses and Ford was to show up. Well, he came in a little bit late because he had a private plane and Betty Ford was kind of out of her mind. She wasn’t out of her mind. She looked doped. But, what it was, I finally figured out, was a chance for Ford to meet all the people - to meet all the nominees - to take Douglas’ place. And one of my happiest memories of that evening is watching Ford dance to the tune of “Bad, bad, Leroy Brown, baddest man in the whole damn town. Meaner than a junkyard dog,” and that was the President bounding around to that music. You’ve been over the fact that he was athletic, but due to one misstep on an airplane, he got the reputation from the comics for being a dodo, which is unfair.

Smith: How would you characterize his intelligence?

Bork: Above average.

Smith: I spent time enough in the Midwest to know, there are people on both coasts who think that because Midwesterners talk slow, they think slow. I wonder whether there’s a little bit of cultural bias. Ford was seen as this vanilla congressman from West Michigan who’d never really been a national player, and who certainly wasn’t an eloquent speaker.

Bork: I think there was some of that. Although he seemed to be somewhat slow, oddly enough that served him well because it gave a certain feeling of solidity and you tended to think that when you’re dealing with him, you’d better deal correctly without chicanery.

Smith: I take it from what you said, reading between the lines, that your name was among those bandied about for the vacancy?

Bork: Oh, yeah. Nixon was going to put me on the court when suddenly that got derailed. No, I’d been bandied about in every administration, including Jimmy Carter’s. It’s the funniest thing because Everett Bennett Williams wrote Jimmy Carter to put me on the Supreme Court. It was one of the silliest notes ever. No Democrat would put me on the Supreme Court. I don’t know why Williams thought he might, but he did.

Smith: Didn’t President Ford appear with you at your confirmation?

Bork: Yeah.

Smith: How did that come about?

Bork: I don’t know. Somebody said, “Would you introduce me?” and it was on Ford.

Smith: Wasn’t he involved with AEI at that point? Was that a point of contact at all?

Bork: No, I don’t think so. I don’t recall that the relationship was all that close, but somebody asked him to do it and he agreed to do it. And, who else was there? There were four people who introduced me.

Smith: Was the theory in the White House that, having Ford do it, would in effect take away the aura of the Saturday Night Massacre? Was that the reasoning?

Bork: I don’t know. When I was up for the court, I never had any impression that there was any theory.

Smith: Okay. Did you stay at Justice through the Ford administration?

Bork: Yeah.

Smith: After this evening, were you surprised, first of all, that Stevens was a nominee?
Bork: Yeah, I was, but somebody told me that the meeting at which Stevens’ name surfaced and people discussed him, Ford said, “That’s great. There won’t be a single vote against him.” And Senator Pat Buchanan walked out in a fury for choosing people for their blandness.

Smith: That’s interesting. Stevens, then and to the end of his career, regarded himself as a moderate. Would you accept that characterization?

Bork: He was a moderate left-winger. No, it’s very odd. See, I knew Stevens in Chicago and we were on a case together. What he became when he came to Washington was a total surprise to me.

Smith: So he was, in fact, at the time of his nomination, seen as a moderate - however you define that - and he moved to the left after he joined the court?

Bork: Yeah. Initially, it wasn’t clear it was left he was moving to, but he was beginning to spin out jurisprudence theories that had nothing much to do with anything. And then, gradually, it became a left-ward trend. I was going to say on the surveillance business that was taken care of by Ford except that our solution. (?) Then there was the Boston busing case. And that was a pistol. I don’t know how much you know about that.

Smith: I was in Boston at the time.

Bork: Well, that judge who was running everything—

Smith: Judge Garrity.

Bork: I hope he’s retired. Yeah. It’d be very good for American jurisprudence if he retired. He was terrible. You know, the object of a remedy in a case is to set things back where they would’ve been but for the violation. But he didn’t see it that way. He took the fact of the violation, which was not too clear anyway, as a warrant to run the Boston school system. He was doing things like choosing the basketballs that they bought and overseeing the purchase of supplies and so forth. I don’t know what was wrong with him, but he became a little dictator on matters that had nothing to do with the busing case.

Smith: And the administration’s position?
Bork: Well, when the case came up again, going to the district court first or maybe it was on appeal, I worked out a remedy that would address the violation and not just tell the judges to run wild with it. And, initially, Levi agreed with it. I went and told him. I rarely had occasion to talk to the attorney general about a case, but if there were political ramifications, I would. I did this with Levi and he initially went along with the idea, but then the heat became intense. William Coleman, for one, came storming over there and was going to resign and make it known that we were all racist or some God damn thing.

Smith: And this was the whole debate over busing and what the administration’s position should be?

Bork: Yeah. So, Levi said to me after all the shooting that was going on, he said, “Bob, this isn’t the case. No matter how reasonably you go in, it’ll be you and the Department of Justice against a long-beleaguered judge.” I had to agree it would happen that way. So, we went over to see Ford and tell him that. He was not happy. He wanted a face-off about busing, but he respected Levi’s judgment and didn’t push it.

Smith: Did you have a sense or did he say anything that led you to conclude what it was that made him want this confrontation? Was it his personal conviction? Was there politics at work? Some combination?

Bork: No, I think he thought it was good politics to resist the judge, but that it would play terribly in the intellectual class, though everyone else would think it was fine. It was politics in the sense that any politician has to think about politics.

Smith: He said at one point, and I think Coleman may have said this to us, that Ford’s position was, “Look, you know how I feel about busing. I don’t think any kid should be bussed.” It was geography, not race, per se. He didn’t think it was good. That every child ought to be able to go to the nearest school. Period. And he saw busing through that very practical, neighborhood lens.

Bork: He may have, but he would’ve enjoyed seeing us bring the case. I remember when Levi said to me, “Bob, this is not the case.” I said, “It’s the case God gave us.” He thought that was so funny, he went and told Ford.
Smith: But apparently on this occasion, God’s judgment was set aside.

Bork: Well, God didn’t make a judgment exactly. He just left us out there with a case.

Smith: What have we overlooked? Is there anything in terms of your contact with Ford?

Bork: Let me see. I dictated some things.

Smith: Great. I saw Bill Saxbe just died, this week, I guess?

Bork: Yeah.

Smith: 94.

Bork: He didn’t check out from overwork.

Smith: I rather gathered that’s the consensus.

Bork: That’s right. He was always out of town some place and giving speeches and being entertained. People would say, “Bill, you’ve got to pay some attention to this stuff,” and he’d say, “I’m out there job-hunting for justice.”

Smith: We’ve been given the impression that he thought this rather a nice way to end a political career. A cabinet position. That justice was a nice place to retire to.

Bork: There’s a weekly meeting in the attorney general’s conference room in which the heads of the divisions and the bureaus were brought together, maybe twenty people. And it was kind of indicative of the personalities. When Richardson was attorney general, he always thought up something worth discussing. When Levi was attorney general, after a couple of discussions, he said, “These are worthless” and he quit having them. When Saxbe was attorney general, he tried once to have a discussion. It didn’t go well. But after that, we’d all get together and he’d stand up and say, “The bar is open” and we got the bootsky.

Smith: Sounds like a throwback to the Truman era.

Bork: No, it’s a throwback to Jim Eastland.
Smith: Well, yeah. How do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered?

Bork: Kindly. A man of integrity. Not of great talents, but of integrity. And sufficient talents. Who was important in the transition phase after Nixon. I never saw a man so thoroughly destroy himself as Nixon did. Anyway… I was about to go into my discussion of the fact that Nixon, while he pulled some really bad stuff, also pulled some good stuff.

Smith: Yeah. I think one of the real challenges that obviously Ford had was meshing the Nixon staff with his own people. Rumsfeld told him, for example, “Immediately clean house.” Ford was reluctant to do that in part because he did not want to impute blame to the vast majority of holdovers, I think, in the White House and elsewhere, who had nothing to do with Watergate.

Bork: No.

Smith: I mean, was there a sense at the department of, “Are we going to have jobs?”

Bork: There was a sense maybe heads would roll, but no specific indicators that that was about to happen. I don’t think it would’ve been wise. You said Rumsfeld said that to whom?

Smith: To Ford. Rumsfeld advised Ford very early on, “Clean house. Make this your own administration. Make a clean break and bring in your own people.”

Bork: Well, he brought in Levi in the case of the Department of Justice and Levi managed to settle and ride that wild beast. So I don’t know how cleaning house would’ve been.

Smith: It’s interesting to hear your observations about Levi, President Ford, in his eulogy at Levi’s memorial service, said he thought he was the attorney general against whom all others should be measured.

Bork: Well, I think that’s true, although, I was there for that service or part of it. My wife and I were there for part of it, at least. We had to get a plane back, but the part that shot me into the air was when Ford said he appointed John Paul Stevens to the Supreme Court because of his knowledge of Chicago jurisprudence, which he was practicing on the Supreme Court every day. Well, in the first place, there is no Chicago jurisprudence.

Smith: The Chicago school? The notion—

Bork: The Chicago school, they were talking about anti-trust and economics. It was not a generalized thing. I thought we could’ve sued Ford for implying that Stevens was doing Chicago jurisprudence.

Smith: That’s a perfect note. That’s perfect. Thank you.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. How did your path cross with Gerald Ford?

DuPont: I was there when he arrived.

Smith: Okay. How did you get to the White House?

DuPont: Well, that’s a longer story. I left my medical training and got my first job outside of training on July 1st, 1968. I had gone to Harvard Medical School and took my training in psychiatry there. I’d gone then to NIH to do two years of service in the public health service. And I was interested in a mission. I was inspired by Martin Luther King, Jr. and by John Kennedy and I was just captured by the idea of making a contribution. So, the question in my mind was how could I possibly do that? I’d graduated from medical school, I’d had my training, but the rubber’s not on the road anywhere. Where could I put it on the road? And, one day a week, in my residency, I worked in the state prison in Massachusetts, a very famous prison that was the prison that—

Smith: Was that in Waltham?

DuPont: No, it was Norfolk Prison.

Smith: Norfolk.

DuPont: It’s right next door. That’s right. It’s the prison that Malcolm X had done six years on a burglary charge. He went as Detroit Red and came out as Malcolm X from that prison. So, it was quite a historic prison. One day a week, I talked to those prisoners. I was just fascinated by them. I was fascinated by crime. I was fascinated by the issue of crime. I was fascinated by the people.

Smith: Were you surprised by anything they told you?

DuPont: Well, I was surprised that they seemed a lot more normal than I’d thought. Somehow I had them maybe more demonized in my mind. And they were regular people. And, I guess, what really captured me were their stories. I’ve been a practicing psychiatrist all these years and what brought me to psychiatry was the stories. I don’t think anybody other than a psychiatrist or a therapist hears these stories of people’s lives the way you do, week in and week out. I really just was fascinated by these stories, so I decided, “Okay, here I’m leaving NIH, I’m going to make a contribution,” and I was going to do this in crime. So I looked around the country and ended up settling on the District of Columbia. I ended up working for the District of Columbia Department of Corrections.

Now, that was very propitious because crime was rapidly rising at that time in the District of Columbia and Lyndon Johnson had established a crime commission to study crime in the District of Columbia. I’d gotten all caught up in that in the Department of Corrections. But the big event in my life was that Richard Nixon, in his campaign, made crime in Washington a major issue. He called it the Crime Capital of the Nation. So when he came in on January 20th, 1969, he was distracted by all kinds of other things and some local citizens, including Edward Bennett Williams and Katherine Graham, marched on the White House, literally, and said, “We’re going to hold a press conference every week until you do something about crime in the city.” And he then turned to his assistant named Bud Krogh, and asked him to take over and fix the problem of crime in Washington, D.C.

I was then at the Department of Corrections in January of ’69 and had lots of ideas for things to do in community corrections, which were going nowhere in the Johnson administration - were just in a file cabinet. And, all of a sudden, there was an interest in it and, by May of ’69, all of my ideas were funded.
Never mind waiting for things, it was just done. Bang.

Smith: That’s interesting because it flies in the face of the notion that Nixon didn’t care about domestic policy.

DuPont: Oh, absolutely. It was huge.

Smith: I wonder, at that point, how much of the local crime problem was drug related.
DuPont: Well, we’re going to get to that. That’s exactly where we go with this.

Smith: Okay.

DuPont: So, at that point, I don’t do anything with drugs. I’m just thinking about the crime issue at that point. Then, there were a couple of things in the newspaper about drugs in relationship, particularly heroin. And we had a senator in charge of the Senate District Committee named Joseph Tidings, who was holding hearings on this. And I get interested in what was this connection. Some college students did a study in the D.C. jail taking urine samples of people coming in and seeing what kind of drugs we’d find in there and asking a couple questions. Well, what we found was some 44% of them were positive for heroin and when we looked at the question of when did they first use heroin, we could show that it started, this epidemic, in the mid-60s and was rising through this period of time.

If you laid that against the crime rate, you got an exact parallel to when the crime rate started up and what the slope of that curve was. It was very dramatic. This was published in the New England Journal of Medicine. It was a historic paper that defined that connection. Well, the next step was, okay, if you make that connection, what do you do about it? And, so, I became a sudden student of addiction treatment and captured what was the best going around in the country, including a program in Chicago with Jerome Jaffee, and in New York with Vincent Dole, and Marie Nyswander (Dole’s wife) methadone program. So, on September 15th I started the first methadone program in the city in the Department of Corrections. By February 18th of 1970, we had been funded, with White House support, a massive program to treat heroin addiction in the district. Over the next three years, we treated 15,000 heroin addicts in Washington, D.C. in forty centers.

Smith: Had that been done in New York?

DuPont: Never in the scale in relationship to this city. They had a big program, but not on a scale we had in Washington. This is the first time anybody had ever done it on a scale for the whole city. And, not coincidentally, by 1973 the crime rate in the District of Columbia was cut in half, the serious crime. I mean it was a huge change that went on. And to say that it got the attention of the White House would be an understatement. As a result, I quickly established a relationship with Bud Krogh and with the Nixon administration.

Then off to the side another issue came up and that was heroin addiction in Vietnam. You’ll recall that in 1970, Vietnam was kind of a serious issue in this country, politically and otherwise. And, all of a sudden, heroin addiction was a huge problem among American service men in Vietnam. And Nixon needed to do something about that. So, now he had two problems. He had crime in the cities and he had heroin addiction in Vietnam that was really threatening the war effort. I mean it was a huge problem. So, at that point, the White House came to me and said, “What can we do to get somebody in here to do something about this issue?” So, I had contact with a White House person named John Dunfeld whose distinction was he was dating Tricia Nixon.

But he is a wonderful guy and did a great job, but that’s how he got there.
He’d been president of USC, the university’s student body president, and gotten the attention of the President and was just a twenty-five-year old attorney from California. Anyhow, I put him in contact with the leaders of this field and got him hooked up with Jerry Jaffee. So, on June 17th of 1970, again this sequence is so rapid to think about this, Nixon declared a war on drugs and started the first White House drug office with Jerome Jaffee as the head of it. That began the commitment of the White House. And that all grew out of the program that I’d started in the district which had demonstrated that, with treatment on a massive scale, you could change the dynamic of this epidemic.

It wasn’t as if that was the only thing that happened, because Nixon did a lot of other things that reinforced that. He increased the police in the District of Columbia at that same time, dramatically increased the police department, and through the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs in international activities blocked the French connection and Turkey from raising poppies, which was the main source of heroin coming, particularly to the east coast of the United States. So, it was a coordinated effort. But the new element in it was treatment. That had never been in it before. For the fifty years prior to that, American drug policy was just law enforcement. There was no treatment investment at all. Certainly not from the federal government, but very little treatment anywhere really.

Smith: Wasn’t there a political downside? As I recall, the idea of the government providing a substitute, if you will—

DuPont: Oh, methadone was extremely controversial. Oh my gosh, absolutely. And it was a weird politics because methadone has become a liberal icon now. But at the time, it was seen as a conservative move because of the Nixon presidency, and was seen as this conservative man who hated blacks and the underclass. You were going to narcotize the inner city young men with this methadone. So, it sparked a tremendous controversy and there was a pushback that was just tremendous to this. But it was working. And, I mentioned Joseph Tidings who was the senator from Maryland who was the chairman of the Senate District Committee. He was a Kennedy Democrat. He was as liberal as you can get and he was totally behind this. So, we had complete support from the left and the right in terms of the political class. There was very little opposition to that. But, in the media, it was just tremendous. And the racial politics, then the District of Columbia was dominated by race, and I was then, and am now, white, and that was a serious liability in terms of—

Smith: Was this when Marion Berry was just rising to prominence?

DuPont: Absolutely. Marion and I came to Washington the same year and we’re the same age. He had an organization called PRIDE and so I was very much involved throughout all this. It’s interesting in that in the time in 1970, there was another organization called The Black Man’s Development Center. The leader was this self-styled colonel, Colonel Hussan, who was a bigger force in politics in Washington than Marion Berry was at that time. But, he ran aground early.

Smith: It is such a challenge - I mentioned the Rockefeller book – writing about Attica. It is such a challenge to recreate for us forty years later the radical politics that existed—
DuPont: In 1970. That was the peak of it.

Smith: Yeah. It was just another planet.

DuPont: It is. And, you know, you mentioned about Nelson Rockefeller. One of my exchanges with Rockefeller that was very interesting was that he was offended by the fact that Richard Nixon, who he had very low regard for, had gotten so much positive reaction about his drug policy. Well, Nelson had taken nothing but grief on drugs and he just thought this was terrible and unfair and he couldn’t understand why. And it’s interesting, and I’ve done some thinking about why that was and I didn’t see it, but now I have a pretty clear idea what happened. And that is, prior to 1970, there were only two states that had a significant infrastructure in drug abuse, where you had experts in the state, where you had a substantial investment going on, and that was New York and California. And, both of those states at the same time, in the late 60s, made big investments in civil commitment and nobody else did.

The federal government got into it in 1967, in civil commitment, but just put a toe in the water. The places that really developed in expertise [were New York and California]. So when this drug issue crested in the early 70s, Nelson Rockefeller had a deep bench, he had a lot of experts. Nixon had none. And, what happened was, Nixon turned to people like me and Jerry Jaffee, who were newcomers, not encumbered by what was going on. And Rockefeller had all these people who were taking him down, let’s say, a path that didn’t lead where he wanted to go.

Smith: That’s fascinating because one of the real ball and chain issues that he drags historically—DuPont: Oh, the Rockefeller laws.

Smith: Exactly. I think The Times has a key, you just push and it out comes “the Rockefeller drug laws.” The irony is, that was his third drug program.

DuPont: I understand that.

Smith: And he was someone who believed that there was no such thing as a problem that couldn’t be solved.
DuPont: Yeah.

Smith: And the first two, which had been much more ‘conventional,’ hadn’t worked. Had he stayed on for another term, there would’ve been a fourth program, because the third one wasn’t working. Was it simply frustration that everything else he tried hadn’t worked, so he would try this draconian approach?

DuPont: Let’s remember that methadone, which was what Nixon really did, was from New York. Rockefeller had overlooked that. It was right under his nose the entire time. And the reason he didn’t go for it is because his experts didn’t like it. It was contrary to their vision. And I tell you this now that we’ve got forty years to think about what happened at that point, so I’m now talking from this perspective rather than that, but the things Rockefeller was doing were not wrong. They were not dumb. All of his things - civil commitment - tough laws. All of those things were actually good moves. The problem was that the epidemic just swamped him. They had worked previously, they were good ideas, but they could not respond to what was going on, so they overwhelmed him with just the scale of it. And that was because we were in what I called ‘the modern drug use epidemic.’ And that epidemic is as new as the computer. People will say, “Well, drugs have been around.” Well, yes, but what happened in the late ‘60s has never happened before.

What happened was we had whole populations exposed to a wide variety of drugs in a political environment and a demographic tender that was coming from the Baby Boom. Because that’s when the baby boomers got to the teenage and early 20s, and they hit right at that same time. So the culture changed. The demographics changed. The drug use pattern changed. Timothy Leary set the stage that it was desirable to use drugs. There was something good about - fit with the kind of do it now value system that was going on. And that just exploded. So, what happened, in contrast with Nixon’s idea was voluntary methadone. Rockefeller’s idea was involuntary civil commitment. So, it was much easier to manage a voluntary open season in the epidemic. Nixon didn’t have all the problems that Rockefeller had with his civil commitment in running that thing. Rockefeller had to get all those prisons. He had to hire all those people. He couldn’t manage the people coming. There was too many of them going on. So, it wasn’t really that he had bad ideas. They just weren’t scalable in the timeframe to what was going on, whereas Nixon’s were. And, again, it had to do with the fact that Nixon turned to a whole new generation of people who had new ideas, who weren’t stuck with what had been before.

Smith: When did you sense that the Nixon presidency was going to end prematurely? Was it a dawning realization?

DuPont: Well, remember that I’m a fairly narrow-gauged participant in the Nixon administration. I’m the drug guy. So, there’s a lot of things going on. I had an experience one time talking to Bud Krogh in his office. Then he went to jail around those issues himself, and he was very close to Chuck Colson. He was the guy who Gordon Liddy reported to in the White House, for example.

Smith: Was Colson a legendary figure?

DuPont: Oh, yes. Oh my gosh, he was very big in terms of all of the stuff that was going on.

Smith: I mean at the time.

DuPont: Oh yes, he was the big figure.

Smith: Notorious?

Smith: Okay.

DuPont: He wanted to talk to Krogh, and Krogh asked me to step out of the office so he could talk to him. And later, he said, “I did that to protect you.” And I thought, “Whoa.” That had never occurred to me to think about that at the time. This is an aside, but a personal thing. I was with Bud Krogh the night before he was sentenced. Now, he’s already pleaded guilty. His role had to do with the break-in of Daniel Ellsberg’s psychiatrist with Gordon Liddy. He didn’t go to jail for exactly the Watergate thing, but for that break-in. And he said to me, “If I don’t go to jail, I think I’ll kill myself. If I don’t go to jail.”
And I said, “What are you talking about?” And he said, “I’m guilty and I need to take my punishment.” And I said, “But you’ve got two little kids, two boys. How are they going to handle this?” He said, “I’ve talked to them already about this and I said, ‘When you do something wrong, you have to take the consequences’ and that’s what I’m doing. And they’re comfortable with that and I’m comfortable with that.” And I was just stunned.

Smith: That’s fascinating because you do sense out of all that crew, he’s one of the very few who have emerged with their honor intact.

DuPont: Enhanced to my point of view. But he was an extraordinary guy from the beginning. I mean, his contributions to the Nixon drug policy were immense. He was completely non-ideological. I was and am a Democrat. That didn’t matter to the Nixon White House. They couldn’t care less about that. I didn’t care that I was working for a Republican president. I was thrilled to work for him and that had to do with Bud Krogh. He was a guy who had just tremendous integrity, but he also was a man of action. He knew he had to move right now. He wasn’t interested in studying it. We had to have a program that was happening now and that was very wonderful to me.

Smith: I don’t know what you’ve read, but the subsequent accounts that suggested that the President in the final days, however you define that, was acting oddly.

DuPont: Crazy.

Smith: Yeah. Was there scuttlebutt at the time?

DuPont: Not about me. Again, you’ve got to remember that I’m not a big player. I’m a small player. So, my time with either Nixon or Ford was very limited. A few visits and that’s it.

Smith: But in terms of picking up from colleagues - you know there’s an atmosphere and it must’ve been rather grim toward the end.

DuPont: My experience wasn’t like that. It goes like this. I was right there at the beginning of the Nixon White House and we got something happening and it had a good effect. Jerry Jaffee became the first drug czar. I said he started June 17th, it actually was ’71, not ’70, as the drug czar. But that was going on.
We had a law that was passed in ’72 that established that office. It created the National Institute on Drug Abuse. It established that office and the National Institute of Drug Abuse, and it passed the Senate and the House without a dissenting vote. Now, how many laws is that true about? So, that was the environment that I was in.

Now, what happened was, and you were talking about the pushback, what I had done or we had done in the District of Columbia was focus on heroin addiction and it relied on methadone. When the program went national, you couldn’t do that. You had to deal with drugs. Methadone was only a part of what was going on. And we were using a system of delivering treatment services that was unmanageable. In the district, I could manage the money. I could make sure we had real patients. I could make sure they were getting services. I could target who the patients were. That was measureable. At the federal level, it was nothing like that. It was much more like the joke is you put the money on a stump and people run away with it. It was much more like that. The drug money would go to a treatment program and God only knows what they were going to do with that and who they were going to consider a drug user and what they were going to consider treatment. It was like pushing on a noodle to try to get it to go.

So, the focus was gone from that and the pushback in terms of a heroin focus on methadone was tremendous. So, when it rolled out as a national program, it lost its power. And, also, the pushback that Nixon was getting, he declared in ’73 that we’d turned the corner on heroin addiction. Boy, the people who were committed to that not being the case - this was another manipulation by the dishonest Nixon - conservative manipulation – it was all this sort of thing. And then, of course, Nixon was distracted. He had been focused on this because it was about crime in the district. He had taken care of that problem. And so, what happened before Ford came in, at the end of Nixon’s first term, Krogh was gone. He went to Transportation. The new people there didn’t have that same kind of zeal about it. So the issue had already lost its traction. The excitement was way down, not because of any problem with Nixon or necessarily with our program. You’re not going to hold that kind of attention for very long. That just doesn’t happen in the real world.
So, by the time Ford came, the objective was much more to hang on, to consolidate, than it was to extend, expand, whatever else. You know, I’m looking forward to talking to you about what happened in the Ford administration. But just in the general sense – you were talking about the Nixon administration – I think that before Watergate really pulled the plug on the Nixon administration, the bloom was off the rose in terms of the drug issue.

Smith: Plus, isn’t it, by its very nature, a chronic program, a plague? However you want to describe it that isn’t going to go away.

DuPont: Well, but the president has got three or four issues that he can deal with. That’s it. You lost the media, what they’re dealing with. They’re going to focus on three or four things that are going on right now and you’re not going to be on that list for very long with pretty much anything like that.

Smith: I just wonder if there isn’t over time a tendency to throw up one’s hands as a society and just say, “This has always been with us. This is almost part of human nature for whatever reason. It’s going to be with us.” And to begin to erode public support or public confidence that government can address this problem in a significant way. That as long as the appetites are there, it’s hard to imagine them being—

DuPont: That’s true. The other side of that, though, is people very much underestimate the potential threat of drug abuse. We have 8.7% today of America’s 12 and over have used an illegal drug in the last month. So, that’s what our number is. The actual risk is more like 60% and the potential for that is just phenomenal. People are underestimating the power of the drugs in terms of taking over the brain, their thinking and the behavior of individuals. It’s not like alcohol and tobacco. These drugs are much more powerful and you can see this in the lab in terms of what it does to people. And those two drugs have created immense social costs in this society.

But go back to the Ford administration, because the Ford administration went through exactly the kind of thought process and maybe we should spend a few minutes talking about how that was, defining what the Ford period did in the drug field. In the context of this downplaying of the priority from really an unsustainable height that it had achieved early in the Nixon administration, not late in the Nixon administration, but early in the Nixon administration, there was an effort that was taken away from me and what I was doing and taken to the domestic council where Jim Cannon was in charge of it, Dick Parsons was the person put in charge, and a fellow named Ed Johnson was the guy who did the spear carrying, the heavy lifting. They did what was called the ‘White Paper on Drug Abuse.’

That was their review, the Ford administration review, and I say ‘they’ because I contributed to it, but I have to say that I did not have any great vision at that time that I was trying to present. I was personally still reeling from the fact that we’d done such a great job in the district and we were having such a difficult time carrying it into the federal role and thinking about, okay, where do we need to go? If somebody comes to me and says, “Where do you want to go?” What is that? And mostly I could get my head to not losing the ground we had as opposed to saying where you want to plant that flag next. Anyhow, the ‘White Paper’ comes in and what it did is exactly what you just said. It essentially said, “Okay, we’ve got this problem. It’s going to be here for a long time. We have to be realistic about what we’re doing. Scale down the rhetoric. Scale down the commitment of energy to it. Manage our resources more carefully. And focus on the more serious drugs.”

Because off to the side of this heroin issue was the marijuana problem. And, go all the way back to 1970, Congress had established a Marijuana Commission with Governor Schaeffer of Pennsylvania in charge, and that had produced reports in ’72 and ’73 that were talking about sort of making peace with marijuana use. Decriminalizing it. Accommodating to this. When I took office, Nixon said to me, “Bob, I want you to be in charge of drugs and to take the lead in this, but, if you say one word in support of decriminalization, you’re gone, because that is the line you cannot cross. It’s the only one. But that one you can’t cross.” So, even a hint would be your demise in terms of this administration.

Smith: Did Ford have a position similar to that?
DuPont: I’m going to tell you what happened with this. I, being the heroin guy, sort of dismissed the marijuana problem. It seemed unworthy to me as an issue.

Smith: It’s what musicians do at two in the morning.

DuPont: Something like that. You didn’t have the bodies piling up the way we did with heroin. We had a lot of overdose deaths. We don’t have a big connection with crime the way with heroin. And the ‘White Paper’ reinforced that. I mean, it focused away from marijuana also. But there’s this other process going on, this sort of rethinking this. I’ve got resonating in my mind, Nixon says, “Don’t support decriminalization.” Now, in August of ’74, Nixon is gone. I’ve got a new president now. Okay, I have been thinking about this issue and think that decriminalization is not such a bad idea. In November of ’74, I speak out as the Ford administration White House person at the Norml convention and support decriminalization. So, I supported it. In Ford’s final strategy in 1976, it says we need to seriously look at decriminalization as a response to the marijuana issue. So, to the extent that there was a Ford position on decriminalization, it was sympathetic.

Smith: Was that something you ever discussed with him?

DuPont: Never.

Smith: So, basically, you were acting on your own -

DuPont: I was, but it was very visible and anybody could’ve stepped on my chain and nobody did. I didn’t have any negative repercussions from that at all. And the speech itself was pretty interesting, because I spent 90% of it saying that marijuana was a dangerous drug, should be discouraged, was very undesirable to smoke it, legalization was a terrible idea. But, I said, I don’t want to send people to jail for smoking marijuana. And that became the headline.

Smith: Did you clear that speech in advance?

DuPont: Never. I don’t remember it ever being cleared. I don’t remember that process.

Smith: And what response did you get?
DuPont: Nobody said anything. It was okay. I never talked to Ford about it, but Dick Parsons was my handler and he had no problem stepping on my chain on other issues. He could’ve done that, but he didn’t care.

Smith: I realize this is speculative and therefore maybe unfair, and I want to be careful how I phrase this.

DuPont: Since you’re being recorded, too.

Smith: Exactly. The Fords had children of an age where Mrs. Ford herself was famously asked about this in the 60 Minutes interview, and she certainly didn’t express astonishment. In fact, she said they probably tried it. In a larger sense, the youth culture that they represented and that they exposed their parents to - do you think that’s a factor at all in this?

DuPont: Oh, sure. Absolutely. And I definitely think it had to. If you think about the different personalities of Nixon and Ford. I mean, Nixon was very strict on this stuff, sort of rigid, black and white. Ford was not a black and white guy. He just didn’t do that sort of thing. Now, an incredibly to me rich irony is, during those years, and not by accident, there was a phenomenal escalation in marijuana use going on. The first state to decriminalize was Oregon in ’73. And decriminalization was marching across the country during the Ford administration and it looked like the future was going in this way. And, by the end of the Ford administration, 1976 and early ’77, I was deeply troubled by the increase in marijuana use.

Smith: Was there a direct link between decriminalization and the increase in use?

DuPont: Oh, absolutely, because what it did was it removed the sense of fear of using and when you do that, you get an awful lot of young people using the drug. So, it was a slope that went up like that - what was going on with marijuana use during the mid-70s. It scared me and I got a letter from a woman in Atlanta named Keith Schuchard who said I was part of the problem because of my positions about marijuana, and invited me down to Atlanta to meet with a group of parents who were dealing with this problem. And I went down there and I became convinced that I was part of the problem.
The sort of defining moment for me was when I gave a speech at the meeting there in Atlanta, a big drug prevention speech, and I was talking in support of decriminalization to this group. And my father, who was very interested in the news, but not terribly intellectually thinking about these things, watching my tongue as he was driving me back because my family lived in Atlanta, he said, “You know, I wish you just weren’t so pro-marijuana.” And I thought, “I have been so studious to say I’m anti-marijuana, but don’t want to put people in prison, that for my father to say I was pro-marijuana, was appalling to me.” And I realized that, with respect to this issue, there were only two positions, yes and no. There was no nuance. You could not say ‘but,’ ‘and’—

Smith: Particularly if you’re a parent with teenage kids who were vulnerable.

DuPont: Anybody. Or the head of the National Institute of Drug Abuse or the White House drug person. So, at that point, I wanted to change my mind. Now, the irony is that Jimmy Carter became president and I stayed on through the first two years of that administration and, there, Jimmy Carter supported decriminalization, so I couldn’t oppose it. So, under Nixon, I couldn’t support it. Under Carter, I couldn’t oppose it. And under Ford, I was left to my own devices. And, the regret I have in the whole thing was the Ford years, because I think I was wrong. I don’t think I did the right thing. I think I was going in the wrong direction and it had to do with my underestimating the importance of this. Think about this number. In 1978, 11% of high school seniors in this country were smoking marijuana every day and that number had doubled in four years. Now, you think about that trend. 11%, that’s 1 in 9 high school seniors is an every day smoker of marijuana.

Smith: We’ve often heard the argument that the worst thing about marijuana is that it’s the gateway to stronger drugs. Would you accept that as a broad assertion?

DuPont: Yeah, my 1985 book is called Gateway Drugs. It focuses on exactly that point. It’s interesting the argument against it, because it’s created a furor. The ‘gateway drug hypothesis’ as it’s called is one of the defining controversies in the addiction field. And it goes like this. The people who don’t like that term point out that, “Well, everybody who smoked marijuana drank milk first, so you can say milk really is a bigger gateway drug to heroin addiction than to marijuana.” That’s one thing they’ll say is, “Well, most people who smoke marijuana don’t use heroin.” And that’s true, too. But I like to say, “Now, wait a minute, let’s take something very simple and that’s the relationship of cigarette smoking and lung cancer. Do you know what the risk of lung cancer for a two pack per day smoker? It’s less than 5%. But, it’s 100 times more than for a non-smoker. Now, does that mean it’s not a cause?” Come on. To be a cause, it doesn’t mean everybody has it and that’s the issue. But what you find is that the people who haven’t used marijuana just don’t use these other drugs. But it also is true that cigarettes and alcohol are gateway drugs.

Smith: This is off the wall, but I can’t let it go without asking. I remember when the President died and Newsweek had a great cover photo of him with the pipe. Someone wrote in to complain about the pipe. Was that an issue at all? Did people raise the fact that the President smoked?

DuPont: No, I don’t recall about Ford. But I’ll tell you, I was in the Oval Office one time talking to Ford and he stepped out or something. Anyway, I was left there alone for a little period of time and he was just getting ready to get on of the helicopter to go to Camp David. So, his briefcase was sitting on the desk of the Oval Office open. I couldn’t resist. What is in his briefcase as he’s about to get on this plane? And I walk over there and look in there and there in this briefcase were only two things, a copy of Time Magazine and his pipe and tobacco. And I thought, “Now, that’s Gerald Ford. That is really just tremendous to think that’s what he’s taking to Camp David.”

Smith: How would you describe his intelligence?

DuPont: Oh, gosh, he was just a very smart guy and very open. I’ll tell you a couple things, Gerald Ford stories. These both come from meeting him in 1992 when there was a dedication of DuPont Hall at the Betty Ford Center. You know, it’s got a building there with my name on it and this was its ten-year anniversary of the founding of the Betty Ford Center. And he and Betty were there and we had a nice little gathering for this dedication, thirty people. It wasn’t a big group of people. But he wanted to make some remarks. He made several, but the one that just absolutely amazed me, he said, for the first forty years of their marriage, Betty had spent most of the time supporting his career and he was very grateful for that. Since he left the White House, he spent a lot of his time supporting her career, as he was doing at that dedication. And, he said, “I think when history is written and the two contributions are compared, hers will be seen as more important than mine.” And I was just stunned. I was just stunned. It was so much the kind of guy he was, the generosity of that was just breathtaking to me.

Another thing, I had lunch with him and Betty that day in their home and he didn’t really get much into the drug issue, but he knew I was a doctor and he had something on his mind that he wanted to ask me as a doctor. He had apparently not supported a VA hospital in Grand Rapids and had been criticized for not bringing home this pork and wanted to know what I thought of the VA hospitals, and whether he’d done the wrong thing for Grand Rapids. I mean, it was amazing to me that that would be on his mind. It’s funny, what I said to him, because that was 1992 and the VA hospitals were not distinguished in their medical care. They actually became pretty good over the next couple of decades. So, what I said to him then would not be what I’d say to him if we talked about it now. But I was just touched by the fact that he was troubled by that.

Smith: Is there a disparity between the Ford that you saw over time and the public image? And, I mean, to the extent that the public image—

DuPont: That he’s a bumbler.

Smith: Yeah, that he’s a Chevy Chase. People forget, ‘Saturday Night Live’ went on the air in ’75 just at the turning point - the drug issue, the whole popular culture, obviously fed by Vietnam and Watergate. Reverence was out the door and he became caricatured. I’m trying to get a sense of whether it bothered him.

DuPont: Well, let me tell you a little bit about that, because this again goes back to that exchange in ’92 when I was with him. I asked him a simple question. I said, “Okay, in the history of the American presidency, who would you think has been the best athlete who’s ever served in the White House?” It seems like a fairly straightforward question. He thought about it and then he says, “George Bush.” I said, “Really? George Bush?” He said, “Yes, he was the captain of the Yale baseball team and played first base.” And I said, “But you were an all-American football player at Michigan.” He said, “Well, I was, but what you don’t know is in my senior year, we only won two games.” And, I thought, you know, that is so Gerald Ford, that he wouldn’t even accept that.

Smith: Of course, the flip side of it is that, as the presidency became more and more theatrical, I always said he was the least self-dramatizing of public figures.

DuPont: Absolutely.

Smith: And it became in some ways detrimental.

DuPont: He’s the only one who never ran for national office until his final time. I had the feeling during the campaign, in the beginning of it, that he wasn’t even trying very hard to get elected. He was trying at the end, but at the beginning, he was too busy trying to do the right thing for the country. But, also, you know, what were the right moves? I mean, people make fun of him about the WIN program, the Whip Inflation Now, but what were the good moves? And, also, his antipathy for Reagan was very striking to me in talking to him. I mean, Reagan wasn’t a good Republican because of those deficits. That was unforgiveable. Republicans don’t run deficits like that. And I thought, “You know, now that is very interesting. He was a non-ideological president. He was a practical president.”

Smith: And you look at his selection of Justice Stevens. Classic illustration.

DuPont: And he supported it until his death. He never regretted it. That was another thing that was very interesting. The conservatives couldn’t forgive him for that. And he supported Stevens right through to the end.

Smith: I made the observation in my eulogy that, you know, the cliché is we get more conservative as we get older because we have more to conserve.

DuPont: We have something to conserve, never mind more.
Smith: Yeah, hopefully. He, in a lot of ways, seemed to run counter to that. I wondered how much of an influence she was, how much of an influence having kids and then grandchildren and being open to that whole culture. How much of it was, quite frankly, an acute awareness of what he called ‘the hard Right’ which had after all come after him in the mid-70’s. It wasn’t just abortion. I mean, that was the most obvious, but he was outspokenly pro-gay rights. We’ve talked to someone who quoted him as saying ten years before he died that gay marriage was coming and society should adapt itself. I mean, things that don’t fit the stereotype of the white bread west Michigan Republican Party. And I’m wondering how much of it was an outgrowth of his work with the Betty Ford Center. where he saw these people in his circle - good, decent people, who had a weakness - and whether that was a factor in broadening his horizons.

DuPont: To me, though, I would say the core of Ford was the sense of duty, a sense of responsibility, a sense of wanting to do the right thing and not promote his ego, but to fulfill the obligation to the public interest that came with his position. And, as his position became more prominent, it became more national and more international, and I think that that broadened him beyond Grand Rapids in terms of his role. And he grew with that, is the way I would see it. But, also, I think the parties at that time did not have an ideological litmus test. So, think about the fact that the Democratic Party through all those years, the Congress was led by the South. Those were Democrats, you know, and that was so different from what has happened now where you get this very sharp ideological divide that is going on.

Smith: Let me ask you, because you might be Exhibit A in this. How difficult was it in the early phase of the Ford presidency in terms of meshing the Nixon holdovers, who were clearly the majority of the staff—

DuPont: That’s what I was.

Smith: Exactly. With the Grand Rapids crowd and others that he brought in. Was there tension between those groups?
DuPont: I don’t think so. I think the people from the Nixon team, I speak for myself, were ready to go on. Dick Parsons was my handler and I just thought he was wonderful.

Smith: Were you also ready to go?

DuPont: No, I was going to stay. I wanted to stay. Absolutely, I didn’t want to go. But Parsons was very inspiring. I mean, he was a wonderful guy to work for. I couldn’t ask for anything better than Dick Parsons.

Smith: Could you have predicted at that point that he was headed for big things?

DuPont: I never knew anybody who didn’t think he was wonderful. You know, I mean, no one had the sense that he’s gotten this job because he’s black and he’s somehow not up to the job and he’s a token.

Smith: A Rockefeller guy.

DuPont: Well, I was going to say about Rockefeller guys, my perception was - and Jim Cannon doesn’t entirely agree with this -, is Ford was a legislative branch guy. Well, legislative people don’t have any staff to speak of. There’s nobody there. Rockefeller was an executive branch guy. He had a very deep bench. I mean, he had expertise in every direction that was tremendously deep. So, when the Ford presidency comes, where did they turn to fill the positions? It’s Rockefeller people.

Smith: That’s interesting. Did you see or sense the tension between Rumsfeld and Rockefeller?

DuPont: No, I never saw any of that. I wouldn’t know that. I can imagine that, but I didn’t ever see anything like that.

Smith: Was there a different feel at all about how Rumsfeld ran the White House and how Cheney ran the White House?

DuPont: I didn’t see any of that because I was just related to Parsons throughout that whole experience and I wouldn’t even know.

Smith: Did you have direct conversations with the President about your field?
DuPont: No, I met him several times, but no real conversations. It would be a formal kind of thing, a presentation to a cabinet committee we had, but it would be very formal.

Smith: So, really, it was in later years, when you worked with Mrs. Ford—

DuPont: Yes, that got me in contact with him.

Smith: And how did that come about?

DuPont: The question is how did I get my name on a building at the Betty Ford Center; and the answer is that I had a patient in this office who I referred, as I have many patients, to the Betty Ford Center. This guy had a good bit of money. Is a wonderful man. He flew out there in his own airplane. He went into the Betty Ford Center and they put him in a double room and his first assignment was to clean up the bathrooms. This was, let’s say, not the way he lived his life at that point. His reaction to it was to be delighted. He had grown up as an orphan. He had been turned out at the age of 18 from the orphanage with $5 and a toothbrush and told, “It’s a world of opportunity. Go out there and seize it.” And so he was perfectly prepared to clean bathrooms.

He was very attracted to the Betty Ford Center and wanted to do something to help them. And at that point in his life his purpose, if you can imagine, was to honor the people who’d helped him. So, he went to Betty Ford and said, “I want to name a building after my doctor who sent me here.” So, they did and John Schwarzlose, who’s the Executive Director out there, commented to me about this. He said, “Bob, I don’t want you to take this too serious. For a million dollars, we would’ve called it the Mickey Mouse Center.” That’s how that happened.

Smith: When she was setting up this thing, had she talked to you?

DuPont: No. Where she got the things were from the Navy and from Hazelden. It’s a direct connection. Hazelden was the pioneer of the modern treatment program, and all the really classy programs have their lineage traced back to what Hazelden was doing with the so-called Minnesota Model. Betty Ford Center and John Schwarzlose are not comfortable, really, with that. They want to be themselves and not one to a program in the Hazelden shadow. And that’s right, they are different. And, one of the things that I really give a lot of credit to, John and the Betty Ford Center, they have not gone the way Hazelden did to expand. Instead, what they’ve done is tried to extend their influence by promotion of ideas that can be used by everybody. So, what they created is the Betty Ford Institute to develop ideas that can grow everywhere and I think that’s a brilliant move and that’s very different from Hazelden.

Smith: Two quick things. In the White House, for lack of a better word, were there rumors, was there talk about her ‘problem’?

DuPont: No. Well, maybe a little, but not much and it wasn’t anything that I saw. I want to say one other thing about the Ford presidency since I’m worried we’re coming to an end here. While I was serving in the White House, Congress refused the money to continue the war in Vietnam. So, Ford had all the White House appointees in the East Room for a meeting in which he spoke and Kissinger spoke about that. So, there must have been about 200 White House appointees and I was there at that meeting in this room. Ford introduced Kissinger. He got up and Kissinger said, “This is the darkest day in American history and what’s ahead of us is disaster because of what Congress has done. They have undermined the presidency. They have undermined a ten year effort in this war. It is awful.” And I was shaking my head and thinking, “Who is this guy? What is he saying? Either he’s nuts or there’s something terrible is going on in this country.” I’ve never heard anybody give a speech like that. Now, that was never in the press that I remember. But, boy, it was unvarnished what he was saying at that point. And Ford introduced him, “This is my guy” at that thing. It was a stunning moment to me.

Smith: But, about the same time, remember, there was a big controversy within the administration. Ford goes to Tulane and gives the speech that Kissinger didn’t want him to give in which he said, basically, the war is over as far as the United States is concerned.

DuPont: And let’s move on.

Smith: Yeah.
DuPont: Which is what he did with the Nixon presidency. And I think that he put that behind him by pardoning Nixon. Otherwise, it would’ve gone on. And I think that was just the same way. That was the right thing to do. That’s what Jerry Ford was.

Smith: Were you surprised when the pardon occurred?

DuPont: No, I think that was wonderful. I had no hesitancy about that at all. Just the idea of stringing Nixon up at that point would do no good and would set a precedent that would be horrible. Whatever Nixon did, he was doing it in his view in the public interest. I really think so. And that’s true of Bud Krogh, too. Somebody said he didn’t pay a high enough price. Please. He was the only president to resign. That’s not a high enough price? I think that’s plenty high.

Smith: How would you characterize Betty Ford’s historical contributions? How should she be remembered?

DuPont: As a saint and a hero. She gave a face to addiction of dignity, of class, but also of compassion, of intelligence. I mean, it was a face that no one else had ever done or has done so well since. All the celebrities in the world don’t do what she did. And her contribution with the Betty Ford Center also is just remarkable. It’s a great gift that has been a gift to lots of patients, lots of families, but to the whole country. It’s an inspiration to our field.

Smith: It’s been suggested that she was equally important, maybe more important, gave a face to recovery.

DuPont: Well, that’s what I meant. That’s true. She didn’t give a face to the fact that continuing to use drugs was a good thing. She gave a face to the fact that recovery is not only possible, but is achievable for everyone who follows the program. He stopped drinking and when I was with him the question was what did he think about that and what he said was he didn’t want to drink anymore. She wanted him to go ahead and drink and he told me, “I don’t want to drink. I’m not doing this for her. I really just don’t want to drink.” And I think that that’s right because of what he’d seen it do. He didn’t want to do that. And I think his stopping drinking also was a statement that was pretty powerful and, I thought, very laudable.

Meijer: Had you been active in politics before that year in Traverse City?

Griffin: Somewhat.

Mrs. Griffin: Oh yes. You were county chairman, Republican chairman. Bill Milliken had been the…

Griffin: Bill Milliken and I were good friends from the time we first came to Traverse City. In fact, he had been the local chairman of the Republican Party and then I got to know him. Then he needed somebody to take over, and I took over and got into it.

Meijer: When would you have met President Ford for the first time, or I should say, Congressman Ford for the first time?

Mrs. Griffin: During that campaign in 1956.

Griffin: Was Jerry in then?

Mrs. Griffin: Oh yeah.

Meijer: Yes, he’d been in since ’48.

Griffin: That’s when we would have first met him.

Meijer: Did he come up here, do you recall?

Griffin: Yeah, that’s right. Didn’t we get Nixon up…?

Mrs. Griffin: I think we went down to Grand Rapids. I don’t remember him coming to our district.

Griffin: I guess that’s when I first met Nixon and Ford was running.

Meijer: Nixon would have been vice president then, of course.
Griffin: Yeah.

Meijer: What was your impression of Jerry when you first met him?

Griffin: Well. Great. I knew him in Congress, we were good friends. Everybody liked Jerry Ford.

Mrs. Griffin: We really didn’t know him until we got to Washington. We knew of him, but not personally, until we became very good friends in Washington.

Griffin: But in Washington we were good friends, and I was pretty instrumental in getting behind him when we made him the leader.

Meijer: Absolutely. If I’m remembering right - and maybe you could talk a little bit about – you were part of a group of young Congressmen with Charles Goodell and Mel Laird and Don Rumsfeld.

Mrs. Griffin: And they met in our living room and decided on Jerry Ford – to back Jerry for the leadership.

Griffin: Who was the other guy that we pushed aside?

Meijer: Hovan from Iowa?

Griffin: No.

Meijer: He was a Republican conference committee.

Griffin: He’s not the one I’m thinking. Do you know who I’m thinking of?

Mrs. Griffin: Mel Laird.

Griffin: Mel Laird, I think it was.

Mrs. Griffin: I think it came down to – Mel wasn’t part of our group.

Griffin: It was between Mel Laird and Jerry Ford.

Mrs. Griffin: And Ford was very, very popular and Mel had some people who didn’t like him, and so this little gang of four or five, whatever it was, in our living room decided to go after Jerry Ford and ask if he would run. He was a little reluctant at first. But he agreed.
Meijer: Why was he reluctant?

Griffin: He hadn’t been a leader before that, at least in Congress.

Mrs. Griffin: And to run against Charlie Halleck, who was the good old boy.

Griffin: We were unseating a guy from Indiana, Charlie Halleck.

Mrs. Griffin: And these were Young Turks who were quite new in the Washington scene.

Meijer: You were taking quite a risk to mount that challenge.

Griffin: Right. It was kind of a revolt, a revolution. And we put up Jerry Ford. Everybody liked Jerry.

Meijer: And you were successful.

Griffin: Yeah.

Meijer: And then you survived the LBJ landslide in ’64, and it was time to put him up again. Well, that was when you went after Halleck.

Mrs. Griffin: Then Bob was the floor manager when Jerry came up for the nomination for president in ’76.

Griffin: ’76.

Mrs. Griffin: In Kansas City?

Meijer: That’s right.

Mrs. Griffin: So he was the floor manager and that was when Reagan put forth an effort against Ford in the convention. We maintained Ford’s…

Meijer: And that, obviously, was a very serious challenge for Ford, as a sitting president. What was Ford’s feeling? Did you think he was going to survive and that you were going succeed?

Mrs. Griffin: Sure.

Griffin: Sure. We were determined. We worked hard at it.
Meijer: Had you known Reagan at all before that?

Griffin: Oh, not really.

Meijer: What did you think of him?

Griffin: He was the governor of California, wasn’t he?

Meijer: Yes.

Griffin: He came into Washington – we all had to get acquainted with him. It took a long time for me to know him. We were much more interested in Jerry Ford.

Mrs. Griffin: We never felt as close than we did to Ford with his Michigan – and Jerry was always very active and very considerate of the Michigan Republican congressmen. The four who were elected when Bob was elected, they were all in the 40s, under 40, in their 30s, and so when we went to Washington we had this little group of Michigan congressmen, headed by Jerry Ford, of course. And all his life he was very, very supportive of this little group of Michigan congressional people.

Meijer: Did you become friends as couples, also?

Mrs. Griffin: You know like El Cederberg, Charley Chamberlain, Bill Broomfield, and Jack McIntosh was the other one.

Meijer: And then would you have seen a lot of each other socially as well? Did you spend time with Betty as well and Jerry?

Mrs. Griffin: Yes.

Griffin: Yes, honey. Socially, we didn’t go out a lot with them.

Mrs. Griffin: Well, no, but we went to the White House for Jerry’s birthday party upstairs. We went to the Kennedy Center with them.

Meijer: I was thinking, too, when you were back in Congress, though, as young…

Mrs. Griffin: That’s when we were in Congress.
Meijer: Okay. And what was Betty like back then? What was your first impression of her?

Griffin: Very nice.

Mrs. Griffin: Oh, wonderful. And she was very active in the Republican wives club, and so we were quite close.

Griffin: Because she was very active, too.

Mrs. Griffin: But they lived in Virginia and we lived over in Maryland, so we didn’t see each other day by day.

Meijer: And you were both raising children at that time.

Mrs. Griffin: And we were both busy with our families. But very congenial, and back and forth on the telephone.

Meijer: When you were setting up your Congressional office, Jerry was still a relatively new Congressman, too. He was only what, four terms in when you arrived.

Griffin: A couple of terms, yeah.

Meijer: How did your offices compare? Did you get any ideas or thoughts from him on how to set things up?

Griffin: Oh yeah. When Congress was in session, we sat next to each other quite often, and had lots of time to talk. And we talked about Michigan politics or anything else. Of course when Jerry was put up for leader, I worked very hard for that. He was easy to work for because everybody liked him, he didn’t have any enemies. Democrats liked him as well.

Meijer: He always said all he wanted to be was Speaker of the House. Was that an ambition that he would have shared with you, as you talked?

Griffin: We didn’t talk about it. I don’t think so.

Mrs. Griffin: We were aware of it, though.

Griffin: But I don’t think that was something – that was just kind of in the future.
Meijer: What were your own, as you went to Washington as a young Congressman, had you thought ahead? Did you ever imagine you’d be going to the Senate, or coming back to the Supreme Court? What did you think your life would look like in 1956?

Mrs. Griffin: I thought he was crazy. We had a new baby and two other children, a six and a four year old, and a new baby and he came home and said he was going to run for Congress. We were quite new in Traverse City in the law business, and I thought he was absolutely out of his mind. But then you get into it, and of course you want to win, and you work hard. I think a lot of the Michigan delegation who were elected at that time…

Griffin: There were four of us. New Congressmen – Republicans from Michigan at that time – we were all in our 40s.

Mrs. Griffin: They didn’t intend to make it a lifetime job. They thought they would go and serve a few terms and do the best they could.

Griffin: Let’s see, there was McIntosh…

Mrs. Griffin: And Cederberg and Broomfield.

Griffin: Okay.

Mrs. Griffin: And Jerry was sort of our elder advisor.

Meijer: And so you help him become Minority Leader, and then how was he as a Minority Leader?

Meijer: I think you’re right. And there must have been a much greater sense – I see this in my own work, too – in research on Vandenberg of being able to have friends across the aisle much more easily than you hear about. Could you talk a little bit about how Democrats and Republicans got along then?

Mrs. Griffin: Well, for instance, Danny Inouye was one of your good friends. And, in fact, that went way, way back. They were two of the outstanding young men of the nation way back – I can’t even remember the year now – but you’ve always been friends with Danny.

Griffin: A Democrat.

Mrs. Griffin: I’m sure there are others.

Griffin: I feel like I was in that category, too – getting along with Democrats. But Jerry did shine better – everybody liked Jerry.

Meijer: And some people say it has more to do with the fact that the Fords and the Griffin’s would have lived in Washington and raised their families there, where so often today people are flying back and forth every weekend and there isn’t the sense of sharing the same community as much.

Mrs. Griffin: It’s true, although we came home in the beginning – we came home every summer, and the children would start school in Traverse City in September and go until Christmas. Then we moved down, first to Virginia, and then to Maryland. And I think the Fords did the same – I’m not positive.

Meijer: I don’t know – that’s a good question. Now we talked about 1964 and Ford becoming Minority Leader, then in 1966 and 1968 George Romney is coming on strong as our favorite son candidate for president. What was your relationship with Governor Romney as he was becoming a candidate for president?

Mrs. Griffin: Well, he nominated him for president at the convention, for one thing.

Meijer: Now was Ford – did he work hard on Governor Romney’s behalf, too? Or what was their relationship?

Mrs. Griffin: I don’t know.

Griffin: I can’t remember too much about it. I’m sure they got along well. Jerry got along with everybody. He was always that way, I think. Everybody liked him.

Mrs. Griffin: We were very much involved with Romney and Milliken during that campaign. I don’t know how much Ford got involved.
Meijer: Of course, at that point he would have had a longer relationship with Nixon, being in Washington over the years.

Griffin: Yes. Oh, yeah. Yeah, he was pretty close to Dick Nixon.

Meijer: How often were you and Congressman Minority Leader Ford seeing each other?

Griffin: Well, everyday on the House floor we would see each other.

Mrs. Griffin: And you went to the White House after he became president a lot.

Meijer: One of the things that I hear people talk about was his command of the budget process. Besides being such a good guy that everybody liked, what particular skills do you remember that he had as a Congressman?

Griffin: Well, I think he watched the dollars pretty closely and I’m trying to think – didn’t he veto some of the bills when he was president? I think he did.

Meijer: Yeah.

Griffin: He was pretty strict looking after the dollars, as I recall.

Meijer: He seemed to have just a real knowledge of the budget – a lot more than a lot of people have.

Griffin: Oh, yeah. He did.

Meijer: With Agnew’s resignation, and Nixon’s decision to appoint Ford, is that something that took you by surprise, or were you involved in discussions about that?

Griffin: I think I was a little bit involved.

Meijer: I bet you were. How did that come about?

Griffin: I don’t know how much I can remember about it, but…

Meijer: But this is where, as you try to remember, if you remember differently, you can read the transcript and change or delete anything. So please feel free to…

Griffin: What do you remember about it?
Mrs. Griffin: Well, I was just trying to remember.

Meijer: Nixon would have had a decision to make. You would have had powerful feelings.

Griffin: Nixon had a decision to make. What was it?

Meijer: Who should be vice president.

Griffin: Oh, okay.

Meijer: Agnew’s gone.

Griffin: Okay. Yeah, I do remember that, although and I worked hard for Jerry on that. It wasn’t hard, though, because Jerry was so popular. He really was.

Mrs. Griffin: You keep coming back to that.

Griffin: Well, it’s true.

Meijer: Well, it’s a theme.

Mrs. Griffin: You know, that was his really strong…

Griffin: They were looking for somebody that would be not too…

Mrs. Griffin: Controversial.

Griffin: Controversial. And that was Jerry Ford.

Mrs. Griffin: As clean as a whistle and as honest as could be.

Griffin: And was real good friends with the Democrats.

Mrs. Griffin: And well qualified, and you couldn’t do any better.

Griffin: Yeah.

Meijer: Now, would you have had a meeting with Nixon at all to talk about this?

Griffin: Yeah. Sure.

Meijer: Who would have been with you?
Griffin: Charlie Goodell and, who else?

Mrs. Griffin: Was Hugh Scott still in the leadership?

Griffin: Hugh Scott a little bit. It really was Goodell and I. We were kind of a twosome.

Mrs. Griffin: That was to get Jerry into the leadership position.

Griffin: Right.

Mrs. Griffin: But to get to be vice president…

Griffin: I can’t remember.

Mrs. Griffin: I can’t remember, except you must have lobbied very hard for Ford.

Meijer: I bet you did. And you were successful. You accomplished it. And now, all of a sudden, here he’s been a Congressman for most of his career and now he’s part of the administration. That must have been…

Mrs. Griffin: It was hard to remember to call him Mr. President and not Jerry, publicly. We tried very hard not to – to remember that he was the president of the United States. I remember one instance, one party at the Capitol Hill Club where I came in and patted the president on the back, and the Secret Service grabbed my hand and said, “You do not touch a President.” And Jerry turned around and kissed me.

Meijer: Ah, that’s great.

Mrs. Griffin: I mean, that was the type of thing that Jerry Ford would do that made him beloved.

Meijer: It must have been awfully hard on him then to become vice president, and now he’s in the position of defending the administration and defending Nixon when all his friends are growing more and more skeptical and uncomfortable with the situation.

Mrs. Griffin: Right.

Griffin: I think there was quite a bit to that.
Meijer: And how soon after he became vice president did you have a sense that maybe he was going to be president – that Nixon would have to go?

Griffin: I can’t remember any particular mark of time or anything, but that gradually did develop. It’s pretty hard for me to say it.

Mrs. Griffin: One interesting sideline is that when he was vice president, he was going to move into the vice president’s house. They didn’t have a home for the vice president before.

Griffin: So somebody had to do something about that, and I did.

Meijer: Oh you did? Was that the Naval Observatory – was that your work?

Mrs. Griffin: Yeah. He was driving down Pennsylvania Avenue one morning and Admiral Zumwalt was retiring who had lived in this house. It was a very, very nice old house up on Pennsylvania Avenue. Anyway, Bob thought, well, this is a perfect time to appropriate it for the vice president because it is already owned by the government. Hubert Humphrey used to complain and Jerry complained, that when they became vice president, they had to come in and redo the windows and do all kinds of renovations on their own house – and it disrupted the neighborhood and everything else, and that they really needed a residence for the vice president. And so here was the opportunity. The house was there. Zumwalt was leaving and Jerry was the vice president, and so Bob went down to Congress and talked to Mansfield and some of the others and got them all aboard, and they made that the official residence.

So, let me see – how did it go – Betty was up in New York buying dishes or drapes or whatever it was for the new vice president’s house.

Griffin: Drapes, I think it was.

Mrs. Griffin: When suddenly, he became the president and Nelson Rockefeller moved into the house. The only trouble was, Nelson had a beautiful home of his own in Fox Hall Road, and so he never really moved into the new vice president’s house. So the first people who lived there were the Mondales.

Meijer: Oh my goodness. Okay.
Mrs. Griffin: Which is just sort of a sideline.

Meijer: No, that’s fascinating.

Mrs. Griffin: So Ford never got to move into the vice president’s house.

Meijer: So you thought you were finding a home for him, but…

Griffin: It’s still there as a vice president’s house.

Mrs. Griffin: It is perfect. It’s up on this hill and it’s all surrounded with fences, and well protected. A beautiful old house.

Meijer: So, Betty is picking out drapes and you’re getting the house approved and at some point, were you part of the delegation with Hugh Scott and Barry Goldwater calling on Nixon?

Griffin: Yes.

Mrs. Griffin: Oh, yes.

Meijer: That must have been quite a meeting.

Mrs. Griffin: Yup. Right.

Meijer: How did he receive you?

Griffin: Actually, I was in a group that met and, I’m trying to think who went with Scott. I didn’t go with him to the White House. But somebody else did.

Meijer: I was thinking – did Barry Goldwater go?

Mrs. Griffin: I think he’s talking about the night when he went on television and Nixon said he was resigning. You had been at a meeting with Hugh Scott and you came home and said that he had gone to pieces and that you didn’t think he could possibly go on television in an hour’s time. But he did – and announced that he was leaving.

Meijer: Had he gone to pieces in front of you?

Griffin: Yeah.
Meijer: Wow. That had to be a moving moment.

Griffin: It was.

Meijer: How many of you were in the room?

Griffin: Oh about a dozen. Can’t remember – it was some kind of a meeting that we had.

Meijer: Would President Nixon have looked at you as - in some ways because you were so close to Jerry Ford - would Nixon have seen you as kind of Ford’s agent a little bit?

Mrs. Griffin: A traitor.

Meijer: In trying to…

Griffin: I suppose. Yeah.

Mrs. Griffin: I think so.

Griffin: To some extent, anyway.

Meijer: When you say, “Fall to pieces,” just in tears? President Nixon.

Mrs. Griffin: That’s what you said.

Griffin: Yeah.

Meijer: And then Jerry Ford becomes president. How soon after he was sworn in did you chat with him or did you hear from him? That must have just been such a whirlwind.

Griffin: I can remember the day when that happened, that’s for sure.

Meijer: Did he call you, or you call him?

Mrs. Griffin: Well, you were on the transition team, weren’t you?

Griffin: Yeah.
Mrs. Griffin: That Ford…

Griffin: When he went into the White House, he had a lot of things he had to do. And I was on a small group that was finding and making suggestions about who could do what. When he needed help on something.

Mrs. Griffin: Change of staff.

Meijer: Do you recall what were you suggesting, or what kinds of things would have come up?

Mrs. Griffin: Well, when Rumsfeld came in as chief of staff…

Griffin: Yeah. That was one of our recommendations.

Mrs. Griffin: And Rummy had been one of the Young Turks who had helped to get Jerry into the leadership and he was quite new in Congress, Rumsfeld at that point.

Meijer: Did you recommend him to President Ford?

Griffin: The little group that we had did. But I think he already knew Rumsfeld, anyway. I’m not sure how much we had to do with it.

Meijer: But President Ford must have felt very comfortable having you work so closely with him.

Mrs. Griffin: All I can remember is that it seemed like Bob was at the White House very, very often during those days.

Meijer: And there were some people like Kissinger and Connally who were around after Ford left, weren’t they? You were having to deal with making decisions about new people, but also about keeping some of the other folks around during the transition.

Mrs. Griffin: It was a very interesting time.

Griffin: Yeah.

Meijer: Never been another quite like it. I’ve heard some people talk as though there were almost a kitchen cabinet that you would have been a part of in that kind of tough transition time with the president.
How did Betty adjust? Here she is, a Congressman’s wife for many years and then…

Mrs. Griffin: Oh Betty was wonderful. She was just herself, as always, and I think the press loved her because she was genuine.

Meijer: Were you surprised at all with that famous 60 Minutes interview that got her in a little bit of hot water, I guess, but that everybody loved?

Mrs. Griffin: I think we wives were very supportive of her when she was having some of her problems and we all liked her very, very much. What else can you say?

Meijer: Some people criticized President Ford because he’d been a Congressman, he’d only represented one Michigan district his whole life, that he didn’t have a broad enough scope to be president. A leading question, but, some people said it took him too long to outgrow Grand Rapids. How did you feel about that?

Griffin: I would say that that would be very unusual and limited people that would say that. No, I think Jerry had a broad support.

Mrs. Griffin: Grasp of world affairs.

Griffin: From Democrats as well as Republicans.

Mrs. Griffin: He was underestimated, I am sure, by the press and by some other people. But not by people who knew him.

Griffin: That’s right.

Meijer: In the same way that people would say, well, he’d spent too long in Congress. That he was a creature of the Congress.

Mrs. Griffin: Just like saying when he stumbled, and here he was the best athlete they probably ever had in the White House, but…

Meijer: When it came time to pardon Nixon, did Jerry talk about that with you?

Griffin: No, he didn’t. And that was a little bit of a surprise.

Meijer: How did you feel when you heard the news?
Griffin: I had mixed feelings, but I went along with it.

Meijer: And part of that same time was when he granted the amnesty program, too, to the draft dodgers. That didn’t go down well with some people in the party, either. Did you talk with him at all about that?

Griffin: No, I can’t say I was part of that.

Meijer: And I can’t remember, were there occasions like that when you would have publicly disagreed with him at all on his decision?

Griffin: No. I don’t recall any.

Mrs. Griffin: No, I don’t think so.

Griffin: I may not have said anything, but I don’t recall being out there fighting him or anything like that.

Meijer: Now, Richard Norton Smith was mentioning that with the amnesty, some of the other Republicans publicly denounced it, but kind of privately – both with the pardon and the amnesty – signaled to President Ford, you probably did the right thing. Did that go on, do you think?

Griffin: I think so. Yeah, it’s pretty much a good description of it.

Meijer: One of the moving moments I’ve heard President Ford talk about was the fall of Saigon and just having to preside over all the evacuation and everything. I’m curious if that is something that you talked about with him or had an impression of how that would have affected him.

Griffin: I can’t say that I did, but I remember that period of time and how I thought he did such a great job. Doing the best he could with a very difficult situation. But, no, I wasn’t very close to the decision making or anything like that.

Meijer: You talked about, Mrs. Griffin, about when he turned around and kissed you and he always had that wonderful sense of humor, and did the presidency change any of that?

Mrs. Griffin: No, I don’t think so.
Meijer: What do you remember about his sense of humor?

Mrs. Griffin: What do I remember about his sense of humor? Well, I don’t remember him being particularly funny, but he was fun to be with, and an interesting acquaintance, but I don’t remember him being funny, particularly. Serious. One of my fond memories of the Fords was spending the last weekend at Camp David before he left office. He had invited two other couples and the Griffins up to Camp David. We had a wonderful weekend up there with the dogs and just relaxing and talking about old times and so forth. Kind of nostalgic because it was their last trip to Camp David.

Meijer: Oh sure. Who else was with you?

Mrs. Griffin: Cederbergs and Wrights – what was his first name? Some old friends from long, long ago.

Meijer: When he lost the election to President Carter, what did he say to you? How do you think that affect him?

Mrs. Griffin: I think he was hurt, and unhappy.

Griffin: I don’t think we were close to him right after…

Mrs. Griffin: I thought we were.

Griffin: Well, do you?

Mrs. Griffin: I remember at Camp David – bemoaning the fact that Carter was going to take over and be the next residents up there.

Meijer: Did he resent Reagan, do you think, for not campaigning harder for him?

Mrs. Griffin: We did. I don’t think he did.

Griffin: At least we don’t know that he did.

Mrs. Griffin: At least he didn’t vocalize it.

Meijer: But you had a sense of that?
Mrs. Griffin: His friends, his close friends never really got over that. But then we weren’t close to the Reagans.

Meijer: I recall President Ford saying that if Reagan had campaigned a little harder in a couple of districts in southern Ohio, in Cincinnati or something, that might have made all the difference.

Mrs. Griffin: Or if the election had been a couple weeks later, maybe. If they’d had just a little bit more time.

Meijer: Well, after he left office, and I’ve just got a couple more here, he said that raising money for the Foundation, which you were also very involved in, was about the hardest thing he’d ever done. Do you recall talking to him about plans for the museum and the library?

Mrs. Griffin: Oh, you organized the first…

Griffin: I was the first chairman of the Foundation.

Mrs. Griffin: You worked very hard at setting it all up. You were a lawyer then.

Griffin: I did the legal work of organizing it and getting it going.

Mrs. Griffin: Bob was out of Congress then and he was associated with a firm in Detroit. It was before he went on the Court.

Meijer: I was trying to remember, when did you go to the Senate?

Mrs. Griffin: ’66.

Griffin: See how she’s got all that on her mind?

Meijer: Well, that’s very helpful.

Mrs. Griffin: Pat McNamara died, and George Romney - Bob was already running. He had announced that he was going to run for the Senate, so George Romney appointed him when Pat McNamara died. And so he was in the – but he had to run for the election again in November.

Meijer: That’s right. When did you first go to the Senate then?
Mrs. Griffin: '66.

Meijer: That was in the spring?

Mrs. Griffin: That would be about January, wasn’t it?

Griffin: Yeah, I think so.

Mrs. Griffin: So he was there from January – so he did have the Senate designation when he ran in November, and he ran against Soapy Williams and defeated him. Which is quite something.

Meijer: You bet.

Mrs. Griffin: Because he was a formidable, formidable candidate.

Meijer: That was a special time for Western Michigan when Jerry was Minority Leader and you were in the Senate. Did you ever campaign – well, he probably didn’t need you to campaign for him in the Fifth District, but did he ever campaign for you in any of your elections?

Griffin: Oh, I’m sure he did. We would have big events, and he would be there. It wasn’t day after day or anything like that.

Mrs. Griffin: Coming up to Travers City in ’75 and being in the Cherry Festival Parade and they rode together and waved at the crowds.

Griffin: He came out here at that time. We had a big…

Mrs. Griffin: If you mean that kind of campaigning, yes. I don’t remember him going door to door with you.

Meijer: No, I didn’t mean that.

Mrs. Griffin: He was always supportive.

Meijer: When was the last time you saw him?

Smith: Thank you for welcoming us into your lovely home.

Hartmann: Well, you are more than welcome.

Smith: Where did you meet Bob?

Hartmann: You don’t know that story?

Smith: No.

Hartmann: Well, let’s see. Remember the beginning of the war, December 7th?

Smith: Sure. Pearl Harbor.

Hartmann: Alright. I was teaching school in Venice Boulevard School in Los Angeles and he was an ensign in the Navy. My friend teaching with me, her husband was an ensign; he’d already signed up and was in. And she said to me one day, “Roberta, it’s time you get a new boyfriend,” or something like that. “We have somebody we want you to meet. He’s an ensign and I think you’d like him, and so I’ve invited him to dinner next Sunday night and I would like for you to come.” I said, “Okay, fine.”

Well, the next day, Sunday, after church my parents and I went to our favorite place at the beach on the waterfront in Long Beach for lunch. And the radio was playing music, and we had just finished and started to get up from the table when “Flash – Bulletin. Pearl Harbor’s been bombed.” And I got home and my friend called me and she said, “The boys are restricted to the base tonight, so we’re going to do it next Sunday night, if it’s okay, if they can.”

So I met him the next Sunday night and started going out with him. And we were married that year and I sent him off to the war and I said, “I want a baby before you go. If anything happens to you, I’d like to have a baby.” So I got a baby at the end of November, 11th of November, and my mother said, “I hope nobody’s counting.” But that’s how we met and that’s how we stayed together for 65 years.

Smith: Now, when he came back from the war, how did he get into journalism?

Hartmann: Oh, well, he was with the Los Angeles Times as a political reporter for them and he opened the Washington bureau here in 1954.

Smith: Oh, really?

Hartmann: Oh, yeah. And later he opened the bureau in Rome. We lived in Italy.

Smith: When was that? In the ‘50s?

Hartmann: No, 1963. Kennedy was assassinated while we were there.

Smith: Was Pope Pius still pope?

Hartmann: Yes.

Smith: Did you enjoy Rome?

Hartmann: Oh, I loved it. That’s my home away from home, and God willing, my son is going to take me next summer.

Smith: Wonderful.

Hartmann: I hope I make it. I’ve been on a crazy – I broke my hip and then Daddy died, and then everything happened. I don’t know where it’s going to end.

Smith: Well, it’s nice to have Rome to look forward to.

Hartmann: Yes, I really do have that.

Smith: Now you mention that being a LA Times reporter and then being in the bureau here, he would have had an association with Richard Nixon?

Hartmann: Oh yes.

Smith: So Nixon didn’t hate all reporters?
Hartmann: No, many a time Richard brought him home at the end of the day – being a morning paper he had to work late, you know, and lots of times Nixon was busy and he’d send his driver to bring him home. Sometimes he came himself, I can see him standing in there in front of the fireplace.

Smith: Really?

Hartmann: When I went to the hospital he sent a beautiful present. Yes, we were good friends.

Smith: So that’s a different side of Nixon from the public Nixon.

Hartmann: Yes. He was such a nice guy.

Smith: Personable?

Hartmann: Oh, yes, he really was.

Smith: Why do you think that didn’t come across?

Hartmann: I don’t know. Well, part of it I would say that he had that devil Haig around him.

Smith: It’s clear that there was no love lost between Bob and Al Haig.

Hartmann: Oh, he just met him head-on. And Bob can hold his own with somebody like that. And that made Haig even madder.

Smith: Let me ask you. Where did Bob’s path first cross with Gerald Ford?

Hartmann: He had met him here as a newspaperman, and when we went to Rome, we were there two years and he was coming home and Mel Laird and Glenn Lipscomb, from California, wrote Bob and said, “Come on home. We want you to be head of the House Republican Conference. Then he became Ford’s LA.

Smith: Was Ford a Republican leader at that point – the Minority Leader of the House?

Hartmann: Yes, Minority Leader. And what his ambition was, was to be the head one.
Smith: Speaker of the House.

Hartmann: Yes. He never talked about being vice president or president, or anything. His goal was to be Speaker of the House.

Smith: Tell me, as someone who knows better than anyone else, what were the qualities that bonded your husband and Gerald Ford? Because, clearly it was a relationship much closer than that of the traditional speechwriter.

Hartmann: Oh, yes. Well, in the first place, they were both devout Christians, which is a good basis. And family men – good family men. He helped people and everything he did was on the good side. He was very personable, very friendly, honest.

Smith: And very loyal.

Hartmann: Very loyal, very loyal.

Smith: But it’s interesting: a loyalty that was not afraid from time to time…

Hartmann: … to speak his peace.

Smith: Yeah. Tell us about that, because that’s a rare loyalty.

Hartmann: Well, like when he said he didn’t want to say what Bob said about Nixon – the final words – because Ford thought it would be too strong against Nixon.

Smith: Oh, that’s right – “The long national nightmare is over.” Ford wanted to remove that from the speech.

Hartmann: Yes. Now, had it been any other two people, it probably would have been. But Bob said, “This is it. This is what you are doing. It’s not just family, it’s the whole world. And this is what’s going to be remembered – that you have saved the country.” And so forth. Oh, and at the convention, just before that. I think it was in Chicago.

Smith: The ’72 convention or the ’76 convention? Before Ford became vice president?

Hartmann: He just was, and he had made his speech – what year was that?
Smith: The speech when he became president – ’74.

Hartmann: That’s right – ’74. Well, he made this speech and we were up there somewhere – Chicago – and they flashed it on the screen – the big screen, and we watched it. We came down and we were walking across an empty ballroom or something and the thing was still up there on the screen – our long national nightmare is over – and Barbara Walters – gave him credit that night on television. And Daddy didn’t like that. Daddy said, “That’s his speech.”

Smith: I used to be a speechwriter, and people who don’t do it, don’t understand it. It’s a very singular relationship of trust. Tell me about that relationship between those two men. Obviously Ford was comfortable with the words that your husband was writing for him. How did your husband go about becoming Jerry Ford’s voice in some ways?

Hartmann: He had a knack with words – a wonderful way with words. And they would talk about things and he would say something that he thought Ford should think about putting that in, and they would just talk back and forth, and then Bob would write the speech. But they had this thing in common, whatever you want to call it.

Smith: It’s almost a sixth sense.

Hartmann: They were both wired the same way.

Smith: That’s very well put. Now, let me ask you because, clearly, there’s almost a year from Agnew’s resignation and Ford’s confirmation as vice president – there is obviously an extended period between him becoming vice president and Nixon’s resignation. And that had to have been an incredibly awkward period in some ways for Ford, and for those around him.

Hartmann: You mean like the last year of Nixon being president?

Smith: Yes, exactly. Because on the one hand, as vice president, he was expected to defend the president; but at the same time, not knowing what shoes might still drop, and the possibility that he might wind up there himself, he couldn’t sacrifice his own credibility. And one senses that no one was closer to him in those days, or a more valued counselor, than your husband.

Hartmann: That’s why some people disliked him so much.

Smith: Tell me about that.

Hartmann: Well, I don’t know. I don’t understand it. But, I guess if you’re hungry for attention to be on yourself, it’s hard for you to let the person who should have it, receive it. And there were some people that were really not very nice to Daddy. But he held his own.

Smith: Before Ford becomes president, when he was vice president, was there friction between the Ford staff and people in the White House about the Vice President’s role – his defense or lack of defense? I’m not trying to put words in your mouth.

Hartmann: Before he was president…

Smith: Before he became president, while he’s still vice president, was there any friction between…

Hartmann: …Nixon’s people…

Smith: And your husband and his people, or Ford’s people?

Hartmann: In all honesty, I really don’t know about that. But I do know we were certainly friendly with him. And Nixon called him Bob. They were that close. Daddy didn’t condone what he had done, but he felt sorry and said in his book, he said that Nixon did a lot for this country before that happened.

Smith: Ford couldn’t have a transition for obvious reasons, he couldn’t even acknowledge that he might become president, and yet, no one was closer to him than your husband. Did you discuss the possibility during that period that Ford might become president? Did he discuss it with Ford?

Hartmann: I don’t know. I just remember when he called me on the phone and told me that Ford asked him to be with him.

Smith: This is as vice president?
Hartmann: Yeah.

Smith: The famous speech – the inaugural address – was that something done, in effect, at the last minute?

Hartmann: Writing that?

Smith: Yeah.

Hartmann: In a way, because he just waited, and then he’d sit down and pound it out. He didn’t do a little at a time or anything. And so it really came like an explosion.

Smith: Really? Was that how he worked, generally?

Hartmann: He worked his head off.

Smith: What are your memories when Nixon leaves and Ford becomes president? Were you at the White House for the swearing in, for example?

Hartmann: Oh, yes. And that’s another thing Haig did. He filled the front row of seats with all Nixon people. And except for Susan and Jack and Mike. And then I and our two kids sat in the row in back of the Nixon people. And we saw them go out on the plane.

Smith: Did you sense discomfort between the Nixon people and the Ford people? We’ve been told, for example, that that morning there was a receiving line and then I think there were refreshments or reception down in the State Dining Room. And some people have said you could see the Nixon people kind of peel off and go back to their offices.

Hartmann: Well, I don’t think I was present at that. I don’t remember that. I just remember where we sat and listening to them speak, and watching it because Bob walked out with the Fords. And was the last to say – he was the last person that Nixon talked to – wished Bob well.

Smith: Really?

Hartmann: Yeah. Held his hand and talked to him and wished him well.
Smith: So then, they are in the White House, and the famous issue of the pardon comes up. By most accounts, your husband really maybe saved Gerald Ford from, at least leaving the impression that could have been very damaging. What’s your recollection of that?

Hartmann: I just know that he spent a lot of time talking to him and writing what he did. It was very personable, and it was really a very meaningful part of life, what happened then. And I think that he saved Ford by getting those…

Smith: Was Ford too trusting? There is a view of Ford as kind of an Eagle Scout, and a guy who saw the good in everyone.

Hartmann: Bob was an Eagle Scout, too.

Smith: Was he really? Well, that’s another thing they had in common.

Hartmann: Yes. And another thing before I forget: Bob’s father had the same birthday as Jerry. Betty had the same birthday as Bob.

Smith: Really?

Hartmann: In that foursome now, two of them have the same birthdays. And when Bob introduced the President to his father, and said, “And, you know, both of you have the same birthday.” And grandfather Hartmann said, “I had it first.”

Smith: Was Ford inclined to trust people maybe too much?

Hartmann: Yes, he did. I know that there were a couple of people, I won’t say names, that he felt he was taken in a little by, that weren’t working for Ford – were working against him.

Smith: Right. Now, that brings us to Al Haig. Had they met before?

Hartmann: Yeah, they had met.

Smith: Where did the confrontation, or where did the clash come – what was it over?

Hartmann: Well, Haig, as I said, he announced to everybody, “I am the President.” That’s what he said, hear my words. And he had all these people who were working for him that were really cowed into believing him because I think he could get kind of mean. He wanted to be in charge, he definitely wanted to be in charge and he started them picking up their – well, one of the things that Bob and terHorst was it?

Smith: Jerry terHorst?

Hartmann: Bob said, “We don’t want anything carried away from the White House.” And Haig was having them pack up things and carting them out, and that’s when Bob called Benton Becker and Benton came on the next plane and came up here. He’s a wonderful person.

Smith: And they obviously had known each other from Benton’s earlier work with the Ford office.

Hartmann: But that was a Haig deal. He wanted to take charge. He wanted to run it. And if there was going to be a new one, he wanted to still be the president. Egotistic, I don’t know. I think you’re kind of screwed up upstairs when you have that kind of an attitude. But Bob was too smart for him.

Smith: How did it manifest – their conflict? Did they have words?

Hartmann: I don’t know. Bob would tell me what was going on, but I don’t know whether they ever – I’m sure they had words together, but whether there was anything bad said, I doubt it.

Smith: Did Haig try to have him fired?

Hartmann: Oh, I’m sure he did. Bob was his worst enemy.

Smith: Because, in effect, he prevented him from controlling Ford in the White House.

Hartmann: Yes, that’s right. He really wanted to control that whole thing.

Smith: When Rumsfeld came onto the scene, was that awkward in any way? How did that work? Because, let’s face it, on Capitol Hill, I guess Bob had been chief of staff himself, and now he’s in this very different environment. Was that awkward at all?
Hartmann: He and Rummy got along. There was an awful lot of talk about them not getting along, but there could be some incidents. But as far as Rummy – he came to Bob’s service – he flew up here. He was down south someplace. He came up at his service. I like him.

Smith: Yeah. And Cheney? Did they get along?

Hartmann: Daddy did not like Cheney. Daddy was the first person who found out Cheney wasn’t the good guy.

Smith: Really?

Hartmann: Oh, yes.

Smith: That’s interesting.

Hartmann: He did not like Cheney, he did not like what he did.

Smith: What was it that he objected to, or what did he find?

Hartmann: Well, I can’t say. You could probably go back and read in here. As far as he was concerned, Cheney was not doing him any good.

Smith: Now, I’m told, and I know this because of the work I’ve been doing, that Bob was actually one of Nelson Rockefeller’s friends and allies in the administration. That the Vice President felt a little bit left out, and I know he regarded Bob as a friend.

Hartmann: We liked Nelson.

Smith: What do you remember about Nelson?

Hartmann: Well, I’ll tell you. I liked him. I remember one night at a party – was it at the White House? We were dancing, it was a big party, and when the dancing started Nelson asked me to dance. And we had our picture taken – and it was just a lovely picture of us – and down at the bottom he wrote on there, “I hope Bob couldn’t tell what I was saying to you,” or something like that.

Smith: Was he a good dancer?
Hartmann: Yeah. When we lived in St. Croix, you know Nelson’s family owned Caneel Bay on St. John and Nelson called and invited us to come over for lunch. He sent a plane over for us. A little plane – I sat up in front – I thought I had my Volkswagen up in the air – and flew over there and landed – not on the strip – landed on the beach. We landed and a car picked us up. Then we went to the resort and had lunch. And Nelson had just had a birthday and he’d been given a camera. Nelson was out shooting pictures of everybody. Everybody else was taking pictures of Nelson taking pictures.

Smith: He was a lifelong photographer. That’s interesting.

Hartmann: That was fun. They had been to our house to parties. In those days we had a million parties. I liked Happy very much. She was very nice. I remember one party they came a little early because they knew they were going to have to leave. I said I was so sorry and she said, “Oh, Roberta, you know, my two children are up in New York and I have to see them.” And I said, “Yes, I certainly understand.” It was kind of too bad the way he went out of life, but he was a nice guy.

Smith: Were there other people in the administration that Bob was close to? People on the White House staff or Cabinet or people that he did work for? Did he write any for Mrs. Ford?

Hartmann: No. He didn’t write anything for her.

Smith: Were there other people you can think of as friends in the administration?

Hartmann: Well, Arthur Burns and Jack Marsh, Jim Lynn, and Secretary Diddendorf(?) and Kissinger. Kissinger used to tease me. He has been a very good friend.

Smith: Really?

Hartmann: You know, he gave my son’s hospital $1,000 in Bob’s name?

Smith: That’s nice.

Hartmann: The teasing came from a picture in the paper – I don’t know what it was – and underneath it, it said I was Mrs. Rumsfeld instead of Mrs. Hartmann. And Kissinger saw that and from then on he would say to me, “And how are you, Mrs. Rumsfeld?” He’d just lean over and say it, and I said to Bob, “What am I going to do to stop Henry from saying that?” Well, he said, “The next time he says that, you say, ‘And how are you Secretary Richardson?” Henry just howled. He said, “You know how to hurt a guy.”

Smith: Let me make a note of it to follow up on that.

Smith: The speechwriter’s life, particularly at the White House, has got to be consuming. Obviously, it’s not a nine-to-five job. Certainly not a 40 hour a week job. Any stories or anything come to mind? It must be pretty consuming to do that job, being on call, presumably, constantly.

Hartmann: I don’t remember. I just remember he would talk to me about what he was writing.

Smith: Were there kinds of speeches he liked to write better than others? There’s always Lincoln Day addresses, and there’s commencement addresses. Were there things that he enjoyed more than others about the job?

Hartmann: He just enjoyed writing.

Smith: He did?

Hartmann: Yes. Like that publisher says, “This reads like a novel.” He likes to write, he has a way with words. And he didn’t have to go over in his mind forty times how am I going to say this. He thought about and put down some words and then he put it together. He loved writing.

Smith: Do you have any remembrances of the Bicentennial year? There were all sorts of State Dinners and of course the campaign was going on at that point. Was there every any doubt about Ford running in ’76? Was there ever any question?

Hartmann: I don’t think so. Of course, I think Ronald Reagan is responsible for him losing the election. You don’t take on an incumbent president of your own party. But Nancy was going to be first lady or break a leg.

Smith: I assume Bob was involved in the writing of the acceptance speech at the convention?
Hartmann: Yes.

Smith: Do you know if a victory speech was written for election night if they won?

Hartmann: No, I don’t know. I bet you they were thinking of everything else besides what they’d write.

Smith: Was he busy in the campaign?

Hartmann: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Did he travel with the President?

Hartmann: Yes.

Smith: Abroad?

Hartmann: He went with him practically every place he went.

Smith: Did he enjoy that?

Hartmann: Yeah. I remember riding in the plane with them. They were going to Myrtle Beach – is that down in the Carolinas or something?

Smith: Yes.

Hartmann: This is a story that never got in the paper. We went down there and we stayed there and we were going on to – where would we be going? What’s the next big town?

Smith: Going south – down to Savannah? Or Charleston?

Hartmann: Well, I’m not sure, but I know we stopped at Myrtle Beach. And General Westmoreland, I think it was he and his wife, we had a setting of little cottages and the Fords had one and we had one, and they invited Westmoreland and his wife to dinner at their place. The next morning they came over and told Bob – Ford ate some fish and he got a little bone stuck on the uvula back there, you know, and fortunately they got it out. And that never was in the paper.

Smith: The President got the bone in his throat?
Hartmann: Yeah.

Smith: What did you like about President Ford?

Hartmann: Well, he was so real. You know, we had lots of close association. Bob got him to put in a swimming pool at his home and later Bob got the pool in the White House donated.

Smith: Did he?

Hartmann: We had a lot of things to talk about other than politics. We could visit and spend the evening. We’d be there at their house in Virginia to dinner, they’d be here. All this camaraderie was good, was nice, easy.

Smith: The kids – did you have much contact with the kids?

Hartmann: Yes. We met the kids, we saw them. When I saw Steve this last time, I said, “You have forgotten what you used to do.” He’d used to come up and kiss me on the back of the neck. I said, “You haven’t done that. I’ve missed that.” But, that Ford family – now nothing ever that I know of was ever said about the children? Was there anything?

Smith: No.

Hartmann: What a family! It was unbelievable that a man of this importance could have such a lovely wife and lovely children that knew how to behave. And she did a lot for the world with her openness about drinking, about having breast cancer. That shows what a family can do if a family works together. Susan said, “We’ve got to tell Mother we know what’s going on, and it has to stop.” And they all worked. And sometime after that we were at dinner at their place in Palm Springs, and we’d all had a drink and she asked Bob, “You want another drink?” And he said, “No, I guess not.” She says, “What’s the matter, you think you’ll end up in my place?” She had a great sense of humor.

Smith: The Betty Ford Center. So she had a sense of humor?

Hartmann: Oh, yes, she did. But she was great. She was kind of tardy sometimes. We were out in California before a speech, and they said to me, they knew I was close to her, “You’ve got to get Betty on time because she is going to receive an award.” And she was always kind of late. Everybody knew that. But who cares. But this time she was going to receive an award. She was in her dining room but she had lost an eyelash and she was looking for it on the floor. I said, “What are you looking for?” “Well, I lost an eyelash, do you see it anywhere down there?” And we looked and we didn’t find it, she said, “I’ll just take the other one off.” And I said, “Betty, you have to be there on time. I’m going to stay here and I’m going to walk you to there and you’re going to go.” And one of the other girls came flying out and said, “How do you like being her control person” or something. And I said, “I’m not. I’m her friend helping her.”

Smith: Being late was always a trademark wasn’t it?

Hartmann: Yes.

Smith: It’s funny, because the President was so punctual. The ’76 campaign – at the end – did you think you were going to win?

Hartmann: No. It just looked too bad.

Smith: How rough was that on the President? Because it took him a while to digest.

Hartmann: Yes, well, wouldn’t it? Of course, it would. But I don’t ever remember him ranting and raving or anything. He’s not that kind of a person. But I’m sure it was difficult. It had to be.

Smith: They enjoyed their new life out in California.

Hartmann: Yeah. Bob was a pallbearer at his funeral.

Smith: When was the last time you saw him?

Hartmann: Betty didn’t come to the dinner this summer, the four kids were there. The last time I saw him was the last dinner he came every June or July – end of June. He came every summer for this dinner and of course I was there at the last one.

Smith: Did he and Bob keep in touch?

Hartmann: Yes.
Smith: Talk by phone?

Hartmann: Oh, yes. They talked often.

Smith: Did Bob do any work for him after he left the White House?

Hartmann: No.

Smith: How do you think Ford should be remembered? Maybe I can make it more personal. How will you remember him?

Hartmann: As a very caring, responsible person, who did his best for his country, for his friends, for everybody. Just a God-given person to help us out. He was.

Smith: And Bob passed away – when?

Hartmann: A year ago this last April 11, three days after his 92nd birthday. I will give you a program of his service which took place at the Metropolitan United Methodist Church in Washington, DC. It has Bob’s picture on the cover.

Smith: Yes.

Hartmann: I thought I’d give you that.

Smith: Oh, thank you. But you say he was a honorary pallbearer at the Ford funeral?

Hartmann: Oh, yes, but because Bob was in a wheelchair he didn’t walk with the others when they arrived at the cathedral. We sat to the right of the speaker and then followed the pall bearers out. Our son, Rob, was invited and he helped his father. At Bob’s funeral, my son spoke and read letters from President Bush ’41 and ’43, and Kissinger and Cheney ______ it or not. But the most beautiful was a letter from Betty. Our grandchildren talked and our daughter did, and Bob Orben spoke.

Smith: We had a great talk with Bob. We interviewed Bob and he was singing Bob’s praises. He was a great admirer of your husband.

Hartmann: Yes, and he was always very, very loyal, and I’m sure that he probably kept other little things down level, because he knew they weren’t so and not important so don’t get disturbed about it. He’s a very nice man.
Smith: He is.

Hartmann: And Benton Becker is a doll.

Smith: Well, we’ll tell them we talked. Thank you so much. This was fun.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. Tell us what you were doing that led you to the Ford White House.

Hills: Well, I was commuting, for one thing, from Los Angeles. As you may know, I had accepted a job with Elliott Richardson as assistant secretary of defense. But I couldn’t get free of that in time, and so Elliott hired Charles Freeman as the assistant secretary of international security affairs, and then he quit. At which I was doing the job of chairman of the company and I couldn’t quite get free of it. I wanted the job very much. So Elliott went to the attorney general and he quickly found Carla. I like to claim he found her in my resume, but I think he probably found her all by himself. And she came back and we had a lovely evening with Elliott and Ann Richardson in their home in Crestlane. And Carla accepted the job. We got up the next morning and bought the house we bought before when I thought I was going to be assistant secretary of defense, and flew home and that was the day that Nixon fired Richardson.

So there was a hiatus where we kind of sulked, and a number of people convinced Carla to take the job, including the chief justice, who had been the assistant attorney general.

Smith: Chief Justice Berger?

Hills: Yes. Chief Justice Berger had been the assistant attorney general for civil, and he called her and said, “Miss Hills, no woman has had a job as important in Washington, and nobody is better qualified than you are. So take the job. Forget who the president is, forget the attorney general. It’s a job that’s made for you. You should do it.”

Smith: That’s interesting. That flies a little bit in the face of Berger’s public image.
Hills:  No, he was very good about this. He was interested. And then the White House, Peter Flanagan, in particular, offered me a couple of jobs. At one time would I be interested in becoming the chairman of the SEC. Ray Garrett had turned it down because of his wife’s illness, and I actually played some role in convincing him to take the job. I was also sounded out on becoming chair of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, and to run the Bicentennial, things that didn’t seem all that exciting. I even interviewed Henry Kissinger to be undersecretary of state for economic affairs. I doubt he’d of offered it to me anyway, but before he could decide, Nixon quit and all the people that he’d offered the job to before flocked in.

I then talked with Bill Seidman and others about jobs, and then John Dunlap asked me to be his undersecretary of labor. I’d taught with John, I thought I’d take that job because Carla was here anyway. And then, literally, the week that I was about to accept with John, Carla became secretary of HUD. And those two jobs don’t go together very well. The White House asked me to do this or that, including international economic affairs, and then Phil Areda quit. Got mad at the vice president and went back to Harvard. And so the job of counsel to the president opened.

The president, who I’d not met yet - Carla had not yet been sworn in as secretary of housing - the president and others sent the word that they’d like me to consider the job. And then, literally during Carla’s swearing in ceremony, I was thinking about it and the vice president came to me and said he knew me through his lawyer Oscar Reubhausen. Oscar and I had been on a board together, and he said that he knew that I was interested in political economics – that’s what I taught at Harvard – and if I would take this counsel job that he knew I had been offered, that the president and he wanted to emphasize the need for regulatory reform. And would I do that?

It was very exciting. I don’t know that I said anything, but in the ceremony after Carla’s swearing in, the band was playing, the kids were there, and the president and the vice president assumed I’d accepted. So that’s how I became counsel to the president.
Smith: Let me go back. You mention Phil Areda(?) left, I assume he got mad at Vice President Rockefeller?

Hills: Yes.

Smith: What was the gist of that?

Hills: I’m not exactly sure what job it was. But he had assumed he was going to get a job, probably as head of the domestic council. Nobody has ever said that to me directly, but I think that was it. And I had actually been helping Phil. Phil and I had played bridge together when I was a law clerk back here in 1955, and so I’d come into Phil’s office occasionally. He had a card table in his office for me, so I could tell him things about the business world. And so, I took Phil’s position and became counsel to the president. I was excited about the idea of political economics and the idea that the president was really willing to consider rolling back the heavy hand of government.

Smith: That’s interesting because I have said on a number of occasions, in my personal opinion, it’s a mistake to see the Ford presidency as a coda - as the last chapter of the Nixon presidency. That, in many ways, you can see Richard Nixon as the last New Deal president, someone who felt as a politician to his fingertips, the need to accommodate himself to that consensus. Whereas, Ford, in some ways, is more conservative than Nixon. And that the Ford presidency really represents a fresh start in a number of ways. It’s more about foreshadowing what would become conventional wisdom, than it is about tying up loose ends of the past. And deregulation is a classic case of that.

Hills: I think that’s fair, but he didn’t like the word deregulation. He really didn’t, and I didn’t, either. It was bad regulation. It was regulatory reform. He didn’t want to touch environmental matters. He didn’t want to touch things that dealt with that. When we talked about it, he didn’t think that we had a scientific basis before making major changes and environmental reform – at that time. But he was interested in the monopolization of business by the government. In other words, by the elimination of competition.
So I would not put him down as part of this deregulation issue. None of the things he did, did any more than stop the fixing of prices. Trucks, planes, and trains. That’s where he had great success. He was interested in communications. He supported the case against AT&T, which was – he didn’t bring it – but he was supportive of the idea that we need not fix telephone rates. It’s hard to imagine – he made this speech in late 1974, and the speech basically was in Chicago saying that he wanted to pull back the heavy hand of government.

I think people, editorials, treated it as kind of a polemic. Just sort of another little political speech. But literally, when I got to the White House, and had early meetings with him, he echoed what the vice president said, and said, “I want to see what we can do.” And what he said is that, “I want to find the bipartisan limits, and I want you to test them.” He sent me over to see Senator Kennedy, Senator Cannon. He said he called the Senators. “I want you to talk to the Senator about what we could do in this era.”

Steve Bryer, fortunately, was Kennedy’s executive assistant, and as luck would have it, the year Carla and I were visiting professors at Harvard law school, Steve rented the attic of the house we were given to live in. So we had a wonderful friendship. Steve was interested in airline deregulation. Howard Cannon was interested in trucking and train deregulation. With the president’s complete support we literally formed a group of twenty Congressmen and Senators. Imagine this – both parties – a formal group, with whom the president met in the Cabinet Room to talk about his interest, the places he wanted to go. It was really dramatic. We came out and briefed the press afterwards with Senator Pastore for the Democrats, and I was asked what the president hoped to accomplish, and I said, “We hoped to begin a consensus, find a consensus, on reform of price fixing by the federal government.” And they asked Senator Pastore. He said, in words to the effect, “Oh, Mr. Hills is wrong. We have a consensus.” It was a very nice time.

Then we formed a group again, with the president’s approval, of people within the government. Paul O’Neill and John Snow were on my committee; Paul MacAvoy was my co-chair for the council of economic advisers; Tom Kauper from Justice Department; about twelve people. We met every Wednesday in the Roosevelt Room, to talk about what we were doing. And we organized a group from the Congress of staff people to do the same. And with their approval, the president gathered in the East Room a classic picture of, I think, fourteen regulatory agency heads, with all the press, and with me as just a moderator, and Paul MacAvoy there to be the expert, but the president didn’t need much of Paul. He talked to every one of the regulatory heads and talked to them about what he wanted them to consider. Not what he ordered them to do. It was really quite dramatic. He said to Richard Wiley, chair of the BCC, words to the effect, “Richard, I don’t think you get my drift.” Richard was talking about fewer pages, shorter times, what have you, and he said, “I’m asking the question: do phone rates have to be regulated?” And when the ICC came up he said, “I don’t understand why we have an Interstate Commerce Commission.” Pretty dramatic.

And, of course, we went from there. While Jimmy Carter, President Carter, gets due credit for passing the airline deregulation bill, it was the president’s initiative. The bill that the president, Howard Baker – I think it was Howard Baker – and Senator Kennedy, introduced that deregulated airlines. Planes and trucks got done during his term. When he announced his opposition to trucking regulations, there was a holy whazoo from the Teamsters Union, which was a Republican supporter in those days, and equally from the Trucking Association. The airlines, with the exception of United Airlines and Frontier Airlines, were deadly opposed to deregulation. The manufacturers were deadly opposed.

Smith: And on what grounds did they oppose?

Hills: Well, it had worked just fine for them.

Smith: The status quo.

Hills: The status quo worked fine, and he was going to destroy successful industries. The remarkable political will he had in doing that, his confidence that notwithstanding the public uproar, that the Congress would support him. And they did. It was an enormous time. It was an extraordinary time. It was unusual.

Smith: This just confirms our interview with Carla, I was telling her when we talked about Bill Coleman, it’s amazing to think today, in that relatively brief period of time, just in his field, everything from the 55 mph speed limit, to airbags, to the Metro in D.C., to finishing the Interstate Highway System…

Hills: Oh, well, but wait a minute. The only president who had the courage to put a tax on imported oil. Mileage standards for cars. Strategic oil reserve. Those were not small things. And the force that he did that with. Political advisors were saying, “Now hold up.”

I hope Don doesn’t mind me telling this story, but as I was leaving the White House to go to the SEC, we had the president’s order, announcement, on airline deregulation ready to go. I was leaving the next day or two, and Bill Coleman and Ed Levi and I came over to the White House for that little ceremony, and we understood that it had been taken off the calendar. I think that Don thought these things were really politically not good things to do. I said, “Well, I guess we’ll have to put off my swearing in ceremony.” Ed Levi objected. And so the president signed that and it went forward.

One session is worth talking about. That is, the president of the union, the Teamsters Union, Fitzsimmons, and the head of the American Truckers Association, who came from Grand Rapids, came in to see the president in the Cabinet Room. I think Bill Coleman was there, and as I recall, maybe a couple of others. Fitzsimmons could hardly speak, he was so mad. He was just furious. But the president’s friend, who liked to call him Jerry, was talking very nicely. He said, “You have to understand that this is a complicated world we’re in. We, who want to ship transcontinental, we don’t really necessarily want to take milk to the schools of Grand Rapids.” And the president looked up and said, I forget the fellow’s name, “Are you telling me that the country that walked across the continent in covered wagons can’t get milk to Grand Rapids unless we regulate it?” He was really something.

Smith: Do you often think in retrospect, gee I wish the public could have seen this?
Hills: Oh, yes. I wish they could have seen him talking in a session. Because of regulatory reform, because it was dealing with anti-trust concepts, Ed Levi and Bill Coleman and I spent a lot of time with the president. Now those are two people of enormous intellects, and boy, the president is right there with them. Anybody who thinks that man was slow is crazy. He understood it, and he understood the politics of it. By that I mean, he understood how when you did this, it would cause that.

You may recall we had White Houses around the country, and we had a White House in St. Louis – a day in St. Louis for the White House. He briefed the press there on the budget, as though he were in the press. He was asked why he had cut the job training bill money, something specific about, something out of left field. And he looked at it and he said, “No, you’ve misread the budget. Yes, we took this money out of this program, because this program was sending people to Mickey Mouse schools that did nothing but take money and give nothing. We put more money into on-the-job training. I believe in training a person for a job that exists, not for a job that doesn’t exist.” Jim Lynn was sitting there and he said, “I didn’t know the president could do that.” So he was a president that this country – this country didn’t know what they had.

Smith: Broder said, I think it was after the election, he said, “People are just sort of realizing that Gerald Ford, in fact, is the president that they always said they wanted, but didn’t perhaps appreciate at the time.”

Hills: They didn’t see it. Carla and I were at a party in Sun Valley. By accident, we were there, some people we knew were having a party – mostly Democratic friends. We got kidded a little bit about the fact we were the only Republicans present. Tip O’Neill was there and after a while, with that wonderful voice of his, he said, “My friends, I mean no disrespect for President Carter, but in your lifetime you’ll never have a president as good as Jerry Ford.” Just marvelous.

Smith: Don Penny tells the story. He was in the Oval Office and the president just had a meeting with Tip, very jovial and very constructive. Then, of course, Tip went out on the North Lawn, and proceeded to unload in front of the press. Don saw this and he rushed back in and he said, “You won’t believe what Tip O’Neill is saying.” And he proceeds to recount all of these horror stories. The president is smoking his pipe, and he says, “Oh, Don, that’s just politics.”

Hills: When we came back from this session with all the regulatory heads, and Paul and I went back with the president to the Oval Office, the president was quite pleased, as he should have been. This, by the way, was a huge story on the front page of the New York Times. It was well publicized, but the public didn’t catch it. The president was excited about it and Paul McElroy told the story. He said, “Mr. President, you’re right. We’ve accomplished a lot, but you’ve got to remember that a regulatory agency is like a turtle. It’s got a very thick hide. You can put a little lettuce in front of it, it will quicken its pace ever so imperceptibly, but only imperceptibly.”

Later, I got a message from the chairman of the CAB, John Robson, who was basically for deregulation. I’d given a flamboyant speech about what we were going to do, and he made up a poem about the deregulatory turtle and the last line was: And the son of a bitch can bite.

Smith: Did you see the president’s sense of humor?

Hills: Oh, yeah. He loved it. I told that joke which was really Paul McElroy’s joke, but the president just loved it. He liked to tell it. He liked to tell it so much that when I went to the SEC, with many other commission heads, we formed the Order of the Turtle. And we found a crystal ashtray in the shape of a turtle that only worked when it was on its back, of course. And we gave that turtle to whomever had done something with regulatory reform in a given period.

Smith: His decision making – clearly he was very comfortable with having high powered, in some cases, large ego’d, very brainy, very assertive, people engage in intellectual fisticuffs. And then he’d make the decision.

Hills: To a degree. As you know, he was irritated one day and several people changed jobs. I was gone by that time.
Smith: As you know, I’m working on this Rockefeller biography and part of that is trying to track down – the president always insisted that really it originated with him – this whole enterprise. There is something about Don Rumsfeld - people just insist that Rumsfeld had to be behind this. Something about Rumsfeld, I guess, that, even when he’s not responsible, there is a school of thought that says he must have been pulling wires behind the scenes. Because Rockefeller is gone, and he is over at the Pentagon, and Bush is, in effect, deep-sixed at the CIA. Anyway, people read into that political ambition.

Hills: Well, I can’t deal with motives, but I think it’s pretty clear that he was responsible for George Bush going to the CIA. The president had other people in mind. I think it’s fair for me to say that he was interested in having Edward Bennett Williams take the job. He actually sent me to talk to Ed. He asked me to read all the things that Ed had written and done and summarize it for him very quietly. And after a week or two of looking at Ed’s background, he said, “Go see if Ed would do it.” Ed was flattered and sent a note to the president to that effect, but said that he loved his firm too much, that he couldn’t do that.

One curious time – actually in my last days at the White House – the vice president had this plan for synthetic fuel, as you may recall.

Smith: The Energy Independence Corporation.

Hills: Right. I can’t tell you how much we all admired Nelson Rockefeller. Many of us met with him every Tuesday for lunch, and he would talk to us about what he cared about. Bill Donaldson was there at the time. Bill was counselor. Dick Parsons was there. Paul O’Neill usually came to those. Frank Zarb came to those. Dick Cheney usually came to those Tuesday lunches. But a number of us had some concern about the bill – that it was too large.

At one lunch – I had not been heard from on the bill – he asked my view on it. It wasn’t so much a legal matter as an economic matter, although I sat in on the Senior Staff meetings. And I expressed my view to him. I said I thought that it would smother the issue. He said, “Well, look, we’re going to have this session. You come to it. You express yourself.” Alan Greenspan had been pushing me to do it also. So we came and we had a discussion. Don got very upset by the fact that anybody was trying to reopen an issue that he felt was closed. Some harsh words were said. The president said, “Will you boys quit scrapping? You’re all going to California with me. Go get dressed and get packed. We’re leaving in about three hours.”

We spent a week on the airplane. Well, more than that; I spent about ten days. We dedicated a law school at Oklahoma, Pepperdine law school in Los Angeles, went up and dedicated a new Stanford law school building, and went down and spent a weekend playing golf with Dee Keaton and Leonard Firestone.

That was when the lady took a shot at the president after he gave the speech. That was anticlimactic. He gave the speech for Nelson’s program at the Building Trades annual convention in San Francisco, walked out of the building, the shot was taken. Nobody ever heard anything about the Nelson Rockefeller plan again. It was just wiped off the face of the earth.

Smith: Yeah. There is a story I told Carla that I heard from Bill Simon who may or may not have exaggerated. But as I understood it, there was a heated, probably more than one, pretty heated Cabinet discussion about the Energy Independence Corporation.

Hills: Oh, yes.

Smith: And at some point, Bill said to the president, words to the effect of, “Don’t let him do to the country what he did to New York.” And the president – it’s revealing – indicated that he was going to support this. Simon went up and renewed the argument because he felt very strongly about this. The president said, “Bill, you and I both know there is no way the Congress is ever going to buy into this, but I’m not going to embarrass Nelson.” Does that sound credible to you?

Hills: It could be. There is another part to it. You didn’t mention this, but one of his first acts when he came to the presidency was to reverse Nixon’s position on South Africa.

Smith: Tell us about that.
Hills: Well, it came before I got there. He simply went along with the sanctions.

Smith: Sanctions from Congress?

Hills: No, no. The world.

Smith: UN?

Hills: Well, there were all kinds of sanctions that countries had put on, and President Nixon had chosen not to do that. It was very early on that the president did. Another time that was even more dramatic to me – you may recall that there was a brief flurry when a number of Saudi banks had bond issues in the United States and excluded the Jewish houses – Goldman Sachs, Bear Stearns, Lehman Brothers, Solomon Brothers – and the president was just furious at this thing. He read it in the newspaper, or I suppose in the briefing. He called me in and said, “I called for Bill Simon. This will not happen again. This will not happen again.” He told Bill and myself, “See that it does never again.”

Bill and I spoke to each of the houses, White Weld Merrill Lynch, I think was one of the houses. I want to be careful here. A couple of other houses that had been in the syndicate that had excluded the Jewish houses. We basically, either in my office or Bill’s office, we alternated, we would say to these gentlemen, “The president of the United States has said that if it should happen again, he will do everything in his power to see that they are no longer in the business.” Bill said, “Can we do that?” I had no idea, of course.

We did the same thing with the embassies. I was instructed to go to each one of the embassies and meet with the ambassador and say to them the same thing – that the United States is not going to allow them access to our capital markets if that happens again. Just that strongly. He felt very strongly about it.

Smith: What kind of a response did you get?

Hills: It never happened again. Happened about three or four times in a small period of time. Never again. He had that force.

Smith: Now, you started as counsel – when?
Hills: I started in March of ’75. Of course, what I got was the headlines of being the CIA’s czar. Because the day before I’d accepted, there was a rumor that I was going to be the CIA’s czar. And I said, “Come on, be serious. I am interested in the counsel’s job.” And then later, of course, I had taken it the next day, and I said the CIA thing is one part of it. Nick Hurrier of the New York Times confirmed something to the effect that HUD’s Hills husband to be CIA czar. So that was a large part of our effort.

Smith: So you came on in time for the fall of Saigon?

Hills: I was there, yeah.

Smith: What was that all like?

Hills: Well, I was new. I knew I could eat in the dining room and I knew I could have all those perks of the White House, but I didn’t know much about it. Brent called me in the Situation Room and we sat there several days in a row, determining the fate of thousands of human beings. To me – Brent became a hero, if not that day, a few days later. It was terrific the way he handled it.

Smith: What was he doing?

Hills: Well, he was deciding how to get people out – save people, save human lives. Move resources – and he went to great lengths. The president was very concerned about this. It was enormous. And [he] brought them into the United States – brought them in by the tens of thousands.

Smith: And that’s a huge story because, of course, Congress wanted to pull the plug as soon as we were out. Sort of forget we had ever been there. And certainly forget any moral obligation we had. And as I understand it, the president felt very strongly, was angry about this, and put together this crazy quilt coalition. George Meany was involved and the American Jewish Congress and other groups. Were you involved in that effort?

Hills: Well, in the sense that I was a lawyer overseeing it. Overseeing is the wrong word. I mean, are we doing anything wrong here? Back and forth.
Smith: And the effort was basically to go to the American people and, in effect, shame Congress into reversing itself.

Hills: Right. It was the same thing he did when he pardoned the people that were in Canada. He pardoned Nixon and then he pardoned them. They said he healed the nation. He did it in so many ways, it wasn’t that he just sat there and was a nice guy. He did all kinds of things to make it a better place.

Smith: I’ve always thought that people make a mistake in overlooking the proximity of those two pardons. To me, they were always part of the same effort.

Hills: Oh, I think so. They both happened before I got there, but it was certainly in the DNA, if you will, of the place. This was the president, this was his doing.

Smith: On one level, the political foolhardiness of deciding, I’m going to go to Chicago and tell the VFW this - we’ve been told that it wasn’t in the original speech – that he had Hartmann draft a page and a half that wasn’t staffed out – that he inserted himself. It was very much his initiative. I mean, to walk into the lions’ den and tell them what they really didn’t want to hear.

Hills: You saw it almost every day. Carla may have told you the stories about her bouts with Jim Lynn. The president would listen and decide. I had a bout with Jim when I got to the SEC. I got there and found out we didn’t have any economists in the place. Not one economist in the entire SEC. And I said, “Come on, now. We’ve got to do something about this.” So I went around and kind of worked on my budget, and figured out a way to get it done and proposed that we create this position.

OMB opposed it. We cut back, cut back. I said, “Look, I’ve adjusted it in the budget.” They said, “If you can lower your budget, fine. You don’t need to do something else.” So I asked for a meeting with the president. I had sent over a memo the day of how I was paying for it. So he sat there and listened to the argument of whether or not lawyers could run the SEC or whether you needed an economist. Alan Greenspan was there to support me if I needed it. The president looked up. Looked at Jim and looked at me. He said, “Well, Jim, Rod’s trading three lawyers and two automatic typewriters. That’s not so bad, is it? At least we get rid of the lawyers.” And that was him. But there was no doubt about what he was going to do.

Another one. You’ll know the names better than I do, but late in my time Doug Bennett, I think was the head of the recruiting, personnel office. And he had promised the head of the Ways and Means Committee, Democratic head of the Ways and Means Committee, that his son could be on the Consumer Product Commission. They announced their intention to appoint him, and the uproar was so big that the president never nominated him. Of course, the chairman was upset. So Doug told him that the next opening would be his son’s, and he said, “Well, what’s that going to be?”

The only reason that Doug Bennett knew the next opening was going to be at the SEC is because I told him that Al Summers wanted to step down, and that would be opening pretty soon. And so he promised him that job. Well, when it was leaked, as he did, that this would be the appointment, all hell broke loose.
The Consumer Product Commission is one thing, but put this guy on the SEC, you’ve got to be kidding.

And so I trudged over to the White House. The president puffed on his pipe and listened to Doug Bennett and listened to the political people saying boom, boom, boom. He said nothing. I was agitated a little bit and said words to the effect that life is tough enough over there, that if I don’t think I have your support – I wasn’t quite that bad. He showed me the door and he said, “I don’t think the name has been formally nominated, has it?” It never came up. Six months went by and no nomination went. He was a good person.

Smith: Everything you say is consistent with what a number of people have said who talked about him as a calming force.

Hills: “Don’t get upset boys.”

Smith: But he had a temper. Did you see his temper?

Hills: Oh, yeah. He hated the squabbles between Jim Schlesinger and Bill Clements, the undersecretary. He just hated that. He’d send me over and say, “Can you keep those boys from scrapping?” He hated scrapping between the thing that ultimately caused those people to leave. I think he lost his temper a little bit at – who was the head of AT&T? – John – he was in a wheelchair at the time. He came in screaming at the president because of the AT&T case, saying terrible words. And the president got upset and looked at John and said, “John, I assume your health has something to do with your lack of civility, but this office is not used to that and will not tolerate it. Excuse me.” He was no patsy.

Smith: Again, if only the public could have seen him. There is such a dichotomy. I always thought that if there had been a second, a full Ford term, that there would be this sort of Trumanesque - not a cult - but a following. That Ford had many of those qualities – the plainspoken, Midwestern decency, decisiveness – that don’t lend themselves to television. But over the long haul…

Hills: He knew enough about government to know that in his view – let me say it differently. In his view, which I share, that the big job of the president is to make it work better. The issue of, “it isn’t working very well,” and, “how do you work it?” – I don’t know that he used the term, but I always, in thinking back, I want to say, “Well, the president wanted to fix the plumbing. He wanted to make it work.” And in almost every problem it was, “We can make it work better.”

Smith: Not abolish it.

Hills: No, no, not at all. Like the job training; move it from here to there. Make it work. And that was such a huge task – that you didn’t need pie in the sky stuff. He was prepared – he was open to anything, and he was able to understand it. He was able to understand whatever the subject was. He could understand it. Keep it in mind the people he was talking to everyday. They were Bill Coleman, Eliot Richardson, Ed Levi, John Dunlop, the dean of the Harvard faculty, David Matthews, president of the university. Those were no shrinking violets.

Smith: What led Dunlop to leave?
Hills: Oh, it was a sad thing. John didn’t want to be the secretary for very long. And one of the things he wanted to accomplish was to make a grand deal with the Teamsters Union, and in that grand deal – it’s been so long, I used to be a labor lawyer – I don’t think I can restate it, but basically, he had a grand idea for labor peace in the construction industry - and one important part was to allow common-situs picketing.

Smith: And explain that term.

Hills: Well, it was to allow the union to picket the whole site if there was a dispute with one union. So the Teamsters Union, which is a powerful force at any construction site, was critical to the Plumbers Union. You could always get by without a plumber for a day or two, or you can find a plumber or two. You can replace them. But this common-situs picketing, and it wasn’t just this…it was something that John had worked at for years.

You may remember that he co-chaired, or chaired, I guess, a group of businessmen and labor leaders. Enormous importance of the head of the union, AFL-CIO – George Meany and his deputy Lane Kirkland…at any rate, George Meany. This was part of it. And the chairman of General Electric, Walter Wriston from Citibank, about ten businessmen and ten labor leaders and they met with John regularly to deal with these major issues. Labor-management relations were – it was an interesting time. Then you had people like George Schultz, John Dunlop, of course, as secretary of labor, and John.

The president came to understand that if he endorsed the common-situs picketing, that would be it. Reagan would be nominated. There was no chance, whatever you thought about the Rockefeller issue, this was the headlines. And so he sadly told John, he said, “John, what good will I do to you if I’m not re-elected?” - because it won’t last beyond the week. But John felt he had to resign over that. It was too bad. He was a good man.

Smith: And then Bill Usery replaced him?

Hills: Bill Usery replaced him, right. And Bill was a good man. We’ve had a lot good people in as secretary of labor, but, none of the classic people recently.
Smith: Tell me about Ed Levi.

Hills: Oh, he was just a Rock of Gibraltar. He would suffer no mincing around about what the law was. I had one run in with him which was kind of fun. For example, I’m told that he would not stay as attorney general, and would not take the job in the first place unless he was comfortable that the counsel’s office was well staffed in the White House. He cared about that.

I’m sure he knew Phil Areeda, my predecessor, and I knew Ed pretty well. I’d been chairman of the American Bar Foundation research committee where Ed sat on it, so we knew him pretty well. But during the CIA investigation, you may recall the case, they had fed LSD to one of their fellow colleagues who jumped out the window and killed himself. I had the sad pleasure in telling the president about it when it came to my attention.

Smith: Was he shocked?

Hills: Outraged. Absolutely outraged. He said, “I want you to make sure that that family is taken care of. The family of this man.” And so I went back to get the records and found out that the Justice Department had settled the case sometime earlier – long before they knew that he had been intentionally given this drug. I went over to see – Carla’s successor at the civil division – Rex Lee. I said, “Rex, the president wants to know,” we always said that – the president wants to know, but the fact is, he did want to know, “The president wants to know what this tort will be treated like.” Rex said, “Well, we’ve settled the case. It’s done.” [I said,] “Let’s say it’s not settled.” We got into an argument. I said, “Look, Rex, tell me what the money is you would pay if it had not been settled, and it’s up to the president to get the bill passed to pay that amount. I want to know the best your people – what’s the amount of money that we would normally pay for this wrongful death.” Ed called me and said, “Rod, the memories of the Justice Department of having the White House beat up on them is still too fresh. Be calm, I’ll take care of it.” So that’s how we proceeded.

The President did another thing that was interesting. When I early got there, he said, “I think we ought to have a discussion of the Constitution. We’ve got Ed Levi over there, and we’ve got Scalia over there, we’ve got Bork over there. Rod, you probably want to put some more moderate mix into that and let’s have at it. And so Jerry Gunther at Stanford, who I’d known - he came to Stanford after I’d left, of course, but he and I overlapped as law clerks in the Court - I called Jerry, and Jerry came back and we had several sessions with the president. Several amongst ourselves. We talked about various things like the one-House veto, just kind of a discussion and the president enjoyed that. He cared about that. The Mayaguez incident, he cared about that. He worried about the War Powers Act.

Smith: But he wasn’t prepared to frontally challenge it? We talked to Jack Marsh earlier this week at some length about this.

Hills: Tony Lewis, Anthony Lewis, called me and said he wanted to talk about it. The president authorized me to talk to him. Lewis wrote a column which was very complimentary to the president, which said he understood the subtleties of saying that here was an act and both parties would be better off not challenging it. He was good about that. He liked to talk about things that – no law pushed to extreme is a good law. I can’t say those are his words, but that was certainly his philosophy.

Smith: Let me back up because you talked about this LSD incident. Was this the fallout from the Seymour Hersh articles that supposedly revealed some of the worst of the CIA abuses and touched off the subsequent investigations?

Hills: It began this way. As I got to the White House, the Rockefeller Commission investigation of the alleged abuses of the CIA was about to come out. It was in the works. The Church Committee had been appointed. My recollection is the Rockefeller thing began first, the Church Committee happened and…

Smith: The cynics, of course, saw the Rockefeller Commission as an attempt to forestall more damaging revelations on the Hill.

Hills: Well, they did. But on the other hand, they were very anxious to get it. Early in my time they sent over – the vice president’s staff – sent me the thing that they were going to produce in a couple or three days. I read it through the night until fairly early in the morning. I went in to see the president the next day and I said, “This is not a complete report. There are names in here about things that allegedly happened, and it’s just not correct that this report should be published. It’s not done.”

Smith: In what way? In terms of verifying the information?

Hills: Well, they said so and so is alleged to have been involved with this. And it was quite clear there were more investigations to be done to see whether it was correct or incorrect. There were just a lot of them. I gave the president some examples and he said, “You’re right. This can’t come out.” I went over to see Fritz Schwarz, Church’s chief counsel, or called him. He was at once furious when I said we were not going to release it at that time, and I was told that Church was upset. It was causing a furious public reaction we all sat there: what do we do about it? I don’t know who did this. Who was the – at Brookings now, the press guy?

Smith: Ron Nessen.

Hills: Ron Nessen. I think it was Ron I knew. I’d only been there for maybe two weeks, and he said, “Why don’t you send Rod out and have him answer their questions until they get tired?” So I went out and the first question was from somebody: Is this embargoed? I didn’t know what he was talking about. Tom Brokaw, an old friend, called me, he said, “Rod,” he said, “it means, when can we release it publicly?” Then Ron took over. Then we talked back and forth, back and forth, for a long time. And finally, Tom asked a question, he said, “Is this investigation of the CIA, is this a wild goose chase, or is this something that needs to be done?” And I said, as previously authorized to say, “There is substantial reason to believe this is an appropriate activity.” So they then had a half an hour of wait. Then the president came out. The front page of the paper was “The press had thrown out all the fast balls, had nothing left for the president.”

Smith: Now out of that effort came the executive order prohibiting assassination?

Hills: Later on. Phil did a good job working with them. We had a number of episodes with the Church Committee. But the president was steadfast in it and...
Smith: What was the relationship between the White House and the Senate Church Committee? Was it difficult?

Hills: I was the go-between. It actually worked out pretty well, mostly because John Tower, salty figure that he was, figured out that when things got really tough, if something was really bad, he would say something that would make Frank Church mad. Frank was a wonderful man, but it was easy to get him mad. And when he got him mad, Church would then have to recuse himself and John Tower, and the matter would be turned over to his number two, Walter Mondale, and Howard Baker. Whenever that happened, the three of us would retreat and discuss it.

The first one was classic, it was a matter involving important people being threatened. We had said that the president said we could tell the Senate that we would let any member of the Senate committee selected by John Tower and Senator Church look at whatever they were trying to get – just one person, no staff – and that person could decide whether or not to recommend a subpoena. But one person only.

Church wouldn’t do that. He said no, that can’t be. Everybody’s good. And so, when we had a fight we retreated to the Situation Room with this box. This tells you about a Washington that doesn’t exist. Walter Mondale said, “Rod, would you characterize again what’s in the box as you did yesterday?” I did, and Fritz looked over at Howard and said, “Howard, do you believe him?” Howard said, “Yeah, I believe him. Fritz, do you want to look at that box.” “I don’t want to look at that box. Howard, do you want to look at that box.”

We went back and told the chairman that we had solved the matter. As I say, that’s a Washington that doesn’t exist anymore. And that was a comity between them.

Smith: It’s doubly interesting because, of course, Fritz Mondale was being groomed as a candidate in ’76, and Frank Church, of course, was a candidate in ’76. So, factor in political aspirations and it makes it even more extraordinary.
Roderick Hills  March 18, 2009

Hills: But there was a time when, at least from my naïve view, the stalwarts of the Congress knew what things had to be resolved, and wouldn’t let those go away. I can’t say they fixed every one of them, but you didn’t get a whole lot of nonsense.

Smith: But you get a sense – and I realize you came in after this – that with the ’74 election and that whole group of so-called Watergate babies, came a more aggressive stance on the part of Congress.

Hills: I was a delegate from California to the ’76 convention when Reagan took over. As you may know, the people supporting Reagan way outnumbered the people supporting Nixon at that convention. And that’s when they changed the voting, you may recall, so that they enhanced the power of people in states that lost. So you really had – it was part of the move to the South.

Smith: I was referring to the mid-term ’74 elections which bring in a whole lot of so-called Watergate babies, and they come here loaded for bear with a more antagonistic, or at least suspicious, view of the executive based upon Vietnam, Watergate and the like. That must have had an impact on relations between the White House and the Hill.

Hills: Well, you’d have thought so, but let me tell/remind you of the story I told you about the twenty congress people and senators from both parties that sat down with the president of the United States and agreed upon a major strategy. That was enormous. And I’m sure you talked with Carla about the number of vetoes that were upheld. Extraordinary. With a veto-proof Congress.

Smith: It is interesting because I think that people did have short memories. He was the fiscal conservative, and some of those who laid claim to that title were much less willing than he to expend political capital on vetoes.

Hills: But the difference is, he was not blind to anything. He would not cut everything at any cost. He was always able to make an argument, “This is important.” He could sort that out. I don’t know that there has been a president since that had that capacity. I should say that differently, there hasn’t been a president since that had that capacity.
Smith: He was also a conservative who did not intrinsically see government as the enemy.

Hills: That’s exactly right.

Smith: He had a healthy skepticism about social engineering. But he was a constructive conservative.

Hills: I think conservative in the British concept. In a sense he was a liberal in the English sense, also. Not a libertarian so much, but just a – you take the stories about South Africa and the Jewish boycott. These things are of moral consequence to him.

Smith: There is that remarkable instance on the eve of the Texas primary – a critical primary. Henry Kissinger is supposed to be going to Africa to, in effect, enforce this new American policy. The trip could have been put off. It certainly wasn’t going to get Ford any votes in the Texas primary. And they went ahead with it and the commitment to black majority rule in southern Africa. Whatever the short-term consequences were.

Hills: The Helsinki Accord. He was laughed at for that. It’s chilling to hear people now. I spent some time in that part of the world, and how important people my age, at the time, thought the Helsinki Accord was to them. Especially in Poland.

Smith: Really? And that’s the great irony. It’s funny, when you go back, people remember the Polish gaffe in the debate. He’d just been to Poland – Poland, Romania, and Yugoslavia, but he’d been to three of the satellites, and he’d seen the outpouring. If he had just made reference to what I’ve seen with my own eyes…

Hills: Well, I just learned just recently that certainly during the time that President Ford was in office, Poles could travel freely. They had no trouble getting a visa. They could leave Poland. That was not true of any of the other Iron Curtain countries. They could get up and walk out. That fact alone would cause the president to see Poland differently.

Smith: When did you leave the counsel’s job to go to SEC?
Hills: In October – November, October, I think.

Smith: Of ’75?

Hills: Yeah. It was a short time – nine months.

Smith: And what were the pressing issues at SEC at that point?

Hills: Well, I thought it was to maintain the deregulation of fixed commission rates. On May 1, 1975 the SEC changed the longstanding policy of fixing commission rates. Now the great credit for that goes, of course, to the commissioners themselves. Ray Garrett, who was chair, but the president, and Alan Greenspan, felt very strongly about that. And so when Ray – as I think I told you, Ray was off of the job, turned it down because of his wife, we all persuaded him to take the job.

When I came to the job as counsel, one of my first meetings was with Ray to talk about unfixing commission rates. The press – it was not a secret meeting – I went to talk to the Senate, Pete Williams, and tell them I was going to see the chairman about this issue. And there was a lot of controversy about it. So I thought that was a big issue. I also thought, and Alan thought this, that derivative trading was a big issue. Options were not organized in those days to trade. They were much like the various types of derivatives now that are the sub-prime stuff that’s scattered. As you know, there is a major, constructive effort to organize trading them so that the derivative contract is spelled out just like an options contract is spelled out. But in those days there was no organized option trading.

The SEC had authorized, reluctantly, an experiment with twenty-five call options. But to be traded as an option, you had to have a positive net worth of a very large amount. You had to have made money for the prior three years, and you could only have call options. You only have an option of the price going up. I brought Fischer Black, Myron Schoels at Alan’s suggestion, and we were able to get organized trading started.

I say those were the issues that I thought were important, but we all also had all the foreign bribery cases on our watch. Ely Black jumped out of the Pan American building just about the time I got to the SEC because he’d been bribing people in Central America when he was running the United Fruit. Then American Airlines, and depending on how they count, several hundred American companies had been embarrassed to reveal questionable payments to foreign officials. That got the headlines just like the Church Committee got the headlines when we were doing regulatory reform work in the White House.

And so the things that we were doing which we thought were important, were kind of put aside. The president – you probably won’t recall this – but there was an element in the country that thought we were crazy, off our rocker. That this was no business of the SEC. If American business had to bribe somebody, so be it. That was good for business. Where did we find the charge to do that? So they appointed a commission of all kinds of Cabinet people with Elliott Richardson as chair, I was asked to testify before Elliott. Carla had taken people at HUD – I think that’s correct – out for a session at Camp David. Ford was great about that. He told them he would let us use the – he let me use the boat, the Sequoia for the regulatory heads, just to get them together. We had to pay for it, but it cost very little.

The commission report came out when I was with Carla at Camp David that was very critical of our anti-bribery work. It happened that I had laryngitis. I couldn’t talk. And so I worked very hard on a draft, a really critical letter that was fairly critical of my friend, Elliott. I felt bad about it. Elliott had not even considered the damn letter. He wrote back immediately and said the letter was ill considered and he was recommitting it to the commission. Somebody told the president about it and he called me to say, “Well done.”

Smith: You mentioned the word derivatives and I know the deregulation of financial services was part of this package.

Hills: The only deregulation that occurred was: just let them compete for commission rates. Once you did that, then, as Alan Greenspan said, - I didn’t understand this, as Alan would say – “If you make Wall Street compete on commission rates, they will be competing with the banks. And the banks will have to compete and you’ll get rid of all those damn regulations. You won’t fix the interest every place.” So that was that deregulation.

Smith: Okay, so that deregulation is totally different from what has since become a pejorative in terms of…

Hills: No, not in that sense. Because, again, Alan, and I think the president, understood far better than I did, that once you did this, these separate silos of insurance, of commercial banks, of investment banks, of savings and loan banks, of credit unions – seven or eight different groups of money gathered and didn’t compete with each other. And there was no question that as you made them compete, they would come together.

And so my recollection is that we all knew back in those days that you had to have a new push for regulation. You had to decide which kind of regulatory function you wanted. Somebody had to be responsible for the safety of an institution. That’s called systematic risk. Somebody had to be responsible for the behavior of institutions. SEC was good at behavior. But unlike poor Chris Cox [who] is getting blamed for something that is not his fault. The SEC has no business telling somebody they shouldn’t do something. You don’t want government saying you can make that loan, you can’t make that loan. But something like the fed, or some organization set up that way, to look at systematic risk. But in that sense it’s different, but certainly it was recognized forty years ago that as they came together, you’d need to have a different form of regulation. Different form, not necessarily more draconian.

Smith: The criticism has been voiced that the White House was slow to realize the threat that Reagan posed. Either that he was serious about running, and/or that if he ran he could be a formidable opponent; and that certainly the re-elect campaign was slow in getting off the ground, and that reflected a disinclination to take the Reagan challenge as seriously as it merited.

Hills: Of course the challenge became more serious after I left, but because of friendships I heard of it. After all, losing John Dunlop was not a small problem. Losing Nelson Rockefeller was not a small problem. So certainly the president was aware of the challenger.
Smith: Did the vice president – who was a proud man, and I know privately how he reacted – but I’m interesting in knowing, was there a change in his demeanor at all?

Hills: Well, keep in mind, I had left the White House and I saw the vice president only socially after that. Every time I saw him he was that same fellow. The first time you met him, you were his best friend. “Hey, fella.” I came into that room, we were there in, whatever, the Green Room or the Red Room, with the Marine Band playing, and we were waiting to go in and have Carla sworn in, several hundred people out there. It was a very exciting time for us. He walked into the room and came over, put his hand on my shoulder and says, “Fella, gosh it’s good to meet you. And Oscar tells me about you…” By God, this guy is really something! He was something. He was a man that surely should have been president. Would he have been a good president? Who knows?

Smith: Yeah. But it is interesting that he was such a champion of regulatory reform himself.

Hills: Yeah, I think so. He went out of his way to support the young people there when we were all young. Bill Donaldson and I had known each other before he’d come to the…and Dick Parsons. They’re good people. Jim – they were all good people. He inspired a lot of loyalty. He inspired thinking. I think that if we’d had another week on the Energy Independence Act, we could have sized it down. But it was gone. And you’re probably right. I think this was something that the vice president cared about. It was obviously a topic of interest. It still is.

Smith: Do you remember where you were election night in ’76? And did you go to Kansas City, did you go to the convention?

Hills: Yeah. We did and Carla went up and down the stairs talking about the vice presidential thing. So, I was there.

Smith: Talk about the vice presidential thing.

Hills: Oh, I can’t. The rumors are too huge.
Smith: Well, I mean, was her name in? Obviously, there was talk at the time of the Supreme Court vacancy.

Hills: There had been a lot, a whole lot of California business people, all close to the president, had signed a petition saying to make her the vice president. But there wasn’t any talk that evening about it.

Smith: But from what she said, it was very clear that at that point, the split between the two camps was very wide and very personal.

Hills: The two camps being?

Smith: The Reagan and Ford camps. That it was not a happy convention in the sense that…

Hills: I have a view, I guess. It’s a modest one, but I believed that evening, and I believe today that, handled right, correctly, that Reagan would have accepted the vice presidency. I believe that. And I had a discussion with William French Smith, Bill Smith was a dear friend from California – I had run several statewide campaigns in California for moderate Republicans. I was Tom Kuchel’s last campaign chairman. The last one because we lost in the primary. But the whole state Republican Party gathered behind a fellow by the name of Hugh Flournoy - professor of political science, and the state controller - to run for governor, interesting enough. I think Hugh clearly would have won but for the fact that the president visited Richard Nixon in San Clemente a few weeks before the election.

Smith: It was actually a few days.

Hills: He was ahead in the polls before that and never caught up again. But Bill Smith came back to me a couple of times when I was at the counsel’s office and complained about the fact that the Ford campaign had chosen one of Reagan’s people to be their campaign chairman in California, the fellow that became president of Pepperdine. Banowsky, Bill Banowsky, and what Bill had said to me is, “Why did he do that? It’s like sticking a finger in his eye?” This young man was a Reagan person. Why couldn’t he have come to all of us? We would have all come together. He said, “I can’t know that.” I would have. The Firestones, the Keatons, the Packards, they would have all come together and supported the sitting president. I was also at Detroit four years later.

Smith: Yes.

Hills: It happened that I was at a board meeting. The company that I was on the board, and it was during the convention, and so the president invited me to come up and sit with them that evening. Henry Kissinger went back and forth trying to make the president a vice president. And it was interesting.

Smith: What are your recollections of that? Was he seriously engaged in that?

Hills: Well, people like Bill Seidman and Henry would have the pulse better than I did. My view was the president thought it couldn’t possibly happen. It was probably like many of us; we want something, we would be willing to do something, [but] we know it doesn’t make any sense. We went out on a cruise for a couple hours and came back and in the meantime it had evaporated. But it was interesting to see him.

Smith: And one also wonders - by that point Mrs. Ford’s wishes would have been taken into account pretty seriously. You can’t imagine that she would have wanted to return to Washington.

Hills: I suspect that’s right. After we all left it happened that the president came on the board of a company with me, Santa Fe International Drilling Company. Santa Fe was not a huge company, but the president was interested in it. We brought Brent Scowcroft on, also. A couple of years later the company was sold to Kuwait Oil. Emiral Kuwait asked the three of us if we would stay on the board because we did have some engineering capacity that was of some strategic concern to our government. And we said we would stay for several years.

But, just to tell you something about Gerald Ford, we had the first board meeting at the home of the president of Santa Fe. The Kuwait oil minister, came out and talked to us and said that since we were no longer a public company, he thought there was no reason to have twelve meetings a year and four meetings would be sufficient. Of course, that’s fine, we’re not a public company.

And he said that I understand our fees are $25,000 a year. Well, he said, “We think that is not sufficient. We’d like to make the fees $100,000 a year.” The president grinned and said, “Before anybody else says something, Ali, let me say that if we’re going to cut the meetings from twelve to four, it’s hardly the time to raise our income. Probably we should reduce it, but I understand you want us to come to Kuwait City for one of our meetings and it takes a little more time, so if my colleagues don’t object (looking at me as his former counsel – I was chairman of the audit committee), we will accept $25,000.” But that was another little vignette of Gerald Ford.

Smith: You know, he took some heat as an ex-president for supposedly commercializing the office and going on boards and doing some of these things.

Hills: He went on a few boards, but only on boards he knew the people who were friends.

Smith: By all accounts, he took those very seriously.

Hills: Absolutely.

Smith: Did his homework, was an active participant.

Hills: He did nothing like they do now. Speeches at $50,000, $100,000. He was a very interesting man. Of course, those Beaver Creek sessions every year.

Hills: Yeah. AEI. Year after year Schmidt from Germany, Giscard d'Estaing, and Callaghan from England.

Smith: Explain – two men politically more polar or opposites than Callaghan and Ford, and yet, by all accounts, they were very close.

Hills: Those four people liked each other. Those four people – the G-7 or whatever you call it – they started it. They worked together, they cared about each other. Giscard, that wonderful ego – he came year after year. He loved to be there. They respected him. Henry came every year. Dick Cheney came every year. In fact, Don was the only one that never came. I always missed him. I don’t know why.

Smith: It is remarkable that the Ford people have continued, year after year to…

Hills: Even now. Carla spent three hours on the telephone yesterday with a Ford Executive Committee. I’ve got an audit committee meeting of the Ford Foundation day after tomorrow, Monday. It is interesting also because all the people on his board, of his foundation, are people he worked with in government. Not all, but are friends. Well, you’ve seen them, you were there. And that’s not true of any other presidential library. We’re not the richest one at all, but we do a decent job – thanks to you, in many respects.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him? Carla thought it was at that next to the last meeting of the group – the one that was held out west, where I think Mrs. Ford received the medal.

Hills: I think that’s probably right. We haven’t seen him since.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction when he died – here was someone who had been out of the public eye for quite a while. I was wearing two hats that week. I was with ABC the first part of the week, and then with the family the second part, and I can tell you, in the media, people were surprised. And it seemed to build as the week went by. A lot of people were being introduced to this guy for the first time. And they are comparing him with current politics and he looks awfully good. The number of young people that you saw out who couldn’t have been alive when Ford was in the White House. It was very touching.

Hills: I thought he was a good president. The most touching moment I recall was in the Old Senate Office Building when he was invited to speak as a former President of the Senate. He was introduced by Senator Kennedy, who was proud of the fact that the Kennedy institution had given him the Profiles in Courage award. And he sat there – were you there that night? – He said with such feeling how much he wanted to apologize for criticizing the president for his pardoning of Richard Nixon.

Smith: Ford said after that, he said, “For twenty years, everywhere I go, people have asked me the same question. They don’t ask anymore.” It was as if, with the imprimatur of the Kennedy Library, the issue went away.

Hills: I’ll tell you two cute stories. You may recall that there was an effort by some Republican governors to have Ford run again against Reagan. And he called a number of people – we had one conference call – he said, “Well, I’ve commissioned Teeter to do a poll.” He said, “I’m doing it only because of my friends, the governors. This makes no sense, but I’m doing it.” And a week or so later he called back – I forget whether anybody else was on the call or not – I think a couple of us were – and he said, “The poll came back with predictable results. People do not want me to run for president. In part, it’s because I pardoned Richard Nixon. In part, because they’re afraid I might pardon Jimmy Carter.”

Smith: That’s a great story.

Hills: Sometime, if you’ll remind me, I’ll tell you a story after this.

Smith: For people to whom he’s a name in a textbook, how do you think Gerald Ford ought to be remembered? What would you tell someone who knew nothing about him, particularly a young person today?

Hills: Gerald Ford was a statesman who understood the significance of his office. Who had, unlike – I can’t think of any easy comparisons – unlike almost anybody, he was qualified and prepared to do that job. And did it very well. And of course, he was the only second(?) president who didn’t want to be president. Which tells you maybe what the qualifications ought to be.

A statesman who understood the job and was prepared to do it.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this. Now, let’s see, you were mayor of Vail twice?

Slifer: Twice.

Smith: So, I guess that put you in the pecking order locally above the mere former President.

Slifer: Well, I have a letter from President Ford that I framed and it’s very brief, but it said that he enjoyed meeting people in high places. It’s addressed to me as the mayor.

Smith: That could have a double meaning.

Slifer: Here, yeah.

Smith: Exactly. How did Vail come to be?

Slifer: Well, Vail opened for skiing in December of 1962. A fellow by the name of Pete Seibert, along with another fellow named Earl Eaton, were really the two that founded it. Earl, being a local growing up near here, knew this part of the world and Pete was a New Englander who always dreamed of building a ski area. He had gone to school in Switzerland and Lusanne and when Earl said, “I think I found the place for you,” he came and looked. And, sure enough, it was what he was looking for.

What set it apart was not only that the front side of the mountain is north facing and retains its snow and its perfect slope for skiing, but the real difference was the back side of the mountain which were two large bowls, really now three large bowls. Wide open, no trees. A lot of sunshine, a lot of good snow. And, he said, “This is the place.” So, he went out and raised some money initially to buy the core area from a farmer or rancher. I think then he did a second round of a $1.2 (million) and, with that small amount of money, they were able to really open the ski area with a gondola and a chair four, which goes to the top of the mountain, and then the chair five, which is the services backside. In one year, they were able to open a good share of the mountain on what today would be a tiny amount of money.

Smith: Could Vail happen today?

Slifer: You know, I don’t think so. It would be very difficult. I was fortunate enough to be here when all this went on. Pete and myself and a couple of others went to the county and they didn’t even have a planning commission. So, the attorney that we dragged along helped them form the process so that they could approve what Vail is today. You know, today, a $1.2 would probably be the water study or the environmental study or something and the process would take forever. So it’d be very difficult with the environmental concerns and so on.

Smith: Now, the Fords started coming here fairly early, didn’t they?

Slifer: They did.

Smith: He was still in Congress?

Slifer: When I first met him, he was still in Congress. They really came here because of a guy named Ted Kendall. Ted Kendall was from Grand Rapids and he built the Christiania Lodge. He was the first mayor of Vail and his father was Jerry Ford’s scout master. So they were close family friends. Ted brought him here when he was a congressman. He had been in public life his whole life, so he really didn’t have much money because he hadn’t been entrepreneurial. They bought an apartment in the lodge at Vail shortly after they came, maybe a year or two later. That’s a great story. He borrowed the down payment from his children’s life insurance policies and that was what his source was, which he never told them, by the way, until much later.

Smith: Well, they liked skiing too.

Slifer: They love it.
Smith: That is a wonderful story. Obviously he didn’t stay there forever, just as he didn’t stay in Congress forever. By the time he’s vice president and even president, it has been suggested to us that the Fords were a major factor in putting this place on the map, particularly as a summer destination.

Slifer: Yes. You know, up until then it’d really been a winter ski resort. First of all, a man named Dick Bass gave him his house, which was a better location and was a single family residence which was much more secure. And that’s where the, if you want to call it, summer White House was. That really brought a lot of focus on Vail. And he was an avid golfer, so you could see pictures of him playing golf and being in Vail in the summertime, and that was a great boost to Vail.

Smith: When he was here as president, what was it like?

Slifer: Well, there was always press, there was always Secret Service. We were bopping along fairly successful, very successful as a ski area, but no notoriety about summer. So, with him being here in the summer and all these people coming in, the news media, we just got terrific coverage of how pretty it was here and all the things you could do. And he was very active. I mean, he wasn’t sedentary, he was playing golf and, I think he was playing tennis in those days, too. So it really brought a lot of focus to Vail.

Smith: And clearly they were very involved in a number of activities in the community.

Slifer: Yes. He was on the board of the Vail Valley Foundation, which is an entity which not only brought in ski racing on an international level, but he was very important in bringing in foreign countries and letting us use him as sort of our spokesperson. Also, he started the conference in the summer.

Slifer: The World Forum, which was bringing world leaders to Vail. And his position as president and even as a former president, he was able to bring the leaders of all the free countries to Vail and Beaver Creek and they would be here for a week or ten days and hold very meaningful meetings which, I think, played a role in international politics. So that was a huge benefit to the community. You know, on a local note, he and a very close friend of his from California, Leonard Firestone, were very instrumental in raising the money to build the interfaith chapel at Beaver Creek. So he touched many parts of the community.

Smith: What about Mrs. Ford?

Slifer: Well, she was also very available. She participated whenever she was asked to speak or to meet with people. And we have the Gerald R. Ford Amphitheater, which is named after him, which is a great asset. But to recognize her - next to that is the Betty Ford Alpine Gardens, which is a very popular place where people can go and see all the flowers and flora and fauna of mountain regions.

Smith: We were out there the other day and it’s a beautiful spot and the amphitheater is gorgeous.

Slifer: So, she was very active and just a wonderful woman.

Smith: And I take it they were very visible?

Slifer: They were very visible. We’re in ___ Gramshammer ____ one of their favorite places to eat lunch or dinner was right here. They would eat out on the porch and people would stop by and want to have photographs and they were very accommodating. He always had time for anyone. So, yes, they were very, very visible.

Smith: We’ve also been told that one of the things they found appealing about this place was at least the natives tended to leave them alone.

Slifer: Everyone did. Really gave them space. And they appreciated it and its one of the reasons, I think, that they stayed and this became a very big part of their life was they didn’t have people bothering them all the time. People were very good about that, even the visitors, not just the locals.

Smith: And he would maybe not preside over, because I imagine you, as mayor, would do that, but I guess every year there was a Christmas tree lighting?
Slifer: Yes, we always invited him and he was very accommodating. And it was really fun to get great crowds. Very often we’d have a celebrity of some sort that we’d ask or I would ask in my role as mayor for a couple or three years. At one time, he had Jack Nicklaus with him. Mayor Bloomberg has an apartment here, though we haven’t seen him lately since he’s been busy, but he helped at least one year, maybe two, lighting our Christmas tree.

Smith: And then there’s the Fourth of July parade?

Slifer: The Fourth of July parade, and where we are, again, the parade came right by the hotel and the Gramshammers would have President Ford up on their balcony. He was the Grand Marshall or whatever title you want to give him and everyone went by and the band stopped and played. The Fourth of July was maybe the best day in Vail all year.

Smith: The place has obviously grown and evolved. For the better? Do you worry at all about too much of a good thing?

Slifer: Well, I think it’s much for the better. You know, when Vail started, there was nothing. We now have great medical facilities, a great hospital. We even have a really wonderful cancer center just down the valley. We have a library, we have culture, and we have so much more to offer rather than in the early days just skiing. And the one good thing about Vail is we’re located in a valley and the hillsides surrounding us are national forests, so they can never be developed. The skiing and so on is on national forests and is permitted and controlled and so on, but we’re like an island. This is all you’re going to see. Everything is really now built out. Any new development is maybe tearing down a house that was built in 1962 and building a more modern, newer house. So, its growth is pretty limited. The growth down valley, particularly to the west where there’s more land and so on, there’s been substantial development.

Smith: Did that include Beaver Creek?

Slifer: Sure, Beaver Creek, but, again, we’re surrounded by national forests and if you drive west, what you see is about what’s going to be there. There’s not going to be much more.
Smith: I wonder if he ever thought about staying here in Vail. I mean, of course they built the place in Beaver Creek, but I wonder if there was discussion at all about it.

Slifer: Well, I don’t know the whole story, but I think that Vail Resorts at that time made a very favorable arrangement for them to build in Beaver Creek. It was a new community, a new resort, and his building a house there along with his friends Leonard Firestone and Dee Keaton that built next to him was just a jump start for people to say, Beaver Creek is a great place to be.

Smith: Sure. Who was Dee Keaton, because we keep hearing the name?

Slifer: Well, you know, I’m not sure I can tell you. He was a close friend of Firestone’s. They were at one time involved in a company called Charter Oil and I think were on the board and so on and had other business arrangements. And I think at that time President Ford was congressman and was involved with them in some business ventures. So when he built his house in Beaver Creek, they built on either side of him, he was surrounded by close friends.

Smith: They were very close to the Firestones weren’t they?

Slifer: Very close, very close. And to Dee Keaton, too, as well. Yeah.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Slifer: Once I saw a little bit of it. I’d said that I thought his selection of his vice presidential running mate was the reason he didn’t get elected.

Smith: Bob Dole?

Slifer: No.

Smith: Nelson Rockefeller? He picked Dole in ’76 to run with, but originally he’d picked Nelson Rockefeller to fill his vacancy as vice president.

Slifer: Wasn’t it Agnew?

Smith: No, that was Nixon.
Slifer: That was Nixon. You’re right. But anyway, I guess it was Dole that I thought dragged him down and he just kind of ripped my head off. He said, “Nobody votes for the vice president, they vote for the president.” And that was the end of the discussion.

Smith: You think maybe he was sensitive about the issue?

Slifer: No, I think he just felt strongly that, you know, you vote for the president of the United States. You don’t vote for the vice president of the United States. And that he hadn’t won the election and it wasn’t anybody else’s doing.

Smith: Did he talk politics?

Slifer: Yeah, I loved to talk politics with him and he loved to talk politics. He loved to talk about Michigan football and sports and some of these other things, but being a life long politician, he loved to talk. And, always, there was a subject or crisis or an issue and at dinner or something you could throw a bone out there and he would love to get into that discussion. And, of course, he had tremendous insight.

Smith: He worked very hard at staying abreast of events.

Slifer: Even after he was out of office, he was in constant contact with Carter and with subsequent leaders and I think they used him as a sounding board and advisor. I don’t think you saw anything of that, but he would say that, you know, “I talked to President Carter” and so on.

Smith: Were you surprised that they became such good friends?

Slifer: I was, but my wife was a Democrat in the Carter administration. So, he came to visit and we had the opportunity to have lunch or something with the Fords and with the Carters and went for a walk up a little trail in Beaver Creek. That was delightful. And he and the president, President Ford, became very good friends and I thought that was great.

Smith: I’ve often wondered if one of the things that brought them together was the fact that they’d both run against Ronald Reagan.
Slifer: Well, that could be. I’ve never thought of that. I just think that if you’re President of the United States, there aren’t too many of those and these two men were both really nice people and they recognized the qualities each had and became great friends.

Smith: Did he ever talk about Nixon and the pardon?

Slifer: No. No. I guess that’s what I blamed for him not getting elected was Nixon’s pardon when he disagreed. No, he never did.

Smith: Did you ever sense that there were some things that you sort of avoided?

Slifer: No, you could talk about anything with him. You know, there are certain subjects you couldn’t talk about. You might ask about a certain crisis or are we going to do something, be aggressive, and he would avoid, if he knew, which I assumed he did, he would just say he couldn’t comment on that.

Smith: I wondered if he ever talked about towards the end of his life, when he had all those people who were in his administration that were in the second Bush presidency. I think he had some discomfort with some of the policies being pursued, particularly the Iraq war. Did that ever come up?

Slifer: That never came up, but I think he was proud that the people he had selected were so qualified that they again were selected in very important roles.

Smith: Did he have a sense of humor?

Slifer: Yes, he did have a sense of humor. It was pretty dry. I think you’d see it mostly playing golf. He was an avid golfer and his real personality would come out.

Smith: How so?

Slifer: Well, you know, like all golfers, when he missed. He was very competitive. All-American football player. If he missed a shot, he’d be grumpy and very excited and happy when things went well.

Smith: Never wrapped a club around a tree?

Slifer: No, no, no, he did not.
Smith: He got one hole in one?

Slifer: One hole in one, it was here. I was not with him, but he was very proud of it.

Smith: What course was that at?

Slifer: I can’t remember. I think it might’ve been here at Vail, but I’m not positive.

Smith: Do you think he was sensitive at all about the public caricature, the almost cartoon image, that Chevy Chase did? I mean, here’s a guy who really is a naturally gifted athlete and who was portrayed as the opposite of that. Do you think it bothered him?

Slifer: I think it must’ve. He never mentioned it. I was always sort of angered by that caricature which, in my mind, came from when he stumbled getting off an airplane coming down the stairs. I mean, he was an athlete. He was not clumsy or anything. He had terrible knees from his football playing days and that gave him a lot of discomfort. He didn’t complain about it, but he did have trouble at times going up and down stairs. Very difficult.

Smith: My hunch is that it may have bothered Mrs. Ford more than it bothered him.

Slifer: Yeah, I think not many things bothered President Ford. He got along just fine.

Smith: They had a good life. And this was a large part of it. I mean, poor Lyndon Johnson who died a day before the Vietnam peace agreement was announced. President Ford lived long enough to see most people come around to his way of thinking on the pardon and to honor him for what they had criticized him for.

Slifer: Yes, and I think after he was out of office, people realized he had been very good. He was a very stable influence at a very critical time. And it was a tough time.

Smith: He was a real fiscal conservative.

Slifer: Yes. Very. I liked that.
Smith: I mean, he really was the last President to use the veto exclusively to contain Congress’ spending habits.

Slifer: Sure, that hasn’t happened since. You’re right.

Smith: The last couple of years must’ve been kind of rough. I mean, his health was great until he was about 90, but clearly they both insisted on coming up here, including that last summer when the doctors and everyone else said he really shouldn’t be doing it. Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Slifer: I think the last time we saw him, we had dinner at our house and he and Betty came to dinner. I believe that was the last time. I can’t tell you how many months that was, but that was the last time.

Smith: Was that the last year that they came up?

Slifer: Yes.

Smith: And how were they?

Slifer: Well, you know, he was a big man and very strong, but he was starting to get more frail, as you would at that age. And Betty has always been a small woman and she’s a very strong woman, but was frail. I mean, she is not a big woman. But she was still there and still very active.

Smith: The altitude, I take it, was an issue.

Slifer: That was an issue for her, yes. That bothered her a lot. They told her not to come and she came, but, yes, that was an issue.

Smith: They both had a certain stubbornness. One might call it resolve.

Slifer: Yes, if he wanted to do something, he did it. Or a belief that, if you disagreed with him, he would be very strong about his opinions. And she was as well, but in a much gentler way.

Smith: Do you think she influenced him at all? It’s funny, because as most of us get older, we get more conservative. And yet on a number of issues, the Republican Party went further and further to the Right, particularly on social issues. By the end of his life, by Republican standards, he was sort of a liberal. And I wonder whether that was just him, whether she had an influence on it, or whether having gone through, for example, the intervention with her and bringing the compassion to bear that her situation and that of many other people called for, whether that same compassion applied to other issues as well.

Slifer: Well, I think you’re right. I think he became more compassionate and understood that there were two sides to every issue and he became more compromising and more willing to listen to the other side. And, you know, he didn’t have the presidency anymore, so he didn’t have to be the way you’d need to be as the President of the United States. So, he didn’t soften, but I think your word ‘compassionate’ is what he became.

Smith: Plus, I assume, having kids and grandchildren will bring a certain degree of youthfulness to anyone. It exposes you to a different viewpoint.

Slifer: Yeah, and they were a very close family. They just spent as much time together as they could and the kids all turned out to be great and loved the grandchildren.

Smith: When he passed away, what transpired here in Vail?

Slifer: They had a service here and that was normal. Several people, including ourselves, went to Washington and to California. It was very sad.

Smith: Were you surprised at the amount of public response?

Slifer: I was. And both sides of the aisle honored him and it was very emotional.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Slifer: Well, I would remember him as just a good man. He should not be remembered for that alone, because I think he saved this country a lot of anguish. When he pardoned Nixon, he put his political career at risk. And if we’d have had Nixon trials that would’ve drug on for a long time. He took the heat, made a decision, and that to me is the one issue that he should be remembered for above others.

Smith: That’s perfect. Thank you.

Smith: We often start off asking people to say something about Gerald Ford that might be surprising. And I gather when you first met him, you had something of a surprising encounter.

Porter: One thing that might surprise people about Gerald Ford is how skillful he was as an interviewer. He was vice president. I had been selected as a White House Fellow. The White House Fellows, after they are selected, interview across the government for their job assignment. Eight White House Fellows had interviewed with his office. There were fifteen in the class and eight ended up interviewing with his office, various people in his office. They narrowed it down to two and two of us ended up having one on one interviews with Vice President Ford. I was fortunate to be one of them.

It lasted about half an hour and he asked an interesting set of questions, although not a highly unusual set of questions - trying to probe a little more about my background. In particular, I had studied at Brigham Young and Oxford and at Harvard and he was very interested in the comparisons between the different institutions. One of his sons, Jack, was studying at Utah State University at the time, so he was quite familiar with the major universities in Utah. Obviously, he knew about Harvard and Oxford. So, he was quite interested in the comparisons and what I had learned.

About midway through the interview, he asked me if I had any questions of him. I thought that was quite striking for a vice president of the United States to invite a young twenty-something year old being interviewed and ask him questions. And I posed a set of questions to him that I was curious about, including how he thought about the composition of his staff and what kind of people sought for his staff. Did he want people who were loyal or people who had a lot of experience or people who were full of ideas and had a lot of energy. He gave a fascinating answer that revealed to me that he had given some thought to this before just simply shooting off the cuff. He recognized some of the strengths and limitations of individuals on his staff and believed that a combination of skills was really crucial and important. Without naming names, I later discovered when I saw these characteristics in person, his capacity to mesh his staff. He went way up in my estimation. My estimation of him before our interview had been based what I’d read. Nothing negative, but I did not have the impression that he was someone who is quite reflective and thoughtful, and, in a one on one interview, very articulate. His speaking style was not one that would compare favorably with a John Kennedy or Ronald Reagan or Barack Obama or Bill Clinton, but in a one on one interview, he was actually remarkably impressive.

Smith: Tell me about your time in the White House during the Nixon administration.

Porter: Well, I did not arrive to begin my White House fellowship - the fellowship year starts on September 1. You get your job assignment in the summer. And Vice President Ford asked if I would come early. By sheer coincidence, I arrived the morning of August the 9th. So, I was technically in the Nixon administration for about three and a half hours.

Smith: What was it like around the White House on the morning of August 9th?

Porter: It was very somber. You could tell that something important was happening. It was not chaotic, although, I did manage to walk in without a White House pass and without being on any clearance list. I had been around for interviews before, so I was not a totally unfamiliar face. I just walked past the guards, waved, and I guess they assumed I had a pass. There was a fair amount of relief that this chapter had finally ended. I think a lot of people, since it unfolded very slowly, had had time to prepare for it, so it was not like the shock of an assassination.

Smith: You wonder if Gerald Ford had had time to prepare. Or whether there had been any sub-rosa effort at preparation.

Porter: If there was, there was not much, because he always struck me as an extraordinarily circumspect person. He was ambitious as most people are and certainly most elected officials are or they wouldn’t run for office. He was not grasping and I don’t think he ever expected to be in the executive branch, ever seriously considered running for president himself. His big ambition, as you are well aware, was to become Speaker of the House. As he saw that chance fading, he had made a commitment to his wife that he was not going to run for reelection. The vice presidency came as something of a surprise because Spiro Agnew’s resignation was a little unexpected. More than a little unexpected and Nixon, obviously, wanted to appoint John Connally and was thwarted in that.

So, Vice President Ford, I think, did not see this as a great opportunity. At his essence, he’s an extraordinarily loyal individual. I mean, when you think about it, he was as loyal to a president as I think any vice president has been with less reason to do so, because, by the time he become vice president, Watergate is well down the path and in the back of his mind, he would have been justified, well justified, in posing the question, ‘Has this person been telling me and others the truth?’ and, ‘If this movement toward impeachment takes hold, I may become president.’ But he wasn’t grasping for this.

I’m told there was a fair amount of tension between the Nixon White House staff and the Ford vice presidential staff because the Nixon White House staff wanted him to be even more publicly vocal with respect to his support for the president. I think he went as far as he felt he could. At no point did he signal that he was disloyal in any way. But, he had to have at least in the back of his mind the idea that it could happen. Most human beings have the capacity to throw themselves into their job and most of us do that when we’re under a lot of pressure because that’s one thing we can control. And that deflects us from spending too much time mulling and thinking about what might happen. So, he threw himself into the job. I talked to his scheduler. He was holding 11.7 meetings per day on average in comparison with Spiro Agnew who averaged less than two meetings a day. And he did a great deal of travel during his period of time as vice president. Lining up my interview with him was actually quite complicated once they narrowed it down to the two of us. Because I had to fly down and they said “Well, he’s travelling then” and “He’s travelling here and there.” So, he was throwing himself into the job of being vice president and I think that was good for the country, but I think it was also good for him to keep his mind off of what was going on.
Smith: We’ve been told by several people - and it’s relevant, for example, because of his later relationship with Rockefeller - that he really didn’t enjoy the job. He really didn’t enjoy being vice president. He was walking such a tightrope and there were those who thought he was out of town too much. I also wonder whether, in the back of his mind, he knew that although he might not be consciously worrying about how far he could go, there were people like Bob Hartmann on his staff who were worrying about it regularly.

Porter: They are not here to be able to give their accounts, but my understanding is that the one person in whom Gerald Ford did confide somewhat earlier was Phil Buchen who had been his law partner and was serving as his counsel and would later become his White House counsel. Gerald Ford recognized that there was a fair amount of tension within his vice presidential staff surrounding Bob Hartmann, who was a wonderful speechwriter, extraordinarily loyal to the Vice President, but who was one that I think Ford kept at a bit of a distance.

I never heard him once disparage Bob Hartmann and that was in the face of many other people making comments that were less than flattering. Ford was very loyal to Bob Hartmann. But I am told by someone who was in the meeting when they were discussing which of the White House Fellows to take of the two that had interviewed - Bob Hartmann was making the argument that they should not take me because I was from Harvard and, therefore, could not be trusted. And Vice President Ford said, “No, he’s from Utah and he can be trusted.” And the individual who reported this to me said that this was the first time he had seen Ford in a meeting - and he said, “By the way, that’s who I want” – run counter to the advice of Hartmann.

I am not surprised that the person that he confided in, at least a little, was Phil Buchen because they had this long-standing relationship, but even there, there was only a very limited discussion and my understanding is that it was Buchen who went to the Vice President and suggested to him that he ought to do some planning and there ought to be some preparation and thinking. And Vice President Ford was very reluctant to do that for the obvious reason that, once you start, the word that something is going on is very high. Vice President Ford was a very careful person who saw that the upside was very low and the downside was very high and he was not going to engage in it.

Smith: Again, it’s fascinating when you talk about this circumspection. A number of people have speculated what secrets he might’ve taken with him to the grave. I’m sure there are things that we don’t know about. When you talk about Phil Buchen, he became symbolic of “the Grand Rapids crowd.” A lot of pot shots were taken at these folks - that they weren’t quite ready for prime time. What was your sense of that?

Porter: Well, Gerald Ford, I think, was remarkably skillful in selecting people and figuring out how they could best serve. Bob Hartmann very much wanted to be his White House chief of staff. He’d been his chief of staff on the Hill. He’d been his chief of staff as vice president. It would seem like a very logical move and Hartmann could legitimately claim that he had been enormously loyal to Ford. And, he could make the argument that he could and would serve him well. Hartmann was crushed when Haig was kept on for six weeks and then when he decided to bring in Don Rumsfeld as - the first title he had was – Coordinator.

Smith: That’s right. He didn’t want a chief of staff, did he?

Porter: His initial instinct was not, although it was quickly apparent that Rumsfeld was in fact the equivalent to the chief of staff and in many respects did a very good job as White House chief of staff. I was impressed with how he handled what was a challenging situation at a relatively young age. He was in his forties at the time and did a terrific job.

Smith: He told us that his advice to the President was clean house early. Ford was resistant to that for a number of reasons. One, he didn’t want to tar all the Nixon people with Watergate, that was unfair. And, two, there was an element of continuity involved. I’m wondering how these disparate elements meshed.

Porter: If you look, he didn’t clean house, but he made some significant changes. Let’s look at what some of them are. He had a change in the chief of staff. Haig was gone after six weeks.
Smith: Did Haig really expect to stay on longer than that?

Porter: I do not think he expected to stay on longer than that. I only had three or four occasions to have much interaction with him over the first two or three weeks, but he was exhausted. He had basically been there day and night for the previous eighteen months and I think he recognized that he was exhausted, he needed a change, and that the President needed to have a change there. Gerald Ford admired Haig a great deal and he did not view Haig in the same way that he viewed some of the other Nixon people. At the same time he made that change and Rumsfeld brought in with him his deputy, Dick Cheney, who was also a new face and played an important, significant role. He changed his assistant for economic affairs. The economy was a huge issue. Nixon had had Ken Rush there and Rush went off to Paris to be Ambassador to France and Ford brought in Bill Seidman. That was another big change.

Smith: And a Grand Rapids guy.

Porter: And a Grand Rapids guy, but very capable. He turned out to be one of the best people who’s ever been in that position. He did make a change in the White House Counsel’s office giving the post to Phil Buchen. He made a change at OMB. Roy Ash was leaving. And Ford did not discourage him from leaving, and brought Jim Lynn in. Herb Stein was leaving as chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors and Alan Greenspan came in who Ford picked. Nixon had tapped Alan Greenspan, but Ford went to Bill Seidman and asked him what he thought and Bill actually had me do some checking as well and came back that Greenspan would be a great choice. So, if you look with respect to economic policy, Seidman, Lynn, and Greenspan. He kept Bill Simon at the Treasury, but other than that, it was a very clean sweep.

If you look in the White House, he changed the press secretary on day one and Ron Ziegler moved on to California to work with Nixon on his memoirs. And he brought in Jerald terHorst and then later Ron Nessen. But that was a change. He changed the Counsel’s office. Change in the Chief of Staff’s office, and his Economic Policy assessment. He kept Kissinger in place on the foreign policy side. And of course he brought into counselor positions Bob Hartmann and Jack Marsh. If you look at the people around him, he actually had in his White House circle a lot of fresh faces. When Rumsfeld says he urged him to make a lot of changes, I think one needs to remember – he did make a lot of changes. It was not like, ‘I urged him to make a lot of changes and he didn’t.’ President Ford did it quite subtly and very gracefully and not in one fell swoop.

Smith: Almost quietly.

Porter: And very quietly.

Smith: Rumsfeld wanted a public hanging, in a sense.

Porter: But that was never Gerald Ford’s style.

Smith: Yeah.

Porter: In part because he didn’t want Nixon people, many of whom - and I’m not going to name names - wanted to stay on and were encouraged to move on. But he didn’t want to do anything to damage them. But, above and beyond that, it just wasn’t his style. He did not have a vindictive, mean bone in his body. He was involved in the rough and tumble of politics. People sometimes say things they don’t really mean. But I never had the sense that he carried with him any grudges or animus or ill will toward people, even people who didn’t respond in kind to him.

Smith: I only heard him disparage two people and the worst epithet he could come up with was, “He’s a bad man.” That’s the worst he could say. One was Gordon Liddy and one was John Dean. Interesting choices. Clearly, for some reason, he and Jim Schlesinger did not get along. One senses it was chemistry. The reason I’m bringing it up is because of the whole question of his intelligence, and how sensitive he may have been.

He’d been on the Defense Appropriations Committee. He knew as much if not more about the operations of the military than Jim Schlesinger. People would say, “Oh, he’s like that with everyone.” But there was a kind of condescension that Ford sensed. And, for some reason, it rubbed him sufficiently the wrong way to do what he did.
Porter: He did not change Jim Schlesinger for over a year, so it wasn’t until October 31st of 1975. Ford came in August 9th of 1974. I believe that he felt that he gave Schlesinger ample opportunity to develop a good relationship with him. I think he felt that he went as far as he could to develop a good relationship with Schlesinger. And, I’m not sure how well they knew one another before, but he kept him on much longer than several of the other Cabinet officers whom he replaced. In part, I think it was the chemistry between the two of them. In part, I think it’s because Schlesinger did not consult him on a number of issues that he thought, given his interest and expertise, he would be consulted on. And, not least, because of reports that he was getting from off the Hill from George Mahon and others who did not have as good a relationship with Schlesinger as they had with several of his predecessors. So, I think it was actually a whole combination of things.

Smith: One specific incident which I’ve never known about before – someone told us not long ago that the secretary had sent over someone on his staff, not particularly high up on his staff – to causally inform the White House that the Pentagon had no intention of being involved in the refugee resettlement efforts after Saigon fell. And it was made very clear that was not an acceptable position. Clearly, the President had taken such a moral stand there, seeing the desire on the part of Congress to pull the plug once we were out of there, was shameful. And, he’d put together this kind of crazy quilt coalition and shamed Congress into putting up funds. As you know, while president, he visited some of the resettlement camps. A lot of people would’ve run away from that issue.

Porter: I’ve never been in the military and I’ve never worked in the Defense Department, although, if I had not gotten the offer from the vice president’s office, the other place I had a firm offer was from the Defense Department. But, I’ve never been in the military. I have spent a fair amount of time during my years in the White House with three different presidents interacting with the Defense Department and I do know that many people in the Defense Department feel like they have a supreme, superbly trained organization, that they have earned the respect of the American people, and that one of the reasons they are as good at doing what they’re doing is because they have a very clear mission and they train people for that. They see it as a problem that the rest of the government, seeing this tremendous asset in hand is always wanting to deploy it. We were thinking about, at certain points, “Gee, these guys are terrific. Could we get them helping in the schools?” I had a conversation with Colin Powell who said, “Look, we have a job to do and that job is to defend the country and we can’t be adding all these other things.” The message that they were sending on here, I think, was not a Schlesinger-inspired, or idiosyncratic to him. It’s almost a gut response.

Smith: The means, though – it’s almost as if the message was less offensive than – Porter: If I was counseling them, I would have said, “Sending somebody over to the White House? Are you out of your mind? This is the silliest thing you could possibly do. Wait until you are asked. Don’t try preempting it. And then, when they ask, explain, ‘Well, if we were to do that, it would mean x and y. Do you really want to go ahead and do it?’ and think about it that way.” But sending somebody over and preemptively informing them that “We are not going to be doing this” just strikes me as really ham-handed. I don’t know if Schlesinger was involved, or knew about it at all, but it had the predictable response and reaction which was exactly the opposite of what they were hoping for.

Smith: Ford was genuinely shocked that Nixon lied to him. At the end of August he has his first press conference and he believes - this man who’s been in Washington for twenty-five years – that reporters are going to want to talk about Cypress and Greece and Turkey and inflation and everything except what they all want to talk about. And, he was angry with himself afterwards because he didn’t handle some of the questions very well. I think there would’ve been a pardon anyway, but I’ve often thought that was, in some ways, the triggering event. Was he naïve? Wanting to think the best of people is a hugely admirable trait. Is it something a president can afford?

Porter: I don’t have any firsthand knowledge that would enable me to shed much insight on this. It occurred thirty days into office, the pardon.

Smith: Were you surprised?
I was surprised and the people who I knew that were much closer to him than I was were surprised. What prompted it, I am not certain. I do believe that he felt two things quite keenly. One, that there had been a lot of discussion during the final year of the Nixon administration that the presidency had gotten too big and that the best sort of way you could paint a picture for Richard Nixon is that he delegated the reelection to somebody else because he was concentrating on the presidency and the presidency was a really big job. You have to worry about foreign affairs, you have to worry about domestic affairs and if you look at the kind of relationship that Ford was hoping to establish with Rockefeller and what he led Rockefeller to believe he wanted him to do as vice president, there’s a bit of that in there, that ‘I want to delegate.’ Ultimately he discovered you can’t delegate it. But, ‘I want to delegate a chunk of this because I want to concentrate on that.’ So, I think there’s part of it that is sort of, ‘Well, Nixon was really concentrating on governing and he had outsourced the campaign to others and didn’t really understand what was going on.’

There’s a part of that in Ford’s mind that cuts Nixon a little bit of a break. More importantly, I don’t think anyone who has not been president can fully appreciate all the strains and stresses of that office. One needs to remember that the country was in a very unhappy mood, not just because of Watergate and the lack of trust, but Vietnam was not going well. It was clear that we were going to need to get out of there, probably sooner rather than later. We had never really lost a war before. The economy was in real difficulty. We had had the energy embargo the year before. There was a huge number of things that were on his plate and I think in part, Ford looked at the situation and the fact that it was not that he was just getting lots of questions on this at the first press conference and that he didn’t handle those as well as he might have, but that a lot of his time was being consumed dealing with the issue on the papers and stuff like that. And, that he did not want to personally be distracted and he did not want the country to be distracted. I think he thought, ‘Well, once this is brought to a conclusion, people will move on to something else.’ I’m not sure he properly calculated, I think even he was surprised a bit at the sharp initial reaction. He had to expect some of that, but I don’t think he was fully prepared for all he got.

Smith: Mel Laird loves Ford, but he’s never quite forgiven him for not following Mel’s scheme, which was, ‘Give me time, Jerry. I’ll bring a bipartisan congressional delegation down to the White House and they will petition you to grant a pardon.’ Now, my question is: given the extraordinarily bitter climate at that point, is it realistic to believe that you could send a trial balloon up without it being shot down? Was there any way to ‘prepare’ the country? If you’re going to do a pardon, was there another way of doing it in that climate?

Porter: People who advocate sending up trial balloons need to remember that you are always going to be held accountable for what you do with the information you receive when you send the trial balloon up. Had he sent up the trial balloon and it received a highly negative response, to then go ahead and do a pardon, would look like ‘I really am indifferent to and contemptuous of public opinion.’ And I suspect that he thought in his own mind ‘There’s a fairly good chance that I may get’ – How many people are going to say ‘Oh, my gosh. What a great idea! Pardon him just as quickly as you can’? The likelihood of it is a very low probability. The likelihood that the sense of ‘Look, he deserves the same kind of justice that everybody else got. He needs to be willing to stand up and be tried for anything that he may have done’, that would probably be much greater. Then he would be in the position of saying, ‘Well, okay, I’ve consulted you and I realize where you are, but I’m going to make a different judgment. I’m going to go ahead and do this.’ So, I think he properly dismissed sending up a trial balloon initially. And the Mel Laird solution, which, maybe Mel Laird would be one of the few people on earth who could do that because he’s an enormously talented, capable man. He might have been able to do that, but he could not have done it quietly. So, that would have been like sending up a trial balloon and I think that’s why Ford deflected that.
Smith: There’s a theory that the pardon and the Vietnam clemency board, both of which occurred in the first month, are really part of the same overall plan of trying to heal the country.

Porter: Well, the clemency came before the pardon.

Smith: Right.

Porter: I’m not sure how much successive planning Ford was doing at that time. I didn’t hear anything about that just in terms of office conversation. The idea of a pardon was never there. I remember the whole notion was that we’ve got to get Vietnam behind us, it’s been dividing the country and that’s why we ought to go ahead and do this earned amnesty. He did it at the Veterans of Foreign Wars convention in Chicago. That was a very gutsy thing to do. I think he was still struggling at that time with what he was going to do on the Nixon pardon.

Smith: You’ve written about him and his energy policy. I don’t know how a crisis can remain a crisis for thirty-five years. It does sort of redefine the term. But it’s entered the lexicon. So, in a nutshell tell us what Ford wanted to do and it’s relevance to what hasn’t been done in the years since.

Porter: Gerald Ford became convinced that there were really two things that had to be done to deal with the energy problem or crisis that we had at the time. I prefer the term ‘problem’ rather than crisis. And one was on the supply side and one was on the demand side. On the supply side, he was for expanding drilling and drilling on some federal reserves that we had at Elk Hills in California, as well as he was in favor of drilling in Alaska and other places. ‘We have some proven, known oil reserves. We need to continue to explore, but we need to maximize and use what we have got.’

On the demand side, he was in favor of raising prices and getting the predictable consumer response. If you raise the price of something, you’ll consume less of it. I can remember him spending a good deal of time in our discussions about how a rebate scheme could work so that people who were on the lower end of the economic spectrum would not be damaged because they would be in less of a position to insulate themselves from higher prices.
For people with middle and upper incomes, they were going to have to make some adjustments. This looked like raising taxes and in a very real respect it was raising taxes because the federal government would be the conduit for this revenue increase. Ford was comfortable with that.

It’s interesting that thirty-five years later, a fairly large number of people have come to the same conclusion of how to deal with what is a much larger problem. At that point, we had about eight percent of the world’s oil reserves. And instead of importing at that time about forty-five to fifty percent of our oil; we’re now importing about sixty percent. If you look at the dimensions of the problem, it’s actually larger today than it was then. Many people have come to the notion that a two-pronged effort is needed.

Smith: On the economic front, inflation was identified as the train coming down the track and then almost overnight – I mean, you had this unique phenomenon, ‘stagflation’ - but clearly unemployment became the most pressing concern.

Porter: When he came in, inflation was very high and unemployment was rising from relatively modest levels and continued to do so, largely because of a huge swing in inventories. The way in which we measured inventories at that time, as Alan Greenspan would remind you, had masked a lot of what was going on in the economy in the last quarter of ’74 and the first quarter of ’75 when we had about a ten percent drop in GDP at that period of time. It was just a very sharp, severe downturn. He did feel, I suspect, as anyone would with the advice coming in, whipsawed between these two twin objectives. Everybody had memorized the Philips curve which basically says there’s an inverse relationship between inflation and unemployment. Now we had to throw out that thinking because it obviously didn’t apply in this situation.

He, I think, reluctantly came to recognize that he had to try to deal with two problems simultaneously. And that many of the things that would work for one would not work well for the other and, in fact, undermine it. So, he tried in the very conventional way that most people do to find a good balance. I think that he was as skillful as any president could be under those circumstances in finding the balance, because I think Gerald Ford was instinctively, intuitively a very balanced person. He did not cascade to one extreme or another. He had not done that in foreign policy. He had not done that in defense policy. He had not done that in economic policy. If you look at his whole career, with a couple of exceptions, maybe, with a couple of comments he made on Supreme Court justices, but for the most part his was a very balanced kind of approach. He was very good at seeing arguments on both sides, seeing the merits and arguments on both sides, weighing them in one way or another.

This is not to say that he couldn’t be decisive, as he was with respect to financial assistance to New York City. And he heard lots on both sides and he would come down firmly, but his whole approach was a very balanced one. I think that came out very strongly in this episode of how you’re going to deal with a faltering economy that was experiencing high inflation, which is what he inherited.

Smith: The whole Ford/Rockefeller relationship - in retrospect, you wonder if the President might not wish he could’ve taken back some of the things he said. I mean, Rockefeller was either led to believe or convinced himself that he would be a kind of domestic Kissinger; he would have a measure of, if not control, then certainly influence over domestic policy that paralleled Kissinger’s in the foreign field. And I wonder how much of that is Gerald Ford the congressman saying that. You can look at the trajectory of the whole Ford presidency as not necessarily unlearning congressional skills, but learning to be an executive, learning to be a president. And, maybe at the end of two years, he wouldn’t have had that conversation with Rockefeller.

Porter: I think there are a series of factors that influenced this. The first is that Gerald Ford had had a very unhappy time as vice president in terms of what he was given to do. And I think his response to that was ‘I’m going to give my vice president a different opportunity to do something meaningful in this job.’ Secondly, I think he thought that his strong suit was foreign policy and defense policy. He recognized that he was going to have to deal with economic policy, but there was this third realm, which, for want of a better term, we call domestic policy, which is sort of everything else that is not foreign and not economic. And here Rockefeller had interest, had expertise, had experience.

I think Ford viewed a lot of this as the relationship between the federal government and state governments and Rockefeller knew the other governors well. This would be, in his mind, a great portfolio and he was trying to get Rockefeller to get enthusiastic about the job and ‘This is my vision.’ What he quickly discovered was that these three are all intertwined. The notion that you can segment them is a fiction of people’s imagination. And, secondly, you can not have two people in charge. You can’t say ‘This part of the government someone’s going to run and this part of the government someone else is going to run.’ And, it quickly became apparent to him that that simply was not in the cards and I think it became apparent to Rockefeller as well. As a result, the way it turned out was a disappointment to Rockefeller because, I think he had hoped – although, the initial issue was over who was going to be the assistant to the president for domestic affairs. Rumsfeld wanted Phil Areeda and Rockefeller wanted Jim Cannon. They went to the mat and Ford went with Rockefeller. And I think that was showing him ‘Look, I’m prepared to make good on this’ and Jim Cannon was a terrific individual, is a terrific individual. I enjoyed working with him enormously. We were actually in the same suite - Bill Seidman and I were with Jim Cannon and Jim Cavanaugh.

Smith: Rockefeller, of course, went to his grave convinced that Rumsfeld did him in, that the deep-sixing of George Bush at the CIA was all part of the same nefarious scheme. Of course the president in the end was the one who signed off on all of those changes.

Porter: That is true.

Smith: I find it fascinating because Ford always said he regretted it and I think he did. But he also said, “You know, I don’t think Nelson would’ve been happy in a second term as vice president.” Because he had come to see all these limitations that you described and he knew Rockefeller’s temperament, and he didn’t see how it would get any better. And, again, there may have been an element of rationalization in that, justifying what he did, but there’s also a lot of truth to it.

Porter: This is an inherent problem with the vice presidency. John Adams felt it acutely because it became apparent to him we can only have one president at a time. And, here’s the problem, you want to select people as vice presidents who can, if necessary, step into the job. You want to have people who are talented, you want people who are good decision makers, and you want to have people who are leaders. At the same time, if you select people who are talented, good decision makers, and leaders, they don’t enjoy – they may be willing to abide it – but they don’t really enjoy it.

Who was the last vice president that you would say really enjoyed the job? It’s hard because you are totally at the beck and call of what the president wants you to do and he may or may not give you assignments that you can really enjoy. But it is very clear to him, to you, and to everyone else that we can only have one president at a time. If Ford were to get reelected, presumably, he could run yet another time under the Constitution. As a result, the only chance Rockefeller had to become President was if Ford died for some reason or got impeached. Given Ford’s health – he did go through two assassination attempts, but that’s not the way anybody wants to become president – so I think Rockefeller recognizes ‘This is my last job.’ And when you have had his career, his family, his background, and his aspirations, that’s not an easy thing to take.

Smith: Two last things. By election day ’76, the polls suggested you’d caught up. What was the mood? Did you think you actually—

Porter: He started from so far behind – everyone points to the time of the Democratic convention – that it always seemed like a long shot. Many of us, as we saw him moving up in the polls, got genuinely enthusiastic. ‘Maybe he can do it.’ I personally think that, if the election had been a month later, possibly even two weeks later, and there had been one round of good economic news, which came out afterward – you need a catalytic event and you need a reason for people to say ‘Well, okay.’ Unfortunately, the timing of the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November did not permit that. So, Ford never quite caught it. But, you know, hope springs eternal in the midst of campaigning. I thought at the time it’s going to be something of a miracle if we’re able to catch Carter. You look at all the polls that come in from various states and you think of how you can do it and, yes, mathematically, there was a shot at it. It was a real disappointment, but it was a long shot just because of how far back he had started.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Porter: I think that he should be remembered as one of the most decent, honorable, dignified, and honest men that we have had as president. And we have had many good ones and I think he fits in that category.

Smith: Character counts?

Porter: Character counts. I think he should be remembered as someone who inherited a very difficult situation, both in terms of the mood of the country, the trust in government, the challenges of how we were going to extract ourselves from Vietnam, the relationship with the Soviet Union which was tense at that time, and China, and with a very difficult economy. And if you’d look at the two and a half years he was President and ask “Did we make progress in all those areas?” The answer to that in my view is an unequivocal yes. If you use as a measuring rod how someone transforms the situation that they inherit, then I think he deservedly should be considered as one of our most remarkable presidents.

The length of time he was President, the way he came into office, his style was not such that he’s going to be remembered in the way a John Kennedy is, who was very charismatic and died very tragically and was in office roughly the same amount of time. But if you look at what actually happened and what was done, I think Gerald Ford actually stacks up remarkably well. Personally, it was a great privilege to work for somebody who was as kind and thoughtful and decent and impressive as he was, but I think if you actually look at the record of accomplishment and not simply his personal qualities, I think he deserves to be very favorably treated.

Smith: That’s great.

Smith: Talking about newspapers, Gerald Ford was omnivorous in his devouring of newspapers. Until the end of his life it was five or six newspapers a day with your morning coffee.

Nessen: Well, he had the Post and the Times and the Wall Street Journal, but he also had the Grand Rapids Press and, I think, the Detroit News, maybe, and one other paper. He had six newspapers a day that he would…

Smith: And woe to those who interrupted him while he was reading.

Nessen: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Off the wall, tell us something about Gerald Ford that might surprise people.

Nessen: I think the thing about Jerry Ford that might surprise people that I really didn’t learn until he made a visit back to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Michigan. The people there really loved him. They knew him better than anybody else, and they really loved him. He stood in the city hall and the people who wanted to shake hands and say hello to him lined up. Well, the line was enormous – out the door and up the block. He stood there and the people came through. The thing that surprised me was how many of those people he knew personally. Knew their names, knew their families, and he’d say, “Oh, hi. How are you Ed? Are you still working out there at the automobile plant?” Somebody else come up and he’d say, “Oh, hi, Sally. How are those two kids of yours? Is your son still going to the University?” It was amazing how many people he knew on a personal basis. They had been his constituents, but he’s President of the United States, and he’s asking some guy, are you still on the line? That was surprising to me.

Smith: There is a wonderful story which I only found out fairly recently. As you know, he commuted that first week. But the first day that he was going to work as a resident, he walked up to the entrance to the West Wing, and the Marine guard held the door open and saluted. And the president sticks out his hand and says, “Hi, my name is Jerry Ford. I’m going to be living here. What’s yours?”

Nessen: Wow. Well, I was a reporter for NBC, and I had covered Agnew, who resigned. So NBC, with a certain lack of imagination, thought well, you can cover the new vice president, too. So I covered him. It wasn’t a year, but it was eight or nine months as vice president, and then I became the White House correspondent for the first month of his administration. Well, it took the Nixons a few days to move out of the White House, so here is the President of the United States living in a – I can’t remember if it was a rambler or a split level or what – on Crown View Drive in Alexandria, Virginia, and I thought, isn’t that symbolic of this guy? The “president next door.” He’s just a guy who lives in the house next door, and he’s President of the United States.

Smith: Of course, you can argue, he suffered from that at times.

Nessen: Why?

Smith: I mean in the sense of the public perception. We had this very bifurcated notion – we love Harry Truman thirty years after he left office – and we appreciate Jimmy Carter when he was carrying his bags – but in the White House we didn’t cotton to, no pun intended, but…

Nessen: But don’t forget – this came after the imperial presidency, and I think people were looking for that. One of the stories that you may or may not know about Jerry Ford was, he had a dog, Liberty. Liberty has an accident on the rug in the Oval Office and one of the Navy stewards rushes in to clean it up. Jerry Ford says, “I’ll do that. Get out of the way, I’ll do that. No man ought to have to clean up after another man’s dog.” Now that was about as symbolic of Jerry Ford as anything I know. I mean, living on Crown View Drive when you are President of the United States, and cleaning up after your own dog in the Oval Office…

Smith: It’s also a metaphor for the task that history assigned to him.
Nessen: You’d better believe it. But, you know, look, you’re a historian, one of the things that Kissinger says that I’m a big believer in is, that you cannot understand historic events and people except through the perspective of thirty years of subsequent history. Okay, now, we’re looking back at Vietnam a little bit through that perspective of thirty years, and we’re looking back at Jerry Ford very much so, and that’s why his reputation, I think, is so much different – why he’s so beloved now, as compared to when he was in the White House, or when he had just left the White House. You see, in the long run of history and what the outcome of some of the things he did was, and you’re away from that day to day heat of politics. So, I believe that thirty years of subsequent history theory, and I think he has benefited from it.

Smith: Let me go back in time, because when we were talking to Jerry Jones earlier this week, one of the startling things he told us was that he, at that point, had sort of reorganized the personnel office for Haldeman. Haldeman calls him up – now Haldeman, of course, and Erlichman leave in April of ’73 – Haldeman calls him while he is still there, and wants to know how many jobs report to the vice president. Jerry does some quick thinking and comes back with a number of about fifty. He said, “Fine. I want every one of them to write a letter of resignation, and get them to me.” They knew that early that Agnew was going to be history. Does that ring true with you…

Nessen: I was totally on the outside then. I live out just off of Massachusetts Avenue in Bethesda, and about three blocks from where Spiro Agnew lived then. There was no vice president’s house in those days. I’m with NBC. About six o’clock in the morning I get awakened by a phone call. It’s the Today Show. They’re saying, “Get up, get up. Run out to Agnew’s house, we’ll send a camera crew to meet you out there. The Wall Street Journal has a story this morning saying he’s under investigation for corruption as governor of Maryland, and maybe as VP.” So, that’s my connection to Agnew, and I spent that whole summer of ’73, I guess it was, on the Agnew case. I’d go down to Annapolis and over to Baltimore and so forth. And then when he resigned, as I say, NBC with a lack of imagination says, “Okay, now you cover the new vice president.” But I didn’t really get into that part of the Agnew story.
Smith: Of course, he led the charge against network news. On the personal level, was he that hostile to reporters?

Nessen: He was totally unapproachable. Most public figures - whether it’s natural, or whether it’s put on - they try to be buddies with the reporters. But he never did. My most vivid memory of him was he brought charges against nine reporters. The Agnew Nine. Did you ever hear of the Agnew Nine?

Smith: No.

Nessen: I was one of the Agnew Nine. And I can’t remember exactly what the charge was, but it had to do with receiving leaked information that was used to expose him. Now, that’s really general, and not specific, but that was the charge. Well, we have a hearing over in the federal courthouse in Baltimore and they hired this New York First Amendment lawyer for me and for some of the other Nine. And so we go to our hearing…

Smith: Was that Floyd Abrams?

Nessen: Yeah. And we go over to our hearing in Baltimore and Agnew walks into the courtroom. And it was so still. In those days you couldn’t have cameras in the courtroom, so there were two sketch artists, one for CBS, one for NBC - they were sisters, and I actually have the sketch at home that she did that day - and she’s drawing this picture of Agnew. He’s very tall, and very stately, and has no expression on his face at all. He walks into the courtroom – dead silence – the only sound you could hear were these sketch artists, and he pleads nolo, no defense, and announced that he was going to resign. The last thing the judge did was pound his gavel and dismiss the charges against the Agnew Nine.

Smith: Of course, it was a very short period of time – it is amazing today, you stop and think of the Fords being at home and getting a call, and being told basically, “Get dressed. In two hours we want you in the East Room for a nationally televised ceremony.” It happened very fast.

Nessen: Well, I think there was a little bit of an advance – I think somebody – I don’t remember the story, you probably know it better than I do – somebody was delegated to sort of sound him out, “If you were asked to do…would you?” It was something like that. I don’t remember all the details.

Smith: And remember, he had that surreal meeting with Nixon in the EOB, where Nixon never brought up the subject, and Ford goes back to the Hill and is told that Agnew has just resigned.

Nessen: But you see, I think one of the things that makes Ford the guy he was, the president he was, the now historic figure that he is – is, you look at the people who have become president: Nixon is a perfect example of it, but many others, including Obama. You don’t get to be president unless you have this hunger for it and you do all the things that you have to do to get up that ladder and take that top rung. It distorts your personality, I think. This is more about beliefs than personality. It distorts your personality, this craving to be president.

Smith: It defines you and your life.

Nessen: Yes, right. Jerry Ford never had that. His plan, as you probably know, he’d told Betty he was going to serve one more term in the House and then he was going to retire and they were going to go to Palm Springs and he was going to play golf and they’d spend time together. I mean, he’d spent thirty years traveling, week after week after week. She raised the kids. They never spent much time together.

Smith: Do you think he felt guilt about that?

Nessen: That’s something I never heard him talk about. I don’t know whether he did or not, but I know that he must have recognized it because that was the promise that he made to her – that he was going to serve one more term in the House. So then, all of a sudden he’s vice president and president, without ever running for it. So he didn’t have that distortion of his personality that I think people get when they just lust after that office.

Smith: Let me ask you, in terms of following him as vice president, did you enter into that assignment with the assumption that Nixon was a short-timer?
Nessen: I didn’t. I thought it was an interesting, challenging assignment, but I certainly didn’t imagine that in eight or nine months, whatever it was, that he was going to be president. I just didn’t put all those pieces together.

Smith: Did you sense, at any point in that time, that Ford, although he might never say it, was internally, at least, preparing himself for it?

Nessen: Toward the end of that period, after he had become vice president, and as Watergate was unfolding more and more, I did then begin to sense that maybe he was sort of preparing himself. If you say, well, how did you know that? I can’t give you a specific example.

Smith: He never said anything overtly that – you know, Tom DeFrank’s story about…

Nessen: What was DeFrank’s story?

Smith: The DeFrank story was that there was some personnel action, as I recall – something like that – and Ford had said something critical of it, sort of let it slip, “Well, we’ll take care of that when I’m in there.”

Nessen: Oh, yeah, I think I heard DeFrank talk about that.

Smith: And you wonder whether Tom - I have to be careful here because Tom’s a good guy and a good friend - sort of made more of that than it warranted.

Nessen: I’m a huge fan of DeFrank, and I think there were five reporters who covered Ford when he was vice president, DeFrank and me and Phil Jones of CBS, Maggie Hunter of the New York Times, and I forget who the other one was. I guess Lou Cannon maybe from the Post. So I’m a huge fan of Tommy and we stay in touch. I’ve got a note on my desk, we’re supposed to have lunch now that the inauguration is over.

As you know, he had a very special relationship with Ford, lasting until up to the time of Ford’s death. He has a lot of stuff that he promised Ford that he’d never talk about until after Ford had died. So if he said that, then I have no reason to doubt him.
Smith: It’s revealing in another sense, of how comfortable Ford felt around him. It was no accident that in planning the funeral – that there was a journalist. That was there very deliberately to make the point, that there was a time in this town when you could hew to the adversarial relationship and still be friends.

Nessen: Well, you know, there’s this one other factor, and I don’t want to make more of this, and I’m sure you’ve heard it from other people, but in those days, Ford liked to have a drink or two before dinner. I never saw him drunk or anything even approaching drunk, but I do think that he maybe spoke more freely in the evenings a couple of times. You know the story, because I think it’s been publicized, about Ford goes down to make a speech at Tulane University in New Orleans.

Smith: Was this as vice president or president?

Nessen: As president.

Smith: Around the fall of Vietnam?

Nessen: Yeah. You know that story?

Smith: No, go ahead.

Nessen: He has two appearances that day. In the afternoon he speaks to the Navy League, I guess it was, and in the evening to a bunch of students in the gymnasium of Tulane. So in the afternoon, the speech was written by Kissinger, of course, and it was reaffirmation of America’s determination to help South Vietnam fight the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese. Well, meanwhile, Hartmann, and a few others had written the evening speech for Tulane without showing it to Kissinger. And that’s the one that has the line in it: “For us, the war is over.” And of course, the audience went crazy. I mean, these young people, “For us the war is over.”

Well, we were riding down the elevator from the hotel. He had the afternoon event, then he had some kind of Republican reception where he had a couple [of drinks]. And I’m thinking, oh God, this is the most important speech he’s ever made, so we’re riding down on the elevator and I’m saying to him, “Now, Mr. President, just take your time. Read the speech carefully and just keep it right there in front of you. It’s very important.” And Kennerly, who was you know, was like a son to him and could say things to him that nobody else could, Kennerly says, “Mr. President, what he’s trying to tell ‘you is, don’t fuck it up.’” And he didn’t.

Smith: Was Kissinger upset?

Nessen: I don’t know whether he was upset or not. I mean, one of the things that marked the Ford White House, somewhat to its detriment, I think, you had a lot factions that were always pulling and tugging. You had the leftover Nixon people, including Haig.

Smith: Let me ask you about that, because that’s a great place to pause for a moment. Leon Parma told the story, and you can see the visual, on the morning of August 9th, was shuffled into the East Room at the last minute with some folks from the Hill. After the ceremony was over, there was a receiving line and everyone was invited down to, I think, the State Dining Room for a reception. He said you could watch the Nixon people peel off and go back to their offices. That may be over dramatic, but it does raise this large issue of how did you deal with the fact that most of your White House staff were Nixon people?

Nessen: There are two or three things. Number one, Ford’s overall theory was, if you didn’t have anything to do with Watergate, there is no reason why you should be booted out of the White House just because you worked for Nixon.

Smith: That’s generous.

Nessen: Yes, it was.

Smith: Politically, given the mood of the country, that’s very generous, maybe too generous.

Nessen: Absolutely. Well, I think what people like Hartmann and Rumsfeld were telling him is that that was too generous. It’s not that you are being unfair to them, you have to do some symbolic things so the public says, and “Oh, well Nixon and his people are gone. We’ve got a new guy and there’re new people there.” And some of it was that kind of larger picture issue, some of it was just simply ambition. So you had the Nixon people, the leftover Nixon people, and what Ford said was, “Unless they did something wrong, there’s no reason to boot them out just because they were Nixon people.”

Smith: It was guilt by association.

Nessen: The Nixon White House was apparently organized in a way where they had floaters, they didn’t report to anybody. So one of the things that Rumsfeld – he was chief of staff then - did was, there were eight senior White House West Wing people, the NSC, the press secretary, the Congressional relations guy, the eight senior people. Everybody had to report to one of those eight senior people. What Rumsfeld said was, “Okay, here are the leftover Nixon staff people who report to you. If you want to keep them, keep them. If you want to get rid of them, it’s your responsibility to tell them they’re done.” So the two people I had on my staff were Father McLaughlin, John McLaughlin, and Ken Clawson, the former Washington Post guy. I didn’t want to keep either one of them on my staff, so I had to tell them. Father McLaughlin didn’t want to go, and he said he only takes his orders from the president. I said, “John, I need your resignation this afternoon, or else I’m going to announce it in my briefing tomorrow that you’re leaving.” So I had his letter. Clawson, it was very strange. His reaction was, “How am I going to pay my mortgage?” But anyhow, that’s how it worked.

Now, what you were left with was a White House that was, first of all, full of factions. You had these leftover Nixon people; you had people who had worked for Ford in his Congressional staff; you had people who had come aboard in his vice presidential year. You had new people who he had just hired, or needed to hire, and was hiring for the presidential thing. And you had some people who had never worked for him before. You had all these different factions and there were a lot of rivalries, and gone were personal rivalries. You had Kissinger and Rumsfeld, you had Bob Hartmann and practically everybody else.

Smith: How polarizing was Hartmann?

Nessen: Very, very polarizing. Very polarizing.
Smith: What was the basis of that? Was it a jealousy that only he was really protecting the president, or really understood the president, or…

Nessen: I think it was much more personal than that. I think Hartmann had been Ford’s chief of staff in Congress and he’d been like the number one guy. And all of a sudden, you had people who are at least equal, maybe more than equal. He was my neighbor out in Bethesda, and Ford was constantly traveling when he was vice president, so we’d get back to Andrews Air Force Base at two o’clock in the morning and he would say, “Come on, I’ll give you a ride home.” So that’s how we really got to be friends. But he was a difficult man.

Smith: Prickly?

Nessen: Very much so.

Smith: It leads again to this large question, this notion you talked about seeing Ford in his element, in Grand Rapids. Or that story about the [West Wing] guard, that’s what you would in some ways expect of a Congressman. How difficult was it for Ford to grow out of the Congressional mindset, into what I think most people would agree, is a very different set of job skills.

Nessen: Yeah.

Smith: There are those who think that the story of the Ford presidency is that evolution. And the tragedy was, just about the time he’d made the transformation, he lost the job.

Nessen: It was time to go. Right.

Smith: The whole spokes of the wheel, for example. Not only was it a reaction against the Haldeman/Erlichman imperial presidency, but it also feels very much like a Capitol Hill office.

Nessen: Well, I remember the first time I ever heard about spokes of the wheel, but that was part of this debate about organizing the White House. And Ford’s original idea was spokes of the wheel - that the president was in the middle and all these senior staff people would report directly to him. Well, that’s impractical, you can’t do that. And so, I think that’s when Rumsfeld began to steer him away from the spokes of the wheel idea.

There was, at one point, and you’ve probably heard about these, the so-called peeking privileges. This meant you could go to the door of the Oval Office, open it a crack, peek in, and if the president was not on the phone, or if he was just reading the paper, or looking at papers and so forth, you could go in and get your questions answered or whatever. Spokes of the wheel. It wasn’t going to work and it didn’t work. But the spokes of the wheel was - at one point what was happening with the White House. I’m trying to think of where/when this spokes of the wheel idea changed.

Smith: It was pretty early. I think when Rumsfeld really showed up. We’ve been led to believe that, in fact, one of Rumsfeld’s conditions for taking the job was…that spokes of the wheel would be replaced.

Nessen: Really? I can believe that. But I think Hartmann, Rumsfeld and I’m trying to think of who else might have been involved – and Kissinger. Those were the three great rivals.

Smith: Let me go back a little bit before Nixon resigned, For people who weren’t around, can you recreate what the mood was in this town?

Nessen: Well, Nixon was not a very popular figure. And I don’t think he was very good at explaining himself and so forth. He was also a Republican and you know Republicans are not necessarily popular – and he was a difficult person. When you think back to him, and what it takes to become the president, and he had none of those skills and abilities - I mean, compared to Obama? But compared to anybody.

Smith: I’ve said the remarkable thing about the Nixon presidency was not how it ended, but that it happened at all.

Nessen: I could not agree with you more. That’s totally right. I mean, how did this guy get to be president when he lacked those skills you would think were needed for it?
Smith: I realize this is speculative – there was this story was kicked around that Nixon would have preferred another vice president, but he really was given no choice by Congress.

Nessen: Right.

Smith: That said, he is said to have regarded Ford as his insurance against impeachment.

Nessen: Yeah. Right.

Smith: Which tells you something about his….

Nessen: Bad judgment.

Smith: Well, but also his view of Ford.

Nessen: Well, yes, I think that’s true, but I think people who knew Ford and people who were in Congress with Ford, I think they felt pretty comfortable having Ford move up to that position. I think they did.

Smith: When the smoking gun was released – did you see Ford at that time? You were covering him. Was there any discernable change in his demeanor, or was there a poker face that he was deploying?

Nessen: Look, he’d been around Washington for almost thirty years, I think he knew what was happening. He knew how this was likely to end. He knew what this was likely to involve, and I just think he tightened up and did not want to react publicly to that. But I think he knew what was coming. Did I, as a reporter, sense that he knew what was coming, that he acted as if he knew what was coming? I don’t have that recollection.

Smith: He was in an impossible position.

Nessen: Oh yeah.

Smith: I mean, he’s basically supposed to be out there defending the president. But he can’t defend the president to the point where he loses his own credibility. And at the same time, no one wants to admit the reason he can’t lose his own credibility is because he may replace the president.
Nessen: Yeah.

Smith: Plus, he can’t have a transition. He can’t even acknowledge the possibility of a transition.

Nessen: You are absolutely right. That’s a very tough position to be in. But, he was. I saw part of it from the outside, and he’d already become president, of course, by the time I joined the White House.

Smith: On the 9th of August, were you in the East Room?

Nessen: Was that when he…

Smith: When Nixon left and then a few hours later he was sworn in.

Nessen: Yes, I was. What happened was, I had been White House correspondent under Johnson and then I came back as White House correspondent during the first month of Ford. So when Nixon gave his farewell speech, they herded us out onto the South Lawn – I’ve got a picture of this somewhere – and, of course, they walked out to the helicopter. You’ve probably seen this picture. Ford looked stricken and Betty looked stricken and of course, Nixon looked stricken.

Smith: She said it was the worst day of her life.

Nessen: And, so I’m over there with the crowd and they walk to the helicopter, and the helicopter goes away. Then we go back into the White House for Ford’s little talk. So I was there that day.

Smith: What was the mood?

Nessen: Oh, God, it’s hard to – you know, everything that was happening was like in some incredible melodrama that you never thought you would see, and you could see Nixon’s staff people crying and you’d see people like Hartmann, who were probably secretly celebrating already. But I do think that there was this sense of, “Oh my gosh, this is one of the most historic moments in America, ever.” There was so much happening and so much high drama and so much emotion – it was just overflowing.
Smith: Can you imagine how cable TV would over-hype?

Nessen: Oh my Lord.

Smith: The thing you didn’t need was hype. You needed to just get out of the way and let the story play itself out.

Nessen: My great mentor at NBC was Ruben Frank, who you probably know. The great lesson Ruben taught me, and I tried to follow it, and every time I watch cable television I realize they didn’t have any Ruben Frank: “Shut up and let the pictures tell the story.”

Smith: That’s what television is all about, isn’t it?

Nessen: Yeah. Right.

Smith: Supposed to be. Go to the radio if you want to hear endless talk and chatter. Tell me about Jerry terHorst.

Nessen: Well, I didn’t know terHorst very well before he became the press secretary. Then he became the press secretary, obviously because he’d known Ford, covered Ford’s first Congressional campaign, if I’m not mistaken, in Michigan. And he was obviously close to Ford. In those days, reporters covered the president when he would go to church – either at St. John’s just across Lafayette Square, or over here where there is a big office building now – used to be the National Presbyterian, which has now moved up to Nebraska Avenue. I and the other reporters would go to church with the president and of course, when he was going to National Presbyterian you had Rev. Elson, who thought it was his role to instruct the president, and he would say, “And Mr. President, the Bible teaches us that when you visit with Khrushchev next week…” We’d be scribbling all this down, go back to the office and pretend it was a story. So anyhow, we used to go to church with the president. One month after he becomes president, Ford goes across Lafayette Square. He goes to St. John’s and comes back, and normally what happens is, the press secretary then says, “Okay, that’s a lid. See you tomorrow morning.” Meaning, no more news today, see you tomorrow morning. But one Sunday, terHorst says, “You know, if I were you, I’d stick around a little bit.” So that’s when the pardon was announced, on that Sunday morning. Pardon of Nixon. I’m sure you’ve heard the story, Ford later said that he was spending 25% of his time and the staff was spending 25% of its time on leftover Nixon stuff and he just had to get that off his plate so he could concentrate.

Smith: Actually, there’s even more than that. He talked about the first press conference, which I think was on the 28th of August, and I think is a quality about Ford which is, again, the flip side of this genuine, kind of Boy Scout niceness, which can only be called naiveté. It’s hugely admirable in everything but a president. But he went into that press conference believing that everyone would want to talk about inflation and Cyprus, or at least he convinced himself. And he came out of that angry, partly at himself for not expressing himself terribly well.

Nessen: For letting it go this long. Yeah.

Smith: And angry, in a sense, at the press corps for being obsessed with this subject.

Nessen: Well, what happened was that we went back to the White House. He announced the pardon, terHorst announced the pardon, and he also said he was leaving, that he was resigning. The assumption was that he was resigning because he didn’t agree with the pardon. You probably have talked to other people, who will tell you that the reason he really resigned was that it was just overwhelming. The job was overwhelming, there was a fifty-five person staff to manage, it was a job where you got there in time for the seven o’clock staff meeting in the morning, and if you were like me and you tried to answer all your reporters’ calls before you went home, you left there at 9:30-10:00 or later at night. He was just overwhelmed by it, and this gave him an opportunity to gracefully leave. I don’t know what the truth is. I never had the conversation, one on one with terHorst.

Smith: Is he still around?

Nessen: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Where is he?

Nessen: He’s over in Virginia. I will look in my Rolodex, if you want his number.
Smith: Wonderful. Yes, because, obviously we want to talk to him. We’d love to.

Nessen: Anyhow, I don’t know the combination of reasons that persuaded terHorst to resign, but he did. I guess Jack Hushen, he was a deputy left over from Nixon, filled in for a while. terHorst never really explained to me why he was leaving, and as I say, there is this disagreement about why he left. I do think that Bob Hartmann, who was my neighbor, maybe was an advocate for me to replace terHorst. I’d been a journalist, I’d gone to UPI in ’56, went to NBC in ’62, this was ’74, so I’d been a journalist all that time. And I think, like most journalists, you know that what you are seeing, and are allowed to see, and what you’re told, is maybe 10% of what is really going on. I just had the itch to see what was happening on the inside. The book I wrote, It Sure Looks Different from the Inside, was a perfect summation of why I wanted to do that, but I don’t think I had exactly the right personality for that job. I was short-tempered, sort of full of myself, I didn’t suffer fools easily, and it was a difficult time. I don’t know if you care about any of the media issues – the fact of the matter was…”

Smith: Sure. I assume they all saw themselves as Woodward and Bernstein.

Nessen: No, but you see, it’s the opposite of that. Two guys who never went inside the White House gate brought down a president. You are a White House reporter, you’re in the press room, twenty feet down the hall there is the President of the United States. Every day you come to the White House, you never got a whiff of that story. Two guys outside of the White House, who never went into the White House, broke the story. You are really frustrated, and some of that, I think, was taken out on me, and on Ford. And also, terHorst, at least was perceived of as having resigned as a matter of honor, because he couldn’t agree with the pardon, and that, again, put some further pressure on me. Now, my view of the job was different from his because who gives a damn what the press secretary thinks? You’re not a policymaker. You’re not a political figure. You’re a spokesman, literally. The president can’t come out there every day and answer questions at the briefing, so I thought my job was to answer questions as the president would answer them if he were there.

Smith: You carry whatever the press corps has in mind back to the president.
Nessen: Yes, and also, along that line, I tried to do everything that Ziegler didn’t do, and not do the things that Ziegler did. One of the things I tried to do was to get more reporters in to see Ford on a one on one basis. He liked that. I think I told you on the phone about bringing in Newsweek and Times correspondents on Saturdays, which were a little slower time…and they need a lot of color. What color was the necktie he was wearing when he signed that bill? All those little details.

Smith: Did he understand that?

Nessen: Yeah. He did. He’d been in Washington all these years, you know. So that was one of the changes I tried to bring about. The other thing that I did which was naïve, in hindsight, was, I thought, well, I’ve been a reporter, now I’m still a reporter, I’m going on the inside, though, and I’m getting even more details and I’m coming out, I’m like a pool reporter. And I’m going to report to the others. Well, that’s very naïve, I think, to think that was the job. I did say I would never lie, and never cover up, and I think I kept that promise. I think I probably delayed announcing some things every once in a while for what seemed like good reasons. But, I think the combination of – terHorst saying he was resigning because he disagreed with the pardon – I was on a program with McClellan at George Washington University a couple of months ago, and he talked about, and he talks about in his book and also in all of his interviews, all the things that he disagreed with Bush about. Who cares? Who cares? We’ve only got one president and nobody gives a damn – I don’t, in my view – what the press secretary thinks. But anyhow, that’s what I brought to the job, and some of the attitudes I brought to the job.

Smith: How did the Saturday Night Live appearance come about?

Nessen: Ford had three teenage kids living in the White House, and they all watched Saturday Night Live. We had this big White House…

Smith: Did they think Chevy Chase was funny?

Nessen: I don’t know about that. But I do know that every year we have the White House Correspondents Association dinner, and in ’75 – ’74 or ’75 – fall of ’74, I think, the entertainment was Chevy Chase. And it’s up here at the Hilton Hotel on the hill, up Connecticut Avenue. I think it is the biggest ballroom in Washington, and there are literally, like 2,000 people there. The tradition is, there is an entertainer, and then the president does his speech. So they introduce Chevy Chase and he comes in, in the far door, and he comes through the tables, and he stumbling and bumping into things and knocking over things, and he gets up there and he does his whole Ford shtick. And, of course, Ford is sitting right there. Then it is the president’s turn. And Ford had this Hollywood joke writer named Don Penny on his staff, and Penny had prepared him for this. Ford gets up and he pretends to pull the placemat off. Then he gets up and he puts his speech on the podium and pretends all the pages fall off. Well, self-deprecating humor is the only kind of humor that goes over in Washington, and that’s what this was. And he won everybody over.

Smith: Do you think he resented – I know what you’re saying – but did he resent it?

Nessen: Yeah, he did. He never showed it very much.

Smith: How do you know that he did?

Nessen: I sensed that he did. He never said anything, but I just sensed that he thought that he was being parodied unjustifiably. He had a good sense of humor. He could make fun of himself.

Smith: I think it was in Vienna when Ford slipped on the steps coming down from Air Force One. And later on everyone around Ford was – I think they thought they were sort of bucking him up, or at least buttering him up, by going after the photographers for capturing him in such a pose. And he said, “Well, of course they did. They would have lost their jobs if they didn’t.” Which just tells you… I can’t imagine Lyndon Johnson saying that.

Nessen: Oh, no. You sure can’t. Well, he hit it off with Chevy Chase, and Chevy Chase comes from a wealthy family. His father was Ned Chase, the publisher, and his mother came from the Crane plumbing fortune and so forth. He loved to play tennis and Ford loved to play tennis, so Ford invited him to come to the White House and play tennis the next day. And he came.
Loren Michael, the producer, had been after me to get Ford to come on the show, and I wasn’t about to do that. Well, when I saw that Chevy Chase hit it off with Ford, and that he could take part in the fun, I started talking to them and Ford agreed to tape these two bits. He didn’t want to go on the show in person, but he would tape these two things. He said, “I’m Jerry Ford and you’re not.” And, “Live from New York, it’s Saturday Night.” And then they asked me to be the host. I’d been at NBC for twelve years as a news correspondent. The only live programming then was news and Saturday Night Live, so I knew a lot of the crew and so forth.

I think, looking back on it, and reading some of the books that have been written by the cast and by others, that it wasn’t in all good, clean fun. They felt, I think, an opportunity to really take a crack at Ford. I think he felt a little bit used, because look, he is used to Washington, where self-deprécatimg is the only kind of humor. You don’t make fun of your opponents, or you don’t make fun of people you don’t like, so I don’t think it was a happy experience for him. He didn’t get outraged by it, but…

Smith: Did he talk to you about it?

Nessen: Not really. And it shows he had a good sense of humor, or that he could make fun of himself. I only remember one time when he complained. He was skiing at Vail, and all the TV news shows used film of him falling while skiing. And Ford said to me, “Those reporters, the one exercise they get is sitting on a bar stool.”

Smith: Take us back to April of ’75 and the events surrounding the fall of Saigon.

Nessen: Well, I have to tell you this to start with. I did five tours in Vietnam as a NBC correspondent. I got wounded there. I thought I was going to die. I had a huge emotional attachment to it. I saw reporters I knew who were killed. I saw friends killed, I saw things that you should…I’m walking down a road one day and there is a pile of charcoal on the roadside and I ask some soldier, “What’s that?” And that was two little babies who had burned to death in a house. I had an enormous emotional involvement in Vietnam. So here I am in the White House, and I’m going to have to be the one who announces the end of the war. You could see it coming for a while, clearly.

Ford was on his way to Palm Springs when he gets handed this note from the radio operator on the plane, that DaNang had fallen, and that the North Vietnamese were kind of sweeping southward toward Saigon. Well, here again, Ford’s got all these parties and stuff he’s supposed to go to in Palm Springs. This was the famous picture of Ford – he has to go up to Bakersfield to make a speech, and of course, all the reporters wanted to ask him about the impending fall of Saigon. He gets off the plane, and you know this, and he starts running.

Smith: With Helen Thomas in hot pursuit.

Nessen: Everybody trailing him. The next day at my briefing, of course, I’m asked about this and some reporter says, “He ran almost as fast as the South Vietnamese army did, didn’t he, Ron?” That was a terrible time. The actual end came, and I’ve been doing a little research on this myself because I want to do a little bit of writing about that period. They are in some kind of relatively routine economic meeting, and Scowcroft gives him a note saying that the North Vietnamese had reached the airport in Saigon, or are closing in on the airport in Saigon. So Ford gives the order to load up all the C130s and take the rest of the Americans out. And by then Tan Son Nhat airport has fallen, so they have to do it by helicopter.

It was supposed to take two hours, because I think by that point there were five hundred Americans left in Saigon. Two hundred or five hundred. Well, somebody made the decision that they had to take out two thousand Vietnamese who had worked for the Americans or in some way were associated with the Americans, because they were going to be killed. So this helicopter lift lasts for sixteen hours, and we all sort of stood around the Oval Office. What do you say? What do you do? It was late at night, about eleven o’clock, and Ford said he was going to go up and wait for further word in the residence. And so it was Rumsfeld who was the chief of staff, Cheney who was his deputy, and me and David Kennerly, the White House photographer. Somebody said, “Sleep well, Mr. President.” And he walked out and I said, sort of under my breath, “If you can.” We didn’t know what to do. I slept in my office that night I don’t know about the others.

The next day the helicopters were taking the refugees out to these aircraft carriers in the Gulf there, the South China Sea, and the helicopters were beginning to suffer all kinds of mechanical breakdowns because they’d been flying for sixteen hours. So Ford says, “Okay, tell Graham Martin (the U.S. ambassador) to get on the next helicopter and get all the Americans out of there and it’s over.” So Kissinger sends Graham Martin that message, and Graham Martin sends a message and you can imagine the pressure he was under. He says, “I don’t take my orders from you, I only take my orders from the president.” So Ford had to sign something, so Martin gets on the next helicopter with the rest of the staff and as many of the Vietnamese as they can get out, and that’s the picture that you’ve seen.

We had a prepared statement and I read the prepared statement, and then Kissinger and I went over to the Old Executive Office Building for a briefing. This was like 4:30-5:00 in the afternoon, and there were amazingly few reporters there, because everybody was back in their offices watching it on television and writing their stories for the morning papers and the evening newscasts. So there were very few reporters there. The briefing was sort of desultory. So we come off the stage and Brent Scowcroft is standing there. The first thing I said at the briefing was, “All the Americans are out of Saigon. The evacuation is complete.”

Scowcroft was waiting off stage. He said, “I have bad news for you. There are still 135 Marines in the embassy compound.” They weren’t forgotten. They were kind of a rear guard to protect, and to keep all these Vietnamese from climbing over the fence. The helicopters were going to come back, the Marines would be gone in two hours. But I had said all the Americans are out of Saigon, the evacuation is complete, and now 135 Marines are still there. So, we had this little meeting with Rumsfeld and Cheney and me and Scowcroft, I guess, and maybe his deputy. What should we do? I tell you, I’m not proud of it, but my suggestion was to – they are going to be gone in two hours – we were premature, but let’s let it go. And Rumsfeld, of all people, given his reputation today, said something like, “This war has been marked by so many lies, let’s not let it end on one last lie.” And, of course, I realized instantly that he was right. So we called the reporters back into the briefing room and said, “Oops, there are still 135 Marines. They are going to be out in two hours, but I didn’t want to mislead you,” and so forth. And they sort of shrugged and so forth.

I’ll tell you one footnote to this in a minute, one postscript to this. There was a lot of black humor that night. What do you do? Kennerly and I had both been in Vietnam as journalists. This was a lost war by America, there was a tremendous amount of emotion there. What do you do, what do you say? And a lot of it was black humor. Kennerly said something like, “I have good news, and I have bad news. The good news is that the war is over. The bad news is we lost.” Kissinger, even Kissinger, he said two things. One thing I’ll tell you in a second, the humorous thing was he said, “I have lost two wars in two weeks, give me another week and I’ll lose another war,” because Cambodia had been evacuated, now Saigon. Everybody was so emotional, so there was that black humor. Kissinger, when he found out that the Marines were still in the compound, he blew up, and I had never seen him blow up. He was always self-contained, and he said, “God damn it, those sons of bitches, can’t they get anything right!” He was really angry.

Smith: And who was he referring to?

Nessen: Whoever was in charge of the evacuation or sending back information about the evacuation. The other thing he said, which I’m sure can be misconstrued, but what he said was essentially something like, “I hope that these last throes of the war are not dragged out,” because it would just make it worse and worse. He hoped that they would surrender quickly, or something like that. It was an incredibly emotional day, and the sequel to that was, that we did get a lot of Vietnamese refugees out. They were in two refugee camps: one in Arkansas and one in Florida. There was a bill to appropriate, I don’t know, $435,000,000 – millions were a lot of money in those days, it wasn’t a rounding era in those days. The House of Representatives defeated the money for refugees.
I took the AP wire copy into the Oval Office and gave it to Ford. I’d never heard him curse all the time I’d known him – three or four years by then. He said, “Those sons of bitches.” And what he did was, he went out and he campaigned for that money for Vietnamese refugees, and it was, to me, one of the greatest examples of moral leadership of his administration. And he got the money for the refugees. We went to the refugee camps in Arkansas and Florida to visit.

Smith: Some of the most touching tributes when he died, I remember reading stories, I think there were columns, Oped pieces in both the Times and the Post from Vietnamese refugees who looked upon him as their president. In some ways, their savior.

Nessen: He saved them. He really saved them. The interesting little sidebar is: everyday at my briefing, I was getting pounded, “Ron, what authority does the president have to take Vietnamese out. Isn’t his authority to just use those helicopters for Americans? Congress hasn’t given…” Pounding, pounding, pounding. I’d go back to my office, the phone would be ringing. It would be network executives begging me to help them get their Vietnamese camera crews and so forth, out. Hypocrisy is the number one product of Washington, as you probably know.

Smith: One of the things that I’ll never forget was, later on, we got the staircase from that embassy [for the Ford Museum]. And there was a big debate among the trustees. There is a great story…

Nessen: That fire escape where…

Smith: We got the staircase from the roof of the embassy.

Nessen: Oh my God.

Smith: Very quickly, I’ll tell you how we got it, because it’s a great story. At the time of the rededication in ’97, the Clinton administration sent Madeline Albright out as their representative. She took part in a program with several secretaries of state. Well, what was going on, they wanted the chemical weapons treaty passed, and I will never forget, in the kitchen of the Ford Museum, Gerald Ford and George H.W. Bush are on the phones, calling Republican Senators to lobby on the chemical weapons treaty, which they got. And what we got in return was, we got the staircase from the embassy in Saigon. Madame Secretary guaranteed it. We brought it back, and there are all these people, beginning with Kissinger, who said, “Why in the world would you want to remind people of that?” But Ford, to his eternal credit, said two things: one, it’s a part of history, we can’t forget it; and two, with an imagination that I don’t think people often credited him with, he looked at that staircase and he saw it every bit as much of a symbol of a desire to be free as the big piece of the Berlin Wall out on the front lawn.

So, we got it, and he came back from California. There is a large Vietnamese-American community in West Michigan – we invited them in to dedicate that staircase.

Nessen: Oh my God.

Smith: And, talk about bittersweet…

Nessen: Wow. Well, everybody has got so many stories about that day. There was this Time Magazine photographer, Dick Swanson, and he was married to a Vietnamese woman, they got married inside Saigon, actually, and she opened this very, very well known Vietnamese restaurant in Georgetown, and they got married there. They left Vietnam before the end of the war. But she had a lot of relatives there, and when the end was getting near, he went back to Saigon, this photographer, on the last commercial flight into Tan Son Nhuit he hijacked a truck. He went around and he collected seventeen of her relatives, there was one uncle he couldn’t find – seventeen relatives, and took them out to Tan Son Nhuit got them on an evacuation plane and got them out of there.

Smith: And remember, then there was Operation Baby Lift.

Nessen: Oh my God. I went with Ford. I will never, ever forget that. They came to San Francisco – well, first of all, the first one crashed. This was like a horror show on top of a horror show. You had the evacuation of Saigon, and I knew people – my friends were not going to get out and so forth – and then this evacuation plane load of hundreds of babies crashes. So then they have another baby lift plane coming. This was a C141, I think, and you know how big they are, landing in San Francisco, and Ford goes out to welcome the plane back. It lands and we climb aboard. Well, I will never forget that. There were hundreds of babies on this plane. They’d been flying across the ocean for like seventeen hours. There were hundreds of dirty diapers on that plane. It was like a nerve gas attack. But I thought that was an important thing for him to go and welcome that plane back. Now, the Vietnamese being what they are, this was supposed to be the Orphan Lift, which I think was the original name of it. Well, as you know, the South Vietnamese officials paid bribes and got their own children on this plane.

Smith: The assassination attempts. Two - improbable.

Nessen: In a couple of weeks.

Smith: In less than a month. Both in California. You were quoted after the second one as saying, “We’re never going back to California.”

Nessen: Well, let’s see, you’re going to have to help me remember here. Now the first one…

Smith: The first one was in Sacramento, with Squeaky Fromme.

Nessen: In Sacramento. That’s right. Okay. So he goes out to see Jerry Brown, who is the governor. And he’s staying at a hotel right on that park that’s in front of the capitol building. So it’s a nice day, so he decides to walk from his hotel across the park, up this little path, and then into see Jerry Brown. Right? So, he’s on the path. The Secret Services agents are on the path, and then there are spectators lining both sides of the path, and I’m walking sort of parallel to him, but behind the spectators. And all of a sudden, this woman raises her hand and there is a gun in her hand.

Smith: Did you see that?

Nessen: Yeah. And the Secret Service agent grabs the gun like this, so the firing pin is there, so the firing pin can’t go down. Meanwhile, the other Secret Service agents grab Ford and they rush him inside the state building, the state capitol.
So, Rumsfeld and I are in this room, and he goes into this meeting with Jerry Brown, and my understanding is, he never said anything to Jerry Brown. He’d just escaped an assassination attempt and he’s sitting there making small talk with the governor. Anyhow, meanwhile, the press is gone…

Smith: His line afterwards was, because I remember asking him, he said, “Well, I didn’t think it would be very nice to go in and say some lady just tried to shoot me while I was coming in to see you.”

Nessen: Anyhow, Rumsfeld and I went into a holding room or something, and we had to try and get as much information as we could, as quickly as we could, because the press was going bonkers. Most of them hadn’t seen it. So, then we had this briefing, and one of the interesting things to me was, Rumsfeld wanted to do the briefing – and he did the briefing. But anyhow, that was that. So that was Sacramento.

The second was in San Francisco.

Smith: Outside the St. Francis…

Nessen: Behind the St. Francis Hotel. Ford comes out of the back door of the hotel and I think we were going to the airport. [He] comes out and the motorcade is lined up there. His limo is right here, and there are people on the other side of the street waving and so forth. He comes out and he waves like this, and this is when the other woman actually got a shot off, and the Secret Service grabs Ford, throws him into the backseat, covers him up with their own bodies, and I’m sort of putting all this together in my mind. I’m walking next to Dr. Lukash, and boy, they got him in the backseat and that motorcade is starting to pull away and I thought, “Oh my God, if we don’t get in the car, we’re going to be left here.” So Lukash and I run and jump into the first car we come to, which is the press pool, and we race out to the airport. We race out to the airport. Meanwhile, Mrs. Ford has her own schedule and she’s down the Peninsula somewhere and we have to wait for her to get back to Air Force One. Of course, they pulled the limo right up to the plane. You step out the door and stairs are right there. They don’t want him to walk across any open space.
So we get on the plane, we’re waiting for her. She finally comes, and I’m up in the president’s compartment when she arrives. She sits down, and on other side of this table from the president, and she says, “Hello, dear. How are you? How did everything go?” I’m looking at Rumsfeld, and he’s looking at me and we’re both looking at Ford. Nobody has told her. Somebody, and I guess it was Rumsfeld, said, “You mean you don’t know?” And she says, “Know what?” I think it was Rumsfeld who said, “Somebody took a shot at your husband.” Well, I was looking right at her face. There wasn’t any horror – she’d been in public life all this time – a lot of things had happened, and she just accepted it.

But I have to tell you, in the back of the plane with the staff and the press, there was an awful lot of drinking on that flight home. The follow up to that is, the guy who hit her arm, as you know was a gay guy…

Smith: Yeah, Oliver Sipe, I think was his name.

Nessen: Oliver Sipple.

Smith: Okay. A veteran?

Nessen: Yeah, a veteran, and, as you know, there was a controversy and why they did this, I don’t have any idea. I guess times were different then maybe. But they did not invite him to the White House. I think it was wrong. I thought it wrong then, but times were different then.

But I’ll tell you one other thing, the next week Time Magazine, of course gave extensive coverage to this, and they had a replica showing the path of the bullet, and, as you know, the bullet hit the façade of the hotel, ricocheted down, hit the curb, and then sort of shattered into pieces. Well, looking at the chart in “Time” I figured out where Lukash and I were, and that bullet went just like that in front of us.

Smith: It is interesting that in later years, I think he is the only president to this day, who has actually put his name on a petition for gay rights.

Nessen: Yeah.
Smith: And you wonder whether he changed, whether it was just the political constraints of the time, and – it was a different culture.

Nessen: I just think that, again, you have to look at the influence that Betty had over him, and the fact that he had four kids, three of them young and living in the White House at the time, so he was exposed to popular culture, and so forth.

Smith: Did you know she had a problem? And what was the problem?

Nessen: Yeah. Well, I think everyone, including the Fords, was in denial. And you see, at the end of the day, a travel day or whatever, she obviously had a problem. And I don’t know whether anybody really knew precisely what the problem was, but you could not escape it - that she had a problem.

Smith: Did she enjoy life in the White House?

Nessen: In many ways, it was a better life because she got to see Ford more. When he was a Republican leader, was in the House, he was literally, always traveling. So now, when he came home, he just went upstairs and there he was, and I think she saw a lot more of him. And you’ve got people to help you, and so forth. I was not that intimate with the inner workings of the family, but my sense is that she did enjoy that period.

Smith: Were you on the job when she had her breast cancer surgery?

Nessen: Yes, I was.

Smith: That must have been a shock.

Nessen: Lukash called me on a Friday night, I think it was, and said, “Mrs. Ford is going to go into Bethesda Naval in the morning for a biopsy,” or whatever you call it. So I notified the press and we had a pool to go with us and arranged a press room out there and so forth. So she goes in and they discover that she has a malignant tumor and they are going to do a mastectomy. Now she sent word that she wanted this to be announced while she was still on the operating table. And that’s what we did. Now, that’s candor. That’s really candor, and it was her own decision. So we went out there into the briefing room they had set up and I said, “Mrs. Ford is undergoing a mastectomy now.
They discovered a malignancy.” That kind of candor, I think, is extraordinary, but that was her own decision. She sent word herself.

Smith: It’s hard, from this vantage point, all these years later, to realize what a forbidden subject that was.

Nessen: No kidding. And let me tell you how many people, how many women saw that and said, “I think I’d better go for a checkup.” Happy Rockefeller did and discovered she had a malignant tumor, as you know. My mother went and had an examination, and found she had breast cancer, and she had a mastectomy. She is still living at 97, I might add. But you can’t imagine how many women took that as a signal that maybe they’d better go and get a checkup, too. And many women found they had breast cancer. That was really the birth of the awareness of breast cancer, and willingness to talk about it in public.

Smith: That leads into this larger question about her candor. There was the controversy surrounding the Sixty Minutes interview. The sense I have is that the immediate reaction goes back to what we were talking about earlier, the one fighting the last war. The instant reaction from the white males was, “Oh my God!” And then it took a while, but within days came in polling data that suggested that, in fact, a lot of people found her candor very refreshing.

Nessen: You bet.

Smith: It probably was a real problem, particularly on the Right, when you were already facing a challenge. But by 1976 there are all these buttons, “Betty’s Husband for President.”

Nessen: I’ve got one of those at home, incidentally. See, I think this is more an example of the common wisdom is always wrong, than anything else. There was sort of a unified media conclusion and you say, “Well, how do you know that?” And the response is, “Well, everybody knows that.” It’s the common wisdom.

Smith: It’s always been that way.
Nessen: Well, having been a journalist for a long time - and then on the other side, the common wisdom is almost always wrong. This was a case where the common wisdom was wrong, I think. I really believe that.

Smith: It’s amazing, when you look at that interview, even now. She said things in 1975 that I can’t imagine Hillary Clinton saying.

Nessen: Remember, that was 1975. That’s thirty-three years ago, preceded by Patricia Nixon, Pat Nixon. She never talked about anything. She only stood there and smiled, right? Then you had Lady Bird. Now, Lady Bird had as her issue planting beautiful flowers all over Washington. At that time that was an acceptable First Lady’s job, and so forth. You never had a First Lady – it was not traditional for the First Lady to get into policy issues or serious issues.

Smith: So you could understand why that conventional wisdom existed.

Nessen: Yes, but looking back at it from hindsight, you thought, “Oh my God.” In a way that’s a kind of discrimination all by itself – where you think of the First Lady doing anything except planting flowers or having teas, as being, “Oh my God, what’s happening here?” That’s a kind of bigotry, I think. Look, she was who she was. I think of both Ford and Mrs. Ford and the great things they brought to the White House. Again, this just comes back to my saying, he didn’t undergo all those character changes that happens when you lust after the presidency for twenty years. They were just normal people living over in Alexandria. They were going to retire to Palm Springs in two years. She was the same way as he was. They were just ordinary people.

Smith: And isn’t it interesting, it almost took his death for people to see just what an incredible love match that was.

Nessen: Yeah. Well, I’ve seen a lot of first couples, and so forth, and I believe that was a really genuine, deep, abiding love affair. And he used to like to flirt.

Smith: Vicki Carr? Remember the Vicki Carr story?

Nessen: Vicki Carr. Yeah. And I’ve got a picture of that night, actually. That White House thing where she was the singer, and of course, you know the Mrs. Ford quote, which was, “That woman is never coming into my house again.” Well,
I mean, sure, he liked to flirt, but, boy, nothing, nothing, nothing, nothing beyond flirting. I went to the Ford funeral at the National Cathedral, and when she came up the aisle, she looked devastated. When I looked at her, I thought, “I can’t imagine how she’s going to get through this day.” You could just see it on her face and in her body, and so forth. She was devastated, because they had been together for so long.

Smith: At the very end, when she had that last long walk down to the gravesite, and she got out of the wheelchair and managed it…someone said to her the next week, “I don’t know how you did that.” And she said, “That’s what my husband would have wanted.”

Nessen: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Were Ford people naïve in not preparing earlier for the Reagan challenge? Because one senses that either they didn’t really take it seriously, or thought maybe it wouldn’t happen, or he could be bought off. Really, it was pretty late into ’75 before people got serious.

Nessen: Yeah. I don’t know a lot of the personal details, but I think it surprised everybody that a Republican would challenge a sitting Republican president of his own party. And I think there was, perhaps, a little bit of underestimation of Reagan. I think you know what happened was that they went through that primary season, and here’s the mistake, just from a personal point of view, that I think was made. Ford won the primary in New Hampshire, he won it in Illinois, and Florida. So he got a New England state, a Midwestern state and a Southern state. Now, I’m not a politician or a strategist, but, at that point he should have said, “Okay, I have proven that I can win outside of the Congressional district of Michigan. We’re facing a lot of problems in this country right now. You’re going to elect me based on whether I’m a good president, not whether I’m a good candidate. So I’m going to go back to the White House and do my job.” That’s my own personal feeling. But, you know, he had a little bit of the old fire horse in him.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story, a semi-famous Stu Spencer story, which we, thank God, got on camera. He’d [Ford] go out there and the numbers would go down – a lot of people have blamed the speechwriting operation, that really was never very good – and Ford wasn’t a charismatic campaigner. Anyway, they are in the Oval Office, just him and Cheney and the president. Stu is trying to come up with a euphemism, and the president doesn’t understand what he is saying, because he wants to get out there and campaign. And Stu finally says, “Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you are a fucking lousy campaigner.”

Nessen: That sounds like Stu.

Smith: And Ford just sat there and took it. Now, the sequel is what makes the story, because the story appeared in Jules Whitcover’s book, and Stu went ballistic. He called Cheney and really let him have it. Just chewed him out. And Cheney let it run down, and then he says, “Stu, there was a third person in that room.” It had never occurred to Stu that Ford would tell the story on himself. But it does tell you volumes about the guy.

Nessen: So Ford won the first three primaries, and I, and I think others, felt he should have then gone back to the White House and said, “I’m going to run as president, not as a candidate.” But Reagan challenged him week after week after week, and Reagan won some and Ford won some. The convention was in Kansas City that year, the Republican Convention. And Reagan and Ford got there and neither one of them had enough delegates to win the nomination. Ford was staying at the old Muehlebach Hotel, which hadn’t been remodeled then, and Reagan was at the big, modern, I forget which one that is, like a Westin, or something like that. Anyhow, they were meeting with all the delegates, trying to – and Haley Barber, I guess – wasn’t he from Mississippi?

Smith: Clarke Reed.

Nessen: Clarke Reed, was it?

Smith: Clarke Reed was the Mississippi guy, who was famously bought and rebought and doesn’t stay bought, or whatever.
Nessen: I guess it was him, then, that brought the Mississippi delegation over to Ford. That put Ford over the top. So they had a deal, and Ford’s guy was Cheney and Reagan’s guy was – the guy who used to have the PR firm over here on 17th or 19th street – the guy had been with him for ages. Anyhow…

Smith: Lyn Nofziger?

Nessen: No, not Lyn. But Lyn was there. I’ll tell you a Lyn Nofziger story. The deal that they had made ahead of time was that the winner would go to the loser’s hotel as a show of unity. So we go to the hotel and we ride up on the elevator, and they have like the whole floor for the Reagan staff. We walk down this corridor toward the big conference room, and I’m looking in all the doors of these hotel rooms and they’re open, and people are in there crying, crying, crying. Reagan staff people crying.

So anyhow, we get to the conference room and Ford and Reagan sit on this sofa, I guess it’s like a big living room for the suite or for the floor. They sit way down at the far end and talk and you can’t really hear what they are saying. And so, I’m standing there and Nofziger is standing there, sort of shifting from one foot to the other. It’s very, very uncomfortable. And finally, Nofziger says, “You want a drink?” And before I could realize what I was saying, I said, “Lyn, that’s the nicest thing you’ve ever said.” I thought, oh wait a minute, I didn’t mean that.

But anyhow, I’ve always felt two things: one, that Reagan really cost Ford the election by dragging out this primary season for so long. And the second thing he did was, he didn’t campaign for Ford, really, in that year. He just went back to California and that was it.

Smith: It is still being debated by some people in terms of the ground rules for that meeting, because my understanding is that the Reagan people made it abundantly clear, early on, don’t ask him to be on the ticket. And after the fact, there were members of the Reagan Kitchen Cabinet…

Nessen: Who said, “How come he didn’t ask him to be on the ticket?” Yeah, I’ve heard that same story. To my knowledge, Ford didn’t ask Reagan to be on the ticket. There was a promise, and he kept the promise. Ford didn’t ask him to be on the ticket. And then the Reagan people complained about how come they didn’t…and if he’d been on the ticket, you would have won.

Smith: Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that Don Rumsfeld did him in.

Nessen: I’m not sure who did him in. Somebody did him in. But, again, there were all these feuds, these internal, endless fights among Ford’s staff people - whether you were with Ford when he was in Congress, or you just joined when he was vice president, or you’d never been with Ford before, and so forth and so on.

I’ve heard all kinds of stories about that, and I guess the story that sounds rightest to me is, somebody, and maybe you know who it was, came to Ford and said, “You can’t win the Southern states if you have Rockefeller on the ticket.”

Smith: Now is that a reference to the convention? In other words, you won’t be nominated if Rockefeller is on…

Nessen: Right, I think that’s right. And Ford wanted to win, and so he – Rockefeller was very gracious about it.

Smith: Probably he wasn’t, privately.

Nessen: I can imagine. And who did he blame? Did he blame Rumsfeld?

Smith: He blamed Rumsfeld. He went to his grave blaming Rumsfeld Nessen: You know, Rumsfeld was so competitive with so many people, and I’m sure you know this, that at least one theory is that the reason he opposed Rockefeller is because he wanted to be the vice presidential candidate himself.

Smith: Right. And he had a reputation of being an extraordinarily skilled in-fighter, who never left fingerprints.

Nessen: Absolutely.

Smith: Didn’t sign things.
Nessen: Correct. That’s the Rumsfeld that I saw. Look, I’m a fan of Rumsfeld because I think, given what he inherited, the mess he inherited there, he got the Ford White House up and running. He sorted out the whole thing about leftover Nixon people, and so forth. I am a fan of Rumsfeld. But, on the other hand, I think during that period, at least, he was looking out in part for Don Rumsfeld.

Smith: I also think Rockefeller, though, was naïve. I don’t think Rockefeller was completely honest with himself about why he took the job. Someone who knew him very well and spent fifteen minutes on the phone trying to talk him out of it, finally exhausted all the intellectual arguments, and Rockefeller said, “But you don’t understand. This is my last chance.”

Nessen: Well, you don’t go into politics unless you’ve got a healthy ego, do you?

Smith: Did you sense, there was Greenspan, Simon, the whole New York City bailout – that was also a flashpoint where at least an effort was made to portray the vice president as being off the reservation. I talked to Bill Seidman who said that at the speech at the Press Club, there was a tug of war, and that one draft would go to the president, and basically it was Greenspan and Simon who were trying to, in effect, beat up on New York. And then Seidman would rewrite it and…

Nessen: I’m a huge fan of Seidman, and I think he was one of the most clear headed people – he was the least competitive of people. He was the part of the Ford staff that had come with him from Grand Rapids.

Smith: Do you think he suffered from the “Grand Rapids” connotation?

Nessen: I don’t know, I think in many ways the best people were – Phil Buchen, terrific guy, I think, and Seidman, who I’m a huge fan of. You can make the argument that the best people were the Grand Rapids people.

Smith: The debate and the Polish gaffe. How bad was that? Did you know instantly that you had a problem?

Nessen: Here’s what happened. Ford was anticipating a question about the Sonnenfeldt Doctrine. Hal Sonnenfeldt is here at Brookings now. We have lunch often and talk about this. The Sonnenfeldt Doctrine was: we ought to let up some of the pressure on the Soviet Union along the Iron Curtain. And if we kind of eased up on the pressure, the Soviets would be more accommodating, and less stringent on how they ruled the satellite countries. So that was the Sonnenfeldt Doctrine.

Smith: And Helsinki was part of all this, in effect?

Nessen: Well, Helsinki was – what was the timing of Helsinki?

Smith: Helsinki was the fall of ’75.

Nessen: Okay, so that was before the debates.

Smith: Yes.

Nessen: Here’s how the Helsinki Accords came in – that the Helsinki Accords talked about easing up on the Iron Curtain countries. But what happened with the debate was that Ford was primed to say, “We don’t recognize the Soviet Union’s right to dominate these countries. We don’t recognize the Iron Curtain as being legitimate,” or whatever. That was what he was supposed to say. The New York Times guy asked the question in a slightly different form than Ford had anticipated, so Ford got kind of thrown off. You know how the practices and rehearsals for these go – you get all kinds of questions thrown at you and then you sort of shape your answers. So the question was asked in a slightly different form, and the way it turned out, instead of saying, “We don’t recognize Soviet domination of Eastern Europe,” he said, “the Soviet Union does not dominate Eastern Europe.” Okay, ok, this was in San Francisco at the Cow Palace – no, not at the Cow Palace, I forget where the hell the thing was.

But any case, after the debate we would always have a press briefing, as they do now. They’re called spin rooms now, but we called it a briefing, in which you’d say, “Oh my God, Ford just wiped up the floor with him!” So, of course the staff had a little huddle in the lobby of the hotel – it was in the Holiday Inn before we went into this briefing. And I think it was Scowcroft who said, “Look, before we start talking about how to spin this thing, let’s make sure we understand, the president made a mistake, and we ought to acknowledge that. Tell them “it was a slip of the tongue, of course, he knows…” Well, we didn’t do that. And so, overnight, this was a huge thing.

Smith: Could you have done that without getting his permission?

Nessen: No, but here’s what happened. The next day, Cheney and I, when he was on the road, would have the equivalent of a staff meeting with him in the morning. So Cheney and I go into see him the morning after the debate and I don’t know if it was me or Cheney, who said to Ford, “You know, you made a little mistake last night, you said the Soviet Union doesn’t dominate Eastern Europe, and what we’re going to do is, we’re going to put out a statement saying, ‘He didn’t exactly word that correctly. Obviously, he knows that the Soviet Union…’ And Ford, as I know you must know from talking to other people, he could have a little bit of a stubborn streak. And I can hear this in my head to this day, he says, “I’m not inclined to do that.” If the president doesn’t want you to do that, you can’t do that.

Well the story went on for a week, it totally dominated the news. No matter what we did or said, that was the story. And so finally, after a week, I was authorized to go out there and say, “Of course, the president knows that the Soviet Union dominates Eastern Europe. It was a slip of the tongue.” But by then the damage had been done, and the damage was: Ford didn’t know what was going on. It reinforced – this is why gaffes and so forth can be dangerous in Washington, if they reinforce a stereotype. And the stereotype of Ford was, he wasn’t too bright. So this reinforced that idea.

Smith: Tell me about his intelligence.

Nessen: Well, look, there are all kinds of intelligence, right? And I just don’t see how you can serve for thirty years in Washington, have the responsible positions he had, and by history’s judgment, thirty years later, turn out to be a pretty damn good president in difficult times. What kind of intelligence does it take? Who was, arguably, the smartest president we ever had? Jimmy Carter. Was he a good president? He was certainly the best educated. Smartest, highest IQ president we had, but was he the best?
At the other end of the scale, I don’t know. Who do you want to pick? Ronald Reagan? Pretty damn good president. He had the kind of intelligence that you need to be president, and I think – I have no idea what Ford’s IQ was, I know he went to the University of Michigan, he went to the Yale law school. You can’t exactly be a dummy and go to the Yale law school.

He was chosen as a leader by his colleagues in Congress. I remember one of the early decisions that Ford made was, if he was having a news conference or something like that, the White House tradition had been, he sits at his desk, and the senior staff sits around him, and you fire questions at him that he’s likely to get asked, and see how well he can answer them. That’s the rehearsal. He didn’t want that. He wanted a written list of probable questions and he wanted a briefing book – not with the answers, but with all the background information, so he could absorb it and craft his answers. So, intelligence, he had the kind of intelligence that it takes to be a good president.

Smith: And, the last president to brief the budget.

Nessen: Exactly. And this was part of the strategy. Because all these stories: Ford’s too dumb, Ford’s too dumb, Ford’s too dumb…and so the decision was; who knows the budget better than he? Been on the appropriations committee all those years. Dealt with the budget every single year. And he went out there and he was masterful. It was over in the State Department auditorium, if I remember correctly. I had actually forgotten that until you just reminded me. But that was part of the effort to show that he certainly was smart.

Smith: After the election, did it take him a while to bounce back?

Nessen: Ford had never lost an election in his life. He won, what, fifteen terms in the House? He became vice president of the United States without ever running for it, president of the United States without ever running. Never wanted to be, never anticipated being, but he never lost an election. When he and Betty came out to the press room, I guess it was eleven o’clock at night or whatever, to concede the election to Carter, his face was unbelievable. I mean, it was stricken. And I’d forgotten this until I did some research for my own book, he couldn’t read the concession speech himself. He asked Betty to read it for him. He was just stricken. It was the first time that he had ever lost an election. He’d thought he’d done a good job and he had been rejected in favor of this one term peanut farmer from Georgia. He was stricken, but I think he bounced back and found useful things to do in his life. He wrote a pretty good book.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Nessen: I’m trying to think whether it was – he used to come to Washington once a year in the spring for a staff reunion, and I guess he had meetings of the Gerald Ford Foundation, or whatever. So I can’t remember if it was at one of the Ford dinners, or whether I was out in California and I drove down to Palm Springs to visit with them. I guess the last time I saw him in person, I think, was at one of the staff reunion dinners. For the last two or three years of his life, he couldn’t really travel, and he and Betty would appear on closed circuit television. But, he got old and…

Smith: But he had the satisfaction of knowing that…

Nessen: You know, this is the great thing, and when, you think about the Kissinger theory – that it takes 30 years of subsequent history before you can accurately assess presidents and events, there are not many presidents who live to get to that point where history reappraises them. And I think the magic moment must have come when the Kennedy family gave Ford the award, the public service award.

Smith: Yeah, it was.

Nessen: And I just think it’s wonderful that he did live to see it.

Smith: And then a month before he dies, Rumsfeld tells him about the aircraft carrier that’s going to be named – a new class, too. So it rounds it out almost…you could write it.

Nessen: So many presidents have left office broken hearted, and didn’t live to see their reputations restored.
Smith: Think about LBJ.

Nessen: I know. I covered the Johnson administration and, I’m sure you’ve heard the Johnson tapes, and the thing that comes through in those tapes was, to me – when Lady Bird asked Beschloss to listen to those tapes and tell her – because Johnson had said you can’t release these tapes for fifty years, and historians were beginning to criticize him and write books about how bad he was and so forth. So she wanted to release the tapes early and she asked Beschloss’ advice. He knew I had covered the White House and we had been friends. He said, “Would you listen to these and just let me know if anything is there?”

So I took them home with me one night. And I thought, well, I’ll listen to five minutes and another five minutes and…three hours later, Richard, I’m sitting here, riveted. The thing that comes through is, this big, tough, rough, Texan was full of self-doubts and I think the most amazing tape is the one where he calls Lady Bird up in the mansion, and he says, “Oh, Bird, I’m having this event out here on the South Lawn. Can you just come and stand next to me?” And she says, “Oh, Lyndon, I’ve got a dentist appointment. I just can’t do it.” And he begs her, he begs her. He needed her support. He was a very, very complex man.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this.

Donaldson: No, I’m delighted.

Smith: First thing I’d love to ask you is, for people who were not around, take us back and give us a sense of what the mood was like in this town after the ’72 election, as Watergate began to be more than a blip on the horizon.

Donaldson: I think when the burglary occurred people were perplexed. What were these Cubans doing there in the office of the DNC chairman, etc., etc. As the story developed, more and more people began to suspect that the president of the United States might somehow be involved. A terrible thing. We watched the Erwin hearing. We had previously not seen John Sirica, the maximum penalty judge, extract from one of the defendants in that initial trial, that there were higher ups involved. And then we watched the impeachment investigation of the House Judiciary Committee. And by the time it came to the crux in the summer of 1974, the country was just convinced that Richard Nixon was a terrible man. His famous phrase of, “The country needs to know whether their president’s a crook. I am not a crook.” We all thought, yes you are, you are a crook.

And then when he resigned, of course, it was just a breathtaking event.

Smith: Where were you during this period? What were you doing?

Donaldson: I was the Watergate correspondent for ABC News. Not the White House correspondent, but I covered the trial, I covered the Sam Erwin hearings, I covered the impeachment investigation in the House. And when it all started, I thought – well, I had my view of Richard Nixon as a real sharpie when it came to politics. He came to power first in the House by accusing his Democratic opponent of being a Communist sympathizer, and all during the way we all kind of knew what he was. But I thought he can’t possibly be involved in this. That’s just too horrendous.

Smith: And too stupid?

Donaldson: Too stupid? Of course, stupid. But Nixon, of course, saw enemies everywhere and his Golden Rule, if there was one, “Do unto them before they have a chance to do unto you.” Rather than the one that we think of as the Golden Rule. Yes, it was stupid. His defense, as we know, in listening to the Frost interviews and in the things he wrote, was basically, he was protecting his men. He was being loyal to his people. But if we listen to his tapes in the Oval Office, ultimately, he was protecting himself, and that’s quite clear.

Smith: I guess it’s safe to say, we still don’t know who ordered the break in or why. Do you have a theory?

Donaldson: Well, I accept the fact that the break in was the work of what’s his name – help me out Richard – been on radio, he’s the tough guy –

Smith: Gordon Liddy.

Donaldson: Gordon Liddy. I still believe that Gordon Liddy came up with the idea. No one said come up with an idea of how we can find out what Larry O’Brien is up to. We suspect there is something going on there we should know. He came up with the idea of breaking into the office. Did John Mitchell know? There’s no great evidence. Jeff Magruder? That’s a different case. And whether Richard Nixon, in fact, ordered it, or whether it was just a case of “will someone rid me of this meddlesome priest?” I’ve seen no evidence that says he ordered it.

Smith: We did an interview recently with Jerry Jones, who was Al Haig’s chief deputy. It was fascinating. Very candid. And he has come to the conclusion, just as theory, that Nixon did know about the break in – that it was all about the old Howard Hughes loans to Nixon’s brother and Larry O’Brien supposedly had evidence of this.

Donaldson: That’s right.
Smith: But, just one more theory.

Donaldson: Well, but here’s the thing: Nixon was a strategist, not a tactician, necessarily. He may have said to the right people, “We’ve got to find out what Larry O’Brien has, we can’t be surprised by something. We’ve got to know what he knows. See if you can find it out.” But that Richard would sit there and say, “Look, here’s my idea: we’ll find some people who are trustworthy, and we’ll have them break in to O’Brien’s office in the Watergate complex. Well, could it be done?” I just don’t think that he, personally…but we don’t know. I don’t know.

Smith: Do you think we ever will? Is there someone out there, or is there a tape we haven’t heard?

Donaldson: That’s like the same thing as saying that I’d like to be at Fidel’s bedside when he draws his last, and say, “Fidel, you’re drawing your last. Did you do it to John Kennedy?” And listen for the answer. I don’t know that there is any witness now who could have spoken, and who would have spoken, who will now speak, or who has in his will or in his memoirs to be published twenty-five years after his death, give us the answer to that.

Smith: Do you think John Mitchell took some secrets with him to the grave?

Donaldson: Probably. Yes. I think Mitchell was basically loyal to the end. There were some anomalies there that were – I mean, thieves fall out - but I think he did, yes.

Smith: This is a little off to the side, but, the competition between, clearly this was seen at the time, as Woodward and Bernstein’s story. You were working for a different organization, and the networks were obviously trying to make this story. What kind of competition was going on within the journalistic community?

Donaldson: Well, I’m ashamed to say that from the standpoint of my efforts, they were basically following the newspaper’s stories. Oh, yes, I would try to do a little something on them, but I don’t think any of us – now there were other newspaper reporters who deserve some credit - not just Woodward and Bernstein. LA Times did some yeoman work, for instance. Even the New York Times, but I think most of us during that period were simply following the stories that appeared in the newspapers, and trying to do what we could to enlarge on them. But I didn’t ever successfully break a big part of the Watergate story.

Smith: In today’s media climate where newspapers are closing their Washington bureaus and cutting back, do you think Watergate could happen again? Do you think the way that the story unraveled and played itself out over those two years could happen?

Donaldson: Well, I think the ultimate outcome might be the same. But there might not be a Woodward and Bernstein – two kids who had no right to be given this huge story – and their senior correspondents, once they saw what they were on to tried get it away from them, [if it wasn’t for] Ben Bradlee that kept the boys in the story, as he said. And the reason I think the ultimate outcome would be the same, is that I know you know, it was the establishment that brought Richard Nixon down. The newspapers and the press did some work, but even without those kinds of stories, I think John J. Sirica, being a man of some intelligence - I got to know him pretty well – would have said, “It can’t just be these guys. There’s got to be someone and I’m going to put the screws to them.” As he did. And McCord then came forward, would have come forward with a letter and the rest would have been history.

Smith: Do you think Sirica is one of the unsung heroes of Watergate?

Donaldson: Oh, absolutely. He’d taken this as a routine burglary, and had the prosecution handled it that way, and they – let us say – would have been convicted, of course, and given them a light sentence, the normal sentence for something like that. That would have been the end of it.

Smith: And then, of course, in the middle of all this, you have a vice president who gets into trouble. One of the remarkable things Jones told us was that, before Haldeman and Erlichman left, which would have been April of ’73.

Donaldson: Two of the finest public servants I’ve ever known…
Smith: He called Jones, who was then running the personnel office at Haldeman’s behalf – reorganized it – asked him how many jobs reported directly to the vice president, and Jones did some figuring and came back with about fifty. He said, “Good. I want letters of resignation from everyone on the staff.” Which meant they knew before they left that Agnew could be in trouble. This in April and the story broke, I think, in the Wall Street Journal in August, which is pretty remarkable if you stop and think about it.

Donaldson: Attorney General Richardson had been investigating for some time, and it led to Agnew. I got to know Spiro Agnew when he was running for governor of Maryland, county executive of Baltimore County, and I don’t know of any evidence that has been uncovered that when he was county executive, it was pay for play or it was this, that, and the other. It may have been there. And when he became governor of Maryland, he was the reform governor. He saved Maryland from George P. Mahoney – “Your Home is Your Castle – Protect It,” said George P. Mahoney. And clearly it was a racial thing he was playing on. And Agnew was a good, progressive governor – reformed the income tax system and all of that.

My theory is, that when he got in power as governor, he learned that what some governors do in Maryland is – do this, do that, and what have you – and, why not? It’s like Illinois today. That’s the way we do it! And, of course, he wanted Rockefeller to be the Republican nominee until Rocky embarrassed him by not telling him – I was there in the room. He calls in reporters together to watch Rockefeller to announce that he was going to run for president. And Rockefeller announced he was not going to run for president. Spiro Agnew’s face just turned red as a beet in his governor’s office in Annapolis. Later then, of course Rocky changed his mind, but by this time Louise Gore has introduced Governor Agnew to Richard Nixon, and the rest is history there.

Smith: As you know, I’m working on a biography of Rockefeller, and it’s still a mystery as to whether he was supposed to be called that morning. And it’s one more of those things that, frankly, for all of their numbers and money and resources, they couldn’t elect a president, they couldn’t nominate a president.

Donaldson: They don’t claim that they called Agnew, do they?
Smith: They don’t. The best story that I can get is, that – and this again testifies to, in some ways, their ineptitude – they decided not to call him because he would leak the news.

Donaldson: Oh, it might have leaked, it probably would have leaked.

Smith: And at that point they figured they weren’t going to run so…

Donaldson: Agnew was the kind of person that that kind of insult, that kind of slight, he took it very personally, really. The Greek in him, I suppose. And then when Louise Gore introduced him to Nixon, they got along famously.

Smith: Now, she was the Republican power? She was the National Committee Woman from Maryland?

Donaldson: Yes, and a distant relation to Al Gore.

Smith: That’s right.

Donaldson: And she was very important in Maryland politics on the conservative Republican side, obviously.

Smith: Were you surprised – did you pick up rumors that Agnew was in trouble before, for example, the Wall Street Journal story ran?

Donaldson: Oh, there was a little gossip, but nothing you could hang your hat on. And I guess the short answer is, no, I wasn’t onto the story, or I would have tried to do it.

Smith: When Agnew resigns, we now know it’s pretty clear that Nixon would have liked to have appointed John Connally, and it was made pretty clear that that wouldn’t fly up on the Hill.

Donaldson: He had to listen to the Republican Party chiefs who just said to him, “We’ll never accept this. It won’t work.”

Smith: Rockefeller and Reagan, each for their own reasons, sort of cancelled each other out. And, as I understand it, Carl Albert and others made it clear that, if you want someone who’s confirmable, pick Jerry Ford. Had you had contact with Ford at that point?
Donaldson: Yes.

Smith: Tell me when you first…

Donaldson: I first met Jerry Ford when the Ev and Charlie Show fell apart because Charlie, Charles Halleck, the Republican Leader of the House, was upended by Gerald Ford and the Young Turks. And so, Everett McKinley Dirksen, and now Gerald Ford, would hold weekly news conferences and we’d all go – I was covering the Congress to some extent at that time. I don’t remember a thing that happened, except that they both talked about the Republican line and legislation and answered our questions. And then, one of my profound memories was, I guess, 1970, when Gerald Ford had the task of trying to impeach Justice Douglas. And I believe, and I think I can demonstrate that, that the White House asked him to – other people asked him to. I do not think it was his original idea, but he fell to it with a will. Justice Douglas maybe had been a Communist sympathizer to some extent, no one on that side of the aisle liked his decisions. He kept marrying young women, 30 and 40 years younger than he was, and terrible…

Smith: I actually think what offended Ford more than any of his decisions, remember – people have forgotten, remember the Justice ran articles in the Evergreen Review.

Donaldson: The Evergreen Magazine! The article, I recall, was on forestry or something, but the Evergreen was a magazine - a little titillating. Today we’d think it was just common, family fare almost, but not in those days. And I agree with you, I’m not saying that Ford didn’t believe in what he was doing, but I think there were other forces involved.

In anticipation of talking to you today, because I thought I remembered something when Douglas resigned from the court, and, sure enough, I remembered the letter that President Ford then wrote back to Justice Douglas and it is the most warm and salutary letter, warm admiration for your valiant effort to carry on…nation’s gratitude for service…distinguished years of service…a lifetime of dedicated public service matched by few Americans…on and on. I thought, as I read the letter, Gerald Ford was saying, in effect, you know, I really didn’t think you were that bad a guy. Plus the fact that if you know Gerald Ford, he was not a mean man.

Smith: He also invited Justice Douglas to the White House for dinner. And he made sure they shook hands.

Donaldson: I think in retrospect, he was a little embarrassed, maybe. Maybe he thought he’d gone over the top.

Smith: It wasn’t his style.

Donaldson: It wasn’t his style, that’s exactly right.

Smith: What was his style?

Donaldson: Well, to see him, very affable, that great big grin, that smile and laughter and all of this. Now he was a very strong conservative, no question about it, when I knew him in the House of Representatives. But I must tell you, by the standards of the strongest conservatives of his party today, he was a moderate, even showing maybe a liberal tendency now and then. It was a different day, it wasn’t quite live and let live, there was great partisanship and he was a partisan. And yet, he, like other leaders on both sides in that day, understood that in the final analysis, you move legislation forward after you’ve gotten as many concessions from the dominant Democratic Party as you could. Then, unless you really had a matter of principle there, you understood that – I couldn’t tell you, but left to his own devises with no whip ordered – he would have voted for the stimulus bill – not really thinking it was the right way to go, but understanding that you’ve got to do something. Standing here is not an option, and that apparently is the best deal you could get with the Democrats in charge, so he’d signed off.

Smith: I’m jumping ahead here, but I remember at the time of his death, being a little surprised by the degree of surprise that some journalists showed toward the response. Which, as the week went on, only seemed to build, and I think it was in large measure, the fact that a lot of people who weren’t even alive when he was in the White House, were being introduced to this guy for the first time, and they were comparing him with the tone of politics in this town.
And he looked pretty good. And beyond that, that was a time when the country desperately needed to feel good about itself.

Donaldson: That’s the thing. I think history, and we see all the historians, you among them, placing presidents and all of that, I think as time goes by, there will be a greater appreciation of what he did for this country in just about two and a half years.

First of all, with Nixon’s resignation at a time when it was clear that we’d lost the Vietnam War, with tails between our legs, according to many people who still, to this day won’t understand what happened, desperately needed something to pull us out of this feeling about ourselves. This is America – we never felt this way after World War II, of course. And it was Gerald Ford, this warm, considerate, affable, but not weak man at all – I’ll never forget his line, “I am a Ford, not a Lincoln.” Alright – playing on the name, but what he said was, “I’m going to do a good job here. I may not be Abraham Lincoln, but I’m someone who knows how to do it.” And he did know how to do it.

I think his place in history will be much larger than it is today, because he really held the country together. It was his greatest accomplishment to me that in a time of great national upset and questioning, he was reassuring that we are still a good people and a great country, and we went forward.

Smith: You’re right. It’s funny, if you just look at the difference in the mood in America between the summer of ’74 and the Bicentennial summer of ’76. We weren’t just going through the motions of celebrating in ’76 – there was the sense that there was something to celebrate. Ironically, we’d tested our Constitutional institutions and found that they worked.

Donaldson: And I had never heard, then or since, really, a president deliver a State of Union message and say, “The State of the Union is not good.” Well, it’s true! And he detailed unemployment, he buttressed his statement with the facts. Presidents that try to pretend that the rest of us don’t know the facts are kidding themselves.

Smith: You are absolutely right. But you haven’t heard a president say it since, have you?
Donaldson: No. Of course, I haven’t heard a president until this time say, “I screwed up,” so I’m prepared.

Smith: Plus, wow, a budget with real numbers! The war is, all of a sudden, on budget, and...

Donaldson: Amazing.

Smith: Ford would have approved so much of Obama’s effort to reach across the aisle. And to restore some degree of civility to this town.

Donaldson: And that’s what I’m saying. I think Ford, in the House of Representatives, would have responded. Oh, no - give up all the principles – I’m not saying he would have rolled over for an Obama and all of his programs – of course not. But he would have responded in a tone, and you would have gotten that from him. And I think they could have done deals.

Smith: Where were you on August 8th and 9th of ’74?

Donaldson: Oh, well, I was up on Capitol Hill. We all knew what was in store by then. Everybody knew, but it hadn’t quite been on the record and said. And I was in John Rhodes office earlier the evening of the resignation speech. Now everyone knew I was a reporter, there were no deals made, whatsoever, but Rhodes just sat there and said, “Well, you know, it’s been a long year or two,” or whatever he said, “It’s over now, he’s going to resign tonight, and I regret it but it’s necessary.”

So I excused myself and I went out and I told Frank Reynolds – I think was our anchor, maybe or Howard K. Smith – that I’ve just learned authoritatively that the president will, in fact, resign tonight. Jay Smith, who was one of Rhodes’ great press people, told me later, and I think maybe Rhodes may have even written in his book, that he thought somehow that I had – he didn’t quite say violated ground rules – because he was a smart guy – he knew that there was not ground rules that prevented me from doing that. And we were friends after that. I admire John Rhodes greatly.

Smith: When Nixon said his farewell in the East Room, were you up on the Hill?
Donaldson: I watched. I wasn’t in the East Room.

Smith: Were you up on the Hill?

Donaldson: I watched it on television, I can’t remember where I was. It could have been here in old building, the east building. It was a remarkable speech, of course. Richard Nixon, self-pitying, the business about his mother. I’m sure she was a great lady, but…and then talking about having – when I get to the mountaintop, the valley and all of that. And this enduring symbol of him at the helicopter lives on and on.

Smith: That’s why, whenever we get to anniversary, August 9th is always seen as the anniversary of Richard Nixon’s departure. It’s never seen as the anniversary of Gerald Ford’s presidency. Nixon owns the images.

Donaldson: It had to be. Here was the ‘Trick’ – leaving town. I use the nickname his critics gave him. Here was the Evil One. Remember, Richard, in the streets – people honk, “Jail to the Chief,” honk if you want him to go to jail. All of that. This was a really grim time. His support fell. I was amazed the other day to see valid polls say that George W. Bush had the highest negative rating, not the lowest approval, but the highest negative rating when he left office. I would have thought it would have been Richard Nixon.

Smith: So Ford becomes president and there’s this sort of palpable lifting from the shoulders?

Donaldson: Well, Ford was not well-known in the country. He was well-known in Republican and political circles, but he was not a household name. And I think the majority of Americans probably said, who is this guy? But I think from the very first speech he made – wasn’t it in the East Room? – the very first, people began to say, well we like that tone. We like that. Of course, deeds more than words. But I think that very quickly the country thought this is going to be fine. This is going to be okay. There is someone there that we like.

Smith: I came to the conclusion a long time ago that he was much more sophisticated that he let on. That, in a lot of ways, he was perfectly willing to let people underestimate him. It was almost a Reaganesque quality in that sense. And one evidence of that is, for example, he knew by instinct what he had to do those first few days - that symbolism was substance - and so who does he invite into the White House? He invites the Congressional Black Caucus, he asks George Meany – all of these people who had been basically shut out of the White House. And that’s just says something about – maybe it’s Congress, I don’t know. Maybe it’s that Congressional mindset that you get everyone into the room.

Donaldson: And maybe I am reflecting the ‘inside the Beltway’ mentality that is so reviled, and to some extent properly so, in the rest of the country. But I’ve always thought that when people come to presidency who don’t know Washington, who don’t know how it works here, they have one hand tied behind their backs – and you know the ones I’m talking about. Jimmy Carter, whom I covered, and even Bill Clinton, his first two years were disasters partially because he didn’t know how to make the system work. Gerald Ford, George Herbert Walker Bush, and I think again, history will treat him pretty kindly – or Richard Nixon, but in a more malevolent way, and certainly Lyndon Johnson – these people know how to get it done. And one way of getting it done is reaching across aisle, trying to be ecumenical, at least in tone, if not in spirit.

May I divest? Because you reminded me of something – Ford being underestimated and more sophisticated than people thought. Yes, that’s true, but he also was someone who – you got what you saw. There was not a lot of guile in him, and he was comfortable, so that he didn’t mind not putting on airs. My personal example was when I was working for the local television station here, he was the leader of the Republicans in the House, and I was running a Sunday program and there was not much news, and I got the bright idea that I’d get the Minority Leader. And it was easy to reach him on the phone down here in Alexandria. I got him on the phone and I said, “Congressman, may I come out and interview you for our news night program here on WTLP TV?” Well, he said, “What time do you want to come?” and I said, “Well, this afternoon.” He said, “Well, alright, but you have come during half time of the football game. I’m not going to miss the football game.”

So we showed up, we sat up. Sure enough, the first half ended, he came in, he answered all the questions, and I was watching the watch, he went back to watch the football game. He didn’t mind doing that. If I wanted to go on the air and say, this man will only talk to me at half time, he’d thought it would be fine. He’d probably be right as far as the country was concerned.

Smith: Well, you know what – it carried over into the White House. There are stories of people on Saturdays interrupting a game – a college game or whatever – you didn’t do that. That’s funny. But it’s interesting that he was that accessible.

Donaldson: Oh, very accessible. I was not great shakes – then or now – but the point is, I ran this little program, it was a CBS station, people watched it. Real cable.
But on the other hand, I wasn’t going to do it live. He was really busy, and I wasn’t going to do a lot for the Republican leader of the House.

Smith: There was this notion that there is a Congressional mindset and an executive mindset. That they are two different things. We don’t tend to elect members of Congress, obviously we’ve broken that, and there are a whole bunch of reasons why. Which, presumably affect how they perform when they are in office. Do you have theories as to why?

Donaldson: There is a congressional mindset versus an executive mindset. First of all, there are five hundred and thirty five of them and they realize – although some of them don’t understand this – that one person up there cannot equal one person down at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. And so, collectively, they want to guard their camp. This one other guy wants to say, “I’m the chief,” and their objectives, many times, are different. He now, she someday maybe, represents the whole country, and if they are doing their job properly looks at it from that perspective. And you know, better than I, or certainly as well as I, that these people up there represent their constituents, and their narrow, selfish interests, a lot of the time. And to say to them, “No, you should always think of the whole country,” is unrealistic and is not what our founding fathers set up. The safeguard is that they have to be responsible to their individual constituents.

So I think there is always this tug of war. But I remind people, I’m not the historian that you are, Richard, but our founding fathers said that Article One was the legislature, not the executive. They wanted the legislature to be, if there was going to be, a more powerful of the three branches. They wanted it to be the legislature.

Smith: I would agree with you. But you know, one of the differences – I remember asking Walter Mondale this question, and I liked his response because he agreed with me – but the notion, forty years ago, if you arrived in this town, it didn’t matter if you were Republican or Democrat, you found yourself in a party that had a left and a right wing. Now there were obviously different proportions, but each party, in some ways, was a reflection of the whole country, ideologically. Now they are much more homogenized, and people who say we should have a liberal party or a conservative party, they basically have their wish, although in theory the Democrats now actually have a “conservative” wing. The point being, forty years ago, when you arrived in this town, before you could even hope to pass a bill…

Donaldson: Forty-seven years ago – I worked for the local station.

Smith: Okay, forty-seven years ago – you had to first internally learn how to deal with people who you might not agree with on a lot of things. I remember Bob Dole saying he was advised when he came to town, be sure to sit down with Senator Stennis.

Donaldson: Right.

Smith: Talk to Stennis. Ted Kennedy said when he arrived here, be sure and spend time with Dick Russell. Those people don’t exist anymore.

Donaldson: No, they don’t. And the mindset has changed, of course. I was talking to Cokie last night and a bunch of other people, and we were talking about those days, when her father was Majority Leader, or working up to be Majority Leader in the House, and the ecumenical way that people got together – fight all day, it’s the old cliché, over some issue or something, and then sit down, break bread, tell jokes, like each other’s families. People say, and Cokie agrees, that one of the problem is, today they don’t move their families to Washington. They hang out with four other guys in a rooming house someplace or their office, sometimes – there isn’t this kind of association. I don’t think that’s the strongest thing that makes a difference – I think the strongest thing in this kind of tone that we’re talking about, is the warfare, politics as war, not just as partisan contention that began, I think in the Seventies. And, frankly, I think toward the Eighties, it was the Republicans. Now both sides did it, but it was the Republicans – Newt Gingrich and his backbenchers who wanted to get rid of this go-along Bob Michael and do it by just torching the place, term limits if they could get it. Get the Speaker, Jim Wright, who gave them the sword, I understand that. Destroy the Democrats and do it in the most bitter, partisan way, all things being fair. Well, I don’t think all things are fair in love or war. Certainly not politics.

Smith: Hale Boggs and Gerald Ford used to debate at the National Press Club and the story is, they would drive down together from the Hill, would decide on the way what are we going to debate today; they’d get down there and have their little debate; then they’d go have lunch and a drink and go back to the Hill.

Donaldson: I was at one of those debates. Don’t ask me, again, can you remember who said what – I don’t remember who said what – it was very civil, but strong from the standpoint of each having a point of view. But I tell people, you mentioned Richard Russell – I watched that great debate in the Senate in 1964. I can see Russell now standing in the center aisle – he would move in the center aisle and clap his hands like this when he debated. The leaders of the Southerners’ last stand, with some Republican support to keep segregation, but I never heard anyone call him a name.

I never heard, frankly, although there were moral issues, and people would talk about the moral issues involved, no one ever said, “The Lord’s on my side, and you are Satan.” Which is so commonplace and almost in so many words today. Politics they say is the art of the possible. To me, politics and the way we’re talking about it is making deals. Everyone makes deals. I might make a deal with my wife, I want to stay home, she wants to go out, we reach an accommodation or something. And the people in the country who have been led to believe by some of the people I’ve talked about, that it is so wrong to make any compromise or deal, are helping destroy the political process that moves us ahead.

Smith: People have forgotten, at least at the presidential level – it was the Carter campaign that brought the Evangelical Christians, not the right, but Evangelicals in a major way into political arena.

Donaldson: Yes, in a major way, but they were not – Evangelicals – I covered the Carter campaign – were not in a driver’s seat as far as their desire to turn this nation into, in fact, the Christian nation, not in just the majority of the inhabitants, but in the way government…I mean, I’m convinced that a lot of the Evangelicals don’t want a separation between church and state. They want Italy – only not Catholic.

Smith: What are your memories surrounding the pardon – the Nixon pardon? Did it come as a thunderclap?

Donaldson: Yes. It ought not to have. It was a Sunday that Gerald Ford announced it?

Smith: Let me back up because Ford always said, and there is a touch of, you’re right, he had no guile, the other side of that was, for someone who had been around as long as he had, there was a touch of naiveté about Ford.

Donaldson: Thinking the country would accept it immediately and understand his reasoning?

Smith: Well, he went into his first press conference, and I think it was August 28th and he believed that people were going to want to talk about Cyprus and Greece and the economy and he was taken aback and angry, partly at himself because he didn’t handle it well.

Donaldson: All the questions were Nixon.

Smith: They were all Nixon questions, yeah. And that seems to have been a catalyst – that he told himself, if that’s going to be the experience I have every time I go out and talk to the press…he was obviously getting a lot of information. My understanding is that Leon Jaworski’s office was saying it could take up to two years to bring Nixon to trial.

Donaldson: I sincerely believe that Ford sincerely believed that the business of the country would be harmed if Nixon was pursued. I believe that was his motive. I do not believe there was a deal before he became president at all. I accept that he was naïve. I was one of those at the time that was furious, not at Gerald Ford, but furious at the fact that Nixon had escaped because I think that the majority of the country wanted to pursue him. The majority of country, the reason there were questions, all of them or most of them at that press conference was that we, I wasn’t there, but the reporters were reflecting the majority country view – “We’re going to get the man, he has to pay!” And if you say, well, losing the presidency, the only one in our history, isn’t that…No! that’s not enough. A jury of his peers? Jail! Alright.

Of course Jerry terHorst resigned on principle. Maybe because also he hadn’t been notified far enough in advance about these things. But it was a thunderclap. And I also believe, although there were many factors that cost Ford his election in 1976, and you can say it was this one, it was this one, it was this one, this one – if you had to pick one, it was the Ford pardon.

Smith: I don’t disagree with a thing you say, but then you sort of spool out this kind of counterintuitive school; if there hadn’t been a pardon and Nixon had continued to dominate for two years…

Donaldson: His presidency might have been ruined by that – I understand.

Smith: It’s a no-win situation.

Donaldson: This fork or that fork, since we didn’t take that other fork, we can’t ever know.

Smith: It is understandable, everyone is right now dwelling on the incredible challenges that this president confronts, but we all have such short memories. At least this guy was elected – here you have Gerald Ford, who comes in office, there’s no transition, there’s no honeymoon, there’s not even a real inaugural. He’s got Vietnam, he’s got Nixon, he’s got the severest economic downturn since World War II. In fact, whiplash, because first everyone told him, no, inflation is the problem, and then a few months later everyone said the bottom is falling out of the job market.

Donaldson: WIN!

Smith: Yes. Which actually was concocted in the speechwriting shop of the White House. Alan Greenspan told us all about that. Ford really was dealt a pretty lousy hand.

Donaldson: Yeah, and the State of the Union is not good, let me just enumerate here. He was, he was. That’s just the breaks, uh?

Smith: Oh, sure.

Donaldson: He wouldn’t have been president if there hadn’t been a lousy situation.

Smith: The fall of Saigon. How traumatizing was that?

Donaldson: Oh, for the country, very traumatizing. Again, when we pulled out troops out, Nixon said peace…well, first Kissinger, peace is at hand, before the election – just kind of the icing on the election cake. And then, “Peace with honor,” said Nixon. I can’t speak for the country, I didn’t buy that. You knew what was going to happen. The Vietnamese wanted to live together and we could not stop them from living together and the North had prevailed. And now we know the famous, after a decent interval phrase, I think Kissinger understood very well what he’d done with Le Duc Tho, and when Le Duc Tho didn’t show up to get his peace prize I thought, well the man has got some integrity there. He knows full well that they are going to take over the South.

But when they did it with those awful pictures of the helicopter and Graham Martin with the American flag, the ambassador coming out. And later, Nixon, of course, kind of snidely suggested, well, we had a deal with the South Vietnamese to come to their aid. Thank goodness, Gerald Ford didn’t try to reintroduce Americans…it would have been impossible. The country would have revolted.
Smith: He said that was the worst day of his life as president, and you could understand that. But in some ways – it’s forgotten today – the best chapter was right after the fall of Saigon. Everyone wanted to walk away from this fiasco and forget we ever got mired there. Congress cut the money for resettling refugees, and Ford went through the roof and said, we have this long tradition in America of offering asylum to victims of persecution. And he put together this crazy quilt coalition, the American Jewish Congress, and the AFLCIO, and basically shamed Congress into forking over enough money – they brought 120,000, boatpeople…

Donaldson: But particularly people who we’d let down in so many senses. It wasn’t just someone from ________________, thank goodness we would help them out. We had been an instrument here – we thought for good at first, that’s true. But we’d been an instrument of these people’s plight. We had an obligation to them, I thought.

Smith: The Carter campaign – now when did you join? Was it the fall campaign or were you with him during the spring?

Donaldson: Oh, no, there were people, I guess before me in January of ’76, which now seems very late. But in those days, there were three or four of us still with Governor Carter, who still was thought to have almost no chance.

Smith: What’s the biggest misapprehension about Jimmy Carter?

Donaldson: Oh, I think there are several. One of the misapprehensions is that he was a rabbit – because of the killer rabbit, he was a wimp, in other words. That he was timid, or something like that. Far from it. This guy was going to do it with Sadat and Begin. This guy was going to try to do it. But I think people got it right. He was not a good national politician. He had, I’m told, the engineer’s mind, and you could see that in the small ways from the tennis court, to other ways. He wasn’t a good delegator, which again - put engineers in charge of products and they want to do it themselves and check all of the schematics and the designs.

But he surprised me to some extent, Richard. During the primaries he was pretty good as a primary politician, pressing the flesh, meeting people. We caught on early that he didn’t like small talk, but he could do it, and his message, I can repeat now: “I will never lie to you, I’ll never mislead you, I’ll never dodge a controversial issue.” You see that’s the antidote to Vietnam and Watergate and the CIA investigations that were getting under way. Watergate didn’t hurt us, Vietnam didn’t hurt us, CIA didn’t hurt us, we can prove to the rest of the world, but more importantly to ourselves, that we are a great people. Today it was change for Obama, for him it was, we are a great people.
Don’t feel bad about us.

Smith: Yeah.

Donaldson: And it sold brilliantly, although he had to struggle through those primaries, and on the last day in June there were three big ones: California, New Jersey and Ohio. He lost California and New Jersey. He won Ohio by 7,000 votes and Richard Daley said, “You’re the nominee,” and George Wallace said, “You’re the nominee,” and so therefore, he was. It was a close thing.

Smith: Can you put an ideological label on him?

Donaldson: No, he didn’t have a firm Reagan-like, or Ford-like philosophy. On the other hand, he was not a situationalist. If he had a philosophy it came from his Baptist church and his feeling about morality and that spilled over to public policy also. But you couldn’t – he didn’t win the presidency because he was an ideologue. He wasn’t an ideologue.

Smith: They went into that campaign – obviously the Carter campaign was leading very significantly.

Donaldson: Oh, 18 points and maybe by some polls more after the convention.

Smith: Yeah. And Ford began to chip away at that lead.

Donaldson: Oh, yeah.

Smith: In fact, Mark Shields says the Ford television campaign in ’76 was as good as anything he’s ever seen.

Donaldson: And the Rose Garden Strategy also.
Smith: Yeah.

Donaldson: “I’m the president. I’m tending the public business. Here I am at the White House…” He never quite said, “I don’t have time to go out,” but we got the idea. Jim Baker and others, and Gerald Ford. But remember there’s always push-pull. Ford was doing things right that fall, but Carter was more and more doing things wrong.

So the gap being closed wasn’t Jimmy Carter really making an impression, but Gerald Ford, the faster horse coming up. Ford started speeding up, but Carter started slowing down. And I subscribe, whether it’s one week or two, sometimes we argue the idea, another week or two, and Ford would have been narrowly elected.

I also subscribe, and I told you, the Nixon pardon to me, Ford’s gaffe in the second debate, which he wouldn’t come off of, and that, too, was quintessential Gerald Ford. He thought he was right. I did at least two interviews with him over his lifetime after that, and he once again would tell me what he meant, and in the last one – because I’d gotten to know him pretty well – I said, “Well, President Ford, why did you put it that way? Why didn’t you say that? The way you said it made it sound to a lot of people who didn’t know you, that you didn’t realize that the Soviet tanks were in the street.” And when Kissinger, that night, came and said to him, “Mr. President, you’ve got to now correct this. We have to put out an addendum,” and you said, “No, I meant what I said, Henry.” That cost him five days.

Smith: Yeah. You saw him after he left office?

Donaldson: Oh yes. Not regularly, but on several occasions.

Smith: I wonder, here is a Republican president who would go to the convention every four years, and it’s as if every four years the party had moved further and further away. And I don’t know whether he moved to the left, I don’t know if Mrs. Ford had some impact, but you know, long before he died he was outspokenly pro-choice.

Donaldson: Right.
Smith: He’s the only president yet to put his name on a gay rights petition. I mean, there is this whole host of things…

Donaldson: I didn’t realize that. The pro-choice I knew.

Smith: Yeah. He was very, very outspoken.

Donaldson: I remember, Richard. Barry Goldwater was pro-choice, because he, who wrote The Conscience of a Conservative, and I think Gerald Ford also, believed that government really didn’t have right to interfere with individual liberties like that, even if they thought it was the wrong thing to do.

Smith: And that’s it. There’s the conservatism that says, “I want government out of the board room, I want it out of the school room, I want it out of bedroom.” There is a whole range of issues that frankly, we’re not even comfortable talking about. But if we have to talk about them, we certainly don’t want government to play a role in them. Now you have, particularly social conservatives, who hate government until they can use it to enforce their agenda.

Donaldson: Of course. And there is the hypocrisy of it. And I often wonder, depending on the person, do they understand this dichotomy in their reasoning? Or do they not even see it – do not see what they are doing? Depends on the person. I admire people like Goldwater. Because of a fluke, it’s known that I voted for him. The only vote of mine that I ever been, even to my wife, disclosed. And I admire Gerald Ford, and other people. And Democrats who feel strongly about something, but to thy own self be true, I admire them, too – whether I agree with them or not. These are the leaders who you were talking about. It’s hard to see that they are here today. And I ask myself, is it because I’m older and just thinking of the glory days? Or, in fact, have public leaders changed some?

Smith: Finally, and talking about being in contact with President Ford, you came out to Grand Rapids that day for our conference with the president.

Donaldson: I remember it well.

Smith: What do you remember? We laughed a lot, I know that.
Donaldson: We laughed a lot and I remember some of the people on the panel who were there. And I think wasn’t that the day that he told the wonderful story about running into Richard Nixon at an airport someplace after the ’60 election, and he shook hands and all, and Leno said, “Nixon said to me, ‘You know that inaugural was just wonderful. I would have like to have given it myself.’” And Leno said to him, according to Leno, “You mean the part about ‘ask not…’” “No, no. The part about I, Richard Nixon, do solemnly swear that…” I think he may have made that up.

I remember we also talked about the issues of the day. But I remember basically Gerald Ford being there, and I interviewed him then for my little webcast I had at the time. It was one of the times he repeated again, about how “Don’t you understand what I meant.” And also, once again, talked about the pardon, which I think he was always comfortable with. And I came to believe, long before this moment, that he did the right thing. It’s just in the ferocity of the moment, in the passion of the moment, I was very upset.

Smith: Poor Lyndon Johnson, of course, died four years after leaving office. Ford was fortunate to live long enough to see most people had changed their minds. But what really did it for him was when the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles in Courage Award. He said afterwards, “You know, for twenty years, everywhere I go people have been asking the same question. They don’t ask anymore.” After the Kennedy Library…

Donaldson: Well, when the Kennedys said that was courageous to do…

Smith: You know a funny story? He wasn’t even going to go. He wasn’t going to go to the event. I got a call from Ken Duberstein on behalf of the family saying, “Can you talk to President Ford and make him understand how important this is?” He was getting on in years and it was across the country, and so forth and so on. There was no one less self-dramatizing than Gerald Ford, and no one who was less inclined to lay awake at night wondering what history was going to say about him. It finally took Mrs. Ford to make him understand that this is a big deal. This is the honor of a lifetime. And they went and they had the time of their lives.
Donaldson: Of all the tributes during the week of the funerals, and I was at the cathedral here, I was not out in Grand Rapids, the one that impressed me the most was Jimmy Carter’s because of where it came from, and also because of the words. Again, not a guile in Jimmy Carter. And you could tell when he was heartfelt, when he really meant something, or whether they’d convinced him he had to go through something. I thought that was remarkable. And the relationship that grew up between the two of them – it was a testament to both of them.

Smith: It was amazing because I did the very last eulogy after President Carter, and sitting in the front row…

Donaldson: You were good, but you hadn’t been a president of the United States.

Smith: No, I hadn’t.

Smith: And you know what? In planning the funeral, there was one thing he was adamant about, only one thing: he didn’t want a caisson in the streets of Washington. And then, we made sure that Jimmy Carter was a eulogist, and we wanted a journalist to be a eulogist. It originally was going to be Hugh Sidey, but he passed away, so Tom Brokaw did it. But the point being, to show people today that there was a time not so long ago when presidents and journalists could be friends…

Donaldson: But there is something else about that relationship. Remember the picture just a few days or weeks ago? Five presidents; four of them standing together, and one guy off to the side – Jimmy Carter. He never really fit in, in that way of the club. But it was Gerald Ford that did it. He loved Gerald Ford as he went on. He thought he fit there. And Ford brought him in. Carter ___________ beat Ford. It wasn’t Carter that really reached out and brought Ford in. It was Ford who brought Carter in. What a thing.

Smith: What hit home to me – it was all a fog, when you are up there doing that - but the one thing I’ll never forget, Rosalyn was weeping in the front pew. Which said it all. You can’t fake that.
Donaldson: No, you can’t fake it, see.

Smith: And, clearly, those two families had become very close. Air Force One flew back to Grand Rapids from here, and I could see President Carter picked up one of President Ford’s great grandkids, a little baby really, put him over his shoulder. It was a side of Jimmy Carter I’ve never seen. And was walking up and down the aisle of Air Force One with this infant.

Donaldson: As you can tell from our brief discussion, I liked Jimmy Carter, also. Not so sure his place will rise much in history, though. And I think I see the warts, and saw them at the time, but he was basically, too, a good man who wanted to do good.

Smith: You were talking about the engineer’s mind. There are more parallels between Herbert Hoover and Jimmy Carter. Both very distinguished ex-presidents. Before the Carter Center there was the Hoover Institution.

Donaldson: The relief work that Hoover had done.

Smith: Humanitarian work.

Donaldson: After Hoover left the presidency he was called on in later years, not for economics, but to head commissions.

Smith: He told Harry Truman he’d added ten years to his life. He and Truman became the best of friends. It’s like Carter and Ford – this very odd couple, in some ways.

How do you think Ford should be remembered?

Donaldson: Oh, he’s going to be remembered as someone who really gave the country the lift it needed at a time of grimness, at a time the country didn’t feel good about itself. And someone who did a good job as president, and also as a human being, someone that you liked. I think all those qualities will be there.

Smith: It is interesting though, he went to his grave convinced that he had adversaries, but no enemies. He literally believed he had no enemies. I only heard him speak disparagingly about two people. The worst thing he could say was, that’s a bad man. You know who the two people were?
Donaldson: No, tell me.

Smith: One was Gordon Liddy and the other was John Dean.

Donaldson: Gandhi. I understand Liddy…

Smith: Oh, no! John Dean.

Donaldson: Shewww. I thought you said Gandhi and I almost dropped my teeth!

Smith: It’s ironic you mentioned Gandhi because, you know what? Well, I said in the eulogy, when Time Magazine wanted the greatest man of the century, they asked all these people, and they had two choices. And I thought Ford would say Churchill or Eisenhower, you know. He said, Gandhi, Mahatma Gandhi, the greatest man of the century.

Donaldson: Oh, okay. John Dean. We’re seeing even more evidence that John, a very smart guy, said, “Well, I’m going to have to save myself here. This ship is going down. So, let’s just see how I can do that.” And I imagine, now that you’ve told me this, that was the basis of what Jerry Ford’s dislike for Dean was. He wasn’t turning on Nixon for the good of the country. He was turning on him for his own good, he thought.

Smith: Thank you.

Smith: I believe – correct me if I’m wrong – that the President came on to the Citigroup board in 1998?

Weill: The answer is different than that. I met President Ford in 1980 when he decided not to run against Ronald Reagan for the Republican nomination, and he decided at that point in time to look around at a few companies and probably go on some corporate boards. Which he didn’t want to do if he was going to go back to Washington.

Smith: Did he discuss with you the degree of seriousness with which he had considered running in 1980?

Weill: I met him after he decided not to run.

Smith: Okay.

Weill: So he wouldn’t have discussed the seriousness, or lack of that because I didn’t know him then. And I was told to call him up and he would like to meet with me when he comes to New York. He came to New York in a couple of weeks. And I remember I called him up before he was coming, called him from my house in Greenwich, Connecticut and I remember writing in big print – DO NOT CALL HIM JERRY. CALL HIM MR. PRESIDENT. Because I’d not had too much experience speaking to ex-presidents at that point in time. So I spoke to him, and he was staying at the Waldorf and he agreed to meet. We hit it off pretty well and I invited him to come on the board of my company, which then was called Shearson Loeb Rhoades, which was right before we merged with American Express. And he agreed to do that. So that was the beginning of a business relationship, which became a very important friendship relationship with both he and Betty and members of their family over the next nearly thirty years.
Smith: He took some heat, as you know, for “commercializing” the ex-presidency. And a lot of that was directed at the fact that he served on a number of boards. How would you counter that assertion?

Weill: I would counter it in a major way. I don’t think that he ever sold the fact that he was on boards. Basically, here was somebody that had a unique experience that could be of great advantage to how a company operates. And you’re talking about a person that had the highest ethical standards and moral standards, and an enormous amount of common sense. So I think that he was a major contributor. I don’t think he was commercializing anything, at least as how it related to my company. And my company evolved over time where he came on the board of Shearson Loeb Rhoades in the latter part of 1980. In 1981 we sold our company to American Express, a year later he went on the American Express board, which he stayed on for the next twenty-some odd years.

I left American Express and started a new company called Commercial Credit in ’86. Which in 1998 became Citigroup. So he was on the board of Commercial Credit, which through its name change to Primerica, through its name change to Travelers, to its name change to Citigroup. And stayed on that until a couple of years ago. And we had rules for directors that directors had to retire from the board, first at age 75, then we changed it to 72. Except if you were President of the United States. And if you happened to be President of the United States before you came on the board, you chose when you would leave.

Smith: A nice exception. I’m sure one he appreciated.

Weill: And one that was unique to one person.

Smith: There was this caricature that was built up, between Chevy Chase and some people in the press. Tell me about Gerald Ford’s intelligence.

Weill: I’d be happy to. I think that he was very smart, really with unbelievable common sense that could look at things and come to a conclusion. In a way he was a mentor to me in a lot of things because I learned a lot from him.
Smith: What did you learn from him?

Weill: One of the most important things that I learned from him is to have enough confidence in yourself that you are not afraid to hire people smarter than yourself. I think if you look at Gerald Ford’s presidency – at one time he had working for him Henry Kissinger and Alan Greenspan, just to speak of a few. And you can add Cheney and you can add Rumsfeld, and you can go on down the line. But that didn’t bother him. He knew how to handle them. And if you speak to Greenspan or you speak to Kissinger, of which I’m friendly with both, they will tell you that President Ford knew how to manage them. And so that was a very, very good lesson that I learned from him. And also just his common sense. He was always able to come to the point so that if we were talking about board issues, he was very, very helpful in the conversation.

He had a unique experience in dealing with leaders around the world. One of the things I was incredibly happy about – a couple of things – one of them was that he was able to see, before he died, that the world changed its mind about his pardoning Nixon. Everybody now thought that he did the right thing. And that was so important for America healing. And he knew that that was changed. And I think another thing that was terrific was that my wife and I had the opportunity to be helpful when he was having a hard time in raising the incremental money to build the new building for the Ford school. That we were able to step in and get that done, and he was still able to go to Michigan and see the groundbreaking and know that that was going to be one of his legacies that last into the future.

I remember one of the things that happened that was really funny when he was up there., It happened to be the day of a football game, and he had been an All-American center for Michigan when he played, and he met the current center of Michigan, who weighed 50% more than what President Ford, who we all thought was a big person, weighed when he had that same position.

Smith: How large was your board?

Weill: Our board varied in size from at one point ten or twelve, to as much as eighteen people,— after the merger with Citigroup.
Smith: And for people who don’t know much about corporate governments, what kinds of functions, what kinds of contributions would someone like him make?

Weill: In the 25 years, when he was feeling okay, he just never missed meetings. He never missed phone calls. I mean, one of the contributions that one can make is that you take seriously the fact that this is part of what you are doing. And he was great at that and that was a good example to other people – that this was an important job that you have. He always read the materials, and he added to our conversations, as I’ve said in a very, very important way.

My relationship with he and Betty went to their business thing, but we also traveled around the world together. We were in Asia together in several of the countries. We were in Singapore, we were in Hong Kong. Together we traveled to Hawaii and a lot of cities around the country when we were having events and President Ford would stay there. It was always interesting when Betty, who I think also a great example to women and to Americans in how she discussed her addiction problem. And how nobody would believe her when she was crying out for help. And how she discussed her medical problems, which are things that affect lots of people and women, especially. But we all can relate to it in different ways. And how she can share those things to make the world a better place, and what she went on to build in the Betty Ford Center to help people. Whenever we traveled someplace she always looked for the local AA and made sure she went to that meeting.

Smith: Really?

Weill: Absolutely. Whether it was Hawaii or Scottsdale, or this place or that place, that was the first thing that she did. Betty’s relationship with the President was really one of a lot of love and when the President gave up his pipe, he gave up his gin, and then he finally gave up the white wine. He did all these things which I know, having smoked a pipe and smoked cigars and drank the gin and still drink the wine – it’s not an easy thing to do. I remember once we went snorkeling with them in Hawaii and Betty loved it. For Christmas he called up and said, “Where do you get this kind of gear?” And what should he buy her. And I remember he bought her snorkeling equipment for her birthday to be able to continue doing something like that.

Smith: So it sounds like they were up for the adventurous elements of travel. They were open to new experiences.

Weill: Oh, yeah. And when you say adventurous, when we were in Singapore, which is, I think ’82, Lee Kuan Yew had a dinner for President Ford and Betty. I was fortunate enough to sit at the head table with LKY and his wife, who is a lawyer. I think she just recently died. But it was terrific to be able to participate in that kind of a conversation. And I think we were their first house guests when they built their house in Beaver Creek. I remember when we got invited, Joan, who is my wife, called her mother and said, “Mother, I’m invited to the house of the President of the United States. What do I do?” And her mother said, “Make your bed.”

So we had a very, very important relationship. And when he asked for help with what they were doing at the University of Michigan, to really get this building going, Joan and I said, they were really good friends, we’ll never know another president of the United States like we knew them, we should really go in and make this thing happen so he can see it.

Smith: I know he was enormously grateful. The University of Michigan was really his second home.

Weill: Right, I know. And to see the school flourishing now, I mean, we not only helped with the building, but we endowed the deanship, and there is a terrific dean there now, Susan Collins. She was in Washington and so we’re in contact all the time and how to really do things together with the Ford School to give it the kind of exposure. We’re trying to get people to go out and speak there. We’ve spoken to Frank Zarb about doing some teaching there, and brought Harold Ford out there to give a lecture. So we are involved, not just with a onetime thing in raising money, but in working with them to try and make this the kind of institution that he’d really be proud of.

Smith: Did he have a sense of humor?
Weill: Oh, yes. Absolutely. I remember once we were playing golf together in the old Crosby tournament in Pebble Beach. And it was a par 3, and the President, he shanked it on this Par 3 and the ball went up in the air and into the woods and we heard a clunk. I was praying it was a tree, but it wasn’t a tree, it was a lady’s head. And he went over to apologize, and I thought it was a little funny. And he said to me as we walked up to the green with the ball in his pocket, he said, “Sandy, you’re not going to think this is so funny. You are my insurance carrier.”

Smith: Did he ever say anything that made you think that he was sensitive to the whole Chevy Chase caricature. Here was a guy who was a great natural athlete, yet who had been stereotyped as a bit of a bumbler. Was he sensitive?

Weill: Do you have bad knees? I mean, he really had bad knees. He had both of his knees operated on. I remember his going into sand traps when he had the first one done, and those are pretty hard things to get out of, some of them, when you have two good knees. He had banged himself up, obviously, pretty much as a young man. So to say that somebody is a bumbler for that - I think he was a pretty good athlete and hit the ball strong, and hit the ball far. It didn’t always go in the right direction, and I played a lot of golf with him, so you always stood behind him when he was hitting the ball.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Weill: I’ve seen a controlled part of his temper. I don’t think I ever saw his temper out of control. I’m sure there were plenty of occasions.

Smith: Was it on the golf course?

Weill: Not really. He was a gentleman on the golf course. We played with people that showed their temper on the golf course. Some of them were supposedly professionals.

Smith: He strikes me extraordinarily self-disciplined. Even into his nineties, even up there at Beaver Creek with the altitude being what it was, he swam every day. He really took care of himself.
Weill: That was another thing. My wife is a swimmer and she went swimming in his pool in Beaver Creek. And from that, we ended up building an indoor pool in our home in the Adirondacks in New York State where she could swim all the time in the cool weather. He worked at it all the time. I think he was a pretty good swimmer.

Smith: Did he talk politics much?

Weill: Yeah, not necessarily because he wanted to. But I wanted him to talk politics about why are we doing something like this, or why are we doing something like that? Why can’t people just come together and think, “What is in the interest of our country?” rather than what is in their interest or what is in their party’s interest. And how these parties were migrating away from the system of conventions electing the candidates, and you can get three states like Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and when you get beyond that they’re forgotten. And it’s always chosen by the activists who are at the extreme of both of the parties.

Smith: Most of us as we get older tend to become a little more conservative. There are a number of reasons for that. He seemed to be the opposite in some ways. He was always a fiscal conservative, but I wondered whether it was simply because the Republican Party had moved so much further to the right, or whether Mrs. Ford influenced his views.

Weill: I think she influenced him a lot, as you would expect in people that had a relationship like they did, which was really beautiful. I was speaking to one of their sons, Steve, a few weeks ago. And I asked him how his mother was doing, and he said, “She really missed her best friend.” The only way a person becomes a best friend is a two-way conversation. So I think he listened, plus, he’d had great exposure. And I think he always wanted to learn, and he was in a learning mode through his nineties, really.

Smith: That’s interesting. I also wonder, he was very involved with her in the life of the Betty Ford Center. And to be exposed over and over again to people, good people, friends, successful people, who happened to have a weakness…

Weill: Who is not touched by people that have a weakness like that?
Smith: But I think that quality of compassion really flowered, and maybe that was a factor.

Weill: But one of the things, I think, that Betty taught us all is, you’re better off talking about it than internalizing it and having it churn inside you, so that you also become a victim of that process, rather than being able to speak about it. Maybe you can help somebody else, and in talking about it, you are also helping yourself. And you are getting to think about what you can do that can make it better. And she thought about that a lot and I think it’s terrific that now her daughter has taken over for her at the Betty Ford Center, which is great.

Smith: My sense is that they both really looked forward to their trips to New York.

Weill: Yes.

Smith: This city was a magical place for them. Did you sense that as well?

Weill: Oh, yeah. And Betty loved it, and the President, except for a few days when he was running for president liked it. But this is an exciting city and they had a lot of friends here and it was a chance to get together. Madison Avenue was a great place.

Smith: And they were theatergoers.

Weill: They were theater goers. They always were treated great at the Waldorf, so they felt like New York was like a second or third home for them. When he was on the board of American Express and then what became Citigroup, those are no-slouch companies, or were not no-slouch companies that were really an important part of the American establishment.

Smith: Somewhere I’ve read that he and Secretary Rubin were asked to be involved in a lobbying effort concerning some existing legislation. Is there anything to that?

Weill: There is something to it, but not what you say. I asked President Ford – he was friendly with Phil Gramm who was the Republican leader in the Senate Finance Committee, which is the committee that looked after financial regulation. And I asked him if he could speak to Phil Gramm about why this would make sense – which he did. But Phil Gramm had his own agenda as it related to what President Clinton was doing, and he did not like this program where banks were forced to lend money in the inner cities to clients who were not very good. It was the Community Reinvestment Act. And he wanted that changed in the legislation.

But that was between he and I, and not President Ford. Bob Rubin was a hundred percent against repealing Glass Steagall, for a completely different reason, in that he felt the elected person, the President of the United States, should be appointing the person that’s in charge of how banks operate, because how could they be responsible for an economy if they can’t have something to say about bank lending and what banks are doing to either help the country expand or not.

And so he was okay with repealing Glass-Steagall, as long as the treasury, which is a part that’s appointed - the secretary is appointed by the president - so the Comptroller of the Currency would control what banks do. Whereas Greenspan felt that this should be out of the political arena, and be something that the feds should do because they are not so connected to the presidency. And lots of time they overlap, as a matter of fact. So Greenspan and Rubin couldn’t agree, and when Bob decided to leave Washington, and Larry Summers took his place, Larry didn’t think that this was his biggest issue. And within months, he agreed with Greenspan, and the disagreement ended. And my issues at the end was with Phil Gramm, who told me, if I don’t get the President to move in the next twenty-four hours, he is going to shoot his cannons and this thing is going to be done. And I couldn’t get the President to move, but his cannons didn’t go off.

Smith: You mention about New York City. I’ll never forget, Hugh Carey told me once that he thought President Ford had never gotten the credit he deserved because, in Carey’s opinion, it was a sort of tough love approach with the Beame administration that actually forced the city into making some very difficult, but necessary, decisions.
Weill: That’s correct. And that’s when the watchdog of Big Mac came into being, which helped the city get back on its feet. And listen, we’re all having that very same lesson today in just about every state and municipality in our country. We all have choices, and you can’t spend what you don’t have. So I think we are seeing our President today move closer to that position, and I think President Ford would be happy with seeing a little bit of our working together rather than the tough stuff on both sides, which is not what the people want.

Smith: Can you imagine what he’d think about the deficits? A trillion dollar deficit.

Weill: It got to numbers that were unbelievable. That clock doesn’t work anymore they had in New York which tells you what’s happening to the deficit by the second. But maybe we’re getting our act together. You can’t really cut back on everything when the economy is as weak as this. Personally, I think Europe is making some mistakes in being too tough. But as soon as we stabilize our economy and get it growing again, we’ve got to face these issues, both in the states and in the cities and in our country. Because this is unsustainable.

Smith: So he left the board – when?

Weill: I would say he left it about two years before he died.

Smith: And I assume that was a source of real regret for him?

Weill: But he couldn’t travel anymore, so he wasn’t able to come to the meetings. And it’s hard to keep up with something that is a dynamic process on the telephone. The meetings a lot of times are boring when you are there in person, but they are deadly when you are on the telephone. And to have to sit and listen to three or four hours of a meeting without the screens in front of you and everybody is doing PowerPoint and he didn’t have Skype.

Smith: Oh, well. He was not technologically adept.

Weill: I think adept is the wrong word. I think he ran the country pretty darn good without technology. I could relate to him a lot because to this day, I don’t know how to use a computer, I’ve never had a Blackberry, I never sent emails, which saved me maybe, and I don’t know how to use a calculator. I know how to do modern math and I know how to do something on the back of an envelope. And I think, like him, you communicate when you don’t know how to use all these things. It means you have to communicate with people directly. And that’s how you really find out what’s going on. I don’t think it’s not-adept. We each have to operate in how we think we can do it best, in the most comfortable way for ourselves.

Smith: He learned to play Solitaire on the computer. And he could get email, he just couldn’t reciprocate. Mrs. Ford, on the other hand, apparently was pretty computer literate.

Weill: Well, that’s helpful. Yeah, my wife can do it. And my secretary.

Smith: A perfect division of labor.

Weill: Exactly.

Smith: Did you have a conversation in which he said, “Well, Sandy, I guess I’m going to have to step aside?”

Weill: Yeah. In the last few years we talked about it a little bit. I retired as CEO of the company in September of ’03, and as chairman in April of ’06. And we were talking about it in that period when I was chairman, and then after I had left the company and I think he probably…when did he die?

Smith: He died in December of ’06.

Weill: Then maybe it was in the period when I was still there in ’05 or something like that. But I remember one time when I got a call from Steve, and he said I want to talk to you about my father’s funeral. I said, “What’s the matter? Don’t tell me.” And he said, “We have to plan for his funeral and update it every six months, and this is what the government wants. And Dad wants you to be one of his pallbearers.” And I said, “You don’t have to talk to me about that. How’s his weight?”

Smith: Were you surprised when he died, the amount of public response that there was?
Weill: It was phenomenal.

Smith: Wasn’t it?

Weill: It was really, really terrific.

Smith: Because he’d been out of the public eye for a while.

Weill: But it was happening because the discussions about what he did were more and more about the pardon of Nixon, and about his following up, and the people that he had, and the quality of the staff work that was taking place in that administration. I went to his 90th birthday party, which President Bush had for him at the White House. It was a pretty small party, about 80 or 90 people, and this is the younger Bush. And Bush was pretty funny and the President was very funny, but all of the people from his previous administrations and the ones he worked with in Washington. Even the ones that don’t speak to each other anymore, and are mad at each other, they came.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Weill: I think that he has a unique place in how he became the president; and that he started as a representative from Grand Rapids, Michigan, and worked all the time, and learned a lot as to how the government operated. And then when Agnew resigned, it was really his friend Mel Laird, I think, that helped that process get going and really was working toward having President Ford become the vice president. Then the President had to resign and he became the president. He was somebody that was really, I think, a person of the people, that represented incredible integrity that had been vetted over and over and over again by all kinds of people through a whole history of the United States for a long, long time. And he was a person that I think was pretty misunderstood, but if you look again…

Smith: How so?

Weill: Because people thought that nothing was happening, and yet he took the best of what Nixon had, and got them all to work together in a much more transparent way, so that they were able to accomplish a heck of a lot more. And I think it was unfortunate in my mind who he picked as a running mate, which really didn’t work that well at that point in time. And especially what happened in New York with his Treasury secretary who ate apples every day.

Smith: Oh, Bill Simon.

Weill: Secretary of the Treasury, Bill Simon, who was very adamant. The thing that framed this, “Ford to New York: Drop Dead,” in the Daily News, when really, I think, as Carey said, it was really Ford to New York: This is what you have to do. And if you do that, we’ll work with you. Which is really what ended up happening. But it didn’t happen in time for that election. That election was very close, and New York was not a runaway.

Smith: Do you think – and I realize it is totally speculative – but I’m fascinated to know what you think: Had he kept Rockefeller on the ticket, do you think it might have made the difference in New York? Or in other states?

Weill: Yeah, it’s not something that I like to speculate upon because it’s hard and no real purpose is ever served by “jeez, if I’d wanted this person to be my successor in X city, rather than the person that we ended up choosing, the company might have done a lot better.” What good does that do? That was not the choice, and that was not what happened.

Smith: Right.

Weill: So, recognizing all that, my answer is yes.

Smith: One last thing. If you were going to tell people something surprising, something that maybe most people never really thought about Gerald Ford. Something that maybe went counter to the image, or something that you uniquely, because of your relationship, had an opportunity to learn about the man. What would you say?

Weill: He was a real person. I think if I say something more it takes away from what I just said. Because I think so many of them get carried away with what they are. Bill Clinton said this to me just the other night – that he didn’t know any president, he can’t imagine a person being prepared to be the president; doesn’t care what their experience was. He was a governor of a state for eight years, and he ran something. And he said when he became the president, he had not a clue and the first couple of years showed that. So we now have a president who really didn’t have much experience at all. So it’s on the job training, and even if you’ve had a ton of experience, it’s on the job training.
So President Ford had those two years, but it was a tumultuous time in the country and, listen, could the country have done much better if he was re-elected rather than Jimmy Carter being elected for the next four years. Again,
I don’t want to speculate, but the answer is yes.

Smith: It’s interesting because President Ford felt he had just mastered the job, when he lost it.

Weill: I think that’s probably true. Just think of the people he had.

Smith: No one would have imagined that these two men would become very good friends, which is a wonderful tribute.

Smith: And in fact, members of the former presidents club never quite understood how they could be friends.

Weill: And they each said they were going to go to each other’s funeral. I remember Betty telling me that.

Smith: Right after the election Ford was down, and we’ve been told by more than one person in the White House, he said, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”
He summed it up. A competitive guy.

Weill: Well, you obviously don’t get to be in that position without being competitive. But I think history will have President Ford being one of our very good presidents, although short.

Smith: Perfect. Thank you.

Smith: You were a minority.

Padnos: Yes. A very distinct minority. And it wasn’t easy because I never really felt fully accepted in the community of activity. In other words, we didn’t go to church, I didn’t belong to CE, I didn’t go to catechism, you know, where the other kids went. And, in spite of the welcome that I always received, there wasn’t any feeling of not being equal.

Smith: Let’s go way back to the beginning. Have you always lived in west Michigan?

Padnos: Yes.

Smith: In Holland?

Padnos: Actually, my mother was from Grand Rapids and chose to have me born in Grand Rapids, but the residence was in Holland. She chose Grand Rapids because she didn’t like the looks of the Holland hospital.

Smith: Tell me, because this is obviously very much a part of our effort to paint in the background of Gerald Ford’s west Michigan. How dominant, shall we say, culturally and otherwise, was the Calvinist tradition in west Michigan?

Padnos: I don’t know about necessarily Calvinist. I guess you’d have to include Reform movement in with the Calvinist movement, but in my lifetime there was a distinction between what we call the auf scheiden, which were the Christian reform movement or the scheiden, which were the more liberal Reform movement of which Hope College was a part as differentiated from Calvin College.

There’s a slightly different mentality of acceptance, and to the degree that there’s the very traditional ultra conservatives who pull their shades down in their stores on Sunday, there was no theater, there was no drug store. You couldn’t buy a Sunday paper. You had to go to a more distant location if you wanted a Sunday paper. That sort of thing. So, it was a rather – I’m not saying Grand Rapids was that, but that was my experience in Holland. I think Grand Rapids was ___________ for the fact that the furniture industry brought in a lot of other ethnic peoples, particularly west side Polish peoples. I think the Bissell Carpet Company brought in a lot of hog-tying, bristle-tying people, many of whom were Jewish - brought an immigrant community into Grand Rapids. They gave it a more dynamic cultural exposure.

Smith: That’s fascinating because one of the things we really want to do is try to get a sense of the Grand Rapids that produced Ford. If someone who’d never been to west Michigan before were coming here and they said, “What’s this about the Dutch?”

Padnos: Well, it was a pretty closed society in that cousins, everyone, seemed to be related. It wasn’t that they were intermarried, but they were all from a unique area in the Netherlands, a unique area of the Netherlands that was cloistered and rather controlling and as an outsider you didn’t always… It’s not the nature of the Dutch people to not be hospitable, but hospitality and friendliness are a couple different things.

Smith: Yeah, sort of the difference between courtesy and true acceptance.

Padnos: Yes. My father, for instance, in Holland had no affiliations other than the fact that he was a Legionnaire from World War I and a Mason and those were his two social activities. Obviously he wasn’t comfortable going to church although oftentimes I went to church with neighbors and things like that, but it was not… You were welcome, but not accepted.

Smith: Was there a synagogue anywhere around?

Padnos: Grand Rapids.

Smith: In Grand Rapids?

Padnos: Yeah. My father was a member of the Grand Rapids synagogue, but in those days, to drive 25 miles from Holland to Grand Rapids was a chore. He was not a regular attendant. Maybe that has something to do with my fact that I went to Hope College, in that we weren’t particularly religious people. While my father came from orthodox origin, he wasn’t a religiously practicing Jew. He worked on Sabbath because of necessity. So as a consequence, when I chose to go to Hope College, it was no great event in our life.

Smith: Now, you clearly from a very early age had some interest in politics.

Padnos: Well, that’s true. When I was in high school, I was selected by the American Legion to go to Wolverine Boys State, which was an introduction to politics and to the Detroit School of Politics, which was pretty rough. And I learned how the machine operated.

Smith: In that case, a Democratic machine.

Padnos: Yes, definitely and how they controlled the way things were done. Subsequently, when I went to Hope, I had a political science/history prof by the name of Bruce Raymond who was an activist in the Republican Party. In those days, if you wanted to be a delegate to the Republican Party convention, all you had to do was announce yourself and Bruce Raymond made it possible. Early on, I was a delegate to the Republican Party convention while in college and I used to be the ferry for a number of local Republicans. I drove the car to the conventions in Detroit.

Smith: Let me ask you about one of those because you have talked about a Democratic machine. Legendarily, there was a Republican machine here.

Padnos: Oh definitely.

Smith: Tell us about Frank McKay and that organization.

Padnos: Well, you know, what I know about Frank McKay is hearsay. I know that Frank, I think his name was McCloskey(?) or something like that, and he was a machine politician from the old school. On this side of the state, you wasted your efforts if you were a Democrat, so he pretty much controlled Republican politics. And if you wanted a liquor license or anything like that, you went to see Frank McKay and bought insurance from his company and that’s the way the system operated.

Smith: He had, in effect, a hammerlock on the party.
Padnos: Oh, yes, he did. And Mayor Welsh and people like that were a product of that system. As I understand, Jerry Ford’s dad was a chairman of the Republican Party here in Grand Rapids and he had ancillary groups over in Holland, men whom I got to know. One man in particular was the president of the Holland-Racine Shoe Company who was a political activist and his name was…oh shoot, age gives me a problem there. And one of his associates was Henry Marntz who was also one of my mentors; who was the president of the First National Bank in Holland. Karel Andriessen was the name of the man at the shoe company. Between Karel Andriessen and Henry Marntz, they mentored me in the Republican Party and introduced me to Jerry Ford.

Smith: As I understand it, President Ford’s father was part of a sort of rebellious group of Republicans who were...

Padnos: Obviously must have been.

Smith: …were kind of tired of the McKay…

Padnos: Fight the system.

Smith: Now, that’s interesting. Did you know his father at all?

Padnos: No, I did not. No, that’s where I wondered where my participation… Because Jerry Ford and I were never personal friends. We were good acquaintances. He never ever failed to recognize me whether it be in a large group or whatever, he’d single me out and say “Hello” and that sort of thing, which I treasured. But when he was campaigning…

Smith: Set the scene: In ’48, obviously, he comes back from the war and decides, at some point, he’s going to run for Congress. I’m wondering, that couldn’t have been an overnight decision.

Padnos: You’ve got to know that my brother and I had come out of the service. He appealed to us as a bright, young guy who was going to change things and we’d talk about change and we were trying to change things. We were opposed to the system.

Smith: Including the machine.
Padnos: To the machine, yes. So, we were going to disrupt the machine politics and when Jerry came to western Michigan, he came as an acquaintance of Karel Andriessen and Henry Marntz who introduced us to Jerry, my brother Stuart and I.

Smith: What was he like?

Padnos: Just a nice young guy. A plain, ordinary person that you didn’t feel awkward at all about being with. And so, we took it upon ourselves to introduce Ford to the people whom we knew in the Junior Chamber and places like that where we thought it might make a difference.

Smith: Now, by this point, he was openly running against Jonkman.

Padnos: Well, Jonkman was the incumbent.

Smith: Right.

Padnos: If you’re going to run for Congress, you’re going to run against the incumbent and Jonkman, who I only casually met, struck me as being one of the old school kind of politicians that didn’t appeal to young people.

Smith: It’s interesting. In some ways, that first race is almost a generational contest as much as anything else.

Padnos: Well, very much so. And he represented the conservative, Dutch lineage that – I don’t know that we found objectionable, but that represented the old school. Here we were, young guys and looking for a new fresh breath of air and so he appealed to us. Jerry Ford appealed to us. And so, young people, aggressive young people, we got behind it and tried to do whatever we could to motivate.

Smith: And clearly there was a significant issue in that campaign that divided, in addition to generational differences…

Padnos: In our scenario, did I mention Arthur Vandenberg? Arthur Vandenberg had chosen to leave isolationism and to become international in his aspects. That appealed to us. We were, if you want to reflect back, free traders, that sort of thing. We lived in the international community of existence. And, to the isolationists, that was an anathema.

Smith: How provincial were they in terms of – not looking at the world, the Marshall Plan, and all of these post-war issues?

Padnos: Innovations.

Smith: Right.

Padnos: They weren’t capable of conceptualizing that. It was contrary to everything that they believed in. I mean really believed in. It wasn’t just a – I don’t know how to identify it, I’m at a loss for words, really. But it was a different ideology.

Smith: And a different life experience.

Padnos: Yeah, right. Exactly. It was not within their life experience.

Smith: Whereas you and a whole generation of...

Padnos: Well, my brother Stuart had been to Europe and had been prisoner of war and had experienced a lot of things that without that, you couldn’t possibly understand. I think that our Jewish origin gave us a universalism that didn’t exist in the conservative Protestant ideology. Ford just represented a whole – he captured the Vandenberg spirit, he represented the idea of the Marshall Plan, the rebuilding of Europe, the necessity for all of that.

Smith: It must have been a time, particularly for all you young guys - you’d gone off, you’d seen the world. You’d seen the world at its worst. You’d won. You defeated the most evil enemy imaginable, and you must’ve come back and thought, “We can start the world over again”.

Padnos: Well, my brother’s perspective was broader than mine. I really didn’t understand the Holocaust until after it was revealed. The press in the United States did not report what really had been transpiring until much later when reporters came back. So, even as a Jew, I remember my father having sent packages, my father still had relatives in Russia, he would send care packages to Russia and that sort of thing, but I don’t think he himself knew what had been happening. But I think we had a broader perspective of the world than cloistered community people here in western Michigan.

Smith: And, let’s face it. There were a lot of people who were isolationists before the war who were isolationists after the war.

Padnos: Exactly.

Smith: And, presumably, Jonkman represented that status quo.

Padnos: And so we were concerned to make that change. We challenged voters. We did vote counts. We did lots of things including putting signs on our trucks to express our position, which I have to say was not all that well received in the community.

Smith: Tell me about that.

Padnos: As a matter of fact, the mayor of our community who was a nice guy, but pretty conservative in his view, after all, he was elected mayor of Holland, called my father to say, “You have to understand the consequences of all this.
If these kids lose, you may have some consequences to pay.” My father was permissive enough to let us do our thing.

Smith: That’s fascinating. And that was beyond the machine.

Padnos: Right.

Smith: That was just the local culture feeling in some ways threatened by what you represented.

Padnos: I don’t think the machine ever threatened us. We were too small and too insignificant. And the thought of beating Bartel Jonkman, a machine operative, was unthinkable.

Smith: What led Ford to think that he could do that, because clearly he was underdog?

Padnos: Derring do. I think that his father whetted his appetite and obviously encouraged him. Gave him reason to believe that it was possible. You know, it’s always the impossible that you – oftentimes, you accomplish the impossible.

Smith: Plus, I imagine, the other thing he got I think from both of his folks, certainly, was that work ethic. I mean, he must’ve out campaigned.

Padnos: What you have to understand is that he was somewhat of an underdog, too. They were not part of the elite. They weren’t people of wealth. He had to achieve what he achieved by his own derring do, you know. His activity in the Boy Scouts of America was an achievement and he was an achiever. You don’t become a varsity football player at South High School by not having been an achiever. And I didn’t know him then, but I enjoyed knowing about it in knowing of him.

Smith: Let me ask you something, and I realize it’s speculative, but this came up yesterday and it was very interesting. It goes again to this whole notion of the culture that he was, in some ways wooing, but at the same time challenging. The whole sequence of events surrounding his marriage to Betty. It’s always been said that…

Padnos: My wife and I were married at just about the same time. As a matter of fact, in ’48, amidst of all of this campaigning and so forth, my wife went with me prior to our being married to the state convention in Detroit. It was all part of growing up, I guess.

Smith: It’s interesting because, over the years, there’s been several sorts of explanations, and let me sort of outline what I think is the truth. He knew he wanted to marry her and he told her early in 1948 that he wanted to get married, but he couldn’t tell her when and he couldn’t tell her why he couldn’t tell her. Now, two explanations have been offered for this. One was, he wanted to take Jonkman by surprise, which he did to some degree, I guess. But the other, interestingly, which tells you a lot more about the culture, was of course, she was a divorcée and there was some question as to the political fallout if their engagement, let alone marriage, had been announced before the Republican primary. Does that, in what you know of the culture…?
Padnos: I never knew that she had been prior married, so it really didn’t matter to me. Nor do I recall it’s ever having a matter of subject of discussion.

Smith: From what you know of the prevailing culture, had it been known generally, do you think it would have…?

Padnos: Oh, I think it might have. Yeah, I do. Just as it is today, if you’re divorced in a presidential campaign, it’s not a plus. Is that not true?

Smith: Yeah, although I think it’s probably much less so. It’s certainly an issue.

Padnos: It’s much more acceptable, but in my time, you have to remember, as I recall, Holland, there was one major realty company as opposed to now when there’s 15 or 20 or more. If anyone sold their house, everybody in town knew about it and if a house came up for sale, certainly everybody knew about it. People just didn’t move around. I grew up in a Depression culture where kids actually went to CCC camp because their parents couldn’t feed them. So having grown up through the ‘30s, it was a very, very conservative atmosphere. There was no such thing as – there were old people’s homes, I remember there was a county poor farm, but generally speaking, if a couple, the parents, were in need, they lived with their children. Does that have any bearing?

Smith: Oh, yeah, absolutely. Absolutely. Tell me about the district itself. I mean, what communities – I assume Grand Rapids dominated the district.

Padnos: Well, obviously, and Zeeland, of course was a major player because that’s where Bartel Jonkman lived. So, when you ran against him, you ran against Zeeland as well. And you had to convince sufficient enough people in Holland. However, when the votes were counted, we won in Zeeland as well.

Smith: Really. So what were some of the major population centers of the district? Grand Rapids, presumably, was by far the largest.

Padnos: There were any number of little Dutch communities, satellite communities, in between Holland and Zeeland, Burkelouw(?) and Vriesland and all of these centers of Dutch culture.
Smith: Rural? Small towns?

Padnos: Very rural. All rural.

Smith: Which, presumably, would be thought to favor Jonkman?

Padnos: Oh, thought to favor, yes, but you’ve got to remember that I was part of a group of returning veterans and those were the guys that, when I went to the American Legion, I talked about Ford. In those days, the young veteran was a member of the American Legion and the VFW. My brother was a member of the VFW. These guys were activists, they were going to make some changes.

Smith: That’s fascinating. The McKay machine, was it district wide or was it basically Grand Rapids or…?

Padnos: Well, they were out of touch. As far as I know, it was Grand Rapids centered.

Smith: Okay. You say it was out of touch.

Padnos: Well, you know, here we are a bunch of veterans, many of whom had seen the world and this was contrary to their current orientation. So, I think that it was a veteran push as much as anything.

Smith: Do you know the story about the Quonset hut?

Padnos: Oh sure.

Smith: Tell the story about the Quonset hut.

Padnos: I don’t know the story intimately, I just know it was Ford’s headquarters and it was symbolic of the returning veterans.

Smith: But, supposedly, McKay gave orders to have it removed?

Padnos: Oh, I don’t know anything about that.

Smith: Yeah.

Padnos: You have to understand that Holland is 25, 30 miles removed from Grand Rapids. Communications were not all that… We had the Grand Rapids Press and the Grand Rapids Herald to depend upon for our sources of information.

Smith: And where were they in this contest?

Padnos: Well, Grand Rapids Press was Vandenberg territory and I suspect that he had a great deal of influence on where they stood. I don’t know this for fact, but I have every reason to believe that Vandenberg was a Ford supporter because they shared common interests. I can’t speak intimately of that.

Smith: Was there any resentment felt by these outlying communities towards Grand Rapids? Was it sort of us against them?

Padnos: Again, I cannot speak with any degree of authority. When you lived in Holland, you were pretty isolated.

Smith: Hmm. That’s interesting.

Padnos: I went to school with kids who never rode on a train, who never left Holland. You know, my parents, we had relatives in Chicago. We’d be back and forth and that sort of thing. It was no great event to have left Holland. But if you read the Holland City News or the Holland Evening Sentinel, there used to be articles of the people, you know, “Jenny So-and-so went to Grand Rapids”, you know, those would be news articles. So, it was a completely different culture.

Smith: Bit of a cocoon.

Padnos: Yes, very much so.

Smith: How did Ford campaign?

Padnos: You know, if my father made a trip to Chicago, it was a news article.

Smith: That tells you a lot. Tell me about Ford the campaigner in those days.

Padnos: Well, again, my intimacy was such that my only exposure was that Ford came to western Michigan and we took him around to meet people. I can’t recall his making speeches. It was more or less conversation.
Smith: But he must have clicked one on one.

Padnos: Well, if you introduced him to a veteran, he was a veteran. He was one of us.

Smith: Yeah.

Smith: Really. That’s interesting. Did you ever discuss religion at any time?

Smith: Because I’ll tell you this story. There’s a wonderful story that I found out actually from a guy named Don Penny who worked in the White House for awhile, he was kind of a consultant on speeches and communication and all that sort of thing. Anyway, he and Mrs. Ford sort of conspired to sort of dress up the president’s wardrobe. So Don got a tailor, really first class tailor from Georgetown, who’s Jewish. His first name was Saul and said he had to come over. So Saul’s pretty nervous about going to the White House and meeting the president and that sort of thing. Anyway, it’s a Saturday afternoon and the president’s sitting upstairs and he’s watching college football. And Don said, “Mr. President?” And he said, “What it is, Don?” And he said, “There’s this tailor here now.” He said, “Well, we can do it later.” And he said, “Well, you know…” And, anyway,…

Padnos: “Don’t interfere with my football game!”

Smith: Yeah, he’s watching football, you know! And, anyway, one thing led to another and he wasn’t going to be discourteous so he went into another room to be measured and everything else by this guy. Quite a bit of time goes by and Don hears these voices, these low, sort of confidential tone of voice and he sort of looks around and the president’s got his hand on this guy’s shoulder and it’s almost like he’s consoling him. So once they are out of there, he was dying of curiosity, “What happened?” The president was asking Saul about his background and the fact came right away that his family – part of his family, not all of his family – had survived the Holocaust. And the president said on his own, “Well, you know, Saul, you’re probably one of the best Americans because you know what it means to be an American,” which was just the perfect thing to say. It was obviously from the heart. It wasn’t for public effect, and you often wished that the public could’ve seen that sensitivity of Ford.

Padnos: Yeah.

Smith: Clearly, and I assume he got this from his folks, this was a man without a prejudice bone in his body on everything.

Padnos: You know, in my recollection, Ford didn’t go out of his way to make Jewish friends, but he had Jewish friends. There was a man in Grand Rapids by the name of Hy Bylan who was…

Smith: What was the last name?

Padnos: Bylan, B-Y-L-A-N, who was a conspicuous Ford supporter and, in actuality, he was the Strohs Brewing distributor. But I know that he made great efforts in Ford’s behalf. And I believe he’d been invited to the White House. In my recollection, I never saw it or was given an invitation to the White House, other than subsequently at Ford’s birthday, but I know that he lays great store in that relationship.

Smith: Were you surprised when he won the primary?

Padnos: I was elated. You know, it was an accomplishment. It was a pleasant surprise and I had no idea what the ultimate consequences of that might be. No conception of that whatsoever. He was just reelected, reelected, reelected, because he’d done such a great job.

Smith: Tell me about that because I used to talk to him about it and he thought two of the things that really damaged Congress in later years. He thought having a bigger staff was a bad thing and raising money was a terrible thing. Spending money was, you know, he didn’t like to do that.

Padnos: Well, he came from a conservative background. We were Depression kids. I don’t think that people today can have any idea of the concept of what it meant to see your father come home with a few bucks.
Smith: Of course, they lost their house. And he sold his blood to put himself through the University of Michigan.

Tell me what kind of congressman he was.

Padnos: Well, my files are full of thank you letters. He was a very thoughtful man, a very appreciative man. He demonstrated his appreciation by written expression. I can’t recall having ever asked him for much personally that he didn’t respond to. I’d wanted some things for my family to identify with President Ford and Penny always responded in magnanimous fashion, more than one might have expected, signed letters, signed all kinds of things.

Smith: I often thought, once a congressman, always a congressman.

Padnos: I guess.

Smith: He had a very good reputation for constituent service.

Padnos: I keep perpetual files and it’s incredible the numbers of envelopes that I have with his signature on it thanking me for this or that or the next thing.

Smith: And he came home to the district all the time.

Padnos: Oh yes, he did. Often. Often. Often. And he was available for any number of things. This photograph that I have here, any kind of event that he could be a contributor to, he was there.

Smith: And it’s interesting because it was a safe district.

Padnos: Oh, he didn’t have to worry. As a matter of fact, his successor rode his coattails, didn’t have to worry until he kind of lost track of his constituency.

Smith: And that was…?

Padnos: Guy Vander Jagt.

Smith: Oh, yes. Yeah, I heard the president talk about it.

Padnos: Actually, Richard - there was an interim period - Richard…

Smith: …Vander Veen.
Padnos: Vander Veen.

Smith: Who had run against Ford.

Padnos: Who had run against him.

Smith: But in the Watergate year,…

Padnos: That was the consequence of that.

Smith: …the first Democrat…

Padnos: That’s right. And then, of course, Vander Jagt was a speaker of quite substantial repute and Hope College and I carried his campaign and carried his brief, so to speak, and subsequently was very able, with not too much difficulty. However, Vander Jagt ran against 5 or 6 other candidates and, again, that didn’t put you in good stead with other people, but we were successful in winning the campaign. But, again, I don’t like to relive that situation.

Smith: Well, it’s funny because, my sense from what the president said, and he was circumspect, but he looked at Guy and he thought he was symptomatic of a larger thing, that he’d sort of gone Washington and didn’t get home as much as he used to.

Padnos: Exactly! Exactly. And got caught up in the national campaigns supporting other Republican candidates outside of his district to the degree that he didn’t tend his flock.

Smith: That’s fascinating because here’s Ford, who of course for the last nine years was Minority Leader of the House, and clearly was traveling all over the country and yet still managed to pay attention to…

Padnos: Well, yes, he did, but he took care of his home base.

Smith: And always did.

Padnos: And he had such a reputation that it could cover a lot of failures if there were failures.
Smith: He had a lot of Democratic support, too?

Padnos: Well, you know, it was hopeless to run against him. I mean, you’re just wasting your time.

Smith: Let me ask you. This is a large, maybe philosophical question, but…

Padnos: This was a Republican district, you know that.

Smith: Sure. But, you know, it’s interesting because he was a conservative, fiscally a conservative. He always said socially, he was a moderate to liberal and a fervent internationalist.

Padnos: I like to think of myself in like stead. I am a liberal socially. I am a Republican… I condemn myself by saying I really voted my pocketbook.

Smith: But that’s perfectly understandable. I think he was fiscally very conservative. I think he had a healthy skepticism about what government alone could to do improve people’s lives. Not that it didn’t have good intentions, but that sometimes good intentions produce not so good results, all of that. And yet, clearly on issues like civil rights, he believed that government had to ensure equal opportunity and in his later years, he was pro-choice. A number of things that actually left him, in many ways, stranded.

Padnos: I was with him all the way.

Smith: But this is what’s fascinating because, in some ways, conservatism changed during the period of his public life. When you ran in 1948 as a conservative…

Padnos: Conservatism is fiscal, not social.

Smith: Right. In fact, the whole range of social issues weren’t even on the agenda in part because, tell me if I’m wrong, his generation thought those were such private matters.

Padnos: You took care of your own.

Smith: But also there was this kind of very decent, Midwest reticence. You didn’t talk about things like abortion, let alone debate them and legislate them.
Padnos: Well, I have to tell you that we lived a naïve life in western Michigan. I had no idea what a lesbian was. It just wasn’t part of our vocabulary. It was never a subject of discussion. It was earth shattering when I went to New York and saw life as it really was. That’s the kind of background that we had here.

Smith: That, in a nutshell, says as much about west Michigan, because remember, in his later years, he is still the only American president ever to sign a petition for gay rights. And you can imagine what the right wing thought, I mean, the social conservatives thought. And, oh sure, okay, I think Betty was an influence.

Padnos: We didn’t have that exposure. If you haven’t been exposed, how do you know? Homosexuality was never a discussion. I know that, among my friends, there were people who were slightly different from me, but they were never singled out. They were just part of the gang.

Smith: Yeah, yeah. It’s interesting, because you also sense this ability when he gets to Washington and particularly as he rose through the ranks, he’s well aware of the foibles, of the shortcomings, and the inadequacies of his colleagues and he has his own, very strict personal moral code, and yet he doesn’t appear to be judging…

Padnos: …others.

Smith: Yeah.

Padnos: Well, I think that part of the Dutch influence was to be charitable to other people’s perspective although very protective of one’s own being.

Smith: Well put.

Padnos: I don’t know if I’m saying…

Smith: Oh yeah, this is exactly what we want. Seymour, this is exactly what we need.

I want to hurry here, because, well, toward the end, as I know you were at all the meetings of the Foundation and would have that contact with him and obviously from time to time when he came back, you saw him. Was that fairly frequent?

Padnos: Whenever he was in the community, I tried to make it a point to be there and he always made me feel comfortable. I recall at one of our last meetings, not last meetings, but in one of the meetings, he made a point of singling me out and introducing me to some of the people whom I might not otherwise have known and always identified me as one of his oldest friends. Well, to be one of the President of the United States’ oldest friends is a pretty unique identity. And I enjoyed that.

Smith: You mentioned the White House dinner. Did you go to the 90th birthday dinner? What do you remember of that?

Padnos: What I remember of that was going to the White House and walking down the corridor and making a wrong turn and getting on an elevator with Happy Rockefeller and her, then, friend and ending up on the third floor which was not ever intended to be. It became obvious I should be on the second floor rather. My wife and I were so honored that we were maybe overwhelmed a little bit.

Smith: Sure.

Padnos: And I remember the dinner and sitting in the East Room immediately next to the president’s table. I remember the entertainment, particularly the army choir and the bass singer.

Padnos: Yes, did an incredible presentation solo. Just to have been there, to be part of that was memorable.

Smith: It must’ve been a very warm, kind of almost like a family event.

Padnos: It was very familial. I sat next to Colin Powell and Henry Kissinger’s wife on the other side and here’s little Seymour Padnos from Holland, Michigan. I never expected to be in that society of people.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw the president?
Padnos: Yes, I do, it was in California and we flew out there to the, I forgot the name of the hotel. The president was there and it’s the first time that I ever saw him sit on a chair. He sat on a barstool and seemed quite able, although obviously not working the crowd as he typically did. And thinking to myself that I’m glad I came to California although, at my age at that time, that was quite a trip - and feeling good about it.

Smith: Did you reminisce about the first campaign?

Padnos: I never saw President Ford, but what he would say, “How’s everything going in western Michigan?”, “Tell me about what’s going on in western Michigan.” In a fleeting moment, “How do you do?” all that, and I knew that the press of his prominence limited the amount of time that I should spend in taking…you know. But he was interested, he wanted to know. There were a lot of things I would’ve liked to have said that you just didn’t feel privileged to take that much time to do. There were lots of people trying to say hello to the president and here I was, I didn’t want to overstay my presence.

Smith: What do you remember of the funeral?

Padnos: I had wanted to go to Washington, but my family discouraged me. They said, “Dad, you’re not up to it and you probably won’t get close enough to be of any significance anyway,” and so, they convinced me. I was in Florida at the time and they convinced me not to do that. However, my wife, Esther, who’s ever my companion, said, “We’ll go to Grand Rapids”. So we chartered … you’re challenging me now…And I remember flying into Grand Rapids and the group in Grand Rapids were so kind. They wanted to know when I was arriving and what the tail number of the plane was and so forth and so on. And they were going to make (inaudible) and I begged off, I didn’t need any special consideration. I knew they had enough other things on their hands. They made sure I was to know that there were to be tickets available at the hotel. And I remember having a friend of mine go to the hotel and pick up my invitations.

Smith: Were you surprised by the crowds?
Seymour Padnos

August 5, 2008

Padnos: I was a part of the entourage on the bus and it was just overwhelming driving down the avenue and seeing all the people on both sides of the … Don’t get me emotional.

He was a dear friend. He was kind to me, almost like a member of a family. I watched diligently on television the whole development in Washington. I was impressed with Betty Ford standing there. My wife and I kept saying, “How can she possibly do this?” And then the congressman passed out in the background and my wife said, “And there but by the grace of God be you.” And so I was thankful that I was able to watch from my apartment and take it all in..

Smith: I think you just answered my question. I was going to say how you would remember Gerald Ford. How do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered by the country?

Padnos: With great appreciation for all that he did. You know, when he pardoned Nixon, I kept saying to my kids, who were so violently opposed to the Nixon performance, “Can you imagine the president of the United States going to prison?” He did the right thing. And, of course, at the time I wasn’t very popular in my own family for defending his actions and I’ve, subsequently, been vindicated. The world knows that he did the right thing. I was proud to know him. I was proud for his persistent recognition of the right thing to do. I have to say this, if I had been part of the Nixon administration, and he had asked me to go break in someplace, I’d probably have done it because I’m that kind of a follower.

Smith: The difference is, in the Ford administration, no one would ever think of making that request.

Padnos: No. No.

Smith: Perfect. Perfect, Seymour. That’s exactly what we want.

Smith: The death of Jerry terHorst brings up a question. There are a number of people who believe that while the pardon was a factor in his decision to quit when he did, it was not the only factor. There are those who claim that he felt overwhelmed by the job, that it was just not really what he expected. Do you have any sense of that?

Weidenfeld: Well, I had him on a TV show right after that. I wasn’t in the White House yet. I remember, at the time that those of us who lived through this era, those of us who were doing TV at the time - I was a television producer of a daily television show - were absolutely thrilled that the Fords had come in because they seemed like such a calming, compassionate couple that could humanize the presidency.

Smith: And they weren’t the Nixons?

Weidenfeld: And they weren’t the Nixons. It was a sad time. It was a time when there was no faith in government. There was no faith in politicians. And while there was a big debate going on about the pardon - and many hoped that perhaps Nixon wouldn’t be pardoned - we didn’t know what the consequences of that would be. But Jerry terHorst - I have to disagree with that premise, because he really was a man of principle. That he wasn’t told was the reason he quit. And I can understand that as a press secretary. There are things about Betty Ford that I knew that I would never have talked about, and in fact, never talked about until she actually went public about them. I thought at the time there were other things that were much more meaningful. But that, of course, is a different story. He felt that he should have been told. That he wasn’t told was the reason, and I have to go by that because he was just so adamant about it. He was so principled about it and regretted having to resign because he would have loved to have stayed on.

Smith: Okay. That’s exactly what we were after.
Weidenfeld: And especially when he was watching how the White House press was dealt with after he left. So yes, he would have loved to have continued.

Smith: I take it Ron Nessen was a somewhat controversial figure?

Weidenfeld: I was at NBC then and I can’t say I knew Ron…Should we get into Ron and the West Wing and the East Wing and the chauvinism now?

Smith: Sure.

Weidenfeld: In terms of Ron, there were just so many stories about Ron and me I don’t know who was coaching him but as far as he was concerned the East Wing was irrelevant. But then the whole West Wing thought the East Wing was irrelevant and that was the mentality at that time. The White House was so traditionally based. The West Wing wanted the First Lady to be quiet, not to make waves, to go to tea parties, to be seen and not heard. I tried to get Pat Nixon on the air numerous times, and I thought, “Well, you can be helpful. You will say the right things.” Not that that would have saved him. I couldn’t get any family member.

Smith: They wouldn’t go on?

Weidenfeld: They wouldn’t let them go on TV. Pat Nixon was kept behind the scenes. As a child I had known her because my father had been in Eisenhower’s administration. She was a lovely woman, but the public knew nothing about her.

Smith: Shy?

Weidenfeld: She was a nice woman who had personality. She was a traditional wife. She listened to her husband. She had worked before she had met him. I believe she was a schoolteacher.

Smith: Right. She had a rough life.

Weidenfeld: She had a rough life.

Smith: She had a rough life; she had a lot of character, and I always thought that they served their own interests badly. I mean, to this day there are a lot of things that she accomplished that no one knows anything about. She started the tours for blind visitors to the White House; lighting the White House at night so people could enjoy the house; she actually did more rooms in terms of the restoration…

Weidenfeld: And then Betty Ford undid some of that restoration. As all new First Ladies do. To make it their style, their place.

Smith: But the notion of the “Plastic Pat” caricature – we just had an opportunity to talk to Lucy Winchester, which confirmed the suspicion that there was a lot more there. A real sense of humor, which the public didn’t see.

Weidenfeld: Well, it’s the job of the press secretary to convey that – the style and the interests of the person who is there. But the challenge is how to do it when everybody wants something…

Smith: You just wonder – because one senses it’s not just that she hated politics, but she hated the humiliations that they had been subjected to, that she in some ways never got over. The Fund Crisis and the Checkers speech, sitting there on national TV while he detailed how little money they had, and all of that. And then the ’60 campaign – once that was over, it’s like finally we can have a life. And then in ’68 it all goes down the drain and you just sense that she brought a lot of old unpleasant memories and resentments, perhaps, at a time when most people would think you’d be lording it over everybody and enjoying life in the White House.

Weidenfeld: I don’t disagree with that. But I would submit that it was more the mentality of the West Wing that had no understanding of a First Lady and didn’t dare take a chance on her. So what you had was somebody who did traditional kinds of things which had to do, for example, with the White House, handicapped children and the like.

Smith: She wasn’t a political partner.

Weidenfeld: She couldn’t be. She wasn’t allowed to be. She wasn’t allowed to express an opinion. If she had been groomed, or prompted, then I think she might have had a different public personae. If she had married somebody else who made her feel more secure in herself, she might have had a happier life. I’m sure she was also afraid to say anything – afraid of what the outcome would be. Would she say something wrong? Would this effect something? Would they scream and yell? She had no support whatsoever. And that was the whole reason I decided to take the job.—to give some meaning to the position.

I didn’t know Betty Ford. And I’m going to probably say a few things that I never would have talked about — and I didn’t — until she made them public. I had been at NBC and she had done a Heart Association PSA (Public Service Announcement) when he was vice president. Everybody there couldn’t get over what was going on with her because she seemed really out of sorts. She was slurring her words and seemed very anxious. And that was the gossip going around the station. I thought it was probably just stage fright. Here was a woman who was thrust into that position who had never done any of this before. She had had a career before she married. That was then.

It never occurred to me in my wildest imagination that I’d end up as a press secretary to Betty Ford. I had one of the very few TV shows in Washington. Frequent guests were White House correspondents Bonnie Angelo and Clare Crawford. Clare helped start People magazine and Bonnie was bureau chief for Time magazine. Both asked if I might be interested in doing the job of press secretary. At first I said no. I mentioned it to my folks, who said I had to be crazy; that I should at least look into it because it would be like touching history. So Bonnie and Clare called the person who was in charge of getting a press secretary at that time. I got a call the next day I decided while there was no way I would get it, at least I would touch history. I didn’t know what a press secretary did. I knew Lady Bird had done a good job with beautification but it was during Vietnam and I thought she should have expressed some opinion on that. At any rate, I drove to their Virginia home and we talked….

Smith: Oh, the house in Alexandria.

Weidenfeld: It was fun to go out there and see exactly what was going on. It was the day after the evening of the first State Dinner with Hussein. Susan was in the kitchen and still wearing whatever she had worn that night to bed, reading the reviews of the dinner. I waited for Betty Ford who then came down in her housedress and we talked. There was just a lot of small talk and then finally I said to her, “What do you expect me to do?” And she said, “Well, how should I know? I don’t know what I’m supposed to do.” And then I thought I don’t know if this is really good for me. I don’t know about clothes that much – I’m not sure that I can…

Smith: Did she talk about her interests?

Weidenfeld: No, we just talked about the evening before, her children, her having gone to the dinner, what it was like. Just warming up to each other. And I spent several hours there. But I really didn’t know what to say about a press secretary or expectations for a First Lady. I just knew that I hoped that it would be more than the description of dresses, tea parties or those kinds of interests that Pat Nixon had. Because here’s a position - although the Constitution never talked about a First Lady – that is a powerful position. She has all this press, or rather the press is there to take advantage of.

Smith: Right. It can be a powerful position.

Weidenfeld: She can be useful to society, and if there was ever a time that we could use a role model, and somebody to set a mood for the country, it was now. I don’t know how old you were during that period and how involved you were…

Smith: I was actually an intern in the Ford White House the summer of ’75 – right after graduation from college.

Weidenfeld: You never came over to the East side.

Smith: That’s so.

Weidenfeld: There you go. This long red carpet that separated both sides, right? But at any rate, on my way back I started to think – I hadn’t told Betty Ford I would like the job and she hadn’t told me she would like me to be there – but I started to think about the possibility of how she could be a great First Lady.

Smith: What was it about her that you saw as potential?
Sheila Weidenfeld: She had a sense of humor. She told me frankly that you can’t teach an old dog new tricks. I love that. There was good press about the way they related to each other….

Smith: That was a real love affair.

Weidenfeld: Yes, but it was hard on her as a wife, because he was never home. So she did suffer the consequences of his not being home.

Smith: Yeah. Do you think he felt guilt in later years?

Weidenfeld: No, I think that may have been afterwards, because I’m not so sure that he was really aware of that. He knew she had osteoarthritis, he knew she was in pain, he knew she had to take pills, the Valium. It was very hard for her to be alone. She really loved the family unit.

Smith: And at that juncture where the kids are kind of off discovering themselves, and he’s away, so she really is alone.

Weidenfeld: I could relate to her because I’m one of four. My mother is in the same age bracket. She was a Radcliffe graduate, very bright, a colleague of my father’s, and very helpful to him - but there was frustration. She was a housewife. And this was the mold.

Smith: Who had been a Martha Graham dancer.

Weidenfeld: Yes, and she also had worked in marketing and clothes. She had been around; she was an independent thinker; and she became a mother - but she was basically, especially for a few of those years, totally alone – which wasn’t easy. And it had its consequences.

Smith: But isn’t it interesting that in so many ways, she became representative of millions of women who may not have political husbands, but…

Weidenfeld: I believe that. There were pins that said, “Run Betty for President,” because of her candor. She was always supportive, by the way. Always a great sense of humor, lots of candor, and fun.
Smith: The first time her name ever hit the Washington Post was in 1957, and it was some really condescending piece about her taste for quiet hats and slightly more talkative dresses. And that was it. And I’m sure that there was an inclination on the part of lots of people – just as they pigeonhole a president – to see this Cub Scout Den mother, Sunday school teacher from Grand Rapids, and pre-label her. Which is why, when she did open up and started expressing her opinion…

Weidenfeld: Well, wait a second – first of all, she transformed her tragedy into a public service; so you have to remember that that was quite something.

Smith: That was a defining moment for most people.

Weidenfeld: At that time cancer wasn’t even mentioned in obits. People were terrified of it. You couldn’t say the word out loud. That she did that publicly was pretty amazing.

Smith: Was there ever any doubt that it would be otherwise? In terms of handling the press…

Weidenfeld: There might have been doubt if somebody else had been there; if Pat Nixon had been there.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: Absolutely. She did it on purpose. As a result she helped a lot of people, including Happy Rockefeller. Including – well, unfortunately she’s passed on – but the person who was the producer of Face the Nation – Joan Barone. Joan told me she never would have discovered it and may not have had as long a life, had it not been for Betty Ford revealing hers.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: There were so many people who told us that. The mail was extraordinary. She had an amazing effect. And when you ask would somebody else have done it? It was not talked about. You didn’t talk about cancer.

Smith: It is hard for us today to put our heads in a culture that, as you said, literally swept this under the rug.
Weidenfeld: Yes. Look, that’s the way it was with AIDS for a while, too. They always called it something else. But also, we knew she was divorced – Whoa! First Lady, divorced? She was divorced, she had worked, she had seen a psychiatrist. But also she always was protective of her kids. Whether or not some of the stories that came out about them were true, we’d disagree on how they should be handled. She’d want to go back and deny it. And I’d say, “Let it die. Just let it die, otherwise, you’re going to make a story out of it.” And that happened on numerous occasions because each of the kids got press that was wrong. I’d try to figure out how to tell the reporter to forget it. “This is a non-story,” because of x, y and z. But it depended on the story as to how it might be handled.

Smith: I’ll tell you a story that Jack Marsh told us that never got into the press. You can imagine what it would have been. When [Ford] decided two weeks into the presidency to go out to Chicago and talk to the VFW about the amnesty program – anyone else would have put out a press release on Friday afternoon and gone to Camp David – but Ford, being Ford, decides to announce it to the VFW. As he said beforehand, “At least I don’t have worry about being interrupted by applause.” Anyway, the day before he goes, Jack Marsh comes in and said, “I’ve got some bad news for you.” And he looked up and said, “What’s that?” And it turns out, Steve, on his eighteenth birthday never registered for the draft.

Weidenfeld: Ah, I didn’t know that.

Smith: Yeah, no one does. But, before the day was over, they had it taken care of and no one ever knew. But you can imagine in that climate, it would have been a problem.

Weidenfeld: Definitely would have been a problem.

Smith: I want to zero in a little bit more about the cancer operation. What was it that prompted her to have the exam in the first place?

Weidenfeld: Nancy Howe. My understanding was Nancy Howe, who was there, who was getting an exam, too, said, “Come along with me.”
Smith: Okay.

Weidenfeld: Is Nancy Howe still around, by the way?

Smith: She is, and she’s not well.

Weidenfeld: Oh, she’s not?

Smith: She’s not well.

Weidenfeld: How is that? What is going on with her?

Erik: Cancer. She’s been going through chemo for a year.

Weidenfeld: Oh really?

Smith: Because clearly that is a delicate relationship. I gather a closeness, almost a dependency some people thought.

Weidenfeld: She and Betty Ford – it was total dependency. And she was always there.

Smith: Was it just because she’s in this totally new, terrifying climate, and one person, for whatever reason, provides her the support?

Weidenfeld: Nancy came in at the very beginning. She was the one who answered the door when I went out to the Virginia – Alexandria White House. She was always there to take care of any need, anything Mrs. Ford wanted, a cup of tea, a haircut, a this, a that. Nancy assumed the position of palace guard. And so she made it very difficult for many of us to get in. I didn’t want to take much of Betty Ford’s time, but I was dealing with the press and the only way the public knows anybody, is through the press. Not that I wanted to tell everybody everything, but I had to deal with the press and do what was best for Betty Ford. Do you want the press to be angry because you’re not getting an answer over some silly little thing, because you can’t get through? There was a lot of frustration for me because Nancy acted as chief of staff and palace guard. It was very hard for me but it was hard for everybody.

Smith: He obviously had years and years of dealing with the press. People commented on the fact that of recent presidents, he seemed to be the most comfortable with reporters. It was not an accident that a journalist was among the eulogists at the funeral. But I’m wondering: did she have an overall attitude toward the press? Not necessarily hostility or even a suspicions, but maybe a caution?
Sheila Weidenfeld

April 14, 2010

Weidenfeld: I’ve got to answer that in two ways: one is that there were lots of journalists, especially the women journalists. She really liked them.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: She really liked them. But she was very fragile. And her condition was often unpredictable because she had to recuperate from the cancer surgery – the mastectomy. She also had osteoarthritis, and I never knew exactly how I would find her if I scheduled something in advance. And again, I didn’t know if what I had heard before, due to popping pills and having a drink resulted in slurred speech or just stage fright. But there were enough occasions – and since it was very hard to get to see her when Nancy was there (which was often) - there was no way I would know if she were just protecting her. I believed as press secretary and somebody who had come out of the media, that quality, not quantity was what was important. I also believed that she didn’t always have to talk to the press. I could give them an answer, especially because you never knew if it were going to be a good day or a bad day. I had to be selective. She didn’t need to give a lot of speeches everywhere. There were things she could do from her residence like the phones calls she made regarding the ERA legislation. What I had wanted to say earlier is that the First Lady can really have an important impact – I firmly believe this.

Smith: Sure.

Weidenfeld: The First Lady has that ability to play a big role in terms of not only helping her husband, but setting the mood and tone of the country by what she does and how she does it. I’ll throw out a few examples: take the ERA. We never said anything to the press about the fact that she was trying to persuade or lobby legislators to amend the Constitution. But she called state legislators, she called Barry Goldwater, she called various other people to try to sway them. Unfortunately, it lost in the end. This was something, by the way, that Ford didn’t agree with necessarily. But she did ERA from her bedroom or the living room by making phone calls when she was up to it. I always believed it would come back and the press would hear about it. They might holler and scream, but it looked like it was something she did out of sincerity, which she did; she wanted to do it. So that was one thing.

Regarding Betty Ford economizing, I believe you show by example, which is what we did. I think it’s great that Michelle Obama is also doing it as well by showing us by example what her family eats. I’d love to get into my head/heart theory, how I finally decided how we delineate turf, because the West Wing gave us no turf at all. We had to delineate it, and I did. As I saw it, we were the heart, they were the head; they were responsible for policy, we interpreted it by daily living, by example.

The citizens band radio – I have to thank my husband for that. I’m really jumping all over the place, so excuse me.

Smith: Describe it again. For people who weren’t around in the ‘70s, what all that was.

Weidenfeld: That was about talking to truckers. Truckers were the first to have this little gadget in their truck to talk to other truckers. There was a whole lingo for it. Betty Ford never quite got it and it was very cute. Her handle [name] was First Momma. I have to thank my husband for bringing that in. A client of his had given us one and we gave it to her. She really loved it, and she was good at it. She had trouble with the lingo and her Secret Service would try to help her out. It got very positive press and showed that she wanted to be with the people, with the citizens.

You ask me questions. Various things are coming to mind as we were talking.

Smith: This is great. Did you have a sense of what her politics were?

Weidenfeld: Well, I had always thought she was fairly liberal, but I really didn’t have a sense of her politics.

Smith: More liberal than him?
Weidenfeld: Yes, I would have thought so. Perhaps I should get to the Sixty Minutes interview. Sixty Minutes was the first big interview that she did, and that was in August, 1975 – she had been there since ’74.

Smith: That was the first interview.

Weidenfeld: She was not ready until then; then all of a sudden, she just seemed ready.

Smith: Had she put it off?

Weidenfeld: We’d done the ERA. But she would still say, “I don’t want everybody just to look at my breasts.” She felt all that was going for her was her cancer and her mastectomy; so it used to really bother her that she felt that that’s what she stood for.

Smith: That was her initial reaction?

Weidenfeld: She was pleased with what happened in terms of helping people saving lives. Save one life and that’s important. She saved many. And as I mentioned earlier, she took cancer out of the closet.

Smith: Right. But that co-existed with a very kind of personal…?

Weidenfeld: Then she had to do something for society. She was in the position to do it. So the ERA was excellent. The economizing was important, as I said; also everything American, whether it be her dress or state dinner menu. As I said earlier, she loved clothes. But I knew nothing about clothes; I would feel the material and ask, “What is this you are wearing, Mrs. Ford?”

By the way, I always called her Mrs. Ford. She was conflicted – there was Betty Ford versus Mrs. Gerald Ford. She was so much more at ease as Betty Ford. When the campaign got started, those in charge didn’t want to hear from her. When they found out how popular she was, they tried to use her for everything, which was not good for her. We’ll get to that when you are ready for it. I threw that out in case we forget.

Smith: Had Sixty Minutes been after you for a while?
Weidenfeld: Sixty Minutes called at a time when I thought we could do this. I thought, she is ready. In fact, that’s the only show I ever wanted her on. The first person who asked me for an interview was Barbara Walters. Barbara called herself. I’d literally walked into the office for the first time and she was on the phone. It was the first phone call I ever got in the White House. And I always thought she is terrific - really something. She makes her own phone calls. But I had to push her off because Betty Ford wasn’t ready for that. What was she going to talk about?

Smith: Was this around the time of the breast cancer?

Weidenfeld: This was right after. I came in the very beginning of October. I was told the day before she went in for the mastectomy by David Kennerly who called to say I had the job. But he said, “You can’t mention anything. She’s going into the hospital.” And he wouldn’t tell me why. And then the next day I found out. Shortly after I started at the White House. But Sixty Minutes was the show I wanted her to be on. I loved Don Hewitt. He’s always been my ideal of a great producer. I loved the show and I thought she could handle it. They loved her, too. But to answer your question, they asked her opinions on all sorts of things. Don sent me the transcript before the show was aired and the only thing I didn’t like and asked, “Could you please take it out?” was when she said she wasn’t for gun control. Don thought I must be crazy because I didn’t say anything about the affair – when Morley Safer had asked her if her daughter had an affair, would she be surprised? She said no, she wouldn’t be.

Smith: Was there a right of, or were doing you a courtesy in sharing the transcript with you?

Weidenfeld: I had asked for it and they gave it to me. It was not a problem. I think he was so pleased that all I mentioned was the gun control.

Smith: Well, if were him I would have been, too.

Weidenfeld: But I liked her answer, by the way. I loved it. And it shocked me that it was misinterpreted. I shared the transcript with everybody on the plane going out to Vail, Colorado.
Smith: Before the program aired?

Weidenfeld: They knew nothing about our doing the show. It got to the point where I didn’t share much with the West Wing.

Smith: Okay.

Weidenfeld: Because, if I shared it, they would prevent us from doing it.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: Little things like going to the hospital for sick children, that was fine. They didn’t care about those things. But not so with things that could make an impact, that were very positive, that I felt fairly strongly about. She signed a picture to me which I haven’t looked at in a long time, but it said something like “To my ever loving press secretary who gets me in and out of trouble.” I think controversy sometimes clears the air, and that it’s not a bad thing. But I wasn’t ready for this one. I wasn’t ready for the reaction that ensued.

Smith: I just want to nail it down: did she see the transcript?

Weidenfeld: I don’t know if she saw it or not. I’m sure I gave it to her; I gave it to everyone, but it doesn’t mean that she would have read it.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: Yes.

Smith: I guess, if I had waited this long to do something and I knew this was a big deal, and I was at all awkward or uncomfortable or whatever, and then I had an opportunity to shape the result, I would have jumped at that.

Weidenfeld: I had to put my faith in them. It was the only thing she had done. She really was fine about doing it. Everybody was all set.

Smith: When it was done, she felt it had gone…

Weidenfeld: But she cancelled the show that morning; she said she wasn’t doing it. They were set; the lights were ready; the technicians were there; Don Hewitt was there, Morley Safer, and I got a call in my office while they were sitting with me saying, she’s not doing the program. She was hysterically crying. And I, to this day, don’t know why and I never asked her. I went upstairs and she wasn’t dressed. She was having her hair done, and she said, “I’m not doing it. I’m not doing it.” And I left saying, “Alright,” and I gave her every reason why she should, and I really don’t know what was going on. I had tried everything I could in telling how wonderful this would be and that she was all ready. Then I had just started to leave the room. It was just moments after this very long period of saying, “But they’re here. We’re supposed to be taping it this morning. They got here at six this morning, all the vans, all the technicians, all the trucks.” I didn’t know what I was going to tell Don Hewitt, my idol. Anyway, she then said, “Okay, I’m going to do it.” And she did it and she was great. And we went up to the sunroom…

Smith: Solarium.

Weidenfeld: Solarium, thank you very much. She was great. She was upbeat. Who would have ever, ever known three hours before, not only was she a wreck, but I was.

Smith: And I assume they never caught on.

Weidenfeld: For a year and a half, we hadn’t done any press. I had held everybody off from Barbara Walters to both Helen Thomas and Fran Lewine, who were both very difficult people because they represented opposing wire services: UPI and AP and were always vying with each other. Nobody will ever understand the tensions in the press when it came to getting a story out after Watergate, when nobody got anything. No matter what I said, reporters (especially Fran and Helen) would often challenge it.

Smith: It's fascinating because I wonder if that’s not a metaphor. You’re right, no one seeing that would have ever guessed that she was anything other than totally comfortable and relaxed and so on. But I only learned long afterward, and it came as a surprise to me. When she would go on stage, she was wonderful. But she really had stage fright. It was more than butterflies.

Weidenfeld: As a talk show producer, I was asked to set up a program on public speaking and dealing with the media for the State Department in the early ‘70s when I was at NBC for the top ambassadors and senior officials. Kissinger was even a student. It was a three-prong program. One was when a mike is shoved in front of you, how to handle it; another a la Meet the Press with three journalists who are querying you; the third speeches. I learned a technique from Dorothy Sarnoff, who I had on lots of shows when I had lived in New York and was with NBC then and Metromedia, which I used with Betty Ford.

So what I gave her was an approach to what I thought was really good in terms of not reading a speech, but delivering a speech and being confident in doing so. We’d go over talking points ahead of time. This was how I dealt with what I believed was her stage fright. But I know there was another component. I know it, because this was beyond stage fright. When she cancelled something reporters would say, “It’s her cancer coming back.” They always thought it was her cancer. If she slurried a word, it was her cancer. Well, it was osteoporosis, it was whatever. She had been accustomed to Valium, she had been accustomed to various things like that, and it is possible that it was some of those things that undermined her confidence and brought her down. She had once said something to me on a trip on the campaign trail when she was being over-used and abused by the West Wing when they discovered her talent. She actually broke down and started to cry. I’ve never talked about this.

Smith: No, this is great. And by the way, you’ll get a copy of the transcript and you’ll have an opportunity to…

Weidenfeld: Do I get a copy of the video?

Smith: We can give you a copy of it, too.

Weidenfeld: Thank you. But I wanted to know what was going on, why was she so down? She said, “If you only knew.” And all of these years later, I wonder, if I only knew – what was it? I wanted to know because if she got nervous, I was more nervous for her. But she wouldn’t tell me more.

Smith: Of course.
Weidenfeld: I wanted her to perform well. I knew how wonderful she is and was, and she had this sense of humor. So I wanted to ground her and believe I did a good job at it. Some people accuse me of saying I produced her. No, I didn’t produce her – she is who she is. My challenge was how do you translate her and put her in an environment that made sense for her, where she can be comfortable and herself.

Smith: Legend has it, and you can tell me if it’s true, that the initial reaction to the Sixty Minutes interview in the West Wing bordered on horror.

Weidenfeld: Bordered on horror? It didn’t border on anything, other than they were horrified. Nobody spoke to me the entire time I was out there. Ron wouldn’t talk to me. It was my anniversary – so my husband came out, and thank God he comforted me. Because I didn’t want to do her in. If anything, I thought this was the most wonderful thing. I was so excited about it before it happened.

Smith: What was her reaction?

Weidenfeld: Well, she watched it with Donald Rumsfeld and her husband. The President said it was fine and playfully threw a pillow at her. That was his reaction. Rumsfeld said he lost twenty or thirty million votes. He was really angry. But the next day was the tough day, because I went to bed after watching the show thinking, isn’t this wonderful? Isn’t this terrific? I’m so happy, what a nice anniversary present for Edward and me.

Smith: You were vindicated.

Weidenfeld: We had the worst trip in our life. Nobody was talking to me and I was afraid to go near the press. I didn’t know what to say. What Mrs. Ford said was totally, totally misinterpreted. I thought it was a wonderful thing for families to understand that you should talk to your kids. You should be honest. It was all hypothetical. She was wonderful after everybody left. We worked on a letter. I’m sure you’ve talked to Billy Zeoli, who I haven’t seen in a thousand years.

Smith: Not yet; he’s on the short list that we’re trying to get to.
Weidenfeld: He’s on the short list? Well, he was a character, and they did have a number of characters around them. But Billy was a good person. I always worried about what he might say that could backfire, the same way that this thing backfired on me. So why should I have been worried? But at any rate, I thought the only thing we can do is to write what I called the perfect letter. And Edward and I started it and then I gave it to her. I’d worked on that the entire trip. Really, I thought, somebody could call me, somebody could yell at me, do something, just don’t ignore me. I don’t want to hear from everybody how awful this is. Ron was difficult. Ron sent me an apology note years later. Ron was always difficult. He refused all requests to help get my office in tune with the West Wing – so we could be supportive. Aren’t we there to be helpful, to be helpful to the country? Can’t a wife be an attribute? Yes, she should be an attribute, not a neutral person sitting there.

He was so accusatory. We had such a small staff, because we came out of the Nixon White House. They didn’t want press, so I had really no staff, and yet she had to make speeches. She had to. I couldn’t do all of that – there were so many things going on. She was in demand. Whether she did things or not, I still had to have more than one aide.

Smith: The irony of this is that there’s no shortage of people who believe that Ron Nessen, by going on Saturday Night Live, ill-served the President’s interests.

Weidenfeld: I told him not to. Yup. I told him absolutely not to, I didn’t think it served the President’s interests then, and I don’t think so now. When we talked about sense of humor, let us put it in a context. Let’s see what the consequences may be. And there were just no good consequences for that as far as I was concerned. There were other ways to show Ford affable, and that, to me, was just ridiculous. I tried, but Ron didn’t listen to me on that one, either. But we were talking about the Sixty Minutes, and there was so much to the Sixty Minutes because that really did have the impact that it should have had.

Smith: Was it rough on Susan?

Weidenfeld: Was it hard on Susan? Well, the most wonderful thing of all was that years later, when I asked Susan about it she didn’t even know at that time what an affair was. It had been so twisted. It was a big learning experience for me. I was aware how you could take something and twist it and turn it and make it into something else.

Smith: But I sense that it was also a learning experience for the West Wing in the sense that it marked – everyone fights the last war.

Weidenfeld: Well, can we just get to the end of this experience?

Smith: Yeah, sure.

Weidenfeld: I wrote the letter, what I always called the perfect letter because if people would understand that it was hypothetical, people would understand that Susan didn’t have an affair, that Mrs. Ford was being realistic, that these things do happen, that conversation with children should be open. I know Billy added a few things that I thought made the letter. That’s when she felt really good about it, and we got the letter right off. I didn’t tell anybody in the press about it. I think action speaks louder than words – and someone who received the letter would come forward and the misunderstandings would finally be corrected.

We sent the letter out. At the same time we had an overwhelming number of negative letters. I thought that by keeping journalists up to date and the public up to date on how many negatives and positives were coming in it would generate positive letters. And not only that, somebody would get this wonderful, perfect letter, and talk about it. And by God, it happened from a woman in Texas. And I’ll never forget her name, and I don’t even know her. Her name is Lorena Chevalier. Because that’s what changed everything. She got the letter, she went to Associated Press. Associated Press printed it, everybody talked about it. And we were inundated with positive letters. And that really changed everything.

Smith: That’s a perfect lead in because my sense is that you just had a bunch of middle-aged or older, white men, accustomed to their own kind of tunnel vision about society and culture and gender roles. “This is the way it’s been, and presumably that means that this is the way it is and will always be.” They certainly did not anticipate the changes that were beneath the surface, and in many ways, she, maybe unknowingly, sort of opened the door for a lot of those changes to come…

Weidenfeld: Well, let me put it differently. Because I was her press secretary and that’s how people do know her. How do you know anybody? And how do you know that you really know them? Hilary Clinton – everybody – even Betty Ford said, “They don’t know the real me.” Nobody knows the real you. They know you as you are publicly presented. And sometimes it’s one little thing that symbolizes your whole life which might be totally irrelevant to your life.

So, no, I would say that I knew that we had to use this position. I couldn’t have taken the job if I didn’t believe that. On my way home from my one time with Mrs. Ford I kept thinking, “what can be done that’s beyond the traditional women’s things” I’m not saying that volunteerism is not important - it should be done, and it’s good when it’s done. But there has got to be something more that talks to people, that deals with their values, that deals with what’s going on. I was out of TV. I was one of the first women producers. I knew the fights that were going on.

I also was quite aware of the fact that the role of women was changing. They didn’t know that at the White House. Whoever the First Lady is, you’re going to have controversy. Expectations can be so polar opposite - no matter what it is, you’re not going to make everybody happy. You can never make everybody happy. For the West Wing, the First Lady position was always fairly traditional. The smiling wife at the podium, beaming at the comments of her man. We’ve had that since Betty Ford. But she walked that fine line.

I remember asking Mrs. Ford after we’d finished the ERA legislation, that is trying to amend the Constitution: “What do you consider a liberated woman?” And I might be paraphrasing a little bit, but she said, “I would consider a liberated woman any woman who feels confident in herself and happy in what she is doing. It’s a general feeling of positiveness and being able to live with yourself” She really walked this line where she loved being a mother, she loved being a wife, But she also was all for the woman who wanted to work.

Smith: She’s a transitional figure in a lot of ways.
Weidenfeld: And we still need that transitional figure because that debate has ensued.

Smith: But, she literally has a foot in both camps. On the one hand, there’s a traditionalist figure there.

Weidenfeld: She absolutely was a wife of the Fifties.

Smith: And yet there is also a woman who is comfortable with this emerging – as undefined in some ways, and to some people, frightening – sense of potential change. Comfortable with the prospect of change.

Weidenfeld: Yes.

Smith: Which, for a lot of people is difficult.

Weidenfeld: And still is.

Smith: True.

Weidenfeld: And I’m not saying that that mentality doesn’t still rear its ugly head. Even at the White House today I think that that’s the way the East Wing-West Wing define turf. My heart/head theory did that for me – which I presented in a memo to Rumsfeld, who paid no attention to it whatsoever.

Smith: One of the themes between the White House wings under Rumsfeld, for example…

Weidenfeld: He didn’t think we were capable of doing anything. So everything we did pretty much went over his head, unless he heard we were doing something. And he’d call on the phone on those occasion and scream.

Smith: Would he really?

Weidenfeld: And he’d tell me what I had to say and that I had to follow it.

Smith: Was there a sense, with ERA evolving into a controversy, and the looming Reagan challenge - did people connect these and say, “Oh my God, she’s lost us votes at a time when we’re worried about Reagan.”

Weidenfeld: I told you nobody knew about it. These were phone calls. Then they’d get out. And I did go to the President’s lawyer Phil Buchen and find out if it was okay.
While it was a national amendment, it was an amendment to the Constitution, and still a states’ issue. So it was okay to get involved. That was as far as I went. I didn’t go, “Guess what we’re doing!” No, we didn’t bring any attention to it. Everything was prepared. She was ready for the conversation with talking points. She had her own style and she was wonderful. I was always there for the phone calls. I was always the scribe. I took notes on every word she ever said while I was present……on little pieces of paper, a notebook, whatever.

Smith: What did she enjoy about the job? We’ve heard, for example, that she put a lot of time, a lot of effort into the hostess role, that aspect of the job.

Weidenfeld: She loved that, too.

Smith: She did?

Weidenfeld: Well, she loved to dress. She did love that part; but she also loved I think the various introductions she had, the exposure she had. I think it was a very difficult adjustment, but when she got the adoration, she loved it. Then she started to feel comfortable.

Smith: The performer came out.

Weidenfeld: Yes. The Gridiron is a good example. She was the first First Lady to perform at one. Some people like to say it was Nancy Reagan, but it was Betty Ford.

Smith: What did she do?

Weidenfeld: She danced - it’s all in my book. Too bad, I don’t think it’s at the Library, but if you need a copy, I’ll send you one. She rehearsed by dancing down the halls of the White House. She enjoyed it. She loved dancing. A lot of what you learn when you are there is how human this White House is. The tragedies that take place – with the Galubins, for example. There are all sorts of little things where you go, “Gosh, this can’t happen at the White House,” but this is a very human institution.
Smith: It’s interesting because we’ve heard from a number of people that he established, and I sensed the family generally, established a more informal, more personal relationship with a lot of the permanent staff.

Weidenfeld: Ah, yes. The Nixons were very formal with the staff. They didn’t acknowledge them. The staff told me how much they loved the Fords - that they would always say good morning, and they would always talk to them. The Fords always treated them like people, not servants, and it made all the difference in the world in terms of their happiness. That was very important for the Fords because that’s how they are. They are informal and enjoy people.

Smith: The story was that she, very early on I think, went to the Usher and said, “Is there something wrong? I say good morning and they don’t respond. Is it us, are we doing something wrong?” And he explained that the Nixons had a different climate.

Weidenfeld: Yes, that’s true. I can verify that.

Smith: You were talking earlier - the family dining room on the second floor that had that Revolutionary War paper that I think Jackie Kennedy…

Weidenfeld: That Jackie Kennedy put up.

Smith: What was the story?

Weidenfeld: Mrs. Ford couldn’t stand being in there. She said she didn’t want to be sitting in a room that’s filled with war pictures. So she said, “I’ve got to paint it yellow.” I think that was it. And she didn’t like the room that Pat Nixon did where they greeted people because it was so formal. You know, the one right next to the Treaty Room – the Diplomatic Room.

Smith: Oh, yeah. The Diplomatic Reception Room.

Weidenfeld: Not downstairs, upstairs.

Smith: Upstairs – the oval room.

Weidenfeld: Yes, there was a name for it.
Smith: It earlier had been a study and it had been lots of things. But it leads out onto the balcony.

Weidenfeld: Pat Nixon came in and she redid it and it was very, very formal. Mrs. Ford could not sit in that room comfortably and enjoy herself with guests. How would she get to know them? So that room she changed as well. She changed a lot on that floor. You know the story about the reaction she got when she said she sleeps with the President? There were people who thought this was horrible. How could she do that? That they have one bedroom, not two. She laughed about that. She thought that was very funny. And it is. It’s like pillow talk. I used to say to people, well, what if you went into the White House overnight like Mrs. Ford? Would you not talk to your husband again? The President always puts his own team together; is she not part of this team? Didn’t they talk before? Didn’t they go over things before? Give an opinion. I don’t know if Pat Nixon did with her husband. But that’s usually what happens in a marriage.

Smith: We heard about her trying to get a woman on the Supreme Court.

Weidenfeld: Yes, she did. And she lobbied and that was her pillow talk. It didn’t happen, but fortunately he chose a really good person. It’s a shame that he’s on his way out. But we’ll at least have somebody else good.

Smith: And she said, at one point, she got a woman in the Cabinet, by which I assume she meant Carla Hills.

Weidenfeld: I guess that must have been Carla Hills.

Smith: Was Ford amiable to that way of thinking?

Weidenfeld: It was hard to tell if he’d act on what she said. He’d sort of smile and appear to take some of those things in. It was like a “Yes, dear”…”of course, dear” reaction.

Smith: What was your sense of the President?
Weidenfeld: My sense was that he was basically a genuinely decent person, easy going and cheerful, who loved his wife and family, was loyal to his friends, and truly enjoyed the political game.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Weidenfeld: I never saw his temper, but I’m sure he had one. I had heard about it on several occasions, but fortunately never witnessed it - not even when he threw the pillow at her after the “60 Minutes” interview – he laughed. Rumsfeld didn’t, but he did.

Smith: Did she have a temper as opposed to temperament, if you know what I mean?

Weidenfeld: I know what you mean. She would tend to be more withdrawn than to lose her temper. I never really saw her angry – no, I never saw that. I almost wish she had, it would have been easier to deal with than with withdrawing. I just want something in my face and I can deal with it.

Smith: You saw much of the kids?

Weidenfeld: It depended on the kids, but I knew them all. Jack was the one who we became most close to. He even worked in Ed’s office. Susan was there all the time. Part of the job as press secretary is being a window on the First Family.

Smith: Right.

Weidenfeld: But not the President, as Rumsfeld told me in my little memo to him. When I said we’re a window on the First Lady and the family, he said, “And not the President.” Of course not, I was not going to do anything that was going to be…who knows. But Susan – can you imagine what it’s like to grow up under a spotlight? Can you imagine what it’s like for the press to ask you if you are a virgin when you are eighteen or nineteen? Or to share your thoughts about marriage when you’re seventeen, or if you are getting married, or who is this boy in your life? And then having to talk and sound intelligent.

Smith: But one of the poignant images is when Mrs. Ford had her surgery and Susan stood in for her. The first time she ever wore gloves. There was a diplomatic reception or something.
Weidenfeld: Susan was definitely daddy’s girl. She knew she could get anything she wanted from him, and did. As for the other Ford Children, Steven was away for most of his father’s presidency. He came in at the very end for campaigning. Jack came back and lived there for a while and wanted to work. He worked out of my husband’s office for a while. We tried to find him things to do. He needed to work, wanted it, and then decided to go on the campaign trail. Susan was a teenager. But I do remember reporters asking questions like do you bit your nails? You had to be very careful. Susan had a series of boyfriends and I remember when she said all she wanted to do was be a mother and have seven children.

Smith: After Sixty Minutes, and as time went by and there began to be a realization – perhaps to the astonishment of those in the West Wing – that hey, this woman is an asset. While you are worrying about losing 20 million votes, you may not have taken into consideration the country is changing.

Weidenfeld: No, no, no. That’s not how they thought.

Smith: They didn’t?

Weidenfeld: No. They didn’t see that. What they saw was that she’d made three covers over New Year’s – Time magazine Person of the Year, People magazine and one other. She made three covers at one time.

Smith: So they saw her news value.

Weidenfeld: There were pins out saying, “Vote Betty.”

Smith: “Betty’s Husband for President.”

Weidenfeld: “Betty for President.” There were very positive stories about her.

Smith: There was no evolution?

Weidenfeld: They saw her usefulness. That’s when she became Mrs. Gerald Ford, doing his thing in his way. And it really did her in because she was no longer Betty Ford. If she had just been herself and gone out and not been over used giving messages, recorded messages, going everywhere - she couldn’t take it. She’s fragile; you know that. You’ve spent enough time with her. She’s no different today than she was then. Everybody thought how frail she looked at the funeral.

Smith: Campaigning was not her forte.

Weidenfeld: Oh my no. And not only wasn’t it her forte - was it in Maine or New Hampshire? Maybe in both she slurred her words. It happened a number of times. She was no longer comfortable in her own skin. It was too much for her and physically difficult. It was physically and mentally bad for her. It was a balancing act to some degree.

Smith: In her zone, she’s a superstar. But being asked to do things that didn’t come naturally…

Weidenfeld: She was over used and they didn’t get that. If she’d been paced… When they left office, I told the people who were handling her that they had to be quite sensitive to her physical - to her and what they had her do. The next thing I knew she was in Russia. I heard when they got back it was embarrassing. But at that point, her drug/alcohol addiction had not been talked about. I wasn’t going to talk about anything other than her osteoarthritis.

Smith: Do you think he didn’t want to believe what he was seeing?

Weidenfeld: Maybe that’s the answer. I just don’t think he was aware. Some friends of the kids were aware she had a problem before he became vice president and was Minority Leader.

Smith: Right.

Weidenfeld: They were aware of some problems, and surprised at how well she had done once she got there.

Smith: At the end of the campaign they’d caught up, essentially. Did they think, did you think that you were going to win?

Weidenfeld: No. I knew we weren’t going to win. I really wanted us to win, but we needed credibility. Why must you stop being president to run for president. If they knew they only had thirty days, or sixty days left, what would be the one thing that they would like to get done? I thought that should be their campaign strategy.” Also it struck me during the primary that Betty Ford seemed more like someone running for First Lady than someone who was First Lady. The President was no longer president, he was running.

Smith: Were you at the convention?

Weidenfeld: Of course I was, are you kidding?

Smith: And I still remember the images; the dueling entries. How choreographed was that?

Weidenfeld: Well, I wasn’t part of the campaign. I think it was probably choreographed by the media as well as the campaign. While there was really not a lot of love lost between Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Reagan, it was really hyped. To my knowledge, it wasn’t staged.

Smith: We talked to Stan Anderson, who was the convention manager.

Weidenfeld: Yes, I haven’t seen him in years.

Smith: And he told us a story about Cary Grant.

Weidenfeld: Yes, I had to take Cary Grant around.

Smith: Where did that come from? There was Tony Orlando and Dawn, and Cary Grant.

Weidenfeld: We had met him in California, and the only thing I can tell you about Cary Grant - because I was the one who escorted him at the convention and had to ease his nerves. He was a nervous wreck. He didn’t know what to do, how he was going to do it in this huge room of people, this stadium of people. And he said, “I just do movies. I can take one take after another. I don’t do this kind of thing.” He was as nervous as anybody I’ve ever seen.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: He liked Betty Ford. They had met before, and they clicked.

Smith: Were there other people that maybe we don’t know about? Celebrities or entertainers?
Weidenfeld: Vikki Carr. The President liked Vikki Carr.

Smith: That’s right.

Weidenfeld: And Betty Ford was jealous, maybe envious, not jealous, would be the word.

Smith: There were entertainers at the State Dinners, and of course, all those Bicentennial dinners.

Weidenfeld: You kidding? She loved Pearl Bailey. We had the best time with Peter Sellers.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: Peter Sellers was in Vail, Colorado after the Sixty Minutes interview and after the President had left.

Smith: That seems like an odd mix.

Weidenfeld: It was perfect timing. They just hit it off. We were with David Steinberg, his manager, who still handles Robin Williams and various others. Recently I found out my son Daniel knows his son Mason and that we each had the pictures of ourselves with Mrs. Ford and Peter Sellers on each other’s walls, all of us wearing funny hats. She loved to ham it up. It was great. That’s when she was in her element. That’s when she was comfortable.

Smith: And yet – I guess getting up to give a speech was…

Weidenfeld: She gave some very good speeches. But she had to feel prepared, grounded, confident, and not on medication. If she were really pained, then she might take the medication that Lukash would dole out to her. I had talked with Lukash about giving her valium and other pills. I was really concerned about her popping pills. I almost felt like the child watching the parent. I took that to heart. I wanted her to do well, but when she slurred the words, it was really hard. If she didn’t feel prepared, if she didn’t have the words, if she didn’t feel comfortable she would not do well.

Smith: Jumping ahead – you may take that back. When you did the book, was that a problem? Did that cause problems?
Weidenfeld: The aftermath surprised me. I took steps to confirm Mrs. Ford’s approval and feel I was betrayed by a man I thought of as a family friend, Nat Lefkowitz, president of the William Morris Agency, then the most important agency in Hollywood. Because of the friendship, I introduced the Fords to Nat Lefkowitz and the William Morris office and encouraged the Fords to listen to their advice. The Fords agreed to let Norman Brokow of William Morris, represent the family. I wrote about this in my book.

After leaving the White House, Norman Brokow contacted me and suggested and encouraged me to write a book. Initially I declined because I was eager to get back to TV and writing a book was something I would not have considered.

Brokow persisted, and I finally agreed on two conditions – one that Mrs. Ford approve of my doing it and two that he would read the book with a critical eye as agent for the Fords and alert me to anything that might be troubling to them. Owen Laster, who Brokow brought in as literary agent for both Betty Ford and me, promised to read it in installments as I was writing it. With each installment I asked if there were anything that might be troubling to the Fords. Mrs. Ford, who by then was writing her own book, personally gave me her blessing to write the book.

Owen was enthusiastic about each installment and when it was finished told me he “loved it” and knew the Fords would, too…. Before the Fords had a chance to read my book, the air was poisoned by misrepresentation of my book. I was even called a traitor and the book was labeled “kiss and tell.” I was shocked that neither Lefkowitz, Brokow nor Laster urged the Fords to read the book before reacting. I was pleased when Shirley Elder, a well-known journalist in Detroit, Michigan (the Ford’s home state) headlined her review of the book with “Read it Betty. You’ll like it.” For me, the ultimate irony was that the consummate insider, Henry Kissinger, told a group of reporters: “I I basically think books like that are a pain in the neck; but when I started reading First Lady’s Lady to see if my name was mentioned, I ended up thinking it’s outstanding and one of the most perceptive books I had ever read about the White House.”.
The whole experience was very difficult for me because I genuinely treasured my relationship with Mrs. Ford and had the greatest respect for President Ford and firmly believe they were the right people at the right time.

Smith: Historically, it’s almost as if her life after the White House is more important in terms of the impact that she’s had on how real people live real lives. Lots of presidents don’t have that.

Weidenfeld: Most presidents don’t, and that’s a real shame.

Smith: How do you think she should be remembered?

Weidenfeld: It’s not just for drug addiction, and it’s not just for cancer. I remember her saying, “if you’ve got a problem, deal with it. Just don’t let it be. Deal with it.” That’s true for all the different areas that she’s been in. You say she couldn’t have done what she did if she hadn’t really been a success in the White House as First Lady. She had a lot of fans. She was very popular. She was candid at a time when her predecessors – there was no such thing as candor. She was compassionate, as was Ford. I don’t know how many of the press people you’ve talked to or covered (that’s probably a good thing to do) they loved being with Ford. She really was a strong First Lady, in the sense that she made a name for herself. And I think that that really worked for her when she came out later and did this.

Smith: That’s interesting. One other quick thing. We know took him a little bit of time after the election to get over it. He went around in private complaining, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Weidenfeld: Yes.

Smith: It took a little while to bounce back. One senses that while she could hurt for him, that she was in some ways more prepared to get on with the new life.

Weidenfeld: She was always prepared to get on with the new life. She thought they were getting on with a new life before they went into the White House, because he had said, “This is it. We’re moving on.” And then this all happened.

Smith: This was a detour to a new life.
Weidenfeld: This was an absolute detour. It was totally thrust on her. She was not prepared for it. She didn’t expect it. Of course, he didn’t either, but it was different. It was an extension of his career and not hers. And she just wanted to get to know her husband again and be with him and enjoy him. And be with the family and all those things that she had looked forward to that she didn’t have as the wife of a congressman. So she felt awful that he lost, but she wasn’t sorry about herself moving on. So I think that’s absolutely accurate.

Smith: And there was never any doubt about their going to California?

Weidenfeld: They thought about Naples. She looked at a few places in Naples, Florida.

Smith: Really?

Weidenfeld: And she looked at a few other places. But I think they decided because of friends. Oh, you asked about the celebrities before – they really liked celebrities. Liza Minnelli and Frank Sinatra. In California there were lots of people. And so that was fun for her.

Smith: And then at the end. At the very end of the administration, you hear the most moving parts of all this are when the First Family says goodbye to the staff – the permanent staff, who become almost family. Was that difficult for them? Saying goodbye, leaving Washington?

Weidenfeld: Of course. Especially for him. Just put yourself in his shoes. It was the end of his career; it was over. He ran hard. He campaigned hard, he really wanted to continue.

Smith: Some say his great frustration was that he felt he had just mastered the job, when he lost it.

Weidenfeld: Yes. Put very well. And she cared more about him than how she felt about leaving and taking care of her own feelings and interests. So it was difficult in that sense, too, as it was for the kids.

Smith: Isn’t it interesting: this family that thinks, oh my God, we’re going to live in the White House, we’re going to live in the goldfish bowl, Susan saying, “I’m not going to give up my jeans.” Mrs. Ford saying, “You can’t teach an old dog new tricks.” And it didn’t take very long, once they got there, to discover this is not so bad.

Weidenfeld: It’s a pretty nice life. But you’re also on public display. I remember when she took off to New York to go shopping on Seventh Avenue with Nancy Howe. I got a call from a White House reporter who asked, “What is she doing in New York?” I said, “Mrs. Ford is not in New York. She’s upstairs in her bedroom.” He said, “No, she’s not. She was spotted on Seventh Avenue.” And I said, “All right, let me check.” And lo and behold, she was on Seventh Avenue and had been spotted. She promised me she would never do that again, because I was supposed to know. This is going back to Jerry terHorst. That’s his story, I’ve got mine.

Smith: One of my favorites, I think Penny told the story. This was after they left office. She loved New York. And he liked New York. They would go to the theater and she liked to shop. Penny tells the story that one time she went to Studio 54. Now that’s culture shock. To see Betty Ford in Studio 54…

Weidenfeld: She loved to dance.

Smith: She did, and he did, too, didn’t he?

Weidenfeld: Yes.

Smith: In later years, I’ve often wondered, everyone knew about the ERA and abortion and issues like that. As the Republican Party moved further and further to the right, every four years they would go to the convention and they were all but marooned - this island of moderation. He is the only president to sign a gay rights petition. And the question arises, how much of that was her influence on him? How much of it was that they didn’t change, but the party did? Most people get more conservative as they get older and they seemed, in some ways, the opposite.

Weidenfeld: I don’t know what camp you are out of, but moderate Republicans felt very similar to how they were thinking, so I think the party has moved. To be Nelson Rockefeller, for example.

Smith: Did you have contact with him?
Weidenfeld: Absolutely. My father was very close to Cabot Lodge, and a big supporter of Rockefeller’s.

Smith: My first book was about Tom Dewey.

Weidenfeld: We’re from Boston and when I think about my father and the Republicans he admired, worked with and respected—like Cabot Lodge, Jake Javits, Edward Brooke——— where would they be today? What party they would join. I don’t know where you are. I don’t know where I am. But I certainly can’t relate to anything that’s going on in the Republican Party today - that’s for sure.

Smith: Did you like Rocky?

Weidenfeld: Oh, of course. He was charming and lovely and very nice though we had no substantive conversations.

Smith: I was going to say, you didn’t sense his unhappiness?

Smith: You didn’t sense, or pick up, that he was not a happy vice president.

Weidenfeld: He felt he was doing nothing. I would agree with that.

Smith: He went to his grave believing that Rumsfeld did him in.

Weidenfeld: I think a lot of people go to their graves thinking Rumsfeld did them in.

Smith: How did your paths first cross?

Archibald: I worked at the McCallum and the lady that had the job before me worked there with me for several years and then when she got ready to leave, she asked me if I would be interested in taking the job, so I told her I’d come over and talk to him.

Smith: What was that like, the interview?

Archibald: Oh my God, I was scared to death. I was just a wreck, because, first of all, I got here to the gate and the agent stopped me and wanted to look in my purse. I didn’t even fathom the idea of what it was like to have the Secret Service and all of that. I came in and he was so nice. I think the thing, too, was, he always had you just sit there next to the desk instead of across from him which always made it a little more personable, instead of that formal type of thing. I was nervous for the first two weeks, too, that I worked here - to come in here and talk to him by myself. We always had our little routine, around a certain time I’d have all the financial stuff ready and show it to him and [say] “I don’t want to go in there by myself!” But, yeah, he was so nice.

Smith: When did you start work?

Archibald: About thirteen years ago. In May, so I only worked with him about a month before they went to Vail for my first summer here.

Smith: You didn’t go with them up to Vail?

Archibald: No, never went up there. I went and saw their place. I’d been here a couple of years, and my husband being with the Secret Service, Lee, he was doing one of the trips to take the car, so I rode up with him and got to see their residence up there and stuff. So that was nice.
Smith: What was your daily schedule like?

Archibald: He would come over the same time every day and, mainly, I would just get all of his financial information together. I had a little report. And usually around mid-morning, he would have me come in and we would go over different things and we would interact during the day on different things. If he wanted to purchase securities, he would have me get information from the stock broker and stuff.

Smith: So you say financial information meaning, pertaining basically to personal finance?

Archibald: It was all, yes, personal finances. Totally. I just did that part and still do for Mrs. Ford now. So that’s what we would do and I loved working with him that way. I guess we were the same in that he wasn’t a procrastinator at all. He would just get things done like that and I loved that. I’d set the checkbook register on his desk because he would go through it every month and go through every check that was written and put his little notes and things. I would set it there and he would be, “Well, I’m pretty busy today. I don’t think I’ll be able to get back to you on that for a couple of days,” and in an hour, it’d be back on my desk and everything would be done and he’d be, “Okay, do you have anything else for me?” I loved that - that he was quick, got everything done.

Smith: And was that the bulk of what you did for him?

Archibald: Yes, we did that and, after Lee retired, I would help him with the autographing, we would do that. He would always set aside at least an hour every day and sign autographs. That was the thing that blew me away the most when I came to work here - how much autographing was on that table. That conference room table would be stacked and I was like, “Oh my gosh, I can’t believe it,” and all the letters and the people who would just lie and tell you all kinds of different things to get an autograph from him. I couldn’t believe that.

At first, I was very sympathetic to their needs, but we did a thing called a repeater’s list, so after awhile you would see that it was the same person. But then maybe they would have cancer, and then maybe they would have a child that was dying and you’re like, “Okay, I’m starting to recognize this name.”
Then I got very jaded, “Don’t sign an autograph for them!” But he always wanted to take at least an hour, especially at first, because he was so busy and he was away constantly. And when he was here he would want to catch up with that. Always a public servant in that way.

Smith: Isn’t that funny, people have no idea of what unique demands are placed on a former president.

Archibald: Yeah, I had no idea about that. I was just like, “Oh my gosh, what is this stack of stuff?” and it would be footballs and baseballs. Everything you could imagine, they would send in. That and the Boy Scout letters, we’d do a letter for every Eagle Scout, so we’d do about 1100 a month. There would be about 1100 Eagle Scouts.

Smith: That’s extraordinary.

Archibald: Yeah, but he always liked keeping on top of that kind of stuff.

Smith: I assume he was still getting lots of invitations, speaking invitations and the like?

Archibald: Oh yeah, yes, that was Judy’s. She would take care of all of that. I would say maybe 20–30 requests a day from opening the mail…that people wanted him to do it. And he’d look at all of them.

Smith: Part of him really loved to be on the road.

Archibald: Absolutely, yes. I remember writing to him when he had his stroke in Philadelphia, I sent it fax so he would see it, and he was like an inspiration. I always said that. Him and Mrs. Ford both, I think, were very inspirational to be as motivated and driven as they were at that age. I didn’t come here until he was in his 80’s and I thought, “Oh my gosh, he wasn’t even president before he was 60,” and people half the time are like, “I’m practically in the grave at 60 years old and he was just starting.” So, yeah, he liked keeping busy, very much so.
Smith: Was he on the phone much?

Archibald: Yes, I would say yes. At first definitely, when I first came here, he would talk to people quite a bit.

Smith: He was pretty accessible?

Archibald: Oh yeah. Are you kidding? On a Saturday, or if the phone wasn’t picked up, he would answer the phone himself walking through the office out there. He would, “Hello.” I think it was my daughter called on a Saturday and he grabs the phone up and he’s like, “Hello,” and she’s like, “Uh, is Shelli there?” But he didn’t know how to do the hold thing.

Smith: I’m told he was not mechanically inclined.

Archibald: I know, and Penny, I’m sure she’ll tell you about sitting with him and working on the computer with Hearts. He loved to play Hearts on the computer. But that was pretty much pushing it right there.

Smith: Did he do email?

Archibald: He had email, but I don’t think that he emailed. People, his kids especially, that’s mainly who would send him emails, but he wouldn’t email back. But yeah, the phone, since my office was right next door, you could hear him yell out and you knew he was having a frustrating moment with the telephone, so we would come in and help him out. He was funny that way.

Smith: Would he ever have lunch here?

Archibald: No, always go to the house exactly on time, because you could set your watch to it. And I think that was the thing, too, with Lee being with the Secret Service, if he was scheduled for taking a trip and flying out of LA, four o’clock would be departure, he would be, “Let’s go ten minutes early.” So I would say he was always early unless Mrs. Ford was going, then she’d make him always a little bit late.

Smith: You say he would always leave at the same time.
Archibald: 1:30 every day, back at 2:30 on the dot. You could pretty much count on it and there would be nothing that would delay that. Same thing in the mornings, he usually came around nine, then he would push that to maybe 9:30 as he got older, and then he’d stay here until 5 o’clock and then go home and take the dog for a walk.

Smith: And he was in here on Saturdays, I’m told.

Archibald: Oh yes, every Saturday. Yes, we had a Saturday schedule until, I would say, about the last couple of years before he died. About the last year, maybe, we didn’t come in on Saturdays. Pretty much until noon, we would be here, come and get the mail and do a little autographing and different things.

Smith: Maybe it was Lee who told us - must’ve been Lee, who said, “You know, it’s a holiday tomorrow.” And the president would say, “I didn’t vote for it.”

Archibald: He did, he was like, “I didn’t vote for that one.” So, “Okay.” He didn’t let you really have any vacation or holidays off or anything. If he was here, he expected one of us to be here with him, which was fine. He was funny on that, too.

Smith: They were both very visible in the desert. They were very involved in a lot of charities and other activities.

Archibald: Yes, yes. Yes, definitely. And they would participate in the Eisenhower events, the Classic, different balls. They would always go to the Carousel of Hope and go out to dinner. At Quito’s, there’s an actual booth there called the Presidential Booth and it sort of looks like a shower curtain, but they would pull that around the booth and give him some privacy, because everybody’s walking up and asking him...

Smith: How did they deal with that?

Archibald: I think well. I never was out with them, but just from agents’ stories and different things like when Lee would be with him, I think that they were always, to a point, he was very patient with that. My husband was with him at a lot of the Bob Hope Classic golf tournaments and he said that he was okay for a bit, but then it’s like still we’re on that schedule thing, like “Okay, I’m signing autographs, but at a certain point, we need to get moving, here.” Lee told me a funny story about they were riding in the car and he had this schedule and he said, “Who’s this Van Halen guy?” I think he was in his foursome. And Lee said, “He’s a famous rock star.” And he thought his first name was Van and his last name was Halen, and so they got to the Classic and there’s these people lined up with the white guitars for Eddie Van Halen to sign and President Ford says, “Wow, he must be really popular!” but he had no idea.

Smith: Was popular culture sort of something that he didn’t know much about?

Archibald: No, I would say not, because I think when he read, he enjoyed reading, obviously history, and different things of the past. Very little non-fiction. I remember, though, right towards the end, he read Marley and Me. I was like, “Oh, that’s such a sad story.” But he did, he read that and in fact that’s probably the only non-fiction book I remember seeing him read. I thought that that was kind of a sad story. But keeping up with that kind of stuff, no, I would say, no, he didn’t keep up with the pop culture and all that kind of stuff too much. But he was exposed to it a lot, too, though. He’d go to the Carousel of Hope and there’s tons and tons of people there of more modern genre, I guess.

Smith: I wonder whether, too, children and grandchildren bring some of that into your life?

Archibald: Oh, they would have to, yeah. I never, I guess, witnessed them interacting together and stuff, because when they were over here at the office, they were probably a little bit more formal with him instead of the “Oh, there’s Grandpa!”

Smith: He spent a lot of time with Steve in the last few years, didn’t he?

Archibald: He did, yeah. He really, truly – and I hate to say that he had a favorite, but I’m –

Smith: I’m not suggesting that, but it just seemed like everything just came together.
Archibald: Oh yeah, when Steve would come, you could just see a change in him. He was just excited and, I guess because they shared golf and so many things together. Yeah, and Steve’s a lot like his dad now, more as he grows older. I see so much President Ford in him it’s amazing.

Smith: They’re a dead ringer.

Archibald: Oh, absolutely. Yeah, the way they look and, I think, characteristics. He truly would enjoy spending time with Steve and I think it really frustrated him, too, as he got older and when he got incapacitated and couldn’t play golf and stuff. I think that was really hard for him.

Smith: I also wonder whether, in a larger sense, and he said as much, that there was a certain element – I don’t know if guilt is the word – but he was certainly well aware of the fact that, when the kids were small, he was out on the road. And he really left it to Mrs. Ford to raise the family and one of the things he was going to try to compensate for was that fact that he spent a lot of time with the kids and grandchildren. How was he as a grandfather?

Archibald: Like I said, I didn’t witness that very often, but he was totally different. You could just see a change in him when they were here, when they would come. I remember Jonathan and Christian came, it was on a Thanksgiving, I think, yeah, it must have been Thanksgiving. And he was out there playing, they had their little golf set and they were out here on the lawn hitting the ball around and stuff. And in the swimming pool, because obviously he was a fish, loved to be in that pool, and with the kids. Lots of good pictures of them swimming and playing in the pool and that kind of thing. So I think that he really enjoyed that and that’s really good for him, too, get out there and take time off of work.

Smith: I think it was Jim who just said, he knew the last few months that he must not be well because he wasn’t in the pool.

Archibald: Oh, he hated that, too. He came back from Beaver Creek and that pool had needed to be re-plastered. They resurfaced the whole pool. And it was not ready when he got back here and he was like, “I want my swimming pool” because he did that every day. And then he got to the point, I would see him later in the morning and would say, “Did you have your swim?” He goes, “I really wouldn’t call it swimming anymore. It’s more like I was wading out there.” And we’re like, “Okay.” But you could see that that was kind of frustrating for him, too. And when he wasn’t in the pool, you knew that there was something wrong.

Smith: A number of people have said we were so lucky, up until the time of his 90th birthday or so, he seemed much younger than his age would suggest.

Archibald: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: And then, one of the things that must’ve really frustrated him was to be told, presumably by the doctors, he had to really cut back on his travel.

Archibald: That was terrible. You could just see the clench of the jaw when, after he had had his stroke, they said, “You need to cut it in half.” I think he tried as much as he could, but he didn’t want to be held back at all. You could just see it, he was frustrated about it and a little angry. I never asked, but I wanted to say, “Does this really make you upset?” but I could see it.

Smith: Were you in Philadelphia?

Archibald: No, I wasn’t, but I just remember watching TV…

Smith: What was that, I mean, it must’ve been…?

Archibald: Oh, yeah, it was horrid. I remember seeing that and just the phone calls and the people that…it wouldn’t let up, the press and everything. It was a little hard to tell, because I had talked to him on the phone a couple of days before he had left Beaver Creek and he sounded funny. And I said to Penny afterwards, “He sounds to me like that he’s had a stroke” and she said, “Well, he has this thing on his tongue.” But I think that was kind of the beginning of that whole scenario. He came back here after Philadelphia for two weeks and then went back to Beaver Creek and he stayed exactly two weeks and the doctor said, “You have to come back to the desert for two weeks and not go to the altitude.” So, he did that and then he went back up there for the rest of the summer. And then, the last summer they went to Beaver Creek, he goes, “I’m going up there against doctors’ orders.” He told him not to go.
Smith: But he goes anyway because he’s frustrated and he’s a very stubborn guy, stubborn! A very stubborn guy.

Archibald: Oh, very much so. Yes, very stubborn.

Smith: I’m sure lots of people had this conversation with him. But, I remember the conversation with Mrs. Ford and she said, “At this point, we’ve had quantity of life, we’re interested in quality.”

Archibald: Absolutely.

Smith: They obviously loved the place.

Archibald: Oh, they did and I think that he relaxed more there. Here was more like the work environment. I think he got up there and it was more, “This is where I can kick back a little bit.” He would allow himself to do that during that time. I think the last summer that they went, we had that huge fire here and my place where we lived was engulfed in that and my husband was there. The first thing, I tried to get home because Lee called me and said, “The fire has started back up. You’d better come home now or you won’t be able to get home. They’ll close off the roads.” I had the staff car, I took off as fast as I could to get home and try to get into the place, but they already had the roads closed. So, my daughter and I came down and we stayed in a hotel down here and I was supposed to take Jan and the chef to the airport the next day for them to fly out. I walked in over to the house the next morning and the very first thing President Ford said to me was, “How’s Lee?” and “Is everything okay?” He was so worried and I didn’t even know he knew there was a fire or what was going on, but he was very concerned about that. So, I reassured him everything was okay and so he flew off and that was the summer he went to the Mayo and has his surgery and stuff up there. But, yeah, he was always thinking about those kind of things.

Smith: What was the relationship like with the Secret Service?

Archibald: Lee worked for him for 21 years and so he was there for a long, long time. Saw it from when he was really, really busy to seeing it fade. He was such a macho man – so things like helping him, there was no helping him at first, like trying to grab his elbow. Lee went on a cruise with them and they were getting on the cruise ship onto the little dinghy boats to take you to shore or whatever they’re called and he said, “The ocean’s going like this and the boats are two, three feet apart,” and they tried to grab President Ford’s elbow to help him down into the raft and he’s like, “I don’t need any help!”

Smith: An old Navy man, too.

Archibald: Oh, absolutely, but he said those were some his best memories, of watching President Ford swimming in the open ocean out there, just having a heyday. You could tell he was just in his element and loving this. He said they would go out for swims and just loved that. So, he was not protective of them, but he enjoyed their protection. I mean, he didn’t want them to be supportive of him in that type of way, physically, but he’d like to have that. And that’s good, I think, that barrier, because I don’t think that people realize how forceful the crowds and outsiders and strangers can be.

Smith: Plus this is a man who had been the target of two assassination attempts.

Archibald: Exactly, yes. And I remember one day we were autographing in the conference room and the gardener was mowing the lawn out here and he hit a rock and it hit the window. And President Ford, down, went to cover! And I thought, “Wow, you must do that because of experience.” And that frightened him a little bit, but I think he was very courteous to them, to the Secret Service. And, to Lee, he always was, he was so nice. They talked a lot and enjoyed each other.

Smith: How difficult were the last couple of years?

Archibald: It was hard.

Smith: For one thing, it must’ve been, on the staff, let’s face it. There was this death watch that the media had going, because I got sucked into it and it was really off-putting on every level, but you were in the middle of it.

Archibald: Well, it is. That and the constant calls we always heard. I think the hardest part for me, and I’m sure when you talk to Penny, she will agree, is that, here’s a man that was over here every day and just so vital and never seemed, like you said, even when he was 90 years old, he seemed like he was 75, 80 years old, and then all of a sudden it snowballed and he was, then, 92 years old. And then, he didn’t come over to the office anymore and you would see him at the house and he was obviously very aware, but physically could not perform. And that was hard. It was like a heartbreaker, because it’s hard to watch. I’ve never had to see one of my grandparents even go through that.

Smith: Plus, he was proud and fastidious and all those qualities, and it must have been internally, just terribly difficult to be going through.

Archibald: I think so, oh yeah. And that’s like I said, I would like to have asked him, “What is it like at this point?” because I think we all wonder what is it going to be like for us when you get to that age. And, one thing, it just broke my heart one day, it was maybe close to the end and I went over. He always liked to hold your hand, by now he was in the hospital bed, so you would hold his hand and talk to him and I said something – I don’t remember exactly – and he goes, “I hate to go.” And I went, “Where are you going?” I was not thinking. And I didn’t realize he was talking about he hated to go, you know, to die. I had to leave. There was no way I could deal with that. That was really hard, because he was always here and such a presence here.

Smith: How long would you say it was before he passed that he stopped coming over here? Was it a matter of months?

Archibald: Yeah, it was probably, just maybe 6 months? But he would come over for certain things because I remember he had a visit from – I cannot think of the man’s name now – he writes The Leaders publication? What’s his name? Anyway, he came and he had a watch for President Ford. He wanted to present him with this watch and he came over, got in his chair, got his hair all fixed and stuff, and he was able - he could be on for that. And remember things, the long-term memory would just be great. But I would say a few months before – about 6 – that he stopped coming over and we wouldn’t see him, just over at the house. But we would go every day and try to see him every day over there.

Smith: And that obviously must have imposed huge burdens on Mrs. Ford.
Shelli Archibald

December 5, 2008

Archibald: It was, she felt very protective of him. She wanted to protect him from everything, obviously at this point, his condition and people coming in.

Smith: It’s funny, because we talked to a couple of people – Penny and I used to talk about this – it bordered on cruel and unusual punishment. Whoever was responsible – we won’t speculate about it – whoever dragged poor Bob Hope around the last few years of his life did not do him a service.

Archibald: No, that’s terrible.

Smith: And I’m wondering whether that memory sank in.

Archibald: Oh, I absolutely think so. I think that is something that, to me, for anybody in their position, you don’t want to have people see you out like that and about. And, no way, he would have liked that at all. He didn’t even want to use a cane and, finally, it was one day it was like, “You have to start using the cane.” But he didn’t want to do that and he never wanted to be in a wheelchair and have people see him like that. He was just too proud. Yeah, he was funny that way.

Smith: For some people, I guess, when he died, it was an education to lots of people. I was wearing two hats. I was with ABC during the first part of the week, and I can tell you, the media were taken aback at the public response and how it just seemed to build as the week went on. And I think a lot of that was, particularly young people who’d never seen him before, were being introduced to him and they were comparing him with what they’re seeing around today and he looked awfully good. One of the things that surprised a lot of the folks was the number of young people who were in the crowds.

Archibald: I was blown away when we went to Michigan and we were riding in the motorcade from Grace Church and the streets, lined, as you remember, they were just lined with kids and young people. It was amazing, because I think that, like my daughter, she talked to him on several occasions, she would come into the office and he was always so nice to her. Another thing that, I guess, kind of blew me away about him was that former President Carter and Bush, Newt Gingrich - these are the three I can really remember off the top of my head that came to the office – he would take them around and introduce each one of us to them. That was great. So, when Jordan would come in to the office, he would always be always so nice to her and drag her into conversation, ask her about school and all that kind of stuff. So yeah, I think they probably did see him and think, wow, with what’s going on in the country, he was pretty solid.

Smith: He and President Carter really did become great friends, didn’t they?

Archibald: I think so, yeah. Just reading, because he would never really talk a lot about those type of things when we would be sitting around doing autographing or whatever. I do know one thing that really made him mad, thought, and he said it right up until the last couple of weeks before he died, is that he was very upset with Clinton and Bush for not including him in the relief for the tsunami. Remember the tsunami that hit? Yeah, he was mad about that. So, I think, Carter, you know, he always said favorable things about him, compared to. He was mad at them about that.

Smith: But he couldn’t take an active role?

Archibald: Oh no, yeah, he was just hurt, “Why didn’t they ask me?” So, that was kind of weird. But I worked with the special letters that he got, so we have a collection of those that we keep, they went way, clear back to notes from Kennedy, when he was in Congress, and the relationships that he had with the other presidents. I remember a really nice note that he got from former President Bush when they had, before one of the elections, they were out together in a car and it was nice, it was like they were talking like two buddies, you know. And I guess you don’t think of them like that, that they’re human that way.

Smith: I only heard him disparage two people and the worst thing he could say about someone was, “He’s a bad man.” That was the worst he could come up with, you know? It’s so, almost Andy Hardy, you know? One was John Dean and the other was Gordon Liddy. And if you stop and think, from his perspective, you could understand how he felt that way.

Archibald: Oh, absolutely. No, I can never remember him saying a bad, degrading or talk down about anybody.
Smith: I do remember, I can remember this vividly because I was involved in it with Penny, at the time, the whole craziness about Monica Lewinsky and I worked with him on the Op-Ed piece which basically pulled the rug out from under the impeachment forces which was a very gutsy thing for him to do and a very statesman-like thing for him to do. And, I take it, he took a lot of heat for doing it. I remember this story about Tom DeLay wrote him a six page letter, a constitutional lecture about all the reasons why he couldn’t do all the things he was proposing and so on and so on. But I know for a fact afterwards both people in the White House and the Republicans in Congress wished they had put aside their partisan feelings long enough to embrace the idea because for the country’s sake it would have been much better than what transpired.

Archibald: Absolutely. Yeah, he said very little about that to me especially, he wouldn’t talk about it too much, but I think that he knew he had to, he did the right thing. As usual.

Smith: It’s interesting, too, because I remember saying in my eulogy. You know, most of us get more conservative or high bound or whatever you want to call it the older we get. And with the Fords, both of them, they became increasingly almost marooned in the Republican Party. I mean, they were outspoken with pro-choice, pro-gay rights, things that were surprising to a lot of folks and were not terribly popular. And I wondered they changed or whether the party just went off in this direction, and how much she influenced him in his views, and… It just intrigues me what the dynamics were.

Archibald: I think so, because I’ve always thought that. That they seemed, like we were talking about, he wasn’t all up on the technology and everything like that, but at the same time very open-minded. I think Mrs. Ford obviously, I was telling Erik before you came in, that she was much more risqué thinking than President Ford was, at times make him even blush. My husband had grown a moustache – I was also telling Erik this – that he drove Mrs. Ford for maybe about nine years constantly and he grew a moustache after we got together. We got together on this job which was a little gossipy thing, but she got all over Lee. She was like, “Lee, why did you grow that moustache? It looks terrible on you! You have such a handsome face. Why would you do that?”
Well, I guess that President and Mrs. Ford were having dinner and about 8 o’clock that night our phone rang at home and it’s Mrs. Ford. And I said to Lee, “Lee, it’s Mrs. Ford.” And I’m like, oh my gosh, what does she want? And she apologized to him because she was telling President Ford this story and he said, “You can’t tell him that! He can grow a moustache!” Lee also has tattoos everywhere and some visible when he was still on the job, but they never ever talked down to him about that. The only thing Mrs. Ford said to him one day we were visiting and he stopped in and saw her and she said to him, “You always walked to the beat of a different drummer, Lee.” But I think at the same time, they didn’t judge that way. I like that. I think open-minded and that’s probably why they did get a little more alienated.

Other: [inaudible]

Archibald: Oh, yeah, Lee was driving and the right front seat guy and Mrs. Ford was in back and she was always renting movies. And she said to the guys, she said, “Have you seen any good movies lately?” The right front seat guy said, “Goodfellas, I just watched it. It’s really good.” And so they rented it and the next day she said, “Oh my gosh, the language!” But I think they enjoyed it and ended up watching it, but she was like, “That is the worst language I’ve ever heard!” I was like, “Oh gosh, I don’t think I would’ve suggested that.”

Smith: Were they big movie fans?

Archibald: Oh yeah. When I worked here, to go out to a movie, only a few times. I remember they went in to see the Titanic and one that he loved, and I was really surprised, was First Wives Club. He says, “You gotta go see it. It’s kind of a chick flick.” And I was like, “A chick flick?” And so he was like, “It’s really good.” And I was like, “Okay.” And they would go I think it was to the Frank Sinatra estate, I think he had a – no, it must have been the Annenberg’s – they had a theater and they would go watch. I think they watched Absolute Power and they’d see these first run, you know, these different movies.

Smith: Did they like Titanic?
Archibald: Mrs. Ford left before the end because she thought it was depressing. The agents were like all into it and, like, an hour before it's over, she’s like, “We’re going to go.” And they thought she needed to go to the restroom, but she ended up just walking around out there. And she goes, “I don’t want to watch any more of it. It’s depressing.” And they’re like, “Oh, okay. We want to stay!” She’s like, “No, I don’t want to see anymore.” I don’t know how President Ford felt about that, but that was kind of funny.

Smith: They seemed to enjoy visits to New York.

Archibald: Oh, yes. Yes.

Smith: And they’d go to the theater.

Archibald: I know, yes.

Smith: I remember hearing they saw The Lion King and I guess they both enjoyed it.

Archibald: Yes. And The Producers. They would make a trip usually around this time of year, I think, and they would spend a couple of weeks or a week and see some theater and different things. Yeah, I think they liked it there.

Smith: And they’d all stay at the Waldorf?

Archibald: I think so, yes, always at the Waldorf.

Smith: They had good taste.

Archibald: Oh, absolutely. And people treated them nice, gave them nice accommodations and all the little extras.

Smith: Did they have restaurants here that they were particularly fond of?

Archibald: Jillian’s was his favorite, they would go there. And the whitefish, I think they actually call it that. I was talking to a friend of theirs the other day and she said that on the menu it’s the presidential white fish, it’s something like that. I’m not exactly sure the name of it, but he would eat that constantly there. Yeah, they would go out occasionally but not so much towards the end of his life, they wouldn’t go out much.
Smith: You tell me, people who never knew him, what would surprise people about him? One thing, and I’m not trying to answer for you but, I saw him with numbers and anyone who ever questioned his IQ or intelligence, I mean, he has this steel trap mind when it came to numbers.

Archibald: Absolutely. I would sit down with him every day when he would get his Smith-Barney statement he would have his pencil from the thing over here and he would sit and he would hand write out every comparison from month to month. He’d have all his papers laid out. Very meticulous and very good at it. Yes, because I would be talking with him and he would go over differences from day to day and he could pop out the differences mathematically quicker than (snaps fingers). And I would go, “Oh, let me go get the calculator.” And he’s like, “No, I’ve got that.” But yes, very good about that.

But I think, just his graciousness. He was just accessible, I guess. You know, talk to you about anything. When Lee and I got together, he said one day, because he didn’t talk personally, I mean, he wouldn’t –

Smith: He wasn’t a gossip, either. I mean, because most politicians love to gossip. And I noticed, when I was around him, whenever it would veer, he would very sort of deftly find a way to change the subject, but he just wasn’t a gossip.

Archibald: That’s something I was told when I very first came to work in the office. You have four or five women working here, you’re going to have the women stuff happening and he didn’t like it. There would be none of that. “And I don’t want to hear about you saying this about them,” or whatever. And so, when Lee and I got together, the only thing he said to me, one day he said, we were sitting here and just out of the blue, “Is Lee going to marry you?” And I went, “I think so.” And he goes, “Well, he’d better and he’d better not get a transfer because you’re not leaving.” And I was like, “Okay.” But he, yes, not a gossip but didn’t pry into your personal life, not at all. It would never ever be that way. But also at the same time just enough, you know, always ask you about your daughter, you know and that type of thing “What is she doing in school?” and so that was nice. So I think they wouldn’t have realized he was as personable as he is.

Smith: Did you see his temper?

Archibald: Oh my gosh, yes.

Smith: Lifelong, it was something he struggled to control.

Archibald: Yes, and it would flare up. It was, I think, still during my two week training, he had been to Texas to a board meeting and the door flies open… Because I’d asked the lady that I took her place, she was still here, I was like, “Is he nice?” because when you come in and interview, of course he’s on his best behavior, as we all are, but she goes, “Oh, no, he’s great.” And the door flies open and he is, you know the famous two words, and he came through the office. I tried to escape out my window because I’m like, “Oh my gosh!” because the roof is coming off. I’m like, “This is crazy!” And he went in to Judy because they did not give him the right pillow at the hotel in Texas – he liked this certain pillow – and they knew it and he didn’t have it. And I was like, “Oh my gosh, he is, he’s angry.” Yes, when we went through the anthrax scare here – the main thing for President Ford is the mail, if the mail was running, there’d better be someone there to get the mail and have the mail done.

Smith: Don’t you think that is the old congressman?

Archibald: Oh, absolutely, and it’s just this schedule. And when the anthrax thing happened, they took all of our mail at the post office and put it in a big trash bin in the back. They didn’t even want to get our mail for the fear there might be something in there contaminated. So at this post office, they have this trash bin and they’re putting all of our mail in it and we left it for about four or five days before the Secret Service could figure out what we needed to do with it. And then, about the fifth day, President Ford was like, “That’s it. I’ve had enough.” So it was like, “Okay, let’s get the mail done.”

And so then we had to open it in anti-c suits and we just got it three days a week, Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, because it was just such an ordeal.
to put all that stuff on and open up the mail. And we had to seal the garage off. We had the hazmat team come and had to tell us everything of how to do it to just be sure. And he was very impatient about that. He wanted the mail every day. So, every other day that we didn’t have the mail, “Did you get the mail today?” “No, this is a Tuesday, we’re not doing the mail today.” So, yes, I did see his temper. I think that was probably the most impatient I’d ever seen him. It flared on quite a few occasions.

Smith: But it sounds like it flared and then it –

Archibald: Oh, absolutely. Yeah, just instantly. And then he’d have kind of this little sheepish little on his face and never say, “I’m sorry about going off like I did.” But you could tell that he was like, “Oh.”

Smith: Do you remember 9/11?

Archibald: Yes, he was in Beaver Creek during that. Yes, that was very bad. I didn’t experience what he felt or went through with it, but from what I understand from Penny and the other girls, he was in tune to watching.

Smith: And they went back to Washington for the service at the cathedral, which I think must’ve been one of the last times he was back in D.C. I know he was there for his ninetieth birthday. The Bush’s had an event at the White House. And I think the Foundation did something about that time.

Archibald: Was Reagan’s funeral after that?

Smith: Reagan’s? Yes.

Archibald: So that would’ve been probably about the last time was Reagan’s funeral. I was trying to think. I think that was the last time he was in Washington. Because they didn’t do another Foundation dinner there after that, right?

Smith: Yeah.

Archibald: Yeah, I can’t remember exactly.

Smith: I remember there was a wonderful, I think the next year they did – I think maybe it was in Vail or maybe it was out here -
Shelli Archibald
December 5, 2008

Archibald: It was here.

Smith: It was here. It was the occasion where he announced that he was Deep Throat.

Archibald: Oh, I know that was so funny. That was excellent! My only experience from that was, during the party, someone slipped up to him and slipped a coin into his hand. And so, the next Monday at work, I come in to do my deal with him and he has this coin and he hands it to me and he goes, “Shelli, what is this?” And I look at it and I go, “That’s a Krugerrand.” And he goes, “A what?” “That’s, like, about a solid piece of gold.” And he goes, “Oh my gosh!” He couldn’t remember who had slipped it into his hand, he was at this party, you know. And I thought, it’s not everybody who walks up to you and goes, “What is this?” and it’s a Krugerrand. I’m like, “Okay.” But yeah, they had it there and then I think the next year they went back to Washington, but I don’t think he went. They just had the tape for him and Mrs. Ford.

The thing he wanted to do the most, though, was the School of Public Policy opening. Every day, “I’m going to that”, “I’m going”, “I’m going”, “I’m going”. And I think that was really hard, that he didn’t get to go. I wish he could’ve been around to be there. He had the pictures and he was so excited about that opening.

Smith: The University of Michigan had a special place in his heart.

Archibald: It did, yes, very much so. That and, I guess what he would talk to me a lot about and usually if we were autographing, we would have a lot of time was, instead of just the business stuff, he would reminisce about things. And I think things we got to would remind him of different stories, but if he was watching a football game, there was no interrupting. It didn’t matter what happened. It’s like we could have this TV on and he would be sitting right here in his chair and would still have all his paperwork and stuff on his lap, but he was glued in to the TV. Yeah, the University of Michigan was his baby, I guess, for sure. That was a very touching thing to me I think was when they did the, they did the flyover, right? And then they had the band there in Grand Rapids when the plane came in. Yeah, that was nice.
Smith: Were you surprised at all? I mean, Mrs. Ford was extraordinary that last week at the beginning, even at St. Margaret’s. At ABC, we’d been told, “Don’t be surprised if she’s in a wheelchair.” But of course she wasn’t. And then at that last, she walked all the way down to the gravesite. And someone, I was told later on, remarked to her when she got back how impressed they were and she said, “That’s what my husband would have wanted.”

Archibald: I know. He was her motivator, I would say. He would have this end of the table covered with autographing, she’d have this little section, and a lot of people were writing for her autograph also, and it would get stacked up and stacked up and stacked up. Then it would be like, “Betty, you need to get to work on that autographing.” And she’d come over and do it. And I think that’s probably been the hardest part since he’s been gone is that she doesn’t have that motivator to get her going and stuff. But for such a small, little, frail-looking lady that she is, she’s tenacious. As you know, knowing her, that she has that tenacity, that was that pure will that pushed her through that with the funeral.

Smith: The funeral planning, how uncomfortable was that?

Archibald: It was terrible. He said the day they were asking him to pick out his casket, he’s like, “Do I have to do this?” and I’m like, “I really wouldn’t think you would have to. Let’s have somebody else do it.” Yeah, I would think that had to be very hard. I wouldn’t want to deal with that at all, picking the songs and…

Smith: It was so revealing, the very first meeting we had with him years before, and I talked about it at the eulogy but, he was adamant that there be no caisson down the streets of Washington which I think is so characteristic.

Archibald: Exactly, yes. Yes, I think so, too. He doesn’t want that hoopla, I guess, or whatever you would call it. He was low-key.

Smith: But you know what’s interesting, since that funeral, I know for a fact that – well, the Johnson girls went back to Texas and redid their mother’s plans and the Carters have redone their plans to make it more like the Ford funeral, to make it more family, a family event.
Shelli Archibald

December 5, 2008

Archibald: I think so, yeah. I mean, I obviously haven’t attended any other presidential funerals or anything, but I was amazed at how warm, because with the family, too, I didn’t know how they would be. But I thought they were so gracious and nice and just everything was on a more, I guess, like a normal person instead of like a president level.

Smith: Do you think he would have been touched by the outpouring?

Archibald: Oh my gosh, yes. Yes, I definitely think so because even though...that was important to him. Like when the autographing, if it would wane, you could tell he wanted to still be favorable, always be favorable in the public eye. That was important to him. And aware that “I’m still out there” and that type of thing. I think he would’ve been way blown away about the outpour. But all the planning and this here and there and that at this time, that would’ve drove him crazy. He would’ve been like, “No, I don’t want to do that.”

Smith: Is she still grieving?

Archibald: I would say yes. I don’t think there’s any way that she couldn’t.

Smith: I was going to say, I think one of the things people didn’t realize and they saw that week was how incredibly close they were.

Archibald: Well, don’t you think that has to happen when you are like they are in the public eye like that? And when you need to turn to somebody that just knows you and you just know them, that’s how their unit was – just the two of them. I mean, even without the children, it was just that they had each other to rely on when they had to get away from the masses. And so now she doesn’t have that. I think he would’ve done terrible if it would have been the other way around.

Smith: Oh, I couldn’t imagine him lasting.

Archibald: No, he seemed like all tough and everything, but she was, that was his baby. He took good care of her, always. Forcing her to, if she was sick, “You get home. Sit down,” you know, “Take good care of yourself,” or “Get to the doctor.” So, yeah, I truly think that, yes, she’s still grieving.
Smith: She must have satisfaction knowing, though, that the Center that she created has been passed on to Susan and it’s very rare that a succession is successful. When you’ve invested so much of yourself in something, it has to be a source of real reassurance to know that it’s in trusted hands.

Archibald: I think she totally feels that way about Susan, that’s she’s very capable. But I think that was hard for her, too, to give up the handling. She was so involved and when I first came to work here, she was there all the time, always going over there, always giving little talks to the patients. The Betty Ford Center was huge for her and I think it was very hard for her to give that up and to cut those strings and give them to Susan.

Smith: Last. Do you miss him?

Archibald: Oh my God, yes. It’s like so weird around here now. Well, I started missing him when he stopped coming over, that just wasn’t right. Yeah, I do, I miss him a lot. He was such a – I guess you would call it a force. Now he’s not here and that is weird.

Smith: How does it feel to be in this room?

Archibald: I hate coming in here without him here. I just would rather stay out, because this is his place. When he would have all of his pens and pencils lined up on the desk and stuff, so yeah, it was hard.

Smith: My hope is that this will be preserved and recreated, absolutely created as it was so that people will have a chance to see it for themselves.

Archibald: Yeah, I think that would be nice. He would like that, too.

Smith: The museum and the library meant a lot to him, didn’t they?

Archibald: Oh my gosh, yes. He was very proud, very, very proud of that. He told me once after I’d seen his home in Beaver Creek, “Well, you’ve been now to my home here and my home in Beaver Creek, you need to go to my first home in Michigan.” I didn’t get to go until he died, but the whole town, the whole Grand Rapids is President Ford, you know. Yeah, you couldn’t get away from it.
Smith: I certainly can’t thank you enough. It’s been great.

Archibald: Well, I hope that it wasn’t terrible.

Smith: No, it was wonderful!

Smith: It is safe to say that although your dad may have contributed to the democratization of technology, he didn’t particularly share it. I think Penny told me he did learn to play solitaire on the computer.

Ford: He did. He could use his computer to play solitaire and that was about it. I used to have to – and I’ve saved some of these messages because they are wonderful – I’d get home from a trip and he would have called my answering machine to leave a message, and I could hear him talking in the background to Mom, going, “Betty, I think I left a message. I’m not sure.” And we’d get this whole extra conversation that had nothing to do with welcome home, Steve, glad you’re back. We miss you. Technology was not his deal. But it’s interesting because when you think about back in 1974-75, he started the whole dialogue about deregulation, whether it be airlines, railroads, all that stuff. That dialogue was started in ’74 or ’75, that aviation bill or something went through that basically allowed for that cheap coach seat that I flew on last night to go back to Grand Rapids. I had no leg room, but I want to thank Dad for that.

Smith: It is astonishing when you think of the pace of change that occurred in his adult lifetime. Things you had to get used to that were radically different from what you were accustomed to.

Ford: Think about this: I can remember the first time I flew back on Air Force One. Dad picked me up in Salt Lake City. I was working on a ranch, I was a cowboy and out in the West, and he was going through Salt Lake City. I hooked up with him, got on the plane, was flying back and I remember, my girlfriend still lived in the Washington, D.C. area and we were going to go out on a date that night. I wandered up to the front part of Air Force One – sort of as an 18-19 year old kid – checking it out. And I was talking to the Air Force communications guy, and told him, “Yeah, I’ve got a date with my girlfriend tonight. We’re going to be a little late.” And he goes, “Well, would you like to call her?” And I was shocked. I go, “You mean make a phone call from this airplane?” “Oh, yeah, we can do that.” And only the President had that in 1974. So I got on the phone, called my girlfriend, and she goes, “Where are you?” And I said, “About 35,000 feet above Ohio right now.” And she didn’t believe me. And to think now, every seat on that plane, in front of it, has a phone you can pull. Whether you want to use it or not, that’s a different thing. But the technology, the chances – only Air Force One – the President was the one that had that technology back then.

Smith: I’ve been told he could receive email, but he didn’t send email. Is that more or less accurate?

Ford: Yeah. He would get email and he’d have it all printed out, and he’d read it, but that’s that generation. And then you run into other people that adapted and use email all the time.

Smith: Then the mail. He never stopped being a congressman when it came to the mail. We’ve been told wonderful stories about it. They worked on Saturdays – they would have worked on Sundays, I think, if he could get anyone to show up. But at the time of the anthrax scare, he wasn’t particularly interested in hearing why he couldn’t get his mail. And apparently there were people at the office who would be sent down to the post office and they would put on these crazy outfits, and they would go through and bring him his mail. I mean, mail was his drug.

Ford: That and newspapers. Every morning a stack of newspapers, whether it be the Grand Rapids Press, the Post, the LA Times, whatever. My early morning vision of Dad would be his swim in the morning, bright and early, his exercises, sit ups and everything, sitting down, having his cup of coffee, and a stack of newspapers. And that’s how he started the day. I can remember as a kid growing up around our breakfast table, at 514 Crown View Drive, Alexandria – Dad’s a congressman, the newspaper was a very important thing. All the kids, Jack, Mike, Susan, and I – everybody would grab and wrestle for a section. And you didn’t really talk much at breakfast, you sort of got into the facts and remembered what the box scores were going to be, talking about business or something. You had to sort of suck in some facts because you knew there would be a discussion that night at dinner and you had to defend your position.

Smith: That raises a large question, because after a conversation with Susan, I went away astonished, frankly, that at least in her recollection, during that summer of ’74, when your lives were about to be transformed, that there was as little discussion of this possibility and all that went up to it as there was. How much political discussion took place around the Ford dinner table? More specifically, was it a subject that he went out of his way to avoid that summer?

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: Just as he went out of his way to avoid it in public?

Ford: Yeah, I think you just hit the nail on the top of the head. There was a denial at times, probably, going on about what might happen. With Dad being vice president, and the idea – I think everybody hoped that the smoking gun – the Nixon tape – that stuff wouldn’t come out, and Nixon would be able to complete his presidency and heal the wounds and do the great things internationally with China and Russia and all those things. But there was a denial that I think we all sort of didn’t talk about, thinking that there was that possibility. I think that’s almost natural for any family that you go, “Gosh, we hope this doesn’t happen.” Because in no way would you think that that would be good for the country, if it got to that point where the president had actually committed crimes and had to resign and stepped out from office.

Smith: So in a curious sort of way, your household may have been one of the few in America where there is a deliberate effort not to talk about Watergate.

Ford: Everybody else was mad and angry and dang it, let’s find out what happened. And that’s true, yeah, because on the street people were demanding answers and trying to figure out what did happen. Had the President been part of a cover up?

Smith: And presumably that included your mother?

Ford: Oh definitely. Oh, they may have a pillow talk in the bedroom about what was going on. But the thing about this, Dad’s career as a congressman was almost over, he was going to retire. He was not going to run for office again because he hadn’t become Speaker of the House, the Republicans had not gotten the majority in the House. He’d told Mom, “If we don’t win the majority, and I don’t become Speaker, I’m going to retire. We’ll go back to Grand Rapids, Michigan. I’ll start my law practice again.” A nice, quiet life. Everything Mom wanted after twenty some years in Congress. And then Nixon appoints him as vice president, and there were other, much more prominent names on that list that Nixon could have picked. Nelson Rockefeller, former governor of New York, John Connally, former Democratic governor of Texas, and I think all of us – the perception was, Dad’s name, yes, it was on that list, but it was down at the bottom. Nixon – he was more important to Nixon in Congress to get legislation through than to be a vice president. And so in October of 1973, when we get the call as a family and Dad is asked to be vice president, that shocked us all. And I can remember Dad, you know, Mother was ready to go through the roof, because here she spent twenty some years to get him to finally retire, and now he’s going to be vice president. I remember my Dad pulling Mom aside and saying, “Betty, just don’t worry. Vice presidents don’t do anything.” And did that prove false.

Smith: There is a sense that – particularly during those years when he was really climbing the ladder to become Minority Leader and all that – how much was he away? How much of an issue was it? And did he feel guilty about it in later years?

Ford: He was away a lot. I mean, a hundred nights a year? Maybe more sometimes. And I know he felt guilty, but I can remember as a kid, every night when he was gone, Mom would kind of line all the kids up in her bedroom by her desk and her phone. And Dad would be on the phone and we’d all say our “How’s it going, Dad?” And he’d ask us how school went and all that. So there’s that vision of standing there in line with my two brothers and my sister, Mom pulling one of us over, giving the phone so we could talk to Dad. And that happened a lot. That’s where Mom, I mean, wow, she was a hero because she was the one there 24/7, got us to school, made sure we got to football practice, to the dentist, got the school worked on, and if there was ever a big blow up or a fight or something, she had to deal with it. By the time Dad got home, he could come home and be the good guy. Mom was the one who had to deal with it. She was the one on the front lines every day.

Smith: She was the disciplinarian?

Ford: Yeah. Because, Dad, by the time he got back, a day or two later, the storm was over and nobody was as angry and upset and things like that. So he could come bringing presents and things. In fact, Mom and I talked about this on the phone the other night. I was calling her, I travel now about a hundred days a year at least, and every city I go to, I always send my mom a postcard, because it reminds me of the kind of things Dad used to do. We were laughing on the phone the other night that when Dad would come home from these trips, and he’d always be somewhere helping a guy running for Congress, or raising money for another Republican, or something like that. And he’d always get the key to the city or something, so he’d bring them home and for some reason, I was the one who got selected to get all the keys to the city. So I had this collection. But it was just classic Dad. With each kid he had something he did when he came home and made sure that each child had that sort of little special thing.

Smith: Did she resent it? I’m trying to get a sense of the family dynamic. Obviously, part of the later story is that it was a contributing factor, in some ways, to some of her unhappiness at the time. In a lot of ways, it made her representative of women.

Ford: Made her very normal.

Smith: Yeah.

Ford: I think, no doubt in my mind that if you go through twenty-four, twenty-five years of your husband traveling a hundred to a hundred and fifty days a year, there’s got to be some resentment built up from that. And at times, I’m sure, it made their relationship very tough. She wanted her husband, father of her kids, home. You need to be doing this, I’m the one doing that. I mean, that’s just normal. That’s just what any marriage would go through. If Mom were sitting here today, she would never blame anything on Dad, she’d take responsibility for her own choices. But I think looking back, you could paint that picture. That clearly had to play into some – and it’s gradual. None of that happens quickly for anybody. It’s gradual, builds up.

Smith: It’s never been clear to me, at that point, how interested was she in politics? Was it something, because of him, she took an interest in?

Ford: It’s hard for me to know. That’s a great question, because I’d be curious how much, back when she was a young woman at twenty – late twenties, before she met Dad, how involved or interested she was in politics at that time. She and Dad used to talk politics all the time and whether she was interested or not, she made the attempt to be up to date on what was going on and participated in all those things. Whether that was out of a love for politics, or a love for Dad, probably a combination of both.

Smith: You keep hearing about how in those days members of Congress brought their families to town. That there was much more social interaction across the partisan divide, with all the consequences of that. Who were their friends?
Ford: I think they had two different sets of friends. As you say, back in those days you socialized across the aisle and on your side, too. That happened all the time. Also a lot of your friends would be considered what they would call almost lobbyists today. There was a much freer interaction between someone that was involved in business or things like that. So there was a different ground rule. But then there were plenty of people in the neighborhood, parents. There was a bonding by they might have a kid my age and we played basketball together, went to school together. There was still that. So there were friends on a lot of different levels.

Smith: We talked to Cokie Roberts who will never forget when her dad disappeared, that your dad would, not just call every day, but would go out to the house to check up and see if anything had happened. Almost a paternal kind of role. It’s hard to imagine that happening today.

Ford: It is hard to imagine today. Yeah.

Smith: But that relationship was clearly special. They used to debate at the National Press Club. Then they would get in the car together and drive down and decide en route what they were going to debate that day, have the debate, and then they would go have a drink and lunch, and back to the Hill.

Ford: Well, you look at that, you look at the relationship Dad had with Tip O’Neill. Not your typical relationship of a President and a Speaker of the House from the other party – it usually doesn’t happen. But they had a great fondness for each other. Why it wasn’t so toxic back then? I’m not sure. I’d love to get back to some of that, but that’s the nature of the beast.

Smith: We were talking to Alan Greenspan and he said one of the things that really broke that up was the jet plane. Because you have members on the West Coast who could stay on the West Coast, and live on the West Coast.

Ford: And not have to live in [Washington].

Smith: Yeah, and I’ve always thought another reason was the Cold War. For a long time, it imposed a kind of artificial consensus.

Ford: That’s interesting. Yeah.
Smith: Plus, you had the World War II generation. They shared the life-defining experiences that transcended politics. The ‘60s race is a classic race of two candidates who really didn’t differ on very much. And so it was a combination of the political culture, and a lot of other things.

Ford: You know, I think one thing today, and it doesn’t have anything to do with Dad, but I think we, as a general population, learned from who we listened to, and when you put all these talking heads on TV today – whether it be radio, it could be the right, it could be the left, but they have a tendency to find such opposites and they scream at each other, and I think we, as a country, we learn to do the same thing by watching. That is probably not a healthy thing.

Smith: One of the things that contributed to this camaraderie one senses that people forty, fifty years ago, just drank a lot more than they do today.

Ford: I think they did. There was a typical five o’clock happy hour, and going back to Mom, I think you start adding all those things up; whether it be the happy hour at five o’clock that was endorsed by everybody, and Dad traveling and that putting pressure on their marriage. Again, it built up over the years. The drinking is just an end result of other stuff.

Smith: Do you buy into the genetic predisposition?

Ford: I do. I’m, myself, eighteen years recovering. It will be nineteen years in June. I’m a recovering alcoholic myself. And so I’m not blaming it on that, I take full responsibility for my sobriety the last nineteen years, but I thank Mom for being a great leader. You would have thought Betty Ford’s son would have known better, you know. Here we went through the intervention with Mom and the Betty Ford Center and all that, and ten years after Mom goes through her bout with alcoholism, I, too, have the same thing. And I joke, I went to Mom and I said, “Mom, I think I’m an alcoholic.” And she was just like every other mother in the country, she said, “Oh, my son can’t be an alcoholic, you can’t be.” And I said, “Mom, stop! You are like Betty Ford, the poster child for this whole thing.” And yet she was just like every other mom. I think that’s how insidious a disease it is, and that’s what happens.

Smith: When did you sense that there was a problem in her case?
Ford: When did we actively talk about it, or when did we sense it? I think we all sensed there was a problem, but, again, I think we were typical of many American families, in that we didn’t talk about it. We didn’t know you could talk about it. When we did the intervention on Mom, I’d never heard the word intervention. That was a cutting edge, new tool they were using in alcoholism. Now you’ve got TV shows on intervention.

Smith: How rough was it? On you, who were intervening as much as on her.

Ford: Let me go back and finish answering the other question. I think all of us knew there was a problem, we didn’t necessarily talk about it years before we did the intervention. You would see Mom at times, slurred speech, she’d miss appointments, not eat much dinner. So you knew something was going on, but, again, there was this denial – the elephant in the room. And finally, thank God, Susan kept after Dad and a doctor and said, “Look, we’ve got to do something.” Dad agreed, understood, jumped in there to save his wife. And, again, he was as confused as all of us, because at that time the stigma of alcoholism – it was a skid row bum, it wasn’t the former First Lady. So we had to sort of get over that hump, and when we did the intervention, Dad led it and called all us kids.

All the kids flew down there the day before and we met in his office next to the house. And we met with the doctor the night before in Dad’s office and he walked us through what this intervention was. He said, “I want each one of you to walk in there with one or two stories of how your mother’s drinking just tore up your life. But you’ve got to keep it short, you’ve got to be able to tell that story within a couple of minutes.” He says, “We’re going to go around the room and everybody is going to tell their stories and we’re going to do this in love, and we’re going to remind your mother, gosh, Mom, we’re doing this because we love you. And she’s going to get very defensive, and there is probably going to be screaming and shouting and tears and hugs, and more screaming and shouting.” The guy knew what he was talking about. We’re just blind, trying to be led.

The next morning we walked in that door, early in the morning – all the kids, Dad, Clara, a woman who helped raise us, our housekeeper years ago, and a nurse. We went in there and the initial reaction of Mom was, “Oh, look, here’s all my family!” And then it took about a nanosecond for her to go, “Wait a second, it’s eight o’clock in the morning. You guys shouldn’t be here, you live in North Carolina, you live in…” and also the walls went up, the defenses went up, and the battle was on. What I’ll never forget, it is really kind of the journey of Mom and Dad in their marriage, is how Dad sat down, took her hand, and led that intervention, reminding her that he wanted his wife back, loved her, the kids were here, and kept calming her down, and just trying to fight to get his wife back. Dad led it beautifully. I mean, he just did a great job, and you could sense that steadiness, that he wasn’t going to move – he’s there, he’s not going. And basically, he shut his life down after that. He stopped going to some of the board meetings and stuff like that until Mom got through this. We were a wakeup call that morning; she did all the work. We woke her up, and obviously, she did all the work. That’s the image I have of Dad leading that.

Smith: Because it’s never been terribly clear as to what portion was alcohol, what portion was prescription drugs, how they mixed. One senses that maybe there is no clear distinction. But did pills, in some ways, afford a respectable kind of cover? You had this genuine, physical problem for which she was prescribed by a perfectly respectable physician. You could, in some ways, almost take refuge behind that.

Ford: Oh, yeah, you justify it. Oh, yeah. I’m doing what my doctor told me to do. And, again, that’s the slow progress of the disease. Mom had a legitimate pinched nerved in her neck, and her back hurt and you would prescribe medications for that and that makes sense. But when you combine that medication with alcohol – and that’s what sort of fooled all of us, we never saw her drink that much. But that didn’t matter because you were making this cocktail of drugs and alcohol, so it just heightened the effects. In the end, it doesn’t matter whether it was sixty percent alcohol or forty percent – the end result is she couldn’t participate in either one of them later on. And she had to get sober. Again, we woke her up, she did all the work.

You might remember, Richard, the best story I remember is after she started the process and went to Long Beach Naval Hospital…

Smith: Which was pretty rough, I’m told – the program is pretty rough.

Ford: Yes, it’s kind of tough love. And I remember going, went and sat in on a couple of group sessions, and I remember meeting some of the guys in her group, and they were all the way from an admiral to a petty officer, whatever. Rank didn’t mean anything, you were all in there as alcoholics. I remember Mom sitting there, and I guess it was the cafeteria, we were sitting at the table, and she sat there with three or four of these guys, and they are telling dirty jokes, kind of sailor stuff, and I was just offended. I kind of raised up, I was getting to, “Don’t you talk like this around my mother…” and I talked to one of the counselors and he said, “You know what? It’s what your mom needed. They don’t care that she’s First Lady. She’s Betty.” And the doctors and everybody else had put her on a pedestal, catered to these needs, and helped create some of her co-dependency and the problems. And so the guy telling the dirty joke was probably a good thing to sort of bring her back.

Smith: Well, a detour, but it is well known among those who know her well, that she certainly has a more ribald sense of humor than your dad.

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: Jokes had to be explained to him sometimes.

Ford: You are exactly right.

Smith: She and the girls…

Ford: But it’s funny, because as a son, you want to…and remember, that afternoon we did sort of a group thing. They went around the circle, the patients and some of the family members were there. And they asked me afterwards if I’d learned anything. And I said, “Gosh, you people here are not very smart. You’re stupid. Why would anybody want to become an alcoholic? This is stupid.” And I just remember them sort of laughing at me, going, you don’t get it, do you? And here, ten years later I raise my hand and said, “I’m an alcoholic.” So that tells you the awareness factor. I should have known better.

Smith: Not an intellectual decision.

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: Did your dad participate in some of these programs?

Ford: Yeah. He went out when Mom was at Long Beach. The analogy I use between Dad and Mom at that time – Dad was very busy – again, they were building a house in Palm Springs, he’s on the board of directors of a lot of companies, giving speeches. It was a very active time in his life after the presidency. And she was home alone, and he felt it.

Smith: In some ways it was even worse because the kids were basically grown up.
Ford: Gone, yes, everyone was gone. She was really much more alone than she was, say, at the White House. The analogy I make when I look at Dad and what happened with the intervention, it’s like two people climbing Mt. Everest. And you get up to the three-quarters level and your partner gets sick and you could obviously go climb the rest of it on your own. Or you can come back and help your partner get well, to get to the top together. And I think that’s what Dad did. When he saw Mom, the alcoholism and that, he sort of shut a lot of things down, to say, “You’re my climbing partner. There is no sense in me getting to the top without you.” And he sat and waited and helped her join him to get to the top.

Smith: You know, that’s raises another question. I remember mentioning in the eulogy the cliché that as we get older, we tend to get more conservative. Maybe because we have more to conserve, nostalgia for the past, or whatever. And, again, I don’t want to make too much of this, because God knows he always remained a fiscal conservative. A true fiscal conservative. But in other respects, he seemed to take a broader view. And it’s easy to say, well, the party moved so far to the right and all that. People speculate, well she had a lot of impact, but she’d always been around. I wonder whether that unfolding experience, going through the intervention and all that followed, and being involved as much as he was in the work of the Betty Ford Center - in the course of all that, he saw all these people, good people, accomplished people, people he admired, who had a weakness, a problem. You wonder whether that fired some of the compassion, the broadmindedness. I don’t know, am I making too much out of that?

Ford: No, I think you’re right. I give it to you on two different levels. I think Dad always had a great compassion for people and helping people. He was a pull it up by your bootstraps kind of [guy], that was the Midwest Grand Rapids way he was raised. And I’ll give you two analogies – the end of the Vietnam war, he’s in front of Congress pounding his fist, saying we need more money to get these people out of South Vietnam that helped us. These people are going to die. The Vietcong, the North is going to kill them. We need to help them. He had great compassion in Operation Baby Lift and the orphans coming over and things like that. And so that compassion was already there. In some respects, he didn’t understand the alcoholism and that weakness idea because he didn’t operate on that level. Dad, you gave him a challenge, he just got it done and that’s the way. So Mom definitely opened up his awareness, even when I went through my alcoholism. I think he didn’t understand it, but he trusted Mom to tell him, “Jerry, you know this is what happens to certain people. It’s a disease, you’ve got a weakness. You have to give it up to God. It’s not just…” You know, Dad came from that generation of, dang it, I’ll just get it done. So it was a different kind of compassion that I think she taught him. He already had that compassion for helping people that needed help.

Smith: Tell me about their faith.

Ford: We grew up going to church every Sunday, Episcopal Church, and they were very dedicated that way. I think they lived out their faith in a different way than you might see other Christians live out their faith. They weren’t a very vocal – I remember going to Africa. I went to Tanzania to work with some orphans whose parents had died of Aids, and my faith then, I was probably a little bolder about it and everything. I told that church over there, I spoke at a church, and I said, “I’ve never seen my dad lay hands on anybody, and heal them. He doesn’t speak in tongues, promise you that.” And I said, “But you know what? I see him get up from the dinner table every night, and go do the dishes for my mother. And love her the way God would love her.” So I think that’s how he lived out his faith. He was very quiet. Proverbs 3, 5 through 6, was what they, every night at bedtime they laid there and held hands. It wasn’t worn on his shirtsleeve.

Smith: Talk about opposites attracting. I assume her tardiness was a lifelong issue.

Ford: She was always late getting ready.

Smith: Was that a form of perfectionism? One thing that would surprise people - but she had butterflies before she went on and made a speech. I’ve often wondered whether the lack of punctuality was somehow related to, “I’m going to be as perfect as I can be before I go out there and do whatever I’m doing.”

Ford: I’m not sure.

Smith: Or maybe she was just late.

Ford: And it really didn’t make any difference because I can remember walking in the room so many times and Dad would be sitting in the chair, and I’d be pacing, “Is Mom ready?” He said, “Just relax, I’ve been doing this for thirty, forty years.” I think probably the first fifteen years it was tough, and he learned a little more patience later on. You’re right. Opposites attract and they both taught each other things. He loved her very deeply, and she loved him and respected him so much.
Smith: Did you ever hear them arguing?

Ford: Oh yeah. Both of them could be tough about standing their ground on their opinion. You know, Dad had a quick temper and it would come out and be gone. Once it got out, everything was fine and we moved on. But do you know when I saw his temper the most was when I played golf with him on the golf course. He’d miss a putt or mess up a shot, and “God damn it, grrr…” And then it would be gone.

Smith: Anger directed at himself.

Ford: Yes. Not at somebody else, no. Think about with Mom and Dad, the second half of her life is where she blossomed, and that was when they came to the vice presidency and presidency. And so, we’re sitting here talking about Mom and Dad – she really had the burden of raising us kids and being there on a daily basis – getting us to the doctor, football practice. And then, once they moved into the vice presidency and the presidency, that’s when she really blossomed. And she blossomed from real challenges – the breast cancer, later on the alcoholism, equal rights amendment for women. But that was her stage, and I think he was very proud of her.

Smith: Did you know she had been married before?

Ford: Yeah, vaguely. It wasn’t something that was talked about, but it wasn’t hidden from us.

Smith: Let me go back to – I still find it astonishing, when the vice presidential nomination was made, quite apart from the questions of taste, this kind of celebratory thing that Nixon put on. It was very interesting that your Dad went out of his way to not reproduce that when he nominated Rockefeller. I think he thought it was unseemly in some ways. But the astonishing thing was the logistics - you get this call in the afternoon, and that evening, you’re expected to be in the East Room, dressed and polished for your introduction to the country. It is amazing that things happened as fast as they did. Was it a blur to you?

Ford: It was. And, again, I think all of us kids, at least my impression of it was, he was not going to be vice president, they were going to chose somebody else. And then as far as the presidency, that happened again as quickly. And we barely had time to brush our hair before we ended up at the swearing in process. Both of them happened like that.
Smith: While he was vice president, was there ever a conversation in which the possibility of his becoming president...

Ford: I don’t remember having the conversation. Now, also, you’ve got to remember, at eighteen years old, that’s not the thing that you are dying to have a conversation about anyway. Part of it was denial and part of it was everybody hoped that it wouldn’t have to happen like that.

Smith: Plus it had never happened before. It was unthinkable.

Ford: Think about it Richard, this was like a Constitutional crisis.

Smith: Absolutely.

Ford: I’ll never forget walking out on the South Lawn of the White House. Everybody remembers the famous picture of Mom and Dad walking out, and Dad purposely walking alongside Nixon. You know, vice presidents usually follow the president. Here he is walking side by side, Nixon gets on the helicopter; the famous wave from the steps. We’re all standing there – Mom and Dad – and when you think about it, most presidents, after they are nominated, after they win the election, come into office, there are galas, balls, celebrations, time for change, whatever. This was not a celebration, this was a dark, dark cloud hanging over the White House. A lack of confidence, a Constitutional crisis – as the helicopter takes off, we’re going to walk back to the East Room of the White House. Mom’s going to hold the Bible, Dad’s going to take the oath of office from a Supreme Court Justice, and here you have a man who was not elected by the American public; who is going to take over this country with a war in Vietnam, Cold War with the Russians, recession, unemployment, Dow-Jones has dropped 40%, price of oil in the last twelve months has gone up 400% from $3 a barrel to $12 a barrel. And you have a man who did not get elected by the American people who is going to lead this nation. That’s a Constitutional crisis in my mind. It was a very solemn occasion. Very solemn.

Smith: And of course that night, famously, you go back to the house in Alexandria.

Ford: Dad’s just become president; we can’t move into the White House because Nixon – they haven’t cleared out all their stuff quick enough. We go back to Alexandria, Virginia – the house there. Everybody is sitting around the table, and Mom’s over there trying to cook something, and she’s talking, “Jerry, something’s wrong here. I’m still cooking. You just became President.” And it doesn’t make any sense, but yet, it was probably the healthiest thing for the nation. You’d gone from a president, Richard Nixon, very secretive, paranoid, the Plumbers and all this stuff that was going on – to Jerry Ford, guy from the Midwest, willing to open up his life to anybody. So in planning, it was probably a healthy thing for the country.

Smith: There are stories that you decided pretty early on that you wanted to get out of Dodge. You didn’t want to live in the White House.

Ford: Well, I’d been accepted to Duke University. When Dad was vice president, we didn’t have Secret Service or anything like that, so our life was relatively normal. I applied to Duke the year before, been accepted, was just weeks away from going off on my freshman year at Duke University. And in August, 1974, Dad becomes president. All of a sudden all of us, Jack, Mike, myself, Susan – we got ten Secret Service agents that are following us around. And as you can well remember, at eighteen years old, that probably isn’t the group you are hoping to hang out with. And so to be honest with you, I just didn’t know how I was going to move into the Duke freshman dorm two weeks later with ten guys with machine guns and radios. It had happened so quick. Walked into Dad’s office, the Oval Office, and told him I wasn’t ready to go to college yet and he asked me what I wanted to do. And I said, “Dad, I’d like to take a year off, get used to this. I’ll go back to school next year.” And he goes, “What do you want to do?” And I said, “I’ve always had this dream, this kind of vision to go out West and be a cowboy.” And I can remember him going, “Cowboy? What? Why wasn’t I made aware of this?” I always figured it was better than a rock star, you know. “Dad, I’m going to follow in Jimmy Hendricks’ tradition and be a rock star.”

Smith: Would he have known who Jimmy Hendricks was?

Ford: Vaguely, because he would have said, “Is that that guy I told you to turn the music down?” And he and Mom talked about it, and thank God I have great parents that allowed us kids to go find our own way. They let me take off. Not go to Duke, moved out West to Montana, started working on ranches – cowboying and rodeoing – took my Secret Service.
Smith: Let me ask you about a story because it involves you. Jack Marsh told us, the day before your Dad was going out to Chicago to deliver the VFW speech, which Lord knows was controversial enough.

Ford: Whew, there wasn’t much applause at that speech.

Smith: No. Marsh goes into the Oval Office and says I’ve got some bad news for you. He’d gotten a lot of that, so he asked what. And he said, “Steve didn’t register on his birthday for the draft.” And he said it’s one of the few times that your Dad looked like he’d been gob-smacked. He sort of put his head in his hands. The extraordinary thing is that the press never found out. You can imagine today.

Ford: And I had to go down and register.

Smith: That day.

Ford: Yes. Because at that time at eighteen you were supposed to register for the draft. It was interesting because there was no draft anymore, basically. I can remember, as a kid growing up, sitting in the living room couch with the whole family, as my older brothers, Mike and Jack - because there was a lottery system for who got picked to go to Vietnam. And it was based on your birthday. And you got a number. And I can remember sitting as a family watching it, the lottery, and just like every family in America, praying that your kids were higher numbers and they didn’t get picked.

So that had ended. So when my birthday came about, when I turned eighteen, I had forgotten to register for the draft. So you’re right. Here was this big speech he was supposed to give, and his own son mistakenly had not done the registration. So we had to jump on that and get that taken care of. It was not purposeful, I promise you that, but it certainly would have been a terrible press situation if that had come out.

Smith: Did he discuss the pardon at all in advance? Did you hear any conversation about…

Ford: I heard more about it afterwards – the justification of it. His reasons for it. Because for myself, personally, I was, “Dad you can’t do this! These people are angry.” And he talked to me. I remember one thing he said to me one time. And again, I think he did a poor job of explaining it to the country. Now, were they so angry at the time that they couldn’t have heard, even if there was a good explanation? It’s like being in a fight with your best friend, your wife, whatever, if they are in that mindset where they are so angry, even a good explanation isn’t going to work. But he did a poor job of explaining. But I remember him sitting down with me and talking about the idea of grace and mercy; and the idea that a president is like father of a family, and at times the father of a family has to give grace and mercy to his kids for the betterment of the whole family. To keep the family together. And I think, with the pardon, that’s how he looked at it. It was a greater picture to move the country on. Both him and Congress are dealing with the war in Vietnam, the Cold War with the Russians, high energy costs, inflation, unemployment. And Richard Nixon is in the headlines every day. There are still criminal charges pending. And so much time and energy and oxygen in the room is being taken up by Richard Nixon. And the country has to move on. And I think Dad probably expected that it would cost him politically, but I think, knowing him, he was thinking long term, not short term. And it did play out well long term. It didn’t play out well against Carter.

Smith: But it’s funny, all these years the conversation’s been about the tangible, measurable, political consequences, including the notion that it cost him a second term. What we’ll never know is what those consequences might have been if he hadn’t pardoned Nixon and we’d gone through two and half years of Nixon obsession.

Ford: I think, and don’t necessarily quote me on this, but I recall he talked to Leon Jaworski, special prosecutor, he talked to Congress, leaders in Congress, and found – how much time are you spending on this? Jaworski told him, “Look, Nixon could drag this out for years.” And Dad just said the country has got to move on. The interesting thing about the pardon, I found fascinating, is that it was based on a 1933 Supreme Court ruling the Burdick case. Where apparently they had offered a pardon to a fellow who was held in federal custody if he testified, but he said he wasn’t guilty, so he wouldn’t accept the pardon. Because the Supreme Court had ruled that by granting a pardon, it was an implication of guilt, by accepting the pardon, it was an acceptance of guilt. And Dad, and I believe, Benton Becker, explained that to Nixon that we’re basing this pardon on that principle. That I’m giving it, but there is an implication of guilt. If you accept it, you accept that guilt. And Nixon, obviously, turned that down at first.

Ford: She and Dad – just this great love affair. They really enjoyed each other, and he respected her so much, and so many times she went…here she is, talking about the Equal Rights Amendment for women, and it really wasn’t a Republican platform – a plank in the platform at that time. But he never discouraged her. He encouraged her to be who she was.

Smith: And one senses because there was a sea change going on, and it really surfaced in the wake of the Sixty Minutes interview. People in Washington fight the last war. And with the Reagan challenge looming, they went “Oh, my God, what has she done?” And then it didn’t take too long – the polls started coming in, and lo and behold, in ways that they hadn’t anticipated, there were whole sections of the electorate that found this refreshing. And indeed, from an administration that defined itself by openness and candor, she was living that.

Ford: She was it. And they didn’t muzzle her. It starts with how Mom and Dad approached her breast cancer early on. They wanted to take the shame off that disease.

Smith: I remember we talked to Nancy Brinker, and she said newspapers, the obits, would refer to a long illness.

Ford: No one said breast.

Smith: How did you find out about that?

Ford: I was actually out in Utah, working on a ranch, cowboying and rodeoing, and I got a call from the White House Secret Service letting me know that Mom had had this biopsy and they were going to do surgery. There was no time for me to get on a plane and get back. So I sort of kept hearing about it and we had no telephone communication out on this ranch. So it was even tougher for me. And I remember saddling a horse, going on this long ride. And I asked the Secret Service if they’d let me go by myself – just pray for Mom, think about her. And they did. And so I was really out of the loop at that point. But if she were sitting here today, she would tell you, she was scared and all those things - but it was all those cards and letters from people all over the country. Women who said, thank you Mrs. Ford for being candid, open. I went in, had a test, they caught it early, whatever, it helped me.

Smith: And it must have been an extraordinary realization about the latent power that she had to educate people. And, in fact, to bring about some pretty profound changes.

Ford: And, you know, a lot of it, too, was men who wrote Dad, who said, “Mr. President, thank you for showing me how to stand next to my wife as we go through cancer.”
Because, again, there was a stigma to it, nobody talked about it, and I think the two of them sort of got the healing process and opened it up. It’s still got a long way to go. The same process happened for alcoholism. Dad showed here’s how I’m standing next to my wife Betty, as she works through her alcoholism.

Smith: Were there some members of your generation who would enjoy the White House more than others? I mean, you didn’t mind being away from the place.

Ford: I didn’t mind, but I certainly enjoyed it. Gads, I remember the first night we moved in. I invited my best high school, elementary school buddy over, Kevin Kennedy, and said, “Look, you’ve got to come over and see this place.” We went to the roof of the White House, up through the Solarium, out onto the roof where you couldn’t go today. Took my stereo up there; and we’re standing up there looking out, and the flags are blowing and we’ve got probably Led Zeppelin’s Stairway to Heaven playing, or something. And here are two eighteen year old kids looking at each other like Dumb and Dumber, going, “There must be some serious breach of security if you and I are sitting here on the roof of the White House.” You just never would have expected it. I mean, if you were the son or daughter of Ronald Reagan you might have thought someday your dad might be president. But not the son or daughter of Gerald Ford. And ten months earlier I would have been outside of that fence, looking in, wondering what the heck do they do in there. And the events that would have to happen in history to catapult me over there. Agnew resigns, Watergate, all that stuff.

Smith: It’s interesting you mention Agnew, because we’ve been told that although in later years, they were basically in the same neighborhood…

Ford: Palm Springs, Rancho Mirage, yeah.

Smith: They managed to avoid each other.

Ford: They did. They did not socialize. I remember going to one – I was down visiting Mom and Dad. One night they had to go to an event; they were invited over by Frank Sinatra to his house to watch a movie or something. And Dad asked me if I wanted to go. I heard Frank Sinatra, and wow, I’d love to meet Frank Sinatra, and so I went. And the former Vice President Agnew was there, there were a lot of people there, but they never had a big conversation or anything. That was the only time that I know of that they ran into each other.
Smith: We’ve been told that at times they were on the same golf course and managed quite deliberately to avoid each other. Do you have a sense at all of his relationship with Nixon in later years?

Ford: I asked Dad one time who was Nixon? Who was his best friend? And I remember having the conversation with him, and he said, “You know, Nixon didn’t really have any really good close friends.” He said, “His wife Pat was probably his closest friend that way.” And I always got the sense from talking to Dad that Nixon was not that kind of man’s man, guy-guy, that you joked around with. You had your guy friends, or men friends. And it’s interesting because here he is a politician; he’s got to sell himself to the people, and yet…

Smith: He was not a natural.

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: Nixon himself once said, “I’m an introvert in an extrovert’s profession.”

Ford: Yeah, that makes complete sense.

Smith: And part of it was, he didn’t want people to see him as a closet intellectual, which he was – probably much more than Jack Kennedy. Did your dad talk about the Kennedys at all?

Ford: I don’t remember much conversation about the Kennedys except Dad would mention that he and Jack Kennedy, basically kind of shared the same area – office space. And they used to walk across for votes together, things like that. But I don’t remember a lot of conversation about the Kennedy family.

Smith: Clearly, the Profiles in Courage Award was a huge, pivotal moment, wasn’t it?

Ford: The Profiles in Courage Award, the John F. Kennedy Award, goes back to the point we were talking about earlier – long range vs. short range – about what the Nixon pardon was all about. And to have Senator Kennedy stand up there and know what he would have thought twenty some years earlier - that that moment would ever happen where he would basically say the pardon helped heal the nation and things like that. I think for Dad, that brought it full circle. They figured the pardon cost him four to eight percent of the vote against Carter? And that could have changed the election. But, again, he was thinking long term, not short term. And I think that showed the courage of what he did as a politician – to be a public servant, not a politician.

Smith: I only heard him speak disparagingly of two people. And the worst he could come up with was, “He’s a bad man.” One was John Dean and one was Gordon Liddy. We know famously he said he had adversaries, not enemies. Beyond that line, was he really that generous in his assessment of other people’s?

Ford: He was pretty dang good about that. He wasn’t harsh on people like that. It was a good quality. Again, he could get mad at somebody, but it didn’t last and talking about John Dean and Liddy and Erlichman and Haldeman, I don’t think he liked those guys because I think he smelled that from day one. I don’t think he had much love for those guys. I can remember him talking about Erlichman and Haldeman would come up to Capitol Hill to talk to him. He was the House Minority Leader and, “The President wants this, you get this legislation through.” And so on. And Dad said, “I used to go, wait a second.” In the back of his mind he goes, I know Dick Nixon, I served with him, that doesn’t sound like what Dick Nixon would want. And he would find out or talk to the President. And Haldeman and Erlichman had their own agenda as far as pushing things. So Dad, I think, had a good sense of what was good and what was bad – who to surround yourself with.

Smith: And I wonder, it could be very significant whether that may have consciously or otherwise informed his original decision not to have a White House chief of staff – not to put too much authority in any one set of hands.

Ford: It could have. I remember Dad always saying – and he probably wasn’t the first one to have said it – is a president is only as good as the people he surrounds himself with. And I think that was very much the downfall of Nixon. You had some people close to the top that, when it came to an ethical decision, a lawful decision, the ends justified the means, and trumped whatever laws you might break to serve the president – for national security – whatever you wanted. And I think Dad surrounded himself with people that might have wanted the same results of national security and things like that, but the laws of America trumped the president.

Smith: Why was Hartmann such a polarizing figure?
Ford: That rough, gruff kind of…but yet he came up with some of the greatest lines that Dad ever spoke. And Dad was very loyal to Bob Hartmann. And that’s a great character aspect of Dad – is the people that got him to Washington from Grand Rapids, from this district, Western Michigan – he kept them all on the train and they were part of it. Some people might say, “Well, they’re too regional, they haven’t operated on the national level enough.” And that hurt a president like Carter a little bit, some of that. But Dad was very loyal to those Bob Hartmann’s and those people from Michigan.

Smith: By the way, quite apart from the unique tightrope that he was walking as vice president, we’re told he didn’t particularly like the job of vice president.

Ford: Well, basically, I think he felt very vulnerable. There was a sense that the president was sending him out there to defend the White House. And you were trying to defend policy, whether it be dealing with Russians on SALT agreements, or the Vietnam war, the economy, and then you were also defending the battle on Watergate. And I think Dad felt very vulnerable that this could all bite me later. So I think at some point he sensed it was maybe turning, and his defense of the President and Watergate kept that distance a little bigger than…Apparently, he never used his office in the White House. He stayed in the Executive Office Building, purposefully, to stay removed from Nixon.

Smith: He was genuinely shocked and offended when he realized that Nixon hadn’t told him the truth.

Ford: Yeah. I know Dad had said that early on, when he accepted the vice presidency, he had a talk with Nixon and asked him – because at that time Watergate was not what it would grow into. Obviously, as it got closer, I think you are right, he was very offended. Because I think during that whole process, he was on the road out there supporting the President’s policies, plus defending Watergate, and I’m sure he was re-checking in with President Nixon, saying, “You sure this is all good?” Then they find out there was a cover up, and so on and so on.

Smith: When the smoking gun tape was released, that really made it clear that the Nixon presidency was over. Were you out of town?

Ford: No, I was in Alexandria.

Smith: How did your mother take the news?
Ford: I was eighteen years old, so I’m not sure I had a total grasp of how important those final pieces of information were.

Smith: When did you realize you were going to live in the White House?

Ford: I think I first believed it very shortly before it happened. As you know, it happened very…

Smith: And the subject had been avoided.

Ford: Yeah – very quickly. And you went with the flow. I’m sure Mom was much more aware of it than us kids were. No one hoped for that to happen. Dad loved being a public servant. That’s what he thought people should do. You give your life. And I don’t think he, even up to the end, suspected. He knew it might happen, but to suspect that Nixon would have put himself above the laws of the nation and the Constitution - it would just be beyond Dad. He knew it was a possibility, but he hoped for better.

Smith: Could you see her blossoming, after they got there, and realized that this isn’t so bad. There is a lot to be said for living in the White House. But she’d been a performer, and it’s almost as if all those years…

Ford: The curtain has now gone up.

Smith: We were told she enjoyed the State Dinners and the public aspects of the job.

Ford: Because you know it’s not permanent – it’s a temporary situation. Every four years or eight years, in our case two and a half years, the locks get changed and the key may open to right one time and to the left the next time. Mom did blossom, there’s no doubt about it. That was a period for her to really blossom and become First Lady. But I think the biggest help to us was it happened so quickly. We didn’t have a chance to worry about it, think about it. And again, I draw the analogy, if you were one of the Reagan children or one of the Bush kids, you almost knew that at some point your father might be president and there was a whole anxiety that went to the buildup. With us, it was let’s go. It’s you, let’s move it.

Smith: Did you think at the end of the ’76 campaign, that you’d caught up – had a real shot at winning this against all the earlier odds?
Ford: At the end of the ’76 campaign, at the end of the convention, I thought we had no shot at all because we were 30 points behind or so from Carter. As it got down to that last week, at the end of the campaign going into the election, I thought we had a real shot. And everybody was invested. And as much as I wanted it for Dad, because he wanted it, when we lost, it was almost a relief. A selfishness for me. I knew he was going to live longer because he wouldn’t serve a second term. And as a son, it was a selfish thing I was glad we lost. But on the other end, I know Dad thought his policies were better than Carter’s to lead us out of a recession, and so there was a mixed message there.

Smith: We were told it took him a while to bounce back.

Ford: Oh, yeah. He loved being a public servant. And when you come that close, it was how many votes in Ohio, and a couple places, could have changed the whole election. And the economy was getting better. Inflation was way down, they were producing jobs and unemployment started to head down. But, again, this is where I think he was a very ethical politician, public servant. He was advised by many people on his staff. “Mr. President, you have an election coming up in November, we can do some things to the economy that will get it pumped up.” But those are always short term fixes. They never last. And he was against that. That had been done before in several presidential elections. Presidents have that power to do certain things to get the economic numbers up, but they don’t last. He chose not to do that, was thinking long term again, not short term.

Smith: The fiscal conservatism – there is some debate over what kind of tipper he was – etc., etc. How much of that do you think is the product of a Depression era boyhood? Selling your blood to get through college and all of that. I assume there is a generational element. Plus, growing up in West Michigan - it’s a number of things.

Ford: Dad was tight at times – there’s no doubt. It was funny, I remember back in the Eighties, I was working for CBS for about seven or eight years on a soap opera, The Young and the Restless, and for a twenty-some year old kid, I was making good money. And I remember every time I went home he’d pull me aside and whip out a twenty and give it to me and stick it in my pocket and said, “Now don’t tell your mother.” And I just have to laugh. “Dad, I’ve got a job, I’m really doing quite well, just bought a ranch…” “Naw, you take it…” But he was always that way. He always wanted to look after you. I think it was his childhood, his upbringing, his father, his mother, Western Michigan, it was getting out of high school and having no money to go to college. Finally got to Michigan – they had done a fundraiser at the high school – South High – and had some sort of little scholarship and raised a hundred bucks for him to be able to go to Michigan. Yeah, that all played in. He didn’t waste money on things. It needed to work, be practical, be usable.

Smith: Did he actively resent his birth father?
Ford: He never talked about him.

Smith: Really?
Ford: When he did talk about him, which was very rare - he would talk about the story if someone had brought it up at dinner, “Dad, do you remember Grandma Ford?” And he’d talk about his mother, our grandma, and then he would relay into that story that my real father left us, and so on and so on. And you could hear the bitterness there. You could see him lift up his mother, Dorothy, but he spent more time lifting her up. And in lifting up his eventual stepfather, Grandpa Ford, Gerald R. Ford.

Smith: Did you know your grandmother?
Ford: Oh, yeah. I knew both my grandparents. Grandpa Ford, he died, I was pretty young, but I remember him, he used to take me in his backyard, had these big sunflowers and he’d pull nickels out of my ears and things like that. Grandma Ford, my sister Sue and I used to stay at her apartment all the time in Grand Rapids. She had a little parakeet and she used to go to church every day and we were scared to death to drive around with Grandma Ford. She would get in the car – she wore hats every day – and she’d get in the car and my sister Susan and I would call over to my Aunt Janet, Tom’s wife, and say, “Aunt Janet, Grandma Ford wants to take us somewhere. Please come get us.” She’d race over because we were just afraid Grandma Ford was going to get in a wreck or something. So we knew Grandma pretty well. Grandpa, not as well. But Dad lifted up his mother, that was his hero – his mom.

Smith: And how did he deal with aging? His health really held up remarkably well until he was around ninety or so. I guess when the doctors said you really can’t travel, that was a kind of death.
Ford: I think a year before he died, I was playing golf with him. So I saw things that a lot of other people didn’t see.

Smith: There is a sense by the way, that he spent more time with you in those last years.

Ford: Yeah, and I think that was purposeful on both our parts. One, at that time I didn’t have a family, wasn’t married. I could do that. The last year of Dad’s life I kind of wiped my schedule clean in a lot of areas, and spent close to a hundred days with him, whether it be in Vail, Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, Palm Springs.

Smith: Were you among those who tried to talk them that last summer out of going to Vail?

Ford: Oh, yeah. And you couldn’t. And we were all afraid with the altitude, he was going to die at the altitude from his heart. But they wanted to go one more time and it was the best thing to happen. I went up and spent several trips with him. And we went out and hit the golf ball and did stuff and it was wonderful. It was wonderful. A year before he died, again, I’ll never forget – I was down at Palm Springs and Dad got me over. There was a friend of his that owned a private golf course, and we got to play on it. And Dad would not play every hole, but he would ride around and then every once in a while he would go tee up a ball, or hit some putts. Every once in a while he’d catch his drive pretty good, and it would go 175 yards. This was a ninety-two year old man. And you could just see him kind of raise up and bristle up like a big old rooster. And we’d go back and have lunch with Mom and I’d just kind of throw it out there and say, “Oh, Mom, you should have seen, Dad hit a pretty good drive on number four.” And then he’d just kind of bristle up again and tell the story. And you could just see it give him energy. He loved that. When his physical activity got taken away, that was a tough thing on him. But he did have it almost to the end.

Smith: And one senses they were both reluctant – she in some ways was especially so - to let outside people, nurses and others, come in. Because it in some ways acknowledged he’d crossed the threshold.

Ford: The kids, we had to fight with them, to get them to get help. There were a couple of falls that had taken place where she’d hit her head, or I think maybe Dad had, too. And initially, it’s just at night while they were sleeping, and then eventually it got to be all day. But, yeah, they were resistant. You feel like you’re losing your independence. But once it got going, they were happy they had it.
Smith: How difficult was it, and how aware were they, of what, for lack of a better word, might be called the media deathwatch that was going on? It must have been pretty frustrating. You go in for tests or whatever, at Eisenhower Hospital and within five minutes, someone would have tipped off the press. That kind of ongoing attention – were they really aware of it?

Ford: I think they were, Richard. But I think because we’d been dealing with all of that for so many years – not necessarily the deathwatch – but on a lot of issues. Whether it had been Mom’s alcoholism, or things like that. We were used to it and knew it was part of the territory. And it always made you sad that somebody on the staff of the hospital would kind of sell you out, but that’s just human nature.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story one of the Secret Service agents told us. The last time your Dad left the Eisenhower Medical Center and got into the Secret Service vehicle, and as they were headed for home he said he wanted to go to In and Out Burger. And so they drove to the nearest In and Out Burger. He gets out of the vehicle, walks in, stands in line to get his burger – I guess one more of life’s simple pleasures.

Ford: He loved his In and Out Burgers. I remember when I would hit golf balls over at this course, and Phil Nicholson was over there, the great golfer – just won the Masters – practicing. So we watched Phil hit some balls and then we all sat down at a picnic table there and they went and got In and Out Burgers and we sat with Phil Nicholson and Dave Pelz, and Phil’s caddy Bones(?). And Dad just loved it. They started telling golf stories and he was telling about how he used to play with Nicklaus and Gary Player and Lee Travino and Tom Watson. But I’ll never forget sitting there – In and Out Burger is what he wanted. You’re exactly right.

Smith: I also wonder – it’s speculative – but I also wonder if in the last few years, any conscious decision was made, influenced in any way by you all seeing Bob Hope’s last years. It wasn’t pretty.

Ford: He was blind at the end.

Smith: He didn’t have to be out there. There are stories about your Dad’s was nature – someone in Hope’s office would call and ask him if he wanted play golf. And they’d go out and do one or two holes, which was all the holes that Hope was [able to play]. And then go back to the house and return later in the day and resume the game.
Your dad was a proud man, fastidious. We were told after the Foundation event speech in Washington where he gave Rumsfeld and Cheney the awards – I remember working on that speech – and he was having some trouble doing it. And he said afterwards that that was the last time he would speak in public. It suggests a sense on his part of this [aging] process.

Ford: He was pretty aware of what others had gone through and had a pretty good self-awareness of himself. Not in a big ego type of way – just this is the way I want to be seen, this is the proper way. We’ve got other ways we can do this now. The kids or Mom or somebody can give the talks now. I think everybody was glad because nobody wants to see their parent, mother or father, be embarrassed by the press. Be respected as you age. Just like when Dad and I would go play golf, I didn’t invite any friends, or he didn’t have any of his friends in those last months that he played golf. It was just him and me. We trusted each other, and it would have been awkward if anybody else would have been there because he wasn’t at his best. But he still enjoyed it, he still loved it. It was funny, Dad and I discovered golf - I remember when I was getting sober, and I hated golf. He tried to get all us kids to play it, but I’d never gotten interested.

Smith: What is it about golf that is so addictive?

Ford: You’ve got to get hooked first, because you’ve got to get through that initial threshold to get on the other side to actually think you can hit it pretty well. But I was committed to find something that he and I could do together. I knew he loved it. I didn’t love it. But I was committed to have that time with him and I just thought it would be great to have three or four hours driving around the golf course, hear his stories as he wasn’t able to tell me when I was twenty years old; as I would tell him the stories, too, that I would never have told him at twenty, but you can tell him at forty. And there was this new relationship and that was my reason. Now, I fell in love with golf and we enjoyed and shared that together, and I think that was a unique bond because I was the only kid that really shared that with him. So I cherished that – all those times sitting in the golf cart and hearing things that I never would have heard if it weren’t for out there.

Smith: He was, one senses, a discrete person. And you wonder if there are things he took with him to the grave.
Ford: Probably. But he was such a Boy Scout that I doubt that they were about him. They might have been about somebody else. He was such a square.

Smith: Was he sensitive about the Chevy Chase thing? The whole stereotype?

Ford: You know, I think he probably, at a deepest level, might have been. But he wasn’t concerned with that. He always told it – “Hey, if you’re going to be in politics, you’ve got to be able to laugh at yourself.” He was very good-hearted, good-natured about it. But I can’t imagine as a human being, in some sense, you wouldn’t – to know that you were probably one of the best athletes that ever served in the presidency. Playing football at Michigan, boxing, this is a guy that skied and swam. But he was pretty good about it. It would have made me mad, but he was pretty dang good about it.

Smith: Do you remember your last visit with him?

Ford: Well, my last visit with him was the days before he died, and he was home, he was in a bed and we were getting ready to celebrate Christmas. My mom and I were down there. I was down with Mom and other kids were not there.

Smith: And, by the way, we were told all her life she’s been a Christmas buff.

Ford: Oh, yeah. And there was a tree decorated in the living room and stuff. But Dad, at that point, wasn’t mobile. He was sitting there in bed and we had it in front of the TV in the family room there. I said, “Mom, there isn’t anything Christmas in here. Christmas has always been your guy’s deal, and here we are.” And I ran over to Long’s Drugs and I walked in the night before Christmas, Christmas Eve kind of thing, and there is one pack of little lights left. And I buy it and I’m probably the last guy out that night and they are going to shut down. I go home and I string the Christmas tree lights around the TV. And the smile came over his face and Mom and I – that was sort of symbolic – you knew something was going to happen very soon. That he was going to pass away. They had told us – the hospice people had told us – actually they thought it would happen earlier and they were shocked and surprised that he lasted days longer than they’d thought. They thought his body was shutting down. But Mom and I – he smiled – we got these little few words from him about thank you. Yeah, that was shortly before he passed away.
Smith: Were you surprised by the public reaction to his death? Because he’d been out of the public eye for a while. I thought part of it was there was a whole generation that was being introduced to him for the first time, and they were comparing these old film clippings against the ugliness of current politics. And he looked pretty good. But there was more to it than that. It seemed to build as the week went on.

Ford: I think people remembered he was a decent man. I think a lot of people realized after the whole Watergate-Nixon thing – all that died down - that that was an honorable decision that he made. I think people look back and think he was probably the president we were really looking for. He wasn’t flashy. He was down the middle of the road, steady, fiscal policy, probably not so conservative on social issues. Fiscal policy he was a good solid conservative on that. And he had that perspective. And they look back and go, “Yeah, you know, he was probably the guy we were looking for.” He was steady at the helm; there was nothing flashy about him; he spoke from the heart. So it’s like an old girlfriend, you know, she really had a lot of great qualities, she would have made a good wife.

I was thinking, we kept talking about Mom being there on a daily basis and Dad being on the road and stuff – but I look back and I think one of the great qualities of Dad as a father is he understood the situation he was in, that his job required him to be gone and I think later in life he felt guilty about that. And I know I came to terms with him and I think he came to terms with me, and wished he’d been home more. But the great quality and the memories I have is when he did come home, he never opened his briefcase, he would be at the house, he’d be with you, he’d be present. And I remember in my eighth grade year, I wanted to make the freshman football team and very rarely did an eighth grader make the freshman football team. And I went to Dad and I said, “Dad, I want to play on the team.” And he said, “Well, that’s going to be tough for an eighth grader. But I’ll tell you what, if you can do one thing that nobody else can do, I can get you on the team.” And so he thought about it, brainstormed, solved the problem. He said, “There’s nobody that can snap for punts, and I’m going to teach you how to snap for punts this summer and they are going to need you.” And, sure enough, when he was home, we were out in the backyard and he was showing me when he played at Michigan how he snapped punts. So I, as an eighth grader, went out for the freshman football team, made it, lettered, played, because he came up with a plan to get me on the team.
Smith: It’s a good story.

Ford: Very practical. There was a problem. I wanted to play. He came up with a way, and he was present and did it. And that’s the memory I have.

Smith: And it’s a kind of intelligence that I’m not sure, quite frankly, people would have credited him with – finding a practical solution.

Ford: Very Midwestern, very Grand Rapids. Exactly what that is all about. The other thing I was thinking is, some of the best advice he ever gave me, and he gave all the kids this, was follow your passion, your heart. None of us went into politics, and I think it was because he advised, make sure it’s in your blood, that you love doing it. He was never a politician for fame and fortune and power. He loved solving people’s problems. He was a congressman-kind of guy that enjoyed being a public servant.

Smith: When we were talking to Greg Ford, he had a visit with him in the last six months of his life. He expected it to be a few minutes, based on what Penny had said, and it was forty-five minutes or an hour or so. Greg asked him at one point, in effect, for the secret of his success as a politician. And your dad said something actually quite profound, he said, “I always treated other people’s problems as if they were my own.”

Ford: I remember him saying that many a time.

Smith: Which is simple, when you stop to think about it, but…

Ford: You certainly apply yourself.

Smith: It’s like: work hard, tell the truth, and come to dinner on time.

Ford: Yeah, a very connected way. And Dad had some great simple ways. He used to talk about the ideal of making and keeping friends. And he said when he found somebody that he might differ with politically or gave you a reason not to have a friendship, he said he was always taught, that’s the person I need to find out something that we share. Do we root for the same football team? Did we go to the same college, or high school, or part of the country? He said he always worked to find something common that they could build a relationship on, instead of highlighting the differences. And I think that goes back to why he could reach across the aisle in Congress and work with Democrats and Republicans both so well. He genuinely liked people.
Smith: The one question I wished I’d asked him, and I don’t know why I didn’t. But I’ve often wondered whether – speaking of regrets – after the fact, he had any regrets in the whole Justice Douglas controversy.

Ford: Was it Playboy?

Smith: It was called Evergreen Review. And you know what the fascinating thing is? Today, I’m not sure Douglas could withstand the ethical scrutiny, but it wasn’t the financial arrangements so much that offended your dad, it was the fact that he wrote articles for this sort of questionable publication.

Ford: But you know, I remember Dad thinking or talking about, and I think I saw it in print somewhere, where he actually said he’d screwed up on that, getting hold of that bone and running with it. And when he looked back he said, “I could have done a better job on that one.” But he was pretty quick to admit his screw ups.

Smith: The notorious exception was the Polish gaffe which basically took a week.

Ford: They had to work on him very hard to say…

Smith: Cheney said he thought he was going to be fired. Other people said they were almost thrown out of Air Force One. But that stubbornness kicked in.

Ford: That should have happened much quicker. And it cost him. There is no doubt, you can look back on that – the campaign was going well, they were gaining ground. And, boom, that shut things down right away and took it the other direction. And I think, again, if he were here today, he would tell you he did a poor job of explaining the Nixon pardon. At the time I don’t think he did, would have thought that, but if he had sat down and explained to people that he was doing it for the greater good of the country, that the House and the Senate were spending, I don’t know, twenty percent of their day dealing with Richard Nixon, that you still had these potential criminal trials, and all this stuff. And it was going to be dragged out and he wanted to get on with the business of the country, and the economy, and getting jobs, and inflation. But he did a poor job. He was not the greatest communicator in any sense of the word. He was, in a room like this – one on one. But in front of the podium, speech-wise, he was not a great orator.

Smith: Last thing: I’ll never forget at the funeral, when you are up there in a fog, and you’re just trying to get through it and the family is sitting right in front of you, and you don’t want to break down. And it’s odd, the thing I’ll never forget is, at some point I remember looking over because I heard this sound, and Roslyn Carter was weeping. And it occurred to me: who would have thought thirty years ago that this is how the story ends? Do you have a memory like that – almost an epiphany – from those days?

Ford: That was a hard-fought campaign. There were a lot of things said on both sides and to see – just to see them come together later on and honorably come up with a genuine friendship. I’ve often said, I don’t think there has been any president who has done more after his presidency to help the common man around the world than Jimmy Carter and his wife Roslyn. I think they remember Dad as a person they liked. I’ll tell you Richard, I really equate it with when we went through the state funeral, first starting in Palm Springs and then came to Washington, D.C., and then finally, Grand Rapids, I remember sitting there on the Capitol steps. Flags are waving and the cannons are going off. It was a state funeral, but I didn’t think about it as what Dad did to finally get the troops home from Vietnam or cut inflation from twelve percent down to four percent, or stock market got back over a thousand points during his administration, and the economy was actually rolling again and dealing with the Russians and Chinese, the Mayaguez – a number of issues.

I didn’t think about any of that – what kind of president he was. I thought about what kind of father he was, the man. How he showed Jack, Mike, Susan and I how to be a great husband, how to be a great father, his compassion in our family. I thought about the intervention; I thought of him holding Mom’s hand when she got cancer and saying, “We’re going to take the shame off this disease.” And I think Roslyn Carter thought about that – the man, the human being, the leader of his family. That’s probably where that came from.

Smith: Last thing. Is it true that you and your siblings, when young, would play in Statuary Hall?

Ford: Susan and I. On Saturdays, when he was a congressman. You were talking about mail earlier – he always wanted to go in on Saturday and look at the mail. And he’d take Susan and I with him and we would get there. The Capitol obviously was a different world than it is today with all the security and everything, but he would have Susan and I sit down at these old hunt and peck typewriters and we would type a letter to our mom. And he said, “Now tell her how much you love her and appreciate her.” And we’d type it and once we got the letter typed to Mom, he would say, “Alright, you can go play in Statuary Hall.” And Susan and I would go play hide and seek in Statuary Hall, and the guards and police all knew us. It was family. And it’s a different world today. But that’s my memory of Statuary Hall - running and hiding behind the statues and typing these letters to Mom to tell her how good a mom she is.

Smith: And, again, how the cycle comes round, with him joining that august company in the Rotunda.

Ford: He will be part of that collection, and if I get a chance to speak at the ceremony, I will probably remind people of that story that forty some years ago, I was racing around this hallway hiding from my sister. The world has come a long ways.

Smith: Time was good to your dad. I mean, he lived long enough to know that people had come around on the pardon.

Ford: Yeah. He could look back and see, whether it was the results of the Helsinki Accord or deregulation, or the troops getting out of Vietnam, or the SALT agreement – even though he didn’t get a signed agreement – he forwarded the process to get SALT II. Continued the process with the Chinese. So he saw all those things happen and the healing of the pardon. That was important.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. You were Time’s White House correspondent. How did that come about? And were you there from Nixon’s departure or did you come later?

Talbott: I hope I do a better job of talking about Jerry Ford than about myself and my own biography. I came to Time in 1968 as a summer intern. Then, when I was at Oxford, I did a second summer internship in Moscow in ’69. I worked on a Time project in ’70 and joined the staff in ’71 as the number two State Department correspondent. Then in what would’ve been late ’73 or early ’74, I was attached to the White House as not the White House correspondent, but a White House correspondent. I believe that Dean Fisher was the principal White House correspondent and that was the only domestic assignment that I had. I think it may have been late ’74, but in any event, it went through the ’76 election, and I covered Jerry Ford in the ’76 election.

Smith: Were you there for the Nixon resignation at the White House or did you come later?

Talbott: Physically at the White House? I was around the White House a lot because I was a diplomatic correspondent and that included NSC as well as the State Department, but I was not attached to the White House at the time. I was covering foreign policy at the White House.

Smith: Understood. Did you find it interesting that Ford, even before he actually took the oath of office, on the night of Nixon’s resignation - almost the first thing he says to the American people - he comes out on the front lawn of his house in Alexandria and reassures everyone he’s going to keep Henry Kissinger.

Talbott: Yeah. We all noticed that, of course, and I knew Kissinger – know Kissinger – very well. I spent a lot of time with him during that period when he was National Security Advisor, as well as throughout his period as Secretary of State and have seen him since. Yeah, I mean, Kissinger was a reassuring figure. There’s no question about that. And, of course, President Ford - before that Vice President Ford - was extremely close to Brent Scowcroft who was, in turn, very close to Henry Kissinger.

Smith: But it’s interesting because, within a year, while taking pains to reassure Kissinger that he wasn’t in any way being demoted, he changed that unique situation where Kissinger wore both hats.

Talbott: You’ll have other sources who were both better informed at the time and will recall what happened better than I do, but my sense of it with all this passage of time is that it genuinely was not intended so much to clip Kissinger’s wings as it was to do a couple of other things. First of all, good sense. Good sense I think would argue for having the two positions separate – NSA and Secretary of State. And the other thing was, of course, it was in the context of firing Jim Schlesinger – it happened at the same time if I’m not mistaken. Right?

Smith: Right.

Talbott: I think there was some fall out on the part of the White House. “Let’s do a number of things at once because it makes what we’re doing with Schlesinger less front-and-center and, you know, it’s more humane. And everything else that we’re doing makes good organizational sense.”

Smith: Was Schlesinger just a case of bad chemistry or was there more to it than that?

Talbott: You know, the famous story that lingers to this day is that Jim Schlesinger, whom I also knew and had a huge regard for and still do, wasn’t overburdened by modesty or deference, and used to basically – I don’t know if he was smoking a pipe, literally, at the time – but would sort of poke the stem of his pipe at the President of the United States and sort of treat him like a medium-bright graduate student. You know, that was Jim.

Smith: We’ve been told he treated everyone like that.

Talbott: Right. God knows I was on the receiving end of it plenty, but I deserved to be. But he came by his self-confidence and sense of his own intelligence honestly. He has extraordinary intelligence and I found him kind of fun in that respect, but I can imagine how his boss would not.

Smith: You say you covered Ford in ’76. Was the White House too slow to take seriously either the possibility of Reagan running or the seriousness of the threat that Reagan might pose?

Talbott: I don’t have any searing insights on that. I think that they were slow. Now, when you say “too slow,” they were obviously too slow, because they didn’t respond in a way that limited the damage. As we sit here in 2010 and talk about this, one of the many pertinences about that whole episode was that a sitting President was challenged in the primaries within his party. That, then, fell into a pattern that was already established with Lyndon Johnson and Jimmy Carter and would then be continued with George Herbert Walker Bush - that any sitting president that was challenged in the primaries would not be reelected for one reason or another. So what would prompt action have meant or effectively would’ve meant? I don’t know. Was there any way to stop the Reagan challenge? I think probably not. Not least because of the circumstances under which Jerry Ford became president.

Smith: It’s interesting. We’ve been told by people who worked on the campaign there were several flashpoints - maybe if things had been done differently, though it might not have prevented Reagan from getting into the race, it might not have given oxygen to the fire. For example, the Solzhenitsyn visit to Washington and the fact that Ford didn’t meet with Solzhenitsyn, Kissinger’s role in all of that fed very much the – Talbott: I remember that episode very well, because my own specialty then and subsequently was Russia, the Soviet Union. And it felt like a big mistake at the time. It felt like a political mistake and a moral mistake. And, of course, as Kissinger’s own star fell - you were referring earlier to the way in which everybody took a sigh of relief when he was kept on by Ford - within a fairly short period of time, he was under attack from what have become known as the neo-Cons, as well as, kind of traditional Liberals, for not paying enough attention to moral politic as opposed to real politik. And the Solzhenitsyn thing was kind of a poster child for that.

Smith: One senses these cross-currents taking place during this period, where on the one hand, obviously, by the time of the convention détente had become a pejorative - almost like stimulus today - a word you’re not likely to hear from politicians. And yet it is in the Ford years when you have the joint Apollo/Soyuz mission. At the same time, you have Soviet proxy troops fighting in Angola. What was the point of détente in 1975? Was it something simply that Ford has inherited from Nixon?

Talbott: Well, there’s kind of two ways to answer that I would think, Richard. One would be sort of an independent analysis, but that is my own. And then the other is why it created the vulnerability for President Ford that it did. I’ll take them in that order. I thought that the controversy over détente and the criticism of it was exaggerated and not very sound. Which is to say I always found that détente was a kind of a no-brainer. You know, it had some vulnerabilities all along. One is that, whenever you have to attach a French word to a phenomenon or a policy in the United States, sooner or later you’re going to run into problems. You know, whether it’s rapprochement or détente. But the concept was pretty simple, which is, “Let’s reduce the tensions” - ‘tente’ meaning tensions and ‘de-’ meaning less of them.

In various ways, détente had been there since the Truman administration, and certainly the Eisenhower administration. However, making that the polestar for the policy created a couple of problems. One was that it contributed to a mindset in Washington that basically said, “Well, just as boys will be boys, Soviets will be Soviets and sometimes they will do nasty things, but they don’t go to our vital interests.” And that is simplistic. It meant making mistakes like ignoring or dising somebody with Alexander Solzhenitsyn’s stature when he comes to Washington.

The other thing was that it looked as though it was granting to the Soviets the geo-political and geographical room to maintain a sphere of influence internationally. And we might’ve come to it anyway in the conversation but I’ll mention it now - there was the whole business of the Sonnenfeldt Doctrine and whether we, the United States, should recognize an organic relationship between the Soviet Union and the Soviet leadership and the captive nations of Eastern Europe which was highly offensive. It got Ford into big trouble, of course, in the campaign, in the debates, when he seemed to not recognize that Poland was under Soviet domination. All of that created a cascade effect, and Kissinger was particularly vulnerable to that over time because, frankly, he believed in it. I mean to say he really did believe in spheres of influence and balance of power and all that. And, of course, I think it was Ford himself in either a speech or an op-ed who began using the phrase ‘détente with strength,’ I believe that’s the case. Does that ring a bell?

Smith: Yeah, it does.

Talbott: Which was sort of a step towards retiring a phrase and trying to detoxify what has been part of your vocabulary.

Smith: Were you around the White House at the time of the fall of Saigon?

Talbott: I was around the White House all the time, but not in the sense that you mean, no. Not in the sense that you mean.

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the, for lack of a better word, I guess, resiliency? I mean, for years we had all been led to believe, whether it’s the domino theory or whatever, when you lose a war there’s a lasting, if not a permanent, diminution. And yet that summer, I believe, Ford was meeting with Sadat in Austria. The Middle East peace process was, if anything, accelerating. It didn’t seem as if the rest of the world had suddenly disregarded the United States. Was it surprising? We almost didn’t miss a beat.

Talbott: Well, I think maybe you’re either overstating the positive side or understating the negative side. The spectacle of the Americans being lifted off of the Embassy roof, the tidal wave of Viet Cong and North Vietnamese regulars sweeping over all of, well, what turned out to be all of Indo China - most of it - was pretty stunning and sobering at the time. Where you’re right is that, by then, it was pretty clear that that was as far as it was going to go, that Indonesia was not at risk, the Philippines were not at risk, Singapore was not at risk, Malaysia, so forth and so on. And it was also apparent what common sense should’ve made apparent - that Hanoi marched to the beat of it’s own drummer and it was not a cat’s paw of China, not to mention the Soviet Union.

And remember that the whole rationale for the Cold War, certainly for American policy in Southeast Asia, was that there was a global Communist menace that was essentially monolithic. That overlooked, long after there was evidence, the split between the USSR and the People’s Republic of China. And then, subsequently, underestimated the extent to which Vietnam was an independent actor in a lot of ways. I mean, it was highly dependent on the big guys for a lot of armaments, but in terms of its policies, its intentions, it was highly nationalistic. Though I think that fairly soon after the shock and humiliation of the fall of Saigon of South Vietnam, people began saying, “Well, wait a minute. How different is the world, exactly?” And that goes to the point.

Smith: I don’t mean to get off on a tangent here, but I’d be curious: what do you say to revisionists who, forty years later, suggest that the war could’ve been won if only—

Talbott: There are a couple of revisionists. I’ll take the school that you’re referring to. First of all, counterfactual history, you’re a professional historian – I am not – I find counterfactual history kind of fun as a teaching device and as a mind game.

Smith: It’s a parlor game.

Talbott: But, you know, it’s not of terrific utility because you could neither prove nor disprove any theory about what might have been. I’ve never found it terribly convincing. I think what it would’ve taken to win would’ve been so massive that it would’ve buckled. It was either going to buckle in the field or it was going to buckle at home. The fact of the matter is that it was buckling both places and we decided to let it buckle there rather than here. A number of our contemporaries are writing now about how Americans are not good at long wars and so forth and so on.

Smith: We’re getting practice.
Talbott: Yeah, well, but the experience may be providing additional evidence.

Smith: Right.

Talbott: Okay. The other revisionist theory which I find to be more interesting - I’ll call it the Lee Kuan Yew School - which is that we won. We won in the following sense: we, by creating such an impediment to what Lee Kuan Yew would characterize as Communist expansionism, and containing it, as it were, to Vietnam with obviously some pretty major implications for Cambodia and Laos, but particularly Cambodia, we did actually stop the dominoes from falling, including in the very small country in which Lee Kuan Yew lives, which is Singapore. He has made that case. Others have made that case. I don’t know, but I find that a little bit easier to entertain than the other one.

Smith: Two things, I realize they’re speculative, but I’m wondering to what sense the impending Reagan challenge and the criticism from the Right, generally, must’ve had on inhibiting the Ford White House from proceeding with normalization in relations with China and/or the Panama Canal treaties, both of which would have seemed to be logical and evolutionary – particularly in Panama, the administration was seriously negotiating.

Talbott: You bet.

Smith: But it didn’t go anywhere.

Talbott: I’ll say. No, I assumed you were going to raise Panama. That was huge. It was huge symbolically, it was huge in its own right, because, of course - and I think it was very unfortunate that Ronald Reagan chose to use that stick to beat up on Jerry Ford, because Jerry Ford’s instincts were absolutely right. Of course, subsequently, the Canal did revert and we haven’t suffered any geo-political damage as a result. I mean, we’ve got issues in the southern hemisphere, including Central America, including the Chinese mercantile growing presence and so forth and so on. But the notion that the loss of control of the Panama Canal constituted a strategic threat to the United States, or it was an injustice for us to give it back, never made sense. And Ford paid a real price for it, not least because he was on the defensive.
I think I remember at a White House correspondents’ dinner, it was one of these joke-y Washington rituals, I forget which one I used to have to go to, where he joked about it. He had a great big Panama hat. It wasn’t even a Panama hat. It was a sombrero, but he called it a Panama hat and he said something like, “They want to take this hat away from me, but it’s my Panama hat and I’m going to keep it.” He was trying to play it back, but it didn’t go over. I remember it didn’t work very well. It made him look silly. It made him look silly not least because it violated the first law of politics, which is never put on a silly hat. But it was a joke that didn’t work and that kind of underscored that it was a really damaging episode for him.

Smith: Could you see him learning the presidency?

Talbott: Yeah. It’s too bad Hugh Sidey isn’t around for your project. He was a great friend and mentor of mine at Time Magazine. Yeah, but in a good sense. I really liked Jerry Ford.

Smith: What did you like about him?

Talbott: His basic decency, his basic intelligence, his extraordinary sense of responsibility. The weight of history in a dictionary correct sense of the word – ironic. He had a sense of irony that, “What am I doing here?” But he didn’t let that paralyze him. He said, “Well, I’m here, so I’m going to do the best job I can.” I’ve always sympathized – he was so easy to caricature. You know, the bumbling thing, bonking his head, and stuff like that. He was probably the best athlete we’ve had in the Oval Office. I mean, I don’t know how good an athlete Teddy Roosevelt was. My sense was probably not terribly good, he just was incredibly vital. Jerry Ford played pretty serious football and swam every day and was coordinated and basically pretty smart and just very, very decent.

I thought he was a great guy. I wasn’t surprised, however, when Reagan gave him as hard a time as he did, and when Carter beat him because he had this huge burden, he had multiple burdens to bear. One was being an accidental president, or whatever you want to call somebody who’d never been elected in his own right. The other was he kind of had to carry the burden of Nixon around because Nixon put him into the presidency. He had to then carry around the burden of pardoning Nixon, which I thought was absolutely the right thing to do at the time.

Smith: At the time?

Talbott: Absolutely thought it was the right thing to do. You know, we had to cauterize that wound, and cauterization hurts, and it hurt him big time. I think the polls showed that he paid a real price for that. Vietnam, it was on his watch that the inevitable occurred. And the other thing, I guess, is since he had not spent his life or at least decades driving for the presidency, he didn’t have that hard core of ambition and commanding presence that, even presidents who have not been successful or who had, you know, personalities that you would not think would make them good politicians – Nixon being the classic example. What Nixon did have was that will to be a leader that was just built into him by the time he attained the presidency. And Jerry Ford didn’t have that and I think that came through, “Really nice guy, but we can do better.”

Smith: Right.

Talbott: That was the attitude.

Smith: David Broder said, “He was the least neurotic President of my lifetime.”

Talbott: Least what?

Smith: Neurotic. He added that it was only later on that a lot of people realized, at least, in theory, this is the kind of person we claim we want as president.”

Talbott: I don’t know about least neurotic, but the point of David’s I would accept is, and I say this advisedly, because one president whose been an extraordinarily important friend to me in my life, that’s Bill Clinton. But I think to become president, there has to be something that mere mortals or near normal folks like myself would regard as a little crazy.

Smith: An obsessive quality.
Talbott: Yeah. Some combination of qualities that you realize are indispensable, both to get the job and to do it well, but you’re just as glad you don’t have yourself and you’re glad your spouse doesn’t have, if I can put it that way.

Smith: Yeah. I was just saying, it’s a TR and Taft test. Who do you want to be stuck on a desert island with?

Talbott: Who?

Smith: TR and Taft.

Talbott: Oh, yeah, TR and Taft.

Smith: And, you know, as much as I admire TR, I think I’d rather share the island with Taft, because he’d be a much less exhausting—

Talbott: As long as there were an ample supply of food.

Smith: — and a more mellow sort of companion, you know. TR would suck up all the oxygen.

Talbott: I don’t know. I think I’d go for TR

Smith: Would you? Well, he’d be entertaining.

Talbott: Yeah.

Smith: Let me ask you about Helsinki. Is that a classic case of something that is seen in one light at the time and subsequently comes to be seen very differently?

Talbott: You bet. Absolutely.

Smith: It seemed at the time as if there were no supporters. The Right obviously was critical, but I believe Carter criticized Ford on Helsinki during the ’76 campaign.

Talbott: I wouldn’t be surprised, but I don’t remember that. Yeah, let’s spend a minute on Helsinki, because I think it was a very important part of the Ford legacy. And before I get into it, you may or may not find this useful, but I remember being in Helsinki for the 20th anniversary and, as it happened, my brother-in-law, Derek Shearer, was the U.S. Ambassador there and they had a huge conference. I was Deputy Secretary of State at the time and went over to give a speech and participate, and Jerry Ford was there and stayed at the Ambassadorial residence with Ambassador Shearer, as he then was. And I spent some time with him and you might want to even talk to Derek, who is a professor at Occidental.

Okay, Helsinki. Multiple plot shifts there. Remember what the original purpose was: it was essentially a Soviet proposal and its purpose was to concretize or sanctify the division between East and West. You know, it’s the old thing, “But ours is ours and what’s yours is negotiable.” That was kind of their philosophy. So, you take the Iron Curtain and you kind of write it into international law and acceptance.

Smith: Why then? What was it about the Soviet leadership or the Soviet worldview that required—?

Talbott: Look, there’s been a lot on that. I mean, the long and short of it was because they could, or they thought they could, and they thought they should.
Remember that the essence of the Soviet mentality is a weird combination of – it’s basically defensive in its core, but it’s defensiveness that manifests itself offensively. You know, the old line was, I think Dimitri Simes may have said it, but in any event, “There’s nothing more offensive than a Russian on the defensive.” So, what they were always trying to do was to protect, protect, protect, protect. The classic example of that - you could say the czars, as they gobbled up much of Eurasia - but Stalin who, after being almost bled to death by World War II then sets about to create these layers, concentric circles of facile space essentially to protect the Soviet Union. It didn’t have to do with, you know, the Communist Internationale or communizing the world. It had to do with making sure that ‘Never again’. Okay?

Smith: Sure.

Talbott: So that, I think, was the mentality on the Soviet side behind what became Helsinki. And it was quite controversial on the American side, whether to do it at all. Kissinger writes about that, Ford writes about it, Kissinger in his memoirs and Ford in his, I think. But in the end they decided to do it and they
- Max Kampelman in particular, who I assume you’ll talk to - it started, of course, as a negotiation that would lead to the CSCE, Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. And what happened in the course of that was that particularly the Americans, but with important input from key Europeans, saw an opportunity to jujitsu the dynamics here. And the instrument for doing so, of course, was legitimation of borders which the Russians wanted. The Soviets wanted to keep out for a long time, but ended up being included. And, instead of legitimating the Iron Curtain, the outcome legitimated the principle that the form of government under which people live is not just the business of that government, but is the business of the international community.

I’m grossly oversimplifying it, but that was really important because it created an opening for wedge initiatives to get the Soviets to accept certain principles, or at least pay lip service to them, and then allow international organizations, including the one that they cofounded, which had been the CSCE and became OSCE. And I think Helsinki was the beginning of the end of the Soviet Union. Now, you know, that doesn’t mean that once the final act was signed, that it was inevitable that by 1991 the Soviet Union or the Soviet empire would fall apart. I think that was very largely a function of Gorbachev coming into power, but it created pressures and caused sprouts to grow on the Eastern side of the Iron Curtain that might otherwise have taken a lot longer to develop.

Smith: And, at the time, Ford paid a political price.

Talbott: Yes. Well, he paid a political price because it looked like it was a peace treaty with the devil. That was essentially it. And there were a lot of things, regrettable things, dumb things said. Hal Sonnenfeldt is a very, very dear friend of mine and a colleague here at the Brookings Institution and a wise person whom I took advice from when I was in government myself. Now, he gave a speech - and you’ll have to check the date of this - to what was supposed to be an off-the-record meeting of American Ambassadors in London that got leaked. Evans and Novak lead to the headlines about the Sonnenfeldt Doctrine, which was essentially, “We’re going to let them have their sphere of influence forever.” What Hal said was quite a bit more subtle and sophisticated than that, but there we were. It kind of fed not only into liberal opposition to the administration, but also to the rise of the neo-Cons. And then, of course, there was Ford’s what I can only describe as boneheaded misstatement of what he had meant to say in the debates about Poland, which just sort of, you know, “There you go again, right?”

Smith: He’d been to Poland. He had been to Romania and he’d seen the people in the streets. Cheney told us that in great detail, Stu Spencer; what everyone around him found so frustrating was, not that he made the original error, but that for a solid week, he would not step back from it.

Talbott: I assume you’ve talked to Brent.

Smith: Yeah, who knew instantly, “We have a problem.”

Talbott: Well, maybe this goes a little bit to one reason that the Ford presidency didn’t last. I think that, if he had had more experience at that level of government or had spent more of his life thinking about that experience, he would’ve had some software that would’ve said, “Error! Error!” and he would’ve in a not terribly felicitous way, would have backed out during the debate. “Well, you know, what I really meant to say was . . .”, but it just came out of his mouth and he said, “Well, I’ve got to live with that. It’s my story and I’m sticking by it.” And it really cost. I don’t think it cost him the election, but it sure hurt.

Smith: When you saw him twenty years later in Helsinki, did he feel vindicated?

Talbott: Yes, is the short answer. And you ought to talk to Derek about that. He was proud because, you know, in 1995, the Soviet Union was history. Had been on the ash heap of history for four years already at that point. Pretty much all of us who made speeches - it was a big international cast - and his own speeches are worth recalling. I mean, it was more memorable than a lot of other Jerry Ford speeches at that event.

Smith: A couple of quick things. You were at the ’76 convention?

Talbott: Yes.
Smith: How bitter was that? Remember, with the wives and the dueling entrances and all of the stagecraft and all.

Talbott: It made me glad that I didn’t have to cover a lot of conventions. I think it was the only – no, it wasn’t the only convention I covered – but I had the assignment of doing the reconstruction of how Bob Dole got selected for the ticket. Come to think of it, I’d been to a number of conventions. It didn’t strike me as particularly bitter. You know, conventions do not bring out the best in people and particularly politicians. That didn’t make a huge impression on me.

Smith: I don’t know whether this is part of your memory or not, but we’ve talked to a number of people, including recently Jim Baker, and the consensus is that John Sears made a fundamental strategic error in putting all their eggs in a procedural issue – that of having to name the vice president before the nomination as opposed to the far more emotionally galvanizing foreign policy issue.

Talbott: Sounds right.

Smith: And the Ford people consciously decided not to contest the Reagan platform. Kissinger was livid. There’s a wonderful story told by Tom Korologos. Kissinger made one of his numerous threats to resign and Tom says, “Henry, if you’re going to resign, do it fast. We need the votes.”

Talbott: Right. That’s very funny.

Smith: The Ford people basically decided to let them have it.

Talbott: It’s kind of coming back as you ask the question. That sounds right. And then, of course, it was four years later that Ford and Kissinger were back negotiating with Ronald Reagan about putting together a ticket that would’ve been a virtual co-presidency.

Smith: Was that serious?
Talbott: Oh, yeah, I think so. I wasn’t there, was I? I may have been there, but it sure felt serious at the time and I think Reagan entertained it. But Reagan’s own instincts correctly told him, “This is crazy.”

Smith: You know, it’s fascinating. People would talk about how Reagan would do this, Reagan would do that. And the Tea Party now is claiming Reagan. I often think, you know, Reagan is such a protean figure. Are you talking about the Reagan who was willing to put Dick Schweiker on his ticket and wanted to demonstrate his openness to moderate Republicans, or for that matter, Gerald Ford or George Bush four years later?

Talbott: I was going to ask, “Hello, what about George Bush?” My recollection is that he ended up on the ticket and he’s very much the ultimate moderate Republican.

Smith: Yeah.

Talbott: I’d still be a Republican, probably. I started off in life as a Republican and the ’64 Cow Palace convention in San Francisco pushed me in another direction. But, you know, George H. W. Bush was a paragon, is a paragon, of a side of the Republican Party that’s not much—

Smith: Whose had to pretend all these years in a sense to be something that—Talbott: Had to resign from the Council on Foreign Relations and the Trilateral Commission. Yeah, I know the whole deal.

Smith: I have to tell you, I’ve been working for ten years on a suitably epic biography of Nelson Rockefeller. It opens with a thirty page reconstruction of that night, the Tuesday night at the Cow Palace where he is all but booed off the stage.

Talbott: I was there. I was there. I will never forget it as long as I live. This is wandering a bit.

Smith: No.

Talbott: What was I? It was ’64, so I was 18. I had just graduated from Hotchkiss and came from a moderate Republican family and one of my mentors at Hotchkiss several years older than me was a guy named Jonathan Rose, who was Chappy Rose’s son. Chappy Rose you know from the Eisenhower administration. Chappy Rose was, I think, Deputy Secretary of Treasury, I believe. A very major figure in the Eisenhower administration. Anyway, so Jonathan Rose who went on to work for Nixon, got me a job working for Bill Scranton.

Smith: Short-lived job.

Talbott: Well, yeah, like for a weekend. Exactly. But in any event, Ann Brownell, Herbert Brownell’s daughter, was my boss and most of my job consisted of answering phones in the Mark Hopkins Hotel, I think it was - wherever the Scranton headquarters was. I’d gotten one pass to go to the Cow Palace and it was on the afternoon when Rockefeller was speaking. I was up in the bleachers and what I’m about to say sounds politically incorrect, but it was just objectively true – I was surrounded by little old ladies in tennis shoes and when Rockefeller came on, they started not only booing, but shouting and chanting, “You dirty lover. You dirty lover.” And I remember thinking to myself, “Not my Party.” And that was that.

Smith: And that night, one of those amazing moments in history, where you can see the page being turned because the next morning, it was not the same Republican Party.

Talbott: Yeah. That’s how you open the book? Well, that’s a great story.

Smith: Yeah. It’s almost as good as the ending.

How do you think Ford should be remembered? And do you think you would answer that question differently now than if you were asked twenty-five, thirty years ago?

Talbott: Nope and this is with one word and it’s a word he used, a four-letter word. H-e-a-l. He was a healing president and even though, you know, he wasn’t by a lot of standards, including reelection, a successful President, his overall effect was to suck the poison out of the body politic and on most issues - and the ones I knew best and cared most about were foreign policy issues – his instincts were extremely good.

Smith: We talked to Jim Baker. Right before the Texas primary, Henry Kissinger is going to Africa to assert America’s support for majority rule in Rhodesia and the rest of the continent. And the people in the campaign are trying to persuade the President he doesn’t have to go, bad timing, so on and so forth. And, not only is he going to go, he’s going to have a press conference before he goes calling attention to this. And Baker went over to the White House to try to talk the President out of it. He said, “Ford’s puffing his pipe and he said, ‘You know, Jim, I think the thinking voters, the thinking Republicans of Texas, will understand this.’” And Baker says, “Mr. President, you don’t understand. There aren’t any thinking Republicans in Texas on this issue.” But Kissinger went and, you know, he lost 100 to nothing in the primary.

Talbott: Well, that was a clever comment of Baker’s. It, of course, wasn’t true. Of course there are thinking Republicans in Texas. They just didn’t think the same way. That’s the point. And, you know, being in tune with the Party and the nation, it’s a very contemporary issue now.

Talbott: I’ve got to go, but I was just going to recall one last thing myself about Ford as a good guy. I was the White House correspondent, I guess, by the time the election took place and I thanked Jerry Ford for getting me to many parts of the country I never would’ve otherwise seen, bouncing around with my Tandy Radio Shack precursor to laptops with alligator clips that you’d have to open up telephones and clip on so you could get your stories filed and stuff like that. It was a great experience. I really loved it. And then he lost.

Smith: Did you expect him to lose?

Talbott: Yeah. I mean, yeah, only because we had a lot of smart people at Time Magazine who really understood the polls. But at any event, the story I was going to tell is, you know, he was popular enough with the press that even those of us - I’m pretty sure I voted for Carter, all thanks to the little old ladies in tennis shoes. But, in any event, we all kind of felt bad for the guy and then he did a lovely thing. He basically said, “All of the members of the White House Press Corps who’ve been travelling around with me are invited to come out with me to Palm Springs just as long as you leave me alone out there and we’re going to just charge the hell out of your companies for the seats on the back-up, the press plane, the Air Force One press plane, and you can bring your families for $5 apiece.” So, you know, I took my two-month old son, who traveled for virtually nothing and we had ten lovely days in Palm Springs.

Smith: It’s hard to know where to begin. Obviously, I’d like to hear you talk about Spencer-Roberts and how the whole business of political consulting really came to be, particularly in California. Had it existed elsewhere, or was that one of the many things in which California lead the way?

Spencer: Well, as far as I can determine, California led the list. The functions of a political campaign managing firm have been conducted for years in different ways, at different times in history. The Boss Tweed era, Tammany Hall, all of those things were doing basically the same things, and in the Greek days they were probably doing it. The formulation of a company designed to run campaigns basically, be they candidates or issues oriented, started in California. I think they started because of the initiative process which was Hiram Johnson’s baby.

Smith: What is the initiative process?

Spencer: The initiative process in California is one where you can qualify for the ballot any issue that you want that meets a certain standard. An example: a bill that the legislature wouldn’t pass, you can take it to the general public. At the time Hiram Johnson initiated the process, there was a lot of corruption in California. There was a company called Southern Pacific that owned the state. They owned the Democrat Party and they owned the Republican Party, and all the legislators that went with them. This is sort of what Hiram Johnson, a reform person, was trying to get out. At that time and place I think it was good.

Smith: It really was the height of the Progressive Era.

Spencer: Right. So, that was passed. Southern Pacific still was prevailing in many ways. There was a firm in San Francisco started by Clem Whittaker and Leone Baxter, a man and wife, called Whittaker and Baxter. Their big client was Union Pacific. They got involved very heavily in the initiative process in the state. A candidate here and candidate there, that sort of thing – and that was in the 30s – that’s how far back it goes. Then there was a period of time where nobody was doing that. Individual lawyers would run campaigns, or political junkies, or things of this nature. Then two guys by the name of Bill Ross and Herb Baus, in 1958 roughly, started a firm which was the same in LA as Whittaker and Baxter. It was just a mirror of them. One came out of the Chamber of Commerce and one was a newspaper writer-type guy. Then in 1960 Bill Roberts and I formed Spencer-Roberts and our model was these two companies. We were young bucks working in the bottom line of campaigns here and there and so forth. We thought, “If those guys can make a living at it, why can’t we make a living at it, because this is what we love to do.”

Smith: Can I back up one second, because back in the 30s you had the great Epic, in every sense of the word, campaign with Upton Sinclair. Allegedly, Louie B. Mayer tapped into all of this Hollywood money – is that true? Was the movie industry that unified and powerful?

Spencer: The movie industry was unified at that level, the studio level, and very powerful. Very powerful. Had a lot of money and spent it that way. But nobody was as powerful as Southern Pacific.

Smith: What was the source of their power?

Spencer: Land, and they had the Huntingtons, the Stanfords, a lot of those groups. It was basically a northern California–San Francisco-based group of people. A lot of wealth was involved in Southern Pacific and the railroads. The railroads were like airlines today, they were money-makers. As they went through this valley, Coachella Valley, and put the track through they got a section on each side of the track, so they owned all that land from one end of the state to the other.

Smith: Would money exchange hands in the legislature?

Spencer: Oh yes. Even beyond that it changed hands. Artie Samish was the next big powerbroker and he was a lobbyist, and he went to jail. He represented the liquor industry and tracks – I’m not sure whether he worked with Southern Pacific or not. I would be surprised if he didn’t, because they were famous for hiring up everybody. But anyway, that was our model at Spencer-Roberts, and in June of 1960 we had been working with the county Republican committee in Los Angeles, with the director and field director. There was going to be a change in chairman, we could see it coming. All those jobs are at the pleasure of the chairman. It’s like a baseball manager, you’d better feel what you’re going to do because you’re only going to be here three years. So we said, “Let’s start a firm.” So we put up $500 each and we rented a little office for $37 a month in the back end of a travel agency and started the company.

Smith: What were you doing at the time?

Spencer: Prior to that? I was field director for the LA County Committee and Bill was the executive secretary of it. We were running the LA County Committee.

Smith: So you had a political background?

Spencer: Oh yeah, and prior to that we were both very active in the Young Republicans, and I was very active with Pat Hillings, a congressman who replaced Dick Nixon. I grew up in Dick Nixon’s congressional district, so I knew him well. Pat succeeded him and I did a lot volunteer work and other work for Pat.

Smith: Was it possible to know Dick Nixon well?

Spencer: Not in the sense that you and I might know each other, or other people. But, yeah, you could get to know him a little. You could know what he was about. He was a very talented guy, and tactically, he was as good as I’ve ever seen politically. I always said he ought to be a campaign manager, not a candidate. He had a deep paranoia, and that was his stumbling block.

Smith: Remember the famous line Kissinger once said – that something terrible had happened to him [Nixon] as a young man – think what he might have been if he’d been loved.

Spencer: Henry had a good example there. So we started the company. We had three clients going in. Two congressional campaigns and one state legislature race. We ran them, we won two, lost one.
Smith: That was the Kennedy-Nixon year.

Spencer: Al Bell was the congressman, Johnny Rousselot who later became Birch Society director. He was running and it was an upset. We won with him, he was a great candidate, but none of us knew he was involved with the Birch people at the time.

Smith: For people who don’t know, tell us about the Birch Society and the influence that they held in the early 60s.

Spencer: The John Birch Society was started by a guy back in Boston by the name of Robert Welch, who had very strong feelings on Communism. Very strong feelings. Very anti-Communist and all kinds of theories about how it should be handled. The basic theory that I saw, as I looked at it, was that he wanted to organize cells just like the Communists organize cells and fight them on the ground in the same manner. Some of his concepts, and he wrote a book, a manual, and some of his concepts in it were just over the hill. They weren’t the real world.

Smith: Eisenhower was…

Spencer: …a conscious agent [of the Communist conspiracy]. And many others who I don’t even remember now.

Smith: Earl Warren, certainly.

Spencer: Earl Warren, yeah. But John was an outstanding candidate. John Rousselot was on the pathway to the United States Senate or the governorship of California. There were a bunch of young guys around him like myself, we were all the same age, who were prepared to go that route. The first step was Congress. In fact, two years prior, when Hillings tried for attorney general, and the seat was open, we decided we were going to run John then. But Nixon was vice president, he was the power in California politics at the time and some of the fat cats in the district – the money people – they were a little leery of John because of his age and his aggressiveness and so forth.

Smith: It’s ironic, given the Nixon congressional district – aggressiveness would not seem to be a disqualifying factor.
Spencer: No, but, Nixon didn’t feel that way, the finance guys did, and they got to him. John and I were in Washington for a national Republican convention and we were summoned to the vice president’s office. Basically, the message that we were delivered by the vice president was, “Quit screwing around, you ain’t running. Pres Lieberg is going to be our candidate,” so forth and so on. So John and I got out and we got in a cab and John turns to me and he says, “What do you think?” I said, “Screw him, let’s go.” And John says, “No, no, no, the finance guys ____________.” So, Pres Lieberg ran and got beat by Kasem, an Arab candidate in the Democrat Party in a pretty conservative district.

Smith: But of course, ’58 was a disaster for Republicans.

Spencer: Yeah, but it still should never have been lost. It should have been a tight race, but never lost. There was like a thousand vote difference. So immediately we geared up, we’re going to go. Then John, he was one of our clients, but the question of the Birch thing…during the campaign in 1960, John had gone back after the Nixon ultimatum and got a job at FAA or FHA-FHA. I think that was part of the deal to keep him out of the race, but he made a lot of friends, he was the kind that made friends, and during the campaign we were getting checks from Arkansas for a grand, or I’m getting checks from Texas for two grand, and, in my naive way, I said, “Boy, John made a lot of good friends when he was at FHA, right?” And nothing was ever said, so we go on, we win, it’s all over with.

Bill and I had no clients now, so John says, “I want you to come to Washington with me and set my staff up.” So, okay, we get on an airplane, on a midnight flyer, and we’re flying back, we’re over Kansas and John starts giving me these quotes like, “Eisenhower’s a conscious agent,” and I said, “John, you’re talking right out of the Birch manual.” I really didn’t know much about it then. He didn’t say much. I said, “John, are you a John Bircher?” He said, “Yeah.” There was a seat open between us, I almost climbed over the seat and choked him. We started an argument and argued all the way into the old airport in Washington, now National, I guess. The guy was meeting us there from New York, a young Republican guy, he was a very conservative guy, Bundy Clark. He had a house in Georgetown and that’s where we were going to stay.

We get in the car, I turn to Bundy and I said, “Let me tell you about this guy, Bundy, he’s a John Bircher.” I thought he was going to drop. We were in Maryland, we were at the Baltimore airport – there was a long entrance – one way this way, one way that way, I thought he drove off over this way, I mean he was so upset. We sat up the rest of the night, until six in the morning beating on him. Our basic premise was, “Well you’ve got to get out of that thing, or you’re done.” Couldn’t do it – couldn’t convince him. In fact, we even warned him that sooner or later the press would do an expose and then you are toast in Congress. The Santa Barbara News-Press, old man Storch did it, and then the LA Times followed up and then John, Ed Hiestand, and Jimmy Utt, all California congressmen were members and they were all toast after that.

That was the end of Ed Hiestand. He came back and ran for Congress later. The interesting thing about the Birch Society at that time, there were members of the Chandler family that were involved. They had such a big family – cousins, uncles, there were some of the Chandler’s who were involved in the Birch Society and yet they did one of the best exposes of the Society that was done. But John, the next step he took was he became the national director. The Birch Society would have died, but John was so good that he kept it going. He didn’t get it going this way, up, so to speak, but he did keep it on even keel. When he finally quit that job it just disappeared. He kept it alive for about two years, in my mind.

Smith: So by the early sixties, paint a picture of the California Republican party. It’s not that long, after all, since Earl Warren had given the state in a sort of bipartisan way. Then of course, you had Nixon. But you also had Tom Kuchel in the Senate, the classic liberal Republican.

Spencer: [Governor] Goody Knight. Once Nixon got into the VP spot, ’53, he’d only been in the Senate two years, and he had ambitions. You could tell at the time. Once he got into the VP spot he used that podium or that platform in California. He was a smart politician in the sense that he knew, “I’ve got to take on my base first.” So we had a troika. We had Warren, or remnants of Warren, of which Kuchel was a part of, and we had Goody Knight, and there was basically a power struggle between Goody’s people and Warren’s people, and Nixon’s people. He started organizing, he basically started taking the state over. Kuchel, who was a client of ours in ‘62, he didn’t like that kind of stuff and he wasn’t good at that internal politics. He was a statesman, Tommy was. He liked to think in big terms and so forth.

Print media was the thing then, there wasn’t electronic media, and Tommy would just periodically get in a station wagon in San Diego and start and go right up the state and stop and see every editor and every publisher and it paid off for him. He had great press support, with the exception of papers like the Santa Ana paper which was almost pro-Birch in their era. But all the way up, the McClatchys, who detested Republicans, supported Tommy. So he had that kind of support, but he had no party support. He wasn’t as liberal as his enemies perceived him to be, but he didn’t do anything to change that.

Smith: Does he illustrate, it’s a cliché, but part of the problem with moderates in these internecine battles is – they are moderate. They are not passionately driven to take over an organization. They could see nuance, they can see all sides…

Spencer: They see two sides to the question – they are not single-minded. Yeah, that’s one of the weaknesses when you look at the internal politics of either party, in fact, as far as that goes. But Tommy was German and he was bull-headed and he made a lot of mistakes. I saw a fundraiser at the California Club with probably the thirty richest guys in southern California when he was a United States Senator. It was the time of the Berlin Wall, Kennedy I think was president, and he [Kuchel] gave his speech, so to speak. Henry Salvatori, a solid conservative oil guy, roughhewn Italian, was a driller or something before he made his money, stood up and he says, “Tommy, what are you going to do about the Wall?” Tommy danced around the answer. Statesman-like, Kennedy-esque answer. Henry stands up again, he says, “Tommy, I asked you a question. What are you going to do about the Wall?” Tommy dances some more. I’m in the back of the room, and I said to myself, “This is the beginning of his downfall. These guys are never going to forget this meeting.” And Henry Salvatori was the millionaires’ spokesman, that’s all.

Smith: What is fascinating is that so small a group of people could have such influence on a statewide campaign.

Spencer: Well, they were the money. They had the campaign money. They then went out and next time found a candidate, Max Rafferty. They said, “Tommy, if you’re not going to listen to us, we’re going to find somebody who is going to listen.” It was a bloodbath, that primary. It was a tough one and Tommy wasn’t prepared for it.

Smith: ’62 – did Kuchel have a primary foe?

Spencer: No. If he did, he wasn’t a major one.

Smith: Of course, that’s the year Nixon did have a significant challenge in the primary.

Spencer: See, that’s another thing in the relationship of those two groups: Warren and Nixon. Tommy wouldn’t endorse Nixon in ’62. They are both on the ticket, and I said, “You’ve got to endorse Nixon.” But he said, “But my labor friends,” he had great support in labor. I said, “Your labor friends understand that you have to support Nixon.” I was with him when we walked out of that hotel to Nixon’s office at Adams, Duque and Hazeltine, and he sat there and told Dick Nixon he wasn’t going to endorse him.

Smith: What was Nixon’s reaction?

Spencer: He was a pro about it. He was a professional about it. He understood the whole thing, but also he would always say to himself, “I’ll get this son of a bitch.” That’s Nixon. I could see it in his eyes. Tommy lost complete touch with the state and his party out here. Nixon filled the void and took it away from those people. Then Goody Knight was sort of an aberration. Oh, and the other factor and personality in that big group was Bill Knowland.

Smith: Blustery guy?
Spencer: Yeah, but he decided he wanted to be governor in ’58 when Goody was sitting governor. He came out and he had the base – a lot of the base – he shoved Goody out. Goody runs for the Senate. Yeah, he shoved Goody out, he ran for governor and the main part of his platform was right-to-work, which was suicidal. Now Nixon stayed clear of all this. He was, “Let these guys kill themselves off and then I won’t have any trouble.” And they did. Goody Knight – there were billboards put up that said, “Brown and Knight, Pat Brown and Goody Knight.” Of course, Goody didn’t know anything about it. I’ve seen that happen again after that, but that was the emergence of Nixon taking over the party in California, which he owned until Reagan came along. The Birch Society and its involvement was never deep in the party. None of the finance guys were into that – they knew what it was.

Smith: The whole issue of extremism is visited in the ’64 GOP primary campaign, before the convention. As for Kennedy in ’63, what’s your sense? Had Kennedy lived, would his re-election have been a formality?

Spencer: I don’t think so. I’m not sure what would have happened, but as I looked at Kennedy’s first two years there, he was accomplishing nothing. It was wearing off. I think it would have been a contest. I don’t think it was a foregone conclusion that Kennedy would be an automatic.

Smith: And if Rockefeller had not gotten the divorce and remarried, was he the odds-on favorite for the Republican nomination in ’64? Or was the party already evolving to the point where Goldwater would be?

Spencer: You can ask a lot of people that question and get a lot of answers, but my assessment would be simply that he would have been a better candidate if he hadn’t gotten divorced and gotten involved. But Barry Goldwater had already laid a very strong base, nationally in the party vis-à-vis Buckley and Rusher and those people, and the west and the south was more comfortable with Barry. Today it’s not true, but in that era, we were never comfortable with New Yorkers in the west and the south. It was a New York thing. See what I mean?

Smith: Was it the New York condescension?
Spencer: To a degree. Which Dewey personified when he ran, and that is what was in everybody’s memory politically. But Nelson, if he hadn’t done that – he almost won the California primary. He wouldn’t have gotten the nomination, if he wanted. It was locked up. But it proved that Barry Goldwater was vulnerable and that he had some weaknesses.

Smith: Now you had been approached by both candidates about running their campaigns?

Spencer: No, never approached by Goldwater. Never. We got the Rockefeller campaign based on Tommy Kuchel’s recommendation. George Hinman went to Tommy and talked to him and we went to New York and we cut a deal.

Smith: Let me ask you, one of the things that has been said over the years is, for whatever reason Rockefeller would never put all of his trust in a Jim Farley, or Louis Howe…and that George Hinman, who was a beloved figure in many quarters and a great gentleman, was no Jim Farley.

Spencer: No he wasn’t. But he functioned very well for Nelson in the sense that as National Committeeman, he had made a lot of connections, and he knew a lot of people in a lot of states. And what George was doing was going around hiring people in individual areas and regions and states to do the Jim Farley type of activities. But also, the Rockefeller organization that sat in New York was top heavy. I mean Ronan, I can go down the list, and they second guessed us all the time in California. But we had Nelson’s support, basically, because Nelson’s attitude was simply, these guys know California, you guys don’t. He was a practical guy. But they were always second guessing us. George had to live with that on a daily basis, and it had to have hampered him.

Smith: Was Ronan particularly heavy handed?

Spencer: I thought he was. He thought he was pretty brilliant, and I guess he was pretty brilliant in some ways. He knew how to get to Nelson, and he knew how to be the last guy in the room. Right? Which is an important ingredient when you are dealing with people like this and there were a couple of others. The press guy, McManus, he was pretty good. He was a pro. The advance guys were good. ________________, but there were others who I can’t remember now, but they were all Ronanites, so to speak, intellectuals.

Smith: Funny you say that because one thing about Rockefeller is that long before the term caught on, he himself was a policy wonk.

Spencer: Yes, he was.

Smith: Ideas mattered. Programs mattered.

Spencer: Yes.

Smith: The irony was, here is a guy who thinks that the way to become president, at the head of a party that’s increasingly suspicious of government, is to demonstrate a genius for government.

Spencer: That’s right. But you know something else I noticed about him? In all those top – Nixon, Barry – I didn’t work with him – but all those people – the toughest guy I ever heard talk about the Communist threat in Russia, was Nelson Rockefeller. He talked in terms that I thought to myself, “If he wins, he’s going to be dangerous.” He was tough. He was never perceived as that. And I asked him the question one time, I said, “Why are you this way?” He says, “Well, if you were a Rockefeller, they won’t mind.” Which was a very upfront answer, I thought. I said, “Okay, now I understand.”

Smith: You think that side of him never really came across to voters?

Spencer: No, it never did. Because, in many ways, it seemed like he was always talking domestic and concerned about domestic. When you went into the White House, Ford almost gave him the assignment of domestic. He gave him control of domestic counsel, and that’s how Jimmy Cannon got in there. Then Rumsfeld and Cheney jerked it out from under him. He liked it, the domestic issues. He had a feel way ahead of his time – the race issue – he had a real feel for it. Where he got it, I don’t know. All the money they spent at Spelman, or I don’t know what it was, his friendship with Jackie Robinson – but in ’64 we had a problem. We were down twenty odd points in January and the election was in June.
So we had to do two things. First, we had to destroy Mr. Goldwater. Secondly, find some kind of base somewhere, somehow. So we scheduled a meeting of the professional black types at the Statler Hotel in LA – a breakfast meeting which he hated. He didn’t like to get up in the morning, and he was terrible when you got him up in the morning to give a speech. So I set this meeting up and I had this black guy working with me, Don Taylor, nice guy. He set it up and I expected 35 people. 240 people showed up with their best dress, best hat on, lawyers, bankers, accountants – all blacks. I’m stunned at this thing. So when the thing is over with, I went up and I said, “Nelson, I’m stunned. I don’t understand this. What’s the basis of this.” He said, “Well, I bet you they are all graduates from black colleges.” So I went back and I had Don check, and they were! They felt they owed Nelson Rockefeller something.

So, being a Paul, I said, okay there’s something to hang my hat on. We’ll jump on this one. But, in a primary sense, there were no blacks in the Republican Party, so I put an organization together north and south where we went out and starting in March, we went into the black communities with money and re-registered 90,000 blacks to the Republican Party. Now you couldn’t do that unless you had a message. Nelson was the message because of his support of the black colleges and Jackie Robinson came out and helped me, which was important.

Smith: Was he a good campaigner?

Spencer: Yeah. The kind of guy that was issue oriented. He was interesting. But, anyway, and we did probably 20,000 in Alameda County and north, so we were able to utilize that. And the race was very close. It wouldn’t have been that close if we hadn’t got those 90-100,000 votes in.

Smith: I’ll tell you something, because we talked about this years ago, and I know over the years there has been a lot of speculation that the birth of Nelson, Jr., was the tipping point. You’re not the only one who believes, that it was at least a contributing factor.
Spencer: It was. At the time I thought it was. The scenario – how it came about – Happy came out and campaigned with him and she was great. But she was really pregnant. In fact, we were in the Hollywood Palladium, a big Republican gathering and his good friend Mark Hatfield is brought down to be the emcee and to introduce him, and it was a hostile audience of fat cat Republicans, and it all kind of indicated - early hissing and stuff before he could hardly give his speech. Mark Hatfield folded. He didn’t know what to say about it. And he had a hard time saying anything good about Nelson, when he was introducing him. Then Nelson, in his way, he got up there and he stuck it to him. I mean, he stuck it to him. But he was mad. He walked off stage, Happy walks off, I’m back there behind the curtain. We’re walking out to the limo, and Nelson turns around and he says, “I’m so pissed off I could belt ya!” He says this to Happy. Happy says, “Go ahead, Nelson. That’ll make a hell of a headline.” I mean, she was a great gal. They get in the car and drive off and he’s steaming. She was that kind of lady.

Smith: His anger, it wasn’t directed at her, but it was just…

Spencer: If you’d been there, it would have been you.

Smith: Yeah.

Spencer: He was mad and he was mad at Mark Hatfield. So anyway, we got a phone call – Bill and I prior to the primary on Tuesday, June 2, and about four days out – five days out, and it’s Hinman. He says, “Will there be any political consequences if Happy had this baby prior to the primary?” Bill and I didn’t even have to consult. I said, “Hey, George, you got that place up there Pocantico – you can go have the kid there and hide it, but DO it! It will make a hell of a difference.” Our campaign of destruction was based on overcoming the image that he was a playboy, that he was a philanderer, that he ran around. They had effectively tagged him with that early in the campaign, so we had countered it by saying that you can’t trust this guy Goldwater with a nuclear button, and all these sort of things. And it worked because in the polling data we were coming up like this [illustrates his point with hand gestures]. It was working. Then all of a sudden all the birth did was reopen that wound, which we’d spent two million dollars trying to solve. That’s why we were opposed to it.

Smith: I want to tell you something that I think may or may not come as news to you. There was more than gossip at the upper levels of the campaign for years — no one would go on the record, of course — that, in fact, labor was induced. That they actually thought that — and Happy basically confirmed that in a conversation that I had with her last year. What does that tell you about their political judgment?

Spencer: It tells me that Ronan prevailed, because there were people in New York that believed that.

Smith: How out of touch can you be?

Spencer: I don’t know. I guess I rationalize it this way, I said to myself, “Well if he’d won it, the primary, he still wasn’t going to win the nomination.” It wasn’t going to turn the world around.

Smith: Could Goldwater, though, have been stopped? Might they have turned to a Scranton, or somebody?

Spencer: Goldwater had that thing locked up. It was locked up. The Scranton effort which came about in Frisco, probably would have had more life, but it would never had got the job done. They controlled the machinery – I was given a room over in Oakland – that’s how they controlled – I wasn’t invited. I hung out with Dick Gregory and a bunch of black friends of his, and I was going to more black bars than I’d been to in my life. ‘Cause I was the enemy.

Smith: Were you in the hall the night that Rockefeller spoke?

Spencer: No! They wouldn’t let me in the hall. He could have given Kennedy a battle though. Get out of California – he would have given Kennedy a battle. It would have been his money versus Joe’s money – and it would have been a donnybrook.

Smith: Stop and think. If you start looking at the electoral college – what would Nelson Rockefeller’s appeal have been in the south?
Stu Spencer  December 2, 2008

Spencer: Not much.

Smith: Which is where, obviously, there’s disaffection with Kennedy because of civil rights. You can make a case that Goldwater at least had a base, in the south and Rocky Mountain states. It is really tough to see how Rockefeller in ’64, particularly against Johnson…

Spencer: In ’64 I can see him – you could cherry pick New Jersey, you had New York, the New England combine, and you had a ballot you could put on Ohio, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and those states. You had a chance. It’s similar to Ford. We knew he couldn’t win – I knew he couldn’t win the south, with Reagan or Carter. So I never spent any time there, I never spent any money. I gave my field director, Margaret Tutwiler, who now is with the State Department, Baker’s number one gal. She was a twenty-one year old girl when she came to work for me. She was a receptionist, and after the primary she came in, as a lot of young girls were doing in those days, and said, “I want more responsibility. I want some of the action.” It was the growth of the women’s movement. She came from a very wealthy family in Birmingham – they owned the town. So I said, “Okay, Margaret, you’re going to Birmingham as state director of Alabama, and your budget is $20,000.” Thinking in my own mind, “She’ll get some of Daddy’s money if she wants to make the show right.” Right? Of course, that was illegal because we were federally funded, but it happens every now and then. So anyway, she went down there and did a hell of a job. But that’s how much I thought…

Smith: By the way, in later years it was said she was one of the very few people in the Reagan administration who would return Gerald Ford’s calls.

Spencer: Sure, because she had worked for Gerald Ford and she loved him. All those girls, that whole group of girls and I had about twenty of them. One morning there was a ringleader in it, who was one I really disliked the most, not because she was a ringleader, but because she was trying to work her way to the top in different ways. So she came in, it was really obvious to me, she put this group together – they all came into my office and I had such a little office, it was littler than this – I said, “We’ve got to go in the assembly room. There’s twenty of you.” Well, basically, their complaint was, or their request was that they were tired of being called secretaries. They wanted to be assistants. I says, “I’ll call you anything you want, just go back to work.” But she was in that group.

Smith: ’64 sees Reagan with a famous speech on Goldwater’s behalf and then you’ve got the ’66 campaign. How did you come to be running the Reagan campaign?

Spencer: Well, I was shocked, surprised. In interim periods, off years, we’d do a lot of city council races and related stuff like that – trying to stay alive. Although we made, relatively speaking, we made a lot of money with Nelson. I paid more in taxes than I’d ever made in a single year prior to that. So, all of a sudden we felt kind of financially secure – semi. So anyway, we were sitting around doing whatever we were doing, and at the time about late November-December ’63 – we’d been doing some council races in L.A. Got a call from Kuchel, and he asked if we’d have any interest [in running the Rockefeller campaign]. And our answer was simple – we’re always looking for clients. We didn’t think much about it.

The next thing you know, we get a call from George Hinman. He comes out and spends some time with us. And we’re talking, talking. Finally he called and asked us to come to New York. We talked to Nelson, talked to Ronan, talked to a few other people, and went back to our hotel – we stayed at the Waldorf. We were going to leave the next day in the afternoon. Then that morning George called and he says, “Change your flight.” So we went up to Pocantico, or whatever it is, and it was cold and snowy. We had a driver and everything. We consummated a deal.

We went back to the city and waiting for us was Nick Timmins of Time Magazine. Nick’s brother was married to one of my partner’s sisters. That’s the only reason he knew what the hell was going on. So he took us to – what was that restaurant that was a big sports hangout? [Toots Shores] – the guy’s name in New York? Well, anyway, we went there for dinner. It had been my ambition in life at that point to have lunch or dinner there, so he took us there for dinner. He naturally had an exclusive. We started the campaign and the first thing we do is the survey research, and man, he was like 27%, Nelson was – he was in trouble. We were like, “Ohhhh.”

Smith: Was it the divorce and remarriage, in particular, or the liberal image, the New Yorker?

Spencer: That was just a piece of it – there was the New Yorker, the liberal stigma that he had. He should be a Democrat, he shouldn’t be a Republican. That was how he got that campaign and then – this is ironic, I think. We got through that and ’65 comes along and there were rumors that Reagan was looking at running and they were talking, but we didn’t pay much attention to that stuff. He had been Barry’s chairman out there. We got a call from his brother, Neil, one day. He takes us to lunch and he asks if we had any interest in working with Reagan. We said, “Hadn’t even thought about it. Let us think about it.” Well, at the same time, right after that, and this had never happened to us before, George Christopher, the other leading candidate called us, and asked us to run his campaign. So first in line position between two major candidates, so we had a decision to make. So we’d gone out and met with Reagan at his house – he and Nancy. We talked for hours. We went back and Christopher would come down to see us and we’d talk. Bill and I were really in a quandary. Part of the success of your business is picking winners, but still, by the same token.

Smith: Presumably, the reason they were both interested…

Smith: Presumably the reason, ironic as it may seem, that Ronald Reagan was interested in hiring you, was because of the relative success that you had in the Rockefeller campaign.

Spencer: Yeah, that’s correct. It showed how pragmatic Reagan was, too. He visited his in-laws in Arizona and met with Barry while he was there and he indicated to Barry that he was going to run in California for the governorship, and had pretty well made his mind up. They talked about it – running, and what he should do and shouldn’t do. At the end of it, sort of a throw in, Barry said, “By the way, if I was going to run in California, I’d pick those sons of bitches Spencer-Roberts.” End of conversation. Well, Reagan was the kind of guy that was pragmatic. People didn’t realize that. In the end, it was a recommendation.

Smith: And that was, presumably, a back ended tribute to the job of destruction that you had done in ’64.

Spencer: That is correct - the fact that we’d given him such a hard time. So then the discussion got very, very intense, back and forth, and Bill and I had to really struggle to make a decision. But we finally came to the conclusion that Reagan had a quality that most candidates don’t have. People don’t remember this, but George Christopher was the favorite. He was the choice of the party establishment, so to speak. He was the newspaper peoples’ – for example, Fiddler(?) – not this actor who had given one speech. But we saw the potential in Reagan and we also knew what George was all about. He had plateaued out, he was never going to get any better than he was. He was a good man, he was a smart guy, but he was dull as hell and all of that. And he came from the north, which was not a plus in California in those days.

So we made the decision to go with Reagan. Reagan called us, it was in one of his trips over to Arizona, and we’d been stalling him and he called us and he said, “When the hell you guys going to get off the pot?” I said to him, “Hey, we don’t even know if you’re a Bircher. We’ve been investigating you, we don’t even know what the hell you’re all about.” He said, “Okay, be at the house tomorrow night at seven o’clock and we’ll discuss it.” So we showed up and he’s sitting there, his legs crossed, he’s got the reddest socks on you’ve ever seen in your life. It’s his way of saying, ‘I’m a Pinko.” . So anyway, we talked at length and we finally said, “Okay, we’ll do it.” We had to consummate the financial deal with Holmes Tuttle and those guys, because he never even understood that, or cared about it, or touched it. So that was the beginning.

Smith: Did you see him then, or did he see himself then, as a potential president?

Spencer: I didn’t. We didn’t. We didn’t even see him yet as a governor. The other part of the question is hard to answer. Instinctively, I think that was the plan. Instinctively, I think that they had talked it over and they said, “Let’s roll the dice. We’re not going to make it in this other business anymore, let’s go to this new business.” I don’t know that for a fact, but that could be.

Smith: Was he as remote as - almost like FDR. Here’s this guy who had millions of “friends” but very few friends.

Spencer: That’s true. He had a lot of acquaintances, he had very few friends. His friends were Nancy’s friends. She was the one who had the friends and brought them in and he went along.

Smith: Historically, I’d say, if it hadn’t been for Mary Lincoln, there would not have been a President Lincoln. If Nancy Reagan had never happened into his life, would he have become President of the United States?

Spencer: No, he would have never become governor or president. She was the driving personal force behind him, that was smart, that learned quickly. In May ’65 we said we’re going to do an exploratory committee. He didn’t know what we were talking about, but we’re going to do an exploratory committee, because you may bomb, you may not have it. You may not be acceptable, and you’ve got to have an out. So we’ll do an exploratory committee and when we get to January, roughly in that period, we’ll see how you did, what’s going on and so forth. And that was our period of watching him. We were five months into that before Bill and I became convinced that this guy could do it, but I think he was thinking all along, I’m going to run. I mean, he was running. Do you see the difference?

Smith: Yeah.

Spencer: It would have been interesting in history if we had set down and said, “We don’t think you can do it.” It would have been interesting what the reaction would have been. At that time we said, “Hey, this is a real horse, and let’s go!”

Smith: How unpopular was Pat Brown by that time? How much of a factor was Reagan turned out to be a star and how much of it was that Brown, by that point, had worn out his welcome?
Spencer: A great deal of it. It was two things: you’ve got to believe in miracles to be a good candidate, and number two: you got to have a lot of luck. I have never seen a luckier politician than Ronald Reagan was in his whole career.

Smith: Including losing the ’76 fight to Gerald Ford?

Spencer: That’s right. But Pat Brown had worn his welcome out to a great degree. He still had a lot of support because of who Reagan was. Reagan was an intruder into this process. But he’d been there for two terms. The dysfunction in the Democrat Party at that time, Unruh and Brown, the two major leaders were at each other’s throat. Jesse was ___________. Brown had basically committed that he would not run for a third term and it was Jesse’s turn and he’d backed down and that just turned Jesse off. So there were all kinds of things going on out there that were helpful to Reagan. And I’m sure that George Christopher saw those things, too. The best way of saying it is, the nomination for the Republican Party was worth having in the governor’s race in that year 1966.

Smith: Plus, 1966 turned out to be a good year for the Republicans bouncing back from the disaster of ’64.

Spencer: That’s right. But people don’t realize the learning curve that he and Nancy were on. Nancy and I were talking about this two weeks ago, or three weeks ago. I reminded her, “You didn’t know a damn thing when we started in 1965, Nancy.” She admits, “That was a real learning curve. Things were happening. I didn’t know what was going on.”

Smith: Like what? What sorts of…

Spencer: Why we would go here instead of there? Why we would only give one damn speech and not do a new speech? We’d let them add two things, maybe ________________. But he wrote his own speeches. We didn’t have a speechwriter. In his gubernatorial race every speech he gave he wrote. Why? Because he was one of the best speechwriters I’ve ever seen. That’s how good he was. He liked to do it. It made him more comfortable and his speeches were better because he was comfortable.
But they were on a great learning curve. They both learned fast. She sat in every session we had at the house with him, which was sort of like, one-on-one politics – let’s talk about it. See what I mean? Or I’d bring in Charlie Conrad, an old actor who had a good rapport with him, who was a state legislator. He was still doing bit parts, but Charlie was an excellent parliamentarian. He was known for that. We’d say, “Charlie, tell him about the legislature. Tell him how it functions, how it relates to this.” Charlie did a hell of a job with it. That was all learning curve stuff. Reagan’s strength – still there was a gap of knowledge as wide as a street – when he hit those gaps, by the press, I mean, the way he handled the answers was, “Hey, I don’t know everything. We’re going to learn. I’m an amateur.”

Smith: You wonder if a Ronald Reagan could happen in today’s media climate? The 24/7 news cycle and the internet, and YouTube, whether someone like that could come along, be brought along, almost learn on the job, if you will.

Spencer: It would be difficult. The closest thing to it is Obama. But he had a better grounding in the legislature, and a few years in the Senate, than Reagan did. But they are both glib and they both were adroit on their feet.

Smith: You talk about Reagan as a pragmatist. I often think of these people who proclaim themselves to be keepers of the flame. Let Reagan be Reagan and all this. I often think, well, what Reagan are you talking about? Are you talking about the Reagan who was going to put Dick Schweiker on his ticket in ’76 because he wanted to win. That Reagan never gets factored in.

Spencer: Yeah. Well, Reagan hated that saying, Let Reagan be Reagan. He detested that, because he didn’t feel he wasn’t being but himself at all times, really. Yeah, there was a practical side to him. The biggest single thing that motivated him was he wanted to win. Because he was practical; “I can’t exercise my authority, and accomplish the things that I want unless I’m in office. So let’s win.”

A lot of the very conservative people that were blinded to the Schweiker things and so forth…If you really look back on how it worked, we handled them with smoke and mirrors. We gave them enough, but you never sold out.
But he’d give them enough. Here is the guy who signed the most liberal abortion bill in the country somewhere in his 60s here in California. The Beilenson Bill. Then later on in his career he became pro-life. I asked him that question one time, I said, “What happened?” He said, “I didn’t know anything about abortion when I signed the bill. I looked at it and studied it and that’s not where my head was.” Which was a reasonable, honest answer.

Smith: You couldn’t get away with it today.

Spencer: Well, he never said that publicly. No, no, he never said that publicly. But, as candidates go, he was just the cream, the top, the best. Timing-wise, his training as an actor was a plus. You can’t deny that. People try to put it another way, but, I can remember watching him in Cleveland, 50,000 people outside City Hall – he’s going to go on – a crazy Jim Rhodes is trying to lobby him every five minutes about something. It was dangerous, Jim was. So I got Rhodes away from him, because he had to have his twenty minutes before he could go on stage to get ready.

I’m sitting there talking to Art Modell with the Cleveland Browns and my event guy comes over and says he’s got three minutes. So I get up and go over and say, “You’ve got three minutes, Ron.” “Okay,” he stands up, he walks out to the wing and out here’s 50,000 people, and I’m behind him, and he took his first steps out on the stage and I swear to God, the guy got bigger. He had this ability of – he got bigger! It was odd. The show started and he was going to deliver, and he did. I see candidates slouch out there…

Smith: I have to ask you, because there is so much to talk about later on. There was the famous remark which I’ve always wanted to hear from your lips. We’re jumping ahead obviously, but supposedly the origin of the Rose Garden strategy - by contrast, with what you’ve just described, can you describe the exchange you had in which you…

Spencer: With Gerald Ford, I assume you are talking about. Well, the whole Ford campaign was an interesting thing and when I got back there it was very dysfunctional. I was on a real learning curve, they were on a real learning curve, and he was on, because here’s a guy, a congressman who wanted to be Speaker that now’s the President, so everybody is on a learning curve. But we reached the point where when he went out and campaigned, and we were doing daily and weekly tracking, particularly wherever you went. When Gerald Ford went out and gave one of his great speeches – ponderous speeches, which weren’t all his fault, he had a bad speechwriting shop - he went out and gave them and our numbers would go down.

That didn’t happen once, this happened about three times. He was always pounding on me, “I’ve got to get out here and talk to the people! I’ve got to get out here…” He was Harry Truman in his own mind. “I got to get out there, I’ve got to do this.” So finally I was at the end of my rope one night, it was six o’clock in the Oval Office and he’s pounding on me. Cheney is sitting there. The world wouldn’t realize how quiet Cheney was in those days. The little mouse in the corner, but bright and loyal to Ford. So, I finally got tired of it. I says, “We’re doing this for a reason,” and I went through the reason. He said something smart to me, and I said, “But basically the question is, you’re a lousy, fucking candidate.” He just looked at me kind of like, oh, okay. End of conversation. He was that way.

Very secure in who he was – it didn’t bother him, but somebody writes the book, Witcover, I don’t know who it is, Jules, Germond, somebody. They write the book about the campaign and I’m sitting there reading it one day and there it is! I went ballistic. Three people were in the room. I know I didn’t say it. Had to be Cheney. I called Cheney on the phone and before he says hello I’m on him. I’m all over him and he lets me go and gets all through and he says, “There was somebody else in the room.” And I said, “Are you saying to me the President told him?” He says, “Yeah.” I said, “Oh, God, in some ways I feel better, much better.” But what that indicated to me was how secure that he was as a person. You know what I mean? And you don’t see that in many of those people.

Smith: He was Trumanesque – in that sense.

Spencer: Yeah.
Smith: He couldn’t do a Harry Truman imitation out on the whistle-stop but in his character and his authenticity, he was Trumanesque.

Spencer: He was and, in fact, he kept talking about Truman early on. I went over and got the Clark Clifford campaign plan that he wrote for Harry and read it. I thought maybe there are some similarities that we can work with. But, yeah, I have become famous for that remark that was said in private, three guys, they’re all under the rope and I tend to be profane, which he knew and always knew and never bothered him.

Smith: When you said it did Cheney react in any way?

Spencer: Cheney was stoic – still is. But it was like sort of, did you really say that? He didn’t say it, but did you really say that? Because I prefaced it by saying, “Mr. President, you’re a lousy, fucking candidate.” Oh God

Smith: Could you have said that to any other president? Could you have said that to Ronald Reagan? Not that you would have occasion to, but could you have had that frank exchange?

Spencer: I might have said it, but I’d never have gotten away with it. Dick Nixon would have had me in Siberia, and God knows what Nelson would have done. It’s hard to say. He might have laughed out loud, but he’d have never repeated it, I don’t think. Reagan? I came close to saying those things to Reagan in private. I learned something. I said it, man on man, I didn’t have a Cheney sitting there. I learned a lesson.

Smith: Interesting.

Spencer: The Ford campaign was – I got back there in September of ’75, right after the Saturday Night Massacre, which was dumping Schlesinger, I think, or maybe it’s before.

Smith: Oh yeah, it was the Halloween…

Spencer: Oh I was there then, but barely there. Because the first guy that I talked to was Rummy, Rumsfeld, and then all of a sudden I’m dealing with Cheney, because Rummy had gone over to Defense at that time.
Smith: And you know Rockefeller went to his grave believing that Rumsfeld was the dark power that did him in…

Spencer: He’s correct.

Smith: And that Rumsfeld went over there because Rumsfeld wanted to be on the ticket in ’76.

Spencer: I don’t know about that, but he did him in and Cheney helped.

Smith: How?

Spencer: Just every way that he could internally. Alerting staff, don’t let Rocky’s people know this, don’t let them know that. The whole thing. Jimmy Cannon knows what the whole story is, but Cheney as much as admitted to me when he became vice president of the United States. With a wry smile he says, “Jesus, Nelson Rockefeller would die if he knew this was happening.” I said, “You’re right! You’re right, Dick! You’ve got that right.” I used to meet with Nelson – he was so out of the loop on stuff, I made a point of going over there sometimes on Friday night at five o’clock when he was in the EOB building next door. Who was that gal out front there? Nice old lady, secretary for years.

Smith: Ann Whitman?

Spencer: Yeah, Ann.

Smith: Who had been in the Eisenhower White House.

Spencer: Yeah. She’d see me coming and she say, “It’s going to be a while, I’m going home Stu. I’ll lock the door and you guys go at it.” And the Dubonnet would come out and I’d drink a lot more of it than he did. He only had one or two, he always quit. But he’d say, “What the hell’s going on?” So I’d fill him in, I’d tell him everything. Then he’d ask other questions and I’d ask him for counsel and advice. He knew a lot of things. I swear to God he had a better intelligence around the world than the CIA did. He’d always know. He’d tell me about stories and I’d say, “Come on, Nelson. You’re BS’ing me.” I’d get the whole pile again.
He had good people, but I felt sorry for him. He could be helpful to me, and I wanted to keep him plugged in. I really think he really appreciated it. I think he really appreciated it that I was the only guy around that would talk to him and keep him plugged in. They all knew full well that if I’d been there when they made the move on him, I would have raised hell. Now, it would have been tough to win that primary with Nelson on there, but you could have done it. You could have found ways, and he would have been one hell of a plus for us in the general election. Really. But they’re sure short-sighted. They didn’t see that. Now let’s look at the Ford campaign.

Smith: Let me back up for just a moment. First of all, what, if any, contact did you have with Ford before…

Spencer: I knew Ford before I got the phone call from Rummy. I met Ford in 1964, roughly. He was a congressman, I think he was Minority Leader then. The National Republican Congressional Committee had a retreat going on out at Arley House, which is in Virginia by Dulles, and had about twelve people in it. The purpose was, how are going to take over the Congress and Jerry Ford is going to become Speaker, right? Bob Wilson, who was congressman, the chairman of the committee, Jack Mills was the guy who ran the committee. I think Mel Laird was there. Bryce Harlow was there, Jerry Ford, of course was there. I think Les Arends, the old Illinois guy was there, congressman, and maybe young Bob Michel, I’m not sure. But we’re staying there two or three days, and Ford and I were roommates. Maybe I’d met him occasionally before that, but it was the first time I’d been with him. So we’d go through all our sessions and everything and talk and go back to the room and he and I would sit there and drink a bottle of whiskey and talk.

It was something I never forgot - that night he was really inquisitive about this guy Rockefeller, because I was doing the Rockefeller thing, so to speak, or had just done it. He said, “Tell me about him.” He had an unusual interest which struck me as kind of funny at the time, but I gave him everything I had and knew because he operated – he digested all that stuff and I’m sure he remembered some of it. So that’s the first time I met him and we spent about two nights together, lock talk politics upside down. And then…
Smith: He was a political animal?

Spencer: Oh, when he’d come west after that, I’d have to advance his trip to California. We’d speak in front of all these congressmen and stuff. Then we went into Michigan in ’66 and did the Don Riegle campaign in Flint, Michigan against an incumbent sitting Democrat. He reminded me of a young Rousselot, a Harvard graduate, same thing. First survey, down by 40 goddamn points, it was awful. We developed some new targeting methods and it was one of the reasons we went and Don knew it because it was a perfect district to test it. We had General Motors, we had labor, and we had guys on the other side of the river with money and were in the country club, so it was a way of testing it. But he was also a great candidate.

So the fact that I got involved in his state in a congressional race, then I started getting a lot of advice and counsel from Jerry Ford, right? We ended up winning it and he didn’t think it was winnable. He wanted to try. The only guy when we were halfway through it that thought it was winnable was Dick Nixon, but he was a very good pol with that aspect. He saw what we were doing, how we were doing it. I brought him into the district (he was out of office) fundraiser, and Art Summerfield lived in that district who had been Eisenhower’s Postmaster General. He was close to Dick and he kept giving Dick all these reports, Art did. Then after that, I didn’t see much of him. I probably saw more of Everett Dirksen than I saw of him.

Smith: By the way, while we’re on Michigan, was George Romney in over his head as a presidential candidate.

Spencer: Senior?

Smith: Yes.

Spencer: Yes. He wasn’t quick and glib enough. He was a mechanical candidate with good credentials. You’ve got to be kind of glib to handle all the stuff that comes at you. Worse now than it was then. No, George Romney was in over his head. And I heard that from people who were working with him close, they thought he was over his head, too, in retrospect. I get this phone call from Rumsfeld, asked me if I had an interest.
Smith: Now this in ’75?

Spencer: ’75, yeah.

Smith: Are you assuming at that point that Reagan is going to run?

Spencer: Oh, yeah. I knew Reagan would run, but I knew I was never going to get that phone call. I had reached the point – I ran both Reagan’s governors races and he had a lot of problems in his staff in Sacramento. The first thing was the gay thing, after that policy problems – a whole bunch of things were coming down. He has some pretty good cabinet people around him. Vern Orr and people like that, they were very good. Cappy Weinberger, finance director.

Smith: Who had been Republican state chairman in California, and who told me, he was a closet Rockefeller supporter in ’64.

Spencer: Oh, yeah. Definitely. Cappy was a guy, San Franciscan that ran for attorney general in ’58 against Pat Hillings in the primary. Pat beat him. He went back to the law practice, so to speak, had been state party chairman etc., etc. When the meetings were being held with the - what was that…The Kitchen Cabinet. When they were sitting around they could divide the pie up and make decisions on who was going to go – they would invite me to the meeting.

I made a point in the meeting of saying there’s two important appointments this man has got to make. The way he operates the chief of staff is really important - which proved out. Secondly, for finance director, because of the economics in this state and the fact that he didn’t like taxes, but he was going to have raise them – that’s what it boiled to. So they said, “Oh, we’ve got the guy, we’ve got Gordon Smith. He’s a CPA with an accounting firm, a big firm.” I said, “Well, there’s a lot of politics in being finance director. You’ve got to deal with legislators, you’ve got deal with Democrats, you got to deal with Unruh,” who was a master. So I said, “I would suggest Cappy Weinberger.”

I was not one of Cappy’s favorite people at that point because I’d helped Pat Hillings run against him in the primary. But I knew his skills, so I said Cappy. “Oh, he’s too liberal, he’s too this, he’s too that.” I didn’t break my pick for Cappy, I let it go. Well, Gordon Smith was a total disaster, which history will show. Who’s the next guy they turn to, they went to Cappy. Cappy and Reagan became like twins. That’s how close they became. From there on out, through history. But he was too liberal at the beginning for them. It was just a perception. He was a San Franciscan.

Smith: Why weren’t you going to get the call to run the Reagan campaign?

Spencer: I wouldn’t get the call because of the palace guard, that is the chief of staff, all the people around him. I’m not going to name names, you can go back and look them up. But there was some turnover. I was in a terrible position. The Kitchen Cabinet, they’d do something up there that didn’t look good, or wasn’t right or something like this, and Taft Schreiber was usually the guy.

Taft was a tough guy – Lew Wasserman’s guy, and an old ancient friend – he was ancient for Reagan. He told me one time, before I got involved, he took me to lunch and he said somewhere in the conversation, “You got to fire a lot of people.” I said, “What do you mean?” He said, “Ronnie’s never fired anybody. I did.” I said, “You got to be kidding.” But he was right, he was dead right. So, those guys forced me into going to Sacramento when they had a message, and delivering the message.

Now, these guys had been my breadbasket – they took care of me – they were wonderful to me. If they had a project they hired me, they paid me well, and I was loyal to them. And yet, some of these guys up there I’d created like Deaver, a field man for the state party and stuff, and Lyn Nofziger, who I gave the first political job in his life – and that was press director for Reagan in ’65, first guy I hired. So, I’d go up there and I’d try to do it politely, for the good you know and so forth. But they didn’t want me around. But I kept knocking the door down when I had to, and going in and doing what I had to do. The Reagans weren’t involved in that.

Smith: Was that a matter of very artfully keeping a distance from what’s unpleasant?

Spencer: No, I think it’s a matter of, I wasn’t the kind of guy that would go tell him. Say, hey, if you’re going to treat me like this, I’m gone. The Palace Guard was not going to tell them, because they knew I was still held in respect in anything political. Not policy – it was politics Reagan ________________, too. To that point. I had a lot of battles with them and they didn’t want me around. Which goes back to one of my thesis, which I don’t think they recognized. But the one I always had with Reagan was, whoever owned the body ran the shop. You see what I mean. I knew that. I don’t think they ever recognized that. If they did, I didn’t give them enough credit. So anyway, I would just start backing off.

I did the ’70 thing and did it with Tom Reed who was not a problem for me up there. Then I just started really backing off. I’ll just tell you right now that they poisoned the well from there on out in terms of anything…so I went my way and they went their way. They wanted to be the guys that put him in the presidency, and all that stuff.

Smith: By ’70, was there any doubt in your mind that he had the White House in mind?

Spencer: Not at all. In ’68 I knew he was going, because they started getting these people, the Cliff Whites, the Rushers, and the Buckley’s and all these other people were coming talking to him about it. Then they put a little group and the Reagans insisted that I come to these groups in ’68. I sat there and I listened to Cliff, of course I’d known Cliff for years in other ways, and so forth, with the whole thing. It just didn’t smell right to me – the president – ’68. Plus I knew that Nixon had it locked up.

Smith: Let me ask you – remember there was this kind of bizarre coalition of convenience between Rockefeller and Reagan. That was the only way to forestall Nixon’s nomination, the hope being that if you could stop him on the first ballot then eventually one of them would win the nomination.

Spencer: Yeah, that’s talk. There was no coalition. They weren’t talking. I remember going to the first governor’s conference at the Broadmoor in Colorado with Reagan and when I got there I said, “You’ve got to meet Nelson while you’re here. You two guys have a lot more in common than you think.” The irony was, we get on an elevator and we’re going up, I think. We stop at the first floor and who is standing there? Nelson. So I said, “Governor, meet Governor.” There was no communication there – any attempt at it. Because most of those people around Reagan, they couldn’t stand Nelson. They weren’t pragmatic enough to sit around in a room with him and say, “Nelson, let’s make a deal.”

Smith: And was Strom Thurmond the factor in supposedly holding enough of the south for Nixon? Clearly, there were southern delegates whose heart belonged to Reagan.

Spencer: Oh, believe me, yes. Yes, Strom was – and others, but Strom was the key guy. In one of these meetings I listened to it and I said, “This is going nowhere.” Some guys like Tom Reed, they had him running around the country at this point talking to people. So I stayed over that night and went and saw Reagan and Nancy the next day and said, “Are you running for president? There’s three of us, tell me.” And I got the famous quote that was, “The office seeks the man.” I remember, I leaned forward, and you asked me if I ever said anything to him, I said, “Ron that’s bullshit. If you want it you’ve got to go out and get it and you’ve got to put it together right to get it.” He listened. Oh then, I closed by saying, “If this is the way it’s going, then I don’t want any part of it. I’m out of here. I just want you to know. It’s either going to be done right or I can’t be a part of it.” He didn’t argue with it. He was passive. He really believed that the office sought the man.

Smith: That was totally sincere on his part?

Spencer: Totally sincere. I guessed it ain’t gonna work and I backed off.

Smith: Was she more realistic?

Spencer: Oh, yeah. She’s going like this. I’m nailing him and she is giving him this, you know what I mean. And God knows, I always wanted to know, what the conversations were like after I left. That’s what I always wanted to know. That’s when I knew, yeah. He was running. Of course, it didn’t go anywhere. In fact, I backed off and with the finance guys – they kind of liked the idea – I put together the delegation that went to Miami and it was a great delegation. If they only knew what I did.
I had balance between Reagan and Nixon. They could go either way. I had them either way. Because Nixon, you're going to fail, he may have jumped in there and tried to push it to Nelson or something, you never know. But I had a twofer delegation, which with Bob Finch, I used him as my key lynchpin because he knew what I was doing. So it was a comfortable delegation for Reagan, but it was also – I had no problem with Mr. Nixon if it was obvious.

Smith: This is sort of a detour, but it has always fascinated me. Politics is full of people who appear to have such promise, unlimited promise, and for some reason or reasons, including circumstance, it just is never realized. That’s probably the historical reputation that Bob Finch has. And why was that? Was he too loyal to Nixon? Or do people exaggerate the talent, the potential?

Spencer: No, he was very loyal to Nixon. That was a plus and a minus. He was a talented guy, he was a creative guy. He’d come up with great, off the wall concepts and ideas and things to do. Some of them good, some of them bad. But his loyalty to Nixon was probably the biggest problem because he made some bad decisions, and all of us who were close to him told him. The first thing he runs for lieutenant governor, he’s not necessarily a Reagan guy. But Reagan embraced him and he wins by the biggest margin.

Three weeks out he’s only 300,000 ahead and we turned our billboard around and made them Reagan/Finch. We put a bundle of money behind Bob and he gets more votes than Reagan. He never quit reminding the world of that. I used to say, “Robert, where were you three weeks out?” He knew what I was talking about. It was nice. He is sitting there as lieutenant governor, he’s the heir apparent. Nixon offers him something in the cabinet and he didn’t offer him HEW. He said, “What do you want?” We get the group together and Bob tells us, “What do I want?” We said explicitly, it was HEW then, we said explicitly, the worst job in the cabinet for a Republican is HEW. You just ruin your credentials. So what’s he do? He takes HEW. Ah! So, his decision making was poor. Leaving the power base that he created for himself of independents, going back to work for him…

Smith: And then getting ground up.
Spencer: He was an insecure guy, Bob, and I loved him, but he was really an insecure guy. He wasn’t like Ford here, who felt good in his own skin.

Smith: That’s interesting. Tell me about Ford’s intelligence.

Spencer: He was very intelligent. He wasn’t – some people who are intelligent are quick and glib - he was intelligent – he tended to be ponderous about it. But he was intelligent. He always came out on the end of the tunnel with logic and the correct thing to do, based on the input of facts that he got. His biggest weakness was he would let personal feelings enter into to some decisions, color some of his decisions. His extreme loyalty to people was a great plus but a great minus. I can sit here and give you so many examples of loyalty to me.

Smith: Give me some.

Spencer: When I went back there, I went back on the commitment that I was going to run in New Hampshire and the Florida primaries and then I was going home. Well I got there and the campaign was dysfunctional. Callaway was in trouble, he canned Lee Nunn, I didn’t know all this was going on.

Smith: Where did Calloway come from? Was he a Rumsfeld person?

Spencer: Rumsfeld had picked him, yeah. Their thought and theory at that time when they made that choice was that he had started GOPAC, which I think is sort of a conservative fundraising thing…that Ford could carry the south.

Smith: Against Reagan?

Spencer: Yeah. Of course the first thing you’ve got to recognize is they didn’t think Reagan was really going to run. Number two, if he ran, he was a lousy candidate, because he was an actor and a this and a that – the whole Washington establishment, both sides of the aisle, they all felt the same way. I knew better. When I arrived on the scene that’s all I heard. And I was whistling in the dark, and telling them all, “You’re crazy man, you’re crazy. Number one, he’s going to run. He’s been planning on it, he feels like he was cheated out of it by Watergate.” And I said, “Rightly so, he was the heir apparent. And then you come along and you’re in his way. Secondly, he ain’t dumb. He’s a smart campaigner and he has a real pulse of the party – what they want to hear, what they want to do.” They didn’t believe me.

Smith: Did that include Ford? Did you have conversations like that with the President?

Spencer: Oh, yeah. But, you know, it’s like when you’ve got Marsh, who is a great guy, and you’ve got Hartmann, who’s a dumbo, and everybody else telling him that Spencer’s nuts – what do you do?

Smith: How much of that was – part of the beef was – Ford took a long time, maybe never did fully outgrow his congressional roots, whether it’s how you run the place, the whole spokes of the wheel notion, or even the campaign. Hartmann was clearly a lightning rod in his congressional office, yet he brought him along to the White House. Who was Bob Hartmann and why did he matter?

Spencer: Bob Hartmann was loyal to Gerald Ford. Bob Hartmann wrote two good speeches a year. But the other twelve weren’t too good. He was there in the tough times for Ford and he was loyal to him and Ford honors that and he respects that.

Smith: Difficult person though, right?

Spencer: Bob? Oh, yeah. He was difficult. Drinking was his problem. He was a two time person – I remember when he was a political reporter for the LA Times. He ran the Washington Bureau for the LA Times. Drinking was his biggest problem. Is he still around?

Smith: No, he passed away about a year ago.

Spencer: Down in St. Croix or somewhere he moved to?

Smith: Wherever, yeah.

Spencer: That was his biggest problem, he drunk days, not just drinking at night.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that because he clearly was this very polarizing figure within the congressional office. When they moved into the White House, the little hideaway office off the Oval Office - he wanted that office for himself.
Which is revealing, but what does it say about Ford’s comfort level with difficult people? Diverse, egotistical, whatever you want to call them.

Spencer: He could handle it. He could bounce it all together. Jack Stiles was the same way, his original campaign manager. When I got back there Jack Stiles is sitting in an office. I say to him, “What’s Jack doing?” “Well, Jack’s this or that.” Well, I had to find room for Jack. I went to the President and I said, “What do you want me to do with Jack Stiles?” He said, “He’s my guy.” I said, “Okay.” So I pleased Jack.

Smith: He was from Grand Rapids?

Spencer: Yeah.

Smith: And had been in the congressional campaigns?

Spencer: He had run his first campaign for Congress. A lot of people showed up from Michigan. I found them all over the place.

Smith: Was that part of the problem? That it was a congressional mindset being superimposed on a presidential campaign?

Spencer: Yeah, plus, the breakthrough I had to make was, he’d been in that town so long, everybody liked him – both sides of the aisle. Most of his people were Congressional people – they all had the answers, they second guessed me everyday – every hour of the day of the week. They had access to him. It was a nightmare for me through the early stages. A nightmare. But this is a demonstration of his loyalty, too. I went to my godfather, Bryce Harlow.

Smith: The original wise man?

Spencer: Yeah. I said, “Bryce, my commitment was to come back for New Hampshire and Florida, then I’m going home.” I said, “These people don’t realize that if they don’t win New Hampshire they are dead meat. They just don’t realize that.” But that’s the truth. He agreed. I said, “The second problem is Florida. If we can get through three, then I think we’re in a race, at least.” But if a sitting incumbent president loses the first primary, he’s done, especially with a guy like Reagan out there sitting.” So, Bryce agreed with that. So I says, “That’s what I’ve committed to do. Besides that, I’m sick and tired of fucking Mel Laird…” and I go down the whole list.

Smith: Tell me about Mel Laird.

Smith: There must have themselves, a reaction from the Reagan camp, or at least from the Reagans when you committed this ultimate betrayal of going to work for Ford.

Spencer: I think they’d accepted the fact that I was out of the picture by then because they’d been running. I never heard anything. There was never any reaction until I did my infamous commercial which said, “Governor Reagan couldn’t start a war, but President Reagan could.” Then I got a reaction. He blamed the whole thing on me, put his fist through the bulkhead. That was the only reaction I ever heard about to my participation in the Ford campaign.

Smith: Was that the raw nerve? The warmonger issue?

Spencer: No. The key to the New Hampshire win, I don’t care what anybody you interview says, the key to that win – the White House, the Ford entourage of Washington – didn’t know Ronald Reagan. They didn’t know anything about it. They didn’t respect him. The fact that I was hired by Ford, I don’t think at any point in time it went through their minds that we’ll hire him because he knows Reagan and he worked for Reagan – which would have been a smart way, I think. I had never found any indication that it was for my other alleged “raw political skills,” shall we say.

So, I know one thing about Reagan. They’re lucky they got me in that sense, and I don’t say that to brag, it’s just that I was the only person that knew anything about him. I knew that he was a rhythm candidate, ‘cause I’d seen him in rhythm, and I’d seen him out of rhythm, and my whole goal was to get him out of rhythm in New Hampshire every chance I could get. Because I knew we had a week’s down time because he would screw it up when he got out of rhythm.

Smith: Explain rhythm and out of rhythm.
Spencer: Rhythm is, he doesn’t get a tough question. He gets a question that he can’t handle, something in his past is brought up that he really said that is kind of stupid now, but he said it – you’ve got it documented. An accusation when he was running for governor, he was on the same stage with Christopher one time and either Christopher or ______________, I can’t remember which, basically accused him of being a racist. He lost it. He storms out of the meeting, I’m chasing him down the hall. It’s damage control right now, what are we going do? He’s cussing Christopher, he’s cussing everybody, “I’m not a racist.” And he wasn’t a racist. I forget what brought it up, but it came up. I saw him lose his cool on that one and it was hard getting him back in focus. That sort of thing really upset him. So I set up, I had a press guy call me in the Chicago Tribune, can’t remember his name now, and he said, “Have you heard about the ninety billion dollar program that Reagan advocated in New Jersey or someplace?” I said, “No, I never heard about it.” I didn’t think much about it.

Smith: It wasn’t Peter Lisagor

Spencer: No, no. It was J something. And he thought it was a great story. He was mad because they buried it in the seventh page and it had happened prior. It was speech written by that guy Bell, who was…

Smith: Jeffrey Bell.

Spencer: Jeffrey Bell. So I get the speech and I read it and I’m not a big policy wonk, but I said, “This doesn’t look good.” So I turn it over to some research guys and said, “I want you to take this and extrapolate it. I want to know how much this would cost the people of New Hampshire, of Florida and every other state.” Knowing in my mind that New Hampshire was a non-taxed state. They prided themselves in being a non-taxed stated. So the numbers they came back with were astounding. It was going to cost everybody in New Hampshire twelve grand or so. It was one of those off-the-cuff speeches you give to the Women’s Federation type thing– raw meat time. So, with Peter Kaye, my press guy – he was a wily little guy, we put together a campaign, we put together a kit, we put together a timing, we took the ______________ who had great rapport with the media, went to the right guys, the Broders, and all these people and prepared them that something was coming, and so forth. The day we hit it, it was on the seats of every press guy on the Reagan plane, as well as every press guy who was traveling with Ford ____________.

Smith: Now how did it get on the Reagan plane?

Spencer: You have ways. You have ways. And so, it’s a charge we made and we delineated what it would cost the people and then we attack him on it. He stumbled all over New Hampshire for three days. Couldn’t answer the damn question. Guy got him out of rhythm. So then he goes back somewhere else and tries to get – it takes a week to get him back, I noticed. It bought us a week’s time – that week. And that’s exactly what my Governor Reagan couldn’t start a war, was the same thing. We did it in California, where I knew we’d have our tail handed to us. It was just a matter of – you get beat by ten points or twenty points. I said, “How can I make something good out of that?” So I said, “We’ll do it in California, ‘cause it’s going to affect Ohio and Jersey and other states.” They were still a little iffy about this guy, whether he was a warmonger and all that kind of stuff. We got swamped in California – the reaction there was fierce. They were all over me. We only ran it once, and the national media picked it up for us and did my job by running it in Ohio and New Jersey and everywhere else.

Smith: It really is almost like the famous Daisy commercial.

Spencer: Yeah, same thing. Same concept. So, that put him in orbit. But it also put him off his feed prior to those primaries. That was my whole goal – always trying to keep him screwed up.

Smith: While you were coming up with this stuff, did Ford know about all this?

Spencer: I would brief him, but not into any great depth. I’ve always believed the candidate should know what you’re doing, particularly if it’s going to get controversial. He bought in.

Smith: For example, this particular ad…

Spencer: He knew about it. I don’t think he understood the depth of the consequence. I don’t think he understood the rhythm thing that I was talking about because he wasn’t a rhythm candidate. But he trusted me, he had faith in me. But going back to the Laird group and all that. It wasn’t the Laird group, it was the Rhodes, Johnny Rhodes, Jesus, I can go through the whole list of them. I was always being summoned to the Hill to be told what I was doing right and what I was doing wrong, and so forth. I got sick of it. I’m living in a motel or a little hotel across the street from headquarters. I’m getting about four hours sleep a night. I’m killing myself, and so I go to my godfather, Harlow, and I tell him my commitment to stay and I’m going home. Bryce looked at me and he said, “No you’re not.” I said, “Why?” He said, “The President needs you.”
I said, “I don’t give a goddamn,” and then I dump all over his friends.

Bryce got on my ass, “Okay, Spencer, yeah.” And he did this (contemplative hand gesture) and the whole thing.” When I leave, Christ, I’m not gone two hours and the phone rings. It’s the President. He says, “Come on over to dinner tonight.” Right? “You’re not going anywhere.” “You don’t say no to a President is what it was. I says, “Okay, then the ground rules change. Your goddamn friends,” and I named them, and I told him and went through the whole thing, “they’ve got to get off my back and leave me alone. They can be helpful, but let me go to them to ask for their help. They’re taking up four hours a day.”

“I’ll take care of it.” I never heard from them again.

Smith: Really.

Spencer: He took care of it.

Smith: So he could lay down the law?

Spencer: He could lay down the law. John Heinz was running for the Senate. The closing days of that campaign, I get a phone call from my field guy in Pennsylvania, he says, “I got up this morning and went to work and there was these Carter-Heinz signs, billboards all over Pittsburgh.” I said, “Take a picture of one for me.” I know what’s going on. I called John Heinz up, he’s not a Senator but I called him. I said, “Heinz, what the hell’s going on?” “I don’t know anything about it.” I said, “I don’t believe you. You’re full of bull.” I got all over him. He started getting mad at me and we’re going back and forth, finally I says, “You know, John, some places in this country you’d get kneecapped for doing that.” He said, “You’re threatening me,” and I said, “No,” and I hung up.

Well, afterwards I thought, Jesus, I’d better go talk to the President. So I called over and that secretary answered and I said, “Whatever you do, don’t let Heinz through until I get to see the President first, okay?” She said, “No problem.” So I get over there I says, “I’ve got to tell you a story.” So I tell the story and what I say to him, all these billboards popped up, he goes, “What?” So I tell him the story. “But let me tell you about my conversation with Mr. Heinz.” So I tell him this little story straight, the way it was. He looks at me, “You did the right thing. I hope he calls.” So I says, “Okay.”

Bill Simon, his great secretary of the treasury, my sources kept feeding back to me that he’s out giving speeches and he never mentions Ford’s name. I know his advance guy, so I call and I said, “I want a copy of all of Simon’s speeches.” I read a bunch of them. He never says his name. He gives a hundred and twenty speeches, he never mentions the President. I had already passed the word to the Cabinet that when you’re out giving your speeches and something good is coming down, refer to the President and give him some credit. Butz and those guys, they were great. Coleman, he was great.

That ticked me off, so I call up Hines(?), Garland was his chief of staff, former advance guy for me. Garland knew that I never went to see these guys unless I was mad, he knew that about me. So when I walked in the door, he said, “What’s the subject?” I says, “He ain’t going to like it.” He said, “I’m getting the hell out of here,” because he had a terrible temper, Simon did. I get in there and we chatted and he’s a happy man, he’s always got something. Bill Simon had ambitions of his own to be president and I knew that. So I says, “Bill, you’ve given 127 speeches in the last twelve months or something. You’ve never mentioned the fucking President’s name!” Psssst – up straight up, and it went bad from there.

Smith: What was his explanation?
Stu Spencer  December 2, 2008

Spencer: Well, I was wrong! I said, “But I read them.” Grrrr – sidebar – “I did this…” It went on and on. I said, “I don’t know what your game is, but I’m just putting you on the alert that we know about it and we expect more support for the President from his Cabinet.” Again, I said, “Jesus Christ, (words unintelligible) So I run across the street and the Treasurer is talking to Kissinger and he sends Kissinger out because I said it’s important. So I tell him the story. Again, “You did the right thing.”

That’s support! I had it 100%.

Smith: Do you think he suffered from not having more people like you around him?

Spencer: Early on he did, because he was working with the Nixon crowd. They weren’t Ford people. At least Hartmann was dedicated.

Smith: Leon Parma told the story: at the last minute he and Rhodes and other folks from the Hill got sort of pushed into the East Room for the inauguration at Ford’s insistence. Afterwards there was a little receiving line that formed up and they said, would everyone join us in the East Room and so on. He said, “We were down in the East Room, there were a few of us, and the Nixon people, en masse, turned and walked away. Never came down to where the President was.” What more dramatically illustrated the fact that Ford was marooned in a White House staffed with Nixon people?

Spencer: He was. It is a difficult thing to say, because they knew where the keys to the door were. Slowly it transitioned out. Gergen was there, Jones __________ was there, he was Al Haig’s guy, they were all there and Rummy to a degree, but you can’t put him in that category, because he was close to Ford. Cheney was a detachment of Rummy’s.

Smith: When you look again at the Rockefeller situation. In many ways, Ford almost created that situation by leading Rockefeller to believe that he was going to be in the domestic sphere when Kissinger was in the foreign sphere. That he was head of Domestic Council and it was really built up. Rumsfeld, for all of his shortcomings, is basically in an impossible situation himself. You never want to blame the president so it’s always the people around the president, who are your enemies. Could it have worked, given the temperament, given the personalities? Example, Rockefeller loved programs – that’s how you get elected in New York. Ford decided early on there weren’t going to be any new programs.

Spencer: You’re right. A lot of it is Ford’s fault. When I first read it and saw the job description, I said to myself, that’s not right, because they are a hundred miles apart on domestic issues. They were on in foreign policy, but how could he give Nelson that? That must be a misprint or something. Nelson would come up with a program and go into the President and the President would ash can it. Or they’d get in a big argument because they were that far apart. Yeah, he has to hold some responsibility for that sort of thing. The chairs were changing in the office, the power was moving back and forth. Cheney developed into an excellent chief of staff. The thing that I appreciated about him and noticed about him was that no matter what the point of view was, the person got access and the right to talk. He didn’t shut people out. You would have never known what his philosophy personally was in that era. That’s why so many people say today, “That’s not the Cheney – that’s not the Cheney I knew.” He was acting as the honest broker and he was a very good chief of staff in doing that.

Smith: One thing I don’t think we actually nailed down: what was the original approach made to you about coming into the Ford campaign?

Spencer: First one was by Rummy in a phone call, and they were going to meet in Sacramento when he got shot at by Squeaky. I went up there, I was in the hotel. Rummy and I were starting to talk about it and all hell breaks loose. We’re out the front door and Squeaky’s taking the shot and…..end of conversation.

So I come home and I don’t hear from anybody. Then I go to the state convention – Republican Party in San Diego. I’m going to be there a couple of days and Bo Callaway comes to it as National Chairman of the Ford campaign. He corners me. He really starts working on me. You can tell he’s talked to everybody back there. His mission was to get me to come back and do something in the campaign. So he lobbies and lobbies and lobbies, and I didn’t know. I thought about it.
At the time the marriage I was in was not going well, and it sounded pretty good – like get the hell out of town, to be honest with you. So I says, “Okay,” and I left on that plane with my little ditty bag and Bo and came back to DC and walked into an absolute firestorm of problems.

Smith: Describe the campaign that you walked into.

Spencer: When I walked into it, Bo the chairman was now in trouble with the West Wing. They realized at that point that maybe the southern strategy wasn’t going to work, and yet he was the kingpin of the southern strategy. Number two: Bo had hired Lee Nunn out of Kentucky to be his political director, and they didn’t get along. Discord between the West Wing and the campaign, dysfunction going on in the campaign headquarters – I almost got a plane and came home. The only reason I stayed was that I had made this commitment, they can do what they want to do, I’m going to go run New Hampshire like it’s a Congressional race. And I’ll get Florida started.

So all of a sudden, Lee – he’s got me - so he cans Lee. I took the credit – they gave me all the credit for Lee – I had no idea what was going to happen. Now I’ve got an enemy all over the country, poor-mouthing me, calling… I had nothing to do with it. I was used, so to speak. So I’m now political director, so I start thinking over some things, and had the complete confidence of the White House. Well, Bo didn’t. I’ve got to get things done! I’m in a balancing act trying to keep my chairman happy and not trying to hurt him, yet doing the right thing, back and forth, back and forth. Then Bo gets in trouble and they find an excuse to dump him.

Thirty days went by and I’m called vice-chairman of the campaign – I’m sort of the top dog over there – but I’m still busy running campaigns. I’m going to take care of this other BS. Finally they bring old Rog in. Morton, who was a great chairman, but sick, dying of cancer. He said, “You do what you want to do, Stu. I love ya. I’ll back ya.” And he did. He gets sick and he couldn’t come into work and then he got in trouble with his great statement, which was a cheap shot by the press, the White House really felt after the convention they had to get rid of Rog.
Smith: Was that the thing about rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic?

Spencer: That was the first one. That was the primary night. In his office, we had a bar set up for the press and it was all behind him – Rogers wasn’t even drinking – they were drinking the goddamn booze. Oh that was a cheap shot.

Then the other was at the convention he made some crack that was blah. But anyway, Jimmy Baker had been brought in. Rogers came to me and he said, “I got this guy over at Commerce (I think it was). A bright young guy, he’s this he’s that, and he wants to get in this political thing.” Well, I said, “Rogers, I’m at the point where I’m running campaigns. We’re getting delegates. I can’t keep track of the delegates, somebody’s got to take care of the delegates, ‘cause I’ve got to go to another two states next Tuesday and another two states, and now you’ve got eight states behind us with delegates. Half of them are emotionally committed, but not legally committed.” I said, “That’s what I need.” That’s what I had in mind. I said, “Bring him over.”

Bob Teeter and I interviewed Baker. I liked what I saw. I explained what I thought his role would be and he came. He moved right in and he did a great job. Just a great job. Jimmy always does a good job. After the convention, Rog got into trouble again. We were at Vail, Dick and I and some others, talking. It was a consensus that Rog wasn’t up to the general election effort. So then the big debate became about them. I thought Jimmy would do the job. I wasn’t totally sure, but my job description for a chairman is the ability to handle the Sunday shows, be articulate, to go on and do all the news shows on Sunday. Take care of the money, because we’re federally funded – there were laws involved. And stay out of my way.

That was sort of my theory of what the hell a chairman ought to be. Jimmy came and did a great job. The funniest part of the whole thing was, he was so worried about the law which said that if you spent more than $21 million dollars, the president and the chairman could go to jail. I said, “Jimmy, there ain’t no way they’re going to throw the President in jail or you. It’s BS!” Well, we went home with a million bucks because Jimmy was cautious. I learned later he was always cautious.
And the second was, when I came in to tell my chairman that I was going to send out a mailer to all the – I’ve got a great list of all the religious right around America – and I got this Catholic list and I got this other list and I’m going to send out inflammatory mail, and I’m going to put a little newspaper together and send it out. He was like a nervous cat on a hot tin roof. I found out later, I won’t say who from, but it was a person we both knew well, Jimmy and I…he said, “When I do that dumb crap,” the lawyer in him would make a memo ‘for the record’ and put it in the file. The file was about that thick when the campaign was over with, because he was – I’m a guy that swings for the homerun – he’s super cautious. We actually made a good team. We made an excellent team. I really became very close to him – still close to this day.

Smith: Let me go back to the primary campaign in New Hampshire. You’ve got Reagan in some ways at least in a vulnerable position. You’ve changed the dynamics of the race, anyway. But you still only win by what? A thousand votes?

Spencer: Oh, yeah!

Smith: It’s a cliffhanger. What do you remember that night? Were you confident that you were going to win in New Hampshire by the time the primary rolled around?

Spencer: I wasn’t confident, I felt good, but I knew that it was up for grabs. That’s why we drove our phone banks to the end. Reagan cut his off. There were a lot of things. Reagan left the state, we flew the damn Air Force One into some burg town. They could hardly fit it in. We stayed until the end because I was worried. Reagan – they pulled out. Their polling data showed them winning by eight points or something and they pulled out and left us a 24-hour gap with all the accoutrements of a president, the airplane, the Secret Service – all the things – the trappings that you can take into a little state like New Hampshire.

Smith: Remember though, it was right about that time that Richard Nixon decided to visit China?
Spencer: Yes. Well, I knew Dick Nixon. I grew up with Dick Nixon’s school of politics. When I came home from the Navy and I’m out drinking beer one night and I come home and sitting at the kitchen table is my dad and Dick Nixon and they’re talking about how they are going to raise money in that area, that part of the district, for the race. I’m introduced to him. Politicians didn’t impress me when I got out of the Navy. That was the first time I ever met him. I was around him a lot after that. I knew the guy.

He knew what he was doing when he went there. He knew it wasn’t helpful to Ford. He knew that his timing was a factor. He knew those things. I said something to Brokaw, and of course it was a great news story. The White House came unglued. Cheney really climbed all over me. There were a lot of Nixon people still in the White House. I stuck to my guns. I said, “Look, I’m telling you right now, that son of a bitch knew what he was doing and he’s sending a message.”

Smith: What?

Spencer: I don’t know! That whole transition from Nixon and the Ford, the pardon, the whole thing – I was never a part of, I’ve heard conflicting stories – the only people I know in the world who could probably tell you what really happened is Phil Buchen and Becker – Benton. And Becker would never talk to you because I know Benton very well. Benton’d talk to you, but he’ll never tell you the truth. He was in it up to his ears. He was sharp – Benton’s a sharp guy. I believe Ford’s story on the pardon, I mean, I have no reason not to.

For people who believe in conspiracies there are a lot of reasons not to believe in it – so, leave it alone. Everything that transpired there about his records in the White House, trying to sneak the records out, all kinds of stuff. There could have been some bad blood, there could of have been some, “Well if I can’t have it, why should this guy have it?” I do know one thing. I know the man well enough, I knew the man well enough, to know that it wasn’t an accident, that he knew what he was doing and he knew it could have an effect upon what happened.

Smith: And did it have an effect?
Spencer: I don’t know. That race went back and forth, back and forth.

Smith: You know there is an argument that Reagan unintentionally performed a service in that he made Ford into a better candidate than he would have been otherwise.

Spencer: True. It’s true. There’re dichotomies in everything that Ford did. That made him a much better candidate. That was two 400 pound gorillas going at it, those two guys. One with the power of the presidency, the other with the talent and really the hearts of the voters, the Republicans were with him. We had to muscle him away from him. Giving stuff away, doing everything, making commitments, and then holding them. It was close in Kansas City, really. So, yes, that made him a much better candidate. But then by the same token, the division we created hurt him in the general election. So you go back and people say, “the pardon.” I think he did the right thing. Did it hurt him? Yes, it hurt him in the election. So he does the right thing, and then it’s the burden he’s got to carry.

Smith: The other school of thought which is: say he hadn’t pardoned Nixon. And say we’d spent two and a half years obsessing about Nixon’s legal problems and Nixon’s papers, etc., etc. It can be argued either way.

Spencer: It can be argued, but I could not have run a campaign if every time he went in front of the press somebody hit him with a Watergate question. We couldn’t have gotten the message out. We couldn’t have had any continuity, and we would certainly have had a frustrated candidate.

Smith: I assume candidates, even people who are gentlemen and who like each other at the beginning of a campaign, probably can’t avoid developing a personal animosity the longer the thing goes on. And there was no pre-existing friendship between Ford and Reagan.

Spencer: No. There was no respect of Reagan on Ford’s part. He didn’t think he was qualified. Reagan felt that Ford, by his appointment, and then in saying he wasn’t going to run after he got it, that he interrupted the natural flow of the Republican process. It was his. So there were a lot of reasons. They never liked each other – before, after, to the end. Period. They were civil.
Smith: It wasn’t simply a question of staffs or wives, those functions that often tend to drive these things. It was the principles.

Spencer: Yeah, they just didn’t like each other. He asked Reagan if he wanted to be VP. I would say, “Do you want Reagan for your VP?” “Hell, no.” “But you’re going to ask him, aren’t you?” “Oh, yeah.” Reagan says, “I don’t want to be asked,” because he doesn’t want to say no to a president. That’s all in the ______________.

Smith: You were getting those signals in advance – don’t ask – but by that point – did Ford want to ask?

Spencer: No, but he knew he had to. We had to have that cover with that base. When it all came out and everything, we had to be able to say that we asked. That it was going to be first choice.

Smith: So, did he ask Reagan in the meeting? Or was that just something in the run up to the convention.

Spencer: The word was passed through Cheney to Sears that Ford would pick him if he had to – not if he had to, but if he wanted to. In other words, backhanded, I really don’t want it. So never were they in a face to face.

Smith: But through channels, reliable channels, the word was passed that if Reagan wanted it, he could have it. And the response was?

Spencer: No. Now, in the Reagan campaign they weren’t communicating internally very well because a lot of the people over there thought that Ronnie should get it, were blaming Ford because he wouldn’t – they weren’t keeping their people informed. But we had a ground rule early on before the convention started. One spokesman, one spokesman. Cheney here, Sears here. They wanted me to be it, I said, “There’s no way.”

Smith: It is fascinating you say this, because Leon Parma told the story of where after the convention, he was approached by Justin Dart, who went off about this. And he said, “Wait a second, Bill Smith told me not to ask,” etc. etc. and Dart said, “You’re lying.” Fortunately Smith came into the room at this point and vouched for everything that Leon had said.
Spencer: A lot of those Kitchen Cabinet guys weren’t informed and they were mad as hell about the whole thing, but our side, everybody knew what the game plan was.

Smith: If Ford had lost New Hampshire - now remember for much of the evening Reagan led, it was only late that Ford eked out this victory - would it have been over?

Spencer: Yes. I’m probably the only guy in America that believed that, at that time. But at that time I don’t think anybody – that would have been the catastrophic defeat for a sitting President of the United States by one of the best candidates America had seen since FDR at that time. That would have been a chink in the armor. Boy that would have been dead meat. I even tell it to a degree the same way about Florida, that we couldn’t lose that. Then I breathed easier, we went and won Illinois and then it all came down – we got our lunch handed to us in North Carolina, which was an indicator of where there was going to be long summer.

Smith: Describe Florida because, that’s thirty years ago, it may surprise people today to think of Florida as a state where a relatively “moderate” Republican could win, particularly against a charismatic conservative.

Spencer: There was a quite large Cuban delegation in there and it was all pretty conservative. But Florida was also settled by retirees from Michigan and New York, and etc., etc. We found ways of accessing those people by mail and we pounded them with mail. Plus we used the trappings of the presidency again. We put him in an open car up in Palm Beach, and make him drive in the rain all the way through Miami. A whole road would be lined with people to see a president, which they do. We had a chairman named Lou Fry, he was a Congressman, he was awful. One of my first moves was dumping Lou Fry, again a Congressman. He had a Cuban working for him, Juarez, and he was a staff guy and I’d go in the office one day and I open a bottom drawer and there’s about twenty thousand dollars worth of unpaid bills sitting in it. I can’t remember who we put in as chairman.
It’s weird, but what I did, basically, is – Bill Roberts had left the company in ’73 – he had diabetes, he had health problems, he had IRS problems, he was sick of politicians and he left and started some other operation. It wasn’t a political operation. It was something in health care. At the time when he left, I bought him out. I said, “Bill, you’re going to be back somewhere because you don’t know anything but politics. That’s all you know – that’s all we know. We couldn’t make a living if it wasn’t for politics.” “Oh, rahrahrah…” So I kept getting word from people that Bill was getting bored with what he was trying to do. So I called him up on day and said, “How’d you like to go to Florida and do the Ford thing for us?”

He was on the next plane, right? So I told the White House I was bringing Roberts in, they thought that was good. But I said, “But I’ve got to warn you, Bill loves to throw money at problems,” which he always did. I said, “We’re going to spend a lot of dough.” He went down and he put it together great, did all the right things and we did very well in Florida. We had a good carryover in Illinois, but that was a more natural state.

Smith: Was Social Security an issue in that campaign?

Spencer: They tried to make it one, but it wasn’t really an issue. We had some Democrat congressmen up in the peninsula area who were really helpful to us. Of course, as I remember, they got a Veterans Administration hospital, too, somewhere along the line. We pulled the plug on all that stuff, we did everything.

Smith: The Rose Garden strategy was more than standing in the Rose Garden. It was clearly exploiting, to the fullest, the advantages of the incumbency.

Spencer: It was the primary concern: what have we got, what can you deliver, Earl Butz out there in Iowa? What can we deliver to Iowa?

Smith: The last story of the day, because I remember hearing from several folks that the Queen’s visit came a month before the convention, And it’s a good thing she didn’t see the guest list because apparently it was larded with undecided delegates and their families who wanted something tangible from the Ford
White House. And I guess there were some delegates who kept changing their minds and you had to keep…does that ring a bell?

Spencer: That’s true. We larded that and we larded White House dinners. When the president of Italy was there, you saw every Italian-American in Jersey there, I guarantee you. Yeah we used the power of incumbency. My thesis has always been, you deal your strength, and I was his strength. Yeah, Mississippi was the biggest example. Clarke Reed was – I don’t know how many times we bought him – and he’d come unglued and we’d buy him back.

Smith: What did you buy him with?

Spencer: Oh, I don’t remember what we did with Clarke Reed. Cheney had not really been in politics – he was a policy guy – he never ran for anything, he’d never been involved in a campaign. And he was sniffing around, getting in and out, so we assigned him Clarke Reed. “You are responsible for Clarke Reed. You’ve got the power to give him the house, right, where you sit? You’re in charge.” So I never asked, really. If I was told, I forgot.

Smith: There is a wonderful story – one day right about then some crazed individual tried to climb over the White House fence, and was shot. The story goes, Cheney was in the room, this was related, and the Secret Service agent says, “Shit, I hope it wasn’t an uncommitted delegate.”

Spencer: Well, I’d say, I hope it wasn’t Jack climbing out. There were others. The other thing I never understood from the Reagan standpoint in that campaign was, I was nervous going into Kansas City. We had like an 84 vote delegate lead, I thought – somewhere around a hundred. We had a lot of delegates who loved Ronald Reagan. They were for us for practical reasons, but their hearts were with Ronald Reagan.

So I thought they would start a fight on floor about some policy thing – some ideological issue that we couldn’t measure up to correctly, and stampede that joint. That’s what bothered me the whole time. That’s why I said to my people when they went out to the platform committee, which started a week before, I says, “Whatever they want, give it to them.” Everything. So I get called and they say, Jesus, they want to do this – I say, “Give it to them!”
I get summoned over to the White House about five o’clock one night. I walk in and old Henry Kissinger - (in German accent) “He’s a giving away my whole foreign policy,” he’s pointing and yelling at me. I listen to Henry. Ford is listening to Henry, and he looks at me. I said, “He’s right, I’m giving it away. But if you want to be the nominee, we got to give it away.” End of conversation. Ford was practical. Henry was mad at me, but who cares.

Smith: That’s perfect! On that note we’ll end for the day.

Smith: Golf and the president.

Spencer: He loved the game, he really did. He was pretty good. In the period of time I knew him, really knew him, in ’76 on, I’d say his handicap ranged from about a low of twelve or thirteen to a high eighteen or twenty. It was not fun playing with him when he was president because he’d be out at Burning Tree, and he always had to have a bet and he always had to keep score. He’d hit a ball over to the trees at Burning Tree, the Secret Service would be walking along the tree line with their big guns, and you’d see him hit it out, he’d go down the fairway, all of a sudden his ball would come flying out of the wood. The Secret Service would throw the ball out. So I’d climb all over the Secret Service guy and he’d just smile at me. The message was, “You’re not President. Presidents get advantages and they get a break.”

Smith: Did his game deteriorate after he left the office?

Spencer: No. The older you get, your game deteriorates, all of us. In terms of when he left office, he played a lot more golf, frankly. He probably got a little better and then maintained it. His knees were his problem. I could remember over at Morningside we used to play a lot and he’d get into a trap and he couldn’t get out of the trap. He’d stand there until you put a club in there and he could grab hold of and pull himself out with. So we used to make him stand in the trap – his son Steve and I. I remember we used to do that to him. He loved the game, he worked hard at it. If anything, I would say he got too much counsel. Because of [his] position in life he played with all the great pros. They all had to give him a lesson, but the greatest one I ever saw was Craig Statler.
For some reason, Ford picked me as his partner in this tournament one year. He always wanted to win his own tournament, naturally. He was competitive. He and I had been playing out here in the desert prior to that quite a bit and I was playing better than my handicap at the time. I was playing pretty well. He noticed that. So when Barrett and he put the pairings together, he picked me as his amateur partner because he figured I could pick up some holes for him. We drew Craig Statler as our pro. We played two days. We were on the Vail golf course and Ford had a terrible putting problem. He had what is called the yips and he developed them early.

So he went to the long putter and he still had the yips with the long putter. Craig had watched him on two or three holes and finally he went over to the president and he gave him a little putting lesson as we were moving along. “Swing it back, just through the ball, back and through the ball, Mr. President.” I was sitting in the cart watching all this and we get to the next hole and I was sitting in the cart. Craig gives him another little lesson, almost verbally before he puts. He comes over and sits down next to me in the cart and he turns away and he says, “I can’t watch this.” He enjoyed the game; he was pretty good at it.

Smith: Would he get angry with himself?

Spencer: Yes. He would get angry with himself. Disgusted is a good word.

Smith: Language would reflect that fact?

Spencer: Yes. But he also used it as a vehicle to get his frustrations out. I remember one time he called me, we were in DC and it was a Sunday. Seven o’clock in the morning I get a phone call – he says, “We’re going to play golf at Burning Tree.” Ughhh. I had to go tearing around and meet him outside the gate at the White House and get in the car and go out there. He was somber, which was not like him in terms of going to play golf. We got on the golf course, we were on about the third hold and he started in. He was really upset about the leaks.

The leaks, which is a perennial problem with anybody, but it was starting to get to him. The more he talked, the madder he got. To the point where he was banging the club on the cart and I’m beginning to think, does he think I’m the leak? Am I out here to be…? Finally I said, “Mr. President, do you think I’m the leak?” He said, “No, no, no,” and he just went on and on and on. But two hours later, he’d got it out of his system. You could tell he felt better. I kept telling him, this is not your problem, this is a historic problem of any White House. There are things you can do to solve the problem, but it is still going to happen.

Smith: For someone who valued loyalty as much as he did, it’s one thing to say, “Yeah, intellectually I know this is the way it’s always been.” But then to be in the middle of it…was that White House – you’ve seen White Houses – any more, for lack of a better word, cutthroat than others?

Spencer: No, I don’t think so. The leak problem, the cutthroat problem, whatever you want to call it, is the end product of the way the West Wing is structured, basically. Now in his case, he had Nixon people and he had his people, and he was trying to meld the two together. That creates a division. In other words, there are press loyalties developed by all these people. Nixon’s people had some press loyalties, Ford’s people were developing them. So there was that.

The Reagan White House was more stark. You had two camps. You had the Meese camp and you had the Baker camp. Created by the man, himself. I can distinctly remember the same story with Mr. Reagan. I’m at the residence for dinner one night – the three of us, Nancy, he and I, and he’s mad about the leaks. He’s going through the same song and dance. First I said to him, “You created it.” He said, “What do you mean?” I said, “Your troika. They are all down there vying for power, they’re all trying to one up the other side. The press are having a hay day – it’s readymade for them.

There is a solution. He says, “What’s that?” I said, “When you walk down to the office at nine o’clock tomorrow morning, you stick your head in the press room and say, ‘I want everybody in here to know that everybody in the White House is on the record. There are no off-the-record conversations.”

“Good idea, good idea.” And I knew that this is what would happen, he doesn’t stop, he goes to his Oval Office and in comes Baker and Deaver, probably, and he says, “Oh Stu had a great idea last night,” and he lays it out and they go ballistic, right? So later on I asked what happened. He says, “Well I told the boys what you said, they didn’t agree with you.” I said, “Yeah, because they’re the problem!” He just looks at me, “Okay.”

They all have leaks, they all have problems. These new things coming out at the Nixon Library - about the tapes - and you can see how tough they were on leakers. They were brutal, you leak, you got your taxes checked. They’ve all faced it.

Smith: Was that the roughest White House you’ve known.

Spencer: Yeah, within my lifetime. Oh yeah – that was out of bounds.

Smith: Ultimately, I assume it reflects the temperament, the character, the outlook and the methods of the man in the Oval Office, doesn’t it?

Spencer: In my judgment, it always does, yes, correct. Dick Nixon was paranoid and it’s reflected in what the people did around him. I knew Haldeman when he was a young advertising executive and he wasn’t of that demeanor at that time. He developed that. He identified with his principle and couldn’t break the cord and became one of the bunch.

Smith: We were talking about the primaries, but before the primaries you had the dumping of the vice president and the whole shuffle in the Cabinet. Schlesinger went, was replaced with Rumsfeld, Rockefeller was dumped. Had there been talk of that as a distinct possibility leading up to its actually happening? Was it something that was in the air around the West Wing or in the campaign?

Spencer: I wasn’t there. I didn’t come until September, but I realized after I got there, I asked questions because I bridged the gap. I knew Nelson well, I’d worked for him. I liked him. I thought he brought a great deal to the Ford White House politically. The basic story in conversation I got was they had a southern strategy and they had brought Bo in and Bo and others had started to immediately talk about “we have to get rid of Rockefeller.” That was the beginning of it.
Smith: Is that something that would have been developed outside the White House, or inside the White House? It’s hard to imagine something like that taking root in isolation from whoever in the White House was looking out for the president’s political interests.

Spencer: No, it couldn’t have been in isolation. It would have originated there and then outsiders brought in. In the Ford White House a lot of outsiders had input. He had friends. He had his Congressional friends. He had lobbyist friends all over town. Power brokers all over town. He sought and got a lot of outside input, more so than any other presidents I knew.

Smith: Would you say that’s a good thing on balance?

Spencer: Yeah, if the person is a stable, balanced person, yeah. A lot of people cringe at the idea of a lobbyist – a major lobbyist like Bill White was then - and was a good friend of the President’s. I was talking to Bill about something, but Bill was a sensible, reasonable, balanced guy that understood that town totally. I think it was a plus that he reached out all the time and talked to other people. That’s a cocoon, boy. You could lose your perspective. He still had that middle western perspective.

Smith: Do you think the family helped?

Spencer: Sure. He spent a lot of time talking about his family. He had young kids for his age when he was in the White House. Two of them, three of them were at an age where, let’s face it, if you have kids like I have, they were a pain in the ass. Right? His sons and my son were about the same age. He and I had some of the same problems and I’ve seen him, when I’m in the Oval Office with him, keep Henry Kissinger waiting outside for fifteen minutes to talk about Jack – something Jack’s doing. And I’d say, “Well, I know what you’re talking about. My Steve’s doing it, too.”

Smith: Jack Marsh told us a wonderful story. The day before he goes out to Chicago to the VFW to announce the Vietnam Amnesty Program, which again, is characteristic - anyone else would put it in a press release on a Friday afternoon and be done with it. Ford goes out to this hostile audience to make this speech. Anyway, day before he leaves Jack comes in and says, “I’ve got some bad news for you.” He [Ford] says, “What’s that?” He says, “Steve never registered for the draft on his eighteenth birthday.” And the president looked like he’d been gob smacked, just, “Oh, no. What more?” Well, amazingly, they got the head of the draft in, they got Steve, they did all the paperwork that day, the press never found out. But it would have been a quite a story.

Spencer: But, you know, three kids, teenagers, the one son was down at Wake Forest, and he was a preacher or whatever it is, a chaplain, and I never really knew him. But these other three kids were at that worst stage in their lifetime, as far as a parent is concerned, and he’s sitting in the White House. That was a load he never talked about, and people never really talked about. But I could see it every now and then in his eyes and his body language. Betty’s addiction problem was a tough row and he handled it, but it was tough.

Smith: Were you aware of it? Were people aware of it at the time?

Spencer: If you were around there, you had to be aware of it.

Smith: We’re talking about in the White House?

Spencer: Yeah, oh yeah. I was aware of it. As presidential wives go, she really didn’t show up very often anywhere. But he had to carry that burden and I don’t think at that time he really had an understanding of addiction, either. I know I didn’t and I went through that with a lot of my family and friends after that, too. I’ve had a lot of them in Betty Ford’s over here, and I don’t think any of us understood it when we first saw it. I think he was that way when he was in the White House.

She was charming and she was all that, but there were times she was floating. She floated. I brought her over to the headquarters one day for all the to-fors, and volunteers and paid people, a lot of them from Michigan, and I was standing in the door of my office and I had some of the Michigan people greet her that were working there. I saw her walk through the door and start moving, and I says, man, she’s floating. She was alright, but if you knew, you watched her, she was floating though the place. Today Betty wouldn’t even remember being there. I went over and asked her, I said, “Do you kind of remember that,” and she said, “I don’t remember that.”

Smith: She became an issue in some ways. There was the famous Sixty Minutes interview. The sense I have was that the initial reaction in the White House was, “Oh my God, what has she done?” Particularly with this looming conservative challenge and so on. But that over time, there was this second wave of reaction – a lot of it from women, but also a lot of it, post Vietnam and Watergate, all of a sudden she came across as authentic, candid, maybe to a fault. But in that climate, that was a very appealing quality. In fact, I think she said things in that interview I don’t think Hillary Clinton could have said twenty-five years later.

Spencer: That’s true. There were mixed reactions within the framework of the White House, I think at that time. It didn’t bother me. I thought it was a plus, but there were others very concerned about it. I always maintained, you’ve got to be who you are and most political figures and activists don’t recognize the fact that the public is a lot smarter than they think they are and they can sense things and smell things. She came across as sincere. Even if you disagreed with her position on Susan, okay, well, the lady is being honest. That quality of honesty in coming out carried the day for her, I think.

Smith: Didn’t she add a little bit of sex appeal to the Ford White House?

Spencer: Oh sure.

Smith: It was a pretty vanilla place.

Spencer: Yeah, she did. It was very much different than most Republican women would talk at that point in time.

Smith: You probably saw some of the mail. I’ve seen some of the letters…my favorite was from Maria von Trapp, of Sound of Music fame, who wrote to the president and said, “If you want to get re-elected, you have to tell your wife to shut up.”

Spencer: Well, the breast cancer thing was a plus, I think. The longer it went and the longer time has passed, the bigger the pluses become of the awareness she made of that. This all happened afterwards, but …why I think she is beloved today, is the way she handled her addiction, upfront, went through the process, then turned around and got Leonard Firestone and these guys with money to back her and put that Betty Ford Center together which has helped thousands of people every year.

Smith: In terms of actually addressing how ordinary people live their lives. In particularly in terms of coming to grips openly with the addiction issue, or breast cancer, or whatever, she’s made as much impact as a lot of presidents.

Spencer: Oh, definitely. And the Fords themselves were probably two of the most open people in the White House and out that I’ve ever dealt with. The Rockefeller family, very measured in terms of what they talked about. The Reagan family has probably got more exposure, but they don’t talk about it. Whatever their problems are internally with their children, etc., you never hear them say anything publicly about it. And they had their problems.

Smith: Would it be the culture? You forget, in the mid 70s the culture wars are beginning to take shape. It was somewhere in the press that, unlike other presidents, the Ford shared a bedroom and they shared a bed. And there were concerned Americans who wrote the White House to protest.

Spencer: I can believe it.

Smith: Did the kids enjoy campaigning?

Spencer: Ford kids?

Smith: Yeah.

Spencer: Jack did. Susan had other thoughts on her mind. Steve was out west, I never saw him much. Jack showed up in my office with a written campaign plan. Jack had his own ideas and was another problem I had to deal with. He’d bring one of his bright young buddies with him. I’d give him jobs and assignments. He showed an interest in that way, but Jack had a very short attention span in terms of – it was one of those situations when you knew it would be gone in a week. You wouldn’t have to worry about it.
Steve didn’t seem to want any part of it. Susan was just a teenage gal, interested in what she was doing and dating and all that stuff. Jack showed a real interest. Later on, after Ford came out here to the Palm Desert, Rancho Mirage, he called me up one day. I was over at Newport Beach, then, before I came out in the desert. He said, “Jack thinks he wants to run for something.” I said, “Okay, we’ll talk about it.” I think I came out here and he and I talked about it first, and then Jack and he and I talked about it. I kind of delineated…you have an opportunity because your name is Ford. Other than that, you have no basis for doing it. The president understood that, Jack didn’t of course. The president really wanted this to happen, believe me.

He wanted this to happen. I said, “Okay, we’ll do a trial run here. We’ll leak some stuff, I’ll put some stuff together. We’ll try to raise a little money.” I made Ford drive all the way from here to Corona del Mar at the beach to a person’s house to talk to some people so I could put $10,000 in the bank to start the ball rolling for Jack. He was there and he produced. We did a few other things and the president would show up and Jack wouldn’t. Shall I put it that way? It became evident to me that Jack liked the glamour of it, but he didn’t want to get in and do the hard work. That was not Ford-like, because Ford was the reverse. He would do the hard work to get to the end.

Finally, I think the president recognized that Jack really wasn’t built to do it. I think it was a statewide lower office that, to me, with that name, if you ran a hard, tough campaign was achievable. But the candidate himself has to be hungry and Jack wasn’t hungry.

Smith: Let’s get back into the primaries and the convention in ’76. After he was dumped, did you ever have a conversation with Rockefeller about anything – about his role in the administration or the ’76 campaign or just generally him blowing off steam?

Spencer: I met with Nelson about damn near every Friday night during the campaign. If I was in town, and I wasn’t in town a lot, but it had to have been fifteen or twenty times during that period of time, I would go over to his office in the EOB and sit with him at five o’clock, at the end of the day. The staff would leave and I would fill him in. He’d give me counsel, he’d give me advice, he’d bitch and whine about something that was happening to him. He’d ask me for counsel, we had a very good relationship. I thought he was a plus. He was a plus to me.

The specific act of him being dumped, I asked him one night in this conversation. I said, “Do you want to tell me what really happened?” The answer was, “No.” And that was the end of it, and if you knew Nelson, you’d know that that was, “I’m not going to talk about it.” So I never heard his version. I heard versions from his staff and from the other side, but he never commented. He was the good soldier. I remember at the convention Ford went through this agonizing process of picking a VP running mate. It was agonizing because, when I look back in retrospect, he pretty much made up his mind what he was going to do, but we went through six hours…

Smith: You mean before the convention?

Spencer: At the convention. Sitting in the room, Nelson’s there, Bryce Harlow’s there, Laird’s there, Marsh was probably there. Cheney was there. They’re probably ten or twelve of us. All the names were put on the table and they all were evaluated. Closed meeting. Incidentally, there never were any leaks from it, which I was always proud of, considering some of the people who were there.

Smith: Like Mel Laird?

Spencer: You know what I mean.

Smith: Is he the champion leaker?

Spencer: He was very good at it. Then we’d adjourn and we’d go back and some of them would go on until like one o’clock in the morning. And we’d go on to our room, and then at three o’clock we’d get a phone call, and we’d get up and we’d stagger back. I remember I’m staggering down the hall, because Bryce Harlow was in a room right by mine, and he and I came out the doors at the same time. And we’re staggering down the hallway to go to this and I turn to Bryce, I said, “Bryce, you have any idea what he’s going to do?” Bryce says, “None whatsoever.” So I says, “Okay.” So we go back in and then we go back through the whole process again. But Nelson was there at every meeting, Nelson was a contributor. It got to look like what was an absolute stalemate. People are grinding on each other.

Smith: By the way, was Anne Armstrong seriously considered?

Spencer: No. I was going to get to that. Only by me. I see a stalemate and animosity developing, people had their favorite candidate. Ruckelshaus – there were people pushing Ruckelshaus. Teeter was there. He was pushing Ruckelshaus. At the stalemate point I says, “Mr. President, what are we screwing around for? Why don’t we just go with Nelson again?” The first guy that pops up is Nelson, “No, no, no,” and goes into his – of course, nobody there wanted Nelson to go again – “I don’t think.” Everyone else shut up. So Nelson bowed himself out very beautifully. Then I said, “Why don’t we take a hard look at Annie Armstrong?” Again, there’s a big blaaaaa – silence in the room. I give my pitch. My pitch is, “Hey, we’re thirty-two points behind today. What have you got to lose? Let’s swing for the fences.”

Smith: Do you think Walter Mondale had that same conversation a few years later?

Spencer: Yeah, I think so. That thing never got off the ground.

Smith: Howard Baker was supposedly a leading contender?

Spencer: Howard was a leading contender. What it really got down to, when you analyze it, and Howard was a leading contender, was I kept reminding him – you’ve got a problem in the farm states – we’re losing today – we’re losing Republican territory. That’s really what Dole’s strength was, and it was a good decision for that reason. Dole was given an assignment, he delivered. He’s taken a lot of heat for some reason, but he did everything he was asked to do and he delivered. All the states we were worried about, we got them. I attribute it to Bob Dole. It was the correct choice. He was flippant and things like that. He got in trouble at one debate, but who cares about a VP debate in the long haul? People don’t understand that. I’m surprised Biden didn’t get in bigger trouble than he did, because he’s flippant, too.

Smith: Was part of Baker’s appeal the thought that he could poach on the south? Was it a geographical…
Spencer: It was that in part, and part of it because his role in Watergate. He was the good guy Republican in Watergate. What’s the great statement he made when he was on that committee, he made a statement about…

Smith: “What did the president know and when did he know it?”

Spencer: Yeah, that’s correct. That was a nice little theme.

Smith: I heard, over the years, that the reason he didn’t get it was because of concern about Mrs. Baker’s drinking problem.

Spencer: Joy, yeah. Joy, yes, that’s correct. I knew Howard well, and I love Howard and that was a burden he carried too as a public official for a long time. But, ironically, she was Everett Dirksen’s daughter, and Everett had the same problem, but Everett knew how to handle it. He was a functional alcoholic is what he basically was.

Smith: Really?

Spencer: He gave a speech one night, biggest fundraiser, I forget what they call it – the Republican Party puts on in Washington every year – they still have it. It had to be prior to ’68 because Nelson Rockefeller had a table, Ronald Reagan had a table, all the heavyweights of the party were there. Everett was the main speaker. I was told by somebody, it might have been Howard, somebody said there was a reception in the Presidential Suite beforehand and – Dirksen had star power – I was assigned to keep track of Everett that night – makes sure he gets down there at the right time, the whole thing.

So I’m up in the room and everybody is having a belt or a drink, and Everett has – I wasn’t paying much attention, he always understood what the ground rules were. And he comes over to me because I’m in charge of him, he knows that, and he says, “On the podium, under the podium, a glass of (I can’t remember, either gin or vodka) I want it there where they put the water glass.” I said, “Yes, sir.” I get down there and I put one underneath there and we go down and all the preliminary speakers – I’m sitting there at the table in the front row – and I’m saying, “God I hope they don’t want a drink of water,” to myself, I hope they don’t do it – and none of them did.
And then Everett gets up there and he got a tremendous ovation after he was introduced, and it went on and on and on, and Nixon is over here and Reagan is over here. And as soon as the ovation finally dies down – I mean it was four or five minutes and while the ovation is going on he was _______________, and I’m going, “Holy Toledo.” And it’s over with and he leans over into the mic with that gruff voice of his and he says, “I accept the nomination.” I mean, it was classy. And then it was five more minutes and the Reagan table and Nixon table are kind of like, “What?” And then he proceeded to give a spellbinding oration, which he did and knocked off the whole glass.

I almost kept the glass as a memento – I was going to take it home and put it in my case - the Everett Dirksen glass. The point is, Everett had a drinking problem, too. It is a genetic thing, I’ve had it in my family. My father, real father was a falling down drunk Irishman, and the gene skipped me, thank God, but it caught others in my family.

Smith: You bring it up – did people drink a lot more in those days – in the political culture?

Spencer: Oh, yes. I started noticing that in the late ‘80s. The young people that you would bring in the campaigns – the guys and gals out of colleges that would migrate to Washington from all across the country - they were into wine, they were into pot, they were into that stuff. But their predecessors, my generation, we were into hard booze. We drank whiskey, we drank bourbon, we drank scotch, we drank gin, and of course everybody smoked. The kids were starting to get away from smoking, too. So, yeah, drinking was an ingrained part of the political culture.

Smith: Did it fuel some of the more eloquent oratory?

Spencer: Some it did. There were people like me – there were certain jobs in campaign where I would only hire a non-drinker.

Smith: Really? There was that story, and I don’t know if it’s true or not, I think Ehrlichman is the source - before the ’68 campaign when Nixon’s about to run, he wants to hire Ehrlichman and Ehrlichman has watched Nixon in action and says at some point, he’d be interested in doing it, but not unless Nixon can guarantee that he’ll control his drinking. Now that may be self-serving on Ehrlichman’s part, but it’s a….

Spencer: Well, no, that’s a problem. Probably the closest I ever got to Dick Nixon was when he was out of office between ’60 and ’68. He would work with our law firm – he started a law firm in LA called Adams, Duque, and Hazeltine and went to New York with the Rose firm, but he still came back and forth. Many of the times when he came to California, he’d call me up and say, “Come on over to the hotel, I want to talk.” Because he wanted to talk politics. Well, we’d sit there and drink and talk politics. He couldn’t handle it. He really got paranoid when he got three drinks in him. There are things I’m not even going to discuss that were said, but they were the result of drinking. He could not handle drink. So, if Ehrlichman said that, there’s fact, there’s reason to believe him.

Smith: Did he resent Eisenhower?

Spencer: Yes. He resented everybody. There was the paranoia there. Why would a guy have Butterfield go through the White House and take down every ex-president’s picture? That happened.

Smith: Really?

Spencer: Yeah. That’s resentment. I say that he was a Jekyll-Hyde guy. He was one of the better political thinkers of our time. He was one of the best tacticians of our time. In these conversations I would have with him, I mean he used to talk about timing, peaking, I mean there were things I hadn’t thought about that I thought about later. So, he had all that. I said to his face on occasion, “I don’t know why you’re a candidate. You ought to be a manager.”

1968 I get a phone call from him, a year out from the election maybe, he says, “I want you and Bill to run my campaign.” He’d gone through a group already and canned them. I think Haldeman had come. Haldeman had come over to see me, too, and he was with J Walter Thompson, I think, and basically, he made an offer to buy our firm – to bring it in. Bill, my partner and I talked about it. It was evident to us that they wanted to buy us now and then use us later. It was all part of Nixon’s concept. We said no. If the price had been right, we’d have said yes, naturally. But we said no.

So he called and he asked if we’d run his campaign. I said, well, we’ve got to think about this. “Well, I’m going to South America on a trip, when I get back we’ll talk about it.” So Bill and I talked it over and there were two factors involved, because we eventually said no to him. First one was, we knew that Nixon ran his own campaigns – we knew him.

Smith: Was that the problem with the ’60 campaign, for example – that he really ran it himself?

Spencer: Yeah, it was. The other thing was that we knew that our governor, Ronald Reagan, had stars in his eyes. It was ’68. And we had to do business in California, and his staff had already been giving us enough trouble on the business level, so we said no. So Nixon calls when he gets back and we go through the song and dance, and the first excuse I used was the Reagan excuse. But incidentally, that’s information Nixon wanted. That told him that this guy is serious. He was that way. But then, at the end, I said, “Besides that Dick, you run your own damn campaigns.” And he chuckles on the other end of the phone. “Yeah, you’ve got a point.” He ended up by saying, “Okay, but I want you to do something in the campaign.” I said, “Fine, wonderful. You’ll have your team put together, everything will be going great.”

So that was the end of it. Then after the convention I got a call from Bob Finch. He says, “What do you want to do in the campaign?” I says, “You got the team.” He says, “Nixon said to call you and ask you what you want.” I said, “Okay, pay us some money, we’ll do nothing.” Finch says, “No, you’ve got to do something.” So I became in charge of all the California fundraising guys – to help all the Nixon, Taft, Shrieker, and all those guys who were helping him to raise money. They paid me seven thousand dollars a month or something because Nixon was the political figure that kept his word.

Smith: Interesting.
Spencer: He didn’t have to. We didn’t expect it. I was shocked when Finch called. In fact, Finch was shocked. So anyway…I can’t say he had a drinking problem, he was just a guy that couldn’t handle liquor.

Smith: Did you spend much time around Nixon after his presidency?

Spencer: Yeah, not much. The first person, I’ve got the handwritten note some place in my office at home. After the Ford campaign, I came home either the end of November or the first of December. I called Nixon up in San Clemente and I says, “I want to come out and talk.” “Come on.” So I go down there. Three hours. I wanted his critique, because I respected his political, tactical judgment. This is all in light of me blasting him in February of that year for going to China, but I understood what he was doing, he understood what I was doing.

Smith: Is that the mark of a pro – that it was just business?

Spencer: Yeah, that sort of thing was business. He always considered me one of his because I grew up in his organization doing all the menial jobs – learning the business, so to speak, from Murray Chotiner and all those guys who were around him and were good. We went through three hours of critique. When we got through that he started being the political animal that he was. He started asking questions like, “What’s Bob Finch’s future?” or saying, “Let’s talk about the next governorship in California,” and he says to me at that time, “I think Pete Wilson will be one of the better candidates down the road.” Well Pete Wilson ended up being governor of the state of California.

Smith: And in fact, was one of Nixon’s candidates for ’96. I’ll tell you my story. At Pat Nixon’s funeral there were four eulogists. Improbably, one of them was Pete Wilson, who had been an advance man in the earlier campaigns, and one was Bob Dole. Nixon never did an uncalculated thing in his life. At Nixon’s funeral there were four eulogists. One of them was Pete Wilson, one was Bob Dole. I wrote Dole’s eulogy and to my dying day, I’ll be absolutely convinced Nixon knew, first of all, that Dole wouldn’t be able to get through that speech without breaking down – and that would be the best thing that could happen to Bob Dole. He was using his own funeral as a showcase for his political heirs for '96.

Spencer: Yeah. That sounds like him. Because those were some of his favorite people. Now Finch, he was always fun, he was like a son to him.

Smith: What happened to Finch?

Spencer: Because of the decisions he made of leaving the lieutenant governorship and going to HEW - he got into trouble at HEW – you talk about the drinking thing, Bob had sort of the same problem that Nixon did. He didn’t drink, but when he did he was gone. I went back to Washington when he was at HEW. He brought Jack Veneman, who was a shrewd, smart, California legislator as his deputy. Jack did the best he could, I know, to protect him. His secretary was Doris Jones who had been Pat Hillings, my congressman’s secretary and worked for Nixon in the VP spot, I think. An old pro gal, a protégé of Rose Woods. I’d go Finch, Doris would call and say, “You’ve got to talk to Bob,” so I knew there was a problem. So I showed up. It was a Saturday morning. When I walk in I notice there is a desk out front and Bob Mardian is sitting at it. I don’t know if you know the name Bob Mardian.

Smith: I know he had a Watergate connection.

Spencer: Yeah, but he was a Mitchell guy – from Phoenix. Originated in California, went over there. I never trusted Bob Mardian. He had his own agenda and in my political mind, I see Mardy in there, I know he’s not a Finch guy. I go into the office and I say, “Bob, what the hell is he doing out there?” Bob tells me and I say, “Get rid of him!” “What do you mean?” I said, “He’s a spy.”

That White House had the old crowd and the new crowd. The old crowd was Chotiner and Dent and Finch and the new crowd was Mitchell and Haldeman, and he had to make a decision on the side you were on. So Bob and I went down to lunch at the waterfront, there on the Potomac, one of those restaurants. Now here’s a guy that didn’t drink, really. We sit down and the girl comes over, she says, “You care for a drink?” Bob says, “Yeah, I’ll have a martini.” I kind of looked at him and I said to myself, “Okay, Bob is going to have one. I’ll have a martini.” I mean, we had four and Bob and I were grrrrrr, but the job was eating him up. He knew what I was saying about Mardian, but he wouldn’t admit to it. Plus he was in a job that a Republican can’t survive at. It was eating him up – it took a lot out of him.

When he came home he dinked around in politics, and did a lot of things. But you notice, none of the old crowd got trapped in Watergate? Nixon’s old crowd – Herb Klein, he didn’t get caught – they had to have inklings of what was going on and they sure as hell stayed away from it, but they were very loyal to the guy.

Smith: Let me ask you, the loyalty to Nixon. What was it in Richard Nixon that would inspire the kind of loyalty of a Rosemary Woods, and I’m sure others, people of character who apparently loved the guy? Was it the Dr. Hyde side of the Jekyll-Hyde, or what was it?

Spencer: Oh, I think that was part of it, and I can speak for myself to a degree. It was the recognition that he really was a talented guy in some ways, which might be, say, the Hyde side of him. But the other side could have very easily been, he was our vehicle to power. A selfish thing on their part and my part, in that, here we’ve got this young guy from California, my congressional district, and they all were starting to get connected with him back in those days. And then he’s elevated to the VP slot - he runs in ’46 and in ’52, in six years he’s VP?

At that point in time he’s thinking president, everybody thinking presidency around him and he’s our vehicle, he’s their vehicle. Any political animal that is interested in the process is always looking for vehicles. And we had one, and he was close to all of us because we’d been around him. He was different than Eisenhower, who really is the guy who got me interested in the process – his candidacy. I was excited about him like these young people were about Obama this time. I was that excited – we had that excitement about Eisenhower.

Smith: But in Eisenhower’s case, wasn’t it almost because he was above politics, in a way?
Spencer: Oh, yeah, and because he saved us in World War II. I registered in ’46, I voted for Harry Truman, I was a registered Democrat. I was going to East LA Junior College, which is in the middle of the barrio, very liberal college, and Cal State, which is a very liberal college, where we had on campus, five Communist Party organizers, quietly. We were all veterans. We’d all been in the service, most of us guys. Even the liberal guys had been in the service.

We took care of those guys. The faculty didn’t have to do it, we found ways as they made their moves for power within the student organizations. We’d take them out and take care of them. It was a great learning experience. That is where I came from. I was exposed to the liberal point of view, and also living in a household where my parents were Republicans, I was exposed to both points of view. But Eisenhower captured my imagination. That was where it started. Those are the things. And he knew how to take care of people. He took care of Finch – Finch got legal business. He took care of me in ’68. So all those things add up to the fact that would give people reasons to stay loyal to them. I think the loyalty of the old group, as I call it – you could sit down with Herb Klein, who’s in his nineties in San Diego right now, and he’d still be very loyal to Nixon.

Smith: How would they explain away Watergate?

Spencer: I don’t think they would. They would basically say, be disappointed – a mistake – blame it on the guys who replaced them. Which they could do legitimately. But even as they were being shoved out, I think a lot of them lost their lust for Nixon. But they were loyal and kept their mouths shut. A few of them sort of crossed the line. Ziegler was brought in by Klein and those guys and he went over to Haldeman. A couple of others, I don’t know who they were. The John Deans were never around – I don’t know where they came from.

Smith: By the way, I only heard Gerald Ford disparage two people. And the worst thing he could say about someone was, “He’s a bad man.”

Spencer: Yeah.

Smith: And the two people; one was John Dean, and the other was Gordon Liddy.
Spencer: Yeah. I’ve heard those speeches from him. Afterward when he was here in this office, in the last few years – that last time I saw him was about June or July of that year he passed away, which was two or three months before. He was on a walker and needed help and was over here at the residence. But prior to that, I spent a lot of time here just talking. He’d call me up and say, “Talk,” and we’d come over and we’d talk. And so I heard him say a lot of things. Have you read the DeFrank book? Of course, you have. Those are the things we were talking about. His pictures, his friends, his protégés, he was really upset with some of the things that were going on. I’d say to him, “Are you going to go public?” You know me – are you going to go public? He said, “No,” which was typical.

Smith: Now we’re talking about the current – the Bush presidency?

Spencer: Yeah, he was unhappy with Iraq. He was very unhappy with the deficit spending. He was in orbit! But yet, here were his guys, Rummy and Cheney, and a lot of people.

Smith: And Paul O’Neill must have been a particularly difficult case because of the circumstances under which he was forced out.

Spencer: Yeah. I’d hear about all that stuff and I never said anything. I’ve got to keep his confidence. DeFrank used to come out here to the desert twice a year to see the President. He had an affection for the President. They had affection for each other. Every time then, DeFrank would call me and he and I would go out to dinner. He wouldn’t tell me what they were talking about. I said, “What did you guys talk about?” Grrrr. So I sort of figured it out, because he kept coming regularly. Finally, one day, much prior, DeFrank told me on the phone, “I got to get out there and talk to him when his health was really bad.” Sort of the final chapter. I remember saying to DeFrank, “Well, it probably will be more candid than the others at this point in time.” It was. I didn’t realize there was a book being written.

Smith: That was my next question. Do you think Ford thought there might be a book being written?
Spencer: Sure he did. I think Ford knew it, I think Ford wanted it. And I wouldn’t be surprised if he said to DeFrank exactly what he says, “Write it when I’m gone.” I think that is probably a direct quote, because it was building up in him. He was the type of person that he was not going to pull the rug out from his protégés, but it bothered him. It really bothered him in terms of the country, the future and all of that. He wanted to be on the record, and that way he could be on the record without having any bother. Sure he knew it.

Smith: Let me go back to ’76. We’ve talked about New Hampshire, we talked about Florida, and then of course he won Illinois. Then you ran into North Carolina. What happened? Did you underestimate the Panama Canal Treaties for example as a hot button?

Spencer: I don’t think we underestimated it, but we also knew it was a tremendous problem, politically. What we ran into was, now we’re in Reagan’s strength. His strength was stronger than we thought. Jesse Helms did a fabulous job of organizing his state. We made some mistakes in message when we were there. My attitude was, we got away with our life in New Hampshire and Florida. We could have lost those states. So we were ahead of the game, and North Carolina proved to me that we were going to do nothing in the south. That was going to be Reagan’s stronghold, and so we had to adjust our plan and our strategies to the point of, how do we handle the Midwest states, how do we handle the farm states, how do we handle the west?

At that point in time, I would say it was apparent to me that we could start defining what our strengths were and what his strengths were. And we could start dealing to our strength, which is what I like to do. It was a wakeup call to Ford and the White House. It wasn’t that much of a wakeup call to me, because I knew it was coming. We got tromped. Probably the biggest single mistake I ever made in politics was Texas in that primary. Texas was a state where you had a large delegate, you had these congressional districts delegates, you had delegates in a lot of different divisions. It wasn’t a winner take all. I will admit that I was given some polling data that had to be erroneous as I look back on it at the time. But that is immaterial. I still made the decision. I put $800,000 into that primary state. Didn’t get one delegate!
Now I used to go to sleep at night thinking about that before it happened, say well, I’ve got to pick up congressional district, I’ve got to be able to get some here, and I’d go through the whole thing through my mind again. We didn’t win one. I should have written Texas off. I shouldn’t have spent $800,000 there.

Smith: Was fundraising a problem?

Spencer: No. It was early, but not later. There is no excuse for an incumbent president not to be able to raise money. David Packard was our first finance chairman and David was one of the sweetest guys I know. He was also chairman for me in the Flourney campaign years later, but David was a donor, not a raiser. He couldn’t ask for money. So it was a problem. We kind of moved him aside and brought in Max Fisher and Les Packer(?), I think, and they didn’t have any problem raising money.

But the great David Packard story, was the Florida Flourney governor’s race. He was my finance chairman, it was right after Watergate. I called David up one day and said, “David, I need $100,000 for TV by (this is Monday) next Thursday. Raise the dough.” On Wednesday, I wouldn’t get a call from nothing, I’d get a check for $100,000. He’d give it! He’d rather give $100,000 than raise $100,000! I just thought, man, I can’t believe this. But he was sweet, he was really sweet.

No, we didn’t have a fundraising problem. Reagan didn’t have any fundraising problems. Then of course, the general election was the first publicly financed presidential campaign and that was twenty-one million dollars. Look what they are spending now, but that was twenty-one million dollars and the ground rules were different. They’ve changed the law since then. The first law that they passed in publicly funding the presidential race created a situation where it discouraged volunteers.

Here’s the reason: if you went out in this state of California and opened a Ford headquarters, it was charged against my budget back in Washington. I had two headquarters in California, that’s all. One north and one south. I had better ways of spending money than put in a bunch of headquarters. That discourages volunteerism, that discourages involvement. Well they changed the law – it’s a play on words. It’s a party-building activity, they can spend it. Now they misinterpret it – the lawyers got hold of it and party-building activity can include TV expenditures and internet expenditures. They get around it. But it was a publicly financed campaign, and I think it was a prime example, historically. Historians who look at it, you could say the law of diminishing returns applies to political money. We had to, both sides, we had to figure out what was important and what wasn’t important and go accordingly. I think 70% of our budget was in media.

Smith: Were you surprised when Reagan announced Dick Schweiker as his candidate for vice president?

Spencer: Yes, I was surprised and chuckled – I was happy. I was very happy. It was so phony. Our guy in there was Drew Lewis in Pennsylvania. We knew Drew Lewis had a handle on it and that Schweiker couldn’t take it away from him, so we were happy.

Smith: Did they actually think that maybe they could put Lewis himself?

Spencer: Oh, they tried to flip everybody. Yeah, they tried Drew, but Drew was pretty a stable guy and, I don’t know what their thinking was. They did a lot of things that I couldn’t figure out what their thinking was, to be honest with you.

Smith: What are John Sears’ strengths and weaknesses as a campaign manager/strategist? And are those two different roles?

Spencer: What, strategist and manager? Well, they can be two different roles. I think John is not a manager. If any strength, it’s strategy. He didn’t like the details. Most campaigns I’ve seen John in, he’s hired people to take care of the details. He thinks academically strategy-wise. All you guys, historians, talking heads on TV that I listen to, I say, how many campaigns has that guy been in? That sort of stuff. I see a lot of analysts of little political background who have been in two campaigns. John had talent, John made friends with a lot of media and if you’re in that business of manager, it sort of gets back to the point – somewhere about ’76, somewhere in the mid-’70s, the media decided the process was more important than the ideas on issues.
All of us thought that being on the cover of magazines, I saw People Magazine and God, I couldn’t believe what was going on. John had made – he had to have been a good source for a lot of writers because they try to cultivate you when you’re in that role. They always treated him kindly. I think John strategically is a thinker, would be an academic thinker and there is nothing wrong with that. I was a street guy. I know some people used to say to me, “You’re a Republican manager, but you think like a Democrat.” I says, “It’s a plus.” So he wasn’t an organizer. And that’s hard to judge when people have that. I saw it happen.

When he took over the Reagan thing in early ’80 or ’79, or something, I was at a governors’ conference in the Carolinas and I was, of course, out of the Reagan act totally. I think Charlie Black was with him then, I’m not sure, but somewhere John says, “Let’s talk about Reagan tonight.” Okay. So we had dinner and we drank. I pontificated. I said, “I’m going to tell what you’ve got to do, John.” He listened. I says, “The first thing you’ve got to do is, you’ve got to get rid of that palace guard around him, or they are going to get you.” He’d already started at that point, I think. He’d dumped one person, it might have been Lyn, I can’t remember. But I said, “Let me tell you something, now. You’ve got to decide on which one you’re going to keep. Some body that when Reagan gets up in the morning, he sees a friendly face.” He didn’t take my counsel. He got them all. And then they got him later, right? That really bothered me, because that was good counsel and it was so, for someone who knew the situation as well as I did. If he’d kept Deaver, he’d never have had any problem. Not that Deaver could contribute that much politically, but he could have been the bridge, which he needed.

Smith: To the candidate as well as the candidate’s wife?

Spencer: Yeah, correct. Certainly. Hey, you can’t say Reagan without saying Nancy. It was the Ron and Nancy Show, and without her he’d never achieved what he achieved. Sure, she was a very big part of the picture. There’ve been other situations like that. When you’re in the management role you just have to recognize it. John never handled her very well, either. You got to sit and look her in the eye and back her down. She has no problem with you giving it to her, she’ll give it right back to you. If she sees fear, you’re dead. You’re dead!

Smith: My experience, which obviously is miniscule compared to yours, but we had a very good relationship when I was out there. It deteriorated when she found out I was going to Ford. I discovered on several occasions, sort of the flip side of what you said is, most people were so afraid of her, but if you could make her laugh, that showed you weren’t afraid.

I’ll never forget one night, it was a Friday night, cold, we were waiting out there for a forty-car motorcade bearing King Hussein, up to the Library for an award ceremony. She was a little miffed. It was late. She had the whole thing, the mink coat. So I just looked at her and I said, “Well, what becomes a legend most?” She sort of looked at me, and then she giggled. It was that moment when I realized that she was surrounded by people who were terrified of her, very few of whom related naturally, and she liked to laugh. I felt like I’d passed the test.

Spencer: You did. Two instances. One: in ’65, three months into the exploratory group, we used to meet two times a week at the house for hours talking. She was always there. He was in his chair. She was over on the ottoman thing, sitting there. Bill and I, one day we got through a three hour session, we’re going to the door and Nancy grabs me and pulls me aside. She looked at me and she said, “You know, I never want to play poker with you and Bill.” I looked at her and I said, “Why?” She said, “I can’t tell what you guys are thinking.” She’s sitting on that thing for three hours watching our body language, trying to figure us out. It was not premeditated.

Smith: But that also suggests a very active mind. To be blunt, she was a lot smarter than I think people credited her. And she was put in an impossible role of being his son of a bitch.

Spencer: Yup, but she enjoyed it. One time, when Rollins was chairman of the campaign in ’84 and the whole process of how Rollins got there is hysterical because they were trying to shut him out of the White House and we had a meeting. ________, me and Deaver and Baker, and talking about who it should be. I’m pushing Charlie Black and they’re pushing Rollins. Finally I realized why. They don’t want him running the White House. He’s a leak, he’s this, he’s all that. Finally we made a deal and I agreed to it.

In reality, we had hundreds of meetings that he wasn’t even in because he couldn’t handle it, or we couldn’t trust him. But one day, here he’s got the title of chairman of the campaign, and he doesn’t even know the Reagans. So I say, “I’m going to take you up to the residency and you’re going to meet Nancy and we’re going to talk, okay?” I call Nancy and I say, “Rollins and I are coming up.” She didn’t like Rollins. “Your chairman,” I told her. Grrrrr. So, we get up there, he sits on the couch. If you were ever at the residence, there was a couch along this window and the wing chairs out here – Nancy’s sitting in her chair here. Put him here. I’m sitting over here because I want to see all the faces.

Going up the little elevator, he’s got sweats coming off his face. I say, “Cool it man, cool it. If she smells fear, if she smells it, you’re going to get chewed up.” So, I wasn’t very much help. He sits there and he stumbles around, I look at her, she looks at me, and I think, “Here she goes.” She started bearing in on him. The guy was a basket case when he walked out of that residency. She was having fun, is what she was doing.

One thing about that woman, she really liked her parents, her stepfather Loyal. I never really knew Loyal. My only knowledge of Loyal was AMA was one of my clients and he was not very beloved in the AMA, that doctor thing that I didn’t pay much attention to that. But her mother, I just love Edie. I have never heard Nancy swear. Never. Might hear her say damn, something like that. Her mother was a stevedore, absolute lady after my own heart. I loved the lady. I could never figure out Nancy, never – I swear a lot and I notice my 54 year old daughter swearing a lot now – I don’t know where she’s heard it, you know? But Nancy, I never heard her swear.

Yet Edie, she always called him Ronnie – during that early stage when I saw her someplace she says, “I’m going to give you some names of some guys who will be giving money to Ronnie.” I said, “Fine.” She gives it to me. Five names. If you went to Wall Street, Forbes Magazine, they’d be big. So I call them up and I go through the song and dance and I get a check for a thousand, I get a fifteen hundred. She calls me up a couple of weeks later and said, “How you doing on the list?” I said, “Pretty good,” and she says, “Well, how much? Richard Norton – how much did he give?” I tell her, “Fifteen hundred.” “Well, that cheap son of a bitch.” I go through the list and blue, the room is blue! “I’ll take over!” I says, “Be my guest.” I get checks for ten grand, I get checks for fifteen grand. The same list! She was a beauty. I loved her.

Smith: Let me ask you about the convention.

Spencer: ’76?

Smith: In ’76. Going in, how confident were you?

Spencer: I was confident if we could avoid an ideological issue on the floor, an emotional issue.

Smith: And the rules change about forcing Ford to name a vice president. That didn’t qualify as an ideological issue?

Spencer: No, see that’s what makes me question the prior question you asked. And that is, if I was in the Reagan role at that point in time, where Sears and these guys were, I would have found an emotional issue to stampede the convention. I would have created one somehow. And when they came up with that procedural thing, I went, oh boy, that’s wonderful.

Smith: But, presumably they had tried - on the platform with détente - and you basically rolled over.

Spencer: That’s why we rolled over, because that would be their platform to do it. What’s the matter with going outside the realm of the convention and going public and attacking Henry Kissinger and raising an issue – they never even tried that on us.

Smith: Also, before I forget, because there was a period right around the Texas fiasco where I think Reagan actually took the lead in delegates, or at least it was a tossup. It was right about that time that Rockefeller basically delivered New York and Pennsylvania. Is that true?

Spencer: That’s true.

Smith: That is the ultimate good soldier.

Spencer: He was the good soldier. He delivered.

Smith: Do you know if Rumsfeld was at the convention? I tell you why I ask; Bill Seidman told me the story, and Bill is a straight-shooter.

Spencer: He’s a good guy.

Smith: He is a good guy. He was fond of Nelson. He told me, this is what Rockefeller told him, now who knows whether he was blowing smoke or what, but he said, at the time – right after delivering New York and Pennsylvania – he had the weekly luncheon with the president, and he said basically there was only one thing he wanted, and that was for Rumsfeld not to be at the convention. And that if Rumsfeld were at the convention, he couldn’t vouch for the loyalty of some delegates in New York and Pennsylvania. The reason being, at that point Rockefeller convinced himself that a) Rumsfeld was responsible for him being dumped, and b) Rumsfeld wanted to be on the ticket with Ford. Accurate or not, that’s where Rockefeller’s mind was at that point. I was told by someone, that Rumsfeld in fact was not at the convention. That he chose to have some elective surgery performed or something. But I’m wondering whether any of that rings a bell – whether it sounds plausible.

Spencer: Yeah, I don’t remember Rumsfeld being there. I don’t remember Rumsfeld being in a meeting of the vice presidential choice, which naturally he probably would have been. So I think you may be right. In terms of whether he wanted to be VP or not, I think that was a possibility. But I also know that when Nelson got into a conspiracy theory, he really got into it – I mean he got into it. So I don’t know about that. One Friday night he says to me, we’re talking about Nixon, and he says, “Well that trip to China and he and Pat brought back $200,000 worth of ivory and goodies and stuff like that,” and I says, “What the hell do you know about it?” “Oh, I’ve got my sources,” so I don’t know if that was true or not. He believed it.

Smith: Well, I can top that. He believed – Jack Stiles, who died in an auto accident?

Spencer: Yeah.

Smith: Nelson Rockefeller went to his grave believing that it was not an accident.

Spencer: Why? Stiles had no problems there. If Stiles had any problems, it would be with me.

Smith: He thought there was a conspiracy including Rumsfeld to defeat Ford in ’76.

Spencer: Oh, well….

Smith: It goes to the conspiracy mindset.

Spencer: Jack was at the top of a hill on an icy night, he drank too damn much and he couldn’t stop his car at the bottom and wrapped it around a tree. I knew Jack and he was a good guy. But he wasn’t important in the future of the whole thing. Rummy was principle in dumping him, yes. Whether Rummy wanted to be VP or not, it’s a possibility.

Smith: Remember, because at the same time, George Bush was deep-sixed at the CIA and it was thought to be the end of his political career, and who was it that Ford had looked at, but Bush and Rumsfeld….

Spencer: No, it could be fact, but Nelson might have carried it too far, is all I’m saying.

Smith: I’m also told that Rumsfeld was very good, he never left his fingerprints.

Spencer: Oh, that’s true. He was good at it. He was a very ambitious young guy and had some smarts. Had personality problems in my judgment for a politician. After he got out of office, he was on the board of RAND or something, and I used to get RAND’s annual report every year. I couldn’t understand it. Why does he keep sending me this junk for? Then there was a point in time where he - which year was it – ’96 or ’92 –

Smith: He was interested in ’88.
Spencer: Was it ’88?

Smith: ’88 – he was interested in running.

Spencer: Yeah, because I got the phone call from Cheney and he said that Rummy was interested in running and he was going to talk to me. Cheney wasn’t too happy with the idea in ’88. As close as they are and their loyalties and all that, he understands Don’s weaknesses. Yeah, that was ’88. I never did hear from him, thank God. I don’t think I ever talked to him about it. But the [’76] convention was tenuous at all times, the whole thing was tenuous, it was an eighteen month struggle.

Smith: Is it safe to say that Reagan enjoyed the [delegates’] emotional intensity? Where there is emotional intensity, it tended to be on Reagan’s side, whereas Ford had the organization, if you will?

Spencer: Sure, he enjoyed it. He thrived on it. It was part of his life, being center stage.

Smith: What was the story with Clarke Reed in Mississippi.

Spencer: I don’t know. Oh, God it was so convoluted.

Smith: Wasn’t Mississippi crucial?

Spencer: Oh, yeah. Well, it was crucial from the standpoint that it was so symbolic if we broke it. Not that the actual numbers were that important as it was the fact that we broke the pattern. We promised them something, I don’t even remember what the hell it was, to be honest with you. Some of these other guys you’re going to interview can probably tell you.

Smith: He has a reputation of being purchasable.

Spencer: Yeah, he was! Oh, yeah. And we bought him. What we paid, I don’t know. Because as I said yesterday, I think we sort of gave Dick the job of taking care of him. But boy he was hard to keep bought. You had to whip him around a little.

Smith: Were there moments in that convention when you thought this might be slipping away?
Spencer: No. I never had that feeling. Once we got by the platform, we knew what the platform was, we had a lot of people out there on top of delegates. Every delegate was assigned to somebody, and they were to keep in touch with them on like an hourly basis, so that we could get any feedback. I saw no attempt by the other side to start a ground wave of discontent. But I saw people crying as they were voting for Ford on the floor. I did.

Smith: His acceptance speech, which everyone said at the time was the best speech he’d ever given, in retrospect tends to be overshadowed by Reagan’s appearance. Apparently he had practiced, which also tells you that he knew he had to practice. You could level with him about his shortcomings as a speaker.

Spencer: Yes. The funniest thing that happened there, though, was after that. He picked Dole and he had an office set up in the Crown Plaza Hotel. Cheney and I appeared at seven or eight in the morning, right after the vice presidential thing was through. Everything was through. He brought Dole, his nominee, to the meeting, and he’s behind the desk. I’m here, Cheney, and Dole’s over here, and everybody’s out of gas but them. We worked harder than they worked. We really do.

So, anyway, we start talking about down the road in the future and this was not unusual. Cheney, Spencer, Ford got into a hell of an argument about something. We went after each other – all of us. And poor Dole, he’s sitting over there and isn’t saying a word. I looked over at him once and he had this funny look on his face. He had to be saying, “What am I getting into?” Then finally it got back to – he and Dole had made a decision, his first appearance out of the convention was going to be in Kansas – at that burg town.

Smith: Russell, Kansas.

Spencer: Russell, Kansas, and Dick and I said, “Hey, our advance guys have been strung out for six weeks, they’re tired, they’re beat up.” I kept saying, “The first event has got to be gangbusters, and we can’t guarantee you nothing in Russell, Kansas.” And Bob’s guaranteeing this and all that. So, the two principles make a decision – the two peons are arguing with him about it.
Ford got so mad he jumped from the desk and walked out that door and walked up and down the hallway.

I look at Dick and Dick looks at me, and Dole is just sitting there like this…and I get up and I go out the door. He’s going up and down and I say to Ford, “What’s your problem?” He says, “I’m the President of the United States. You guys aren’t the President of the United States. I’m going to make some decisions.” I says, “Anything you want.” I totally capitulated. I says, “If you want it, fine. But we ain’t going to guarantee you anything.” Okay, well, we did it. Poor advance guys.

Then I flew from there to Washington, Dick went with him to Russell. I didn’t go to Russell. Dick says the planes coming in Benton(?). It goes like this, he looked up, there are cars for fifty miles in every direction. Ford leans over, past Dick and says, “Hey, you guys, see what happened?” I’m back in DC doing something, getting ready for the general and Dick called me and said, “God, you’re not going to believe it.” But that was so funny. I often thought – I never asked Bob after that – what he was thinking. He had to be going, “Oh my God.”

Smith: You had a strategy session out in Vail, didn’t you?

Spencer: Yeah, in Vail. We had a strategy session to talk about everything, look at polling data.

Smith: John Connolly was on the periphery in some way, wasn’t he? What was his role supposed to be?

Spencer: I don’t know.

Smith: Deliver Texas?

Spencer: I don’t know. John was a great giver of advice. He was a great inside pol. I have this theory that there’s outside pols and inside pols, and he was one of them. But the big question there was picking a chairman because the Rogers Morton’s problem had come about, and there were several – I think John’s name was one of the potential names for chairman. But Cheney and I privately really thought that Baker could be the guy. We knew it was a risk, but I’d worked with him now for five or six months and he grew in the job, he was ambitious.

He had a real problem. I called him in Houston, he wasn’t in Vail with us. I said, “We’re talking about making you chairman. What’s your reaction?” He was a protégé of Rogers’. Rogers just got dumped. He says, “I can’t do that to Rogers.” I said, “I’ll take care of Rogers,” because I knew Rogers well. I said, “In the end Rogers will appreciate it.”

Well, Rogers’ wife called Jimmy and gave him hell. The world doesn’t know that. Jimmy doesn’t like problems, he doesn’t mind big problems, sort of like Reagan – he hates little problems – but also he undoubtedly had to see this as a great opportunity for his future. And he agreed to it. Rogers was great. He handled it well.

Smith: Before I forget, I want to ask you, in that acceptance speech, the President took everyone by surprise by challenging Jimmy Carter to debates. What was the origin of that idea?

Spencer: The origin of just about everything was we were thirty-one points down coming out of that convention. What could we do? You’ve always got to try to be on the offensive – how to get control of the agenda, so to speak, and the challenge was controlling the agenda. We were going to debate Mr. Carter, and not let them challenge us, or let third parties do it. Let’s be out front and do it. That was the origin of the whole thing. He did well at every debate except Frisco, and in some ways he didn’t do bad there, his stubbornness came forth.

Smith: Tell us about – real time. Where were you, who were you with, what happened?

Spencer: We were in this auditorium thing, I can’t remember. It’s a museum or something up there. He’s staying at a residence not too far away. We’d had a lot of rehearsals. They had a stage and it had wings off of it. I guess Carter must have had people in one wing and we were in the other wing. I’m sitting there and we’ve got TV sets so we can see the whole thing or we can go over there and look out and watch them in person. I always loved to watch them on the tube because that’s what the public was seeing and that’s where the judgment is going to be. So I’m sitting next to Brent Scowcroft and I’m listening to the whole debate and he’s going along, I think, doing fine. He gets to the question of Poland being dominated by Communist Russia, and Eastern Europe and Reagan gives him his answer. No registration in my head.

Smith: Carter gives him, you mean, Carter gives him his answer.

Spencer: No Ford gives his answer, yeah. And then the questioner, the guy who asks him the question, comes back and gives him a chance to clean it up. But the first time, to me, no problem. Then he goes back to clean it up and he goes through it and it’s still no problem. Brent’s right here, kind of a quiet guy. He says, “You’ve got a problem.” I said, “What do you mean, I’ve got a problem?” He says, “The Russians have got x number divisions in Poland.” I said, “So? How many in divisions, Brent?” He says, “Oh, 240,000 or something.” I said, “Holy Toledo, we’ve got a problem!” Like that! I guess I realized that I knew what his intent was, psychologically, emotionally, that they were not dominated people, but he wasn’t swift enough to pick it up and say, this is what I mean.

Smith: He’d been to Poland, and he’d seen these huge crowds, cheering him. If he had simply described that experience, it would have been a plus.

Spencer: That’s right. So what happened was, we left there and we knew already there was going to be a press flap. Cheney and I headed back to the residence. I walk in the door, I hear (in German accent) “Mr. President, you were wonderful tonight. Wonderful tonight.” You know what I’m talking about. Then walks in the hack, Spencer, and the staff, and they were saying, “You were shitty, we’ve got to straighten this one out.” He listens to his secretary of state, Henry. He’s not going to listen to these two guys. We pound on him. He gets mad. When he got mad the red started here and went straight up. You could see it. Henry was no help. There was a press conference held, which he was not at, which I forced Brent to go to, I think, and some other people. They staggered around the podium just getting onslaughted. It became the issue.
Smith: It played into the storyline that this is a nice guy, well meaning, but not on top of his job. That was the storyline, the narrative.

Spencer: It was obvious that it was on Cheney’s mind and on my mind and at breakfast we started in on them again. He brushed us off. He had all the overnights at the meeting – you could see what was happening, but he brushed us off. We got on a plane, we’re flying to LA. I really was concerned about the problem. I go back and talk to him alone. Piss him off, come back. Cheney goes back, talks to him alone; nothing.

Smith: Why was he so ‘W’?

Spencer: I don’t know, except his chief foreign policy adviser was saying he did a wonderful job. That’s the only thing I can think of. So, I said, “Okay, one more shot. We’ll go back together.” I think Dick and I went back together. I think the end result was, when we both walked out of there, we thought we were going to get fired. We really did. We’re over Santa Barbara in Air Force One and we thought we were going to canned, because his great last line was, “What do you want me to do, apologize?” and I said, “Yeah.” I made him mad. Well, we got a statement written finally, between there and wherever we were staying. He was going to speak at Verdugo Days in Glendale, which is an annual celebration, Spanish-type thing. We released that statement before he gave his speech in Glendale, but it was after the curve and it was meaningless. Some papers probably never even printed it. It wasn’t referred to. But the local knowledge you have to have in politics came out at that Verdugo thing, because I’m walking around the back of the auditorium where the press guys were and, Ford being a guy from Michigan, he’s going through his speech and he says, “It’s wonderful to be here today at Vertigo Days.” Well, Verdugo, it’s like La Joy-a, instead of La Hoy-a – and I hear it and I go ‘oof’ like this. Well, enough of the press room, at least they didn’t catch. They were as bad as him. It was a piece.

Smith: How important do you think that was? The conventional wisdom is, that it stopped your momentum dead.
Spencer: Yeah, it did. The only thing that did. We had momentum, it stopped our momentum for a while. It was important in that aspect, because we needed to keep that momentum, because the race ended up close. You can never say you won or lost usually on any given thing, but it’s contributing factors and that was a contributing factor, that’s all.

Smith: What about at the very end, the last weekend. There was the Lou Harris poll that showed you’d actually taken a one point lead. I don’t know what your own polls were showing, but there were some economic numbers that were released that at least suggested a pause in the recovery that you were out trumpeting. I’ve always thought that the combination at the very end, when people were confronted with the prospect, “Hey, he might really win, we might have another four years,” and then the sort of uncertainty stoked by the economic issue, at the very end, those came into play.

Spencer: Oh, they did. But you go out to any precinct in Ohio and you have a marginal voter who is trying to make his mind up in the last week of the campaign, and one of them will say, “Well, I’m going to go with Carter because of the Polish thing. I’m going to go with Carter because of the economy.” They’ll all have their different reasons. But I think the economy was more important than the Polish thing for the simple reason that historically, in this country, people have more confidence in a Democrat dealing with the economy than a Republican. They have more confidence in Republicans dealing with foreign affairs than they do Democrats. That has been a given and it was definitely a given in those days. So, when you get a little dipper in the economy and you’re a Republican, you’ve got a little bit of problems that you wouldn’t have if you were a Democrat. So, yeah, I think it was a factor. The hangover from Watergate was a factor. What post-election showed was that six percent of the Republicans didn’t vote for Ford because of Watergate. That’s pretty bad of those that voted. He was running in a tough time.

Smith: Could Reagan have made the difference?

Spencer: I don’t think so. No.

Smith: Do you think Ford thought he could have?
Spencer: He never felt that Reagan campaigned for him. And he’s right. That negotiation was awful. Of course I was excluded from it, by choice. But Deaver and Cheney, I guess did it.

Smith: What did it entail?

Spencer: I gave Cheney a laundry list. This is what I want from the son of a bitch. Right? Cheney was pretty good at that stuff, and he goes down there and got six appearances and bye-bye. But the thing that irritated me the most was that the premise, they kept saying, “Well, he’s going to be all over the country – he’s going to talk about the platform.” I said to Cheney, “Tell them to go to hell.” I said, “We don’t want him on the platform! We have ___________ on the platform.” But that was their out.

Smith: Do you think they were already looking at 1980?

Spencer: Sure. They had to be. It’s that nature of the beast. The Reaganau, I’ll call them for different reasons, think that if he could have won in ’76, he could not have beat Jimmy Carter in ’76 and I said to him, I would say to him later, “The luckiest thing that ever happened to you is you didn’t win the primary nomination because you’d have got your tail handed to you.” The logic is very simple.

Smith: Did he believe you?

Spencer: I think he might have. I think Nancy did. But he was a perennial optimist about everything. But it became very evident to me early on that the south was going to go for Jimmy Carter because he was their boy. And they wanted him. They wanted to prove a point. Now they proved their point, but they created a great opening for Reagan because they were so disappointed in Jimmy Carter after four years that they loved Ronald Reagan. So, how’s he going to win in ’76 when he can’t hold up the south and we’re in these industrial states, some of them Rockefeller-type states. Reagan couldn’t have carried those states. He couldn’t have carried Michigan, he couldn’t have carried those states.
And another interesting thing, people forget now, of course, but it was Jimmy Carter who brought the born-again’s into the political arena. Was that ever an issue in the campaign – the Fords were Episcopalians; they were more button-down in their religious views.

Externally, no. Internally, it was a battle. I saw it. The religious right was very quiet about it then – they were working it. I saw it and I was trying to counter it. I was lining up preachers and Catholic priests and I had a mass mailing nationwide to a list – one of Catholics that I got from a priest out of Chicago, and an Evangelical list I sent out. I was going after them, too, in a lot of different ways, quietly. Nobody knew what the hell I was doing. Even Baker didn’t know what I was doing. I had Nofziger do a piece for me and put it out. So, yeah, I recognized what was there, they never identified with Ford because of what he was. They had a better argument than we had to get to those people. But, you’re right, Jimmy Carter…Ham Jordan and those guys did a very good campaign. They did a great, good job. I was impressed, particularly with their primary operation. Jimmy’s 11% in the national polls in February, and they got the nomination – I mean they did a good job. They don’t get credit for what they did in my mind by political historians.

I’ve heard people say, just recently – Mark Shields, who you wouldn’t expect to hear this from, Mark Shields said the best campaign he’s ever seen, was Ford’s campaign in the fall of ’76. He talks about MacDougall and the media, in particular. Tell us about that whole aspect of it.

I either read or heard Mark say that, but, it was a good campaign. It was a tight campaign considering…some of the best campaigns I ever ran, and I’ll get to that, I lost. I think the effort that Bill and I made for Nelson Rockefeller in California was one of the best campaigns we ever ran. We got beat, but we were at 27% in the polls when we started. You’ve got to figure those things. MacDougall was an ad guy out of Boston, I think. He was brought in by Deardourff and Bailey. Deardourff came out of the Rockefeller organization. I don’t know where Bailey came out of, but he was basically a re-writer type, and I had confidence in them. Because I did, I think the president did. There were other people in the White House that didn’t. But that was my problem.
They brought MacDougall in to write a lot of stuff. He was a wild man, he was a crazy Boston Irish pol. I think he contributed greatly. I think their work was outstanding.

Smith: "I’m feeling good about America."

Spencer: Yeah, I thought it was very good. The only thing I’d say about MacDougall is, he wrote a book afterwards. I hate people that write books. People that make notes and memos while you’re working, and then they write the book. He wrote this book and I went through the roof. He got the word that I was going to kill him and so he calls me up and he’s all apologetic. He was nice, he was a smart guy, but I have a standard and that’s few, but I have some standards, and that was one of them. I don’t like people going out and writing books. Stories – outsiders – that’s fine, that’s their job. But insiders, he had no business writing books. But he did and nobody bought it, naturally, I’m sure, but insiders. In Mark’s experiences, he was very close in that campaign in terms of coverage. Democrat, really at heart, but it seemed to impress him.

Smith: Where were the debates inside the campaign about the strategy. Or was it, once the debate was decided, you basically all stuck to it – a strategy?

Spencer: There was some debate about the Rose Garden strategy. There was some about that. There were debates about schedules.

Smith: And was the south still thought to be in play?

Spencer: Some people still thought it was, but I didn’t, and I wouldn’t put it in play. See, the joys of my position in those things is that I’m going home. I don’t have to stay and fight the battle in the West Wing. So, I say it like I feel, because I don’t have to worry about that. There was a constant struggle over the speeches. He had a very poor speechwriting shop, headed by Bob Hartmann. His speeches were not good. We finally got to the point where every speech that was going to be given ahead, they were started a week out, we would be at speechwriter meetings. Then an initial meeting with the principle, the President, and then go back and finalize it. So, after a series of what we considered politically bad speeches, I went to Cheney and I say, “I’m going to start bootlegging speeches in here.” There were a lot of good speechwriters back then, I mean, I’d come to Richard Norton and I’d say, “I want you to do a speech on this and that.” Bailey was a good speechwriter – Doug. Well, Mr. Hartmann didn’t like that logic, so what happened was, Cheney and I made a decision. One of us would be at all the speechwriters meetings to make sure that it wasn’t too bad, at least.

There comes a speech for the Future Blue Birds or Future Housewives of America Convention in South Carolina, I think it was. My turn in the stool. I go to the meeting. It is CRAP! I sit there and I don’t say a word. I don’t say a word – but I say to myself, “I’m going to let him give this and I think I’ll win a point.”

So he does, he goes down and he gives this speech. I’m in the back of the room again, walking around, the press guys are all there. Anti-feminists, terrible speech, you little girls, blah, blah, you grow up to be good kitchen help – I mean, Goddamn it was awful. The press were going like, “What the hell’s he talking about?” I’m going (shrugs). Well, by the time we got back to the White House, first thing, Cheney looked at me, “Where were you in the meetings?” I says, “I was there.” He said, “What did you do?” I said, “Nothing.” He says, “Why?” I says, “I want to bring in outside help.” He says, “I think you’re going to get it.” And we start bootlegging speeches in. That’s how far I had to go to break the hold of the shop. Ohhh – that was a big, contentious thing, I was not very popular over there. To this day I’m probably not very popular.

Smith: What do you remember about election night?

Spencer: I don’t remember much. I started drinking. Nothing I could do.

Smith: On election morning, did you think he had a chance?

Spencer: Yeah, I thought it would be a close race. I didn’t feel really confident like I did in the other campaigns, but I thought we were in the game and by that point I am, believe it or not, so relaxed. One time in California I went on election day morning and took my annual physical from my doctor of a hundred years, and my blood pressure was normal and everything. His name was Stokesberry and he says, “I can’t believe you.” I says, “Hey, man, you don’t understand, I’m relieved that it’s over. I don’t care what happens today.’ And that’s basically always been my attitude. I’m just so glad it’s over with. That’s the night I was in the headquarters, I was drinking, I don’t know what happened. I didn’t go over to the White House.

Smith: How did Pearl Bailey and Joe Garagiola become spokesmen?

Spencer: Pearl became very close to Betty somehow. Joe, I saw Joe last spring at spring training and we talked.

Smith: How old is Joe?

Spencer: He’s my age, we’re the same age, 81-82. Just wrote another book. Two things, we had the Italian prime minister came for a White House dinner, I think it was the prime minister, or whatever they call them. And I made sure they put an Italiano list together. As Sinatra used to say to me “A Wop list.”
The Wop list and Joe was on it and Yogi was on it and Paterno was on it.

Well that was the first meeting and Joe was a very glib guy, and so later I convinced Ford because good friends of mine were running the Philadelphia Phillies. Dallas Green and Paul Owens, and Carpenter was a DuPont – owned the club. They were all good friends of mine and I used to spend a lot of time with them. They had the All Star game in Philly that year and I convinced the President that we’d all fly up for the All Star game. It was good politics, but it was also doing my friends.

I put on the plane Joe, Jim Murray, the old sports writer, there were a couple of other sports figures, and Joe was the entertainer for the President and they became good buddies and all that. In fact, Joe told me a funny story this spring when I saw him. He says, “Do you remember when we arrived?” What I’d done, I put Joe in the car with the President and they arrived in the front of the stadium and Bowie Kuhn, the commission of baseball, was standing there.
The door opens and out walks Joe Garagiola and Joe says, “You should have seen the face of Bowie Kuhn. What’s that bum doing here?” And then the President gets out. But that’s how they got there and I think he was there at the White House that night, wasn’t he?
Smith: He was.

Spencer: They had a lot of their friends. Parma was probably there. Leon was probably there. That was a connection. Pearl Bailey, she was around a lot, but it was through Betty.

Smith: But she was part of the last broadcast?

Spencer: Could have been.

Smith: It was on the plane, actually, on Air Force One. The President spoke and Pearl Bailey spoke and Joe Garagiola spoke.

Spencer: I don’t remember it.

Smith: I don’t want time to run out without asking you about, you mentioned ’80. His consideration of running in ’80. Tell us about that.

Spencer: There was always, by people you might call Ford people, whether he ran or not in 1980 – there was always talk and speculation that he might go seek it. He never really tipped his hand during all these things. Then you get down to, it’s the fall of 1979, I think it’s the early fall, and a lot of his friends in the east are calling him and encouraging him, some asking him, but a lot encouraging him. There was still this animosity toward Reagan, this belief that Reagan wasn’t a heavyweight – that Reagan couldn’t do it. This still persisted in the eastern establishment types. So he was getting those phone calls, people coming out and sitting here and talking to him and telling him, and I had a conversation with him early in that period. What I basically said, there are periods of opportunity, you’ve passed two of them – to get him prepared to do this. So you’ve got to make a decision. I don’t think he’d made a decision yet, otherwise our openings – things that have to get accomplished at this point in time, at this point in time and this point in time.

Smith: In organizational terms.

Spencer: Organizationally, although the whole thing. And Reagan was doing them all. I told him the window of opportunity was going to close, without saying do it or don’t do it. It was, “Hey, these are the facts, Mister.” He listened as I went through all this. So he called a meeting. Held it in his conference room over here, of which, you’ve probably got the list somewhere, I don’t know if you’ve got it.

The eastern crowd was here, Bailey was here, Deardourff was here, I think Jack was here, Marsh and Teeter and Cheney was here, I was here, I think Phil Buchen might have been here. People like that. These in the group really wanted him to run. I mean, they have him a pitch to run. Cheney shared my thoughts at the time. I put a damper in the meeting, I’m sure. I just said, “Hey, we missed too many opportunities to do it.” I was still the only one who said, “Hey, Ronald Reagan’s one tough candidate. He’s one of the best, you’re not running against a patsy. He basically today owns the party. To me, guys, this is not a realistic decision. It could be a suicide mission.” But I said, “It’s his decision to make.” He listens, he always listened and listened and listened and kept his own counsel, but I definitely left the meeting and Cheney and I had stayed overnight at the Racquet Club and then came over here and then he was flying out, I was driving back to Newport.

We left the meeting, we were convinced he wasn’t going to do it. I think it was two days later, 48 hours later, I get a phone call. “We’re going to have another meeting to talk about the presidency.” Barrett calls me. I said, “You’re nuts.” He says, “Yeah, he’s got another meeting. We can’t find Dick. Can you get him?” I says, “I’ll get him.” So I called Dick and he said, “I ain’t coming to another meeting. They know my position.” He was right. “I’m not flying back out there for another meeting.” He was not a Reagan guy at all, he never thought very highly of Reagan, Mr. Cheney didn’t. The second meeting was held. I don’t know what transpired, but I think Betty got in the act. I could smell it. By the time he went home and Betty said, “I ain’t going to do it.” It was pretty much pronouncement at that second meeting that, “I’m not going to do it.”

Smith: She had just come off the intervention, and had a whole new life out here.

Spencer: Oh, yeah. Whole new world. I don’t know what she said to him - she said something and that was the end of that game.
Smith: Did the meeting take place? The second meeting? You attended a second meeting, but the tone was different?

Spencer: Yeah, the tone was different, the crowd was different. That’s when I said Betty got in the act.

Smith: It would have made no sense, would it – for him to run in ’80?

Spencer: No. It only would have made sense if on January 1, ’77, he would have said, “I think I’m going to do it,” and gone out there and started working his butt off. Then it might have worked. But no, he wanted to make the money – you couldn’t have them both.

Smith: They enjoyed their new lives out here.

Spencer: Sure they did.

Smith: You saw them, obviously, a number of times over the years?

Spencer: Here? Oh I saw them all the time. I was close. I moved out here basically right after he got out of office and we played a lot of golf, he was very active and involved all that period of time. He had phone calls from everybody, and he wanted to talk politics. He wanted to talk, and he trusted me. I was a great guy to talk to. We enjoyed each others’ company. We weren’t social. I only went out to dinner with the Fords about twice in my life, when they came out here and she was still drinking and they were disaster nights. We’re all drunk.

Smith: This was before the intervention?

Spencer: Oh yeah, I think Betty worried about me for a while, after she went into the intervention – by some of the things she said. Yeah, I saw him all the time. We played golf, I was sort of the middle person for a lot of people – like press people who wanted to talk to him. Not that they couldn’t call here. Like Brokaw, I’d say, “Okay, we’ll play golf, you and I and the President, and you can talk to him while at lunch.” He loved that. We played golf and then we’d have lunch at Morningside, and Brokaw and the President would sit there and go at whatever they wanted to go at.

Smith: He liked reporters, didn’t he?
Spencer: Yeah. He loved DeFrank, he really did. He liked Jimmy Naughton. When we pulled tricks on people like the DeFrank thing and Peoria, we put the sheep in his room one night. We got so sick and tired of hearing about Texas A&M, his college. Ford was part of the conspiracy. He got in the act. Naw, he liked reporters. I never heard him put off any reporter.

Smith: Who did he dislike?

Spencer: In terms of people?

Smith: Yeah.

Spencer: Well, there was a period of time that he disliked Carter. That was the most shocking thing in my life. I’m saying to him, I said, “Who’s your new buddy?” He didn’t like Carter.

Smith: How much of that, I wonder, was grounded in the fact that they both ran against Reagan?

Spencer: Some of it, yeah. And I guess it all came to fruition on that flight to Egypt which they were all three on, as I recall. Reagan is over in his seat.

Smith: No, it was Nixon, Ford, and Carter.

Spencer: Yeah, that’s what kind of – Nixon was playing the independent. They became very close. I never let them forget it. I don’t Barrett let him forget it either. I know a lot of other press people, they’d linger through here and they’d usually call me after or before, and I’d see them. A lot of substantial people.

He became very involved in the community here, in the philanthropic things, the church over there up by me on 74, the Episcopal church. Of course Betty’s program here was a big part of the valley.

Smith: He was so proud of what she was doing over there.

Spencer: Right, he was.

Smith: They had their annual alumni event, and there were stories that you’d see him cooking hot dogs and that kind of involvement.
Spencer: He was very happy. There is quite a little social structure here, because there is so much wealth here in the winter season and he was a star attraction for the dinner party – the event.

Smith: And he knew that.

Spencer: Oh, sure he knew it. I used to needle him about it. I used to have fun with him. He’d just laugh and say, “You’re jealous.” “I’m jealous, yeah. I’m jealous about those bums.”

Smith: Did he hold a grudge?

Spencer: Yeah, he could hold a grudge. But there’re degrees of grudges. I could really hold a grudge if I wanted to. He couldn’t hold a grudge like I could. He was softer at it. He believed in people. He was a supreme optimist, he really was. I’ve always said, good candidates have to believe in miracles. He did.

Smith: Did he dwell much on the past? Did he talk about it? Or was it really here and now?

Spencer: He thought of forward. He’d go through a short period of grieving and then go on about his business in the world. He didn’t hold on to things. He felt good about himself. It was evident. He felt confident in who he was.

Smith: He had a pretty extraordinary life.

Spencer: He had an extraordinary life. He didn’t have any hang-ups, he didn’t have any paranoia’s.

Smith: He and Mrs. Ford, together, were increasingly, in some ways, marooned in the Republican Party. They were outspokenly pro-choice, they said nice things about gay rights, at a time when the party was going this way – I don’t know whether he moved to the left, or whether he just stayed where he was and the party moved to the right.

Spencer: Reagan had a great quote that’s apropos to this. He changed his registration in 1960 or ’62, from Democrat to Republican. And his premise at the time went asked was simply, “The party left me, I didn’t leave the party.” Well, that’s exactly what happened to Ford and a lot of other people. I could say it with great comfort today, the party has left me, I haven’t left the party. This is not the party I grew up in or worked in.

Smith: Including Reagan’s party.

Spencer: Yeah – ah, Reagan may have shared some of these social network concepts, but he wasn’t going to talk about it, they were private matters and he wasn’t going to hold it against you if you were on the other side. He and I disagreed on abortion, we disagreed on a lot of things, but, okay, fine. So be it. I’m not going to make a national issue out of it.

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the amount of reaction to Ford’s death. I was wearing two hats, I was with ABC for the first half of the week and then I was with the family. I can tell you, from within the media cocoon, people were surprised, especially as the week went by. And of course, eventually they went to Grand Rapids. There were surprised because this guy had been out of the public eye, and as far as they were concerned, hadn’t really been a player for a long time. And my theory was, there was a whole generation that didn’t remember Watergate, but were being introduced to him for the first time through these old clips. What they saw, compared with what he have today looked pretty good.

Spencer: Yeah, I think that’s true, and they also kept in the limelight, and Betty’s work was a plus for him. But, in some ways, he was still a quantity and he had a fatherly, grandfatherly image that young people can adapt to. The press never hurt him. The press was always good to him. I think the country was looking for something to rally around. Bush was in trouble and here was this grandfatherly guy that had gone through Watergate, tried to straighten it out, and it was something to rally to. I was at the church over here. I did the thing out here. I didn’t go back there. This valley really rallied around him. We’ve still got billboards around here, “Thank you, Gerald Ford.” There up on the damn 10 freeway. There’s one right there today. First time I saw it I thought, “What?”

Smith: I was surprised, when I saw later the numbers of people. I had been part of the group that was planning the funeral and we worked for two years. I said, “Oh you don’t want to have another leg.” They were proposing California. “It’s too much.” But, 57,000 people, overnight, went through that church.

Spencer: The only thing I saw – it ran ten days, didn’t it?

Smith: Six, partly because of January – because of New Year’s Day added a day.

Spencer: All of a sudden I thought, “Jesus, this is going on too long, come on.” But everything was great. I don’t know why, but I just wasn’t surprised at the reaction.

Smith: Do you think he would have been pleased?

Spencer: Oh! Yes. He would be happy, happy, happy.

Smith: Last question: if you were telling someone who had never known him. He’s just a name in a textbook or clipping or something. What do people need to know about Gerald Ford and/or is there something surprising about Ford that most people don’t know?

Spencer: I’d have to say to you, he was a very decent human being, first. Everything he did, he did with integrity. He had a belief system and he lived by his belief system, which is a very positive thing, I think, for a public figure. The thing they don’t know, the thing that I think they never understood was that he had an intellect and he had some brains. He wasn’t the dumbo that fell down the stairs. He was one of the best athletes that ever sat in that chair. He had bad knees. He had smarts. He had intellectual capability. He could analyze. He totally shocked me, and an example of that, he totally shocked me in 1976 when he took the budget and stood up there without a note and went through the whole thing like a diagram. I couldn’t believe it! The guy knew the budget!

Smith: The federal budget.

Spencer: Yeah, the federal budget! He knew where it was coming from, where it was going, what the numbers were. That took some intellect, in my mind. He never got recognition for that side of him. The mis-service that the media did to him, particularly the visual media, was the guy that played ball without the helmet and fell down the stairs. And that became very ingrained in America – there’s no doubt about that. That would be the thing I think I would say to America – that they should really understand this guy had some brains and he had some intellect. Not excessive, but much better than the average. Much better than some other people I’ve known in that job. Let’s put it that way.

Smith:  Was television not his friend?

Spencer:  Television was not his friend at all. No. He tried to be a politician orator in the William Jennings Bryan sense. If I can yell louder and scream louder and pound enough things louder, I’m going to get my point across. He wasn’t. He was not an electronic candidate.

Smith:  Do you think he envied Reagan his gifts?

Spencer:  Sure he did. I think everybody in public life envied Reagan. They had to, the guy was so good. Sure, he envied him, but that just was not a good relationship for a lot of reasons. There are relationships in life that get off on the wrong foot, and they’re really not that far apart, but they never change. I have a relationship with Bush, Sr. that way. The situation started twenty years before, but something always happened like, he’s chairman of the party, Watergate’s going on, I’m running a governor’s race here. The White House says to him, I think we’re going to have seven fundraisers around America, the president’s going to be on a big screen, blah blah blah – one of the site’s California, LA.

So I get a call from Bush’s guy and I said, “I don’t want it.” But Bush wants it. I said, “I don’t give a Goddamn what Bush wants, I don’t want it.” So, all hell breaks loose. Finally I end up telling Bush, “Go ahead and have it. The Republican gubernatorial candidate is going to be in Eureka that night.” My premise was simply, every morning I woke up something new was happening in Watergate. I didn’t know what else was going to happen. So what happens a few weeks later? Butterfield comes out and finds the tapes and another shoe dropped. They cancelled the ball, right? But I was defiant of the chairman.
Only representing my client, that’s all.
So that started it. Then I’m running the Clements campaign in Texas. I bring Connolly, Tower, Annie Armstrong, and Bush to a hotel - going to have the cameras, I’ve got them scripted, we’re going to shoot commercial spots, endorsement spots of Bill Clements. Connolly and Tower are pros, they click it off. Annie did a good job. George screws the first one up, he screws the second one up. I won’t let him leave the room until he gets it right. I really pissed him off. Really. He’s going out of here grumbling about that son of a bitch Spencer. I heard it! But I had my job to do and I did it. Then he goes to the White House, sort of the same thing. Every time something happened.

Smith: I always said, George Bush, ’41, would have made a great secretary of state in 1949. He really was much more, in some ways, attuned to that sort of establishment appointive position.

Spencer: He was. But I didn’t dislike him. I brokered the Reagan/Bush thing when they made the handoff, ‘cause that was some bad blood there, staff-wise. I did a lot of things for him. I never got any credit.

Smith: One last thing: the Ford vice presidency boomlet in 1980 – where did it start? One senses Kissinger was negotiating, Greenspan was negotiating.

Spencer: It was started by the Ford people. They wanted back into the game. I stayed away from it. The other thing for Bush, and I don’t know what Reagan’s process was, but when I came back aboard before the convention, the Reagan campaign – they brought me in and they asked me to fly back to Detroit with them to the convention. This was the first time he and I had been together in years. He’s very gracious and he started talking about the primary and all that. And he spent twenty minutes really mad at George Bush. Voodoo economics, blah, blah, everything was said about him. I’m not saying anything, I’m listening.

Finally, I said, “Hey, that’s what campaigns are about. You got to forget that stuff, it’s over with.” So we went into another subject and he turned to me and he said, “What do you think about the VP thing?” I said, “Well, politically, it’s obvious to me that you’ve got to pick someone who is perceived as moderate because we’re going to a convention that’s written a platform that’s really right wing. The guy that fits the bill is George Bush.” He said, “You haven’t been listening to me have you?” You’ve been dumping all over George Bush. I said, “I’ve been listening to you, but politically, you’ve got to pick George Bush.” He said, “Whoaaaa.” That’s how he was. Then we got on another subject. We get back there and then all this other crap breaks loose. And I know it’s not going anywhere. It’s just not going anywhere.

Smith: Is it just a great media story?

Spencer: Yeah. Betty would have divorced him. Let’s be honest. I go down in that damn hotel, you could never get down in the elevator, and there’s Baker sitting over there. He’s got his bags and stuff and it’s before the last night the decisions are made and all that. I said, “Where you going Jimmy?” He said, “I’m going back to Houston.” I said, “I’d stick around if I were you.” He said, “What do you mean?” I said, “I’d just stick around if I were you.” Brokaw calls me in my room that night, and see, Rather’s gone with the story. I said, “Brokaw, I’m going to give you a piece of advice. I wouldn’t touch it.” “Well, what do you know?” I said, “I don’t know nothing, but I’m just telling you.”

Today he thanks me for giving him that piece of advice. And it went away. I got a phone call from Reagan, I wouldn’t even go up to the rooms. I wasn’t up there. I’m in my room, I’m hiding, actually, from everybody. He says, “You still feel the same way about the VP thing.” I said, “I haven’t seen a thing happen here that changes my mind.” He says, “Thank you.” Hung up. I’m sure he talked to other people, too. And I’m sure other people were taking my position. I certainly hope so. He made the right decision. They got along great. Bush was in total awe of that man, unbelievable awe. To this day something will happen. I feel sorry for George, Sr. His son’s eight years is such a debacle. I feel sorry for the man. I’m talking to Baker the other day, and I said, “I really feel sorry for George, Sr.” I said, “Why don’t you tell him.” He said, “I don’t think I would. He wouldn’t take it well coming from you.” I said, “You mean he wouldn’t have a sense of humor, huh?”

Smith: Perfect, that’s perfect. That was great.

Smith: We’re basically at that point where it’s now a four ring circus. We’re still doing interviews; we’re sending interviews out to interviewees to review; we’re now reminding people who have had those for three or four or five or six months; getting them back and incorporating their changes and indexing them; and then sending them on to Grand Rapids. Right now Grand Rapids has about fifty-five that are done.

Susan Bales: That are signed off?

Smith: That are signed off, which is actually pretty good. The frustrating part of this is getting them back from people.

Susan Bales: Yeah, I understand.

Smith: We’ve got about forty that are out there now. Just this week I’ve sent out twenty reminders, along with a copy of the original transcript and a handwritten note and all that kind of thing. It’s that overlap that will take this to the end of the year, but we’re planning on finishing the interviews by the first part of October.

Susan Bales: I bet it’s been fascinating. Did you learn anything that you didn’t know?

Smith: Oh, we’ve learned a lot.

Susan Bales: Oh, okay. So it’s not boring?

Smith: Oh, God, no, particularly parts of your dad’s life. Obviously both of your parents, but much of the focus is on your dad. The post-White House years – not surprisingly just because of the age of the people we’ve talked to and all that – the sheer, not only volume of activity, but the seriousness with which he took it. And the contributions that he made; so much of it was off the radar screen and so much of it reflects back on the kind of person he was and how seriously he took all of those things. But also the humor; him going to the movies and coming back and telling Penny and all the gals, they’d like it, it was a chick flick. Which is not a phrase you’d think as automatically rolling off his tongue.

Susan Bales: Did they talk about him going to In and Out Burger?

Smith: Oh, yes.

Susan Bales: Going through the drive-thru.

Smith: In fact, the last time the Eisenhower Medical Center – it was just a great story. But there are so many…

Susan Bales: Lorraine Ornelas.

Smith: Lorraine’s story is very poignant.

Susan Bales: Oh, Lorraine.

Smith: And she told it so well. She was a nervous wreck getting on the plane the first time or going down the ski slope.

Susan Bales: Right.

Smith: But she was wonderful.

Susan Bales: And he was a huge father-figure to her.

Smith: She made that very clear. She learned all about self-discipline and having a purpose. And it was very, very clear it was a very special relationship.

Susan Bales: Yeah, it really was.

Smith: There is obviously a dwindling number of folks; we tried to go first after members of the Cabinet, but also people who had been in Congress with him. We talked to John Dingell on Thursday. Had a wonderful interview with Mike Wagner on Monday, and he told us at the very end, he said, “Let me tell you a story that I don’t think anyone knows. It was about a Navy Ensign we’ll call Shirley. Anyway, her parents were from West Michigan. Post 9/11 and post-Homeland Security Department setup, basically Secret Service was given a new coordinating responsibility for state funerals - to basically pull together all the pieces. They gave an agency assignment to the woman and it turned out her parents were from West Michigan and she was an infant at the time. Her father was a disabled veteran, I think from the Korean War, and the government screwed up, he wasn’t getting his checks and it got to the point where they were literally facing eviction from their home. In desperation they called their congressman. Well, one thing led to another and he took care of it. They saved their house and fifty years later she says, “Now I can repay the favor.”

Susan Bales: Wow.

Smith: You’d be amazed at how many of these interviews are studded with those kinds of stories.

Susan Bales: For instance and you might check with Donna and Joe Calvaruso, there was a gal that I met at the museum who was one of Vietnam refugee babies who came to the wreath laying. I didn’t realize it when I met her; I realized it later.

Smith: One of the really extraordinary moments of my life was the day when he came back and we dedicated the Saigon stairway, and there were probably five hundred members of Vietnamese community from West Michigan. It was bittersweet.

Erik: Remember the little guy who came up to President Ford with tears in his eyes and said, “Mr. President, I wouldn’t be here right now if it wasn’t for you. I would be dead right now.” And hugged him.

Susan Bales: And that is something that Tyne did not know about, and I have passed some of this on to her and she’s like, “Wow” - because she wasn’t born.

Erik: She says, “This is neat, this is Grandpa.”

Smith: Let me ask you first of all about your grandmother. One senses that’s she’s a really pivotal figure in this whole story.

Susan Bales: Miss DAR, there she is.

Smith: Tell us about Dorothy Ford.
Susan Bales: Well, first of all, I was like ten or eleven when she died, so I have some memories but they are a little bit fuzzy. My cousins would have - Lori and Linda and Julie. But I always remember we spent several days with Grandma before we would go to camp because Steve went to Leelanau – all the boys went to Camp Leelanau.

Smith: And that was where?

Susan Bales: Traverse City. And so always we would go back and the kids spent the whole month of July in camp, and then we spent the month of August at the cottage. The cottage does still exist. Actually, I took my girls and Joy back two summers ago.

Smith: That is also in Traverse City?

Susan Bales: No, it's in Holland – Ottawa Beach. And we went and knocked on the door and the woman let us in the cottage, which was phenomenal because as a child, you have these memories of “The Cottage,” but then to see the cottage...So anyway, usually Mother would go with us. Sometimes Mother wouldn’t go with us, and Aunt Janet would then take us to camp. The thing you were always told is, don’t let Grandma drive you. Grandma was not known for her driving skills and she had really bad eyesight and really bad cataracts. So you were always told never to get in the car with Grandma. She was a very strong woman, she was very direct – in a sense she was like Dad. I mean, it was pretty black and white, not a lot of grey. She was very transparent, very truthful, told you what she felt.

My mother tells stories about – my mother – here she finally gets a girl after three boys and my mother goes and cuts my hair into this really short pixie haircut and it looks horrible. So Mother puts a bonnet on me to take me to Michigan to see Grandma, and Grandma takes the bonnet off my hair and there’s this really short haircut. I guess Grandma Ford let my mother know how she felt. “You finally got a girl and you cut all of her hair off...” and that sort of thing. I would not say Grandma and I are the same kind of grandmothers. I’m a really warm, fuzzy grandmother. Not that she wasn’t warm and fuzzy. I would say I was one of her favorites. I was the last girl grandchild to be born. There was only one other grandchild after me, which was Greg. I have her four-poster bed that Grandpa slept in that President Eisenhower slept in. She gave that to me and I still have it. I will probably give it to my granddaughter. She was an active woman. She had to be tough, she had four boys. Think about it; four boys is a handful.

Smith: The famous story is, of course, that she died in church and they went home and found her appointment book filled for several weeks in advance.

Susan Bales: Oh, yeah. She was a very busy woman and she played cards and did all that stuff. But she was very direct. She never stayed with us; she stayed in a hotel. She stopped by and would spend several hours with the children, and then she would leave. I don’t remember her ever getting in there and getting her hands dirty, but I’m not sure grandmothers did that then. Let’s think about the time, it’s a very different generational thing.

Smith: Was there ever any talk – or is it one of those things all families have that you sort of knew existed, but you didn’t talk about – about her first marriage, about the circumstances surrounding your dad’s birth and all of that? What she went through? It clearly had to have stamped him in some ways.

Susan Bales: Do you know, actually I never knew about it until I was probably sixteen years old. It was just not something talked about. And I think part of it was to me, and I mean a rude awakening when they referred to Uncle Tom and Uncle Dick and Uncle Jim as half brothers; and I went, “No they are not. Those are my uncles.” Biologically, you are calling them half, but I don’t know the King family, I’ve never heard of the King family, and I don’t want to say Dad hid it; it was just not talked about. And I actually never understood the whole circumstance until I sat down and read Jim Cannon’s book that goes into such great depth about how it happened. And then at some point, I went to Omaha, Nebraska and I saw his birthplace. So Dad talked about being from Omaha, he just never talked about being from Omaha and as a King.

Smith: Did you ever have that conversation later?

Susan Bales: He talked about it – the parts…
Smith: One sensed at least in public he got more comfortable - it says something for his own capacity to evolve that he was maybe a little bit more comfortable talking about the idea of the broken family and all that.

Susan Bales: What he talked about more was when he was cooking hamburgers at the hamburger stand in high school and this man coming up to him and saying, “I’m your father.” That was a very difficult – that’s the story that maybe we talked about the most of. “Gee, Dad. How did you handle that? That must have been really difficult.” And then going and spending a summer with him and then also how - I think he was extremely proud – proud in a different way – that he was able to throw his father in jail so that his mother got the money. I don’t want to say that he was momma’s boy, but he was the first son, he was the oldest son, he was productive, he was on his own, and he was protecting his mother.

Smith: Well, just a sense of justice, as well. Let’s face it; it was the father who had…

Susan Bales: Had beaten his mother. But, you know what? We just never really thought about it. Occasionally, we would get letters at the White House from Kings saying, “We’re related.” And I don’t want to say we brushed them off, but to us they are not our family.

Smith: Understood. Did you talk about your mother’s first marriage?

Susan Bales: I always knew about that. That was never something – it was discussed – not a lot, and we knew the circumstances to it and all of that, but that was not hidden, whatsoever. And I know she was glad she never had any children with Bill, because that, of course, makes it far more complicated. I have to say, also, when I got a divorce, she was far more understanding because she knew what it was like.

Smith: Interesting. And then again there was this sort of mysterious circumstances surrounding her own father’s death.

Susan Bales: Alcoholism.

Smith: And she sort of alluded that suicide was considered a possibility. Was there a sense within the family that was the probable motive?
Susan Bales: Yes. I would definitely say that’s for sure. And I think now that Mother is open and honest about her alcoholism and addiction and that sort of thing, her father was an alcoholic – there’s a very strong genetic link in that family, or that side of the family for alcoholism. Now when you go back and look at it, there is without question.

Smith: I don’t mean to dwell on it, but it seems a little bit like a black hole in the story. That must have been an incredibly traumatic experience for her.

Susan Bales: Yeah, I think probably because of her age more than anything. She was what – fifteen, sixteen years old? And you’re father dies and you just go, “Oh my gosh.” She never has really talked to me about what kind of influence her father had on her or how close. She was very close to her mother. And maybe the boys were closer to their dad, I don’t know.

Smith: How many brothers did she have?

Susan Bales: She had two brothers. She was raised with brothers; I was raised with brothers. The male gene is pretty strong on both sides of the family. But it also tells you – the stories that I’ve heard about her mother, because of course, I never met her mother. She was dead before any of us children were born. She was a very strong-willed woman, too, in what I’ve read about her. I mean, she was a tough cookie.

Smith: And one senses that she certainly – indulged isn’t the right word – but your mother wanted to follow an somewhat unconventional career path, and at the very least, her mother was willing to bargain with her to give her an opportunity to show what she could do.

Susan Bales: Right.

Smith: Certainly she wasn’t suppressing her.

Susan Bales: No. But just to live through – and I think Grandma Ford and Grandma Hortense, they all lived through the Depression. You look at what they lived through, and they made some pretty strong women out of that whole thing. And I think it says a lot.
Smith: It’s easy to apply a generational element to this, but it makes sense. Do you think that makes a significant factor in your dad’s shall we say, fiscal conservatism.

Susan Bales: Oh, please – yes.

Smith: Your dad was…and it never changed.

Susan Bales: No. That I would have to say – I remember we all were told if you left lights on in your room, “What do you think – you own stock in the electric company?” How many kids have not heard that line from their parents? “Would you turn off your lights…”

Smith: Let me make it clear: it was him, not her?

Susan Bales: Oh, no. It was him saying that. I don’t want to say Mother was frivolous, but her purse strings were much looser than his. So he would get after you for leaving lights on, leaving water running or dripping, all of those things – when he was home, which was a little bit rare, too. But when he was home, he was after you for that.

Smith: Did he tell stories about his youthful privation, for lack of a better word?

Susan Bales: No.

Smith: He didn’t?

Susan Bales: No.

Smith: That’s interesting.

Susan Bales: Didn’t talk about that. But he did not believe in a mortgage. So when you bought your first house, and you would say, “But Dad, that’s the only tax write off you can get. You don’t want to have any debt.” Well, to him, credit cards were useless because you pay for everything in cash, you weren’t to have a mortgage and to him you were to pay that mortgage off as fast as you possibly could.

Smith: It’s almost a sign of character.
Susan Bales: Oh, absolutely. He had no mortgage on the Palm Springs house, he had no mortgage on the Beaver Creek house, he had no mortgage on anything, very quickly. I think he did temporarily when they were building them and doing things like that. He had like a building loan or whatever it’s called. But it was paid off very quickly. The man did not like that and he did not like his children to have debt. Once a year you’d get called into the office and it was, “How are your finances?” And you were like, “Oh I hate this conversation.”

Smith: And how old were you at this time?

Susan Bales: Oh, until the day he died. Every year you got that, “How are your finances? Do you have a retirement fund? Are you putting enough money away every year to take care of you? How are the children? Are you paying for their college?” He prodded into your finances. He didn’t want to know numbers, but he wanted to know that you were fiscally sound, shall we say, would be the best way to put it. And if you were hurting, he would do short-term loans. If you would say, “Dad, until so and so, until I get something,” and he would. And you signed a document that you were going to pay it back. But it was a riot.

My favorite story is still the car and putting the blanket over the car; the car that he paid $75 for before he went off to college. It was cold and he put it in the garage and put a blanket on it and the thing burned up and he went off to college without a car. Can you imagine? Think $75 for a car? That’s amazing to me.

Smith: Most of his life he didn’t have any money to speak of.

Susan Bales: He didn’t have money until he left the White House.

Smith: Someone told us the story – I think maybe it was someone who worked with Bill Seidman, but anyway, in his first couple of weeks on the job, maybe less, he asked when he would be getting a paycheck because he had someone going to college and he had…

Susan Bales: He had several in college at that point.

Smith: And he literally was living paycheck to paycheck.
Susan Bales: And when they bought the condominium in Vail, Dad borrowed money from all of us kids’ investments that he had set up – our stock funds – which were our college funds, actually. And they bought that Vail condominium, if I’m correct, for $50,000. They borrowed against their life insurance; they borrowed against everything to buy that condo; and then sold it for $500,000 or whatever.

Smith: Which, first of all, tells you how much they must have fallen in love with Vail.

Susan Bales: Yes, exactly. That was a huge – I don’t know, I mean, today’s economy is so different, but I don’t know how he afforded to take us skiing every year. Four kids, skiing, in ski school, ski lessons, Boyne Mountain, Sun Valley, the whole nine yards. Skiing is not an inexpensive sport. And to take a family of four skiing, that’s huge. That would have been huge.

Smith: Was that something you did almost as early as you can remember? Is that something from childhood?

Susan Bales: I started skiing when I was five years old.

Smith: Really?

Susan Bales: And the first couple of Christmases, Steve and I stayed home with Clara, and Mother and Dad took Mike and Jack. But once Steve and I were five and six years old, then Steven and I got to go. We started off in Boyne and I remember ice skating on the ice rink in Boyne Mountain and there was the Snowflake Lounge in the lodge that children were not permitted in. And so Mother and Dad would go to the Snowflake Lounge at night. But Boyne was so small then that kids just ran loose in the lodge all night long and you made friends down the hall – and the kids just ran loose. It was very safe. It was really fun, but it was safe. It was a riot.

Smith: We were out in Vail and it was so clear that they are held in such special regard out there. Not least of all because they are the people who put the place on the map as a year-round destination. They contributed to its success as a winter sports destination.
Susan Bales: Then when you go back and you look at the whole fact that the first house we ever stayed in was Ted and Nancy Kendall’s house. Ted Kendall’s dad was my dad’s Scout master. And we’re still in touch with the Kendall’s. I ran into somebody in Grand Rapids last week and they said something about the Kendall’s. The Kendall’s are in Phoenix now. They are still around; there is contact with the Ford family and the Kendall family.

Smith: You mentioned Clara. Tell us about Clara.

Susan Bales: Uh…sainthood would be best.

Smith: Was she a surrogate mother?

Susan Bales: Yeah, very much so. She was the glue that kept us all together. Clara kept Mother calm when she was out of control and frustrated when Dad was traveling and not available and Mother was trying to raise four kids. Clara was our housekeeper that came Monday through Friday, from nine to five. We all used to fake being sick so we could stay home with Clara instead of going to school. Clara was the one that when we ran away from home she would walk around the block and find you. She was the glue. Even after Clara left because her father became ill and she had to go and take care of her own father, Dad sent his shirts out because only Clara knew how to iron a shirt. I think they paid her fifty cents a shirt or a buck – I don’t remember what it was – but it was unbelievable. So I would go out when they would drop them off – and I’d go out and spend the day with Clara and her dad at the farm. She was the glue. She could calm us all down, and if she took her slipper off, you knew to run as fast as you can because you were getting ready to get spanked and spanked hard. She was tough, but loving.

Smith: And your mother was perfectly comfortable with her playing that role?

Susan Bales: Oh, absolutely. Clara introduced us to Cassius Clay. Mother and Dad would travel and Clara would stay with us. So when Mother and Dad would travel and go on trips to who knows where and all over, all four of us kids would pile into Mother and Dad’s king sized bed in Alexandria, and Clara would turn on the black and white TV and she would turn on Cassius Clay. She taught us about boxing as kids, because she loved Cassius.
Smith: She was African-American?

Susan Bales: She was African-American. Not dark-dark, but she was totally African-American. And her mother actually worked for my mother first. So Clara was with us for about twenty-five years.

Smith: So how old would she have been when you were a child.

Susan Bales: Well, she was there the day I came home from the hospital. She was there the day I was baptized in church, which some church members had a problem with an African-American being in our church. And the Museum has video tape – I think of my baptism and she probably left when I was twelve or thirteen – somewhere in middle school.

Smith: Okay. Did her presence call forth – did you have a conversation with your parents about race?

Susan Bales: No, but I do remember the first day at my elementary school, which was Douglas MacArthur in Alexandria, the first day that black kids were allowed in our school. And I remember one day, to my huge regret, calling Clara a very ugly name. And that’s probably the first time that I ever had a conversation with my parents about race. There was just no discussion. I mean, Clara was family. It didn’t matter. I didn’t care what color her skin was and I think some of that came from me calling her an ugly name of growing up and hearing about it in school and things like that and going, “What are you all talking about? I don’t get this.” So to me, Clara was just – I don’t think I saw her skin tone.

Smith: But the conversation you had with your parents was admonitory?

Susan Bales: No, I think it was more of trying to explain. Richard, you know that they were from Michigan; we were in Virginia; Virginia is the South. Things are a little bit different.

Smith: The first time I was ever in DC, it was in September of ’64, and I’ll never forget, we went out of the city and went down to rural Virginia, and stopped at a restaurant and on the table were paper placemats which said, “We Susan Bales: My dad took us down to Tent City when it was in Washington and drove us all through Washington when they did the whole Tent City all along between the Capitol…

Smith: The poor people’s city.

Susan Bales: Yes.

Smith: He took you down there?

Susan Bales: He took us down there and showed it to us.

Smith: Really. People always said of him, conservative on economics, internationalist on foreign policy, but moderate to even liberal on civil rights, the whole party – Abraham Lincoln bit.

Susan Bales: Exactly. And look at the whole football story. He wasn’t going to play football if Willis Ward…

Smith: And the sequel to that story, of course – many, many years later – the statute…

Susan Bales: Which is phenomenal. I know you read a lot, but have you read the book The Help? And it’s not a chick-flick book. It is about the South in Alabama and Mississippi in the ‘60s and The Help is the help stories where they are on the bus going home every day. And it was like sitting at the kitchen table listening to Clara. I’ve never loved a book more in my entire life. It is so touching and, sad to say, even in Tulsa, a friend of mine was in a house recently where there was a toilet in the garage and you know what that toilet was for? The help.

Smith: So she would talk about her experiences as a black woman?

Susan Bales: In the book The Help they do.

Smith: Okay.
Susan Bales: Not Clara. Clara – there was no color difference. She was family. And that was just the way it is.

Smith: Did your dad – he obviously had the three brothers – was he closer to one than another? What sort of qualities did each have?

Susan Bales: Well, I guess the thing is they were all very competitive. And I think Tom and Dad were probably the most competitive. I think Tom, from what I’ve heard – I was too young to really understand it – was competitive because of the politics. He was a state legislator and Dad was, you know. I think Dad was a better golfer than Tom. Now we all know that Uncle Dick was probably the best golfer of all of them. Dick and Jim were probably the better golfers of the four boys. But they all had a good time together.

Smith: The competitiveness didn’t get in the way of just enjoying the company?

Susan Bales: Of their relationships? No. Tom went to Michigan State, I’m pretty sure. Some went to Michigan, some went to Michigan State, so I think it was a split household, as to college and that sort of thing. I only saw them in the summertime, on my way to camp. I loved my cousins; I looked up to my cousins because they were all older than me and they were like big sisters and I didn’t have big sisters. So I used to love going to see my cousins.

Smith: Let me ask you – it’s jumping out of sequence here, but that’s the way this goes – how sensitive was he to the whole, for lack of a better word, the whole Chevy Chase caricature. The impression that had been created; obviously at odds with his athleticism. Over the years the story has been, well, he kind of laughed at it, or he sort of laughed it off. Is it something that bothered your mother more?

Susan Bales: You know, it’s interesting because I personally thought the skits were funnier than – those parts were kind of funny. I think it may have bothered him because we all know that he was extremely bright, extremely athletic. They would pick one thing and it’s kind of like let’s repeat, repeat, repeat.
Smith: It’s such a turning point; Saturday Night Live goes on the air during the Ford administration and some people thought it was a breath of fresh air, some people thought it was outrageous, but it was a defining moment.

Susan Bales: It was a defining moment.

Smith: Satire turned to sarcasm; irony became cruelty.

Susan Bales: Yeah, Dad has an unbelievable sense of humor and he’s pretty thick skinned and so much of it rolls off of his back. I think over time, it began to bug him that that’s what people would drag up more than anything. At the time it was okay, when you talk about history and things like that – that that’s what people drag up is a little bit much.

Smith: And the fact that Ron Nessen went on the air…

Susan Bales: Yeah.

Smith: Was of questionable judgment.

Susan Bales: Yes.

Smith: Or judge-a-ment, as he might say.

Susan Bales: Yeah, there were some fluky things about it that just didn’t – but I’ll never forget Sally, bitchy, at the Washington Post.

Smith: Sally Quinn.

Susan Bales: Thank you. She wrote a nasty story when I graduated from high school about me. That the only reason I graduated from high school was because my father was President of the United States and I wasn’t a 4.0 student or anything else. Wrote this horrendous story about me. That was one of the most hurtful things that ever happened to me at the White House and my dad said, “You know what your grades were, I know what your grades are; it doesn’t matter. No, you weren’t a 4.0 student, you’ve never been a 4.0 student, you were a B-C student; you were always a B-C student. We never asked you to get straight As.” But it’s things like that that you go, that’s what you remember, is the story that she wrote. But I knew behind the scenes, the conversation my dad and I had and he’d say, “Just forget about it.” And he was so good at saying, “Let it roll off your back. It’s really not worth making a big deal about. Just let it go.” And I’d go, how can you do that? He was so good at that.

Smith: You wonder because he talked about – and it makes perfect sense – but you also wonder if it wasn’t also a little bit of a rationalization. He talked about playing football as wonderful preparation for life in that sense. That there are a hundred thousand people who may be booing or cheering, depending on your last play, and it’s in effect, irrelevant. They’re not the ones down there who are playing.

Susan Bales: Exactly.

Smith: And he could carry that attitude into politics, which is pretty rare.

Susan Bales: Well, and it’s true. Because when you think about the center, a team can’t play the line without the center. The center is a very important person in the football line.

Smith: But one that doesn’t get a lot of credit or visibility.

Susan Bales: Right. Everybody is crazy about the quarterback; but do they talk about the center? No. And he really does play almost a far more important position than the quarterback does. But that always blew me away that I didn’t get that quality and I wish I would have. But some of that may go back to his mother. I remember him telling me a story about his mother. I guess Dad had a really bad temper as a young boy. And his mother saying, “Have you ever looked at yourself when you are angry like this?” And that had a profound impression on him. Now we all know he got angry, and we all saw it. And it was not pretty.

Smith: Apparently there were days when you knew were God damn it days.

Susan Bales: Those were God damn it days and you disappeared really fast.

Smith: Was it kind of a slow boil? Other people talked about a summer thunderstorm – that it would just explode and then be gone.
Susan Bales: Except for when it was football. Colorado – Vaden –he could probably tell it better - the Colorado-Michigan game. Mother and I were out shopping and Vaden was at the house with him and I guess it was like the last twenty seconds of the game and Colorado won. And I mean things were flying across the living room and Vaden was like backstroking out of the room as fast as he could. And Mother and I walked back into the house and say what’s going on and Vaden’s going, “Don’t ask about the game.” He was not happy.

Smith: I suppose, actually, if you’re going to get angry or throw things about something, probably a football game is better than – at least it’s not your marriage or your kids.

Susan Bales: Right. Exactly. And I do remember giving him one year for Christmas, or sticking in his stocking, I had bought off the University of Michigan site and it’s a sponge yellow brick with M so that he could throw it at the TV. It was like, “Here, Dad, use this when you get mad.” But to me it was more of a spring thunderstorm that just volcanoes. Quick eruption and then it’s over and you go, “Wow, that’s really good.”

Smith: Would he apologize afterwards?

Susan Bales: If the grandchildren were there, because Mother would usually say, “Jerry, you probably used some words that probably the grandchildren didn’t need to hear.” Glasses got thrown, kind of whaled across the room. But, you know, he usually didn’t apologize; you just kind of understood it. If you were family, you understood it.

Smith: One thing that Tyne said…Your mother is a very complex person, who - people always want to pigeon-hole everyone, it’s a shortcut, it’s easy, they don’t have to make the effort to understand people on their terms. And I’ve always thought she has a foot very much in both the traditionalist camp and the contemporary-visionary camp. Here’s a woman who people often refer to as a free spirit. And we all know she had a more ribald sense of humor than her husband.

Susan Bales: Yes.
Smith: And yet, as Tyne illustrated in a very loving way, there are standards and you adhere to those standards, in some ways very old fashioned standards, about what you wear in public and how you comport yourself. Can you sort of weigh those two sides? You buy the notion that your mother is a more complex figure than the…

Susan Bales: Oh, my mother is a very complex individual. She is a tough cookie, a strong individual, but I think back to when once we all knew that Dad was close to the end, within six months, we were all as a group sending out emails of what is appropriate. I sat down and had a conversation with Mother and I said, “What do you expect people to wear? Because I don’t want any discussion, concerns of you looking at a granddaughter or a daughter or daughter-in-law or somebody and going, ‘Oh.’”

I know my mother has standards. What do you expect? She expected everybody to have hose on; nude or black, not to have open-toed shoes, and your arms were to be covered. So if you had a sleeveless dress on, you needed a wrap, you needed a jacket, you needed something. And one of the classic stories was when we went on the Crow’s yacht, the Michaela Rose, which was an unforgettable family vacation, and mother made us dress for dinner. And there were what – nine of us? And a staff on the ship of eleven or fourteen or whatever it was. But what Mother meant “dress for dinner” for men were: no, she did not want to see hairy arms at the dinner table. So it was either a long-sleeved shirt, you didn’t have to have a tie on, but you had to have a long-sleeved shirt or sweater or jacket on. Polo shirts were fine for lunch, but they were not fine for dinner. And so us women, we wore skirts and cocktail pants and she kind of gets into dressing up and we didn’t. But we made it through it. It’s fluky little things like that that are important to her. To this day, her table is to be set nicely, appropriately, different china and dishes are used for different meals because of the quality of the plate and the…

Smith: Presentation.

Susan Bales: Presentation. And I think some of it comes from her not having it as a child, and if you have the stuff, use it. She’s not doing it to show off. She’s just doing it – she likes those things. She likes dishes, she likes a pretty table, and she likes fresh flowers. She likes those things. But if you are going to use them, use them properly. I know one time I used a white wine glass and put red wine in it as I was sitting there in the den having a drink with them, and Mother said something about, “Well, that’s the wrong one,” and I’m like, “Well, who cares?” She does. She does.

Smith: And grace was said at meals?

Susan Bales: Yes. Grace was said at meals, more so when it’s the whole family. And growing up it was. In Alexandria we had, which we still have this table and it’s in their kitchen in California, a table. There was no dining room and a kitchen; it was the same place. But there was a lazy Susan and if you didn’t get your food – now remember, I’m sitting – Jack was to my right and Mother was to my left, and Mike was on the other side of Mother – and so on the lazy Susan, if I didn’t get my food by the time it went around the second time, there was nothing left to eat because I was always fighting against the boys. And that was pretty casual for her growing up. But that was okay. But once they got to California and the White House, and Mother was very respectful of the White House. She didn’t want them to come ‘down to our level.’ It was ‘we needed to step up to its level.’

Smith: Let’s go to the large issue of their faith, because I think a lot of people learned, or maybe relearned things they had forgotten during that week of the funeral. First of all, they were reintroduced to the family. Secondly, I think they came to realize the Fords had a real love match for fifty-eight years, and the importance of their faith, generally. How would you describe that?

Susan Bales: Their faith was extremely important to them. I don’t know if a lot of people realized that Mother was raised Christian Scientist.

Smith: I didn’t know that, because I am a Christian Scientist.

Susan Bales: She was raised Christian Scientist, and when she married Dad she converted to being Episcopalian. So he was the Episcopalian, and she was the Christian Scientist, which is why the boys went to Leelanau - a Christian Science camp.

Smith: Oh, okay.
Susan Bales: I don’t know if that is still true. So, anyway, we went to church on Sunday. I wouldn’t say we made it every Sunday; we were all baptized in the church; we all went to confirmation; I sang in the choir; we did all of the things that you were supposed to do to become an appropriate Episcopalian. I guess we were known as Emmanuel on the Hill, and Alexandria was the low Episcopal Church versus the Christ Church which is downtown. Alexandria was the high Episcopal Church. I never figured out what the difference was.

Smith: I think maybe one is more Protestant and one is quasi-Catholic.

Susan Bales: We were low Episcopalians. And I have continued. I mean, I’m very proud to be today a practicing Episcopalian. I have no problems with it. And Mother and Dad were very involved in St. Margaret’s. As far as Grace, the Grace that they went to in Grand Rapids, is not the Grace Church that exists today. But Mother taught Sunday school, and of course, Boy Scouts was at the church hall and she did that. They were very much involved and a lot of our friends that we got to know and that kind of thing, we got to know through the church. And then the same thing at St. Margaret’s. They were very involved in St. Margaret’s at Palm Desert and building - that new sanctuary. The original church – actually, I got married in the first original church – which is now like the auxiliary hall compared to the big church that she and Dad and Leonard and Mom were very involved in building that huge church out there in Palm Desert. So the church has always been very much a part of their life.

Smith: Tyne spoke very movingly about conversations that she had with her grandfather. Whether he said it explicitly or she clearly drew this impression that there was a direct connection that he was not afraid to die.

Susan Bales: No. No, he was not afraid.

Susan Bales: Oh absolutely. That was not – and I know my brother Mike, having a divinity degree – Mike had long conversations with Dad about that whole time. But he had absolutely – I mean, I spent a lot of time with him from the time he came back from Mayo’s until the time that he died. I was out there probably every two weeks or so and no, there was no qualm whatsoever.
Smith: Do you think her faith has helped her to get through the last few years?

Susan Bales: I think that her faith and her family are what keep Mother going. She has lost a lot of friends since Dad, she’s lost Lee Annenberg, she’s lost a lot of friends, and I think that’s probably the hardest part of growing to be the age that Mother is – that all your friends are younger. But she still has Lilian Fisher. Lilian Fisher – they are the same age and they’re both still going strong and I know she talks to Lilian a lot. But other than that, she’s pretty limited in a lot of her friends. So, us kids and grandkids are out to see her a lot, but that, I think is what keeps her going. That and when she gets just ornery and stubborn. She is still very much in control, I promise.

I will tell you a story that will just let you know how much she is still with us. I needlepoint a lot, and so Vaden and I were just out seeing her in early July while attending Greg Willard’s son’s wedding, and I’m sitting at the kitchen table needlepointing and we’re talking because she’s eating her breakfast and I’d eaten an hour or so before. I had needlepointed Dad a Christmas stocking. Well, it got lost several years ago and I think it got thrown out. To a needlepointer, that’s very hurtful. There’s a lot of time spent on these things. So when they get thrown out, it’s like you somehow got thrown out. So we’re talking about it and Mother looks up and she goes, “Maybe he took it with him.” I just went, “Really?” Okay.

Smith: She has a distinctive sense of humor, doesn’t she?

Susan Bales: Oh, she has an unbelievable sense of humor. And she does stuff like that every now and then and I go, “You are really still…” She truly sits back and she knows exactly what’s going on, who’s playing what game, whatever. And she doesn’t say a lot, but when she does, listen.

Smith: Go back to the beginning, because it’s always been a little bit cloudy, this issue of - he’s climbing the ladder at an accelerating pace, particularly after he becomes Minority Leader, post-Goldwater debacle. And was on the road a lot. I assume he had been on the road a lot before. He liked travel, didn’t he? He liked the rubber chicken; he liked…
Susan Bales: He liked people. That’s as simple as it is. His liked people. And he became the Energizer Bunny when he was around people. And I’m not going to say he didn’t like being home and he didn’t like reading his newspaper. He loved watching his boys play football; he loved being with his family. But the man liked people and it was like food for him, I guess is the best way to put it.

Smith: How much of that was an issue? Did it evolve over time? Did it become acute? What did it contribute to her unhappiness?

Susan Bales: Well, see, you’ve got to remember that when he was Minority Leader I was middle school, freshman, sophomore year high school. Parents were not probably one of my most favorite things to be around. But, yeah, I would say…

Smith: Was it a source of tension?

Susan Bales: Yes, I guess that’s the best way to put it. And not that I wanted to be around the house anyway, I was usually out in the neighborhood playing with my friends or demonstrating – you always thought that somebody else’s house was way cooler than your house and way more fun and everything else. But yes, I would say tension. And that’s where Clara was the relief valve. I could talk to Clara about things that I felt I couldn’t talk to my mother because she was tense. And as she says in her book, she was seeing a psychologist. Yes, there was tension. My parents never fought in front of us kids. If they fought they went upstairs to their bedroom and closed the door and fought behind closed doors or after we went to bed. I would say you would hear Jerry and a few curse words, but then they quickly excused themselves. There was no screaming and yelling and finger pointing in front of the children. So I could not tell you what kind of fighters they were. Unlike some people who probably could.

Smith: What is the sequence of events – I know she had the pinched nerve.

Susan Bales: She had the pinched nerve from tripping over a stool in the den in Alexandria. She had the pinched nerve, she spent much time in traction, on and off over the years; and she did a lot of physical therapy. She went to a psychologist for peace of mind, which I understand. When you’ve got a husband who is gone a lot and you’ve got four kids you are trying to raise.

Smith: It’s been suggested – and I don’t mean to be trendy here – that she is, in so many ways, a kind of a stand in for a whole generation of women who were sort of on the cusp of the women’s movement and self-realization – whatever that meant. But it’s almost as if the language didn’t exist yet. It’s as if they didn’t quite know what they were looking for, but they were sort of groping their way towards some re-definition of role.

Susan Bales: And I think that’s true, but I also think she was very involved – there was the Senate Wives’ Club, and the Republican Wives’ Club, and all those clubs – Mother lunched a lot. Did the Red Cross stuff, which I don’t think any of that’s even done anymore. They were truly her support group. Bobby Burns, the McGregors – the families that stick out in my mind that they saw on the weekend were the McGregors, the Burns, Glenn from Wisconsin.

Mel Laird, Mel and Betty Laird. Les Arends, I’m thinking of the people we went to the Greenbrier with. I knew their kids, their kids knew us, those were the people – and there were other congressmen and senators and stuff. I ended up in college with Cissy Baker and her dad and my dad go way back.

Smith: And on weekends you would play in Statuary Hall?

Susan Bales: Yes! Hide and Seek. But we’d also go to the Army/Navy Country Club. I think as a congressman you automatically got a membership at Army/Navy Country Club. So we would go to the country club a lot on the weekends and so you would run into these same kids over at the Country Club. And so you’d swim with them in the pool and the dads were all playing golf and the mothers were playing tennis or sitting on the lawn on the beach towels and that sort of thing. Those were the people you saw on a regular basis. And so that was your support group along with the Senate Wives Club and the lunches that they were all doing. I remember doing fashion shows, mother/daughter Senate Wives fashion shows, raising money – I don’t know who they were raising money for. They did the Congressional Wives Cookbook. There was a lot of support in that group of people then. I don’t know, but I don’t think that goes on anymore.

Smith: And it’s fascinating because those were all “political wives” who in many ways shared experiences, and probably shared their frustrations.

Susan Bales: Absolutely.

Smith: Did she seem unhappy to you?

Susan Bales: She had unhappy times. She and Jack were like cats and dogs growing up. And I think it’s because they are very much the same. And Jack in high school, if Mother said black, Jack said white. And he just liked to get her riled up. And he would get her riled up and there was no father there to say, “Jack Ford, stop that.”

Smith: I was going to ask you what your dad’s response to this was.

Susan Bales: He wasn’t there.

Smith: Yeah. He was really away that much?

Susan Bales: Yeah, he really was away that much. And so Mother would get upset because she and Jack would get into this big fight and then I would have to go up and calm Mother down, Mike would go and have to say, “Jack, you need to go apologize.” Mike never really became the fatherly figure, but Mike was having to do things…so that’s kind of the way it was. Some mothers have one child that they just…and Jack and Mother were the bristly ones, shall we say?

Smith: Do you think your dad felt guilt, either then or more important, maybe, in later years? Because there is this sense that, although certainly he kept on traveling, that was…

Susan Bales: He did keep on traveling, but I don’t think he felt guilty. He came, he went to North Carolina to go to his grandchildren’s graduations; I think he spoke, not at their high school graduations, but I think he attended school with each and every grandchild for one day. That’s a huge commitment. Now he did other things while he was there.
Smith: That could also be seen, though, as in some compensating for what he didn’t do or wasn’t able to do.

Susan Bales: Yeah, and maybe that was his way, but when he came to Tulsa, and he came to Tulsa several times, one he did Law Day while he was there. He went to Heather’s middle school, but at first he went to Tyne and Heather’s elementary school, which was a public school. I know he did it for all of Mike’s kids and I know he went to Jonathan and Christian’s football practices when they were little boys. Very close to the end of his life. He was involved with his grandchildren; he knew what his grandchildren were doing. He talked to them on a regular basis. I don’t think it was guilt, I think he truly loved and cared about them.

Smith: But in terms of maybe more intimately, meaning the relationship with your mother…

Susan Bales: He bought her jewelry. He knew how to make up to her. He bought her jewelry.

Smith: She likes jewelry?

Susan Bales: She likes jewelry. And Ann Cullen would go – and I don’t know, have you talked to Ann?

Smith: Yeah, we have.

Smith: Ann would go to the jewelers and he would say, “Here’s the budget.” And that was the hard part. And Ann would go to the jewelry store and she would come home with several things. She would try them on and she would walk into the office and say, “Okay, here’s this, and here’s this, and here’s this ring, or here’s this bracelet…” or rings or earrings. Mother was big on earrings. And so Dad would say, “Well, I like this one, but which one do you think she would like?” Ann had impeccable taste. And Ann, having worked for Mother for fifteen years, knew Mother’s taste. So Ann would say, “Well, I really think this is the one she would like.” And then the price discussion would happen, because sometimes Ann would go over the budget just a little bit because it was close enough, and Ann knew that Mother would really, really like that one. So he knew jewelry always made her very, very happy. Very happy. We always waited for the little box on Christmas morning. Or he’d call me and he’d say, “What am I going to get your mother?” And I’d say, “Dad, I don’t know. You need to talk to Ann. Ann is with her every day. I don’t know what Mom needs; I don’t know what Mom wants. Ann really does.” But jewelry appeased her, shall we say? My mother liked clothes, a lot. And she liked expensive clothes. Very tailored, very simple, but she had good taste in clothes, and I don’t think he ever said, “You spent too much money on clothes.” It was his way of, if that’s what she wants…

Smith: And then - talk about opposites attracting - because he was the most punctual of men.

Susan Bales: Oh, I thought you were going to talk about his clothes in the ‘70s.

Smith: Well, actually, we could, because the legend is there were closets full of suits that were older than you. And that he didn’t want to get rid of. And that part of her function in life was to make sure he didn’t embarrass himself by going out in some of this stuff.

Susan Bales: When you compare – her being the queen of fashion, he was not the king of fashion. He had one jacket that was a brown and blue wool plaid, double vents in the shoulder – I think it even had suede elbow patches on – that when we cleaned out the Beaver Creek house was still there. And when it went in the Goodwill pile, it was kind of sad to throw it out because he’d put it on and Mother would go, “No. Put it back.” “Well, it’s still good. It’s not worn out.” And we’d go, “It’s not that, Dad. It’s the fashion. Double shoulder vents is not in fashion anymore.” That’s where he was very frugal. It had to be worn out before he threw it out.

Smith: But then, as I said, the punctuality, which I assume as long as they were together, must have been an issue. Let me try out a theory, because I think one of the things that might surprise people about your mother – for all the time she spent in the public eye, for example, before she went up and gave a speech, she had butterflies.

Susan Bales: Oh, yeah.
Smith: Which is, in many ways, the mark of a true performer. It’s when you stop worrying…and I always wondered whether some of it was - that’s last thing I can do that I have control over. It’s a kind of perfectionism. So maybe it’s the last piece of jewelry, or the last look in the mirror, or whatever – but also, a little bit of butterflies.

Susan Bales: She did at the funeral.

Smith: She was late?

Susan Bales: She was late.

Smith: I noticed a couple of times we were waiting.

Susan Bales: I can’t remember if it was – and it was simply when you go back and look at it and Greg Willard would be the one to know exactly what the item was, she had forgotten to get. One of the things she carried was one of his handkerchiefs. And she looked in her purse and that handkerchief wasn’t there. Things that meant something to her. But all of us are sitting in the cars waiting in the motorcade because the motorcade can’t leave until she is in the car in the lead motorcade. And we’re all sitting there looking at our watches going, “Okayyy.” But, to her, and I don’t mean this in a rude way, it was her show. And she does it now with dinner. We’ll say, “Mom, can we eat at 7:00 instead of 7:30?” “Well, maybe.” And at 7:45, and then you just can’t…

Smith: She just has a different sense of time.

Susan Bales: She just has a different sense of time.

Smith: Was it an endearing difference that they had? He obviously accommodated himself.

Susan Bales: Oh, he was pacing. He would be pacing waiting for her. And the times that I would be with him, and you could see the eruption, “God damn it, people are waiting on us.” And I’d say, “I know, Dad, but screaming and yelling is not going to solve the problem and it doesn’t solve the problem with her.”

Smith: Did she acknowledge that there was a problem with her?
Susan Bales: Oh, yeah. Oh she knows there’s a problem.

Erik: Excuse me, Susan, I just wanted to ask, did he ever have a schedule, if he knew it would begin at a certain time, would he ever….?

Susan Bales: No.

Erik: He wouldn’t move it maybe a half hour?

Susan Bales: No, I have friends that I do that with, but no, they never padded the schedule that I’m aware of. He would say to me, “Will you go check on her?” And so you’d go back and you’d kind of see, okay, the hair is done, the jewelry is going on, so we’re probably five minutes away. But the whole thing with him, he’d come out in a suit and he’d have one tie on and he’d always have a tie in his pocket. And he’d go in and he’d say, “Betty, this, or this?” And she always picked, “This.” This is what he wanted, this is what she wanted.

Smith: But he would defer to her judgment?

Susan Bales: And she’d go, “Uhum,” and he’d go change it.

Smith: That was his idea of getting ready to go out.

Susan Bales: Right, and I guess because of her lateness, I’m unbelievably punctual. If I’m late, I’m late for a really good reason. Something has truly thrown me off. Because I back into things.

Smith: When that little cloud, no bigger than a man’s hand, first appears, in the form of Watergate? By the way, were politics talked about in the house? Or was it something he left at the office? And was she political?

Susan Bales: First of all, my freshman and sophomore year in high school, I was at boarding school, so I was only at home on the weekends, because I was the last kid. And you’ve got to remember that Steve went to TC Williams, which is – did you ever see the movie Remembering the Titans?

Smith: No, but I know about it.

Susan Bales: Okay, that’s the high school that I would have gone to as a freshman and obviously there were some issues, which is why I went to boarding school.
And Steve, being a boy, he could be tough and he’ll be okay. So I was only home on the weekends. I was home Friday and then I had to be back at school Sunday night by four o’clock, or whatever it was. So when I saw him, I did not hear a lot of politics being discussed. Before that, in middle school, politics in general were being discussed because Mike and Jack, at that point, were in high school and they were starting to discuss politics.

Smith: Was Vietnam a topic?

Susan Bales: Yeah, because I remember when the boys got their numbers, which they got very high, high numbers and knew that they would not have to go. But I was way too young and I really didn’t get it – I didn’t pay attention to it.

Smith: You asked about stories – I’ll tell you one. Jack Marsh gave us a great story, which I’m sure has never appeared in print. At least he said it hadn’t, and it’s amazing that it wasn’t ferreted out at the time. Your dad’s first days on the job in the White House; it’s the day before he goes to Chicago to give the VFW speech, which, let’s face it, as he said, “At least I don’t have to worry about being interrupted by applause.”

Susan Bales: Right.

Smith: That day, a day in advance, Jack Marsh comes in and says, “We’ve got a problem,” and he had a lot of problems on his plate at that point.

Susan Bales: It comes with the job.

Smith: It turns out Steve had not registered on his birthday for the draft. And the thought that…you know, it’s a juicy story. He said your dad looked like he was gob smacked, he just kind of put his head in his hands…

Susan Bales: Like, “How did I let that slip?”

Smith: And so, before the day was over, I think they got General Hershey himself, they got it all taken care of, buttoned down. And the press never found out. But you can imagine…

Susan Bales: We’re not perfect, as we all know.
Smith: Most families argued about Vietnam. Were there arguments about the war that you can remember?

Susan Bales: I remember Jack and Dad getting into arguments about politics. Even then Jack was one of those students that sat in Social Studies class with the social studies book and a Time Magazine or Newsweek inside of it. He was always reading that kind of stuff. He was very much in tuned to it – I was just into riding my bike and playing with the dog. That would be a Jack question – which is why he got involved in Nixon’s re-election campaign, where he met a lot of those people. That’s why Jack was so involved in Dad’s campaign. That was his thing – it wasn’t mine.

Smith: Was there a moment when suddenly the prospect of your life being turned totally upside down crystallized? I mean, did your parents discuss this ongoing…before the vice presidency? It would have been before that.

Susan Bales: Well, in the vice presidency – with that happening, that summer I was dating Gardner Britt, of Ted Britt Ford, where you probably see those commercials now, in Virginia – Ted Britt Ford. Gardner, I dated him in high school, isn’t that special? I went with his family to Rehoboth Beach that summer. Wait – Dad was vice president – I’m trying to think about that.

Smith: Okay, so ’73 is when Agnew’s problems emerge. August of ’73 is when the Wall Street Journal comes and then, of course, October…

Susan Bales: Right. Because I’m just starting to think – I took Secret Service agents to the beach with Gardner’s family and they hung out in the garage of the house that the Britts had rented. So for the vice presidency, the only thing that truly sticks in my mind is, I came home on Friday and the front yard was full of press. And I mean full.

Smith: It’s not a big front yard.

Susan Bales: No. It wasn’t. We still had a garage then, because the garage had not been converted. And then some of them were across the street in the Abbruzzese’s yard. So I came home, it was probably four o’clock that afternoon that I got home from boarding school, and Mother was frazzled, truly frazzled, and she says, “I need to go up and take a nap.” I said, “Fine, you go take a nap and I’ll take over the phones.” And that’s when Sam Donaldson and I became best friends, because Sam called every thirty minutes. “Have you heard anything? Do you know anything?” Finally, I went, “Now I know why my mother is frazzled,” because our phone number was published in the phone book. It was horrible. So that’s when I really got the first sense that something was getting ready to change. It was ugly. And that’s when Mother and I, because she was a late person and not terribly punctual, I said, “We need to pick out some clothes. We just need to pick out some clothes if you’re going to have to be in front of the press, let’s just pick out a couple of dresses that would be acceptable if, at the last minute, you have to jump and get dressed.” That’s the kind of stuff – I wasn’t in tuned to it. I wasn’t paying attention to it, because of my age more than anything.

Smith: And when the call came - the thing that I find astonishing is that literally, you had so little time. I mean, within a couple of hours you were supposed to be in the East Room of the White House for the ceremony.

Susan Bales: Yeah. And we couldn’t find Mike, and we couldn’t Gayle. They’re driving to Massachusetts. I mean, when you start putting all the pieces together, it’s a comedy show and we do look like a bunch of mucks from the Midwest that have no idea where anybody is. But, yeah, it was pretty amazing.

Smith: One senses your dad did not enjoy the vice presidency for reasons quite apart from – clearly there was a unique set of – he was walking a tightrope. But no one particularly enjoys the vice presidency, and in that sense, it was the job itself that wasn’t much fun.

Susan Bales: I don’t want to call it a ceremonial job, but it really is a ceremonial job. My dad loved to have his hands in the mess. And to pull him away from the Capitol…and maybe when he was vice president he could truly make a difference because he knew the players and could go up to Capitol Hill and do one on one lobbying and talking. “Come on, let’s talk about this bill,” and that sort of thing. And he really had a savvy about him with those. But, yeah, it’s not a great job. The only thing I cared about was, I was anticipating moving to a different house and I wasn’t going to have to share a bathroom with my brothers. That’s all I was concerned about.

Smith: You were going to move into the Admiral’s House.

Susan Bales: That’s right. Mother and I had picked out my bedroom, we’d picked out fabrics, we’d picked out all kinds of stuff.

Smith: And was she comfortable with the way her life was going at that point? Or at least she was along for the ride?

Susan Bales: She was along for the ride. Yeah, I think she was along for the ride. I think she was enjoying working on the Admiral’s House and if anyone has seen the pictures of what the Admiral’s House looked like beforehand, it was a disaster. It really was a disaster.

Smith: Did she enjoy decorating?

Susan Bales: Yeah, she enjoys doing that stuff. She enjoys fabrics – I think that’s the fashion side of her doing things. So, in that sense, it was going to be fun, it was going to be nice. I was going to be closer to school.

Smith: And it would only be a couple of years.

Susan Bales: Exactly. And I think her theory was, it’s only a couple of years and then we get to retire and go do what we want to go do. Which we know is not what happened.

Smith: Of course Tom DeFrank made a great deal in his book about a slip of the tongue that your dad made – something to the effect that, “When I’m,” as opposed to “If I’m,” a subject he presumably avoided under ordinary circumstances. At home, one would think it would be harder to avoid – it’s like the edge of the falls is over there. Were there discussions about what if; aside from the very end, when everyone knew what was going to happen?

Susan Bales: I never heard it. But you’ve got to remember, Steve and I were the only ones home. And when you consider the age that we were do you think we were really paying attention to it? No. We were concerned about where our next date was coming from, whose party – we’re high school kids. And we knew the Nixons. We’d known the Nixons our entire life. We had been to the White House. To us, I think partially, we felt bad for the family because we knew them as a family and as friends.

Smith: In fact, your mother said that it was the worst day of her life. And one understands that she was referring to that personal element of what the Nixons were going through.

Susan Bales: Right. Because Dick Nixon, if you go back and look at Dad’s book, he talks about how Dick Nixon was such a good friend to him when he was a young congressman in Congress and things like that. And Mother and Pat had become friends through these congressional luncheons and stuff that they all did. So it was very hurtful and we saw that in our parents, I guess, is the biggest thing. You saw the pain in your parents, because their friends were going through this. It was not, “Look at what we’re going to get. Bye-bye, so long.” It was that you were feeling the pain that your parents were feeling is probably the better way to put it.

Smith: At what point did it dawn, or was it revealed to you, that this was going to happen?

Susan Bales: When Dad got the phone call, because I’m the one who answered the phone. Are you talking about the vice presidency?

Smith: No, I mean in terms about moving into the White House - about the fact that at some point he’s going to be president.

Susan Bales: Dad came home after that meeting after he knew.

Smith: Was that the meeting with Haig?

Susan Bales: Yes. And he didn’t directly say it, but he gave some innuendos, kind of like, “We need to be prepared.”

Smith: How did your mother deal with that? Over the years the impression has been left, maybe you were all in a state of denial, but that in fact, it was news to her. That it was a surprise to her, and not a necessarily totally welcome surprise.
Susan Bales: Oh I think it was. Dad was very confidential. When you’re not supposed to talk about stuff, you don’t talk about stuff.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that because I wonder what secrets he took with him to the grave.

Susan Bales: Oh, wouldn’t we all like to know? Yeah. I agree with that. No, he was very confidential, and I think part of it, too, when we look back at it all, Mother is seeing a psychologist…

Smith: At that time?

Susan Bales: Oh, sure. So there is tension and he’s thinking, “Why do I want to add more tension to what’s already going on there?” Now life is a little bit easier because we now have Navy stewards cooking and helping at the house and doing things like that, because the vice president’s house is not ready and we’re still living in our house in Alexandria. Which, let me tell you, was really cramped quarters. What people don’t realize is that the life that we lived was a very simple life; we were a very simple family. My clothes came from Sears and JC Penney’s. The first time I got a dress from Lord and Taylor or Woodward and Garfinkel’s was when my dad became vice president.

There were four children. He made thirty some thousand dollars a year. We couldn’t afford what a lot of those other people out there – I mean most of my friends were far more wealthy than my family was. So our house was small. It was adequate, but when the Secret Service and Navy stewards move into – I mean, our kitchen and dining room area was probably not much bigger than this room, so when you get people moving in and preparing food, it gets really small, really fast. And I don’t think people realized that we didn’t grow up with silver spoons in our mouths, to put it in perspective.

Smith: Over the years the story has been told many times, and I’ll give you a chance to confirm or deny it – that you, at one point, said you didn’t want to go to the White House if it meant giving up your jeans.

Susan Bales: Oh, I don’t know about that. We were criticized for wearing jeans. We were one of the first families to wear jeans and were criticized for them. I mean, my dad wasn’t wearing jeans. My mother was still wearing dresses; you saw her in pants, but even then the First Lady didn’t wear slacks. And I think the President almost always had a tie on, unless he was on the golf course. But us kids were criticized for wearing jeans – that was inappropriate First Family attire.

Smith: And there were the letters. The letters that I read when she let it be known that they shared a bed, and there were concerned Americans who wrote in to protest this fact.

Susan Bales: Yes, absolutely.

Smith: This must have been a whirlwind in any event, but the fact that suddenly you are fodder for anyone and everyone. Do you ever adapt to that?

Susan Bales: Yeah, you do.

Smith: Did you ever discuss it with him? Or her?

Susan Bales: No, some of it has to do with your age. Mike and Jack were gone. Steve left, went to Montana and jumped on a horse and said, “I’m outta here,” instead of going to Duke.

Smith: Was that influenced by – he didn’t want to be in the goldfish bowl?

Susan Bales: Yeah. “This ain’t going to work for me.”

Smith: Okay.

Susan Bales: And I think maybe Steve had talked about deferring a year, anyway. But I think this just kind of pushed it over the edge. “For sure, I’m going to take a year off before I go to college.” So I went to Mt. Vernon College in Washington, which now is part of GW, and then transferred to the University of Kansas because I wanted the real experience. I wanted the real college experience. And I kept trying to get the real college experience and part of it is, you can’t do that in Washington. The press are constantly following you. It didn’t help that I was a photo journalist and I was working at AP – so no matter where I turned – I was with the press. To get to my father’s office I had to walk by the press room. I mean, I kept trying to get the real experience.
Smith: Was there anyone who gave you advice, anyone who had lived in the White House before, anyone who was in a position to know what you were going through?

Susan Bales: No. Later, now, I’ve talked to Luci and Linda and people like that, and the thing is, it’s changed so drastically. The White House days then and the White House days now, the press really followed the children, but we didn’t have 24 hour news back then. And today you’ve got this 24/7 stuff and I cannot imagine being there now. They don’t seem to follow the family quite as closely because they’ve kind of put a wall up and said, “You can’t do that anymore.” I don’t know. It’s tough. I’m sitting there looking at what they are doing with Chelsea Clinton’s wedding. Come on, she’s not in the White House anymore. Please.

Smith: The first few days – you were still in the Alexandria house for a week or so before you actually moved in.

Susan Bales: Almost two and a half weeks – maybe it was ten days, but close. Right.

Smith: Was there a time when you went on a tour of the White House to see your new quarters?

Susan Bales: We did go on a tour. But you see, that summer I had worked at the White House selling guide books. I had worked at the White House – my summer job when Dad was a congressman was working for the White House Historical Association. We called it the White House Hysterical Association, selling guide books to the tourists who came through. So when we went on the tour, I knew all the police guys, and when I walked through with my mother, they’d say, “Hey, Susan, how are you?” Which was kind of weird.

When the Nixons were there, there was always a folding screen at the end of the hallway so that you could get from the family elevator to the West Wing and the tourists could not see the family and the family could get out through, I can’t remember the name of that room, to get out the front to get in the cars and leave. And so Mother and I go “behind the screen.” Why, I had never gone “behind the screen.” And so it was Clem Conger, Rex Scouten – Mother and I went out and did the tour of the whole second and third floor.
Smith: That name, by the way, rings a bell because over the years there have been suggestions that your mother and Clem were not completely simpatico in terms of style, temperament, whatever.

Susan Bales: That’s true.

Smith: And that he presumably had a view of the White House that was not only very protective, but possessive as well.

Susan Bales: Yes, it was his house. Yes. That is true because when we walked – the only other bedrooms on the second floor was Tricia’s suite, which was a two-bedroom area, and it was truly bubble gum pink. Pink shag carpet, pink bedspreads, pink walls, pink, pink, pink, pink. And both Mother and I just went “whoaaa.” I would not call me a girly-girl, and so when we went upstairs, I actually took Julie’s old bedroom and Clem said something to me about, “Well, do you like this furniture in here?” And I said, “It’s fine, but I’ve always wanted a brass bed.” Which I truly, truly wanted a brass bed. Well, a brass bed did not fit the era and time of the House. Clem was not happy. So Mother looked at Clem and said, “If you could find her a brass bed, that would be nice. If in the storage, whatever…”

Well, that wasn’t going to work with Clem. Clem found me a phenomenal brass bed that was in Missouri somewhere that actually had - and I don’t know the term for whatever that piece is that is on the top - it wasn’t a full canopy, it was a partial canopy. And actually Chip Carter, I think, wanted to keep it because he took my room after I left, and Clem called the family in Missouri because they loaned it to the White House, they didn’t give it. And they said no, we want it back. There’re all kinds of little stories like that.

It’s like Freddie the elevator guy going out and swimming with Dad in the pool.

Smith: Really?

Susan Bales: Yeah.
Smith: We’ve heard that almost immediately there were relationships with the permanent staff; that your dad would invite the butler to come in. “Oh, come on in and watch the football game.”

Susan Bales: Yeah.

Smith: Or at dinner they would talk sports. And I wonder if that presented a bit of a challenge in some ways. Clearly the Nixons ran the White House differently. There is the story about your mother at the very beginning saying good morning to people and not getting a response.

Susan Bales: Right.

Smith: And going to the Usher to ask if there was something she did.

Susan Bales: Had she offended them? And I don’t mean that the Nixons don’t see color, but that’s just once again a statement of most of the White House staff was black, and we didn’t see that as “You are servants or butlers or maids.” We were all just kind of one big happy family. They got me in trouble a couple of times. “Susan didn’t make her bed this morning.” Because my mother had a rule that we kids had to get up and make our beds. It was not going to be: move into the White House, and put your feet up and snap your fingers and ring the bell. “You are to get up and make your bed every day. That’s the least you could do.” And so they would tell on me and say, “Susan didn’t make her bed this morning.” And I’d catch all holy hell by the afternoon. “I overslept.” “What a surprise.”

Smith: But I take it that both of your parents got acclimated pretty soon to life in the White House.

Susan Bales: Oh, yeah. It’s nice, it’s really nice. It’s nice digs, it’s great food. And they are nice people. They are probably the nicest people you could ever imagine. The staff at the White House is what makes the White House what it is. The White House is just a building. But the staff is what truly makes it special.

Susan Bales: Did you ever get used to the press?
Susan Bales: No. No, you never get used to the press. They become your friends; you think you can trust them; you think you know them; and then all of a sudden you open the newspaper and you say, “Whoops.”

Smith: The pardon comes along.

Susan Bales: Right.

Smith: And did you have a sense of being in the eye of the hurricane? Did what was going on out there translate around the dinner table?

Susan Bales: No. Because once Dad came upstairs, it was family time. And that truly is the other advantage of living in the White House and having Air Force One. He was home so much more. I was a senior in high school, so I was pretty focused on getting graduated, getting into college, that sort of thing. And when he came upstairs, it was time to talk about, “What did you do today? What are you doing this weekend and what’s going on with you?” and that sort of thing. I had no clue ahead of time that that’s what he was going to do. None.

Smith: And then, of course, in short order, comes your mother’s breast cancer surgery.

Susan Bales: That was tough. And the reason I say that was tough was because, besides Gayle, there were only three females now in the family. Mike’s married to Gail, there’s Mother and there’s me. And I was seventeen - that seems like many, many decades ago, which it was. We’d just moved into the White House. Mother goes in; finds out that she’s got to have surgery; and the fact is, as a senior in high school – you’re trying to cut the umbilical cord anyway, and when you find out that she’s got stage II, several lymph nodes involved, the prognosis is not real good. And you’re going, “My mom may die.”

Smith: How did she tell you?

Susan Bales: She didn’t. Dr. Lukash told us. And I think that was the easiest way for her to do it. Lukash told all of us.

Smith: Including your dad?
Susan Bales: Yeah. I think Lukash had already told Dad, but then he sat down with Dad and Mother and I together, kind of again, “This is what’s going to happen…” that sort of thing. And you’re seventeen years old, you’ve moved into the White House, and now your mother’s got breast cancer, and the chances are that she could die because of the technology of the time.

Smith: You were awfully young. Was the impact of the news even greater because it was something no one talked about at the time?

Susan Bales: I think so. Because when you think about it, back then Mother and Dad could have said she was having female problems. And the press would have left it alone because I don’t think you could even say breast on TV then. And the press didn’t invade like they do now. Do you think they ever would have asked my dad about boxers or briefs? Hell, no. Just to set the stage of where we are. So I think once Mother realized the impact, and I don’t think she was going for impact - they had told her breast cancer is killing women and this could really make a difference if you’d change two words in the press release: breast cancer versus female problems.

Smith: So that discussion took place: how we handle this?

Susan Bales: Because Dad had said, “This is going to be an open and honest administration.” And that was the discussion of breast cancer versus female problems.

Smith: And who was in that discussion?

Susan Bales: I think probably Ron Nessen, Dad, Sheila…

Smith: There was a professional…

Susan Bales: There was a professional side to it.

Smith: Did the family have the discussion?

Susan Bales: We discussed it. We had a little bit of time to hash it out and think about it, and the Johnsons came, and Mother left for the hospital right after that. But there were a few days before the Johnsons came that we were putting it all together, I guess, is the best way to put it - from the time that the doctors discovered it, because they hadn’t even done the biopsy – all they’d done was find the lump.

Smith: Was she scared?

Susan Bales: Sure she was scared. I would have been scared. Yeah, she was scared; we were all scared, because we really didn’t know. Back then it was the “I don’t know” days. They didn’t know if it was cancer; it was strictly a lump; back then if it was cancer, they automatically do a mastectomy. There is no decision involved in the process.

Smith: And let’s face it, a lot of people assume it’s a death sentence.

Susan Bales: Yeah, exactly. And we didn’t know then what kind of cancer it was. We didn’t know how many lymph nodes were involved. We didn’t know a lot. It was strictly, “There’s a lump and we’re going to go see what it is.” And you didn’t know what you were going to wake up with. That was pretty much: were you going to wake up with a raw chest, or were you going to wake up with your own boob there? We didn’t know. The unknown, I think, is the fear more than anything.

Smith: Over the years, understandably, so much has been written and said about the example that she set and the history that she made. But he set an example, too.

Susan Bales: Oh, yeah. And it also showed the very tender side of him, very quickly. When you go back and you look at those tapes of him, and I’m trying to think of the one in particular…

Erik: The Economic Summit.

Susan Bales: Thank you. Where he says, “Betty’s going to be okay.” Which you can tell that he’s very touched; he’s hurting. And so that wasn’t a side that the public had seen of him right off the bat.

Smith: Did you go up to the hospital?

Susan Bales: Oh, I was there the whole time. See, that day, it was really an interesting day. Louise Abbruzzese, who was the neighbor who lived across the street, went into labor that morning, and she was in that hospital giving birth to her third child the morning that Mother was having her surgery. I guess they had come up and said it’s cancer. I went down to see Louise, because I had babysat her other kids, and she let me hold the baby, who is named Elizabeth Ann, after my mother.

Smith: That’s great. We talked to Peter in one of our interviews.

Susan Bales: How is Peter? He’s like ancient, because he was like sixty years old a long time ago.

Erik: Will you ask her about the story about being locked out of the house – remember that story. While she was babysitting – with Secret Service.

Susan Bales: Ohhh, yeah. I do remember that one.

Erik: He was roaring telling us about that one.

Susan Bales: Yeah, I bet he was. When they were parents they probably didn’t think it was. I don’t remember the whole story, but I do remember it happening and going, “Oh, shit.” No, I’d take their kids to the beach. Their kids – I loved their kids, they were great kids. I’d love to know where they are now. But Peter was old back then, or looked old.

Smith: Well, he’s very, very well preserved.

Susan Bales: He’s very, very, Democrat.

Smith: Yup.

Susan Bales: Very much a Democrat.

Smith: But that’s great to get that perspective.

Susan Bales: Who was the congressman he worked for?

Smith: Wayne Hayes.

Susan Bales: Wayne Hayes, that’s who it was.

Smith: Interesting background.

Susan Bales: Yes, exactly.
Smith: Did he talk about Nixon in later years?

Susan Bales: He never really did. I know for a long time, I think they still called each other on birthdays. There was still a friendship of some sort.

Smith: You have to assume the relationship must have been changed from what they went through.

Susan Bales: Right, but as we’ve gone through stuff, there is always correspondence. You don’t just write somebody off like that who has been a long time friend. But, no, he really didn’t talk about him much.

Smith: Did he talk about Reagan?

Susan Bales: He talked about Reagan more because Mother and Dad saw Nancy and Ronnie in Beverly Hills at functions, in LA, they ran into them at parties, that sort of thing. I know Mother talked to Nancy several times after he sent out his memo about the Alzheimer’s. She felt very bad for her because she realized what a lonely life Nancy had ahead of her. And to me, part of me says, we had a very short time that we knew my dad had left, but his mind was there, all of those things. I think ours was far less painful. Who am I to judge? Except that I have a father-in-law who is more like a Ronald Reagan right now, who doesn’t know who I am. I think it’s far less painful the way that Dad went.

Smith: Let’s go back to the White House years because I guess it must have been – well you would know – hard on the heels of your mother’s operation, you were wearing white gloves and making your social debut.

Susan Bales: They were miserable to wear. Maybe that’s why I never got to be in a diplomatic party – that was my debutant party, I guess is what it was.

Smith: What was the story behind that?

Susan Bales: Well, Mother was still in Bethesda Naval Hospital after her mastectomy, and actually that afternoon we had just surprised Dad with Liberty. And that was the ambassador’s embassy White House dinner. And it’s really not a dinner; it’s more like drinks and desert. It’s an after-dinner event, because I really don’t think we sat down to dinner, if I remember correctly. Maria Downs would know. But it is very formal, I think it’s actually – besides when the Queen came – it’s the only white tie, and I had never worn white gloves like that before, which they are miserable to get on and off. So you stay in this receiving line, you greet every ambassador and then there is dancing afterwards and I had to dance with all these people. And it was quite an experience.

Smith: Did you volunteer? Were you asked? How did it come about?

Susan Bales: No, my dad needed a female escort, and being the only female in the household, I didn’t have a whole lot of choice. I had no intention of going to that, but Mother’s surgery is what got it started.

Smith: Did you relate the experience to her afterwards?

Susan Bales: Yeah, it was like, how do you get into this stuff? To me, I wouldn’t say it wasn’t fun, it was a very special evening between my dad and I; and that was the neat part of it. The diplomat, proper etiquette, title – I’m sure I called an ambassador by the wrong name – that wasn’t my everyday life.

Smith: The fall of Saigon – what was the mood?

Susan Bales: Didn’t see a lot of Dad right then.

Smith: I guess that brings up a larger question: did he bring the job with him?

Susan Bales: No, when he came home at night, he did not bring it. There may have been a brief moment of discussion of “I may have to be excused to go take a call,” or “If Brent is coming up or Henry is coming over, I may have to excuse myself to go in the other room and talk to them.” And we knew better than to ask why, because most of the time he couldn’t talk about it anyway. And then you knew what it was all about afterwards. So there was so much of that that just took place in the room next door, that you didn’t really know what it was all about until it was all over with. So, no, he didn’t bring it home with him.

Smith: There were two assassination attempts.

Susan Bales: Yes.
Smith: Astonishingly, three weeks apart, both in California.

Susan Bales: And I can tell you where I was for both of them. I can’t remember which was first.

Smith: Squeaky was first.

Susan Bales: When in the year, though, it would tell you where I was. Because one I was at the beach with girlfriends, and the other one I was with a boyfriend in the solarium. Why I remember this stuff, I don’t know. I had gone to the beach, all of us were getting ready to leave for college, which would have been August-September-ish. And the group of girls that I ran with, we all decided to go to the beach to have our last weekend before we all scattered. So we’re down at the beach.

Smith: Which beach?

Susan Bales: Rehoboth. Down at twins house and we had had the radio on and we were just lying there, lying on the beach and I guess a bunch of us got up to go swimming, and my agents turned the radio off while I was gone. And we came back from swimming and somebody noticed that the radio was off and we went to go turn it back on and Tommy Pabst, who was head of my detail, who was with me, said something like, “Oh leave that off,” or something. He obviously had gotten the information and was trying to figure out how he was going to tell me. So, anyway, we walked back to the townhouse and before I walked up the steps to go up to the townhouse he said, “Susan, I need to talk to you.” And so he told me. And that was before cell phones or anything like that. He said, “Your dad is fine, everything is great, don’t worry about it.” But, yeah, I couldn’t wait to talk to him until he got back to the White House. I guess if I really was persistent, I could have called Air Force One or whatever. But you didn’t do things like that. But I was with my girlfriends, so I was glad I was at least with friends when that happened.

The other one was, I was dating a guy and we were up in the solarium and my agent called me up there and told me just over the phone. And that was to me, probably the beginning of 24 hour news in White House world. Because the technical communications guys could run it on the TVs non-stop, the footage that they were picking up off the news networks and they were running it on the White House TVs. And so we were sitting there in the solarium, watching all of that stuff and then I went downstairs when Dad came back in the helicopter. But, yeah, those were scary. He had several bullet-proof vests made to match suits. And Mother and I chose never to find out what suits those were, so that when we would see him in a crowd, we wouldn’t be concerned. I can’t believe a woman – here he is married to a woman who was promoting the Equal Rights Amendment and tries to shoot him.

Smith: Parenthetically, do you resent the fact that both of those women have been released?

Susan Bales: No. And you know what? If I saw them on the street today, would I recognize them? No. I’ve seen them on TV. They look like a normal, grandmotherly type person. They’ve served their time. I’m uncomfortable, I don’t like it, but they have a right to be out.

Smith: Has your mother ever expressed an opinion?

Susan Bales: No. I think some of the things – you’ve always been told you’re supposed to get notification of hearings and all this other stuff – we haven’t been notified about any of that stuff. That irritates me. So my mother has not been notified of a lot of that stuff and that’s very irritating. That’s more irritating than the fact that they are out.

Smith: The campaign of ’76 – were you at the convention?

Susan Bales: It’s right before I met him [Vaden] for the first time. First time I ever met him in my life. (?)

Smith: How bitter was the atmosphere up there. I mean the two camps. Literally you had dueling entrances by the First Lady and Mrs. Reagan, it just felt like a very divisive…

Susan Bales: It was divisive – I think that’s a really good term for it. But I have to say, we were on such a cloud nine and so confident that we had it – at least I, as a family member, did. That to me it was, pooh-pooh on you guys. But the thing is, when I go back and look at it, that’s not what I remember. What I remember is the fun that we had, the fun we had campaigning as a family together. The time we had together as a family, the excitement, the joy, all of those things. That’s what I remember. I don’t remember the divisiveness and that…

Smith: Did you think at the end you’d won it? Did you think you were going to win?

Susan Bales: Sure.

Smith: I mean, you certainly came to have fun.

Susan Bales: And the thing is, that was August, and we had until November, and when I fell asleep and when Mother finally woke me up and sent me upstairs to go to sleep, which was like midnight, one o’clock in Washington in November; I went to bed thinking, we’re going to pull this off. So when she woke me up the next morning and the first thing out of my mouth was, “Did he win?” And she said, “No.” It was like, wait a minute, I want to go back to sleep again. I just couldn’t believe that at the last minute we couldn’t pull it off.

Smith: There is a wonderful story Rex Scouten told us. Rex, of course, is the soul of discretion, and the ultimate professional.

Susan Bales: Yes.

Smith: But he did tell us the story that that night he was upstairs and oh, along about two o’clock or so, whatever, in the morning, it wasn’t looking great and the President decided he was going to turn in. So he goes across the hall and Rex follows him because he wants to say something consoling. And he said, “You know, Mr. President, who knows what’s going to happen. If you don’t pull it out it really will be shame because you deserve it. You worked hard for it. But you know, think for a minute, you’ve spent your whole life in service to this country. Whether it was in the Navy during the war, or all those years on Capitol Hill, and these are two of the toughest years any president…” He said, “You know, maybe it’s just time for you to take a well-earned vacation.” And your father says, “I don’t think so.”

Susan Bales: Well, I think, to comment, do you think he worked less after he left? No. He traveled as much, if not more, and he took his job seriously on the boards.
Smith: He took heat for “commercializing” the ex-presidency. We’ve talked to a number of people who were on boards with him who made it very clear he worked very hard on those boards.

Susan Bales: He was committed to them.

Smith: Yeah. And the other thing that people never really paid much attention to, or at least the critics, two things: all the work he did for charity and all the campuses that he visited; but two, the fact that he had to raise ten, twelve, thirteen million dollars to build those facilities in Michigan. Which, for someone who had never seriously really been challenged in his congressional races, must have seemed an awfully tall mountain to climb.

Susan Bales: Yes.

Smith: And he was a very generous donor to the Foundation over the years.

Susan Bales: He was, and then he turned around and helped Mother raise all the money for the Betty Ford Center. She learned it from him. I’ll never forget one very wealthy person was over for lunch one day and Mother is the one who had invited this person. And she looked at Dad ahead of time and she said, “This is mine, not yours.”

Smith: There was that line, I don’t know if it was true or not, that supposedly everything east of the Mississippi was his and everything west of the Mississippi was hers.

Susan Bales: Well, I wouldn’t put it that way, but they put dibs on people. The thing is, if you look at both organizations, there is a lot of crossover between the two of them. But Mother learned from him.

Smith: For her, just creating the Center must have called on a lot of muscles that hadn’t been used. In terms of, fundraising and building a building and hiring a staff – all of those kinds of things.

Susan Bales: But you see, it’s not only that. It’s not like raising money for a museum that’s going to go up. It’s raising a place for addicts. A lot of people don’t like to have their name associated with drugs and alcohol. It’s kind of like the breast cancer thing. What Nancy Brinker did in raising money for breast cancer – unbelievable things. And I think my mother did that for drugs and alcohol. She put a face to it and made it okay. It’s got a long ways to go, but that’s just another one of her pearls. Hey, wouldn’t we all like to have our name on a presidential building and foundation and whatever, but a drunk tank? No.

Smith: But you know something? When you stop to think about what she changed, at the intersection where the rubber meets the road, where ordinary people live their lives, it can be argued she had more impact than most presidents.

Susan Bales: Oh, I would totally agree with you on that. Yes, absolutely. And she had a gentle, strong spirit about her in twisting arms.

Smith: Did she turn out to be a natural fundraiser?

Susan Bales: Yeah, and she will tell you that she learned it from Leonard Firestone, though.

Smith: He clearly was a pivotal part of this story, isn’t he?

Susan Bales: He was a pivotal part of my family’s life. I mean, first of all, Leonard and Dad were friends for a long time. But it just goes on. I know Leonard’s kids; I know Leonard’s grandkids; their grandkids. Our families had been together for a long period of time. But Leonard and Dad go back, that gets into Bob Hope and how Dad met lots of people in the desert. Mother and Dad buy the lot from Leonard to build the house next to Leonard; then Leonard goes to Beaver Creek with Dad.

Smith: I’ve been told by more than one person that she basically saved his life.

Susan Bales: Yes. And I didn’t know Leonard was a drunk. I did not see that. I did not know that. I saw him more in social situations. We all know how to behave when we have to. Yeah, the Firestones have always been around.

Smith: Let me ask you a sensitive question, because you mentioned Bob Hope. I wonder if in any way seeing Hope’s last years, whether that made an impression on your parents in the sense that if that “we’re never going to let history repeat itself.” I think the last time that he did the dinner in Statuary Hall. I had written the remarks and he said to someone right after he finished, “That’s the last speech I’m going to give.” An awareness of bumping up against one’s limitations and having sufficient pride, self-respect, whatever.

Susan Bales: I don’t know if I would say it was Mother; I think that was truly a family decision. We knew when it was time for him not to be out photographed in public. I think probably one of the last pictures of him was when President Bush came to the house.

Smith: April of 2006.

Susan Bales: Right. And Dad was standing and walking and he was until the day he died. But you do make that decision of “we’re not going out anymore.” And it is a sense of pride; it’s a sense of family pride as much as it is as individual pride.

Smith: I remember the vultures of the press being what they were, and a real concern on the part of the family that we have privacy.

Susan Bales: Leave us alone.

Smith: He’s not president anymore. But I mean, is that realistic in the modern media climate? Did you pull it off?

Susan Bales: No, I think we pulled it off. I think the fact that the last picture of him was with President Bush is really the way it should have been. He was with another man of his same club. And we weren’t hiding anything except for we knew the end was coming. But do you make announcements about that? No.

Smith: It must have been frustrating because I assume there were leaks coming from the hospital. There were people there that would tip off the media and that’s got to be frustrating.

Susan Bales: We got really good at it. Actually I have pictures somewhere of Steve and me sitting in our car taking pictures of the media. And Steven and I walking out of the hospital, and them not recognizing us. I think even one of us walked up to them and said, “What are you all doing here?” Steve and I kind of had fun with that. It was one of those hahaha, we can do this, too. And we got good at it. It wasn’t fair. I mean, a lot of times he was just in the hospital for tests.
And when you get to be in your nineties, you have little tests, you’re checking stuff.

Smith: Did he share in that? Did he resent the media intrusion at that point?

Susan Bales: I don’t think we told him it was much of a deal. The only thing that we ever had was, we had a standard press release that we would use if we needed it. But to go in for tests, or things like that, they were on a death watch and that was the thing and they were on it for years. Probably I would say the last four years.

Smith: Yeah.

Susan Bales: It just got to be a joke – well, the press are back, oh well.

Smith: Let me ask you, obviously I’ll be asking President Bush tomorrow morning, was it difficult for him having so many of his people who came back in the Bush administration and it didn’t always work out? I’m thinking of Paul O’Neill, in particular, with whom we’ve talked. Obviously, he knew Cheney became controversial, but Rumsfeld even more so.

Susan Bales: He didn’t talk to me about that. It was more of – he stood behind Paul O’Neill, he stood behind Rummy, and to him they were friends and that sort of thing and I think he was discouraged more than anything of – what do see wrong with him, because I’m proud of them and they are still my friends.

Smith: Before I forget, back in the White House days, did you have contact with Rockefeller?

Susan Bales: We had some. I would see them at dinners and things like that. I went to the Vice President’s house a couple of times for meals, events, that sort of thing. I got to know Happy’s daughter…

Smith: Carol?

Susan Bales: Carol – fairly well. Carol and I were close in age. She was older than I was, so we communicated some.

Smith: Happy wasn’t in DC very much.
Susan Bales: No, and the boys would come and go for different stuff on occasion. And that’s about it. They were always very nice and very polite to me. They knew my name, so that’s always a good start.

Smith: Your memories of the funeral…

Susan Bales: Yeah.

Smith: I’ve asked a number of people because I was wearing two hats that week, and I was with ABC the first part of the week and then with the family the second part of the week. And I can tell you, journalists, particularly the younger journalists, were surprised at the amount of public response. And I think that was because: a) they didn’t know much history; and b) he hadn’t been in the public eye for a while. But I also think what was going on – there were a lot of things going on – one of them was that it was a time when the country desperately needed to feel good about itself. It needed to convince itself, even for a few days, that it could rise above the kind of ugly partisanship that had become the norm. There’s a whole generation that discovered him for the first time through those grainy film clips. And they were comparing what they saw with what goes on now. And he looked awfully good. And ironically, the Nixon pardon was trotted out as the prime illustration of political courage. So there was all of that going on, but things like, for example, I’m told the numbers of people on a Saturday night who turned out at Alexandria surprised you.

Susan Bales: Oh, it was unbelievable. And that was one of those things, Richard, you know. We planned that week to ten days of events, every single part of it was thought through, rehashed, discussed. And I don’t know who came up with the idea of, we can drive through Alexandria on our way to Washington, and there was a relief - that’s another way of going home. Because that was, for us kids.

Smith: Sure.

Susan Bales: That’s where the boys had played football and Old Town Alexandria was where we hung out when we were young kids, and Alexandria, besides Grand Rapids, the other home, I guess is the best way to put it. That was huge and it felt good. Just like going past the (World War II) Memorial and the people, the soldiers and stuff. It felt good. Dad chose not to do the horse and all of that down on to Independence Avenue. Which I’m glad. At first I kind of questioned his decision about that. Now I think back on it and I think it was truly the right decision, because we did these things, which to me were far more symbolic of him. And it said something about him.

Smith: It’s interesting, because after the fact I know the Johnson girls right away, but I believe the Carters as well revised their plan because people saw the Ford funeral and it felt much more like a family event, a little bit less pageantry and more honest emotion. So it’s had a lasting impact in that sense.

Susan Bales: And you know, going up the House steps and coming out the Senate steps, most presidents won’t be able to do that. I guess they could do it, but it wouldn’t have the symbolism that it did for us. Those are the kinds of things that were so special and so important to us. And what people don’t know – there was so much laughter behind all of that. My friends would call me and say, “You just look so sad,” and I said, “I am, but you know what? We are also laughing and telling stories and being together as a family.” The public part is the hardest part of this thing. But there was still lots of laughter and enjoyment of being together. So it wasn’t all sad.

Smith: Kind of an Irish wake. Kind of an ongoing wake.

Susan Bales: Yes. That’s a good way to put it.

Smith: And one of the surprises – again, I was up at the cathedral that morning – ironically, although he had chosen not to have the caisson through the streets of Washington, I was told a lot of folks turned out along the route just to watch the hearse go by.

Susan Bales: It was phenomenal. It just really was. I did not expect it. Mike Wagner had kind of warned us this could happen. And MDW can’t predict what crowds are going to be. They didn’t have a clue.

Smith: It’s a holiday.
Susan Bales: Yes. It’s Christmas; it’s New Year’s. And maybe the crowds were bigger because families were home. I don’t know. But it really was warm and fuzzy and it made us all feel good.

Smith: Including your mother?

Susan Bales: Including Mother. We all were just flabbergasted; it was just like “wow.” And it just goes on and on and on. Grand Rapids was very understandable, but as cold as it was – the miles of Boy Scouts and things like that – that blew us away.

Smith: She was not well that week, right?

Susan Bales: She wasn’t, no. We didn’t know how sick she really was. She was very sick.

Smith: Was it a bronchial thing?

Susan Bales: It was a bronchial thing, which we later found out – I don’t remember the name of the bacteria that was in her lungs – but she ended up having to be on intravenous antibiotics for three months afterwards. It was a form of tuberculosis.

Smith: She’s always had kind of a respiratory vulnerability.

Susan Bales: She has a bad respiratory system. And the only thing we can think of today is that the dog – something that is in the soil, the dog brought it in, had it on his paw, put it on the bed and somehow it got in her lung. For three months she was on antibiotics. She was sick.

Smith: We’d been told, again on ABC, at St. Margaret’s, don’t be surprised if you see Mrs. Ford in a wheelchair. And of course we never did until at the end, and then of course, she got of the wheelchair and made that long walk down to the gravesite. And the story goes – a week later, she’s back home and there’s a visitor who was complimenting her - in effect, “I don’t know how you did it.” And the story goes, she responded, “I just did what my husband would have wanted me to do.”

Susan Bales: That’s very true. To me, it’s the old Depression ‘pull yourself up by your bootstraps, stand up straight and we’re going to get through this.’ Now, truly,
I think the three days in Washington to rest in between California and Washington (Grand Rapids?) was a blessing to all of us, because we got to relax, we got to put our feet up; we got to take a deep breath. She literally got to spend two days in bed. And she wasn’t diagnosed – they thought it was just respiratory – she wasn’t diagnosed at that point with what we later found out she had. We were just kind of shooting anything we possibly could. That was the way we were to do. “Do not whine, do not cry, do not complain. I do not want to hear your sob stories. This is what you’re going to do and you’re going make your father proud.”

Smith: And then while she was at Blair House, you had a host of distinguished visitors. I think the Nixon girls came. I think the Johnson girls came.

Susan Bales: The Bush family came.

Smith: And also the Carters.

Susan Bales: The Carters came. The Clintons came. Now some came up into a private den and met with us and some met with the ambassadors. Because, you see, you’ve got to remember we had the Cabinet and the pallbearers that came first. And that’s when the Clintons and some of those came. Happy Rockefeller came. So that was where we greeted a lot of those people But the Bushes we met privately with their family upstairs. They weren’t part of the larger group. That was the whole point of Blair House, so that you can greet a lot of those individuals and have time. And that stuff is exhausting. It’s just exhausting. So we really controlled Mother’s time in that situation because we didn’t want to wear her out, and she wasn’t well.

Smith: And it must have been touching, on the way out to the cathedral to go by the White House with its staff out on the street.

Susan Bales: With the staff out front waving at you – I think the only thing better than that would have been to go over and hug them all. Some of us went over to the White House and saw Dad’s portrait draped, which was very comforting. It’s so funny now – when we were there, what – a month ago – walking by the White House and saying, “My bedroom was up there. I lived there.” And people going, “Yeah, sure you did.”
Smith: Do you remember – were you there at the ninetieth birthday party?

Susan Bales: Yes, we went to that.

Smith: That must have been pretty special.

Susan Bales: That was special, and that was also the time, if I’m not mistaken, that they let us run all over the House. And we went to the third floor and the second floor – or was that ’41? Okay – long time.

When ’41 was there, they let us literally go, and that was the only other time we were allowed back on the family floor.

Smith: What is it about the solarium that every White House family seems to fall in love with?

Susan Bales: You could put your feet on the furniture. It’s really simple. Everything else is an antique and a museum this and a museum that, and you’re afraid you’re going to put a ring on an antique table. The solarium is overstuffed couches and manufactured furniture from I don’t know where. But you could put your feet on the table. That’s the difference. We used to play cards up there a lot.

Smith: And there are pictures of you and your mother making Christmas ornaments. I’m told she is a Christmas fanatic.

Susan Bales: Oh, she is so Christmas. And I try and be Christmas. I don’t. She over buys, if you looked at the pictures of the amount of gifts under the tree at Christmas time, it’s huge. The house was decorated to the hilt. It’s just the most magical time in the whole wide world. And I don’t know, because I never spent Christmas with her mother, I don’t know where she got it from.

Smith: Do you remember how old you were when you concluded Santa Claus was fictitious?

Susan Bales: You just informed me. Thanks, Richard.

Smith: I’m not talking about Uncle Santa. There is a difference. No, I’m wondering if you ever had that talk with, doesn’t everyone have that talk with a parent? I would think it would be pretty traumatic.
Susan Bales: I don’t remember it. And I don’t remember it with my children.

Smith: The subject you dare not speak its name.

Susan Bales: It kind of just happened. And I remember maybe Tyne had stopped believing, but Heather hadn’t. And I was like, “Oh, we’ve just got to go along with it. We’ve got to keep it for Heather.” And then once Heather had outgrown it, then there was Hannah, and then after Hannah was Christian and Jonathan. So we’re all still believing that.

Smith: Have you seen The Polar Express? Set in Grand Rapids.

Susan Bales: Oh, yeah. We saw that this year, we watched it. Of course, Santa is for real. It’s big time.

Smith: At the end – you went back after the internment, you went inside the Museum, and I think the Carters were there. I assume there were others.

Susan Bales: You know, it was such a fog because we were so tired. You are so tired and you are so numb. There are some things that are very blurry.

Smith: I told people when you are up there doing a eulogy, you’re in a fog, and you’re just trying to get through it. And you look at the family right in front of you, and you want to connect with them, but you don’t want to lose it in front of everyone. And it’s odd, the thing I remember – the thing that cut through – I looked over and Rosalyn Carter was weeping. And I thought, who would have guessed thirty years ago that this is how the story ends. Who would have imagined.

Susan Bales: Yeah, those are the fluky little – and there were a lot of fluky little things like that that happened.

Smith: Or him on Air Force One with the baby over his shoulder.

Susan Bales: Yeah, there were just fluky little things like that that happened that week, that if we really sat down and tried to write a book about some of the stuff that went on behind the scenes, nobody would believe us. Nobody would believe us.
Smith: It looked flawless.

Susan Bales: Some of the people that call and say, “Where’s my invitation?” twenty four hours after he’s passed away – they expected them that quickly. The demands that some people…you just go “Excuse me, we’re just trying to get through the first twenty-four hours right now.”

Smith: Funerals bring out the best and worst in people.

Susan Bales: They really do. For us, for our family, my girls were home, I had been with Dad ten days before. And every time I left him at that point in his life, I wondered if this was the last time. But I had been with him ten days before and I’d made a commitment to come home and spend Christmas with my family and my girls came home for Christmas. And Joy, this was Joy’s first Christmas, and we knew Christmas Eve that he had gone into a coma, and we were on our way to church and Steve just said, “Pray for Dad,” and I said, “Okay.” And so we came home from church and made the decision to open gifts that night because of his state, which we knew it would be…

Smith: On Christmas Eve.

Susan Bales: On Christmas Eve, which we knew probably within twelve to twenty-four hours we were going to be packing our bags to leave. So we came home from church and had Christmas that night. Got up Christmas morning and we all looked at each other and went, “Nobody called us. It’s now Christmas morning and we’ve already opened our gifts, what are we going to do?” And Christmas Day we all literally sat around staring at each other, going, when is the phone going to ring? Really, just going, “Okayyy, this is supposed to have happened by now and we’re still sitting here. Does it surprise you that Jerry Ford is going to stretch it out just as long as he possibly can?”

So in the meantime, I’m calling our travel agent, and every day she is moving our plane reservations another day. Cancel for today, book us for the next day and just keep doing it. Meantime, Hector flies back here to Dallas to get Tyne and Hector’s funeral wear and Joy’s portable swing and baby stuff, because we know once it starts, it’s going to start. Heather was supposed to leave the next day to go back to New York to go to work. She calls her boss and says,
“Can I have two more days off? My grandfather’s health is failing.” Because what’s the point of Heather going back to New York for one night, to turn around and then have to fly across the country by herself for her grandfather, who has just passed? So it was finally the day after Christmas, but I mean we sat around looking at each other, going “What do we do?”

Smith: There was a notion that he willed himself...

Susan Bales: Not to die on Christmas.

Smith: Not to die on Christmas.

Susan Bales: To ruin it for us forever. And Christmas will never be the same; it will never be the same. And I don’t know – knowing him, he could have been willing himself to, but I don’t know. The whole thing is that it still puts a damper on Christmas, no matter what. But I don’t think my grandchildren will – I have to make Christmas magical for my grandchildren, just like my parents made it magical for my children. So that’s my job and I have to do that. And I may be sad, but it’s not about me. It’s about them.

Smith: The last thing, does she talk about him?

Susan Bales: Yeah, we laugh about him.

Smith: Is that part of the process? In an way, of extended grieving, to get to the point where you can…

Susan Bales: Oh, yeah. We laugh, we tell stories, we make fun of him – “Do you remember when Dad” did this and that sort of thing.

Smith: He was not a friend of technology.

Susan Bales: No.

Smith: I was told that he, at some point, mastered the art of solitaire on the computer.

Susan Bales: On the computer, because he did love to play cards and he was a good card player.

Smith: Was he?
Susan Bales: He was a fantastic bridge player. He and Mother played Gin their entire life. They played a penny a point, and at the end of the year, they totaled up who won at the end of the year. So they played cards their entire life. And he did master solitaire, but he and the telephone were not great friends. And the fact is that we finally taught him how to use the hold button, but he never could transfer a call. He would stand in the stairs in Beaver Creek and scream, “Vaden, line one’s for you!” because he couldn’t figure out how to hit the intercom button and call you and tell you that the phone was for you. And if he didn’t answer the phone so quickly, because he barely let it ring once, somebody else might have gotten it. And if the phone didn’t get answered, that was another one of those “God damn it, somebody answer the phone.”

Smith: Like answering mail.

Susan Bales: Yes. Now you know why I always answer the phone. I was raised by him. So another great one was a speech that he gave at Heather’s school in Albuquerque, and he was supposed to say, “CDs” and he said, “CDS’s.” And there was another one, but it was stuff like that you just went “Ohhh, Dad.”

Smith: The Church of Latter Day CDS’s.

Susan Bales: And Glenn Campbell was Glenn Cantbell. There were some things that you were not going to change about that man. Mother never got great on the computer, but she could read email and do stuff like that. And we’ll send her pictures of the kids and stuff and that’s great. She looks at the computer. That generation, it’s just not their thing.

Smith: Yeah. It’s an awful question to ask at the end because it’s so huge, but I’ve asked so many people. How do you remember him? Or maybe it’s easier to say – how do you think he should be remembered?

Susan Bales: Well, I think the way I remember him and the way he should be remembered are almost two different questions. I remember his smile, the twinkle in his eye, and him calling me Susan-Gusan, the girl of my choosen. He should be remembered for his decency and his honesty, and his listening and caring. Because I think, you’re right, I think he’s all – he’s really one big, soft, squishy person until you push that one button, and then he’s a gorilla. But he was truly a statesman and a good statesman. I don’t think there are many statesmen out there anymore. That’s the sad part. And the crooked finger.

Smith: Does your mother expect to be reunited with him?

Susan Bales: Absolutely. Can’t wait.

Smith: Perfect. Thank you.

Smith: Thanks for doing this. We really appreciate it. Tell us a little bit about what you were doing before your path crossed with Gerald Ford’s.

O’Donnell: Well, I was an Air Force Academy graduate and an Air Force officer, and after Vietnam, I was serving in Washington, D.C. Alex Butterfield, who was my father’s military aide in Hawaii when my father was Pacific Air Forces Commander, called me up one day and he said, “Terry, the Nixon White House is getting ready for the ’72 election. Would you like to come over and get interviewed, because I know you’re thinking about leaving the Air Force?” I was a JAG officer, a legal officer, at the time.

So I took him up on that, went to the White House, interviewed with Dwight Chapin and Ron Walker and a couple of other individuals and was hired on as a staff member in the Nixon White House. I did some advance work and then I went and worked directly for Dwight Chapin from the convention until the election and then I worked for Bob Haldeman directly as his assistant from the election in ’72 until Bob resigned in March or April of the following year.

Then General Haig came in to take Bob’s job. I’ll never forget it, I was right in his outer office, my little office was right there in the West Wing. He said, “Terry, I understand you come from a good military family, so I want to keep you on the staff, but your last two bosses, I’m afraid, are going to go to the slammer. So, if you don’t mind, I’m going to put you over into the Executive Office building for awhile until things cool down.” Of course, I was delighted to stay on, because a lawyer leaving the White House during the Watergate time would not have been a good thing and I’m afraid I might have had some trouble finding a job. So, I was delighted to stay on. And, roll forward, when the resignation occurred, General Haig as Chief of Staff at that point asked me to sit in the President’s outer office filling the job that Steve Bull used to fill for President Nixon as his personal aide for a few weeks until things settled down, because there was no discipline, initially, in the office. People were walking in with papers and letters and things of that nature.

Smith: The famous spokes in the wheel?

O’Donnell: Yes.

Smith: Although one senses the wheel was coming off.

O’Donnell: That’s right. So, I was happy to do that and that’s how I ended up having my first meeting with President Ford.

Smith: Let me back up. Do you remember where you were when you heard about the Watergate break-in?

O’Donnell: Well, I don’t remember where, but I was on Ron Walker’s staff, on the advance staff. That was my first job when I came in. That was in June of ’72 and I had been on the staff for maybe three weeks prior to the Watergate break-in. Of course, it didn’t seem to be a very significant event, initially. Nixon had that landslide win in ’72 and then it eroded and ate away and the resignation was ultimately the consequence of that. It was a tough time to be on the White House staff.

Smith: What was it like to be around Haldeman at that point?

O’Donnell: Well, one thing that I’m forever grateful of is neither Bob nor Dwight Chapin ever shared with me anything. I was a young aide working for them and they never shared anything with me about those events and I was very happy that I did not have to go to the FBI for interviews and everything else as many White House people did. Bob was a very dedicated guy. He was an exacting executive. He expected perfection. He said, “This White House is the President’s house and it should be the best in the world.” So if he walked through the West Wing and saw a paper askance, he’d make note of it. And if he went, literally, into the john at Camp David because this really happened, and the toilet paper roll was almost run down, he made a note of it and say, “Terry, that’s not as it should be. Fix it.” And that was my job and I found whoever was in charge of it and got it fixed. So that was the kind of man he was. I enjoyed working with him because he’s the toughest boss that I’ve ever had.

Smith: I also sense that Mrs. Nixon was held at some distance by Haldeman and Ehrlichman.

O’Donnell: The East Wing was very distinct in those days and dealt with differently. I would say, the more modern presidencies have incorporated the East Wing. Things have changed a lot since then. You’re right.

Smith: Did they resent her? Did she resent them? Because I’m sensing there was a personal element quite apart from the cultural sense that, “Well, that’s the East Wing and they do women’s issues.”

O’Donnell: That I can’t comment on because I never was privy to any information about the inner workings vis-a-vis Mrs. Nixon. I know about the two staffs and how the East Wing was dealt with as a staff during the Nixon times, but I don’t know the inner relationship between Bob Haldeman, or Dwight and Mrs. Nixon or Steve Bull. I just can’t comment on that.

Smith: Was there a time, an epiphany, or was it a gradual dawning process, end of ’72 or first part of ’73, when you personally began to sense that a) this was bigger than we thought, and/or b) that maybe the President’s involved?

O’Donnell: I think it was a gradual kind of painful process, step by step. There was a cartoon at the time which I think best defines it because I can remember it vividly. There was a gentleman on crutches and he’s asking someone for directions and the fellow tells him, “It’s just around the corner.” We always felt the good news, the break, is just around the corner. But in the cartoon, corners just went on for infinity, just a squiggly line of corners. And so that’s the way we began to feel. The staff was a terrific staff. It was a very dedicated and loyal staff.

So many of the people, the Nixon people, went on to become Ford people and Reagan people and George Bush people, Bush 41. So they were very, very good, capable staff with a lot of hope in the President and a lot of trust and so it was a slow, painful process that ate away at the confidence and trust. And then, when the tapes came out, some of the tape quotes, I think at that point, everybody on the staff was very concerned about what really happened here and how it happened.

Smith: Did you know about the taping system?

O’Donnell: I’ll tell you a funny story. I did not, bottom line. But when I went to interview in June of ’72, Fred Malek was Nixon’s personnel guy; he was one of the fellows that I interviewed with. After the interview, I went to meet with Alex Butterfield who I had known as a family friend and former military officer for my dad. And Alex took me into the President’s office, the Oval Office; the President was away and I was looking around and touching things and he said, “Terry, be careful, there’s a lot of tricky things in here.”

That’s the word he used and I had no idea what he was talking about, and then later I realized, that Alex was aware of the taping system and, in fact, I think it was under his jurisdiction or part of his responsibility to help to set it up. He didn’t make the decision to do it, but he implemented that decision. But I never had an idea that it was there until it was disclosed publicly. And Alex, I don’t know whether the Watergate staff knew before they interviewed Alex Butterfield that day, but you remember, he was the one who was credited for revealing it up there on Capitol Hill in a staff interview and immediately they rolled him into a formal hearing and made him say it on the record. And I think that was the beginning of the end because without the tapes, the President never would have resigned and they never would have a “case” against him, I believe. I just don’t think it ever would’ve occurred.

Smith: You know, it’s interesting, I only heard President Ford speak ill of two people and the worst he could say was, “He’s a bad man.” That’s the worst he could come up with. One was Gordon Liddy and the other was John Dean, both of which, in retrospect, you can see why he might have felt the way he did. Did you have any contact with either one?

O’Donnell: I had a fair amount of contact with John Dean. Liddy and that whole operation, when you think about it, I think, was a horrible misjudgment, judgment error based on funds beyond belief. There was so much money that was raised, there was really nothing you couldn’t afford to do and here was a step going too far because the money was there where you could do these things and one of the greatest errors ever made in U.S. political history in terms of political judgment and the like.

John Dean, I didn’t have a good relationship with John Dean, but when I was working for Haldeman, I would see him come in and out of Haldeman’s office frequently and I would set up meetings. So I saw a fair amount of him. My problem with John Dean is that, because I’m the general counsel of Textron and before that I was the general counsel to the Department of Defense, and if you’re general counsel, you have to be the conscience, you have to be the road block if something starts to go wrong. It’s your job to say, no matter how unpopular it is, “We can’t take one step in that direction,” or “We can’t put that out in our press release,” or “We can’t put that out in our earning’s release because it’s not accurate and ultimately it’s going to cost you.”

And quite the contrary, John, I think, helped lead the President and Haldeman and others down the wrong path as counsel when he should’ve been doing just the other thing. And then when it began to bind and he became the focus of an investigation, he flipped and cooperated and, to this day, still points the finger. But I think he was very ill-suited to be the chief lawyer of the White House. It was a bad personnel selection and I’ve often wondered if he had been doing the courageous thing as counsel, how that might have changed the course of events, because it was his job to say, “We can’t pay under cover one dollar of those attorney’s fees without disclosing it, because if we do, that’s the road to an obstruction and that could lead to your resignation. So, I’m not going to do it. You shouldn’t do it. I don’t care what we have to say or what comes out. We can’t go down that road.” And he made that mistake and it was a tragic mistake, really, I think, so I would agree with the President 100% on that.

Smith: Do you think John Mitchell took any secrets with him to the grave?

O’Donnell: Oh, I don’t know.
Smith: Well, let me rephrase that. Is there anything we don’t know about Watergate, including, I suppose, who ordered the break-in, that you think we ever will know?

O’Donnell: I kind of doubt that we’ll ever know anything more than we know now unless somebody is deciding to hold back on their true knowledge. But now that Deep Throat has been identified and so forth.

Smith: Did that surprise you, by the way?

O’Donnell: It did. It did. I didn’t know that fellow.

Smith: Did you play the game, I mean, did you have candidates in mind?

O’Donnell: I didn’t have a good lead. I actually bought into the composite theory, that Woodward and Bernstein were getting bits and pieces of information from a number of people and that was Deep Throat and they were just doing that.

Smith: That’s what their editor, Alice Mayhew at Simon & Schuster, told Steve Ambrose, point blank - that it was in fact a composite.

O’Donnell: Because I don’t know how one person, as I thought back at the time, would have all that information. Now, the FBI, that makes sense because so much different information funnels in. But then again, the notion that an FBI agent, much less an FBI leader deciding on his own that he was going to transfer information which he is sworn to protect, the FBI is sworn to protect their investigative information unless they’re given permission, to me is repugnant. I mean, I just couldn’t believe when I heard who it was that he would really carry on that course of conduct. I mean, he had a grudge, he wasn’t selected for the top position, this and that, but none of those things justify that kind of conduct in my view. So it was a surprise that an FBI man would do that.

Smith: Remember, there was a wonderful moment, a couple of years before President Ford died, I think it was the last meeting of the Foundation. It was out there. And this was right at the height of the media speculation. And he had practiced, his timing was perfect, you know. He said, “I have an announcement I want to make. “I just want all of you to know that I’m Deep Throat.” And there was just this stunned silence for a moment and then people realized it was a joke.

O’Donnell: That was a Foundation meeting I couldn’t go to. I couldn’t get out there and I truly regretted that because it was a special meeting, I heard, really a good one.

Smith: How did Haldeman tell you he was leaving? Or did he tell you he was leaving?

O’Donnell: He did. His lawyer was in and out, not Buzhardt, but his private lawyer, and the drumbeat of articles in the press and the like. And I don’t remember precisely when I learned, but I learned from him. He would typically come out of meetings - he had long meetings with the President, generally two a day - he would come out of the meetings and Larry Higby, who had the job before me, would sit down with him and take notes. And out of a normal meeting with the President would come 15 or 20, and perfectly appropriate things, but action memos, usually a sentence or two saying, “Do that” or “Do this,” that went out to the staff.

They’d be called Higby-grams or whatever. And so Larry moved into Dwight’s office and I really took that role. Larry would still sit in those meetings. But, Bob came out of one of those meetings and said, “This is it. We’re going to resign, John Ehrlichman and myself, and on a date certain.” It was really a short timeframe, if I remember. And that’s really when I first - that I learned of it. I wasn’t surprised because the drumbeat of the press was relentless.

Smith: Were you surprised when the stories appeared in the press about Agnew’s problems?

O’Donnell: Yes. Yeah, I had no idea that those problems existed and hadn’t paid a lot of attention to Vice President Agnew’s history and pedigree and so forth. I knew a lot of the staff members. There were some very good members on his staff. And so that was a shock, yeah.

Smith: Did you see much of the President during this period?
I sat in for Steve Bull on occasion and helped Steve, because you remember, I came in to do advance work for President Nixon and when George McGovern was selected, the President found no reason to go out and campaign. And so, the advance team supported the first family, Julie and Trisha and Mrs. Nixon, and they would go out and do events. And so we had some time on our hands that summer and early fall, and it was just at the convention in Miami that Dwight picked me up out of the advance office and I became his assistant working at the convention. So my contact with the President was never personal. I was in a few meetings with him about some trips and of course I was on the road with him on several occasions. I did advance Senator [Allen] Ellender’s funeral down in Slidell, Louisiana, but I had no personal rapport or contact with the President. I was just a junior staff member.

Even into ’74 the defining months at the end of his presidency?

Yeah, when Haldeman left and Haig came in, I went over to the Executive Office building and I even saw less of the President and the West Wing team than I did when I was in the West Wing.

Were you around the Vice President at all during that period?

No, I was not. I really didn’t have a chance to work with him. My dad, who had passed away in 1971, really liked President Ford a lot as a Republican congressman from Michigan and they got to know each other well. They played golf together at Burning Tree and so I heard my dad say great things about Jerry Ford over time, but that’s about all I knew.

What did he say? And how did they get along?

My father had a great sense of humor and he liked to tell stories and play some golf and have a drink or something at the club there, and I think the Minority Leader at the time then, Ford, did the same thing and they were very compatible in their views and they just got along very well. And, in fact, when the President asked me to stay on after the initial two weeks as his personal assistant he commented on my dad who had passed away and how good of friends they were. They were golf friends, mainly, but they were good friends. So that’s really all I knew, other than he was a Minority Leader and had been around politics for a long time and was on the Commission involving the Kennedy assassination. That’s really all I knew about Gerald Ford at the time when he came in as Vice President.

Smith: What are your memories of August 8th and 9th?

O'Donnell: Yeah, the very vivid memories of being told about going to the East Room event where President Nixon made his farewell address to the staff, you know, with all the staff members, and then marching out of the East Room down to the portico and out on the lawn where the helicopter was and waving goodbye at that point. I remember it very, very vividly. The President gave his victory salute and got onto the helicopter and off he went. And I was still over in the West Wing working with David Parker, who was a Nixon guy, who was head of appointments and schedule and what Warren Rudland subsequently did for awhile for President Ford. And then we went back the next day, was it the next day, the next day for the President’s swearing in ceremony.

Smith: That’s that same afternoon.

O'Donnell: That’s right, same day. I was there for that and it was a dramatic 24-hour period when you first heard about, because President Nixon was on television the night before, wasn’t he? And announced the intent to resign and so all the way through that day was very disruptive.

Smith: Were there tears in that East Room?

O'Donnell: Yeah, yeah, there were. The staff was very, very proud of the accomplishments of the President and the staff and really was very dedicated to President Nixon, warts and all, for the good things that he had done, not standing up for the problems, but for the good things that he had done.

Smith: Let me ask you. Someone who was in the East Room for the swearing in, sort of got shoehorned in at the last minute with some congressional types, described the situation afterwards. After the ceremony in the East Room, there is a receiving line and people were all invited down to the State Dining Room for, I guess, a reception.
O’Donnell: Right.

Smith: And, at least, as this individual recalled it, he said, “You could see the Nixon people kind of peel off and go back to their offices.”

O’Donnell: That’s right.

Smith: And it illustrated that among the challenges the new President faced was integrating the vast majority of the existing White House staff, which had no taint, except political, with a few Ford people and whoever else he wanted to bring in. What’s your recollection of that?

O’Donnell: Well, I do remember several of us leaving an event, I guess it was in the State Dining Room or the hall there after the swearing in and my thought was, “This is the new President’s day and this is his staff and his family and his friends.” And so it seemed like the appropriate thing to do, not to linger too long. It was out of no disrespect for him or anything along those lines.

There was, that afternoon, if I’m not mistaken, a meeting in the Roosevelt Room, I think, of the staff, and one of the funniest things I’ve ever heard occurred in that meeting. Everybody was pretty much in a state of shock. You may have heard this story before. And you had the senior staff of the Vice President, now President, and you had the senior staff of the outgoing President and you could’ve heard a pin drop. I mean, everybody was wondering, “What’s going to happen here?”, “What’s going to happen to me?”, “What’s going to happen to the country?” I mean, you could really cut the air, it was that thick. And Tom Korologos bounced in, who had a magnificent sense of humor, and he looked around the room and he said, “You know, you Nixon guys are in serious trouble.” Of course, he was the arch-Nixon guy. Everybody laughed and he broke up the meeting.

I remember that very well, but that was kind of the view because you had a change of power instantly, here, which has occurred very infrequently in American history. I mean, I guess if you roll back to the Kennedy assassination.
Smith: Which at least was a friendly transition, a tragedy, which, if anything, bonded the country. But there must have been enormous uncertainty among the Nixon folks.

O’Donnell: Oh, huge. I mean, “Are we out tomorrow?” or “Should I send my resume out this afternoon?” “Can we help? Is there something we can do?” “What’s the right thing to do?” So those were all those things going through. And though there was tension during the Ford vice presidency between the Nixon staff and the Vice President in that, with Spiro Agnew, the practice was that the great speechwriting team of Ray Price, Pat Buchanan and Bill Safire, you know, they’d write stuff for Spiro Agnew and he really wasn’t permitted to change anything. He’d go out to the hustings and deliver whatever he was told.

I think Vice President Ford probably asserted more discretion and pushed back a little bit more. Obviously, the Vice President does the President’s bidding as long as it’s appropriate and everything. So I think a little tension built up over that, and then there were the things that the Vice President had to do to protect the transition that he felt, I look back and I’ve read, he felt was coming for awhile. And he had to maintain his credibility and there were certain things that he couldn’t do, that wouldn’t be appropriate to do when he is knowing that he is very likely to be the President of the United States at some time in the not too distant future.

I think he acted appropriately in that regard, but it created some tension with the Nixon staff because he wasn’t doing everything he could to defend the President because he had to maintain a certain degree of discretion for the country.

Smith: You can understand how everyone played that role and how everyone felt the way they did. It’s interesting, we were talking to Bob Barrett and he said, “People really don’t fully appreciate how good Ford was at keeping secrets.” And he said, “I’ll bet you there are things that he took with him to his grave.”

O’Donnell: Oh, I bet. Yeah, that’s an interesting observation. I would share that.
Smith: One of the curious things I’ve found about the President that set him apart from most politicians I’ve been around, is he wasn’t a gossip. I mean, politicians love political gossip, but on the personal level, I sensed he almost found it distasteful. That he’d change the subject if you went too close.

O’Donnell: Yeah, he had a very clear - and it’s the only way I saw him, as President - he had a very clear view of appropriateness and discretion for the President of the United States - what you should talk about and what you shouldn’t, and he did not want to get into talking with staff about what’s good or bad about another person other than personnel issues or something like that. He didn’t have any patience for that. I didn’t know whether that was the way it’d always been or whether that was a mantle he took to the presidency. It’s a good thing to do, because as the President it doesn’t do himself any good to get dragged down into gossip and things.

Smith: And I assume there’s no such thing as a private conversation with a President.

O’Donnell: Well, the President has absolute discretion to share anything with anybody he needs to get something done or whatever.

Smith: But in terms of, for a President to believe he can have a private conversation, I mean, how far do you go?

O’Donnell: I think that mold has been broken. I think it existed. I really do. I think the President did have confidence when he was meeting with certain people. Rumsfeld and Cheney, for example, when they did the back-to-back that they would be totally loyal and discreet in that information and to my knowledge, they were. I mean, Cheney was an absolute example of maintaining confidences and secrets of a lawyer. As a lawyer, you appreciate that because that’s what lawyers have to do with their clients’ confidences and secrets.

Smith: Yeah.

O’Donnell: He would tell us, the staff, what we needed to know, but he wouldn’t get into any of the dialogue. Haldeman, on the other hand, would come out of the meetings and, to his trusted aides, Larry Higby and then later myself, would describe a fair amount of what went on in those meetings, but by no means everything. He kept a lot of it to himself and I know that because you subsequently found out what went on in those meetings through the tapes and so forth.

Smith: Tell me about the President and Edward Bennett Williams, their relationship.

O’Donnell: I observed that they had a very good working relationship and I think President Ford felt good about Williams being on the Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board. And I recall one meeting of the Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board in the Cabinet Room in which a policy debate ensued over intelligence tactics, if you will. And Ed, who was a prominent Democrat, was conservative on foreign policy and intelligence, and he knew constitutional law like the back of his hand. And so he and Attorney General Ed Levi got into a to-and-fro on the issue. The meeting concluded and the President asked me to get Ed and bring him into the Oval Office. So, I quietly did that, but it was apparent to those in the Cabinet Room that Ed was being led out of the room by me, which meant one thing, that he was going in to see the President. And he left the rest of the members of the Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board cooling their heels and Ed stayed in there a good while. Finally, I came in because we had a visiting group in the Rose Garden and we were quite late, and I broke that meeting up and to roll forward, when I interviewed at Williams & Connelly after Jimmy Carter won, Ed said, “Yeah, O’Donnell, I remember you. You’re the one who broke up the meeting with the President just as I was about to make my sell.” But they did have a nice working relationship.

Smith: Was he at one point approached about the CIA job?

O’Donnell: I believe he was. Yes, I believe he was and I think President Ford wrote about that in his book, although I can’t be sure about that. I think he wanted Ed to take that job. I believe that to be the case.

Smith: Clearly the President had a lot of friends who were Democrats.

O’Donnell: Yes, indeed. Indeed. He surely did.
Smith: Tell me about the relationship with O’Neill. There’s a wonderful story that Don Penny tells - he was sort of an outsider and he took things at face value. And he saw one day, I guess in the Oval Office, the President and Tip had had a meeting - you know, warm and friendly. And then Tip went out on the North Lawn in front of the cameras and, of course, lambasted the President.

O’Donnell: Right.

Smith: And Don, seeing what he saw, went back in to report to the President this outrage that was occurring outside his very door and the President’s got his pipe and, you know, he says, “Don, that’s just politics.”

O’Donnell: Well, the identical thing happened to me. One of my fun duties on a Thursday or Friday afternoon if the President could break away Saturday morning for golf, he would ask me to call two or three guys in his name and set up a golf game at Burning Tree. And Bob Michel and Tip O’Neill were typical golf partners.

He asked me to do that on one day and I kind of screwed up my courage and I said, “Well, Mr. President,” you know, because it wasn’t my job to intervene on this, “are you sure you want to play with Tip O’Neill?” And he said, “Of course. Why not?” Well, he’d just made this statement this week and it was one of the pointed statements about a football helmet too small or being able to walk and chew gum or something like that. At any event, I was offended by Tip O’Neill’s statement and I told the President that, and he just laughed and said, “That’s nothing. That’s politics. That’s nothing.”

So he had a strange ability to enjoy his friends, almost unbelievable ability to enjoy his friends and their friendship even though some of them were very tough on him, and Tip O’Neill was one of them. He would blast the President on a fairly regular basis and yet he would be in the golf foursome. I can understand Michel, he was on the same team, but Tip was not. It’s interesting isn’t it, because you don’t see much of that today?

Smith: Ford comes into office - where were you at the very beginning of the administration?
O’Donnell: At the very beginning, I was still with Dave Parker in the Executive Office building next door to the West Wing. I think it was on the first full day of the presidency, General Haig called me and he knew that I had understudied with Steve Bull a little bit as personal aide to President Nixon in handling the appointments and paper flow and all that. And he said, “We’ve got people coming in,” and this is part of the tension between the two staffs, he said, “We’ve got some people coming in who worked with the Vice President when he was Vice President with an inbox under their arm, papers falling out, and getting in there and we have no record of what was discussed or decided or anything else. We can’t run the White House this way. You know how to do it. Would you go down there and enforce the schedule?”

“You have to have an appointment to see the President, you can’t just walk in, and we have to make sure that ideas that come into him have the comments of the right people that are staffed properly.” So, I said, “Sure, I’ll go down and do it.” And he said, “You know, it’d be a couple of weeks or so and after that we’ll see if we can find a good legal position for you over at the Department of Justice.” And I said, “Terrific.” So, he took me in and introduced me to the President, who I did not know personally, and as I said, he knew my dad, and the President was, “Great, let’s give it a try.” And so I moved into the little office next to the Oval Office between the cabinet room and the Oval Office and started to fulfill that role.

Smith: And you know who wanted that office?

O’Donnell: No, I don’t know.

Smith: Hartmann.

O’Donnell: Oh, I didn’t know that. No, this is not his study, now, this is the little office, it’s hardly bigger than a closet, right between the cabinet room and the Oval Office and Bob ended up, of course, with the big office next to the President’s study where Alex Butterfield used to be. But, in any event, I moved in and took the job and we got along well and a couple of weeks came and passed and a couple of weeks later, the President said, “Terry, this is working out fine. Why don’t you just stay?” And I said I’d be delighted, because from a standpoint of a position, I was having a great time and that it was a wonderful job.

Smith: What were your first impressions on him?

O’Donnell: Extremely hard working, extremely dedicated, wanting to hear from everybody initially, including his old pals, the Grand Rapids group, the congressional group, the industry group, K Street Corridor, who were pals of his, some of those people, and becoming a little frustrated with wanting to get all that done. You just couldn’t do it all.

Smith: In those first few days, understanding the substance of symbolism at such a time, he had the Congressional Black Caucus come over and George Meany over and people who had not been in the Oval Office for some time, clearly sending a signal that this was a different—

O’Donnell: This was open and this was an open White House, open presidency and he wanted to continue those fine thoughts in the speech he had made upon taking the oath, you know. And so I enjoyed him immensely as a boss and I kind of reported directly to him and to the chief of staff of the White House who was then still Al Haig.

Smith: Was there any question of Haig staying long in that role or was it simply a question of what alternative you were going to come up with?

O’Donnell: I was under the understanding, and I could be well wrong from my perspective because I wasn’t in the counsels where some of these things were discussed with the President. I typically, if you were visiting the President, I might work with the scheduling office to set your appointment and I might go out to the West Wing hall, say hello to you, say, “It’ll be five minutes,” or whatever or, “Come on in and sit outside my office” and I might take you in there and on occasion the President might ask me to stay and takes notes in the meeting, but that was rare. And then I would excuse myself, so what went on was not my jurisdiction, if you will.

Smith: You were a facilitator.
O’Donnell: I was a facilitator. I was not a policy person. So I thought for awhile that the President was just going to give it a try and then Don Rumsfeld, of course, came back and others came in on the transition to advise and assist.

Smith: Was that related to this recognition that the spokes of the wheel just wasn’t practical? That a Rumsfeld would not have come in unless there was going to be some significant change?

O’Donnell: Almost immediately, there was a huge clash of approaches, because what I would say the successful representative in Congress, in that model, which is the one that the President had lived and breathed for all these many years with the vice presidency being a brief interlude, and then the battle of the Nixon White House discipline process, heavily processed Staff Secretary ensuring that every piece of paper that went to the President had the views of all the interested parties, which is a good thing. But there was a big clash between those two cultures, which I observed. I mean, it was right in front of me, day in and day out.

Smith: And, to what extent was it personalized? For example, Bob Hartmann was clearly a polarizing figure.

O’Donnell: It’s no secret that Bob and Al did not get on at all from day one and there was, not without reason, but there was a sense that the holdovers really should be purged, that we don’t know where all the bodies are in Watergate, and after all, it became, despite all the good things done, the administration crashed and it was a failure in that regard and that’s a fact. And so, we ought to get rid of those people and bring in all new people. And that view clashed with the notion that it was very hard to start a White House on the run without the experience and capability of the people on board. And secondly, the President knew a lot of these people because he had been an influence in Washington for a long time as Minority Leader, so he knew and respected a lot of the talent in the National Security Council, in the White House, and in the cabinet. So he really wasn’t interested in making a wholesale change. And there was a lot of give and take. I mean, you’ve studied this and you know, there was a lot of tension and give and take at the time as to who would go, who would stay, who would end up in what position, whether the Nixonites were suffocating and crushing the new presidency in the cradle or whether they were just bringing the best practices of how to run the White House successfully to bear.

Smith: One of the things we’ve been told, and it’s perfectly consistent with what you say, is that a not insignificant consideration in the President’s thinking was basic fairness - that it was not fair to tar everyone in the Nixon White House for the crimes of a handful. He really didn’t want to be a party to branding people, in effect, professionally for life by simply kicking them out on the streets.

O’Donnell: That’s wholly consistent with my observation of Gerald Ford, that he would take that position. I never heard that one way or another, but I can understand that that’s the way he would be. You know, he had a high regard for a lot of the people. He saw a lot of the congressional relations people on a regular basis. He had a high regard for a lot of those folks.

Smith: Those first couple weeks…certainly as he talked about the pardon, one senses that perhaps naively he believed the country was ready to turn the page. As a new president who never expected to be president, he was painfully aware of everything else on his agenda.

O’Donnell: Right.

Smith: It should be everything from Greece and Turkey and Cypress to, gosh, the Glomar Explorer, the economy, the continuing energy problem - all this stuff.
And then there was that first press conference on the 27th or 28th of August where he, again, perhaps naively, expected to be asked about all these concerns and it didn’t happen that way, did it?

O’Donnell: No, they focused like a laser right on Nixon and the criminal investigation and cooperation and documents and document flow. He, even in my presence, expressed enormous frustration with all of the lingering strains of the Nixon investigation. I know and I heard him say on multiple occasions, “We’ve got to clear the decks.” And he used that phrase, “We’ve got to clear the decks.”
And so I wasn’t surprised at all. I got very short notice of the decision and came rushing in the night before, I think I was told, and came in to set up the Oval Office with the press office for the statement that he would make on that date for the pardon. But I do think he was stung by the aftermath of the pardon and strong reaction to the contrary. I think, from what I observed, he knew it would be controversial but he didn’t have any idea that it would blow up on the doorstep to the extent that it did, and that Jerry terHorst would resign and, you know, all of these things.

Smith: This obviously is supposition, but there is an ongoing debate as to what, in fact, lay behind terHorst’s decision. We’ve been told by more than one person that it wasn’t simple. That terHorst was genuine in his disappointment/resentment/anger over the decision to pardon President Nixon, but there was in fact more to it than that, that he felt the job was overwhelming—

O’Donnell: He wasn’t comfortable with the responsibilities of the job.

Smith: Yeah, the sheer volume and demands of the job.

O’Donnell: That was my observation of Jerry at the time, but I was deeply disappointed at the time because I didn’t think it was an appropriate response to the exercise of a well-established constitutional power. I mean, if the President had done something wrong, I can see people resigning, but I didn’t see that. You might disagree with it, but the President has unfettered constitutional authority to grant pardons. But in any event, it was defining surely for the rest of the administration - the pardon lingered on right up to election day.

Smith: Right. Apart from the President, in your own sense, was it literally night and day? Was there pre-pardon and post-pardon in terms of just the reaction of people?

O’Donnell: Yeah, I think it was. Of course, you had the congressional committee stirred up and the question of the President going to testify and “Was there a deal?”
and all these things. They kind of took the place of dealing with the criminal investigation. Maybe they were more demanding for awhile than was the status quo with just the ongoing independent counsel.
Smith: And how did that originate? Clearly Ford was perfectly willing to do it although it had never been done before. But, was that an invitation that came from the Hill informally?

O’Donnell: That I don’t remember because, again, I would not have been involved in the decision to do that. I would’ve strongly urged against it just because I don’t think the President should have to go up. I think it’s a bad precedent to go up and testify before a committee under our system versus the Brits and everything, and even then in Britain, that’s debate, that isn’t sworn testimony. What takes place in the House of Commons is a great tradition, but I think it’s different than an investigative committee grilling under oath. But, anyway, he was a man of the House and he felt that he wasn’t exposed here and hadn’t done the things that were being rumored.

My sense is in the snippets of conversations that I heard, he wanted to go up and clear the air and he felt he was the only one who could do it. And it was part and parcel to “getting this all behind him.” Because the investigation was supplanted by the post-pardon investigation and the trouble with that is the post-pardon investigation was focused on him. The pre-pardon investigation was focused on Richard Nixon. So, in a way, this decision bit back and I think he was really genuinely surprised at the intensity of the backlash.

Smith: One of the things we’ve been told is that the White House was being told through back channels from Leon Jaworski, that it could take up to two years to bring Nixon to trial. That had tended to define…” that’s how long I’ve got to be here,” assuming I’m not running for or reelected in 1976. “Do I really want to spend all my time here dealing with these things?”

O’Donnell: Prior to my taking the Textron position in 2000, I did a lot of defense work for companies and white collar defense work, and two years is about right. And the President’s view is it’s going to dominate all of his term and he genuinely believed, in things that I heard, that he just couldn’t get about dealing with these problems with these things lingering in the background. And I remember the lawyers coming down to see him time and again over the investigation, the handling of the former President’s papers, who was going to screen, what about the privilege, you know, the attorney-client privilege, and executive privilege of those papers. And the President I think just threw his hands up in frustration and said, “I can’t deal with this. I just can’t do this and fulfill my duties. I want it over.”

And so I think he did it for all the right reasons. I was very pleased and proud and surprised years later for the Kennedy Award came to him for that decision because I thought it was deserved. I still think it was the right decision for the country. But it will be one of those things that will be debated forever.

Smith: It’s funny, and it will come as no surprise to you that Mel Laird still thinks he had a better way to do it. Mel had a plan. Mel’s plan was, he was going to bring twenty or thirty members from both houses of Congress, bipartisan delegation, down to the White House to ask the President to do this. The problem with that scenario is, put yourself back in the supercharged climate of the day. Because I remember spending an evening one night with the President war-gaming this, thinking there must have been a more adroit way of doing this. The problem was, any trial balloon, I don’t care what source, would never have gotten above the trees before it was shot down. I mean, there was no way to “prepare” the country for this.

O’Donnell: I think you’re absolutely right, I think it was just too hot a topic. And he decided just to take it on quickly, and once he made the decision and acted on it quickly, there was not any time for it to leak out and bounce around anymore than speculation had already talked about the pardon somewhere out there. And, boom, he did it.

Smith: There has been criticism over the years that he didn’t get much in return for whatever reason. That he didn’t get Richard Nixon to say very much.

O’Donnell: Yeah, I read about those discussions and the intermediary who was—

Smith: Benton Becker?

O’Donnell: Benton Becker, yeah, the very fascinating discussions in San Clemente and everything that was going on out there at the time. I think the President in my view really had his eye on the ball when he did this and maybe he could’ve rounded the corners or made it a little more palatable, but I don’t think it would’ve gone down much easier than it did. And he thought it was the right decision and he got it done early in his administration. Substituted another problem, which was the backlash from that problem, which was focused on him, but he still thought to his last day that that was the right thing to do for the country and I think that was why he did it.

Smith: And then literally just a couple weeks later, you have Mrs. Ford’s cancer operation.

O’Donnell: Right.

Smith: What are you memories of that period?

O’Donnell: Oh, he was extremely focused on her condition and I remember going out to the hospital, I think it was, not Walter Reed, but the Navy—

Smith: Yeah, Bethesda?

O’Donnell: I think. And he was worried about her the entire time, extremely focused on her. It was a tough thing for him to do because they were, from my observation, so close at that point. I think Bob Hope may have come in to see Mrs. Ford or been there at the time with the President. I have a slight recollection of that. But in any event, it was a tough thing for him, that's what I recall personally - for him to get through.

Smith: It’s fascinating, when she did her 60 Minutes interview, she became this sort of controversial, certainly an unconventional first lady. One senses that the initial consensus among the kind of good, grey male political types in the White House was, “Oh my God, what is she doing?” to be succeeded by perhaps mild astonishment when the polls showing that most Americans found this very refreshing. I mean, it may not have been helpful to the Reagan challenge.

O’Donnell: Yeah, it may not have been helpful on the conservative challenge front. The funny thing about what I recall from the President was he was remarkably buoyant and supportive of her views and would talk about them and kid about them. So, they were an interesting couple.
Smith: Was it sort of a joke on him? A joke on her? Or how would he kid about that?

O’Donnell: He would say, just in groups that would come into the White House, you would get questions on, say, abortion issues, that would come up and some of the women’s issues that would come up, and he would say, “I feel this way or that way, however, Betty feels…” You know, he would always bring her into it. “Betty feels a little differently than I do” and he always would laugh about it. Or “We don’t always agree” and then he would laugh about it. And he had that way about him, about poking fun at himself. But he seemed to not only take it in good humor, he seemed to support it. Now, maybe to a Stu Spencer or someone there may have been a different communication about it, but that’s what my observation was, that he was highly supportive of her views and respected her views.

Smith: And that extended to his kids as well.

O’Donnell: Yeah. Yeah, that’s right.

Smith: I mean, one senses, they didn’t ask for this. You know, leave them alone or let them be themselves.

O’Donnell: Yeah, he was, I think given all his time and pressure that he had, I think he was a good father to the kids and was very devoted to them. You just see it come up during the day’s activities. [He’d] ask me the question, “Is Susan back up yet?” or whatever. I could just tell they were always close to him, close to his mind how his children were doing, how Mrs. Ford was doing.

Smith: What made him so grounded?

O’Donnell: Well, it’s just his cut, you know. He just took the presidency, just stepped right up to it and ran with the ball. He had enough confidence with himself, he had enough confidence in friends and advisors and staff, and he didn’t hesitate. I think it goes back to his entire career, you know, Naval officer training, his football career, his law career, small law firm in Grand Rapids. That’s pretty mainline, solid stuff in America that he experienced all of those things. He was a member of Congress.
So there isn’t much he hadn’t seen in my view and he was blessed with a very, I think, good sense of humor. Not that he couldn’t get mad and he sure did, but he was blessed with a great sense of humor and a real interest in people around him. I mean, he would never get into inappropriate discussion, but he knew the agents, he was interested in their families, sometimes he met their wives, you know, because they might have been up at Vail or something like that on occasion. He had a genuine interest. He knew my two young daughters at the time. He knew Margaret and he would ask about them. You don’t concoct that. That was just natural for him. So it’s beyond my kin to speculate, but he was pretty darned solid, really well tied to the ground, really well-rooted.

Smith: The first day, of course, they lived out in Alexandria that first week, and the first day, I think, he actually was living in the White House and he’s walking up to the West Wing and there’s a Marine guard, of course, saluting, you know, holding the door for him. And he walks up and extends his hand and he says, “Hi, my name’s Jerry Ford and I’m going to be living here. What’s yours?”

O’Donnell: Yeah, I didn’t see that, but I can picture it in my mind and that was Gerald Ford.

Smith: But that goes back to this larger question, because there is this view that it was the congressional Ford that was sort of plunked down in the Oval Office and that it took him awhile to learn, almost to grow out of that role. And yet, in many ways, it was those qualities that made him what he was and it was sort of perfect for the time. Did you see an evolution in comfort level - the difference of being a Minority Leader on the Hill and being the President?

O’Donnell: Yeah, I never saw him change in his focus and dedication to his family, his concern and interest in his friends. The frustration that he didn’t have time any longer for a lot of his friends, you know, as much time as he’d like to spend with his friends, that was frustrating for him, you know. The frustration with the discipline and the amount of work that was required, not because he didn’t enjoy the work and have a great appetite for it, but it just precluded him from doing things with people that he intended to do.
Smith: A sociable guy.

O’Donnell: Sociable guy, very. And he liked, unlike President Nixon, he really enjoyed having the debate on a policy issue before him.

Smith: Can you illustrate that with an example or two?

O’Donnell: Yeah, of course, he loved the budget and he had a lot of experience with the defense budget and so, at budget time, he actually held appellate meetings in the cabinet room. This is the antithesis of anything Richard Nixon would do. He [Ford] would sit in the cabinet room and Jim Lynne and Paul O’Neill would be at his side. On the other side of the table would be Carla Hills or Matthews or one of the cabinet members complaining and raising issues about this budget. “Look what OMB has done to this program. We can’t live without this program” and that. And he’d entertain these meetings and I thought that was fascinating. It took a lot of time. Was it the very best use of his time? One could debate that, but he thought, “My cabinet members feel strongly enough about an issue, I’m not going to decide it on a piece of paper. I’m actually going to hear them out.”

So he wanted to repeatedly have the advocates come in and sit with him and he’d entertain debate, give and take, before him. Nixon really wasn’t interested in doing that at all. He wanted that done out of his presence and if he wanted to see contrary views, he wanted a well-staffed memo because I used to, with Steve, all the paper that went in from the staff secretary or National Security Council or anything else went through me. I mean, I was the guy who took the folders, take them in, unless Cheney or Kissinger brought a particular paper in alone and that was rare. Most everything went through the process and it was totally different the way they behaved, but what changed dramatically in Gerald Ford was his recognition that with all he had to do, he couldn’t do as much of that, anywhere near as much, as he wanted. So I saw him move, a little painfully, toward a more efficient use of his time. He grew, in my eyes, as President, pretty dramatically over that period of time.
Smith: It’s been said that his greatest frustration was, by the fall of ’76, he felt he’d really mastered the job, only to lose.

O’Donnell: Right. Exactly. He would’ve been honestly a really fabulous second-term President. He really had his feet on the ground. He really had his understanding. He wasn’t Ronald Reagan on the campaign trail or Barack Obama or whatever, but he was even getting better at doing those things and the last campaign swing which ended up in Grand Rapids with him losing his voice was one of the most fabulous political - from an advance man’s point of view, was an enormous success. Big crowds and lots of cities, two and three events a day. It was a real demanding trip which Red Cavaney and his capable team put together, and I was working with them on schedules and briefings for the President on each event and he performed magnificently as a political combatant in that campaign in the end and you know, “coulda/woulda/shoulda,” was almost there.

You know, the San Francisco situation set the polls back a couple of days. I’m sure Stu Spencer regaled you with some interesting stories. I saw Dick Cheney and Stu Spencer try to deal with that problem for 24, 36 hours and it was a tough one.

Smith: Was he just stubborn?

O’Donnell: On that one, I think he was pretty stubborn. At the San Francisco debate, he said what he said, and I was on the Poland trip with him and I knew he was talking about the spirit and the hearts and the minds of the Polish people, and if you asked him how many division the Russians had in Poland, he could quote you down to the weaponry that they had there, how many tanks. So he knew exactly what the situation was, but he didn’t say it articulately.

Smith: If he had simply referred to the fact that, “I’ve been to Poland and I’ve looked into these peoples faces and I’ve seen…” he could’ve turned it to an advantage.

O’Donnell: It’s the indomitable spirit that he was talking about, not the fact that Russia had tactical, strategic control at the time of the geography, but you know, Scowcroft and Cheney, Spencer and those guys were kind of running around, we were in the back during the debate. The President came out, we whisked him off immediately, and there was no time for any kind of assessment, to Senator Hayakawa’s campaign event in the hotel, the same big ballroom. And the President had been studying for it the day he got there and he mispronounced it, Senator Hayakawa or something like that, I can’t remember what it was. But a great event, big rally and the President was buoyed, he was buoyed by the crowd, he thought he had nailed the debate and he felt fabulous.

Red Cavaney and I go back to the residence. He was staying at a residence in San Francisco. With him back there was the captain of the Mayaguez ship and that was prearranged, and the President comes in and he’s feeling good, asks for a drink, and says hello to the captain. Red and I are the only guys there. Cheney’s not there and Scowcroft’s not, as they normally would be, and the President looks around and says, “Where’s Dick?” And I said, “Well, he’s back talking to the press.” And he said, “Okay.” And the President gets the captain a drink and they’re sitting down, just the two of them there and the President said, “Flip on the TV.”

So, I turn the TV on and he is getting hammered, real-time, right there, this is one hour after the debate, maybe, and the President’s face, he can’t believe what he’s hearing. He didn’t really comprehend what had happened there until he sees this stuff on the TV and Cheney and Scowcroft are doing their clean-up brigade with the press, trying to get things on an even keel, and then they get back to the house and the meetings, they ensue. Meetings break out, they’re talking to him, and I’m out of the room then. But it was a total shock to him and they tried to get it turned around for him all the next day and half the day into, I think it was 36 hours or so, he finally kind of pierced the well a little bit.

Smith: That raises the question, could he be stubborn?

O’Donnell: He could be stubborn and I think he was pretty stubborn on that issue because, “I know damn well what I meant and I know that it’s right,” and, “My words aren’t wrong.” They weren’t as precise as they should have been. And Dick and Stu went in and told him that in multiple ways and he’d get a little angry, get his back up, and almost throw them out a couple of times.

Smith: That’s exactly what Stu said. He thought he was going to be fired.

O’Donnell: And seldom did I see him get wedded to a position so vigorously as he was on this one, but it did turn around and he started to pick up again.

Smith: Going into election day, did you think he had a real chance?

O’Donnell: Yeah, I thought so because it was one large state or two small states that I recall might have made the difference and it was so close, so close.

Smith: Were you at the White House that night?

O’Donnell: Yes. We were in the Roosevelt Room. We went up to the residence a couple of times for a brief stint, but he was up there with the senior staff and some of his key people and stayed all night. It was pretty bad, because by 12, one o’clock you knew things were going down.

Smith: What was it like the next morning? And how long did it take him to bounce back?

O’Donnell: Funny thing happened the next day and David Kennerly took a picture of it. Just David and I were in the office, it must have been between appointments and I said, “Mr. President, you know that that last campaign trip that you took, you performed magnificently and you deserved to win this thing,” and I was a little choked up about it. And so, I was trying to get him to feel good and he came over, put his arm around my shoulder and said, “Terry, we put up a good fight. You can be proud of it. And I’m going to be just fine.” Here he was helping me and I was trying to help him, and I remember that very clearly, and David has a picture, I have the picture around here somewhere with his arm around me.

Smith: Did it take a while?

O’Donnell: It took a little while. You know, he went out to Palm Springs in, I guess, December. It was never the same, really. I mean, it never is between election day and January if you’ve lost the election. You know, you’re winding down, you’re a lame duck. And he got back on his feet from what I saw pretty well, but he believed as we all believed that he was equipped to do the job and that he would’ve done a better job than Jimmy Carter. We felt very strongly about that. And he had his issues with Jimmy Carter during that campaign on a number of occasions even in my presence. He got quite upset because he thought Jimmy Carter wasn’t conducting the campaign at a high national plane of integrity and truthfulness. He thought he was cutting corners and he was demagoguing. That was the word that he used on occasion and this upset President Ford significantly. He didn’t get upset at people very often but he got upset at that. But true to form, it didn’t last and they become friends and they go out with you and they do seminars together and things like that.

Smith: Bob Barrett, during the interregnum, after the election, he said the President would go around saying, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

O’Donnell: That was the sentiment. That was the sentiment and the day that Jimmy Carter first visited, I brought him into the office, as was our practice, and they sat down and the President was not interested in seeing that meeting last too long, just the appropriate amount of time. So we made sure that happened. It was just one of those things, you know. But he got over that, too. I think he counted him as a friend for many, many years after that. And that’s true to Gerald Ford; he’s not going to hold a grudge, at least from what I could tell.

Smith: Do you think his relationship with Nixon was permanently altered as a result of what they’d both gone through?

O’Donnell: Yeah, I think so. I think so. I never really understood. You know, they had a longstanding relationship because of their position in the national arena that goes so far back and it was pretty solid, I thought. I think it was strained during the vice presidency. I think it was strained further in connection with the pardon and the aftermath of the pardon. The President, I remember, we were out in California and President Nixon was in the hospital with phlebitis and President Ford wanted to make sure he went by the hospital, if I recall correctly.
Smith: And that was something the political advisors didn’t want him to do right before the mid-term election.

O’Donnell: I think you’re right. I hadn’t thought about that. Yeah, I think you’re right. But, you know, there’s a lot of things that he was told politically would be very bad for him and he went and did them anyway. I was frustrated by some of them, because politically I wanted him to be strong.

Smith: Such as?

O’Donnell: You know, the wheat embargo with Henry Kissinger. Some of Henry’s advice which he took which drove the conservatives to a further hostile base, but things he thought were correct, he just did them. Encouraging Mrs. Ford rather than discouraging her is another one. You know, the conservatives didn’t like Mrs. Ford because of her views, some of the conservatives didn’t, and he didn’t try to muzzle her, at least as far as I know, he never did. I saw him encouraging, not discouraging.

Smith: In the spring of ’76, the eve of the Texas primary, Kissinger has a trip to Africa, which basically is to advance black majority rule in the former Rhodesia. He could’ve put it off, but what were the chances that he bumps it for the Texas primary?

O’Donnell: No, not likely.

Smith: But he went. I mean, the President told him to go.

O’Donnell: Yeah, he had a very traditional view of taxpayers’ interests, the taxpayer, the citizens’ interests, the citizens’ time. We would go out in the ’74 elections for all of these dinners, you know, the rubber chicken circuit. He didn’t want to leave the White House until four or five o’clock, you know we’d fly out to Iowa to do a dinner for a congressman and friend of his and he’d fly back because he wanted to be in the office in the morning because that’s the peoples’ business. He didn’t want to spend the night even though that would be the easy thing to do. So, time and again, he would arrange the schedule, they were grueling schedules, so that he could, like a good lawyer or banker or someone who wants to be at the desk and feels they need to be attending to the business, that was kind of the mentality that he brought to the job.

Smith: One thing a lot of people commented on was just the sheer amount of energy that he brought to the job, which is not something you automatically think of. I mean, physical stamina is one thing, but just the ability to maintain that—

O’Donnell: Yeah, he kept going hard, and sometimes he would get very tired on these trips and we would discourage him from adding another appointment or another issue, but his friend wanted him to do this or something and he would do it and he’d get tired sometimes. And he wasn’t at his best when he really got tired. Sometimes it would really effect his performance if he had to give a public address, you know, so we had to give a constant fight and he was helping the fight at the end, but really pushing it at the beginning, and that was to pare down the schedule to really focus on the critical things and even though it may hurt some of your friends and associates and members of Congress who you want to spend time with. You just don’t have time to do it all. So he was torn a little bit between those two tensions.

Smith: Were you around him at the time of the two assassination attempts?

O’Donnell: Yes, indeed. Typically, as we worked the rope line in Sacramento just in front of the state capitol where Jerry Brown was waiting for the meeting, there was, shoulder to shoulder, an agent in front of him, behind him and on his side, and between the agent on his side and the agent behind him, I was there walking the rope line with him. Literally, shoulder to shoulder to shoulder almost, because people would constantly give the President things, envelopes, pictures to sign, letters, all kinds of things, and the agents had to keep their hands free, so they couldn’t touch those things. The President wasn’t permitted to touch them because it wasn’t appropriate or safe, so I would take them like the bag man and I would put them in a big briefcase that I would carry. Then we’d take them back to the White House and every letter would be answered and every request would be dealt with one way or another.

Smith: That’s a congressman.
O’Donnell: Yeah, that’s right. And often he would take those pictures home and sign them at night instead of having the autopen. Isn’t that amazing?

So, we’re working the line and I saw, about one row back, a woman with eyes that were scary that I could still see and it was Squeaky Fromme and she had some kind of an orange cape thing on. And I caught her eye just before the event occurred, as we were walking down the line, and I was struck by the fact that she didn’t look like a normal person. I was wondering what she was doing there. The next thing I know, the agent is yelling “Gun!” and her arm is coming up and that’s when Larry Buendorf, the agent, caught the gun coming up and cut his hand right here with the force of the gun. The agents collapsed the President.

Smith: Buendorf was where?

O’Donnell: Buendorf was in the front, as I recall, the front agent and then the middle, Kaiser, the back agent, and then I was kind of tucked right in there. And they yelled “Gun!” True to form, they collapsed him which really meant, collapsing him, meant putting him on the ground and jumping on him. It was a huddle. They’re looking around, they got the gun, and they got the lady. They yelled “Clear!” We’re up out of the huddle, I wasn’t in the huddle, I was next to it, and when the President is going down, he was throwing an elbow because he was being treated pretty roughly, you know, like a football player. Like, “What the hell’s going on?”

And so we get up and we walk at a fast pace and double time, literally, to the state capitol and the President goes like this, (straightening his tie) goes into the state capitol and off into the room and there’s Jerry Brown. “Hello.” [He] meets Jerry Brown’s guys and Jerry Brown knows nothing of this and it just occurred a minute before, two minutes. And I’m in the back of the room and one of the Brown aides comes in and whispers to Jerry Brown, and Jerry Brown kind of turns white and he said, “You okay, Mr. President?” And the President laughs and he said, “I’m just fine.” And that’s how Brown learned the incident. President Ford didn’t say a word about it.
Smith: Maybe it was just too fast, but when you were double timing it into the capitol, was there any conversation, any discussion? Did he say, “What happened?” or “Who was that?”

O’Donnell: I don’t remember anything at all. I remember, I think it was the agent probably said something to him that there was a person with a gun or something. So in any event, we finished that trip, get back to Washington and there was a big fight between security and political people about whether or not he goes back to California and when, particularly Northern California.

Smith: Because it was a hotbed of radical—

O’Donnell: Yeah, and because this event occurred when there been other threats from out there. So President Ford said, in my presence, told, I think it was Dick Cheney that, “I’m not going to be a captive in the White House and we’re going back.” And it was a month to five weeks later, we were in San Francisco and the President was speaking, I believe it was the Hopkins or the Saint Francis Hotel, I don’t remember, and while he was speaking upstairs, I went down into the street to check the situation with advance men and the agents. And there was a crowd, mean crowd, demonstrating across the street and the agents said, “We recommend you take the President directly to the car, from the door of the hotel directly to the limo and not shake hands on either side” which he would normally do because people are lined up on the sidewalk.

So we go back up, the speech finished, the President comes down, we’re in the elevator, and then we get him on the first floor and I say, “Mr. President, the agents want you to go straight to the car.” And he says, “Fine.” Didn’t ask because he knew if they had a reason, they had a reason. And so we get out the door and it’s about ten, fifteen steps to the car and we get about halfway from the door to the car and there was a gun pop sound across the street and the agents yell “Gun!” and they collapse the President again into this huddle. Rumsfeld was on that trip. This must have been before Don went to Defense. And then they throw the President into the car like a log, Rumsfeld’s trying to get into the car and I think he did.
The motorcade then starts to peel out and my car is right behind the agent’s car. I’m losing agents in the control car, so I jump into the control car because it’s moving pretty fast, and I grab the door and jump into the thing and one of the military aides, I don’t know if Bob Barrett or one of the aides was there, and we speed out to the airport. We were so concerned we were going to kill somebody because there were a lot of crowds, and the agents were driving so fast out of there.

When all that was done, I must say, I didn’t have a great feeling about Northern California. That was Sarah Jane Moore that fired that shot off. And, by the way, the shot went over my left shoulder and hit the hotel wall and I was on the President’s left and it was about that far away [gesturing an arms length]. I didn’t know that at the time. And one of the photographers on the other side of this limousine, looking over the limousine, took a picture of the President coming out, you know, one of those rapid firing [cameras], and you could see them collapsing the President and I’m part of the way down and then I’m down all the way. And the President’s 2/3 of the way down and then he’s down. But those were frightening incidents.

Smith: Let me ask you, do you think people took too long in ’75 to recognize the potential threat that Reagan posed? I mean, did people either believe he wouldn’t run or if he did he would be a less formidable challenger than he turned out to be?

O’Donnell: From my observation, that was correct, but I wasn’t a political advisor. I think his [Reagan’s] strength in the primaries surprised people significantly and you know it was a real tough time. I remember in Kansas City, we had the Presidential Suite where they arranged a bunch of very good military photos - you know the President’s photo gallery, those big, framed photos in the West Wing. And we had one with the President inspecting an aircraft, inspecting the troops, climbing on a tank, and near a naval ship. So we had the suite looking really good and conservative, and then Baker and the group would bring up these delegates, onesies, twosies, and threesies at a time, you know, from Mississippi and elsewhere who were undecided. And it was pretty tiny and we worked that entire process of the delegates there and that same suite was where the President’s Vice Presidential decision was made. Having stated Rocky was not going to run, they debated late into the night and ended up with Bob Dole. I was at the door that night of the suite, so I heard that debate going on.

Smith: Was Anne Armstrong ever considered?

O’Donnell: You know, I don’t remember. I don’t remember whether Anne’s name came up.

Smith: The reason is I think Bob Teeter had maybe included her name in a poll and I think the idea was, “We’re so far behind. We’ve got to do some Hail Mary’s.”

O’Donnell: Well, that’s when Rocky was not particularly happy, obviously, being out at the convention, but not being on the ticket.

Smith: How bleak was it for him? I mean, he was a good soldier.

O’Donnell: He was a good soldier and he hung in there. It was tough for him and his assistant Joe Canzari and I worked together to make sure things between the two of them were as good as they could [be]. The President, you know, was fine, but Rocky, this was a tough situation for him. And there was a strategy meeting for him afterwards. You know, it was important for Rocky to go and so forth, and he did, and he hung in there.

Smith: At one point, he wasn’t going to go.

O’Donnell: That’s right.

Smith: He went to his grave convinced that Don Rumsfeld did him in and then he transferred that to Cheney as Rumsfeld’s deputy.

O’Donnell: Well, you know, there’s that classic picture that Kennerly has and a lot of photographers have of Rocky giving the “one finger salute” at the convention floor. It almost looked like he enjoyed doing it, too, you know. I think he was at that point pretty fed up. And the conservatives on the floor, which was a very strong group, the Reaganites, you know, they needled him to death, they wouldn’t let him alone. They were pretty tough on him.
Smith: His relationship with the President, did it suffer?

O’Donnell: Yeah, it did. It was never the same after that decision, I don’t think. He was a buoyant person, Rocky, and the President liked him a great deal personally and he would see him for his weekly meeting, and he would come with a well-developed plan or policy of some sort that hadn’t necessarily been staffed through the White House. Jim Cannon knows a great deal about that and so forth.

Smith: That’s how you were elected in New York.

O’Donnell: Yeah. That’s right and Rocky was a fountainhead of creativity and thinking and he was good. He was very good.

Smith: One thing before we wind up. At some point we’d love to have a second visit, but the fall of Saigon must have been extraordinarily difficult time for everyone.

O’Donnell: Oh, yeah, yeah. I mean, I don’t have crystal clear recollections of that other than the President’s monitoring the heck out of it and being constantly engaged in it. One vignette related to defense which comes to mind is that Jim Schlesinger, whose an extremely bright guy, and the President would have these sessions in the Oval Office. Say it was going to be 45 minutes and Jim knew that going in; and he was a tough guy to get out of there once he was in. And both of them would light up their pipes and there was this kind of blue fog in the Oval Office area, they’d both be in there smoking their pipes. And the President knew a lot about defense and so did Jim and Jim would repeat a lot of what he knew, and I saw that relationship kind of deteriorate because of that.

Smith: Chemistry.

O’Donnell: The chemistry just wasn’t very good, so that was kind of something in the making for a period of time. It was a chemistry issue. You’re absolutely right.

Smith: And the massacre, whatever it was, when Rocky went and Rumsfeld went to the Pentagon and Schlesinger and Colby were replaced, and George Bush was brought back - again Rockefeller absolutely convinced himself that it was all Rumsfeld, that Rumsfeld was pulling all these strings. I assume that was a gross oversimplification or just plain—

O’Donnell: Yes, because they were straight events. The Bush thing, Bush coming into the CIA. I mean, I don’t remember the sequence of events, but I remember them being all at once. Maybe I’m wrong on that.

Smith: Yeah, basically there was a grand shuffle.

O’Donnell: I knew there was a shuffle, but somehow I thought Bush might have been over there already, but maybe not.

Smith: Obviously I’ll ask the Secretary, but was it your understanding then that Don Rumsfeld wanted to be Vice President?

O’Donnell: I never saw that. Not that it wasn’t there one way or another, but I never saw it because I knew the President was going through this process and was working on the Vice President selection, back in his study working on it pretty hard and there were a number of meetings associated with it and people, Rocky, came in and we brought him ______________, I think, in under the tunnel. I think we did. I know we brought one of the candidates, I think it was Rocky, he’d go in to Treasury and go into the tunnel.

Smith: And was that when Rockefeller was—

O’Donnell: Being interviewed for the Vice President’s job, yeah.

Smith: So that was at the beginning of the Ford presidency.

O’Donnell: The very beginning, I’m talking about now.

Smith: Supposedly the three names on the list were Rockefeller, Bush, and Rumsfeld.

O’Donnell: Yeah, see, I know Bush and Rocky were on the short list, but I don’t know who else was on the short list, but I’m not surprised because Don had engineered the successful Minority Leader run for Gerald Ford in the House, so they were pretty close.

Smith: Tell us something about Gerald Ford that might surprise people.
O’Donnell: I’m trying to think if I can come up with something that I haven’t alluded to already today.

Smith: Did he have enemies? I mean, he didn’t think he had enemies, but I suppose Ronald Reagan qualifies.

O’Donnell: You know, one thing that hadn’t gotten a lot of attention is the Church proceedings which changed, perhaps forever, intelligence operations. Mike Duval and Jack Marsh were advising the President on that a great deal. I think one of the things that people don’t really understand about Ford is his depth of comprehension and understanding of the mechanics of government and the agencies and the departments, National Security, Intelligence, Defense, the budget. He really knew how the sausages were made, you know. He would go over to the state department and give a briefing on the budget which was pretty spectacular to show the breadth of his knowledge. And with the Chevy Chase stuff, you know, the constant degradation of his –

Smith: Was that tough for him?

O’Donnell: If it was, he really guarded that closely, because all he did was laugh about it, but it had to be, at some point, tough on you. But then again, he’s a resilient man. He didn’t let stuff like that get under his skin.

Smith: And you wonder how good an idea it was to let his press secretary go on Saturday Night Live and, in effect, call attention—

O’Donnell: Humor and satire are powerful things and I think we saw it this election with Sarah Palin. I mean, my God. And the next thing you know, you’re a caricature of yourself and you’re not yourself anymore as far as people looking at you from the general public. It’s not regulated and it shouldn’t be, but we have a First Amendment in this country and it is a powerful thing. I can remember one trip, just to give you an example, out to Vail when [we] were into the stumbling, head-bumping stories, you know, the Chevy Chase things, and damned if the press hadn’t pooled together to stake out the mountain and they combined. I mean, they had photographers all over there, AP, Newsweek, they were going to share, right? Who’s going to get the big stumble picture? And the President was a pretty good skier and I skied with him a couple of times and he was a lot better skier than I was, and I had a hard time keeping up with him. He would push the envelope, so you’re going to fall when you do that. And, by God, they got their picture, you know, rear end over tea kettle, and put it on the front page of the New York Times, which I thought was really so unfair, but that was one of the political weapons. We don’t really appreciate how powerful a weapon it is.

Smith: A great Ford story, in Vienna in the rain with the umbrella he went over to Mrs. Ford and slipped on the gangplank coming out of the plane and of course everyone around them was denouncing the photographers. And Ford says, “Well, of course, they took it. If they hadn’t, they would’ve lost their jobs.”

O’Donnell: Right.

Smith: That Eagle Scout quality.

O’Donnell: I was at the ramp at the top on the plane with him and I was warned that it was wet and slippery out there and I had the steward ready to hold the umbrella and walk down behind the President and Mrs. Ford so he could have, like a good sailor, one hand for himself, one hand on the railing, and he took the umbrella. He didn’t want the steward carrying the umbrella, so he didn’t have a hand for himself and took that fall at the bottom. I mean, it was a very embarrassing thing. But isn’t that interesting, because he didn’t want the appearance of someone doing his job for him, he didn’t want to look like royalty or something like that with somebody carrying the umbrella.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. What does it feel like to be back in this office?

Matanich: Nostalgic. I have a lot of great memories in here and it brings back a lot of great moments.

Smith: How did you come into the service?

Matanich: Well, in 1983 I was a hire from Hinckley’s assassination attempt. The service hired about two hundred folks after that. I was in that wave and so I started the career in 1983. Didn’t get involved with the Ford detail until about ’91. I left Chicago to come out here and did about two and a half years out here with President Ford, and then left to go back to D.C. to do some headquarters time back in Washington. Then I had an opportunity to come back out in 2003, and I finished out out here, did about four or five years. As soon as he passed I retired.

Smith: How do agents get assigned? Do you have any say in that?

Matanich: Well, we all have dream lists when we come on the job, and headquarters has a division that handles manpower and planning. So they kind of take a look at what the agents would like to do, and then they punch it into where the needs are. Both times I came out, I asked to, which was kind of the normal. There weren’t too many agents who came out here that didn’t ask to come out here. The fact that he bounced between Beaver Creek and Rancho Mirage wasn’t a bad factor.

Smith: Geography is a factor?

Matanich: That helps, yeah. Plus, especially early on, it was a good life. A lot of travel – single guys liked it, so that was helpful.

Smith: He did love to travel, didn’t he?
Matanich: Yes, when he was younger he didn’t sit still much.

Smith: One sensed that around his ninetieth birthday - whether the doctors, at some point said, you’re not going to be able to do this - it was like a turning of the page. All of a sudden, he was ninety – but he didn’t seem to be, up until that time.

Matanich: Right. He was very resistant to slow down. Towards the days when he was starting to decline in his stamina, he would go out to play golf, and he was apologetic that he couldn’t finish eighteen holes of golf. And I used to tell him, “Sir, if you look around, you won’t see many of your peers here.” Now, they not only couldn’t last eighteen, but they wouldn’t have tried it. So he would, even at ninety, he would be out there and get in fourteen, fifteen holes, and he’d give it everything he had, but at the end of the day he just couldn’t finish. And that was problematic for him. He had trouble accepting the fact that he couldn’t get it in.

Smith: And he continued to swim?

Matanich: Yes.

Smith: As long as he could.

Matanich: Absolutely. He was something to see in terms of determination.

Smith: He was a very self-disciplined guy, wasn’t he?

Matanich: Absolutely. The most self-determined man I’ve ever seen.

Smith: Let me go back. You said ’91. Now at that point he was still pretty active, he was probably still doing a lot of speaking.

Matanich: Yeah, took some foreign trips and he was very active.

Smith: What kinds of places would you go abroad?

Matanich: Well, I went to the Ukraine, went over there for about ten days. Did a yacht trip from Kiev down to the Black Sea.
Smith: This would have been post-Berlin Wall falling.

Matanich: Yes. We were said to have been the first American vessel that went into the Black Sea and stopped at the Russian naval station there.

Smith: Did he ever go to Poland?

Matanich: Not with me. I didn’t go with him.

Smith: We used to joke - because when you get to the museum, it’s so characteristic - no other president I know of would have the staircase of the American embassy at Saigon as a central exhibit, and in the ’76 campaign display a screen endlessly repeating the Polish gaff. And the gag was, you weren’t wrong, Mr. President, you were just ten years ahead of your time.

We were talking about playing golf late in life – of course, he and Bob Hope were great buddies, and there are stories that Hope, toward the end of his life, would let it be known that he wanted to play a hole or two. The president would go with him, come back while Hope rested, and go back again. Does that ring a bell?

Matanich: Well, you know, Hope may have done that – but President Ford, that I’m aware of, never did. I don’t think he could have done that. He wasn’t like that – he would go out and give it his all and then he’d be done.

Smith: I was told that Hope would rest between holes, and the president, on at least one occasion, would, out of politeness, and friendship, accommodate Hope – that he would come back to the office, and then when Hope was ready to play the next hole he’d go out.

Matanich: Oh, yeah – in that way, it wouldn’t surprise me.

Smith: In determining the size of a team, to be blunt, is age and activity a factor?

Matanich: You mean in terms of staffing?
Smith: In terms of the Service assigning permanent folks.

Matanich: There is a concept of acceptable risk with any protectee we have, aside from the president and vice president, but when it comes to formers, they pretty much have a standard package in terms of what assets are allotted. That’s all changing, though, depending on the intelligence that’s derived and security situations where they travel. So nothing is ever static, it’s always kind of a situational staffing issue. The nice thing is, politics never enter into the equation, which was always a huge thing for me. I was thankful that we never had to play any of the games of whether you are on the in or out; it was always done in a very professional manner. And President Ford knew that and was unusually good about being security conscious.

Smith: Having been the target of two assassination attempts, how did that factor into his awareness of security?

Matanich: We never had any conversations specific to that, but he always was very conscientious of what we did and why we did what we did. And I think of the twenty-four years I was in the Service, of all the folks we protected through the years, he was as aware and as professionally courteous to security as anybody I’ve seen. He didn’t like inconveniencing people - didn’t like the fact that we did on occasion, in his travels. But through the years, obviously, there was a great understanding of when we did things, and why, and he had us around long enough to know when we were out of character.

Smith: Tell me if this is intrusive - the whole issue of the relationship. Obviously it is a professional relationship, but clearly if you’re around people long enough, a kind of personal relationship develops at well. You work Christmas, Thanksgiving, presumably, it’s a 365 day a year job. How is that adapted – how did this first family address that?

Matanich: I think there has been so much water under the bridge with this family and the Service – the fact that we were with them so long - we were pretty much, it seemed to be, I don’t want to say an extension of the family, but we were just an appendage to them. We were something that they knew was always there and in that regard I think it was, for me anyway, for my time here, it was a great relationship because they always knew what they could count on us for, and especially towards the last few years in his declining health. There is a very fine line between security and safety and public health, and we diverted a lot of potential problems by having a mutual understanding on where the Service fit into the picture.

Smith: That’s well phrased. Penny and I had any number of conversations around our concern, one that a lot of other folks shared, at some point, they really both needed some help. The Secret Service has functions and they are not these functions. And there are wonderful stories…Bess Truman famously wouldn’t have her agents inside the house. I think there was a garage outside the house, the Truman home, across the street. Mamie Eisenhower, on the other hand, had agents who would fix the washing machine when it broke down. That sort of thing. I’m sure there are these stories within the Service. Is it that clearly defined, or does it depend somewhat upon the particular individuals and situations?

Matanich: Yeah, there’s no defined documents. The problem is that there are just so many different components to it that as soon as you make a rule, within a month you’d have to circumvent it. So I think more than anything, it was just a general meeting of the minds on concepts – security concepts and the difference between care giving and taking care of. And so we had our own distinct rules here that some of the details in the Service historically haven’t had. I was very proud of the fact that the family was respectful to the agents here, in terms of having – they get into this job for a reason, and their hearts are all in the right spot for the right reasons. And if you take them out of their role of what they’re doing and you put them in a care giving role, aside from the morale issues and potentially some discontent, everyone here was aware of not pushing the edge on that kind of thing. It was understood and the lines, I think, were pretty distinct and held pretty firm.

That said, there was always cases where the agents were asked, on occasion, to do some things that normally they wouldn’t do. And all I asked them to do was do what their conscience directed. And if they felt like it was something that was beyond what they could handle, then just to let me know. And I never had a complaint.

Smith: I left out one large element here. I assume he resisted, as long as he really could, acknowledging that such needs existed.

Matanich: Yes. He was a proud man.

Smith: The very quality you talked about - playing fifteen holes of golf and wondering why he couldn’t play eighteen.

Matanich: He was a very proud man. One of his qualities that I really appreciated was the fact that he was old school in many ways, and yet thought younger.

Smith: That’s interesting. What do you mean?

Matanich: Well, by thinking younger, I mean, he appeared to have certain philosophies that folks his age didn’t have. He had a broader philosophy on world affairs and he was incredibly up to date on things – even to the end - that most folks wouldn’t have dealt with.

Smith: And a real news hound – the stories are legend about how he could be happy if he had a half a dozen newspapers to read.

Matanich: Yes.

Smith: And presumably that was something he maintained as long as possible.

Matanich: Yeah, he was very current. It was always great just to – I mean, we didn’t have a lot of sit down chats – that’s not something we did as a rule – but on occasion when we did, it was just pretty incredible for me to have an opportunity to sit and talk to someone who went back as far as he did and could tell stories of folks that I’ve only read about in books. And so it was quite interesting to listen to him.

Smith: One of the banes for any former president, and I suppose for lots of celebrities, is the autograph seeker.

Matanich: Oh they were there. Till the end, they were there. Yes.

Smith: And how did he handle that?

Matanich: Generally well. His problem, I think, came from as most nowadays - he didn’t like to see the same people coming back twice, putting it on eBay. He was okay if he thought it was for personal consumption. But if he thought somebody was doing it for moneymaking opportunities, that was a problem for him.

Smith: Did he know was eBay was?

Matanich: Oh, yeah. He knew how they could sell these. And that was the only concern he really had – if somebody was using them for commercial values.

Smith: There are funny stories about – I’ve heard from Penny – to what extent he actually became computer aware – cognizant as opposed to computer proficient.

Matanich: Oh, I’m not sure he did much buying on eBay or selling, but I know he knew it was out there. He just knew it existed and someone obviously told him what the value of autographs could be on the internet.

Smith: I know they went to New York fairly frequently, of course, he had board meetings and the like – were there places they particularly enjoyed to travel?

Matanich: They seemed to. For a while they went every year, to New York; South Central Park is where they always stayed there. And the Christmas type season, they enjoyed their time there for several days shopping and just vacationing.

Smith: I heard they saw Lion King and I think they saw The Producers. I was told they enjoyed theater – they enjoyed New York. Each of them had spent, as young people, quite a bit of time in New York.

Matanich: They seemed to enjoy it every time they went. I think, in the years I went with them there, aside from the board meetings, there was some charitable thing they did where they went there for some silent auction. They would bid on that, so they obviously wanted to go back there.

Smith: It’s no secret, he took some grief, particularly early on, for “commercializing” the former presidency. But people never really took into account the amount of charity work that he did.

Matanich: Right.

Smith: Or the campuses that he would appear on.

Matanich: Right. He was extremely active in that. There was a reason, aside from the locale of where he was at, that brought me back. I must say from a personal note, I was detailed over to the Department of Homeland Security when it was first set up from the Secret Service, and I spent a little over a year there, and so when this opportunity came up, I mean there was more than the location that brought me back out here. It was just the fact that I always respected him for his – just the way he conducted himself, and his humble nature, and his professionalism. He was one of the few – I wasn’t a real protection agent – my personal interests lie in investigations for the most part, in which I spent most of my career. But the protection side intrigued me mainly because of the people. And when I had the chance to come back out here and spend, what seemed to be his last several years, that was a big part of why I came back. Just because of the kind of person he was.
Smith: More than once, it was almost an annual event for a while, he would get back to Michigan, usually around the time of the Ohio game. Did you ever accompany him on any of those visits? The reason I ask is, by numerous accounts, when he would go out there and give a pep talk, there was a sort of untapped vein of eloquence that people didn’t associate with Jerry Ford. There was something about that place and that event that he – almost out of the movies sort of thing.

Matanich: Oh he was always very comfortable around college football players. I went with him to Notre Dame and Michigan and I think those were the only two, but he gave pep talks to the players both places, and the kids were always just enamored with his reports of the days when he played and some of his stories. He enjoyed it and the kids seemed to enjoy it as well.

Smith: The Bush’s had him to the White House for his ninetieth birthday. Were you on that trip?

Matanich: No, I didn’t make that trip. I came in 2003 when he was still quite active, still traveled, still went to Beaver Creek, still swam, still played golf, but shortly thereafter is when you could start to see the decline.

Smith: What was his daily routine like at Beaver Creek? I remember being amused, it must have been Penny who said, he’d go pick up the mail. He wanted his mail and he would go and pick it up himself.

Matanich: Yeah. He stayed busy up there, but it was always either, pretty much reading, writing, and just doing work in his office and the house. Didn’t get out a lot out there, but up until his last year up there, he stayed pretty active. Went out to eat a lot.

Smith: They were both pretty visible around town?

Matanich: Yes.

Smith: I take it they have facilities named after them up there in Vail.
Matanich: Yeah, he has an amphitheater, an outdoor amphitheater up there where they have concerts and various music and plays, and both of them would frequent that place quite a bit.

Smith: And the routine here? Sort of the same thing? Spent a lot of time in the office?

Matanich: Yeah, most of his time was just spent here in the office. And up until the end, he was pretty active out in town – going out for dinner and going to McCollum – the theater. Played golf, hit balls.

Smith: The last couple of years I used to be getting calls with annoying frequency from ABC, with whom I was under contract, reporting the latest rumors – and they were usually just that. And sometimes they weren’t. Was there a sense that at least some elements of the media were out there, I suppose doing their job, but in a way that was almost ghoulish?

Matanich: Well, I don’t know what drives them to be as assertive as they are on that kind of thing, but it was kind of like our headquarters would inquire on any trips to the hospital. And my response, at some point, was, you really don’t have to worry about our trips to the hospital – it’s the trips home because, knowing President Ford like we did, the last thing he wanted was to pass in the hospital. So I said, it’s when he comes home after the hospital that you need to be concerned about logistics. Not that it couldn’t happen, but it’s just that that’s not what would have been his wish. And he usually got what he wished for.

Smith: Was it tough for Mrs. Ford to accept the fact that they needed help?

Matanich: I think so. I’m not sure that it was any more than anybody else. I think that they were just both very proud people and they were not folks to give into anything lightly. And so, they were both going to give it all they had, and she didn’t want to make it easy on anybody because I think she knew how he was, and the bottom line was, they just were going to go down fighting. And that’s what they did.
Smith: A specific example: I remember that last summer when they insisted on going up to Vail, and I remember having the conversation, and she obviously had it with a whole lot of other folks, trying to persuade them that maybe that wasn’t a great idea. And the response that she had was, “At our time in life we’ve had the quantity of life and now we want the quality of life.” And even though it was a rough summer, one has the sense that they wouldn’t have done it differently.

Matanich: No. His response to that was they’ve told him for the last three years not to go up to Vail and he did and he had a great time. So he was just going to continue to roll the dice.

Smith: What was it about Vail that made it such a kind of special place for them?

Matanich: I think just the history of their family up there. The memories they had every time they went up. Like I said, I only was involved from ’91 on for my years, but they obviously had just countless years of memories there in that house and the town. And they enjoyed seeing it grow - Beaver Creek growing. The memories, I think, kept drawing them up there.

Smith: That makes sense. I think I know the answer to this, but, did he have a sense of humor?

Matanich: Sure. We had some fun. He was never what I would have called a cutup or somebody who took things lightly. He was just a very professional man who, when the moment struck him, he saw the humor in a lot of things. But it had to be in the right spot at the right time.

Smith: Would you call him a workaholic?

Matanich: I don’t know about his early years, but for his later years, he worked as hard as anybody I’ve seen in that age.

Smith: Your memories about the funeral: were you surprised? I was wearing two hats that week. I was with ABC the first part of the week and then up in Grand Rapids with the family later on, and I can tell you, the media were astonished at the response, and particularly at the number of young people. And my sense was, these people were being introduced to him for the first time. And they were sort of comparing it with what they have grown up with and he looked awfully attractive. Someone who spent his life in politics, but who could rise above it – above partisanship, if you will. And that seemed pretty attractive two or three years ago.

Matanich: Well, just from my own personal perspective, I think a lot of people are craving his type of leadership. I’m not sure how much that played into the funeral or any of the activities, but I know in Grand Rapids, that was where it struck me more because it was to me a Norman Rockwell scenario – to go back and to see the folks and how they differed from the California situation as well as D.C. And the at-home feel of that whole situation up there just struck me as to the different dynamics of each site, California, D.C. and Grand Rapids and the sense of what you felt in Grand Rapids for him and the feelings that those folks had that went back years with him.

Smith: It really did feel like a homecoming –there’s a warmth there which wasn’t missing in Washington, but so much in Washington is official.

Matanich: Yes. You’re not quite sure in Washington if it’s heartfelt or if it’s just expected. So you kind of play that in. But up in Grand Rapids, I think it was pretty much heartfelt.

Smith: She was amazing that week. We’d been told at the network, from St. Margaret’s on, “Don’t be surprised if you see Mrs. Ford in a wheelchair.” But clearly she was going to defy that. Someone told me this story –after she got back, someone remarked to her how impressed they were, particularly at the end, by her walking all that way to the gravesite. And her response was, “That’s what my husband would have wanted.” Which rings true.
Matanich: Sure. They were both, in my eyes, each other’s biggest cheerleader in terms of pushing themselves to do what they had to do. It was interesting to watch their longstanding relationship.

Smith: Several people have said to us, whenever he was on the road, the day never ended without him calling her. And usually a call in the morning and a call at night, whenever they were apart.

Matanich: Yeah. Extremely close.

Smith: For people who had never been around the man, who just saw the name in a textbook or just saw the clips that we’ve all seen a hundred times, what would tell them about Gerald Ford that would flesh him out?

Matanich: I probably think of the qualities that just took me the most into these times is his constant stance on integrity and honesty. You didn’t need a dictionary to know where he was coming from. He was very direct and succinct and, I just don’t see that a lot today and so I think those qualities are, aside from being admirable, are qualities that the youth of today should know can exist and do exist in successful people, and that it doesn’t have to be an old world philosophy.

Smith: It’s funny because the word decency is used over and over. Some people use it almost as a euphemism – almost with a trace of condescension – that decency in lieu of sophistication. And decency certainly applies, but I also sensed that he was more sophisticated than those critics suspected.

Matanich: Yeah, when it comes to sophistication, I looked at him as the type of person that you didn’t need to – he just seemed to be able to deal with the folks no matter where we were. No matter what level of society we were dealing with, he was comfortable. I always felt he was comfortable around pretty much any segment of society out there and that was impressive to me. A lot of folks, and I don’t know if you call that sophistication or lack of, but I think he was, aside from being just decent to them, I think the fact that he could individually speak to folks and have them find commonalities - because I guess he came from humble beginnings and that probably helped in that regard.

Smith: He never forgot where he came from.

Matanich: Exactly, and I don’t take that lightly. I think that’s quite a nice quality, and another one that I was glad to see in him.

Smith: Quickly, my favorite story which goes to that. The Nixon’s left the White House so abruptly that it took several days to pack up, and so the new president commuted for a week. Well, the first day he was actually moved into the White House, he walked in to the West Wing and there was a Marine standing at the door saluting, and he walked over and says, “Hi, I’m Jerry Ford. I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?” Well, that’s a Congressman, on one hand, but it’s also Ford. To be totally comfortable in any situation and try to make the other person equally comfortable.

Matanich: Yeah. I would not say pretentious was in his vocabulary – at least not that I ever saw.

Smith: Is it really true that he was an addict of butter pecan ice cream?

Matanich: Absolutely. Yes.

Smith: His one weakness.

Matanich: We all have our quirks.

Smith: Would he go in a restaurant and sort of consciously try to lead a normal life?

Matanich: Yes.

Smith: And, what would you do?

Matanich: He wasn’t big at asking for private rooms or special treatment or any of that, so, of course, we kind of tried on occasion to steer him where the situation was best for our concerns in terms of being able to cover the event he was at. So we would get in a position close enough that if someone did go up and was over zealous, or whatever, that we could intercede and he always understood when we were sitting close by.

Smith: It was somewhere, I believe it was in New York, I remember reading the story the next day – a wire story – someone, I think it was in a restaurant, happened to have a gun on him. There was no connection except that once a reporter found out that Gerald Ford was in the same place – does that ring a bell at all?

Matanich: I wasn’t there at that incident, but I do remember the story. Those kind of things happen more often than they are reported. But often times we don’t make them public because if there was no connection it wouldn’t be public necessarily.

Smith: Finally, what do you do on Christmas Day?

Matanich: What did he do?

Smith: Christmas Day, birthdays – again, I guess it gets to that relationship between the agent…

Matanich: The agent’s job is the same no matter what day it is. They’re here, they’re posted around the house or, for Christmas, most times he was up in Beaver Creek and so the agent’s job up there is the same situation as it is anywhere else. Usually the supervisors have off on holidays, so that’s nothing different. But it wasn’t like our involvement with the family was any different, necessarily on holidays – other than he would go up and do the annual Christmas Tree lighting up in Vail, and had certain holiday activities they did just historically. But, other than that, it was another workday.

Smith: And – this may be over the line – do you have a final memory?

Matanich: Not one in particular. I look back and see many different – and as we talk I remember a lot of things that I had forgotten about. It was just the total package with him that was a pleasant memory. I don’t have specific instances that I found appealing. It was just the package.
Smith: Were you on duty when he passed away?

Matanich: Yes.

Smith: Well, thank you. I appreciate it very much.

Smith: First of all, thank you again for doing this. We often ask people, can you think of something surprising about Gerald Ford; something that might surprise most people?

DeFrank: One thing I learned about him is that he loved watches; he loved expensive watches. He had a lot of watches. He wasn’t ostentatious about it. I don’t ever remember him flaunting watches, but apparently he didn’t have a good watch as a kid and when he finally got some money, he seemed to gravitate towards good Swiss watches. It was just a little quirk. And I also was surprised to learn that – I knew he came from a very modest background as an adopted child and growing up in the Depression – but I didn’t know that, until he told me, that in Michigan he used to sell his blood regularly because he needed the proceeds. I think it was $25 a donation. He needed it for his tuition.

Smith: That’s fascinating. I suppose – he’s certainly not unique, or even unusual among that generation – do you think that’s a source of his fiscal conservatism, or at least factors in?

DeFrank: Oh, absolutely. He saw what the Depression had done to his parents, or to his mother. He saw that money was always a problem, even though he got some help playing football, I suppose. But I think that’s really the root of his fiscal conservatism – that and just he was a Midwestern orthodox Republican. I hesitate to call him a country club Republican because he’s not a John Boehner in that respect. He had a lot of lobbyist friends like Bill Whyte of Ford, but he was always embarrassed about things like that.

I can remember in the spring of 1975, he took a trip to Hawaii with his friend Bill Whyte and Peggy Whyte, who I believe, at the time, was the Washington rep for – I want to say Ford, but I know that’s not right – US Steel, or somebody like that. W-h-y-t-e, and he was very embarrassed because he took reporters and we were giving him a hard time about wasting taxpayers’ money playing golf on the big island of Hawaii and staying at the Monaki(?) Hotel, still one of the great hotels of the world – no longer a Rockefeller resort, but that’s where he went. And he was really kind of rueful about that. He said to me that he had cut the trip shorter than he had intended, and if he had not been vice president, he would done it for a few more days, but he was being sensitive for all the obvious reasons. He didn’t want to look like a big spender. He was never a big spender, but he didn’t want to look like one.

Smith: We’ve been told, in fact, that he was pretty tight.

DeFrank: He wasn’t a big tipper, and he also didn’t pay his staff particularly well, I don’t believe. There are some who worked for him for a long, long time, who made a pitiful amount of money. I guess that’s part of his upbringing. But after he was loaded, after he became extremely wealthy, he was still very tight with the quarters.

Smith: He took a lot of heat for commercializing the ex-presidency.

DeFrank: Well, he didn’t just commercialize the former presidency; he created the commercialized former presidency. That’s why I said in my book that every former president should go visit his grave in Grand Rapids and thank him for ensuring that they will be instant zillionaires. He created the model, he created the business model for the former presidency where a former president was not exactly encouraged to go out and make money, but able to make money without a whole lot of unhappiness – without a whole lot of blowback from it.

Smith: Was he unapologetic about that?

DeFrank: Totally unapologetic. One of the maddest I can ever remember him with me was a couple years after he had left office and I started gathering information about all of his financial dealings. It took me about a month to get what I felt was a pretty good understanding of all the various things he was into. I learned, for example, that he wouldn’t go on a corporate board without the board agreeing to give him a separate deal, a separate consulting contract, and I think that one of them was in the six figures, which thirty years ago was a lot of money. And he had consulting deals for every corporate board he was on. I think at the time he was on eight. And he was into shopping centers and radio stations and Jack Nicklaus and Leonard Firestone and others. I wrote a little story about this. He had talked to me about it and was very unapologetic.

Smith: What did he offer as his rationale?

DeFrank: I’m going to tell you in just a moment, but the story appeared under the headline, “Jerry Ford, Incorporated.” Penny Circle told me later she had never seen him as angry with me as he was. He wasn’t throwing things, but he was really upset. So the next time I was out to see him, which was not too long down the road, he really landed on me. He said, “I thought that was a terrible story. It was really unfair.” And I said, “Mr. President, let me remind you that much of the information in there came from you. You were one of my primary sources. We talked about this. You are quoted.” And he said, “Yeah, but it made it look like I was bad and greedy and all that.” And his basic rationale was twofold: one, I never do anything for free. Now, as you know, he did a lot of charitable stuff, a lot of pro bono stuff. But he never accepted money just for his name. He never accepted money without doing something, without giving a talk, without signing a charitable appeal, without doing something. He said, “I’m not on anybody’s dole. I work for my money.” And that was part of it.

In other words, it’s not an ill-gotten gain, it was – to use the text jargon – this is my language, not his – it was earned income, not unearned income, and in his own mind he really made a distinction between earned income, which he had earned for doing something, and unearned, which is “We’ll give you a hundred thousand dollars just to put your name on our letterhead.” Which he didn’t do. But his real rationale was, it’s nobody’s business, and he really got his back up on this, and I will always remember in this same conversation, him pounding the desk and saying, “God damn it, Tom, it’s the free enterprise system at its finest.” And that was Jerry Ford. He believed it. He wasn’t going to be persuaded otherwise. He had no problem.

He had disdain for the notion of the appearance of conflict. This was one of his blind spots. His attitude was since he was a honest, and reputable person - which he absolutely was - that there could be no conflict. And the appearance of conflict was baloney, something created by reporters and do-gooders because he would never do anything involving a conflict of interest. It was a hot-button that never cooled with Jerry Ford.

Smith: Yeah. It’s a fascinating observation. I wonder, initially, because he left the White House with virtually nothing.

DeFrank: As I recall, he had a modest mutual fund, and a congressional pension, and then a presidential pension. But he was not a wealthy man, and he had his house in Alexandria. But that was it. He was a man of very modest means, even after leaving the presidency. It was a big deal for him to get the book memoir. And, as you know, for most of this century, the only way former presidents made money was to write a memoir and get some money there and that was kind of standard. But it was Jerry Ford who expanded the business model into what it is today.

Smith: I also wonder if he – because we sort of danced around this subject – clearly it was not something he brought up. Whether either then or later, he convinced himself, factored in the fact that he had to raise all this money to build a library. I always thought that what Ford and Carter discovered they had in common was that as soon as they left - they had the responsibility of raising the money. And, to Ford, who never spent anything in his campaigns, the museum was nine or ten million dollars. The library building was five or six – a pittance today – but to Ford, that must have seemed like a pretty formidable mountain to climb.
DeFrank: Well, I think he was truly shocked that a guy that spent 200 days a year on the rubber chicken circuit was going to have spend at least 100 days a year back on the circuit raising money for himself and for his legacy. I mean, for a long time he didn’t have a problem with it, but it was not part of his calculation. And he did find, while he had an easier time raising money than Carter, he did have a difficult time, and I think it bothered him.

Smith: We talked to a lot of people in Vail and out in Rancho Mirage, and it’s curious, maybe this isn’t unusual – I’m interested in your reaction. He seemed more comfortable raising money for other people, other projects, than for his own.

DeFrank: Because he didn’t want to think of himself as a charity. I agree with that. It was much easier for him to raise money for the Betty Ford Center, or for any number of other charities. And he raised tens of millions of dollars for charity, but it was hard for him to ask for money for himself. And I think part of the emotional drag of that was that it reminded him that he was a defeated candidate, a defeated president for re-election. And he was always getting a new lesson on how hard it is for a former president who has lost to raise money. And it kind of reminded him that he had lost, which bugged him forever.

Smith: People we’ve spoken with have said it really took him a while, in the immediate aftermath of ’76, to bounce back. And one wonders to what extent that wound never completely healed.

DeFrank: It never healed. It never healed and I don’t care what the revisionists say, he never forgave Ronald Reagan. He was convinced that Ronald Reagan had lost the ’76 election for him by not campaigning in Mississippi and Texas. And he was also extremely bitter - which I didn’t know until years later – he was extremely bitter that Reagan didn’t step aside in 1980 and let Ford try again.
Jerry Ford wanted a rematch with Jimmy Carter. He was convinced that Carter was a disaster to the country, was convinced that he could easily beat him, and was also convinced – and he was wrong about this, of course – that Reagan could not beat incumbent President Jimmy Carter. Ford wanted Reagan to step aside and let Ford have another chance, which was poor judgment even to think that that could happen. I don’t know what Ford was thinking about that; why he thought that might happen. But the Ford people, of course, looked at it from the other side of the coin. The Reagan people thought that Ford had kept Reagan from being president in 1976. That it was Ford that should have stepped aside in ’76 and let Reagan beat Carter then.

And so, once Reagan announced his Alzheimer’s, Ford never spoke another unkind word about Reagan to me ever again. But that wound was never healed. I mean, it galled him that he was an accidental vice president and it galled him that he was an accidental president. It just really upset him and it was extremely painful, and I think it took him months and years to get some sense of equilibrium back in his life about it. You could make a case that he never really mellowed about it until he got the Profile in Courage Award from the Kennedy Library.

Smith: That really was a turning point, wasn’t it?

DeFrank: It was an emotional turning point for him. He told somebody that he felt like that now he could die. He felt like the history books – the historical narrative would be amended in a way that made him more comfortable.

Smith: He’d say, “For twenty years, wherever I go, people asked the same question. And since the award, they don’t ask the question anymore.” The whole bizarre episode in 1980 of the vice presidential nomination…over the years it’s fuzzy how much of that was Kissinger and Greenspan, and people looking for an entree back, and how active was Ford. What I’m trying to get at is - and you would know this better than most - I always thought that of Ford had a weakness, there was a certain passivity. He could be persuaded to do something, but he wouldn’t have thought of it or taken the initiative on his own.

DeFrank: That’s because he was not in the least bit interested in being Ronald Reagan’s running mate. The notion galled him, it upset him. He wanted nothing to do with Reagan. He really felt strongly about that. But, you are right, he could be swayed, and he could especially be swayed by people like Henry Kissinger, and to a lesser extent, Alan Greenspan. And for friends of his to come and say, “You have to consider this for the good of the party, this will make it easier for Reagan to win,” he was susceptible to hearing things like that. And it also stroked his ego. And so I think in this situation, and this is just armchair, off the top of my head – I think he knew what he wasn’t going to do. Which is why I think he constructed a scenario which made it impossible for Reagan to offer it and for him to accept it. I think he did that with malice aforethought.

But he was more than happy to let it go along, let it percolate, let people leak the idea out there. I don’t think he was a particularly malevolent person at all, but I think he kind of saw it in some subconscious level as a way to stick it to Reagan some more. Just to remind people that Ronald Reagan – that Ronald Reagan couldn’t do it by himself - he needed somebody like Jerry Ford to provide the ballast. I mean, he wasn’t above a little psychic score settling. And I think that was a piece of it. But I think from the start, he knew there was no way this was going to happen because he was going to make sure he constructed a formula that made sure it wasn’t going to happen.

Smith: That’s fascinating on many levels. It raises this very large question: he had this reputation for being without guile – whatever that means. And yet he clearly was not without ambition. Was he as innocent as he appeared?
DeFrank: I think he was essentially innocent, essentially guileless – like the Detroit convention incident we’ve been discussing. I think there was a little healthy lapse into guile there. He was no dummy; he knew how to play the game, and he knew how to pull certain levers, but I think for the most part, he was about as guileless as you get.

Smith: Was he sensitive about popular perceptions regarding his intelligence?

DeFrank: He was very sensitive about it, but he was quite aware. I know he told one of my friends once after he’d fallen down on the ski slopes. He said something to the effect that reporters who write these stories, the only exercise they get is bending their elbow on bars in Vail when we’re out here. He was very comfortable with the fact that he was an excellent skier, he was a pretty good tennis player for a long time, and he could have been a professional football player. So in his own mind, he knew that. The notion that he was clumsy, he said it didn’t bother him, but it bothered him a lot. It always bothered him a lot. He thought it was just really unfair and he thought reporters were playing the Democratic game here and it always bothered him.

Smith: How would you describe his mind?

DeFrank: I thought he had an above average intellect. I think he had very good political instincts. I think he was smarter than people thought. As I said, I think he was a man of above average intelligence; I don’t think he was a particularly strategic person, he clearly was not a visionary. He was kind of a meat and potatoes intellect; a pragmatic, commonsensical intellect. That’s why I think people like Henry Kissinger, who was nothing but strategy and vision, and larger context and institutional memory, and shameless flackery and flattery, would appeal to a guy like Ford. Even well after he needed to know better about Kissinger, he was still was kind of enthralled with Kissinger.

I remember the story - most of the time when he was vice president, he was on this little twin engine Convair 580 prop jet. He was entitled to a nicer airplane, he was, in fact, entitled to the backup Air Force One, a four engine Boeing 707. But Kissinger liked that plane and wanted it. I asked Ford one day – someplace, I can’t remember where, it was on a trip – and I said, “Mr. Vice President, why do you fly this piddling little airplane? I know you sometimes go into airports where you need a smaller plane.” Nixon even used that plane once to fly into a small airport in West Virginia. It was Air Force One for one trip. But I said, “Most of the places you go, big cities, you don’t need a plane this small.” So I said, “Why don’t you do it?” And he said, “Well, Henry asked me if he could have that other airplane and I said sure, no problem.” So I was on a big airplane with Gerald Ford as vice president maybe a half dozen times – when he went to Hawaii, when he went on longer trips – but most of the time it was this tiny little airplane. To a certain extent, it showed his lack of ostentation, but it also showed the sway and the thrall that Henry Kissinger had on him.

Smith: Of course, on the night of the Nixon resignation, he appears outside the house in Alexandria, and the one thing he announces is that Kissinger was staying on. Now a year later, he decides to split the job. Is there a trajectory there? Or did he come to – not necessarily know Kissinger better than he had – but maybe come to understand the presidency a little bit better.

DeFrank: I think it was both. I think he got a larger dose of Kissinger every day as president. And I don’t think he was thinking about the arc of history, but I think somebody, and it probably was Don Rumsfeld, and to a lesser extent Dick Cheney, put the idea in his mind that you probably would have more independent judgment if you had a secretary of state here and your own national security advisor. And that it was fine to have a holdover secretary of state, maybe you shouldn’t have a holdover secretary of state and a holdover secretary of defense and a holdover national security advisor. So I think that was a conscious decision helped along by others with more ambition than Ford. But I think it was basically Ford’s view. Ford once said to me sometimes you need small doses with Henry. And what that meant was, Ford could see through some of the flattery, he could see through probably all of the elbow throwing and the special agenda and special pleading; and I think he thought it would be better for the institution and better for himself to have Kissinger split from both hats.

Smith: You talked about the vice presidential plane. We’d love to get the context – here is a vice president in a unique historical position, who on the one hand, more than most vice presidents, has to demonstrate his loyalty to the man who chose him. On the other hand, if he goes too far in doing that, will undercut any chances for his own future in an office that he can’t even acknowledge might come his way.

DeFrank: Ford had to walk this terrible tightrope all the time. He started as a total, almost sycophant, for Richard Nixon. Not my president right or wrong, but the presumption was that Nixon was clean and Ford didn’t have to apologize for apologizing for Nixon. And in the early going in his travels - and he traveled all the time because he wanted to stay out of Washington as much as possible – it was a poisonous, nasty, place – but in all of his travels, he’d always have one press conference on every trip. And he was very defensive of Nixon. He said I see no evidence of any wrongdoing, no evidence of an impeachable offense, and he was very trusting of Nixon.

Nixon had come to the House in ’46, Ford came in ’48, they were charter members of the Chowder and Marching Society, and he considered Nixon a friend. He always thought Nixon was a little weird, but he considered him a friend. He was convinced that Nixon was okay. And he also felt an institutional obligation to defend the man who had elevated him to the job. But as time went on, and as he would learn things, most often from Woodward and Bernstein’s stories, I think it slowly began to dawn on Ford that Nixon was lying to him. Or Nixon’s people, Alexander Haig and others, were lying to him about the state of Nixon’s culpability. But still, he felt this real obligation, a personal obligation and an institutional obligation, to defend Nixon.

It became harder and harder and harder for him to do that. And every once in a while he would let his guard slip in a quiet moment on the airplane over a martini, where he would say something that made it clear to reporters, even though he was talking off the record, that he knew that Nixon was in more trouble. Even if he was still defending Nixon, he knew Nixon was in more trouble. He never sat around on one of those late night trips back from the middle of no place and said anything like, Nixon hasn’t been straight with me, but I have to defend him. He just wouldn’t do that. It wasn’t his kind of thing. But it was pretty clear that he knew at some point that he had been rolled by Nixon.

Smith: You wonder if, with the whole Eagle Scout thing, I don’t know whether naïveté is the right word, but it involves an element of political judgment. For example, the first press conference with him as president was August 28th. He goes in there seriously believing that they are going to want to talk about Cyprus or Greece or Turkey, inflation; all the things that he’s got on his desk. And he’d been forewarned that they were going to want to talk about Nixon. He didn’t believe it; was angry afterward mostly at himself because he didn’t handle it terribly well. I’ve often wondered if that was, in his own head, the tipping point that led to the pardon.

DeFrank: Well, years later he said to me, “I came out of that press conference and I said, ‘Is this the way it’s going to be for the next two years? Am I going to be dogged at every press conference with questions about Nixon and a pardon, and should he go to jail, should he stand trial? If he’s convicted, should he go to jail? What about a pardon?’” And he said, he was just convinced that he would never be able to govern in the normal definition of the term, governing, as long as the specter of Nixon was hanging over his head. He said to me, and this was only a couple of years before he died, he said, “I was convinced that Nixon would be indicted, he would go on trial, he would be convicted and he would be sent to jail. And this would take three years at a minimum, and that would just take me through ’76 and beyond.” And he said, “That’s when I called Phil Buchen in,” his former law partner and his counsel to the president, and he said, “Start researching this for me.”

I think he thought he would never be able to move forward on the huge basket of problems that were facing the country, especially economic problems, as long as the specter of Nixon was lurking, was looming close to him, and I think that really began it. You are right, he was very distressed about the way that press conference had worked out.

Smith: And yet, in October that year, right before the mid-terms, he goes to California and everyone says, don’t go see Nixon. And he goes and sees Nixon.

DeFrank: There was a small profile in courage. That was Jerry Ford. I think if Nixon hadn’t been sick that obviously wouldn’t have happened. But he was led to believe that Nixon might die. And he didn’t want it to look like he was going to let Richard Nixon die without seeing him. I was the pool reporter on that. I was the magazine pool reporter on that trip and I remember being in the hospital. And the only thing I remember seeing was there were some big double doors flung open and Pat Nixon came out and she just threw her arms around him with great heartfelt joy to see him there. I just saw the back of him from a long distance away.

But he was adamant, and he was not going to behave like that. He thought it would be cowardly, and of course, as you well know, Richard, the argument was, well, it will just reinforce all those millions of people who think that there was a deal for the pardon. And now you are going to go see the guy. And he said, “I don’t really give a damn what people think. The guy is sick, he may die, and I’m going to see him.” End of conversation.
Smith: It’s interesting, because in some ways it is representative of a frame of mind. We determine presidential success, the Rooseveltian model, as doing whatever the situation requires. And those are really admirable traits in a human being. It raises the question of whether a president can afford to be that uncalculating, because, let’s face it, if they’d lost thirty seats instead of forty-seven, or whatever they lost that year, it might have contributed in some small way to a successful presidency.

DeFrank: My view, and I’ll bet it was Ford’s view, although he never said this to me, my view is that he finished himself for re-election on September 8, of ’74, when he pardoned Nixon.

Smith: Really?

DeFrank: At that point, the honeymoon was over with the Democrats on the Hill – even his old friend Tip O’Neill said, “Jerry, things have now changed.” The whole tenor of the bipartisan relationship was altered. And I’m betting that Ford said the damage that’s been done has been done. People decided about what they thought about the pardon when it happened. That was the pragmatic side of him. I’ve taken my hit on this; I’m not going to take a further hit. People are not going to think I was in the tank for Nixon by going to see a sick man. If they think I was in the tank and there was a deal, they thought that when I pardoned him, not when I went to the hospital visiting a sick predecessor.

Smith: Yeah, because it raises this question. Here is a guy that I think arguably sacrificed his presidency to give Nixon a pardon, who saw him in the hospital at great political cost. And what did Nixon do? Right before the New Hampshire primary, he goes to China, ensuring that the spotlight will be on him, yet again. Do you have a sense of what the Ford-Nixon relationship was? Did it ever recover?

DeFrank: No, it never recovered. Ford said to me once that they had an understanding – it wasn’t on paper – but they had an understanding – they’d given the pardon, it was probably best that they not show up at things, even after Ford was out of office. And I know that aides to President Ford would routinely look at guest lists at parties to see if Nixon was going to show. Sometimes they got together – for instance, there was a USO dinner honoring Bob Hope once, and every living former president came. So there were rare instances like that where they were around. But they did not go out of their way to see each other, and they both understood, according to Ford – Ford told me they both understood that even after they were both long gone from the White House it was not smart for either of them to be seen hanging around much with each other.

Smith: I wonder if it went deeper than that. I mean, there were stories that Ford had confided his distress that Nixon had never thanked him for the pardon. And, of course, you put yourself in Nixon’s shoes, the pardon was a humiliating act. Why thank someone and be reminded of it? But I just wonder if the relationship, if there weren’t some real resentments created as a result of the pardon.

DeFrank: Well, he said to me once that Nixon was not a bad guy, but there was ten percent of Nixon’s personality that sometimes – which he called the demons – he said this man had real demons – and that the ten percent of his personality sometimes overwhelmed the ninety percent of the better part of his personality. He said Nixon was never able to admit he was wrong on anything. And he said, as a politician, you’ve got to admit when you blow it, because we all blow it sometimes. And he thought that that was a real character flaw.

Smith: Speaking of admitting when you are wrong, stubbornness was certainly a Ford trait and it really haunted him after the Polish gaffe. And it’s amazing – presumably in today’s twenty-four seven news cycle, there’s no way that a week would go by without – and clearly even then, people were scrambling to try to undo the damage. And yet we talked to people who literally, watching the debate at the time before the echo chamber kicked in, didn’t see it as a pivotal moment in the campaign. Within twenty-four hours that began to change.

DeFrank: I think it began to change even more quickly. I remember that at the post-debate press conference, the first question from a reporter of Ford’s handlers, including Brent Scowcroft, the first question was from Pat Sloyan, who I think was at Newhouse at the time, and Sloyan asked Scowcroft, “General, how many Soviet divisions are there in Poland?” And I thought Brent was going to choke. And he used the figure of six or seven or nine, or something, but he answered it. And I said, well, I think this is going someplace. It didn’t strike me in the room, as a, “Oh, my God, the election just changed.” But within twenty-four hours it definitely had, and as you know, it took him almost twenty-four hours to get Ford to even to agree to put out a signed statement.

He put out a printed statement, kind of basically saying, what I meant to imply was. And knowing Ford, it was as grudging an admission as you’re ever going to see. It’s like Nixon saying he had to resign because he lost the political support of Congress, not because he had been impeached and was going to be convicted. And so, Ford was very stubborn about it. And it goes back to his own sense of self. I mean, he thought he was a decent and honest and hardworking and honorable guy, who never had anything and had excelled by hard work and true grit, and that’s the way he was.

Smith: Yeah. You wrote at length in your book about the slip of the tongue that he made, I guess, on one of his vice presidential trips that really stood out because it was, in fact, the most explicit acknowledgement that there might be a Ford presidency. And he sort of caught himself, it’s been a while since I’ve read it, but clearly he tried to swear you to secrecy.
DeFrank: Well, there were two things I remember. He was in Palm Springs in the spring of 1974, and Betty Ford was running late as she often did.

Smith: Wasn’t it a case of opposites attracting?

DeFrank: Drove him crazy. He was always upset about Mrs. Ford’s tardiness. Reporters had been assembled; we’d all gotten out to the airport waiting for him; as is customary, reporters are on the plane, but we got word that he was running late, so we all got off the airplane and got some more sunshine. We were heading back to Washington, and so we were at the foot of the steps leading up to Air Force Two. This was a big plane. Ford shows up without Betty, and he’s apologizing. He said with great exasperation, “Betty’s running late, again.” She was still shopping.

So we were all talking and he sees Phil Jones of CBS, who was one of his favorites, and Phil, who spent a lot of time in Vietnam, was wearing one of those bush jacket outfits with the shirt with the epaulets that photographers and reporters in war zones love to affect. So he sees Phil and he says something like, “Hey, that’s a pretty smart looking outfit there, Phil. Are you going to wear that when we go to the White House?” And it took him about a half second to figure out what he had said, “and to Capitol Hill” and to someplace else he said. And that was the first time that many people who had traveled with him regularly thought they had caught him slipping.

But the fact of the matter is, it was not a surprise to me because that was the same fateful trip in which I had a conversation with him in which he blurted out that he knew that he was going to be president. Now the official version of events has always been that he didn’t know until a few days before the resignation when Al Haig called him and said, “There’s going to be some Supreme Court tapes issued. It could be difficult and you need to prepare yourself.” And that led to the famous incident where he and Mrs. Ford went up to the Chief of Naval Operations residence at the Naval Observatory, which was going to become the vice president’s residence and they were going to be the first VP and Second Lady to live there. They were going up to look at carpets and fabrics and stuff like this. And so they go up and they go through the routine where they are shown samples of these drapes and this carpet and this wall treatment, and all this stuff, and Ford, going back to his office in the limo, says to Betty in a very low voice, “Betty, we’re never going to live in this house.”

That’s the official history, but I don’t believe that’s the first he knew. And the reason is that my first son was born on March 28, 1974. I had stayed back to be with my wife and new son, so I missed the first several days of Ford’s annual trip to Palm Springs at Easter time. I was very neurotic about being away from the trail, because in those days things were happening so quickly – in the middle of Watergate – spring of ’74 – that three days was a lifetime. So I really felt behind the curve. I called his press secretary and said I’d like to see him as soon as I get out to Palm Springs. And he said sure, so I did. It was arranged that I flew out – he had an office – he was staying at the Annenberg retreat – but he had an office in the International Hotel or Inn, which is now a Holiday Inn, and that’s where the press was staying.

So I dumped my bags in the room and I went over to his staff office where he was going to see me. He came right in from the golf course, I still remember he was wearing white socks, kaki pants, and a light blue Munsingwear golf shirt with a little Munsingwear penguin above the left shirt pocket, and he was flustered, he thought he had played very poorly, he was cranky about that, but he was very nice. He was always gracious to me, and we were talking – it wasn’t even an interview. I took some notes, but I was just trying to catch up – what have I missed, what’s going on? He was very solicitous. He said we were worried about you, we heard the pregnancy was very difficult and glad you’re okay. Typically gracious.
So we were talking and it was just a kind of a make me feel better that I was back in the game. It was the best game in town at the time. So I get up to go and he said, “Put your notebook away, I want to show you something.” And he showed me a column written in the New York Times a couple days before by William Safire, one of Nixon’s real loyalists. And I think the headline upset him more than anything else. The headline was Et Tu Gerry? Misspelling his last name – spelled it with a G not a J. And by coincidence, I had put together a reading file to read on the airplane coming out and that was one of the stories that I had missed because of the birth of my first child. And I had just read it on the airplane a few hours before. He said, “Have you seen this?” And I said, “Yes, I just read it.” He said, “What do you make of this?” I didn’t want to go down that road, so I tried to duck and I said, “Well, the first thing I noticed was they misspelled your name.” He said, “I want to know what you think about this. Why did Safire do this?”

Of course, Safire was a loyalist and Ford had given a very ill-advised interview with John Osborne of the New Republic, speculating about what a Ford White House would look like. And it was really one of the more boneheaded things he’s ever done, because he basically was saying, “I’m convinced that Nixon is going to survive, but if he doesn’t survive, will I keep Henry Kissinger – I might make a few other changes,” and it was just really ill-advised. I don’t know what he was thinking. I think he thought it was off the record, but it wasn’t.

Smith: Is part of it attributable to a congressional mindset? I mean, how many people pay attention to what you say on Capitol Hill, even if you’re the Minority Leader? As opposed to every word that comes out of a president’s mouth.

DeFrank: Well, a vice president who has a good chance of being president – I just think he wasn’t thinking clearly. And he was by himself, he probably had a martini – this was on an airplane. So he was just speculating, but it was just poor judgment. He said, “Why has he done this?” He said, “Bill Safire knows that I’ve been damned loyal to Dick Nixon. I’ve gone out of my way to be loyal to Dick Nixon.” He kept calling him Dick Nixon. And he said, “Why would he do that? I want to know what you think, why did he do this?” It’s not my job to give advice or opinions to people I cover. It’s usually not a good idea, but he was really leaning on me and he was really agitated. It really struck at his core because he thought he was an extremely loyal guy, and for somebody to suggest in the New York Times that he had behaved poorly really got to his own sense of self. And he was really agitated.

We were standing at this point and my notebook had been put away, and he said, “I want to know why you think he did this.” And I said, “Well, Mr. Vice President, it’s very simple. They know Nixon is finished. They know he’s a goner. They know he can’t survive and they know sooner or later – probably sooner – you’re going to be president.” And I was kind of mad of myself for the audacity – I should have known better – but I just blurted it out. But I was not prepared for what happened then, because without any delay at all, he blurted something out. And he said, “You’re right. But when the pages of history are written, no one will ever be able to say that Jerry Ford contributed to it.” If I’d had a pen out I would have dropped it because that was one of those holy smokes moments. Here was a vice president of the United States telling me he knew it was over and that he was going to be the next President of the United States at some point.

He quickly recovered and recognized the enormity of what he had done, and he came around the table, and he said, “You didn’t hear that.” And I, without thinking said, “But I did.” And I think he took from that, I think he inferred from that that I was going to use this. When, in fact, what he should have inferred from that was that I was scared out of my mind. I was twenty-eight years old, still a journeyman reporter, and the vice president of the United States had handed me the biggest story of my young career. So I knew what I had there, but I was just scared to death, because I also knew that Gerald Ford was my meal ticket to the White House, which I still report on thirty-seven years later. More than that – forty-some – whatever, I’m still covering the White House most days of the week. And so I can remember saying to myself, this is great, this guy is basically threatening me – he’s basically saying if you print this, you’re mud. You’re done for. And, of course, I was very ambitious as well, and that made me very nervous. But basically, it was an imposing guy. He had about eight inches on me and he was towering over me.

At this point, he grabbed my tie and he held my tie and he said, “Damn it, Tom, you’re not leaving this office until we have some understanding.” Well, I knew what the understanding was; the understanding was he wanted me to admit to agree that I wouldn’t use this.” And I froze. I was petrified. This is where I learned, for the first time, that he was not a dummy. Because it was his formulation, not my formulation. I was speechless, literally speechless, and he looked at me and he said, “Write it when I’m dead. You can write it when I’m dead.” And I was so relieved, so relieved.

Now, today I kick myself. Today I say I should have negotiated, I should have been able to work out some arrangement where I could have used something from it, not saying that it had come from him. Some formulation like, some of President Ford’s closest confidents, are increasingly believing that the end game is coming, or something like that. But I was so relieved to get out of this bind that I just unconditionally surrendered. And I said, “Okay.” He stuck his hand out, we shook hands, and we didn’t mention that incident again for years – like maybe fourteen years, something like that. We walk out – the other thing I should have mentioned is his press secretary, Paul Miltich, had gone out to take a call and had fallen asleep on a sofa in an adjoining room. So it was one of those – everything aligned – there was no handler to say uhhhh, let’s don’t go down that road. It was just the two of us. He liked me, he trusted me, and he was really irritated about this column and he knew I had just come in from Washington, so he was wanting to see what the mood from Washington was. We walked out the door and it was like it never happened. “Nice to see you, Tom. I’m glad your wife is doing okay. I’m glad the baby is doing okay.” All these things he said before, “Coming with us to Monterey tomorrow?” Just like it never happened.

We’ve already talked about that time when he was mad at me for doing the Jerry Ford, Inc. story about his business interests, which was always a hot button. There was another instance where he was very angry at all of us on the airplane. There was an instance, I don’t know where we were, I could find it in my records, but he always loved to do these daytrips, up to New York and back, up to Boston and back, but for him a daytrip began at seven in the morning and ended at two in the morning. It was not – I like daytrips that begin at nine and end at six or seven and it wasn’t his style.

Smith: He had amazing stamina.

DeFrank: Incredible stamina. But he would always, in those days, order up a martini or two on the plane coming back and often he would come up to the front. This was a strange configuration on this airplane. These days the president sits upfront, vice president sits upfront, the press sits in the back. In this particular small Air Force Two, it was reversed. The press sat in the front, Ford sat in the back. So he had to come through us every time he got on the airplane. There was a backdoor, but for some reason, it was never activated. He always came in the front door, came past us. So the good news was there was always engagement on every trip, even if he didn’t want to have a press conference. He would often come up to the front cabin at the end of the trip, at the end of the day, and just schmooze, and he did this on this particular trip, and he had not set ground rules.

One of the things he said was, that he was concerned about the fact that as the Watergate crisis continued while he was still defending Nixon, he was concerned that the discord and the chaos, which was not his word, but just the disruption to orderly process of government, could at some point begin to take a toll on America’s ability to conduct successful foreign policy. That diplomats and foreign ministers and people in other capitals around the whole would begin to wonder what was going on. And that concerned him.

Now, there were six or seven reporters on the trip that day, and we all thought that was a big deal, but we didn’t think it was something that would just destroy him. So we all resolved that we were going to write it, and, of course, the television guys were the first to go back to the Ford press office the next day and say, “Does he want to say anything about this to put it in context?”
Well, Ford went nuts. He was convinced that it was off the record, but he had not set ground rules on this one. Usually they were very careful about ground rules. And I don’t think he thought it was a big deal, but he only thought it was a big deal when it became clear that it was going to be written and would probably look worse in print.

He called each of the television reporters individually to try to persuade them not to write it. He said it was off the record and they all said, no, it wasn’t.
And he was really in a foul mood. He didn’t call me because he knew I wouldn’t publish for three or four days, Newsweek being a weekly in those days, without an Internet. And so by the time he got on the airplane for the next trip – this was one of those back-to-back daytrips – he went out, he came home, and then we went out someplace else, I think to New York the next day. And by the time he came on the plane, he knew that the networks were going to use this story that night, and he was none too pleased. I’ll never forget, he got on the airplane and he didn’t even look on either side of the press cabin. He just came storming down the row and he said, looking straight ahead, without looking at any of us, he said, “Good morning, gentlemen.”
And just disappeared to the back. And that was a rare, rare fit of pique. He was real irritated. But they printed it; I printed it the next week, and the next day, or two days, or three days later he was up in the cabin having martinis with us. It was just past.

Smith: People drank a lot more in those days, didn’t they? That’s one of the cultural changes.

DeFrank: Reporters drank a lot more and principals drank a lot more. There was a lot of that.

Smith: Do you think it fueled the relationships in some ways; kind of a camaraderie?

DeFrank: I think in certain respects, yes, indeed. It was easier to have a more social relationship with presidents in those days. And now it’s a combination of times have changed, the culture has changed, and more than anything else, I think, reporters are viewed as the enemy, even among public figures who like reporters, because officials know that reporters can be a problem. Reporters can bite the hand that feeds them. Because reporters are going to do their job first, even if they like a guy and even if they get invited to events.

I can remember President George H.W. Bush gave me an interview once, and as I was leaving the interview from the Oval Office, he was referring to something that a senator had said, criticizing (him) in the Washington Post that morning. He said, “Did you see this story?” And I said, “Yes.” And he said, “Well, what do you make of that?” And I said, “Mr. President, you know this stuff better than I do, this is just politics. He just said that because he had to say that.” I said, “I don’t think it’s a big deal.” And he said, “Well, you’re probably right, but what really chaps me is I had that SOB to dinner last week with his wife and Barbara in the residence.”

And for somebody like Bush ’41, who was so astute, it showed a surprising naiveté about the realities of journalism, but in this case, just political realities. That’s the way it happens. And so, over the years there has been a wariness that has grown. I suspect, and I don’t think it has anything to do with me, but I suspect, and know reporters are not going to have the kind of access to a future president or vice president that I was very fortunate to have with Gerald Ford. The press secretariat now is designed to keep the boss out of trouble. The press secretary in the modern presidency and the modern Washington political culture – the press secretary is somebody whose job it is to keep problems from happening. The press secretary is no longer a facilitator; he or she is a roadblock.

Smith: Not even an honest broker.

DeFrank: Absolutely not. I mean, you always expect a press secretary to be advocating the point of view of the person he or she works for. But it goes beyond that.
The press secretary is now someone to keep reporters away from the boss at all costs. In those days, we were all fortunate – that small group that traveled with him – because we got to know him well and he was a different sort of guy. He didn’t need to be told what to think about reporters. I feel really lucky.

Smith: Can you imagine a press secretary going on Saturday Night Live today?

DeFrank: Well, Ron Nessen did it in the early days of the Ford administration.

Smith: Was it a good idea?

DeFrank: No, it wasn’t a good idea. It was not a good idea at all.

Smith: One wonders about Nessen. One senses that there was a television guy with a need to be on camera.

DeFrank: Well, also Ron, as you well know, had come from NBC, and Saturday Night Live is produced by NBC, and I think Ron, even then, was thinking about what he was going to do after the Ford press secretary job ended. And I think it was a bad idea.
Smith: Did you know about Mrs. Ford’s problems, however defined?

DeFrank: I did. I didn’t know about the pills, I didn’t know about the pain killers. I knew about the drinking because we would see her wander back on the airplane sometimes with a drink in her hand. I can remember on this spring trip in ’74 to Hawaii, there was a staff complex, and right next door was a press center, a very small press center in the marquee of each hotel. And she wandered in on one of those days with a drink in the middle of the day. I think it was a screwdriver, I can’t be certain. She wasn’t incapacitated, but she was drinking in the middle of the day. And so I had seen that, but I had never had any inkling that she had a serious problem. I took it to be she was a social drinker and drinking more than she probably should, but I didn’t connect the dots.

Smith: Would anyone have written it, if they had?

DeFrank: Probably not, because she was the wife of a president, not a president. But, of course, every instance is different. Had she passed out at a dinner, or had she fallen out of her chair or knocked over something, then I think you can’t ignore it, especially if it was on videotape or film. But I think, for the most part, in those days it probably would have been overlooked. But certainly not today. Everything is fair game today.

Smith: They were, in some ways, opposites attracting. We talked about the punctuality thing. He was religiously punctual. In fact, maybe it even became a bigger issue with him than it would have been because of the contrast with her, who was never on time for anything in her life. You wonder if there is an element of perfectionism – she wants to look perfect, she wants exactly the right jewelry, preparing takes longer. But you wonder – some people are just tardy or if there is anything more to it than that.

DeFrank: Well, I think that’s part of it.
Smith: Or you can get conspiratorial. If she harbored unspoken resentment about so much of their marriage when he was on the road and away, climbing the ladder and leaving the responsibilities with her. That’s pure speculation.

DeFrank: I don’t know. That sounds reasonable to me, but I couldn’t prove it. But I also think, now that we know more about her than we did all those years ago, maybe it was the alcohol and the pain killers, the drugs, the medications, that contributed to that. He once said some remark about women’s things – very dismissive. But that was just in the context of “Betty’s always late.” But I think maybe her medical condition affected it as well.

Smith: Was he in denial for a long time?

DeFrank: He was. I think he was.

Smith: And I wonder if he felt any guilt – not simply about being away at a critical time as much as he was – but whether his absences in some way, may have contributed to her problem.

DeFrank: I think he did feel a certain element of guilt. He was gone while bad things were happening to her. And, of course, the breast cancer, I think, exacerbated his feelings of guilt about being gone, but the good news there was that they were in the White House and she had the best medical care she could have gotten anywhere. But I think the mastectomy fueled his sense of guilt that he was AWOL for her and I think it did bug him. And I think that’s one of the reasons why he quit drinking. He said to me once, years later, he said, “Well, it just wasn’t any fun drinking by myself, so I stopped.” But I also think it was more of a principle decision on his part, too. She couldn’t drink, and he wasn’t going to aid and abet. I think part of him said, I probably had something to do with this because I was never there and I’m not going to repeat my mistake a second time.
Smith: Today we take it for granted, but thirty-five years ago the notion that the First Lady of the United States had breast cancer – the word breast was never mentioned on television. It really does seem like things have evolved in terms of public awareness.

DeFrank: Well, obituaries would say things like died after a lengthy illness. And now in obituaries you have to have a reason not to have the cause of death listed. But everything was so much more in code in those days, and for a First Family or First Lady, even more so. It’s hard to believe how primitive by contemporary standards discussion about things like that were. It was shocking, and it was shocking because it was just not spoken about. And I give Betty Ford a great deal of credit for wanting to go public – making sure that people knew about it and knew about treatment and early detection and all of that. I think she provided a great national public service.

Smith: There is a school of thought that says she enjoyed the White House.

DeFrank: Oh, she did. She loved the White House. There is a famous David Kennerly picture of her dancing in bare feet on the Cabinet Room table. She loved the White House. For the first time in her life she had help. She had people.

Smith: She had help and she had a stage.

DeFrank: Yes, exactly.

Smith: She had been a performer. And you often wonder – again – you could never crawl inside a marriage, but at what point did resentment fester that he was off making a name for himself, and she…

DeFrank: was wrapping bandages with the Senate ladies for the Red Cross. But that all changed because the White House, as you say, was a stage for her. For the first time in her life, she didn’t have to worry about carpooling the kids or cooking tuna noodle casserole, or being out of his liverwurst for his sandwiches – which she hated for him to be eating. Especially after he left the White House.

Smith: Jack Marsh told us that the day before (Ford) went to Chicago to give the VFW speech about earned amnesty, whatever they called it – and you have he went into the Oval Office and said, “Mr. President, I have some bad news.” And he’d had no shortage of that. But it turned out that Steve, on his birthday, had not registered for the draft. And he said Ford looked gob-smacked. He just sort of put his head in his hands. They took care of it before the day was over. And no one ever got the story. But you can imagine in today’s media climate, on the eve of this politically risky initiative…I’ve often wondered whether that initiative and the pardon are not pieces of the whole. That Ford initially saw his task as trying to heal the country. And whether they were in some ways, almost equal.

DeFrank: It was binding up the wounds. As you well know, the title of his memoir was A Time to Heal. And I think it went beyond the pardon. It went to Vietnam, it went to the draft issue, and it went to the protests. Washington was such a snake pit the summer of ’74. It was hot and muggy and sticky and awful, but it was just a terrible – not a happy place - to be. I told the story many times about in those days Pennsylvania Avenue was a main east/west artery. Today it’s closed because of security reasons. But you could demonstrate in front of the White House and a big band of anti-Nixon demonstrators had set up shop right across the street on Lafayette Park, and they would hold up these signs that said, “Honk if you think he’s guilty.”

My enduring memory of the summer of ’74 is going by the White House, in and out day after day after day, early morning, middle of the day, late at night, and you’d hear the horns honking all day long. And I often wondered whether Nixon could hear that because it was a cacophony of horns being tooted. And I always like to say that on August 8, 1974, the honking stopped.
And I think that was part of Ford’s mission. He thought it was time – not only to bind up the political wounds – but just to bind up the wounds of a nation that was angry at itself over Vietnam, over Watergate, over the pardon, over lots of things. I’ve often said, in this superheated partisan atmosphere of today, where’s Jerry Ford when we really need him? Because we really need that kind of humanity. We really need that kind of personality. I think he would be able to make all of this better. So I think he saw this healing mission in a grander context than just merely winding up the Nixon wounds.

Smith: Let me ask you, I realize it is speculative, but we’ve talked to Mel Laird. He loves Ford, but he’s still mad at Ford for not, in effect, doing what Mel wanted him to do about the pardon. Laird believes that he could have put together a bipartisan group from both Houses, brought them to the White House, and had them, in effect, petition the President for a pardon.

Now, the problem with that scenario is – at least in my memories – it was such a supercharged atmosphere, I don’t know how you could have launched a trial balloon without it being shot down before it ever cleared the trees. Even people who acknowledged the pardon may have been necessary, still say there must have been a more politically adroit way to do it. But if there was, I don’t know what it was.

DeFrank: It had to be done in complete secrecy, for one thing. And something like this would have been instantly dismissed by the press, among others, as just a ploy engineered by the White House to take some of the heat off of President Ford. No one would have believed that the White House wasn’t doing a backdoor deal on this, especially since – well, no, Rumsfeld was not there at that point, and neither was Cheney. With Al Haig there, I think the body politic, and especially the media, would have said this is another Haig concoction, trying to deflect heat off Nixon. You would have instantly resurrected the deal – is there a deal here? Even before the pardon itself resurrected the notion. And so I think it would have been a non-starter. I think that’s crazy because I always thought Mel Laird had more political sense than that.

Smith: We’ve talked about how you believed, maybe he believed, that any realistic chance of re-election was probably sacrificed when he issued the pardon. We can look, in some quantifiable way, at the political damage that was caused by pardoning Nixon. But we can only speculate as to what the damage would have been, if he had not pardoned Nixon. And spent the next two years with trials and obsessive press coverage. Wasn’t it really a case where you were damned if you did and damned if you didn’t?

DeFrank: Yes. I think he had no choice. I think the pardon, in retrospect, was the best of miserable alternatives. But I think he had no choice but to do it. And I think from the start, he understood the hit he was going to take on this.

Smith: A couple of quick things and we’ll let you go. You talked about how ugly things were in ’74. I think at the time he died there was certain amount of misplaced nostalgia. I think a lot of people were introduced to him for the first time that week. They saw the old clippings and they compared it to today’s political climate and it looked pretty good. As you know, it wasn’t exactly an era of good feeling in the ‘60s and ‘70s. Yet, it seems to have been a much more constructive period. The parties could work together. What was it about that period, and what was Ford’s contribution to that before the presidency?

DeFrank: Well, Ford was much more in the Arthur Vandenberg school about foreign policy stopping at the water’s edge. He said a zillion times, “I think people can disagree without being disagreeable.” That was part of his philosophy. There was a time, I think in the ‘70s, you didn’t always have to have a clear a winner and a clear loser. There was a middle ground. There was less polarization. There is just incredible polarization in this town right now. And even though both sides behave a little bit better right now, it is still very polarized.
Smith: Isn’t it possible that one of the factors that created this, in some ways artificial, consensus was the Cold War? For forty years the number one priority, enough to make people at critical junctures forget their purely partisan identification, was staying alive.

DeFrank: Mutually assured destruction. I think that’s right. The Cold War was a unifying force because everybody could support staying militarily strong and doing what you had to do to, as you say, stay alive. And so there was always a partisan divide, but it was much less nasty. And now it’s just nasty and poisonous on each side. And that and the Internet, you can call people bad things instantly.

Smith: And the more outrageous you are, the greater the likelihood you are going to get noticed.

DeFrank: Right.

Smith: Which is what it’s all about.

DeFrank: Making a splash, being even more outrageous – is what Sarah Palin has figured out, although I think she has probably started to peak here. But despite the incredible polarization over Watergate, for most of the ‘60s and the ‘70s and Vietnam, you could function on the political level in Washington more easily. Things could get done. That’s why I think history is probably going to judge the passage of the health care law as a significant cultural accomplishment for many reasons. One of which is, it’s hard to imagine how they have a White House that was able to get the support to get even a watered-down, scaled back version of that health care bill passed, given the anger and the volatility and the polarization of the process.

Smith: You’ve been with the Daily News how long?

DeFrank: Fourteen years plus.
Smith: Okay. So you were not around when the famous headline…?

DeFrank: No, I was at the National Press Club that day when he gave that speech, but I was not here.

Smith: In the course of the Rockefeller research… a lot of Ford’s speeches involved tug of war between competing speechwriting teams or philosophical arguments, or whatever. That one clearly did. Bill Seidman told me how his camp, which included the vice president, and Bob Hartmann, thought they had written the last draft. And, to their astonishment, the Bill Simon/Alan Greenspan camp got their fingerprints on the final draft. And you wonder how much of this was defensive, with the Reagan challenge looming – you want to throw something to the right. And how much of it was Ford’s orthodox economics - if we bail out New York, what precedent does it set?

DeFrank: It had to be both. But he was very adamant. I did a long interview with him about that years after he left office – about New York – after I came to the Daily News. I knew that was a story I’d be able to print for this paper some day. And he just basically said the same thing you just said. If we let New York off the hook, the unions will go crazy, it will never be able to fix New York and we’ll have to do it again in Boston or Philadelphia, or someplace else. And we had to draw the line someplace.

Smith: Hugh Carey told me once – he may have just been politic - but he said, “I never thought Jerry Ford got the credit he deserved because of his tough love approach to New York, without which no change would have been possible.”

DeFrank: Well, that was Ford’s point. He always said that they paid back those loans, and it worked out. And it wouldn’t have worked out if I hadn’t beaten them up. So he felt very proud about that and he didn’t like the drop dead cover. He said to me about the headline, he said it should have been “I Saved New York.”
Smith: We didn’t know that at the time.

DeFrank: No.

Smith: Do you think he grew into the presidency?

DeFrank: He did.

Smith: Did he master the job?

DeFrank: I think he did. I think he had a strong grounding. Of course, as you know, in the legislative process - all that time on the Appropriations Committee - I think he had mastered the whole budgetary piece of the presidency. But I think he got more comfortable in what I call the public diplomacy part of the job. I think he mastered it. He definitely grew in the job. And it’s too bad; I would have liked to have seen what another four years of Ford would have been like.

Smith: Do you know what Bob Hartmann’s job in the second term was to have been?

DeFrank: No.

Smith: Ambassador to Ireland. Was that another example of Ford being too loyal to someone? Granted that Hartmann had played a significant role and made real contributions, is there a point at which presidential loyalty is…

DeFrank: Yes, always. But that’s not specific to Ford. I mean, every president has blind spots. Bush ’41 kept Nick Brady around as secretary of treasury, even though he was probably one of the more incompetent treasury secretaries ever. Presidents always surround themselves with one or two or three hacks, toadies. And in Hartmann’s case, he wasn’t a hack, he was a very good speechwriter.

What I liked about Hartmann was, Hartmann was one of those people who could write like Jerry Ford talked. You could tell a Hartmann speech because it was a speech that sounded like Jerry Ford had written it, for the most part.
And so he was loyal, but he also knew that Hartmann had a bad temper, had increasingly lost control of his drinking. There had been complaints from the Secret Service about altercations with Hartmann. And there was a famous incident, you may or may not have heard about it, about Bob, scantily clothed in a hallway on some trip with a drink in his hand, threatening to transfer a Secret Service agent who wouldn’t give him another drink to Alaska – to Kodiak, I think it was. And so Ford knew all that, but I don’t begrudge presidents their loyalty. But sometimes you have to find jobs for loyalists that are commensurate with their ability. And I don’t Bob Hartmann would have gotten confirmed by the Senate as ambassador to anything. That’s the kind of thing you’d need to have an ambassadorship to OECD, or something where you don’t necessarily need a Senate confirmation.

Smith: Hartmann, from what we know, saved Ford from himself at times.

DeFrank: Often times.

Smith: And Ford recognized the value of having someone around like that, particularly in the White House, where they are few and far between.

DeFrank: Of course, Rumsfeld and Cheney couldn’t stand him. They worked really hard to undermine him with David Gergen and others. Ford didn’t like the fighting, but he kept Hartmann on. And so, again, I don’t mind a president being loyal to his friends, but at some point you’ve got to make sure that taking care of your friends is done in a way that is not bad for America.

Smith: Since you saw so much of him after he left office, I’d be interested in your views on this. I mentioned in the eulogy the cliché that we get more conservative as we have more to conserve, or nostalgia takes over, or whatever – we get more cautious. And Ford certainly remained the most orthodox of fiscal conservatives. I suspect he was horrified at the deficits. That said, in many other ways, he seemed almost marooned in his party long before he died. And it wasn’t just abortion – gay rights – things that you don’t associate with a conservative Republican president. Granted, conservatism itself is being redefined. But I wondered whether Mrs. Ford was an influence on this, plus the experience of going through the intervention with her and then building the Betty Ford Center; being part of that project, and seeing good, decent people – friends, corporate executives, who had a weakness, or had a problem – whether it all came together and sort of pushed the compassion button. He seemed to become more open.

DeFrank: I think being out of electoral politics kind of freed him up. It just kind of liberated him to say what he really believed. I mean, there were just lots of things he knew he couldn’t support as a congressman or vice president or as a president. But, freed from those shackles, he felt more liberated and he didn’t care what people thought. And if they disagreed with him in the party, too bad. I mean, he just didn’t care. But I do think Betty had a real influence.

Smith: When you talked with him about Iraq and Afghanistan what was your sense of his attitude?

DeFrank: Well, he said that he thought that he supported them. I don’t think we talked much at all about Afghanistan. But he was absolutely supportive of Iraq. He said Saddam Hussein was a bad guy and needed to go, and so he supported the intervention, he supported the war. But he said he thought he had made a fundamental mistake in pegging the war to weapons of mass destruction. And he said that he thought that even before it became clear that there were none, or none could be found. He just said he thought that was just dangerous. There was plenty of reason to lay out the case for getting rid of Saddam Hussein. And they should have just done that and nobody was going to support Saddam and there was just a strategic miscalculation for which he faulted Rumsfeld and Cheney more than he faulted ’43.

Smith: Was it awkward for him, having so many of his people – Paul O’Neill, of course, Cheney, Rumsfeld – in the second Bush Administration. One senses on the personal level there was never any diminution of his regard or respect or affection. But you just wonder if he felt any degree of awkwardness. You talked about being liberated, in some ways, having them there was the opposite of liberating him to speak out.

DeFrank: He was very proud – it showed that he had quite a bench. I think he thought that all these guys’ re-emergence in the Bush era reinforced the authority and stature of his own limited time in the White House. But he didn’t think some of the things they did were very smart – like the Iraq strategy. I would never have believed that Ford would have thought that Cheney should have been dumped in 2004 because he had become a political negative for Bush ’43. But he was still very proud of Cheney. He just thought Cheney got a little too out there. And he wouldn’t have said that fifteen years ago, that’s for sure. But I think he felt liberated to say what he thought and didn’t care much what people thought about what he thought.

Smith: When he died, were you surprised at all by the degree of public reaction?

DeFrank: No, because, as you know, Richard, presidential funerals are a state event planned by the Military District of Washington for years. I mean, every president plans his own funeral, and I’d have to go back and check, but at one point the funeral plans had to be updated every six months because as presidents get older, respective pallbearers die, or occasionally there will be a falling out, and the president doesn’t want this guy as a pallbearer, didn’t want this guy to speak, but he’d like him to be in the reserved pews. So presidents have time, just because of the law, to deal with the ceremonial aspects departure. So he planned all that. He’s the guy who wanted Jimmy Carter to speak at Grand Rapids. He’s the guy who decided that he didn’t want Bill Clinton to speak, but he wanted Bill Clinton to be there.

Smith: I was wearing two hats – I was with ABC the first part of the week and then with the family the second half – and as an outsider parachuted into the network operation it was fascinating to watch this reaction, particularly among younger journalists, who weren’t around during the Ford presidency.

DeFrank: Weren’t ever alive, yeah. And I think there are over a hundred million Americans today, or maybe a hundred and fifty million Americas, who weren’t even born when he left office. I mean, I think the national education about Jerry Ford continues, and I think that’s a good thing.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

DeFrank: As a guy who tried his best to do the right thing, and who helped contribute to healing a very fractured country. I think that’s a good enough legacy for anybody, and I think that’s what history will judge his to be.

Smith: Last thing, because one has a feeling that when the first Bush left office, there was almost this unspoken awareness that he had fulfilled his historical role. That he had very skillfully managed the end of the Cold War and with the kinder, gentler aspect tried to change the face of the party and of conservatism. But there was a sense of what might have been if there had been a second Bush term. Do you feel that way about Ford? Ford himself is said to have observed he felt he had just mastered the job when he lost it. Would a full Ford term have added significantly to his historical legacy?

DeFrank: No, I don’t think so. I think he did what history will decide was important for him to have done. And I think four more years would not have really embellished the historical judgment. There is no way to know, of course, but I think how do you top becoming president after the first president in history resigns under pain of impeachment, and bringing the country through that, getting it back on an even keel.

Smith: People have tended to forget…Obama came in facing a terribly difficult situation, but at least he had the legitimacy of being elected. Look at what was on Ford’s plate when he was pitch forked into this office, for which he hadn’t really been able to do a transition, whatever he might have thought privately. Did there hang over the Ford presidency this question of legitimacy?

DeFrank: Not in his mind, and not really among the people around him. Because he thought the one thing he had going for him was the legitimacy of his relationships with members on the Hill. He thought that was going to be the one thing that always saved him because they liked him. He always thought that he would never have been picked by Nixon – Nixon thought that Ford was impeachment insurance. It turns out that Nixon thought that the Hill would never vote to impeach him if Jerry Ford, who they knew so well, was going to be the successor. But, in fact, the Hill was very comfortable with Jerry Ford. It was a strategic miscalculation on Nixon’s part. And so Ford always thought, yes, I’m unelected, but I’ve got a real reservoir of goodwill because these guys know me, I know them.

Smith: That must have contributed even more to the pain of coming so close in ’76 to getting that imprimatur.

DeFrank: Right. And the pain was exacerbated by the pardon because some of his closest friends on the Hill admitted to him that it just can’t be the same anymore – you’ve altered the balance. Yeah, we’ll come and have drinks with you, but the political dynamic has changed forever.

Smith: How did your paths cross with that of Gerald Ford?

Kauper: Almost by indirection. I actually was appointed in the Justice Department by Richard Nixon.

Smith: At what stage of the Nixon administration?

Kauper: Well, I was in the Nixon administration twice. The first time it was not a presidential appointment, I was one rank below that in the office of Legal Counsel at Justice. So I was there, really, at almost the beginning – 1969. And in the office of Legal Counsel I was giving legal advice to the White House, which meant I was dealing with people like Haldeman and Erlichman.

Smith: Let me ask you, is there something we don’t know about John Mitchell that we should know?

Kauper: I don’t know what you know. My impression, he was a very smart, very able guy, who had, I thought, a very good sense of the role of the Attorney General. Actually I had more dealings with people in the White House than I did with Mitchell, but he had a very good notion of what he was supposed to do vis-a-vis the Justice Department. He knew he was the buffer between the department and the White House, and he was really quite good at that. Now, he did play a political role that is part of what got him in trouble.

But I always found him very supportive, always up to date on things. I had one wonderful episode with him when we were asked to give an opinion on a piece of legislation that was pending, that would have allowed the changes in a number of what we thought were statutory rules, by a process that did not involve the President. It would simply go into effect if the Congress didn’t act, and there was no role for the President. And so we had put out an opinion this was clearly unconstitutional. And I got summoned to Mitchell’s office. He said, “Hey, I just had a call from the Chief Justice and who was this whipper-snapper who was claiming his bill was unconstitutional?” And Mitchell heard me out. He hadn’t seen the thing before it went out and he picked up the phone and called Chief Justice Berger while I was sitting there and said, “Warren, your bill is unconstitutional. We’re not going to support this.” So in that sense, he had done his homework, he knew what it was about. He was a pretty good administrator.

Smith: This was also the time, obviously, when Nixon was trying to remake the Court.

Kauper: Oh, yes.

Smith: And you had the Haynesworth and the Carswell episodes.

Kauper: Yes, I worked on the first one of those.

Smith: And it’s interesting how history does tend to sort things out. My sense is that in retrospect a consensus has formed that Haynesworth was probably badly treated, and that he would have been a perfectly adequate, if not distinguished, member of the Court.

Kauper: I believe that’s true.

Smith: Whereas Carswell was…

Kauper: Carswell would have been a disaster. In fact, I told my boss - the assistant attorney general happened to be Bill Rehnquist - that I wouldn’t work on the Carswell appointment. I just thought that was – it was almost like it was spite.

Smith: Carrying the southern strategy to the extreme.

Kauper: And he just didn’t have the credentials, he didn’t have the temperament and it would have been a very bad appointment, I think.

Smith: Would Mildred Lily or Hershel Friday have been any more distinguished?

Kauper: Probably not. But I remember when I left the office of Legal Counsel - I was there two years; I was on leave from the law school here - and I went in to see Rehnquist and said I was going back to Michigan, as I had told him I probably would do after two years. I said I don’t want to be involved with the people I know at the White House during the upcoming election. So, in some ways, I left for the right reason. But I also sent a memo to the White House saying if you were looking for somebody to put on the Court, you ought to think about Bill Rehnquist.

Smith: Did you really?

Kauper: Yeah.

Smith: Did you discuss that with him?

Kauper: No. No, I didn’t.

Smith: What was it that made you see in him a potential court appointment?

Kauper: He was a quite remarkable character. He could be quite partisan sometimes, but not in that role. And he was working with a staff of lawyers, probably at that time about twenty lawyers. I would say 80% of them were Democrats. They absolutely adored working for him. He heard everybody out. He never bypassed anybody’s opinion. He was just a warm kind of personality, and I think you saw that when he went on the Supreme Court, and his ability to work with other people with very different views. It didn’t surprise me at all.

Smith: You may have already just answered my question; you made reference to the people you knew at the White House, at least expediting your decision to come back to Michigan. Were you surprised by what eventually transpired?

Kauper: No. I’ll tell you a story about that. I actually was back in Washington by the time of the election. My appointment as the assistant attorney general in the anti-trust division actually became effective in July of that year. So I was actually there for the election and I had come down ahead of time to work a little bit with the fellow who was going out of the office before my appointment actually became effective. I had to come back to Ann Arbor for my sister’s wedding. It was on June 17, 1972. And I got up the next morning and the local paper had a little story about that long that there had been a break in at the Watergate complex. And my wife has never forgotten, I turned around and said, “There’s going to be a lot more to that than might be apparent.”
Smith: It’s interesting - you’re reaction, I remember talking to Pat Buchanan. I said, “Do you remember where you were when you read…?” And he said, “Oh, I didn’t read about it; I heard about it. And then I got a call,” and he said, “My first reaction was, that’s got to be our guys.” Because he said we were routinely getting material from inside the Muskie campaign.

Kauper: Just having been around those people - and it’s not that they weren’t smart - but it was a very different experience for me and I just wasn’t quite sure where they were going.

Smith: I assume we’re talking about more than Haldeman and Erlichman – the Colsons and the Magruders and those folks?

Kauper: I worked with them, too. I worked with one younger fellow who got swept up in the whole thing, ended up going to prison – Egil Krogh, who was a really good guy. It was really unfortunate.

Smith: Do you have a theory? Are there things we don’t know about Watergate?

Kauper: I don’t know that there are any of the facts of Watergate that we don’t know.

Smith: For example, who ordered the break in?

Kauper: Well, I don’t have any very good sense of that. I don’t think we ever will know that.

Smith: You think it might have been something Mitchell took to the grave with him?

Kauper: It’s possible.

Smith: There is a theory that Haldeman played a vital role in knowing instinctively when to take seriously Nixon’s rants or off the wall comments, or directives to ‘get’ someone. And a Colson or a Magruder, someone lacking that knowledge, sophistication or just eager to curry favor, might have passed along something.

Kauper: That’s certainly possible, but I was not at a level where I was going to have any clear notion of it. All I know is what everyone else knows from that point on. But, by the time the whole thing really started to break, I was back at the Justice Department.

Smith: Was Saxbe then attorney general?

Kauper: Oh, I went through an amazing array of attorneys general.

Smith: Oh, because Richardson…

Kauper: I started with Mitchell, then Kleindienst, then Richardson, Bob Bork as the acting attorney general, William Saxbe and…

Smith: The Saturday Night Massacre?

Kauper: Oh, I sure was.

Smith: What was the atmosphere around the place?

Kauper: Well, I don’t even know the words to describe it. It was an evening I will never forget. We were at home, there was a local television station ran a program called Agronsky and Company, and we were expecting some company for a quiet evening. We had been trying to get together for some time; they were coming at 7:30. The show was on at 7:00, and somebody just walked right out across the camera and handed Agronsky a note and he read off the note that the attorney general had been fired, that the deputy attorney general had either been fired or resigned soon enough to not be fired, and that Bob Bork had fired the special prosecutor. And it began a very long evening, to say the least. I came out of that evening really as – I didn’t have the title, but I was trying to run the deputy attorney general’s office as well as the anti-trust division.

Smith: Thirty five years later there is still debate over exactly what Richardson’s role was and what the White House thought it had in terms of an understanding with Richardson.

Kauper: Elliott Richardson was a consummate politician. I’ve never known how much he actually knew in advance of what happened that Saturday night, but knowing him, it would have been clear that he was going to come out clean. He was going to act so that he came out clean. Bob Bork never forgave him.
Bork thought that he had been set up, that he had not been kept informed of anything that was going on. When he got the word initially, he was writing a letter to a high school student about some values in the Constitution, and suddenly this order comes. So I was on the phone with him probably within twenty minutes after it happened. And then the evening went on.

Smith: And there was never any question about Ruckelshaus also simultaneously resigning, which left Bork to do the dirty work?

Kauper: Yeah, he was left in charge of something he had not been privy to at all; that had been going on with the special prosecutor, and made the decision to go ahead and fire him. I think what would have happened in the Justice Department had he not, would have just been dreadful. There was no established order of succession among the assistant attorneys general. So if Bork had said no, they would have started down the list. There was one who would have probably done it with a certain degree of glee, but I’m not sure the White House knew that. And they could have wiped out the whole group of assistant attorneys general, too. All but one, if Bork had said no, all but one would have also said no.

Smith: Take it for whatever it’s worth, but my sense is that Al Haig went to his grave believing that he was double crossed; that he thought he had an understanding with Richardson and, for whatever reason, it blew up.

Kauper: It would not surprise me at all. So it was an interesting evening. I gave a speech that next Friday at an anti-trust institute in Boston. I had called the entire top career staff of the division in for a meeting on Sunday morning after the Saturday Night Massacre, because they clearly wanted to know what I was going to do, and made it abundantly clear that if I resigned, they would all do the same. And I finally decided no, I wasn’t going to do that, but I used the speech, part of it, to be very critical of the White House. I think it was the old Washington Star ran a column saying the President must be really weak because he didn’t do anything to this guy who went up to Boston and was very critical. And as you know, he was very weak at that point.
Smith: Indeed, you could argue his selection of Gerald Ford testified to his weakness. We talked with Jerry Jones, who at that point was reorganizing the personnel office for Haldeman. This would be the spring of ’73, and he [Jones] gets a call one day from Haldeman wanting to know how many staffers worked for the vice president. He does some mental math and says about fifty. And he [Haldeman] said, “Okay, I want undated signed letters of resignation from all of them.” Which raises two intriguing theories; one is that it’s a hangover of the post-’72 Nixon wanting everyone’s resignation; but the second, more intriguing is that they knew well in advance of the Wall Street Journal story, that appeared in August - that Agnew could have some problems. Is it logical to assume that the White House would be aware of an investigation going on in Maryland?

Kauper: I think so. I think they would have known. I don’t know for sure, but I think the odds are they would have known.

Smith: Do you think Richardson did the right thing on the Agnew resignation? I assume he was point man for the notion that resignation was sufficient punishment.

Kauper: Yeah, I think he probably did. I always get very uncomfortable with any notion you’re going to prosecute people at that level. I think it does not do the country any good in the long run.

Smith: Was there a point in all of this where, at least internally, people began to think the unthinkable – that the President might be next?

Kauper: Yeah, sure. I don’t know that I can put a time on it, specifically, but there was a real sense of inevitability that began to develop – that this just couldn’t go on.

Smith: Presumably the tapes were a significant contributing factor to that?

Kauper: They were. Sure.

Smith: Were you surprised when their existence was revealed?
Kauper: Not entirely, no. It almost seemed to me like something you’d expect. I don’t know that you’d expect everything to be taped, but the notion of taping, it didn’t come as a big surprise.

Smith: What about the argument, which is kind of ironic in a number of ways, the argument that politically what hurt Nixon was less the fact that he taped, than the language that people heard on the tapes?

Kauper: I think that’s true. I think the language really hurt, and it revealed a Nixon that I think people hadn’t been particularly aware of. I think those of us who were around were aware of some of it, but not to the degree it showed on the tapes. I was in and out of the White House a lot when I was in the office of Legal Counsel, and some of the staff would pass some of that on.

Smith: Really?

Kauper: Although, as you know, Nixon didn’t see a lot of the staff very often. It was a very tight White House, almost uncomfortably so. In fact, I’ll take the word almost out of it. We’d send something over, a legal opinion over, and we never knew in what form it finally got up the ladder. Everything would get shorter and shorter and shorter. It never was very clear who he was talking to about things – and some of them were problematic, so you’d expect he’d be talking to somebody.

Smith: I only heard President Ford speak disparagingly of two people, and the worst thing he could say was, “He’s a bad man.” That’s the ultimate epithet that he could come up with. One was Gordon Liddy.

Kauper: Now selling gold.

Smith: And the other was John Dean.

Kauper: Yeah. I think I would not disagree with either of those. John was a very competent lawyer, but you remember the title of his book, which was Blind Ambition. He at least characterized himself well. There was a lot of bad feeling about Dean. Liddy I never had much to do with. But I can imagine Ford’s reaction.
Smith: I don’t know whether it was naiveté, but there were times where you sort of wondered, for someone who had been around Washington for twenty-five years, he was genuinely shocked that Nixon lied to him.

Kauper: Oh, I’m sure that’s true. Yeah.

Smith: And he was equally shocked by the language on the tapes. And the third thing almost more viscerally than the first two - he was deeply offended that Nixon would send his own daughter out to, in effect, perpetuate the lie.

Kauper: Yeah. Well, there was so much that went on that was so strange during that whole time. You asked me when we began this, you said, “When did I first encounter Ford?” I didn’t really know Ford in Michigan at all. He just got sort of stuck with me. I was heading the anti-trust division, he didn’t come in and just sweep things clean. So essentially, I was a holdover.

Smith: That raises a larger question. Rumsfeld urged him to clean house early. To be ruthless. And it does raise a question of whether you can be too nice as president. On the other hand, I think it’s fair to say he didn’t want to tar the vast majority of Nixon appointees who were innocent. Two, he valued continuity, just from a practical standpoint. Plus there were a lot of very competent people in the Nixon administration. But he resisted the political advice to symbolically start over.

Kauper: He also had the history that Nixon had sort of tried to clean house. Nixon demanded resignations right after his second election that went way down the departments. I had to call for the resignation of a lot of people that were not protected by civil service, who were GS16, 17, 18.

Smith: And what did that do for morale?

Kauper: It was terrible, obviously. And I finally said, “You know, if we hold out, if I don’t get those resignations, it’s really going to come down on the division across the board.” And I believed that. We had a new deputy attorney general who would have carried it out without any difficulty. So they all complied and one of the great things that Kleindienst did, the night that he was fired, he sent back each of those resignations with a personal note. And Kleindienst was an interesting guy. He’s been kind of vilified over time. I thought in many ways he was the best attorney general I served under. He got the short end of the stick in a number of ways. But that was a very typical act.

Smith: What was the charge? What was the allegation against Kleindienst?

Kauper: Well, it went back to the AT&T cases. It was very interesting. The belief was that he was going to be charged with perjury before Congress because he had indicated that there had been no contact between the White House and the Justice Department about the settlement of those cases. Whereas in fact, there was, at least as far as I know, there was. He actually was charged, as I recall, with contempt of Congress. He called me the night he pleaded guilty to that charge, and I said to him, I said, “Dick, you can’t plead guilty to that charge. You’re not guilty of contempt of Congress.” That was a statute I’d spent some time with when I was a Supreme Court law clerk, because of a couple cases we’d had. I said, “You are pleading to a false charge.” And he said, “I have to. If I am charged with perjury, and if they were to get a conviction, I’d lose my license and that would be a felony. I can’t do that.” The violation of the contempt of Congress statute, and I still even remember the number, it’s 2USC1992, as a misdemeanor. So he felt he was just in a terrible box, but what he was actually charged with went back to the AT&T settlements – anti-trust cases.

Smith: Just to get it on the record, you said you clerked at the Court; who did you clerk for?

Kauper: Potter Stewart.

Smith: Did you enjoy the experience?

Kauper: Oh, that was a great experience. I clerked with him for two years. He staggered his clerks, so he brought one new in each two years, and that was a great, great experience. He was a wonderful guy to work for. Sometimes he wrote a little too well. He had a great knack for hiding an issue just by turning a phrase. I know he always worried that one of his phrases was going to end up on his tombstone. The line which said, “He couldn’t define pornography, but knew it when he saw it.” But he did that. He had that ability to sometimes cover things up a little bit.

Smith: Use the vernacular.

Kauper: He was a terrific writer. He didn’t ask his clerks to do drafts of anything. Everything he wrote, he wrote himself. He was just a very personable guy to work for and also an extremely good judge. So that was a good experience, too.

Smith: So Ford becomes president. Where are you on the morning of August 9th?

Kauper: You know, I don’t even remember that. I was in the office, but I don’t remember anything particular about it.

Smith: One of the things that we’ve been told, gets to this larger issue of meshing disparate cultures. After the swearing in there was a receiving line and then a reception in the State Dining Room. And several people who were there have observed you could watch the Nixon people peel away – which under the circumstances is understandable. But it raises the question of how successful or otherwise was this meshing of a holdover culture, with the Ford people from the Hill, with some additional people from outside?

Kauper: Well, the anti-trust division was kind of immune from the whole meshing process. After the AT&T case the White House was terrified to admit that they even knew who headed the anti-trust division. I mean, I can remember that long atrium in the Kennedy Center. We were there for a concert shortly after I came down to head the anti-trust division, and that long corridor – it was during intermission – and here was Peter Flanagan coming down from the other way. Now, I had done a lot of work with Flanagan and this, of course, was still during the Nixon time. He just turned his head and he wouldn’t even look at me. I mean, they were scared to death, I think, of any thought of a contact with the anti-trust division. So, I hadn’t had much to do in that time with the White House at all. So the meshing problem wasn’t terribly acute.

Smith: What’s your estimate of Bill Saxbe as an attorney general?
Kauper: Oh.

Smith: He sounds like a bit of a character.

Kauper: He was a bit of a character, there’s no question about that. And he was given to very quick decision making. I’m not sure why that’s so. I’m not sure whether it was just a short attention span, or what it was. But I had several things with him where decisions were made very quickly, and perhaps not always correctly. I knew that he basically sent us out to do our thing, and he backed us up. He was the attorney general when we filed the case to break up AT&T, which was a day to remember because it was Saxbe who just stunned us that day. We were not planning to file the case that day. He forced our hand.

Smith: Is Nixon still in the White House?

Kauper: No, Ford is in the White House. And I’ve never been altogether clear what Ford knew about that case in advance. I asked the archivist here to get me any documents from that day about the case. And as it happened Phil Areda was one of the counsels to the President. Phil Areda was an anti-trust professor at Harvard. I’d know him for years.

Smith: And he fell afoul of Nelson Rockefeller?

Kauper: Yes. But we found in the archives out here a couple of memos from Phil to the President which would indicate to me that Ford knew absolutely nothing and that Saxbe had not briefed the White House at all. I am quite confident that Elliott Richardson had briefed Nixon, but that was one of those pieces of information I think that just died. So we had this, what I’m sure was a bit of a shock, here comes this lawsuit to break up the nation’s telephone company. And Saxbe – I don’t know what he was thinking that day – I haven’t been able to sort it out. I had set up a meeting with AT&T’s counsel for them to present their views to Saxbe, and I’d sent a note up to him. Saxbe had the whole fact memo we had done and the complaint, which were ready to go. But it was normal in a situation like that that the counsel for the company would ask to meet with the attorney general before any final decision was made. And so I set it up. I sent him a memo saying they are coming in, this is just to hear them out. And he walked into the big conference room in the attorney general’s office and said, “Gentlemen, I want you to know we are going to file suit to break up AT&T.” And I mean he had just given away the biggest piece of insider information probably ever given out. And moreover, it was clear he’d made up his mind before he ever even heard them. It was a very embarrassing moment for me because I had told them he would hear them out. We had to immediately deal with the SEC, trading was suspended of AT&T stock.

Smith: Now, was this very early in the Ford presidency?

Kauper: This was in November of ’74.

Smith: Okay.

Kauper: I thought to myself at the beginning, boy, how could he have done something that dumb? What was going through his mind? And then the more I thought about it, I thought, boy, he is one shrewd customer. He knew that the President was in Kyoto; not reachable; he was getting on a commercial flight – the attorney general was getting on a commercial flight – to go somewhere, I don’t remember where. He was not reachable. And now the wheels were in motion. And I, to this day, think maybe he thought he could avoid any interference by just directing us to go ahead.

Smith: It’s a pretty breathtaking assumption.

Kauper: Well, I don’t know. I may have read that all wrong.

Smith: But what made him feel so strongly that this was necessary?

Kauper: I learned much later a bit more about his background when he was the attorney general in Ohio. And he had built a kind of aversion, I think, to the telephone company.

Smith: Really?

Kauper: I don’t know that for sure, but there are hints of that from time to time. He may have just thought it was the right thing to do - to back up the anti-trust division. I just don’t know. But the case got filed that afternoon. It was off and running.

Smith: What kind of contacts did you have [with the White House], either personal or in policy terms during the Ford administration?

Kauper: We didn’t have much contact coming out of the Nixon administration. There was a group called the Economic Policy Board, which met almost every morning over in the Roosevelt Room.

Smith: With Bill Seidman.

Kauper: Bill Seidman. Simon usually presided over the meetings. We were by that time beginning to be into the whole deregulation movement. And our office was playing a good sized role in that.

Smith: By the way, I’ve been told from someone in the process, the President didn’t like the term deregulation. Regulatory reform?

Kauper: Yes.

Smith: Which is actually smart.

Kauper: The Nixon people would talk about deregulation sometimes. But the airline thing was really just getting underway. And so because we were involved in that, I would be invited over to those meetings once in a while, because the administration as a whole was trying to get a position fixed. And in Nixon’s day, you’d go over there and you’d sit in the anteroom of the Roosevelt Room, and when your item was on the agenda, you would be summoned in. I believe it was within one week after Ford became president, that if you had something, if it was an Economic Policy Board group – I’m not sure it had the same name, but it continued - and the environment was 180 degrees different. You’d go over, you were entitled to speak on anything that was on the agenda, and you were in there for the whole meeting. It was just a 180 degree flip. And it was the difference between being closed and open. And to me it was the most obvious manifestation of that.

Smith: Did the President sit in on any of these?
Kauper: No.

Smith: I remember talking with Bill on a number of occasions. One sensed that there were two camps; there was Greenspan and Simon and the purists, quasi-libertarians. It really came to the fore in the New York City aid crisis. And then you had Seidman and the Vice President as the pragmatists or moderates or whatever you want to call them.

Kauper: I think that’s probably a fair statement. And you kind of sensed that there were quite different philosophies when you were in a meeting like that.

Smith: But regulatory reform seems to have been universally embraced.

Kauper: Yes, and I think there might have been some difference in how you went about it. But I think there was a commitment, certainly in the Ford administration, to going ahead with the airline stuff, in particular.

Smith: And what prompted the movement at that time?

Kauper: I don’t even know that I can answer that. In the Nixon years there was this very strong sentiment that business was just over regulated. And at some point they began to focus on not just removing day to day regulation, but of doing things something more basic than that. The airline thing had been coming along for some time because the airlines kept up this series of agreements, with the approval of the Civil Aeronautics Board, on fares and capacity and so on. And it was very easy to criticize that. So I’m not surprised that became almost the starting point. But I’m not sure of the point at which it actually crystallized. I had the feeling when Ford came in that that commitment was made. That was nothing that we were re-examining. We just went on ahead.

Smith: I’ve often thought about it, even talked about it a little bit in the eulogy - the popular notion is to see the Ford presidency as a coda to the Nixon years. Whereas, I think in many ways, it’s actually a break. It foreshadows more than it recapitulates. And the classic example is deregulation.

Kauper: Oh, yeah. I agree with that. I think treating it as a coda to the Nixon administration is both inaccurate and unfair to Ford. I never sensed it that way.
Smith: Were there discussions in the hallways or around the water coolers or whatever, before the pardon, about the possibility?

Kauper: Yes. I think that possibility really surfaced for conversation within the Justice Department probably the day after Ford was sworn in. That was always a possibility. And I think the department lawyers were like everybody else, they were divided. There certainly were some who really wanted a full-scale prosecution. Others who I think thought that would be very unwise. It probably mirrors the public at large. But, yes, those were common discussions. What was going to happen next? What was going to happen to Nixon?

Smith: We talked to Mel Laird. It will come as no surprise, Mel Laird loves Ford, but nevertheless, resents the fact that he didn’t wait and do what Laird envisioned him doing. Laird thought he could bring a bipartisan delegation from the Hill to petition the President to pardon Nixon. The problem that I have with that scenario is, under the intense political climate of that time, it’s hard to imagine how any trial balloon could have risen above the trees without being shot down. You can war game it all sorts of ways, but it’s difficult to see, if you’re going to do the pardon, it’s difficult to see how you “prepare” the country under that environment.

Kauper: I can’t imagine that. I just can’t imagine that. Ford so clearly, to me, did the right thing. It was his decision. He wasn’t urged by people to do it. He took responsibility for it, and certainly in terms of his long run legacy, he’s come out very well for it.

Smith: What was the reaction in the department?

Kauper: Well, there were certainly some that I think viewed it as a kind of intrusion into the prosecutorial process. I’m trying to think exactly when the pardon occurred.

Smith: September 8th.

Kauper: See, I was out of the department by then. I knew what was going on at the department, I hadn’t lost my contacts, but I’d come back here to Michigan at the beginning of September. So the pardon actually, technically took place after I had left. But I know that there were some, because I’ve talked to a number of people about it; people who saw it just as another political intrusion into the prosecutorial process. Lawyers are very sensitive to that. So there were going to be some who would see it that way. But I think the majority of people that I’ve talked to, admittedly most of them are not people from the criminal division, but I think most of them felt that it was handled well.

Smith: You came back here in September. Did you have any later involvement?

Kauper: No. I discovered, as many people do, when you’re out, you’re out. And contacts tend to dry up after a while. Now, I was in and out of the department a fair amount, just because I was working at some anti-trust matters as a consultant from time to time. And I still know a lot of the people down there.

Smith: I guess you never worked for him, but would you agree that Ed Levi…

Kauper: Oh, I did work for Ed Levi.

Smith: You did?

Kauper: Oh, yeah. I have a wonderful story about Ed Levi.

Smith: Tell us about Ed Levi.

Kauper: I first met Ed Levi when I was a senior in college and I think at that point he was the dean of the law school at Chicago. At the last moment – and it must have been April or May of my senior year – I learned about a scholarship that was available to go to law school and it was available to people who went to a “Chicagoland” law school. It was from the money of Colonel McCormick and he had created this foundation, named the Kirkland Foundation, in honor of his personal lawyer. And so I applied for it and I went over for an interview. I walked in and there were, I think, three people, and Ed Levi was one of them doing the interview. And he had my transcript. I had gotten a B in English I at the university. It was the only B I got in four years. And Ed looked at me and he said, “Can you explain to me why you got a B in that course?”
That was back eons ago. He’s named attorney general and now I have to go up for my first meeting with him. I walked into his office and he said, “You never did tell me why you got that B.” Ed was a wonderful guy. He was clearly the smartest of all the AGs I dealt with. And the only times he got me sort of in trouble with some of the staff was, he couldn’t quite let go sometimes of being a law professor, and the result was that once in a while staff wasn’t sure which position they were supposed to take because he would just argue. He’d always take the opposite view. But I really enjoyed working with him.

Smith: There are those who say that there was a downside, that there was a brittleness – not condescension - that would be rude - but a kind of brilliance that went beyond not tolerating fools.

Kauper: Well, he didn’t tolerate fools, that’s for sure. Maybe because I came out of a law professor’s background, too, I didn’t find him the least bit difficult to deal with. I know there were other staff who did, and who did what they thought they had been told to do, only just to be raked over the coals for not doing the right thing. But I’m not sure that’s a bad thing. I thought he was very effective. Unlike a lot of law professors I know, he was quite capable of making decisions. He didn’t hesitate.

Smith: And it was presumably part of his mandate, to de-politicize the department, restore its credibility.

Kauper: And he was always well-prepared. There is a close relationship between the division and the attorney general’s office on a lot of matters. And he was always well-prepared. It didn’t take him very long to be well-prepared, I mean, he was very quick. And he really was a very warm, friendly person. To really appreciate that you had to see him with Kate, his wife. And it was like watching this couple who just played off of each other. And you could spend a whole evening in stitches; they were really very funny people.

Smith: I’ve often thought the Levi appointment is the Ford administration in microcosm. Because it is an unlikely choice, a very distinguished choice, but it also tells you something about Ford’s comfort level with people who were more obviously, or in a more articulate way, brilliant. Beyond the big egos, he had the Kissingers and all those folks, around whom he was perfectly comfortable. In fact, he was very proud of that appointment.

Kauper: Well, he should have been. It was a wonderful appointment.

Smith: And presumably Levi played some role in the John Paul Stevens selection.

Kauper: I assume so. That was in a part of the division that I wasn’t in anymore.

Smith: I assume around town there must have been chatter about why is Bill Douglas still hanging on?

Kauper: There was that chatter when I was a law clerk. That was a long time before that. Because he was really much more absorbed in writing his nature books than he was in the work of the Court. Which is not surprising. When you think about it, yeah, he was appointed in the late ‘30s, as I recall. I was there in 1961 and ’62. By that time you would have thought about an awful lot of problems that were maybe not directly involved in a given case, but tangential to it. So I think when somebody is around that long, they really already have a fixed view on a lot of issues that technically the Court hasn’t decided yet. But he was very quick, a very smart man and things came very fast to him. His law clerks used to rush in to get into the office on Saturday morning, because if he was assigned an opinion on Friday, he would have written it and sent it to the printer by Saturday.

Smith: He was not the most personable of men.

Kauper: No. Clearly not.

Smith: Now later on I assume you had a lot of contact through the Foundation with President Ford.

Kauper: Yeah, he would always wait until the end of the dinner when the speech was over, and I don’t how many times he would come up to me right at the very end, when most people had left. So yeah, I had contact with him. I think I only had contact with him formally, other than a couple of social things at the White House. While he was President, only once.
Smith: Really?

Kauper: He had signaled a veto on a bill that I had testified in support of, or I testified in support of part of. We had sort of negotiated a deal with Phil Hart that we would support two or three provisions in this one hundred page bill. I testified supporting carrying out that deal. And then Ford signaled a veto. So I got summoned to the White House and we went on for a very long time. It was a long bill. I think we originally had a half hour scheduled and that was extended and then it was extended again. And I just left in awe. I mean, he knew that bill inside out and upside down. I was flabbergasted. But it also said something about Ed Levi because – I don’t remember everybody who was in the room – but I know Levi was there because I went over it with him and Dick Cheney was there and I don’t remember who else might have been there. And we got all the way to the end and Ed Levi hadn’t said a word. So Ford turns to Levi and he says, “Well, Ed, what do you think?” And Levi looks at me and he says, “I don’t agree with a single thing he said.” But he said, “Mr. President, you politically cannot afford to veto this bill.” And as we were going out, I went out behind Ford and then Levi was behind me and Cheney was behind Levi and I heard Cheney lean over to Levi and said, “Ed, you sure have got a hell of a way of supporting your people.”

Smith: Was this discussion almost a debate over the merits of the bill?

Kauper: Yeah, well, I wouldn’t call it a debate. It was just an extended conversation about what the bill was about, whether it was good, bad, or otherwise. In fact, he ranged over into a couple of subjects that weren’t even going to remain part of the bill. And that’s what really surprised me; that he’d gotten into that much of it. And it was a very difficult bill for him to deal with, because this was the Phil Hart memorial bill. Everybody knew Hart was dying of cancer. This was his bill, this was the great anti-trust improvements act that had everything in it but the kitchen sink. And we’d gotten it down to three things; and it was one of the three that somebody had gotten Ford’s ear and that was the issue. But we talked about all the rest of it, too.

Smith: Last thing. How do you think he should be remembered?
Kauper: I find that very hard to put in words. I was always very struck by a colleague of mine a couple of years ago whose father died. A bunch of us had sent him notes and things. He sent around an email and all he said about his father was he was a good and honest man. And I thought, you know, that sort of says it all, doesn’t it? And I think of Ford that way. I never questioned his integrity; he was smarter than people gave him credit for, a lot smarter than people gave him credit for. And serving in that administration as a holdover, the difference was just so dramatic. It got to be fun. It was not in the Nixon years. You knew from the time I took over in the anti-trust division that this trouble was coming and this sense of everybody’s got the wagons around in a circle. And that just disappeared.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: First, the obvious question is, when did your paths first cross with Gerald Ford?

Korologos: When I worked on Capitol Hill for Senator Wallace Bennett, I didn’t have any dealings with him, but I knew of him. The Senator was a strong pro-defense senator during the Vietnam days and actually before in the ’60s. I went to Senator Wallace Bennett in 1962 and I can’t remember - what was President Ford at the time?

Smith: Well, at that point he was still just a Congressman from Michigan. I think that was the year, it was ’63 when he took on Charlie Hoeven from Iowa for that number three job in the House leadership.

Korologos: Yes, so I just came across him just reading the Capitol Hill gossip sheets, that’s about all. But then I really came to know him a lot better and more when I went to the White House on April first, 1971. He was in the leadership at the time and he used to come to leadership meetings. I’ll never forget that one picture where it was Mansfield, Ford, Scott, all smoking pipes in the leadership meetings. And they would smoke them right in the meeting and nobody ever said anything. Now, I guess, they’d faint.

We had some dealings with him then and he was a strong supporter and then suddenly Watergate broke out.

Smith: Do you know where you were when you first heard about the break in, or how you first learned about it?

Korologos: I didn’t pay attention to it. I don’t know that it wasn’t a two-bit burglary. It probably was at the beginning, but I have no memory of it. But pretty soon it started getting louder and louder. So it was nothing when it first happened and I can’t tell you the exact time that I thought, “Hm, I wonder what this is.” But then it started getting louder. So I can’t tell you when I first heard.
Smith: Was there a point at which you were beginning to get questions from the Hill, from people like Ford, saying, “My members are wondering what’s going on,” or a kind of restiveness on the part of the troops?

Korologos: There was some restiveness in my office, especially, because Senator Wallace Bennett’s son, Bob Bennett, had bought the Robert R. Mullen Company from Robert R. Mullen, the PR firm that was over on – 17th Street in a fancy office. The Robert R. Mullen Company had PR clients around the world. One of their biggest clients was the CIA. The Mullen Company was a front in its offices around the world for agents to go and be undercover – to show that they didn’t work at the embassy. We had a bunch of those in Belgium when I was ambassador there. If I asked, they could tell me, and I didn’t ever want to know, but they were there. [They] worked at airlines or worked at restaurants and elsewhere.

One of the characters that worked with Robert R. Mullen was Howard Hunt. Howard Hunt was an employee, in effect, of Bob Bennett’s and so we got a little bit into that when Howard Hunt started appearing and Bob Bennett being associates with a CIA agent. So it kind of got bigger and bigger when the Watergate committees and all those started appearing and people started interviewing and started asking questions.

Bob and I used to talk all the time about what’s going on. He came to me with tales of how now they have invented - that bottle cap there on the Coke - a microphone that is that big, and you can put it under a desk and people can hear you talk. And he said that’s probably what they were trying to do. He insisted he didn’t know anything about the break in. I remember during our White House days that Charles Colson was the political genius and guru that Nixon and everybody liked, and he was the savior of all. My assistant at the White House in those days was Wally Johnson who came over from Justice. We only had two. The White House Senate liaison job is a 1.5 person job. Now they’ve got twenty. So I also was a terrible leader because I never gave Wally anything good to do. I took all the good stuff and gave him the dredges. And he still complains about it.
But Wally became close to Colson, and they used to have these round-and-round meetings on Watergate. Once or twice I went over to Wally or Colson or somebody, and I said, “Hey, what the hell is going on here? This is terrible, we’ve got to stop this. What is happening?” And they used to say don’t worry about it.

I remember going home to Utah to campaign for Senator Wallace Bennett, Bob Bennett’s father. I was with the Senator for nine years, and every two years we’d go to Utah and campaign – either for him or the House race or to help the governor or somebody. I was the Library of Congress, in effect, because I had all the data. I used to take huge crates of information about Utah and all the candidates would come to me and say, “What’s this about? What does this mean?” So I had the background, as it were. I’d dig through a file, because somewhere along the way we’d done it before.

And people would always talk about, “What’s this Watergate stuff? What’s going on?” And the thing that drove me, and even I used to tell my wife and neighbors, “Nixon and Mitchell are too smart. They did not have anything to do with this. It was a bunch of rogue guys trying to figure out something.”

The other thing that was funny – I don’t know if it’s funny – when the campaign began - Mitchell came to my office in the White House one morning. He was the attorney general, the closest guy in the world to the president, and he came over to see me! It was before the ’72 election campaign. [He] closed the door. I was shaking, I didn’t even know he knew me. And he came in and he sat down and he said, “You’re one of the few people in the building who has been through political campaigns.” And I had…every two years since ’60, I’d done something in campaigns.

“We want you to come to the Committee to Re-elect, and be the “opposition person.” In other words, we want you to put on a campaign - I suppose we knew it was going to be McGovern that early - like they are going to run against Nixon. Because you know what’s going to come up. So you be the opponent. You be the guy, when we do things, we want you to be the guy – the response person. I want you to be the mock responder.”
I remember saying, “Mr. Mitchell, that’s an honor to have you ask me to do that. Frankly, my strength with the president is my relationship with the Southern Democrats, and the other Democrats on the Hill.” At the time we were in the middle of the Vietnam War, we were in the middle of all kinds of bills and things, which needed Democrats to pass, we only had thirty-five or forty Republicans, whatever the number was. And so I had to go find conservative Democrats from the South, who are all today Republican, and get them to vote for our bills, especially on those Nixon really cared about – which was the war and national security.

You could tell when Nixon didn’t give a damn about things by how fast he used to give the State of the Union address on the domestic issues. [fast, garbled words]. It’s like those fast talkers you hear on the radio, and then he’d get to national security and the Russians and the Chinese, and defense and Vietnam and he’d now slow down [speaking slowly] and emphasize and work on his themes. Somebody else had written that domestic portion and you could tell he didn’t much care.

So, I said, “My strength in helping the president is with the southern and conservative Democrats who give us all their support – the patriots. And if I go to that campaign, I am suddenly tainted as a partisan running against them.” Case in point: I had taken Senator Jim Allen a strong supporter in to see President Nixon. Well, Senator Allen had some Cotton Queen he wanted to bring in. We had Congressional half-hours when we used to schedule members to spend two minutes with the president with their queen or with their whatever.

And so I brought Jim Allen down with somebody, and we did our photograph and Nixon held me back and said, “Tom, just a minute. Jim, Jim, hang on here.” And he looked at me and he said, “Jim Allen is a supporter of ours. Jim, I want to thank you for the support you’ve given me. I know about how you are doing,” and he turned to me and he said, “Now, Korologos, you listen to me. You tell Dole, I don’t want any Republican running against Tim Allen in Alabama. You got that? You understand that? We don’t want anybody taking on Jim Allen, you hear me?” And I said, “Yes, sir. Yes, sir.”
Smith: And that wasn’t just for show?

Korologos: That was not a show. He meant it. So I went back to Dole and sure enough, there wasn’t anybody running against Tim Allen. The guy that would run against him would be a conservative Republican from Alabama rather than a liberal. So Nixon didn’t want Allen hurt. So, I went to Dole and Dole said, “Holy Cow, okay,” or whatever he said.

So the point is, that’s my strength with the president. I didn’t tell Mitchell that story, but that’s what I was alluding to. I said, “I don’t see how I can help the president. I can’t help the president going to the campaign. You’ve got other guys, I’m not much of a – I’ve just been on the fringes of campaigns.” He said, “Well, I understand.” He left and then after he left I got to shaking, and I said, “My gosh, I have turned down John Mitchell. That’s the end of me.”

Wally Johnson came in asked, “What was that about?” I told him, and he said, “You turned down Mitchell? You realize what you’ve just done? You’re finished! You might as well go to Salt Lake and open a gas station.” I said, “Oh my word.” Well, having said that to you, I’m such a loyalist, I would have been in Watergate with a flashlight that night myself, given whatever those guys were doing. So, as luck would have it, I didn’t do that and I did survive the campaign.

Smith: Do you think Mitchell took secrets with him to the grave?

Korologos: Oh, I’m sure. Yeah.

Smith: Do we know, even now, who ordered the break in.

Korologos: Well, everybody kind of second guessed it. Have you read that new book by whoever it was – Rosen?

Smith: No.

Korologos: Rosen has a book out on Mitchell that’s very good, people tell me. I haven’t read it. I think Watergate was an operation run amuck, that ran a little too far, and Mitchell might have said, “Yeah, let’s go find out something.” And I can see how Nixon, knowing him a little bit, would have yelled, “Why don’t we know what they’re up to? Where’s McGovern going? See what you can find out about these campaigns – what’s his schedule next week?” So they planted guys to get answers and try to get information.

Smith: There is that school of thought that Nixon may have been popping off one day and Haldeman’s job, among other things, was to filter those orders. At least the sort of off the wall ones to make sure that they weren’t carried out, and that the Colsons and the McGruders of the world didn’t have that judgment.

Korologos: I agree.

Smith: And that it could have been something as simple as that.

Korologos: I agree, you’re absolutely right.

Well, fast forward, pretty soon Watergate collapsed around our ears. Oh, wait a minute, we’ve got to go back to Agnew.

Smith: I was going to ask you because we did an interview with Jerry Jones who had a fascinating story – a number of fascinating stories. But one of them was at that point - this was the spring of ’73 - Haldeman is still at the White House and Jones is sort of reorganizing the personnel office for Haldeman. He gets a call from Haldeman one day wanting to know how many people worked for the vice president. And Jones does some figuring and it’s about fifty. He says, “Fine. I want undated letters of resignation from every one of them.”

Korologos: Wow.

Smith: Jones’ interpretation, after the fact, is that Haldeman, and presumably the president, knew well before the Wall Street Journal story broke that Agnew could have problems. Does that seem possible to you?

Korologos: Yes, except for an ingredient you’d probably have to put in there. I don’t think Nixon and the White House guys liked Agnew, period. They put him on just to appease the Rockefellers, the Rockefeller wing. He was Rockefeller’s campaign manager, wasn’t he?
Smith: Well, he had been a Rockefeller supporter. Then remember, Rockefeller didn’t call him the day he announced he wasn’t running, so he was humiliated. He went over to Nixon.

Korologos: That’s right. So Nixon put him on the ticket, it was a surprise. When everybody says Agnew’s the vice president. I said, “Who?” I remember my sister telling me, “He’s put a Greek on the ticket!” I said, “Holy Cow! That takes care of that vote.” But my point is, there was a leadership meeting one day early on, and Nixon was talking about revenue sharing.

But what happened is, they said, “Here’s our revenue sharing plan,” and they had the charts and maps and whatever, “and here’s what we’re going to do.” And Agnew said, across the table, “Mr. President, and others, I look around this table, I’m the only governor here.” They had the Republican leadership. It may have been bipartisan, it may have been Republican leadership. “I’m the only governor here. I know how states work, I know how that happens, and that isn’t going to work and yackedy-yak…” and he dumped on revenue sharing.

Smith: Really?

Korologos: Well, that was the end. They went to him, Bryce Harlow told me one time, they went to him and told him, “Never say another word in a leadership meeting again.” He was to come to those meetings and never say another word. He was petrified and he got scared away by that. The other thing that I know firsthand, that I was there and I did it. One day there was speculation about what’s Nixon going to do on television tonight. What’s happening? My gosh, he asked for prime time, big secret. It was the China thing. And so, they said to me to go to the Hill and tell our leaders to be sure and watch TV tonight, and be sure to tell Goldwater, Dominic, and others. And the House guys were to tell – people like Walter Judd and other China hands.

Anyway, they went to tell the equivalent Goldwater-Dominics who had the China syndrome in their heads. And I was to tell Agnew, who was presiding over the Senate that day for some reason to tell him to be sure and watch television that night. “I’ve been told to tell you,” I’d known him fairly well. In fact, I was helping a couple of guys in an Agnew for president drive – there was a little campaign going around with Walt Moat and some of those guys to make Agnew president. And I even went to a Greek thing in New York. I remember speaking in Greek about Agnew at a big Greek Church function thing, and I said, “I bring you greetings from the president,” and then I said in Greek, “and by golly, by the next time I’m here I’ll bring you greetings from a Greek President,” and I spoke in Greek.

Well, so, Agnew and I were pretty close – I knew him fairly well, and I said, “I’ve been told to tell you to be sure to watch TV tonight.” He said, “What’s happening?” He asked me what’s going on. I said, “Damned if I know, but here’s who I’m talking to, so it’s got to be something with China.” Goldwater, Dominic, Walter Judd in the House, and the foreign relations guys – it’s got to be some China thing. He said, “Yeah, I guess you’re right.”

Well, and then we got to chatting and Agnew was visibly unhappy that he had been cut out. He told me how, apparently after the Cabinet Room incident, he had been told by Haldeman, and Bryce had sort of confirmed it, he wasn’t ever to talk – well, it was kind of dumb to dump on the president’s plan. But God damn it, somebody should have told him, here’s what we’re doing. Send a briefing paper around. He was the number two guy in the U.S. You ought to tell him what we’re doing, at least with that revenue sharing thing. So nobody told him anything again. And he was worried that they were going to do some violent thing to him. So he was not an insider.

Then he was chased out by the scandal. I was on the Hill when he sent his resignation to the Secretary of State and to the secretary of the Senate because of his job at the Senate.

Well, pretty soon, we were trying to find a new vice president. They started this process of “who shall it be?” And they had – I don’t know if Timmons or I did it – have you talked to Timmons about all this?

Smith: No, not yet. We wanted to get you first. We want to get to him.

Korologos: Timmons or somebody had me go around, I guess orders from the president and others, to get suggestions from Senators on who should be vice president.
I have in my gut the absolute incontrovertible view that he wanted John Connally. Loved him. Connally used to come back and forth to the White House from Treasury.

Smith: Was it Connally’s kind of brass-plated assurance that appealed to Nixon? What Nixon didn’t have himself.

Korologos: Successful. Yeah.

Smith: He completed Nixon.

Korologos: Completed Nixon. He loved him. I remember the first – I was down in the White House sharing an office with Ken Belieu, I was talking on the phone to my friend Ralph Mecham who was at the University of Utah. He brought me to Senator Wallace Bennett’s office and then left. I asked him one time, “What did you show in your administration? I passed Truth in Lending and got rid of this one secretary we all disliked.” He sent me a telegram back and said, “I hired Korologos and got rid of myself.”

And so Ralph and I were good buddies. I was bullshitting with him on the phone, and I heard this, “Agh, what’s going on here?” I turned around and there is Nixon in my office in the East Wing. And I said, “Ralph, the president just came into my office.” And he said, “Yeah, Tom.” Later he said, “I think I heard him.” So we hung up and Nixon was in there yakking away, on his way over across the street to see Connally at the Treasury. He kind of wandered around to go see Connally. He loved Connally and he wanted to make Connally vice president. I’m convinced Rumors and things circulated that Connally was going to be on the list. So I went around Capitol Hill to get letters –I remember Senator Scott gathered the letters in his office in a stack this high. I don’t know how many there were, it was a four or five inch stack of letters from Senators with suggestions. I remember running into Senator Robert Byrd in the hall. And he said, “Tom, what’s going on?” And I said, “Well, I was a liaison,” and Byrd was good to me and I was good to Byrd. Byrd was good to Nixon because Byrd thought Nixon was the best president since Truman. I can tell you stories about that. Do you want me to tell you a Byrd story, too?
Smith: Sure.

Korologos: One time Byrd had a judge in West Virginia that he wanted to put on the bench. He sent the name down and he was unqualified, said the Justice Department, turned down by Mitchell. I went to Nixon and we were seeking votes in support of the Vietnam war, God – once a week there was an end the war vote. And Nixon would say, “Don’t let them vote on Friday, we can’t have it Friday,” and I couldn’t figure out what the hell that meant. But Kissinger and Le Doc Tho were cutting deals in Paris, and Nixon knew that if we voted, it would undercut Henry’s posture over there.

So I’d go to Byrd and he’d delay it for us. Byrd was stronger for us than Mansfield, who was his leader. And so Nixon said to me, “You tell the Justice Department right now we’ll put that judge in there, right now. You understand that?” One finger again. [tapping] So the judge got in there. So Byrd thought Nixon and I were doing it. Byrd actually thought Nixon was considering him for the Supreme Court when we went through a new justice of the week thing with Haynesworth/Carswell, and all that. And he actually thought about it and I don’t know if Nixon did or not, but we didn’t ever disabuse Byrd. And Byrd was very loyal and supportive. And so Byrd did a lot for us.

I’m really fast forwarding now – Nixon is now former president in New York, Senator Lawton Chiles of Florida had an amendment to an Appropriations Bill to ban pensions and security for former presidents funding for offices or whatever it was. All former presidents. Well, there happened to be one living former president, you know – maybe I’m wrong on that.

Smith: You’re right.

Korologos: Was Nixon the only living former president when Ford was president?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: Who was the former president?

Smith: LBJ had died.
Korologos: So Nixon called me and he said, “I’m going to fax you something,” this was before emails, “you take a look at this, and what can we do about it?” I took a look. It was a House-passed appropriation bill and also in it was a Senate-passed appropriation bill that was not in conference. I said, “Mr. President, it’s in both bills. I don’t know what we can do about it.” He said, “Well, see what you can do. Talk to Byrd.” So I went to Byrd and showed it to him and I said, “Senator, look at this.” He looked at it and didn’t say word. He looked at it and he nodded, and – fast forward again – a week later, it disappeared out of both bills – after it passed both the Senate and the House.

I called Nixon and I said, “You need to call Byrd,” and thank him. Also, every time Byrd cast a tenth thousandth vote, the five thousandth straight day, the twenty-fifth year, the fortieth anniversary of his wife, pick all that stuff, I would call Nixon and say, “Call Byrd.” I often would call Nixon and say, “Here are the five guys running for leader on the Republican side, or the five guys running for leader on the Democrat side and I’ll call you with the results.” Thus the first phone Byrd would get was from Nixon.

Byrd was going to Russia one time. He gave a speech on this after Dole had put together a 25th anniversary, or 20th or 15th or something of the swearing in of Nixon at the capitol steps. Nixon came to it in the LBJ Room and Byrd stood up and said, “I want to tell you a story. I was going to Russia one day, and I needed background, and I want you to know that I called President Ford to say what advice do you have for me for my trip to Russia. He’d been there. And, you know, President Ford gave me a little bit of something. And I called President Carter and I got a little more. And then I called President – who’s next? Somebody – then I called President Nixon and he gave me the most succinct one, two, you tell Gorbachev, one, two, three, four, five, just because there’s a new president doesn’t mean this or that. And he said I was writing notes so fast, I thought that he knew I was going to call him. I thought he knew about my calls.” Well, Nixon got up a little while later and said, “Bob, I gave up bugging people a long time ago, so I didn’t know you were going to call me about.” Laughter in the room.
So the point is, Byrd was very close to Nixon. Byrd said to me, getting back to my original story, “Tom, I hear that Connally is on the list.” And he pointed to the Senate door as we were standing there by the Ohio clock, and he said, “Tom, if he names Connally to be the vice president.” Under the Constitutional amendment requiring confirmation by the Senate and the House for the new vice president in the event of vacancy - he said, “Tom, there will be blood coming out underneath that door, if he names Connally to be vice president. You just pass that on.” And I said, “Yes, sir.” So I took my stack of letters, took them down to Timmons, and I said to Timmons, “You’d better tell somebody what Byrd just told me.” And he said, “Whew, Holy Cow.” And I guess he told somebody and Nixon knew, politically, that Connally could not fly.

Smith: There is a story, which may not have happened, but some variation of it I think happened. Where supposedly Nixon - I think he actually had Rockefeller in the office, this was after Ford’s confirmation - and Nixon says, “Can you imagine Jerry Ford sitting in this chair?” And whether exactly that happened or not, there is a sense that Nixon looked on Ford as his insurance against being impeached, which was a total misreading of the situation. The fact that he might not have seen Jerry Ford in that chair, didn’t alter the fact that Congress was perfectly comfortable with the idea of Jerry Ford in that chair.

Korologos: Okay, I saw and heard – that the story was loose in the land, except a couple of incidents that I had firsthand may add to it. Nixon was so fixated on Cooper, Church, and Mansfield and bringing the Vietnam troops home, and also bringing the troops home from Europe and Asia, shutting NATO down, all those amendments and he really was in on that. He cared. He cared about that all the time. He never asked me anything about any of the other stuff. One day there was a particular vote coming up and we were in the leadership meeting in the Cabinet Room. And Nixon was sitting right here where I am, Jerry Ford is on his right, Hugh Scott is on his left and I’m sitting right here behind him. Scott said, “Ah, Mr. President, oh gee whiz, I don’t know. Gosh, it’s tough. Golly, how are we going to do this?”
The White House forever suspected Scott of leaking stuff to columnist Jack Anderson because he would take notes on the little pads that were about this big and you’d hear (tearing sound) and he’d give them to Jack Anderson. And every time Jack Anderson wrote a column it was how great Scott was, and it protected Scott from negative columns. So, they suspected Scott of leaking.

So Nixon didn’t like him at all at the beginning, so he was sitting like this, and he said, “Well, okay Hugh, I understand. I understand, Hugh,” put his hand on his shoulder, turned around in the great big chair, pulled the chair, moved it up, and went like this…and turned his back on Scott. “Hugh, I understand the problem, yeah, I understand.” And he started talking to President Ford about the problems and the issues. You know, here’s Hugh Scott sitting there and Nixon is turning around just sticking it up Hugh Scott’s rear end every time he had a chance of getting Leader Ford to help him with one of the “end the war” issues. And so my point is, that puts a little chink in the business of Nixon didn’t like Ford.

Smith: Or didn’t see him, maybe didn’t take him seriously, maybe condescended, is the word. They clearly were friends. They’d been allies. But Ford was put - once he became vice president – Ford’s in a very awkward position. There must have been people – well, we’ve talked to a number of people who said, there were folks in the Nixon White House, not surprisingly, who wondered how come he’s out of town all this time. Why isn’t he here? Sort of defending us – it was a very awkward position that he was in.

Korologos: It was awkward as hell.

Smith: The Admiral Stockdale defense. You will have a chance to look over the transcript.

Korologos: Can I take anything out?

Smith: You can put any restrictions on it you want. And none of it will be released before 2013 at the earliest. It will go to the Ford Library. Yeah, you’ll have an opportunity to review all of this and do whatever you want.
Korologos: Because I’ve done an oral history at the Senate for the Senate historians. I don’t know how deep I got on a lot of this, but I said everything up there because they are exempt from the Freedom of Information Act.

Smith: And it’s important that you also know, by the way – this is not today the property of the Ford Library. It is the property of the Ford Foundation. And they are exempt from the Freedom of Information Act.

Korologos: Why? Why are they exempt?

Smith: It is a private foundation, it’s not a government agency.

Korologos: Oh, yeah. I see.

Smith: So the point is, we’re collecting all these – the assumption being, at some point, they will be deposited at the Ford Library, and then they become, if you will, public property. But even there, anyone can put restrictions on it, whatever they want.

Korologos: My restrictions at the Senate, I don’t know, I signed some letter ten years after I die…well, like my Reagan-Bush recollections. After those guys are gone, it doesn’t matter.

Smith: Once you look over the transcript, you can put whatever restrictions on it you want.

Korologos: Okay. Where was I?

Smith: Well, we were talking about the awkward position that Ford was in as vice president.

Korologos: Okay, so I guess there were questions of where he was. There is loose in the land, that, look, how did Ford get to be leader?

Smith: No, the first one was Charlie Hoeven, and then it was Charlie Halleck.

Korologos: Charlie Halleck. And who was behind all this? Les Arends, Griffin, Ford, Laird – Laird who creates a – he’s like that guy in Peanuts with the cloud, he collects dust no matter what he’s doing.
Bob Dole had a great line. He said, “Laird always struck me as a guy who put the poison in the river a mile up, and then runs into town to save everyone.”

Okay, the great conspirator. And that led to the theory that there was a coup, that Ford and those guys were staging a coup against Nixon throughout the whole thing. And I heard it more than once in the White House; at the mess, at sessions, and so on. So onward. So Nixon and Ford were buddies and what have you, I brought the letters down, people were recommending guys all over creation, off the wall stuff. I never looked at the letters, but I gave them to Timmons.

Pretty soon rumors were flying over who was going to be vice president and we went to a White House event. There is another thing I should mention during all this. Hugh Scott had got it into his head, and I don’t know where or how he did, but Nixon would not pick Scott or Ford. Have you heard that?

I remember vaguely Scott saying that and it seemed like an odd thing to say.

It was an odd thing to say. And he had it that it wasn’t going to be Ford or it wasn’t going to be Scott. And it could have been Nixon and his good old Nixon conspiring or some way of putting Scott off so he doesn’t start a campaign or something. So we’re down there and I remember – nobody knew who it was going to be – and Scott kept saying, and others kept saying, look for the wife, look for wives. And we looked around and there were no wives that we knew. Soon Nixon started talking and he started talking and Max Friedersdorf was sitting next to me – have you talked to Max?

Yes.

He said, “God, it’s going to be Jerry!” I said, “God, you’re right!” And so it was Jerry - out come Jerry and Betty. At which point they did whatever they did and then I got involved in the confirmation – both the House and Senate. Went to the House first, didn’t it?

Yeah. He was the most investigated man in American history. They couldn’t find anything.

There was one thing in the hearing on some loan. Do you remember that?
Smith: Yeah, vaguely.

Korologos: Some loan thing he had done and how did he get it. It came up in his hearing, and he answered it well. Of course, the lawyers and Hartmann and all those guys were around and did a lot of the confirmation.

Smith: I take it that confirmation was a lot easier than Rockefeller’s.

Korologos: Yeah, I think you’re right. I remember a lot of people saying, for the first time I’m a Democrat and I’m voting for a Republican that’s likely to be president. We went through Watergate, too, don’t forget.

Smith: When you got Ford confirmed, did you think you were working with the next president? Or was there a sense that Nixon could somehow tough this out. The tapes hadn’t come out…

Korologos: Tough it out. No, I didn’t think Nixon would quit. In fact, he was very close to Senator Stennis and we’d bring Stennis down a lot and Stennis would say, “Ah, Mr. President, you’ve got to stick this out. You ain’t going to quit here. You gotta continue to be president.” “John, don’t worry about that. No, never!” And I believed him. And I think he had it in his head never. Then we went through the agony of once a week some new screwball thing would come up on a Friday – everything happened on Friday – the eighteen minute gap happened on Friday, the smoking gun tape happened on Friday, everything happened…

Smith: Do you have a theory about the eighteen and a half minute gap?

Korologos: No, except there must have been something on it. Somebody erased it. I don’t know what was in it.

Smith: We talked to Mel Laird, who said when he came back into the White House, within less than a month, he got a call from Fred Buzhardt. Buzhardt had been his counsel over at the Pentagon. And so he called Laird in the nature of warning him. “Listen, I’ve been listening to these tapes and Nixon’s in this up to his neck, so be careful.” And Haig subsequently told us, I always assumed that Haig at least listened to the smoking gun tape and Haig denies it. He said
“Fred Buzhardt gave me some very good advice,” which was, “Never be alone in a room with a tape.”

Can you think of a time, a specific event that convinced you that maybe this wasn’t going to be successful? That maybe this presidency was going to end prematurely?

Korologos: I was a hold out, and my first indication of that was the Friday – the day they released the smoking gun tape.

Smith: Oh, basically, it was telling the CIA or the FBI – having one of them tell the other to stay out of the investigation.

Korologos: Well, it was worse than that. It was we can raise money to quiet them down – something worse wasn’t it?

Smith: I think we’re talking two separate tapes.

Korologos: Well, what prompted Scott and Rhodes and Goldwater to come down?

Smith: Alright, that’s the “smoking gun” tape, the June 24th tape. It’s obstruction of justice.

Korologos: Well, what happened on that is, I was going around – I have a paper and I was going to give it to the Nixon Library. It had a vote count on it as to who was still with us. Before that thing came out, I had thirty-five, forty votes, solid, on impeachment. We could beat it in the Senate. Because the Southerners were with us, all those old Bulls that we had been working with, and the Republicans were fairly good, except some of the liberals. We had thirty – forty, we could have beat it. Then that thing came out and I started nosing around again and even guys like Russell Long said, “God damn, Tom, even the rats are leaving the sinking ship.” Because Long was one of our supporters and Herman Talmadge was a supporter because of what happened to his dad when they threw him out of the Georgia thing. Bennett, Cotton, Curtis.

Another item comes to mind involving Rabbi Korff [who] had organized a star spangled banner sing in the Rotunda of the Capitol. I was talking to one of the cops who said they were instructed by the chief to go arrest the rabbi for disrupting. And he said, “I’m not fixing to arrest anybody singing The Star Spangled Banner in the Capitol of America. They can fire me!” Well, anyway, all that was going on right in the middle of all this. Anyway I started making vote counts and found we’re down to about six or eight. I’ve got the names on a piece of paper. There was Bennett, Cotton, Curtis, Eastland.
Eastland would have never voted to impeach. Eastland got pissed off at Nixon, “@#$%, I’m not going to vote for him anymore.” I said, “What’s the matter with you?” He said, “Well, he fouled up the soybean subsidy.” I said, “Mr. Chairman, what are you talking about?” “Well, look, he did this to soybeans and he shouldn’t have done this!” And that’s going to make you vote to impeach the president? Well, we had a little chortle.

But there were about six that hung tough. And I went down and told Timmons that I think we’re down to about six or eight. Because I was under the impression, from Haig and Lehman and others – are you going to interview John Lehman? You might should.

Smith: No, I haven’t, but that’s a great idea.

Korologos: He was close to Jerry, close to Haig.

Smith: Oh, Jerry Jones.

Korologos: John Lehman was close to Jerry Ford.

Smith: Really?

Korologos: I think so.

Smith: Okay, that’s great.

Korologos: Anyway, we were down to six or eight, and it was not looking good at all, and it prompted him to say in his speech, “I have lost my political base,” which is what he said in that meeting when we had them all down to the Cabinet Room to tell everybody it’s all over and he was going to resign tonight, and what have you. At which, they told me to invite the leaders, including Senator Griffin. I recall during impeachment we were hustling impeachment votes – I was talking to Cotton, I was talking to our guys, shoring up all the base vote.
There were only two Congressional Affairs persons in the history of the United States ever counted impeachment up to that time – me and the guy that did Andrew Johnson’s and he’s dead. I used to say that. I used to say that a lot. I said, “Let me tell you something Senator,” just in a jocular way, as only Korologos can get away with, “the last guys who voted with impeachment are dead. You saw what happened to them.” And ho ho ho. So I’d say that to these guys and pretty soon we had lost our political base. I remember we invited people down to the day, or whatever day it was that he announced that he was going to resign that night. We had a leadership meeting in the Cabinet Room. So I invited Griffin, during the time of all and he said to me, and to Wally, “Hey, fellas, look, I’m Senate whip,” and we used to do whip counts together. We’d counted things together all the time in his whip office. “It would be wiser for you not to come to this office during impeachment counts because I don’t how….this is a big Senate issue.” So we started hanging out in the vice president’s office. In other words, he didn’t want us around helping Nixon. Put that down as another conspiracy theory episode.

So Nixon set it. They all come down. Griffin said, “Jeez, if he wants me down there, I guess I’ll come,” implying that Nixon might have known what Griffin was up to. And sure enough, they all came, sat around the Cabinet table and Nixon said what he said. I remember well, he got out of his chair. He almost broke down in tears. And he pulled his big chair back like this, this side – I was sitting right there – and he got up and he stumbled, and I went and grabbed him so he wouldn’t fall down. He turned around and went out behind the chair like that, and left the room and said, “Well, tonight I’m going to be on television.” And that was the last we saw of him until he went into the East Room the next day that was where he put on his glasses, the first time I’d ever seen him in glasses, and said goodbye and went to the plane and went like that and that was it.

Smith: Were there tears in that room?

Korologos: Oh, God, tears like crazy. It was awful. Okay, now let me tell you the rest of what happened to me. So Nixon was gone, in the plane, just terrible. Down the carpet, in the helicopter, off he goes. Resignation effective noon, and noon was coming while Nixon is in mid air over Iowa or someplace, and now Warren Burger, on the spot, swears in Jerry Ford.
Tom Korologos  May 21, 2009

Smith:  Yeah, the 9th of August.

Korologos:  When did Nixon leave?

Smith:  He left that morning. At noon, Ford is sworn in.

Korologos:  Okay, so we’re now swearing in Jerry Ford, President Jerry Ford. Well, let me say some other stuff about Vice President Ford, can I go back? How much time have we got?

Erik:  Seven minutes.

Smith:  We’ve got another tape, or we could always come back and do more later.

Korologos:  Well, I’m in the middle of a project downstairs that’s making me a little nervous.

Smith:  Let’s just finish this tape and then we’ll schedule another time.

Korologos:  Okay. Well, before that, Jerry is now vice president. They finally put a gym together about this size of this room over in the EOB and I go over there all the time and take some steam and jump up and down like a workout. Vice President Ford was there all the time – used to bullshit with him all the time. Became fairly close to him on Senate stuff and brought him up to the Senate a lot, he presided. I can’t tell you of any close tie votes – the darn thing was, we’d bring the vice president up to break a tie and the damn vote would be eighty to twenty, and yeah, good count, Tom.” So, we hit it off pretty good and so fast forward. Now Jerry Ford is president of the United States. Before that we had said we’re going to bring leaders down to meet the new president right after the Nixon helicopter left. So we’re now in the Blue Room – is that the middle room?

Smith:  Yeah.
Korologos: We’re now in the Blue Room, and I’m standing there talking to President Ford like I’m talking to you. Behind President Ford, now president five minutes, are the leaders Mansfield, Scott, and others.

Smith: Carl Albert.

Korologos: Carl Albert. I’ve got to go back and tell another Scott story. Scott and some of his staff bitched to me, “What is this stuff when Jerry became vice president that wasn’t going to be Scott or Ford,” I said, “I don’t know where that came from. One of the problems with Nixon and leaders and even your leader, Scott, and all of them is – you know what happens? They get in meetings and talk like Casey Stengel. Nobody knows what the hell they are talking about or what they mean. And guys like us have to interpret it. So you can take any interpretation out of that you want. That’s what I think happened to Scott.” He took some long convoluted conversation, interpreted it into that it wasn’t going to be Scott or – because Scott was pissed that it was Ford. A little bit, but it could have been him. And a little bit that he thought that Nixon didn’t tell him.

So, we’re now – God, I’m mixing up sixteen stories at once – so now, I’m talking to President Ford, and over there are the leaders, twenty-five yards away waiting to come and shake hands with him. Mansfield’s the first in line. And I said, “We’ve got the leaders down to come through a receiving line, now Mr. President. Mr. President, congratulations. We’ve got the leaders now to go through a receiving line and to say to you good luck or whatever it is to say. You know them better than I do.” And he said to me, “Tom, I want you to know you are the only Senate creature I have around here.” Creature. “And don’t you let anybody talk you into leaving. I don’t know the Senate. I was there for a little while as vice president, but you understand that, you will be my Senate guide, my Senate liaison.”

To my knowledge, he didn’t talk or see anybody between the time of the swearing in and the time he walked to the Blue Room, I was the first person President Gerald R. Ford of Michigan hired in his White House. So now I’ve got a job. Hell, I didn’t know – I had two kids, I didn’t know what was going to happen. Everybody is going down the dumps. I’m in there bawling five minutes ago as Nixon leaves, and now I’m elated.

Smith: We were told by more than one person, that you could watch – everyone was invited down for a reception or whatever in the State Dining Room, and you could watch the Nixon people just peel away.

Korologos: That’s right. They peeled away.

Smith: Which is understandable.

Korologos: Yup. And the reception occurred and they peeled away. Later I went to the White House mess and the Nixon guys were in there daubing down in their soup, with their heads bowed, and I said one of the most obnoxious things in the history of the United States, in a loud voice, “You Nixon guys are in a heap of trouble. The president just hired me.” Isn’t that terrible?

Smith: That’s a fantastic ending.

Smith: You warned Ford about not going to a party.

Korologos: Rumsfeld was involved in this, but my version of it is that President Ford and I were taking some steam together over in the EOB, putting on our black ties to go to a birthday party for Tip O’Neill? Tungsun Park was giving at the Georgetown Club.

Smith: Ford had become President at this time?

Korologos: Ford was President.

Smith: Okay.

Korologos: Ford was President. So, we’re in there getting ready, washing our hands and face and the phone rang and the President went to the phone and said, “Oh, yeah…yeah…yeah,” and came back and said, “We’re not going.” I said, “We’re not going? Why not?” He said, “Because that was Tip and he said I shouldn’t go and he’ll tell me why later,” or something. He didn’t quite say why.

Smith: A little mysterious?

Korologos: Mysterious. So, I think, “Geez, thank goodness I get to go home.” Come to find out a short time later, Park got indicted for whatever he got indicted for. And, I’ll be darned, Tip O’Neill showed you what kind of a guy he was and what kind of a town we lived in in those days. He tipped off the President not to go to this party to protect the President and his friend, Jerry Ford. And I put that in my head as an example of what was then and what is now. Because the difference that has happened and the comity in those days.

Smith: It’s a great story. Can you expound at all on the Ford-O’Neill relationship because it seems to have been pretty close?
Korologos: Golly, Richard, I have no personal – see, I did the Senate --

Smith: Of course he’d been in the House all those years. Did he have any friends in the Senate?

Korologos: Who?

Smith: Ford. Were there people in the Senate who he knew?

Korologos: Hardly. They could’ve been some of the appropriators when he was on those conferences and he was on Appropriations and it could’ve been – he was vice president for how long?

Smith: About nine months?

Korologos: You could barely make way to make friends in nine months, but he was close to Senator Griffin from Michigan. And I can’t remember specifically any other personal friends he had in the Senate. If I saw a list, I could probably come up with somebody, but I don’t know.

Smith: That went on for a long time.

Korologos: Quite a bit.

Smith: Did you ever think you were going to lose or that he would withdraw?

Korologos: No.

Smith: No?

Korologos: I don’t know why I had said that so fast, but I never think I’m ever going to lose. Maybe that’s what’s wrong. But, no, I have no reaction to, as I remembered in that thing we did last time, there were other names that were considered before President Ford was nominated for vice president. Nixon considered, but I don’t have any knowledge of other names that President Ford considered for vice president.

Smith: The best evidence is that he also looked at George Bush and he looked at Don Rumsfeld at the time that he nominated Rockefeller. And his view was that, while both Bush and Rumsfeld in effect represented the future of the party, Rockefeller’s experience, his international credibility, his reputation for attracting talented people, all of that recommended him. And given the unique set of circumstances that Ford found himself in, he went with Rockefeller. And I think Bryce Harlow was recommending Rockefeller and I think Mel Laird was as well.

Korologos: Did Baker’s name ever come up? Howard?

Smith: That’s interesting. I don’t think it did at that time. It did at the ’76 convention in a major way, a serious way. But once Rockefeller was off the ticket at the ’76 convention, Baker was one of a handful of people who were seriously considered. Now, you stayed at the White House for how long after Ford becomes President?

Korologos: I guess it was a year. When did Ford become President?

Smith: He became President in August of ’74.

Korologos: Golly, then we left in January or February of ’75. Yeah, so we stayed six months.

Smith: What were the issues? What were the kinds of things you were dealing with during those six months?

Korologos: I’d have to look at some dates. There were things in the Appropriations committee. The President is now President and one of the first things that we did was to bring in chairmen to meet the new President. Of course he knew them, shaking his hand and talking to them, but there were some issues they had to sit down and talk to the committee chairmen about and others. Things were moving. There was a tax bill. And one of the memories that I have that was quite remarkable was we brought Senator Long Finance Committee chairman down because there was a tax bill – there’s always a tax bill – and I went up to him and he said the same thing to me then that he later said to President Reagan, fast forward however many years. I went to him and I said, “We’re putting a program together to have President Ford meet you and others to come down and discuss issues kicking around.” And I don’t know what prompted me to say it, but I said, “Make a list and come on down and talk to him.” And Russell Long said, “Tom, I never make lists.” I said, “Why not?” He said, “Lists have ends to them.” And the funniest thing in the world is, when I took Long down to see President Reagan, he said the same thing. I had forgotten it and it reminded me.

So we brought Senator Long down and it was President Ford Senator Long and myself in the Oval Office. And Long was the kind of a guy that kept moving his chair closer to the President. And the President was sitting there where presidents sit and Long was in the chair on his left and I was in the chair on the right taking notes. And I kept trying to take notes so I could write the report for the historians and Long’s chair kept moving, kept moving closer and closer to President Ford. And it was a great big chair. I mean, it was not just a little chair, it was a serious chair.

And pretty soon I looked up and he has moved that chair a good eight or ten feet to President Ford and I’m not sure, but I think President Ford’s chair had also moved – it was on wheels, Long’s wasn’t – and his chair had also moved closer to Long. Pretty soon Long’s got his knee on Ford telling him what we’re going to do. “Here’s what I’m going to do”, “We need to do this on the tax bill”, and he’s banging on President Ford’s knee. “Here’s what you need to do”, “Here’s what you’re going to have to do”. And President Ford was nodding and nodding and I say to you that I got very nervous that here’s this new President, been President now a very short time, a week maybe, and Russell Long is in there being Russell Long, as only the chairman of the Finance committee can be, beating up on the President, telling the President what he was going to do, and what we were going to have in the next tax bill.

And I had to come to the experience with Nixon when we had the mental attitude of “Up Congress” and here’s President Ford who is a creature of the Congress, down here willing and ready to talk and do whatever needed to be done to solve whatever the issue of the day was. And I got a little nervous that maybe word’s going to spread on how Long went down there and got what he wanted out of Ford, by golly. And my attitude has been and is that I was on the Hill for nine years and in the Executive Branch for five and I’m sorry, Hill, I’m an Executive Branch creature. Congresses do two things best:
nothing and overreact and sometimes both at the same time. And I’m a strong Executive Branch person and this bothered me.

The President, right after that session, went to, I don’t know where it was, somewhere in the Caribbean, the Virgin Islands, as I recall. A G8 or G20 or whatever those things would’ve been in the Caribbean. And off he went and, they came back from that and he wanted to see Long again. And it had only been two or three weeks after we’d seen Long, so we put together the briefing papers I brought Long back down. And I’m here to tell you that in that short period of time, Jerry Ford had become President. He was telling Long what he, Jerry Ford, wanted to do. And Long was backing down. “Now, Russell, here’s what we’re going to do” and “Here’s what I want to happen on this.” And I was so impressed and I came away buoyed up by, “Hey, this guy’s going to be alright.” And it was a remarkable story that I saw before my eyes.

Smith: There are those who believe, whatever they think about him personally, politically, subsequently, who nevertheless believed that Don Rumsfeld played a very significant role in in effect coaching Ford, teaching him the difference between Capitol Hill and the executive position.

Korologos: I’m not surprised. Yes, that doesn’t surprise me and thank God because that was a good lesson. I didn’t know that Don had done that. Have you interviewed Don?

Smith: Yes. He also says, by the way, that he believes that the President made a mistake in waiting as long as he did to make some of the significant changes in the cabinet and that he strongly urged him earlier rather than later to, in a very substantive and symbolic way, make it clear to the American people that this was a different administration even if that meant clearing out people who had done nothing wrong.

Korologos: It was. It was a new administration. He was right. Another time I remember prior to this trip and when I saw this metamorphosis occur, there were two or three things happened. I know the Nixon advance guys and the Nixon schedulers were still around – Mike Duvall and a bunch of them. And they wanted to look at the President’s schedule and what he may have committed to as Vice President. Well, that secretary that President Ford had, who’s a nice little lady who’s name I don’t remember, --

Smith: Mildred Leonard?

Korologos: Yes, exactly. Brought in a calendar like I have on my desk with flipping dates and times and places, but penciled in this, this, and this and this. And they were aghast that this was so elementary scheduling rather than going through the process and what’s in it for the President and why and wherefore and yet the audience and so on.

Smith: Is it the difference between how a congressman would handle his schedule?

Korologos: Amen. Absolutely. And they found things that he had committed, fundraiser in Michigan, a Rotary speech in Toledo. And they would go, “But what is this?” “Well, I don’t remember but they must have told somebody to go there and give this speech.” So they were running around trying to get a handle on that because he’s now President. And the other thing that happened that was remarkable is that he was a former congressman and I walked by the Oval Office one time and I looked in there and there were two or three guys with their legs draped over the handles of the couches, standing there talking or sitting, and the President was at his desk and it was a congressman’s office again. And I thought, “My goodness has this place changed.” And I almost went in, but I didn’t out of fear and a little more remembering the Nixon thing when the place was as quiet as a church and I didn’t have any reason to go in, but people wandered in and out of there.

Smith: That’s fascinating because it was in those first few months that he had what had come to be known as the spokes in the wheel organization. And indeed Rumsfeld made it a condition of his coming back that they would get rid of that. That was very much how a congressional office functioned.

Korologos: That’s right. I was on the Hill nine years. I know what that means.

Smith: Why would it not work in the presidency?

Korologos: You have to have a much more discipline. You have to have, I hate to say this, but presidents say things and do things that have impact. Congress doesn’t have impact. Congressmen and senators can say things morning, noon, and night and they do not have an impact on the market, the international exchanges, war, peace, foreign affairs, trade. Presidents go “Boo” and the repercussions world-wide are enormous. Congressmen go “Boo” and who gives a rat’s ass? So, what you have is the transformation from a congressional person to an executive branch person where comments and decisions matter and we’re seeing that today with some of the Obama stuff. Those guys still think they’re in the House poking around, but they’re probably going to get better. I guess they all do. I should tell you another thing. I have no memory of it. It got into a Cheney book that somebody wrote here a year ago. Who wrote the Cheney book? It was a favorable book.

Smith: Steven Hays?

Korologos: Could’ve been.

Smith: Conservative?

Korologos: Yeah, I think it was unauthorized. Well, Joulwan, George Joulwan, later NATO commander, was Haig’s deputy at the NSC. And Haig stayed as Chief of Staff for awhile and Cheney -- what was Cheney in those days?

Smith: He would’ve been Rumsfeld’s deputy.

Korologos: Okay. I can’t remember exactly what it said or what happened, but it’s in Cheney’s book and it must have happened but I have zero memory of it. I sent a piece of paper to Joulwan that Cheney was doing something with President Ford that I thought was kind of strange. And I sent Joulwan a piece of paper that said it was on the President’s schedule that day with a circle around the Cheney thing that said “Can you believe this shit?” Well, fast forward twenty years, Cheney’s book comes out and it’s in there. Korologos said about Cheney and I went to him at something and said, “What the hell was that all about?” And he said, “Yeah, you did that.” And I said, “No, I did not.” I said, “No, I went to Joulwan and he said he has no memory of it.” And he said, “What are you talking about? I know I saw the piece of paper.”
So I started an argument with him about whatever this thing was and we had a good laugh, I hope.

Smith: How would you differ in terms of Rumsfeld’s style of running the place and Cheney’s? We’ve talked to a number of people who have indicated they thought that there was a clear difference in style.

Korologos: Oh yeah, Rumsfeld was a master sergeant, I mean, by the numbers. Remind me to tell you something about Cheney and Kissinger, would you?

Smith: Sure.

Korologos: Yeah, Cheney was a good leader, but Rumsfeld was a drill sergeant. “One, two, three…” And he was that way in Defense when I worked for him. He was that way at Searle. And that was Rumsfeld being Rumsfeld. He’s that way today. Ask my wife. He was on the Kellogg board with her. And people to this day, Gordon Gund who was on the Kellogg board with him and I’ve been with Rumsfeld when Gordon and all of them talked about, “Old Rumsfeld never changes, does he?”

But Cheney was more quiet, steady, never raised his voice, but important, you knew what he was doing. My one memorable thing that comes back to me about that is that Senator Eastland, chairman of the Judiciary committee, had prevailed upon us during the Nixon years to get him a plane for the Special Air Mission over at Andrews to go to Mississippi a lot. And Eastland being Eastland, chairman of the committee, used to confirm all of the judges and all of the Supremes and we had made it a policy of Eastland gets anything he wants. So he came to me one Friday and he said, “I need a plane.” So I came down and went to the military office and said, “We need a plane for Eastland. The usual.” Well, President Ford is now President. Cheney is in there. When did Rummy leave the White House?

Smith: Well, remember, it was the end of the year massacre, end of ’75, when Rockefeller is dumped and Schlesinger is replaced by Rumsfeld and Cheney becomes Chief of Staff? End of ’75.

Korologos: So it’d only been three or four months from August.
Smith: And that’s ’74. This is a year later.

Korologos: Okay, then for some reason Cheney was the guy I talked to that this piece of paper ended up with and he said he called me in and said, “What’s this?” And I said, “It’s a plane for Eastland?” And he said, “Do we do this all the time?” I said, “Yep, we do this all the time. He’s chairman of the committee.” He said, “Good grief” or something. He was puzzled and amazed by it. There was a guy that ran the military office, Sergeant Gulley, that wrote a book on all this, too. And Rumsfeld asked me about the book sometime later. “Did you read it?” I said, “Yeah, I sure did. There’s sure a lot of fiction and a lot of revisionist history in there to make this guy look good.” And Don said the same thing that a lot of that stuff was self-serving.

Smith: For example, Dorothy Dowton, the President’s personal secretary, chose her words carefully, but indicated that Rumsfeld had tried to replace her. And by contrast when Cheney took over, people felt – Korologos: Comfortable.

Smith: Yeah. Not relaxed. No one is ever relaxed

Korologos: That’s Rumsfeld. I’m not surprised.

Smith: Tell us about Ed Levi, because there’s a classic example of when a President begins to remake the cabinet. Presumably, as with the later nomination of John Paul Stevens, with this kind of necessity to go outside the usual political bounds. The Justice Department is super-sensitive and it’s, fairly or not, perceived to have been at the heart of the problems during the Nixon presidency. So you have to find someone cleaner than a hound’s tooth, to use Ike’s phrase, and he comes up with Ed Levi. I think it was in place of Bill Saxbe?

Korologos: Okay, it was.

Smith: Now, did Saxbe decide on his own to leave?

Korologos: I don’t know.

Smith: Okay.
Korologos: But Saxbe, the contrast that you mentioned was remarkable. Saxbe was from Ohio and chewed tobacco and had a jar like you put jelly in, underneath the front seat of his car. I used to ride back and forth to the Hill with him. And every once in awhile, he’d pull this jar out and pop the tobacco juice into the jar. It was swirling around in there. But he’s a great guy. I liked him, but then suddenly Levi appears with a bow tie from the University of Chicago, this brilliant legal mind that could quote law to you from the beginning, but he didn’t know anything about politics. And the rumor was that he came from Chicago, Rumsfeld - Chicago, “Ah ha!” So somehow or other that Rumsfeld must have found Levi and put him in there.

So suddenly it’s time for Levi to be confirmed and word is announced and they did it wrong as I remember. They did not go to the chairman first, that was one of the first appointments that they made, I think. And they didn’t go to the committee chairman and they didn’t tell me or I would’ve said, “Let me tip off Hruska and Eastland and other leaders” like you do any time and then announce it. Tell them at ten o’clock in the morning and announce it at noon. Didn’t happen. So they announced it and Hruska and Eastland were taken aback when people started doing research on him and found out he was from Chicago. He was liberal. He was for something or other. He could’ve been for something very liberal that I have no memory of what it was except somebody discovered that he had gotten in trouble for bugging a jury. And, my goodness, it was kind of funny, but the Republicans who had a reputation for bugging everybody – remember Nixon, Kissinger - you know. And now they’re raising hell because Levi had bugged a jury.

So, come to find out it was when he was a Dean of the University of Chicago Law School. Brilliant, one of the best of the nation. And he had a class or something on the psychology of juries. I’m making that up because I think that’s what it sort of was. And they were trying to find out what goes on in a jury room. And he indeed put a bug in a moot court class jury room. The story they told me when it came out was that it was a moot court class jury in the school. That they had a moot court trial and indeed had a jury and indeed put them in a room to decide on the case and they bugged the room to see what thought processes went through a juror’s mind as he deliberated. Well, Eastland and Hruska were now madder than hell and I’ve got to bring them down to see President Ford.

Smith: And their anger is rooted in the fact that they weren’t tipped off.

Korologos: That was the root of it. And when that happens, you can find out a hundred reasons why you don’t like him, but if they’d have known about it, they would’ve “Hmm, we’ll take a look at him” and it wouldn’t have been – but that annoyed them from the start. And then the bugging thing came out and then his record came out and then he wore a bow tie. Eastland even mentioned he wore a bowtie. He told me, “Who’s this bowtie?” So, we brought him down and we’re waiting there in that room where the secretaries are, not the Roosevelt Room, to go in there -- and what was President Ford’s daughter’s name?

Smith: Susan.

Korologos: And Susan had the big red lab in there. The dog’s name was -

Smith: Liberty.

Korologos: So Liberty is down there sniffing Eastland’s crotch and Eastland’s getting nervous, probably had a few pops, both of them. God, I said to myself, “What else can go wrong?” And Eastland’s trying to shoo the dog away and I’m trying to shoo the dog away and finally Liberty goes away and we go inside and they have not sat down yet or anything and Eastland said to President Ford, “This is a terrible appointment.” And Hruska said, “I agree with Jim, Mr. President. This is a terrible appointment.” And I thought, “Oh my word, how bad this has gotten.” We sat down and they talked it over and the President was persuasive, made his case. He did quiet them all down. They were silent.

Smith: Did he apologize for not telling -?

Korologos: Oh yeah. “We mishandled that.” I took a little blame for that, but I didn’t know either. We told them, “You should’ve known sooner” and “We’ve learned.” And “Let me tell you about this business of what his record is and who he is” and they had cited all this brilliant stuff that Levi had done and also the issue of bugging the jury and what that was about and so on. And they kind of went away mollified and alright. And I kind of said, “Whew, I think we’ve dodged one.” But then it came time for Levi to get confirmed and they had not met Levi yet. So it came time for me to take Levi up to meet Hruska and Eastland, so we arranged a breakfast up in the Senate Dining Room. And we went in and sat down and Eastland looked at the bowtie and he kept staring at this bowtie. And I didn’t recognize it at the time, but later he had mentioned that “that fellow wearing a bowtie”. And I thought, “Oh God” and we’re not going to change his bowtie. That would’ve been confirmation conversion. So we sat down to breakfast and Eastland ordered for all of us, me and Levi and Hruska and Eastland. Is Levi still alive?

Smith: No, he died several years ago.

Korologos: The waitress lady came over and he said, “The usual for all of us.” So, I didn’t know what we were going to get, so here came bacon, scrambled eggs and grits and toast. And she put it down in front of us and Levi looked at this breakfast and I looked at it and I knew immediately it was grits and he kept eating all around it. And Eastland pulls out the Worcestershire sauce and he pours it on his and Hruska’s and mine and Levi’s. Now we’re sitting here with grits and Worcestershire sauce and I’m not sure Levi had ever seen grits, let alone eaten them, let alone eaten them with Worcestershire sauce on them. So, somehow or other, Hruska and Eastland were distracted by somebody who came to tell them about something on the floor and I knew Levi was frowning and he said, “What’s that?” And I said, “It’s grits.” And I mumbled, “You want to get confirmed, you’d better eat them.” And that poor guy nibbled on them as did I. But we got him through and that was in the days when it was easier to get people confirmed than it is today. I didn’t handle any other confirmations, I don’t think. Were there others?

Smith: Yeah, well, let’s see. I think they probably tended to come in after you left.

Korologos: When did we do Kissinger?

Smith: Because, again, it was Rumsfeld who himself only came on board I guess in December full-time. Had urged the President to sort of clean house immediately and instead it was sort of staggered. You know, people like Bill Coleman and Carla Hills and other folks came on later in ’75.

Korologos: I don’t remember that. Henry stayed on, didn’t he?

Smith: Yes.

Korologos: Now, I’m not clear in my own head. Did Henry have to be reconfirmed?

Smith: No.

Korologos: No, neither did Gates last time, did he?

Smith: No. Now, let me ask you because maybe it’s an urban legend and maybe it’s not…when the pardon took place, members of both houses rushed to the cameras that day to publically make their displeasure known. But that supposedly, behind the scenes, there were calls, some of them were actually sort of privately telling Ford, “You did the right thing.”

Korologos: “Atta boy.” When did the pardon occur?

Smith: One month into the presidency. It was September of ’74. Does any of that ring a bell with you?

Korologos: Yeah, because what happened on the pardon was, and there was a photograph of it, we’re all called in to Timmons’ office and it was Hartmann and Ford and Timmons and me and Haig. We’re standing around and Timmons was on the phone, phoning people on the Hill and phoning around and Haig and the President were listening and they gave me a couple of assignments to go talk about the pardon and I remember I was elated, personally. I recognized immediately what a nightmare we would’ve had. Good for him. And then everybody fainted, the New York Times and all of them says it’s a terrible thing, and it cost the President the presidency I’m sure, with a lot of votes the way they played it. Today, he’s like Harry Truman who was a great hero and we found out for doing this, but yes, I think there was some calls and some “Whew, we don’t have to go through that.” Remember Congress’ Law, Congresses does two things: nothing and overreact. And there was an example. There were please to do nothing and they were overreacting at the same time that they did not have to go through the agony of the trial of a President. I can’t tell you names of who might’ve called, but Timmons might know. Clark MacGregor died, didn’t he?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: He might’ve known. Too many guys have died. You’re too late.

Smith: Let me ask you a generic question the Levi thing brings to mind. You have vast experience in this area. How impressed or persuaded are members of the Congress by sheer brilliance/credentials? If you bring a candidate to them who anyone outside would recognize as eminently qualified, is that enough?

Korologos: No, it’s just part of the equation.

Smith: What else does it take?

Korologos: Well, if you’re Secretary of the Interior, you’d better be from the West, you’d better wear a cowboy hat, you’d better know what grazing rights are and if you’re going to be Secretary of Agriculture, you’d better know the price of soybeans last week. And if you’re going to be Attorney General, look at the Attorneys General we’ve nominated. Was Saxbe a brilliant scholar? No.
Was Meese a brilliant scholar? No. Who else is over there? Holder had a record as a U.S. attorney or whatever Holder was. Was Bobby Kennedy a brilliant scholar? No.

Smith: Before I forget, what was your impression of Elliot Richardson?

Korologos: He was a sophisticated, used to talk in sentences written in paragraphs when sentences would do, good guy. I knew him fairly well. We got him confirmed. That was Rumsfeld’s Attorney General of the week. That was another time. Who appointed Richardson? Nixon?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: Well, they appointed Richardson as Attorney General and for some reason I got in the car with Eastland to go to the Hill after Nixon told him it was Richardson or somebody told him it was Richardson. And I’m in the car with Eastland going to the Hill and there’s Elliott Richardson walking back to the Justice Department on the street, on Pennsylvania Avenue. And I said to Eastland, “There is Elliot Richardson, the Attorney General. Should we give him a ride?” And he said, “No, drive on.” So we drove on. He wouldn’t give Richardson a ride. I find that the funniest thing in the world.

Smith: When the whole Saturday Night Massacre took place, do we even now understand? I mean, we’ve talked to a number of people and it seems so convoluted as to whether Richardson in fact had given the President his word in terms of removing Archibald Cox, whether the White House believed in fact that Elliot was on board and Richardson subsequently - for whatever reason - changed his mind? Do you have any sense of what transpired?

Korologos: No, except that Richardson wasn’t a political person. That’s perfectly understandable what Richardson did. He was not a Rumsfeld; he was not a Washington insider that knew.

Smith: And he was certainly not a Nixon man.

Korologos: Yeah, he was not a Rahm Emanuel. He’s an intellectual. He’s a Levi. Nice guy, smart, brilliant, could recite Homer to you. Is that what you really want as your Attorney General?

Smith: Yeah. Tell us about Earl Butz.

Korologos: Earl Butz had a joke a minute. A funny guy. A great guy. That got him in trouble for telling an off-color story, wasn’t it?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: He was confirmed for agriculture secretary that somebody, John Whitaker, I guess, found him, wherever he was. We got him through and Senator Miller of Iowa voted against him for some reason. Iowa, a big farm state. It was a remarkable thing that a farm state Senator Miller would vote against Butz. The story - that Butz tells that Miller came down there one time asking for this and this and this and this and this for Iowa and Iowa that and Iowa this and Iowa that in a long meeting - Miller never was one to be reticent - or went on forever. He talked forever and demanded all these things for Iowa farmers. At which point, Earl Butz got out of his chair, walked around in back of the desk or the wall where the vote count long sheet was with the senators names, every name on it on how they voted. I don’t know if it was the original, it could’ve been. I got the original on my confirmation. It’s kind of fun to hang. My wife Ann has hers as Secretary of Labor.

As Butz tells this story, he went down this list and says, “Here it is, ‘Miller – Nay’. And what do you want to talk about Jack?” And that’s an impressive story. But Butz was a good Secretary of Agriculture because he told it like it was, he was blunt, he didn’t mince any words, he knew the stuff, I don’t know what his background was, but he knew what he was talking about. He was the combination politician, the smart guy, Mr. Congeniality. I went dove hunting with him one time in Virginia somewhere. I went with Admiral Zumwalt in Zumwalt’s Defense Department car and Butz was already there. Butz said, “I’ve already shot my dove for the day.” He had been on some talk show, it was on a Sunday, where they were talking about the Vietnam war, so he was politically into everything that went on.

Smith: During those six months when you were there, I know no openings came up on the court until later when Justice Douglas resigned, but were there any advance discussions? Any attempt to sort of take stock of where the court was? Or was it more reactive?

Korologos: Not to my knowledge.

Smith: Were there ever any overall discussions about replacing members of the cabinet or was that again done on an individualized basis?

Korologos: Not to my knowledge. I didn’t get involved in any of that. There were rumors all over the place of why people survived.

Smith: Did you sense the Ford-Schlesinger non-relationship?

Korologos: Schlesinger’s a hard guy to - I mean, he was kind of a mean-spirited guy on some days. And I didn’t sense any - they were two different kinds of people, I felt and I don’t know what their personal relationships were.

Smith: One senses that Ford thought Schlesinger condescended.
Korologos: Yeah, that. You bet.

Smith: That kind of, almost a caricature of the professorial manner, suggesting that Ford who’d, after all, been on the Armed Forces committee all those years and knew a lot about the subject, was somehow not up to Schlesinger’s intellectual level.

Korologos: There was a little of that. You could tell. Even today, Schlesinger’s being Schlesinger. It’s like Rumsfeld’s being Rumsfeld. Yeah, I can believe that.

Smith: When you decided to leave in six months or whatever, what prompted that?

Korologos: Well, Timmons and I, and Stan Abner who was counsel in OMB, were fixing to leave after a while. We had been in the White House now four plus years and we wanted to open a lobby firm and do some things called “Lobbyists Unlimited.” There were tax firms, there were trade firms, there were other firms. We wanted to do it all and take clients and look at the issues that come up. Everything. All of us do everything. So we went into sessions and meetings. What are we going to do? What are we going to call this? We kicked around titles. We kicked around pieces of paper to make a brochure. And we had let it be known that we wanted to go and one of the ulterior motives was we wanted to stay with President Ford for as long as we could to get through the Watergate syndrome.

Smith: That’s fine. Now, you came back to work on the ’76 convention.

Korologos: Let me tell you one more Ford story.

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: There was a bill kicking around, a treaty that we wanted. The State Department wanted, NSC wanted, I’ve long since forgotten what it was. All the NSC guys and state guys, “Oh my gosh, we’ve got to talk Chairman Sparkman about this.” And I couldn’t find Sparkman, or something came up, and it became crucial to get it done before some recess, so the President let me in his office. I’d see him in the halls and we’d talk. And he asked me, “What’s the story on that treaty?” And I said, “We have a mess on our hands and I can’t get hold of Sparkman.” He said, “Call him.” So the President and I walked into the Oval Office and the phones over there in the corner and I picked up the phone and the operator came immediately and I said, “Hi.” And she said, “Mr. President?” And I said, “No, it’s Tom Korologos.” I thought she was going to call the cops. And she said, “What can I do for you?” And I said, “The President would like to speak to Senator Sparkman” and “Here’s his number” and sure enough Sparkman came on and I said, “Mr. Chairman, hang on, here’s the President.”

The President talked to him and I headed straight to the Hill afterward and Sparkman had it done. And, in fact, Sparkman got in trouble with Byrd over this thing because he went out on the floor and I had cleared the bill with the Republicans, on Foreign Relations at the time. And I said, “Hey, we really need this and the President has talked to Sparkman and he said fine.” So Sparkman went out and asked unanimous consent and voice-voted the treaty. Bang. Done. Well, Byrd came out, heard this on the speaker thing and he said, “We can’t do that. We’ve got to have a vote. This is a treaty. This is important. You can’t do this on your own.” And chewed everybody out. And Sparkman and whoever the Republican was said, “Let’s vote.” And they voted and bang. Passed it. Again. And the President, being from Congress and knew Congress, picked up the phone and, “Hi, John.” And I’m not sure whether John said, “Hi, Jerry.” But that was the relationship that he had. You know, don’t forget something: President’s bring in the job they had before. You know, President Ford was a Congress creature for twenty-five years and he knew what made them work. Carter was a nuclear physicist. What do they do? They have to touch everything. They assign the tennis courts and parking places.

Smith: Let me ask you. Remember Rockefeller early on got in trouble in the Senate for some rulings from the chair. But ultimately, out of that came the 60-vote rather than the 2/3 necessary for cloture. But he apparently really alienated some of the southern Republicans, especially people like John Tower and others. Did you remember what that was?

Korologos: Yeah, that’s been written and you’d better get the details of it if you really want it good from some of the Rockefeller books because it’s a technical thing that I don’t want to get wrong. But he did make a ruling on a motion as Vice President without paying attention to the parliamentarian. You must pay attention to the parliamentarian, but a lot of it is at the VP discretion. He made this ruling that, by golly, when you make a ruling in the Senate from the chair, that’s it. I mean, it is a real mess to try and undo, even by unanimous consent and somebody objects. It really created a furor and it created a firestorm over his doing that that grew into the consequences that we face today on a lot of issues. But that’s too technical for my memory.

Smith: What was your role in the ’76 convention?

Korologos: I was at the official proceedings. I was underneath the podium doing official proceedings, orchestrating the speakers and orchestrating the Star-Spangled Banner and the prayers. I used to call them the preachers and patriots. The preachers were the prayer people. The patriots were the Star-Spangled Banner and the colors. And all the parliamentary official proceedings to get a nominee.

Smith: How bitter was that convention?

Korologos: It was fairly bitter because the war was on and Kissinger was there.

Smith: Remember Ford let the Reagan people have the platform on the foreign policy plank - in effect conceded to avoid a fight.

Korologos: Yeah.

Smith: And Kissinger was not happy.

Korologos: Kissinger was unhappy as hell and I got quoted in Cheney’s book again, because he must’ve been standing there and heard me, because Henry came into the hotel where the big rally was to see Ford or somebody and he came to me and he said in a loud voice - it was a plank on Russia and détente and Henry was a détente-nic and the conservatives didn’t want anything to do with the Commies, except Henry did. And so he said in a loud voice, “I will resign.” See, we were counting votes. There was a key vote going on. And the question was whether Ford was going to get the nomination over the Reaganites.
I’m digressing again. This is fun. I’ll never forget. We Ford guys in ’76 beat the hell out of Reagan in that convention and I’ll be darned, four years later, we Reaganites beat the hell out of Ford for Reagan. We got it good both ways, don’t we? So Henry went by and said in a loud voice, “If this plank passes, I will resign.” And I said in a loud voice back to him, “Henry, will you do it now and do it loudly? We need the votes.” Well, Cheney remembered that and put it in his book and every time he introduces me somewhere, he tells this story about “Korologos tells Kissinger to resign”.

In fact, Cheney did it at a Jerry Ford alumni thing when they were honoring Henry up at the Capitol Hill Club and Rummy was there. Cheney stood up and thanked everybody. And Cheney introduced Henry. Cheney went and told this story about Korologos over there and I’m ready to crawl in a hole because Henry was pointing daggers at me and Henry denied it. “Oh, that did not happen.” As only Henry would do. Yeah, that was a fairly bitter convention. Is that when Rockefeller ripped the phone out of the wall and held it up high?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: He was raising hell at the convention and you can’t have chaos at the conventions when we’re running the convention. We had to have the timing right because in those days – the good old days – the nominating speech and the keynote and all of that had to happen at five minutes, thirty seconds after the hour to get them to the TV and we didn’t want any alternate things happening to screw up our time. Well, here’s Rockefeller holding the phone up, ripped out the phone, saying “they cut my phone off” I’m sitting up there in the box and Senator Tower and Tower said, “We’ve got to go down there right now. We’ve got to stop this. Look what’s happening.” And I said, “You’re not going down there. You’ll get in a fight.” I said, “I’ll go” because they could throw me in the river and nobody knows. “I’m going down.” So, I get down there and I thought, “How am I going to do this now that I’ve gotten myself into this job?” I broke my way through the crowd and there’s Rockefeller and he knew me and there was – what’s the guys name? Canzeri?

Smith: Oh, Joe Canzeri.
Korologos: Joe Canzeri and a lot of those guys were there and I went up to him and said, “Governor, Governor, Tower and the boys are in the back room and want to talk to you. We’ve got some stuff going on.” And he said, “Oh, yeah?” And I said, “Yeah.” So, he brought his phone and we went off the floor and I had to pass a lot of people. See, delegates couldn’t get to the back rooms where we were. So I had a pass and we got in the back and he said, “Where are they?” And I said, “Well, I guess they disappeared.” In the meantime, other things had happened in the convention. I had broken up this big fight that was brewing and I said, “Gee whiz, I’ll have to find him.” And never came back. Well, Canzeri stopped me a short time later and said, “I saw what you did and don’t you ever muscle us again. You muscled Nelson Rockefeller.” And I said, “Well, I’m sorry. I couldn’t find Tower” crossing my fingers. And he was mad and he saw exactly what I had done and it quieted it down.

Smith: Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that when he got to speak they cut the sound. Did you hear that?

Korologos: Oh, yeah.

Smith: He didn’t age well is how I put it.

Korologos: Yeah, good point.

Smith: That was not his finest hour.

Korologos: Well, Rockefeller, too, was a guy who was in charge of everything. I mean, he was the kind of a guy that would go into a convention and redo the hall before the speech that night. And I found that a lot. So, here all of a sudden he’s been dumped off the ticket for whatever reason and then they picked Ford and then we were up there -

Smith: Dole.

Korologos: Er, Dole. And we were up there in the hotel and I for the life of me thought it was going to be Howard Baker. Bryce was up there and they were in the meeting and I was in the back and they discussed Howard Baker. The rumors came back that one of the reasons that they didn’t pick Baker was that Joy Baker had been an alcoholic and that would’ve been bad. They decided on Dole and the reason they decided on Dole was that he was former RNC chairman. He could hit the ground running. Knew the issues. Didn’t want to mess around. Had campaigned for everybody in the world. Knew every politician in the country. Very logical and brilliant choice, because I remember during the platform of that year, I went to a platform meeting and I was sitting next to Dole, who was my buddy, and I was pointing at something and somebody took a picture of us and it got on the cover of Parade Magazine. And the story in Parade was ‘Is This the New Vice President?’ They’d printed it a couple weeks ahead.

[Tape 2]

Smith: ’76 convention, going into that convention?

Korologos: You know who’d be good at that is Timmons.

Smith: Yeah, we talked to him a little about it. But, I mean, was it your sense that it was still up in the air, the outcome of that convention when it began?

Korologos: For Reagan?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: Yeah, you bet. That one vote, remember. What’s the guys name from Mississippi?

Smith: Clark Reed.

Korologos: Yeah, Clark Reed.

Smith: Tell us about Clark Reed.

Korologos: Clark Reed screws up every convention I’ve ever went to just by standing there. The other guy that screwed up every convention I’ve ever went to and I’ve been to every one since ’72 was Percy. Senator Percy had always had something going and Clark Reed too. He was holding the Mississippi delegation back for whatever the hell reasons and Clark Reed had something going and we didn’t know what was going to happen. The Reagan people were hustling around, getting votes, the conservative Ernie Wilkinson, the delegate from Utah, he was the President of BYO, came to me and said, “Who would make the best President, Ford or Reagan?” And I said, “Ford. Four years from now, come and ask me again.”

Smith: But we’ve been told for example, the thing that really sent Reed into the Ford camp, not that he didn’t try to weasel out later on, was the selection of Schweiker. When Reagan picked Schweiker to be his running mate, it really backfired.

Korologos: Pissed him off. Yeah. I had no idea how that happened, but yes that really was a remarkable – you could feel it. You could smell it in the hall.

Smith: Really?

Korologos: Yeah.

Smith: Was that at all John Sear’s doing?

Korologos: I supposed. Yeah.

Smith: When all these people now talk about Reagan in retrospect and “let Reagan be Reagan”, well, guess what? In 1976, Reagan was going to put Dick Schweiker on his ticket because he wanted to be nominated. What does that tell you about Reagan?

Korologos: You bet, he’s smarter than a lot of people thought.

Smith: And, less ideologically rigid than a lot of people thought.

Korologos: Yeah, that’s right. That’s exactly right.

Smith: When did you see Ford? I mean, was there a moment when you realized you had it won? Because there was that test vote, you know, the procedural vote. Remember when the Reagan people wanted to force Ford to name his Vice President?

Korologos: Yeah, I’ll tell you when I thought we knew he’d won and you’ll have to ask Timmons this, but we all had walkie-talkies and you could hear everything. There was a very quiet moment and I heard Timmons say to Bryce Harlow something about Reagan. I knew it was about Reagan, but he didn’t use the word. “Has that call been made? And was it positive or negative?” And Bryce said, “Positive” which meant Reagan had agreed to nominate. Is that what happened?

Smith: Now, Reagan agreed to see Ford after the - you know, they’d worked up this deal where the winner would call on the loser, whoever it was.

Korologos: Was that what that was?

Smith: And to this day, people debate over what the ground rules were for the meeting. But I come away from all the conversations we’ve had absolutely convinced that Reagan in fact, as Cheney has always said, made it very clear that the condition he attached to meeting with Ford was that Ford not ask him about the vice presidency.

Korologos: Yeah, comes back.

Smith: And Ford wasn’t particularly eager to have him on the ticket at that point and it’s only after the fact that some Reagan people who weren’t as plugged in as they thought they were said, “Well, why didn’t Ford ask Reagan? He would’ve accepted.”

Korologos: I remember that boiling and bubbling, but I have no specifics.

Smith: Were you involved in the fall campaign?

Korologos: Yes, a little bit. Remind me. That convention was in Detroit?

Smith: No, that was the Kansas City convention. Four years later when Reagan was nominated was in Detroit.

Korologos: That’s when Baker and Dole tried to commandeer a police car and the cops wouldn’t move so they took a cab to lobby Reagan.

Smith: Tell us about that. This is in ’80 for the vice presidency?

Korologos: Yeah. The Reagan thing fell apart. The President Ford, vice president Ford fell apart.

Smith: That’s right. Was it ever serious?
Korologos: Yeah, serious as hell! Ask Timmons about that. They burned the typewriter ribbon and they burned all the paper. Meese tells you different stories about what happened. And, oh my God, that was the damnest thing.

Smith: What’s your recollection?

Korologos: My recollection of that is John Marsh went in to Reagan or somebody and said, “Yeah, we’ll take the vice presidency if we can have domestic and foreign affairs. Just the two things.” Well, somebody got wind of that and Reagan said, “Get me Bush” and they got him Bush. But when that fell apart and I heard about it, I came outside and I ran into Novak and it got in his book, too, and he said, “What’s going on?” And I said, “Well, the Ford thing just fell apart.” He said, “It did?! No, no, it’s happening.” I said, “Like hell it’s happening.” And as he puts it in his book, he was a CNN commentator and he ran around, before cell phones or anything, ran around trying to find a CNN correspondent to get on the air immediately and say the thing’s fallen apart. He couldn’t find anybody and he got scooped by somebody up in a box. Walter Cronkite scooped him and he mentioned he had one of the biggest scoops of his life “given to me by my good friend Tom Korologos.” Holy crap. Well, the Ford thing falls apart and now who’s going to be Vice President? Now, Baker and Dole of course were in the running and wanted it in the worst way. They ran out the back of the convention center and saw a sheriff or police car sitting there and they ran in and said, “We are Senator Baker and Senator Dole, take us to the” – what’s the name of the hotel, great big tall hotel right on the river where airplanes are flying underneath?

Smith: Part of the Renaissance Center.

Korologos: Yeah, one of those where Ford was and Reagan was, I guess. And they couldn’t get a car, so they had to take a cab. Went down there to try and lobby for it, but of course by then it was Bush. But that’s about all I remember of that one. Where were we before you distracted me?

Smith: Well, about ’76, the fall campaign.
Korologos: Oh, the fall campaign. Yeah, I got involved in that a couple of times. We went out and campaigned. By golly, or was it when he was Vice President? When did Carter get elected?

Smith: ’76.

Korologos: Why would I have been on Ford’s plane?

Smith: Let me back up. Did the Ford White House wait too long? Did they not take Reagan seriously enough before Reagan actually got into the race? Did they wait too long to crank up their own campaign? And did they make the mistake of not taking Reagan seriously enough as a challenger?

Korologos: I don’t know. I have no knowledge of that. I got in a plane with Ford – was he Vice President or President? Well, we went to Utah campaigning. I came out the door of the plane and Ford walked down the receiving line. There were___________ my brother and my daughter came running to the tarmac and I thought the Secret Service was going to shoot her. And we hugged her and the President met my brother Mike who said, “How do you like your new job?” And that got in the pool report, I saw the pool report that said, “Mike, Tom’s brother, asked how you like your new job.” And the President said something very good. Then we went to Colorado and campaigned there for Senator Dominick. We went to a ballpark and we’re standing on the pitcher’s mound and they had a podium – or maybe it was the home plate – but there was a podium there and all the people. And on the plane on the way out there, President Ford had had some pops. Hartmann or one of those guys that was with him, the guy from Utah, whatever that guy’s name was that was his buddy from ______, and they had gotten into the back and started drinking. Have you interviewed Terry O’Donnell?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: Terry will tell you this. We were out in this cowboy place and, the other thing that happened, see, we were somewhere in the ballpark in Colorado Springs or somewhere and we’re sitting there at 7,000 feet. I found this out when I got to Colorado myself, you drink a glass of wine when you get off that plane in the new altitude and it’s like drinking three. And you’d better be drinking water and you’d better not be carrying suitcases upstairs even as old as I am. And President Ford had a few pops and he gets out to the stands to talk about Dominick, he’s got his speech on the stand and the wind comes up and blows his speech away. And there’s paper flying all over hell and Terry O’Donnell and I are picking up pieces of paper and trying to put them back for the President. It was God awful. Somebody, it may have been Cheney or Rumsfeld, raised unshirted hell with those guys in the back room giving the President something to drink and letting him be alone with those guys before an event like this.

Smith: Hartmann really was a polarizing figure in that operation, wasn’t he?

Korologos: Yeah. Yeah, he was large and in charge. The other thing that happened on that is, on that same trip – God, I can’t remember whether he was vice president or president – on that same trip, we went to Portland which was Kennerly’s – have you interviewed Kennerly?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: That was Kennerly’s home port. We went to San Francisco and went to Portland and we go to this hotel and, God dang, it’s now eleven o’clock at night which is two o’clock in the morning, East time, and we’d been flying all across country. We’d stopped off in Kansas and here and there and everywhere and we’re now in this hotel and everybody’s tired as hell. And Kennerly had prevailed on the President to do a function for him with his buddies from Portland. And, honest to God, we’re sitting there and there must have been thirty young ladies, good-looking as hell, even in those days, brought in flowers and roses and little tribute things for their buddy Kennerly to stand in the line with the Vice President or what to say ‘hi’ to him and talk to Kennerly. That occurred shortly after we went to a Portland Trailblazer’s basketball game somewhere up there. President Ford and I and a couple of others – the team was on the bench and we were on the next seats over at the basketball game. Then went to Kennerly’s thing which is now at 1:30 or 2:00 o’clock in the morning East time and I can’t possibly imagine how Kennerly got away with that? So the discipline was not good.
Smith: Yeah.

One last thing. Do you remember where you were on election night in ’76, the night of the Ford-Carter election? And did you think by the end of the campaign that as the polls suggested, he just might pull it out?

Korologos: I can’t remember where I was. Yes, I thought we could pull it out because to this day – well, shortly after, somehow or other, I remember President Ford saying had they gotten Delaware, they could’ve won. What did we lose by? Three or four electoral votes?

Smith: A little more than that, but it was close.

Korologos: I don’t remember where I was. I can’t remember. That’s funny. But I thought we could win. Oh my gosh, yes. Shortly after - not shortly after – Nixon, I was on his call list and I became Washington guy for Nixon after his presidency, just being down all the time to see Dole and we did stuff in Dole’s back room and did seminars and things. I was at a dinner last night with Linda Robb’s husband, Chuck Robb.

Korologos: He reminded me that I had brought Nixon up to the Democratic caucus and he’d given a tour of the world. One time Nixon called me to wish me Merry Christmas - December time - and he said, “How are you doing?” And I said, “I’m very nervous. We’ve just opened our firm. We’re a Republican firm and the Democrats have just won the presidency and I don’t know how we’re going to be able to survive this.” And he said, “Now, you listen to me,” he said, “Republican firms flourish in Democrat administrations. When the Republicans are in, Corporate America thinks it has great friends in Washington.” He said, “It isn’t true, but they think they do, so they think they don’t need Washington. So, when the Democrats come in, they come running to Washington to save them from all the evils of the Democrats.” And Nixon was right. That’s how we broadened our business.

Smith: Did you ever hear Nixon talk about Ford in those later years? Did you get a sense at all?
Korologos: That’s interesting. I was around Nixon a lot. Yes, we were in New York one time and I used to take senators to see him - freshman senators, we’d go to this place and somebody would cook Chinese and Senator Larch Faircloth of North Carolina who was a pig farmer. The group started talking about the Kitchen debate and everything else. I don’t know how we got into it but at one point Nixon took umbrage over Ford getting on corporate boards, using the presidency to further his own bottom line. He was not happy at that at all. That’s about the only time I recall anything about Ford from Nixon. Did President Ford get on a bunch of corporate boards?

Smith: He went on several. Yeah. His view, of course, was he had no money when he left Washington and a family provide for. But, yeah, it certainly has come in for criticism.

Korologos: But did he -

Smith: But, I mean, Ford was never window dressing. He only went on boards where he was really involved and felt that he could really make a contribution. We’ve talked to a number of people who served with him on various boards.

Korologos: Who was President when Nixon died? Carter?

Smith: Clinton.

Korologos: Clinton?

Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: So Bush had already been President. So he was really furious at Bush also for going around and getting $1 million honorarium including one in Japan from somebody.

Smith: Well, Reagan had gotten $1 million from Japan.

Korologos: But Nixon had died then.

Smith: No, because Reagan’s out of office in ‘89.

Korologos: Oh, yeah.
Smith: See, Reagan left first.

Korologos: See, Nixon took umbrage with Bush and Reagan for the $1 million honorarium.

Smith: How do you think Ford should be remembered?

Korologos: Well, that pardon thing was the greatest sacrifice that a person could possibly make. It quieted the country down. It did end a long national nightmare and had that not happened, who knows what would’ve happened. Politically, the precedent of doing in presidents, not only for some high crime and misdemeanor, or whatever Nixon did, but there could’ve been a political decision, another Andrew Johnson thing. Just because we don’t like your policy on Iraq, we’re going to impeach you. Boy, I tell you.

Smith: Or because you had an affair with an intern.

Korologos: Or you had an affair with an intern, yeah. I tell you, that was quite remarkable what Ford did and it took a lot of guts. Did you find out in your thing or do I have to read the history about how all that transpired in his head?

Smith: Yeah, I think one thing about Ford is sometimes Ford was perfectly willing to let people think he was more naïve than he was.

Korologos: Yeah, I got that a lot. Yeah, you’ve broken the code.

Smith: And I think he had a pretty sophisticated grasp of the options. He didn’t need Al Haig or anyone else to outline for him what the options were. I think it’s interesting that it was Bryce Harlow who he listened to, who said in effect, “You’ve got to go back to Al Haig and make sure he understands that there’s no quid pro quo here, for the record.” But I also think that even as that was going on, he had a pretty good grasp of what was in the public interest. I think there were probably some things that he probably took to the grave with him.

Korologos: I agree. You know, you said Bryce. Bryce was a great savior of the presidents. What a historical contribution he has made. But what a shame that we didn’t have the Ford presidency another four years.
Smith: Yeah.

Korologos: Golly. I have a theory, I’m semi-religious, that the Constitution was divinely inspired and somebody looks after this place except I get nervous once in awhile depending on the kind of people that get elected. Somehow, we muddle through.

Smith: I don’t know if I told you this story already. If I did, stop me. What Rex Scouten said to him on election day? Rex told us a great story. It’s about 2:30 in the morning and they’re up of course in the family quarters and, you know, it’s not over, but it’s not looking good. And Ford says, “I’m going to go to bed. We’ll know in the morning.” It was pretty clear it wasn’t going the way they wanted it to go. So, Rex follows him across the hall, wanting to say something consoling. And he says, “You know, Mr. President, who knows what will happen. If you don’t make it, it’s terribly unfair. No one deserved more…” and such and such. “Maybe you should just look at it this way: You’ve given your whole life in service to this country, whether it was military during the war, all those years on Capitol Hill and these last incredibly difficult years” and so on and so on. And he says, “Maybe, Mr. President, it’s just time for you to take a well-earned rest.” And Ford says, “I don’t think so.” Rex gave it the old college try.

Korologos: Way to go, Rex.

Smith: It’s interesting. Ford told people, in the days after, because, you know, he was down, he would say to people, “I can’t believe to a peanut farmer.”

Korologos: He was right.

Smith: Well, I do think there was some buyer’s remorse on that election.

Korologos: One more story. It was time to get Haig confirmed for Secretary of State and the pardon came up. “What was his role in it?” “What did you do?” And we muddled around with all kinds of answers and questions on that. And, to this day, “Was Haig in on a deal?” and “What was happening?” and a lot of questions and answers. I’d have to go back to the hearing to see how he answered it, but Haig was a nervous Nellie on that. Ford gave a reception, didn’t he, when they had that meeting in the East Room where ‘our long national nightmare is over’? We met the leaders and everyone went our separate ways and later that night, there was a reception to meet the new president? And I went, of course, I’ve got a job, you know, Ford just hired me. And I ran into Haig the next day or somewhere and I said, “Where were you last night?” And Haig said, “I don’t dance on dead men’s graves.”

Smith: That says volumes.

Korologos: Yeah.

Smith: That’s perfect. Thank you.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. You have a unique perspective. Certainly we’ve talked to of your grandfather’s contemporaries, but I don’t think we’ve talked to anyone…

Berlanga: The grandchild.

Smith: Yes, which is very distinctive – different, I assume, from children.

Berlanga: Oh yes, because we get spoiled way more.

Smith: First of all, what were they like as grandparents?

Berlanga: Incredible. Well first there were the five girls, so we were Grandpa’s five little blonde angels and we literally were his angels. My mom Susan had me and Heather and then Uncle Mike had Sara, Becca, and Hannah, in that order. And whenever we’d go to Beaver Creek Grandma would always get us matching outfits and take our picture and we would put on shows for them. Regardless of the fact that Grandpa was a former president, he was just a really caring grandpa. The times with him were always magical. He and Grandma always made holidays so special. I think my husband thinks I’m nuts about Fourth of July, but we’d always go and spend Fourth of July in Vail and Beaver Creek, go to Pepi and Sheika’s, do the fireworks. They always made the holidays magical.

Smith: And you have an ice cream named after you.

Berlanga: I do. The Sara Tyne.

Smith: Yes, how did that happen?

Berlanga: I believe Grandma and Grandpa were at a restaurant, I know the name…

Smith: It’s called the Left Bank.
Berlanga: Yes, and my mom had me when Grandma and Grandpa were there, and I guess they got the news, or that was the day, and so the chef named the ice cream after me and Sara. He was so cute at the funeral, he came up to me and I know I had met him before, but I had grown since then. It had been a while and he came up to me in his sweet French accent, “You are Tyne! You are Tyne of Sara Tyne! I have the ice cream!” He’s so sweet and it’s really flattering to have an ice cream named after me. I have to take my daughter there one day to go have the Sara Tyne ice cream. I mean, you don’t realize it at the time, but Grandpa made sure we knew how to swim because that was important to him.

Smith: Is that because he swam every day?

Berlanga: Because he swam. So every time we’d go out to visit him, he’d take us out to the pool, just him and you, and he’d say, “Okay, show me your laps.” And you’d go and do your freestyle swimming and then you’d do your breaststroke, and then you’d do your backstroke. It was kind of that special thing you had with Grandpa. And it was important to him that you could ski, so he made sure we had skiing lessons. We didn’t know that it was any big deal, but every morning Grandpa would walk you to ski lessons and he’d carry your skis on his shoulder. He didn’t even make Mom take us; he just took us to ski lessons every morning.

Smith: And this was after he’d stopped skiing.

Berlanga: Yes, after he’d stopped skiing. So he’d be up, he’d have his breakfast, he’d read his papers and then he’d take us to ski lessons. That was just a special time to have with Grandpa and it was just great on a grandpa level; but you don’t realize until you’re a grownup that he didn’t have to do any of that stuff with us. It was really important to him that the things he loved, he instilled in us as we were young, and now they’ve become things that we love to do. And it was full circle moment that my daughter, Joy, when we were out visiting my Grandma for spring break, figured out how to swim in Grandpa’s pool. So when we were there visiting Grandma at Rancho Mirage, she learned how to swim.
Smith: That’s wonderful.

Berlanga: It was very cool.

Smith: Let’s back up first because there were the two houses.

Berlanga: Yes.

Smith: And how were things different in each?

Berlanga: Well, Beaver Creek was pretty special because the granddaughters had the loft. They took an attic and just made it into a space that, maybe at the tallest, was five and a half feet tall. So it was perfect for little granddaughters. There were six twin beds and the ceilings were arched, so if you sat up too quickly you’d get a wall in the face. But for us, it was perfect and we loved it. So we’d have our little floor to ourselves and no one would really ever come up to the loft to bother us. They would just stand there. But Beaver Creek you would go for holidays; for the Fourth of the July, for Christmas and that’s where everyone would congregate.

Smith: The house was big enough that all of the kids had their own rooms.

Berlanga: It fit everybody. All the kids had their own rooms and all the granddaughters got to stay together in the loft. Once Jack had his boys, the granddaughters were old enough; we’d all kind of spread out. But now Jack’s boys stay in the loft and the granddaughters have been moved to the adult bedrooms. It was fun because with cousins you could play and make noise and it was good that we’d be away from the house. I remember our Christmases. Christmas morning they’d always make us wait at the top of the stairs while the grownups were downstairs getting everything ready. And then Grandpa would say, “Alright, come down,” and we’d all run down the stairs to the Christmas tree, and of course, it looked like the whole neighborhood’s presents were under our tree, the way they spoiled us. But, that house was just fun. It’s where everyone congregated. The dining room table was big enough that we’d have big Pictionary games, boys against the girls. Grandpa can’t draw a lick, so he would always be looking over to see what girls were drawing and steal from us.
Smith: And he never really mastered computers, did he?

Berlanga: No, he didn’t.

Smith: I think he learned to play Solitaire.

Berlanga: Solitaire and maybe Bridge on the computer, but that was about it.

Smith: And the story was that he could receive emails, he just couldn’t send them.

Berlanga: No. And I think he tried. Mom and Vaden, I think, really tried to get him to learn how to use the computer, but to no avail.

Smith: But your grandmother, she was computer literate?

Berlanga: A little bit. I think so. I mean, you could send her emails. There was a time that you could send emails, but I think for the most part, they preferred the written letter. But Palm Springs was always fun because you had the pool, the house around the pool, and usually when you went and visited them in Rancho Mirage, it was just you because the house isn’t really big enough for all of us.

Smith: That house was all on one level.

Berlanga: Yeah. All on one level, kind of built in an L-shape around the pool. It’s fun because it’s kind of like a compound. They’ve got the tennis courts and I remember Grandpa would let me drive his golf cart and I crashed his golf cart.

Smith: Do you remember how old you were?

Berlanga: Probably – maybe ten, if ten. But it backs up to the golf course and there’re the orange trees and citrus trees and I remember Grandpa going out and picking kumquats and eating them right off the tree. It really just felt like a resort.

Smith: Beats Michigan in the winter.

Berlanga: Yes, it does.

Smith: Have you been in Michigan in the winter?
Berlanga: Only for the funeral. That was the only time and from what I hear, it was pretty mild. We spent a week there at the beach in the summer and I thought, hey, Michigan’s pretty nice, and Mom said, “Well, you’ve never been here in the winter.” But I think the desert’s always fun because it’s kind of one on one with Grandma and Grandpa. You don’t have to share with anyone else. It’s just warm and beautiful. They sure know how to pick the places to live, that’s for sure.

Smith: What was the routine like?

Berlanga: Well, Grandpa was always up before everyone else. He was always up, usually sitting - they have these great big chairs, super comfy - he’d be sitting there reading his paper in the mornings, drinking his cup of coffee. Grandpa’s the one who got me hooked up on grapefruit because he would have his little half grapefruit in the morning and when I’d go to Grandpa’s house I’d always have the other half of grapefruit that he didn’t eat. So you’d have a little time with Grandpa, and he’d eat his breakfast and he’d go swim, and right about as he was swimming was usually when Grandma emerged.

Smith: She’s not a morning person.

Berlanga: No, she’s not. Grandpa’s a morning person, Mom’s a morning person, and so am I. And then, it’s funny because Mike’s got Grandma’s sleeping in and so all of his girls sleep in like Grandma does. Grandpa’s always up in the morning. You knew if you woke up before Grandpa, it was time to go back to bed.

Smith: And not just on Christmas morning.

Berlanga: No. And even then, if you were caught down the stairs, you’d get in trouble. We always had to wait for Uncle Steve to wake up Christmas morning, too. Uncle Steve would always say, “Well, I don’t know if I’m going to wake up.” Anyway, he liked to give us a hard time.

Smith: Talk about opposites attracting, because he was such a stickler for punctuality.

Berlanga: Oh, my goodness.
Smith: Tell us about that.

Berlanga: Well, we’re always downstairs – in the bottom of the Beaver Creek house you’ve got the mud room, the coat closet and we’re all usually bundled up, probably to go do the Christmas tree lighting and we’re all waiting downstairs, the agents are outside, cars are running and Grandpa going, “Betty!” And no matter how many times he asked, she always came on her schedule. Even at the funeral, I think, we still probably had to wait a little bit. But Grandpa was always five minutes early, and Grandma was always five minutes later. I don’t know how they worked it out.

Smith: Did you ever discuss it with her?

Berlanga: I think she just understood that if she was going to look as beautiful as she always did, then he would just let it be.

Smith: That’s interesting because I’ve often thought part of it was a kind of perfectionism.

Berlanga: Yes.

Smith: And tell me if I’m wrong, I’ve been told it and then I saw it, that for someone who had been in the public eye as much as she was, she still got butterflies before going on stage or to give a speech. Which is another side of perfectionism, and actually, if you ever stop worrying, that’s when you should worry, because you obviously want to be at your best.

Berlanga: You care. Exactly. I think she always cared how people appeared, how her granddaughters appeared. I mean, she cared that we looked appropriate, she really didn’t want – when it’s casual, it’s no big deal – but I don’t think she ever wanted someone saying anything bad about her family, how they looked because she didn’t impart what being appropriate is. I think something that I really learned from Grandma is appearance, class, decorum, how to act like a lady.

Smith: Which is not stuffiness.
Berlanga: No, it’s not, because she’s as modern as they come. But there is something about being a modern, sensible woman, but still not walking around looking like you don’t care about your appearance. And I think that was really the interesting part about Grandma; she’s a classy lady, but she’s not stuck, she’s not stuck in the old days. She’s pretty with it.

Smith: She’s fascinating because one senses that maybe he was a little bit more of a traditionalist.

Berlanga: Yes, absolutely.

Smith: Even in another context, I remember saying in my eulogy that most of us tend to get a little more conservative as we get older, and they didn’t seem to. And in fact, maybe part of it was the party went so far to the right on a number of things. Whether it was the whole abortion issue or gay rights or things that you don’t really associate with a conservative Republican, or even a former president; I’ve often wondered how much of that was her influence on him; how much of it was having children and grandchildren bringing up new ideas and new ways of seeing things.

Berlanga: I think that is a lot of it. I think part of it is Grandma coming from an arts background, dancing with Martha Graham. I think she was always kind of poking at him a little bit. But I also think Grandpa had just – he followed his gut, no matter what the party said. If he felt it was right or in terms of equal rights, I think he just listened to his heart. And when it all comes down to it, he’s a good guy. I think he and Grandma weren’t loud and proud about anything; I think they just quietly knew what was important to them, and I think Grandpa’s faith had a lot to do with it. I think he felt we were all created equal in God’s eyes and I think that was something he really carried with him.

Also, I think, as grandchildren we tended to stir the pot a little bit. But I guess Jack was a wild child, but then became the most conservative one because Uncle Jack and I got into it one day about – I think I was talking about gay rights – and it always seemed like Beaver Creek – the big table always turned to politics somehow. I was an art student at SMU and it was probably my most liberal time of my life. I was talking about gay rights and Uncle Jack was talking about how Republicans are persecuted just as much as gay people are and I pretty much laughed at him. But Uncle Jack and I got into it a little bit. Grandma pulled me aside after dinner, I think she could tell I was a little defeated and pretty ticked off. She said, “You know, he used to be my most wild boy. I don’t know what happened to him. But it’s really nice to hear different opinions around the table.”

Smith: Really? What an encouraging thing to hear.

Berlanga: It is, and no matter where you came from, and even with Grandpa – Grandpa, again, when I was at SMU – Grandpa and I got into it. I got onto him about how America doesn’t give enough to the arts; how we don’t fund it enough in the schools; how compared to countries in Europe, the United States is lacking in its arts funding. And Grandpa kind of got onto me about every year we give more, and da, da, da. And me still being a mouthy teenager, said, “We don’t give enough…” Well, about two weeks later at my college apartment, a big packet was sent to me. He had requested, and I can’t remember from what congressman, but a copy of the budget and the numbers for the past five years of how America has increased their arts spending.

Smith: It sounds like he took what you said seriously.

Berlanga: He took what you said seriously, and you were never ashamed or made to feel bad for your opinion. They really encouraged discussion. It was just open and polite, we never really said anything hurtful, but roundtable – let’s have at it and the granddaughters always stirred the pot with their concerns. I think Grandma and Grandpa kind of sat back and appreciated that they had raised a strong minded family. And I think had we not expressed an opinion, had maybe where they would find ________________. I think, if nothing else, they just wanted us to have a strong head on our shoulders.

Smith: I also wonder in a large sense if the seeds were always there. But I also wonder if, for him, the experience of going through the intervention and then becoming really a part of her work at the Betty Ford Center, just brought out the compassion that existed; sort of institutionalized it because obviously their lives were really caught up in a lot of what was going on and they saw friends of theirs, good people, decent people, who had a weakness. That’s got to be a lesson in and of itself.

Berlanga: I never saw Grandpa – I know he can be a tough guy…

Smith: Did you see his temper?

Berlanga: Of course, he has a temper. Yeah. Yes, Grandpa has a temper.

Smith: What would set it off?

Berlanga: Oh, you know – Grandma would be late, tended to be something – you know he doesn’t like lateness. He doesn’t like bickering. Now, discussion is fine, but he really doesn’t like bickering.

Smith: We were told early on, I think, maybe it was Penny who said it, at one point he had mostly women in the office. And he politely, but firmly, made the point that he wasn’t interested in backbiting, gossiping, all of those things that take away from the work.

Berlanga: Yes. With your parents and your aunts and uncles, you show respect. He really doesn’t like the sass, and he shouldn’t have to put up with it. I don’t know if you’ve heard this story before, but I think I was about six, maybe five, maybe a little younger, and I had just learned to swim without my floaties. I think we were at Rancho Mirage and we were in the pool. It was Uncle Jack’s birthday and I was in the pool; Jack was on one side of the pool and Grandpa was on the other. Grandpa had just come from the office, so he was in his suit – this was still a man who was “retired” but would put on a suit most times just to go to the office. And so he had come back from the office; he was in this gorgeous suit and nice shoes, leather belt, and him and Uncle Jack thought they would tease me and they were throwing the ball over me and pretending that they were going to throw it at me. And – oh goodness – I got really nervous and so I decided to push my Grandpa in the pool. And so they were doing something and I pushed Grandpa in the pool and I think the pool started looking like a Jacuzzi because he got so hot. He came up sputtering, and I immediately went in between my mother’s legs and hid there. You could tell he was upset, and he just kind of, “Now, Tyne, you shouldn’t be doing those things,” but you could tell he was so mad. He had lost his temper, but he wasn’t going to lose it on his granddaughter.

Smith: That’s a great story because one senses that it was a lifelong effort that he made – almost always successfully - but it required an effort.

Berlanga: And I think the fact that I was hiding behind my mother. I knew that I had messed up really bad; that it wasn’t quite as funny as I thought it was. But to a five year old, you don’t understand a nice suit and a leather belt and shoes. It’s one of those things that you don’t really get in trouble with Grandpa unless you’ve done something really wrong. He had a lot of understanding and compassion for his grandchildren.

Smith: What would it take? You’ve opened the door…what would it take?

Berlanga: I don’t think I really got in a lot of trouble. My sister got in trouble. She lived with him for a summer and didn’t come home at curfew and she got in big trouble for that. But I think for Grandpa, it’s got to be big. You don’t really see him – he really doesn’t lose it that often.

Smith: You mentioned the suit. His fiscal conservatism expressed itself in a number of ways, including the fact that I guess he had closets full of suits older than you.

Berlanga: And they are still there.

Smith: And I guess one of Mrs. Ford’s jobs was to make sure that he didn’t go out in public in them.

Berlanga: Oh, yeah. She always made sure we all looked good. You had a feeling that Grandma probably picked out what he was wearing and he just put it on – as probably the smart man that he is, because she had a great sense of style.

Smith: Was she a disciplinarian?

Berlanga: Yes. I would say Grandma probably was the iron fist in the house, if anyone. The grandchildren ate in the kitchen. We didn’t eat in the dining room unless it was like a special occasion. There were a lot more rules. You made sure you took your shoes off when you entered the house.
You only make Grandma ask once. But now, it’s funny, with great-grandchildren? All the rules are out the window. I brought Joy to see her – this was before Cruz was born, and I was talking to Mom, “Well, I don’t want to put the highchair in the dining room, I don’t want Joy to make the dining room a mess.” And we’re sitting there having lunch at the dining table and she said, “Well bring Joy’s highchair out here so she can eat with us,” and she was letting Joy eat crackers and juice in the dining room and giving crackers to the dog. And I kind of looked at Mom like “are you kidding?” Apparently great-grandchildren just don’t have any rules.

Smith: It skips a generation.

Berlanga: It does, it absolutely skips a generation. She lets Cruz eat her robes, just those things don’t seem to bother her, or aren’t as important anymore. It’s nice and Joy loves going to GG’s house – that’s what she calls Grandma – GG. And so she loves going there and she loves picking the fruit from the trees and swimming in GG’s pool.

Smith: Isn’t it nice that she’ll have memories?

Berlanga: Yes, it is, it’s really nice. And she asks to go there, so that tells me she does remember visiting her. And she can pick both their pictures out. We picked up some presidents flashcards and she really doesn’t understand the concept that Great-Grandpa was a president, but she did tell Grandma, “Well, Great-Grandpa played football, and he swims, and sometimes he was a president.” That’s what she told Grandma. She gets it, but she doesn’t really understand what that means.

Smith: How old were all of you before you understood what it meant?

Berlanga: I don’t know.

Smith: Was it something in the background or did they talk about their days in the White House?

Berlanga: Well, Grandpa would more tell stories before the White House – when he was a Ranger at Yellowstone, the bear story. The bear story was always – now you have to get Uncle Steve to tell the bear story because Uncle Steve tells the bear story the best. But I would hear the bear story and he would like to tell stories about Grand Rapids and his mom, because I never met Great-Grandma Ford. He likes to tell how he courted Grandma, how Grandma knew that she was going to marry Grandpa because one night – I guess Grandpa might have been waiting for her when she came home with another beau – and after the beau had escorted her in, I think Grandpa took him aside and said, “Now what are your intentions with Betty?” And she heard Grandpa asking. I think that’s when Grandma knew that that was going to be the man she was going to marry.

Smith: Really?

Berlanga: He more told those stories. We would have to ask about the White House stories.

Smith: He clearly was very close to his mother.

Berlanga: Yes. And from what I can tell, she was a spectacular woman. Grandma talks highly of her, and so does Mom. Everyone loved Grandma Ford.

Smith: She died in the church pew, and when they went back home they found her appointment book full for the next month. Does that sound like a family trait?

Berlanga: Yeah. I think Grandpa really – he was his mother’s son.

Smith: And one sensed, too, that he really had in a lot of ways advanced views about what women could do because first of all, he’d seen what his mother had been put through, and how she came through that. One sensed that he always felt that she had been victimized in a number of ways; but refused to be a victim.

Berlanga: Yes, exactly. And then he went and married another strong woman. He was raised by a strong woman and then married another strong woman. I think it was important to Grandma that she raised a strong daughter as well as strong granddaughters. I think it was very important to Grandma and to Grandpa that just because we were girls, that didn’t mean we shouldn’t speak our mind.

Smith: Politicians are notorious for being in a bubble, and in a curious way, maybe in the White House more than almost anywhere else. I remember Bob Dole, when his daughter was in high school – this is ’64 or ’65 – and he heard her talk about this musical group. And so he wrote to the British embassy to see if the Beatles could come and perform at Robin’s school.

Berlanga: Oh, no. Had no idea?

Smith: No idea. Politicians tend to get very absorbed in what they are doing.

Berlanga: I think they find that stuff just not as important – irrelevant. And I think that’s part of, too, why Grandpa didn’t like cattiness or bickering.

Smith: He wasn’t a gossip, was he?

Berlanga: No, he wasn’t a gossip and if it wasn’t relevant, I don’t think he really felt like he should waste his time on it. I just think he had done so many important things and had lived such important stuff, why waste your time on something that wouldn’t do or someone else any good? And I think that was really his attitude towards it all.

Grandma loves Dancing with the Stars, that would be the only thing. She loves when Dancing with the Stars is on. But I think the pop culture…

Smith: Did he know that MTV existed?

Berlanga: No, I think he thinks they were silly shows, kind of trash on TV maybe? News was always on in the house. In the evening he watched the news. I think Grandma may have read a People magazine here and there. He loved going to the movies. I saw, I think it was Apollo 13, and I think that was really neat to watch with him. It came out at Christmas time and I think we all went as a family to go see it.

Smith: How would people react when this group of Fords came into the theater?

Berlanga: A lot of times, they’d just have two rows blocked off and then right before the trailers started we walk in and sit down. But I know Grandpa would love a good bag of popcorn. He’d love his junk food. In California even, towards the end of his life he’d still ask for an In and Out Burger and a chocolate milkshake.
You’d always hear the whispers and then usually at the end of a meal when we’re leaving is when people would usually clap and shake hands and stuff.

Smith: At some point did the light bulb go on?

Berlanga: Yeah, it was weird and it was really sweet. It was incredibly sweet. And people were typically very respectful – let them enjoy their meals with their grandchildren and children – and usually would wait until the end. Kids - he would always shake their hands and sign something for kids. I think you do feel when you’re out that people were looking and staring. But then after five or ten minutes you just kind of get used to it.

Smith: Autograph dealers were a bane to his existence.

Berlanga: Yes. He didn’t like that, no. But I think like anyone, I’m sure he appreciates – he worked hard.

Smith: It’s nice to be noticed.

Berlanga: It’s nice to be noticed and as long as it was done in a respectful way and not disruptive; they were always really pretty good sports about it.

Smith: And my sense is, that they were beloved in Vail.

Berlanga: Oh, yeah.

Smith: They weren’t just visible.

Berlanga: That was not their hometown, but it’s their town – they own Beaver Creek. It’s Grandma and Grandpa’s town.

Smith: We’ve been told that they, more than anyone else, put the place on the map as a year-round destination.

Berlanga: Oh, yeah. And that’s where I have the most memories – in Beaver Creek. That’s where I consider the extended Beaver Creek family – the Pepi and Sheika’s and all of them. Those are people that would just be in your heart forever. And just be part of making all those memories. Steve Jones up in the stables. And probably, too, because we got all of these wonderful extravagancies while we were there, and were treated so special. But it’s really a magical place.

Smith: At some point you realized your grandfather was the one that they had turn on the Christmas lights.

Berlanga: Yeah. It’s pretty cool. It’s very cool. You know, he didn’t turn on the Christmas, he let his granddaughters turn on Christmas lights. When I moved to Frisco and I heard they were doing the Christmas tree lighting, I just let them know who was really – I had a resume full of light switching. But it really is pretty cool. It’s pretty cool to know what he did, I think. Growing up though, I’ve just now started going back and learning the history – I think I purposely shied away from learning the details of the time when he was president before and after. But I did know kind of hazily about Watergate and him pardoning Nixon. And I kind of knew that it was a very polarizing decision, but I think when you are in your teens, I think you really didn’t want to have an opinion on it, I think you didn’t want to hear people’s opinion. I think I just knew he was president then and that was fine and it was very cool. I didn’t want to have to get into a discussion about it, or give my opinion on it. He was my grandpa and he was president then. I think now, my stepdad just recently sent me something about the wreath laying at his birthday and there was a woman who had evacuated from Vietnam and I realized as a grownup, that I really have no idea about history at that time. And I think I shied away from really learning about it. And so now as an adult with some perspective, I’m going back now and kind of learning the history leading up to his presidency and afterwards, to kind of understand the scope of everything that he went through.

Smith: Did you ever hear him talk about Nixon?

Berlanga: No. I think he was a good man. That’s pretty much – you know, Warren Commission, I think I asked him about that once, and he said – JFK – that movie made him really mad.

Smith: I think he was on a plane and he was a captive audience.
Tyne Berlanga  July 24, 2010

Berlanga: I have never really heard him say, to ask us specifically, but I feel like he specifically asked us not to go see that movie, I think it made him so mad. I think I asked him about the Warren Commission and he said those conspiracy theories are a bunch of crap, something along those lines. And the Warren Commission – what we found is correct and so I think all that stuff made him pretty upset.

Smith: I only heard him disparage two people, and the worst he could come up with was, “He’s a bad man.” And one was Gordon Liddy and one was John Dean, and I think a lot of people would probably second his opinion. Did you ever hear him talk about it?

Berlanga: No, he really doesn’t speak badly about people. And I think he really does, with everyone, try to look and find the good in people. Even with Nixon I think he felt like he was a good man who just got caught up in a bad situation. And I guess, from what I’ve learned about Grandpa and from what I’ve learned about politicians in general, is even though they might have politics I don’t agree with, or they have opinions that I don’t think are right, they are still people and for the most part have all been friends to my family. So I find it really hard to just cross a line through someone or to disparage someone. Because no matter what they do or if they make a mistake, they are still a person and I think that’s what I learned the most about Grandpa. Yes, he has the title of president, but he’s still a person and I think they’re all just doing the best job that they can do.

Smith: It’s fascinating to see the relationship with the Kennedys because, as a young congressman, he had an office across the hall from Jack Kennedy.

Berlanga: Which I just learned.

Smith: When the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles in Courage Award, it was such a turning point; and to see Senator Kennedy and Caroline that day and their interaction, it was just such a privilege to be a fly on the wall. And, of course, the friendship with Jimmy Carter, which I think still surprises people.

Berlanga: Yes, I had no idea. To see that friendship and Jimmy Carter’s eulogy was just so touching. He came up to me on Air Force One; I was holding my daughter and it was one of those things where I was whispering, “What do you think? Think we could maybe get a picture of Joy with President Carter?” And without anyone saying anything, he just saw me walking by and he goes, “Well, let me hold that baby.” He just took Joy out of my arms and I think you don’t realize with the news bites and the speeches and everything, that these are just people and they are not in this business, for the most part, to make a lot of money. They really do have good intentions and especially with Grandpa’s time, they were all buddies. They all lived in DC. I think you miss that these days.

Smith: A very different culture.

Berlanga: Yeah. And what you can learn from Grandpa is that the man who defeated him has become a close friend. He could have been a sore loser, he could have turned his back, but he did everything in his power to let President Carter become a successful president. I think there is a camaraderie with the presidents that a lot of people don’t realize, because there are not a lot of people in that club and everyone knows it’s kind of a thankless job. I didn’t realize the friendship between the Carters and my grandparents until the funeral, and it’s really pretty special.

Smith: It is. Were birthdays a big deal?

Berlanga: Yes. We love celebrating Grandpa’s birthday and usually we would go out for Fourth of July and just stay through until his birthday. So we’d stay in Beaver Creek for two weeks in the middle of July.

Smith: And of course, the Fourth of July, they always reviewed the parade in Vail.

Berlanga: Oh, yes, and sometimes we got to ride the fire trucks in the parade. So birthdays were a big deal. Grandma didn’t like celebrating her birthday as much as Grandpa, but birthdays were a big deal. I’ll never forget – maybe he was 88 or 89, for some reason I sent – I just had my days mixed up – and so I sent his birthday card for June 14th instead of July 14th. And then on June 14th I picked up the phone to call my grandpa on his birthday, and, “Happy Birthday, Grandpa, how are you? Miss you…” And he was so sweet and let me go on, and he goes, “Well, thank you for your sweet card, but I think you’re a month early.” And I said, “Really?” And he said, “Yeah, it’s July 14th and not June 14th,” and I went gulp. But he was so sweet and he was like, “Well, you’re the first one to wish me a happy birthday.” He never made you feel bad about it. He just thought it was sweet that his granddaughter was a month early.

Smith: It’s not a secret that she had a somewhat more ribald sense of humor than he did.

Berlanga: Yes.

Smith: Ann Cullen tells a story about how she and her [Mrs. Ford] would be in there roaring with laughter, and he’d poke his head in and it just sort of went right over.

Berlanga: And Grandma is still in on the joke. Grandma just gets it and ah, I’m sure she’ll kill me for saying this, but…

Smith: I can probably tell you an even better – but you tell yours and I’ll tell mine.

Berlanga: My husband Hector, he and I moved in together before we got married, and Hector came up with me for Fourth of July, and for some reason Mom and Vaden couldn’t come, but all my uncles were there, and Uncle Steve and Uncle Jack specifically – well, first of all when we were younger they were the tickle monsters, and now they just kind of put all the granddaughter’s husbands through the wringer – give them a hard time – you’ve got to initiate them somehow. And so somehow Jack kind of gets wind…so Hector and I probably weren’t going to really broadcast that we were living together before we got married. We just – you know. Somehow Jack kind of got onto it and got wind that we were living together and was giving both Hector and I a hard time at the dinner table, in front of Grandpa and Grandma. And poor Hector, he’s just sitting there trying not to make a bad impression and say the wrong thing, and Grandma finally pipes up and says, “Well, you’ve got to try the shoe on before you buy it.” And that just shut everyone down.

Smith: Talk something about her that might surprise people.
Well, besides her sense of humor... well, everyone was giving me a hard time that my husband, he is a ballet dancer, not that they don’t know that she’s a dancer, but, you know, growing up they said the boys were going to be football players and the girls were going to be ballet dancers. But I think she was really proud that I was in theater and my husband was in dance, and that was important to her, I think. Keeping the arts alive was very important to her.

Well, that’s interesting because I think she was clearly the one – Martha Graham got the Medal of Honor.

Yes, and she was behind that, I’m sure.

And Alexander Calder, the sculptor, who did what has now become Grand Rapids’ symbol.

The red thing?

Exactly.

Yes.

The irony of ironies – your grandfather got the federal funding, and it was one of the first big National Endowment for the Arts projects. I’m not sure he was a big Calder fan beforehand, but he was responsible. And subsequently, he didn’t want a statue of himself in front of the museum and they settled on the spaceman because of his interest in the space program. But he did say to someone, “Whatever you do, make it representational art.” He did not want another Calder.

Grandpa.

One senses your grandmother might have a little bit broader approach to the arts.

I would say Grandpa is a simple, Midwestern man. I would say Grandma is more of a city girl.

Maybe that’s what part of the opposites that attracted.
Berlanga: Yes, and I think that’s what brings them such a good balance, is they balanced each other and taught each other. Like most successful married couples, they said they never went to bed angry. I even asked Mom, I said, “Grandma says her and Grandpa never got into it, did they?” And she said, “Oh, I’m sure they got into it, they just…” but I guess they never let the kids see it. I think they were really smart about how about they handled things.

Smith: She obviously went through a period back in the Sixties – you’re mother has written about this – where she was really representative of a whole lot of women of her generation.

Berlanga: Yeah.

Smith: Who were trying to find a role in this emerging, ill defined culture. I’ve always thought your grandmother was a remarkable combination of the traditional and the visionary in some ways. She has a foot in both camps.

Berlanga: Yes.

Smith: But that’s not always easy to live that way. Did she talk about it?

Berlanga: Women would come up to her and say, “Thank you for changing my life, you’ve done so much.” And Grandma would say, “What thing have I done?” Because she’s done the alcoholism, she’s done equal rights for woman, she’s done breast cancer, and I guess I should probably ask her who instilled in her the courage to not be told no – or to not bite her tongue.

Smith: Did she talk about her parents?

Berlanga: Not too much. She talks about worrying that Grandpa Ford, Grandpa’s dad, would be wary of Grandpa marrying her because she was a divorcee. And that was not looked well upon.

Smith: In West Michigan, generally, in the whole Dutch Reform Church, there was a very different kind of attitude in those days. There was this uncertainty about her dad’s death, and whether it was in fact suicide or an accident, and she’s suggested in passing, I think, in one of her books that it was probably suicide.
That’s a trauma under any circumstances, and you don’t know what people take away from it.

Berlanga: She really doesn’t talk too much about her parents to us. And I think it might just be – I think she still tries to shelter the grandchildren a good deal.

Smith: Does she still have a political interest? The ERA never passed, but…

Berlanga: I think she just likes to know what’s going on. I think when President Obama won, she said, “It’s good to see a black man in the office.” I think she just is happy to see the nation moving forward; not necessarily Democratic or Republican, but just kind of opening the mind of America to all the possibilities of who could lead our country.

Smith: I would love to get her and Michelle Obama in the same room.

Berlanga: I think it would be very interesting. They are two like-minded, forward thinking, can’t be put down, women. And I think my husband himself being a Hispanic man, I think he probably was a little intimidated by the fact, but they never even blinked. Even my grandmother said, “It’s finally nice to have someone with brown hair in the family.” My daughter has curls and she just puts her hands in my daughter’s hair and says, “Finally, we have someone with curls.” I never saw any prejudices from them or from anyone in my family. We were just raised that everyone is equal.

Smith: He loved to travel. And he was really in good shape until around his 90th birthday, and I think one of the doctors probably said to him about then, you’ve really got to cut back. And that must have been really tough for him to accept.

Berlanga: Yeah.

Smith: Because among other things, it’s another sign of your mortality and limitations and all of that.

Berlanga: Well, and not being able to go to Beaver Creek was very hard for him. I really do believe that was his favorite place to go and spend his time.
Smith: And they insisted on going that last summer, even though everyone told them you shouldn’t.

Berlanga: It was just important to them. And I think that house has so many memories and that place has so many memories and I think he just loves the valley and all that means to him and all that big community. He brought up the valley and he would still go out and fill the birdfeeder out the window because they’ve got a big bay window where he sits and reads his papers and he loved to see the birds out there eating the bird food. And every now and then, maybe once every five, ten years, you’d get a bear out there, you’d get a porcupine. But it was just important to him and I’m glad he got to go that last time.

Smith: It had to have been difficult. The Secret Service are not trained to provide medical care, and your grandmother really didn’t want to bring outsiders into the house.

Berlanga: Yes.

Smith: First you want to deny that the need exists, it’s just human. And then you want to make it clear that I’m taking care of my husband. How did that play out?

Berlanga: I think she’s still dealing with the fact that she has nurses. I think for the last part of his life, Grandma was making sure that Grandpa was okay. I think that’s what her focus was, and even with as many people that were there – housekeeper, chef, Grandma and Grandpa liked their privacy, they liked to take care of themselves. They weren’t someone who just kind of sat there and let people wait on them. So I think bringing that in and giving up control – Grandma is a little bit of a control freak – that runs strong down Mom’s and my line as well. She likes things done the way she likes them done, and if they’re not done that way, then it’s not okay. And I think bringing anyone in, especially if they don’t know how we like things done around here, it’s going to be more of an annoyance than anything. So I think once Grandpa did pass, I think having the nurses – I think Grandma finally took a breath and then realized that maybe she wasn’t in as good as shape as she thought she was in. But I think now they are good companions for Grandma, too. Just to have someone. You have the same set of nurses coming in and I know the faces and they’ve seen my children grow up.

Smith: I think maybe it was your sister who said, according to your grandmother, saying, “This getting old is not easy.”

Berlanga: Yes, she tells you that, it doesn’t feel good to get old. I think that is frustrating to her because they both were so active and not only active, but athletic.
Fitness was part of their daily routine and being healthy. Not that she’s not healthy; but her body just doesn’t work like it used to. You’re 92. But her mind is still there and I think it frustrates – the aches and pains – that can’t be easy. And I think she misses her sweetheart.

Smith: She said when people asked and wanted her to do something, she said, “Tell them I’m retired.” At 92 you can be retired.

friends and her family. And I think all that other stuff is great and fine, but I think her time now is very precious to her.

Smith: Anyone who gets to be 92, one of the problems is that you tend to outlive a lot of your contemporaries, your friends.

Berlanga: She still has a few friends that will come visit, and I know she talks on the phone a lot. I think, as a family, we all just try to make a point that someone is out there, if not every month, every couple of weeks, so that her days aren’t long. I can’t imagine being married to your best friend for over fifty years and then you spend the end of his life taking care of him and then when he’s gone…

Smith: Does she talk about him?

Berlanga: Oh, yeah, with pride and love, and she misses her sweetheart. I can’t even imagine what that would be like. But she loves to tell stories about him, and I try to get her to tell me – I ask her every time, “What was the favorite trip you took?” And she tells me that India was the favorite trip she took. I guess they saw the Taj Mahal at night and so the moon was reflecting. So I try to get the tidbits out of her while she’s giving us these stories.
Smith: You mentioned his faith and that’s interesting, because we all know about the Carters – I think lots of people during that week of the funeral – first of all, they were reintroduced to the family.

Berlanga: Yeah.

Smith: Secondly, they realized – again, everyone knows about the Reagans – they realized what a love match existed between the Fords. And then, maybe more subtly; this element of faith. Describe that.

Berlanga: He was never a man who wore it on his sleeve, but it was the strength that he had. It was where Grandpa derived most of his strength – was his faith.

Smith: Did it come from his parents?

Berlanga: Yeah, I think so. We always grew up going to church with them. We’d go to church on Sundays and one of my last visits with Grandpa, my husband and I went out there. I was pregnant with my daughter, and he was trying to remember a Psalm and I pulled it down – if I’d go back and look at the Psalms – but it was about just having faith. And I really do believe that he was never afraid of dying. He believed that God had a plan and he instilled that faith in us.

He made sure we prayed at every meal. Also, before dinner we’d always say, “Who’s going to get the prayer? Who’s going to get the prayer?” You know he likes you if he asks you to do the prayer, and two nights in a row he asked Hector to do the prayer and Hector was only planning on one, because here’s the deal: Grandpa is probably going to ask you to say the blessing one night before dinner. You need to go over…you don’t want to go too long because any time you ask Uncle Mike to do the blessing he pontificates. He gives a sermon. And even then, you can see Steven and Grandpa kind of wrapping it up to Uncle Mike. Keep it quick, keep it nice, say you appreciate you are here. So two nights in a row he asked Hector and Hector kind of looked at me like a deer in the headlights; like, I only had one prayer ready to go – and Grandma goes, “Honey, you asked him last night, why don’t you have Jack do the blessing?” On Christmas Eve and we tell the story of Christ being born and the nativity. It was never shoved down our throats and was just who we were as a family. And it was just a quiet faith that you really didn’t have to question, you just knew it was there. It’s how we were raised.

Smith: I’ve read in a number of places that your grandmother loved Christmas.

Berlanga: Yes, yes: the decorating, the sweaters, the Christmas tree – the ten foot Christmas tree that they would bring in. It was always a big deal. She would wait until the grandchildren came and then we would all decorate the Christmas tree together. And the house – every single corner had a decoration and the mounds of things that people would send to the house. We must have had five buckets of popcorn with three different flavors, and the chocolates, and we would always have ribs for Christmas Eve dinner. Well, sometimes not ribs. We would have ribs at Christmas time, we’d also do it at Fourth of July, because Grandpa loved his ribs from Cleveland. I like to think she did it for the grandchildren, but she just loved it. Every little thing you could make special, she made it special. And she made, not a production out of it, but she heightened it. She heightened whatever she could.

Smith: A classic life-enhancer.

Berlanga: Yes. Absolutely.

Smith: But she is also very smart. I was talking to her about I want to do this for Joy and I want to do this and I want to take her to the Nutcracker, I want to do this…she said to me, “You don’t have to do everything every year, because if you do it every year, then it’s not special.” So she still had a way of renewing it. She’s very smart in how she did things. It’s kind of like she set these boundaries, but still allowed you to flourish. She’s just magical, that woman.

Smith: Did she ever talk about her own problems?

Berlanga: I think with drugs and alcohol she talked about it a little bit. She realized that she had a problem. She talks more about getting better and sobriety, but not too much. And I guess it’s not something that I pry into too much – so Grandma, you want to talk about that last cocktail?

Smith: A teenager reaches the age where it’s a potential issue and her own experience would be relevant in some ways.
Berlanga: I think she still giggled when I would say, “Oh, we had a wild night,” when I was in college. I think she thinks that. I guess now, having her as a grandmother, I guess I try with all that stuff just to make sure everything is in moderation and to recognize my history. And you also want to have respect for the fact that Betty Ford is your grandma and you don’t want to end up at her Center.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Berlanga: The last time I was supposed to see him was in Michigan, there when they opened the School of Public Service at the University of Michigan? That was when I was supposed to see him. I think the last time when I saw him reading the Psalm was, because I was pregnant and then I had a newborn. And so Joy was ten weeks, maybe twelve weeks old when we came out to Michigan and that was when I was supposed to see him and for him to meet Joy. And then, pretty much from then on, Grandma was very protective of who saw him. And all of my cousins and my sister, they got to see him towards the end – well, more recently than I had. When he passed, because he passed December 26th and I was planning on coming out right after New Years, I had a trip planned. I was really upset that I hadn’t just dropped everything and I was like, you have a newborn and you couldn’t do it, and I remember Becca saying, “You know, when I saw him last, you might just be grateful that you didn’t see him like that.” When I saw him he was walking, he was sitting up, he was very coherent, and so my last time with him it was really nice. So I did regret that he never got to meet Joy, but I do make it a point of Joy knowing who he is and how important he is to me.

Smith: What do you remember from the funeral? It must have been an overwhelming experience.

Berlanga: It’s a fog. Not only that, but I was traveling with a six month old baby, so I wasn’t sleeping.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of reaction?

Berlanga: Yes, absolutely. I think DC was the one where it was the most overwhelming, because it was night time when we came into the city.
Smith: Going to Alexandria.

Berlanga: Yes, and turning the corner and seeing the throngs of people standing out in the bitter cold, waving flags, holding signs, and just to catch, not even the casket, just a glimpse of the limo that was carrying my grandfather’s casket. It was so touching and to know – you hear that, oh your grandpa was a great president – oh, he touched so many lives. But for these people to take time out of their holiday, no less, this is Christmas time where all you want is to be bundled up at home with your family in front of the fire. To come out and take some of the precious time they have with their family to come stand there and show their support, it was really incredible. Stopping in front of the World War II memorial, and hearing them blow the whistle; that was really powerful.

Smith: And your grandmother, I’m told, was really impressed by the numbers and response.

Berlanga: Absolutely. And the people through the night would just go to pass by his casket in Michigan to get a chance to pay their respects. I was really touched and grateful. Because I think it really lifted up Grandma to see all of Grandpa’s hard work was realized. All of us went out at some point to shake people’s hands. Oh “that was so nice, that was so wonderful.” But I don’t think they realized how grateful we were to them that they would take their time to come pay their respects to one of our family members.

Smith: Had you been to Grand Rapids before?

Berlanga: I had when I was younger. When they rededicated the museum…

Smith: In ’97.

Berlanga: That was the last time I was there before the funeral. And then we’ve gone back since then, since the funeral. But it had been a while.

Smith: Nothing prepares you – that line stretched for two miles.
It was remarkable – absolutely. You just can’t imagine how many people he affected and touched. I remember one of the billboards said, “Gerald, O U R Ford.” And to know that he was coming home. So that was very cool.

She did. That woman is a trooper, you can’t tell her what she can’t do, because then she’ll tell you what’s what. She managed to get through it. It must have been the hardest time. She was very - again with us granddaughters - she is very protective of us, and so we got to see her a little bit, but I think she was going through such a hard time that she didn’t want us to see her suffer and having such a hard time. Because she knew we were all going through losing our grandfather, but I think it would have been really hard for us to see how much she was hurting.

There is that scene – that last long walk. She got out of the wheelchair and I think Steve and General Swan…

General Swan, yes.

And the story was, when she went back to the desert the next week, someone was complementing her on that and expressing amazement. And she said, “I just did what my husband would have wanted me to.”

Yes, exactly. She said, “This is what your grandpa wants me to do, and I’m going to do it for him.” I think that was what was so incredible about their marriage and what made it so strong – is they were honoring each other throughout their marriage.

It’s interesting because she got the Medal of Freedom before he did. She got a lot of recognition, and he seemed so proud of her. He just beamed.

He never needed the accolades. He was just proud of his wife, and that’s how he was with everyone in the family. Every year on your birthday card, he would tell you how proud he was of you. And he never let you forget. He was the leader of the free world, but he was proud of you and he wanted you to know it.
Smith: Every year the Betty Ford Center does an alumni weekend, and a lot of people come back. And he could be seen grilling hot dogs.

Berlanga: Exactly. He never let the fact that he was president effect who he was as a person. He did, he loved to grill. In Beaver Creek, we’d go out to the patio and he’d grill by the pool.

Smith: Really?

Berlanga: Yes. And I guess in the framework of people who think, “Well, your grandpa is a president,” I think people put it on you that it was special. And yes, you knew that it was special, but people put it on you. And you want to go, “But, yeah, he’s my grandpa and if you saw him, you’d say he was just like everybody else’s grandpa; just a really good grandpa and a really normal guy.” And I think the discrepancy of it is, he was supposed to be President of the United States, but he was just a guy who put on the apron and went and grilled out hamburgers in the backyard, and enjoyed it.

Smith: Was he a role model?

Berlanga: Oh, absolutely. I think between the two of them you are kind of intimidated by what you have to live up to. But I think what I derived from them the most is putting family first. Being there for my kids, telling my kids how proud I am of them. Giving them every opportunity that they can have because that’s what they did for Mom and that’s what they did for us. It’s to really make sure we had a chance to excel and to thrive and to live the life we wanted to.

Smith: A couple of quick things and we’ll let you go. I wondered about the whole Chevy Chase thing – the whole notion of a clumsy…Given his athletic background and everything, did he ever say anything?

Berlanga: No. He always got a chuckle out of it. I think Grandpa could laugh at himself. Grandma didn’t ever say anything about it, but I can imagine that it might have ticked her off a little bit. Because it’s kind of like, I could say something about my husband, but don’t you say something about my husband. They’ll give each other a hard time. Grandma will turn over to Grandpa and be like, “Jerry, put your napkin in your lap.” But if anyone else were to tell Grandpa to put his napkin…you’d get the look of death, “Don’t you tell that to my husband.” Grandma never said anything, but I can imagine that…She can laugh at a good joke, but I’m sure she probably doesn’t like people poking fun at her husband.

Smith: And the movies, we were told by someone, she left an hour before Titanic ended. They went to see Titanic.

Berlanga: Yeah.

Smith: But she didn’t want to see the ship sink.

Berlanga: Ohhh, Grandma. That’s such a romantic notion.

Smith: But then a wonderful story, I don’t remember what the movie was, some Matthew McConaughey kind of romance or something, and the President came back and told everyone in the office, you’ll really like this movie, it’s a chick flick.

Berlanga: Did he really?

Smith: It seems very incongruous, the phrasing coming from him.

Berlanga: They loved going to the movies. They loved watching movies; they loved doing all that stuff.

Smith: Did they watch old movies as well?

Berlanga: Yeah, they’d watch old movies, and they loved reading, too. That was something, I think, that really they instilled in us. They loved reading, they loved reading good books and we’re all readers now.

Smith: That’s great.

Berlanga: I think that’s something we grew up seeing and we’d all talk about the books we were reading and what’s good. Grandpa always tended towards more historical novels and stuff, but Grandma loves a good book. It could be a softy book, it could be a mystery. Grandma loves a good book. And so every now and then I say, “Grandma, have you read this? You should really go pick this book up.”

30
Smith: Does she still read?

Berlanga: She does. She does as much as she can.

Smith: Her eyesight is not a problem?

Berlanga: No. She’s good. And I think we started getting her on audio tapes, too.

Smith: Okay.

Berlanga: I can’t imagine having all the time and not reading. And she still, like Grandpa, reads the paper every morning. And the paper is sitting there, waiting for her, when she gets her breakfast. It’s reassuring. I think the day there’s not a newspaper on Grandma and Grandpa’s table will be a sad day.

Smith: He was a voracious newspaper reader.

Berlanga: Yes. And I think he appreciated – like having Tom Brokaw, but before Hugh Sidey passed away, I think he appreciated a real journalist and recognized their position – their relevance in what he was doing and to the world. That’s why we have the journalism award. He appreciated a good journalist. They are hard to come by these days.

Smith: It’s even harder to come by a president in the modern era that appreciates journalists and regards them as friends.

Berlanga: Yes, exactly.

Smith: That’s rare.

Berlanga: Yeah.

Smith: This has been wonderful.

Smith: When did you come into this family, this picture?

Smith: Was there anything intimidating?

Vaden Bales: No, I think it’s probably a little bit amazing that I wasn’t intimidated. I just had never been around that sort of thing, and she was just a cute and fun girl. I remember when I first met President Ford, I drove over to Beaver Creek from Aspen and everybody said, “Oh, aren’t you nervous?” And I said, “Oh, he’s just a person.” And I really wasn’t - I was that clueless. But then when I drove up to the house in Beaver Creek on the circle there and parked the car that I had rented, and got out and walked to the front door these guys met me with earpieces and said, “Are you Vaden Bales?” And I said, “Yes,” and they showed me in. All of a sudden I realized I was about to enter into a world that I hadn’t even thought of, and I had a bad case of what I think actors call flop sweat.

Smith: And I assume they put you at your ease?

Vaden Bales: Immediately. I had had one interesting conversation with him before that, that you may find interesting. After Susan and I had been dating below the radar, so to speak, I got a call from some friends of mine about whether I was up for a federal judgeship or something. And I said “No, I’m not. Why do you ask?” They said, “Well, Joe Williams called me.” And then I got three or four of those calls from friends of mine. Well, as it turned out, Joe Williams was the head of a big pipeline company in Tulsa who sat on the board of the American Express Company with President Ford. President Ford at some board meeting had turned to Joe Williams and said, “My daughter is very serious with this lawyer in Tulsa named Vaden Bales. Do you know anything about him? And he said, “Well, I know him a little bit. He’s with a good firm, has a good reputation,” and that was the extent of the discussion.

Well, evidently Joe took it on himself to do a little more investigating. Since he was also the head of the judicial nominating commission that vetted federal judge candidates in Oklahoma, that’s why all those people got concerned about the call from Joe. I mentioned this to Susan and she went ballistic. She said, “He shouldn’t be checking up on you,” and she evidently called out to California or Colorado, wherever her parents were, and read him the riot act. A day or so later, my assistant walked in and said, “I don’t know which one of your friends this is, but somebody named Penny Circle is on the phone claiming that former President Gerald Ford is on the line holding for you.” I said, “Put him through.” I had kept the fact that I was seeing Susan from her, from my assistant.

So I get on the phone and it’s President Ford. We said hello, and he said, “I owe you an apology.” I said, “You do?” and he said, “Oh, yes. I understand Joe Williams…” So he went through, and just basically said, “I just asked Joe if he knew you, and he took it on himself to go forward.” But he said, “Susan and her mother are just all over me.” And I said, “Well, you don’t owe me an apology because if I were you, I would do the same thing.” He said, “Well, will you please call Susan and tell her I apologized because if I don’t get that call and her mother doesn’t get that call - it’s just that I’m paying hell for it right now.” So that was my first encounter with him before I had actually met him.

SFB: Let’s remember, I was thirty years old. We weren’t sixteen.

Smith: Parenthetically, that is nothing. Nelson Rockefeller went to J. Edgar Hoover and had the FBI investigate his prospective sons-in-law. You got off easy.

SFB: I guess he really didn’t love you, honey.

Vaden Bales: And back to the Fourth of July thing, when I went over there, even though I was nervous, within thirty minutes, you know how he was – I was relaxed. He actually, I think, made efforts to make me relaxed. He asked me about Page Belcher, who was a guy he had served with in Congress for years and was from Tulsa. Asked me about what he called the ditch, from Oklahoma and Arkansas down to the Gulf of Mexico, which is the Kerr McClellan Arkansas River Navigator Channel.

SFB: Carl Albert.

Vaden Bales: Carl Albert. So I was very relaxed again, but I did have about a fifteen minute episode of terror.

Smith: Let’s back up. Tell us a little bit about your background, your life before you came to this juncture.

Vaden Bales: I grew up in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Went to college; went to law school; practiced law most of my life up until I met Susan - mostly corporate and some commercial real estate. My father came to Tulsa to go to law school. My dad was a lawyer; my mother was an advertising executive. I had been married before. When Susan and I got married I had three sons from my first marriage and she had two daughters from hers, and I was a busy, active, never going to get married again lawyer.

Smith: Political at all?

Vaden Bales: Well, yes, I was. But I was on the dark side. I was a Democrat.

Smith: Did that give rise to some conversations?

Vaden Bales: Yeah, it did. I was active in the sense that when I was younger I worked on Jim Jones’ campaign, who was a congressman from the Tulsa area.

Smith: I know Oklahoma Democrats are not exactly like Massachusetts Democrats.

Vaden Bales: Yes, he was a moderate. And then active in the sense that I supported people financially some. In fact, that was kind of a family joke. After three or four years – you know we had these huge Christmases at Beaver Creek, and politics inevitably came up. After everyone expressed their opinions, I was always the last, and President Ford would look at me and say, “Now, Vaden, what would Democrats think about that?” So, at some point I went down and changed my registration and when we went out there the next Christmas, I showed him that. He said something like, “I knew you’d see the light.”
Smith: I have to ask you before I forget, when you gave up smoking and he gave up smoking, what was the background to that?

SFB: It was a bet. And Vaden gave up smoking, too. When we started dating, we both were smokers.

Vaden Bales: It was interesting, when we first got married, the whole family would be at the Beaver Creek house, and even though her mother didn’t smoke, she tolerated all of us, Susan, me, Jack at that time smoked, Steve smoked and the rest of them didn’t. President Ford smoked a pipe and I don’t even know how it came up, but we made a bet that the first one to smoke again owed the other $100 and that was the beginning of – you know, once he set his mind to something…he’s the most disciplined person I ever met. I thought about that when the bet came up, but it was also good accountability because I knew he wasn’t going to be the first to break down.

Smith: As I understood it, he gathered up all of his pipes and sent most of them out to the Library.

SFB: He did. Now, you know it’s interesting, I actually have one of his pipes that he used and it sits in an ashtray on my coffee table in my living room. That is one of the ways that I remember him, because most of my life he did smoke a pipe. Tyne has a pipe and Heather has a pipe. My girls remember sitting in his lap as children and him reading bedtime stories while he had his pipe in one hand and them in the other. Mother was a smoker for years and years and years, too. I remember him with a pipe, and to this day, I will walk someplace and if I smell a pipe, my head will turn. It is strictly – that’s my dad.

Smith: Was there a particular brand of tobacco? Or was he a connoisseur?

SFB: Field and Stream, which I don’t think – you smoked a pipe for a while, not when we were around, but I guess Field and Stream is not like real high quality.

Smith: I was going to say, I think that was a fiscal conservative’s tobacco.

SFB: It was a baby blue can with a stream on it. It’s funny how you just never forget some of those things.
Smith: So you felt very much accepted in the whole family?

Vaden Bales: Yes, he was very welcoming, and I’m sure he was cautious at first, but he was very welcoming. I’m sure he had some reserve; but as long as his daughter was happy, I was okay.

Smith: Did anything about either one of them surprise you initially?

Vaden Bales: I really didn’t have any expectations, so looking back, I would say just what the proverbial normal they were, considering where they came from. That he was the leader of the free world and she was obviously a very public First Lady, but my first exposure to them was in the family setting in Beaver Creek. So it seemed like just a normal American setting, except that the surroundings were quite elegant.

Smith: Let me ask, the question of his temper and the fact that - again, the discipline you referred to - he spent a lifetime controlling it. But there were times, and reputedly you were present to observe, if a football game didn’t go the way he wanted, that you knew it.

Vaden Bales: I saw the temper and it was – one of his aides described him best, which is that he was 98% kola bear and 2% wounded grizzly, and you never knew what was going to bring the wounded grizzly out, although Michigan losing a football game was a good one. The one I think that Susan must have mentioned was, we were up in Beaver Creek in the fall for one of the Gramshammer daughter’s weddings and Colorado and Michigan were playing. Kordell Stewart was the quarterback, Michael Westbrook the receiver. Anyway, it was a really good football game. We were down in the basement there where the big TV was and Lee Simmons had set up a big table. President Ford had been signing stuff during the whole game; footballs, pictures, and it was kind of a seesaw game, but then Michigan got the lead right at the end, and it looked like it was over and Michigan would prevail and then Kordell Stewart threw a Hail Mary to Michael Westbrook and it was a touchdown. It was the end of the game, it was over.

He stood up, took his glasses off that he’d been using to sign things, and bounced them off the table, he uttered a profanity, and I immediately decided that it would be a good time for me to go up and get on the Nordic Track. He occasionally would exhibit a temper, but mostly in that area. I would say, his ability 99% of the time to keep it in, where I would have lost mine, I think that’s what probably made him different – he was one of those people who could keep his head while those about him were losing theirs.

Smith: You mentioned the autographing. People have no idea, because there is no job description for former presidents; they have no idea how much time a former president could spend just signing his name for deserving types, let alone the collectors. And I remember there was a great big table in the conference room out in Rancho Mirage, and maybe once a week he’d sit down to his stack and he would sign them all, and he’d say, “Now, come on Mother.” One had a sense that she might not have done it if he hadn’t goaded her into it. But that was part of the job, wasn’t it, of being a former president?

SFB: It is part of the job, and you’re right as far as Mother is concerned. She hated doing that stuff. Yeah, it’s not fun. I mean, I still get requests here and there, and it’s not fun and the problem is now, are you going to see it on eBay? There is so much of that stuff sold on eBay. Back then that wasn’t an issue.

Smith: It’s interesting – you saw in Grand Rapids, there were people who would be regulars and adults who would push their kid forward - that kind of thing; really cynical. And he’d know it.

SFB: That’s true, but it is part of the job and that’s just the way it goes. On occasions I’ve said no to people in crowds because part of it is, if you do one, it starts this wave and there was one this last June. We walked out of the Press Club after the luncheon and Tyne was with me, and there was somebody standing outside and I said, “No, not at this time.” And Tyne looked at me like “Mom?” And I just went, “I don’t want to start the wave, I don’t have time to start the wave.” And I feel bad because I really am pretty good about it, but you can really start something that there’s no end to.

Smith: My sense is that people in Vail and out in the desert, too, were really pretty good about leaving them alone. Was that your sense - that they could walk through public areas and not be besieged?
Vaden Bales: Yes, but you had the occasional drunk, or something. But people were respectful of them. You talking about that reminded me: one time I was in New York with President Ford and we walked through the lobby of the Waldorf-Astoria and people stood up and clapped. And the next time I was in the Waldorf-Astoria, I was with some of my colleagues and we walked through the lobby and I said, “How strange.” And they said, “What?” And I said, “The last time I walked through here people stood up and clapped.” They looked at me like I was crazy, and I said, “Well, maybe it had something to do with the fact that I was with President Ford.”

It was always interesting, particularly when you were out at dinner; when we were the first there or if new people came, you could watch people. When you’re out and you see someone famous and you’re not expecting to, and you see someone and then the recognition gradually – and then they’d go, “That’s Gerald Ford!” But most of them would just acknowledge him. A few times there were some people, one of whom was a client of mine from Tulsa, who’d had too much to drink out in Palm Springs. They finally had to ask him just to not come over anymore. And that was where the Secret Service was helpful.

I know President Ford told me that when he flew commercially, he always put an agent on the aisle. He said, “I don’t know what it is, everybody wants to talk to me. And sometimes I’m just all talked out.” And I said, “Well, I have a belief that maybe the reason they want to talk to you is because you are a former president.” And he laughed. In Vail especially, but even in Palm Springs, they clearly, in both places, there was this sense of ownership of them, but in a beloved sort of way, because when we went out to restaurants that were well known in both places and people were just very respectful 99.9% of the time.

Smith: I’m jumping around, but that’s the nature of the beast here. It’s improbable, and yet when you start to think about it, unavoidable – the stories that we’ve been told after 9/11, especially when the anthrax scare occurred. Of course his work ethic was such that he would have had people in there working on Sundays if they would have shown up. And they did, I guess, work on Saturdays.
SFB: Well, they had to get the mail.

Smith: And he didn’t/couldn’t/wouldn’t understand why he wasn’t getting Saturday mail. Attempts to explain it were unavailing, and it got to the point where, literally, there were members of the staff who would put on these crazy anti-anthrax suits and go through the mail so he could have his Saturday mail.

SFB: It’s kind of like the newspaper. He loved his newspapers, and if his newspapers were not there when he got up in the morning, it really could start a very bad day.

Smith: We talked to Mary Fisher, who among others things, was the first female advancement man in the White House.

SFB: Right.

Smith: And she said the only time he ever was short with her was on a trip where he didn’t get his newspapers. That was the drug of choice – newspapers.

SFB: His newspapers were very important to him. And like I said to you, it was a quick explosion, once it was resolved, it was over with.

Smith: Was he a television viewer of news?

SFB: He and Mom watched a couple of shows, I remember growing up and watching the World of Disney on Sunday and Wild Kingdom was on Sunday, I think. Of course, I watched football. Back then there was one TV in the house. Ours was in the den. Now, Mother and Dad had a black and white TV upstairs, so there was a black and white upstairs and a color downstairs. But other than that, yes, we watched the news. Maybe, probably in the White House days they got more into some of the serial type shows. They watched Dallas and Dynasty.

Smith: They appeared on Dynasty once, they made a cameo appearance. Wasn’t Marvin Davis a friend of theirs? Somehow he was involved.

SFB: And then who was the female actress that Dad thought – she was in some cop show.
Smith: Angie Dickinson?

SFB: Thank you. Now, she caught his eye.

Smith: Well, she caught Jack Kenney’s eye before she caught his eye.

SFB: I can’t remember what the show was that she was on.

Smith: Policewoman.

SFB: He liked that show. But they watched a couple of them together. For news though, no, he read the newspaper because “TV news does not tell the whole story.”

Smith: Really? That’s interesting. So he thought it was biased?

SFB: Yes. It wasn’t biased; they didn’t have enough time to do the whole story. In a print newspaper, you read the whole article.

Smith: Walter Cronkite said the same thing. He said, “Twenty-two minutes every night – that’s the equivalent of the front page of the New York Times.” So he said, “Read the paper, in addition to watching.”

SFB: That was Dad’s theory, too.

Smith: He liked reporters, didn’t he?

SFB: He did like reporters. They were his friends. They had been his friends, and I’m sure you’ve talked to most of them. Some of the stuff that went on during the vice presidential days was just over the top – the crazy stuff that went on. But he liked the press because I think he used them as much as they used him. He told the story and that’s the only way the story was going to get told was talking to the press.

Smith: Plus, in a larger sense, from a very early age, he made a conscious decision, and I don’t know whether it was influenced by his mother, or whether it was something he came to on his own, but a conscious decision to see the good in everyone. And he concluded that most people were mostly good, most of the time. People sometimes talk of Good Ol’ Jerry – Jerry’s an Eagle Scout. And one of the things we’ve been grappling with in this whole thing is: Bob Hartmann is a great example – or being genuinely shocked that Richard Nixon lied to him, or that anyone would lie to him. Where does that admirable quality of wanting to impute good to people - where does that end and a kind of naiveté about people’s motives begin? Maybe that’s too stark a choice. Was he naïve at all about people’s motives?

Vaden Bales: I don’t think he was naïve. I think you captured it when you said earlier he started out with a sense of people were innately good, and I just think people may attribute naiveté to the fact that he didn’t blow up a lot and all that. He did seem to have a capacity for forgiveness. Susan has talked about once he lost his temper, it was over, and it really was. Obviously, if it was a crime or something, no. But I think that he maybe was naïve in the sense he thought everyone else was as good as he was. But when you think of some of the tough decisions that he made, that really cost him politically, he does show a toughness. I think he’s like anyone in that, I will put up with behavior from someone who I believe in and like and have a history with, that I won’t from someone else. I think you look on the current political scene and if a Democrat does it, certain people throw a fit. When a Republican does the same thing, well, there’s a reason.

Smith: Sure.

Vaden Bales: But I think he was forgiving up to a point; but when you crossed this moral line of his, then it was over.

Smith: We were talking with Dick Cheney; the president sometimes has to be ruthless for the good of the country; and the question of whether ruthlessness is not a quality that one associates with your dad. I remember asking Cheney, “How difficult was it for him to fire people?” And he said, “He really enjoyed firing Jim Schlesinger.” And he went on to relate the circumstances. He couldn’t wait. But that’s a relationship where Schlesinger was not just professorial, but condescending.

Which raises a question about your dad’s sensitivity to what we talked about earlier; the whole intelligence thing. He’d been on the House Appropriations Committee, the Defense subcommittee; he knew the Pentagon budget as well, or better, probably than Schlesinger did. Is Schlesinger a type who would push his buttons? It’s one thing to be genial, and to see the best in people, but in reality, there are people you run up against all the time…

SFB: There were people he chose not to be with. He would say people that felt they were friends of his or acquaintances of his, that would ask things of him, that he didn’t like their character. And without having to say, “I don’t like you and I don’t want to be around you,” that’s I guess the beauty of a staff. You just never become available. You just do things like that. Yeah, there were people he did dislike.

Smith: I only heard him speak disparagingly of two people, ever. One was Gordon Liddy and one was John Dean. And in retrospect, he had pretty good judgment. Were there people he was vocal about?

Vaden Bales: Oliver Stone when JFK came out.

SFB: He was very vocal about that.

Vaden Bales: He was as angry as I’ve ever seen him. And he was angry because he thought it was…I remember on the plane, it was around Christmas time that all the came out, and there was a Newsweek magazine, the cover was JFK – History as Fiction. I handed him that magazine when I got to Beaver Creek and he said, “Boy, that’s the truth. It is fiction.” And he was really angry about it and he said, “Plus, I’m trying to be up here with my family and enjoy the holiday, but I’m the only surviving member of the Warren Commission and it is my duty to give a bunch of interviews and all that and back up the Commission findings.” He was really angry about that.

Smith: It’s interesting that he saw himself as having, in some ways, a historical obligation to defend the Commission.

SFB: And I think that some of it is that the majority of the kids that went to see that movie - I’ve never seen the movie; I’m like forbidden to go see that movie - would not do the research to know what is fact and what is fiction, and the whole thing. To them it’s a movie and that was Dad’s greatest fear – that they are not really given the true side. He really did feel a duty to constantly defend the decision that had been made. And most of the generation – I don’t know what the percentage is today, of kids that are alive who don’t know who my dad is, weren’t even alive when he was president. And to me, our job as family members is still and will always be, to continue his legacy, so people know who he is and what he did.

Smith: Did he talk at all about the Profiles in Courage Award? I know he said, “Everywhere I’ve gone for twenty years, people always ask the same question. After that award, they stopped asking.” Which tells you something about the power of the Kennedys; in effect, the imprimatur of the Kennedys. Did he talk about that experience?

Vaden Bales: Yes. You ran the museum for a while; you know that this is a guy who has been getting awards his whole life. And of all the things that he ever got during the time that I was around him, he was the most proud of the Profiles in Courage award. He talked about it in the sense that it was really – it gave the imprimatur – everybody, all of a sudden, jumped on the bandwagon – well, he did what was right when it cost him. But the fact that it was so visible and who gave it, and he said to have Ted Kennedy up there in a press conference with the TV cameras rolling, saying basically, he was right, we were wrong, meant a great deal to him. He didn’t use the words, but just, again, the level of his happiness and all that – it meant as much to him as any award that he got.

Smith: I was going to complete your sentence for you: I can’t think of him using the word vindication, but he was vindicated. And I wonder, for example, if your mother had a more intense personal reaction, because I knew for a fact when I was tipped off to it, that he didn’t want to go.

SFB: Right.

Smith: He literally didn’t want to go. When he died Newsweek had a story, and buried in it was this notion that he had somehow cultivated liberal historians, because this would redound to his benefit. And I can’t think of anyone who spent less time cultivating historians, or anyone else, in terms of consciously shaping his place in history. That’s what the rest of us had to do because he wouldn’t do it. And the classic example - he initially didn’t realize the incredible symbolism of this event. And my sense is, that other people had to…

SFB: Coerce him.

Smith: Yes, including I assume, your mother.

SFB: That, I don’t know, and I only wish at the time we would have known more about it because we could have gone to see it. It’s just one of those things – it’s an after the fact moment of, gee I’m sorry I missed that one.

Vaden Bales: Yes, we were on the list, at one point, to go and something came up and we said, “Oh, well.” We didn’t realize what it meant. And that was before the Congressional Gold Medal Award, in which you had a lot of people, some current, some from those days, getting up and talking about he was right, we were wrong, the courage – you remember all that. And that meant a lot to him.

Smith: But it’s also true that with a lot of those awards – she got the award first.

Vaden Bales: Yes.

Smith: She got the Medal of Freedom first. And one sensed that he was just so proud of her. There was no competition in terms of recognition.

SFB: There was never competition between the two of them. They were so proud of each other and their teamwork – I think they were unbelievable soul mates. And not that there weren’t rocky roads – hey, we all know marriage is one of the hardest jobs you have in your entire life, and theirs wasn’t perfect but they worked really hard at it.

Smith: There are stories about the Betty Ford Center alumni event with him on the grill cooking hot dogs.

SFB: Our Memorial Day cookouts. Yeah, he would sit there and help cook on the grill or pass out the pop. That was her thing but he was right there holding her up and supporting her the whole way.
Smith: How traumatic was the intervention? And how long had it been in the imagining?

SFB: Not long in the planning. It kind of was an overnight thing because I talked to Dr. Kruz(?), and once I talked to Dr. Kruz and he kind of put us in touch with the people that we needed to be in touch with, it began to work very quickly.

Smith: You were the chief spearhead?

SFB: I was the chief spearhead that put it all together. I’m the one that went to Dr. Kruz and first said, “I have a friend whose mother has a problem.” By the end of the time in the car, he said, “Susan, you don’t have a friend who has a problem; you have a mother who has a problem.” My mother was his patient and I was his patient, also, so he was not talking out of school. I don’t think we had HIPPA then, but just to be sure. So he’s the one who helped get us in touch with Dr. Kursh(?), and Pat Benedict and all of the people that we needed to put it together. And then I went back and kind of reported to Dad and I said, “Dad, I spent a very interesting day,” and kind of filled him in on it. He said, “That sounds great. What do we do next?” And so once we got the things working, Mike and Gayle were living on the East Coast, Jack was already in San Diego, maybe Steve was up in San Luis Obispo by that point. But trying to get a day that we could get together and pull it off was the challenge. And once we realized that that day was like five days away, things start happening.

Smith: Had he been in denial?

SFB: Oh, absolutely. We all had. We all had been in denial. And I would not say that I was in denial, I didn’t know what it was. I was nineteen years old and Dr. Kruz was actually the one who put a name to it. He said, “Your mother is an alcoholic.” I had been raised in a house where your parents have a drink at night and so did all my friends’ parents have drinks at night. As we all know, it affects different people in a different way. In that sense, it happened very quickly and part of it was, once she left and went to Long Beach, we all took a big sigh of relief and went, “Ahhh, it’s all fixed.” Well, what we didn’t realize was we all had to be fixed. We were as sick as she was, and that was very much of where we were.

Smith: How so?

SFB: We were enabling her. I went to functions with my dad because she wouldn’t get dressed and go to functions. We’d say, “Oh, her back hurts, her neck hurts.” I was covering for her and I shouldn’t have. I didn’t confront her. The stories go on and on and if you read her book, they are all there. We didn’t bring friends home because we didn’t know what kind of shape she would be in. She would fall asleep at the dinner table. Things like that. We needed to become transparent again. We needed to stop our behavior. Our behavior was as bad as her behavior.

Smith: And it has been suggested that there was nothing automatic. When she went into Long Beach, it was rough.

SFB: Oh, yeah.

Smith: It tends to be sort of lost in the triumph that ensued just what hell she must have gone through.

SFB: I’ve never been through treatment, but when you read her stories about it and things like that – it’s hell. It’s not fun, it’s not a spa by any means. And Dad went to family and I went to family and we all got help and we helped her and the biggest thing that we all learned was that it is her sobriety. It’s not ours and it’s not our job to manage it; it’s not our job to fix it; she has to do it on her own and we have to fix ourselves and she has to fix herself. But it was the most incredible experience for our family and it’s the best thing that ever happened, because we truly became transparent again.

Smith: Let me ask you something, let me ask both of you; again, this is speculative, but I often wondered – I think I even mentioned in the eulogy – people tend to get more conservative with age. And in their case part of it was that the party went way to the right. But it wasn’t just that. He seemed to be extraordinarily open minded, compassionate, understanding, on a whole range of issues that you don’t automatically associate with a “conservative Republican,” former president, whatever. If he changed or evolved or whatever, how much impact did she have.

Of course children and grandchildren bring their generation’s perspective. In the larger sense of the word, and maybe the hardest to quantify, I wonder how much the experience of going through the intervention, and everything that followed reinforced an existing compassion and ability to understand and empathize with those who were good people, but who were different, or people who had a weakness. You know what I mean? Rather than imposing moral judgments or ideological certitudes on human behavior. He’s still the only president who ever signed his name to a petition for gay rights, which is a pretty remarkable thing. Obviously, there was the abortion issue.

Vaden Bales: My observation in the time I knew him, and got to know him was that he was evolving. I don’t think it was a big change. I think, if you think about his presidency, one of his styles was to get people who were at the complete opposite ends of the spectrum, let them make their best arguments, and he would listen to both. That’s the thing I hear from Carla Hills, Cabinet members, that they really respected about him is that they didn’t always win, but they always got a fair hearing. And I think that’s how he approached some of these issues that people now would call liberal.

The one issue that I can remember that surprised me back when same sex marriage first became an issue, and I’m talking ten years ago at least, and I asked him what he thought about it and I said, “Do you feel like maybe at least the civil union contract and all that,” and I thought he would say yes, or something further to the right and he said, “No, it’s going to happen. We need to just short circuit all the damage that’s being done to people and just let it happen.” And that really surprised me. I think the intervention had an impact on him; I think Mom had a big impact on him because she really stayed current with what I would call more trendy stuff. He knew what was going on in the world, because he read four newspapers a day.

Smith: That’s a very interesting distinction.
Vaden Bales: I think she had a real influence on him on what I would call – now trendy probably sells her short some – but I’m just saying changing sociological trends.

Smith: And the popular culture.

Vaden Bales: Yes, and I’ve seen her step up to the plate for her granddaughters when one of their uncles would say, “Well, you really shouldn’t be living with this person,” and Mom would say, “Well, what’s different about her than you? You’ve done the same thing.” Because that was more her interest and the arts, and she was a free spirit in that sense. But because he valued her counsel so greatly – you know this as well as anybody – she was, in my opinion, his number one advisor, political and otherwise. So I think his constant openness to other points of view – I think that was in his DNA. It’s why I think, even though he was a heck of a partisan, who were his best friends off the floor? Carl Albert, Tip O’Neill, it just goes on and on. So I think it was in his nature.

Smith: I also wonder, though, if in some ways, the Reagan challenge alerted him, sensitized him – when he would talk about the hard right, there was kind of a code word – these people who were trying to take over his party, trying to redefine conservatism.

SFB: Well, to back up what Vaden said, I would say he was probably one of the best listeners I’ve ever been… I mean when you, as a kid, were pleading your case to get off the “I’m disappointed in you,” which is the worst thing your father…you hated to hear that.

Smith: That was the worst form of discipline?

SFB: That was the worst. “I’m disappointed in you. But I’m willing to listen.” And that’s what he did. He truly listened for you to plea your case. Whether I ever changed his mind on my discipline, I don’t know, but I felt fairly heard. And I wouldn’t say he made judgment on it or anything else, he just said, “Well, this is how we’re going to deal with this.”

Smith: By the way, this may be more applicable to your brothers, were spankings ever administered?
SFB: Oh, yeah. I would not say by him, that I can remember. Now I don’t know if this is the father/daughter relationship, but I can tell you my mother spanked me and Clara spanked me. I was spanked and I spanked my children. Child abuse.

Smith: Clara was sub-contracted to discipline.

SFB: We were spanked.

Smith: What was different about the pace of life in the desert versus Vail? He was in the office every day, I’m sure.

Vaden Bales: His routine wasn’t that much different because he got up – he was an early riser most of his life – he got up before her. He came down, fixed his breakfast; I usually had breakfast with him at either place while we were visiting, and he would read the newspapers. Well, the first thing he did was take a swim, both places. Then he would go down, fix his breakfast, read the newspapers, and then he would go to the office. The Beaver Creek office was physically in the house, as you know, and then in Palm Springs it was about a fifty foot walk. And he’d spend a couple of hours over there.

More activity, in terms of either place, happened at Beaver Creek at Christmas time, because we were all there. There were sixteen or seventeen people in this house; we were skiing; you had kids from infants to teenagers; and we were all there, but he didn’t change his routine that much. And we all had family dinner at Christmas time, at a certain time Christmas Eve we went to the four o’clock service, and God help those who didn’t show up on time or miss the bus from the ski slope, but his routine didn’t really vary. You know, when he was in his office in Beaver Creek, you had to walk by it to get to the other parts of the house if you were on that floor. He didn’t shut the door, but when he had his head down at his desk and had the pencil or was reading, everyone knew that unless you had some compelling reason to go in, in which event, he was available, he was working.

Smith: Did you have the ski tow that went behind the house?
SFB: Behind the house. The other thing I would say that was different between Palm Springs and Beaver Creek was they had a heavier social black tie schedule in Palm Springs. I mean, there are weeks where they went to two and three black tie events a week in Palm Springs. Which is just unbelievable, but that’s the way they do it. Beaver Creek, there was no black tie. There was no formal, it was a polo shirt and maybe a sports coat, occasionally a suit.

Smith: And what about your mother’s day?

SFB: Well, my mother is not a morning person, has never been a morning person. And so he was in the office by the time she usually came. He would come back over to the house, especially in Palm Springs, while she was having breakfast and he might sit down with her and go over the day’s schedule that they were doing together. But her day consisted of making calls, going to the Betty Ford Center, going for hair, nails, all that kind of stuff. She had events. She had friends, she had women’s groups that she met with. And she had a desk and an office that she worked at. But lunch they normally had together unless he was on the golf course, and they always had dinner together. Rarely did she do anything at night. Sometimes if he did something in the evening, he would go and show up and then come home and have dinner with her, especially if it was a local something in the desert. But Beaver Creek was way laid back, and they would go to Ford Park and hear the symphony and do things like that and have dinner with friends. So that was truly a vacation for them - to go to Beaver Creek in the summertime.

Smith: How tough was it for him to get old?

SFB: He complained about it – “Oh, I’m getting old, these knees are getting old.” Didn’t really seem to affect him. You know, Richard, he traveled and did _________.

Smith: Yeah, in fact, I’ve often thought – really he was in great shape up until about his 90th birthday. And when the doctors told him, “You really have to cut back or stop traveling,” that was a kind of death. Because it had been his life; he loved it.
SFB: And the thing is, he used to be able to sleep anywhere. Sleep on a plane, sleep in a car. I did get that trait which I’m so thankful for, but he wasn’t sleeping well on the road. He didn’t like the pillows, he didn’t like this – and I would say it was into his 90s. There wasn’t the joy, there wasn’t the exhilaration, and it took longer for him to recover, would be the best way to put it. I think it was harder on us to watch him get old than him.

Smith: Was your mother reluctant to acknowledge the need for outside help?

Vaden Bales: Uh, if she was reluctant – that was an understatement. It was just her generation. They pulled themselves up by their bootstraps. She considered it a moral failure on her part to even think about it. But at some point, as his mobility was less and less and she’s a very tiny, formidable, but tiny woman, and we finally were able to get help. We started it, “Let’s try it part-time.”

SFB: It was part-time only in the evenings from like ten at night until ten in the morning.

Vaden Bales: It took a concerted effort from all of us. Because she was deteriorating just from exhaustion, and I think when they came in, it was surprising how well she adapted to it. She didn’t want people – I heard it from my mother when my father started having problems – she didn’t want someone in her house. She was perfectly able to take care of her husband. So she was a hard sell, but she came around.

Smith: What about him?

Vaden Bales: I think he adjusted to it pretty well.

SFB: We had some personality issues with some. Part of it is figuring out the right people for the right thing, and until you get that adjusted…

Smith: It’s like adjusting drugs – literally.

Vaden Bales: I think he knew he needed it and I think he saw what was going on with her. I would say he generally, if we talk about how accepting he was of different views and things, he would say things like, “I just can’t recover like I used to.” And I remember one time I looked at him and he said, “I don’t know what’s up with that.” And I said, “You might want to go look at your birth certificate.” And he laughed. But I would say he pretty much aged majestically.

Smith: That’s well put. I would get calls from the press, and one of them was from Tom DeFrank, “What was the cause of death? What was the cause of death?” I said, “Tom, he died of being 93.” It’s called old age.

Vaden Bales: But the fact that we went to Mayo Clinic when we did, tells you – even though he was not thrilled with the diminished capacity that you have as you age – he was willing to go at 93 and possibly have open-heart surgery because he loved his life so much. We were shocked when he made that choice.

SFB: We would not have told you that was going to be his decision. Never would have said that.

Vaden Bales: We met with the Hospice people before we met with the doctors because we knew he was going to say, “I don’t want to go through that.” And I’ll never forget – there are things in your life that you can play on a video, and we had a cardiologist and his primary physician at Vail there, and we had a guy from Mayo Clinic on the telephone and we probably had an hour long discussion. And we got done and they said, “Well, what do you think?” And he looked around the room and he said, “I’m inclined to proceed.” And there was this deafening silence. And he looked and said, “What do you think, Mother?” And she said, “Well, I’ll support whatever you want to do.” And then as he did – it was eerily like when we were in Philadelphia and he had this problem with his tongue after he had the stroke where he went around the room and asked us what our opinion was.

Smith: Was there a corresponding sense of disappointment on his part when he got to the Mayo and found that for a number of reasons they couldn’t do the surgery? Had his hopes been raised in a sense?

Vaden Bales: Yes, he was disappointed, but he had seen – he didn’t know because he wasn’t really aware of the impact the sedatives had on him with minor procedures, meant that the heavy duty stuff they would have given him, had they put him on the table - we didn’t know - and he seemed to accept it and understand it. He didn’t, in front of me or Susan, I think, emote greatly, but I’m sure he was disappointed because he made the decision to go to Mayo in the first instance. Before we went, they talked about if this worked, what it would be like, what his life would be like. He asked that question. “Is it going to be more of this?” “No, if we’re able to do it, this and this and this,” and these people had a fairly remarkable history of doing this procedure on elderly people. I’m sure he was disappointed. But at the end of that, when we knew where we were going, this will sound – it gave us time to say goodbye in a nice way. Often you lose people unexpectedly. We knew it was coming so all of us got to meet with him and the last six months of his life I spent a week a month with him. So we got to say what we meant to each other.

Smith: Quality time.

Smith: Thank you very much for doing this. The obvious question at the beginning is how did your paths first cross with Gerald Ford?

Ehlers: I really don’t know except that I recall once getting on an airplane here in Washington. I was here for a physics meeting, got on the plane, and he was sitting up in first class reading the newspaper. I just introduced myself to him and he said, “Hello,” and was very polite. And just to show how impressive he was at remembering names and people, the next time I saw him, I don’t even remember where it was, he got that puzzled look on his face and a few light bulbs went on, and he in fact made the comment something about, “Ah, Professor Ehlers!” And that’s impressive given all the people he meets.

Smith: The mark of a good congressman?

Ehlers: Yes, he was much better at remembering names that I was.

Smith: You came into politics through a very unconventional route.

Ehlers: Yes.

Smith: Tell us a little bit about that.

Ehlers: Well, I’m a nuclear physicist by training and never intended to get involved in politics. I had been teaching at Berkeley, had received my Ph.D. there, and was asked to stay on the faculty. So I taught and did research at Berkeley for six years after the Ph.D. Then Calvin College – an excellent, excellent liberal arts college in Grand Rapids, Michigan, and my alma mater - asked me several times if I would come and help them build a physics department and teach at Calvin. And I said ‘no’ several times, but my conscience started bothering me, so I finally decided to do it.

We moved to Grand Rapids in 1966. It’s all kind of complicated and even a little hazy in my head at this point, but that was at a time of great national distress due to the Vietnam War - I was at Berkeley - so of course, I watched all the related student activity. I was not involved in demonstrations, but I interacted with students and faculty and watched carefully. I’m a good watcher. And I watched what was going on and who was doing what, saying what, and how it was going. Initially, it started through this very idealistic effort to change policy of the nation, but it turned violent after a few years, by the time I left. I went back for three summers to do research after I’d moved to Michigan, and each summer was progressively more violent, even to the point of a student getting shot by a National Guardsman. This was before the Kent State event. It was not a fatal shot, but it was a remarkable step of course.

Smith: Do you find it difficult to communicate to people today who weren’t there just how intense, even violent, the political feelings had become, not only on campus but in the broader culture?

Ehlers: The difficulty is most people don’t even know it happened. Today, when you talk to them, they’re just astounded. And when we’d moved to Grand Rapids, there’d been race riots there just a few weeks before we arrived. Compared to Berkeley, it was small scale stuff, but still pretty serious for the city Grand Rapids was. My wife and I are both devout Christians and we went searching for a church and we chose one, particularly because it was only two blocks from where the race riots were. We thought maybe we could be of some help to that community, plus we had some friends who already belonged to that church, people I had known from Calvin. Even though we had ended up at Berkeley and they had ended up at Columbia University, we ended up back at Calvin.

So my wife and I decided to join Eastern Avenue Christian Reformed Church and that suddenly put me in the midst of the maelstrom because the church was trying to be a positive force in the community. We started Baxter Community Center - I’m sure you’re familiar with that - which was a big factor in stabilizing the community there. We started Project Conserve which was to restore housing, and that became the Inner City Christian Federation, which rebuilt hundreds of decaying homes in the inner city. They rented them or sold them. I was teaching courses on how to maintain and insulate your house, and it turned into sort of a Habitat for Humanity before Habitat for Humanity was around. I was active in helping that get started. And later, it became ICCF, but also had a portion for humanity of development. We had two programs going.

Smith: One of the themes of this project is to examine the culture of West Michigan and the environment that produced Ford and that elected him over and over again. We’ve heard wonderful stories of the influence of the Christian Reformed Church – how for years people would buy a Sunday paper on Saturday night, but they wouldn’t read it until Monday. How has it changed and how has it not changed?

Ehlers: It has changed considerably in terms of participation in the political arena. I was one of the first. There had been some others from the Christian Reformed Church who had served publically, but they were not considered leaders in the Dutch or Christian Reformed community. I wasn’t either when I started, but as I said, I came into our church, and later our church formed a social justice committee and I was asked to chair that. That immediately put me in touch with a lot of other churches in the city, non-Christian Reformed, that were doing the same thing. Denny Hoekstra and his wife Jeni went to the same church. Both of them are masters at localizing a community, so we worked with them and became close friends with them. Also, Howard Rienstra, who would later become a city commissioner, is also a faculty member at Calvin and many of the Grand Rapids activists were at Calvin College.

Smith: This flies in the face of the stereotype of West Michigan, and particularly the Dutch community, as an inherently conservative group.

Ehlers: My mother was very upset when I got involved politically. She sort of justified it when I got elected to the county commission. She justified that as long as I was still teaching at Calvin and part-time in politics, that was okay, because - in paraphrasing what she said - any damage done to me in the county building by my colleagues there was undone by my going back to Calvin College to teach the same day.
Smith: So, it was less an ideological aversion than a cultural rejection of political involvement?

Ehlers: Yes, I would say it’s certainly more the latter. And my mother never really fully adjusted to the fact that I was politically involved. Whereas my dad, who was a pastor in the Christian Reformed Church, was quite proud of it. He thought that was the right thing to do. In fact, it’s kind of funny because my sister liked to prod my dad occasionally and when he retired, he moved to Ohio where my sister was. He became active in the United Way, treasurer of the local United Way and things like that. One day, he was sitting at the kitchen table counting money and so forth and my sister walked in and says, “Dad, you’re going to the dogs. You used to preach against the Boy Scouts and now you’re collecting money for them,” which sort of epitomized the change. But in my case, I didn’t have any of the hang-ups.

I had been at Berkeley and I had seen that side of the world and their reaction. But my friends and I, you know, the Hoekstras and Rienstras and so forth, recognized that a good deal of the problem with Grand Rapids was a lack of good leadership in the city commission, so that’s where we started. At least, that’s where Rienstra and I went on the County Commission. We were working through different channels, but always with the same objective. We simply decided we needed better leadership and so we would try to pick the person who was running for the city commission who showed the greatest understanding and the greatest promise of doing something and we would help that person get elected. We basically became a machine without even trying to be.

Smith: Imagine: a good government machine.

Ehlers: A good government, idealistic in approach, and you know, you’ve been in politics, you know how hard it is to get volunteers to help. You drag them in kicking and screaming to get them to write and put stamps on letters and all that stuff. Howard Rienstra and Jeni, Denny Hoekstra and I, along with Norm DeGraaf, who was a forward looking insurance salesman, we just put this little machine together and we’d pick who the best candidate was, go to that candidate, and knock on that door and say, “We think you’re the best. We’d like to help you.” To have volunteers, experienced volunteers, appear out of the gloom and say, “We’re here to help you” had a major impact. But also, it grew in the sense that, if we felt none of the people running were good, we’d go out and recruit someone. We recruited Lyman Parks, who was the first African-American on the Grand Rapids city commission. We recruited him to run for city commissioner and he was more than willing to do it. He later became the first black Mayor in Grand Rapids.

Smith: It’s interesting because, as you talk about this project, I’m thinking back to a precursor of sorts, back when President Ford’s dad and others were trying to overthrow Frank McKay and bring decent government back to Grand Rapids.
So, in some ways, history repeats itself.

Ehlers: Well, that’s very true. The differences, of course, that McKay, whether it was true or not, had the reputation of being a shady character. Not just McKay, but all the people he surrounded himself with. In our case, we were trying to change government to recognize the needs of society, particularly the poor people.

Smith: In some ways, it’s a tougher thing to do.

Ehlers: Yes, it was, particularly in the shadow of the race riots, which shocked the people of Grand Rapids. They couldn’t imagine.

Smith: ‘It can’t happen here.’

Ehlers: Yeah. So, anyway, that’s how I got involved, never, never intending to run myself. I learned enough about politics and what people look for in a candidate. You know, a strong chin is worth two points, the right nose is worth one point, and so forth.

Smith: Hair helps.

Ehlers: It does. I learned early on that an unattractive, bald-headed man like me doesn’t have a chance, but that’s not why I decided I wasn’t interested in running. I just wasn’t interested in the job. I was interested in changing society, but not doing all the grunt work for any political office.
Smith: When did you first run?

Ehlers: In 1974, I ran for the county commission and the reason I was persuaded to, I had become active in the environmental movement. You’re familiar with the West Michigan Environmental Action Council, which I think is still one of the best in the country. We started that about ’68 and I was in on the ground floor. I was not a key player in that at all, I just thought it was a great idea. I had become very aware of the environmental problems and Michigan had the right atmosphere to make changes, so I joined the West Michigan Environmental Action Council. In fact, fairly quickly I ended up on the board of that organization. So, when we had a terrible solid waste problem and Kent County opened dumps with leachate flowing into the rivers and creeks and saw headlines in the paper every day, friends said, “Look, Vern, you’re a scientist, you’re an environmentalist, you’re the guy to deal with this.”

So I ran for county commission. It was a thankless job. The county commission was still the good old boys club, very much so, and literally with the emphasis on boys. There was not a single woman in twenty-one people. I still remember in my first month there, after a county commission meeting, I was looking around, chatting with some of my fellow commissioners and said, “You know, this is awful. It’s all men. I’m going to go out and recruit some women to run.” And a member of the county commission said, “Ah, the last thing we need is a bunch of pushy broads in this outfit.” The press reporter was standing right next to him and he didn’t even report the story. I asked the reporter afterwards, I said, “You heard what he said?” He said, “Oh yeah.” I said, “I thought that’d be a big story.” He said, “Well, no, everyone in the city knows what he’s like.” I said, “So, if I had said it, it’d be a story?” “Oh, yeah.” I said, “You have a different standard of news than he does.”

But, at any rate, in the meantime, I had met Jerry Ford and then I met him again and as I said, he remembered my background. The next time I met him, he knew my name. He was incredible on names. And I remember times when I was walking down the streets of Grand Rapids with him and it was a real revelation to me that I knew scarcely any of the people walking down the street and he knew them all and called them by name. I remember one time, we walked in what was the Pantlind Hotel before the remodeling and I was with him. By then, he was presidential rank. I think he was vice president. We walked in together, Secret Service and all, and he was shaking hands with people and mostly calling them by name and I noticed an African-American man lurking in the background kind of off to the side. It was clear he wanted to meet Jerry Ford. So I tapped Jerry on the shoulder and said, “Jerry, I think that gentleman over there wants to talk to you.” He looked at him and said, “Oh, yeah, I got to say ‘hi’ to him.” So, he walks over and says ‘hi’ to him and says, “How’s your mother? Is the cancer gone or is it still progressing?” And I thought, just what an amazing guy. Here’s a guy one step from the presidency of the United States and he remembers his roots, he remembers the illness in the family of that man.

Smith: I remember hearing him tell later on, not to pick on any one in particular, but he sort of used Guy Vander Jagt as an example of someone who was enormously talented yet, in some ways, forgot his roots. Clearly, Ford never really had a seriously contested race after his first one and it’s amazing how much time he spent in the district, even after becoming a national figure. He used to say that he thought things had gone downhill since the staffs had expanded. Part of that was his fiscal conservatism, but I think part of that was also a sense that maybe they didn’t simply reflect, but in some ways contributed, to the pell-mell growth of government.

Ehlers: Yes.

Smith: Did you talk to him about the House and housekeeping issues when you were first elected? Did you have any conversations?

Ehlers: Not really. Well, when I was first elected to the county commission, he complimented me. In fact, I played somewhat of a role in the county contribution of the Ford Museum and it was like pulling teeth to get money out of the county commission, which normally never appropriated money. Their job was just to keep the county running, so to give money to something like the Ford Museum was a real change. One time, Jerry and I were there looking around. I think by then I probably had become chairman of the Smith: I was going to ask you. From time to time, we ask people, did you ever see the temper? Because it existed and he spent a lifetime controlling it.

Ehlers: No, I never saw him lose his temper, but clearly he was angry in that instance. The one time I saw him really angry, and it tells you a lot about what kind of a man he was, was at the time of Watergate. I have to tell you an interlude here. I went up to the University of Colorado at Boulder for a year on sabbatical and did research on atomic and nuclear physics. It was a great year. And, while I was there, I went to the national meeting of the American Physical Society, which was the physicists’ association. A speaker was Congressman McDermott from Washington, who was a chemist and worked at the Hanford facility, and he said, “All of you should get out there and get in touch with your member of Congress. A lot of scientific issues come up in Congress and most of them know nothing about science. See if you can offer to help them.”

I thought, “Good idea”, so I got back to Boulder and sat down and wrote a letter to Mr. Ford to suggest that, if he was interested, I would put together a group of scientists from West Michigan and we would be happy to meet with him and advise him on science matters. I dropped it in the mail and my thought was that I would get one of these thank-you-for-your-letter type of letters in response that said ‘We’ll keep it in mind’. And, instead, two days later, I get a call from Mr. Meyer, Jerry’s Chief of Staff. He called me and said, “Hey, got your letter and Jerry really thinks it’s a great idea and he’d like to have you put that together.” And I said, “Good. I’ll be in Washington in three weeks for a science meeting. I’d be happy to meet with him.”
So, I came and met with him and it was interesting. It was in what now is the Speaker’s office under Madam Pelosi with a beautiful view down the mall between the monuments and so forth. It was pretty heady stuff for a punk scientist from Grand Rapids. At any rate, I had a series of questions. How did he want it run? Who did he want on it? Et cetera, et cetera. It was very interesting because I posed the question “Do you want me to restrict it to Republicans who are scientists?” And Frank Meyer immediately spoke up and says, “Of course we would want that.” And Jerry took a puff on his pipe and said, “Well, I don’t see why. We want scientific advice, not political advice.” And so that gave me a clear signal of how he operated. So, we scientists would get together with Jerry about four times a year. He’d come to town and I would set up a meeting. We had about five or six scientists. I’d prepare an agenda ahead of time, so the scientists would be able to get some background on it and we advised Jerry. That’s what led to my getting politically involved on the national level.

Smith: Did he ask questions?

Ehlers: Oh, yes, lots of questions, good questions. The only time we really had a disagreement was when he was gung-ho to build the supersonic airplane and we all advised him against it. We said the cost was going to exceed the benefits and the program wouldn’t fly, literally.

Smith: Did you ever have a chance to remind him of that in later years?

Ehlers: I think I did at one point. He still fought the battle, but he lost the battle in the Congress, though not because of anything we did. I remember clearly one thing which gave me some real insight into how Congress works, but I never fully appreciated how true it was until I got here myself. I talked once after one of our science meetings and said, “You know, Mr. Ford pardon me for asking this, but I’m a little puzzled because, here you are, an extremely busy congressman; you come back on the weekend; you meet with constituents; and then you come meet with us and spend an hour and a half or two hours with us and you seem to enjoy it. That’s really surprising to me because you’re so busy. How do you find the time for it, first of all, and why do you enjoy it?” And Jerry was a pretty big guy, he puts his arm around me and says, “Well, Vern, you’ve got to recognize one thing. You’re the only people I meet with who meet with me for the purpose of giving me something instead of asking me for something.” He says, “All day long, I sit in that office and people come in and ask me for favors and you come along and you’re here to help me.” He said, “That’s great. I really enjoy it.” And he did, he really did enjoy meeting with us, partly because he didn’t understand science and we were able to explain these issues in very simple terms.

Smith: That raises a great question. Tell me about, for lack of a better word, his intelligence, his mind.

Ehlers: Well, I had heard all the stories, too. He was very slow of speech, slow to react, and that, I think, was what killed him in that one debate where he said he’d got himself in a little box and instead of realizing how bad the box was, he just kept plowing.

Smith: Plus he was stubborn.

Ehlers: Stubbornness, too, perhaps. But he was a thoughtful guy and much, much brighter than his constituents realized and certainly much much brighter than the press corps realized. I found him to be very bright, very astute.

Smith: But it’s interesting, the curiosity factor strikes me. A subject that he didn’t know a lot about and he wanted to know more about it.

Ehlers: Right and it was very good, but it was also very practical and pragmatic. For example, I got a call from him one day. He said, “Vern, I don’t know what to do. We’ve got a bill coming up” on banning open pit mining for coal or something related to the mining of coal. And he said, “Vern, I have a telegram from Detroit Edison and they say if this bill passes, they’re going to increase the cost of electricity in Michigan by x percent.” It was a pretty sizeable percent. He said, “Is that really true or not?” and I said, “I don’t know anything about it, but I’ll see what I can find out.”

I knew it was a big controversy in Montana at the time, so I called some of the people involved in it in Montana and asked a bunch of questions. Pretty soon, I was talking to people all over the country about it. I put together a position paper for him and he appreciated that. But a lot of the questions were something that our committee couldn’t answer right off. We had to do some research. The one thing that happened that really gave me some insight into his character because, as you know, he didn’t use profanity, not unless he was really angry.

Smith: The worst thing was a “God damn it”. Penny (Circle) says once in a while you could tell this was going to be a “God damn it day,” but that was it.

Ehlers: At the end of one of our science meetings, we were all pretty curious about Watergate and what he knew and so forth. So, he told us what he knew. I think it was John Mitchell that he was angry at, but he made the comment about him, and then he got angry, just pounded the table. He said, “I was standing this far away from John Mitchell and he looked me right in the eye and he lied to me. That damn guy lied to me.” He was just so shook up that anyone would lie to him at that level of government. I think he was ready to kick Dick Nixon out right then.

Smith: That’s an admirable character trait that you just described, and yet there are people in this town who would say, “Well, how naïve can you be?”

Ehlers: Yes.

Smith: That’s the Boy Scout.

Ehlers: Yeah, he tended to believe people. If they told him something, that was it.

Smith: Did you ever debate the pardon with him or discuss it?

Ehlers: Yes and no. I never brought it up with him. He brought it up with me a few times and not just with me, sometimes it was a group of people. But he said repetitively he had absolutely no regrets about having given the pardon. He saw no other way of bringing the nation back together and getting on with business than to do that. And he told me very directly that he knew that very likely that would be the end of his presidency. Now, that may have been easier to say after the fact, but I really think he looked at that. I think what really bothered him a great deal was when terHorst resigned. They had a lot of respect for each other and I don’t quite know why terHorst resigned unless he was just peeved that Jerry did it without telling him, so he was totally unprepared when the media called.

Smith: Well, Ford’s explanation was, first of all, he didn’t want to put terHorst in a position where he was lying to the press by denying it before it happened and he certainly didn’t want people to know about it before it happened. Mel Laird, characteristically, talks about how he had a plan - he was going to bring a bipartisan delegation from both Houses down to the White House to ask the President to do this. The problem with that is, given the supercharged political climate of that time, could you really have floated a trial balloon without it being shot down?

Ehlers: No.

Smith: I once spent two and a half hours in a hotel in Grand Rapids war-gaming it with the President. I went in a skeptic and I came out convinced that really there wasn’t another way to do it. There’s no easy way. There’s no politically safe way to do it. And the other side of this story, of course, because it never happened is, what would it have been like for the Ford presidency had he not pardoned Nixon and the country for the next two and a half years had remained preoccupied by Richard Nixon’s legal status? I mean, you can say that it cost him the presidency. It probably did. But if he hadn’t done it, it might have also have cost the presidency.

Ehlers: Yes, you’re right. I think the only thing he could’ve done which might’ve put a better cast on it entirely would be to announce it and at the same time announce he was not going to run for reelection. But that might also not be the best thing for the country by the time the election came around. Who would know who would be running, et cetera.

Smith: He always remained a true fiscal conservative.

Ehlers: Yes, except where his allowance was concerned.

Smith: The exclusive trade union, as Herbert Hoover once called it, of former presidents - whenever they needed anything, they went to Jerry because Jerry had friends.
Ehlers: The funny thing is, as time went on and his friends disappeared, he called me more often when they were in danger of losing or having a reduction in the funds allocated for Presidential retirees. One time he called me, and he was very concerned, “I may have to let two people go in my office,” he says. “I can manage okay but 100,000 people a year will write wanting a letter from me and they won’t get a response.” He said, “You do what you want, but that’s the fact.”

Smith: Once you were in Congress, when you got together, what sort of things did you talk about? Was it current events? He made a real effort to stay very much on top of things, to be as contemporary as possible.

Ehlers: The statue looks spectacular. The pictures are wonderful.

Ehlers: It’s very good.

Smith: I can’t imagine any honor that would’ve pleased him more than that. He really regarded this as his home.

Ehlers: Not Released

Smith: Not Released
Smith: You were also instrumental, I believe, in seeing that the Congressional Gold Medal went to both the Fords.

Ehlers: Yes, that was my own project out of necessity because you need, I think, two-thirds of the members of the House to personally sign the bill, and I couldn’t just contact their office and have someone fake a signature. They had to personally sign it. Then I had to personally go around and ask for their signature. That’s just the way it is. They just don’t want people willy-nilly giving away gold medals, although, lately I don’t think the standards have been as high. But I remember very clearly the little buttons that said “Vote for Betty’s Husband” and I said, “There’s no way I’m going to leave Betty out.” There’s been some criticism of me for that.

Smith: Really?

Ehlers: Yes.

Smith: Of including the two of them?

Ehlers: Yes, because we’ve never done that for a president’s wife before. This sort of thing.

Smith: People have forgotten a lot of history.

Ehlers: I just said, “That’s the way it’s going to be.” And I got the signatures and we did it.

Smith: It was a wonderful event, a great event.

Ehlers: Yeah, it was. Thanks, especially, for the speech you wrote for me. I think that’s the only time I’ve ever used a speech someone else had written.

Smith: I’m glad it went well.

Ehlers: It was very good and there are some tough critics around here. Remember Hal Rogers, who likes to play the role of the grumpy southerner? He came up to me afterwards and said, “Vern, I never thought that you had it in you. That was a superb ceremony and an absolutely superb speech.” And I said, “I wish I could take credit for it. It’s the first speech in my life I’ve ever read.”
Smith: Well, you did a great job. Everyone did. It was nice of President Clinton to be there. Again, like the funeral later on, sometimes the official trappings can almost drown out the personal element. There, it was the opposite. I mean, it was a grand setting and a great occasion of state, but it felt like a family event.

Ehlers: Yes, and everyone loved Jerry. I recall several years after that, he came around, and I think it was his last visit to the Capitol. I got word, I don’t even remember how I got it, but with about ten minutes warning that Jerry wants to walk across the floor of the House. That’s where he started. So, I said, “Okay, I’ll meet him in the cloak room and I’ll take him around.” So, he showed up. He first had to kiss Helen, who ran the little food concession and have a picture taken with her. I think it’s still hanging there. I was asked to try to get him through quickly, so I brought him through the cloak room to the floor of the House, and the word had spread a little bit that Jerry might be coming in, but then someone spotted him and started applauding. That’s the first time I’ve ever seen the floor of the House stop business totally for

Not Released

Smith: I assume he saw as many Democrats as Republicans.

Ehlers: Yes. It was a great time and they all just applauded until he walked out the other side of the chamber. Continuous applause and, actually, it’s one of the few times I’ve seen members of Congress fighting to get in line to shake someone’s hand.

Smith: That’s great. Was that the last time you saw him?

Ehlers: No, I saw him in Michigan a few times after that, but I think that was his last visit to Washington. Then, I found out interesting things, too. Todd Plaats came over to me, he’s a Representative from Pennsylvania, a young man, good guy, he came up to me and said, “Vern, thanks so much for bringing him here. Do you realize Jerry Ford is my hero? I wouldn’t be in Congress if it weren’t for Jerry Ford.” I said, “How’d that happen?” He said, “Well, when he ran for president, we had a teacher who wanted us to be interested in the election, so he let us pick our candidates and then he would choose someone to be the candidate and then others to work on the campaign. I was Jerry Ford’s campaign manager in my 7th grade class. Boy, I worked so hard on that and I was so brokenhearted when he lost, but he’s been a hero to me.”
So, the next week I went home (I go home every weekend), and I went to the Ford Museum and bought one of those blankets they have that said Gerald Ford and brought it back and gave it to Todd. He was crying when he originally told me about his grade school Ford campaign, and when I gave gave him the blanket he started crying again and said, “Vern, this means so much to me.” It’s still hanging in his office.

Smith: That’s great. You know, people get so cynical about this place and they assume everyone in it is cynical.

Ehlers: Actually the level of cynicism here is very low. It’s certainly lower than the public at large. And it’s not a good old boys club, either, anymore. I think it used to be.

Smith: I know he was appalled at campaign spending, what it cost to run for office.
Did you and he ever have that conversation?

Ehlers: No, not really. I was aware of his feelings. I think he was upset about various things. Upset is not really the right word, but a little bit concerned. When I was elected, he talked to me and I still remember clearly one of the things he asked because I wasn’t sure what he meant. He said, “Vern, where are you going to live?” And I said, “We’ve got a nice house here. We’ll continue living in this house.” He shook his head and said, “When I was elected, we backed a moving van up to the house, loaded up everything we owned, drove to Washington, bought a house and lived there. I only came home twice a year at first, for the August recess and the Christmas recess.” He said, “It’s so different now.” I said, “Yes, I get to come home every weekend.” And I’ve used that story many times in speeches because I’m constantly asked about the civility or lack of civility and I used to say, “Some of our lack of civility is because we never are together on weekends, because almost all of the Members go home on weekends. At the state level, it’s because of the freeway system so everyone drives home. Same in the state legislature. In Washington, it’s because of the jet airplane.”

Smith: Absolutely. Alan Greenspan told us the same thing. We asked him once about what had contributed to the problem and he volunteered that the leading cause was the jet plane.

Ehlers: In fact, I have constituents who’ve been angry at me because I won’t come home on a Wednesday night to give a speech. And I said, “I’m sorry, I come home every weekend. I’d be happy to give a speech then, but during the week, I’m supposed to be in Washington voting.” “Oh, they won’t care if you miss one bill!” But the people do mind!

Smith: You’ve spoiled your constituents.

Ehlers: Right.

Smith: I think you were the one who told the story, a wonderful story…the first day when President Ford began living in the White House, as opposed to being out there in Alexandria where he lived and commuted to DC, he went up to the door of the West Wing and there was a Marine there who saluted. And the President sticks his hand out and says, “Hi, I’m Jerry Ford. I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?” Again, that’s the Congressman, isn’t it?

Ehlers: Yes, and I did tell you that story. The person I got it from is no longer alive, so we have to trust my memory.

Smith: I trust you.

Ehlers: But it was Maury De Jonge from the Grand Rapids Press and Maury was in his glory, of course, because he always had a close relationship with Jerry and always treated them well, too, which is another factor. So, Maury got invited to all the events when Ford took over. And Maury was walking behind Jerry Ford when that happened. The real coup de gras, maybe you didn’t hear of this, was when Maury went and talked to the Marine afterwards and said, “What did you think of that?” He said, “I thought that was great. I’ve been standing here and opening the door for the President for over a year and President Nixon never even once looked at me.” Maury made a little story of what a difference that was between Nixon and Ford.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of public reaction when he passed away? He’d been out of the public eye for a while.

Ehlers: No, by then, I think the general public had put in perspective his pardoning of Nixon. And I think they had recognized, not as totally as you and I have, but recognized that it really was for the good of the country. They didn’t quite believe that Ford did it knowing that it would likely cost him the presidency. Ford had said it often enough. Who’s the old guy on NPR?

Smith: Daniel Shorr.

Ehlers: Last question - I realize it’s totally speculative. The way the party has changed, could Jerry Ford get nominated in the Republican primary in West Michigan today?

Ehlers: Yes, easily. I think what he stood for is still what most of the people in West Michigan stand for. It’s what I stand for and I’ve gotten elected quite handily close to ten times. I get compared to Jerry quite a bit, not so much back home, but around here I do.

Smith: Really?

Ehlers: Yes.

Smith: And I’m sure it’s a complimentary reference.
Ehlers: Yeah, and not so much in the way that I could be president or anything like that. It’s just that what I stand for is what Jerry stood for. Honesty, integrity, not being willing to play the games that get played around here. People still remember that about Jerry. Some of them almost implied that I act the way I do because I’m trying to imitate Jerry.

Smith: Maybe that tells you something about West Michigan.

Ehlers: Yes. Well, it’s the values of West Michigan and it’s a great place to live. I was very proud to represent them and I’d be very happy to represent them for another twenty years. A different story. This may sound funny to you, but when I got to the State House and I saw some of these old men doddering around and being generally fairly useless in the legislative process, they were the old timers. They knew all the good stories and so forth, but just not making contributions anymore. I remember saying, “Lord, please give me the wisdom to quit before I get that way.” Now, that was at the State House and then I found the same thing at the state Senate and also here. People staying too long. I may have quit too early. I don’t know. From that standpoint, I think I easily could’ve gone another two or four years and still been very productive.

Smith: I suppose, in retrospect, is it better to quit too early than too late?

Ehlers: Not Released

Smith: Will you miss it?

Ehlers: Yes, I will miss being at the center of action. I will miss being able to say, “I think we should do this” and start working towards that. Now, I still have that opportunity because I’ve been approached by enough organizations and people who want me to continue doing things like that, but I also don’t want to be a hanger-on and I don’t want to be a lobbyist. In fact, a reporter, when I announced that I was not running again, said, “Are you going to be a lobbyist?” I said, “Nope. Well, let me correct that. I may be a lobbyist, but I won’t charge anything for it.”

Smith: That’s a novel approach.

Ehlers: I said, “It may be a little hard for me to keep my mouth shut when things need to be said and I’m not above talking to colleagues about what I think they should do, but I don’t want to get paid for it.”

Smith: This has been wonderful. I can’t thank you enough.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this.

I have to ask you, what does it mean to be back in this room?

Hoffman: Well, I’ve been a frequent visitor with the president in this room for going back since it was built. I know it’s nostalgic in some ways but it’s common to me. I know right before he died, I had a long visit with him here.

Smith: Did you?

Hoffman: Yeah, so I’m familiar with [it] and we’re old friends of both Betty and President Ford going back a lot of years. Forty years.

Smith: Well, that’s the perfect place then to go. When did you first become acquainted?

Hoffman: It was back when he was minority leader. In fact, maybe even before that when he was in the Congress. But I was appointed by President Nixon before his Watergate times to sit on a businessmen’s panel to examine ways in which the government could use normal business techniques to improve the way in which the government was run. I was on that for about two years. I was running a company here in Los Angeles, the Flying Tiger line and Tiger International. I ran into and had business with President Ford, or at that time, Congressman Ford on and off very casually. From then, we had a home in Eldorado Country Club, just a weekend thing for us.

One day, Leon Parma, whom you’ve talked to - I had dinner with him and his wife last night at the theater - Leon called me one day, this was probably 1971 maybe ’70, and said, “Jerry Ford’s coming in and wants to play a little golf and I wondered whether he could use your home.” I said, “Fine” because he knew we didn’t stay there except to come in and out over the weekends and so on. So they came two or three times, usually over Easter, and would stay in our home. And we got to know Betty and the president before he got involved with all the things that followed.

Smith: What was your impression of them then?

Hoffman: I got to know them well enough to know that his reputation, particularly talking about him, was exactly honest and a wonderful person to negotiate with. Totally trustful and considerate. They both proved to be that throughout their life. And, of course, after he retired and moved here, we had a home here and have one now. We’re Vintage Country Club now, which is our principal home, but we live half of the year in Del Mar when it gets hot. But anyway, we then had a much closer relationship that expanded. And we got to know Betty well because I was on the board of the Eisenhower Hospital for many years and she was also on the board. So, I gained knowledge and experience with her in what I call her business capacity.

Smith: What kind of business woman was she?

Hoffman: She was, of course, the founder of the Betty Ford Center and very interested in it given her own experience. She was the chairman and founder and she actually ran that thing, not day to day, but she was the chairman of the board and she saw that they had the proper people working and building the things she wanted done.

Smith: She was hands-on?

Hoffman: She was hands-on, very much so. And, also, I enjoyed learning so much about her instinctive abilities in the business area.

Smith: And this was all new for her now, wasn’t it?

Hoffman: Well, it was brand new. It was an idea that was brought on by her own problems, in her case, with alcohol.

Smith: Where you aware of this, by the way? When you knew them earlier, was that something you were aware of?

Hoffman: We were not aware of that at all until the papers started reporting on this and so on. Early on, we didn’t, and as I got to know her, we never discussed anything but the business side of her operation, but I knew the history of it. I’d come to the conclusion that Betty was sensitive to unfair criticism of President Ford as he was moving into this maelstrom of Watergate. I think she was always a lady and always very pleasant and also worrying to do the missions and the work that the First Lady needs to do. But you couldn’t help but see, when you got to know her, how the pressure was affecting her. And so, when Watergate was over and the president’s term in Washington was over, Leonard Firestone had this piece of property here and he fixed it up so that they could build a home here.

So, when she did that, I don’t know when the decision to start the Betty Ford Center actually emerged, but I know the whole family was involved in sitting her down, as her book said, and saying, “Mother and Jerry, you’ve got to face the problem that you have here.” And they were the ones that got her started in her own treatment. I’m a great admirer of her, my wife and I are friends going back and she’s one of the strengths that the president had through his difficult journey during difficult times, and that followed on until the day he died. And I know that the president’s death has affected Betty in ways that you would normally expect, but much more so because they were very, very close.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that because a lot of people didn’t realize that. And when he died and people saw Mrs. Ford, it was impossible not to be moved by the fact that she wasn’t well herself at the time, and yet she was resolved to go through that whole punishing week-long ordeal, in front of cameras, no privacy. Toward the end, remember she got out of the wheelchair and she walked all the way down to the gravesite. Someone expressed their admiration to her and she said, “Well, that’s what my husband would have wanted.”

Hoffman: Yes.

Smith: They were incredibly close, weren’t they?

Hoffman: They were, and for the public and the United States, this was a very educational experience to see all this happen on the television because his reputation will increase as they get more and more into it. The thing that the president regretted so much was that he was not elected. Not because of any personal feeling that he deserved it, but that he had learned so much and he had gotten into so much that was important and he wanted to finish it. And that would’ve cemented in the minds of many of the scholars in later years their assessment of his presidency, because he had that kind of personality we needed at that time, whereas, for example, President Carter did not. And the whole country had changed.

Smith: And yet, of course, they became good friends.

Hoffman: They became good friends. Jerry was the kind of person that could set aside any, what he called ‘minor things’ and think in terms of people and what they’re trying to accomplish in life. It’s all of the ex-presidents who are alive and I can’t tell you how many congressmen and so on, there was never a bad word about the president, President Ford. And that makes him very unique, because in politics, as we saw in the last campaign, a lot of hatred comes to the front amongst the voters and everything else, but that never was the case with President Ford. I’m not sure he ever really understood how much people appreciated him. One of the reasons is, his roots were in pre-World War II and he knew and understood a lot of the important things that were happening in the Cold War. And then Ford was able to take us up to the point that he could eventually resolve all these very strong, dangerous, and common arguments that existed between the Soviet Union and the United States. He had a tremendous experience.

He was a great football player. In fact, as you know, the history of that at University of Michigan, which was very much sports oriented. And then he went to Yale, was a coach there and sort of worked his way through on scholarships and graduated from their law school. He was in World War II early and was on a Jeep carrier that almost sank in a horrible storm during some battles around the Philippines, and his vessel almost sank. There was a huge fire on the vessel and the captain was a young sort of Reserve-type captain. This wasn’t the real Navy, this were the guys that were running these additional ships that were built and thrown into the battle. But they did marvelous, marvelous work. There’s a book out on this as you’re familiar with, and a recent book that President Ford had suggested not be published until he died and other such information has broadened out the public’s knowledge of what kind of a great human being he was. And then the open way in which Betty and he treated her own problems. You know President Ford liked to have a drink and he smoked a pipe and things like that and he stopped doing any drinking at all in support of his wife and so on.

Smith: Did he reminisce about the war? Did he talk much about it?

Hoffman: He never talked about it. He talked to me about it. Before I read this book on Halsey that had a whole important paragraph about President Ford in it, I didn’t realize other than sketchy that he was a Reserve officer and was in early and so on. But it turns out that he was very close to being killed or dying in that battle, very close. In fact, he was trying to put out the fire in a huge storm and he’d slid off the carrier deck and was hanging by his hands in a huge storm on the side of the vessel trying to get back on board. If he’d gone into the water, it’d have been goodbye.

But he and I and Laura, my wife, and Betty were at the local restaurant here with Leon Parma and Barbara, just the six of us, going back as I’m describing and somebody, I think Leon said, “You know, I’ve often wondered how we were able to put sixteen million people under arms.” And suddenly, in fact just before the attack on Pearl Harbor, we had an army that was the seventeenth largest army in the world, 117 thousand people or something like that, 170 thousand. And yet when we built all those ships and created all those divisions and so on, the greatest number of junior and mid-rank officers were just right out of civilian life and so on. Some went to ROTC, as I did, and went off to get trained. But the interesting thing is that we did and as rapidly as we did, you know, building fifty thousand airplanes a year and getting people to know how to fly them, these complicated big airplanes and fighter planes and bombers and so on. And people, some of them late teenagers and so on.

So at this dinner over in town here, Leon said, “You know, I’ve often wondered how we got sixteen million people suddenly brought into the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Air Corps and all that – how they got trained, how they learned to do what they did,” talking to me and to the president. And I said, “Well, I’ll give you a fast answer. A lot of the training was very superficial and a lot of the knowledge that was gained to lead to our later success was on-the-job training. And, you know, it sounds like you’re making a joke, but this is true.” And that’s the first time the president began to talk about his days on the Jeep carrier. And he told a story about how they were on a Jeep carrier, it was a carrier that was a converted older naval vessel, usually a large one, and they converted them to small and therefore called them Jeep carriers and they could carry about half of the airplanes of the big carriers, but nevertheless there they were.

There were a lot of them out there and we were building them. And as we went along, we had a huge naval collection of modern carriers as well as these Jeep carriers. The Japanese and Germans began to suffer because we had command of the world’s oceans along with the British and so on. But, [about] the on-the-job training, the president at this dinner said, “Well, I want to tell you a little story. We were on board and I happened to be up in the wheelhouse with my captain who was a young guy,” maybe three years older than Jerry and Jerry had handled all the sports efforts on the vessel and all the crews. He had other relationships with the crews, but he got to be the number three officer as I recall that they had on this Jeep carrier. And they got a call on the radio from a cruiser that said, “We’re dead in the water. We’ve got to get towed out of here.”

It turned out that it was a cruiser and the Japs didn’t have any cruisers, but they had a lot of destroyers, much smaller guns with less range. But by continuously charging at this cruiser, they had damaged it as they say ‘Dead in the water.’ It was only a matter of time before the Japanese got in there and sank that vessel and there’d be a couple thousand men, eighteen hundred people, on that would just be in the water and so on. So anyway, he said they’re up in the bridge and they get a call that said, “Anyone in position close to get to us, please get out here and tow us out of here.” They looked and found they were close, so they kept on-the-job training and the captain said, “Well, I wonder what we’re supposed to do.” And President Ford said he said to him, “Hell, I don’t know. Can we tow a cruiser? Are we big enough to tow a cruiser?” And [there’s] a big storm going on. So the captain said, “Well, I don’t know. Anyway, let’s get going.”

So they took a heading and got close by. Then, embarrassingly, they had to get on the radio and the cruiser captain was very anxious and said, “Well, how do we do this?” meaning how do we hook up with this. “We’ll send a little boat out with the ropes and then you tie it up and you pull us out of here as fast as you can.” So, they did, they got them out of there and saved them. And, of course, when they got them with other vessels to protect them, they were able to do whatever they did.

I didn’t follow up on that story, but I thought that this is a powerful story that I’ve never seen in print. I know it’s true, every word of it and that they were all endangered and under fire as they did this work. And they’d never done it before and they didn’t know how to do it, how to actually get down there in the water and hook up and tow them out of there. And they were embarrassed to talk to the regular Navy captain of the vessel who said, “Tie a line to us and get us out of here!”

Smith: It’s also good training, I suppose, for on-the-job training as president.

Hoffman: Yes, but you know, the side thing we said here talking time and again about military things and so on is that he had this background and he never raised any issue alluding to bravery or anything like that and he never gave the public an understanding of how much he really knew, how much he’d learned as a young man before he got into Congress.

Smith: That’s interesting. Tell me about his mind, his intelligence.

Hoffman: Well, President Ford had great judgment. His brain worked at a very high level on matters involving judgment. And you know the brain has hundreds of different areas and it’s an amazing thing the human brain, but he had this ability. And there’s more to intelligence than what’s your score on an IQ or you’re brilliant enough to go to Harvard at eleven and all that. But this is different.
Smith: Plus, often, glibness, verbal facility is equated with IQ whereas they may not be related.

Hoffman: And a lot of people didn’t realize, the political tactics were to make fun of him. There were pieces in the paper about how he stumbled and he’s clumsy. Actually, he was the best athlete we’ve ever had in the presidency.

Smith: Did that perception that some people had bother him, you think?

Hoffman: He was very sensitive, as Betty was, to unfair criticism, but he never reacted the way people did, the way you or I or somebody else might do. He was able to evaluate what was happening, what people were saying and minimizing conflict. One of the reasons he was so successful as minority leader was that he could work with both sides of the aisle. And he had friends and I knew some of them, the majority leader in the House and so on, that used to come out here and play golf with him and they were very close. It was on that level, those kinds of people. Yeah, I think, to answer your question directly, he was sensitive to this.

Smith: Do you think it bothered her even more?

Hoffman: Well, I can’t evaluate that, whether it was more or less, but I know it bothered her. It always bothers, I think, the First Lady more than it does the person being ridiculed and criticized and so on because their loyalties are what they are and they can’t respond.

Smith: Did you see them while they were in the White House?

Hoffman: Yes, yes. Just as an example of that, a lot of years ago now – I’m eighty-five years old. When I was fifty-three years old, I had a heart bypass and they weren’t all that common in those days and it was something that’d come up fairly quickly. I was chairman of my company and before that had been the number two man as a very young person of the Vanderbilt companies in New York and so on. And had a lot of early experience in business and so forth and Jerry and Betty would come visit us in our home and play golf and I’d set up games with him with Bob Hope and people like that. They really enjoyed it, usually over Easter, but his attitude was always sound, and he didn’t change. You knew what you saw was what you got.

He wasn’t the best speaker in the world, except when you, as I did – I attended a meeting with the city council of one of the towns we have here and we were trying to get some dollar help for the theater. I was on the board and he was on the board, we used to sit together on the theater. Almost from the days it was built, they got involved through our association and later, when it was built and so on, Betty was interested and on the board of the hospital and he was sort of the person from the former White House who was more interested and asked to do more with the theater. And we had gone to the meeting of the city council and I was impressed.

He got up in the audience and there were a lot of controversy and we, the theater, were asking, “Look, the theater is in your area. It was built all with private money. We never asked for a dime, but isn’t it time, now that you have this wonderful facility – we’ve provided entertainment for children, we bring all this good entertainment for the members of your city and so on. It’s just time you came up and recognized we need money. We raise money every year, two million dollars every year. We go to the people that have the money and we say, ‘You know, we need two million dollars’ and after a while, you’re going year after year after year, you’re going often to the same people. When do we get some help from you people?”

There were people with signs saying don’t and blah-blah and were walking around. And he was standing there and in a quiet way – there were newspapers there and so on – and he sold them on the idea that politically, even if you don’t believe in this, you’d better start thinking of getting some money. And he got five million dollars from them, and since then we’re getting about ten million dollars or fifteen million dollars from people every year from the various little towns that benefit from having the theater. And this is what I call intelligence, judgmental skills, people skills, all of which he and Betty both were on a very high level and they didn’t pretend to be intellectuals. They didn’t masquerade in any way and they took the beating that they took when he stumbled and didn’t do well in a speech when he had to use it in the White House. So, in a long way of saying, yeah, this bothered him but again, he rose above it.

Smith: Did they tell you why they decided to move out here when they left Washington?

Hoffman: I think partly, maybe largely, it was because of these wonderful visits they were having here. The interesting thing was, when he got to be vice president, he called me and he said, “We can’t use your home.” We had a nice home. We had a separate pool house, and they could use four or five bedrooms, it’s not an elegant place, but just a nice place. They had a very good country club and they had a good golf course and so on and that’s what we were interested in, in those days. We were a lot younger and that was absolutely vital, but I got the surprise of my life when he said, “We can’t go to the Hoffman’s anymore.” And I said, “Why?” And he said, “Because we’ve been out there, we’ve sent our security people out there and we can’t set up the kind of security we want for the vice presidency, for the vice president and his wife.”

So I laughed and he laughed and it turned out the Annenberg’s have this beautiful place, have their own golf course, and some of our friends said, “The vice president would like to come out” and so when he got to be president he came out, always to the Annenberg’s. And their great friend and also a wonderful person was Firestone, Leonard Firestone, who had a home, it’s still there, but Leonard is dead and the Firestone’s don’t live in that particular home now, but they were there.

They were walking this piece of land, actually, so when he retired from the presidency, I think Leonard said, “What would you like to do?” They wanted to be in Vail or someplace near there and they wanted to be here and this was the way they wanted to make their life. And Leonard was very helpful and said, “We’ve got a piece of land right there, adjacent, bigger, it’s right off the fairways of the country club there. And here’s a piece of land. Go ahead and build a house on it and so on.” And then he helped them that time also at Vail. And then they fell in love with both places and, of course, they were here and then when the weather got hot, really hot, then they went to Vail. And, of course, they had children who would come and visit them and so on.

I got past the question you asked, but I had surgery on the very day that he lost the election. That’s on a Tuesday in November of 1976. This surgery was very difficult and is still difficult. You feel like a truck has rolled over you. I had this done at Good Samaritan Hospital in Los Angeles. And, about three days later I’m out of surgery and in my private room at the hospital and the nurse came running in bug-eyed. She said, “The White House is on the phone! The White House is on the phone!” You know, just in a state of panic.

Well, I had been on this White House committee and the White House telephone set-up included this large office building next to the White House and I get many calls from people, always the phone set-up said, “The White House speaking for Mr. Hoffman” and so on. You’d ask, “Who is it?” And some cabinet member or assistant or whatever would be on the phone. So I said, “Go back and find out who it is.” So, you know, she couldn’t believe it so she turns right around and she comes running back and she says, “It’s the president! It’s the president!”

I pick up the phone and he’s at the Oval Office. It’s nighttime. He’s already thinking in terms of, “Okay, I’ve lost the election.” He’s got his feet on the desk and he said, “How’re you doing?” And I said, “I’m doing fine, Mr. President. How’d you find out?” He said, “Well, I called your secretary. I’m coming out and I want to set up a golf game”, which we did that way. And I said, “How’re you feeling? How’re you doing?” And he said, “Well, I’m feeling awful, but I’m through with this. And, by the way, what happened to you? How are you doing?” Of course, I knew from reading the papers. And, again, in his own way, as I remarked to my wife, his comment was, “Well, you know, we were running behind and we almost overtook.” He said, “Four votes and I would’ve been in the White House.” Never a word of censure or criticism about the bitter campaign or anything like that. The person that he resented the most throughout this thing and I think he felt he lost the presidency because there was the interference he got from our president, the movie star.

Smith: Ronald Reagan.

Hoffman: Reagan. When he first tried to gain the nomination and then they had a lot of interference and he was apparently very unhelpful as far as President Ford was concerned. And I remember sitting here about two years before he died and he had been telling this reporter that he had been getting over the years that the person that he really holds responsible and he just can’t have a warm place in his heart for is Ronald Reagan. And I sat there talking about that with him later and I said, “You know, this is the first time I’ve ever heard you criticize somebody.” And he said, “Yeah, I guess that’s right.” So, there were people, but the public didn’t know that.

Smith: I only heard him disparage two people and the worst thing he could think of to say about someone was, “He’s a bad man.” That was the worst epithet he could come up with. And one of them was John Dean and the other was Gordon Liddy. And you could understand where he was coming from.

Hoffman: Oh yeah, and those were people he didn’t trust. If anyone demonstrated that he was not honest and predictable and true to his word, then he got on the quiet list, but he didn’t talk about it. He didn’t go out of his way to criticize people, but yeah, he had what you and I and normal people would say are enemies were people that he didn’t like or didn’t like him, but you didn’t know it. And over time he got out of it.

I tell this little anecdote. They were heading for the Anwar…

Smith: …the Sadat funeral.

Hoffman: The Sadat funeral. And there were four ex-presidents going and President Carter was sitting next to him. And then we all got, his close friends got this photo of all these ex-presidents together that are alive and so on. And he called me and he said, “I want to give you something.” And he gave me this and I said, “How’d your trip go?” And he said, “You know, I sat with Carter,” they were in a military airplane, and he said, “I can not, I can not get to like him.” It was that light of a comment and I was surprised he was making this effort successfully. That of all the people, ex-presidents, that I would expect to hear make the kind of wonderful speech that Carter made, Carter that would be very low on that list. But he had worked to get over that. This man was not an enemy. He was somebody he didn’t like, but…

Smith:Yeah, but they became good friends, didn’t they, over the years?

Hoffman:Well, not really friends. Not really friends, but not enemies.

You know, I didn’t mention this, but in 1980, this was after he had settled down and had his home built here and so on, I said, “You know,” and it was in this office, I said, “I’d like to ask you if you’d like to join my board.” It was by that time, we were a large Flying Tiger line and we flew over all the oceans, had the best route structure for cargo in the world and we had a number of companies. The holding company was our company that had the outside directors. And I said, “One of the reasons I’m asking you – I want to be honest – is that you had experience that’s important to us in evaluating certain situations. Everything we do turns political. We’re always looking for routes. We’re handling a lot of government business and so on. And, if you accept, we’d like to be able to use you on the QT as a consultant. We’ll publish that that’s what you are, but we won’t go into the details.” So I said, “Think about this.” He was then doing a little of this. And he called me back and he said, “Yeah, I’d love to do this.” And so we did. I retired in ’86, ’85 actually, but I continued to have an official title as chairman and so on. He stayed on the board until our people, including the board that he was on, sold that entire entity to FedEx. FedEx had no international routes at all. All their routes were domestic. Now they have the best route structure in the world and, today, believe it or not, bar none. We’re not talking passenger versus cargo, they’re the largest airline in the world and they make more money than anybody in the world.

Smith:Do you remember what you paid him as a director?

Hoffman:Well, what our directors’ fees were, when you look at what’s happening these days, that was before that insanity, but, you know, a director would get maybe fifty or sixty thousand dollars and we expected them to work. When they came to board meetings, they had read the data and so on. And then we paid them a figure for consulting, I think it was about fifty thousand dollars and we had a helicopter and so, to ease for him, we would bring a helicopter and land right over here and pick him up and land him on our office building in Century City. So, then, when the board meeting was over, we’d fly him back in the helicopter, so we spent money on him that we didn’t do for the other directors. But to give you an example of some of the things that he did, he was very obviously well-read up on everything and he didn’t make questions that are more speechifying to the other guys on the board or anything like that. He asked questions that made sense and you had to give him answers that made sense. He was a good director and everybody got to know his quality.

One time, we were sitting in the boardroom for our board meeting in Century City and my secretary came in and said, “Mr. Hoffman, Mexico is calling.” We had a division, not of the airline, but of a company that we owned in Mexico City. And I sort of wrinkled my brow and I said, “I’m in a board meeting. I don’t take telephone calls.” She said, “Well, you’d better take this one.” So, I knew this was something so I told the board, “I’ve got a phone call I normally wouldn’t take, but I’ve got to figure out what it is.”

He said, “The president,” it was a young guy by the name of Spencer, they were calling from our company, he said, “He’s disappeared and some bystander saw him. He was driving down la Forma(?), going home from the office, and a couple men jumped out with shotguns in front of the car and stopped the car, dragged him out of the car, and he’s gone. We don’t know where he is.” And so I said, “Have you talked to the police?” And he said, “Yes.” But, you know that may be the last people you want to talk to and so on. So I could see we had a complex problem, but I said, “What do you mean you don’t know where he is?” He said, “Literally, we don’t know where he is. We haven’t been able to talk to him. Nobody will tell us where he is.” So I went back to the boardroom and I said, “Jerry, you’re a consultant and I’ve got something I want you to work on for me.” So, he said, “What’s that?” I told him the story and he said, “Well, listen. When we’re through with the board meeting here, let me get a hold of the Attorney General of the state of Mexico. He’s a man I know well. He and I get along well. He speaks good English” and so on and so forth.

So at the end of the meeting, he called him and he came in after his call and he said, “Well, here’s what he said to do. He wasn’t aware of the situation, but he said that he would find out where he is and get back to us.” And on the QT, this is the retired president of the United States of America. And that’s exactly what we needed to know. So, anyway, shortly, he called and came back here and he said, “I heard from him and he’s in a prison in a huge ward with eight rapists and bank robbers and murderers and one guy in there is a captain and he’s the guy that protects everything. You know, you have to give him handouts” and so on. So I said, “What’d they charge him with?” He said, “Apparently there’s a business dispute that’s resulted in litigation.” And, unlike our situation, of course, Spencer, our president had spent many years in Mexico, he knew Mexico well, we didn’t know Mexico that well.

But he said, “I’m going to give you some advice. I know the judge that this matter will be brought [before].” And this is outside Mexico City, somewhere far away. “And I’ll talk to the judge and he will set a bail session for your man. When he does, you pay the bail and then skip bail, go back to the United States and then this situation will be handled. You can handle it from there on.” So, this is what we did. Here’s a young man with a young wife, got four kids and so on and he had a home there and had been living there for years. So, that was one example of the efficiency with which he could get something done. We didn’t call him in and say, “We’d like to consult with you on we’re trying to get into Russia.” We didn’t get into anything that was political or which we could handle better than to bring him in. But he was there and knew it to help us and wanted to help us where his unique insight and contacts and so on in a proper way. Don’t ever go to him and try to beat somebody else out of a flight pattern or bilateral decision as to who gets a route. That’s not what he wants to do and he won’t do that.

Smith: Where did he come by this range of contacts?

Hoffman: Well, as the president, this would be not at all uncommon for him to go down and visit and meet these people. Certain people would seek him out and he’d seek them out. He’s a lawyer and highly regarded. He’s president of the United States, so knowing the Attorney General was just happenstance that worked in our favor. Otherwise, as you know, this country is not governed by the kind of laws that we are.

Smith: I just want to ask you to step back a bit because the president took some criticism for being on boards, was part of a larger criticism directed at the so-called commercializing of the presidency. What’s your reaction to that?

Hoffman: Well, again, if everybody were Jerry Ford, you probably wouldn’t have that criticism. Now days, I can’t believe how much money President Clinton has made where his wife had twenty-one million in her bank account she could throw into a campaign. Jerry never did that. He did things that he would enjoy, would keep his mind active and so forth. But I think there’s good reason to be careful that there’s some oversight here, because this can be abused and this present situation we’re in now, which is a very serious situation, won’t be over very fast. We’ll make some corrections in some of this huge money that flies around.

But I’ll give you another example of his activity in the business world. The government owns an entity called Aerospace Corp. And that was a company that had six thousand people working for them, half of whom were Ph.D. and master’s degree levels in various sciences and so on. They were involved in top secret work in launches and so forth of satellites, and other such things the government was involved in. They had a board of about twenty-one people that was made up of four or five business men, and then they had people from the academic world, usually, and they had people from the military, four-star generals and whatever, and naval officers. Bob Gates who was on the board and people like that.

I was on the board in point of, not age, but in point of service. I wound up when I retired as the senior director in the company, so I was involved as a business man and so on. Every year, we would lose people from our board and we wanted to have good people. They had to be conscious of security. They had to be able to pass the security tests and so forth, and they had to be the kind of people you could trust and so on. This was very, very high level stuff. For example, when Powers was shot down, the government - I can tell you this, there’s a lot of stuff I was involved in that is still classified – but one of the things we were working on that’s been declassified was launching satellites that would operate in stationary orbit over certain places, and it eliminated the need for flying these missions across. We had satellites that you couldn’t shoot down, and the various people that these were being used to obtain information from it didn’t have the capability to shoot them down, didn’t have the capability to build these kinds of things and so on.

So anyway, we had a number of security clearances and all the board had to have security clearances and so on. Every year we were looking for somebody, and somebody said, “You know, we need some people from the government,” which was part of the group. And I said, “As I sit here, let me ask you a question? What about President Ford?” now retired. And they said, “Well, what about him?” I said, “Well, he might be interested.” And, of course, they thought that was a great idea. And so I came here and I said, “Would you like to do this?” He could get paid a modest director’s fee and that was it. But you sat in on meetings, very important meetings, and so on and so forth.

A little bit amusing anecdote. He joined the board, and I’ve got a picture of him here, you don’t need to see it, that has him on the board. You see he’s in the picture and all of our directors. We had a couple of meetings and we got into a meeting where they were going to discuss a codename clearance. A lot of people think ‘top secret’ is the highest, but that isn’t the way it works. They have “on a need-to-know basis,” they have all kinds of different levels and they only bring in “in codename clearances,” if, for example, you might have six people on that under a codename and that’s all they needed and wanted. It goes on under the correct analytical conclusion that the more people that know about it, the less secret these things become.

So we’re sitting in a board meeting and we get to the agenda and the chairman turned around and he said, “Do you have the codename clearance?” The president said, “No.” He said, “Well, we’ll have to ask you to leave the room.” Along with him, of the twenty-one, sixteen of them left the room.
There were a number of us that had code clearance. And he left the room cheerful enough, came back in ten, fifteen minutes, back on schedule, and I said, “You know, I was amazed to learn that you wouldn’t be admissible to any kind of discussion.” “No,” he said, “a lot of things we were not involved in, did not want to be involved in, didn’t want to carry around, certainly didn’t want your secretary involved in and so on. No, I understand this and I understand the theory behind this very well.” I said, “We can get you code,” because one of the things we were talking about was a satellite that we had approved for launch in zero-sync orbit over Russia. We were able to read license plates on parking lots. We were able to interdict phone calls and so on. It was unbelievable what we were able to do with these things. We had a whole bunch of problems, like problems with Kaddafi and so on and we were involved in a lot of things that we knew that we, the United States, knew about. We were able to send the entire Sixth Fleet somewhere and nobody knew, the public, “What’s the fleet doing there with battleships and carriers?” and blah, blah, blah. “Don’t know.” Well, we knew and so on.

In fact, we had to get clearance if we ever went abroad. Laura and I hadn’t been to China, we didn’t operate in China as an airline. We had routes there, but we never operated there. The government didn’t want us and we didn’t want them. But anyway, we were going to go to China. So I reported to them and they called me back and said, “It’s not cleared.” And I said, “What do you mean it’s not?” I thought, “What do you mean it’s not cleared?” I said, “My wife and I are going to China. Why would you say something like that?” And he said, “Well, I don’t want to go into that.” And I said, “Well,…” And he said, “Fine. How are you on having your fingernails pulled out?” I said, “What do you mean by that?” He said, “Just what I said: How would you handle that kind of thing?” And I said, “Okay, I won’t go to China.” Because they didn’t know what I knew, but they knew that I knew it. And you just couldn’t risk it because you could just disappear and never be found and that kind of thing. But before you disappeared, they would’ve found out what it was they wanted to know.

So, he was on that board for only about two or three years because we kept rotating the board. He was a wonderful board member there. He could pick up on things that he had been involved in. You remember that Vietnam ship that – I won’t go into all these details, but he knew a lot about all of this stuff and whether he was in on code clearances or not was really ________. For example, we had Bob Gates on our board and he had clearances that were similar to the president’s if he needed to know, or had to know, but otherwise, he didn’t have it. We’d say to Gates, “Do you have this clearance?” “No.” “Goodbye. We’ll call ya.” At that time, he was head of CIA, so you know how those things worked. So this is an example of the things that he would do, got paid for, but that’s what he liked to do where he felt he was accomplishing something that was helpful to the country. He would attend meetings, and we would have parties, and we were going to cut ribbons and so on. He would show up at things. We gave him as few of those things as we could because we know he traveled around a lot.

Smith: He loved to travel, didn’t he?

Hoffman: Yeah, he did. And especially where he didn’t have – when you become a civilian later, after his presidency, you don’t always have government aircraft at your disposal. So, he didn’t like to travel in terms of enjoying the trip itself, but he liked going somewhere and seeing people.

Smith: Did he have a sense of humor?

Hoffman: Excellent sense of humor and you could tell him anything. You didn’t have to tailor a joke or a story with him. If he liked it, he liked it. If he didn’t, he didn’t. That kind of thing. But yeah, he had a very much alive sense of humor. So did Betty! I keep bringing her up because she’s so much a part of that team and she’s now ill. She’s here, actually, as you may know, but she’s getting to the point where she just doesn’t want to go out and isn’t able to do a lot of things. She’s ninety years old now.

Smith: I know she’s told one of her granddaughters, “You know, this getting old is not easy.”

Hoffman: And when you lose a spouse… I met a girl, my wife, when I was at the University of Illinois. We were nineteen years old. It was sort of love at first sight type of thing, but I was in ROTC and they were going to pull me out whenever they wanted to. I didn’t want to get married and then leave and have babies born back [here] and I didn’t want to do that. She didn’t either. But, we met September 24, 1942 and I got back just the end of ’45 and I was in the service until April of ’46. I went back to law school to finish law school. She came back and was teaching at the university. But in any event, we met sixty-six years ago, and I look at her now and, of course, we’re getting at an age and I look at her and I think, “What would I do without her?” So I gave her instructions when I woke up, I said, “I’ll make a deal with you, if you die before I do, I’m going to kill you. I don’t want to be left without you.” It would be very difficult.

Smith: Yeah, I think the Fords were inseparable. When you said ‘partnership,’ that’s absolutely right on. In later years, I think he almost felt some guilt about how, early in his career, he had been away as much as he had, had been on the road as much as he had, and really entrusted raising the kids to her. I think he went out of his way to try to compensate for that in the later years, both being here and with the kids, too.

Hoffman: Well, the other thing I think that bothered him was that there were a lot of things he couldn’t talk to her about.

Smith: Like what?

Hoffman: Well, anything that had any security rating, you couldn’t talk to your wife about. You couldn’t go home and say, “Gee, I had an interesting meeting at Aerospace Corp where we’ve got a satellite in geo-sync orbit over Russia.” You just couldn’t do it. So your wife felt sort of excluded from a lot of things that were important. Or she’d hear it on the television two weeks later and say, “Oh, that’s what you were doing.” “Yep.” So that was hard and then raising the kids. The children suffer badly. They’re lucky in that they’ve got a great group of children, but that’s one area that you don’t envy them at all. It’s not an easy job.

Smith: But it must be so fulfilling for her, for example, to know that Susan is taking over the Betty Ford Center.
Hoffman: Very much so. And Susan, like her mother, is a very sharp hands-on executive. Betty doesn’t go to any of the hospital meetings anymore and she had, when she was up and about, she had her meetings in her own offices there right on the campus of the hospital, but she doesn’t now. She brought Susan in at a time when she knew that physically she wasn’t able to get about as much as she used to.

Smith: In the last few years, when I mentioned travel, up around his ninetieth birthday, he was able to travel pretty extensively and then I guess his doctors pretty much prohibited it. And I wonder if a little bit of him died at that point, accepting those restrictions on your freedom. It’s something he’d enjoyed all his life. Those last few years, how would you describe his –

Hoffman: Well, I had an interesting life with him in a lot of ways. He’s a good athlete. He and I played golf when we were in our late thirties or forties. He was, you know, about a ten handicap, as I was. But he wouldn’t play much as we went along. He’d play in the Bob Hope Classic and things like that and so forth. And we played quite a bit. But then it got to the point where he really wasn’t able to play as much as he used to. And so we had, at the Vintage Country Club, and this is in this last book that was written he mentions it, so I know he enjoyed this. I called him up a couple of times and said, “You know, we have got a nine-hole group here.” And then we’d meet. In the men’s locker room, there’s a table that will fit about ten people and that’s all. You’re not out there where every time you try to take a fork full of something to eat, somebody comes up and says, “Remember when I met you back in 1918” or whatever they would say. So, he said, “Yeah, I’d like that.”

So we did this and we had a group of about ten or twelve people and we’d play two foursomes at least once a week. He really loved it because he enjoyed that and he enjoyed staying for lunch. Normally, if you played golf, he had the car there. He didn’t have lunch. He didn’t like the idea of everybody out in the dining room coming up and then he’d try to think through, “What’s their name? I know their name” and so on. Very difficult for him. But he always stayed for lunch for this.
So, one day, he called me, and a man named Tim Blixseth had built his own country club here called Porcupine, totally private, but it’s a professional layout – he’s got a long story on that. But anyway, he said, “Would you like to play nine holes?” I said, “Fine. Where?” He said, “Meet me at Porcupine.” It was a very hot and humid day, very, very uncomfortable. And I think he was then about eighty-nine. I had my cart set up. When he was playing with me, he liked to drive the cart. He could go where his ball was and he wanted to be the driver, so I set it up. It was just the two of us. And, of course, the golf course is entirely private so we’re the only two people, as it turned out, playing on the golf course.

So he shows up in his car with the Secret Service. And, by the way, Secret Service, I got used to dealing with them and after I get through with this story, I want to make some comments about that, that you don’t think of. But anyway, he shows up in the car and he gets out of the car and he sort of stumbles and he doesn’t look good to me at all. So I said, “Well, how are you doing?” He said, “Well, I’m doing fine.” And I said, “What do you mean ‘well’?” He said, “Well, I was swimming this morning,” as he did every morning, laps, and he said, “When I got up out of the pool, I got a little dizzy.” And I knew that he had doctors at Eisenhower and I was on their board and so on. And so, I said, “It’s hotter than Hell. You want to cancel?” “No,” he said, “let’s go.” So we get out there and we hit off on the first tee and so on. And, second tee, he’s going toward the green and he stumbled and he’s on his knee.

The Secret Service are there and so I didn’t want to hurt his feelings, so I said, to him, “Do you want to continue? It’s hotter than Hell and I don’t think we’re going to do nine holes because I don’t feel up to nine holes. What about you?” He said, “Well, let’s play another hole.” We played another hole and then I got a hold of one of the Secret Service guys that I knew and I said, “Call the doctor. Do you have his doctor’s number?” “Yep.” “Call his doctor. Don’t call Betty because there’s nothing she can do at this stage. Just call the doctor. Tell her you’re on your way.”
And so he went there and I later called him at home to talk to Betty to see how he’s doing and she said, “He’s here. You want to talk to him?” So it was one of those things, it was really caused by some medicine he was taking and so forth. But the press carried this story. All over the world, there were stories that the president… I could tell then that they were on a death watch, so to speak.

Smith: And did he know that, too?

Hoffman: Yeah, he knew that, but it was amazing how, first of all, the first person that gave this story was, whoever was called said that it was very hot and we think that this may have been heat exhaustion of some kind. And, of course, I knew what it was.

But he enjoyed those things and we played. I think that was the last effort at golf that he had and I was glad I was there because it could’ve been dangerous and so on.

But, talking about the Secret Service, early on, when he got to be vice president, we had him around. And Eisenhower used to come and he’d be playing on our golf course. He had a home there that he used and there’d be Secret Service guys behind the trees and so on. And when I first started dealing with that with President Ford, I said to him, “You know, we’re going to have some lunch. Now, what do we do about the Secret Service?” And he said, “I’m glad you brought that up. We never provide for the Secret Service. As far as we’re concerned, they can starve to death. We don’t care. We don’t think that they’re behind the tree.”

Well, we know they are out of your mind and particularly, when we’d have events at our house, we used to have them as guests, they’d show up as guests. Of course, Secret Service would be out a couple of hours before that. They’d look over everything in the house and so on and then they’d be there. And I knew them and they knew me, but we didn’t make any provisions. We didn’t tell them to have a drink or some food or anything like that. And that was the protocol. They took care of themselves and didn’t make a nuisance.
They had all their communications, they were there, they had the vehicle, and that’s where he got the benefits.

Smith: One sensed, just from some of the agents I’ve known, that they were fond of them both.

Hoffman: Yeah.

Smith: And I don’t think that’s universally the case.

Hoffman: No. Well, you know some business man made this statement that when talking about evaluating people for new employment, he said, “I always take the high-end candidate out to dinner, just the two of us. And when they’d say, ‘Where should we go?’ I’d say, ‘What’s your favorite? People that know you.’ ‘Fine. I’ll take care of it.’ ‘I’ll pick up the tab and so on, but you do that.’” And then he watched how he handled the wait staff. And he said, “You cannot believe the number of people that automatically went off the list because of the way they handled the people who were waiting on them.”

So I followed that advice, because there are people that become Dr. Jekyll and Hyde. They begin to want to throw their weight around, or whatever it is, and that’s not what you want out of a president or somebody who’s in the news and so on. And President Ford was, again, very – a bad meal, he never had. You know he did, but he never had a bad meal. And he was always polite and he always tried to remember their names.

We were at Jillian’s last night and June Trubee, she and her husband own the restaurant. His favorite place was Jillian’s to go to, so we used to eat there a lot. They had a fish that he loved and so on. Of course he knew everybody there. They were all very circumspect. You could go in there with the president alone or with six people, sit down there in the middle of the dining room, and nobody ever made a big deal because they saw a lot of him and so forth. But this was part of his character. You’d be surprised, or maybe not, how many very top people wouldn’t pass that test. Simple test.

Smith: You’re absolutely right. It’s an absolute litmus test of character, how you treat people “above” or “below” you on whatever scale you set up.
Describe for me this place, this whole community, in the 80’s or even in the 90’s for people who haven’t been here. My gosh, you had Bob Hope, you had Sinatra, Spiro Agnew was around here. You had all these folks, Hollywood stars, and the Fords were clearly part of all this. What was it like then and is it essentially over?

Hoffman:  Do you mean with respect to the Fords?

Smith:  I mean that whole sort of generation is gone, but when they were here, what was this place like?

Hoffman:  This is a strange community, but what’s happening that is worthwhile observing is how the place is growing. This is becoming one of the largest cities, take all of it, will be one of the largest cities in the United States. They’re talking about a population of 500,000 people. We’re already up to 300,000 people. And when I first joined at Eldorado, the roads that lead in and out of Eldorado were dirt roads except for one street. Empty lots everywhere, empty properties that are now being filled. Changing dramatically. Traffic, unbelievable. We never had any traffic here, you know. And people, more and more people that are regular people, live here. By that, I mean they have jobs and they come and go and they have their own place to play golf and they enjoy life as anybody would. But then there’s lots of social structures that you’ll find everywhere.

Smith:  Was Sinatra very visible around here?

Hoffman:  Oh yes. And Barbara particularly because she had a center for children, the Sinatra Center, right next to Betty’s Center. And we’d see her at board meetings she’d be invited to join and so on both before and after he died. And he had a very large home at one of the clubs here, so he spent a lot of time here.

Smith:  So, he would cross paths with the Fords as a matter of routine?

Hoffman:  I don’t really remember the Fords spending a lot of time with Sinatra. I didn’t either. He was a sort of a different person. Wonderful act, beautiful voice, wonderful to watch him. I still like to hear him. But he had special friends. I would say this about the desert that it has not changed much. For example, at the hospital, over seventy percent of our business is Medicare business. We have people from Canada, people from Europe, people from all over have homes there at Vintage now and has become much more worldwide and I think all for the better.

Smith:  Spiro Agnew lived out here, didn’t he?

Hoffman:  He came out here during and after his problem. And so his social life was, I think, impaired a bit by that.

Smith:  Did you ever see him and Ford together?

Hoffman:  I’d never seen them together, but they might have been.

Smith:  The last time you saw him, when was that?

Hoffman:  The last time was really the time I mentioned earlier when he opened up about his service and Leon and Barbara Parma, the six of us, were at Jillian’s. He came in with a cane. He was then ninety-something, -two. I think it was a year or less before he died, but because of his athleticism and his habits, you would’ve thought he would’ve outlived Betty. Betty had problems and I considered him to be the luckiest man alive or dead because he went so long.
You know, you just fall apart. You don’t realize why or maybe you do, but if you look at it, you’d be surprised at how many of these long-married couples, when one dies, the other is gone in three or four months or whatever.

But Betty -her whole life has changed - is there, but Jerry’s not and everything to do with life was the two of them. So, there’s nothing you can do about that. We sent her some flowers for her birthday and Laura, my wife, remembered that she loved coral roses and so we picked out some nice flowers and brought them out to the gate out here. Betty wrote us a long letter and said, of course Laura knew, but she said, “I love those flowers.” But it’s a hard life.

Smith:  Final thing:  What do you think, for people who never knew him or for whom he’s just a name in a textbook or an old film clip, what should people know about Gerald Ford?
Hoffman: Well, I would like to have, and it will happen, somebody said one time it takes forty years to get a piece of history. History, when you read the general’s first book after World War II, it’s not accurate. First of all, I was a student of reading and so on and I’d been in the invasion of Normandy and fought with an elite division called the First Division. And so I’d fought all the way through war, was wounded a couple of times and I knew what this was all about. So I have our baby and I’m in law school. So I start reading these books and, boy, these generals, they really knew what they were doing. One of the things I never knew until twenty-two years later was that they’d broken the German code. And so they were reading the German’s mail and listening to them, in effect, on the telephone. And that never showed up when they talk about their judgment to do this and that. So now as you read a book as you do that happens to be on one of our big generals or whatever, now you get an honest piece of history.

But I think, to answer your question directly, I think that history will reward Ford. The perception will be more honest. [inaudible] isn’t looking for somebody to tape over something. The same thing that happened to Truman. Truman was really considered to be a very weak president, being shoved around by his general in the Korean War and so on. And kind of a dumbbell, but, as it turned out, he was a very good president, but it took about thirty-five or forty years to figure that out.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Veit: His political being is extinct.

Smith: Well, we’ll start on that note. Even while he was alive, he and Mrs. Ford became sort of marooned in the national Republican Party. Could Jerry Ford get nominated in this congressional district today?

Veit: Not a chance.

Smith: And why is that?

Veit: Well, because the Republican Party in this district, as in so many others, has been totally captured by the far right, and it isn’t so much that Jerry Ford had necessarily views that were less conservative. The difference was that today’s activists don’t even allow civility to the opponent. If you are not rabble rousing to those that disagree with you, then you’re not on our side. And Jerry Ford was never that. He was a conservative. He was substantially to the right of me, for example.

Smith: He was a true fiscal conservative.

Veit: Exactly.

Smith: He was tight, that’s what he was.

Veit: Right. That’s right. And whenever we disagreed with him, it really was over that. There were some expenditures that we thought ought to be made, but no matter how we disagreed, or he disagreed with everyone else, there was never a lack of civility. There was never the notion that somehow those who disagreed were un-American. God forbid – it would never have occurred to him to call anybody a Socialist.

Smith: It was no accident that at the funeral in Washington Cathedral, one of the eulogists was a journalist. Originally it was going to be Hugh Sidey, and then he passed away, so Tom Brokaw took his place. But a message was being sent.

Let me go back. Where does your journalistic career begin? What are your roots?

Veit: Mine?

Smith: Yeah.

Veit: I suppose my roots were I never learned how to do anything else. Well, even in high school, I was interested in more than in just writing. Where I went to high school, we set the type for our school newspaper.

Smith: Did you really?

Veit: And the whole operation intrigued me.

Smith: Was West Michigan home? Where did you come from?

Veit: Well, yes and no. I’ve lived here since early high school. I was actually born in Germany, and grew up partly in Colombia, and then came to the United States just before World War II.

Smith: Okay.

Veit: But then my growing up years were pretty much all in Western Michigan.

Smith: Arthur Vandenberg was still around.

Veit: Oh, yes. I worked for him.

Smith: Did you? Really?

Veit: I worked on a newspaper called the Grand Rapids Herald, which was a morning paper at the time, and he was one of the owners. He wasn’t terribly popular with the staff. As matter of fact, the Herald was one of the first to organize a union, partly in opposition to Arthur Vandenberg.

Smith: Because of…?
Veit: He was very imperious. And he owned the paper. I was sent out to talk to him, I was nineteen or twenty, and probably scared. I knocked on the door to his house and he opened up and I told him that I would like to interview him on subject X. He was prepared for that. He handed me a question and answer sheet and shut the door in my face. As a matter of fact, in the newsroom they used to say, “Let’s vote for him to keep the son of a bitch in Washington.” He was a great hero because of the so-called bipartisan foreign policy. Until then nobody really thought much of him, but he had a lot of longevity, and from my perspective, I just believed what everybody else believed among my peers, for I all know he might have been a fine senator.

Smith: That’s fascinating.

Veit: My view was pretty narrow.

Smith: But valuable. Because with a project like this, context – like a newspaper – context is not everything, but it is absolutely invaluable. We’re trying to get a sense of the political culture and the broader culture of the place that produced and sustained and defined Ford. Which brings us to Frank McKay. He was a legendary figure. Describe the legend and maybe beyond the legend.

Veit: He was somewhat before my time. I think he was probably a product of the Depression, when anyone who could deliver anything was probably fairly popular. I think his political power came from really understanding patronage. He also had some questionable associates – the famous Purple Gang and so on – he was alleged to have been a part of. When I was in high school, the mayor of Grand Rapids, George Welch, supposedly was crowned by Frank McKay and the city was pretty much in the grip of that group. And all of a sudden there came a reform movement. A chap named Paul Goebel who had been a hero at the University of Michigan football team – that’s big around here – began a reform movement. And much to everyone’s surprise, managed to totally take over the city commission and the mayoralty and so forth.

Smith: Now, the President’s father was part of that. And, in fact, Ford’s campaign in ’48 presumably was in some ways at least an offshoot of that. Although it was clearly the issue of internationalism versus isolationism drove him against Jonkman.

Veit: Of course, the district was much larger than the city of Grand Rapids, although that had the bulk of the votes. And that reform movement also attracted what was then a pretty powerful block, the Christian Reform voters in Grand Rapids. And surprisingly, Jonkman didn’t hold all those. I think Jonkman really was surprised by Jerry Ford – his vigor and his appeal as something new. He was sort of, in some ways, a Republican white Obama.

Smith: I understand exactly what you are saying. And it’s interesting because – a subplot there – it has been suggested over the years that Ford, who is popularly thought to be without guile, but certainly didn’t get where he got without calculation, held off marrying Mrs. Ford until after the primary out of concern that it might, in fact, become an issue among…

Veit: Among that powerful group.

Smith: For whom divorce was a sin.

Veit: Yeah.

Smith: We’ve heard wonderful stories from people about the whole Dutch influence. Some of it semi-comical - people going down to buy a Sunday paper on Saturday night and not reading it until Monday. That kind of Sabbitarian observance.

Veit: I can tell you more pointed vignettes about that because when the Grand Rapids Herald folded, I started the Sunday Grand Rapids Press.

Smith: Roughly, when would that been?

Veit: 1958. So the first thing that happened was eight Christian Reform ministers showed up at my desk. Knelt before me and prayed for my soul because I was the worst kind of sinner because I caused other people to sin. It wasn’t so much my sin as I was causing other people to sin. I was somewhat taken aback, didn’t know quite what to say. I finally said, “Well, thank you very much.”
Some of the other interesting things that used to happen: there was a carrier, a newspaper carrier, in the suburb of Granville, which is heavily Dutch, changed hands. Somebody else took over. And in the process we finally learned why it was that of all the several hundred news carriers that the newspaper had, this kid took two or three times as long to deliver the paper as it took anyone else. And what had happened was that he had a book of instructions on where to place the paper – behind bush X, or behind barrel Y. They were all neighbors hiding from one another that they were getting delivery of the Sunday paper.

I had a neighbor, a very nice chap, quiet and pious, but he was also a baseball fan, and he really followed the Detroit Tigers. In those days, yes, you could listen to it on the radio, but to get a full account, you really had to read the paper. So, he used to kind of sheepishly, after church on Sunday he would sort of come over and I knew what was going on and I would leave the sports section open to the Tigers accounts, so he could without actually seeming to, read the account.

It was a long time before our Sunday circulation exceeded our daily, but eventually it did. But that was a pretty good signal that times had changed, and the church itself had changed. It's interesting that, even in its hey day, it never quite had the hold on its members as the Evangelicals do today.

Smith: Really?

Veit: At least not politically. And it seemed to me that while their view of life was pretty narrow, I never felt that there was any hostility involved toward Catholics or Jews or whatever.

Smith: Right. Interesting. But obviously Ford had to take their presence into account.

Veit: And did.

Smith: And it affected, or helped to define what kind of conservative he was.

Veit: Sure. I’m not sure he was without guile, or perhaps he was without guile, but he was certainly a skilled politician. There’s no question about it.
Smith: I have a theory which has been somewhat strengthened after doing 120 interviews. I’ll put it in someone else’s mouth. We talked to Lee Hamilton recently. Hamilton was kind of refreshing because he admired Ford, he liked Ford, but he said something very interesting. First of all, he said Ford was much more ambitious than people thought, but he was smart enough to hide his ambition, which in Washington is rare. And the sense one gets is that he knew there were people out there who – the polite word is underestimated him – and he used it. He was not above using it. That’s a form of guile, certainly. It’s certainly a form of calculation. When you say he was a skilled politician, how would that manifest itself in the district?

Veit: I don’t ever remember a challenge from the right. He was smart enough to know that if there was going to be a real challenge; it was going to be from the right. That was a long time ago. Now it’s pretty obvious, but it wasn’t so then. So first of all, recognizing that was important. And secondly and thirdly and fourthly, what you just said about knowing the Christian Reform Church – that as long as he appeared socially conservative as well as fiscally conservative, it would be very difficult to mount a campaign against him. Nor, unlike his predecessor, did he ever slow down in terms of campaigning.

Smith: Was that part of Jonkman’s problem – that he had just become less visible in the district?

Veit: Exactly. He thought this was sort of like a safe district in Britain.

Smith: It’s interesting – I find it almost amazing that Ford, who had pretty much a safe district, nevertheless spent as much time, even after he became something of a national figure, in taking care of things back home.

Veit: I think one story illustrates how much he was interested in remaining, even after he became President. About two weeks, something like that, into his presidency, I don’t remember exactly the timeframe, I was then the editor of the Grand Rapids Press and I got a phone call from Jerry terHorst, who was still his press secretary. He said, “Werner, the boss wants his paper.” I said, “What are you talking about?” He said, “Well, we’re not getting the paper anymore.” I said, “Well, that’s odd. Let me check into it.”
I called our circulation department and he said, “Well, yes, we cut him off. We haven’t been paid.” I said, “You cut off the President of the United States?” “Well, you once told me you wouldn’t carry your grandmother past 30 days.” But with all the things that were going on, he was still concerned that he wasn’t getting his local newspaper. I think what Jerry told me, “Betty’s been a little busy.” Neglected to pay the bill.

He used to comment – it was a little disconcerting to publish an editorial and get a reply or a comment from the President of the United States. Now, I’m sure he directed Jerry or somebody to do it, but nevertheless.

Smith: Did you comment on the pardon?

Veit: Yes we did, and we were opposed to it. Still are opposed to it. But it didn’t change anything in terms of our personal relationship. I was the co-chair of the inauguration of this place for him. And he was always very thoughtful. I always got a little note at Christmas – no matter what. That was another calculated, smart thing to do.

Smith: In some ways he never stopped being a congressman.

Veit: That’s right. Exactly. That’s what congressmen did. They really paid attention to what’s going on in the district.

Smith: It didn’t always serve him well in the presidency. You can look at those two and half years as a trajectory of him learning – not necessarily unlearning congressional skills – but learning the very different skill set that a president requires. And in some areas, he’d be the first to admit – particularly in communications – he never mastered it. But he said what really hurt about ’76 was he felt he’d basically just mastered the job when he lost it. And you do wonder what a second full term would have been like.

Veit: And I was somewhat surprised that Jimmy Carter, who I didn’t conceive of as a big campaigner, could defeat a sitting president.

Smith: Did you know his parents at all?

Veit: No.
Smith: Did you have much contact with Mrs. Ford?

Veit: Yes we did. We were all aware – because life in Grand Rapids was different in those days – we were all aware of her alcoholism, drinking problem.

Smith: At what point? Before they were in the White House?

Veit: Oh yeah. And I think most of us were sympathetic rather than – it could happen to us. Heaven knows there were enough drunks in the newspaper industry.

Smith: When he was in Congress, one gets the sense that she’s representative in so many ways of a whole generation of women. The children are leaving home, and they are married to a professional, and groping for a role of their own.

Veit: And it’s no wonder that risks happen. So we were aware and everybody, I think. I don’t think it was common knowledge among all the voters, but a certain common knowledge among people in the Republican Party. And out of it, for that matter.

Smith: Locally.

Veit: Locally, yeah.

Smith: Had you seen evidence of it?

Veit: I think knowing it, I saw things I probably would not have recognized. It wasn’t ever anything…she was never falling down drunk or anything like that.

Smith: Of course.

Veit: She just had a serious problem.

Smith: But you found her a sympathetic figure?

Veit: Exactly. And I think it was typical that when she got breast cancer and so on, she took her illness as a way to do public good in establishing the clinic.

Smith: It is hard for people today to grasp how guarded people were on the subject of breast cancer thirty-five years ago.
Veit: That’s right.

Smith: It just wasn’t talked about.

Veit: It was a taboo subject. But she eventually became open not only about breast cancer but about alcoholism. And I think a lot of people admired her for that, which wasn’t really typical then.

Smith: That brings up a couple of things. First of all, let me go back. During those congressional days, as being House Minority Leader and especially Watergate, the vice presidency; was there a kitchen cabinet? We’ve gotten conflicting reports. Some people claim to be part of it who have asserted that before Ford became president there were conversations in which people told him you’ve got to be prepared for this eventuality. Was there an informal, or self-appointed, group of advisors, or whatever you want to call it, that he would call on, particularly for sensitive counsel?

Veit: If there was I never heard about it.

Smith: Okay.

Veit: In fact, this is the first time that I heard anything like that might have happened. It sounds somewhat un-Ford-like.

Smith: In the sense that he tended to keep his own counsel?

Veit: Exactly.

Smith: That’s an interesting thing. Again, the popular notion of this big, genial, friendly, outgoing, uncomplicated, guy; and one learns that there are depths within everyone. And he was very good at keeping secrets.

Veit: You can’t become Speaker of the House, never mind anything else, without having a pretty firm grasp on reality.

Smith: How did the district change? He was there for a quarter of a century. During that period, how did the culture change? When I first came to Grand Rapids, my acid test was to ask people – when, if ever, could you imagine Elton John performing a sold-out concert in Grand Rapids? It was just a litmus test.
Veit: That’s an interesting test. Probably not. In the first place, his sexual orientation probably would have kept people in that district at arm’s length.

Smith: Yeah.

Veit: Number two, even the arena – I think the town was really too conservative to spend money on a large arena. So the chances are, yeah, it probably would not have happened. Although, the district did change very rapidly once all the other changes happened in society. I could imagine today – of course geographically the district is different today, too – somewhat more in his favor really because its gerrymandered to some degree to be Republican. But I could at least imagine that a Democrat could take this district. And one did.

Smith: In ’74, he did. Was that purely a reaction to Watergate?

Veit: No. It was certainly a reaction to Watergate, but it was also – Dick Vanderveen was a highly respected, very active Dutch personage.

Smith: One of us.

Veit: Exactly.

Smith: Had he run against Ford. Had he ever run before?

Veit: No.

Smith: Was this the only time he ran for office?

Veit: Exactly. And he told me how relieved he was when he was defeated.

Smith: Really?

Veit: When he ran, he thought that he would be interested in being a congressman, but once he got there and realized how little impact one of 435 would have for many, many years, he lost interest in a hurry. Because he thought of himself as a loyal Democrat, he agreed to run. But he spent almost no money to get re-elected and he didn’t work very hard. He was very relieved, he told me. Dick was part of a group that still exists and that I’m a member of. We meet once a month to discuss politics. It was started by a federal judge who felt that it would be unseemly for him to talk too much about politics, but he still had things he wanted to get off his chest. So he gathered a little group of Republicans and Democrats. This was not a Democratic thing.

Smith: Off the record conversations?

Veit: Exactly. And he unburdened himself – Dick Vanderveen unburdened himself at the first lunch after the election about how relieved he was.

Smith: That’s fascinating. Before I forget, we talk about the culture evolving, but ironically Ford, in a sense, is responsible, at least for the funding for the Calder sculpture.

Veit: Oh yeah, which I always found greatly ironic.

Smith: What is the story of that?

Veit: Well, I have often wondered. One of the women who began this whole thing – this is a very persuasive person – she claims that she talked Jerry Ford into the notion that as long as we’re going to have a National Endowment for the Arts that’s going to spend money, it might just as well be spent in Grand Rapids. That’s her story. I never talked to him about it. I’m not sure that that would have done it, but it may have. It really surprised us.

Smith: And in a number of ways - again, you know better than I – he did not have a reputation for bringing home the bacon. At various times, as a young congressman he was approached by people who wanted to get some military establishments in. And he opposed it because he thought, first of all, it was a boom and bust economy. So when you think of ‘the big project’ that has his name on it – that it’s an Alexander Calder sculpture…

Veit: Not only that, but I never had any notion that he had any interest in art, particularly contemporary art. There were a number of people who, in this town, made fun of the Calder because of its modernity. Although by today’s standards, it’s not all that radical. But it was thought to have been and then a) have Jerry Ford, the great fiscal conservative push to get money for it; and b) for a piece of modern art just astounded us.
Smith: I know the coda to that story which confirms your astonishment because there were two things he said about this place. You may very well know this, but he didn’t want a statue of himself here, and the spaceman was the substitute. But he said make sure it’s representational art.

Veit: I did not know that, but it’s certainly…

Smith: It’s consistent with the mystery of something so seemingly out of character both financially and aesthetically.

Veit: And it turned out to be a real drawing place. It’s a festival site now and led to other sculptures. As a matter of fact, all of a sudden Grand Rapids is a center for contemporary sculpture with the sculpture garden.

Smith: And he did, as president, give Calder the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Veit: That I didn’t remember.

Smith: Yeah, he did, just before Calder died.

Veit: Well, like so many human beings, he is somewhat a man of contradictions. We all are.

Smith: You know what? I’m glad you say that because, again, this notion – as much by his admirers as anyone else – suggests not that he’s one dimensional, but that what you see is what get. And that can mean a lot of things, including that there’s not much behind what you see. For example, he clearly evolved in his later years. He and Mrs. Ford would be at convention after convention, and every four years the party had moved farther to the right and made social issues increasingly prominent. And I’ve often wondered; was it that he just stayed the same and they moved to the right. Certainly fiscally he never changed, but culturally…and I wonder how much of it was her influence.

Veit: That’s certainly possible, but I certainly detected that it became somewhat more broad. After he left office he asked me to write his obituary – update it, I should think. So every year I would travel to Vail or wherever he was, or Palm Desert, to talk to him and we would talk about what had happened that year and we’d update it. I sensed very much that he was becoming quite uncomfortable with the Republican’s takeover of morality, as it were. I think he was becoming increasingly uncomfortable with it.

Smith: older I get the more I think the most important factor in politics, even more than ideological, is generational. Generational factors trump almost everything else. And what I mean by that, in this instance, I think of Gerald Ford as a classic, Midwest conservative, who, at least for much of his life, assumed that issues like abortion, or sexual preference, were not political. They were not things you discussed at the dinner table, or in the legislative hearing room. Conservatism was economic, it was foreign policy, but there are issues that are ultimately personal and not political. And that part of the trajectory of his political life was to see that change rapidly, in ways that I think made him uncomfortable. But once these issues were dragged out in the open, he took a surprisingly ‘liberal’ view. I’d love to be able to trace that to its roots.

For example, it’s been suggested he saw what his mother had to put up with and the support that she didn’t receive – legally mandated and so forth and so on. The fact that he really was a product of a broken home maybe bred into him a kind of empathy that you wouldn’t automatically expect in that kind of conservative.

Veit: The problem is that we weren’t close enough so that I could surmise where that came from. We were close enough so I could tell it was happening, but not where it was coming from.

Smith: Mike took over those – how long did you do those?
Veit: I think I did it about four years and then Mike took over.
Smith: So through the Carter years?
Veit: Yes.
Smith: Were you surprised when they became friends?
Veit: Yes, very much so. But I was pleased because I thought that was showed a development of his character – that his character was still developing.
Smith: That is an interesting observation. That at that point in his life, age-wise and experience-wise, that you thought his character was developing.

Veit: The first couple of years he was bitter and resentful.

Smith: Really?

Veit: The change was salutary, certainly.

Smith: Bitter toward Carter?

Veit: Yeah. And we never got into it all that deeply, but it was pretty obvious. I think he wanted to avoid my saying anything about that in the obituary.

Smith: Did he talk about Nixon and their relationship?

Veit: I tried to get him to talk about Nixon, but he reminded me the ground rules were that we would talk about what had happened since I was there last.

Smith: Well, but Nixon’s comeback was part of that.

Veit: Yeah.

Smith: There was a formula about the pardon – I heard it a hundred times. I’m sure you could recite it, too. Did you ever hear anything other than the set piece?

Veit: No.

Smith: Did he tell you anything that surprised you in the course of those?

Veit: I don’t think so, not that I recall, anyway.

Smith: And you said about four years; that would also have covered the period of Mrs. Ford’s hospitalization. Did that come up?

Veit: What came though always was his admiration for her, not only his love for her, but also his admiration for her. That came through very strongly.

Smith: Getting to 1980, it’s hard to know – clearly there were meetings, there were discussions, there was talk about him possibly running. Did he talk about that at all – the possibility of running again in ’80?
Veit: No. And I would have been surprised. I think he was – at least when I talked to him – he was in the mood to reflect on the past.

Smith: Was there resentment locally that they didn’t come back here?

Veit: Some, not a lot.

Smith: Was he aware of that?

Veit: Yeah. And I think the reason he was aware of it is because he was a little defensive about it. He would bring up the subject.

Smith: Really? And his explanation was?

Veit: I’m not sure that it made any sense. I think what he would talk about was how often he would come back here for specific events. That’s what he liked to talk about.

Smith: He took some heat, particularly early on, for attempting to ‘commercialize the ex-presidency. And in particular for going on boards and lending his name to some things. Did any of that ever come up?

Veit: Well, it did, but I think he reminded me as he reminded others, that the money that he earned went to the Foundation. And I think he was truly interested in political science scholars that would visit the library.

Smith: That was part of his legacy.

Veit: Exactly.

Smith: It seems again, very much the act of a congressman or a Solomon, to split the library and museum.

Veit: Yeah.

Smith: It was a terrible idea. Did anyone try to dissuade him at the time?

Veit: No, because we – Grand Rapids – were afraid we’d lose the whole thing, so we were happy to get half the loaf.

Smith: Yeah. And how much of a catalyst was this for what’s happened since.
Veit: I think it was an important catalyst. I think it certainly encouraged the rebirth of the hotel, which then led to other things. Urban renewal in Grand Rapids was a disaster. There were many places torn down, some historic places. And monstrosities put in their place, and it really didn’t accomplish anything. But the rebirth of downtown, which is now pretty lively, was really started with the museum and the hotel. They were simultaneous. They opened on the same day.

Smith: I guess Fred Meijer had some land on the outskirts that he was perfectly willing to donate. And my instinct was that Ford felt pretty strongly about wanting to have this downtown.

Veit: Yeah, there was a committee and I was one of them on it – a site committee. And I think despite Fred Meijer’s popularity, on the committee there was a strong feeling that it should be downtown. And our ace in the hole, of course, was Jerry Ford, who after all, should have had the last word.

Smith: And I think he agreed with that viewpoint. Was the burial place always part of the package? Did anyone discuss that with him? It had to at some point enter into the conversation.

Veit: As I recall, it sort of came in almost casually when the architect started work on a site plan and I think he just – I think Jerry just worked with him right from the beginning. Let’s put it over here or whatever.

Smith: We’ll be talking to Marvin later.

Veit: If you talk to him you’ll probably get a much better sense.

Smith: This is a dramatic building. Were there different designs that you went through to get to this?

Veit: Never saw one. It’s a dramatic design, but it is not so avant garde to make it un-Ford-like. I think it’s a very clever design.

Smith: It’s not a Calder.

Veit: Exactly.
Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Veit: You know, that’s a good question. I saw him at his 90th birthday, but then we had a big party at the Capitol. But I saw him subsequent to that. I’d have to think about that. It had to be at some event here, I would think. I was also on the committee planning his funeral before Mike was and I don’t think Jerry ever participated in those discussions. We met yearly. We might have occasionally got a quote – “Jerry thinks X.”

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction, not only locally where to some degree you might expect it, but nationally?

Veit: Very much so. He was only president for two and a half years. He was Minority Leader.

Smith: Been out of the public eye for quite a while.

Veit: For a long time. Naturally, I would expect it here, but that came as a big surprise.

Smith: I wonder how much of it was the timing – the country desperately needed to feel good about itself. And there is a whole generation that was discovering him for the first time. They were seeing the old film clips and they were contrasting that with the ugliness of today’s politics, and hearing about this guy who fell on his sword with the pardon and it looked pretty good by comparison.

Veit: That may very well have been. Stories about his playing golf with Tip O’Neill and all those things, I think might have resonated with a lot of people.

Smith: A couple of quick things and we’ll let you go. Do you have from the dedication stories, memories that stand out?

Veit: Actually, the biggest thing that stands out is Lady Bird Johnson, not Jerry Ford. I went to pick her up at the airport. Everybody who came in was a big deal. Lady Bird came walking off the DC8, carrying her suitcase, and I was really struck by that. And then she wrote the loveliest personal letter afterwards and it included a check. There must have been a lot of residual expenses from people, I guess. I was just so totally taken with it.

Smith: When we did the re-dedication - I remember that cold, cold day. And Caroline [Kennedy] stayed in this office and watched it. Lady Bird wasn’t going to miss it and she was sitting out there and Barbara Bush was kind of mothering her, and her health wasn’t great at that point. It was really an effort to come here at all, and it told you something about the woman.

Veit: She told me that she had been fond of Jerry Ford. I had no idea that there was even some kind of relationship. In fact, she said, “He’s such a nice man.” I still remember that.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered? Not necessarily from the local perspective, but in a broader sense.

Veit: Maybe as our last non-ideological president. Oh, I guess I can’t say Clinton was all that ideological. He was a pragmatist.

Smith: It’s interesting. John Paul Stevens told us at his confirmation hearings, no one asked him about abortion.

Veit: Is that right?

Smith: And that was December of ’75 – almost three years after Roe v Wade.

Veit: Isn’t that interesting.

Smith: Ford was very proud of that selection. Over the years people would suggest otherwise - assuming for ideological reasons that he was part of this long procession of Supreme Court justices who turn out to ‘disappoint’ their sponsors. Ford was very proud because it was a classy pick – intellectually impeccable. And because Stevens went on to have a very distinguished career in the Court.

Veit: Yeah, and I think it’s wrong to say that he was a liberal Justice. I don’t think he would have disappointed Ford. There may have been individual decisions that he may have disagreed with.
Smith: For the twenty-fifth anniversary of the inauguration we did a lecture series. We brought a number of people out here and one of them was Justice Stevens. Ford came all the way from California to introduce each of these people and it turned out Stevens had always wanted to play golf. I checked, and I could be wrong, but we believe this is the only time in history that a former president, in fact, introduced a justice whom he put on the court. And after the program, they went out and they played golf and had a great time and it was really kind of poignant.

Veit: Justice Stevens could not have been very young at that time.

Smith: No, we’re talking, it’s eleven years ago. So he’d be 79?

Veit: Also he was a much better golfer than people gave him credit for.

Smith: Ford?

Veit: Yes.

Smith: Really?

Veit: Oh, yeah. The things that would be publicized would be a slice off into the crowd or whatever, which happens to everybody. But he was actually a really good athlete. This notion that he couldn’t chew gum and walk at the same time was absurd because he was probably the most athletic president.

Smith: The luck of the draw timing – Saturday Night Live goes on the air in 1975 – it’s a real turning point. I suppose on some level cartoonists have been caricaturing presidents, but the power of television is vastly greater, obviously. And in some ways he never recovered from that.

Veit: It was really unfair because he was agile, and not in the least bit clumsy, a good athlete.

Smith: Final thing. Do you have memories of the funeral? And of Grand Rapids’ response? I remember, obviously, the two mile line and all of that.

Veit: That is what struck me the most – is the lines. And the Democrats that turned out. There was a lot of affection for him here.
Smith: People had gotten over the fact that he didn’t come back.

Veit: Exactly, and by this time never thought about it. And he is back in a sense.

Smith: The reason we really wanted to talk with you was to get a sense of how Congress operated in the days when Jerry Ford was there, in whatever capacity. And then, obviously, trace the story beyond there. When did you arrive in Congress?

Brock: I came in at 31 years old, burnishing my sword and my bright armor, ready to change the world in 1962.

Smith: Pre-Goldwater.

Brock: Oh, yeah, pre-Goldwater, although Goldwater was a big factor, because I had read The Conscience of a Conservative, and just fell in love with that thought pattern. But, it was a wonderfully interesting time and ours was the breakthrough gun in the South. John Tower was the guy in the Senate that broke out of the South. I was the first person below the so-called Mason-Dixon Line in Tennessee, not a deep South state, but I was the first one to come in. I felt pretty proud of myself, and pretty excited. I came into a time in the Congress when the Republicans were a little bit down on their dobber because we had not only been out of power for ten years, but we lost the presidential election and we didn’t see much prospect, because Kennedy was such an attractive leader.

Smith: You were also part of a class, I think – wasn’t that the same year Donald Rumsfeld was elected?

Brock: Don and I came in – I thought I was the youngest guy in Congress. The first person I met was Don Rumsfeld, who was a year younger than I was. The two of us talked about how young we were and how great it was, and next we met Ed Foreman, who was twenty-eight. So, anyway, it was a fun time.

Smith: You were young, but at that point the Republicans had a – I won’t call him elderly – but a leader who was - Brock: Charlie Halleck.

Smith: Charlie Halleck.

Brock: Old and of the old school.

Smith: Define old school.

Brock: Old school in the sense of accepting the status quo. When you are young and you win, you want to come in, and you want to do battle. You want to take on the Huns and Hessians and change things. That’s why you ran. And the leadership in the House didn’t have that sense of excitement, of purpose. You couldn’t get any sense that we were there for a reason as a group. And that was pretty frustrating for the first couple of years. Particularly with a guy like Goldwater who was jetting up our political juices, and getting us excited about things.

Smith: Were you at the ’64 convention?

Brock: Of course. I was not only the chairman for Tennessee, I was the leader in working the South for Goldwater.

Smith: I have to ask you just because of my interest – do you remember the night that Rockefeller was booed? In the Cow Palace.

Brock: Yeah. Not a good thing.

Smith: Yeah. But spontaneous.

Brock: It was spontaneous. I was not a supporter of Nelson Rockefeller because I was more on the conservative side. More so than today, actually. You don’t do that in politics, and I think a lot of us were a little bit uncomfortable because it was spontaneous, and people felt like Goldwater had earned it and he was there – a philosophical leader and people didn’t want any division in the party, and Rockefeller represented that.

Smith: Talk about division in the party, because clearly civil rights was a significant issue at that point, and fairly or not, at least some in the Goldwater effort were seen as opposed to the civil rights movement.
Brock: Right.

Smith: How did the House Republicans, I won’t say finesse, but how did they deal with that issue?

Brock: We didn’t deal with it very effectively, to be honest with you. We were faced with a dilemma. I have said many times, subsequently, that the largest single mistake I made in my political career was following Goldwater and opposing the civil rights act. That was wrong, he was wrong, and both of us were using the Constitutional arguments, and frankly, not having enough expertise in the Constitution, we should have shut up.

But it was one of those issues which was dividing the party, and frankly, when Goldwater took that stance, it put a lot of us in the position of saying, either we’re going to support our presumptive nominee that we were actively fighting for to get the nomination and the election, or we were going to put the party over in the hands of Rockefeller. And that was not an easy choice – not a good choice. I don’t think we were that ideologically – I think we made up a bit of ideology. Sometimes you overstate your case. And both sides were doing that.

It became a bit less split when the Voting Rights Act came up. That was a much easier thing to address and support because nobody can legitimately argue against that. But ’64 was a tough time in that particular aspect. We didn’t have, by the way, the flashpoint issues that did come up in the civil rights area later on. Like bussing, which was a really serious issue for a lot of people, both parties.

Smith: Were you surprised by the magnitude of Goldwater’s defeat – and how did it impact your own race for re-election?

Brock: By the time the election got there, I was not surprised, I was terrified. Goldwater was running at 35% in my district, and I was a new guy that had won with 51%. I was hanging on by my fingernails and it got to the point where I literally, in the last month, in October, cancelled all of my personal billboards and put Goldwater in place of my own name, because I was running much better than he was. Still, the magnitude of that defeat was I think more than we’d expected. But if you think about the context of that time, Jack Kennedy was assassinated my first year in Congress. President of the United States being killed. Lyndon Johnson was obviously going to take the leadership of the party, and I think the country was not only reacting to the difference between Kennedy and Johnson and Goldwater, but was reacting to the possibility of further instability. When you think about it that way, it’s more understandable, but it was very painful.

Smith: Talk about civil rights – but I would think in Tennessee, Goldwater’s position on the TVA would have been a significant factor.

Brock: Oh, yeah. Barry Goldwater had an ability to find a way to alienate everybody, except those that were truly true believers. In my state of Tennessee, here was a guy who opposed the civil rights movement, which – we were making pretty good progress with the black community in Tennessee, less so in the South, but particularly in my state, and we were working it. So, A) you start off by attacking that constituency; next he comes out against TVA, which is sort of a bedrock issue in the state of Tennessee, northern Alabama, other states that are affected, but mostly Tennessee.

That was very hard for me, and I’d just say, “A case where somebody is wrong,” and he was wrong. Then he came out against Social Security. Holy cow, you take on everybody that’s getting power, everybody that’s old, and everybody that’s black, and there’s not a whole lot of people left. I don’t know how he got 35%. But I loved him because he just laid it out on the table. He believed. He said, “Win or lose, this is me. I’m not going to con you and then change my stripes because you have a difference of opinion with me.”

Smith: In the immediate aftermath of that defeat, the House Republicans, obviously, are confronted with their own future. Can you recall what went on in terms of the maneuvering that led to a replacement?

Brock: Yeah, I sure can. It’s vivid. After the election, and we had just gotten our hat handed to us, it was just mean. The younger guys, Rummy, me, particularly some of the guys that had been there, maybe a couple of years before we were, Charlie Goodell, Jim Martin, people like that – some with only two years of credentials, some with four, maybe some with six, had some very quick meetings. Talked about the fact that, particularly in the House, going back to what we said earlier, there was no sense of collective purpose, we had to wait for somebody to run for president to pull us together. And even then we were somewhat divided. There was no sense that in the House we could operate as a team and become more effective in advocating on those issues that we felt strongly. And frankly, the focus became Charlie Halleck.

Charlie was a very decent guy, but he was old. Frankly old and beyond his age. Old in the sense that he didn’t have the energy. And we wanted to go back and recapture our sense of purpose. We wanted to recapture our momentum, and that was a fairly easy call. It was easy in the sense that we knew we had to change the leadership, it was very hard to say, “Charlie, we want you to leave.”

Smith: Did you do that? Did anyone suggest that?

Brock: I don’t know that it was put quite that way, but it was pretty much read that way. It was hard for him, it was hard for those who had hung with him that were the older guys that knew him and loved him.

Smith: By the way, that raises an interesting question. I’m struck by the way these things occur. The older I get, the more and more it seems to me that for all the ideological divides and everything else that comes into play, that you cannot overestimate the generational factor. That this seems a generational/cultural divide, as much as philosophical or ideological.

Brock: Absolutely. That’s the case today in both parties. Watch how the parties change their leadership. Watch how they conduct themselves. It is not always age, it can be philosophical because these two parties, the Democrats more than the Republicans, are composed of disparate groups, with the difference out of parties and issues. But age does have an effect because there is so much more energy when you are coming in young and full of excitement about what you want to do and achieve. And the process tends to act like an emery wheel. It takes off your rough edges, and over time, the relationships become really important. And today I say that I didn’t realize how important they were. I do now. And the relationships are nonpartisan.

Smith: It is interesting - there is a certain amount of irony here because Halleck replaced Joe Martin, with many of the same arguments.

Brock: Absolutely. So here’s a guy that goes against the old guy and now he is the old guy. To beat him, we couldn’t run on an ideological basis. We had to get somebody that would unify people older, younger, not on a philosophical basis, but on the basis of pulling us together and becoming a force – creating the leadership that would drive us to become a significant force in the House again. And Jerry Ford was sort of an obvious choice.

Smith: Were there other candidates considered?

Brock: I think we talked about a lot of different names. I think Charlie Goodell would have loved to have been chosen, for example, and he was a good guy. John Lindsay probably would have liked to have been chosen. Both were New York, both were a little bit Rockefeller – that was not going to work. Jerry Ford – here he is: Midwestern, solid as a rock, just basically a truly good, honorable, decent guy that everybody loved. You couldn’t say that he was mean spirited, you couldn’t say that he was going after Charlie out of spite. It would never have occurred to anybody.

Smith: But also, it seems to me, it’s funny now that you say that – you are absolutely right about New York. In those days, the center of gravity of the Republican Party was in the Midwest.

Brock: Absolutely.

Smith: You didn’t have much of a southern party. It was developing.

Brock: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, that’s our Heartland – it was then, it should be now. It’s not quite so much, but it would be better if it were – that’s the core of American values in my judgment. It really is. The northeast, the south, the far west, tend to have a little bit more focus on the specifics of their own location. The Midwest is sort of the place that pulls people together and it’s more of a common purpose, it shares all the basic ingredients that the rest of us have, but it collects them, if I’m not being too obtuse in the way I’m presenting it.

Smith: Well, pragmatism isn’t a dirty word. Consensus isn’t a dirty word.

Brock: Pragmatism and consensus are terrific words, as long as you hold to a core.

Smith: Yeah. What was it about Ford? The danger is, as you know, Ford sometimes gets portrayed as good old Jerry Ford, and the word decency almost is used in a condescending way – as if it’s a substitute for IQ or sophistication, or whatever. What was it about Ford that made him stand out to his colleagues? One thing about Ford is, I think, certainly of any recent president, he is the least self-dramatizing of men. He may have been ambitious, but it didn’t show in the conventional ways.

Brock: I’m not sure he was ambitious, in terms of needing a claim, in terms of needing the reassurance of accolades from others. I think maybe where I’m going with that, he was comfortable within himself. Jerry Ford didn’t need somebody else to tell him that he was an okay guy. He had a sense of who he was, he had a sense of what his values were, and that just came out. And what you like about that, in a leader, is that you don’t feel that he is trying to impose on you. That he is, in fact, trying to gather you together and achieve something that’s important.

Smith: It’s not about him.

Brock: It’s not about him. No, it never was about him. But Jerry Ford wasn’t ideological in the sense of being out here on this issue or that. Jerry Ford had a core set of Republican values that all of us shared. And when you knew that, and you knew that he was comfortable within himself, and I say decent because he was such an honorable and a nice guy to be around. But there was never any doubt about where he wanted to go and what he wanted to do to gather the forces of the House together and achieve a larger purpose. And that’s a terrific combination.

Smith: How bitter did the fight with Halleck get?
Brock: Probably less so than we felt at the time. The guys that were around Charlie were there because he’d been around a long time and they’d been around a long time, and they knew him and he was a good guy.

Smith: Did that include people like Les Arends?

Brock: Yeah. Really decent people. Good people, but just felt like you don’t throw the baby out with the bathwater. That we had lost, not because of Charlie Halleck, and we wouldn’t win because of Charlie Halleck – that he just had earned it. He had earned his spurs, he had provided leadership and he was a friend, so you don’t turn your back on your friends. The bitterness was more – who are these young studs coming in here telling us what to do? Who are these – we called ourselves the Young Turks – and they heard that. I’m sure they said, “Well, that’s for sure not what we want.” “We’ve been around too long to have a bunch of new kids on the block coming in and telling us how to do things.” So, it wasn’t anger at Jerry Ford. That wasn’t the issue, and it wasn’t anger at Charlie. I think it was going back to the generational thing. Mostly the young activists saying, “We’ve got to get with it. We’re never going to win unless we change.”

Smith: And of course, the vote was close. It's always been my understanding that the Kansas delegation provided the margin of victory. There was something like three votes, and they were three or four votes from...

Brock: Well, I would claim that the Tennessee delegation made the differences.

Smith: And did you have company by that point?

Brock: Yes. I had Jimmy Quillen and John Duncan both in Congress at that time, actually, and myself. As a matter of fact, Howard Baker, Sr. supported Charlie Halleck our three broke ranks with him.

Smith: Was that because of his relationship to Senator Dirksen?

Brock: Probably.

Smith: Makes sense.

Brock: And because he was part of the older crowd.
Smith: Yeah.

Brock: Not illogical, and not bad. But it was very close.

Smith: I assume there was a caucus. Did they each speak before the vote?

Brock: Now you’re testing my memory.

Smith: Well, then how do you campaign for something like that?

Brock: Door to door. Person to person. Talking to the people that you’ve gotten to know well enough to say, “It really has to change. That this is reason. We’re not here just to be here. We’re here to do something. To do something as a team. We can’t do it individually, we’ll never get anywhere. And if we’re going to do it as a team, we’ve got to have a team leader that crosses ideological lines, that draws East, South, Midwest, West together.” Charlie was Midwestern, but Charlie was not energized. Jerry Ford was. And Jerry Ford had energized support and that was sort of the basic of our argument.

Smith: What do you think his relationship with President Johnson was?

Brock: Good. Good. First of all, I don’t know of Jerry Ford having a bad relationship with anybody, but Lyndon Johnson was a terrific politician and a terrific leader. We opposed a number of the things he wanted to do, but boy, was he a good pol, and he knew how to reach across party lines and work with even young smart alecs like me. I would never forget a couple of instances where he made some statements about me that just were mind blowing. One to my wife and he was talking about what a patriot this young man is, and, wow, here’s the President of the United States saying that about somebody who’s got maybe two terms, three terms, at that time in the Congress. And Johnson was really good at reaching out – and Jerry Ford, obviously, would do that. Both taking the national interests and knowing, even when they disagreed, you don’t have to do it by a mean spirited approach.

Smith: Did he talk at all about his work on the Warren Commission?
Brock: Only that it was tough. I’m not sure that I heard any of the internal specifics. I’m not sure he was comfortable talking about that, to be honest with you. But that it was hard, and not any fun.

Smith: Of course, ’66, you’ve got this big bounce back, to some degree almost as the other side of the ’64 disaster. You win back a number of Republican districts and you do very well in the governorships and the like. Did you have a sense that you were making progress? That you had done the right thing in putting Ford…

Brock: We said, “Hey, you want to make the case? Look at what we did. Look at how people reacted to the change and the image of a much more aggressive, much more active group of people that were willing to stand up and say, ‘Some parts of the Great Society are okay, others are just lousy, and we’re not going to put up with it. We’re going to go ahead and fight it.’” Showing some backbone is pretty important to this country and to the people of the country. And we did.

Smith: It is fascinating, there is a term which you don’t hear very much anymore: the loyal opposition. But it seems almost perfect to apply it to what you were doing back then.

Brock: That’s the way we thought of ourselves. That’s a good phrase. We’re all loyal as Americans, but it is our responsibility to stand up for those things we believe in and to oppose those things we don’t support. We felt really good about ourselves in ’65, ’66, and that translated into some pretty good press. And to a significant win in ’66, which led to our win in ’68.

Smith: Do you have a sense of where Ford stood on civil rights?

Brock: He was for it. Period. Across the board. No issue. And I think after ’64 when we took our beating, in many ways justifiably so, the party decided that that was an issue that we had to get active on. Voting Rights Act. Beyond that, other things that would demonstrate, again, that one party, one country, none of this discrimination thing. So it was a pretty good issue.
Smith: In Vietnam – where were you all at that point on the war? Clearly there was beginning to be a significant anti-war movement.

Brock: More than that. We had riots in the streets in Chicago at the Democratic convention, which I think cost them the election. We didn’t have the best candidate. Humphrey was a better candidate by yards than Richard Nixon. But the Democrats were viewed as dispirited, as divisive, as supporting pull-out without supporting our troops. They were spitting on our troops that came home. I mean, the Left in this country can be really obnoxious when they want to be. So can the hard Right, by the way.

Smith: They almost deserve each other.

Brock: They do. One time I suggested that we ought to give them Arkansas and let them all focus and shoot each other, as far as I was concerned. It was crazy. But, yeah, Vietnam was horrible. It was an interesting time, though, because we really didn’t understand. It is easy to understand people saying, “I really hate the thought of so many of our kids getting killed or wounded.” That’s understandable. But to hate those that were fighting, that’s a different order. And it really ginned up on our side, and with many Democrats, a sense of true anger at what was going on, and it made the debate less – the sides, they were drawing apart rather than pulling together, saying let’s find a solution. It was dividing us from pro and anti-Vietnam, and then pro and anti-troops. That’s serious stuff. Bill Steiger and I decided to, when we heard some people in the Congress literally calling for the suspension of any support to any college that allowed any demonstrations. Now that’s where the hard Right can just be self-destructive. And we said, “That’s insane. You’re going to drive more people into the other camp.”

We put together a bunch of about eight or ten of us, and decided to go out to college campuses. We went to fifty colleges in the next couple of months, and we didn’t make a speech, we just listened. When we came back out of that, Nixon had won – this is ’69 – and wrote up a report which said, “There is a reason for young people to be in the streets. They are drafted at age eighteen, they can’t vote until they’re twenty-one.” That’s really ridiculous. We didn’t like the draft, anyway. So we came back, we wrote up a report, which I literally presented to the president, which said, “As a group, all of us wanted the President and the Republican Party to come out for the eighteen year old vote and the all volunteer army.” Both of which happened.

So, good things can come out of some mean debates, but Jerry Ford, Lyndon Johnson, those of us that were on what we thought was the side of the right, were working very closely together. A lot of the time.

Smith: What was his relationship with Ev Dirksen? Did Dirksen resent at all the fact that his buddy Charlie Halleck had been ousted?

Brock: I never saw any evidence of that. Dirksen was, above all, a pragmatic leader. Wonderfully, wonderfully articulate, avuncularly, just all the nice things that you would expect of a guy who has this shock of hair that was just a wonder. Talk about a Midwesterner, he epitomized that, as did Jerry Ford. But I think they were very comfortable with each other. I never saw any evidence of – I saw a lot of evidence of them working together, I never saw any sign…

Smith: And the division of labor: it seems that Ford was comfortable with it, Dirksen in those days was a ham, too. A very theatrical performer.

Brock: He would never admit it.

Smith: And Ford was perfectly willing to sort of cede center stage to Dirksen.

Brock: Ford was almost uncomfortable with being out front in a public sense. I think he thought his job was more to shepherd us, to pull us together. Make sure that we were coherent. Dirksen, okay, he was a ham, but he loved being a ham. And he was so good at it. We had a few like that. Roman Hruska was a bit like that in the Senate, not to the degree of Dirksen. But you need that. That’s good politics, that’s good theater.

Smith: We got a great story from Stu Spencer who was assigned to sort of shepherd Senator Dirksen before this big Republican dinner in D.C., where he was going to be the main speaker. Dirksen knew he was being shepherded, and he said, “Okay, I want you to,” and he took a big glass, I guess it was a glass of gin to put on the podium beforehand…
Nelson:: With no ice.

Smith: Yeah, with no ice.

Brock: So it looked like water.

Smith: Tricks of the trade.

Brock: He was more avuncular when he had a little bit of that kind of water.

Smith: Precisely. And, of course Stu tells it better than I, but he had a moment of panic when he realized there were several other speakers before Dirksen, and he thought, “Oh my God, I hope they don’t want a drink of water.” But anyway, Dirksen got there, and he started out and people were sort of taken aback a little bit, and then he launched into this thing, and had them all in his hand, and he also emptied the glass before he was done. But it was a tour de force.

Brock: Absolutely. That was the wonder of Dirksen. He really was just a special, special man.

Smith: By the way, one senses it was a different culture then. People drank a lot more – did people drink more? They certainly smoked, but was Congress more fueled by alcohol forty years ago than today?

Brock: I’m not sure I know enough about it today, but I have a sense that is true.

Smith: But just reflecting the broader culture in some ways.

Brock: There was a reason for that. Not just that people liked alcohol more, alcohol was the grease that allowed you to meld people in less public settings, less political settings. I talk a lot about how different things are now with the Tuesday-Thursday Club. They vote and members just run home to campaign to raise money these days, so they don’t know each other. We all had softball teams. We’d play softball against each other and then the two teams would go out and have a few beers. So not only were the members having a few beers with each other, but so were the staffs. That’s a different culture. And when you get to know somebody, it’s hard to hate somebody that you know.
Smith: There’s a wonderful story of Jerry Ford and Hale Boggs debating each other at the Press Club. And they would drive down together, and they’d decide on the way what the topic was going to be, and they got down there and did their debate, and then they went out and had lunch together.

Brock: And that’s what we did. I cannot count the times when I did the same thing with people, and you go, hell, full out against each other on floor of the House or the Senate. And you’d go out and have lunch or dinner. You’d laugh and you’d talk: “Man, did I get you on this one.” “Oh my gosh, but you cut me in pieces on that one.” And you’d laugh about it because you weren’t taking yourself quite so seriously, you were taking the issues seriously. But you knew that sooner or later you were going to find something on which you agreed, and you’re going to need each other. And so, you maintained those personal relationships and you think this is important stuff.

Smith: I also assume you weren’t playing, at least the same way, to the camera and the internet.

Brock: We didn’t have the internet, of course. The internet didn’t come until less than fifteen years ago. The mid-nineties technology really began to impact politics. Not just in the sense of the internet and communication, but what it did to money. We just didn’t need the kind of money that they seem to think they need today. And we didn’t have to focus all of our time on raising money. And that sort of colors and conditions your relationships with others, too.

Smith: It’s remarkable. I remember talking to President Ford. He came from a safe district, he didn’t ever have to worry, and yet, he went home a remarkable number of times, even during this period when he was also on the road traveling around the country. I remember him saying once, not critical, but as an object lesson…of what happened he thought to Guy Vander Jagt. That he just sort of stopped going home. He reached this level of national prominence and the like, and paid a real price for it.

Brock: I think, because we didn’t have the internet, and tools like that, going home was keeping in touch. It wasn’t to raise money. It was to talk to the Farm Bureau, the Rotary, the Jaycees, the different civic organizations.
Smith: It was to listen as much as to speak?

Brock: Absolutely. That’s how you grew. I was running 65 or better percent by my fourth term. Which is a little better than that 51% which was too close. But I don’t think I went home any less because that was my corner. I needed that. That fed me. It kept me straight and focused on the issues that people cared about.

Smith: How badly did he want to be Speaker of the House?

Brock: Jerry?

Smith: Yeah.

Brock: I don’t know how to answer that. He clearly wanted to be speaker in the sense of governing the House. I think he probably had mixed emotions about it in the sense of the public position it would put him in. He was comfortable representing his own views. He was not so comfortable saying, I think all Republicans think like this. That wasn’t quite his approach.

Smith: Yup. Which also helps to explain the difficulty of the transition from Congress to the White House. Some of it is structural, people talk about the spokes of the wheel - trying to run the Oval Office like you did your House office and all that. But it had to be much larger than that, a much more deeply rooted institutional culture which reflected his own personality. And suddenly, overnight, you’re forced to develop a whole new set of job skills.

Brock: Totally different job skills. And you move from a very comfortable place where everybody around you are friends – in both parties. And you’ve earned that, and you’ve earned the respect and you’ve established your role as the leader. And you go to a place where you’re leading a couple hundred million people. And you have to bring a whole different skill set to that – the ability to communicate, market, sell, as well as to guide the entire Congress. And to do so without the relationships that gave you comfort in the House. That is a big, hard transition. I don’t know.

Smith: When Agnew resigned, were you surprised? Let me tell you something I found extraordinary. We’re talking to Jerry Jones earlier today, who, at the time was reorganizing the White House personnel office for Haldeman. He gets a call from Haldeman wanting to know – this is before Haldeman leaves, so this is before April of ’73 – gets a call from Haldeman wanting to know how many jobs report to the vice president. And Jones does a little bit of mental calculation and says, “About fifty.” He says, “Good. I want letters of resignation from every one and give them to me.”

Brock: That was Haldeman.

Smith: Okay, but the fascinating thing is, this is long before the Wall Street Journal broke the story in August of ’73, that eventually went to Agnew’s resignation.

Brock: Really? Wow.

Smith: Yeah. This is several months in advance, which tells me, or at least Jerry, and Jerry is pretty shrewd, that they knew that Agnew had a problem that could, in fact, terminate his vice presidency.

Brock: All of us knew that something was awry. I wanted Agnew out by certainly a year before he left. He was – you just weren’t comfortable with him – you didn’t feel respect for him. There was something that bothered you, and when I was running in 1970 I specifically asked him not to come to Tennessee. And he did. I pled with him and his staff to focus entirely on one issue, and that was the Vietnam War. That would work. He insisted on coming to Memphis, the biggest town – which he did. We had a POW rally for him in the Memphis stadium. But, you just didn’t want to be around him. You didn’t want him working for you, campaigning for you, and Jerry Ford certainly had a sense of that. So I’m not surprised that they would want him out. Now, I would bet that they didn’t know the specifics of the story. Here’s a guy that took some free suits – this is grubby stuff.

Smith: Yeah. When Agnew left, and it was pretty clear that Nixon – everyone agrees that Nixon himself said – his first choice was John Connally for the vice presidency. But it became pretty clear that wasn’t going to fly. I guess Carl Albert, and I assume Mike Mansfield, said to the president, “The one person who will be confirmed without difficulty was Jerry Ford.”
Brock: Sure. Nobody’s enemy. Everybody’s friend. Everybody loved him, everybody respected him. There was no question about integrity. The contrast. Freshen the process, bring in somebody that nobody would challenge. They were right. He was the right guy.

Smith: Did you think, because obviously the question that hangs over the Ford vice presidency, brief as it was, and obviously he spent as much time out of town as he could, was: at what point, shrewd guy, he’s been around this town for twenty years, at some point he had to have internally concluded that this thing could very well end the way it did. In the cloak rooms was there a sense that the Nixon presidency was doomed, or that, in fact, until the tapes, for example, were released, that this was something that could linger on, crippled but functional?

Brock: The latter. Until the tapes came out, there was pretty solid confidence that Nixon could survive with one wing. Could survive the balance of the term. It was uncomfortable. It wasn’t any fun, but it was some jerks that had done something stupid.

Smith: And the universal assumption was, the best argument that people made was, Nixon, of all people, wouldn’t be stupid enough to do this.

Brock: And John Mitchell. He was the campaign manager. Smarter than all get-out, tougher than nails, the thought that he would condone some stupid operation like that, just didn’t enter anybody’s mind. Nobody has to stoop to that sort of thing. When you’re talking about the White House, for gosh sakes, you just don’t play those games. Nobody thinks you do – or should. And Nixon really worked – on the Republican side – to reassure us that that was the case. That it would never occur to him to do that sort of thing. Nor would he tolerate it. And if he had been advised of it, he would have not only said no, he would have taken some action. And everybody said, yeah, that makes sense. We agree. You didn’t have to like Nixon to think that he was too smart to do that.

Smith: He lied to you.

Brock: He lied to us. He lied to some of us that were close. I was the southern chairman for him in ’68. I worked the South for him. I was the national young voter chairman in ’72. I worked the country for him. In part because I owed him. He came to me in ’64 when nobody else would come. And I appreciated that.

Smith: I have to ask you, because you mentioned being southern chairman in ’68: was it, in fact, Strom Thurman who sort of held off the Reagan challenge in the South? That convention where you had this kind of unofficial Reagan-Rockefeller coalition to try to prevent Nixon on the first ballot, and there were clearly a lot of southern Republicans who, even then, their hearts were with Reagan. And yet, in the end, Nixon won enough delegates, particularly in the South, and the story has always been that it was Strom Thurman who sort of closed the deal. Is that your recollection?

Brock: I don’t know. I was not in that – I was in the room when we debated any number of names. We went through and found something against each one. Nixon waited until the last minute to name his vice president in ’68. We were at the convention, maybe the second night, and he had to make a decision in the next twenty-four hours, minimum. Should have been the next twelve hours. Everybody present had a reason not to support somebody – in the wrong part of the country – wrong approach – wrong constituent – whatever. Somebody said, “How about this guy from Maryland?” Nobody knew him. Nobody knew anything against him. Moderate, right kind of state, eastern, good balance with Nixon, California. And Agnew came out of that.

When you look at the Rockefeller-Reagan thing, people still remembered the ’64 Rockefeller thing. They weren’t going to go with him. And I think the two almost cancelled each other out. I would give Strom Thurman all the credit he wanted. If he did that, fine. But most of us just wanted somebody that was not coastal, in that sense.

Smith: During those months that Ford was vice president, before Nixon leaves, did you have any conversations with him that would touch upon what was going on or what might be coming down the road?

Brock: No. The only conversations you would have in that sense was: is it doing damage to us, what’s going to happen to us in the ’74 elections? That sort of thing. It was not – I don’t think any of us had any portent, maybe some did. I certainly did not. I sat there with Nixon and when he looks you in the eye and said, “You know I wouldn’t do that sort of thing. You know I would not,” you accept that. It comes out impeachment proceedings are going on, and I had to tell him that I could not support him in the Senate on the basis of what I saw on those tapes.

Smith: Now was this after the smoking gun tape? Remember, toward the very end, when the June 26, 1972 tape was released and everything sort of collapsed. I think maybe it was a week or so before he actually left. Was it that late in the game? Or was it earlier?

Brock: It was pretty late. It was in the last, certainly in the last two or three weeks when it became so obvious that he was lying to those closest to him.

Smith: Was this a meeting at the White House that you had with him?

Brock: We had meetings in the EOB.

Smith: Okay. Was it just the two of you?

Brock: No, no, there were probably at least six or eight people, besides the president.

Smith: Now, was this the famous meeting where Goldwater and maybe Hugh Scott and…?

Brock: No. I was not in that meeting.

Smith: Okay, this was separate. But you know the meeting I’m talking about?

Brock: Yeah.

Smith: But aside from sort of that leadership, Nixon was meeting with junior members?

Brock: Some of the guys that had been troops in the campaign.

Smith: How did he react when you told him that?
Brock: I didn’t tell him. I sent him a note. I didn’t even want to do that. Man, there are a lot of times you don’t like to remember. That was one. None of us could believe what was on those tapes. You just couldn’t accept…

Smith: Was part of it the language?

Brock: Yeah, of course. The language was gross. Nobody needs to talk like that. All of us have used stupid words on occasion, but it’s in a fit of anger, or something like that. You feel bad afterwards. But to do it almost ad nauseam throughout the conversation, that bothers you. To hear him basically instructing people on how to fire an attorney general, and deal with people that – the Elliott Richardson incident, for example. Stuff like that. Unacceptable.

Smith: Do you remember the first time you talked to Ford, either at the end or at the beginning of his own presidency? Your memories of Nixon’s departure and Ford being sworn in? Can you recapture the mood of that? This must have been a pretty somber town. Even the Nixon haters must have, at least temporarily, suspended their...

Brock: Well, it certainly was somber. It was scary that we had a president of the United States resign in disgrace. I think the thing that made it – was it tempered a sense of concern, frustration, anger, all of the above, was Jerry Ford. You were comfortable with him. Comfortable with his ability to hold it together, to move us through this. Again, the logic of having somebody that everybody really loved gave you a sense that the country was going to be okay. I don’t remember a particular occasion that we did talk about what we could do to move things forward. I was not part of the decision which led to his pardoning of Nixon. I think he probably thought about that, as that, to get all this behind us. Every one of us, if we’d be asked to advise him, would have told him to wait until after the election. Don’t do it now.

Smith: Were you taken by surprise that morning, when it was announced?

Brock: You bet. Flabbergasted, because you knew it was going to cost this election. We were already in trouble, we were already in trouble. Here was Jimmy Carter, Mr. Moral himself, Bible-reading, southern peanut farmer, nuclear sub commander, all the right stuff, and we got Nixon hanging around our necks like an albatross that is fifty pounds or five hundred pounds, in some cases, and we were vulnerable. We were at risk. As it turned out, and I don’t blame this on the pardon, we didn’t know how bad it was. Every one of us, except one, who won the new Senate seats in 1970, was defeated in 1976. Nobody could carry that baggage. I’m sympathetic with the guys that were running in 2008.

Smith: Did you ever discuss it with Ford? After the fact, were there…

Brock: No, I never did. I would’ve told him “Doggone you, you gotta do the right thing all the time? Can’t you use a little caution and wait?” Even if he’d lost, he could have pardoned him after the election, but he has to do it in the middle of the election – in the last stages when – man, it’s hard enough as it was.

Smith: And not only that: remember, days before the ’74 elections, he visits Nixon in the hospital.

Brock: Yeah.

Smith: Everyone told him: God knows, don’t do that. But he did.

Smith: How should he be remembered?

Brock: Oh, I think, for precisely what he did. And that is to hold us together. For us in the House as a party to recover from some down times, for as a country, the same thing. Having the comfort of somebody that the American people could say, “This guy is solid. He is Michigan-solid. He is one of us. We can relate to him as a human being. We would never have a sense of any failing, any question about integrity, for goodness sakes, but also just the fact that [he’s] a good man. A good man. The kind of person you want in leadership. Holding us together, getting through one of our more traumatic times in the last fifty, sixty years, at least. That was a singular contribution, not everybody could have done it.”
Smith:  Last thing – last question. Fall of Saigon, and all of that – the roof fell in on him not once, the roof fell in on him repeatedly, including the responsibility for those last days in Vietnam. And Congress wanted to pull up the drawbridge – they didn’t want to bring refugees out of Vietnam, and he took that fight to the country.

Brock:  It was again, doing the right thing. We could have gone in – I was there – mid- fifties, I helped to evacuate the Catholics. They were denied jobs, the ability to practice their faith by the Communists when they took over. We watched the meanness of that war. We watched the courage of the Vietnamese who fought for their country and their freedom. And Jerry Ford, and all of us, at least a lot of us, felt this country has a moral obligation that’s really deep.
We did a lot less than we should have. He knew that. But doing the right thing was, again, Jerry Ford.

Smith:  That’s perfect. Perfect.

Smith: Thank you very much for doing this. Tell us how did you come to have such an intermittent and longstanding association with the White House.

Seale: Well, I was at the Smithsonian as curator of architecture, and had written a history of state capitals with Henry-Russell Hitchcock. I was very interested in going on to something about houses, but I didn’t know what. I never could get my teeth into it. I got interested in the White House and the White House Historical Association wanted to do in ’74 or ’75 – ’75, I think – wanted to do a film about the White House. So I left the Smithsonian to do that and we went through a year or two of interviewing movie people and people like that. And there was nothing to base a movie on. So I proposed I do a book about the White House, and went under contract with the association to produce a history of the White House.

So I was there all the time. I want to make it clear, with the Fords, I was not an intimate member of the family, pulling up a chair to the table. I was at the fringes of things, and very much at the fringes of things, and not a lot there. Of course, I was all eyes and ears, and Mrs. Nixon – I did not meet President Nixon – I met her two weeks before his resignation when I started – in the summer.

Smith: What was the mood like at that point?

Seale: It was the strangest thing I have ever experienced. The day of the actual resignation I was over there and the action was taking place in the East Room of the state floor, and people on the floor below were all watching it on television. It just hit me as very odd. And then when I left, out in the street, there must have been the nearest re-creation of an 18th century hanging in England as ever happened. Every kind of person and every kind of riffraff in the streets, including a porn queen, Linda Lovelace, in a see-through black lace dress, passing out pictures of herself. And then, of course, as is famously known, I’m sure, Mayflower pulled up a van in front of the House and left it. It wouldn’t happen today.

It was just a terrible setting that I’m sure the Nixon’s weren’t even aware of. They went from room to room, going east through the White House, and as they left a room, starting the evening before, the room was vacated and the things were taken downstairs and put in a moving van and taken to storage, which was then at National Airport. And then at last, in the Lincoln end of the House – there was no furniture in the rest of the house that was theirs, just the stock stuff in the White House – then they go downstairs and that’s it, and out the back with the Fords to the helicopter.

So that part I saw on television and I was not there during the move, but the Park Service made the move and everyone talked about it.

Smith: You said you met Mrs. Nixon?

Seale: I met Mrs. Nixon, yeah. She was rather willowy and sweet. She had a calming, very feminine quality. It was just a brief meeting about the film – that there would be a film.

Smith: Did it seem a little surreal to be talking about this book projected at some indeterminate point in the future?

Seale: It was actually a film during her time, but I always wanted to do a book on the House. So, yes it did. And she was very charming and loved the idea. She was used to talking to a lot of people. But it was a very pleasant encounter. I remember very vividly, she was pretty in a soft sort of way. Certainly not a movie star way.

Smith: And then, of course, when they left – the Fords didn’t move in for a week – and I guess the story was that Julie had been left behind to sort of supervise.

Seale: She came back on a bike everyday.

Smith: Really?
Seale: Julie did, and removing things. But they had moved most things. And then, of course, the West Wing incident with the filing cabinets being moved.

Smith: What was that?

Seale: Well, one of the staff, after Nixon’s departure, went to the big window at the end of the West hall and looked down and there were Army trucks in a line and filing cabinets were being taken out. And this was ordered stopped at once. And I remember hearing all about that with the Parks Service people and how they said no, this was not to happen. And then there was a lot of back and forth. The Nixons lived all over the White House. Some people don’t. The Fords didn’t.

Smith: What do you mean by that?

Seale: Well, they lived upstairs in the apartment, I call it. It’s forty rooms or something, but it’s a lot of rooms. But the state floor and the floors below stay the same. The Nixons were very interested in antiques and things. Mrs. Kennedy’s renovation had been making the White House a setting for television, basically. And it was very wise – why not? That is what it is – a stage. So that was defined under Kennedy with a great interest in historical embellishment. But the quality of the contents was not on a level with what the Nixons acquired. What is in the White House today is from the Nixon administration and you know they had appointed Clem Conger from the State Department to come supervise it.

Smith: He was sort of a legendary figure in his own right.

Seale: Yes, he was. He was a character. I’m amazed Nixon put up with him, but anyway, he did.

Smith: We’ve heard Mrs. Ford and he had their differences.

Seale: Oh did they ever. There is correspondence for that. But Clem Conger was very good at what he did with this, I should say, the class of people that he dealt with. Some of his talks would make MSNBC turn over in their graves, with some of the political things he said and some of the promotional films he did. But he was doing what he was doing. And that was very much on Mrs. Nixon’s behest. I knew him well. And referring to the apparent freedom with which he pursued his collecting, he said, “Oh, she was personally very interested.” It’s been misinterpreted that the Nixons were in a rivalry with the Kennedy administration. I never, in all my research, saw one indication of that at all. I never heard an antique dealer say it – they naturally loved her for the business she generated. And she was more of a participant than Mrs. Kennedy in the actual hands on. She went in the car to historic houses all around Washington and studied the crown moldings and the centerpieces in the ceilings. Edward Vason Jones from Atlanta, an architect who was an expert in period decorations guided her, suggests what they might put in the rooms to make them more period historical. She was along. She helped select these things. But really we have no written record of that unfortunately. It’s not the kind of thing you record. She was busy, busy, busy. And Mr. Jones would get her for two hours and he and Clem would drive around to Riversdale or one of these big houses to show her moldings – somebody has to make the decision - and she would select from what she saw. All the original had been torn out in 1948 to ’52.

Smith: Do you have mixed feelings about Harry Truman?

Seale: I think he did what he had to do to save the White House. And I think it would horrify people today, but we are more pedantic in our restorations today. Harry Truman was a “Masonic” historian. You’re a presidential historian; he was a Masonic historian. He thought in grand sweeps. So if he could save those stone walls and make the house still functional for a president to live in – by his philosophy, he had saved the White House. And I agree, I think he did. Because, had that house been meticulously gone into by the late famous restorer Charlie Peterson, who would have saved every scrap, it would be a House museum today, it wouldn’t be the White House where the president lives.

Smith: What do you mean by that?
Seale: You could no longer live in it as it stood after World War II. It was too much a wooden structure, not only for the use of structural timbers so much; but the lath that held the plaster on the walls, because most of that 1816 material was still there. McKim and White in 1902 put steel lath in and they just stapled it on top of the original wood. So the place was a firetrap - whatever anyone may say, it was, at least as a residence for the president. The Corps of Engineers realized this right after Pearl Harbor, when they made a complete structural survey of the House. When told he must move out, Roosevelt slapped the report on the table and because he loved old houses, here he said, “I’m not going to move.” The Civil Defense then wanted him to paint it camouflage – he thought that was the funniest thing that ever happened. But after Mrs. Roosevelt had gone and with her 13 truck loads of Roosevelt possessions, President Truman began having some signs of structural trouble in the building. The engineers brought him their earlier report.

Smith: And there had not been, throughout the Roosevelt years, any signs of physical/imminent decay?

Seale: I know the floors jiggled. But FDR lived in old houses and he loved old houses like his own up the Hudson, and Stratford Hallm, an 18th century home he loved down in Virginia. And he liked the “old” part – age was part of the romance of the house. So he would not have been one to change things. He did work on the house the entire time he was there with the White House architect Lorenzo Winslow. His interest in houses made him move right in and make the home fit what he wanted. Winslow had an office in the house. He and President Roosevelt designed the library. They built the swimming pool, of course, immediately. And they did many other things. Roosevelt was busy with the White House. But as far as a higher level of maintenance – that organic maintenance necessary to old buildings – he wasn’t interested.

When Truman went in, that huge central hall on the second floor – that runs transverse to the House – it was virtually empty. There were bedrooms that didn’t have a bed in them. The living quarters weren’t furnished. So your floors really jiggled with nothing to stabilize them. Anyone who knows buildings, knows jiggling normally means wooden floors are healthy, if you can just stop the jiggling. But the steel that McKim and White had run in, in 1902 had worked against the natural movement of the house, and the brick and timber were cracking. More famously, of course, Margaret Truman’s piano - one of the two pianos in her sitting room, the caster on the leg went between two of the boards of the floor. I don’t think Roosevelt would have been disturbed at all by this. But the press took it on because it was a quick image. And Truman had to admit they were correct when they brought that 1941 report to him. I did interview some of the engineers who were still living in the seventies and they were still concerned that one fire bomb in the entrance hall could set that house like a lantern. And it just was foolish – as President Clinton later said about closing Pennsylvania Avenue – it would just be foolish not to listen to the experts.

Smith: Well, it’s interesting because the first president Ford ever met was Harry Truman. He met him as a freshman congressman, he was the lowest of the low on the committee overseeing the White House restoration/renovation. And he never forgot being given a tour of the House by Harry Truman.

Seale: And all the stories that went with it. Truman had a million.

Smith: And, of course, I guess the balcony was controversial in its day, and he never dreamed thirty years later that they would be spending the Fourth of July out there. It seems like every president since has been grateful that Harry Truman put the balcony up there.

Seale: Well, where design is concerned it was an unfortunate addition. If they had set the “shelf” of the balcony back from the columns even twenty inches, it would have been beautiful. But they didn’t, probably because to do so would have taken floor space away. It’s not an enormous porch. And they all love it. It’s their patio.

Smith: Could a president do that today?

Seale: Oh, yes.
Smith: Do you think he could get away with it?

Seale: The question is, would he? The president can do anything he wants to the White House. A person could go in there that liked Moorish interiors with incense and put cushions on the floor, and empty the room. It’s funny. I think nine times out of ten cases, the public would cheer. People love to know what the president does there and how he lives. But no president is going to do anything as radical because the White House is, as Taft first said, is a very valuable place as it has always been. Taft’s wife had a stroke and he had to tend to some of the state dinner details, and he did a seating chart with his aide, Archie Butt. He didn’t want to do it, but once he had finished he turned to Archie, and he said, “Archie, this White House is a very useful place.” So he put people where it worked politically.

Smith: I have often thought we need a new biography of Taft.

Seale: Oh, he was magnificent, brilliant, too.

Smith: I think Taft is one of the least appreciated presidents. In some ways there are parallels with Madison, or Hoover – someone who was hugely successful in every other part of his career but the presidency. And even the presidency was less unsuccessful than, I think, the conventional view. But he didn’t, by his own acknowledgement, have a political bone in his body. And that’s the most political office in the world.

Seale: The Taft years are very interesting to me because of Roosevelt, with his crazy attempted comeback.

Smith: Have you read Edmund Morris’ third bio?

Seale: Yes.

Smith: I was surprised. I think of Edmund as a romantic – which is why I thought he and the first volume were made for each other. I don’t think Edmund is someone who frankly cares a lot about the governing process. And I figured the third volume would be very much like the first. Of course Edmund’s thirty years older, too, and has lived a lot. I thought the third volume was in many ways extraordinarily bleak, and uncompromising in its portrayal of decay.

Seale: Isn’t that the way Roosevelt was? And grabbing that spotlight, wanting that spotlight? But ultimately failing after the presidency. At least he was not taken seriously enough to be restored to the presidency – but was willing to destroy Republican chances to further himself.

Smith: It’s a brave book. I think it’s not as commercial as it might have been if Morris had taken a little more sentimental approach.

Seale: I think there was a lot missed in Roosevelt by missing Edith. Silvia Morris did a wonderful book on Edith Roosevelt, but I think there is a lot more to be done about her, to interpret – she was extraordinarily powerful over him. And she lived so long. And there she lived until what – 1947? And nobody interviewed her? She wrote some books about her trips, but she was a very strong individual and very demanding. She restrained his circus tendencies. In Europe, after his presidency, he wanted to call on the royalty wearing his Rough Rider clothes, and she put the quietus on that. She was always there. At the White House her right hand man and friend for most of their retirement years (he died around World War II) was George Cortelyou. And they would clip off these things that Mrs. Roosevelt wanted to do, which I find absolutely fascinating.

Smith: In the case of the Fords, a classic of opposites attracting…She was never on time to anything in her life. And he was religiously punctual. Was that something that people noticed?

Seale: I never remember hearing anything about that. The main themes that I remember dealing with her – he comes across as a constant. She seems flighty, you know, in the shorthand of the press.

Smith: It’s funny you say that, because people often comment that he was much bigger than they had expected.
Seale: Strikingly, and yet in his movements, you didn’t see him that way. But I’ll never forget shaking hands with him. Every time it felt like I had a paw and his hand was monumental. They said at the White House at the time that Betty Ford was stage struck. That she got to the White House and here it was, a great empty stage for her alone and an audience, a full house. She could pick up the phone and call anybody in the world. And that she would sit at night and call movie actors and stage people. Then she got in the hands of social people, or PR people, who began to try to frame her, make her into a character. And I guess this all follows from Jackie Kennedy, I don’t know. Pat Nixon, I guess, never really fit into such an image. But Mrs. Ford said flip things – I looked these up – these sleeping with your husband lines, all that – she didn’t originate those remarks. Someone had put her up to that. To a reporter she would say, “Well, the next thing you were going to ask me is…” Then the reporter said, “Well, what if I did?”

Smith: Goading.

Seale: Then she would make the answer that I suspect had been decided beforehand. The symbol of that attempt to be a character to me is David Kennerly’s picture of her standing in stocking feet on the Cabinet Room table. There is even a certain vulgarity to that picture, considering the place and its meaning. But I don’t think that’s the Betty Ford who is going to go down in history. I think she changed. Of course, she made a remarkable change – the shoes fit her finally. She seems to have discarded those who would “image” her.

Smith: That’s interesting. Describe what you mean.

Seale: I think she became after some delay the first modern First Lady on her own. She did it without borrowed frills. She did not follow the Kennedy path, yet appreciated her surroundings. At the White House, she couldn’t have cared less about the interior decoration. She thought the Nixons had done a beautiful job, leave it alone. There was one room that she thought had too many legs in it – I think she called it the Leg Room – I think it was the oval room upstairs - the sitting room - where they had their cocktail parties – pre-dinner things. And she called it the Leg Room. I only know her feeling about interim because of hers and Clemet Conger’s memos to each other. He had plans he wanted to redecorate at the locomotive speed he had kept under Nixon, and she didn’t. There was a particular piece of furniture, for example, that he had paid a great deal of money for. When she sat on it, her feet couldn’t touch the floor. She sent it to storage and he brought it back. And the Parks Service people trembled with fear at a battle of back and forth never seen before at the White House.

But Mrs. Ford was a genteel person. When it seemed time, she handled it. That’s typically what happened to her at the White House. She kind of grew into it. And I think she softened the Kennedy thing that dominated so through Johnson and, to an extent, Nixon. Betty Ford was the president’s wife and when the Ford’s left office she was First Lady. She looked great. There are many new things what’s she’s famous for - the story about her personal situation - she was willing to talk about it publicly. She was able to say things a lot of women would not be able to, at least and be heard. I don’t think Mrs. Clinton would be a person to do that. She has to do her own thing, too. But modern in the sense that the individual suddenly fit and interpreted the office of First Lady in a personal way that embodied the larger scene. And that is why I think Betty Ford is very important historically, and will be.

Smith: That’s interesting. Remember in the family dining room, there was the Revolutionary War paper that Mrs. Kennedy had found.

Seale: The “Wonders of America,” yes.

Smith: And I think Mrs. Ford had it covered up.

Seale: She had it removed. It wouldn’t exist if it hadn’t been put on linen originally. So all they do is detach it and put it in acid-free paper and take it to storage. So it can be stuck up again.

Smith: And, in fact, it was.
Seale: She thought it was gloomy, and it was – on the north side. So she had the room painted, as I remember, yellow, something like that. And it was just a sunnier place, because they were big breakfast people, I gather.

You want to hear a story about that mural?

Smith: Yes, absolutely.

Seale: Peter Hill - now a famous antique dealer in New England, and the crème de la crème of Empire and Victorian furniture. I mean, nobody would question anything he had – and his wife, were a young couple with nothing, living in Washington in a difficult part of town. And Baltimore was bulldozing these beautiful, beautiful federal buildings block after block of urban renewal insanity. This paper was in one of those federal period houses. Peter went and paid a little fee to the bulldozer man who left early, and he and his wife took spatulas or scrapers and things and spent the entire weekend, twenty-four hours a day, peeling that paper off the plaster and re-backing it and putting it together in the most meticulous way. It was one of those seeds of a great tree. Mrs. Kennedy’s committee paid $15,000 for it. The Hills had nothing in it except whatever they bribed the bulldozer man with, which is famous. And then Peter set up his business and his business grew and grew and grew.

Smith: That is a great story. Supposedly, Mrs. Ford had some crack about how depressing it was to be eating and seeing all these people shooting each other.

Seale: It’s very fine for what it is, but you know how that can be. It depends on where you put it. The White House is a workplace more than a museum. The workers need to be comfortable at home.

Smith: On so many levels, here was this family, which I still find astonishing…that summer [of 1974], when everyone else in America was talking about what might happen, they never had that conversation. Which illustrates the limits under which he was operating. He couldn’t even discuss it with his own children. Now, I’m sure he and Mrs. Ford – but one senses that even she was in a state of denial. I think until about a week before it actually happened, I don’t think they had a serious conversation. So here you have this family that’s almost hermetically sealed off from these raging political currents; he had never aspired to the presidency; she certainly had never aspired to live in the White House. She was counting on their retiring; going home to Grand Rapids. And suddenly they are pitch-forked into this maelstrom.

Seale: And a very active family. The whole bunch of them. They were very dramatically energetic.

Smith: How so?

Seale: The children were always doing something. They were always busy with some sort of project. The son Jack lifting weights up on the third floor – they set up an exercise room – and that sort of thing was going on all the time. She had her public activities and was just as busy with family. But in a way, to me, they were the first in many years who never seemed really to live there. And maybe that’s more in my memory, for the fact that the house didn’t change much. They simply took the White House for what [it was]. And the people who followed them have more or less done the same. Unless something was broken and they fixed it. Mrs. Bush, the second, re-did the Lincoln bedroom, more of an alteration than the rooms had known in thirty years. That room has a Betty Ford story by the way. That was one of the rooms Clem Conger had planned to redecorate. She wanted redecorating to stop. It’s a mess to live around that, and so most first families have put up with it if they had to, but, anyway, she went out of town on one of the tours they took, and returned and in spite of her earlier direction, the decoration was underway. She stopped it instantly. The curtains and so forth were all taken out to storage. So the room still had Harry Truman’s textiles and things in it – literally tattered and worn out. That’s why, finally, Mrs. Bush bit the bullet. I think they changed a few things earlier, but then Mrs. Bush did work so extensive that the Lincoln room became comparable to a state room, although it is not officially so.

Smith: Gary Walters told us a great story. It’s revealing in many ways. His first day on the job, first full day on the job was a Sunday. And a call came and it was the President. And you just knew he wanted to say, “Oh, hi, Gary, this is Jerry Ford,” but he sort of caught himself and said, “This is the President.”

Anyway, he said, in an almost apologetic tone, “You think you could get someone to take a look, when it’s convenient, at the shower because I don’t have any warm water.” And Gary was a little flustered because the engineer, I guess, isn’t there on Sunday. But he knew they would be going to church, and he said, “We’ll take care of it Mr. President, when you come back from church.” He said, “No, that’s fine, no big deal. I haven’t had hot water for two weeks.” And he just walked down the hall and used Mrs. Ford’s shower. Can you imagine Lyndon Johnson saying…

Seale: No. He had the shower torn out, anyway.

Smith: And so then I had to ask Gary about the Johnson shower, and I did not realize Rex Scouten tested it personally once when LBJ was out of town, and was practically blown out of the bathroom. And then, and only then, was Johnson satisfied with the shower.

Seale: Nixon got blown around, too. He didn’t know it was powerful like that. It had been shown to him by President Johnson, and then they turned the thing on and it knocked him around a good bit, too.

Smith: It’s interesting what you said – did they seem at home in the White House?

Seale: I never thought so. But I think had he been re-elected, yes, probably so. But remember, there was the house in Alexandria. And this is one of the amazing things to me, they seemed to have thought all along that they would return to that house, which is in a nice Alexandria neighborhood. A split level, just what they loved with a swimming pool. They rented it for a while. And they went there just before they left the White House, and the Secret Service told them there was no way they could ever live there again.

Smith: Really?

Seale: I think it’s strange to prevent people who have just faced these things as they come, but…

Smith: It’s like Coolidge going back to the duplex in Northampton.
Seale: Right. It’s not going to happen.

Smith: It didn’t work.

Seale: No. They thought they could go back there, because they loved that place, they were very happy there, and it’s a real friendly neighborhood. But the Secret Service - you would have to buy the neighborhood. We’d have to rope off the street. So Mrs. Ford, I believe she says this in her memoirs, she said that they didn’t know where they were going to go. They picked Palm Springs as a maybe because it was near a golf course. And then they rented a house there that the Secret Service approved and she said, not for me. And they lived there a year and then moved down closer to town. But they eventually sold the house in Alexandria.

Smith: Early on in the presidency, he installed a swimming pool.

Seale: Oh, I remember all that.

Smith: Was that a controversy? That’s a pretty significant change.

Seale: I don’t think President Ford even thought of that. He swam a lot, and there was a beautiful pool at the Y, three blocks away. That pool suited him. But the Secret Service didn’t like it; he did; the Secret Service didn’t. He didn’t ask for anything. And then the National Pool people in California became involved, and donors became involved, and the Park Service became involved, and the architectural drawings they made were for a very exotic underground Las Vegas apparition. You went down levels and terraces with plants, and into this huge sort of Roman bath.

Smith: Shades of San Simeon.

Seale: Right. And so finally they settled on basically an ample-sized backyard pool. And that’s what the White House pool is. The inside pool Nixon floored to make the press room. It’s still down under there, with all the beautiful sea green tiles. President Ford really wanted to continue his swimming. People moved in like this to please him.
Smith: Was it a short walk from the Oval Office?

Seale: It is just right behind the building. It’s no distance at all. And the family has their times of use, and then the staff can use it between times, like the tennis court.

Smith: Let me ask you – it may be a sensitive question – but put in the broader context because Mrs. Ford has been very candid, in print and verbally over the years. One senses that people fifty years ago in this town just drank a lot more than they do today.

Seale: Oh, they did. When I moved here in ’71, the line was, “If you want to have a cheap party, have a cocktail party,” because the liquor was so inexpensive. And people did just drink like fish. In restaurants and in bars and private houses – it was drink, drink, drink. And that’s, of course, slowed down now considerably. But in Mrs. Ford’s case, I wasn’t surprised. I know nothing about the pill side of things, but I know that exacerbates problems. That the Fords would be fairly heavy drinkers, wouldn’t set them apart from anyone else. My God, especially after Lyndon Johnson, he was a very heavy drinker. And I remember one White House employer told me, “We could have a morning party for the Ladies’ Aid, and the Johnsons would have a bar.” But it was the way it was in Washington. And now they say they sell more bottled water than they do liquor. But the hard stuff – people drank it. And that’s the world the Fords came from – the Washington world.

Smith: And some smoking, too.

Seale: One description of the Kennedy party in the Blue Room, is that you couldn’t see anything for the smoke. It was just a big, grey cloud over everything. And people smoked a lot.

Smith: We have great stories from the social secretaries about how things have evolved over the last half century. But some things never change, including the people who try to move the place card settings.
Seale: Oh, I didn’t know that. I missed that one. I would think that was a very dangerous business.

Smith: They didn’t get away with it. Then there’s the lengths to which some people would go to get into a dinner.

Seale: Oh, yeah, I can imagine that.

Smith: Bess Abel tells the great story about, I think it was the King of Sweden who was coming to America. And there was some very prominent businessman, presumably either he or his wife was of Swedish nationality, and they tried everything they could think of, unsuccessfully. And then the story was relayed through Bess to Mrs. Johnson that the wife was dying of cancer. And Mrs. Johnson took sympathy on her and they got in. And she may still be with us, but she certainly had a miraculous recovery.

Seale: You know Washingtonians feel very left out of White House events. Historically, early on, there was a list that developed through the 19th century – it was called the Made List at the White House. And it was a list of the locals who were acceptable to come to the three or four or five state dinners, or official occasions to mingle with the crowd. Because of early-day transportation, you know, you couldn’t always get a big crowd. And time went on and the airplane came in and people could come. Like your Swedish dinner, anybody could come for that. They’d go from London for that, probably. They do all the time. And then in 1934, FDR did away with the Made List. Said he could get more public attention from having movie stars. He would only have them to luncheons, not dinner. And the performers at the musicals usually didn’t come to dinner, either. But the Made List expired and it was almost the same year or the next year that the Green Book in Washington came out with a list of the socially acceptable in the capital.

Smith: Years ago at the FDR Library, you could buy replicas of the matchbooks that FDR designed that said, “This matchbook stolen from the White House.”

Seale: I didn’t know that. But today they put out various “things” for people to steal. They’ve had to stop using linen hand towels in the bathrooms. They have paper now because people take the linen ones. Things are likely to be taken from the table, and there is a policy that if silver is taken at a dinner, the butler, who sees the indiscretion goes and stands beside the culprit as everyone is getting up to leave. They don’t usually have to say, “Would you please put that back.” But they are prepared to do so.

Smith: Tell us about the permanent staff, the people who really run the White House and serve the family. They have a unique role, don’t they?

Seale: They do.

Smith: One senses they are always thoroughly professional, but that some families develop a closer or more relaxed relationship. I heard that both the Bush families were very highly regarded by the permanent staff. In the case of the Fords, the story is on a Saturday afternoon, the President was watching a college football game. And someone would come in to the room and offer him something. And he’d say, “No, thanks, but come on in and watch the game.” Which almost created a problem.

Seale: It would.

Smith: You have this job and this relationship – on the one hand it’s flattering…

Seale: And fellow workers see you in there with your feet propped up. Yeah. I can see where that might lead to an organizational problem. First families develop these friendships with staff. Look at Rex Scouten and the Reagans. They adored him, they trusted him – everyone would trust him. It’s a special kind of job, to work at the White House. I tried to link the White House management customs of great English houses, which are more or less patterned on what people used to do long ago with a big household staff composed of many people with particular responsibilities. But that kind of domestic work in England is an established profession. And it has its own rules and it has its traditions. Being a butler or being a chambermaid is a regular job. It’s not so in this country, but the White House was set up that way more or less because the structure worked over time. And it remains that way.
Different presidents made big changes. The Theodore Roosevelts re-vamped the White House physically and organizationally to serve America’s new world power. They printed rule books for every position on the staff. It was a job description of what you were supposed to do, house and offices – for example, one’s desk was to be cleared when he leaves every day. Nothing was to be left on the desk. The individual employee was responsible for the little book itself, which must not be found outside his possession, or he was dismissed. And the rules underlined the authority of the ushers in the White House. This functionary by name was an announcer in a European house. Ushers were traditionally intimate with the family, the go-between between the individual, the important person, and public business – everything. They made decisions that kept the machinery oiled. James Buchanan brought that title to the White House when he came in the 1850s, having been at St. James’. Now there are a lot of ushers and there are a lot of butlers, where you would have one of each in Europe. It follows the old regimented way, and the staff accepts that and the fact that it is ongoing. Universally, they know that the White House operation is ever-moving and that certain individuals guide it; their job is to support that individual so he can do what he has to do.

Smith: You wonder, with the Fords coming out of modest circumstances. And, more important, they had never imagined themselves being in this kind of setting. You wonder if there was any kind of cultural acclimating that needed to occur.

Seale: I don’t know. I’ve wondered that. Most presidents come from relatively modest living circumstances. I thought probably President and Mrs. Ford accepted the White House as you would accept living in a hotel, because that seems the nearest approximation. Few presidents in modern times have come from such domestic regimentation, even, really, going way back to Jefferson and those early people. Some southerners lived in houses where slaves, African-Americans served. Yet I never heard of a Southern house that had a regimented order to it in the European sense. They may have called their head man a butler, but no – they were more like helpers than trained servants. In the later 19th century some of the new millionaires on the East Coast imported British staff as professionals but over the long haul it wasn’t long-lived.

Smith: There is documentation through oral history, but I would think there is a fascinating story, as the civil rights movement unfolded, how it played out in the Eisenhower, the Kennedy and Johnson White Houses.

Seale: It would be very interesting to know. I only know of one anecdote. My understanding is that it didn’t make any difference at the White House until later. But the day the Civil Rights Act was signed, an architect friend of mine, Blaine Cliver, was at the White House, assigned by the Navy. At that time segregated dining rooms were still in operation for the White House staff.

Smith: Really?

Seale: Yeah. And that goes back to Mrs. Taft, I believe. Mrs. Taft segregated them.
They had never been segregated before. Nothing in Washington had ever been segregated before that early period.

Smith: I know Wilson gets a lot of heat for doing it throughout the federal service, and of course, Wilson was a Southerner.

Seale: Yes, he was, and not to mention Edith, his second wife. She was very Southern, from Rome, Georgia.

Smith: The Bicentennial must have presented all sorts of challenges, and for anyone who is stage struck, all kinds of opportunities, as well.

Seale: Yes, I think Mrs. Ford was kind of beyond stage struck by the Bicentennial. I do. She handled herself, I thought, very gracefully and very nicely. But, of course, we read about these things in history, about Cleopatra’s barge and the George IV’s parties with the live fish dancing silvery in the champagne. Well, this was close. Mrs. Ford staged the main Bicentennial dinner in the East Garden.

Smith: Was this for the Queen?
Seale: For the Queen. And they extended the air conditioning in ducts over the roof to blow into the tent because they are forbidden to film the Queen with beads of perspiration. So these ducts were run over the roof and cold air misted, was blown into the garden. And when you think about it, it’s for a relatively small group of people. But even this was outdone by the French response. They brought silver from Versailles, fine paintings – they had a silk-lined tent. By contrast, President and Mrs. Ford had a party that was rather simple to see, not wholly unlike a big wedding reception in any city in the USA.

Smith: And then of course, the famous incident with the Marine playing The Lady is a Tramp.

Seale: Oh, yes, for the Queen. I’m reminded of the General Marshall banquet held in recent years for American and German relations to World War II. Very conciliatory. The band struck up Lily Marlene. A big blush fell over the assembly, not the least General Powell, the host and MC.

Smith: And it takes a lot to diminish Colin Powell.

Seale: Clearly he was very embarrassed. You have to trust that a lot of people didn’t know the difference.

Smith: Were you around when Saigon fell in the spring of ’75?

Seale: I was around, but I didn’t…

Smith: Was there a palpable change in the mood about the place?

Seale: I don’t remember.

Smith: And the assassination attempts in the fall of ’75.

Seale: Oh, yes. Those were striking. That was scary. But I don’t think people know the extent of threats that come to the White House. All that happened with the Clinton administration. Many near-disasters happened, and I stuck my fingers in those bullet holes on the front of the House, they were deep into the stone. Those rolling panels at the windows were installed in the Ford time. When the Fords and all who followed ate in the dining room the glass rolling partitions – Gary may have told you about those. They’re about this thick, bulletproof. There are always threats, threats, threats, and starting with Theodore Roosevelt, they never shared those with the family because they were so horrible. Mrs. Roosevelt broke into tears when told about one written threat to catch her son Archie who was going to school over in Alexandria and cut his ears off. These hideous things parents they would hear, and so the Secret Service has always had one hell of a job. Whatever it is, they’ve handled it very well. It’s a little rough at first when they have to take action – like closing the [Pennsylvania] Avenue. Protecting President Ford, came to require many more agents than ever before, but that is small compared to today’s detail. They polish their technique. They must always know that another assassination might be near. For President Ford with danger seemed greater than with anyone before him.

Smith: And the most unlikely of targets. But it just tells you what kind of country we were at that point. It’s much more about us than him.

Seale: Oh I think so.

Smith: If you were asked to define Betty Ford’s impact on the White House and on the First Lady’s job, how would you describe it?

Seale: Well, I think in the future, when they are lining the First Ladies up, Betty Ford’s going to be very important. Because I don’t think she was trying to play First Lady when she got settled. I think her PR people tried to make her interesting to the press by being shocking. They tried to build a persona for Mrs. Ford. I think they were trying to make her interesting on a cheap kind of TV or Hollywood level. She came into her own on her own; by being Betty Ford she became First Lady. She became unique. All her predecessors had to cope with becoming First Lady. When it seems to me that after a period or trial that didn’t work – her being shaped by others – Mrs. Ford eased into the symbolic role. Jacqueline Kennedy fought First Lady bitterly. After she finished redecorating the White House she was gone a lot. Mrs. Johnson had to pinch hit for her in holding ladies events which are always part of the White House – punch and cookies, coke parties they call them behind the doors. Mamie Eisenhower started these as a practical way of bringing more people to the White House. As president’s wife Mrs. Johnson pursued her duties in a traditional way, replacing the public project Mrs. Kennedy had distinguished with her redecoration and restoration with beautification. Mrs. Nixon bought antiques. But Betty Ford brought her personality which had more impact than any project she undertook. Americans came to know her as an individual. Betty Ford was herself and I think that will be clearer as time goes by. And I think she is more imitated by subsequent First Ladies than people realize.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that. For example, once she went public with the breast cancer surgery – again one of the really striking things that we found, is just how unusual it was for people to discuss the disease. I think women discussed it among themselves almost in secret. But she had an enormous impact by example. And I think she was surprised. It was six weeks into the presidency, but I think that crystallized for her in a way that nothing else could, the potential impact that she could have. And then, of course, I’ve often said that she’s unusual, if not unique, among First Ladies, in that her historical impact may be greater after she left office. If you stop and think, between the breast cancer surgery and the alcohol and pills, and the Betty Ford Center and all of that, she’s had an impact on how regular people live in ways that some presidents don’t ever manage officially.

Seale: I would agree with that. A story I remember when they hadn’t been in office very long - a family in Alexandria that had been very close to them, particularly to Susan, there was a very terrible tragedy involving the violent death of the parents. And Arlington cemetery was where the funeral was. And Betty Ford prepared to go and then didn’t, and explained it to the family. She said it is a zoo wherever I go, and I can’t see going and ruining this solemn occasion. I always found that very touching. Likely a painful point of recognition of how his life had changed forever.

Smith: Yeah, can you understand?
Seale: Yes, I do. I can see the sort of wonder at the whole thing, the sort of reaction of, I’m a private person and I’ve been a private person, except when called upon. She was no recluse in her life before. She was always active with the Congressional Club and things in Washington cherished by the congressional people who have been there a long time. But suddenly, there is another person there – another world looking in on her. As it turned out she took the girls to go to the White House after the parents’. That’s where they went, not back home. It’s always been rather poignant to me.

Smith: And I’ve often wondered, when you go back and you look at the Morley Safer interview, the famous Sixty Minutes interview, and the things that she said. I’m struck by the unlikelihood that even a “modern” First Lady could or would say today, the things that she said thirty-five years ago. Mrs. Obama is extraordinary in many ways, but one gets the sense that they have made a very calculated decision to basically limit her activities to very traditional…

Seale: That’s the way the Obamas are. Their private life is capital P, private. Her mother manages the family needs and deals with the staff. There have been no photographs whatsoever allowed in the family quarters. Which has not been changed a lot. All the paintings are borrowed from museums, so the walls are pretty much vacant when a new family arrives. New pictures are borrowed. So privacy in the current family motif at the White House. Betty Ford was otherwise, and was willing to make public statements. She was so struck by what was happening to her, that she was sharing the experience. A sort of First Lady looking back on herself.

Smith: It’s interesting because I think in this town – as you know better than anyone – people put a label on everyone. It’s much easier to deal with a label than the complexity and nuance of real life. And as far as Mrs. Ford was concerned, she was this Cub Scout den mother, Sunday school teacher from Grand Rapids, Michigan. That was the label. And there has always been this other side – the performer, the Martha Graham dancer, the woman whose talents had been sublimated in the traditional roles of wife and mother.
Seale: But not a public woman. I mean, she didn’t want to be, or she would have been. She might have longed to be on the stage, as I think many women start out on a career and then marry and have children and then that career stops and What might have been is always back there. I deal with a lot of them who think, had they continued with their careers they would have been at the head of the show. It’s perfectly normal. And that may have been the case with Mrs. Ford. But she chose to be wife and homemaker, and she knew what she wanted.

Smith: When President Ford passed away, ironically, one of the things that people saw was just what a love match they had. Just extraordinarily close. I think he always felt a certain guilt about having been away as much as he was during those earlier years when he was climbing the ladder – typical of men of his generation and of his profession.

Seale: And to an extent today.

Smith: Of course. We talked to Steve recently and he said every single night that his dad was out of town, he would call and Mrs. Ford would line up all the kids, and they’d get on the phone and tell their father what they did that day.

Seale: Well, there are no shadows in that family’s life. They were very happy. There is that wonderful picture of them in the Oval Office, all lined up. Amazing, amazingly modern, too.

Smith: From someone who has been around a long time, how do you think he should be remembered.

Seale: Ford?

Smith: Yeah.

Seale: As a man who probably should have been elected again. I think he was amazing the way he harmonized everything. But his enemies were able to take the pardon and kill him with it. But the pardon had to be. It’s the reason Nixon resigned, is to avoid a long court drama even though, in fact, he might have won it. Well, the newspapers hated Nixon, that’s what they wanted. And I think Ford was a good president for almost a term. And I think history will remember him, always as a interim, and the one president that never stood a national election as president.

Smith: But you do have a sense in some ways, even in that short period, he fulfilled his historical mission.

Seale: Oh, yes. For certain. A very difficult one, at that. And turned heads away from the tragedy and back to business. Ford could have done otherwise. He could have capitalized upon the resignation to pump himself up, to increase his power especially with the press. He chose instead to use his time to calm the waters. When he went to office he had to face the storm the media had whipped up over the Nixon Watergate affair. This was the greatest stir the media had yet attached to the modern presidency and it was scandal-based. Gerald Ford faced the power of the media – but more a challenge, TV. I always like to say that beginning with Eisenhower TV was the presidency’s most significant transformation. Truman realized as the White House was being rebuilt, the power that what Kennedy called the little gadget – TV – and Truman began to honor it. He used the White House almost always as his setting. And he created the broadcast room, which is sort of ludicrous, a room about this big; and that was where they were going to broadcast from – it being a historic setting and TV would be visual. Then Eisenhower came along. Robert Montgomery was brought back to the White House – there’s a biography – and from movie star to director to master planner of TV. He had been there under Roosevelt, and he returned to organize Eisenhower for TV. Eisenhower at first was frightened of it. The biggest ordeal in getting the first broadcast was who was going to powder his shiny head and nose. And Robert Montgomery grabbed the powder puff and did it. Then Eisenhower grew right into television and loved it. And so the studio moved next door very quickly and did a lot of TV. It was the beginning of an era of a new level of communication for the president. A president today must be telegenic – is that word?
Smith: And to Ford’s disadvantage, quite by accident, 1975 is also the debut of Saturday Night Live, and a whole new – some would say ironic, some would say something else – a whole new sensitivity.

Seale: An awful lot of humor today is cynicism. Show business.

Smith: Perfect.
