Smith: First of all, obviously, thank you for doing this.

The afternoon of August 8th, 1974 was your confirmation hearing. How did that come about? How did the offer of the Council of Economic Advisors come about and what is the Council of Economic Advisors?

Greenspan: Well, let me start with telling you what the Council of Economic Advisors is. It’s a very small economic consulting operation with one client, the President of the United States. And its power is wholly proportional to the extent to which the President has relationships with the chairman of that council.

During the years of, say, Walter Heller and even Herb Stein, there were close relationships with the president. I was fortunate to have a very close relationship with Gerald Ford so our organization had a lot more influence for a lot of the reasons than I thought was generally historically the case.

Herb Stein, who had been my predecessor, had to leave for some reasons while the Nixon administration was in its last days. I recall getting a call from Bill Simon, then Treasury Secretary, saying that, “Herb was leaving and it was the consensus of those of us down here that you’re the only one that could possibly replace him.” And I said, “Bill, I purposely did not choose to take a position in the White House because I’m a private sector person and I much prefer to be in the private sector. I can give you several suggestions for that and I would suggest you look elsewhere.” And I did indeed give him several suggestions and I thought I was out of the loop. A couple of weeks later, he calls back and he says that, “We’ve given this considerable thought and it’s the conclusion of Arthur Burns and myself and the president” (which was then Richard Nixon) that I was the only credible source. I said, “Bill, I really can’t.” And that was the end of that conversation.

Smith: And Arthur Burns at this point was?
Greenspan: He was the next call. Arthur Burns then calls me with this, “Harrumph, harrumph, harrumph.” You have to understand that Arthur Burns had a very significant role in my life in the sense that I met him first in 1950 when he was on the faculty of political science in Columbia University where I was enrolled in graduate classes. I got to be very appreciative of his insights and the like, and in subsequent years we kept in touch as he went into government and out of government. And he and his wife and I often would get together for dinner at times and the like. And so there was a sense, a family relationship there, in which, when Arthur Burns spoke, “Yes, sir,” I would listen.

So he called me immediately after I turned down Bill the second time and he said, “Alan, you don’t understand. You’re not going to be working for Richard Nixon, you’re going to be working for the United States. We have very serious problems as you well of course know with the president and the functioning of government, and with all the political problems that exist. The country must run and it needs to have oversight of the economic system wholly independently of what’s going on in the rest of the world and in the White House and in the political system.” He said, “You’ve got to come down because we definitely do need you.”

So I said, “Arthur, really, I’m having great difficulty because I’m doing very well in the private sector. I’m enjoying immensely what I’m doing, my business is expanding.” And he says, “Well, would you at least speak to Al Haig?” So I said, “Of course, I’ll speak to Al Haig.” And so Al, maybe a day later or so, calls me up and says, “Could you come down and see me at Key Biscayne?” I said, “Alright.” The next day or the next day when I said I’d be going, one of the – I’ve forgotten what it is – but one of the larger private planes that were turned into the sort of VIP section which now runs out of Andrews Air Force Base was sent up to meet at La Guardia Airport with a steward, pilots, and the navigator. I mean it’s like all the pomp that you can imagine was set up for me, a single passenger, to fly down. I got on the plane and I said, “Now, seriously, what do you have in mind here?” I knew obviously what they were doing. So I met with Al and he said to me –
Smith: Can you put a rough timeframe on this? Was this July or—

Greenspan: It would be several weeks before Nixon resigned, but clearly he was in serious difficulty and I believe Gerald Ford was then Vice President at that point, obviously. And I get down and I see Al, whom I’d known over the years for many relationships which we had, and I said, “You know, I really have no interest.” And I said, “Look, Al, let’s understand what you’re dealing with here. If I had been in the administration when wage and price controls were set up in August of 1971, I would’ve felt the necessity of resigning. Not in indignation essentially in this ethical or moralistic sense, but I don’t know how that economy runs. I don’t know what you do and I wouldn’t be able to add very much to economic intonation.” And I said, “If that’s the way this administration is going to behave, I would feel very uncomfortable and I’m telling you, it’s very likely you’ll be confronted with a resignation from me if I were to come down in very short order.”

Then Al said, “Look, you would be a significant player in such decisions and, as far as we’re concerned, we’re willing to take the risk that you’ll quit.” I said, “Let me think about it.” I knew I had been weakened immensely and the main force there was Arthur Burns. I mean, Al was relevant. Before I left, he said, “Would you like to see the old man?” I said, “No, that’s not necessary. There’s nothing that he can say to me that’s going to make any difference” and one does not like to turn down the president of the United States, I just as soon not be in that position.

So I go home and I think about it and I called about two or three days later. I called Al back and I said, “I will agree to come down as an interim pending your ability to replace me in short order. I will be taking out a one month lease and, figuratively and maybe not so figuratively, I will have my luggage near the door ready to go,” because one of the reasons you don’t leave things, is it causes a lot of – I’m planning for a quick exit. He said, “Fine.” And they put my name up for nomination to the Senate and, I believe, August the 8th was my hearing. And August the 8th, of course, was a very famous day.

Smith: During those last days, to what extent even implicitly could you factor in the increasing likelihood that you might never be working for Richard Nixon?
Greenspan: I didn’t, because the smoking gun had not yet been discovered. It looked as though he was going to just struggle his way through because I knew that it is a very big deal to have a president resign. Knowing American history, that would utterly be unprecedented. And there were far more potential cases of where presidents were utterly dysfunctional and they stayed around for awhile. So it never quite entered my mind, but largely because I thought that my tenure there was going to be shorter than Richard Nixon’s. So that issue didn’t come up.

When I was called up before the Senate Banking Committee, I remember Bill Proxmire, who was then chair said, “It’s understood that the President is planning to resign today and this hearing may in fact be wholly moot.” I said, “I understand that.” I went through the hearing. It was very interesting in the sense that Proxmire and I disagreed on lots of things. I remember basically that, before the Committee, there were two votes potentially against me even though it might be moot, but they were very complimentary in the sense that Proxmire said, “I wouldn’t vote against you if you weren’t so intelligent. What we don’t want with the President is an effective sitting chair.” And Joe Biden said very much the same thing.

So, I was sort of in an odd position where I was being complimented in a very adverse way and the reason is that I just stuck to my guns. I could answer all of their questions. I obviously knew all of the subject matter exceptionally well because that was really my day-to-day operation. Essentially, moving from my offices in New York to chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors gave me a different boss, gave me a different geography, gave me a different environment, but the work was scarcely different. What I did at the CEA was almost 85 percent what I would’ve done in my private business. So that wasn’t a big transition there.

In any event, what occurred subsequent of course was Nixon resigned and Ford was sworn in as president. I’m told that Don Rumsfeld, who I had worked with periodically on occasion, had recommended to Ford that he essentially renew my nomination for chairman of the CEA. And indeed I’ve forgotten, but probably before then, when he was still vice president, Ford asked, when I had been discussed as being the CEA chairman, asked me to come by and see him and we spent for the first time, an hour together. I’d never met him before and I found him really quite extraordinarily interesting and a remarkably calm personality for a politician and we got along well.

When the issue came up of my coming down to work with Gerald Ford, it was a wholly different set of circumstances and a wholly different view because I didn’t go to the White House in 1969. I had seen Nixon because I worked with him fairly closely in the campaign and I felt very uncomfortable with him. He was really an extraordinarily intelligent person. In fact, when you look strictly at IQ, Bill Clinton and Richard Nixon were, as far as I could judge, at the top, but there was an odd psychology there which I didn’t quite grasp and made me very uncomfortable. Ford was very different. Ford was open, straight, never varied as long as I knew him. And, as I’ve said on innumerable occasions, I’ve spent 20 years in government, two and a half years at CEA and eighteen and a half years at the Fed, and Gerald Ford is my favorite president for many, many reasons. The irony is that some of them are those reasons which he would have had very considerable difficulty being elected president on his own.

Smith: You mentioned the calmness, I think the critics would equate that with colorlessness. I mean that there’s an almost condescending use of the word ‘decent’ as if somehow being ‘decent’ in a Midwestern sense is a euphemism for lack of sophistication, intellectual or otherwise. In some ways his virtues were turned into – Greenspan: I think that is blatantly condescending and utterly misplaced. Let me give you an example which I think is interesting. I would watch Ford dealing with Henry Kissinger who is, in himself, very interesting in many respects. Ford would in no way conceive himself as intellectually superior to Kissinger nor have an insight into global forces the way Henry has evolved over the years and still does. Yet there was never any question that Gerald Ford was president and Henry Kissinger was not. And it wasn’t handled in a way that “Henry, you haven’t been elected” surly. He would just basically calmly say, “Henry, I see where you’re coming from, but it doesn’t strike me just right. I think we ought to be going in a somewhat different direction…” and he’d say a few words. “Yes, Mr. President.” And it was very interesting, in that that there was never any tension which in any way implied that there was an inferiority complex. So what you saw in Gerald Ford is a psychology which, I hate to use the word ‘normal’, but it’s as close as to what one would term ‘optimum human psychology’ in the sense there were very few hang-ups.

Smith: David Broder famously said he was the least psychotic president he’s ever known.

Greenspan: That’s faint praise indeed.

Smith: No, it is, especially when you consider the competition.

You got there and inflation was the immediate dragon that needed to be slayed, which of course gave rise to Whip Inflation Now. What was the origin of that and what was your immediate reaction to that campaign?

Greenspan: Well, I arrived at my desk in the old Executive Office Building two or three weeks after the administration was in place. Herb Stein actually spent a couple of weeks as chairman of Gerald Ford’s CEA. So I arrive and one of the very first meetings I get called into – I think it was in the Roosevelt Room – and I’m sitting there in the back of the room along with maybe 20 or 30 other people when this plan, of which there had already had several discussions, and was already being developed, I’d never heard of it before. I’m sitting there, I’m saying, “Oh, my God, what do they have in mind here?”

What the problem was is that they were setting themselves up for failure. And so all I could do in that meeting was to suggest a few obvious problems which were going to arise if you induced somebody “voluntarily” to hold their prices. For example, cotton fabric manufacturers, they could do that only so long as the price of cotton didn’t go up. And no one was suggesting that farm products were in any way being constrained by this voluntary price movement, which is essentially what it was. And I suggested, “Mr. President you’re going to have to be aware that there’s an awful lot of small textile manufacturers, people who would very much like to join in to your very desirable approach against inflation, they may not be able to. And that as time goes on and half the economy is voluntarily price frozen and the other half is not, the system will break down and I think that we have to be very careful about that occurring. Well, Whip Inflation Now got undermined not by its own internal problems but by inflation becoming rapidly a nonexistent issue as the economy began to gather negative steam, if I may put it that way.

Smith: I’m fascinated, because I think you wrote that the whole WIN campaign actually originated in the speechwriters’ shop in the White House, which is revealing in and of itself.

Greenspan: Yes, indeed. I learned later that the origin was how can Gerald Ford be perceived as being essentially anti-inflationary, show basic concern about the nature of the problem, and words were put together without any notion of whether they applied to reality or not and it was a very good speech. The only problem was that it didn’t reflect any practical, conceivable policy that could be implemented. And, fortunately, it died and perhaps the last remnant that I have of it is some Whip Inflation Now button which I suspect may be worth a lot of money at this stage.

Smith: That raises a broader question. It’s sort of, and I don’t mean to pick on Bob Hartmann, but Bob Hartmann in some ways became the face of this notion that Ford, having spent a lifetime on Capitol Hill, came into the White House with pretty much a congressional mindset. [He] originally wanted to organize the Oval Office - the spokes of the wheel - which has the feel of a congressional office. Related to that was this complaint that he was surrounded by people from Grand Rapids. How much of that was relevant? And how much do you have a sense that he outgrew some of that during the two and a half years that he was president?

Greenspan: Oh, that was inevitable. You must remember that Bob Hartmann, I presume, wrote that wonderful line “Our national nightmare is over.” Now, that was so significant a phrase and the way he wrote was so effective in certain respects that it was natural for Ford, in my judgment, to lean on Bob to approach this. Now, the difficulty with it is that he did not have a back-up policy, it was a rhetorical policy, basically, and rhetorical policies are great if you don’t have to implement them. They’re wonderful for campaigns. The one thing about a campaign is that reality need not interfere with what you're saying. And I think there was still that element in there.

What happened over the years, inevitably, as issues became more and more complex, and the focus of the Grand Rapids coterie, which had some very good people in it, was a local type of focus on the types of issues which president of the United States goes far beyond. It was inevitable that he would have many, many individuals which would gradually augment and, in many cases, supercede the congressional structure or even the Minority Leader structure that he had on the Hill.

Smith: What was the Economic Policy Board?

Greenspan: The Economic Policy Board was a formal means that was set up by President Ford to organize the flow of information that coordinated and presented options to the president. My recollection is that Bill Simon was chairman as Secretary of the Treasury. It included Roy Ash, it included me. Arthur Burns was a visitor, so to speak, and Arthur used to say to me, “When you think the agenda is interesting, or will be interesting to me, let me know and I will come.”

He was advised of every meeting but he didn’t choose to show up at all of them. And it included all those cabinet secretaries who had some form or other of an economic interest. Bill Siedman, obviously of Grand Rapids, was the executive director of the board, meaning, essentially, the coordinator of policy under the chairman, which was Bill Simon.

The group met very often, filtered all various different types of recommendations coming down from the Hill, coming from other places, and essentially trying to debate within our group ideally to present the president with a series of options on a lot of policies. But we also thought it was useful, when there was essentially consensus within our group to say that, “This we think, Mr. President, that we may be giving you two or three different options, but we all strongly believe this is the correct thing to do.”

The reason that was important was that for lots of reasons the general economic philosophy of the Economic Policy Board closely approximated that of the president. And the important thing about economic policy is that every economist has got a fundamental view as to the way the world works. The vast proportion of us believe the same thing about many things like free trade, free prices. The vast proportion of economists are against price control and against protectionism, irrespective of whether they’re Republican, Democrats, or anybody else.

Ford’s general position was largely as a free trader, believing in market competition and economic freedom, and the Economic Policy Board had very much that same overall philosophy. It meant that the differences amongst us were not on the fundamental goals, but on the tactical implementation of specific strategies and it, therefore, was useful for us to say to the president, basically that, “We know your philosophy, we know where you want to go, we know various things, and while there are alternate ways of going there, this is the best.” And it worked rather well. In fact there was only really one major fundamental difference within the policy board which I will always remember.

That was, the issue came up about whether or not the United States should sell its gold. Now, the reason that was important is that interest rates were relatively high at that point. Gold has got zero interest on it, and indeed, it’s got a carrying cost, so really it’s a negative interest. So, the US Treasury was foregoing a very substantial amount of revenue by basically holding non-interest bearing assets rather than interest bearing assets. Now, Bill was a strong advocate in getting rid of most of our gold stock. Arthur Burns was absolutely adamant in the other direction. As a central banker, his essential view is that gold is and was the final means of payment.

I mean, it was always evident, for example, that in 1944, for example, Germany could not purchase goods outside of Germany unless payment was made in gold. So, gold always sat there as, elitist as it is today, that ultimate means of payment. The board could not come together on that. And with Bill Simon and Arthur Burns going at each other, the rest of us sort of sat back and were amused. So, Ford sat in on that meeting and –

Smith: With the two of them haggling this—Greenspan: With the two of them arguing together and I just sat there and I sort of like—

Smith: Neither one of them was exactly a shrinking violet.

Greenspan: Hardly. And they’re very good friends, but they went on each other with remarkable ferocity. And I sat bemused, saying, “The poor president, he can’t conceivably understand what these guys are talking about,” in part because I’m not overly certain that either one of them knows what they’re talking about fully. So, the meeting’s adjourned, I go back to my office, I’m sitting there for about two minutes and the phone rings and it’s the president’s secretary saying, “Could you come back to the Oval Office?” I said, “Certainly.”

So, I go back there, I walk in and Ford says to me, “What was that all about?” And I said, “Mr. President, you are just seeing a really major important economic issue of profound significance being debated in front of you. The problem is that no one knows for sure that, if you sold off the gold supply, what would happen. That you would get increased revenues, that is a factually accurate statement. But what the cost of that is, and the more fundamental aspects of what a market economy is, and its stability, and the willingness of people to accept the currency, is an unknown factor. Bill Simon cannot in truth say it has no effect and Arthur Burns cannot say in truth it has a huge effect.

“My own judgment,” as I said to him, “is probably it’s too high a risk to take. Frankly, if you want my advice, I’d forget the conversation.” And we still own precisely the same amount of gold today with a few little wrinkles here and there that we did back then. Nobody in the White House or, as far as I can judge, in government in the United States has really seriously thought about selling our gold stock. And indeed, when the Europeans in recent years - 1990s for example - decided that for exactly the same reason they’re going to sell off their gold stock, they did.

But even though we were a member of the G-10, which is the organization whose board are on the board of the Bankers for International Settlements - which is the vehicle which coordinated the gold sales - I very explicitly, as a board member, opted out for the United States. In other words, I actually at one point was the host of the meeting in which that was discussed and I essentially said the United States will not participate in these gold sales. And we didn’t. And that’s the only other time I recall it coming up in this country.

Smith: Now, what does this say about Bill Simon?

Greenspan: Well, Bill Simon was a very strong supporter of Milton Friedman at the time. As I recall, Milton had very much similar views and others had similar views. It gets down to an issue where you have to make a judgment, as we are indeed observing today - which is December in 2008 - we’re creating a huge amount of fiat money claims and in a sense doing something which the gold standard would not have enabled anyone to do. But we are doing it, at least at this point, creating huge amount of dollars without a significant impact on inflation or very much on the exchange rate as well. That’s the type of view that I believe Bill Simon thought of, but it’s now at a point in the discussions today where it’s a very crucial unknown issue, and it is reminiscent very much on a much larger scale clearly of the discussions that that economic policy board had on that particular extraordinary day.

Smith: But the story is implicit in what you’ve already said about Henry Kissinger and now about Bill Simon and Arthur Burns, that President Ford was comfortable with, for lack of a better word, a vigorous back and forth conducted by people of stellar IQ and significant ego.

Greenspan: Unquestionably. I mean, I agreed probably, I would say probably, with 98 percent of Bill Simon’s views. We’re very close in that regard. Actually less with Arthur Burns, because remember he was in favor of incomes policies, prior to the imposition of wage and price controls by President Nixon. Indeed I’m a private citizen, and Nixon at the time, through Chuck Colson, who called me and said, “The president would like you to talk to Arthur Burns about this.” I said, “Chuck, the president does have a telephone, does he not? He knows Arthur’s number.” And he says, “He’s not speaking to Arthur.” So it’s very interesting, but what was very attractive about that group of people was we all held the same views. I mean, how the world works, except on this particular issue, it was a very effective operation and Ford was clearly president of the United States in those discussions.

Smith: Let me ask you, just so we get it on the record: what was the fund of economic knowledge and economic assumptions that he brought with him from those 25 years on Capitol Hill?

Greenspan: He had a lot of related economic issues. He was on the House Appropriations Committee, and very knowledgeable about the federal budget over all that period. You cannot become knowledgeable about the federal budget unless you know a good deal about how the American economy works. And so, he was subject through various hearings, through all sundry types of things, that he got a very practical education on how the American economy functions. And, in that regard, he was remarkably knowledgeable about lots of things. And you could teach him because he had an underlying set of relationships where he could draw analogies and understand how things work, and he did grow in knowledge very clearly through the period.

Smith: I’m thinking, coming from Michigan and of course the auto industry, wasn’t there an approach initially from, was it Chrysler, that not long after the whole New York City business, wasn’t there an approach from the auto industry about government loan guarantees that were initially turned down?

Greenspan: Well, remember, Chrysler did get a loan.

Smith: Eventually they did. Yeah.

Greenspan: My recollection is that – I forgot what the year was, it not during the Ford administration – I think it was subsequent to that.

Smith: I know the loan guarantee came during the Carter years, but I thought that there was an initial approach from Detroit toward the end of the Ford years.

Greenspan: I don’t recall that.

Smith: Let me ask you, you sort of had this whipsaw. You come into office and inflation is clearly a significant and growing menace and yet within a matter of months you almost have to turn on a dime to confront radically rising unemployment. Was there a moment when it sort of dawned on you and/or the president that you were fighting a multi-front war?

Greenspan: Oh, indeed. One thing I recall is that you could see that the economy was weakening in the latter part of 1974, but it didn’t appear as though there were large inventory accumulations, which is usually what then was a critical triggering point. Then the Department of Commerce revised its numbers and I said, “Oh, my God, we have a problem.” At the same time, the economy was beginning to sag and I and the Economic Policy Board were telling the president that things were in the process of changing fairly rapidly.

Smith: How did you explain that change?

Greenspan: Well, basically, that the underlying forces of demand had been essentially suppressed by rising inflation. One thing about inflation is, people pull back when they’re confronted with rising prices. They save more, they’re uncertain. And that fairly significant inflation - which incidentally comes in part out of the aftermath of wage and price controls - that was beginning to grip the economy and you could see the erosion going on, but it wasn’t rapid. And so, we were communicating to the president and in writing my book I had to go back and look at some of the documents and it was there, we were saying that things are beginning to deteriorate and that it wasn’t a point in which I recall when somebody said, “Whip Inflation Now has now been rescinded.” It sort of gradually died from lack of mention.

And so it faded away and we were confronted with essentially what was a very tricky State of the Union message as we were coming up to 1975. And, unlike what you have today, where your word processors or such that you can change the State of the Union in the last twenty seconds, back then, we were still cut and paste and type, you had those old things called typewriters. And the speech continuously got revised, revised, and revised and by the end of it, I thought that he delivered a really thoughtful speech.

Smith: Remember, he did something no president before or since has ever dared to do. He said, “The State of the Union is not good.”
Greenspan: Precisely. And, strangely, it was so normal for Ford to be saying that. It wasn’t the “Oh, my God,” that he would say otherwise sounded utterly improbable and inappropriate. I’ve always said that there was sort of a Mayaguez incident type view that, in other words, instead of the president – remember when, I recall visibly because I was there, basically, Brent Scowcroft, I think he was then the National Security Advisor, came into an economic meeting and had handed a piece of paper to the president. He looked at it and he handed it back to Brent and says, “Just make sure that we don’t shoot first.” And I’m saying, “Now, what in the world was that?” Subsequently, I obviously learned that that was the first note that he’d been told that Mayaguez had been essentially boarded. I said, “You know, that was pretty, like, ____________ like your wife just called and said that dinner reservations have been changed.” And I had that same attitude with respect to: the economy is running up against potential significant problems and we’re likely to see some pretty awful early months of 1975.

Smith: Originally there was, by modern standards, a relatively modest tax cut that had been proposed by the administration. How did that evolve? I assume you came on and as the problem increasingly came to be defined as unemployment rather than inflation, presumably you were under growing political pressure to respond with Keynesian stimulation?

Greenspan: In fact, it’s always very useful to go back and read the current reporting on what was going on. One of the great values of writing a book is you’re forced to go back and to actually see what was said, not what your memory left with you, but what was actually said. The economy was weakening. It was moving down rather rapidly and unemployment was clearly moving up and there was a great deal of uncertainty. George Meaney came out with a proposal to run a hundred billion dollar deficit. Now, back then, a hundred billion dollar deficit was big stuff. There was general talk of just expanding, you know, doing all sorts of incredible programs and the pressure on Ford to respond to what was scaring everybody in the United States, it was phenomenal. His basic view was very cautious.
I recall his saying to me essentially, “How deep is this going to get? And how bad is this going to get? And what do we do about it?” I said, “Mr. President, we don’t do too much at this particular point, but let me tell you, the best I can judge, we are in a classic major inventory recession, the nature of which is that production falls very rapidly as you move from inventory accumulation, which is basically meaning production is above the level of consumption, down to well below it as you begin to liquidate.

The critical determination, however, of how this is going to materialize is whether what economists call ‘final demand.’ That is consumers, purchases, home building, capital investment, government expenditures, as differentiated basically from inventory fluctuations which, back then, were really quite expensive because we did not have just-in-time inventory, which has essentially changed it very importantly in recent years. So, inventory fluctuations were always a major part of a business cycle. But what you didn’t know is whether ‘final demand,’ that is consumer spending, is falling as well, and at that particular stage we didn’t know very much. So, what I did actually is—

Smith: Is GNP quarterly? You had quarterly GNP estimates?

Greenspan: Quarterly data which, at the time, came out quite a number of weeks after the quarter close, which is way too late. We did have the Industrial Production Index which the Federal Reserve produces every month, roughly two weeks after the close of the month, and that was far more current and you could tell what was going on. What I decided to do at the Council of Economic Advisors is to sit down with all of the people who are very good statisticians and economists and see if we could set up a whole series of real-time indicators which were either weekly or monthly and try to get an update, not necessarily on the exact numbers, but on where the critical question of this decline was. Whether we were dealing with an inventory contraction, which we surely were doing, but whether that was the whole business.

In other words, were we dealing with not only an inventory contraction but a fall off in so-called final demand? And so we set up a weekly GNP system which was not something I would want to show in public, but it worked. It essentially told us week-on-week what we needed to know: namely, whether in fact, this was very substantially an inventory adjustment which meant that when it turned it would come back very rapidly. Because if, for example, production is above consumption at the top, if it slips below, at some point you’re continuously liquidating inventories, you’re going to get to zero. And when you get to zero, or the lowest you’re going to get to, then you cannot liquidate anymore so that production must come right up to where the consumption level is and that’s precisely what happened.

We knew as best one can know in those types of circumstances that this is what we were confronted with and President Ford essentially says, “How confident are you that that is indeed the case?” I said to him, “Mr. President, clearly we’re dealing with fragmentary data. We’re dealing with data which are delayed or late, but as best we can all judge, we have not seen a major weakening in final demand which means, of necessity, that this thing will pop back.” And he said, “In that event, we’re going to do as little as we can get away with”

What he chose to do is accept a proposal which had been floating around at that time of doing a quick rebate and it was such that it had no long-term impact. It basically probably did some good with respect to final demand, but it was de minimus and he was excoriated by all those who either are in the press or the political system. And the fascinating thing which I’ve seen time and time again is that not only did that pressure disappear when the economy came back with a roar, but collective amnesia came over the whole political system in which those who had argued that we should’ve done much more, it never happened. And I have seen that time and time again and I think it’s a sad commentary on, I would say, the recollection capabilities of the American public.

Smith: But it also hints at a reason why he, in some ways, didn’t get the credit that perhaps a more flamboyant or self-dramatizing president would have gotten. I mean, in effect by not doing things, that’s the inverse of what we’ve all been led to believe as swashbuckling presidential leadership.

Greenspan: It’s called activism and sometimes activism is running in the wrong direction.
Smith: So, he was a true conservative.

Greenspan: Oh, indeed. He truly believed, he fundamentally believed in the Constitution, the rule of law, and the way a market economy operates and why it operates as effectively as it does. And while he could not get up and give you a lecture on the changing economics and all that stuff that we teach in school, and the pros and cons of economic multipliers and the like, he had a common sensical view of the way the world was working and in many respects - I mean, I’m an econometrician, I deal with mathematical stuff all the time. I sometimes look at all this complex stuff that we got with its presumed exactitude and I say, “You know, on occasion, if we were to just push this stuff aside and just take a look at what’s going on out there.”

And that’s what Ford did. You know, he had all sorts of contacts, especially in the business community, and he was up to date remarkably with what was going on, had a good sense of what appropriate policy was, and he had enough of a history to realize that cycles come and go. And while this was by far the most severe since the Depression, he basically recognized that we would come out of that in a way.

Smith: How much of all of this, in the background at least, was energy an issue?

Greenspan: Energy became a critical issue obviously largely because we, in the United States in 1970, finally created a level of consumption of oil, crude and products, which was exactly equal, net, to our productive capacity. Remember, we used to have the old Texas Railroad Commission which had quotas on crude oil production in Texas in order essentially to keep control over prices. Up until 1970 with the Texas Railroad Commission, they could control world oil prices and they kept quotas down until consumption finally inexorably rose up to our capacity at which point the pricing determination moved from the Texas Gulf to the Persian Gulf. And they didn’t know it, basically, until the Yom Kippur War caused a huge increase in prices which then lead to the endeavor to keep controls of oil and gas, which induced the long lines at filling stations. And it was a disaster. And indeed we have to struggle with that with all the various different grades of war and the complexity. Fortunately, the Reagan administration finally unwound the whole thing.

Smith: There’s a story that, at one point, the president respectfully urged, I mean, they put together this massive energy program, a 143-page document or something like that, and he asked his former colleagues on the Hill to create in effect an ad-hoc committee to address the emergency. And back came word that, “Well, that wouldn’t work because that would upset the existing jurisdictional elements,” and so on and so on. “It might be an emergency, but we couldn’t change the way we did business.” And, I guess the debate went back and forth, the president seeking decontrol of at least some energy prices, the Hill resisting. And eventually a deal was worked out, a handshake deal. I believe Mansfield and Albert came back a week later and said they were embarrassed, but they couldn’t sell it to their own membership, which raises the issue of post-Watergate.

You had that whole influx of the so-called Watergate Babies, people came in with a much more aggressive view vis-à-vis the White House and congressional relations and you were in the middle of all this and here you are trying to make policy. And the great irony is, here’s Gerald Ford who is a child of Capitol Hill, who finds himself in many ways defending executive prerogatives.

Greenspan: Well, the reason basically there was a problem was that we got ourselves in such a complex structure of various different types of oils and various different types of things that were going on that we brought on, remember, Frank Zarb as the “Energy Czar,” my tennis partner. And it was a complex mess. I mean, if you really want a lesson on what’s wrong with regulation, go sit yourself in the middle of that type of thing. And it worked very poorly, and indeed, it created the huge gas lines and very negative reaction there. In fact, the one interesting episode that I always remember with respect to this is that Nelson Rockefeller, then vice president, had this big, big hundred billion dollar project. Now, a hundred billion dollars back then was real money.

Smith: The Energy Independence Corporation.
Greenspan: Yes. And Zarb and I actually pounded on Ford, and Cheney was with us, who was then Chief of Staff, and we got him to the point he said, well, he’s not going to support him on this issue. Two or three weeks later, I get a call to come to the Oval Office and Ford says to me, “Remember my promise about saying ‘no’ to Nelson?” I said, “Yes, sir.” And he says, “The pressure’s too much. I’ve had to cave.” I said, “I understand that.” And he said, “You know, I want you to know I really apologize for that.” I said, “Mr. President, you’re president of the United States. We are your advisors. You have to make those decisions. You don’t have to tell me that you can’t do everything I think is the right thing to do. I would, frankly, be very uncomfortable if that was indeed the case.” But that, to me, tells you something very important about the man. In other words, there’s a sense that even if it remotely entered your mind that Richard Nixon would do it, I would suggest you dismiss it immediately. It was not conceivably credible.

Smith: A sidebar to that is a story I picked up from a couple sources, that in fact, Bill Simon was doing exactly what you were doing for the same reasons in arguing with the president - and I’m not sure what point in the process - but I think it had been a formal cabinet discussion about all of this. And the president had indicated that he would support the vice president’s proposal. And Secretary Simon, not willing to leave it at that, was renewing the argument. At which point, the president turns to him and says, “Bill, you and I both know Congress is never going to pass this. I don’t want to embarrass Nelson.”

Greenspan: I hadn’t heard that story.

Smith: You had not? Isn’t that a great story?

Greenspan: No, I didn’t. It was very interesting.

Smith: It was difficult for Rockefeller, wasn’t it? I mean, given his temperament, in New York you got elected by creating programs, never mind what they cost. I mean, that’s how you governed. And at some point, I think fairly early in the Ford presidency, the decision was made that we were going to at least suspend any new domestic spending programs until we got a handle on the budget, on the deficit. Does that ring a bell?

Greenspan: Oh, yes. No, Jerry Ford was a fiscal conservative amongst all of his other attributes and a firm believer in the fact that fiscal responsibility was a crucial aspect of maintaining a viable economic system. And largely because of his knowledge of how the budget worked and the like, he knew what you could do and what you couldn’t do. And, you remember, one of the rare things that all of us, we were very pleased with was when, I think it was in 1976, no, the 1977 budget presentation was done by the president of the United States. And we were all proud of the fact that our president knew enough to get up in front of the press corps and handle all the very detailed questions. It was very impressive. It was very interesting to watch the system go.

Smith: It’s never been done since.

Greenspan: No, for good reason. He fundamentally was a conservative in the fiscal sense more than any other way. You know, it’s hard to recall, but I remember Dwight Eisenhower apologizing for a four billion dollar deficit. Now that was before, kind of, the revolution, you know, where Walter Heller came in and said, “We have fiscal stagnation going on here” and all this various sort of things. But Jerry Ford was a throw back basically to Eisenhower in that regard.

Smith: Yeah. Someone once referred to him as Eisenhower without the medals.

Greenspan: Well, that’s probably not far off.

Smith: A couple of things. apropos the whole New York City fiscal crisis. There was a famous speech at the National Press Club. I’d been told that there was a real debate within the administration in terms of how tough the president ought to sound in terms of even considering federal assistance to the city. And a very legitimate case could be made that the city wasn’t taking seriously enough its own need to do some fairly radical pruning. What’s your recollection of that whole issue? And then, of course, you have the vice president who is presumably in a somewhat awkward position, but obviously arguing for the city and the state.
Greenspan: The problem basically was that they actually had the financial resources to solve the problem in part. Remember there was a very large pension fund which, as I recall and my recollection is a little vague on this, but I recall that the real issue is that the city government did not want to do the hard stuff and, as a consequence, essentially wanted just government payment. Ford was not happy with that. Bill Simon was Bill Simon, you can imagine. And you know that famous headline Ford to New York City: Drop Dead. Of course, it was never actually stated, it was a fabrication of the media. The issue was a very clever set of negotiations. Ford knew that at the end of the day, the city would have to cave because they did not have real ______. But the question is, how much of it seemed reasonable?

It’s very much similar to the negotiations currently going on with respect to the Big Three automakers. That their initial view is just, “Give us cash and we’ll solve our problems.” There was a real serious concern that if that was done with New York, they’d be back again. Because what was wrong with the fiscal situation in New York as I remember it, Mayor Lindsay issuing huge amounts of short-term credit and then all of a sudden being unable to sell short-term New York City notes in the markets. And that is sort of the scariest of all situations. And the reason, essentially, is it went into ever increasing fiscal profligacy and the well finally shut down. Now what basically New York City wanted was for somebody to bring water to substitute for the well. And what Ford wanted to make certain is that you basically got a system which would function in and of itself. Eventually New York City got bailed out because of the fact that the stock market which was then low, ran up for numbers and numbers of years and the revenues just poured in, so it solved their problems.

Smith: Hugh Carey told me once, “Jerry Ford has never gotten the credit he deserves for the tough love approach he took which forced New York City…

Greenspan: And he was governor at that point.

Smith: Yeah, he was.

…it to face reality.
Greenspan: Hugh Carey said that to me once, too, I recall. I was wholly accurate in my judgment that the presumption that that particular set of negotiations were essentially a disaster is utterly untrue. That was a very clever set of programs to recognize economic reality which the New York City government did not wish to do.

Smith: Can you talk about what he wanted to do in a full term? Did you have a sense, I mean, did you have an agenda in-house, in terms of what you hoped to do if he had been elected in ’76?

Greenspan: I think basically the principles that he enunciated in his shortened term would go forward. I don’t recall any sort of planning of this type that you invariably get in Democratic administrations. In other words, there was a really fundamental difference. In Democratic administrations, you plan everything. In Republican administrations, at least up until recently, you believe that the vast proportion of decisions are made by the market and that that’s the most effective way, and that to try to plan it is futile, and that to indeed implement plans is counterproductive. So there is no sense of, “Well, we’re going to have this program or that program.”

Now, there’re always things, I mean, the Energy Independence Act and all the various other things that go on, but there is a really seriously important difference between beliefs that there is a self-adjusting mechanism which essentially creates the highest standards of living, rapid economic growth, but has aspects of instability in it which is more a reflection of human nature than it is of economic policy. And the question is, how much do you want to control that? And the evidence is pretty clear that, the more you control it, the slower the rate of growth and the lower the standards of living, but the less volatility in the markets.

The more you allow the markets to function, as indeed coming out of the Ford administration, even into Carter and to Reagan, and thereafter and on to Clinton, we had a massive change, a removal of regulation where the Reagan administration with the air traffic controllers ultimately changed more fundamentally some of the whole structures of labor relations in this country.
Smith: But deregulation really began in the Ford years.

Greenspan: It did and it was an odd bipartisan combination in which you had Ted Kennedy as chairman of the ____________ Committee and Steve Breyer as basically his chief of staff in that committee. So that, the same time that Breyer was very much, and you can hear him now, he still takes that as an important period of his life – he was one of the key elements in the deregulation of airlines and rails and all that sort of stuff. And so it was essentially a bipartisan movement, but fundamentally driven by Jerry Ford with a lot of it starting to be implemented during the Carter administration.

Smith: That goes to the heart of something I’ve argued for a long time. That people who see the Nixon-Ford administration as a continuation, almost see Ford as a coda for the Nixon presidency, overlook something very fundamental. A lot of things changed. I mean, you could almost look at Richard Nixon as the last New Deal president. Someone who grew up in the shadow of FDR and whose political calculations being what they were, and Ford in a lot of ways is a more conservative, classic conservative than Nixon. Things began in the Ford presidency that bore fruit in later presidencies. But it’s a mistake to see the two as philosophically joined at the hip. There’s more of a break in some ways, a turning of the page.

Greenspan: Oh, indeed. Indeed, if you just look at the numbers, the size of government under Nixon grew immensely and his reasoning was always, “Well, if we don’t do it, they’ll do more.” And Ford didn’t quite buy onto that, as you know, with his very slim minorities in the Congress, he vetoed an awful lot of bills and prevailed in a remarkably large number of cases. All he needed was a small part of the Senate and he could render a lot of legislation from occurring.

Smith: This is hypothetical, but can you think of one or two things that, historically looking back, you think would have been different had he been reelected?

Greenspan: Yeah. I don’t think that the underlying inflationary forces - which were coming off basically the early parts of the 1970s, partly Nixon, partly coming off the Vietnam War - I don’t think that severe inflationary process could have been suppressed under Ford. The forces were fundamental and Jimmy Carter got being in the wrong place at the time and it’s essentially what brought Reagan in a good light many years. It is conceivable to me that, had he been reelected, he would’ve struggled with that and may have made it less than it ultimately turned out to be, but not enough to actually alter what went on. It would’ve meant in some way, Reagan would have never been president of the United States.

Smith: That’s interesting, because by ’76, the administration was running on a record of having, in effect, broken the back of the inflation. Unemployment was clearly headed down and indeed, for all the people who said Ford lost because of the pardon, I’ve always thought a strong case could be made that just before… There were numbers that were released, literally just before election day, which suggested a pause at least in the economic recovery.

Greenspan: That was my term.

Smith: I think that, by that point, there was a perception that this would become a very close race. And I think there were $x$ number of people who sort of stepped back even that last weekend and said to themselves, “Well, do I really want four more years of this or will I take a chance on Carter?” And it was just enough to push Carter across the finish line. How did the pause come about?

Greenspan: Well, the pause came about largely as a consequence of the ’75 recession. Because what happened was, you may recall that early 1975, the gross national product is what we used then, was going down very sharply. But when, because inventory liquidation was so huge that, when it turned around, it came back and we were up close to a ten percent annual rate of growth in the early months of 2006.

Smith: Or ’76.

Greenspan: I’m sorry, ’76. 1976. You had this momentum going forward and you can’t maintain that because inventories were building up and so what ordinarily happens in such a period is you have a pause. Meaning that it went from close to ten percent annual rate and sunk down to close to two percent or whatever it was, and the two percent happened to coincide with the election date. But, as you may recall, when Carter got into office, he had a number of fiscal stimulus programs to deal with the pause, but by the time he was inaugurated, the economy was rolling back again. And so that, for Ford’s point of the view the election was held on the wrong date.

Smith: Two other things and I’ll let you go. One, in 1980 - you were in the middle of this effort and I’d like to just have you describe it - about Ford possibly joining a Reagan ticket. There’s been debate over the years as to where it originated, what Ford really expected. I would love to have your account of that.

Greenspan: Well, I think it emerged because the early polls showed the gap was not very large between Carter and Reagan and that the polls showed that if Jerry Ford were vice president, they would put an additional two or three percentage points on what was a very close race. And my recollection was that in the Reagan campaign staff, they decided to approach Ford and they essentially asked Kissinger and me, as old Ford people who were now involved in the Reagan campaign, to go approach Ford. So, we approached him.

Smith: Was this at the convention?

Greenspan: At the convention. Oh no, at the convention.

Smith: In Detroit.

Greenspan: Yes, indeed. And it was very obvious very early on that he, Ford, was very content with his Rancho Mirage, and his golf, and his new lifestyle.

Smith: And, of course, Mrs. Ford had gone through the intervention and she was recovering and that obviously affected their lives.

Greenspan: I’m sure that was probably the case. And they were settling down there and what was being proposed was a real upheaval in their very… Because, remember, they never had an affluent life in that Ford was one of those people who would, you know, if you tried to bribe him, he would probably bite you or tried to stamp you into the ground. And so, you know, he was never wealthy, but he didn’t become wealthy as such, but at least the pressures of living on very tight, you know, began to ease obviously as he went back into the private sector and he was enjoying that, I’m sure.

You could tell the pressures were off him and I would play golf with him and, you know, he was a happy man. What then tended to occur is a real resistance to going back. And what they tried to do with the Kissinger meeting phrase to redefine the office of vice presidency in ways which raised very constitutional questions and there was a bit of – Ford was really quite reluctant. And then he got on, I think it was a morning show, television show—

Smith: It was with Walter Cronkite.

Greenspan: Oh yeah, okay. And he suggested a lot of the — and apparently Reagan said, “You know, no way,” because in the sense these were a private conversations and Jerry Ford opened them up and, at that point, it ended. There was never any real possibility of that happening as far as I could judge. In other words, there was reluctance on day one and reluctance all the way along and, to this day, I don’t know whether Jerry Ford consciously did [that] to suggest to Reagan or give him a way out, I don’t know that. But it’s the Cronkite interview which, as far as I can see, ended the conversations.

Smith: When was the last time you saw him?

Greenspan: You mean at his funeral? You mean before the funeral.

Smith: Yeah, before the funeral. Because you obviously would see him every year at the reunions.

Greenspan: Oh, yes. I would say within maybe a couple months of his death maybe. Maybe less than that.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction when he died? By the public reaction?

Greenspan: I was an honorary pall bearer and so I was in the entourage and you could see the crowds on the streets and this is when the general state of optimism was not obvious. But there was an out flowing of “Here’s an extremely decent man” and nostalgia for that type of presidency.
Smith: The civility that he represented. And yet, I mean, God knows, it’s a misplaced nostalgia to suggest that the ’70s were some sort of era of good feeling.

Greenspan: They sure were not. But, in the context of going back historically, you tend to forget the bad, and more often than not, tend to emphasize the good. For example, we look back in the 1930s with some degree of nostalgia because we knew that, in the end, we came out okay. But, you read the literature at the time, it was basically fear of where we were going. There’s a fear of fascism. Fear of communism. Undermining the Constitution. All sorts of really very scary episodes. And since none of that ever materialized, it’s not that we all recognize the 25 percent unemployment, bread lines, but there were still the movies, there’s still Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers and all of that stuff. I think the same thing occurred here. That, to be sure, it was a pretty scary period, but we knew we came out okay. And by the time Jerry Ford died, there was a degree of nostalgia for his presidency which I think is growing year by year. It’s not dissimilar to the way Harry Truman got himself resurrected.

Smith: It’s interesting, because I was wearing two hats that week. I was with ABC the first half of the week and then with the family the second half. And I can tell you, in the media, there was astonishment that, as the week went by, it seemed to grow and grow and grow. And my theory was, in particularly seeing the number of young people in the crowds, that they were seeing this man for the first time in a lot of cases. They were being introduced to him. And he looked awfully good compared to kind of the politics in both parties in recent years. And I think the country needed to feel good about something at that point, too. In some ways it almost foreshadowed Obama’s appeal as a, we’ll see whether it holds up or not, but the appeal as kind of post-ideological bringer of civility.

Greenspan: Yeah, it’s that view of America which Ronald Reagan sort of brought forward, but more importantly it was a view of the civility of the Ford administration, not in the politics _________. You did, I don’t know maybe you did, you remember that Tip O’Neill and Jerry Ford used to come at each other, boom!, from 9 to 5pm and then Tip would end up at the White House with a bourbon with his old friend Jerry. That’s the nostalgia that I think really mattered, that the bipartisan sense that the Senate was a club, that people worked together for a national purpose, because by then, Ford’s death, there was just huge partisan breakdown.

Smith: And he also was lucky, he lived long enough to know that most Americans had come around to share his view of the pardon. And that even those who still disagreed with the pardon at least accepted his motives and even acknowledged his courage, political courage, in doing it.

Greenspan: I don’t have as much of a feel of that, but I am aware that the polls did show that. I have no firsthand experience, so I don’t have that much of an insight into it. But the general view towards Gerald Ford has clearly, since his administration, been going straight up. And, as best as I can judge, since his death.

Smith: That brings me to the final question. How do you think he should be remembered?

Greenspan: I think as a very important turning point in American life. I think that the fact that we came as close with the Nixon resignation to potential chaos in this country. Now, remember, there were Secretaries of Defense making certain that no orders came out of the Oval Office. That Hartmann speech was a very critical turning point. It defined a change in the spirit of the country which is quite similar to this last election. And I think that the American people have a certain unrealistic view of political civility and they liked people like Howard Baker, for example, or a lot of those now still around but no longer in power. Senators who talked to each other. I mean, Pat Moynihan was sort of, to me, an extraordinary senator. And you had five or six of them who really defined. We don’t have that anymore and Jerry Ford was part of that general view. We, as Americans, would like to have far more civil politics than we get. The problem, unfortunately, is that negative advertising does work. We do find that the old notion that good economic policy is good political policy has been discarded.
Smith: And the media is so fragmented and so dedicated to fanning the flames. I mean, talk radio, and cable,…

Greenspan: Cable is… I sit and watch my wife dealing with… She gets out in the morning with the Today Show and then she’s got her own cable show in the day. She’s got the evening news and then she’s got to prepare for the Today Show, and what you’re coming up with is that the old notion that there are two sources to every story, you never bring it up, and how we don’t have the bloggers back then. Jerry Ford would have been very uncomfortable in this type of environment. And I think the American people are uncomfortable with it, but they don’t know what to do and, indeed, there’s a conflict here. It’s their views which basically.

Smith: In that sense, it’s an electronic democracy and the results aren’t always pretty.

Greenspan: It’s not always pretty, but it still works.

Smith: It still works!

That’s perfect. Thank you.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. Tell us something about Betty Ford that might surprise people.

Cullen: She loves dirty jokes and he did not.

Smith: Was it that he didn’t get it, or he just didn’t want to?

Cullen: No, I think that’s just not the way his sense of humor worked. There would be times that Mrs. Ford and I - like if they would be getting ready to go to a dinner party or something - and I would be there helping her get ready and pick out jewelry or whatever. We would be in her dressing room just in hysterics about something, and he would be across the hall in his dressing room and he would come in and say, “Okay, girls, what is so funny in here?” And Mrs. Ford would tell him the joke and he would just kind of stand there like, and then the two of us would try to explain it to him and then our hysterics would become more so that we could never explain it. And he was just like, “I don’t get it.”

Smith: He had a sense of humor.

Cullen: Oh, he had a sense of humor, but it wasn’t a joke-related sense of humor. I think he saw the humor in the things that happened around him, but I just don’t think, telling him a joke, his mind just didn’t go that way. He was thinking of much more serious things.

Smith: One of the things I found early on that surprised me about him - because most pols love gossip, not just political gossip, but they love gossip. And at first I just sensed it and then I really sensed it that he wasn’t a gossip and, in fact, would politely find a way to steer the conversation away from personal gossip.
Cullen: Yeah, he didn’t want to chat about people. I think you’re absolutely right. I guess from my view, he always wanted to find the finer qualities about everybody he knew. And it was demeaning to the person that was doing the gossiping, I guess. He didn’t want to have suspicions about other people, I guess. So it wasn’t something he was happy with.

Smith: Do you think that at all, in some ways, fed a notion that some people had that he was maybe a little naïve?

Cullen: Yeah.

Smith: And I don’t mean that in a negative way, I mean, it can be in many ways an admirable trait.

Cullen: I think because he was so honest in his own dealings with everybody and so trustworthy, he kind of assumed that everybody he dealt with would be the same way, and in that way he was naïve about it. I don’t think he ever saw that people were nice to him because they were going to use him two weeks later for something. He just genuinely enjoyed people, he liked meeting new people. I think he was naïve about the fact that there was a lot of stuff that went on behind the scenes that he just either didn’t see or chose not to see.

Smith: Well, see, that’s what’s fascinating to me. Because someone who’d been in DC as long as he was at the levels he was—

Cullen: Yeah, and to maintain that naiveté.

Smith: Yeah, you’d have to work to at it almost.

Cullen: Yeah, and I guess his theory that you can disagree without being disagreeable, it’s all maybe part of that mentality that, maybe at the end of the day, everybody’s a friend and you have your disagreements, but if you like a person, you like them. You get over those disagreements.

Smith: But you wonder if that quality - for example, whatever you think of Bob Hartmann - made a Bob Hartmann necessary, in the sense that—Cullen: Somebody had to be the bad guy.

Smith: Yeah. Someone had to do the mistrusting for him and the suspicion about people’s motives. Clearly at the time of the Haig-Nixon pardon business—

Cullen: And, I think maybe Mrs. Ford played a little bit of that role, too, in that I think she saw that in people before he ever would be willing to recognize that maybe there was something going on. She was a much better read on personalities.

Smith: It’s funny, I never thought about this, but that’s kind of a parallel to the Reagans.

Cullen: Mhmm. Oh, yeah, the guardian at the gate kind of thing with the women.

Smith: And it puts the wife in a very awkward position, difficult position.

Cullen: Yeah, it sure does.

Smith: How did your paths first cross?

Cullen: I was working in Delaware for Pete DuPont when he was governor of Delaware. And a friend of mine who was working for Pete – you know Dick Wennekamp.

Smith: I know the name.

Cullen: Well, Wennekamp was in the White House, in what capacity, I’m not sure at the moment, but anyway he worked at the White House and he was casually going out with this friend of mine on occasion. Mrs. Ford needed a new assistant, so, Dick called Marian and asked her if she’d be interested in the job. They were interviewing three or four people or something. She said, yeah, she would be. She went to New York, interviewed with Mrs. Ford, was offered the job and took the job and moved to California.

Smith: So this was post-White House.

Cullen: Yes, this was like a year after they’d left the White House. In fact, she had just come out of treatment, I think, when all this happened. Marian went to California, quickly moved to Vail. A couple of friends and I went to Vail and spent a week or so, just visiting, you know, because we had a friend who was working for Betty Ford and this was a big deal when you’re from Dover, Delaware. And, then in September, Marian called me and said, “You know, it is really expensive to live in the desert. Why don’t you move out here and we’ll share a house?” Which I thought, “This is perfectly nuts. I’m just going to pack up and move to California?” But the more I thought about it, the more I thought, “Well, it might be a pretty good opportunity and it will get me out of Delaware,” and quite frankly, I’d sort of dated all the eligible bachelors in Delaware, which is a small pool.

Smith: It’s a small state.

Cullen: It was a fairly small pool. And I went and talked to Governor DuPont and said, “What do you think if I would go out there?” And he said, “I think you should do it and if it doesn’t work out, you have a job here you can come back to,” which kind of made it risk-free. So, I moved out to California the end of September of 1979 and kind of hung out for a few months, started looking for a job and realized – I was working in urban planning work at that point – that to find a job, I was going to have to go to L.A. So, I started interviewing in L.A. And, at that point, President Ford was thinking about running again. I had done some campaign work for Pete and President Ford and Bob said, “We can’t pay you to stay on, but if you can hang around for a little bit, there will be a job on campaign staff for you.” So, I thought, “Oh, well, this sounds pretty cool.”

Smith: So that sounds like this talk had gotten pretty far advanced.

Cullen: Yeah, and then I think it was in March that he decided that he was not going to run and at that point, I thought, “Okay, L.A., here I come.” And about three weeks later, Marian decided that she was getting married and moving, at which point, President Ford said, “Well, you’re either going to work for me or you’re going to work for Mrs. Ford. We want you to stay here.” And Mrs. Ford was not particularly sure that she wanted me to work for her. I think she thought I had too much experience and I might try and run her and she was not looking for someone to run her because she’s a little bit of a control freak. And so I really thought I would end up working for President Ford, but she finally said, “Well, let’s try it. Let’s give it a couple of weeks, see how it goes” and seventeen years later, I finally left.

Smith: Now, clearly, you, even just hanging around as you put it, must’ve made an impression.

Cullen: Well, I wasn’t very good at hanging around totally. I needed something to keep me out of trouble, so the Fords had all these photograph books that they had brought from the White House of pictures that had been taken of people, you know, state visits and parties at the White House and they were not in any kind of order. No one knew who any of the people were in the pictures. Some of them, they did. So I was given the project of putting the books together, which I spent a couple of months trying to figure out dates and knowing a couple of people that I could identify and going back and researching it and putting it together. And now, you know, in the breezeway of their house in California where all the elephant statues are, there are a bunch of photograph albums from the White House. If you go through those today, there are still my handwritten notes of who the people are in the pictures. I never got any farther than that, but I identified a lot of people and ended up with a job.

Smith: Tell us how the office functioned just generally, because that was pretty early in their post-White House years. What kind of coordination went on between her activities and his?

Cullen: There was still a little bit of the East Wing/West Wing syndrome that went on in that most people sort of figured that her work was not as important as his work. At that point, I worked for her. I had someone who worked for me, and that was it. There were the two of us who did what five or six people who worked for him did. I was pretty much an independent agent. I didn’t report to anybody else other than Mrs. Ford, and the thing that was kind of interesting about the position I had was that when President and Mrs. Ford traveled together, particularly for social events, I would be the person that traveled because I guess they thought I could help Mrs. Ford do things, but I could also handle some press issues if it was necessary. I could do some things for him as well. And I guess the other side of that was when Penny became Chief of Staff, he was very leery about traveling with a very attractive blonde. So, the fact that I worked for Mrs. Ford made it a little easier. You know, there was an explanation for why I was along and the explanation for Penny would’ve been much more difficult for him. He was uncomfortable with that.

Smith: Which is revealing in and of itself.

Did you ever meet Phyllis?

Cullen: Phyllis.

Smith: His old girlfriend?

Cullen: No, I know the name. I think I saw pictures once upon a time, the girlfriend from New York.

Smith: Yeah.

Cullen: Yeah. No, never met her.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story. Was it Jim Cannon who told us this story? Yeah, Jim Cannon. One of the last times he saw the President, the President said, “You ought to go see Phyllis,” who, I think at that point, was in a condo in Las Vegas. And Jim went and was going in from the airport and thought, “Oh, how do I sort of introduce myself and ingratiate myself?” So he stopped and he got flowers and went up to the apartment and rang the bell and she opened the door and he said, “President Ford wanted you to have these.” And she said, “Oh no, he didn’t. He never got flowers!”

Cullen: She knew him fairly well, then, huh?

Smith: And at the end of the conversation, she told Jim, “Would you take a message to him for me?” And the message was, “I still think about him. I still dream about him. I still love him.”

Cullen: Oh, wow.
Smith: And Jim dutifully passed the message on over the phone. There was a long, long pregnant silence and he finally said, “Well, that’s very nice, and Phyllis, she was a lovely girl, but I’ve had such a wonderful life with Betty.”

Mrs. Ford’s tardiness, was that—

Cullen: You mean “the late Mrs. Ford”? That’s how we referred to her.

Smith: Really?

Cullen: Yes.

Smith: Was it always a problem?

Cullen: Always. And I don’t know if it was based on insecurity and wanting to be perfect when she walked out the door or if it was, again, her control mechanism of ‘I can do this, therefore, I shall do this.’

Smith: And he was a stickler for—

Cullen: Oh, he was. When the schedule said “7:15 motorcade departs,” 7:15 he was at the front door ready to open the door to walk out so the motorcade could depart. She had exactly the same schedule that said, “7:15 motorcade departs,” but at 8:00 maybe, if she was ready to leave. And he would fuss a little bit but not much because he knew his life would be uncomfortable if he fussed too much.

Smith: Was that the biggest source of friction? I mean, were there habits that one had that the other had to put up with?

Cullen: There was some friction over her tardiness, but I think after all those years, he had to come to expect—

Smith: They were acclimated to it.

Cullen: Yeah, and I think if it was something that was really, really, really important to him, he would talk to her about the fact that, you know, “Now, dear, we really need to leave on time.” And she would make an effort and she could do it when pressed. And, you know, if we were on foreign trips and a plane was leaving or something, she could absolutely be ready, but she liked to take her time and make sure that every hair was in place and that her purse was perfectly put together

Smith: She’s a perfectionist?

Cullen: Oh, yes, very much so. She wanted everything, you know, clothes were, if there was a crease in something, she wasn’t sure, because she was so used to having people judge her by her appearance that she wanted that appearance to be judge-able.

Smith: Did she enjoy clothes?

Cullen: She loved them, loved clothes. She loved to shop. She loved to go to the designer salons and, well, you know, she’d been a fashion buyer at Herpolsheimer’s, so it was kind of in the blood, I think.

Smith: That leads to the other question. Was weight ever a concern?

Cullen: Never.

Smith: Ever?

Cullen: Never, ever. The only time it was a concern for her was when she had heart surgery and she lost a lot of weight and she was too thin. I remember, one day we were sitting out in the garden area around the pool at the house in California and there were a couple of women on the golf course. And they were not stout, but they had a little bit of meat to them. And she looked out there and then said, “Oh, I wish I looked like that.” I said, “Oh, no, you don’t. I’m going to hold that over you when that happens.” And it never did. I mean, she gained the weight back. She got right back to her same size.

Smith: What was her size?

Cullen: She wore a size 8 forever and always as far as I know, and at the point that I worked with her, I was just a little bit too small to wear her clothes and now I’m way too big. Because there were a couple of items that I’d said, “When the time comes, I want that, I want that, I want that.”
Smith: How would you define her preferences in clothes? Were there things that she was particularly drawn to or shied away from?

Cullen: She loved well-made suits of, I’d say, kind of the classic Chanel suit, well put together. She was always well coordinated. She was not into a lot of froofroo. She was a very classic dresser. I think Albert Capraro, who designed clothes for her in the White House and for years and years afterwards. I mean, she has closets full. I have a closet full of Capraro clothes, I think, that I was fortunate enough that were either passed on to me or when she would go buying, I would get to buy a couple of things, too.

Smith: And jewelry?

Cullen: She liked jewelry and I would say right now she has quite a bit of jewelry simply because over the years since they’ve been in the White House, it’s been something that President Ford’s enjoyed giving her for gifts.

Smith: Any favorites stones or…? Some people are partial to pearls or…

Cullen: I think she has some pearls that she really likes. It’s a long strand that comes apart into two so that it becomes a double strand. I think she’s always been very fond of that. There’s a ring that Leonard Firestone and Dee Keaton gave her when we were in Hong Kong and it’s a star sapphire with diamonds around it. I’ve always told her that I wanted that ring. There’s no way I’ll ever get it, but… And I never liked star sapphires, but this is a lovely ring and the star sapphire is approximately the color blue of President Ford’s eyes. So it really meant a lot to her. And the fact that Leonard was involved in the gift.

Smith: Tell me about that relationship, because I’ve heard it said that it’s no exaggeration to say that she saved his life.

Cullen: Oh, absolutely. Absolutely. I mean, I’ve heard Leonard say that. He was very indebted to her for that.

Smith: Now they had been friends, he was apparently instrumental in their decision to—Cullen: To move, yeah. The property that their house is on, I think he owned originally. So they lived right next door. And they lived right next door in Beaver Creek. Now that’s got to be a pretty close friendship if you have two houses that are next to each other. And he was one of the loveliest men I’ve ever known. And, admittedly, I guess I did know him before he was completely sober, but I never—

And, in fact, my husband’s name is Leonard and the only reason I went out with him the first couple of times was because his name was Leonard because I figured there was good karma there, that I’d been so fond of Leonard Firestone that, “I’ll give this a try.”

Smith: What was it about him that clearly endeared him to the both of them?

Cullen: He was just a kind, considerate man who, if you didn’t know he was Leonard Firestone, you wouldn’t know he was Leonard Firestone. He never held that up for people to take note before they knew him. It was something that, you know, if people knew, fine, but he didn’t really care about it. And he was so generous to people. I mean, he was really kind to me over the years. There was one time we were on a trip, I know we were in Japan and Leonard Firestone and Nicky Firestone and a couple others of us had gone shopping in a camera store. We’d gone pearl shopping and I had made my big purchase and was wiped out for the rest of the trip and we went into a camera shop and he was looking at cameras and I said something about, “Oh, well, my little sister had said that when I was in Japan, if I was at any place to buy her a camera, but we’ve got another two weeks on the road or something, and so I can’t afford to do that” and he said, “I’ll loan you the money.” And I said, “Well, no”, I really didn’t want to do that. And he just absolutely said, “I will loan you the money. You’re buying the camera for your sister.” And I bought the camera and when we got home, I gave him a check I guess to pay him back for the cost of the camera and I got it back with a note that said, “I can afford this. You can’t.” So, he was just a sweetheart. And his wife, Nicky, I was very fond of, too. She was just a lovely woman.

Smith: And his involvement with the Betty Ford Center grew out of his own personal experience?
Cullen: Yes, I think after Mrs. Ford got sober, and I don’t know how long she had been sober, but not a whole long time, I don’t think. And I don’t know if Nicky came to talk to her or if Mrs. Ford just went and talked to Leonard on her own and just said, “You’ve got to do something.” President Ford may have been involved, too. And Leonard just kind of said, “Oh, okay, if you think so, I will.” And he got sober and they started talking about the fact that the desert would be the perfect place for there to be a treatment facility and he said to Mrs. Ford, “If this is something you want to do, I’ll help you raise the money for it.” And, so the two of them, you know, people came to be very afraid of seeing them approach.

Smith: I think it was John Schwarzlose who told us this story. They were on Frank Sinatra’s plane flying to Las Vegas and coming back she had this captive audience and so the first pledges to the Betty Ford Center were written on cocktail napkins on Frank Sinatra’s plane.

Cullen: And then, every time she went out to dinner, she had pledge cards in her evening bag. They’d be nicely folded up in this little, tiny jewel encrusted evening bag and whoever she was sitting next to, she’d say, “Oh, and by the way, I have something here I’d like you to take a look at.”

Smith: So, she was a lioness when it came to fundraising?

Cullen: Oh, yeah. I mean, the Betty Ford Center was paid for when it opened because she and Leonard went out and beat the bushes. And she did things like, I mean, she hated public speaking, she was always a nervous public speaker, she didn’t like it at all, but she knew she could raise money for the Betty Ford Center by going out and making speeches. So, she did it.

Smith: Do you think that factors at all into her late in life sort of reticence, withdrawal maybe, from the public eye? That, among other things, she doesn’t have to go and give speeches anymore?

Cullen: Well, she doesn’t have to do it. I think as soon as she felt that she didn’t have to do it, it was like, “It’s got to be something really wonderful for me to want to do this,” because she would always, I mean, we’d be standing backstage and she’d say things like, “Oh my God, I think I’m going to throw up.” And, you know, she wouldn’t. She’d get out there and she was always fine, but she would be really nervous doing a speech.

Smith: Why do you think that was? Because, here’s a woman who was a performer, you know, who had aspired to be on the stage.

Cullen: Dance is one thing. Having words come out of your mouth was something different, I think. Because she did okay and she was much better. Having her stand there with cards that had a speech prepared on it, she was kind of a little bit stilted. She was not comfortable with it, but when it came to the Q&A session afterwards, that’s when she really shone, because the personality came out. She was funny. She would just say things that people would kind of go, “I can’t believe she said that!” So, it was the prepared speech kind of thing that set her on edge. Just talking to people, she was fine.

Smith: It’s amazing. When you go back even now and look at the famous Morley Safer interview on 60 Minutes - we had it on display at the time in the museum - and she was saying things we couldn’t say today. Not that there wasn’t controversy generated by Mrs. Ford saying them, but I mean, it was more on the Right. I think the country was changing in ways that some of the political types in the White House never anticipated. They’re always fighting the last war, but the fact there was this Cub Scout den mother from Grand Rapids…

Cullen: Yeah, who shouldn’t have opinions like that.

Smith: Exactly.

Cullen: But I think the fact was she was a much more independent, liberal thinking woman than anybody realized until that point. I think her husband knew it, but she had a mother that worked because she had to because her father had died.

Smith: Did she ever talk about the circumstances of her father’s death?

Cullen: Not really, except that he passed away when she was 16. I think she said to me that she kind of always felt that it was a suicide, but never really sure as to what happened. The things she said in that interview with Morley Safer, I think things were changing in this country for women and she was on kind of the progressive edge of that, unbeknownst to a lot of people.

Smith:  Exactly, and I think that’s why it made such an impact. We now know, and it’s almost tragic that we didn’t know then, we now know that Pat Nixon had opinions of her own and a life of her own.

Cullen:  And just thought she wasn’t allowed to have, or had been told she wasn’t allowed to have them, perhaps.

Smith:  Did you have a sense of Mrs. Ford’s relationship, or his for that matter, with the former presidents and first ladies? I mean, obviously there were ceremonial occasions when they got together, funerals or library openings, but was there a—

Cullen:  There was a real friendship there with Lady Bird Johnson. I was able, I think on two occasions, to spend a night at the ranch with Mrs. Ford and Lady Bird and it was really wonderful. And I think there was one time, I think, it was just the three of us and another time it was Mrs. Carter. I’ve got a picture somewhere, I was trying to think if there was someone else in there, but I don’t think so. It was something they were doing, an article that was being done for Good Housekeeping or some magazine that everybody got together there for the interviews. And President Ford and Lady Bird were fairly close and I think he had enjoyed Lyndon Johnson.

Smith:  Which, again, runs counter to the popular impression.

Cullen:  Yeah. But when they first went to Congress, the Johnsons were in the Senate, I guess.

Smith:  Had just gone.

Cullen:  Just gone. Okay. And since the Johnsons had been in Washington for a few years, how they really met in the first place, I’m not sure, but I know that Senator Johnson and Mrs. Johnson at that time were very kind to the new kids on the block. They kind of took them under their wing. They introduced them to people. They made sure they were invited to some social things, so I think that really clicked a relationship there.
Smith: Plus, Lady Bird, I mean how could you not love Lady Bird?

Cullen: Oh, she was just such a sweetheart. And then in the later years, President Ford was on a board with her for a bank in Texas. So, she saw her like once a month for years. And she and Mrs. Ford stayed in touch and the girls at the museum at one point there was a First Ladies’ conference or something and Lynda and Luci came out for that and I think they always felt close to President and Mrs. Ford.

Smith: There is a fraternity of sorts that people don’t realize that’s bipartisan, transcends political rivalries.

Cullen: Oh, absolutely. And you know I think a lot of people kind of look at the relationship President Ford and President Carter had and think, “You know, how can you be that friendly with the guy that beat you in the election?” But there’re so few people that have ever worked in that office and walked in those shoes that it’s a very small little private club and they are very supportive of each other when they need to be.

Smith: You know, it’s funny, when you really sort of boil it all down, they may have spoken with different accents and belonged to different parties, but they had a lot of similar values and their upbringings were in many ways reflective.

Cullen: Sort of basic, honest human beings who were not from the big city.

Smith: Plus, they had shared in common running against Ronald Reagan.

Cullen: Well, they also had military backgrounds that they could share.

Smith: One of the most touching things I’ll never forget was flying on Air Force One back to Grand Rapids from Washington after the service at the cathedral. And President Carter scooped up one of the great grandchildren and was walking up and down the isle with this baby. You wish people could see that side.

Cullen: That must have been Joy, Tyne’s daughter, because I think she was maybe the only baby because Tyne was the only one who had a baby-baby on the plane at that point. But I mean there’s a real fondness that, as you say, transcends party because you know what they’re going through. I mean, if it’s somebody that’s currently there, it’s a life experience that very few of us can relate to.

Smith: And clearly there’d been a long-standing relationship between the Bushes and the Fords.

Cullen: Yeah.

Smith: Really going back to Prescott Bush in the Senate.

Cullen: And George H.W. - all kinds of years they were kind of intertwined and so, yeah.

Smith: You know, it’s funny, before I forget, I’ve heard that afterward from very good sources, you know, it’s interesting that both Johnson girls and the Carters, after the funeral, substantially revised their own plans because they were so impressed with the kind of intimacy and sort of family feel to this big ceremonial.

Cullen: My personal experience with that was, at Blair House, the reception that was there for ambassadors and the pallbearers and the other former first families who were there, when people came in, they went and saw Mrs. Ford. And I think you were there, weren’t you? So then there was tea and wine and whatever, so people were standing around talking. And Luci Johnson who I’ve known casually over the years for a long time, came up to me and we were talking about stuff and she said something to me about, “What have you all done to get ready for this? What was the most important thing that you did?” And I said, “Well, you know, the services were important, but one of the things that we really worked really hard on was the guest list for all the services.” And she kind of said, “Guest list? Oh my God, we haven’t even thought of that.” And I think based on talking to a few people at that point, they did go back and say, “We’ve got to get on this.”

Smith: I don’t mean to jump all around like this, but what were your memories of that week? Because I remember I was wearing two hats. I was with ABC for the first half of the week and I remember the very, very beginning out in the church, I think at Saint Margaret’s, and we’d been tipped off. Basically the media had been told, “Don’t be surprised if you see Mrs. Ford in a wheelchair.” And, of course, we never did until very briefly at the end and then very dramatically—

Cullen: And we kept saying to her, “Mrs. Ford, if you don’t think you can walk, we have a wheelchair at every location. Please use them. Don’t wear yourself out. This is going to be a long, grinding week for you.” She was so determined that she was walking everywhere. No one was going to see her in a wheelchair. And she pulled it off. I mean, I think going down the isle at the cathedral President Bush may have been carrying her part of the way. And that was one nice thing about General Swan. He was so big that we figured, “If necessary, one arm under an elbow and one arm around her and he could just scoot her down and no one would ever notice.”

Smith: The story was told after she came back here very shortly afterwards, someone had said how impressed they were particularly at that last long walk to the gravesite where she got out of the chair and walked and they had expressed sort of their admiration for her.

Cullen: Yeah, she was a real trooper through that whole thing.

Smith: And she said, “Well, that’s what my husband would’ve wanted.”

Cullen: Yeah, you know, again, when we were at Blair House, the first night we got there, because I had traveled on the plane with the family coming back from California and we were all having dinner there. And then, I don’t know if you’ve heard the story about Air Force One losing my luggage.

Smith: No.

Cullen: Yeah, I’m halfway across the country and I get a phone call from Richard Wennekamp in California saying, “I don’t know how to tell you this, but your luggage is still here.” Fortunately, I was the one person on the plane that lived here. So, my husband came and picked me up and I came home. I spent the night and I got other clothes, I went back. So it wasn’t any big deal, but I was going to be coming back home that night because I had to get a change of clothes so I could proceed. And I went over and I sat at the table with Mrs.
Ford and we were chatting a little bit and I said, “Now, I’m going to be going home for the evening, but I’ll be back tomorrow morning. If you need anything, Susan knows how to get a hold of me. Just call.” And she said something to the effect of, “Do you think this is going okay?” And I said, “Well, I’ve got to tell you, I think you are doing absolutely a magnificent job.” And she got tears in her eyes and said, “Well, I have to because I’m doing it for him.”

Smith: They must have been touched by the crowds that came out in Alexandria.

Cullen: I’ll tell you, when you said what was in my view of the whole series of events, the crowds just blew me away, because he’d been out of office for how many years. He’d been President for two and a half years. You know, he didn’t have an eight-year history of people and all that. And the crowds at the church in California, when the motorcade went through Alexandria, I mean, we were all sitting, I was in the fourth car back or something, sitting there with tears running down our face because they were six and eight deep in some places and people with little kids and with their dogs with signs around their necks. It was just unbelievable. And the same thing happened in Grand Rapids.

Smith: Well, I was told the morning when you went up to the cathedral because that was the morning – I couldn’t go because ABC wanted me up there – remember, when we were planning from the very beginning, the one thing he was adamant about was no caisson through the streets of Washington. But I was told from a number of people, including the media, that they were amazed, a lot of people were amazed at the public reaction and it seemed to grow as the week went along. But they were amazed that, even though there was no caisson, at the number of people who just turned out on the streets of Washington.

Cullen: Just stood silently and watched the motorcade go by. It was really unbelievable.

Smith: She was touched?
Cullen: I don’t think she ever expected an outpouring like that. A personal example I’ll share with you. I take riding lessons here in town and my riding instructor, I had a horse out at the barn and I was going to be gone for x number of days, so I was kind of staying in touch and, you know, called to say, “I’m not going to be home until this day. Will you make sure somebody rides my boy so that he’s getting exercise?” And my riding instructor said, “Yeah, we’re standing here in line.” And I said, “You’re in line? What do you mean you’re ‘in line’?” And he said, “We’re waiting to go in to the rotunda.” I just couldn’t believe he and his wife and their two kids drove into town, got in line, and walked through. And I was so touched by that because the only relationship they had with him was through me kind of.

And there was another, on the drive out to the barn, there’s a house that has a big flagpole in the front of it. And when I got home, the first day I drove out there, the flag was at half-staff. And I kept driving down and the day that the official mourning was over, the flag went back up. And I was traveling with some of those, I’m not sure what you call them, but anyway, you know the cards that were given out at the rotunda and at the viewing and I stopped and I went up and I knocked on the door and the man came to the door and I said, “I know you don’t know me and I’m sorry to disturb you, but I’ve been watching your flag at half-staff and the fact that it’s back up today. I know it was at half-staff for my former boss and I thought you might like to have this.” And he was just astounded, “Oh, I can’t believe this. This is so neat!”

Smith: And then of course when you got to Grand Rapids, I remember that night because I rewrote the end of my eulogy, which had to reflect the reality that we were experiencing. And the fact that I went out that night and the line was two miles long at midnight.

Cullen: My husband went out. He said, “I’m just going to go out,” because we could see out the hotel window and he said, “I want to go out and see what this is really all about.” And he was gone for the longest time and he came back and he said, “You won’t believe it. They are four and five abreast and it goes on forever and there are kids in strollers and,” and he said, “people just stop and talk to you.” It was just an incredible experience.
Smith: And obviously that got back to her.

Cullen: Oh, yes.

Smith: I mean she saw what was going on. And then of course in the rotunda with the kids and then they did it again in Grand Rapids, when the kids appeared.

Cullen: And greeted people.

Smith: That made a real impression.

Cullen: That was a very nice touch for them to do that. And I guess maybe it was probably a help for them, too, because that had to be a really tough stint for all of them going through day after day after day.

Smith: In public.

Cullen: In public and trying to keep it together. Be the perfect child mourning for your father and to go and be able to talk to people and have people share experiences with them. I think that was probably helpful for them. And the people that they talked to were just so overwhelmed that the kids were there and sharing that with them.

Smith: You know, I have a theory that I think explains some of what happened that week. First of all, it was a time when the country desperately needed to feel good about itself. But, more than that, there was a whole generation that weren’t alive during the Ford presidency who were being introduced to him. Inevitably they were comparing it with more recent times. And he looked awfully good.

Cullen: Yeah. And it was like, “Wow. And people didn’t reelect this guy? What’s the matter?”

Smith: Here’s a guy who was going to stake his reelection on a point that was unpopular at the time.

Cullen: Who did what he felt was right. Unpopular at the time, but I think we all sort of agree now that it was what had to be done. Everyone outside our little circle has come to that conclusion too. And, well, you know, getting the award from the Kennedy Center for Public Policy—

Cullen: I’d gone out to California and we were doing funeral planner, and I think we were out there doing maybe updating some stuff of his but working on her plan. Susan was there, so it, well, I still don’t know which one it was, and Mrs. Ford asked me and Susan to come over to the house and have lunch. And Sue went over, the four of us sat there. We had a very nice lunch, chatted about stuff, but it was at a point where he was starting to not get around real steadily. And he got up from the table in the dining room and was headed back down to the sitting area and suddenly felt a little woozy so Susan and I grabbed a chair and put it down out in the hallway so he could sit down. And then he would get up and take a few more steps. At this point, Susan had him on one arm, and I had him on one arm and Mrs. Ford would kind of jockey a chair along and then he’d sit down and we got him downstairs and we got him into the bedroom and he said, “I really think I’ll stretch out on the bed for a little while.” And Susan left the room to go maybe get a glass of water or something and I was there by myself and I said, “Is there anything I can get for you?” He said, “Well, I’ve got some eye shade things I like to wear during the day and the quilt that’s at the foot of the bed, would you pull that up over me?” And I pulled the quilt up and he took my hand and just kind of held it between his two hands on the side of the bed and said, “This is nice. It’s just like you never left.”

Smith: The Kennedy imprimatur, it’s funny, he said, “For twenty years everywhere I’ve gone, people asked the same questions and now they don’t ask anymore.” It was almost like flipping a switch and it was a gutsy thing on the part of the Kennedys to do. It really was.

Cullen: Oh, it was. Well, and that’s another friendship that people probably weren’t aware of. His office and John Kennedy’s office were right next to each other for a few years anyway, when he first went into Congress. And Edward Kennedy has always been so kind and respectful to the two of them that, you know, like the first couple of times I was around him, I was like, “Where is this old buddy stuff coming from?”, but I think it kind of stems from the relationship they had with his brother.

Smith: And of course Carolyn came to the library rededication and her brother interviewed President Ford for the magazine.

Cullen: It was one of the first interviews, wasn’t it?

Smith: I think so.

Cullen: Yeah.

Smith: And I think at that point, too, President Ford was one of the dwindling number of people who really had known his dad, so I think he was really interested in coming back for the personal level, but they seemed to really hit it off. But, you’re right, the one thing that appeared at the time of his death that I took exception to - and I’ve since talked to Jon Meacham about it - in Newsweek and, frankly, it was a very nice story, but it left the suggestion that he had deliberately cultivated liberal historians to sort of shape his legacy.

And, you know, there was no one in the world who gave less thought to how he would be portrayed in future history books.

Cullen: I think he definitely was, “I am what I am. You all interpret it as you will, but I’m not going to try and color it one way or the other.”

Smith: Part of it was he was accessible to pretty much anyone who wanted to see him. There weren’t a lot of conservative historians. I mean, by that point, they were all sort of Reaganites and they weren’t interested in writing about Gerald Ford. But the fact that people like Bob Woodward, who in some ways was a precursor to the Kennedy library, the fact that Woodward would come around. And Richard Reeves in the mid-1990s, who wrote a piece for American Heritage called I’m Sorry Mr. President. He had written a very unflattering book during the Ford presidency. But anyway, to counter that notion that he somehow was orchestrating this, he wasn’t going to go to the Kennedy Library. He truly was not going to go and I remember getting a call from Ken Duberstein on behalf of the family, saying, “Is there anything that can be done?” And I said, “The one person who can persuade him is Mrs.
Ford. She will realize right away in a way that he might not just how significant this is.”

Cullen: How significant, yes. That he was asked to do that. I mean, I’m so glad he did.

Smith: You know, it’s funny, because she got the Medal of Freedom before he did. I mean, she got a lot of public recognition and yet he seems to have been delighted by this.

Cullen: He loved it. He loved the recognition that she got. He was so proud of what she did. I mean, their relationship, they were so in love through all those years and all the ups and downs that when she was getting the accolades, he was more than willing to stand back and be Betty Ford’s husband. I mean, and he used to joke about the fact, “Well, I only made it to President. She made it to Chairman of the Board.”

Smith: I’ve heard stories about the annual reunion event at the Center, he could be seen cooking hotdogs. I mean, he supported her role.

Cullen: Oh, yes. He definitely was the dutiful supporting husband at those things and as I said more than willing to take a step back and let her have the spotlight. He had no qualms about that. He glowed from the reflective glow, I guess.

Smith: But then you wonder if she was in turn pleased when late in life strings were pulled with the Clinton White House to assure that on the 25th anniversary of his inauguration, he received the Medal of Freedom. And it coincided a couple of days before the op-ed piece in the Times about affirmative action citing his black friend at the University of Michigan and all of that. There were a bunch of people getting the award that day, but in ways that hadn’t been predicted, he sort of was lionized.

Cullen: The centerpiece.

Smith: Exactly, because of his recent activities. I assume she was as pleased by that as he was by her.
Cullen: Oh, yeah. I think she really liked the fact that with those more recent accolades, proving that he had not been forgotten. That, you know, being President for a short period of time did not mean that his service wasn’t worth what other people’s were. And I think as we’ve looked back over the years, the time that he was there, there was a lot that went on. And there is a lot that has happened since that the players are a reflection of his White House.

Smith: What were her politics?

Cullen: Well, President Ford is dead now, so she’s not voting the way he told her to, but she didn’t then either. He was very dutiful in his support of the Republican Party throughout his entire life. And I came out there as a dutiful registered Republican and she was a dutiful registered Republican. We always voted absentee because we never knew what was going to happen with the schedule and where we were going to be so we always got absentee ballots. And before we would do our ballots, he would sit down with the two of us and go over in great detail why this Republican candidate we should vote for and we would go out of the room and kind of go, “Pfft.” And vote the way we wanted to. And we never told him about it, but I think we probably had a majority of other ticket votes in a lot of cases. But we’d listen, we nodded our heads, we said, “Oh, yes, thank you so much. We appreciate your advice” and then we would go and do what we pleased.

Smith: Do you know if she voted in the last year’s election?

Cullen: I have no idea. I have no idea.

Smith: She once told me, it was interesting, we were just chatting and out of the blue, she said, “You know, I don’t know why people thought it was surprising,” almost as if it was something she wasn’t allowed to talk about, but just as a matter of course, she always had huge admiration for Eleanor Roosevelt. And she went on about why she thought she was such a great lady.

Cullen: Big deal, her husband was a Democrat. So what?! Yeah, I think she really didn’t break things down into party lines very well.
Smith: It’s interesting because, of course, the party moved to the Right, particularly on cultural issues and all of that.

Cullen: Boy, you aren’t kidding.

Smith: And they were marooned and long before he died every four years they would be a lonely kind of outpost.

Cullen: Yeah, that moderate Republican that had no base anymore.

Smith: And, you know, there was the abortion issue and also he’s the only President ever to side sign a gay rights petition.

Cullen: Mhmm.

Smith: Now, did he change? Did she influence his change? Or how much of it is just by contrast with where the party went? Or is there some mix of the three?

Cullen: Well, maybe a mix of the three. I guess I mean, the party changed and they were where they were and they stayed where they were. They did not choose to change with the way the party went. And I think she did influence him to a degree, you know, particularly with women’s rights issues, maybe even gay rights, but I think they both were people who saw people as people. Who didn’t see them as this person goes in this category and this person goes in that category. And they had friends who were just they were their friends. It didn’t matter where they came from, where they’re going, what they were sexually, professionally, politically. They just enjoyed people and I think they just had that respect for other individuals that it didn’t matter to them.

Smith: I also have thought, the older I get the more I realize ideology matters less than generational. Generational factors trump everything. And he was a conservative of a certain generation where he was clearly fiscally conservative, I mean, he was tight fiscally. Let’s face it.

Cullen: Professionally and personally.

Smith: Yes. But obviously an internationalist, but then there was this whole host of what now are called social issues which basically people had a decent reticence about. You didn’t talk about abortion. You didn’t talk about sexual preference and maybe we should’ve. But nevertheless, he was a consistent conservative in that he had a healthy skepticism of the government being involved particularly if it was the boardroom or the bedroom.

Cullen: Yeah.

Smith: Unlike today’s “conservatives” who hate the government, but they’re perfectly willing to enlist it in their cause.

Cullen: Yes, absolutely and I guess those were issues, you know, it’s like the whole pardon thing. You do what’s right. And that’s the way they both were about abortion and gay rights. You do what is the right thing to do. You don’t question your own feelings. If your feeling is that people deserve their individual rights, if women deserve the right to choose, then, by God, speak up for it. You can’t just have that and tiptoe around it and have people think you think something else, perhaps, because you’re not speaking up. I think it was what they believed, so it was what they said.

Smith: Were there issues on which they disagreed or subjects, humorously or otherwise?

Cullen: I’m trying to think. I mean, I’m sure there were things like how much time he spent on the golf course, but if he won, she got the money, so that kind of eased it off.

Smith: Really?

Cullen: Yeah, when there would be bets on the golf course, if he won, he would come in and say, “Okay, here, this is for you.” And, believe me, it wasn’t much. It wasn’t like they were playing $1,000 a hole or anything.

Smith: That gets back to the frugality.

Cullen: Yes, I mean, he and Bob Hope bet maybe 50 cents a hole or something.

Smith: By the way, I wonder how much of a cautionary tale there was for them in seeing Hope in his last years, and how he was dragged out in public at a time when—Cullen: Oh, it was painful. I guess President and Mrs. Ford - their feeling was, “If that’s what the Hopes wanted to do, more power to them.” And I think, you know, maybe for Delores Hope it was that Bob had always been so in the public eye, he still, even though he was not in the best condition to be in the public eye, she knew that he still enjoyed it. But, yeah, President and Mrs. Ford, I think, were very aware of the decline and not wanting to have the pictures and the press gathering. You know, the deathwatch kind of thing.

Smith: That’s fascinating you say that because I can’t tell you how many conversations I had with Penny during those last few years. Once was I actually able to use some contact with ABC to get one camera crew out of the neighborhood. You certainly can understand their feelings, but they were kind of public property. How do you balance?

Cullen: Yeah, how do you balance it? But there needs to be a degree of respect, I guess, for when people get to a point in their life where they don’t view themselves as there for public consumption anymore. And I think that limit is when you are in your declining years. There should be the respect and the dignity afforded you that you get to choose how you go out. That it’s not gory details and helicopters hovering over, hoping they’re going to see you fall out of your chair on the back porch or something.

Smith: Well, and let’s face it, talk about ethical - apparently sources at the hospital who would tip off the media.

Cullen: Oh, yeah, “He’s here!” Yeah.

Smith: That must’ve been frustrating.

Cullen: I don’t know if they’ve ever figured out who that was, but there’s all sorts of stuff that goes on now. So that whoever that person is, they’re not going to know if she’s ever over there.

Smith: Maybe I shouldn’t bring this up, but remember Father—

Cullen: Certain?

Smith: Yeah, whose 15 minutes were kind of—Cullen: Oh, his 15 minutes were expanded as far as he could expand them. Yes. You know, it’s such a shame because he is such a good priest. I mean, he was such a good priest and he did such a nice service, but he just didn’t understand when he was told, “Keep your mouth shut.” He just, “It does not apply to me somehow.” I think he understands now. So, yeah, that was really uncomfortable for everybody. “Quick, turn on the news this morning! He’s there again! Didn’t someone just talk to him yesterday??”

Smith: They valued their privacy? Or maybe a better way of saying it was they valued their dignity.

Cullen: They valued their dignity. I mean, I think they both really understood that their privacy was something that they had pretty much given up. I mean, they had Secret Service for all those years. They had me running in and out of their bathrooms. You know, stuff that regular people would be going, “What are you doing here??” So their privacy had been shot, but their dignity - and I think everybody gets to have respect - and that’s all that they were asking for in those last few months of his life. That he had given so much to this country that, you know, let him decide how this is going to end.

Smith: I take it that must have really been her life at that point, caring for him.

Cullen: Absolutely. Yeah, absolutely. I don’t think she really left the house much at all. I mean, she might have gone once a week to get her hair done or something so that she would look nice for him. But that became her job, to make sure that he was taken care of, that he was comfortable, that he had a companion there to talk to, play gin rummy with, you know, watch television with, eat his meals with. That was her role.

Smith: And they insisted on going to Vail.

Cullen: And no one could talk them out of it. I mean, everybody tried. But, you know, they loved the house up there. They both loved the house. They loved the people up there. It was a wonderful life up there.

Smith: And by all accounts, they were loved, beloved.
Cullen: Oh, they were the mainstay of that community, pretty much. And they loved being there. I was very lucky in that, you know, I got dragged up every year. You know, I went up there. Penny and I would go and spend the summers up there. It’s not a bad duty to live in Rancho Mirage part of the year and Vail the other part of the year.

Smith: What was the house like?

Cullen: The house was - I’m going to say - a traditional Alpine house that grew like Topsy. It started out, I think, with maybe four bedrooms on the second level and then, when they realized that if they put a pool in the back, they were going to have to dig into the mountain. And once they had opened up the mountain, they might as well blow the back of the house out, so then there was a theater room and another bedroom and another bedroom. It probably was twice the size as they originally intended it to be, but it served their family very well because everybody could be there at Christmastime and eventually the families got big enough that they kind of only overlapped for maybe one or two nights, but they could all be there. And I think that was important to all of them. They had done it since the kids were high school age or something, whenever Vail first started, and they had had a condo in town.

Smith: And did they as late as ’95 for example, did they still, did the family gather?

Cullen: Well, I left in February of ’96, so yeah, I mean, Christmas of ’95—

Smith: Forgive me, I meant literally 2005, the year before he died, would they still be trying to assemble?

Cullen: 2005… You know, I can’t answer that question, but I sort of think so, because that summer was when they went up and they had a limited time. You know, I’m just not sure because the couple of years that they didn’t go out there was like the year that she had her heart surgery which was right before Christmas. Everybody came to the desert.

Smith: And how, I mean obviously it was serious, was it something that had been in the works for awhile or something that presumably could not be put off any longer?
Cullen: Her surgery?

Smith: Yeah.

Cullen: Yeah, it was at the time that her second book came out and I was with her doing a book tour and we used to say that the book tour was a death march with room service. And the book tour ended and we came back to the desert and she started to not feel great and, you know, didn’t think anything really seriously of it, but went in and had a check-up and they said, “Oh, wait a minute, there’s some blockage here.” And it was like, “You’ve got five days and you’re going to be in the hospital.” So she went in and they had to go in a second time because she had some, I don’t know if the stitches didn’t adhere properly or something, but all of a sudden, she started bleeding at the dining room table one night while everyone was there at Christmas, I think, because I was in Vail skiing for Christmas and suddenly got this phone call saying, “Mrs. Ford’s gone back to the hospital.” And it was taken care of but then she got a staph infection which was quite lovely.

Smith: How did he handle that?

Cullen: I think he was scared to death and he didn’t quite know what to do. He wanted to make it better, but he knew he couldn’t make it better; so therefore, it just was not a good place for him to be.

Smith: I can’t imagine him imagining life without her.

Cullen: Oh, yeah.

Smith: He always assumed that he would go first.

Cullen: You know, and I think she, because of her health issues, thought that perhaps she would go first just because her body had been damaged by other things. But I think she also knew that he wouldn’t function very well without her, so it was best that it happened the way it did.

Smith: I’ve heard her quoted since as saying to someone, I guess not surprisingly, “I don’t know why I’m still here.”

Cullen: Mhmm. She doesn’t have a job anymore.
Smith: Now she’s told people she’s retired. That it’s her choice, which sounds voluntary. Must be an enormous amount of satisfaction. I mean how many people create an institution and then have the satisfaction of knowing while they’re still alive that’s its future is ensured, because Susan is doing what she’s doing?

Cullen: Absolutely and Susan’s doing a fabulous job with it. I mean, it’s been really interesting to watch Susan step into that role.

Smith: Very big shoes.

Cullen: Scary shoes, I would think.

Smith: Well, sure. Does Mrs. Ford follow the progress of the place?

Cullen: Yeah. Now, I’m not sure today if she’s following it on a day-to-day basis, but when she was chairman, she knew everything that went on at that place, much to John Schwarzlose’s chagrin on some of the occasions, I’m afraid. And after Susan took over, her mother still stayed very actively involved in what was going on. And then she tried to back off a bit. I think some people kind of wanted her to stay involved and were shuffling Susan aside, as you know, “She’s just a little girl. She can’t do this.” So, Susan had to kind of get a ramrod back and step up and say, “Wait a minute. I’m the one that’s doing this now. My mother is not and if you don’t believe me, you can ask her, because this is what she wants me to do.” And it’s worked out nicely, but it took some doing on Susan’s part, I think, because for a long, long time, she was just the Ford’s little girl and she’s not anymore.

Smith: What kind of grandparent is Mrs. Ford?

Cullen: Doting. She’s the kind of grandmother which I understand today, having a grandchild of my own, that when the grandchildren were there and she had had about enough of the noise and the commotion, she would retire to her room. She would just disappear and there were times I thought, “Don’t you want to be here playing with the kids?” But now it’s something I understand fully, it’s like, “Oh, please, quiet! Peace!”

Smith: Was the President like that as well?
Cullen: Well, he always had the office, you know, so it was, “I have to make some calls,” you know, “I’ll be back.” So he could plan his escape and everyone accepted that a little more. But she had a system and I don’t remember how it worked now, but from the time the first grandchildren were around, where they got so much money a month from grandma, and, like, half of it they could spend and half of it had to go into the bank. And as they got older, it increased and then, you know, the new grandchildren came up and then I think it got to be a pretty healthy chunk of change she was handing out there, but she thought that would be good for them to have their own money and to know that they had to put some of it away, they couldn’t blow it all.

Smith: Was she the kind of grandmother - you know, there are some kind of grandparents who could talk to grandkids about things that parents can’t.

Cullen: I would imagine that she is one of those grandmothers because I could always talk to her about anything. I mean, there was stuff I’d think, “There is no way I’d have this conversation with my mother, but having it with you is perfectly okay.” So I think, yeah, she’s very open and, you know, I think if anyone came to her with a question or concern, she certainly would not be the type to say, “Oh, no, you have to talk to your parents about that.” She would be, “Oh, you came to me. Okay, well, sit down right here and let’s chat.”

Smith: Mary Fisher told us that I think she may actually have told Mrs. Ford before she told her own parents—

Cullen: That she was HIV positive.

Smith: Yes, and they cried and they laughed and then she said, “Now, you’ve got to tell the President.” And she said, “Oh, no, I can’t do that” and so on and so on. Finally she prevailed on her to do so. And it’s good because I asked her, “Did you ever see him angry?” And she said, “There were two times and one was a professional thing back at the White House” and this was the other time. She said, “He was so angry” and it’s the sort of reaction you would expect from a father, not from a friend of the family.

Cullen: Yeah. Well, when I was leaving and moving back to the East Coast, Susan had called me and said, “Hey, since you’re going to drive back, I’ll fly out to the desert and I’ll drive back with you.” Well, after President and Mrs. Ford found out that we had this plan, I mean, neither one of us was a 20-year old little innocent. I was 50-years old, I think, at the time. Well, maybe not quite that old, but I was getting close. And the intercom rings and he says, “Ann, would you come into my office?” “Okay, what have I done now?” And he said, “Sit down for a minute.” So I sit down across from him at the desk and he says, “Now, I understand from Susan that the two of you are planning to drive across country. It’s not going to happen. There are axe murders,” and, I mean, he went through this whole tirade of, “You girls cannot do that. You can’t.” And I finally said, “Well, sir, okay, I guess you can tell Susan that she can’t do it, but I’ve got a car and a couple of cats and I’m going to have to figure a way to get across country somehow.” So, and this is off the record, Susan and I drove across country and he never knew.

Smith: Do you think he was sensitive, I assume she was, to this public impression about his clumsiness - you know, the whole Chevy Chase business by contrast with his real athleticism?

Cullen: I think it ticked her off. I think he just kind of was, “Pfft.” It was no big deal. And I remember one time there was some event in LA where Chevy Chase was there and they ended up sitting up at the same table together or something and he gave him a hard time about the hard time that Chevy Chase gave him about falling down. You know, I think he just kind of thought, “Well, the photographers were there, they took the pictures, you can’t refute that. I know what I’m capable of doing.” But I think she hated the fact that people always brought that up.

Smith: He was astonishingly comfortable in his own skin.

Cullen: He was. He knew himself so well and was so comfortable and just, you know, “Take a pot shot, I know who I am. It doesn’t bother me.” I mean, that always was my read on him - he didn’t care what people thought because he knew who he was.

Smith: Just a couple other things and we’ll wind up.
Do you have any other memories of that last week either at the cathedral or Grand Rapids? For example, I’m sure you’ve done this when you were in a position like that, I remember when I was talking, just being in a fog. You know, I was just focused. They were sitting right in front of me, which in some ways makes it harder.

Cullen: But the rest is just a blur.

Smith: Exactly. But I remember that for some odd Roselyn Carter was weeping. And I thought to myself, “Talk about coming full circle. That says it all.”

Cullen: Well, I thought President Carter, the way he started and ended his eulogy with the line from his inaugural address, that was so touching. And when President Bush, Sr. went up to do his eulogy and he walked by the casket and tapped it, I thought that was—

Smith: And you knew he didn’t want to break down.

Cullen: Mhmm. And there were a couple of times he kind of—

Smith: Exactly. Yeah.

Cullen: Yeah, the evening in California with the public viewing, I went over late one night with Greg Willard. We had heard about the crowd that was there and we wanted to see it. And we walked over. The Secret Service was around the side, and we walked into the church, where a huge line of people was waiting. And there was a Marine standing in line. I remember this exactly correctly. There was a rope across so that people could just walk up near the casket, and then they had to move off to the sides. Greg went up to this young Marine in uniform and said, “Sir, why don’t you come with me?” And I walked up with the Marine and Greg. Greg took the stanchion down and walked us right next to the casket. The Marine stood there for a moment, then came to attention and snapped a salute. I thought I was going to fall down with emotion!

Smith: What kind of relationship did they have with the Secret Service?

Cullen: Love/hate.

Smith: That’s an honest answer.
Cullen: For the most part, I think they really liked the people that were in the Secret Service. They respected the job they were doing, but there were times they just wished they would get lost.

Smith: Just because of the intrusion?

Cullen: The fact that they had to know every second of their lives. But they also recognized that how would they have gotten around without them? Neither one of them had a driver’s license, and having been on a golf cart with him once when he was driving, it was a good thing.

Smith: What do you think they’d think about Squeaky Fromme being released?

Cullen: You know, I wonder if Mrs. Ford’s even aware of it. I mean, I’m sure she reads the paper and watches the news.

Smith: And, of course, Sara Jane Moore recently.

Cullen: Yeah, uhm, I don’t know what she would think of it. Maybe, “You’ve served your time” and I’m sure at the time she was scared to death when all that was happening.

Smith: That gave her a particular - I don’t know how you would ever fully shake - that sense of vulnerability.

Cullen: Yeah.

Smith: Having been through it twice. So that even long after you’ve left office, there’s still this lingering.

Cullen: That fear. And, you know, there are always nuts out there. And, you know, at the time that I guess when the first sort of terrorist attacks were going on and suddenly out in front of the office there were the concrete buttresses and all that stuff going on and you thought, “Boy, it just kind of never ends.”

Smith: The other thing is I’ve heard stories about how every week, one day a week, he’d set aside for autographing.

Cullen: With Lee and they would just sit there and sign and sign and sign.
Smith: And people have no idea. And on occasion, she would go in. He would be the goad, “Now, mother, you’ve got to…” and they would be at the opposite ends of the table with their piles and I’ve often thought about that as a metaphor because once he was removed, once that goad disappeared, if her life would change in ways more than most. I mean, most widows have the luxury of living a private life.

Cullen: Yes, and I think she tries to live and fairly successfully to this point has chosen to live a private life. She kind of dedicates herself now to children and grandchildren and that’s the visiting that she does.

Smith: And I assume there’s just the fundamental fact that when you’re 91, you’ve probably outlived most of your friends.

Cullen: And there is that. I think that’s got to be a hard thing for her because like Lee Annenberg has just died recently. Delores Hope is still around, but I certainly don’t think they see each other because Delores is not able to get around as much and certainly Mrs. Ford is not going out to parties and out for dinner. And so, yeah, they both had outlived a large, large percentage of their friends.

Smith: I had a sense and I don’t want to exaggerate it, but in the times that I was around them - that they really made an effort to surround themselves with younger people.

Cullen: Well, I don’t know if they really made an effort or if they just liked people and it just got to a point that the younger people who were the ones who were kind of filling the spots that were available. You know, if you’ve got 20 friends that you’re going to have around you, you want to keep those spots filled, so younger people came in and they enjoyed that. I don’t think they really necessarily sought out, “Okay, we need younger friends, because that’s going to keep us younger” but it was, “We’ve lost so much of our group.” And, I mean, they did so many social things. They went so many places where they could meet and get to know younger people, so that they could bring them into their group.

Smith: And all of the trappings didn’t get in the way of making new friends?
Cullen: No, because I think at first, the first time you met them it was kind of, “(gasp) This is a former President and First Lady,” and “Oh, I’ve heard so much about them,” and then after you’ve been around them a couple of times, you realize that, “These are really just genuinely nice people. I don’t have to worry about what I’m going to say. I don’t have to worry about whether my tie is straight or using the right fork or whatever. These are just people who like other people and I can be myself.”

Smith: What would make her angry?

Cullen: Me. I’m trying to think what would make her angry. What would make her angry was that she had agreed to do a speech and then she had to do it. And therefore we had to come up with the speech and therefore she had to have me give her something that she could start working on and she didn’t want to do it and so therefore I became the bad guy there for a while. But she didn’t get angry at a whole lot of things.

Smith: What would disappoint her?

Cullen: If her children, not that they failed, but if something went wrong with one of the kids that they hadn’t gotten something that they wanted, she would be disappointed for them, not in them. I don’t know what else. I guess she would be disappointed that perhaps her husband in a certain circumstance didn’t get the respect that she thought was due because, you know, she knew what a great guy he was and thought that everybody else should know what a great guy he was.

Smith: I love the image: We were told when we were out there at Rancho Mirage in the summer that on occasion they would go to the movies. And they remember she walked out of Titanic I think right after the ship hit the iceberg because she didn’t want to see the rest. And so literally she was out in the lobby.

Cullen: I’m not aware. That was after I was gone.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story someone told us, one of the gals working out there. It wasn’t Penny.
[Other]: Marie?

Smith: No, one of the women on the staff. They’d gone to a movie over the weekend and he came back from some romantic comedy and he came back and said, “You’d really like it. It’s a chick flick.”

Cullen: I’m sure he got that term from her. A ‘chick flick’. Yeah, not exactly his terminology.

Smith: Did they enjoy going out like that or was it problematic?

Cullen: It was problematic in that they couldn’t just go out and be themselves and just spend an evening enjoying being out with each other because there was always somebody that would come up and say, “Oh, can I have your autograph?” You know, they would be in a nice restaurant having dinner, just the two of them, the Secret Service discreetly over somewhere trying to be unobtrusive, and there would be someone who would come up with their napkin or something and say, “Oh, Mr. President, can I have your autograph?” And for the most part, he was pretty good about it. Every once in a while, it would just be, “Enough.”

Smith: Tell me about his temper.

Cullen: It was there and it was gone.

Smith: Summer thunderstorm.

Cullen: Yeah, it was white light and then it was calm, but you didn’t want to be in there when it was white light. Well, we used to - I don’t know if anyone else has told you that we used to - call them ‘God damn it’ days. And it would be, you know, “Oh, this is a seven ‘God damn it’ day” or “This is just a two ‘God damn it’ day.” So, when he was really upset about something, it would be “God damn it” this, “God damn it” that, and “God damn it” the other thing. And you know you wouldn’t want to go in the office if it was a seven.

Smith: That was the worst language you heard?

Cullen: Yeah, that was the very worst.
Smith: One sensed that he was genuinely offended by the Nixon tapes as much as anything else because of the language.

Cullen: Yeah, I think he just couldn’t believe that there would be that kind of talk because he just didn’t do that. I mean, as I say, “God damn it,” that was pretty much it for him. She, on the other hand, might have had a couple of other words in her vocabulary, but we won’t go into that.

Smith: One of the most moving of all of our conversations has been with Lorraine, the cook. What an extraordinary story. She never had been on an airplane and was scared to death and the President convinced her that everything was going to be fine. And then, of course, she’d never seen snow and he took her to the ski school and, you know, it’s almost a paternal feeling.

Cullen: Yeah, all of us who worked for him I think he kind of took, I mean, he and Mrs. Ford referred to themselves as my second parents to me. So I think they really felt that. There may have been people that worked for them that they didn’t have that relationship with, but there were a lot of us that they did. They felt very protective and, you know, if we were dating someone that they didn’t quite like, we heard about it.

Smith: Did you have to introduce—

Cullen: I mean, on occasion, I introduced them to people and, you know, when I would be going out with a Secret Service agent or something, I would get this look like, “Oh, you can do better than that.” But I had a good friend that I’d grown up with in Dover who was a priest at Grace Episcopal in Grand Rapids while we were doing a lot of traveling back and forth to Grand Rapids. So, when I would go to Grand Rapids with the Fords and we would be staying in the hotel, I would get in touch with John and say, “I’m going to be in town. Let’s go have a drink. Let’s go have dinner” or something. And he would come to the hotel to get me and the only deal was he had to come in full regalia, big cross, dog collar, black suit, the whole bit. And the agents would be, “What?! She’s dating a priest? What is this?!” And John and I just thought it was hysterical.

Smith: You still talk with her?
Cullen: I do on occasion. I write to her now more than I talk to her just because I think, I mean, I like to talk to her, but I think sometimes it’s tiring for me to be on the phone with her and keep asking questions and, “How are you?” and “What’s been happening?” I can tell her more about what’s going on with me if I put it in the written word and send it to her and then I call every once in a while and we just have a chat. It’s amazing how much a part of my life they both were, are.

Smith: We asked everyone how they think the Fords should be remembered historically, but in a more personal way, because you’re in a position to answer that question in a much more personal way than most, how do you remember them?

Cullen: Very kind, caring, thoughtful, just really good friends. I mean, they opened their lives to me without reservation and I think I kind of gave that back to them and we spent a lot of time together over the years I was out there and we did become very close. And I can’t believe that I had that opportunity to be with them and to do the traveling I did with them and to meet the people that I met through them and it was amazing.

Smith: Were they fun to travel with?

Cullen: They were. They could be very interesting in that he always wanted to get on the plane first and she always wanted to get on last, so it was always this big discussion in the car and then it would be, “Well, okay, God damn it. I’m getting on. You come when you’re ready.” You know, things like that, but it was fun and, yeah, I would drag cats back and forth to Vail in private planes.

Smith: You must have met lots of interesting people.

Cullen: I met lots of interesting people. Brent Scowcroft taught me to drink Saki in Tokyo. Stayed with the sultan of Oman’s cousin in Oman in his house and, you know, just amazing people that I got to meet.

Smith: Were you with them when the Clintons visited them in Vail?

Cullen: Yes.
Smith: How was that?

Cullen: That was very cordial and, you know, they stayed in the Firestone’s house next door, so, you know, it was terrace to terrace, they just had to walk across a little piece of grass to get from house to house. I do remember there was a dinner party one night that may have been down at the Betty Ford Alpine Garden and it was something for the ballet that was in town. And Mrs. Ford sat next to him, to President Clinton, at dinner and I had gone to the dinner and I rode back up to the house with them afterwards. And we were sitting around talking and I think she was getting undressed and I was in the dressing room with her and we were just sitting there talking about the evening and she said, “That is the most charming man I have ever met in my life.” So, she saw what was there apparently. And, well, Mrs. Clinton had been an intern in the Ford White House and she brought the picture, I think, to show him that had been taken. They got along very well.

Smith: Perfect. That’s perfect.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this.

Holkeboer: This was a surprise to me to be interviewed after thirty years. I can’t remember that much.

Smith: You might be surprised what you remember.

Holkeboer: Yes, things come back to you, I guess. It used to be that once I started I couldn’t quit. But now – that’s many years ago.

Smith: We’ll test that theory. First of all, when did you go to work for Congressman Ford?

Holkeboer: I started in 1963 until 1977, I worked thirteen years.

Smith: And you were located where?

Holkeboer: First we were located in the Cannon Building, and we were ready to move to the Rayburn Building. He was made Minority Leader, and he was Minority Leader for many years. I’d have to review that, I can’t remember how many. Then he became Vice President, then he became President. So I worked with him through all those years.

Smith: What were you doing before 1963?

Holkeboer: I was a school teacher.

Smith: A school teacher where?

Holkeboer: Kalamazoo and then Grand Rapids. In school teaching they always ask you in March, are you going to come back? Now that’s the only job that does that. Are you going to come back? And every time you say, “Do I want to?” And so another girl and I decided to go Washington, D.C. No job, no place to stay – nothing. Just our cars full of clothes and we went to Washington, D.C. We found a furnished apartment and she found a job, and I finally found a job. I had a hard time finding one because everybody wanted me to teach school. In September, there are many Jewish holidays, so they thought I should substitute. They didn’t want to hire a teacher.

But finally I found a job, and during that time Frank Meyer, who was Mr. Ford’s assistant, administrative assistant, went to the same church I did and one time I said to him, “If Mr. Ford ever needs another person, let me know ’cause I can sharpen pencils.” He called me and asked if I were interested, and then I started. This was right after Kennedy was shot and the Warren Commission. Mr. Ford was put on the Warren Commission and he needed more help in the office.

Smith: Did you have a job interview?

Holkeboer: With Mr. Ford? Yes. It was very fast.

Smith: Had you met him before?

Holkeboer: Well, only by pictures in the paper. Because I was from Grand Rapids and I saw his picture. But I had never met him personally. It was very early because he had a lot of appointments that day, and I think it was like seven or eight o’clock in the morning. I found a parking place, which was illegal, but I didn’t know that. He just said - well, I can’t really remember all the words he said, he said something like, “When can you start?” and “Even if you have a headache, you have to be nice.” I remember that. So I was a receptionist for many years, but I never had a headache.

Smith: His office was in the Cannon Building,?

Holkeboer: Cannon Building, yes.

Smith: Can you describe the office?

Holkeboer: You walked in, it was only two rooms. This was way back in ’63. It was only two rooms and there were five of us in one room, with a really tiny kitchenette. Really, it wasn’t even that. His room was a nice size and he had a nice closet, but we were all in this one room and we were ready to move to the Rayburn Building, which was really going to be a treat for us because we’d have more room. When he became Minority Leader we moved to the Capitol and we had lots of room, but we had to hire more people.

Smith: But see, that’s interesting, because in 1963 he’d been in Washington at that point for fourteen or fifteen years.

Holkeboer: Yes, that could be.

Smith: And he had risen in the Republican hierarchy and yet, you said he still only had two rooms.

Holkeboer: He only had two rooms. Well, everybody had two rooms, because the Rayburn Building was just built, and when you got the office, you stayed there. After a while, once they let him in the Rayburn Building, he had his pick because he had been there so long. So he could pick a nice office. Also that’s all done by numbers. I can’t recall how it’s all done, but if you come that year, then you draw a number and then you have a choice.

Smith: With seniority factored in there somewhere.

Holkeboer: Something like that, yes.

Smith: Tell me again, you said there were five. Who were the five? What were their functions?

Holkeboer: There was Mildred Leonard, who has passed away. Frank Meyer has passed away.

Smith: What was Mildred Leonard’s role?

Holkeboer: She was the executive secretary, or his personal secretary. Then there was Jim Bersie.

Smith: What was his function?

Holkeboer: Well, I really can’t describe everybody’s function because we all worked together. So if one had a job to do, we’d all work at it. I really can’t describe everybody’s job. I do know that Ruth Kilmer - Frank Meyer dictated to her every afternoon and she typed the letters the next day.

Smith: Was there a lot of constituent mail?

Holkeboer: Yes.

Smith: I assume it was very important to answer constituent mail?

Holkeboer: Oh, yes. He answered every one of them. Then he, himself, signed them. No machine at all. He signed his mail. Who beside Jim Bersie and myself? Like I say, giving us each a job – except Ruth, she was the secretary because she took the dictation. What Jim and I did, I don’t know. Every day just flew – I don’t know what we did.

Smith: In addition to constituent mail, there must have been constituent services. People from the district must have wanted things.

Holkeboer: We had somebody in Grand Rapids. You know, I don’t know who they were. I can’t remember. Elaine somebody, Gordon Vander Till. Elaine handled that office alone for quite some time. Then when it was election time, one of us or two of us, would come to Grand Rapids to help her. I did that a couple of times and I loved it.

Smith: What did you like about that?

Holkeboer: I don’t know, I guess just being back home for a little while. He would have these town meetings and I would go along with him, try to get there before he did and lay out all the paperwork or whatever he wanted. Then the people would come in to see him. They really didn’t have appointments, they just knew he was going to be there. As soon as our time was up he would get in his car and I’d have to first gather all that material and take it to the next spot. I don’t know, it was kind of challenging, kind of adventuresome. It was different than being in the office in Washington.

Smith: Did people come looking for things? People who wanted favors, wanted help from the government?
Holkeboer: Oh yes, people wanted everything. People thought that they could get everything from their Congressman. I often said to people, “Don’t go to a lawyer, go to your Congressman. He’ll help you,” because they asked for everything. I can’t remember the things they asked for, but I was sometimes just amazed what they asked for. And so, since then, I’ll have to admit, I’ve been a little bolder about things, too.

Smith: You never really had a tough reelection campaign. He was from a reasonably safe district.

Holkeboer: No. He never did, but he worked hard to let the people know he was there for them. No, I don’t think he ever had a hard election.

Smith: The story is that he tried to get home as often as he could.

Holkeboer: Yes he did, almost every weekend. Of course, Betty didn’t like that too well. So one time he decided to stay home that weekend. The kids all had plans, so there he was, the kids were gone. So he says, “I stayed home and the kids all had their own activities.” It was kind of funny. No, he got back here as much as he could, and as often as he could.

Smith: Did you get to know Mrs. Ford?

Holkeboer: Yes, quite well.

Smith: Tell me about that.

Holkeboer: She was taking care of the four kids. When I was there the kids were young, six, eight, ten, twelve. They were young and sometimes she’d have her hands full. One of them liked animals and she found a snake in somebody’s bedroom. She about hit the ceiling, and so she called the office, “What am I going to do? There’s a snake in the bedroom!” I don’t know if that was Susie’s – Susan loved animals –

Smith: And Steve, too –

Holkeboer: Maybe it was Steve’s. One of the little kids liked animals and she found a snake in the bedroom. She was very upset.
Smith: Politics is a lot of snakes in the grass, but not usually snakes in the bedroom.

Holkeboer: This is a REAL snake. I don’t know what she did after that but we tried to calm her down. She’d come to the office often, all dressed up to go to an event in the evening because they always went out at night to something.

Smith: She liked clothes, didn’t she?

Holkeboer: Oh, she loved clothes. Oh, yes. And she went to somebody named – she went to a special shop, but I can’t think of the name of it. Frankie’s? I can’t think of the name of it. She loved clothes and she always looked nice, very nice.

Smith: Maury Dejonge was in here earlier today and he had a photo, it was so funny, because it was emblematic of the era. It is 1975 and he is talking to the President. He was wearing this plaid jacket and striped trousers and it was pretty clear that Mrs. Ford from time to time would put her foot down and say, “You’re not wearing that suit.”

Holkeboer: He wasn’t that clothes conscious, I don’t think. But she was. But of course he left home before she got out of bed, because he was at work at seven or eight in the morning. He was there early and stayed late. We had somebody in the staff come in about ten or eleven and leave at seven or eight so that there would be somebody there when he was still there.

Smith: I take it most weekends he would travel?

Holkeboer: Most weekends. I would say most weekends. Yes. There was a time, and this time was before me, I think, that the Congress got out in June and didn’t go back in again until January, but I’m not quite sure of the facts. The whole family would move back here, kids and all. They had a house. The first part of the school year the kids were here, the second part they were in Alexandria. But after awhile they found out that wasn’t too good for the kids. So then they just didn’t come here again. And Congress didn’t get out until August and started right away in September, so it doesn’t have that long recess it used to. But that was before my time.

Smith: After the Kennedy assassination, the Warren Commission must have consumed a fair amount of his time.
Holkeboer: Yes, it did.

Smith: How much of a factor was that in your daily existence? Did he have any extra help because of that?

Holkeboer: No, but the whole committee had help. The help was within the committee. They had their own help, but thinking back – see, I was hired right around that time, so it was a whole new thing to me. And if we didn’t see him, I wasn’t too aware of it because there was so much to do and so much to learn.

Smith: Did he talk about it at all?

Holkeboer: No, not very much. No, not to me. He might have talked to his AA, administrative assistant, but not to me, no.

Smith: There is this legend out there that LBJ said awful things. It is interesting, if you do the math, he asked Ford to be on the Warren Commission long before Ford was Minority Leader, when he was just another Republican Congressman from Michigan. There had to be something that Johnson saw in him.

Holkeboer: He knew he was an intelligent man and I think he wished that he was a Democrat instead of a Republican.

Smith: Did you ever see them together?

Holkeboer: No. One time the President called, so I said to Mr. Ford, “The President is on the phone,” and all of us were kind of shocked. What’s a president calling Mr. Ford for? I never did find out, because that’s all their business and not mine. Secret business. We were all kind of shocked that Johnson called Mr. Ford.

Smith: Now I assume that began to change. In ’64 we had the Goldwater disaster and that’s really what set up the whole race for Minority Leader against Charlie Halleck.

Holkeboer: Yes, that’s right. But he only won by a few points, a few votes.

Smith: What was the view of Halleck?
Holkeboer: I don’t know because I just came at that time. All I can remember is he was an older man; I don’t how old he really was; he was not doing his work like he should. But I don’t know.

Smith: Almost a generational thing, as much as anything.

Holkeboer: I think so. I think he was getting tired and worn out. But I don’t know because that’s when I came.

Smith: Do you remember when Ford, he obviously had to let you all know, that he was going to run for this?

Holkeboer: Yes, we were all excited and when he won we were all excited. But, what do you do? Jump for joy! But we also knew that it was going to be more work and more of a burden. It was a busy life.

Smith: He also took a risk, because if he lost, let’s face it, the guy he ran against probably wouldn’t forget it.

Holkeboer: No, he wouldn’t. Yes, you don’t think of those things, do you? I think I’m going to win!

Smith: Do you think he was an ambitious man?

Holkeboer: Oh yes. Yes, he wanted to be Speaker of the House. That was his one job – that’s a job he wanted, but he never got it. But he got to be President. But he always wanted to be Speaker.

Smith: How did things change once you moved into the Minority Leader’s office – where was it?

Holkeboer: It was bigger. It was in the Capitol, in the corner and we had one room for the reception and Mildred and Frank and I were in that room next to his. In the back there was Dorothy and Charlene and Ruth and Jim and Jo Wilson, and then in another room was Paul Miltich, because he was the Press Secretary, he wanted a room of his own. And then in another room was George, George something. He opened the mail, and just took care of a lot of things for us.

Smith: Did he still sign every letter.
Holkeboer: He always signed the letters. Because he had a limousine he signed them to and from work, from home. Yes, he signed them. In the limousine he was busy signing letters. Yes, he always signed his own letters. Until he became President, then I don’t think he did anymore.

Smith: And of course there was the famous Ev and Jerry Show. Everett Dirksen.

Holkeboer: Yes, Everett Dirksen. But that was always on the Senate side. We just had to help Mr. Ford gather material so he would have it for it - but I never saw it because that was during working hours that he was doing it. And it was on the Senate side.

Smith: I guess I didn’t realize that it was exclusively on the Senate side.

Holkeboer: Yes, I think it’s because Ev was there, Ev Dirksen was there longer and he was older…

Smith: He was a bit of a character, wasn’t he?

Holkeboer: Yes, he was.

Smith: Let me ask you something, and I’m not looking for names, I’m just trying to get a sense of the House culture of those days and maybe a little bit of the contrast that Jerry Ford represented. You hear stories about a lot of drinking that went on, and there was a certain amount of skirt chasing that went on. A lot of things that didn’t get reported, and he clearly stood apart from that culture, and yet he was able to get along with them all.

Holkeboer: He got along with everybody. Betty told us when she married she knew she never had to worry about another woman. The only thing she had to worry about was that he was a workaholic – and that he would work too much. That was true. He worked all the time. But, no, I worked for Mr. Ford and then after I lost that job, I worked for Jim Leach, and I was really blessed by working with two great men. Both of them were good men, and honest men, and fair. And thoughtful, both of them. I don’t know how I was so blessed to work with two good men. I don’t think I could stand it if I worked with a Congressman who ran around.
Smith: Were there Congressmen who ran around?

Holkeboer: Sure there were. We knew it, and the secretaries – you know, they played the field, some of them. They dressed up, they were gorgeous, you know. What can you do?

Smith: And a lot of drinking?

Holkeboer: I think there was, but not Mr. Ford. If he had one drink, maybe two, I think that would take him all evening. Only because he knew he shouldn’t have more. No, no, I never thought Mr. Ford, shall we say, drank too much, never.

Smith: Now his counterpart, was it Hale Boggs? I think the Democratic - Holkeboer: Yes, he was killed in an airplane accident. We never heard…they never found them, did they? They never found them.

Smith: And then there was Tip O’Neill.

Holkeboer: Oh, yes.

Smith: Now that clearly was a very special relationship.

Holkeboer: Yes it was. He got along real well with Tip O’Neill, but you know, I never saw the two together, but maybe they were together in the House. I never really saw them together, but I knew they got along real well.

Smith: Can you explain, because I think people, in today’s political culture, would find it hard to believe that there was a time when people could be very partisan, and very loyal to their party, and go hammer and tongs all day long, and after dinner adjourn and become friends.

Holkeboer: Yes, I don’t know, I can’t explain that either. I think it is the character of the person, their self. Mr. Ford was one that always wanted to stay friends, didn’t want arguments and after something was done where they had big disagreements, he would come and shake the person’s hand and discuss it with him. But he never was one to hold a grudge, never was one to say, “I’m never talking to you again.” But lot of these things happened on the floor of the House and you don’t see that in the office.
Smith: And of course there was no television in those days.

Holkeboer: No there wasn’t. Sometimes those were the good old days.

Smith: I want your opinion – I wonder what television has done to the Congress.

Holkeboer: Well, I really don’t know. I think it is good to have. They may have it so that you can see what is happening on the floor. You really don’t have to go to the floor until it is time to vote. Which, I don’t know if that’s good or bad. I don’t know.

Smith: One also senses that in those days, before all the Watergate reforms, people were more loyal to their party. There was more party identification. The seniority system was stronger, there was handful of old bulls who called the shots.

Holkeboer: Yes, I think so. Mr. Ford had three or four real strong friends.

Smith: Who were some of his friends?

Holkeboer: All I can think of was Arends, Les Arends. That’s the only one I can think of. Do you know some of them?

Smith: Les Arends was from Illinois.

Holkeboer: I can’t think of another. I can see them, but I can’t –

Smith: Mel Laird.

Holkeboer: Oh, Mel Laird, of course. Yes. Anyone else? You know them better than I do. As soon as you say the name, I say yes. Mel Laird became Secretary of Defense, I think, when Mr. Ford was president.

Smith: There was Don Rumsfeld.

Holkeboer: Yes, he was another good friend. And so was Cheney.

Smith: And Bob Dole.
Holkeboer: Bob Dole, yes, but he’s on the Senate side again. We got to know Mel and Rumsfeld and Cheney quite well and, all I can say is, they are changed people. They’ve changed.

Smith: Did he have any enemies?

Holkeboer: If so, we didn’t know about it. There might be people who disliked him, but as far as an enemy is concerned, I don’t think so. I don’t think he gave people a chance to be an enemy.

Smith: When the Warren Commission came out with its report, almost from the beginning, there were people who doubted it. What was his reaction to all that? Was there a lot of mail, for example?

Holkeboer: As I said, I just started when he was chosen for the Warren Commission. I just started, so everything was so new to me, everything he did or said was, “huh?” like that. If I had been there for a few years maybe I could answer that question a little better. Because right after he became Minority Leader we had to move and then he was on the Warren Commission, and he was gone all the time. You know, I don’t know where they met. I really don’t. He had the full text, I know, in his bookcase there, right in our room. And we each got a book, signed by him about the Warren Commission. I still have it. I still have things he gave me. They are very valuable to me.

Smith: What was he like as a boss?

Holkeboer: Oh, I think he was wonderful. But, you know, look at it this way, the AA is really the boss, is really the one who tells everyone what to do, and if they’ve done a good job. Then Mr. Ford would tell us, you’re good, or glad to have you here, or you did a good job. On the whole, it was Frank Meyer who was our boss. The AA is the boss. But Mr. Ford knows what goes on because the AA tells him all about it.

Smith: Tell us about Frank Meyer – what was he like, how did he do his job?

Holkeboer: He was another workaholic. They met in Grand Haven. He was a school teacher there, and Mr. Ford brought him in. He was my boss as soon as I came, Mr. Meyer was. Like I say, he was a workaholic, he expected you to get your work done. But he was very nice about it, and very helpful. What more do you say? You know yourself you had to get your work done. If you didn’t get it done today, there would be more tomorrow.

Smith: With all of these increasing demands on his time, it must have been harder for people to just walk in off the street to see him.

Holkeboer: Yes, they very seldom did. Once he became Minority Leader he wasn’t in the office that much. We saw them, we made them as comfortable as we could, showed them the office. In fact, I took pictures of people in Mr. Ford’s chair. They thought that was the berries. We showed them the Prayer Room and little things like that and that helped a lot. Showed them our offices, but he very seldom saw constituents that walked in, because he was always at committee meetings or on the floor or somewhere.

Smith: Now, Mrs. Ford, I know at some point, maybe it was earlier, but she would take constituents on trips to Mt. Vernon and that sort of thing.

Holkeboer: No, she didn’t do that when I – I don’t think she was too well when I was working there. And I’m not sure if it was her back – she wasn’t too well. In those days you could help out and I sometimes took the kids to get haircuts or to get this or to do that, because she couldn’t drive. I think it was her back. I’m not too sure it was her back.

Smith: We also heard the kids talk about on weekends, their dad would take them in, when he’d go into the office. And they would play with stuff, Holkeboer: Oh, yes, yes, yes.

Smith: Remember that?

Holkeboer: Yes, we do, because they would take all the things off the top of our desk and hide them, or exchange names, we had name plates, so my name might be in somebody else’s desk and all the little items that you just kind of keep on your desk – they were gone. So we got quite used to putting the things in our drawers, so the kids couldn’t exchange them. Mr. Ford would come in on Monday and say, “I had Susan and Steve with me here on Saturday,” and go right into his office. He knew that they had been up to something. But it didn’t take us long, but the kids would come and they kind of liked fussing at everybody’s desk.

Smith: Was he good with the kids?

Holkeboer: Yes, he was good, very helpful and very patient. And the kids loved him.

Smith: Now tell us the story that we’ve heard about the bribe.

Holkeboer: Winter, Winter, what was his name?

Smith: Winter Berger.

Holkeboer: Winter Berger, oh yes.

Smith: His name would surface later on.

Holkeboer: Yes, it surfaced. Oh, yes. He would come in and,

Smith: Who was he?

Holkeboer: I don’t know, I think he came from New York. He was recommended by somebody who was a good friend of Mr. Ford, so we had no idea that this man was going to do what he did. He had an appointment with Mr. Ford. I can see him sitting on the couch.

Smith: What did he look like?

Holkeboer: Short, kind of dark hair, and long face. He was short. Then he came again and he gave all of us girls something. I have a little compact, but I’m not the one that had to go to the hearings of Mr. Ford to become Vice President. Esther Dukov was that, and he had said that he gave Esther Dukov a billfold with a hundred dollars or something in it. I don’t remember the amount. So she had to go to the hearing and swear that there was no money in her billfold. I know he gave me a compact, I wonder what I was supposed to do with that. I don’t know whether I still have it or not. Then he disappeared.

Smith: The bribe story, what happened? He went in to see the Congressman?

Holkeboer: I don’t know. I don’t quite know the story about it.
Smith: The way Maury Dejonge reconstructed it, this guy came in and basically tried to bribe him. It took 15 seconds for him to tell him to get out of his office and never show his face again.

Holkeboer: That must have been the second visit, because this opportunity to give us a gift was another time. It wasn’t the first. So he must have come again. Then it came up again when he was sworn in as Vice President. Then Winter Berger came to the hearings, or he had to testify. That’s when poor Esther was caught.

Smith: The lead up to his nomination as Vice President, there must have been sort of speculation in the office.

Holkeboer: Yes, yes.

Smith: Agnew was in trouble.

Holkeboer: Yes, but we didn’t think he [Mr. Nixon] would choose Mr. Ford because he needed Mr. Ford in the House. He needed him there for the Republicans. So we thought it would be Rumsfeld, and we thought – Rumsfeld, I think at that time was in England or something or abroad – and we were quite shocked that night. At least I was, when it was announced about nine o’clock at night.

Smith: You found out from TV?

Holkeboer: Yes, we found out from TV. I think it was about as as it could be. So the next morning I come to work and it’s full of security people and I thought, oh what’s happening? This was all so new to us.

Smith: The next day he went to the Red Flannel Parade in Cedar Springs.

Holkeboer: That’s right. He said I promised and I do that every year and I’m going to do that again. So he did. I don’t know what happened there, but he insisted that even though he was Vice President, he was going to the Red Flannel Parade. I don’t know what happened at the parade.

Smith: How did things change?

Holkeboer: Well, we had to move.
Smith: I assume he didn’t change.

Holkeboer: No. We had to move and I was in his office in the Senate side because he was also President of the Senate. He had an office. So two or three of us were put in that office. Charlene and Jo and me, and we were with Walter Mote. He was the boss and we stayed there for a while. Then he became President and then I went to the White House and we were put into a small room with no windows and I think two of us were put into this small room. I about went crazy. It was too small, I needed windows! So every couple of hours I would go for a walk because I couldn’t stand it. Because, you see, in Nixon’s day all their people wanted their own rooms, with their names on it. So that’s why there were all these old cubby holes.

So then I was transferred to the Executive Office Building. A beautiful building. Just George and I were there, and we had one big room with lots of windows. We had a fireplace and we had another room where we could put our equipment. It was wonderful. We enjoyed that room. But we had to keep our door closed. We could not keep it open. I like open doors, I don’t like closed doors. We could not look out the window because then the security people would think I was going to shoot somebody, I guess. I went to a lot of these, what do you call them, official welcoming’s on the grounds. I could not watch them from my window – they wouldn’t allow it. So then I just went over there. But that was security already, before we had this shooting - he was shot at twice.

Smith: Let me back up to the transition in August – we’re observing the anniversary today.

Holkeboer: Is it really?

Smith: Today is the anniversary of the Nixon resignation.

Holkeboer: Is it really? How many years?

Smith: 34.

Holkeboer: You expect me to remember that?
Smith: Your life, obviously, was transformed along with a lot of other folks. When did you begin to think that you might be working for the President?

Holkeboer: Well, I was one of these innocent people who believed Nixon. I thought the newspapers were just after him. I really did. I thought this would soon be over because they know they’ll be wrong, and I think Mr. Ford believed Nixon, too. I think we were led to believe that he was right. Then all of a sudden he said, “I’m resigning.” I couldn’t believe-

Smith: But in between, remember, the tapes came out, and my sense is that Ford was really shocked by the language. Was that your sense?

Holkeboer: Yes, oh yes. That’s true. Yes. I heard that Nixon did have a vocabulary. I think that’s not something Mr. Ford did – his words were never like that. Yes, I think, all of a sudden, we began to realize that this was not true. Right after that I started reading every book I could about it, because I had ignored the newspapers. I thought, they’re not right, they’re just after him. I’m not reading that stuff. Boy, after that I think I read every book I could about Nixon and what he was doing.

Smith: And at the end, when it crumbled, and when the so-called “smoking gun” tapes, were released, it became pretty clear that Nixon was going to resign - did he ever come in and say, “We may be moving”?

Holkeboer: No, he never said a word. I think he kept that for his wife, or maybe the AA, but he never came to the staff and said, “We may be moving.” I think all of us on the staff were quite tense about it. What’s going to happen now? Are we really going to be working for the President? No, no, no, we’re not going to be. We just really didn’t believe it. I think it was kind of unbelievable. Then when he resigned, I think all of us were quite shocked. But that’s thirty years ago.

Smith: The day after Nixon resigned, Ford was sworn into office. Were you at that?

Holkeboer: Yes, yes I was.

Smith: What do you remember then?
Holkeboer: I think that all of this was kind of overwhelming. His kids sat in the front row and a lot of people sat around, and I thought it was kind of unbelievable. It was like watching a movie or reading a book. Is this really happening? I’ve got pictures – I’ve got pictures of the back of my head that I was there. But I don’t think we realized what we were getting into. At least I didn’t. Is this really true?

Smith: Tell us about Bob Hartmann.

Holkeboer: You shouldn’t ask me that.

Smith: Well, he is a somewhat controversial figure.

Holkeboer: ‘Cause I never liked him. So I don’t want to talk about him.

Smith: You are not alone. He was a somewhat polarizing figure in the office, and what contributed to that? What made him-

Holkeboer: I think the original Ford staff weren’t too happy with him. Then he had his own little group of people. So, you see, there was a kind of conflict. There was us and Bob’s.

Smith: When did he come into the picture?

Holkeboer: Good question.

Smith: He was there before the Vice Presidency?

Holkeboer: Yes, he came right after Mr. Ford was Minority Leader. He came in with Minority Leader because we all said, who is that? And we found out who is that. He seemed to take over.

Smith: He was a speech writer who wanted to be more than a speech writer?

Holkeboer: I guess. A speech writer who thought he was going to be President. I don’t know. You shouldn’t ask me about him because I never really liked him. I had nothing to do with him because I was on the Ford staff and he was on –

Smith: We know from history that he had a lot of talents, but he was a divisive influence.
Holkeboer: Yes, yes he was. You have an interview with him, or is he dead?

Smith: I interviewed him for another project. Apparently he liked to drink.

Holkeboer: Yes, see I don’t know that part. I don’t know his personal life at all. I do not know – that might have come afterward, too. I don’t know.

Smith: A much, much tougher day must have been grafting the Ford staff, a lot of whom were from Grand Rapids, onto a White House staff that were all Nixon people.

Holkeboer: Yes.

Smith: What was it like?

Holkeboer: That was a conflict because Mr. Ford said we had to try to get along. They weren’t excited about getting along because they wanted to say, that’s not the way we do it, this is the way we do it. And they wanted to do it the Nixon way. We knew Ford’s way and they were entirely different. But they wouldn’t let us.

Smith: How were they different?

Holkeboer: I think they still believed in Mr. Nixon and I think they wanted it to continue and they were going to continue it. His ideas, his ways. But one by one they started getting other jobs elsewhere. One by one. In some rooms like the mail room, it doesn’t matter who you’re for or against, because you open mail all day. But one by one I think they started to leave, but we did have a conflict. It was his ways or our ways, or Mr. Ford’s ways or Mr. Nixon’s ways.

Smith: How about Al Haig?

Holkeboer: I never met him. The only thing I know about him is what I read in the paper. But I never met him.

Smith: Were you surprised by the pardon – the Nixon pardon?

Holkeboer: Yes and no. I knew that he wanted to get rid of the whole thing. Let’s not discuss it anymore, it’s over with, get it out of the way. But people didn’t want that. People wanted it to continue and I think the pardon was on a Sunday, September 8th. I think he knew he had to do something. Otherwise it is going to continue and he couldn’t get anything done if that continued. So, I think it was more or less one or two that agreed with him and he did it. He said, I may lose the election, but I’ve got to do this. And so, yes, I was shocked. I didn’t know about it. I was shocked.

Smith: Were you surprised by the ferocity of the public’s response? The intensity?

Holkeboer: Yes, because it lasted through election – he didn’t get re-elected. Yes, I think that’s one reason he didn’t get re-elected. Because who ever heard of Carter – what did he do? I think the people were mad at Mr. Ford. They really wanted to, what shall I say, get even with Nixon. And once that was over with, it went away – as far as work and business was concerned. People’s thoughts were still there, but as far as business, Mr. Ford could get back to work. Otherwise he just had a hard time getting things done, because it was all Nixon. So, the two years that he was there, he did a good job. I’m sorry that he didn’t do four more, but then again I’m not – who wants to be President? Who wants to be President?

Smith: Then, of course, just three weeks after the pardon came the news about Mrs. Ford’s breast cancer.

Holkeboer: Yes.

Smith: It must have come as a shock.

Holkeboer: Yes that was a shock, too. She had a friend, no, not a friend, but somebody who came every day, talked to her, helped her, etc. – I don’t know the lady’s name – I can’t think of it, anyway. She was going to have a test; every year she does this. She says, “Come on, Betty, go with me.” This is how we heard it. And Betty went and found out that she did have spots. But, again, I saw Mr. Ford. He was so kind and thoughtful and he just sat at her side. Well, during that time it was her first. That was sad – it hit us all kind of sad. But, look at her, she’s living now and she’s how old?

Smith: Ninety.

Holkeboer: Oh, ninety. So, if you get it in time…
Smith: One senses then people didn’t talk about breast cancer.

Holkeboer: No, oh no. But she came right out and said so. She told people about it and they were all kind of shocked, but it was the best thing. She did a lot of little things like that. She was quite open.

Smith: Sometimes her candor got her in trouble.

Holkeboer: I think so. Sometimes I think Mr. Ford wished that she wouldn’t talk so much. But she was honest. She said what she thought.

Smith: Remember, there was the famous Sixty Minutes interview, when she talked about Susan having an affair, and her kids smoking marijuana, and her pro-choice views.

Holkeboer: Oh my, folks were so upset about that.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Holkeboer: Well, I think that was the first time we all heard about it. At least I, I didn’t know. But I think everybody got the wrong idea. She said if they do this, I will - if my daughter moves in with somebody. But immediately people thought, she has, okay, that’s wrong. In those days it was wrong – she could get away with it now days. And I think that she would talk to her boys and do whatever she could if they were taking marijuana. And that’s what she said, but people just took it as “that’s what they’re doing.”

Smith: What was the response? You must have been dealing with mail.

Holkeboer: I think we all said, “Don’t those people understand? Didn’t they listen? Didn’t they hear?” We blamed the people. But that blew over, too.

Smith: Eventually, her candor became a very appealing part.

Holkeboer: Yes, people liked it. She was quite outspoken. Poor dear, now I feel sorry for her.

Smith: Do you know anything about any of her problems while she was First Lady?
Holkeboer: No, we knew she was taking something – I can’t remember what her ailment was – was it her back? Back problems?

Smith: She had back problems. She had some arthritis.

Holkeboer: She had to take pills for that. Now I don’t know what kind of pills they were. But, maybe they led to it. I do think she got kind of lonely when she was in her house with the four children and he was gone all the time. And maybe she thought, “I’ll have a drink.” I don’t know, but she kiddingly said, “Yes, he was never home before, when the kids were growing up and now he’s home all the time.” That’s when he was President, because they would have dinner together and maybe – not breakfast because she slept in – but dinner. “Now he’s home all the time,” she said. So she had to get used to that.

Smith: Did he sign his own mail?

Holkeboer: Oh, yes, but when he became President, yes, then we had a machine. But before that he didn’t have a machine. When he was to and from his office in his limousine, he would sign it and read them. Sometimes we’d get one back.

Smith: Sometimes you must have got nasty letters, or at least some unfriendly ones.

Holkeboer: Oh yes.

Smith: Did he read those, too?

Holkeboer: He would want them, too. He would write a nice letter back. Sorry you are disappointed, but this is what I thought, and I hope that you change your mind and agree with me – and that sort of thing. Then we never heard from them again.

Smith: Did you sense that Mrs. Ford was enjoying her life in the White House?

Holkeboer: Well, I really don’t know because I was in the Executive Office Building and she lived on the second floor of the White House. I think she loved it that somebody else took care of clothes for her – and made her meals. I think she loved that part.

Smith: Did they enjoy entertaining?
Holkeboer: I think so. They did a lot of it in the White House. I don’t know how much they did at home. It was all their old friends.

Smith: But particularly with the bicentennial – there were a lot of State dinners and formal functions like that. Remember when Queen Elizabeth came?

Holkeboer: Yes, I have a picture of Mr. Ford and Queen Elizabeth. That was exciting, too. The only part I saw of it is, they had a big tent in the back yard and the dinner was outside, so I, nosey I, had to see what it was all about, and I went down there and the tables looked just beautiful – oh, they were decorated just beautiful. Loads of tables with tablecloths and decorations – oh they were beautiful. I have some pictures of it [taken by the photographer].

Smith: Do you remember any other state visitors, or visitors that made a real impression? Jack, of course, had a couple of Beatles.

Holkeboer: Yes, see that wouldn’t interest me. I’m not a Beatle fan.

Smith: What about the kids?

Holkeboer: I think the boys were very annoyed with the security that they had. And I think that Susan was just at the age that she loved it. She had her Senior Prom in the White House. She loved it. I think she loved all this, I think she loved it because ever since she was a little girl she was included in a lot of the dinners. So she got to know a lot of these men, women, and I think she loved it. I think the boys were annoyed because - and I think that’s why Jack went away. Mike was already in North Carolina, and I don’t know what kind of security he had, but I don’t think it really fazed him. But Steve and Jack didn’t like it, so they both went to California at that time. I think they got used to it, but didn’t like it.

But now my question is, do they still have security after – up to a certain age is it? Up to eighteen, isn’t it?

Smith: Now they have it up to a certain age, but they did not.

Holkeboer: Now Carter had a daughter, she isn’t eighteen yet is she?

Smith: Oh, yes, she is considerably older, they are all older. She was little then.
Anne Holkeboer  AUGUST 8, 2008

Holkeboer: Oh, I just wondered who was President and still having security.

Smith: When he was President you were in the Executive Office Building. How frequently would you see him?

Holkeboer: Not very often. The security was too tight. If I wanted to see him at that time, I would have to talk to my boss, who was Mildred Leonard, and then Mildred Leonard would go to him with all her things that she had, and then mention what I also needed.

Smith: Now, what was Mildred Leonard’s background? She had worked for him?

Holkeboer: She worked for Halleck, was it Halleck? No, when he became a Congressman, then Mildred had worked for Jonkman. Yes, Bartel Jonkman, his predecessor. And I think Mr. Ford said, you stay, you help me because I need you. She was a good secretary – excellent.

Smith: What was she like?

Holkeboer: I thought she was very nice, but very businesslike. But very nice, we did a few things together. She was older than I was, but we had this in common - that we worked for Mr. Ford, so we went to things together. She knew everything about Mr. Ford – where he was and what he was doing. A good secretary.

Smith: What kinds of things would you need to see her about, or see him about?

Holkeboer: You know, I can’t remember. I don’t know.

Smith: What kind of things were you doing over at EOB?

Holkeboer: Well, they told us we were on his personal staff, so we got a lot of letters that said, “Dear Jerry.” It got to the point that everybody in the United States was addressing him as “Dear Jerry.” We had to really pick out his friends, or the people that we could help, and then the others went to other places to be answered. But, it got to the point where everybody said “Dear Jerry.” They knew him as Jerry Ford.
Smith: Then the re-election campaign – obviously there was a Reagan challenge which was very tough.

Holkeboer: That was the first one. That was before - then Reagan became President. I don’t that Mr. Ford ever had his mind set on being a president. I don’t think so.

Smith: What makes you say that?

Holkeboer: Because he wanted to be Speaker, He wanted to be Speaker of the House – he had that in his mind. The Presidency was way over there as far as he was concerned. And he loved legislation. He loved that. He loved the bills, he loved to be on the floor. He loved his work. No, he didn’t want to be president. But he wanted to be Speaker. But he didn’t get to be Speaker.

Smith: He didn’t hesitate to veto bills.

Holkeboer: When he was President – no. That, again, was a different field than I was into, so I don’t know. But I think he always thought he had to do the right thing for the people. His two years in the presidency were not easy. But I think he did a wonderful job.

Smith: Do you remember the days around the fall of Saigon, the end of the Vietnam war?

Holkeboer: That was very disappointing. No, I think that was a big disappointment to him. That’s about all I can say. To a lot of people, too, but he had really planned on that, and really thought that this was the right thing. And then he got the little children here on the plane. I think they have steps or something right here in the museum. I think that whole thing was very – well, first disturbing, and disappointing to him - but it worked out okay.

Smith: Were you ever afraid he was going to lose to Reagan? It was close. In the spring of ’76 he won in New Hampshire, President Ford, but then in North Carolina Reagan-Holkeboer: But before that time, see, he wasn’t really running for the presidency. This is something that all of a sudden came up. Reagan was a wonderful speaker. Mr.

Ford could be if he practiced a long time, but he wasn’t always the best speaker, and when you have to speak at every little town - Reagan really had the gift. I think he was disappointed, like everybody else was disappointed when you lose something. But he still had a job.

Smith: Did you see any of Henry Kissinger around?

Holkeboer: No, I never saw him. I know where his office was in the White House, but I never saw him.

Smith: What about other members of the Cabinet? Were there any who stood out?

Holkeboer: I very seldom saw them. I saw the Cabinet Room, could tell where everybody sat, but I never saw the full Cabinet.

Smith: How about the Vice President, Nelson Rockefeller?

Holkeboer: Yes, I saw him. He was in our building. He also had an office in our building. I think on the second floor and I was on the fourth. Of course, when the elevator door opens, here he is, waiting for the elevator. All of us are waiting for the elevator, but we back up, because he goes first. And only him, goes into the elevator alone. So he went into the elevator and he says, “Come on girls, come on girls.” He got us all into that elevator, and I thought that was so nice, because we weren’t supposed to. And I always liked him for that.

Smith: He was very approachable?

Holkeboer: Yes, he was. If he saw you, he’d say, “Hello.” I kind of liked him. But it didn’t work out.

Smith: In the fall election, did you remember election night? Remember Ford had closed the gap, most of the gap with Carter, coming out of the conventions, and right at the end, no one really knew what was going to happen.

Holkeboer: No, no, all of us just kind of trembled. This is close, what is going to happen. Something is going to happen. That Carter won was a surprise and a shock, but yet we knew that the race was always so close.

Smith: What was the mood in the White House the next day?
Holkeboer: We were all very quiet. We had to move out! And we were very quiet, I don’t think anybody said anything to anybody.

Smith: Do you remember where you were election on night?

Holkeboer: I was home. I stayed home.

Smith: Were your fingers crossed?

Holkeboer: I thought if there was a disappointment, I want to cry alone. One time I went to the Capitol Hill Club for an election, or something, and it was so close I said, “I can’t stand it. I’ve got to go home and see this by myself. I can’t see it with all these crazy people talking and trying to decide who is going to win. I don’t like that – I’m going to go home.” So every election night, I’d just stay home. I just didn’t like all that fuss of the other people.

Smith: Do you remember the first time you saw him after the election? Did he take a little time to bounce back?

Holkeboer: Mr. Ford, no. But I saw him. He couldn’t talk anymore, so Mrs. Ford conceded for him. And I thought that was the saddest picture I ever saw. And all the kids around him and he couldn’t talk because he had laryngitis. Oh that was sad, I thought. That was a sad part, too. But, in the long run I think maybe it was for the best. But I don’t know what kind of a president Carter really was.

Smith: It is interesting, he made it very clear, that despite his own feelings, that there was going to be a better transition than he had experienced.

Holkeboer: Yes, oh yes. That would be Mr. Ford. And he would be very friendly and very cordial. Some of them aren’t – the outgoing and the ingoing aren’t very friendly. But that’s the kind of person he was. See, he really didn’t hold a grudge. He just thought, I’ve lost.

Smith: What were your plans at that point? Were they just up in the air?

Holkeboer: Yes, I had to find a job. I went from door to door because we had the names of all the new congressmen coming in, and I wanted to go back to the House of Representatives, I liked it there. So, I went to all the new congressmen and I left my resume, and they said, thank you, you’ll maybe hear from us. I think the thing that kind of took them was that I worked for the President. So it was kind of hard to find a job after working for the President. But I got a real good job with Jim Leach, and I want to tell you the way I got it.

When we were with Mr. Ford, there was somebody in Iowa who wrote him almost every day, because this person knew how to handle everything and he could take care of the whole world, if only Mr. Ford would read his letters. He knew everything. And then he would call us sometimes. He would talk for a long time because he knew how to handle everything.

Smith: How do you handle people like that?

Holkeboer: Very nicely. Okay, fine, sure, we’ll tell Mr. Ford all about this. And we’re glad you called, and if you want to call again, we’re right here for you.

Sometimes you write down all they say, but with him we knew – so he had said to somebody, it was Dotty, any of you girls need jobs, I’ll find you jobs. Now how is a person in Iowa going to find a job for people in [Washington]?

Dotty said she was going to work for the transition people and Mildred was going to retire, so that left me. Okay, I’ll send you the resume of one of the girls who works here. So, he got my resume. Then he went to Jim Leach of Iowa, who had just won the election and he said to him, here’s a resume of a girl and you have to hire her. So, I got the job.

Smith: I bet they were glad you were nice to him.

Holkeboer: Yes, but then he wrote Mr. Leach letters forever and ever. We had a whole file full from this man who wrote all the time. So then one time this man had his birthday, and Mr. Leach was going to his birthday party. This was in Iowa. And I saw that on the schedule, and I said, “Oh Mr. Leach, would you thank that man for getting me my job?” and he said, “How is that?” He had forgotten all about it. So Mr. Leach had to make his speech and the first thing he said is, “The only good thing so and so did was get me my secretary.” So it got to be kind of a joke, but isn’t that an unusual way to get a job?

Smith: It’s a very unusual way to get a job. I was an intern in the Ford White House. The summer of ’75 and I worked in the personnel office, which meant, of course, going through all of the deservedly dead letters and deciding what goes to the central file. But at the same time, dealing with people who would say, meet me as such and such a place Thursday at five o’clock and we’ll discuss my interest in being Secretary of the Interior, or words to that effect. And I wasn’t as nice to them as you were.

Holkeboer: I always remembered when I was interviewing, “Even if you’ve got a headache, you’ve got to be nice.” So, yes, yes, so and so, yes, sure, we’ll tell him and we wrote it all down. But after a while we didn’t write anymore because we got letters from him and that told everything.

Smith: Did you have any contact with him after the White House years?

Holkeboer: No, but I got a Christmas card every year. But, no, no contact at all. No he passed away just before – I did not get a Christmas card last year. And I won’t anymore, I don’t think, because I don’t know if she even sends out her cards anymore. I don’t know. But I always wrote a little note in there, so that whoever opened the mail would think, hey, this is personal, we’ve got to show him. If he saw it or not, I don’t know. But I was on their mailing list, so I got a Christmas card. That’s the only time.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction at the time of the funeral?

Holkeboer: Yes, yes I thought it was overwhelming. I stayed home because I can’t stand very well, so I stayed home and I watched everything. I think I watched all day long. First Washington – and then here – I just thought they did a wonderful job, a wonderful job. Whoever did it, did a wonderful job.

Smith: If you were to tell people something about him, that they may not know – something about Jerry Ford that might surprise people?

Holkeboer: I don’t know what I’d say.

Smith: Or a generation that didn’t know him? What’s important that they know about him?

Holkeboer: Well, I don’t know. Just like here, once you get me talking, I can’t quit. I haven’t talked about Mr. Ford for years. I don’t know if people aren’t interested or – what do I say? People say, “Was he a nice man?” Sure, he was a nice man. We all know that. They say, “Was he as nice as everybody says?” Yes, he was. This sort of thing. But what I would just say, “This is what I want you to know about Mr. Ford…” I don’t know what I would say. I would really have to think about that.

Smith: Were they fun years?

Holkeboer: Yes, looking back it was fun years. But you have to remember, it’s work. We worked, too. So I don’t want people to think that we were just partying all the time or whatever. It was work. And we worked eight-ten hours a day. Then you go home exhausted and go back the next day. It was work, but looking back now, it was wonderful. I can’t believe that I really worked for Mr. Ford. I can’t believe that – the President of the United States, I can’t believe that. But while you’re there, it’s work.

Smith: It’s less glamorous than people on the outside think.

Holkeboer: Yes, people think it’s glamorous. I don’t know what they think, but we worked. But anyway, it was wonderful years. I had a good life, and I don’t know how I deserved it, but I did get it.

Smith: Can you think of anything else?

Smith: I’m curious, he said even if you have a headache, you have to be nice. But did he ever get upset?

Holkeboer: One time. And it was one of his boys, I don’t know what his boy did, and he heard about it. I don’t know what he did. I don’t know if he took the car or if he did something at school, but he was mad. And I think it was the second boy, Jack. Mike was such a good kid, and Jack was a little fire ball. And Steve, well you didn’t notice it, but Jack – he did something and Mr. Ford heard about it and boy did he slam the door. That’s all I know about it. I don’t know how he calmed down, but he slammed that office door and all of us – I remember that. Those kids were teenagers by then, because when I started they were six, eight, ten years old, twelve years old, something like that. All of a sudden they are teenagers.
Smith: Was Susan sort of the favorite, I don’t mean favorite, but the youngest and the only daughter.

Holkeboer: Only girl, yes.

Smith: Kind of a special status.

Holkeboer: I think so, but they loved their boys, too. I mean it wasn’t that - but here, they finally got a girl. I think she was home longer than they were, because as soon as they got out of high school, they went on to college in other places and she stayed home and went to all their dinners, their parties with them. So she learned, what shall we say, etiquette quite soon and she loved it. She loved the attention.

Smith: There is an extraordinary photo when Mrs. Ford was, of course, in the hospital. Susan, who was sixteen at the time, stood in for her mother at a State dinner.

Holkeboer: Yes, right.

Smith: With long gloves and flowing gown.

Holkeboer: And she knew how because she had been to so many. Not State dinners, but dinners of – and I think because she stayed home longer than the boys, she was such a part of the family that they took her all over. I think she loved it.

Smith: She’s actually in a photo with Chairman Mao. She went with them when they went to China and I think Chairman Mao was paying her more attention than he was the President.

Holkeboer: She was a pretty young girl. And she knew how to handle all that, too, because they took her along all over.

Smith: Do you think she was mature for her age?

Holkeboer: Yes, I really do. I think she was very mature for her age.

Smith: You mentioned the time that President Johnson called when Mr. Ford was in Congress. Did other Congressmen call regularly, were you picking up the phone and having Senator Dirksen, or someone like that on the line?
Holkeboer: To talk to Mr. Ford? Yes. And a lot of the times Mr. Ford wouldn’t be there and we’d have to take their name and number, and then he would call them back. But yes, a lot of Congressmen would call.

Smith: Did you have certain favorites that you heard from and others who just weren’t as polite on the phone?

Holkeboer: When you came down to it, they were just names. Important names of people that he knew, so we would – Senator Dirksen was about the only one who called from the Senate side. About the only one.

Smith: Did you ever see Congressman Ford and Nixon together?

Holkeboer: No. Except TV or pictures. Once he became Vice President – President, he had lot of security and we just didn’t see him as much. The best years were really Minority Leader, or when he was Congressman, because then we were a big family. But once he became President, all these important men were around him all the time. Then the security people – no you couldn’t get at him.

Smith: How do you think Mildred handled that transition?

Holkeboer: Not too well. Because she was getting older, and I think she felt she was being forgotten. Bob Hartmann took over, so it was difficult.

Smith: When did Dorothy come into the picture?

Holkeboer: Dorothy?

Smith: Downton.

Holkeboer: Downton. She came in as a young girl right out of business school, I think. And she signed up to go to FBI. She was going to work for the FBI – that was a big thing – she wanted to go to the FBI. She signed up to work for them and they called her that they had a job for her. She came in our office with her dad, I think – something like that. Then I guess Frank Meyer was impressed with her because a couple months later he called her and said we have a job for you. And she said, “No I can’t take it, because I promised FBI I would be here for a year.” So he said, okay, we’ll wait, and we’ll see what happens and then we’ll call you again. And so she came to us after a year at the FBI. She was his secretary and Frank Meyer dictated to her, because we were getting so much mail. He dictated to her and to Ruth Kilmer.

Smith: This is still on Capitol Hill?

Holkeboer: This is on Capitol Hill. And then Frank Meyer died and Mildred became the administrative assistant and Dorothy became the secretary. That’s how she got into seeing Mr. Ford, and then when he got to the White House, she was still his secretary. Then Mildred was kind of pushed aside, maybe by Bob Hartmann, I don’t know. I don’t think she was too happy. But she retired.

Smith: But she in fact took the job that Mildred had – Holkeboer: Well, if Frank hadn’t died – but see, Mildred was the administrative assistant and then when Mr. Ford became President, Bob Hartmann kind of made himself whatever, Chief of Staff or something, I don’t know. So I don’t think she was too happy. I think that she wanted Dorothy’s job and Dorothy got it. A continuation of what she was doing, so it was to be expected.

Smith: Were you aware at all of a - conflict may be too strong a word, of a rivalry between Rumsfeld, and then later Cheney? And Hartmann?

Holkeboer: That I don’t know, that could easily be. I didn’t see much of Rumsfeld and Cheney after Mr. Ford was President. But before Mr. Ford was President, he was Minority Leader, they would walk in the office quite often. So we got to know them that way. They were very friendly, very kind. So we liked them. Personally, I think times have changed, people have changed. Maybe it went to their head. I don’t know. I’m very disappointed in them. Of course you don’t hear about Rumsfeld anymore, but Cheney is a disappointment. But, but, but-

Smith: Yeah. This has been great. Thank you.

Holkeboer: My husband’s going to say, “You talk too much!”

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. We really appreciate it.

Bakshian: My pleasure.

Smith: You were in the Nixon administration?

Bakshian: Yes.

Smith: We’re interested in your story before the Ford story, but also in the larger context. One of the themes that we are exploring is the degree to which – particularly early in the Ford administration – there was or wasn’t an integration of the Nixon holdovers with the incoming Ford staff.

Bakshian: There was some, but that was pretty quick. I was the only Nixon speechwriter who was actually kept indefinitely. When I quit, it was in the autumn of ’75 because I’d been offered a fellowship at Harvard at the Institute of Politics and it was my idea. But within a few weeks, maybe less, I forget now, it’s been a while, of the turnover, most of the writing staff was leaving or was planning to leave, or was told they wouldn’t be there. There was one other writer, John Coyne, who was kept for more than just a pro forma courtesy period, but then left. And one by one, or several at a time, the Ford staff came in. When I left there was no one left who had been a Nixon speechwriter, and there had even been some shifts in the power balance of the Ford dynamic – Hartmann and so on.

Smith: It is interesting – maybe I’m biased, but I sense that the speechwriting operation is in many ways a metaphor of the Ford White House, its strengths and weaknesses.

Bakshian: The factions, too.

Smith: The factions and the trajectory, which you may or may not accept, of seeing someone thrust into this position and having not only to learn the job, but in some ways unlearn the congressional mindset - the distinction between leading in Congress and leading as an executive.

Bakshian: Oh, very much so. And just having an office of a handful of handpicked people that you’ve worked with for years and a much bigger bureaucracy – nothing like the vast federal bureaucracy – but the White House is a much bigger machine than a congressional office. Actually, my impression was that Jerry Ford made the transition very well and became a very good president very quickly. The problem was a number of people, especially those who were about his age, sometimes a little bit older, who had for years been working in the small town on the Hill with him; who came in and they were sort of eaten by the machine or weren’t up to it. In some cases they were up to it and in some cases they weren’t up to it. And in other cases they just butted heads.

Gradually, as happens with most administrations, Washington regulars and power types are more in charge. Even the first year that starts to change. It happened in the Reagan White House, it happened in the Nixon White House. There were friends that each in their own time had had in California, for example, or had known on the Hill, in the case of Nixon, who were in the campaign and were in the administration briefly, but were marginalized. The same thing happened with a vengeance with Jerry Ford because it was such a tough time. I had nothing but respect for him, and I also think he probably got one of the most bum raps of any of our presidents thanks to the media, and also not just the media – the temper of the times because of what had happened before him. It was like taking over a sinking ship that was also in rather ill-repute at the time.

Smith: When you think of the popular culture, it’s almost a parallel if you look at Britain in the late ‘50s, early ‘60s, with That Was The Week That Was. Harold Macmillan was the perfect target for that kind of humor. Here it went beyond irreverence - Saturday Night Live represents a wave in the culture.

Bakshian: It was a very adolescent age, and there was no check on it. Eventually, even some of the people who were doing the most nasty stuff felt badly about it and grew up. But also I think the public [got sick of it].
Smith: Some of them wound up at the Betty Ford Center.

Bakshian: This was like dumping drugs into the water system. The public had never seen all that before, so it was swept away with this massive cynicism, sarcasm. Then it got its balance as the American public usually does, but it takes a little while. And, I mean, here you had economic dislocation, the Vietnam mess, and then the Watergate thing – all piled one after the other. The country has never been through those sorts of crises of confidence. The one other president that had the whole world falling on him was Herbert Hoover, but that was a different age and a different set of circumstances.

Smith: Let’s go back – tell me about how you came into the Nixon White House, and how that operated.

Bakshian: I used to say I got it through a want ad in the New York Times. It wasn’t quite that. I’d worked on the Hill for then-Representative Bill Brock, and I’d also been a speechwriter for Bob Dole as chairman of the Republican National Committee, not on his Senate staff. So I had a background in speechwriting and in Republican matters. Those are just two of the various things I had done in that department.

But it happened that at the very beginning of ’72, I wrote an OpEd piece as a conservative, as a writer, because I wrote pretty regularly for National Review, Bill Buckley’s magazine. A group called, I forget whether they called themselves the Manhattan Twelve or what, but at any rate, pushed the Ashbrook candidacy, Representative Ashbrook from Ohio, as a conservative Republican to run against Nixon in the primary in New Hampshire, which was then – well, everything happened a little later then – and it was the first in the nation. I wrote a piece suggesting that it was cutting their nose off to spite their face because Ashbrook would probably do so badly that if anything, it would lead the administration to pay less attention to the squeaky wheels on the right. That, in fact, he would probably be outperformed by Pete McClosky, who was a liberal Republican, who was running and who did get about twice as many votes. So that it was a self-destructive, silly tactic.

I didn’t write this with anything in mind about the White House – that was just my opinion, but as I found out later, at about this time the White House was getting ready to gear up to add two new speechwriters or three – I think three, to the staff with the idea that there was a campaign coming on and so on. And also that they needed some fresh blood anyway, new blood. Not fresh blood – makes it sound vampirish. But anyway, I don’t know, about a week afterwards, after that OpEd piece ran, I had a phone call from a Mr. Clark in White House personnel who asked me to come in – they were looking for speechwriters. And then I was interviewed by Ray Price, who was in charge of the speechwriting shop at the time; and Dave Gergen, who was his deputy, almost like the office manager for the operation in those days, or the managing editor. And then they decided to hire me.

But it had just happened, and I later found out, I think, as a result of seeing my files when I was leaving the White House at the end of the Ford period – or maybe it was actually the Freedom of Information Act at the end of the Reagan period. I finally, actually, took a look and saw that several people had apparently read the article, including Chuck Colson - that’s the one name that comes to mind, I would have liked it otherwise – who had seen the article and said Price is looking for some speechwriters, here’s somebody… Oh, and the squib on the New York Times thing said, “Has served as a speechwriter to the chairman of the National Committee.” So there is a Republican speechwriting tie.

Anyway, so that’s how it happened. And then as the campaign wound down, and I think the day after the election, everyone had to tender their resignation on the White House staff, but you knew that some people were going to be asked to stay and get a promotion and others’ resignations were going to be accepted. Of the new hires, I was the only one that was kept and they got rid of several other people and so on.

Smith: That must have been a real downer. Here you scored this extraordinary victory, and Nixon himself writes about how he felt strangely unfulfilled.

Bakshian: He sensed, at some point he acknowledged also, he thought it was a mistake to do that, I think. I don’t know if that was in conversations that have come to light subsequently, or what. I just read something recently, I hadn’t heard about it before.
Smith: I mean, was it part of his dream of drastically overhauling the federal establishment?

Bakshian: Very much so, because at that point, he was poised to – Vietnam was being phased out – he was poised to launch a series of major initiatives, some of which might have settled problems like healthcare back there. Or at least taken us a step further down the road to reconciling what the government would be. And that’s what he thought. He also felt that after four years, there are a lot of discardable people – and there were people who hadn’t been carrying their load during the campaign. Some of the people who were let go had it richly coming to them. Those who didn’t, and even some who did, were given a job somewhere in the government if they needed it. They weren’t just kicked out into the cold. But the idea of asking everyone for their resignation was one of those things that sounds like a good shock tactic, but is probably bad for morale. It’s the old Voltairian ploy of shooting one of the admirals to encourage the others or something. [reference to British Admiral Bye]

Smith: During the campaign, of course, the Watergate break in occurs. Were there conversations about this?

Bakshian: Yeah, but early on – remember, first of all, we were in the middle of a campaign, so we were all very busy with other things. Watergate becomes almost an obsession with some of the staffers when it’s in the defense mode afterwards. Also, nobody – only a real handful of people – had any idea, knew about the Plumbers or anything like that. So at the time of the break in, it was an odd news story and that was about it.

Smith: The reaction that we get is everyone said it makes no sense. It’s stupid, it’s too stupid for us to do.

Bakshian: That’s right. You felt it couldn’t possibly involve higher ups because higher ups can’t be that dumb. Ha ha.

Smith: When we asked Pat Buchanan, I asked him, “When did you first hear about it? And when did you first read about it?” He said, “Oh I didn’t read about it. I got a telephone call. And as soon as I heard about it, I knew it had to be somebody on our side, and because, he said, they were getting material out of the Muskie campaign regularly.
Bakshian: Pat was involved much more in the partisan stuff, plus he had been working with Nixon. He had more of a personal line to Nixon and to the senior people that was separate from – he wasn’t writing that many speeches anymore. His office was right next door to mine after I came in. He basically had a staff that put out the news digest, which he was very interested in - media handling - and wrote one or two speeches like Safire. But when Ray Price was made head of speechwriting after the departure of Keogh, because Pat, Safire and Ray had been co-equal senior writers, when Ray was put in charge of the day to day operations, the others were given autonomy and roving commissions. Which meant they also spent more time on campaign strategy and schmoozing with people who involved in these things. I’m happy to say I didn’t know much about it.

Smith: Richard Nixon famously said of himself that he was an introvert in an extrovert’s profession.

Bakshian: Yeah. He was the door to door salesman with bad feet.

Smith: I always said the most remarkable thing about the Nixon presidency is not how it ended, but that it ever happened at all.

Bakshian: That he ever got there.

Smith: Yeah.

Bakshian: Now, he’s not a person one gets sentimental about, but I had two long conversations with him when he was working on his memoirs and I was out there to just help with some of the early years. Had two long, several hour conversations with him where I got to know him better than I had known him in the White House as a fairly late arrival, and his was a very insulated Oval Office. Very different from Jerry Ford’s or Reagan’s. Also I was more senior with Reagan. But, Nixon was a man who went into politics partially out of ambition. You’ve got to have ambition to put up with the aggravation, but who wanted to do good things for the country and also with the world view. He got burnt very early unjustly, which then made him very snappish.

Smith: Was that the fund crisis?
That sort of thing and also where he really became the enemy as far as the liberal media was concerned, was where he was absolutely right. And he was never an acolyte of Joe McCarthy’s, but he is a House member who is investigating Alger Hiss. And he was right about Hiss, and the liberal establishment was wrong. Hiss was a Communist agent, the former Soviet archives have proven that. But at the time he [Nixon] was lumped in with McCarthy, and then was a target forever. And not being the most prepossessing winning personality, not a Reagan personality, and being easily bruised, it fed on itself. The media disliked him more and more; he disliked them more and more. Both sides developed a pathology about each other. It was very tragic because he wanted to be a good president and his motive for doing it – Johnson wanted to be a good president, but he was also an egomaniac – Nixon was not a egomaniac in that sense. He didn’t want to brand the nation and make everybody have a first name that started with L and middle name that started with B and a last one with J.

Rex Scouten told us something I found extraordinary.

There’s a man who has seen a lot.

And he’s very discrete. Very appropriately.

That’s why he was allowed to see so much for so long.

But he did tell us, as a Nixon Secret Service agent in the ‘50s, the family out in California had a room for him. I mean, they were that close. One day, out of the blue, on a plane, Nixon just started sort of pounding the edge of his seat for no reason in particular, and said, “I’ve got to be tougher. I’m not tough enough.” Just a remarkable non-sequitur, but clearly revealing of some kind of inner turmoil.

He always thought he was not tough enough – that he was being ground down by external circumstances and that was because he wasn’t being tough enough, ruthless enough. He needed to be smarter, he needed to get outside of his own head and see things a little more clearly. Ronald Reagan knew that he had press, a media establishment that was largely hostile, but he didn’t let it get to him. The most angry I ever saw him was when he was a bit annoyed about coverage of some Republican fundraiser where they talked about how many fur coats the women were wearing, as if at Democratic fundraisers there aren’t women wearing fur coats. But it was just a slightly peeved remark and then he was smiling and talking about something else. Whereas, Nixon could brood for days at a time. Johnson also, as Vietnam got worse, became obsessed that way.

Smith: There are people who brood, who need enemies. Willa Cather said there is such a thing as positive hate. And I wonder if Nixon had some of that.

Bakshian: If you look at people who live to a great old age, they are usually very benevolent, or their hate keeps them warm and keeps them going. Their grudges, rewriting their will every other week – writing out this person or that.

Smith: In Julie’s book, remember that wonderful line where not that long after he left office, Pat said to him some expression of astonishment at how he kept going and so on. And he said, “I just get up every day to confound my enemies.” Which, on one hand is a great line, but it’s also sad in some ways.

Bakshian: Well, it wasn’t living well is the best revenge, but simply living is the best revenge. Although I think once he recovered from the basic shock of resignation, he became a more balanced person and took an increasingly more objective view of things afterwards.

Smith: Really? Including Watergate?

Bakshian: Yeah, gradually. And also, as he saw and recognized it. He asked me something when I was out there, because the memoir work was occurring after the ’76 elections, actually before the inaugural. It was late in the year, and then I was back in January. And at one point he asked me, he really wanted to know what people – how with Carter coming in and this election – he said, “How do you think people are going to feel now about Jerry Ford?” I said, “Well, I’ll tell you one thing. I think they are going to feel increasingly better about him as they see more of Jimmy Carter.” Which is exactly what happened. And I also sort of meant, and I think that’s what he was looking for, that once Jimmy Carter started screwing up on his own with that special gift that he had, people would then get a clearer view – especially of Ford – but also just generally.
Smith: Did he offer an opinion on Ford?

Bakshian: He liked Jerry Ford. Now, because he always felt he had to prove he was tough, if he was talking to the boys, sometimes he would say things, I’m sure, somewhere that were a little less than flattering, but he always, first of all, he knew that Jerry Ford was straight and solid - that he hadn’t cut a deal with Jerry Ford – and that Jerry Ford for the good of the nation had done something generous for him. And also, out of compassion for him, had been very kind. And he always respected that. Plus he knew Jerry Ford morally, ethically, and as a man who understood the workings of government. He probably felt that Jerry Ford wasn’t tough enough with anyone, but that would have been what he thought about everybody.

Smith: It’s funny, something just dawned on me. Ford, until he got the Profiles in Courage award, he said, “For twenty years, everywhere I go, people ask the same question. After that they stopped asking.” Which tells you something about the imprimatur of the Kennedys. But it occurs to me, Ford spent the rest of his life being asked that question. I don’t think anyone ever asked Nixon that question.

Bakshian: No. Well, I think first of all, if there was an interesting answer, he wasn’t going to give it, I don’t believe, anyway. And also Nixon was fairly selective about whom he talked to. But, you’re right, for example, David Frost, who probed into all sorts of things, I don’t think even touched on that.

Smith: Isn’t that amazing? For people who weren’t around then, can you convey some idea of what it felt like inside the White House as this thing unfolded? And was there a “Eureka” moment or just a gathering sense?

Bakshian: Toward the end, although even then it seemed unreal that a presidency could be toppled the way it was - but it was a death of a thousand cuts. You were bleeding but you were losing blood very gradually. Yet there were certain moments when you thought, well, another brick in the foundation just crumbled. First John Dean – well, the tapes.

Smith: Were you surprised?
Bakshian: Not entirely, because I had heard – not about his taping – but that there had been various things like that around. And as it turned out, even more than I knew. Ike even apparently always turned it on when he was having a one on one with Nixon, interestingly enough. Because it was something he would activate voluntarily, as opposed to a 24 hour automatic system. And FDR had wiretaps and so on.

Smith: Sure.

Bakshian: But I was surprised, first of all, it was almost a chance question, because I don’t think the committee, unless there is something I don’t know about that they knew about – I think they were just fishing around, and they happened to be talking to the guy who’d been assigned to do that, and who was under oath and who wasn’t about to be a martyr for somebody he probably didn’t even know very well and wasn’t that crazy about.

Smith: I was going to say, was Butterfield regarded as something of a traitor?

Bakshian: Maybe by the fruit of the looms, but he was a man who was there under oath and was asked a direct question. It wasn’t a matter of whether you remembered what happened in a meeting at some point, but was something you’d been in charge of running. So it would be like expecting the head of the motor pool to deny that he had anything to do with the choice of tires or whatever.

Smith: How was the President functioning through all of this? And particularly as it got worse?

Bakshian: Well, I’m sure he had his bad hours and bad days, but there were still vast amounts of governance stuff going through, including large amounts of foreign policy statements; and in the early phase of the second term, of policy initiatives. And I know for a fact that he was focused on – you could see mark ups and questions that would come back about speech drafts on policy and his input. So, he was able to compartmentalize to a large extent. He’d been compartmentalizing all of his life because there was such a conflict between who he was and what sort of personality he had, and wanting to be doing what he was doing. He did have an iron self-discipline, but it ate away at him. I’m sure that phlebitis, for example, the blood clot leading to that – was stress related to a large extent. But that was an internalizing of the strain.

Smith: Let me ask you something awkward, but for the historical record, much has been written, perhaps too much has been made that suggests that maybe he had a drinking problem, at least at this point. That somehow it was a factor.

Bakshian: I think that’s been exaggerated. I think he may have taken a drink occasionally – at night especially in family quarters. But he was never somebody who – and I know people who had known him since he was a congressman, and have always complained about - if he might call up somebody to give them a deep background during the Hiss thing, for example, [invite them] to his house in Spring Valley and how chintzy he was with booze. Because journalists being journalists in those days, they drank a lot and they thought he had this one bottle of Scotch probably for two years and he might have been watering it. So he had no history of drinking. Maybe there was some midnight drinking once or twice in the last days of his presidency. But a lot of this goes back to one or two episodes that are second and third hand. Kissinger, for example, was a source of one story where it’s not even – I’m not clear how much Kissinger really described and how much is other people’s descriptions of Kissinger’s description to someone else.

Smith: And I guess by most accounts, he was the kind of drinker where one drink was about all he could take.

Bakshian: The sort of people that are found on the pavement on St. Patrick’s Day because once a year they…

Smith: The Agnew thing. We talked to Jerry Jones who had been asked by Haldeman to reorganize the personnel office. And he got a call – Haldeman was still there – so this would be early spring of ’73, and he wanted to know how many people worked directly for the Vice President. And Jones did some figuring and said around fifty. Haldeman said he wanted undated letters of resignation from all of them. Which raises, to me at least, a couple interesting possibilities: one, they were unhappy with the Vice President that day and Nixon gave him one of these off with his head orders; or two, which seems to be more likely, they knew long before the Wall Street Journal ever wrote the story that the Vice President was at the very least, under investigation.

Bakshian: I suspect that they knew that there was a distinct possibility that something might happen. So this was working on that eventuality, and that also raises an interesting question. I don’t know whether the Vice President’s staff received the order right after the election, because that was technically meant for everyone on the White House staff – they were in the Executive Office Building – but they did receive from the President, at that point, a letter asking them to resign? Which everyone had to do – that all of us had to do the day after election. There had been stories going around, plus anybody being a native Washingtonian, anyone who knew anything about Maryland politics, knew that even if he had been immaculate as Vice President, as Groucho Marx once said about Doris Day, hell, there were people who knew him before he was a virgin when he was governor. Even if he’d been a well-intended person, just occupying that office, the way things were done, things would have probably happened. It certainly would be happening all around him.

Smith: Everything began to happen so fast. When you think of Watergate, something that was dragged out over two years, but then you have this acceleration.

Bakshian: It’s like an illness that in the last days the person’s symptoms get worse and worse, faster and faster. Again, it metastasizes.

Smith: It's amazing how quickly Ford was selected for Vice President.

Bakshian: I think the removal of Agnew, by the way, also whetted the appetite, or increased the appetite for both the liberal establishment on the outside and the Democratic congressional leadership to go for the kill because if Agnew had not had his scandal and then resignation, they wouldn’t have been in that much of a hurry, or at least they would have had counter incentives to just pushing.

Smith: That certainly makes sense.

Bakshian: That accelerates the process, too. And that’s an unrelated, yet, in the end, relevant development in a sense.
Smith: But it’s interesting, there is a story, and I think it’s true because in my Rockefeller research I think I can vouch for it. That Nixon, at one point, supposedly tells Rockefeller in the Oval Office, “Can you imagine Jerry Ford in that chair?” Now, Nixon may have been flattery Rockefeller, who wouldn’t, I think, like to have been vice president.

Bakshian: And also he was showing he was tough.

Smith: Yeah. Did you have a sense of what the attitude was? One of the things that Ford did once he became vice president, he was obviously walking a tightrope, he probably could never be sufficiently vocal in defending the President for the President’s strongest supporters; on the other hand, he spends a lot of time out of town. And we’ve picked up a sense that, at least there were some in the White House who thought maybe he wasn’t defending Nixon as he ought to.

Bakshian: They were the same control freaks, who of course thought everybody was there, not to serve the country or even to serve the policies of the administration, but to fall on their sword or lie or cheat, or whatever. I thought Ford behaved well and most people did. Most people had no quarrel there. There are going to be a few that may. Jerry Ford became vice president, not because he needed that job or desperately wanted it, but because: a) he was somebody who was sufficiently respected by the other side on the Hill that he could actually – and who also was much more qualified than Nelson Rockefeller, for example, to be president in terms of experience with the federal executive branch and policy and so on. So I didn’t feel that way. And I saw a bit more of it because I and John Coyne, the other one who was kept for a while afterwards, were detailed – not detailed, we were still writing for the President, but to help the rather nuclear Ford staff with speeches he had to give and draft a few speeches. And I made a point of keeping it – advocate, defend policies, defend the Republican Party, defend the administration – speak out if you think there is unfair criticism or something, but you shouldn’t be walking around being a Rabbi Korf or something. A forgotten name, I’m afraid, for 99% of the public now. He and Rev. Moon were sort of the last two spiritual leaders even after Billy Graham developed a three month head cold, or whatever.
Smith: One quick thing and then we’ll get into the Ford presidency. Was there an attitude in the White House towards Ford’s performance as Minority Leader during the Nixon years?

Bakshian: Well, again, you would have people like Colson and some of the others, and also Nixon in his tough moments, who would say, “The trouble with the leadership on the Hill is they’ve been used to accommodating and they aren’t willing to kick ass,” etc. But that just said more about them than anything else. I don’t think that was a widespread attitude amongst those of us who hadn’t come to the White House as Nixon groupies, although we’d been for Nixon, but who understood it all and spent time on the Hill.

Pat Buchanan was one of the hot heads. A friend of mine, you’ve got to remember that he really had had virtually no political experience. He had written editorials for the St. Louis Globe, or whatever. And then he’d worked with Richard Nixon. He was a groupie. I don’t mean that in a dismissive way. Or he was a personal retainer, who then came to the White House. Even though he was raised in Washington, he had nothing to draw on, no experience to draw on about governance. And then there were other people – some of the California mafia who had never been to Washington.

Smith: Were you in the East Room on the morning of August 9th?

Bakshian: No, I was very fortunate. I had blocked off a vacation six months or three months before because Readers Digest had international editions and the year before I had done a profile, The Last of the Viennese Waltz Kings, about Viennese composer Robert Stolz. He was in his nineties, but I used my vacation to go interview him and so on. So I was in Europe for two and a half weeks or so during the crisis. And I had a new assignment. A year or two before the centenary of the Bayreuth Festival, I was asked to go Bayreuth to do a piece for the world editions of Readers Digest on Richard Wagner, but also to interview Wolfgang Wagner, who just died recently, who was the composer’s grandson and was still running the festival, etc. So I blocked off that schedule.

I actually watched the resignation speech on a small black and white television in the lounge of the Hotel Meurice in London, which later became Quaglino’s which is still a restaurant, but no longer a little hotel on Bury Street, just off Jermyn Street in London. And then the next day I watched the farewell speech to the staff. I had a sister and brother-in-law who were there, and my old friend Ben Stein was there, who was the only person who actually managed in that East Room to cry and chew gum at the same time while Nixon was making that speech.

So I happened to be overseas for the last few days and I when flew back and came through customs at Dulles, they hadn’t changed the photograph yet, “Welcome to the United States” and Nixon’s picture was still up there. Also, the night of his resignation speech, there was one other guest at that little London hotel. This was a respectable, rather posh, hotel, but small, just fifty rooms or so, and they had a West Indian night porter, and he was watching it along with myself and one other guest. He didn’t know I had any connection with the White House. He said, “I wonder if anything like that is going to happen again soon?” I said, “Not soon, but sooner or later.”

Smith: So, you came back…

Bakshian: I heard stories about people just getting drunk that night of the resignation. It was like VE Day if you were German.

Smith: Or if you were in the bunker.

Bakshian: Yeah, that’s right. But that had all burned out beforehand. I don’t get that carried away, and I was from Washington. I hadn’t come to Washington to be in the Nixon White House. It’s like the tsetse fly – the local Africans have survived it and developed a certain immunity to it. Same thing with Potomac Fever. But I’m glad I wasn’t there in the sense that I think I would have seen a few people I liked being rather silly or maudlin, or making fools of themselves, understandably. But I’m just as glad I didn’t see it. If you know a married couple and you like them both, and you’re glad you’re not there when some scene happens…

Smith: Well put. On the 9th, after the Ford swearing in, there was a receiving line and reception down in the State Dining Room. And you could watch the Nixon people sort of peel off.
Bakshian: I can believe it.

Smith: Which is understandable.

Bakshian: They also knew, if they had any brains, that most of them were going to be history, regardless of how good a job they had done. If they were fairly visible, it just had to happen.

Smith: That’s interesting because that raises a larger question about Ford and whether, in some ways, he was almost too much of a Boy Scout. Whether part of this learning process entailed…Rumsfeld insists, and I don’t dispute it, Rumsfeld urged him early on to clean house, to basically convince the country that this was a different White House. Ford took a much more measured approach. One, because he thought it was unfair to the vast majority of people who had nothing to do with Watergate; two, because he needed some continuity; three, because there were a lot of very capable people working in that White House.

Bakshian: I think he was right on all three scores. And the only one you could fault him for as commander in chief, would be the first one. That’s surely compassionate. The other two were good for good governance. They may not have been good politics, but they were good for good governance and he first and foremost, always saw himself as President, not a candidate for re-election. And that was one of the things I most respected him for. You also have to look at – I’ve known Rumsfeld for years – Don Rumsfeld’s motivation. First of all, Don Rumsfeld was always a, not only take no prisoners, but a don’t worry about killing anybody with friendly fire if it’s going to get you where you’re going kind of guy. He would have loved to mow down everybody that hadn’t been a personal hire of Don Rumsfeld’s. Forget about Jerry Ford.

Smith: Dorothy Downton, the President’s personal secretary, told us he tried to get her fired.

Bakshian: I don’t doubt it. In the same way that Erlichman and Haldeman repeatedly tried to get Rose Woods.

Smith: But that raises another question, because…
Bakshian: But that’s separate from Watergate and everything else. That’s the old power thing.

Smith: Oh, absolutely.

Bakshian: Anybody with an independent mind, or independent loyalty on the part of the President.

Smith: Which explains a lot. But it also raises this other question. There is a school of thought that says beneath the Boy Scout exterior, was someone who was shrewder, more calculating, more ambitious than he let on; someone who was not above using the image that people had of him to his advantage. I mean, the nice guy, whereas, having a Don Rumsfeld, could in fact…

Bakshian: Nice guys almost always have someone like Don Rumsfeld. Reagan was that way. Eisenhower. It’s part of being an effective leader. Jerry Ford was never naïve. He was a nice guy, but he was nobody’s patsy. But I think what he usually did, and it had nothing to do with naivety, was to put the national interest and his duty as president ahead of cynical, political choices. If something might have helped him, but it might not have been in the national interest he wouldn’t do it. He was quite capable of being political, and he was very often. But he never let that distract him from his duty, I don’t think.

Smith: Is the pardon the most obvious example of that?

Bakshian: I think so. Although I’m not sure that it was quite the turning point that people make it out to be. The country, and the GOP even more so, were suffering from mental fatigue. It was a bad brand. People were fed up. Jimmy Carter, had a free ride in 1976, although the media very quickly turned on him, partially because he turned out, I think, in their minds to be a bigger jerk than they thought; but also because having eliminated their favorite targets – that is, the GOP having been routed and Jerry Ford being gone – they needed somebody to punch. Obama is finding that out now. And also the Democratic leadership on the Hill. But I think Jerry Ford was a very substantial guy – and when you sat with him in the Oval Office, or anyone who ever met him, or delegations that came in and talked with him, if they had not met him before, always came away very impressed because they had been going by this outside image and found a fuller, more impressive figure.
And the other problem was that bum knee, even though he was by no means a klutz. In fact, he was probably the best athlete who had ever been president. He also occasionally got tongue-twisted, tongue-tied, and it had nothing to do with the thinking process. I saw that again and again. As speechwriters we were told about keeping the sentences short and so on. I think actually we were over told that. I think there were some people, including old loyalists of his, who almost liked the idea that they had uniquely captured his cadence and knew what he needed. And they were taking care of baby more than baby needed to be taken care of, I suspect. But, who knows?

Smith: You do wonder because that obviously raises the whole Hartmann thing. I assume there is a very thin line, maybe almost no line between being protective and being possessive. Or maybe they are two sides of the same coin.

Bakshian: And the person in that conflicted emotional situation is the last person to be able to see it clearly.

Smith: I’m sure. Why was Hartmann such a divisive figure?

Bakshian: Well, he was an abrasive guy. I have no complaints about him. He was one of the people that asked that I be kept, and I got along with him.

Smith: What did it take to get along with him?

Bakshian: Well, basically, I could write and I could write quickly, and so I guess he felt I served a need. I also was a writer on the writing staff, I was not somebody in a different branch of the thing. So we were not rivals for the President’s ear or anything. He’d been part of a little group, most of whom were at least as old as Jerry Ford, but who had not grown much because they were doing the household work of serving on the Hill and that is a very small town setting up there. And especially if you’ve been in the minority all that time.

They suddenly come to the White House, and whereas Jerry Ford had been a leader and policy-wise and everything was ready for it, these guys, I don’t think, were for the most part. And most of them didn’t last, or were marginalized. Don Rumsfeld is a particularly ruthless guy and I mean that in both the good and the bad senses. So he made a small meal out of most of them. But I don’t think they were quite up to it anyway. Jerry Ford was young for his age, healthy, plenty of stamina, and also a very positive man – not a lot of bitterness, not a chip on his shoulder.

Smith: Uncomplicated?

Bakshian: I think he was much more complicated than people thought, but I think he saw and felt clearly. He wasn’t labyrinthine. Straightforward, let’s put it that way. Because I think he was capable, for example, about weighing all the pros and cons. But he didn’t have a lot of pulls and pushes going on inside him. And he didn’t have trouble dealing with people or things. He didn’t have little warring voices inside – without citing anyone in particular who might have.

Smith: David Broder said he was the sanest - I think he said, the least neurotic president in my lifetime.

Bakshian: That’s right. I once, as a joke, said to President Reagan when I was leaving, just like a goodbye conversation where we were sitting around talking for quite some time, and I said it as a joke and he knew I meant it as a joke. I would never have said it outside. I said, “Mr. President, I can’t tell you how grateful I am to you. I’ve worked for three presidents, you’re the third. The first one was abnormal, the second was subnormal, and now you’re normal.” What I really meant, and I think he knew it - the first one was a bit kinky, the second one was normal and now you were dealing with a born-natural.

Smith: By the way, did you ever hear Reagan talk about Ford?

Bakshian: Well, it never came up. The Ford loyalists and the Reagan loyalists all hated each other.

Smith: And the wives, I’m sure, was a factor.

Bakshian: Oh, yeah. Because of the ’76 run. And I can remember in ’76, after I’d come back from Harvard, I was helping in the campaign, the actual election campaign. And Lyn Nofziger was there, who of course worked very closely with the President – President Reagan. And at one point we wanted to get a tape. We were doing things for surrogates – statements and speeches – we’d take them and then spread them. And they wanted to get Reagan to do one heartily endorsing Ford and Nofziger said, “Oh, Reagan would never agree to it.” But someone got through to Reagan’s office, and obviously he supported Ford, and Reagan did it. Reagan didn’t hesitate to do it. It got back to the bad blood. the Hartmanns and the Nofzigers were much more that way than the big guys themselves.

Smith: Who is the guy we interviewed who ran the convention for Ford? [Stanton Anderson] He was a young guy then, he’d been at the RNC. But he’d run the ’68 convention, or ’72 convention.

Bakshian: Not Bill Timmons?

Smith: No. In any event, Ford finishes the acceptance speech and he gave it to him, to this guy. He gave him the speech, he said, “You deserve this.” And then he said, “I’d like to get Governor Reagan down here.” You couldn’t go down on the floor, so this guy, he went down through all the bowels, past the locker room, past everything, then up into the skybox. Pokes his head in, and says, “President Ford would really like to have Governor Reagan join him on the podium.” And before he could finish his sentence, Nancy says, “Don’t do it, Ronnie.” And Nofziger said the same. And Deaver had a somewhat milder version.

Bakshian: Looking to the future…

Smith: But Reagan said, “Naw…” and he did it.

Bakshian: Reagan was smart.

Smith: He was very smart.

Bakshian: Reagan not only was “that’s the sporting thing to do,” and he was, he and Jerry Ford - although they happened to butt heads - both were gentlemen. They were both nice people and treated people individually, treated people well. And so it was the natural thing for Reagan to do, but it was also the smart thing for him to do. Much more so than the soreheads who were much more busy about getting even.

Smith: And who were living in the moment.

Bakshian: That’s right, couldn’t look ahead.
Smith: Did you ever see Ford’s temper?

Bakshian: I never saw him really blow up, but I saw him express impatience once or twice. But it was not to someone in the room, it was when we were dealing with a speech or something. I don’t even remember what, but about someone being such a pain to deal with, or a major road block or something like that. I know he could do it. And God knows it’s a job where there are enough little prods all the time. But I never actually saw him blow up.

Smith: Again, the speechwriting operation as a metaphor for what he had to learn and the degree to which he learned it, mastered the job. It does seem curious that he would tolerate a situation where eventually you had, in effect, dueling speech operations.

Bakshian: Yeah.

Smith: How did that come about? How did it work, and what does it tell you?

Bakshian: Most of that started happening shortly after I left to go to Harvard. But I knew Dave Gergen very well, for example. I think Rumsfeld recognized that Jerry Ford was never going to actually give the gate to his old and trusted friend Hartmann, and in addition, to a large extent, although they shifted – that is Paul Theiss was eventually replaced by Bob Orben – but that you were never going to be able to abolish the speechwriting staff that was supposed to report to Hartmann. This isn’t Russia or the Nixon White House, for that matter. And you’re not just going to execute them all and bring in new troops, or move them all to Siberia. Actually they were sort of moved to Siberia – not moved, but they were allowed to continue, but other things were done. I think that actually showed you that with Jerry Ford, there was a point beyond which he would not go about mistreating old friends. And yet he was convinced he needed better work coming in. Now I say “convinced,” I said was convinced because I’m sure that Rumsfeld was constantly explaining how much, what the “problems were,” sometimes when they weren’t necessarily coming from there. At any rate, Rumsfeld prevailed and Dave Gergen was brought in to run a “shadow” speechwriting operation.

Smith: I think the first real flashpoint is the ’75 State of the Union Address. There are those who believe, and who assert as a fact, that Hartmann was perfectly capable of withholding work until the last possible moment, so as to make sure that it was his work – it wasn’t staffed out.

Bakshian: That would be in character, certainly.

Smith: And that’s an unaffordable luxury in the White House.

Bakshian: Yeah. Well, also Hartmann before had worked with Jerry Ford, but he worked in a situation where maybe one or two other people were involved in the process and he took it to Ford. And also it was last minute, usually up there on the Hill it is a last minute process. And also, there is no clearance process.

Smith: I was going to say, who cares what the Minority Leader says, to be honest?

Bakshian: Yeah, and to Hartmann, probably even the legitimate clearance process in his mind was enemy forces.

Smith: Did he tend to see enemies?

Bakshian: Well, he was right about Rumsfeld, but then it’s a chicken and egg thing, too. If he came in with an attitude and with certain inadequacies, other people were going to recognize them and as he decided more and more people were out to get him, he would get more and more the way other people recognized as a problem.

Smith: We interviewed Al Haig a year before he died, and it was still not clear to me whether he was simply an emphatic personality given to sometimes extreme assertions, or sort of borderline senile. But he came out swinging.

Bakshian: I’d say one from column A and one from column B.

Smith: I think that is probably very fair.

Bakshian: Plus, he had nothing to lose anymore. He was never going to run for president again, and he was a bit PO’d about a lot of things that have happened. So he was paying back.

Smith: He was nice about the President, very nice about Mrs. Ford, but boy, he came out swinging against Hartmann. Said the Secret Service had come to him and warned him about Hartmann, etc. etc. That he had gone to see the President. And the interesting thing is, I could hear Ford saying this. Haig was going on about “I’ve seen one president brought down because of so on and so on, and Ford, according to Haig says, “Al, you’ll have to let me handle this.” At which point Haig says he said, “Well, then I know you don’t want me to stay.” And allowing for a little bit of dramatic license, I can envision that scene - Haig having a very large chip on his shoulder.

Bakshian: Oh, yes. That’s more or less the way he was – because, later, he would throw many tantrums in the Reagan White House. I was much more aware of that in a way, because I happened to be on the plane on Air Force One once where Judge Clark had to calm down Al Haig on the phone. This was before he finally was let go. Because as a result of the President, the Vice President, and, I don’t know whether it was the Senate Majority Leader or the Speaker of the House had also needed executive planes, Haig, as secretary of state, had been given a military transport plane that he considered infra dig in the pecking order of airplanes, and was having a hissy fit on the phone. And Judge Clark had to – it was like talking him off the ledge. And everyone was shrugging about it like, “Oh, there he goes again.” And, of course, he did it once too often.

Smith: So, he had that kind of temperament?

Bakshian: Yeah. He’d been in military command. And if you are base commander, you are base commander. Or, for that matter, if you are deputy whatever, there aren’t two, and I think he felt that way. If he was chief of staff, then if he came to the President identifying someone as a problem, and he had done that, it was him or me.

Smith: Doesn’t that illustrate so richly the shortcomings? And in some ways, foreshadowing what happened in the Reagan presidency. It was almost unavoidable.

Bakshian: Although many of us really think that in the meantime, Haig’s bypass surgery aggravated that. Something had to be there to begin with, but that kind of really super-trauma sometimes tends to aggravate the tendencies. There are some people around with that opinion about Dick Cheney, by the way.

Smith: Right.
Bakshian: I’ve known Dick Cheney since he started on the Hill. I don’t know about the medical bit, but I’ve seen him evolve.

Smith: You left, I guess, before Rumsfeld turned the reins over to Cheney?

Bakshian: That’s right. Because when I came back to Washington, Rumsfeld tried to hire me as his speechwriter at the Pentagon.

Smith: Oh, really?

Bakshian: I was dubious in general, but having then gone out to talk to him at the Pentagon and figured out what it would be like to work in that pigsty and what kind of lunches you’d be likely to be get - that did it.

Smith: Nelson Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that Don Rumsfeld did him in. And, of course, no one ever wants to blame the President. But George H.W. Bush clearly believes that Rumsfeld deep-sixed him at the CIA. And it’s fascinating to talk to people thirty years later.

Bakshian: Rumsfeld has always been that kind of an operator. I first knew of him when I was working for Bill Brock on the Hill in 1966, and there were various fights for just little think tank operations and so on going on in there, where all of a sudden – the old thing about Rumanians and revolving doors. You know, all of a sudden, Rumsfeld had got through and was in front of people that he’d been behind, and there is no reason to believe that changed. And he’s a very competitive man.

Smith: And, reputedly, leaves very few fingerprints.

Bakshian: He’s good at it. He loves his work. I’ve worked closely with him and I always got along with him, again, because I’m not somebody running against him. He needed a certain skill set. Also, I’ve never worked for him on a staff. It’s one thing to help with something, and maintain your autonomy with somebody like that.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Rockefeller?

Bakshian: No, just his staff once or twice about something. But, no.

Smith: Was there a sense of tension there?
Bakshian: They were very much in a world of their own over there. They were just – the whole thing didn’t last that long, and he didn’t have a real Washington nucleus. I see this with political campaigns - people talk about you’ve got to raise enough money to run for office. It’s very dangerous when you raise all the money you need and then some, and Rockefeller, he always had more talent than he needed. He always bought more talent than he needed, and some of it wasn’t very talented. And so there were a lot of hacks who were professional Rockefeller people, he thought were very good, who weren’t necessarily. And who also were not an easy fit with Washington or the presidential staff - either used to throwing their weight around or something.

Smith: He’d been governor of New York for fifteen years. He was a Rockefeller.

Bakshian: He was a Rockefeller. He was also paternalistic about taking care of people who had worked for him. And he had a lot of breadline cases, some of whom he didn’t realize were breadline cases.

Smith: Really? The reputation was he had this great staff.

Bakshian: Well, he had it and then he had lots of stale leftovers mixed in. How did he not get the nomination all those times, if money could have bought the best campaign staff? He had other problems, but…

Smith: Oh sure. I realize you left before the campaign per se started. Were they slow to take Reagan seriously? Either the possibility that he would run, and then the fact that he might, in fact, be a formidable opponent?

Bakshian: No more so than just about everybody else was, I mean, other than Ronald Reagan and his core staff. I think, if anything, Ford was probably accepting the Washington, the inside the Beltway, commentary and interpretation of where things were, because I don’t think he underestimated Ronald Reagan any more, maybe a little less, than the liberal press, the Washington Republican establishment and everybody else. So it wasn’t a matter of him uniquely and willfully ignoring it. There was nobody there that was sounding the alarm. Everyone was taken sort of off balance by that. The other thing was – well, Reagan had just always been underestimated.
Smith: It’s interesting because you can argue, in a different way, Ford was underestimated.

Bakshian: But he was a man of Washington. Reagan, to the Washington press corps, was California.

Smith: Actor – right wing, too old.

Bakshian: And also, they just never had to cover him in detail. They hadn’t had to cover him day to day. They’d never taken the measure, because the guys that had didn’t underestimate him.

Smith: Right, the Lou Cannon. What were Ford’s strengths as President, and did you see any evolution in his grasp of the office?

Bakshian: I think he was a quick learner about how the White House worked, but you wouldn’t hear that from the “Ford loyalists” because part of him figuring out how the White House worked meant he had to recognize certain limitations on some of his old friends that he brought in. So, to them, that would have been him being manipulated by the other people.

Smith: Would you include Phil Buchen, for example?

Bakshian: I never had to deal with him in great detail, so I don’t know how he interacted with all that. But the people that were old friends – Jack Marsh and various other people – that came there who sort of talked slowly and moved slowly. And Jerry Ford, I think, didn’t get out of breath going onto that presidential treadmill where you’re running even when you’re standing still, both politically and metaphorically. And a lot of these people did. So I think he was a quick learner, but still it was a stunning change, the most difficult since Harry Truman. Well, come to think of it – well, Lyndon Johnson – but Johnson, first of all, loved being president, even though he shed genuine tears when JFK was shot. Plus he’d had such an unpleasant time being vice president, I’m sure that whoever looked after the presidential dogs had more entry than he did.

But I think Jerry Ford was up to it from day one, and he learned from day one. But I think he was more qualified than most vice presidents are because of his long experience. I just had a high opinion of him, which the more I saw of him, the more it was confirmed.

Smith: Rod Hills said in our interview, “The older I get and the more presidents I see, the more I think, at least one definition of presidential success is making government work.” Knowing how to make it work and making it work.

Bakshian: And under those adverse circumstances.

Smith: But that is the opposite of the theatrical, self-dramatizing nature of the presidency in the television age.

Bakshian: Jerry Ford was neither an egomaniac nor insecure. Most presidents tend to be a little of both. He and Reagan, temperamentally, were very similar, except that Reagan was a master of the camera and was more aware of the importance of that, I think. Plus, he had more time to do it.

Smith: Was it frustrating at all for those of you who were responsible for the public Ford, at least Ford the communicator. My sense is he was at his best away from the camera. He was at his best one on one…

Bakshian: And around the table.

Smith: Where his knowledge of government and his manner really could be very, very effective. Was there a sense of frustration at all that some of that couldn’t be better communicated in the arena?

Bakshian: A sense of frustration and challenge trying to rack your brains about what’s the way of saying this that makes it come across. But there were only so many major speeches where that really mattered, though, because he comes in and all of a sudden it’s already 1974 midterms, and so he’s saddled with all these crappy speeches he has to give, which can’t be finely tuned. And which also are going to be, if there are film clips of them on the news, standing at an outdoor podium with the wind blowing through your hair and bad acoustics and having to shout. When you think of it, he was quite capable of giving a good Oval Office speech. There just weren’t that many of them.

His first speech as President of the United States couldn’t have been done better. And I think, by the way, that poor Hartmann - who in many ways failed to measure up - he deserves, he has a niche in history about something important, where he struck the right note and probably was able to do it better than the most brilliant ghost who might have been brought in from the outside, because he also knew the man who was going to give the speech.

But my point is, that down the line, if and when he was well served, that kind of speech, as opposed to the standing up before a live audience, Ford was quite capable of doing that because that was closer to what his manner would have been if you were sitting there in the room with him. With the speechwriters themselves, he actually was much more interactive than most presidents. I dealt with three and I’ll show it to you on the way out, just one of several pictures that were taken of the speechwriters – there were several of us all sitting around, really going over speeches with Jerry Ford. I used to bring the Reagan staff in, or some of them, for an Oval Office meeting because I had one once a week with him automatically. We talked about the upcoming schedule, but we weren’t really going over speeches. He [Ford] did that.

Smith: Again, right before the ’74 elections, when all of these candidates had the burden of the pardon on top of everything else, and he goes to California and everyone said don’t go to see Nixon, and he insists on going to see Nixon. It was the decent thing to do.

Bakshian: He was a man of honor. He was decent, but not necessarily soft. It was being true to your code. That was being tough, by the way, in a way that Richard Nixon might not have understood or appreciated.

Smith: When we talked to Benton Becker - this was during Ford’s vice presidency, and Earl Warren died. And Becker said, “It would be a nice gesture if you went and paid your respects.” And Ford sort of thought, and said, “Well, I don’t think the President would like that very much.” He said he’d think about it. Well, Becker finds out later in the day, without telling him, Ford on his own had gone up to the Supreme Court and placed a wreath at Warren’s casket. Needless to say, Nixon was not happy.

Bakshian: Nixon was not happy, but TS, in addition to which, this wasn’t somebody who just happened to have been a Supreme Court Chief Justice. The Warren Commission was something that Ford had been involved in, so they had had an association.

Smith: Yes, of course.

Bakshian: And to have ignored that…Richard Nixon visited Harry Truman while he was president and all sorts of other things, so I don’t think there was any real grounds for…

Smith: What were Ford’s weaknesses? Apart from the communications.

Bakshian: Just the actual, physical delivery bit. He didn’t have any impediment as a speaker, per se, but it was almost like a slight handicap.

Smith: Judge-a-ment and gar-an-tee.

Bakshian: He put the extra syllable into judgment. But other than that, if he’d been a little more ruthless, if instead of actually being a nice fellow, he’d mastered the art of pretending to be a nice fellow, but had been a little more of an ass kicker, he probably would have served himself well politically. I don’t know whether it would have improved his presidency. But I think he was a genuinely nice man who was not ruthlessly ambitious; not in it for himself – being an honorable man is the key. Nice implies sort of soft. He wasn’t soft. But he was honorable and he wasn’t going to do something shabby; he wasn’t not going to place the wreath at Earl Warren’s lying in state. Wasn’t not going to when he was in California visit the former president. It’s funny how you still, when you worked for them when they were president, you still tend to say…We’re here to talk about Ford, so I can’t talk about him as Jerry Ford or Ford, but the others I keep referring to as president.

Smith: One other thing, tell me about his intelligence.

Bakshian: Again, I believe that both and he and Ronald Reagan were at least as intelligent as Nixon, but they did not have intellectual aspirations and pretenses. I think they both, to use the J word, they both had a lot of judge-a-ment. To me, leadership effectiveness consists of raw intelligence, judgment and character which really go together, and then experience. But, of course, you can have all the experience in the world and learn nothing unless you’ve got both the raw intelligence and judgment and character. So I would say, I think he was a bright student, and the amount of stuff he knew and could draw on and deploy intelligently from his experience, proved to me that he was an intelligent man. I have no idea what he would do on an IQ test, but I think those are abstract, to a certain extent, too.

Smith: We’ve been told the decision to have Ford introduce his own budget and to stand in a room and answer every single question until there were no more questions - I think the last president to do that was Harry Truman - and it’s not been done since and probably won’t be anytime soon. But that that was, in effect, a tactic.

Bakshian: Well, first of all it showed he knew what he was doing; and, in fact, it showed him doing something that very few other people could have done in his place; very few other presidents could have done. I agree entirely. I give him top marks. Imagination wasn’t his strong point, but he was not there at a time where imagination would have been much help. He was first of all dealing with an overwhelming pile of things that couldn’t be changed by imagination. It wasn’t a matter of choose your theme; choose what you address today, because they were already there. So I don’t think that was a problem.

Smith: My sense is he was a real fiscal conservative. He was tight, financially.

Bakshian: I admired his use of the veto. And in fact, the thing I have the most, I won’t say contempt, but the thing I felt the most damning about the second George Bush, was that either he was totally heedless of the problem, or was afraid to use the veto against his own party out of responsibility to the nation. And Jerry Ford again and again did it where it didn’t necessary help him politically, but it was the right thing to do and sometimes it prevailed.

Smith: Now, you said you came back and worked on the campaign.

Bakshian: In the last month or so.

Smith: Post-convention.

Bakshian: Yeah, when it was the general election campaign, which I could do while also pursuing my own writing and so on.

Smith: Now, he was gaining ground – clearly – from where they’d been.
Bakshian: I think it’s amazing how close it became. It would have been almost a miracle to overcome the odds, but he came remarkably close.

Smith: What do you think were the factors that – people tend to zero in on the Nixon pardon. I’ve often wondered, because you had some economic numbers released at the very end of the campaign that Greenspan famously said was a pause, and I just wonder whether…

Bakshian: I think it was more than that. I think the pardon thing is something that people can point to a lot, but the people who were the most enraged about that were not going to vote for Jerry Ford anyway. It didn’t help him with anybody. It may have helped him to a certain extent with the conservative base – a little bit. But it hurt him, but I don’t think it, by itself decided anything. In fact, if you start playing that game about well if it affected X percent of the voters, you can do that about umpteen other issues, too.

Smith: And we’ll never know.

Bakshian: We’ll never know. I think he did remarkably well for anybody who was in that situation at that time. It was time for a Democratic president, especially one who came from outside of Washington, and had nothing but cheerleaders in the press corps.

Smith: Again, no one will ever know, although I think Ford certainly gave it a lot of thought at the time and later, what the consequences would have been if he hadn’t pardoned Nixon.

Bakshian: That’s right. Where would we have gone? What sort of due process would have been followed and what would have been dominating the story, not just to the diminution of his efforts as president, but to the detriment of the country? That’s why I think he was so right, both ways.

Smith: A couple of things, then we’ll let you go. The fall of Saigon; that must have been a searing experience for anyone in the White House. And there was a speech at Tulane where he, in effect, I think, overrode Kissinger and said the war is over as far as we’re concerned. There must have been an internal debate over that.
Bakshian: The frustration to me, it’s not a matter of anger, or even sorrow, the frustration was, to this day I believe and I suspect Ford may have, that if it hadn’t been for Watergate and then the irresponsible attitude of partisanship on the Hill, it didn’t have to end the way it did. With the North essentially being able to do a victory parade into the South. It didn’t have to end the way it did, and if it hadn’t ended that way, probably fewer people would have suffered and there would have been a more normal evolution of things over there. That said, under the conditions, it was over and I think that to the extent that Henry Kissinger wanted to do things to prolong the agony, it was at least as much out of egotism about his own policies and his “legacy” or reputation, as it was any realistic chance of changing what had been set in motion some time before. Because of Watergate and because of the total irresponsibility, to my mind, of the Democratic leadership on the Hill.

Smith: Even people who criticize Ford’s presidency acknowledge that he built a remarkable Cabinet.

Bakshian: Yeah. He was secure around talented people. Plus, his first thought wasn’t was he building up a rival? And that was partially because of the time frame and everything else. But also because that was the kind of person he was.

Smith: And apparently the one exception to that appeared to be Jim Schlesinger.

Bakshian: Well, Schlesinger, I think, was one of the less talented members.

Smith: Oh.

Bakshian: If you look at his subsequent career, he was a prima donna. He and Al Haig have certain similar characteristics. And it’s interesting that the two people who are sort of the most – not totally embittered – but who left somewhat under a cloud, they were both prima donnas and they weren’t necessarily the most brilliant, brightest bulbs in the chandelier.

Smith: Yeah, that’s interesting, very interesting. I asked Dick Cheney, “Was it difficult for Ford to fire people?” He said, “Not when it came to Schlesinger.”

Bakshian: Schlesinger probably also had a very high opinion – he was an intellectual in the sense of somebody who was much more intellectual than he was intelligent and who probably drastically underestimated Jerry Ford’s intelligence, and probably exuded that attitude Jerry Ford, who didn’t miss much – so Jerry Ford would have already known where Schlesinger was coming from. So when the time came, he would not have had to shed a tear and say, “Gee, too bad about that.” Nor should he have.

Smith: At the end of the campaign, did you think you’d caught up?

Bakshian: No. I had a feeling that Ford had done remarkably well, but this was one of those things that was over. And it was over before that campaign started and he had done everything. There is a scene in A Night to Remember, an old film about the sinking of the Titanic, toward the end, where they’ve rescued the first officer who survives and is on the deck of a ship, the name of which I forget, the Beringeria, or whatever it was, that caught up with them and picked up the survivors. And the first officer says to the rescue ship’s captain, “I wonder what I might have done,” and the captain says, “You did everything that was humanly possible.” Jerry Ford did everything that was humanly possible. And he did remarkably well. But it was in the cards. Barring Jimmy Carter actually suddenly having stopped lusting with his mind and starting to lust in a motel two days before the election and getting caught on camera, I just think it wouldn’t…

Smith: Did you have any contact with him in later years?

Bakshian: Alas, no. Because, until the Reagan years, I wasn’t involved in politics, I was doing my own writing and all. And I didn’t ever see him at anything and I didn’t happen to be at loose ends that day in the Reagan White House when he was there on his way to the Sadat funeral. I was busy with something, where I didn’t have time to come over just to, you know, say hello.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Bakshian: First of all, as a man who distinguished himself in every responsibility he ever took on in public life; as a man, especially for a politician, of stainless honor. A man who was up to the occasion, including a number of times, where he was thrown impossible assignments on short notice, under minimal conditions. But most of all, a man who steered us through a very painful time, and I can’t think of anyone who could have done it better, or how he could have done it better than he did. And a lot of that was where he was doing it from his gut, not because of the most expert people around. Very often they were wrong or giving him conflicting advice. And I think that’s how, with most Americans who paid attention, and with most historians, he will be remembered. And I think that’s justice.

Smith: It’s interesting. I wonder if you were at all surprised – I was wearing two hats the week of the funeral, I was with ABC during the first part of the week and then with the family the second part – and I can tell you, journalists, particularly younger journalists, were surprised, particularly as the week went along…

Bakshian: They were learning about him for the first time.

Smith: They were. And I think there was a whole generation who were seeing him in these old film clips and comparing him to today and he looked pretty good.

Bakshian: Yeah. Absolutely. And, again, especially when they pictured him in the context of the hand he was dealt. As I say, it is sad, but even Nixon, Nixon’s death – when I was talking to him in his retirement, he also was still talking about how do you think history will judge? And I didn’t have the heart to say, “Yeah, but, actually the day after you passed away, that’s when the positive re-evaluation will begin in earnest.” With Jerry Ford, it had already, among insiders, begun. But a whole new generation, not just of journalists, but other people, when they saw his story, I think they gained a fuller appreciation of him. And now that’s more on the record than it was and more than it was before.

Smith: Final thing, did you have any contact with Mrs. Ford?

Bakshian: I didn’t, but my sister, Mimi Timmons, who happens to be married to Bill Timmons, knew her very well from the Hill and then as First Lady, and loved her. As everybody, as far as I know, did. The possible exception is Nancy Reagan, I don’t know. They never were personal friends. To me, I always have had a high respect for those people in public life, especially way up there, who had a real marriage and the husband and wife loved each other and the marriage survived all that stuff. The Reagans, in a very different way, but it was true of them. The Fords in a much more full rounded way, because I think they had a more normal relationship with their children, too. Which to me was an added plus – just in how you felt about them. So, I loved her from afar, but I didn’t have any real dealings with her.

Smith: After they moved in and she told someone that – I guess presidents have always had separate bedrooms, presidents and their wives – and they shared the same bed. And concerned Americans wrote in to the White House to protest.

Bakshian: Well, in the old days, (in the 50s and 60s) sitcoms, if there was a marital bedroom scene, it always had to be two beds. And, of course, with the Nixons, if it had been a single bed in one bedroom there probably would have been a demilitarized zone.

Smith: Did you have a sense of what that marriage was like?

Bakshian: No, I think Richard Nixon had very little of a private life at that point. He loved his daughters, but I think his whole persona was wrapped up in being “the President.” I’m told by people that saw a lot of him after the presidency that, ironically, or sadly in a way, but better late than never, when Pat Nixon had her first serious stroke, he then started appreciating how she had given up so much of her life for him. She had totally accommodated his career and so on. And there was an appreciation and closeness that then developed for the duration, in the twilight years. I think earlier it had been just something that – also she, probably, probably just withdrew. I think they both withdrew into themselves as opposed to having something going on on the outside or having detested each other or anything. It withered. And then I was glad to hear that toward the end…

Smith: This is great.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this.

It’s hard to know where to begin, so let me try to begin at the beginning. Everyone, of course, knows about your significant role in the Ford White House. But your relationship with Gerald Ford, obviously, predates his days in the White House. When did you first meet?

Becker: We first met in a very formal atmosphere in the late 1960s. I take you back to the Congressional investigation about ’66, of former Congressman Adam Clayton Powell. You may recall that the House concluded an investigation without any conclusions and sent their work product to the Department of Justice to determine whether or not there were any violations of criminal law by the Congressman. The subject matter of the investigation was kickbacks amongst staff.

The Department of Justice in those days did what the Department of Justice always did, they sent it to the FBI, and the FBI sent dozens or more agents out to investigate, and the agents came back with empty investigative notes. No one would talk to the FBI agents in the congressman’s district in Harlem, and so we empanelled, we, the Department of Justice, empanelled a special grand jury in DC to investigate.

I was a criminal division attorney in the fraud section for the Department of Justice at that time, and I was given, along with two other gentlemen, that assignment to conduct the grand jury investigation and make some recommendation with respect to prosecutive recommendations to General Katzenbach or General Ramsey Clark. And there came a point in time in the course of the investigation that it was obvious to us that we needed certain documents. If we were to proceed with prosecution, these documents were essential to successful prosecution and these documents would have been the documents that the congressman himself signed.

For example, Richard, if you worked for Congressman Powell, under the prosecutive theory, if you worked for Congressman Powell and you would be required to kickback a $1,000 every month as part of your employment to the congressman, you and all other employees would have submitted to the congressman every month by the clerk of the House, a document that says, “Richard Norton Smith has been employed by me this month, is entitled to received $4,000.” And it would be signed by the congressman.

That document would be a material false statement, and thus the violation of the Title 18 statute in the Federal Criminal Code, that the congressman was making material false statements to an agency of the federal government. And that would be the technical criminal violation. So, in order to proceed, we needed those documents, we needed the originals of those documents.
Congressman Powell, at that time, had been suspended – at the time of the investigation was in the Bahamas, in Bermuda. There was an office manned by some staff people, but there was virtually no congressional contact.

The grand jury and the Department of Justice subpoenaed the House of Representatives to produce those documents – not only for one employee, but for all the employees that were the subject matter of consideration. Those subpoenas were predictably responded to by the House of Representatives as being subpoenas that were violative of the principles of separation of powers.
We are, said the House of Representatives, the co-equal Executive branch and we cannot be subpoenaed by a co-equal branch. Which we expected.

There were precedents in the past, and the precedent that was employed was, in that case, was for every subpoena we sent, a special committee of the House was established, a three-person committee, consisting of the Speaker, John McCormick, the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Manny Seller of New York, and the Minority Leader, a guy from the 5th district of Michigan, a guy named Jerry Ford.
And so every time we issued a subpoena, I had to go to that committee, or one of my colleagues went to that committee and had to respond to questions about the pending subpoena – why we wanted it, what it was for, the absence of any political nature, in an attempt to persuade the three members to go down to the floor of the House and for them to recommend to the entire floor – all 435 members of the House, that the House – and here’s the operable word – voluntarily comply. And so, that was our role, to try to persuade the three members of that committee to agree to tell the House to voluntarily comply with the subpoenas. And they did. They always did.

And so my first encounter with Congressman Ford was during that time period across the table. A very formal, Congressman this and Mr. Becker that. And I found, quite frankly, and I commented about it then to friends and family, and I’m happy to repeat it in later years, that of the three members, Jerry Ford was always the most prepared, the most succinct questions, very fair, very logical, and that’s how we first encountered one another.

Smith: Did you have a sense he’d made up his mind on Powell himself? Did he convey an attitude about the congressman?

Becker: Let me answer this way, by saying that if you didn’t know, and you simply read the transcripts of those executive session committee meetings, you’d have no way of knowing that Jerry Ford was a Republican and Congressman Powell was a Democrat. He was as balanced and as fair as possible. His questions about separation of power and whether we were overstepping or not overstepping, and even if they volunteered – showed a real good working knowledge of the constitutional principles, and I thought he was very, very fair. I was quite impressed. I really was.

Smith: Let me ask you about a still more controversial part of the story, and one for which he took considerable heat at the time, and even later on. That, of course, is the whole Justice Douglas investigation. People tend to apply labels in this town. It’s a shortcut and gets around thinking sometimes. People just automatically assumed that Ford was, in effect, carrying water for the Nixon White House. That this was part of a larger political effort to remake the court. And, of course, Nixon had had some serious setbacks with the nominations, both of Judge Haynesworth and Carswell. That’s the traditional way of approaching this. Tell me about how it came about and how you interpret Ford’s role.

Becker: This is one of those classic lawyer stories where the lawyer opens the conversation by saying, “Why didn’t you call me before you did this instead of after you’ve done this?”

Smith: Is that a reference to Ford’s conduct in the…

Becker: No, the speech on the floor of the House, his speech on the floor of the House with respect about Justice Douglas is what blew the whole thing up, and that’s when he called me and said, “Let’s sit down and talk about this.” And my answer was, “Let me see what you said,” and my first response was, “Why didn’t you call me before you said this, because a lot of this is filled with allegations that are unsupported,” at least at that point in time by real merit.

Smith: By the way, before I forget, it’s important to insert because it wasn’t only that Nixon had lost two Supreme Court nominees, but you’d also had the Fortas scandal. And that’s part of the backdrop, isn’t it, to this effort to raise…

Becker: You correct me if I’m incorrect, but my memory is that, this is after the denial of Haynesworth and Carswell.

Smith: Yes, that’s right.

Becker: That was my memory, because all that played into it. I was told by Congressman Ford that following the Haynesworth and Carswell denial of confirmation by the Senate, the Nixon White House was very angry and there were people in the White House who were very angry. John Mitchell was angry at the Justice Department and he had a criminal division assistant AG named Wilson, Will Wilson, who was particularly angry about all of this. And the congressman, who was a minority leader of the House, was contacted by Wilson, as he told me. And Wilson had made certain assertions to him – telephonically, as Ford described it to me – about information retained in the files of the Department of Justice that was at the very least, embarrassing, and possibly even impeachable evidence with respect to Justice Douglas. And as Congressman Ford then described it to me, that Wilson made the point that if this were public Bill Douglas could never continue to sit on the bench, and certainly could have not been confirmed with this kind of information public.

Smith: This is hardball.

Becker: And, he, Wilson, would make the records available to Ford.

Smith: This is hardball.

Becker: Yes, this is serious stuff. Now, at this point in time, none of that information, if indeed it existed, which I doubt that it really did, was ever made available to Jerry Ford. But Jerry Ford was, among other things at that point in his life, far and away, and I’ve used the expression in his presence lots of times, a team player. He was a team player. Wilson assured him he would give him this information. Nothing was forthcoming.

Bob Hartmann, who worked on Ford’s congressional staff, wrote a speech based on that conversation as related to Hartmann by Ford, which Ford delivered on the floor of the House. And it didn’t really call for the impeachment of Bill Douglas, the media overstated that – it called for an investigation of his conduct. Richard, as you know, Article Three - judges serve a life tender, including members of the Supreme Court, and that life tender is conditioned constitutionally only by two words in the Constitution, and those two words are, “Good Conduct.” And so, Article Three says you have it for life tenure in good conduct.

So the argument that Ford was making was, “Is this the kind of conduct that falls outside of the constitutional restriction of Article Three judges for good conduct?” Remember, Article Two, executive branch personnel have an entirely different impeachment standard that deals with bribery, treason and high crimes and misdemeanors.

Smith: Let me break that down for a moment, if I may. Long after the fact, sensing that maybe Ford had some regret, or at least embarrassment over his part in all of this…he took pains to make the distinction that you’ve made quite accurately. He didn’t call for the impeachment, but an investigation. Although in the climate of the day, that was seen as a distinction without a difference. Legally, you are absolutely right. But, again, with everything as politicized as it was…More to the point, he indicated that he had members in his caucus who were gung-ho to get Douglas. To get him off the bench.

Becker: Republican members?

Smith: Yes. And that Ford as he explained it, was taking the ball from the firebrands. In effect, trying to moderate, to some degree, this effort. Now that may be a little bit of rewriting history, or reinterpreting history. Did he feel regret at any point about all that?

Becker: He had a sense of regret about the publicity and the way the media played his speech and his communications to the Judiciary Committee on this subject. And I don’t think there is any question about that – that he felt embarrassed. And I’ll say, too, he was really quite surprised that the media jumped on this so much – that here’s Jerry Ford trying to get rid of an old Roosevelt liberal judge, whose been on the bench for so many years.

Smith: Was that in part because it was seemingly so out of character?

Becker: Was it out of character for Jerry Ford? It was out of character for him to be leading a charge without supportive evidence. But it was not out of character for him to be responsive to a request from the Republican White House, and a Republican AG. It was all team player stuff. But he did not seek, at any time, an impeachment. He simply wanted some clarification, and it bothered him.

We sat over many conversations, and he would say, “I don’t understand how Haynesworth and Carswell are ineligible to serve on the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Senators won’t confirm them because they did this and this, but members of the Court can do this, this, this, and this and they continue to sit.”

Smith: Let me ask you, because that does get us to the heart of the case against Douglas. I don’t want to answer the question before I ask it – but you do wonder, in light of the Fortas resignation, which entailed his receiving a fairly substantial retainer from the Parvin – no, Douglas, I think, had the Parvin Foundation – but basically, Fortas was being paid…

Becker: By the litigant –he was not being paid indirectly. I think a person who had a pending action before the Supreme Court, paid for, as I recollect, paid the American University Law School a sum of money, and that sum of money was used in the summer for Fortas to teach a course. I think that’s correct. That’s a different story than Douglas.

Smith: Douglas was, I guess, a consultant to the Parvin Foundation?

Becker: A member of the board of the Parvin Dorman Foundation. The Parvin Dorman Foundation had some people associated with it that were highly questionable. Highly questionable. In fact, that’s the only information we ever really got, that we got confirmation of from the Justice Department. And it was an appearance, it was a terrible appearance that he should sit on the board of essentially a furniture company that makes and sells furniture and other equipment, along with other people who have definitely, at least in the Department of Justice, organized crime connections.

Smith: One sensed that, objectionable as that was to Ford, personally, the Justice’s writings, particularly for, I think it was for Evergreen magazine, were perhaps more offensive.

Becker: Yes.

Smith: Or seemed more inappropriate. Is that an accurate assertion, or was a big deal to Ford in terms of how he formulated the case against Douglas?

Becker: I couldn’t call it his case against Douglas, I’d say it formulated in a large part his feelings about this man and his continued tenure on the bench.

Smith: Did that have anything to do with his marital record? The fact that…

Becker: No.

Smith: No, nothing at all?
Becker: I can try to be more responsive to you and I will, and that is that, he was deeply troubled. President Ford was deeply troubled by this diversity of standard. You had to be of such a quality to get on the bench, but once you got on the bench there was this good conduct. Good behavior is so vague and every member of the Senate can affix their own definition to it. And it bothered him.

And I can tell you – I’ll jump ahead on this interview – but at one point, I’ll never forget this. I’ll take it to my grave, Richard. At one point in the vice presidential confirmation proceedings, a congressman from California, a man named Jerome Waldie, not a fan of President Ford, was questioning him about Douglas and the same kind of questions about, “Are you offended by the fact that Justice Douglas has been married to young women? Are you offended by the fact that he writes articles in magazines?” Well, I thought I had a pretty good handle on everything that was at that desk where President Ford was speaking, we had notebooks and questions and answers, but I didn’t.

He went into his briefcase and he took out that magazine, that Evergreen magazine, and he opens it up – now this is pre-cable TV, opens it up and he’s showing it to the congressman. He says, “This is Evergreen magazine, and here’s an article on this page.” And he says, “Let me turn the page Congressman,” and he did this and you could hear a hush in that place. And there was a semi-nude playmate picture. He said, “I just don’t think that it’s appropriate for a justice of the Supreme Court to write and have an article published in magazines of this type.” He says, “If you do, that’s your affair Congressman, not mine.” And so I don’t know if that is responsive to you, but that happened.

Smith: And what does that tell you about Jerry Ford’s values?

Becker: Oh, that this is a Midwestern guy who, although it’s been twenty-some years in Washington, still has the Midwestern values, and that’s the way he was made.

Smith: That wasn’t politics; that was him.
Becker: That had nothing to do with politics; had nothing to do with – it’s even before what we use today so openly, we use the phrase “Liberal and Conservative” to talk about justices. I don’t think we even used those phrases then. If anything, Bill Douglas was being possibly criticized in some quarters for Griswold vs. Connecticut and the privacy right decision that he wrote about.

Smith: But Douglas has to be the personification of what today conservatives talk about as judicial activism.

Becker: I suppose.

Smith: He was the face of creative interpretation of the Constitution – I mean, the penumbra of privacy. He was an iconic figure in a lot of ways.

Becker: Those are your words. I wouldn’t use those words to describe Griswold. I think Griswold has - for those that watch this and don’t understand, this is a case involving the Supreme Court – doesn’t have to but they decide the case on the basis of the discovery of a new Constitutional right in the Constitution that is not actually articulated; and that is the Constitutional right of privacy, which evolves and eventually gives us Roe v Wade and a bunch of other cases. And Douglas writes the majority opinion in Griswold and his majority opinion does indeed cite the penumbra of the amendments that suggest that there are other rights. But the Ninth and Tenth Amendments do provide a textural basis for a judge, being that judge a liberal or a conservative judge, a textural basis in the Constitution to conclude that there are constitutional rights reserved to the people that are not articulated and identified by name in the Constitution. That’s my position on privacy.

Smith: Ironically, of course, it would fall to President Ford to name Justice Douglas’ replacement. Now there is a scene in, I think, the Brethren, the Woodward book about the Court, a rather nasty scene where Douglas is, I believe, at the White House. The president invited him to a dinner at the White House, and they shook hands – which is all a matter of record. But I believe as this scene has it, the president says some sort of tossed off casual remark about, “It’s nice to see you, Mr. Justice Douglas,” or something – some kind of courtesy. And supposedly Douglas responds very sarcastically, “Oh, yeah, we’ll have to get together again real soon.” Something like that – suggesting a bitterness. Now, of course, he was also ill. You don’t know really if any of it happened. You don’t know if it was…

Becker: I read the book but I don’t remember it, frankly.

Smith: Do you remember any encounter between Ford and Douglas after the fact?

Becker: No. None at all. Not to suggest that he, President Ford, avoided Justice Douglas, but I think the time period you’re describing, Richard, in my memory, is that Justice Douglas was a pretty ill man at that time. And I don’t know that he was wandering around at White House functions, but I could be wrong. I know this, if this is of any consequence to you, somewhat related. During his vice presidency, when things were getting a little bit sticky between him and the Nixon White House and the staff of the Nixon White House, lo and behold, the nation lost Earl Warren. Earl Warren died during that time period – a great, great loss.

President Ford knew that Earl Warren was one of my personal heroes, and I suggested to him as vice president that, “What are you doing this afternoon? The Chief Justice is lying in state. It would be a very nice thing to do.” He thought about that for a second and he made some remark about the Nixon White House would not like that, they would go crazy with that, and that would be all over the paper. And I said, “Well, I was suggesting that it might be…” because the man had had great, great impact on this nation, and the vice president stopping by his lying in state would not be an inappropriate thing. And he said, “Let me think about it.” And I found out that, without any notice to the media or anything, he just grabbed the Secret Service and ran over there. He put a wreath at the site and went back. He told me later, he said Nixon made some remark to him about it.

Smith: Really – disparaging.

Becker: Earl Warren, he said he went to see Earl Warren.

Smith: That’s fascinating – really, that’s fascinating on multiple levels. We’re jumping ahead but this is perfect. This is where I want to go because clearly, one of the things that we’re picking up in these interviews, people knew that Ford, as vice president, had a very awkward job. Terribly difficult. And the conventional notion is that one way he dealt with it was to get out of town as much as possible. But clearly there is more to it than that. Dorothy Dowton told us how unpleasant, in many ways, the Nixon people were. How they clearly resented Ford’s presence. On one level you can understand it, I suppose. He’s a convenient target as your world is caving in. Why isn’t he out there more vociferously defending us? And so on. Talk about that period and the challenges that Ford faced and how he dealt with them.

Becker: It’s a short period, Richard, for history. It’s December of ’73, December 7th when he took the oath of vice president, through August 9 of ’74. It’s a very short tenure as vice president. Actually, it begins somewhat before that. As you know Jerry Ford is the first person ever to be nominated under the 25th Amendment of the Constitution, which provides, among other things, that when there is a vacancy in the office of vice president, the president can nominate someone for the office of vice president, and that individual will become vice president upon confirmation by both Houses.

So Nixon nominated Ford following Agnew’s resignation as vice president.
Up until that point in time in the country, something like 27-28% of the entire history of the country, we had no vice president. Presidents had died, and vice presidents became presidents and there was a vacancy in the office of vice president. We had two vice presidents that resigned and at least one that died, so we had long periods where there is no vice president. This ended with the 25th Amendment. So Ford is going to be confirmed under the 25th Amendment. I was very honored to be able to represent him during those proceedings.

Smith: How did that come about?

Becker: He called me.

Smith: Having been nominated.

Becker: Yes, the night before. “I’m going to be nominated tonight…” one of those kind of telephone conversations. And we put together a team. There were certain issues that we focused on that we wanted to make certain that we had a clean, clear record on certain of those issues. There was a book, a horrible book out on the bookstands called Washington Payoff.

Smith: Let me ask you about that. I’ll tell you why.

Becker: We’re jumping around, and I’m not answering your question from ten minutes ago.

Smith: No, no – this is how it works. We jump around.

Becker: Okay.

Smith: I was reading Nelson Rockefeller’s oral history about the Ford presidency, which has never been published. It was done for a memoir that he never wrote. And I tell people – Lynn Cheney came up to me the other night and asked how the book was going and said, “Well, wasn’t he a little crazy at the end?” And I always say he didn’t age well, and there’s a number of incidents.
But anyway, after he left office I think he nurtured some bitterness about all that and how he left office. Anyway, he brought up this, he didn’t have the book title, but he’d got into his head –

Becker: You talking about Rockefeller?

Smith: Rockefeller.

Smith: Yes. And the way he reconstructed history, first of all, I have to tell you, he believed that Rumsfeld was blackmailing Ford.

Becker: Oh my goodness gracious. Rocky thought Rummy was…?

Smith: And the notion that Hartmann had something on him, too. And he went back to the hearings and this notion that, in effect, there was someone who had paid off Ford, and the committee closed ranks and they sort of kept it off the record, and somehow he made some connection, and if that had been public it would have prevented Ford from being confirmed.

Becker: That’s really surprising.
Smith: It is. So that’s the backdrop. I’m glad to have you mention that and explain what it was and how it was addressed.

Becker: It was a paperback book called Washington Payoff, and it was written by a man named Robert Winter-Berger, who was a small-time lobbyist I was told, on the Hill. And among other things, that book asserted that at one point in time, he, Winter-Berger, gave the minority leader some cash, $4,000-$5,000 or something of that nature, in return for a vote. Now we were faced with that, knowing that this man is now going to be confirmed by the Senate and then by the House, and to make matters even worse, the committee that he’s going to have to appear before in the House, is the same House committee that is entertaining impeachment resolutions against the guy that appointed Ford.

So, it’s not going to be a very friendly atmosphere. So we wanted to get the air cleared on this Winter-Berger matter once and for all. And, of course, we spoke with him, I spoke with Ford about it at length and there was absolutely no truth to it at all. He couldn’t even describe Winter-Berger to me in terms of what he looked like, and so forth. So I read the book from cover to cover and I met with a wonderful man, a wonderful man, Bob Griffin, who was then the Senator from Michigan, and was a member of the Senate Rules committee that we appeared before. With Senator Griffin and his staff I had provided a whole body of questions to propound to Robert Winter-Berger. I wanted the committee to subpoena Robert Winter-Berger and I wanted the committee to question Winter-Berger. And they did. And it just showed, without a doubt, that it was just absolutely totally fanciful.

He said he met with Ford at times when Ford wasn’t even in the country. He was asked where he got the money that he gave to Ford. He didn’t know, nothing was in his bank account – no withdrawals, it was totally fanciful. In fact, the committee, the Senate committee that interviewed Robert Winter-Berger, took Robert Winter-Berger’s testimony before that committee, and sent it to the Department of Justice for possible perjury prosecution. Winter-Berger was destroyed so badly, was shown to be so frivolous, totally frivolous, the allegation, that, when we got before the House committee, this was after the Senate had voted, and Ford is before the House Judiciary Committee, quite truthfully in many, many, instances, and many, many, members on that committee, terribly unfriendly group. Really unfriendly group. That group never asked one question of any person, including Jerry Ford who sat there for about seven hours before that group, not one question about Robert Winter-Berger. That’s how much he was destroyed.

Smith: Two different members of the Ford congressional staff reinforce each other indicating that, in fact, Winter-Berger was thrown out of the office. He came once and made everyone feel very uncomfortable. And Ford basically said this guy is bad news and the word was communicated. In fact, I think he tried to come back once and he was literally tossed out of the office.

Becker: That would be consistent with what he told me – that is, I can’t tell you if he’s tall or short, or heavy or thin, I have no idea…and his book drew an entire picture of the great friendship between the two of them. No such thing existed. And let me say on the record that Don Rumsfeld and Bob Hartmann blackmailing – that is wild. Nelson Rockefeller shocks me that he said that.

Smith: There was a streak of paranoia, particularly as he got older, and it runs throughout. I won’t bore you with all the stories, but it’s actually, bizarre as it sounds, it’s consistent with the last few years of his life. He tended to see enemies behind every lamp. No one ever wants to blame the president, so he went to his grave believing that Rumsfeld did him in. That Rumsfeld was responsible for his problems as vice president, for the fact that he wasn’t on the ticket, so forth and so on. And from there I think it just festered and festered, and he couldn’t understand why Ford would have as polarizing a figure as Bob Hartmann around. And so, therefore, there had to be this sort of explanation. A lot of people asked why he kept Hartmann around. You asked if we had talked to Haig, we talked to Haig.

Becker: You ring a bell with me on Rumsfeld. There is another explanation, and that is Donald was unhappy with the appointment of Nelson Rockefeller. Rumsfeld thought that there was another person that would much better serve Jerry Ford and could make a much better vice president in the person of Donald Rumsfeld.
I will tell you a Don Rumsfeld story about – Don would not deny this, I suspect. This is in the early weeks of the Ford presidency, pre any consideration of pardon, I think, and I’m working in my office there and Rumsfeld walks into the office and said, “Hello, how are you?” and we’re chatting, and it was about 6:30 at night. I happened to be involved with some of the considerations for vice president. And he said, “Let’s go have dinner.” So we walked down Pennsylvania Avenue, there was a little Italian restaurant, and we had dinner, the two of us.

We sat across the dinner table and he started a monologue, I would call a monologue, that went on for about ten minutes and it was along the lines, “You know, Benton, government is a strange, strange, thing,” he said. “How much one learns in government. Here, look at me, for example. I started as an aide to a congressman and I learned in that job the work of legislative aides. Then I became a member of Congress. And then Nixon made me chairman of Wage and Price Controls, and then Nixon sent me to the only job that involves military and diplomacy over in NATO.” He said, “I’ve been so many of these things. Government is very strange.”

I was sitting there, having dinner, and I let him finish and I said, “You know, Donald, if we were in a corporate environment, if we were in a large pharmaceutical corporation, or General Motors or something, and you and I were sitting down and you said to me, ‘Benton, I spent two years in advertising and two years in production and two years in this,’ I would say to myself, ‘Look out for that guy, he wants to be president.’” And he understood.

So I don’t think he ever applauded, or supported the Rockefeller nomination and I think history might have been entirely different if Don Rumsfeld had been the nominee, I’m not too sure for the better. The thing that shocks me a little bit about your comment about Nelson Rockefeller is that it was always my observation when, in the presence of both of them together, Ford and Rockefeller, and in a formal environment and in an informal environment, as well, I always thought Rockefeller just got along with him so well, and that Rocky was really a good friend to the president.
Smith: I think he was. Some of the best evidence of that is, even after he was dumped - talk about a good soldier – he produced at a critical moment in those primaries, the New York delegation and was instrumental in turning over Pennsylvania, as well. And that, in the end, provided Ford with his margin of victory. I will tell you a story. It goes to the Rumsfeld/Rockefeller/Ford relationship. Bill Seidman originally told me this, and I think of Bill as a straight shooter.

Becker: Me, too.

Smith: Bill’s not a guy who’s got an agenda. But, Bill, in the White House found himself aligned with Rockefeller in things like: you had the economic issues, Greenspan and Simon, the real free-market types, and Seidman is a different cat. Whether it was New York City, aid to New York, or whatever. Anyway, Seidman told me the story that Rockefeller told him that in advance of the Kansas City convention, at one of their weekly lunches, Rockefeller having delivered New York and Pennsylvania, said there was only one thing he wanted in return. And that was, he didn’t want Don Rumsfeld at the convention.

Becker: He wanted him removed from the convention?

Smith: He did not want him physically at the convention.

Becker: Oh, at the convention.

Smith: Because I think he convinced himself that Rumsfeld wanted to be vice president and Rockefeller wanted to prevent that. Now, the story is, and here’s where it get really interesting because Rumsfeld, as he told the story, was not at the convention until the last day, but put out the word that he’d gone into the hospital for some elective surgery. Fine. Now, when we interviewed Rumsfeld six weeks ago – boy, he’s still good, he’s very good – because I didn’t want like Hansel and Gretel to leave bread crumbs leading up to something obvious, so we were jumping around and out of the blue I said, “Now were you at the ’76 convention?” And without pausing, he said, he sort of laughed to himself, he said, “Oh, that’s another one of Nelson’s stories.”
He’s very good, and I don’t know what the truth is, but I regard Seidman as a pretty good source. At least let me put it this way: I’m sure Nelson told Bill what Bill reports, and from Don’s own words, he, in fact, went into the hospital for elective surgery and missed all but the last day. I think on the last day the whole Cabinet was there. So that whole relationship – and I think that it does not diminish, I think you’re absolutely right - I think Rockefeller had great respect for the president and I think real affection for him. But I also think you could imagine a situation after the fact – he’s talking to his communications director who did these oral histories, and this stuff just kind of spins out and it’s directed less at Ford than it is at his perceived enemies in the administration led by Rumsfeld and with Cheney as number two. The funny thing is, more than one person has told us, Rockefeller was not above walking by the door to Rumsfeld’s office early in the morning, opening the door, poking his head in, saying, “Rummy, you’re never going to be vice president.”

Becker: I could see that happening.

Smith: Things like – Rumsfeld, for example, wouldn’t give his staff parking places. That kind of tit for tat, back and forth. And I assume Ford didn’t know about that, but one of the things that really drove Ford up a wall was internal squabbling.

Becker: Yes, he didn’t care for that.

Smith: Now, was it easier to control when you’re just dealing with a congressional staff, and it was much harder to control because, first of all, it’s not all his staff. The Nixon holdovers – how much of a problem was it meshing a staff that was basically Richard Nixon’s staff with his own people.

Becker: Well, when he moves into all this, of course he’s only given like a 24 hour transition period, and he inherits all of the Nixon staff, including Al Haig as his chief of staff. The events of the first four, five, six weeks of the Ford presidency, demonstrate clearly that much of that staff – this is the Ford White House staff – but that staff is not really serving Gerald Ford, they are serving Richard Nixon. Remember, there is a conflict between what Richard Nixon in California wants and what Gerald Ford in Washington wants. The staff is pushing Ford to go to what Nixon wants. So that was a problem.

My perception has always been that in terms of White House staff, traditionally White House staffs are difficult animals to live with. I thought that that White House got along fairly well with one another. I thought they got along better when Dick became chief of staff than when Don was chief of staff. We all knew Don was not going to stay there long. We all knew that somebody was going to go, and Don was going to take that Cabinet post.

Smith: Because clearly the Ford/Schlesinger relationship was never good. Just a matter of personal chemistry. Jim Schlesinger and President Ford just very different…

Becker: Totally different kind of animals, and Jim Schlesinger was kind of a by the book, and I don’t want to go into any details, but I was present at some session where it struck me that Defense Secretary Schlesinger was speaking down, as if he were speaking to a Congressman Ford instead of President Ford.

Smith: Well, Ford said to people, he thinks I’m a dummy. And of course, Ford had spent all those years on the Defense Appropriations Committee. He knew his stuff.

Becker: He knew that backwards and forwards. In fact, when Jerry Ford used to say to me that - when we were talking about the budget and so forth - he would say, “Jim Lynn is good, but I know this stuff backwards and forwards.” And he really did know it. Jim Lynn was an OMB person in the administration.

Smith: Let me go back to the vice presidency and the friction between the Nixon White House and the vice president’s people, or the vice president himself, or both. Where were you during this period?

Becker: During this period – I was in the vice president’s office at least once a week for a two-hour conversation with him. That was our agreement and he had given me, after the confirmation proceedings, a corporate box with arrows leading to it at the very top the vice president – a box leading here and this one – and he showed this and he said, “Do you want to see this box? This is General Counsel.” I noticed there is a straight arrow directly from General Counsel in the vice president’s office, my vice president’s office, to me. He said, “That’s what I’d like you to be, Benton.” I said, “You know, it may come as a shock to you, but the vice president doesn’t do very much and the counsel of the vice president does less.” And I said, “When and if the time comes and you elevate yourself, you take a step up the ladder (I didn’t use that expression), that’s a different story.” But in the meantime, I had so many obligations to the law firm and to the clients that I wanted to wrap them up. But I did want to see him. I wanted to see him weekly because I was concerned that the Nixon staff would take advantage of him.

Smith: What led you to that concern?

Becker: There were certain people on the staff that I didn’t care for. And, typically, Al Haig and I had one very serious confrontation before Ford became vice president.

Smith: Before Ford became vice president?

Becker: Before. And what happened, Richard, this was about two weeks, three weeks before our first hearing before the Senate, post-nomination, before the Senate Rules committee. I came to then Congressman Ford’s office, it was late in the day, and we were talking about how to handle this question, how to handle that question, there were a series of books on how to handle different questions. Votes and campaigns and other matters, and the secretary came into his office and said, “General Haig is on the line.” “Okay, I’ll take it.” So there was a desk between us, and he gave me a minute kind of a sign and picked up the phone and said, “Hello, General, how are you,” and so forth. And then I’m hearing just one side of the conversation. And I’ve got two weeks - in two weeks we’re going before the Senate committee.

I hear him say, I hear Congressman Ford say things like, “Oh my goodness gracious, I haven’t thought about him in thirty years or forty years. They found him? Where in the world did they find him? They’re looking for her? Oh my goodness.” And I hear him say, “The Bureau’s got nothing better to do?” And it is very obvious to me that Al Haig was getting reports from the Bureau on the background checks that the Bureau was making on the nominee, which background checks and reports were going to be given to the committee chairman only, and not to the nominee.

I got up and walked around the desk. Bill Cramer was with me. Got up and walked around the desk and I said - he was talking on the phone - I said, “Give me the phone, give me the phone.” He saw me gesture that I wanted the phone and he handed me the phone and there was Al Haig was talking, thought he was still talking to Jerry Ford. And I said, “General, General, General.” He finally realized it wasn’t Ford, and I said, “Let me give you my name. My name is Benton Becker, and I’m representing him before the House and the Senate, and before we’re finished before these committees, I can tell you, I guarantee you, he will be asked and re-asked the question, did the White House feed in any information about the FBI reports - the White House prepare him improperly - because the members were not getting the reports, just the committee chairman?”

And I said, “When that question is asked, General, the answer is going to be a truthful answer, and the answer is no. We don’t need or want you to do this anymore. He’s in good hands, he will be confirmed well and it will be fine.” And, Richard, the deadliest silence on the other end of the line continued for about eight to ten seconds, followed by, “May I have your name one more time, please.” That was my first encounter with Al Haig. They never called him again, and, of course, Ford was asked that question several times.

Smith: Was there anything during that period – aside from the typical kind of political jabs – were there any real serious issues in the course of the confirmation hearings? Did anything come up that presented any kind of real threat to his confirmation?

Becker: Well, there were some votes, procedural votes on the ’64 civil rights act, as I recollect. There was absolutely nothing that came up from a standpoint of campaign financing. Nothing at all. With Bill Seidman’s passing last week, we were talking about it, and I remembered Bill Seidman during the confirmation coming in from Grand Rapids to appear before, and spend hours and hours and hours at a House committee on taxation reviewing Congressman Ford for the past five years, and going back to Grand Rapids. And then when we moved to the Senate, the Senate said we’re going to have a joint committee of the House and Senate go over his finances for the past five years tax. Bill Seidman came in again and went through that again, and we thanked him and he left. And then the House committee decided after two such, they’re going to have a House committee investigation, and they went through that again for five years.

And what they found was always a subject matter of some humor with Betty and the president. It was that in ’72, these confirmation hearings were in ’73, in ’72 the Minority Leader, Congressman Ford was the chairman of the national convention and Betty had made it clear to him, you’re going to go buy some new suits for national television. So he bought two or three new suits and wrote them off as a business expense. That’s the only thing that came of that. So he ended up paying for that and that was the whole thing.

Smith: I want to ask you a couple more things about the hearings because you mentioned Mrs. Ford. And in light of what we subsequently know about her state of mind at that point, that she’s written about herself, did any of that come up in, not necessarily the hearings, but was it investigated? Because they investigate everything else. Did they know, for example, that she’d been to a psychiatrist?

Becker: You’re asking about Betty? Betty’s alcoholic problem was not made public. I was aware of that.

Smith: That early?

Becker: Yeah. I don’t know if it was described as a disease, but she had a bit of a problem, and the psychiatric material, I don’t recollect anything at all about Betty with the psychiatric material information at the House and Senate. There was a little sojourn that dealt with some shrink in New York that had been Nixon’s psychiatrist – tell me if I’m off base here – and that Nixon at one time had recommended him to Jerry Ford, and Jerry Ford once spent an hour with him or words to that effect.
Smith: That sounds right.

Becker: Something like that, but that’s the only thing I remember.

Smith: It’s hard to imagine anyone less a candidate for psychoanalysis than Gerald Ford. You could see Mrs. Ford.

Becker: Very well adjusted.

Smith: Let me ask you, did you have any discussion with Ford at that point in the context of preparing him, or describing the investigation, or whatever, about Mrs. Ford?

Becker: I have given my records to the library, and all my papers and records are in the library. There is a body of records that remain sealed for a period of time. I don’t generally discuss those kinds of things. I understand we are doing this for historical purposes, but I’m not comfortable discussing my private conversations with Congressman Ford about his family in anticipation of the committee hearings, except to say that we tried to be prepared and to be candid and frank and answer all questions. We recognized the American people, in general, did not know him, and that this was their way of being introduced to him. We wanted them to see the open candor of this man.

Smith: Let me try this a different way. The standard way the story is told now is that Mrs. Ford was having some problems by the way, characteristic of a whole lot of women of her generation. She is almost a metaphor for women, sort of middle-aged, who – and she has written, herself – at this juncture in their life where their husbands are doing fascinating things, their kids are growing up, and in some ways they are left on the side. And under those circumstances all sorts of things are possible. Ford was out on the road all the time, perhaps not as aware of some of this as, for example, Susan became. Is that your sense, broadly speaking, that it was not an unusual immersion in his own advancement with all the demands, travel and everything else that were imposed upon him as he rose up the ladder. And it was almost a benign neglect, not seeing some things that perhaps he might have been sensitized to later on.
Becker: I do subscribe to what you said, but not only that, I would make the point to you that as minority leader, when the minority party is in the White House, he was every night, literally every night - and I was amazed during the confirmation proceedings, when we were preparing for the confirmation proceedings and I spent a lot of time in his congressional office during that time - that every night there was some cocktail party here or some function here, or some group – you never bought dinner, that’s where you went every night. I said, my goodness gracious, I could never keep up with this kind of a lifestyle. As minority leader [it was] even more so than as a congressman. He attended a lot of those things and it was not uncommon in those days for this kind of thing to happen. He was, himself, President Ford himself, I would consider a moderate drinker, a very moderate drinker. Before dinner sometimes we would sit and have a cocktail. I might have a glass of wine with the meal, and he would pass on that.

Becker: Yeah, very much so. Oh my goodness, if he would put on a little weight, he would notice it and he had to do this and he had to do that. “I swim every day, you should swim every day. I find time to do it, you should find time to do it.” Oh, God, the Midwestern ethic – I’m a little Jewish boy from Washington, give me a break.

Smith: Did he ever talk about his parents?

Becker: His parents? He talked about his brother and his young years. He talked about Michigan a lot. He talked about the school and his football years and the football games. A little bit about the military. I got to know about his military background. Of course, I didn’t know everything about him.

Smith: Did he tell you about Willis Ward, his black teammate at Ann Arbor?

Becker: The story about how they wouldn’t serve him or feed him? I always thought that was such a poignant story and then, when you go before the House committee, members would go out of their way to try to make something out of a procedural vote on the ’64 Civil Rights Act as though he were against it. He was very much in support of the ’64 act. In fact, Jerry Ford voted in the – I believe it’s the ’52 act that Jack Kennedy voted against and Richard Nixon voted for – or ’50. I think Jerry Ford – if he would have been a Democrat, they would have probably called him a moderate Democrat.

Smith: But he was certainly a fiscal conservative.

Becker: Oh, very much so. He was quite conservative.

Smith: And that carried over into his personal life.

Becker: We’d have a $2 bet or something, and “pay up, pay up.” We’d play gin on the airplane coming in. I remember going to Tampa with him on Air Force One. We sat and played gin for an hour on the flight down – four bucks, five bucks, or something like that, and we landed and – this is the President of the United States - said to me something like, “I’m going to be pretty busy. I’ve got really a busy schedule here, once I get on the ground. I’ve got a busy schedule. Have to be here and there and we’ve got to be over here and we’re leaving. Why don’t you pay up your debt before…” I said, “I’m going to be here, for God’s sake! Here’s your lousy four bucks.” That’s what he was like.

Smith: Let me ask you, I only heard him speak disparagingly of two people. And I mention that because - and I’ll tell you who they were - but I’m sure there were others. But my sense was that he really made an effort to see the good in everyone. Beyond that, something unusual for a politician - at least when I was around him, I noticed pretty quickly, he would be pretty deft in steering the conversation away from what you and I would call personal gossip. Most pols love gossip. Not just political gossip, but they love to get the dirt. But my sense was that Ford was almost offended by that.

Becker: I think that’s true. He didn’t have a lot time or patience for that sort of thing. But he had a wonderful sense of humor. I’m trying to remember – you can help me, Richard – the wonderful columnist who died a couple of years ago of cancer, a humorist, columnist…

Smith: Art Buchwald.

Becker: Art Buchwald came to some of our dinners. And Art Buchwald would always tell a Jerry Ford story about being tight with a buck. And Ford would laugh his head off. He told a story, I remember, and I heard Ford repeat it. It was a story about two lawyers in Washington who went on a yacht trip and the yacht crashed and the two of them swam to an island, a deserted island all by themselves and never to be found again. One day the two lawyers are sitting there on the island all by themselves, “One lawyer said to the other, ‘My God the sunlight was terrible and I was just getting to be successful in Washington, and I had this and I had this and I had this, in fact, I recently had lunch with Minority Leader Jerry Ford. I had no money. But I paid for lunch. I borrowed $30.00 from Minority Leader Ford to pay for lunch. I told him I would repay me this week.’ And the other lawyer says, ‘Oh my God, we’re saved. If you owe Jerry Ford $30, Jerry Ford will find us.’” It was very funny. He loved that story, an old Art Buchwald story.

Smith: But there were some grounds for that. You know, the best humor is grounded in reality. He was austere in his approach.

Becker: This is a man who raised four children on a congressional salary, maintained a home back in his own district, and it was tough to do in those days. It was really tough to do. So he really had to watch a buck, and he was honest. He had no side deals, no special deals, he had no radio stations or TV stations or anything like that. Just, what you saw is what you got.

Smith: Do you sense what his relationship really was with LBJ?

Becker: No, no I don’t know. But I do know that he had high regard for Jack Kennedy, and he spoke to me lovingly of those early days when they were both young congressmen, both single, both good looking guys, and how fond he was of him. I think that fondness carried on to the whole family, with respect to Ted and Caroline when they awarded him the Profiles in Courage Award. He was really touched by that.

Smith: During the vice presidency, he obviously – again, he’s in this impossible position – cannot give the slightest public hint that he might, in fact, become president for obvious reasons. Behind the scenes – Tom DeFrank, of course, made a lot out of a slip of the tongue, and actually I’d like to get your view of that.
Becker: During the vice presidency?

Smith: Yeah. But in a larger sense, did he ever say anything?

Becker: Well, we spoke about his relationship with the Nixon staff and with Nixon. And he complained early in his vice presidency to me about how they would book him for speeches without clearing it and they, the staff, the Nixon staff, would write the speech and he wouldn’t see the speech until very late in the game. Sometimes he’d be on the airplane and he still hadn’t seen the speech. There was a conscious attempt, it was pretty clear, to turn him into a Spiro Agnew #2 – a blind defender of Richard Nixon.

This is pre-smoking gun, pre a lot of the tape disclosures, and once the tapes are disclosed, I think we are talking about roughly March of ’74, the smoking gun tapes and some of the other tapes come forward when they were produced, the vice president just cut back altogether. He said, “I’m not going to do these speeches,” and, in fact, at a Cabinet meeting the vice president of the United States, off the agenda, and Nixon’s Cabinet’s were strict agenda, off the agenda, announced to the president and to the Cabinet members that he would no longer publicly defend the president.

Smith: You’re right. That’s at the end, after the smoking gun tape came out, which was, of course, at the end of July, or whatever.

Becker: After the evidence is out, yeah.

Smith: But earlier, at least, say spring of ’74 – depends how you look at it – there always was a Boy Scout quality to Gerald Ford, and I don’t say that condescendingly. Eagle Scout is a real part of his character and he said, more than once, and I think not just as boilerplate, that he literally tried to be honest with everyone, and he assumed that everyone was being honest with him. Now, again, you can look at that with a certain degree of naïveté, or you could say that that’s a very admirable character trait. Was he, in fact, as surprised/appalled that Nixon lied to him as one might be led to believe? Was he really surprised that Nixon turned out to be as involved in the cover up as it became clear?
Becker: Well, you know, there’s not one moment in time when all the evidence is made public. What I thought, Richard, was this: it kind of comes out slowly and you get it piecemeal. We all lived through that period, we make judgments, we see what’s going on in Sirica’s courtroom, and we see what McCord is saying and we see what John Dean is saying, and begin to, who do you believe or don’t you believe, and so forth. And there becomes this documented form of evidence in the form of the White House tapes, and then you get edited portions of that first. Then you get….

Smith: Let me ask you about the tapes, because when the transcripts appeared, one senses that he was, in fact, appalled by the language as much as any revelations. For a lot of people, that was a Dick Nixon that they’d not heard before.

Becker: The final transcripts, you’re talking about? Yes, I agree.

Smith: Was that your sense? That it was as much the style of Nixon’s conversations, plus the fact that he was taping people. Did that offend Ford? That people were being taped without their knowledge?

Becker: Did it offend him? The only way I can answer is saying that one of the first White House orders that he issued was that there would be no taping. No taping whatsoever during his administration. I’ll tell you an interesting story about that. I think he was more disappointed than surprised. I think at one point in time, probably going to ’68-’69, somewhere in that time, that he had great expectations for that presidency. And there was a great disappointment for him that Nixon would use this kind of language and would speak this way of ethnicities and races and genders, and they would even consider using the CIA to cover up this or to cover that, and we’ll claim this and claim the privilege.

We talked about that, yes. And it was rather surprising. We talked about it in the context when that finally came about though, in the context that this is a dynamic system. This is not a stagnant system. This is not going to remain the same. Richard Nixon is going to have to stand trial for impeachment and that is going to happen, or he is going to resign. And then when Hugh Scott and Barry Goldwater, if you remember, Richard, walked up to the White House and had a conversation with President Nixon and Goldwater told Richard Nixon that he did not have the support of the Republican senators for the two-thirds vote in impeachment, and then told the world, it was pretty clear that he was going to lose that office one way or another. And at that point in time, we began to think in terms of how do you prepare this man for that next move, and how do you avoid any appearance of a coup, or over anxiousness, and how do we communicate the honesty and the fresh candor of this man to the American public so that they know what the quality of the new president is?

Smith: That is, again, post smoking gun tape. Before that he had, obviously, old friends on both sides of the aisle. Were there people advising him in the expectation that this was an increasing likelihood? You stop and think, every single day, how many opportunities he had to put out a foot wrong, and by and large he didn’t. But it must have been – talk about self-discipline – it must have been an incredible amount of caution, watchfulness, dexterity, to go through this period. Be out in front as much as he was, have as much interaction with the public as he was, and yet thread the needle in terms of never saying anything that could be turned against Nixon - knowing that the Nixon loyalists, were dissatisfied with what he said. What was his mood during that period? That must have exacted a certain amount of strain.

Becker: I would answer you by saying that I wouldn’t characterize him at that point in time as a loyalist. A loyalist to me would have been someone who turned a blind eye to any evidence. Just don’t want to see or understand it. But, Jerry Ford, I think, during that time period would better be described as someone who was: A) a team player; he’s the minority leader of the Republican Party, the Republican Party is in the White House and his boss, the head of that party is in the White House, and B) a guy who is a lawyer, who is prepared at all times to give someone the benefit of the doubt until the evidence comes forward. The disclosure of the existence of tape, as you remember, Alexander Butterfield I think was his name, long precedes the actual disclosure of the contents of the tapes. And so he took a position of I’d like to see what was said on those tapes. I’d like to hear those tapes; I’d like to hear them myself.
Smith: Do you know if he ever advised Nixon on what to do with the tapes?

Becker: Not that I know of. I read that Laird had some advice on that score to Nixon. Later we had conversations, not late in his presidency, after his conclusion of his presidency, about why didn’t Nixon destroy the tapes before they were subpoenaed, and maybe he should have listened to Mel Laird, words to that effect. No, I wouldn’t call him a blind loyalist at all. That’s what I would call an Agnew type person.

Smith: No, my point was actually, the real Nixon loyalists would never be satisfied with what he, as vice president, said in defense of Nixon. But he is, literally, suspended in this terribly awkward position.

Becker: I will tell you this, too, listening to this conversation we’re having here brings back some memories. I remember – I don’t know if this is relevant to this point – but I remember him saying to me quite often that he, as minority leader, had greater access to the Oval Office during Lyndon Johnson’s presidency than Richard Nixon’s. He didn’t blame that on Richard Nixon. He blamed that on Erlichman and Bob Haldeman. And so he wasn’t a big fan of the way they ran that White House.

Smith: By the way, this is an appropriate time to say that the only two people I heard him really disparage, and the worse he could say was, “He’s a bad man.”

Becker: Which one?

Smith: One was John Dean and the other was Gordon Liddy.

Becker: Well, I’ll go halfway with you. I don’t think Gordon Liddy was a bad man. I number Gordon among my friends. John Dean is a different story altogether. John Dean, I think, was concerned with his own neck very early in the game, and did what he could to preserve his own neck and sometimes, in my view, concealed his true role in the break in and so forth. There are books – the Silent Coup makes a very strong case of John Dean had pre-break in knowledge of the Watergate break in, and there is considerable evidence to support that.
Smith: Did you ever have a conversation you recall where the issue – not the stupidity of the break in, everyone says they knew right away – but the responsibility for it? For example, did John Mitchell take secrets with him to the grave?

Becker: I don’t think John Mitchell is a secret at all. Ford would agree, I think, and I recollect that’s how the conversation on the subject, that what was in the public domain with respect to the so-called explanation for the break in of the DNC, made no sense whatsoever. Because there is nothing there of any value at the DNC that could be helpful to Gordon Liddy and Howard Hunt and that group of people. They didn’t have a nominee yet, the Democrats didn’t have a nominee yet and the records of contributions were not there. It made no sense at all. There had to be a different explanation or some frolic of others.

You might remember some years later, I don’t know, fifteen years after his presidency was over, I appeared with Richard Nixon’s lawyer and some others at Fordham, a symposium on Watergate. But the original press secretary Jerry terHorst was there and Jerry terHorst made – fifteen years later said what he’d said fifteen years earlier – he said, “I left the Ford White House because I couldn’t live with the fact that the guy who was responsible for the break in got a pardon, and the others went to jail,” – talking about Nixon.

The fact of the matter is, I have never seen anything to suggest that Richard Nixon had any prior knowledge of the break in. None at all. So this business of Nixon being the mastermind has never made much sense at to me. There are other explanations, and they are in the books out there for the break in, by that group. Liddy knew what he was doing, knew he was breaking in to DNC, but I don’t think Liddy knew the real mission at all when they went in.

Smith: There is this theory about Larry O’Brien and the old loan to Nixon’s brother and somehow that may have been what they were looking for. The other problem, of course, was…

Becker: Castro and all those crazy things.

Smith: Yeah, the other problem was they had too much money and…
Becker: That’s exactly right.

Smith: And there is a theory that Nixon you know, Nixon would pop off – and Haldeman, for the most part, knew when to take it seriously and when to forget about it. But, the Magruders of the world, lacking that sophistication, heard the old man say something and took it as gospel. And before you know it, Mitchell sort of signs off without really thinking about it, and the rest is history.

Is there something we don’t know still about Watergate?

Becker: Yes. Sure.

Smith: Including who authorized the break in?

Becker: I think the public does not know the real reason for the break in. You know, there were two break ins. There was one two weeks earlier, before the one where the arrest occurred. They don’t know about telephones being tapped in the DNC. Why the telephones were tapped. They don’t know about two weeks of, following the first break in, of listening to those taps from the Howard Johnson’s. They don’t know the full story of the principles involved. In fact, Richard, did you know that there is an unprosecuted DNC break in conspirator who later became an assistant state attorney in Rhode Island? And they don’t know, the public, I don’t think, really knows who ordered it, who’s idea it was, and what was the ultimate purpose of it. What were they trying to gain?

My view is, I think there were certain people that were trying to gain some blackmail information against Democrats, and use that to their own political advantage. But that said, there were cutouts. I’m confident, I’m personally very confident the Central Intelligence Agency had nothing to do with this break in. That’s craziness. The FBI had nothing to do with it. It’s that group – that group of Plumbers that went out to California and got into Dr. Fielding’s office and broke in there. But will they ever know? I don’t know. I’m not sure there is an interest anymore. For a long time we had a cottage industry in this country of Watergate, didn’t we?
Smith: Sure. And Deep Throat. It’s almost as if, once the identity of Deep Throat was revealed, some of the air went out of the balloon. Let me tell you something – it’s interesting – we have done about seventy interviews so far. One of the most interesting was with Jerry Jones, who told us, among other things, that in the spring of ’73, Haldeman was still on the White House staff. Jerry Jones, at that point, was finishing up reorganizing the personnel office for Haldeman. He got a call from Haldeman wanting to know how many people reported directly to the vice president. And Jones did some quick thinking and said about fifty. And Haldeman said, “Fine. I want undated letters of resignation from everyone of them.”

Becker: This was Vice President Agnew?

Smith: From Agnew, exactly. Now, there are two theories that have been advanced to explain that. One, which I think it is safe to say Jones subscribes to, is that they knew long before the Wall Street Journal published its first story that Agnew had problems. And they wanted to be prepared.

Becker: Quite plausible.

Smith: And the other, more general theory is, well, Agnew wasn’t held in very high regard, and it would not be atypical of Nixon one day to sort of say, just out of the blue, being angry at Agnew. That kind of thing. But Jones believed that it was grounded in the fact that they knew, before the public knew, that Agnew had some pending legal problems. And they wanted to be prepared in case of…

Becker: That, I think, is quite plausible because, as I recollect, Agnew himself, through counsel, very early in the investigation made it clear to the Department of Justice if they wanted to deal exclusively with Elliott Richardson, and they didn’t want it to lead to lower levels, and they didn’t want to deal with some assistant U.S. attorney or USA, they wanted to deal with the AG. And so the AG is brought into this thing. I could see that happening and that’s exactly what happened - Elliott Richardson negotiated the terms of the Agnew disposition.
Smith: We’ve heard varying accounts of Richardson’s initial response to the order to fire Cox. There is something of a debate between – maybe they heard what they wanted to hear, but clearly, there were people in the Nixon White House who believed that Richardson was prepared to carry out that order, and subsequently, obviously, the opposite turned out to be the case.

Becker: Well, the obvious question is, if the order was direct to Richardson, why didn’t he do it? Why did he resign? I’ve never heard that story. But anyway, I would assume that if the AG gets involved in the negotiations involving a criminal matter involving the vice president, I see nothing inappropriate with the attorney general informing the president of this ongoing matter.

Smith: Another source, who probably should at this point remain nameless - the day the Supreme Court handed down its ruling about the tapes, the call was placed to San Clemente and Ron Ziegler, speaking for the president, the initial reaction was, “Can we defy the Court?”

Becker: Can we divide?

Smith: Defy. Nixon’s initial, immediate response was, is this something that we can get away with? And it was made very clear that it was not an option. And you could see, that’s really the beginning of the end of the Nixon presidency. But it’s interesting that Nixon’s initial response…

Becker: Well, what’s interesting about that is that, to me, that option would have been considered while the matter was pending, for goodness sakes. It wouldn’t come out of nowhere – oh my gosh, we lost, we never expected to lose – no, no, not at all. It was an 8-0 decision, I believe, with Rehnquist not participating. No, I can understand, and I can envision Ron Ziegler saying, “Screw them, we’ll do what we want to do…” because that was Ron Ziegler’s makeup.

Smith: Is it possible that Ziegler said that on his own without talking to his boss?

Becker: Sure. His boss would have considered, long in advance, if the court does this, we’ll do this, if the court does this, we’ll do this. He wouldn’t have waited. That’s the way Richard Nixon was.
Smith: One other thing that we found surprising because it’s the portal to the whole pardon story. We talked to Haig. I’ve always assumed, I imagine I’ve read it more than once, but for whatever reason, I’ve always assumed that Haig, at the very least, listened to the smoking gun tape. He denied ever having heard the smoking gun tape. One thing we’ve learned in this is how many roads lead back to Fred Buzhardt. I’ll back up just a minute. Because when we talked to Mel Laird, who had come into the White House staff somewhat reluctantly to lend a hand, Buzhardt had been his counsel at the Pentagon. And according to Laird, he’d been on the job about a month when Buzhardt called him and said, “I’ve been listening to the tapes. Nixon’s in it up to his neck. Be careful.” Laird also acknowledged, somewhat reluctantly, later in the conversation, that Buzhardt also tipped him off to Agnew’s pending problem. So he’d known about that.

You remember, Laird has a conversation with Ford where he says, “If you think things are bad now, wait—they’re about to get a whole lot worse.” In any event, Buzhardt is his source for both of those stories. Haig says, “Buzhardt gave me some very good advice. Namely, don’t ever be alone in a room with a tape.” Now, whether that is a comment on the famous eighteen and a half minute gap story, or what, I don’t know. But I always assumed that Haig, at the very least, as I say, listened to the smoking gun tape. He claims he didn’t. He also claims, by the way, that the whole initiative of the pardon was not his idea; that it originated with Buzhardt, that it was Fred Buzhardt that drew up this list of options. That it was Fred Buzhardt who, he said, gave me (Haig) credit for being intelligent enough to realize what a questionable position that would put me in, etc., etc. That he basically is passing on Fred Buzhardt’s handiwork. What’s your reaction? Is there a little bit historical rewriting going on here?

Becker: Yes, indeed, indeed, indeed. First of all, if you listen to all the tapes during the Nixon presidency, you’re going to hear Al Haig’s voice almost as much as Richard Nixon’s. Al Haig is a frequent participant in those conversations. I find it very difficult to believe that, given that fact, and given the fact that the tapes were such a critical piece of evidence on the question of the loss of the Nixon presidency, that Al Haig wouldn’t want to hear what he said, to remind himself of what he had said at that time. If he said anything that is arguably obstructionist behavior under the Obstruction of Justice statute. I find that very, very difficult to believe.

Smith: Is there a middle course? Is it possible he would have seen transcripts and been content to see transcripts?

Becker: No, I don’t think that that’s bad advice. Don’t find yourself in a room alone with the tapes. But the chief of staff of the White House can avoid that by having three other people present with him at all times while he’s listening to these tapes. And you don’t listen to originals, Richard, you always listen to dups. You never touch the original, so there are ways of avoiding that. That’s standard behavior. Local police departments are going to operate that way.

My impression always was, in an indirectly related matter, that Al Haig would have been most happy if, most happy if, Jerry Ford did what Bill Saxbe told him to do as AG, and that is to send the tapes to Nixon in San Clemente. Al Haig would have been most happy if all those tapes were out of the White House in the hands of Richard Nixon, presumably for some big bonfire out there in San Clemente. Because, in my view, Al Haig demonstrated, at least to me, in my view, that that’s really what he wanted. Now that, of course, was not in any way in the best service of Gerald Ford or the Ford presidency.

Smith: And presumably that included as well Nixon’s papers which were in storage?

Becker: Yes, sir. Well, all the records, papers, and tapes.

Smith: And I believe they were stored at the Old Executive Office Building?

Becker: They were boxes about two feet by two feet. They were in the Executive Office Building across the street from the White House, across the walkway from the White House. And they were on the third floor and the Secret Service was concerned because there were so many boxes. It was almost five years of records, papers, and tapes – they were concerned about the floor of the EOB. And, of course, that became, within one week, a major issue in the Ford presidency.

Smith: Since we’re there, let’s explore that. You mentioned Attorney General Saxbe.
Becker: Yes, sir.

Smith: How did the issue first come up and how was the decision made to get an opinion from the attorney general?

Becker: Very simple. Without exaggeration, within 24 hours after landing in San Clemente – within 24 hours being the ex-president of the United States – the ex-president of the United States picked up the phone and called Al Haig, his former chief of staff, and said, “You know those boxes up in EOB? Ship them out here. Send everything out here. I want all my records, all my papers and all my tapes.”

Smith: Because – let me interject – historically, papers, in fact, have belonged to the outgoing president. That had been the tradition.

Becker: You are using the right terms, Richard. You are using the right terms. Using the term tradition, and you’re using the term historically, but your sentence did not use the word by law. By custom, by practice and tradition, that was historically correct. Jerry Ford agreed to, at the very least, initially – he was president a very short period of time – make a determination of who owns these records. Who owns them? Does Richard Nixon own them? Does the government own them? And so forth. And so what he did, he asked the Department of Justice to give him an opinion on ownership. In the meantime, nothing leaves the White House.

Smith: There is this – I don’t know where it came from – notion out there that Ford immediately is inclined to let Nixon have his papers and tapes.

Becker: If you were to take a new position in an office, and you had 85 people working for you in that office that had worked for your predecessor, and an issue came to you in the first 24 hours of your new position in that office, and you staffed it out to these 85 people, what do you think I should do? And all 85 of them said, “Oh you should do this Richard,” and they all said the same thing, you might be inclined to go along with that. And that’s what happened with Jerry Ford. Jerry Ford inherited the Richard Nixon staff and within days the issue came up, what do I do with these records, papers, and tapes? And at the very least, and it took a little doing, at the very least we got him to at least get the legal opinion from Justice.

Smith: Now, what led him to that? Describe that process.

Becker: My gut reaction to that was immediately negative. Strongly negative. Hostile negative. You cannot do that. Jaworski is going to want these, the special prosecutor is going to want these, there are litigants that are going to want these, you can’t part with those. How do you know that they are not the property of the U.S. government? I don’t know – I’m not expert on papers and records. At the very least, let’s get an opinion.

Smith: Were there other people either echoing what you were saying or taking issue? Was there a debate going on?

Becker: There was one other person. That was Bob Hartmann, bless his soul. Bob felt very strongly the same way I did. Saxbe, who was Nixon’s, I believe, fifth AG, had the legal department prepare the memo. Do you know who prepared the memo? A young lawyer in the Department of Justice named Anton Scalia, and it was a wonderful memo. I don’t have any problems with it substantively in terms from a legal standpoint. He’s right, he walks though different presidents over the years. This one had an auction of his papers and tapes. Grant actually had an auction of his papers and tapes. And Lyndon Johnson cleaned out the White House. You couldn’t get a pencil in the White House. By custom and tradition, many, but not all presidents claimed and took their presidential records when they departed the White House. Several presidents simply left their records to the government. What happened with the Department of Justice memo was an interesting set of facts. We’re now about ten days into the Ford presidency, maybe a little less. Bill Saxbe meets with the president. Al Haig is there, as I recollect, Bob Hartmann was there, and I was there, and the formal delivery of the memo was given to the president.

Smith: From the Justice Department?

Becker: Yes, by Bill Saxbe.

Smith: The attorney general.
Becker: Yes, but, Bob Hartmann had learned before the meeting, from a member of the media, that the media had received a copy of the memo before the president.

Smith: Really?

Becker: Justice had given a copy of the memo to the Washington press corps before it was given to the president. I always believed this to be a maneuver to lock the president into the position urged in the memo. Specifically, to send the records and tapes to Nixon in California. It became a very antagonistic meeting in the Oval Office. Not the president. The president was quiet during it. You must send it, you must send it, you must send this stuff. You’re going to get sued, you have no standing, no reason to withhold it. It’s not yours.

Smith: That being, presumably, Haig’s viewpoint or Saxbe’s?

Becker: Saxbe’s making a point and Haig is strongly supportive of it. All I can tell you is that I felt very, very strongly about it; very strongly about it. I wanted to verbally hit President Ford in his gut, someplace that he would really feel it. And my view is that presidents really feel it when you talk about how history looks at their presidency. Once you’re president, that’s the only thing, theoretically, you’re concerned about. And I said to him, “If you send that to Nixon, if you send those records, papers and tapes, to Richard Nixon, there will be a hell of a bonfire in San Clemente – and whatever happens in the remaining two and a half years (meaning the remainder of Ford’s presidency), is unimportant. Historians will write about the Ford presidency and this is what they will say, ‘Jerry Ford committed the final act of the Watergate cover up when he sent those records and papers and tapes to Nixon in California.’”

And, Richard, you know the personality. You could see from the neck up, literally see the color change. I really angered him with that statement, and I meant to anger him. I wanted to shake him – you can’t do that! Red through his neck…Saxbe jumped in and said something like, “I’m the attorney general. You should listen to my advice.” And it was a senator talking to a congressman again. That’s what it was. That’s what I saw. I didn’t see the Oval Office, I saw a senator talking down to a congressman. And that was a mistake. Ford said, “Those damn things are not leaving here. They belong to the American people, they are going to stay here. They are not leaving.” And of course, I had made the argument that by custom, tradition and practice, outgoing presidents had claimed ownership of their records. But the nation never had a criminal proceeding against a president, we never had White House tape system and so forth. It was a whole different set of distinguishing arguments.

Smith: Here’s where it gets confusing, because subsequently, a deal was arranged to send the stuff.

Becker: Not too quickly.

Smith: But which then had to be, in effect, superseded by a congressional act. How did you get from this very dramatic confrontation to the sequel?

Becker: Okay, there was a decision made, I’m not going to voluntarily send them to Richard Nixon. I’m not going to do that. Let’s find a disposition, let’s find a happy disposition. I considered going to Sirica, saying, “Judge, would you take them?” That was out of the question, he wouldn’t do it.

Smith: Now, wait, you didn’t go – but that idea was floated?

Becker: It was floated.

Smith: By the way, was Phil Buchen in on this meeting?

Becker: Phil was not in that meeting, but in subsequent meetings. At that point in time, concurrently, while all this was going on, Phil and I are meeting with Jack Miller, who is Nixon’s lawyer. And he is talking about, when are the records going to be there? When are the tapes going to be there? Ultimately, we tell Jack Miller that it’s not going to happen. They are not going to go out to be sent to California voluntarily. We’re not going to do this.

But coinciding with all of that, if you can follow all of this at one time, while all of this is pending, these meetings are going on, Phil and the president and I have a conversation about the Constitution and what his powers are under the Constitution, with respect to pardon. He had a series of questions that he wasn’t certain about the answer to. He hadn’t made up his mind on pardons, but he wanted to know the range of his authority. Wanted to know, for example, wanted confirmation that pardons could be issued pre-indictment, pre-conviction. That pardons could be issued across the board without specification of the statute for which you are being pardoned. That a pardon could be, once issued by the president, could have effect on a similar or concurrent state criminal statute – that the state couldn’t proceed, or what was the status of that? That a pardon would have no possible effect on any residue action that the Senate might pursue against Richard Nixon. Because even though Richard Nixon had resigned, he could still be subject to impeachment because the impeachment clause provides for a loss of office, but also loss of honors and privileges and profits, and so forth. So the Senate could have proceeded, and the President wanted to know if a pardon was affected by a residue impeachment action. And then finally wanted to know if a pardon could be refused. It was pretty clear what we were talking about.

Smith: Do you have any sense of how far into the administration is this conversation?

Becker: Within two weeks, and the President is very clear. He says, “I don’t want you to work on this here. I don’t want anybody seeing this. Go someplace…” “I understand.” So I went to my old law firm’s library and used that. I’d keep books out and I’d mark the page. If it was on page 412, there was a case I was looking at, I would mark it 537 and have a separate code to myself in case some curious little law clerk was curious about what Becker is looking at. I went to the Supreme Court library and I wanted to see some of the original briefs on some of the pardon cases.

And so, ultimately, I came to have what was the answer to all of his questions, and they are, of course, that pardons can be issued pre-indictment and pre-conviction, that a pardon does not have to specify with particularity the statute involved. It can be across the board, and if he was considering, as he was considering pardoning, for any and all federal offenses that would not be a prohibition. All states enjoy sovereignty where they are technically not required to honor a presidential pardon ranted for a federal offense to apply equally against a state criminal offense. Principles of comity and one sovereign being respectful to another sovereign had come into play in some of the cases coming out of New York. New York had voluntarily granted comity to a presidential pardon.

Break taken.

Smith: Well, we’re obviously mid-narrative in terms of the disposition of the Nixon papers.

Becker: Let me finish those five questions, if I may, so if they become relevant - I think I’ve gone through three of them and the fourth question dealt with Congress. The pardons are specifically excluded in the impeachment clause. One may not pardon an individual for the individual’s impeachment. The pardons had no effect on impeachment trials. But the question that really was a fascinating question was this business of whether a pardon could be refused. If President Ford was considering giving a pardon to Nixon, certainly he didn’t want the embarrassment of granting it and having it thrown back in his face.

And so when I looked at much of the case law on this subject, Article 2 of the Constitution that deals with the presidency identifies the powers of the president to give something called reprieves and pardons. Now, reprieve, we don’t use that word today, we use the word commutation. Commutation is what Scooter Libby got, what Jimmy Hoffa got, it is an executive branch reduction of a judicial branch criminal sentence. That’s what a commutation is. A pardon is altogether different. A pardon is a forgiveness, an executive forgiveness of the criminal act, which certain implications attached thereto.

So, if you follow this logically, it is very simple. Commutation cannot be given until there has been an adjudication and a sentence and a reduction of the sentence by the executive. Since no one has a Constitutional right to be a resident of a federal prison, “I choose to stay here, I want to stay here in this federal prison” – no one has that kind of Constitutional right. A commutation cannot be refused. Commutations, once issued, are effective and can be conditioned, and they still cannot be refused. Jimmy Hoffa, for example. Jimmy Hoffa’s commutation issued by Richard Nixon said thou shalt not run for union office for, I think, ten years. And Hoffa didn’t like that part of it, and tried to litigate it.

Now, on the other hand, a pardon is an act of forgiveness by the president. Judicially forgiving the crime, as I say, can be given pre-indictment, post-indictment, and so forth. But acceptance of a pardon is an acknowledgement of guilt.

Smith: Is that a legally established point?

Becker: Yes. Let me try to give you that a little more clearly. A pardon can be accepted or rejected. Individuals who are offered pardons have the authority to accept or reject pardons. A rejection of a pardon renders the offered aprdon as void and without effect, but once one accepts a pardon, it’s an acknowledgement of the complicity in the act for which you were pardoned.

In 1914 a journalist in New York named Burdick wrote a series of articles on immigration in the ports of New York, and wrote about bribery occurring in those ports, and identified immigration officials that were accepting bribes. His name was Burdick and he was brought before a federal grand jury in New York. The U.S. attorney made it very clear we have no interest in you, Mr. Burdick, no prosecutorial interest in you, we just want to know your sources and your evidence. Tell us your sources.

Burdick said, “No, I will give you no sources. I invoke my privileges under the Fifth Amendment,” and refused to answer any questions. He simply wouldn’t tell, and this was long before there was any kind of statutory shield or legislation that reporters could invoke. Burdick, a month later, was subpoenaed for the same grand jury and was asked the same questions by the same U.S. attorneys, same grand jurors, and he gave the same answer. Where upon the U.S. attorney, the opinion tells us, went into his pocket and pulled out a piece of paper, put it in Mr. Burdick’s hands and Mr. Burdick read it. And it was a pardon signed by Woodrow Wilson, pardoning Mr. Burdick for everything that he’d done from the moment of birth up until that moment in time. It is what we prosecutors used to call a complete bath. And he said, “Now Mr. Burdick, you have no Fifth Amendment privilege because your answer can’t incriminate you in any way, you must answer.”

Burdick refused to answer, they took him to a federal judge, the judge ordered him to answer, he refused to answer, he was found in contempt, and the case went to the Supreme Court in 1915. United States v Burdick. US v Burdick, the court said Mr. Burdick is right, he should not be held in contempt, he should be immediately freed from jail because Mr. Burdick has every right in the world to refuse this pardon from Woodrow Wilson, because acceptance of a pardon is an acknowledgement of guilt. Still the law. That US v Burdick is a case that I had the privilege of going through in much, much more detail with the President of the United States, in Washington, D.C., Jerry Ford and subsequently, the former president in California.

When I was sent to California by President Ford, one of the three tasks that he assigned to me was: I want to be certain that Richard Nixon understands Burdick. Richard Nixon understands that he can refuse this pardon, and there I cannot force him to accept it. And that Richard Nixon, if he does accept the pardon, the Ford White House’s position - with respect to his acceptance, will be that Mr. Nixon’s acceptance was an acknowledgement of guilt. It was one of the three tasks.

That was difficult out in San Clemente to quiet this man down who had a lot of anxiety at the moment, didn’t like talking about himself being pardoned, didn’t like that at all, interrupted a half a dozen times in the narrative of the case. Said things like, “How are the Redskins going to do this year?” Wanted to talk about anything other than… you really have to understand this, you really have to understand. I really wanted to be able to say to Jerry Ford, in truth and in candor, that I explained Burdick to Nixon and he really did understand it. And I feel that way today, that Nixon understood that he didn’t have to accept that pardon. If Jerry Ford is going to give you a pardon, and it will be across the board for everything that happened during your presidency, during that time period, you have an absolute right to refuse it. Your lawyer is right outside, he’ll tell you the same thing. Jack Miller will tell you the same thing. But if you do accept it, Jack will tell you what the implications of accepting that are, that it’s a bar against any federal prosecution during the period covered by the pardon, and that your acceptance is an acknowledgement of guilt.

Smith: But from Nixon’s standpoint that’s a blanket acknowledgement of guilt. You don’t even know what you’re, in effect, pleading to. At that stage of the game, particularly if you’re in Nixon’s shoes, because so often it’s seen from the other viewpoint. But if you’re in Nixon’s shoes with all of the emotional strain and trauma that you describe, from his standpoint, he is, in effect, surrendering any realistic claim he could make subsequently that, “I didn’t do it.” Because you don’t even really know what you are being charged with. It’s a kind of blanket acknowledgement, isn’t it?

Becker: I hear what you are saying. Let me change your question a little bit, because you are usually exactly right on line, but consider this from Jerry Ford’s view. At the very least, Richard Nixon knows what he did every morning that he was president of the United States and every day. And at the very least, he knows when and if he violated the law, but we don’t know that. Consider the darkness Jerry Ford is operating in. Is there something out there that the special prosecutor has never even touched?

Smith: That’s what makes this so fascinating in ways that I don’t think have been explored before. Because the fact of the matter is, you have two people, not only on different planets, [but] in different universes, each groping their way in the dark in some ways. That’s what makes this, to me, so fascinating and you’re the bridge.

Becker: Thank you, but you’re right. And at times, before I left Washington and went to San Clemente to discuss this matter, Ford and I talked about maybe should we restrict this to the articles of impeachment that were voted on by committee in the House. Or should we go broader, and if we go broader, what are we buying into? What don’t we know?

Smith: Which is presumably why it became all the more important to get as explicit an acknowledgement of guilt and remorse, for lack of a better word.

Becker: Yes, contrition.
Smith: From Nixon. Contrition. But at the same time, in some ways, it’s the worst possible moment to be asking Nixon to rationally weigh his own conduct. You’re right – it’s one thing to say he knew every morning what he did, but you know better than anyone that people have all sorts of rationalizations or convenient lapses of memory – he didn’t know what else was on those tapes. You know what I mean? Plus, the ingrained refusal to acknowledge what seemed to everyone obvious, up until the end. And presumably he takes that mindset with him to San Clemente and now it’s reinforced, because he’s sitting there in a cloister, stewing with Ron Ziegler telling him, “Mr. President, either you didn’t do anything wrong or…” The traditional way that people look at this is in a sort of almost antiseptic kind of…

People look at things from the outside and through their own interests and fail to immerse themselves in the very uncertainties, the murkiness, the motives, the fluidity of this situation on both sides.

Becker: Indeed. And it’s not altogether black and white in that there are tapes, and there are statutes, and I was recently taken back somewhat. I saw that Nixon-Frost movie and I didn’t remember Frost being as aggressive as the film made him. But what I did remember, though, is my conversation with Richard Nixon on this, to the point of confrontation at certain levels. And I had transcripts of the tapes there with me during my meetings with Nixon. I said, “When you said this about the CIA, that you were going to use the CIA, that’s an act of obstruction of justice. Let me read the Obstruction statute. Anything that frustrates the smooth or the clear administration of justice, these are criminal acts. These are chargeable, criminal acts.”

Smith: So you had to argue with him.

Becker: Confront him with his own words on the tape transcripts.

Smith: By, in effect, legal necessity, for lack of a better word, or justification for getting an explicit statement acknowledging his responsibility. It wasn’t just politics.

Becker: Oh, no.
Smith: It was the legal rationale.

Becker: You’re absolutely right. The conversation I just described would have been under the umbrella of getting the statement of acceptance. “Because what should Nixon say? What can Nixon say? Nixon initially wanted to talk about the staff didn’t do their job…” I said, “Mr. President, we’re not talking about that. We’re talking about your acts, you need to acknowledge your acts that are on these tape transcripts. If no other, acts that are on these tape transcripts that show that you considered, took steps, were prepared to proceed with frustrating the administration of justice in this.”

Smith: Is it possible that he was simply, at that stage - and you know better than I what his mental state was, his emotional state - that he was simply in massive denial?

Becker: I’ve described him in the past as being an individual who had a deep sense of depression. He struck me as being deeply, deeply depressed. The elevation from the presidency to his then resigned status occurred so quickly. Jack Miller, who was a talented lawyer, represented Nixon, understood this very well. Jack Miller made it clear to me and told me that he made it clear to his client that this was a wise and proper thing for him to do. To accept the pardon and the legal implications of it as well.

Smith: What was the price of the pardon? It’s one thing to go out there and have your lawyer say you should do this. Was there ever, in fact, a quid pro quo, that unless you do X, there will be no pardon? Was that implied?

Becker: That was more than implied. The first two days in San Clemente, nothing was accomplished at all. The Nixon staff wanted to talk about a pardon, I don’t want to talk about the pardon, I want to talk about the deed of gift that he’s going to sign over to GSA, which we’re using as a holding device, until Congress can act.

Smith: By that time there had been some decision reached, at least internally, about the papers and tapes. Was that part of the larger deal?
Becker: The internal decision was: The Ford White House was not going to send to California, or give to Richard Nixon any of the original record papers, and tapes accumulated during the Nixon presidency. And I had with me a Ford White House prepared deed of gift from Richard Nixon to Art Sampson, a GSA administrator, containing Nixon’s waiver of all ownership interest in the property, reserving Nixon’s rights to write memoirs with copies of the property. This deed of trust is viewed by President Ford, Phil Buchen and I as a little more than the holding device until we can get Congress acts on presidential papers. President Ford told me that he quietly spoke to Tip O’Neill, he’s spoken to this one about it, and we’re going to get an act and it’s going to be retroactive to Richard Nixon.

Smith: Providing for the disposition of the Nixon papers and tapes.

Becker: Providing for governmental disposition.

Smith: You said, the first two days, that’s what they wanted to talk about.

Becker: The first two days nothing was accomplished.

Smith: Did you see him?

Becker: I saw him briefly the first two days. And what I’m getting are drafts of two paragraphs, statements of acceptance. The drafts were just nonsense.

Smith: Did you have a sense of who was writing these?

Becker: Ziegler was writing.

Smith: Was Ziegler the gatekeeper?

Becker: Ziegler was finagling into everything. My impression is that he was not getting along well with Miller and Miller is kind of not happy with having Ziegler’s sort of biting at his cuff every time. But the early statements said things to the effect of “the White House staff made serious mistakes,” or “the White House,” or “we,” and there is nothing of an acknowledgement by Mr. Nixon of his improper acts. And I would say, “This is not a statement of acceptance. This is a political statement issued by a politician about the people that worked for him.” But more important than that, I wasn’t getting anywhere on the tapes and the records. Ziegler (and I assume Nixon’s) position was “We still want the records. We’d like to have the pardon, we’ll give you this statement, but forget this deed of trust. We want our records and tapes. We know by custom and tradition it’s ours.”

The property was valuable as well, Richard. Some of that had an archival value of millions of dollars in terms of correspondence with heads of state and other unique historical reference. The tapes alone had an enormous value.

Smith: Were you reporting back to the president?

Becker: Yes. Night two I went back to a secure phone and called President Ford and reported to him. I said there is no interest whatsoever in waiving ownership on the records and tapes. And they are adamant and I’m getting that from Ziegler and Ziegler is repeating Nixon. I’m not getting it from Miller. I’m getting it from Ziegler, which says something.

Smith: Well, it can be off the record, because, by the way, we’ll give you a transcript and you can extrapolate.

Becker: I wanted you to know that twenty, twenty-five years later, in litigation, John Dean and Maureen Dean sue St. Martin’s Press for the publication of Silent Coup. A section of the book subscribes a far more detailed role of John Dean in the Watergate break in then is generally accepted by the public.

Smith: The break in, not the cover up?

Becker: The break in. Which litigation Dean never won, it was settled. But during that period, when I was representing the authors and St. Martin’s Press was involved as a co-defendant – Gordon Liddy was a co-defendant because he had promoted the book as well on his radio show – we deposed a lot of people. One of the people we interviewed was Ron Ziegler, and I asked Ron Ziegler questions about the book and words that were attributed to him in the book and so forth. And during the course of a Zeigler interview, he volunteered the following: that when I was boarding a plane at Andrews going to California, Al Haig was on the phone with Ron Ziegler. “Benton Becker is coming out there. He wants a statement of acceptance, he’s, in effect, got a pardon in his hand — that Ford would issue a pardon if Ford got a letter of acceptance, and Becker’s got a deed of trust whereby Nixon waives ownership interest. Tell President Nixon he does not have to sign that deed of trust. Ford will give a pardon without it.”

And Richard, I’m telling you, for two days, of course I didn’t know this then, I didn’t know about these conversations. Ron Ziegler described three such conversations. And Ziegler said, “I thought it was perfectly appropriate. I am the chief of staff to the former President…” Incidentally, I was present when Jerry Ford was told about that and he was really very angry about that.

Smith: When was he told about that?

Becker: During that same period, twenty-five years later.

Smith: Long afterward. He didn’t know, obviously, until then.

Becker: No, no, many years. So, the second night I called and said, “Nothing is happening. Nothing is happening here. They are just adamant, they are not moving one inch on the papers and tapes.” And Ford would say something very forcefully, “He’s a son of a gun,” or something like that or more so. President Ford said, “What do you think?” I said, “I’d like to really lay into them tomorrow and tell them I’m leaving and the hell with it all.” He said, “Do it. Do it, give them everything you’ve got.”

Smith: Do you think — and I realize that maybe this just calls for supposition — do you think Ford was prepared, in fact, to walk away from the pardon?

Becker: Yes. Yes. The next day I went back to the negotiations and nothing is happening. I said, “I tell you what, fellas, give the Air Force colonel on the phone that’s involved with the plane that we came out here on — the White House plane.” I said, “I’m going home at two o’clock today and the hell with this. I’m not sitting here another minute. I’m going back and I can tell you this,” and I turned to Jack Miller. I said, “Jack, I can tell you this. There will be no more conversations, none at all about pardons. Forget it. It’s off the table, it’s done, it’s over. I’m leaving. You guys don’t want to talk about records, papers and tapes going to the American people, and they own it and Richard Nixon waiving ownership. It’s over and done with. I’m leaving and I’ll leave this afternoon at two o’clock.” I said, “I’m not going to sit here anymore. And I want you to know, I spoke to the President last night and I’m doing this with his authority, and you can tell President Nixon that.” And I was really serious.

Miller reacted to it as if – he struck me as a very bright guy - struck me as, “I was waiting for this to happen, I knew it was going to happen, I was wondering when it was going to happen, how much patience you had, Benton.” And Ziegler had exactly the opposite reaction – “Oh, go to hell…get a plane, what do we care.” I said, “Goodbye.” Miller said, “I’m going to talk to the president,” meaning Nixon. “Go have some lunch, go take a walk or do something,” and came back 30 minutes later and he said, “We’re prepared to talk about the deed of trust. We had a couple of things we didn’t like here,” and they wanted to tinker with it. And we tinkered with that for a day or two. Nixon wanted to have executive privilege to be able to prohibit journalists from taking some of the tapes that he, the former president, could assert some executive privilege to prevent the journalists from getting them. This is out of the question. Executive privilege can only be asserted by the occupant of the White House. But, again, they never knew what we knew secretly in Washington, and that is, this is an important document and we want this, we want this controversy over where the tapes are going to be. And we want the American people to know that Jerry Ford was concerned enough to protect the papers and records of Richard Nixon for posterity. But nobody really knew, except that we were trying to accomplish this goal and the deed of trust, would serve as the government’s right to retain and own the Nixon’s records and tapes while the legislative process proceeded legislatively.

Smith: Why do you think to this day, that, I’m not sure this message really ever got out.

Becker: Why do you think they gave in on it?

Smith: Well, no. I’ll tell you, to the layman, when I think about Nixon’s tapes and all that, for some reason I just think that Ford was prepared at one point to send them to San Clemente.
Becker: Oh, no, it was a gut reaction – I’m president, I’ll get staff…everybody on staff says I should do it, maybe that’s the right thing to do. Oh, then somebody else gives him another thought.

Smith: His initial reaction, then you and others, in effect, talked him out of it and he takes the position that you described. Let’s just clear up because, then what was the business about the trucks appearing?

Becker: Okay – let me make this very clear – I thought you were asking me this question and I want to answer this on the record. If I had gone home, and that would have been the end of it, would Richard Nixon have gotten the pardon? I don’t think so. As a matter of fact, I’m pretty confident that he wouldn’t have, based on the telephone conversation that night. “You do it. The hell with this.”

Smith: Could the story have leaked?

Becker: There was no leak. When Miller and I arrived and we had a cup of coffee at a bar somewhere, a breakfast bar, and some reporter came over, he recognized Jack. He came over to Jack, “Oh, Jack, what are you doing out here?” And I just walked away. There were no leaks that I know of, nothing I ever saw in print, ever, on it. It was a well-kept secret. I didn’t tell my law partners, I didn’t tell my wife. I told her, “I’m going to San Clemente, I’ve got some important matters that deal with President Nixon.” I just didn’t talk about it.

Smith: We’ll continue on this. Before we finish I want to discuss the trucks, because it’s the third chapter of this.

Becker: After President Ford had made the decision not to send the records and tapes to Nixon, after the Saxbe meeting and before I traveled to San Clemente to so-called “truck incident” occurred. We sought various approaches that would result in government ownership and government retention of the Nixon records and tapes. (Legislation, judicial, etc.). In the mind of Jerry Ford the issue of the Nixon records and tapes became linked with the issue of pardon. The linkage of the records, papers and tapes resolution and the pardon. That was the linkage that he foresaw. Even though he called the pardon publicly, an unconditional pardon. He referred to it that way, in my opinion, it was not unconditional. All parties involved recognized this.

Smith: Would he have been politically better advised to have called it a conditional pardon.

Becker: Oh, I think one can make really a good case that there were a lot of things he could have done politically before, during selective prior notice, trial balloons, all kinds of ways. Politics is not my bag. Probably the answer is probably yes.

About a week after the presidential meeting, wherein, it was ordered that no records or tapes would be sent to Nixon, none of the 900+ boxes in the EOB were to leave the White House, I was walking from the White House across the little short parking lot that separates the White House from the EOB for some purpose, and there was a truck being loaded by enlisted men under the command of a colonel. It was an open truck – it had sides on it, but it was not totally enclosed – and I could see what was being placed in it. I couldn’t help noticing the truck, it was directly in that parking area. The enlisted men were placing the EOB boxes of Nixon’s records and tapes on that truck. The boxes with the records and tapes were immediately recognizable to me because I had observed them previously in storage in the EOB. I approached the Colonel supervising the packing of the truck. At closer inspection, there was no question, whatsoever in my mind that the boxes being packed in the truck were the EOB Nixon records and tapes boxes. I said, “Colonel, are these the boxes from the third floor of the EOB containing the Nixon administration records and tapes.” He said, “Yes, sir. They are.” I said, “Well, what are you doing?” He said, “We’re taking them to Andrews Air Force Base. We’re shipping them out today.” I said, “Someone gave you that instruction?” He said, “Yes, General Haig gave me that instruction.” I said, “Are you aware that President Ford has issued instruction that these boxes shall not leave the White House?” He said, “Sir, I take my orders from General Haig.” I said, “Very well.”

So I recognized two Secret Service agents at the gate at the White House and I went over to them. They knew who I was and we chatted for a while. Without giving them a reason, I said, “Do you see that truck?” I said, “I’m going in to see the President of the United States, I’m going to talk to him about that truck. That truck cannot, under any circumstances, leave these White House grounds. And I’m leaving it up to you to see to it that that truck does not leave here.” I said, “I don’t care if you have to shoot the tires out, that truck does not leave here.” He said, “Yes, sir. You may be assured of that.”

I turned around and went back into the White House, went upstairs to the Oval Office. The president was alone and I walked in, I was allowed to walk in immediately. “I’m sorry to interrupt you, but…” and I told him what I just observed and my conversation with the colonel. And before I was finished – I mean, he had a telephone in his hand and his face was as red as a beet – “Get Haig in here,” – get Haig in here. He directed telephonically Haig came in. President Ford said to me, “Tell Al what you just told me.” The calmest, coolest Al Haig you ever saw, feigning surprise, said, “Yeah, the damn colonels, they just don’t know anything. They’re so stupid. I’ll take care of that colonel.” Haig quickly, immediately, put all the blame on the colonel. Haig said, “Of course, I never ordered that.” But as sure as I’m alive, those records would have left the White House. President Ford knew it was an act, that no colonel would undertake such a task without orders from a higher authority and that Haig apparently had personal reasons (beyond service to Nixon) to relocate the records and tapes in California with the former Nixon.

And it wasn’t too long after that, that the decision was made – we’ve got to find someplace for Al Haig that’s far away from the White House, that doesn’t require Senate confirmation. There weren’t a lot a places, but we found NATO.

The story I was going to tell you about, the one with Henry Kissinger, was a couple of months later. You can see this in some of the early photographs and later photographs in the Oval Office. A couple of months later I was having lunch with the chief of the Secret Service, his name was Knight, and just intellectually, I was asking him about how the Nixon White House taping system worked. He almost knocked me off the chair when he said, “Mr. Becker, I don’t have to tell you about it. I can show it to you.” I said, “Show it to me?” He said, “Sure, it’s all still there. It’s all in place.” I said, “What!?”
And we got up and took me my downstairs to a room below the Oval Office and there it was. There was a room with all the Nixon taping system in it.

He said, “Of course, we’ve turned all this off since President Ford took office.” I said, “Are you kidding?” And he said, “It can go back on again.” And then, rather innocently, he said, “You know, those Nixon microphones are still in the Oval Office.” I said, “Where?” He said, “Well, there’s a couple in the walls, and there are two in the president’s desk.” I said, “Come with me, come with me.” And as we walked out of that room, I saw and grabbed a screwdriver. I knocked on the Oval Office door and Henry was seated on the side of the president’s desk. I said, “Excuse me for interrupting you – but – I’m with Mr. Knight of the Secret Service who has just told me that the Nixon microphones that were installed in the Oval Office are still here.” Richard, you never saw Henry Kissinger move so fast in your life, shroom – he was out. Mr. Knight and I entered. President Ford was mad as hell about that, and I said, “There’s two microphones in your desk.” If you look at an early picture of the Ford Administration Oval Office (first 3 months), on both sides of the fireplace you will observe brass light fixtures.

Smith:  Sconces?

Becker: Built-in to the wall – light fixtures built-in to the wall. And Knight informed us, “There’s a microphone behind each one of those brass lamps.” Ford said, “I’m going to get a haircut. You get those things out of here,” or harsh words to that effect. I pulled it free from the wall and put my hand in and said, “You sure there’s a microphone in here?” Knight put his hand in and pulled out a microphone and did the same thing with the second lamp. We inspected one of the brass lamps. The microphones in the president’s desk were retrieved after the President returned to the Oval Office. But I left a hole about the size of a tennis ball in the wall on both sides of the fireplace in the Oval Office. What do you when you have a hole in the wall in your office? You get a big picture and you cover it. And that’s what they did. So if you look at the year two of the Ford presidency, you’ll see over the fireplace there are pictures from the National Gallery of Art and where earlier, the brass lamps were there. But we digress, right?
Smith: No, no, wonderful stories. It’s interesting, when you talk about – I realize politics wasn’t your thing – but for years and years, of course, there were people, even when people came around to saying “he did the right thing, but there must have been a more adroit way of doing it.” People talk about a trial balloon. Mel Laird said he had a plan.

Becker: Mel Laird said that?

Smith: Oh, yeah. Mel Laird is saying he claimed he talked to Ford right before the pardon and said, “Don’t do anything, Jerry, until I get back in town.” His plan: he was going to get a delegation, bipartisan delegation from both Houses of Congress to come down to the White House and ask the president to pardon Nixon.

Becker: Oh, I understand now. Never heard that.

Smith: Now, the problem with that…

Becker: But that’s part of that big package, the pardon decision could have been done more politically.

Smith: But, the thing is, I was much younger then, we were all much younger then, but, if you put yourself back in the supercharged atmosphere of that day, including that first press conference where Ford got so angry because all the questions were about Nixon. I find it hard to imagine how realistically you could have had a trial balloon that would not have been shot down before it got above the trees. People say he could have prepared the country. Well, how could you prepare the country? If you talked about the possibility of a pardon, you would have drawn all of this – you might have made it so radioactive. It’s almost as if you could only do it…maybe there was a more adroit way to do it, but, for example, we’ve been told that Jaworski was indicating that it would be two years till…

Becker: That’s right. That was Leon long before the pardon, and he made it very clear. He said two things: one) grand jury is prepared to indict Nixon for obstruction, prepare to do it; and two) that if they do, it will be at least two years before Leon would walk into a courtroom to prosecute this man. And Jaworski was talking about pre-trial publicity and, of course you remember, the television coverage of the House Judiciary Committee hearings during the impeachment hearings, where witness after witness, and night after night. That’s what he was talking about. I think what you just said is exactly what Jerry Ford said, because I believe, I’ve heard that comment you made in his presence before, namely that, “You could have done it more politically intelligently,” and so forth. And his answer has always been, “What could I have done? Whatever I would have done would have polarized and polarized and polarized.”

Smith: Were there debates in the Oval Office before the pardon? Were there discussions with a Buchen, or ….

Becker: Yes.

Smith: Were you present for…

Becker: Yes, I was present. I wouldn’t characterize them as debates at the stage where I was listening to them. But this was before I went to San Clemente. And the position that was espoused to me, before I went to San Clemente, was, “I’m not prepared to sign a pardon. I will give favorable consideration to a pardon, if the deed of trust is signed happens.” It was always presented to me that way.

Smith: Okay.

Becker: But I do recall being at one of those meetings with Al Haig and Bob Hartmann, and Phil, and Bob Hartmann said, very clearly, he said - this is the end of August, early September – “We have a congressional election coming up in two months,” (the ’74 congressional election). He said, “Pardoning Nixon is not going to be helpful on a congressional election. It’s going to hurt, hurt us at the House.” There are some key Senate races that he mentioned. He said, “If you are going to do this, if you are thinking about doing this, for political reasons, you ought to put it off until after the November elections.”

Up until that point in time, as I said, I know I had satisfied him legally on his presidential authority and powers to issue a pardon, but he’d always been, in my conversations, had always been, “I will give favorable consideration toward.” No guarantee of it. And what he said to Hartmann at that meeting is something that has resonated with me, and I remember him saying it very clearly. He said, almost verbatim, as if to look at this room, he said, “For the past five years, too many, far too many decisions have been made in this room based on politics. This has nothing to do with politics. If I decide to give a pardon, it will be because it’s the right thing to do.”

That’s exactly what he said, and, you know, you can’t argue with that. It’s hard to argue with that. “I don’t want to hear about politics. I don’t want to...I’m going to do if it’s the right thing to do.” I remember that. I remember that Ford gesture, because I got a Nixon gesture in California when I was departing. When Nixon and I finished our lengthy conversation, Nixon had signed the deed of trust, we’d agreed on language and the letter of acceptance, and...actually I had left. It was over. I had the deed of trust in my briefcase. Al Haig’s parting words four days earlier to me in Washington were, “You will never get Richard Nixon to sign that deed of trust.” Of course, I didn’t know Haig would be telephoning Ron Ziegler – that he was going to backdoor me.

But I had left – I walked out of that facility – it was single story – walked out of that facility. It was a long walkway from the front door to the car that was going to take me to El Toro, the airport that we flew into. And Miller was with me, was flying with me, and we walked out and I felt really good about this for President Ford. And literally I had my hand on the door of the car to get in the car, when Ziegler opened the front door, maybe back twenty or thirty feet on the walkway, and hollered to me, “Mr. Becker, Mr. Becker, don’t leave. The president wants to see you again.”

I had just been in the office with Nixon for an hour, an hour and a half or something like that. My initial reaction was, Nixon has changed his mind. I walked back in and I made some gesture like, are you coming in too, Mr. Ziegler? “No, no, he just wants to see you.” So, I went in – that’s the way it had been before Nixon was standing behind the desk, and of course he had a coat and tie on, and he said, “I asked Mr. Ziegler to ask you to come back before you left.” He said words to the effect of, “You’ve been a gentleman. You haven’t been a bully...been a lot of bullies lately,” or words to that effect. And I said to myself, what’s going on here? He said, “I wanted to give you something, a remembrance.” I said, “That’s not necessary, Mr. President.” I just, frankly, wanted to get the hell out of there. That’s what I really wanted. And he reached down in his desk drawer, and he opened the drawer and he took out a little two by four box, and he looked at the box, a white box, and he said, “I want you to have this. There aren’t any more. This is the last one. In fact, Pat had to find this for me in my jewelry box.” He said, “I don’t have any more, I don’t have any more.” And he was standing and he gave this kind of sweeping gesture, as if to say, look at this office. It wasn’t a very large room, as if to say that. And the walls were not adorned, the way you might expect a former president’s decor. There was a flag behind the desk. He said, referring to the small box, “This is the last one. They took it all away from me. They took it all away from me.”

I could feel my heart pound with that, and I said something like, “What we’ve done here today is a good thing for the American people. It’s good for history and our children, and our children’s children will know more about your presidency. It’s a good thing that you’ve done, and you should be very proud of that Mr. President.” Shook hands, and left.

Flew back, directly flew back and went straight to the White House, somewhere about eight o’clock at night, it was a Saturday night, I think – maybe about seven o’clock at night. Went up to the residence and one of the first things I did, I still had the small box containing the Nixon presidential cufflinks and the Nixon signed deed of trust. The cufflinks were a presidential seal with his name on the back. I gave them to President Ford and I said, “This is for the Ford museum, someday there will be a Ford museum.” He said, “You hang on to them.”

President Ford and I went through the entire San Clemente story, what happened in the last three days. He called Jerry terHorst in and told terHorst to notify the media, he’s going to have an announcement at twelve noon the next day. He told terHorst what the announcement would be, but he said, “Don’t tell the media. I’m going to announce a pardon to Nixon.” He said, “Benton, come in early and take care of the coordination of the statement of acceptance?” I said, “Yes, sir.” I called Ziegler and told him it was scheduled for twelve noon tomorrow – I told him I would call him in the morning to confirm all questions. Bill Casselman, who was a lawyer in the staff, good, very bright guy, was formally the GSA, general counsel. I asked Bill to have Art Sampson at the White House at eight o’clock in the morning so Sampson could be the second signatory on the deed of trust. And with that, I caught up with my wife who was at a friend’s house for dinner that night.

Got up real early the next morning and went in, was in the White House by 7:30-7:45, and called Ziegler very early. Ziegler said, “I’m glad you got me so early, we’ve got some changes in the Nixon statement of acceptance.” I said, “What do you mean, you’ve got some changes?” And we were back to the word “I” in the statement of acceptance. “I” was deleted again, and we were back to “the staff.” Typical, typical – I said, “This damn thing at twelve o’clock will be cancelled in a minute.” I said, “I’m going to call you in one hour, I want to see the original statement of acceptance wired to me. Otherwise, Jerry Ford is going to cancel this damn thing. I guarantee you.” And so, it came back the way it was, the language we’d agreed to. And the big firestorm followed the announcement.

Smith: Worse that he expected?

Becker: I think much worse than he expected. Much worse that all of us expected.

Smith: There is a story – there were congressmen who were calling that day telling him he did the right thing, and then going out and telling the cameras that he did the wrong thing.

Becker: Is that right?

Smith: Yeah.

Becker: Well, you know about that Kennedy speech on the floor. Ted Kennedy gives him hell, gives him real hell on the floor of the Senate. Ted Kennedy, to his credit, twenty years later, gave the Profile in Courage award to President Ford. At that ceremony Kennedy stood and announced the award to President Ford. Kennedy read from his speech on the floor, delivered twenty years earlier and announced publicly “I want everybody in this room to know I was wrong about the Nixon pardon. Jerry Ford did the right thing and I was wrong.”

Smith: It was an extraordinary moment.

Becker: Yes, it really is.

Smith: And isn’t it fortunate that the president lived long enough to participate in it.

Becker: Wonderful.

Smith: I assume these events must have forever after colored any relationship he had with Nixon.

Becker: I’m not sure I understand your question.

Smith: His relationship – President Ford’s relationship with Nixon must never have been the same after this.

Becker: He did go out to California. He was in California and he visited when the phlebitis had hospitalized Nixon.

Smith: Which, again, his political advisors begged him not to do.

Becker: Right. But I think you’re right. I haven’t thought about that, Richard, over the years. But I cannot envision them in any social environment other than a funeral, a presidential funeral, from that moment on. That’s an interesting point you’re making. I have a picture of presidential funerals with multiple presidents standing there altogether, but…

Smith: I think towards the end of his life, he would say, “Nixon never thanked me.” So it existed on both sides. You could understand Nixon – first of all, resenting the fact that he didn’t get his tapes and papers right away, in his own head saying, “I made this guy. I made him president.” Stu Spencer had a fascinating twist on this.
Becker: But the other thing was, I thought. Try to put yourself in the position of Richard Nixon, and what would bother you and what would not bother you, and so forth. I think what would bother me, I’d been vice president for eight years and president for five years, Senator and House member, and devoted my life to all of it, I’d be kind of embarrassed, the world can see the way I talk like a sailor, or I talk like a men’s locker room, particularly with Erlichman or Haldeman. And the things they say about women, and the things they say about African-Americans, it’s just shocking. That, I think, was something in the back of his mind – I’ve always thought that was in the back of Nixon’s mind and made the papers, records, and tapes much more difficult for the transcript for the government. Nixon wanted to be able to object. If somebody wanted to study the papers or tapes, Nixon wanted to be able to prevent it.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw President Ford?

Becker: Let’s see. Well the last time I saw him at a board function was at the last dinner we had out in California. Do you recall that?

Smith: Right.

Becker: But, we would frequently speak.

Smith: That’s the one where Phelps announced that he was Deep Throat.

Becker: Yes, yes. The President was quite thin then. I think he passed on within six to eight months after that. I can’t think of her name, I should think of her name, the woman who was the final chief of staff.

Smith: Penny Circle.

Becker: Penny. Penny called me a couple of times and told me to try to find the time to come out to California. And I didn’t quite get the message, I didn’t quite get it, what she was really saying, and so I didn’t see him privately. But we did have telephone conversations.

Smith: What do you think about the Tom DeFrank book? There’s an argument; there are people who believe that Ford knew exactly what he was doing and that this was part of his legacy, that he was getting all this on the record and understood that it would be out there, be part of the record, including some of his criticisms of the current administration, etc., etc. And there are other people who believe that, well, he was a little naïve and that he couldn’t have foreseen that some of these conversations would quite find their way into the record.

Becker: I think the public perception of him in many ways is erroneous. He was a lot brighter than a lot of the media and the historians give him credit for. And certainly knowledgeable of the federal government and how the federal government operated. But if the suggestion there is that there was any kind of deal with Nixon at all…

Smith: No, I mean on the Tom DeFrank book. Was he, in effect, taken advantage of, or was he actually the one who wanted to get this out on the record?

Becker: Oh, I think the openness of Jerry Ford is to get it on the record, by all means. I don’t think he was taken advantage of at all. I remember once during his vice presidency, pointing out to him that something he already knew and that is, you were the only person in the executive branch in these two buildings that Richard Nixon can’t fire. So you really don’t have to do these speeches, you don’t have to do them. This was totally swimming against the stream of the team player. And President Ford said, “Yeah, you’re right. I hadn’t thought about that.”

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: When did you first come to the White House?

Monkman: When did I first come to the White House? I came in early 1967, sort of at the end of the Johnson administration to work in the curator’s office.

Smith: We all have seen the pictures, the demonstrators and everything else – was there a sense of an embattled climate?

Monkman: Yes, and I think more so even into 1968. In early ’67 there wasn’t, but certainly in ’68. I remember standing in the Usher’s office, looking out at a protest in Lafayette Park, and I remember there were some agents, some Secret Service agents and people there. And they said, “Oh, those Commie students…” And I said, “Well, they could be your children,” because I was of that generation. I was only twenty-five or something. I was of the generation of a lot of those people out on the street. So, yeah, I did become more – I felt that even after 9/11, but it became more insular, I would say. And especially with the huge demonstrations, when the buses were surrounding the White House with the Vietnam protests and things.

Smith: Now, that’s I think in ’69 with the moratorium – there was October and November of ’69.

Monkman: Yeah, that was Nixon then.

Smith: We’ve seen footage, in fact, we aired footage as part of the C-Span series. I think there were paratroops, literally under the old EOB.

Monkman: We had Army troops under that passageway in back. Our office was right opposite the diplomatic reception room on the ground floor, and there is a long corridor underground for the kitchens and where the more utilitarian spaces are. And there were, at times, even after Martin Luther King died in that spring of ’68, we had troops stationed under there and we’d walk out of the office and there would be these armed troops right there.

And even during tour hours people were concerned that there would be protests in the House. And it wasn’t just the war; it was the Center for Creative Non-Violence, which was a homeless shelter here. They would literally come in the House with – and this was long before security magnetometers and things like that. But I remember one time people came in with vials – we didn’t know it until they started opening them up and throwing them – but whether it was blood or red paint, or whatever it was, they would be in the State Dining Room on the tour and they would open these vials and all this red fluid would come out. Or they would bring in cockroaches and let them go. So we had to train the housekeeping staff on what to do if some of these situations occurred. But, yeah, it was a big time of protests. Huge.

I stopped telling people where I worked. People would say, “What do you do?” I’d say, “Well, I’m a curator in a historic house,” and they’d say, “Oh, where?” And I would say, “Well, I work for the National Parks Service.” I was young and you’d go to parties and everybody took their political things out on you. If I said I worked for the Johnson or the Nixon White House – whew – I just got every bit of verbiage that people wanted to expend. So I stopped telling people where I worked.

Smith: Was it different or basically pretty much the same in terms of people projecting on you whether it was the Johnson administration or the Nixon – was it just different ends of the political spectrum?

Monkman: Yeah. I mean, everybody hated the war, and I think it was very – toward the end of ’68, Johnson was hated, Nixon was hated when he came in – I think the Nixon thing was even worse after Kent State. When that happened after Kent State, even the more moderate people were really upset by the Cambodia bombing and the Kent State thing. And I had a sister going to Kent State, going to graduate school at the time, so I got really upset.
But, we had White House police and Secret Service around, plus then all the political people supporting the issue of the war and this and that. So it was very hard to make those transitions. If you’re in a different world or if you’re among other people who think so strongly about issues, you just kind of stop talking about work, completely - except for in the White House. We’d talk about it to ourselves. I would never talk about it to friends, even close friends.

Smith: Right. I think it is hard today to make people understand what it was like…

Monkman: During that period.

Smith: It’s so aberrational.

Monkman: The fierceness of opinion. And then even during Watergate we watched the newspapers every day. But even within the White House during the Nixon time, when those Congressional hearings started taking place, whew, everybody had an opinion about something.

Smith: Did people watch?

Monkman: We did have television; we did. We turned on the television to watch the hearings, I do remember that. Oh yes, people were glued to their television sets, even if they were little black and whites, or whatever.

Smith: I have to ask you before we move on: did you have any contact with the Johnsons?

Monkman: Yes. In fact, some of my best friends are still people I met in the Johnson administration. One was a secretary to Mrs. Johnson, who worked with Ashton Gonella, her personal secretary. And Bess Abell. I keep in touch with a lot, and Liz Carpenter. All those people, all their staffs, too - their press and their social staff. I think because I was very young and more impressionable at the time, and they were very easy people to work with. Even though people talk about President Johnson, Mrs. Johnson was extremely easy to work with.

Smith: Everyone loved Lady Bird.

Monkman: I remember years later I was down in Texas at this – maybe you went to some of those, those American Presidency conferences, the presidential libraries and the Parks people did. She invited us up to the ranch. So I’d gone though and looked at the house and I was kind of late. I guess everybody had gone down by the river to the picnic or something, and all of a sudden this young agent called me over to this van. They were taking Mrs. Johnson down to this picnic and she said, “Oh, Betty, come have a ride with us.” She never forgot people, and she was just so thoughtful. Very thoughtful.

Whereas I remember other people coming, like carpenters, and people coming in who worked at nights or worked on the weekends, talking about Johnson roaming the house and screaming about the lights being on and all those stories. But Johnson was the first president I ever worked for and boy, he had this physical presence about him. He was tall and he was big, and he just exuded the – I’ve never felt any presence since him having that physical power about the presidency that I did with Johnson. Even though they were as large and everything, but there was just a force about him physically, I think. But I liked their staff a lot and it was just a very, very difficult time.

Smith: One of the main things that most people don’t know about Mrs. Nixon is, she took an enormous interest in assembling historic furnishings for the White House.

Monkman: Oh yeah.

Smith: It’s not a zero-sum game, it’s not to take anything away from Mrs. Kennedy, but…

Monkman: But she did, she put a lot of effort into it, and she supported Clem Conger. He took the bull by the horns and really ran with her support. But she would sit down and write personal, handwritten letters to anybody who donated an object or even funds for a particular project or something. She received them, had their pictures taken, she would even walk them around on tours. There was an architect we worked with from Georgia, Edward Jones. She grew very close to his family – would have them for dinner. She would put herself out for that tremendously, I think. And she was very supportive of all of us.

Smith: It’s a side that the public never really saw.
Monkman: No, and I think they only saw her when she was out in public and she could be a little stiff out in public – reserved and a little maybe watchful. But when she was in the House, and when she trusted you, then she was very amiable to talking and [was] friendly.

Smith: You saw her smoke?

Smith: That’s funny.

Monkman: We knew she smoked, but I really didn’t see her. Up until the early Clinton administration, we had ashtrays all over the White House for parties and receptions and things like that. It was only since the ‘90s that people had to go stand out on the North Portico, and now I’m sure not many people do that to have a cigarette anymore.

But I liked her a lot and I liked Julie a lot, too. She lived there for quite a while, from time to time, she and David. She was very involved with tours for the blind and she would come into the office and want particular information, or what can they touch. Whereas Tricia was distant and removed. She even would put across her bedroom door wires so that she would know if the maids came into her room, or anybody came into her room. She was very, very different than Julie.

Smith: When Agnew resigned – I suppose in retrospect that’s just one more in a series of milestones on the road – but, at the time…

Monkman: And it was all so close in time, too, wasn’t it. I mean, his resignation – what year was that? Was that ’74?

Smith: It was October of ’73 he resigns, and within days, Nixon announces Ford, and then within days comes the Saturday Night Massacre. In the same month of October, you had Agnew resigning on the 10th, Ford was announced on the 12th, and then within ten days came the Massacre. There must have been this sense of events accelerating.
Monkman: Yeah, especially that Saturday Night Massacre. I think I remember that. It was a Saturday night, I remember. It was on the news, we were watching those talk shows with Hugh Sidey and some of those other people. But, boy, yes that was a very traumatic, dramatic time. I don’t remember much about Agnew, actually. I would see him coming or going, but at that time vice presidents didn’t have offices in the West Wing. They had their offices in the EOB. So, unless they were coming over for a meeting or a function or an event, you didn’t see them too often.

Smith: I think you’ve already answered this, but was there a sense of the place under siege during those last months of the Nixon presidency?

Monkman: Oh yes, and it got worse and worse. After that Supreme Court decision about the release of the tapes - I think I was away; that was in July and I came back at the end of July – and it was so tense around there. I would come home at night and my legs would just ache from tension. From being there.

I remember one day, it was a week or so before Nixon was resigning, they decided to go on the Sequoia down the Potomac, and they wanted all the staff to go out and wave goodbye and give support to him. I just couldn’t go out there. I just stayed in my office. They wanted that public support of him. And I remember, even within a day or two before he resigned, and I would see one of Mrs. Nixon’s staff or somebody in the hall, and I would say something about I’m so sorry this is all happening, and they said, “Oh, we’re staying. We’re not going anyplace.” I mean, they did not believe that he was going to resign. And I thought there was just kind of a denial.

Smith: A bubble within a bubble?

Monkman: Like a denial that this could be happening. And I remember we’d have people calling us from all over the country saying, “What’s going on?” as if we...Finally, I think it was the day before he was resigning, one of our operations people who move our furniture said, “Oh, Mrs. Nixon has called for some packing boxes.” And then we knew that they were getting ready. They couldn’t take very much within a day with them, but enough that she could pack up a few things to take when they left the next day. Yeah, it was very tense, very tense. And none of us really knew anything, we really didn’t know. Nobody knew, right, until the last day or so? But, yeah, it was very tense.

Smith: Were any of you consulted – because, of course, this was also the time when the vice presidential residence is about to be – was there any consultation on that?

Monkman: Yes, we went out there. I was thinking that. The first time I ever met Mrs. Ford was in July of that summer. Clem Conger and I went out because they were trying to decide what to do with the Observatory Circle house – the Admiral’s house. And so we walked around with Mrs. Ford and we talked and we discussed whether she could borrow things from the White House storage facility. Mr. Conger still ran the diplomatic reception rooms of the State Department, so he was going to plan to lend some things from there to the vice presidential house.

Smith: I take it the house was furnished, but not necessarily…

Monkman: I think the Admiral had moved out so there were some things there, but it certainly wasn’t set up for them living there, or entertaining there, because I do remember the State Department was going to lend them a dining room table for instance, and things like that. And there were no paintings or works of art. It was kind of a vacant place.

Smith: But it was very clear she assumed they were going to be living there.

Monkman: Oh, yes. And I think we went out there a couple of times because the Navy was involved and so forth, too. She was going to go up to New York and meet with people about fabrics and furniture companies, and this and that. So very clearly, this within less than a month before this all happened, they were still planning that move.

Smith: And there is that famous story the day, I think it was the first of August, or a week before the resignation, the day Haig informs the Vice President about the smoking gun tape. And basically, the message is, it’s only a question of time. And Ford has to go and pretend – he goes with her to look at the house, because if he doesn’t, he knows the press is going to be all over him.

Monkman: Yes, they have to.

Smith: And then, as if that’s not bad enough, and he can’t tell her – they had dinner that evening with Marianna Means, and they couldn’t say anything. It was at midnight when they got back to the house in Alexandria, and she’s going on about the house and he says, “We’re never going to live in that house.” And that was the beginning of the final chapter.

Monkman: Oh, wow. So it was just a week before that he was even aware that the situation was. Well it was very difficult because we knew, like so many of the staff, like Rosemary Woods. She was a very good friend of Rex’s – to see her with that photograph of her trying to reach that tape and so forth. You have to sympathize a lot with the staff, too. Some of them like Rosemary Woods had worked with him since his Senate days or longer, too. I think it really affected a lot of people’s lives after that. There were some people like Steve.…

Smith: Steve Bull.

Monkman: Steve Bull. He was the nicest person, and they would come back for events later on, maybe when Mrs. Nixon’s portrait and the Nixon portrait or something like that, and we’d see some of these staff people. It was good to see that some of them survived and went on with their lives. But then I often thought about some people like that man who ran the re-election committee, who later became a minister.

Smith: Jeb Magruder?

Monkman: Jeb Magruder. He was the most handsome young man. You would see him all the time and would think, “How could he have gotten himself into that mess?” You really see people – I think I became much less judgmental about people, because you really saw them as human beings. And even though these actions took place, you could be sympathetic to them, in a way, too.

Smith: Sure. Well, you develop empathy, at least. Were you in the East Room on the morning of the 8th?
Monkman: I went up there, but the room was packed, it was just packed, and I was standing by the door near the staircase as you walk up the staircase from the ground floor. I couldn’t see anything because there were so many people in there, and a lot of people had to stand. So I went back down to my office and watched it on television because I could see, at least. But I did go out as they were leaving because so many staff were out on the grounds then.

But then it was just after the Nixons left there was this calm, quietness in the house. It was just eerie because all the Nixon staff people had left the residence and the grounds and so forth, and then we were waiting – we knew that the ceremony would take place again – it was at noon or something, it was shortly after noon. But there was this utter emptiness in the house. It was very, very strange. And I remember I’d hoped to go up and see the swearing in, but the police said no, there are only a certain number of people that are going to be allowed to go up. So we didn’t go up. But it was very – I think everybody breathed a sigh of relief, for one thing – I mean that this trauma was literally over with. But it was so emotional, too. Everybody was really drained, I think by that time.

Smith: One thing we’ve heard from several people, variations of a theme – it’s perfectly understandable when you stop and think about it – was after the swearing in there was a receiving line and then I think there was a reception down in the dining room. And you could watch the Nixon people peel off. You can understand it, but that raises a larger question. Just from your observation, how difficult was it to sort of mesh the existing staff with the new people? That must have been a little bit of oil-on-water.

Monkman: Well, not particularly. And I’m more familiar maybe with the East Wing staff than some of the West Wing staff, but I know that there was a State Dinner coming up within a few weeks. Was it the Shah of Iran?

Smith: King Hussein.

Monkman: King Hussein, yeah. And I remember, Mrs. Ford literally had to rely on Mrs. Nixon’s staff. Lucy Winchester was still there. But there is that permanent staff that works there, too in the House, and so they stayed. They would give the support to the incoming family. I think there were some real issues in the West Wing. I mean, some people did leave, and some people gradually left or whatever.

Smith: Rumsfeld – it’s interesting because Rumsfeld, when he came in, pressed the President to clean house much faster. But Ford didn’t want to tarnish the vast majority of the Nixon people. And it’s a fascinating sort of case study in learning to be president. In some ways, Rumsfeld was right. In some ways the good of the country, the good of the presidency requires a certain amount of ruthlessness in this situation, and Ford, being Ford, and being a Congressman and all of that, wasn’t inclined to kick those people out.

Monkman: A lot of them did stay.

Smith: A lot of them were very good, that’s one of the unfortunate hangovers of what happened. We’ve heard over and over again that the Nixon staff was very talented - with obvious exceptions – particularly in policy.

What was your first contact with President Ford?

Monkman: Well, I think I did meet him at the vice president’s – at the Admiral’s house then. I can’t remember exactly when they moved in.

Smith: It was a week after.

Monkman: It took them a while. Exactly.

Smith: They stayed at the house in Alexandria.

Monkman: At least a week, if not a little bit longer, I think.

Smith: And there is a wonderful story. The first day that they moved in, he walks up to the West Wing and there is a Marine saluting, opening the door. And he sticks his hand out and says, “Hi, I’m Jerry Ford, I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?” Isn’t that typical?

Monkman: I think the Fords were much less formal, more casual people than the Nixons. I mean, the Nixons dressed and sat down for dinner every night. Life was just on a different - well there wasn’t that casual family atmosphere.
Smith: Understood. The story has been told by several people that Mrs. Ford, in her first days there, in the morning was walking, I guess on the second floor, and saw some of the staff and said, “Good morning.” And they didn’t reply. Eventually, she went to the usher and said, “Do they not like us?” And it was explained to her that it was just kind of different under the Nixons – you were not encouraged to speak to the first family. But the word went out that it’s different. We heard that they established – particularly the President – very good relations with the permanent staff.

Monkman: I think so, too. Although this is the end of the Ford administration, but I remember when they were getting ready to go down to the Blue Room for the formal tea with the incoming president. Some of us were up on the third floor where Susan and the boys had lived, and so forth, and the maids were getting ready, doing things for the incoming family. But the Fords hadn’t left yet. And President Ford went around to every single room there and every single working space to say goodbye to the maids and the housemen and the carpenters and everybody. And thanked everybody individually for what they had done for them during that time that they had lived there. And it was very warmly done. There was no…

Smith: Nothing ritualistic about it.

Monkman: No, exactly, as though it were expected. It was something that you knew he sincerely thought. And I don’t recall any other president ever doing that. I mean, they might have had everybody go through a receiving line to say goodbye or something like that, but this was a much more casual, much more heartfelt, I thought, relationship. But that was at the end of the administration.

Smith: We were told that whoever would be serving them in private quarters…that he loved to talk about sports, and so I think there was one butler, in particular, who they would get into a discussion, and I think it was at first, a little bit uncertain, maybe awkward, the butler not knowing how far to go with this…

Monkman: What the barrier was.

Smith: Exactly. And there was one Saturday afternoon the President was watching college football, and one of the butlers asked if he needed anything. He said, “No, no, I’m fine,” and he said, “come on in and watch the game.” And you do what the president asks, but I think it was unprecedented, and…

Monkman: To be treated…

Smith: Yeah, he didn’t quite know how to…

Monkman: That there wasn’t that separateness, in a way.

Smith: But, again, Ford didn’t see a separateness, which is revealing.

Monkman: Well, I was surprised. There was this kind of issue between Mr. Conger, who always wanted to tell you what to do, and Mrs. Ford. And so, I remember her secretary, her personal secretary, who I liked a lot, but whose name I cannot remember, came down one day and said that Mrs. Ford wanted to talk with me. She didn’t want to talk to Mr. Conger. And so I went up there and there was Mrs. Ford in her bathrobe in the West Sitting Hall, and she wanted to discuss having the wallpaper removed from the dining room with the Revolutionary War scenes, and whether that would be possible. And so, there she was in her bathrobe. I had never – I mean I have talked to many first ladies – but never in their bathrobe. It was like mid-morning, maybe 10:30-11:00 in the morning. It wasn’t 8:00 or anything like that. So that, to me, said something, too; that she felt so comfortable about herself and who she was. That didn’t make any difference whether somebody came to talk with her.

Smith: And the story always has been that she found that wallpaper sort of unsettling, sitting eating and all these people shooting at you.

Monkman: And it was dark and it was on the north side of the house and she wanted something light and airy. So we did investigate how we could remove it and called in people to give us advice and so forth. And it was removed and then it went back up.

Smith: And then it went back and then it got removed again, I think.

Monkman: Well, no, it’s still there. We couldn’t take it down the last time, during the Clinton administration. We put up kind of a scrim over it and then some fabric was hung on that because it couldn’t be taken down again. I think it went back up in the Carter administration, because Mrs. Carter had talked to Mrs. Johnson and she found out that there had been wallpaper on the wall and so then she asked us if we could put it up again. It’s still there, but it’s behind something now. Clearly, this was something she didn’t want Mr. Conger to say no, it’s not possible. She wanted an honest opinion.

Smith: Is it safe to say that after as many years, and the historic relationship he had with the house and everything else, that you get a little possessive?

Monkman: Well, yeah, and I don’t think he realized in ’74, when the Nixons were having to leave, that things were going to change. I remember still, honestly, it was that summer of ’74, walking with Mrs. Nixon and Mr. Conger around certain areas, and he was saying, “I’m getting these designs from Lennox for your china.” I mean, this takes two years to make. And the reality just wasn’t there in terms of the possibilities of things. But he had raised a lot of money, he had brought in a lot of things, and he just felt that his idea was the right way to go.

I remember in 1976, he was still there in ’76 – well, he stayed for quite a while after that – there was this question of whether, during all those state visits in ’76 for the Bicentennial, whether the Queen of England would be a houseguest in the house. Mrs. Ford wanted the Queen’s Room and the Lincoln Room, and some other areas kind of fixed up because they were kind of down. So Mr. Conger went ahead with these plans without really taking into consideration what she really wanted, and she was so angry. I remember, we got a call about these curtains in the Lincoln Bedroom and she had come back from a trip and saw them and she just did not want them, she had made us put back the old ones that were there, and so forth. So that created a lot of little – she just didn’t want to deal with him because he had very forceful ideas. He went ahead with his ideas without taking hers into consideration, let me put it that way, I think.

Smith: Thinking more the museum than the home? Or the family residence?

Monkman: Yeah, and not really thinking that they had an opinion and they lived there. It was their house. Eventually, it happened the Queen didn’t stay in the house. I think her staff, and she maybe, what had happened in ’39 when the King and Queen of England had under the Roosevelt’s, and the retinue that comes with them, and all the things that go on. So they ended up not staying there. But, nevertheless, that was something in the back of their mind, I think they thought about.

Smith: Do you remember the time of her breast cancer surgery? One senses that it was a bit of a shock to the country.

Monkman: Yeah, because I think it was so unexpected, but I knew that she hadn’t been well. We have this advisory committee, the Committee for the Preservation of the White House, and meetings would be scheduled and she wouldn’t attend. I remember during the ERA Amendment, there would be things scheduled in the theater with her press secretary and other people, and Mrs. Ford would be supposed to attend and she wouldn’t. So we were clearly aware that she had some health problems. But I don’t think anybody knew about the breast cancer. At that time people didn’t talk about it, either. The recuperation was much longer than it would be today. That’s some thirty-some years ago. But I think people really admired her forthrightness about that and about other things, too. We all loved her. She was really very down to earth.

Smith: Free-spirit?

Monkman: Yes, but we appreciated that after this kind of tight, closed White House that we had experienced. For all the little controversies of things, she had a little vitality about her, I think. She does still have a vitality. I don’t know how well she is these days, but she was a very vital person, I thought.

Smith: In some ways it’s a case of opposites attract, because she would needle him, very lovingly, and he would egg her on. She was not punctual. That was the one thing under the best of circumstances – there was Betty-time and there was someone else’s time. And he was the most punctual of people. But they learned to work around it.

The whole Bicentennial must have been an enormous challenge.

Monkman: And it was the campaign year, too, on top of that. So all of that travel and all of that – but it was a very busy year in terms of entertaining and all those arrivals, and even the year before when the Emperor of Japan came. That was a huge thing to have the Emperor come. You know, when you work there over a lot of years and administrations, you don’t go out for every arrival. They are kind of one like another. But the Emperor of Japan was such a historic figure you had to go out and watch that ceremony on the lawn. The staff gets very tense, her staff, his staff, everybody, when some of these really important heads of state come, like the Queen or the Emperor, or Gorbachev in the Reagan administration, because they are so unusual and they’re kind of historic figures.

Smith: The famous incident with the Queen’s visit and the band and The Lady is a Tramp – were there repercussions after that or was it talked about?

Monkman: Well, I think we all kind of laughed about it, because it really was the Marine Band that was playing the music. It wasn’t anybody else. It was after the dinner, because the dancing was in the dining room. I think the dinner had been in the tent in the Rose Garden.

Smith: And the Fords loved to dance.

Monkman: Yeah, and they had taken the carpet out of the dining room and removed all the furniture, so they used that room for dancing. But that was the music people, I don’t think anybody had pre-selected on the staff, or anybody had pre-selected the music. I think they were very careful after that as to what they played at a particular time.

She probably laughed about it, too, in the end. I’m sure Maria, if she were the one in the charge of the dinner, had some qualms about it afterwards, I never asked.

Smith: What was the atmosphere when the pardon came? Was it like a flashback to all those bad old days when you had people outside the gates, or was it…

Monkman: That happened on a Sunday, didn’t it? That pardon? Because I remember hearing about it. I wasn’t at work when it happened, I do remember that. But I think there was this sense of “Here we go again,” about a controversy, because that was the really big controversy of his administration.
Having worked there for so many administrations and so long, you realize they all come in so hopeful, so hopeful. And they all leave – all of them – other than Reagan, maybe, who stayed there eight years and wasn’t up for re-election, and he had some clouds, too, in the later part of his administration. But it gets tougher and tougher and tougher as all the decisions have to be made. We clearly see this already with the Obamas. But this sense of hope and this sense of anticipation, and then the reality of both living there, losing their privacy – and I think that’s one thing I have to say for people that work closely with the family, either in the residence or on their staff – that was one of our major things – was not to invade their privacy. And to keep their privacy. And I think that’s why we all – we might have talked among ourselves about things - but we didn’t talk outside of work about a lot of things.

Smith: There is a wonderful story sort of contrasting Ford and LBJ, that Gary Walters told us. It was his first Sunday there by himself and he picked up the phone. He [Gary] could tell he [Ford] wanted to say, “Hey, this is Jerry Ford,” but he said, “This is the President,” and Gary immediately went into full alert. It was Sunday morning, they were getting ready to go to church, and he said, “Maybe at some point you could check with a plumber because I don’t have any hot water in my shower.” Gary says, “Oh, of course, Mr. President, we’ll take care of it right away.” He said, “No, that’s alright,” because there is no plumber on Sunday, I guess. He said, “That’s alright, he’ll be in on Monday, that’s fine. That’s alright, no big deal, you don’t have to hurry. I haven’t had any hot water for two weeks.”

Monkman: And he hadn’t said anything.

Smith: Hadn’t said anything. He said, “I just walked down to Mrs. Ford’s shower.” Now, Rex, of course, was on when LBJ insisted on his shower. When the president was out of town, Rex tried…that was apparently all he could stand. It is revealing that Ford just didn’t mention – “For two weeks I haven’t had hot water.”
Monkman: And the casualness of it. And I think, too, having someone like Susan around kind of kept them involved in the normal parts of life, too. To have a young daughter like that, and occasionally their sons.

Smith: And she had her high school prom there.

Monkman: Yes.

Smith: But the really poignant part was, of course, when her mother was in the hospital…

Monkman: Yes, when she substituted for her. I remember that at that diplomatic, white-tie reception. Here she was, the sixteen or seventeen year old girl with these long white gloves standing in that receiving line. She was very poised and did it very well. We had a secretary in our office, her name was Wilma Sands, and her son David went to school in Utah – was it the University of Utah they went to, or Brigham Young – with Jack Ford. And they were very good friends. They must have been good friends in Alexandria in high school and then they both went off to Utah. She died a number of years ago, but she would go up and talk to Mrs. Ford, and just visit with her and talk about their sons and things like that. It felt more like a neighborhood than a formal space, I think. The kids were so casual, too. If Steve or Jack were there, it was very, very casual. And I remember Susan would sometimes want us to come up and look at something or do something, I can’t remember specifics. But there would be – who was the photographer that was so…

Smith: David Kennerly.

Monkman: David Kennerly, he would often be up there showing her how to use a camera, they’d be looking at photographs and various things, too. So it was just kind of casual.

Smith: It seems like every White House family, I know the Fords did, why do they all fall in love with the solarium?

Monkman: Well, it is a very private space, I think. It’s removed from everything. People have to literally walk into that room. Unless you’re a staff person that’s been asked to come up to that room, it’s a private space. It's very airy, light, a lot of windows. Also, there is access to the outdoors. I think Susan maybe would lay in the sun up there. There is a terrace around there. And so it was kind of a real private space for them. It wasn’t formal by any means and it was fairly large. You could watch TV, you could play cards, whatever you wanted to do up there. It was kind of your space, I would say more so than a lot of other spaces.

Smith: Almost like a family room?

Monkman: Very much so, yes. And for them, it was, I think.

Smith: Ike used to grill steaks outside.

Monkman: Yes, on his cooking thing. There is a wonderful photograph of that, I think, of his grilling. I’ve seen it, too. I think a lot of families have felt that was a very informal space that they could relax in. And they did. For Susan and her brothers, it was just very close to where their rooms were, so it was easy for them to have their friends come in. There were little refrigerators up there and a kind of kitchenette where they could keep things for them to eat or drink, or whatever. So it was a very, kind of like your rec room in another house.

Smith: Little did Mrs. Coolidge know what she was starting.

Monkman: Except you had this gorgeous view, of course, looking out over the lawn and people could go up there and watch fireworks, the sunset, or whatever. It was a very appealing space for a lot of families.

Smith: They came back in later years on a number of occasions.

Monkman: For their presidential portraits, especially. Yes. In fact, I remember Mrs. Ford. Her portrait was hung down near our office on the ground floor, and we were standing there – I can’t remember if it was right at the time of the unveiling, or when she came back another time later – and she said, “You know, I always wanted to look like my portrait, and that’s why I had my plastic surgery.” I remember her so clearly saying that.

Smith: Isn’t that typical?
Monkman: She was so forthright about it. She said, “I always wanted to look like my portrait.” But they had another portrait that she had, I think it’s still in their home in California; it was an enormous portrait of her. I can’t remember the artist’s name, but it was huge. It could have taken up that whole wall. It was kind of like in this pointillist style. Very nice. It was in the gown that she had worn for a State Dinner. But they hung that up on the second floor in the corridor, and I remember walking up there. There she would be, bigger than life. It was huge. But it belonged to them personally, and I think they still have it, because I don’t think it’s at the library. I don’t know whether they’ll keep it or just what will happen to it. I think she seemed to take things with a lightness about her, even with all the difficulties that I think she had with her health and so forth. But she did have a sense of humor about a lot of things.

Smith: There is a wonderful photo – so emblematic of her – with that sort of fantail window, and she is so tiny, she is actually up on the sofa, looking at the residence, or the wing beyond.

Monkman: Yeah, and the EOB through the window there.

Smith: I assume most families spend – isn’t that a place where they congregate quite a bit?

Monkman: Yeah, and especially before dinner. Yes, and the light is so wonderful there. There is another room adjacent to their bedroom, which was for so many years was used for the president’s bedroom. Actually, Johnson, Nixon, Kennedy, they all had these separate bedrooms. But the Fords did not and they turned that into a kind of sitting room/office for him. They would have a television in there, too, because there weren’t televisions in the West Sitting Hall, I don’t think. But it wasn’t quite as bright and airy a room as the West Sitting Hall where people would congregate. It was easier for the butlers to serve them supper.

Smith: We read that when the word got out that they shared a bed there were concerned Americans who wrote the Fords to protest. It is astonishing, when you stop to think, I guess, of what people…
Monkman: It had been just a long tradition that there was always that separate room. It really was, up until the Fords, that that remained a tradition. Since then that Presidential Bedroom has always now been a sitting room, or like Reagan used it, as an office, too. The American public concerns itself with every detail, regardless.

Smith: My favorite is after the Sixty Minutes interview. I’ve seen some of the correspondence. A woman from Texas wrote and was very serious about this, as well as passionate. She said, “You don’t understand the Constitution requires you to be perfect.” The perfect mother, the perfect wife, the perfect hostess. And she was dead serious. She was taking her to task for falling short of her Constitutional requirement to be perfect in all these ways, as this particular letter writer defined perfection. And there were a lot of letters like that.

Monkman: Well, they write about everything. And Mrs. Ford did have her controversies at times. But, you never underestimate the American public, is what I say.

Smith: I’ll never forget, because I wrote his remarks, and he practiced for weeks - the 200th Anniversary Dinner.

Monkman: Oh, that was very, very moving. Did you write those remarks?

Smith: I did.

Monkman: Oh, you did? Because I think of all the remarks that were made that evening, his remarks about living in the house and so forth, were the most moving. And people still talk about that. His remarks are still used and quoted in different publications and so forth. Oh, that was very – he did that very beautifully.

Smith: Penny Circle and I were co-conspirators, because I would write the stuff and then she would make him practice. At that point he’d been out of practice in some ways – so she would make him. And we were so proud that night because he really did hit it out of the ballpark.

Monkman: He really did. His remarks were delivered with such empathy, I thought, too. He did a wonderful job. Well, that’s nice to know that, Richard. You’re behind that. But that was very thrilling. It was a very strange evening, to say the least.

Smith: Because it was right after the election.

Monkman: And the first President Bush was there, and we didn’t know whether his son would be president or Gore. And I remember Mr. Bush was to go off to Spain or Europe or something, and he was going to leave early, but then he was delayed a while. But everybody was on pins and needles that night. But Mrs. Johnson was there. Everybody was there except for the Reagans because of his health. It was a very special evening. But President Ford’s remarks really hit the spot that night. It really did.

Smith: That’s nice to hear. Was that the last time you saw him?

Monkman: Yes.

Smith: He came back for his ninetieth birthday in the second Bush presidency, in 2003.

Monkman: That was after I’d left. I left in 2002. So I didn’t see him then. But I did see Mrs. Ford out at the library – how many years ago was that, I wonder? At the First Ladies’ Conference. Was that 2000?

Smith: Yeah, we did a program.

Monkman: And I spoke. Then we toured that exhibit, I remember that.

Smith: Yes, that’s right.

Monkman: So that was probably the last time I saw her, too, because then I had left.

Smith: I wanted to make sure. You’d written some notes and I want to make sure we’ve covered them.

Monkman: I think I’ve covered most all of them. Oh, I should mention – this is one thing that I really had to admire about Mr. Ford. This is in 1976. He was getting all these gifts from heads of state and so forth, and one of the things that the government of Italy gave him, was this little miniature of President Jefferson by Trumble.
Smith:   I’ve seen it. We borrowed it once for an exhibit.

Monkman:   We knew all those state gifts would go to the libraries, but we really wanted that miniature. The portrait gallery really wanted the miniature, too, so we did a memo to the President and he made the decision to let it stay in the White House, and we could lend it to various things. But I really appreciated that.

And I think one other thing, a gift that year, although we really didn’t want it, but we took it – a couple of things. One was, the Polish government gave this huge portrait of Kosciusko, enormous. It wasn’t a life-portrait, it was a copy of a portrait. It was so big and it was not something we could hang in the White House. But President Ford decided that it should stay in the White House, so we lent it up to the Kosciusko home I think in Philadelphia, or something.

And then there was another gift, I think the Shah of Iran – was he still around? Yeah, he was still around. It was a beautiful Persian carpet with an image of George Washington on it, which we still have in the White House. I think it’s in storage. But just to let you know that we do have some of those Bicentennial gifts that stayed in the White House.

Smith: That’s great.

Monkman: And then one thing we did. When Susan came in she wanted a particular bed for her room. She wanted a brass bed. She didn’t like any of our White House beds, so I remember we went to the curator at the Met-New York, who grew up in Muscatine, Iowa. He had sources all over the Midwest of dealers or places, so we borrowed this fantastic brass bed for Susan from this family in Iowa. And then this decorator did this gorgeous canopy for her. I remember her saying when they were ready to leave that’s the one thing she hated to leave was that bed. She loved that bed in her room. But those were just little instances of things that just in passing…

Smith: Couple of things to wrap up. Did you have any encounters with the vice president? With Nelson Rockefeller?
Monkman: No. And I remember this whole thing about he didn’t want to live in the Admiral’s house, and then brought in all those very modern things. But we really didn’t have any contact. And at that time, I don’t think he had an office in the West Wing, either.

Smith: No, he did not.

Monkman: I do remember Mr. Cheney, though, who became his Chief of Staff. He was really not an easy person around there. And I remember when Mr. Rumsfeld left and Mr. Cheney became Chief of Staff, and he wanted some paintings for his office. So I took him down into our storage room and he was very abrupt and very curt. He made his selection, but he wasn’t pleasant about it at all at that time. Although other people that worked with him didn’t have a problem. I think maybe he was busy and this just wasn’t something on the day he wanted to spend much time with. I don’t know.

Smith: I was struck when the President died and they had the service up at the Cathedral, and they went by the White House and the staff was out front. Had that been done in the past? I don’t remember. I guess you’d have to go back to Reagan.

Monkman: I do remember – when did Mr. Reagan die?

Monkman: Yeah, because I had retired by then, but I got a call from the Usher’s office saying that Mrs. Reagan had said that she would really like to have all of the residence’s staff go down along, I guess it was Constitution Ave. at 16th Street, because the cortège was going to the Capitol building. And so the Usher’s office called me and said Mrs. Reagan had requested that all former and current staff, if they wished, to go down there. It was a really hot day and I decided – I knew the crowds would be terrible – I decided not to go down there. But, that was her request. And then I think they stopped on that access with 16th – not really 16th – but the access there near the Washington Monument. And some people said that she waved to them and recognized some of the staff there.
But for them to do it spontaneously, for Mr. Ford, I think that would be unusual. Many of us received an invitation to go to the service and I saw many people there that had worked in the White House during that time. So they were, again, very generous, and very thoughtful about doing that.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Monkman: In terms of the country, he did bring this great sigh of relief to the country and I think all of us, whether we worked there or not, felt that he was a man of great integrity who kind of soothed the nation at the time it needed to be soothed. And to have a calmness and an honesty about him. So I think if he achieved nothing else, I think this sense that he brought that the country could go forward with an honest man of integrity. And we really needed that at the time. And for those of us who worked there, it was, I think, a real sense of relief that life goes on and there can be a lightness about life again and appreciation of things. It was a good time, considering all the other issues and things, but with the fall of Vietnam and all of that. That was a relief, in a sense, too, I think. It was traumatic, but it was a relief. So I think in a positive way, he’ll be remembered, don’t you?

Smith: Yeah, I do.

Smith: Let’s start with your stories before you met the Fords. And how Vail came to be. Because it was clearly central in their lives for a very long time.

Bill Hanlon: The President started coming to Vail, I think it was 1968 that he first came, and he was an avid skier and he was an outdoorsman from his earlier days when he was a young person.

Smith: I’ve always wondered where he got the skiing bug, because we don’t think of Michigan as a ski location.

Bill Hanlon: Well, I think it was Bowie Mountain that they used to travel up to and his fondness for the outdoors and being very athletic - that was his bag. And Mrs. Ford, I don’t know. She skied, but he sure was there and made an effort to come to Colorado through a couple of friends, Ted and Nancy Kindel from Grand Rapids.

Smith: Who had already discovered Vail?

Sally Hanlon: They opened the first lodge, the Christiania.

Bill Hanlon: So, they came here in 1963. Vail opened in ’62, but there were only three buildings.

Smith: What was here before then?

Sally Hanlon: His family was in the furniture business in Grand Rapids.

Smith: Okay.

Bill Hanlon: Ted Kindel.

Smith: But in terms of the geography and the region?

Bill Hanlon: Two sheep ranches and a couple of buildings in Vail, but that was it. That’s when Vail Associates at that time purchased two ranches that I think were about 500 acres each. They did some other things, but they were also in the process of applying for a forest service permit to access public land to operate a ski area. And, in those days, I think it was a lot easier, as you mentioned before. Could this happen again? Probably not. Land being one of the items.

Smith: In Colorado, how much of the ski industry was already developed? Was Aspen developed?

Bill Hanlon: Aspen was 1880 or 1890 and it was a mining town. And it almost became the capital of Colorado.

Smith: Really?

Bill Hanlon: Because there were many people in Aspen. Same thing with Leadville. And then Denver, because of the lower altitude, was probably chosen.

Smith: And am I right that the Fords originally had a condominium in Vail?

Bill Hanlon: They had a condominium in the Lodge of Vail, but I think it was 1968 that they came here. Again, with Ted and Nancy Kindel, who had decided to come here. They built the lodge. Then Larry Burdick, who had built in 1962 a building that is still there called the Red Lion, which is a restaurant. And Larry lived there. So that was their exposure to coming here.

Smith: Sounds like it was love at first sight. I mean, that they developed an affinity for the area almost on seeing it.

Bill Hanlon: Yeah, and I think one of the other items is their children were getting older and as you go to the university, whatever it is, this is vacation time and a place for the children to meet up with the parents for family vacation.

Smith: Later on they had the habit of spending Christmas out here. Was that something they did almost from the beginning? Because I would think the condominium would be pretty crowded for the whole family.

Bill Hanlon: Well, that was his time to have vacation, too, from the House of Representatives.
Sally Hanlon: When he became the president, that’s when they rented the Bass House. Dick Bass was one of the original investors in Vail. And they always gave the Fords that house. That’s where they had every Christmas and summer.

Bill Hanlon: And that became the summer White House.

Smith: Oh, okay. Now, how did your paths cross?

Bill Hanlon: I guess our first exposure was through Bob.

Sally Hanlon: Bob Barrett. Have you met Bob Barrett?

Bill Hanlon: Yeah, but I guess he came when the President was at that time Vice President, and we were up at a function for something up at the top of the mountain. And that’s when Bob Barrett came over and introduced himself and we said, “Well, we’re Bill and Sally Hanlon and we live in town,” and all that. And that was at that function. And then it was the next summer…

Sally Hanlon: When Agnew resigned and then Nixon resigned.

Bill Hanlon: Yeah, and Nixon resigned. The President came to Vail.

Smith: That must have been somewhat unsettling, but also a big deal.

Bill Hanlon: It was a big deal to see the entourage of people coming in before for security for everything. And he had met us and it was a little nucleus that Bob wanted him to meet - some of the local guys - and we were considered some of the local guys. And when President and Mrs. Ford came, he wanted someone to present Mrs. Ford with some flowers in a very traditional way of welcoming the First Lady. And he called Sally and we had two children who were then four and five, to go up to the Bass House, which is a couple of hundred yards from where we lived in town. The town was a lot smaller then. And our children were there and we dressed them up in finery so they looked presentable for four and five year old children. Then the limousine and the security were there and we walked the children over and they had their flowers with them and a car came in at the presentation. The dog was there, the President’s dog Liberty, and it was good. We took some pictures and we still have them. That’s how we met them. And, I don’t know, there was just a little group of about twenty people.

Sally Hanlon: And that’s the summer, too, that Bob called and asked them if we’d have them for dinner. He said, “Would you host a dinner for the Fords?” And we said, “Sure.” We lived in a small condominium, so we said, “Well, sure.” And that’s how we really started becoming friends.

Smith: Was there anything about them that surprised you? People talk about how unspoiled they seemed to be, how natural and accessible. Was that an impression that you had?

Sally Hanlon: Absolutely. And people would ask them, “What do you talk about?” And I would say, “The same thing we talk to you about.” It was nothing different.

Bill Hanlon: I think that was the surprising factor, because when you first meet him, you’re meeting the 38th president. There were only 38 people before him holding that office and we were there. Nervous? Sure. But it was quite an honor. I mean, I grew up in Boston. Sally grew up in Boston. I worked for public utilities before coming to Vail. Sally was a school teacher in Newton, Massachusetts. We got married and then came out here and it was fine. We had two children and then all of a sudden we were asked to have our children present flowers to the First Lady of the United States.

Smith: Of course, the other side of the coin was they had never expected to be in those roles.

Bill Hanlon: They were mainly just regular people. And the fun thing is, what do you talk about? As Sally said, you talk about anything that was in the paper that day or the current events. But they were just very quiet people.

Smith: Talk about families – kids - as you got better acquainted?

Bill Hanlon: He was always concerned about, you know, the outdoors because he loved golf. And he loved politics. He was in it for forty some odd years.
Smith: The whole Chevy Chase bit, the notion that this guy, who really was a naturally gifted athlete, was a stumbler, bumbler…the whole caricature of Ford. Was that something that he ever discussed?

Sally Hanlon: He would laugh about it. You know, when he would hit the golf ball into a crowd, he’d just make fun of himself and laugh about it. But the press treated him so poorly in that regard. I mean, he was anything but a bumbling athlete.

Smith: Well, it’s interesting, because when he was on the ski slopes, waiting for the lift or actually on the slopes, there were always people who were waving, who wanted to get his attention. There were all sorts of distractions that any other skier would never confront.

Sally Hanlon: Would never have. But I think most of the Vail people, a lot of people, left him alone. People would come into the store and ask where the Ford house was, but no one would ever tell them because we didn’t want them to be driving by that house every day. So I think it was pretty low-key.

Bill Hanlon: That was part of the low-key bit, but if you’re the President of the United States and you fall skiing and there’s someone around, it’s going to make a newspaper.

Sally Hanlon: And a lot of people thought that he shouldn’t ski. That it’s a dangerous sport and as president he shouldn’t be out there. Not Vail people, but the nation.

Bill Hanlon: But he just enjoyed it. And the operating company at Vail Associates at the time - I mean, to have a president skiing on your area. It wasn’t a crowded ski run that he was on. They needed the security and they got it. It was wonderful. And you mentioned Larry Buendorf. Larry was one of the skiers with him all the time. Dale Underlick. Did you know Dale?

Smith: No.

Bill Hanlon: Larry was the Secret Service president(?), Dale was the head of the detail. And he’s in Denver. He’s a retired person. They were great friends, too.

Smith: Did you see much of the kids? Were they up here much?
Sally Hanlon: Susan was here a lot more than the others. Susan and Steve. Susan was dating someone in Vail at the time in the summers.

Smith: Was she a skier?

Sally Hanlon: Mhmm. And then as she got older and got married, our Meg used to babysit for Susan, because they were close.

Bill Hanlon: But it was fun and exciting to be on a first name basis.

Smith: Were there places in Vail that were their favorites? Things to do, places to go, restaurants? Were there habits they had here that you could describe?

Sally Hanlon: They would go to almost any restaurant. They went to Gramshammer’s a lot because they were very close to Pepe and Sheika. They would go to the Left Bank a lot. But people pretty much left them alone when they were in a restaurant.

Bill Hanlon: It was kind of fun, when they came here and after he was no longer President, they were here from the eighth of June until the end of September. And they were up here and they had a lot of visiting dignitaries.

Sally Hanlon: They had the World Forum.

Bill Hanlon: And the Jerry Ford Golf Invitational, also. So there was always somebody in and he was very active on boards.

Sally Hanlon: And he travelled a lot.

Bill Hanlon: And he travelled a lot, but when he came into town, Sally and Betty were very close, so there was “Let’s have dinner next week.”

Smith: We get a sense of what his daily routine was like. What about Mrs. Ford’s?

Sally Hanlon: She had a lot of close friends and she had a group of friends from Denver that she remained very close with that helped her with starting the Betty Ford Center. And people like that would come to visit. She was very close to her interior decorator, the one that did her house in Beaver Creek. She would just call and say, “So and so is coming to town. Do you want to lunch with us?” And it was funny, until this day, I have two voicemails at home that I just can’t erase. And one of them was Jerry’s birthday a couple of years ago. His birthday’s in July and we joined them for dinner. I was out of town, but we joined them for dinner at the Left Bank and I said, “I should erase that, but I just can’t do it.”

Smith: Was that the last summer?

Sally Hanlon: I think it was.

Smith: That was the summer everyone told them, including the doctors, “You shouldn’t be doing this.” The altitude and all that. And she said to me, “We’ve had the quantity in life. We want the quality of life.” You can understand that being here, but those last couple of summers must have been pretty rough.

Bill Hanlon: They were, because of the altitude. On all people the altitude is going to affect them.

Sally Hanlon: But that summer, someone started a group, a Friday lunch men’s group. And you had President Ford as your guest that summer and he had trouble breathing and it was at Gramshammer’s on the porch. And he was embarrassed.

Bill Hanlon: Yeah, because he wasn’t moving and going from the car to the table that we had, there were probably ten guys. But he had to walk maybe 30 yards and in that time he had to stop, and the altitude got to him. He was a little dizzy and one of the Secret Service guys came over and we sat down in a chair.

Smith: Did you sense he was very proud? You’d never see him in a wheelchair.

Sally Hanlon: No. No cane.

Smith: No cane.

Bill Hanlon: But Mrs. Ford was a very, very active lady and when you see the Betty Ford Alpine Garden, it’s beautiful. People go out there and enjoy her little park.

Sally Hanlon: And they went to all the Bravo concerts. They were out every night.

Smith: Really?
Sally Hanlon: Mhmm.

Smith: Well, we’ve been told that they were very visible, very involved.

Sally Hanlon: Mhmm.

Bill Hanlon: But Vail is a funny place and whether it was Jack Nicklaus walking down the street or Mrs. Ford or the President of the United States, people would not bother them. So they felt very, very comfortable and right now in the big city you can’t do things like that. But here they could and they felt very, very comfortable. They didn’t have to come in the side entrance to go to the Gerald Ford Amphitheater or anyplace. They could just walk down the street.

Smith: That’s interesting because I think one of the banes of existence were the autograph seekers, particularly, the professionals who were out there.

Sally Hanlon: Right.

Smith: But I take it that he didn’t have that as much to deal with in a setting like this.

Sally Hanlon: I don’t think so.

Bill Hanlon: We’ve got a little pile of things. We’ve got some great notes and thank yous and this and that. But yeah, he was always responsive and it was great to be with him.

Sally Hanlon: And all those years, the Firestones lived next to them and Nikki Firestone and Betty were very close, so they did a lot together.

Smith: And clearly, the Betty Ford Center is the Betty Ford Center, but it’s also the Leonard Firestone Center.

Bill Hanlon: They were great friends and when Mrs. Ford decided to do that, Leonard jumped in 100%.

Smith: There are people who say that she saved his life.

Bill Hanlon: That’s right.

Sally Hanlon: He used to say that.
Bill Hanlon: He told me that, and I’m an alcoholic, and he was.

Smith: One of the things that’s fascinating about President Ford – most of us, clichés become clichés for a reason, most of us tend to become a little more conservative as we get older. Maybe we have more to conserve. And fiscally, he was never anything but a tight-fisted traditional conservative. But on a lot of the social issues, whether it was abortion or gay rights or whatever, he seemed to be much more accepting, much less judgmental, for lack of a better word, than some ‘social conservatives’. And was that related in any way to the alcoholism? To understanding that good people have weaknesses?

Bill Hanlon: Well, you said that he was kind of conservative. In New England, we used to call that snug as bark to a tree. That’s tight.

Smith: He didn’t tip generously on the golf course, I’m told.

Sally Hanlon: He would check every bill at dinner.

Bill Hanlon: Yeah, he did. He did like to pay his fair share.

Smith: He was, like lots of people, a child of the Depression and really bore that mark.

Sally Hanlon: Right. And can’t stand to see any waste. But Bill always had a football bet with him.

Bill Hanlon: Yeah, we used to bet more than any game was when Michigan played Notre Dame. And I always used to give him a little bit of jazz, you know, “You get these big rough kids from Michigan playing those nice Catholic kids from Notre Dame who were just going to school and trying to maintain a great grade point average so they could get into the seminary.” “Now, don’t start that business.” He was a very easy person to talk to being the 38th president. One thing I did like, I did like to play golf. Now I’m not a great golfer, but it was very easy to play with him. And we would talk about things. But before I went out on the golf course with him, I would, always at the first tee, wherever we played, whether it was Vail, Arrowhead or Beaver Creek, it didn’t matter, but there was usually he and I and two other people. And I always made a point that I myself would walk away and around the first tee, you know, everybody that’s there is out looking at President Ford and they’re certainly not looking at the other three people of the foursome. I would always walk away and then get in a good position to say, “I’ll be right back. Don’t forget Mr. President, bring your wallet.” And he’d say, “There you go.” And when we left the tee box, he would say, “At least you’re consistent.” And I would say, “Yeah, but the people like it.” You know, they always wanted to see him. And he was a good golfer. He hit that golf ball a long way.

Smith: Did he ever get a hole-in-one? Did he ever mention that?

Bill Hanlon: I don’t know. I’m sure he got a lot of gimmes.

Smith: Well, now that brings up the somewhat famous story about Bill Clinton.

Bill Hanlon: When they were playing golf.

Smith: Speaking of gimmes.

Sally Hanlon: Uh huh.

Smith: Of flexible rules.

Bill Hanlon: Uh huh.

Smith: Was it Nicklaus or Palmer that they were playing with?

Sally Hanlon: He played with Nicklaus a lot and I think that’s who it was that day.

Bill Hanlon: Yeah.

Smith: Then I think it was Nicklaus who had the great comeback when Clinton said, “Let's do this again tomorrow.” And Nicklaus said, “Okay, but you have to play by the rules.”

Bill Hanlon: We did have a lot of fun. I tried to call Mrs. Ford July 1st. The Fourth of July was a big thing - that’s Americana days. But I would always call on President’s Day and leave messages. She’s out in Palm Springs and she gets the message that I called and we talk every once in awhile.

Smith: Do you really?
Bill Hanlon: Yeah.

Smith: That’s interesting because I don’t think she’s ever gotten over losing him.

Sally Hanlon: I don’t think so.

Bill Hanlon: They were a good team. They were good buddies.

Smith: It’s interesting you put it that way. They hadn’t been in the public eye for while, but people were maybe reminded, or some learned for the first time, of just how close that marriage was. Everyone knows about Ronnie and Nancy it was a revelation, I think, to see how close the Fords were.

Bill Hanlon: They were big _______________ than I was. I mean I’ve got some great memories.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Bill Hanlon: I heard a few GD’s.

Smith: Was that on the golf course?

Bill Hanlon: Yeah, but that was just when he and I were there.

Smith: Never wrapped a club around a tree or anything?

Bill Hanlon: No. He did at himself if he did a bad shot. Some of the things we were talking about - whether it was everyday events or something - there were a few GDs or something, but he was always just a gentleman. And that’s what everybody loved. And walking down the street with them or in a restaurant or something, people did respect him. But there was always somebody yelling in the background “Hey, Mr. President!” It was funny, one night I asked him if I could tell a story because I didn’t know if I would offend anyone.

We were out at a function in the Vail Village Inn and there were probably 60-70 people and we’re all in one room. Then came 10 o’clock and the function was over and it was a fundraiser for drama(?) or one of the events here. And there were two Secret Service people, one in the car and one inside the room. Sometimes they had two, sometimes three when they went out to events. But this night at the Vail Village Inn, it was in the dining room. And next to the dining room in the bar, there were about 15 people from the University of Michigan. And it was about 10 o’clock at night and they were hooting and hollering and they found out President Ford was there in the next room. And finally 10 o’clock came and everybody’s getting up. When he was talking to his wife, it was “Betty”, when he was getting ready to go, he said, “Mrs. Ford, I think it’s time to go.” And so the Secret Service looked around and I was near him and he said, “Bill, when we go by that door with all those University of Michigan people, can you walk in front of the President (on the outside of him) between him and those people who I think have had too much to drink because they all want to shake his hand?” So, I had three minutes of glory with the Secret Service as President Ford’s wingman.

Smith: They didn’t get the chance to shake his hand?

Bill Hanlon: No, President Ford was between the two of us and we had a little barrier there and he waved and said “Thank you” because they were singing the Michigan fight song. And it was fun. And those are the things that I’ll always remember. The night we went to a concert at the Gerald Ford Amphitheater and Willy Nelson was there. Sally and I and our children had gone to dinner with them and we drove out in the car to the Amphitheater and Willy Nelson was there. To get acknowledged and pointing to the presidential seats, I mean, we got some great people. We went to the dedication of the library and the rededication of the library.

Smith: That was a cold day.

Sally Hanlon: That was a cold day!

Smith: It was amazing to see Lady Bird. I mean, Caroline was inside, but there was Lady Bird outside with Barbara Bush kind of mothering her.

Bill Hanlon: The memories of the gentleness of both of them and they both were gentle people.

Smith: One thing people didn’t fully realize, because they didn’t proverbially wear it on their sleeves, and that was the importance of faith in their [the Fords] lives.

Sally Hanlon: Absolutely.
Smith: People think of Jimmy Carter and they think of born-again Christianity and they think of the Reagans and I’m pretty sure the Agnews, but the Fords really didn’t.

Sally Hanlon: They really did. It was automatic. It wasn’t for the press.

Bill Hanlon: I think you could see that in their adoring of the children and the children adoring them. They had a nice, tight relationship.

Sally Hanlon: They really were close.

Smith: And they enjoyed grandparenting?

Sally Hanlon: Oh, very much so. Very much so. But, as Betty used to say, like we all say, “It’s wonderful to see them all come at Christmas, but it’s wonderful to kiss them all goodbye.” But the grandkids were all pretty close.

Smith: Obviously he had a sense of humor, but he couldn’t tell a joke. He would laugh at someone else’s joke?

Bill Hanlon: He would appreciate it. Another thing, with Mrs. Ford, you could tell about the allergy.

Sally Hanlon: When we first met them, the second or so time they came for dinner, we invited a number of friends and we spent a lot of time in New England, so we decided we would have a lobster dinner, not knowing she’s dreadfully allergic to shellfish. So, when the Secret Service told me that the day of the dinner, we just had steak cooked at the same time for her. You’ll probably be interviewing Rod Slifer, but he and his wife were at this dinner and he cracked open a piece of lobster to break the shell and he squirted Betty Ford all over the face with lobster juice and he grabbed his napkin and he kept trying to wipe her face. We all thought that was pretty funny that the one person who’s allergic is the one he hits.

Smith: Let me ask you something that among those who know them well is well-known - she had a much more ribald sense of humor.

Sally Hanlon: Oh, very, very funny. Very funny. You couldn’t say much about that in front of him because he was infuriated at that nonsense, that there was no respect for the office. In a private conversation with just the four of us, he would say, “It’s disgraceful. It’s embarrassing.” So that was just a subject that none of us talked about, but you could talk about it to Betty and she’d be funny about it.

Bill Hanlon:  He was disappointed in him.

Smith:  I heard him say Clinton had such talent. He’d say, “If there’s one thing I’d do over in life, I would’ve give much more attention to public communications.” And he saw in Clinton someone who could do it effortlessly.

Sally Hanlon:  A master.

Smith:  Absolutely. And I think he actually used to say “He could sell refrigerators to the Eskimos,” or something like that. So he had great respect for Clinton’s gifts, which made him all the more disappointed. That, you know, you never have the perfect package.

Sally Hanlon:  And he would say things like, “I feel badly for him because it’s an illness with him.” You know, he had compassion about it even though he was angry.

Smith:  That’s interesting. That goes back again to this notion whether perhaps living with and learning about alcoholism broadened his perspective.

Bill Hanlon:  That it’s a disease just as other addictions are. I’d been out visiting him and I’d played, I think, the first twelve Betty Ford Golf Invitations out of Palm Springs Easter weekend. And I would go over just because I was there for three days or something. I’d go over and see some of the people that I knew at the Betty Ford Center who I met golfing and all. And I would just hang around for awhile and that’s a complex that she was so proud of. And he was proud of her doing it. And their mutual friend Leonard was the financial force behind it. They just made it happen.

Smith:  They’d have an annual alumni weekend and you’d see the President cooking hot dogs. He was one of the troops. Before the intervention took place, you obviously had established a friendship. Did you know? Was it visible?

Bill Hanlon:  No, it wasn’t obvious to me.
Sally Hanlon: No, because we were all smoking and drinking, so it was just part of the group. And she was never stumbling, falling down. I mean, she was always composed.

Bill Hanlon: And she pointed out in her book, she made sure she did the packing if they were going on a trip.

Sally Hanlon: She also would say of her days in Washington, “We always would have a drink before we went out just to get ready to go out to drink,” which is true.

Smith: It’s interesting. We’ve talked to so many people, it’s hard to imagine, but 40 years ago, it was a totally different culture. People just drank a lot more.

Sally Hanlon: And nobody drank wine, they drank Martinis and Manhattans and it was just different.

Bill Hanlon: And whisky, they drank lots of whisky. They didn’t drink that wine. There wasn’t enough wine around then.

Smith: My sense was his health was really remarkably good up until about his ninetieth birthday. One of the things that must’ve been really difficult for him was when the doctors said you have to cut out the travel. And travel for him was—

Sally Hanlon: That was his life.

Smith: Yeah.

Sally Hanlon: And he loved speaking at a lot of those. I mean he was an invited speaker many times and people loved having him and he loved doing it.

Smith: Yeah.

Bill Hanlon: It was kind of hard to see in the last few years that he used to come to Vail, to see him out for lunch or out for dinner. And then when he’d get up from the table, he would have to stand there a second to get a breath and to make sure his equilibrium was fine.

Smith: Did he talk about it at all?
Sally Hanlon: She did. He didn’t.

Smith: About the difficulties of aging? I mean, one of the granddaughters said to me that she said, “This getting older is not easy.” Something like that.

Sally Hanlon: She’d say things like, “It’s not for the faint of heart.”

Bill Hanlon: But he had to stop skiing because it’s kind of an age thing. Golf is different, but I think he always maintained fitness.

Sally Hanlon: Well, he swam every day.

Bill Hanlon: He swam every day and it was important for him to watch his weight and to maintain a level of athletic ability.

Smith: And he was a workaholic, even up here. I mean, the mail, he never stopped being a congressman in the sense that the mail—

Sally Hanlon: And he was the one in the last years who always wrote the thank you notes. It was always his writing.

Smith: Well, it was funny. I know the staff in Rancho Mirage and I assume up here, Saturdays, you worked. And Penny’s story was that he’d work Sunday if he could’ve gotten them to. So, after 9/11 and the anthrax scare, they had to explain to him why he wasn’t getting Saturday mail. Well, he wasn’t about to accept that. They had members of the staff put on those costumes and go through the mail so he could have his Saturday mail.

Sally Hanlon: That’s interesting.

Smith: I mean, I sensed he was very self-disciplined, for example, the fact that when she stopped drinking, he stopped drinking. When he wanted Susan to stop smoking, he stopped smoking.

Bill Hanlon: Helping the person that he wanted to help was by doing the same thing himself.

Smith: One of the most poignant stories we have is from a woman, who was their cook. And she’d been through the Betty Ford Center. She’d never been in a plane and had never seen snow. And they brought her up here and he took her by the hand to ski school, made sure they got her ski clothes, the whole thing. And at one point, she fell off the wagon while she was working for them she offered to resign and, of course, Mrs. Ford said, “No way.” She talks about how she learned discipline and having a sense of purpose, and how he in a very quiet kind of way was the teacher. She didn’t want to get on the plane, so he got the pilot of the plane and they walked all around the plane and explained the engines and everything else. Just remarkably kind.

Sally Hanlon: Yeah, exactly.

Bill Hanlon: One time, they were at the Bass House and a cold weather snap came through. This was Christmas week. And on Christmas day, the Bass House lost all the heat in the boiler. Now, this is getting awful cold when dropping from 72 down to 60. The person who did the repairs was a guy by the name of Bill Burnett, Burnett Plumbing and Heating. Bill had been born and raised in Mintum and if you needed something done, he was the one who watched out for the Bass House. Bill was kind of a little historian on the town of Mintum and he wrote a little book and in the book he told the story and he told it to me. But he got a call on Christmas morning at 10 o’clock that the Bass House was out of heat and so he said, “I knew I’d be out there for a few minutes, so I packed my sandwich and thermos of coffee. And I went out there and we looked and I found out what the problem was going to be, but it would take three or four hours to fix it. So President Ford came down. I explained what we were going to do and that it’d be three or four hours. ‘So, while my son goes down and gets the part, I’ll have lunch.’ He was going to have lunch in the garage. And President Ford brought him over to a little room and President Ford went upstairs to the kitchen and he got a sandwich and a cup of coffee and he came down and sat with Bill Burnett, the plumbing and heating guy, and they spent an hour Christmas Day just shooting the breeze and waiting for the part to arrive. He said, “There I was sitting in the little room off the garage with the President of the United States.” He said, “Not bad for a kid from Mintum.”

Smith: It’s a great story and it reinforces what we’ve been told. The Secret Service agents were very appreciative because the Fords would go out of their way to be sure that they didn’t have events on Christmas day so the agents could have the holiday themselves. Which is pretty thoughtful.

Sally Hanlon: It really is.

Bill Hanlon: Very thoughtful.

Smith: Do you miss him?

Bill Hanlon: Yeah.

Sally Hanlon: Yeah, you do.

Smith: I mean, does the community, because they must have become such a part of the local scene?

Sally Hanlon: And so much has been renamed in their honor. You do miss them. You miss seeing them around.

Bill Hanlon: Like the Gerald Ford Golf Tournament, that was an event that went on for 20 years. The people that used to come to Vail, I mean, Bob Hope came 19 of the 20 years. The event was for 20 years. He was here 19 of the 20 years and the one year he missed, he was over with the USO. So, the nucleus of people that we used to have coming here was outstanding and it was always an event for everybody in the tournament.

Sally Hanlon: Even today, as frail as Betty is, like a few weeks ago, she asks by name “How is so and so doing?”

Smith: Really alert?

Sally Hanlon: And we would occasionally - and Sheika does this all the time - would send her pictures of what’s going on in Vail. “You wouldn’t believe the construction.” And she’s still very alert.

Smith: So, I assume there was never any doubt about selling the house. I mean, the house was put on the market even when he was still alive, wasn’t he? Toward the very end of his life?
Sally Hanlon:  No, I think it was right at the end because I saw Susan and I said, “Are you coming to Vail with the kids?” and she said, “I’m not sure, because we really don’t have a place to stay anymore.” And I said, “We always can find you a place to stay. That’s not an issue.” But she came for the ski classic that year with a friend. Their husbands didn’t come. And they really haven’t come much since that. And as she said, skiing is expensive for Mike and his family, for any of them. So, I think it was two summers ago Betty spent the summer in New Mexico. No, she was going to be in San Diego to be with Jack, but then I think she went to Susan’s because it was just a cooler climate. In New Mexico?

Smith:  I think you told me the last time you saw him. Do you remember?

Bill Hanlon:  That was at our lunch that we had.

Sally Hanlon:  Yeah. They didn’t stay through all of September that summer. They left earlier.

Bill Hanlon:  He just wasn’t feeling good and on the advice of our doctors here that told him “You’d better get out of here and get to a lower altitude.”

Smith:  Were you surprised by the amount of reaction when he died? Because he’d been out of the public eye for awhile. And it seemed to build as the week went on.

Sally Hanlon:  Yeah, Susan and I’ve said and people have remarked about it. It was so kind to him when he was there, all those wonderful, glorious things. It’s a shame they didn’t write and say those things when he could appreciate it. That was hard for me.

Smith:  But the public outpouring.

Sally Hanlon:  And the stamina that she had to go through those days.

Bill Hanlon:  Well, that was a long process. We went to Palm Springs and then we went to the National Cathedral in Washington and those events were – Smith: Demanding, physically as well as emotionally.

Bill Hanlon: Demanding.

Sally Hanlon: And then to go to Grand Rapids after that, too.

Smith: At the very end, because I’d been with ABC during the first part of the week and with the family at the second part. We’d been told at the beginning at Saint Margaret’s, “Don’t be surprised if you see her in a wheelchair.” And, of course, we never did. And then again, in Grand Rapids, briefly, she got up with Steve and walked all that way. And the next week someone in the desert commented on that and expressed admiration for her ability to do that and she said, “Well, that’s what my husband would’ve wanted.”

Sally Hanlon: He was so considerate that he wouldn’t die on Christmas day. I always said we’d say that about the Mash, that the group the doctors kept somebody alive through Christmas day so his family wouldn’t have that to remember every Christmas.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered? I realize it’s colored by your own experiences and all that.

Bill Hanlon: Well, all the years that he was in the House of Representatives, I think he was honorable and everybody liked him. You know, today there’s the splitting of parties.

Sally Hanlon: And the scandals surrounding everybody.

Bill Hanlon: And he and Tip O’Neill were great friends. They just liked each other. And, yeah, one was a Republican and one was a Democrat, but they had to work together. They had to work together to accomplish things. And I think that he should be remembered as a person who went in there under very tough situations. The Nixon resignation and the pardon, those were very, very controversial. And that’s why he should be remembered as the leader of free world. His book was labeled correctly, A Time to Heal. And he had to do it. He had to do a lot of things, but he had to run the free world also at the same time. He will always be remembered as a quiet man and a quiet President. But the people that I think got to know him loved him.
Smith: How do you think she should be remembered?

Sally Hanlon: I think for her honesty, her openness whether it was with family conflicts or the alcoholism or whatever, the breast cancer, I mean, nothing was behind closed doors. Whenever she was interviewed on the TV talk shows, she just said it like it was.

Smith: We talked about the change of attitude about alcohol, but it’s hard for people to appreciate how closeted a subject breast cancer was 35 years ago. A, it was regarded as a death sentence and, B, it engendered almost a sense of shame. People didn’t talk about it. And she almost singlehandedly transformed that.

Sally Hanlon: And it was shortly after that - she and Happy Rockefeller were pretty friendly - that Happy was able to announce that she too had it.

Smith: I’ve been working for ten years on a suitably epic biography of Nelson Rockefeller and it’s a huge and very colorful subject.

Sally Hanlon: Well, she one time called, maybe a Tuesday, and said, “Are you and Bill available tomorrow night for dinner?” And I said, “Well, I think so. Why?” And she said, “Well, Happy is coming in with her two boys,” and they were thirteen and sixteen. And she said, “I don’t know how to talk to a thirteen year old, so maybe you and Bill could join us for dinner.” Which we did. We went to Eagle Vail to Whisky Creek Golf Club, the restaurant at Eagle-Vail Golf Course. But President Ford called in the middle of the afternoon and I was in the travel business at the time and he called and asked if I could come over to the house because Happy’s plane was delayed and he wanted to know how he could get information on where she was in the air and what time she’d be landing. So, he just called the Stapleton airport and said, “This is President Ford and I want to know…” And I said, “That’s what I should do. When I want information, I should call and just say, ‘I’m Betty Ford and I’d like to know…”” Well, that night at dinner. It was very interesting, it was fun. There was as many security guards and Secret Service as there were just the ten of us at dinner. And it was a fun dinner. I mean, the Rockefeller kids were just so terrific and sharp as could be. And we were talking and, at one point, I think it was the youngest one that said, “We should take down the Statue of Liberty if we don’t mean that.” You know, that we welcome your tired, your hungry, your poor, and that’s no longer the case. And he was fascinating to talk to. And my daughter at the time was about eleven. They weren’t invited to the dinner. But I came home and I said, “Meg, I found him.”

Smith: That’s Mark and he’s every bit as impressive as an adult as he was a kid.

Sally Hanlon: As he was at thirteen.

Smith: Obviously, Happy did a great job at raising those boys.

Listen. I can’t thank you enough. This has been great fun and I’ve learned a lot. And hopefully it was nothing painful for you.

Sally Hanlon: It’s been fascinating.

Bill Hanlon: It’s an honor to be asked to do this because we loved both of them and their family and their values and the work they did for America and for Vail and for the people that they’ve influenced.

Smith: Well, thank you for helping us.

Smith: Thanks for doing this, we really appreciate it. You came to Congress from Houston, from what had been George Bush’s old seat.

Archer: That’s correct.

Smith: Is it safe to say he was perceived to be a moderate conservative to moderate even at that time?

Archer: Yes.

Smith: Now, you were a rock-ribbed Republican particularly on fiscal matters.

Archer: Yes.

Smith: And yet you were in the House long enough to see in some way conservatism redefined, particularly when supply-side economics came in. I sense Gerald Ford was much more of a traditionalist, a fiscally austere conservative. Was there a generational change that took place? How did you deal with the new conservatism?

Archer: Initially, there was not that division. And that only came later on when Reagan became president and Jack Kemp was very instrumental in pushing supply-side economics. In fact, Jack and I had a lot of debates on that, personal debates, because he called me a traditionalist. In fact, he said I just had to move ahead into the new world and deficits didn’t matter. And I said, “No, I think deficits do matter.” And we had some very interesting debates about that. We were very close friends because we came in as freshmen in the same class.

I don’t know if anybody has mentioned the Chowder & Marching Club in the interviews with you, but Jack and I were the two freshmen who were invited to join the Chowder & Marching Club in 1971, and it became a very significant part of my life. Jerry Ford was one of the early members and was the leading member at the time that I joined. Well, he wasn’t leading member, because Richard Nixon was the charter member of Chowder & Marching and he was president at that time so he would hold a meeting once a year in the White House, which was the way the club worked. And I got to know Ford better than I would otherwise because of Chowder & Marching, [which] also had a lot to do with Jack Kemp and I becoming very good friends.

Smith: What was the purpose of the Chowder & Marching Club? Was it ideological in any way?

Archer: Well, in a sense it was, it was all Republicans, but as the history was explained to me, after World War II there were a number of members who ran for Congress and were elected and fifteen of them who were Republicans decided that they would fight a bill that was being sponsored to give veterans a cash bonus. Since they were veterans, they felt politically they could get away with opposing it. They took the position that we served our country because of our patriotic duty and we don’t want somebody to think they’re abandoning us all by giving us sort of a cash bonus. They were able to defeat that very popular proposal by a few votes, but in the process of getting organized to work against it, they got together socially and they met a number of times and they got to know each other better and when it was all over, they said, “We should keep this group together.”

No one knows why they picked Chowder & Marching as a name for the club and that’s been searched and researched and no one’s ever been able to determine. But in any event, it became a nucleus - that bill’s support - for each of its members. I don’t think I would’ve been able to get on the Ways & Means Committee except for the help of members of the Chowder & Marching Club within the process. And I benefited tremendously as a new freshman to be immediately meeting with Jerry Ford whom I held in awe coming into the Congress.

He was Minority Leader and highly respected by everyone, and it gave me an opportunity to get to know him personally by meeting every Wednesday afternoon. And in addition, we would have social gatherings several times a year when we would have our wives with us and we would meet somewhere off of the Hill and that enabled me to get to know Betty Ford, too.

Smith: Let me ask you. Is that largely absent today, that kind of socializing? I mean, certainly between the parties, it seems to be.

Archer: Well, unfortunately, the Chowder & Marching Club no longer has the social gatherings. There are a number of us who think it would be good to reinstate them, but part of the problem is that it costs money and in those days, the ethics rules did not have the same restrictions as to how you could spend, whether it was outside your campaign fund or what. So it just hasn’t happened in the last number of years.

What we do continue to do, however, is every five years, we have a gala to celebrate the beginning of the club. At one of our galas, we actually had four Presidents that attended. This year, we will have one in June, our five years is up, and if Jerry Ford were still alive, he would be there, I’m sure, because he was very, very good about coming. But we have a beautiful event. We will have it this year in Statuary Hall in the Capitol, a seated dinner and everyone gets dressed up in tuxes.

So, the Chowder & Marching Club was not philosophically dictated in the sense of any views that might exist now within the Republican Party. Nobody really talked much about philosophy in those days and the social issues had not emerged as a dividing mark. There was the issue of are you a Rockefeller Republican or are you a Goldwater Republican. But that never interfered.

Smith: That’s fascinating. Let me ask you very quickly. Had you met Ford before you came to Congress?

Archer: No, I had not. I, of course, knew [of] him, but I had not met him.

Smith: When you met him and got to know him, was there anything that surprised you?

Archer: I think because I had him up on a pedestal as a Leader of my party in Congress, I was a little bit surprised that he was so down to earth and so natural with no arrogance and no affected airs at all. And I think that was a little bit of a surprise. Easily accessible, would talk to you openly about anything and I really appreciated that.

Smith: That may answer one of my next questions. What were his strengths as a party Leader?

Archer: At that time, I would say that his strengths were that people knew how genuine he was. He was not in any way artificial. He was not politically driven, per say, in just trying to find some political opening. He was a man’s man. He got along well, and that’s not to say that he didn’t get along well with the few women that were in the Congress, I think there were only two Republican women at that time, but you just felt very comfortable with him. He’d pull out his pipe and smoke it and talk to you in a very down to earth way. And people respected him because he respected them. He respected every one of the members and spoke to them on their level and I think it was that mutual respect that really made him the Leader that he was.

Smith: And he obviously got along with the Democrats.

Archer: Yes, he did. He did. But it was a different environment then, too, very different than it is now.

Smith: Describe the differences.

Archer: There’s been a lot of talk about how bipartisan it was at that time. And it was far more bipartisan, but what people forget is that there were forty or more Democrats who were as conservative as Republicans from a philosophy standpoint. So it was very easy to work across the aisle with those Democrats who shared your same philosophy. That is not true today.

Smith: Isn’t it also true, though perhaps more in the Senate than the House, but both parties also had conservative and liberal wings. I mean, there were Republicans in the Northeast, some in the industrial Midwest, who were largely liberal by the standards.

Archer: By Goldwater standards.

Smith: Yes, they were Rockefeller Republicans.
Archer: But not by the standards of what is a liberal Democrat. And so, particularly on fiscal issues, there was great unity within the Republican Party. And George Bush, for example, who was considered by some of the Goldwater Republicans to be too moderate, was as tough as anybody on fiscal affairs, and that came to the surface when he became president.

Smith: So Ford’s job was not complicated by having to herd cats, ideologically.

Archer: It was much easier then than it is now. And you did not have the social issues emerging that become so frictional. Yes, he had an easier time and because of the philosophical harmony with so many Democrats, it was easy for him to reach across the aisle. And, what happened, too, was that even for those Democrats who are not what I would call conservatives, there were so many of them, whoever the Speaker was, whoever the leader of the Democrats was, he knew that he could not dismiss them totally, and therefore he was more inclined to work with Republicans and to work with Jerry Ford and it worked out fairly well.

Smith: It’s always been asserted that his real goal in life was to be Speaker. Did he ever talk about that?

Archer: No, I never talked to him about that, but clearly that would’ve been his goal, to be Speaker. I don’t think his goal was ever to become president. I don’t think he would’ve said, “Gee, I’m gearing all of what I do to become president of the United States.” I suspect that it was quite a surprise to him when he was picked to be vice president.

Smith: The story is told that, again to illustrate just how different things were in those days, he and Hale Boggs used to debate one another down at the National Press Club and they would drive down to the club and decide on the way what they were going to debate. Get down to the club, do their debate, they’d go have lunch or a drink and go back to the Hill. You really can’t imagine that happening today.

Archer: I don’t see that happening today, no. I really don’t. As I mentioned earlier, the whole environment then was so different and then you also did not have the advent of money to the degree that you do today. And I think that is pernicious to the system.

Smith: And, I imagine, a very different media environment. Now you have cable TV which is all about conflicts. Basically it’s a food fight 24 hours a day. And the internet, which for all of its useful purposes, has also in many ways coarsened political discourse, rumor mongering and the like. None of that existed. I mean, it sounds like a much more civilized way to do business.

Archer: Well, it was, but again, philosophically, even beyond fiscal affairs, there was a lot more harmony. Scoop Jackson, Democratic senator from the state of Washington, was liberal on fiscal matters and liberal on more domestic matters, but, boy, when it got to foreign policy and defense, he was tough. And he was a big leader and he would get together with the Republicans to fashion a totally bipartisan foreign policy and you don’t see that today.

Smith: How did the White House communicate its agenda to the House Republicans? Presumably Ford was a point man conveying that to his colleagues and vice versa. How did that work?

Archer: Well, with Nixon in the White House, the White House actually did a lot of liaison with the Congress and I think did it very effectively and many of the people who were in the White House who were charged with that would be on Capitol Hill frequently and would be talking to Ford and our leaders and talking to the Republicans as a group and, in addition, working with the conservative Democrats and developing the number of votes that were needed in order to pass something. There was a very healthy relationship between the White House and the House of Representatives. I can’t speak to the Senate, I assume they were doing the same thing in the Senate. And that was very helpful and Nixon was very successful politically. This may come as a surprise to a lot of people, but history shows that to be true. He put in place the EPA, which was a totally bipartisan effort. He was working on a new form of welfare with Daniel Patrick Moynihan in the White House, which would be kind of unthinkable today and a number of issues.

Smith: It was kind of a creative conservatism.
Archer: Yes, it was. Yes, it was. And to some degree, some of the more rock-ribbed conservatives in the Congress were really comfortable with it. There were a number of issues where Nixon was really extending and reaching out.

Smith: I wonder if you felt, because clearly we now know in hindsight that a political realignment did occur. That America went from being a New Deal country to being a basically conservative country, peaking perhaps under Reagan and then with the ’94 Republican sweep of Congress. And at the same time, Ford wanted to be Speaker, hoped that in 1972 with the Nixon landslide, you might get enough Republicans in the House. Did you sense at that time that you were part of this movement that would bring about fundamental political realignment?

Archer: I was excited when Reagan was elected because I thought that was going to change the approach of the federal government. As it turned out, I don’t think that it turned anything around. I think it slowed down movement toward a bigger and bigger federal government. But it was very interesting at that time to be a part of it. But once again, it was an activity that occurred and was successful only because the conservative Democrats, the boll weevils, so called, that got together with the Republicans by the Reagan White House. And Reagan had this great personal capability, but the fact was that he was also attacked by the media. It wasn’t just all peaches and cream and let’s sing “Kumbaya” and all come together.

Smith: And you do forget how polarizing a figure he was. But that’s true of most great presidents, successful presidents.

Archer: Yes, but Jerry Ford was not polarizing. It just wasn’t in his make up. It was in his make up to get along with people as best he could. And that doesn’t mean he caved in on his principles, but there are different ways to do things.

Smith: Let me ask you, because that’s fascinating. He went to his grave believing that he didn’t have an enemy. That he had adversaries, but he didn’t have an enemy. I’m wondering, were there people in the House that he didn’t get along with?

Archer: Not to my knowledge.
Smith: Really.

Archer: Not to my knowledge. He never said or did anything that would be negative toward another human being. He held strong beliefs and he worked for those beliefs, but he was never frictional, he was never raspy in the way he conducted himself. We need more of that in politics.

Smith: He clearly was disappointed that the Nixon landslide in ’72 did not bring in a lot of additional Republican House members. Were you disappointed in relative terms that you didn’t have more Representatives in the House?

Archer: Absolutely. Absolutely. In fact, when I saw how difficult it was to get into the majority, I actually at one point went to Bob Michel when Reagan was president and I said, “Bob, we’re not going to be able to elect you Speaker, but I believe we could elect a conservative Democrat as Speaker of the House and we could then have a bipartisan House with some Republicans as committee chairmen and some Democrats as committee chairmen, but we philosophically could then give Reagan a structure he could take full advantage of.” And I fully believe that was possible. It would’ve meant Bob Michel would’ve had to step aside and tell the Republican conference, “I want us to nominate a conservative Democrat as Speaker,” and he was unwilling to do that.

Smith: Did you have a candidate in mind?

Archer: Yes, I did. There was a Texas Congressman named Sam Hall who was, again, a non-frictional kind of person and solid and strong. He later became a federal judge. I don’t know if he’s still on the bench now. But I didn’t stress a particular individual. He’s the one that I personally would’ve picked. I just stressed the idea of it. And Bob said to me, “No, we don’t want to do that because we can use Tip O’Neill as an issue and we’ll get a majority next time by running against Tip O’Neill.” And I’ll never forget saying to him, “Well, Bob, I don’t think you’re being very realistic, in fact, I’ve never bet over $100 in anything in my life, but I will bet $1,000 that we will not get a majority next time. And I’ll give my $1,000 to Billy Pitts,” who was his chief of staff sitting in the room at that time. There were just the three of us. And he didn’t take me up on it. The point I’m making is that I was not encouraged that we were going to get to the majority. Not in the Jerry Ford, but in the Bob Michel era.

Smith: You’d said you’d gotten to know Mrs. Ford.

Archer: Not well, but because of the social interchange, I did get to know her.

Smith: What was your impression?

Archer: Well, she’s just a lovely lady in every regard and everybody loved her and everybody respected her.

Smith: You didn’t sense unhappiness on her part with her lot in life?

Archer: Richard, I didn’t get to know her well enough to be able to pick up on anything like that.

Smith: Sure, sure. Was it difficult for political wives?

Archer: It’s always difficult for political wives. The whole life of a congressman strains their family relationship and it’s one of the sad aspects of being a member of Congress.

Smith: And it’s almost paradoxical that the more successful a member is, the more visiblity he achieves, the more demands placed upon him, in Ford’s case, the more travel that the job entails, the greater the strain.

Archer: And it’s even more now. Whoever is the Leader has got to go all over the country now to raise money. You did not have that same requirement at that time. Most of the money that was raised for Republican candidates for Congress was done by mail. And then Jerry Ford’s colleague from Michigan, Guy Vander Jagt, who was head of the NRCC, travelled a lot and spoke a lot and raised an awful lot of money, but the Leader himself as I recall just really didn’t have the same demand to go all over the country. He did travel, but not to the degree that exists today.

Smith: It’s interesting that you mention Congressman Vander Jagt because I remember hearing President Ford say that he thought the reason that Vander Jagt lost his seat was, in effect, that he did his job too well, the national aspect of the job, and he lost touch with his constituents.

Archer: It hurt him back home and ultimately the campaign that defeated him was that he was not paying enough attention to his own district. But he made life easier for all the rest of us because he was funneling campaign money into the races where it was needed. Fortunately, I never had a need for it in my district. I was very lucky. But it’s a very different world today and I think that the fight for money increases the divisions. Members now are having to raise millions of dollars just to run for a House seat and then if they’re in any kind of leadership position, they’ve got to raise extra money for other candidates or if they’re a committee chairman or ranking on a committee. And yet I’m convinced, sadly enough, that that will never change until you amend the Constitution.

Smith: Let me ask you one thing and then we’ll move on, because it goes to the heart of how you all saw yourselves at that point in the loyal opposition. Because as you know, certainly by the Gingrich era, it became fashionable in some ways to almost take pot shots at the Michel approach, the notion that, “Well, we’re not confrontational enough. We’re so accustomed to being in the minority that we’re assuring ourselves of that status.” And when you go back even to the Ford era, people talk about how genial he was and he got along with everyone else. Some people read into that a lack of competitiveness, almost a resignation to permanent minority status. What was the mood within the Republican caucus when you arrived, and how did it evolve?

Archer: Well, clearly we wanted to get in the majority. I don’t think anybody sat back and said, “Gee, I’m so happy to be in the minority. This is a wonderful life.” It became very frustrating to me because once I got on the Ways & Means Committee, fortunately, it was a very bipartisan committee. Wilbur Mills was chairman of the committee and we had three Democrats who were as conservative as Republicans and every day we could put a majority together when we went into the committee room. And the staffs worked together, did not fight each other. So that was a nice situation, but after the ’74 elections was when things really changed.
Smith: This may be a silly question, but to people who don’t know, what’s the difference between being in the minority and the majority?

Archer: Well, the difference is primarily that you lose if you’re in the minority and if you believe strongly in what you were doing, and that was certainly true for me, you aren’t comfortable losing. I didn’t run for Congress just to see my name in lights, I wanted to do something for my kids or my grandkids, and it’s very frustrating. I was 24 years in the minority and at least Ford had been in the majority at one point in his career and Bob Michel had, too, but I’d never been in the majority and I would work hard and I would attempt to articulate well and I could never win.

Smith: Apart from simple role call votes, what was it about the nature of the House, the way the House ran in those days, that made being a minority even more unattractive?

Archer: Well, it depended to a great extent on your committee. In my first term, I was on the Banking Committee and we had a chairman, Wright Patman, who really did not like Republicans, in fact, to such a degree that he would not recognize Republicans to even offer an amendment or to even speak on the committee. So when you say, ‘What was it like?’, clearly that was very, very frustrating. And the staffs fought each other, everything then was as bitter as it is now on the Banking Committee. But then, when I went over to Ways & Means, it was like going to legislative heaven because the staffs worked together and the chairman encouraged everybody to participate irrespective of their party or their philosophy. It was a delight to be there until the ’74 elections and then everything flipped.

Smith: Tell me about the importance of the ’74 elections, because we all know about the whole generation of Watergate Babies, so called, who came into the House and rewrote rules. What happened?

Archer: They just turned the House upside down from where it had been and they rewrote the rules. They were determined to rid the Democrat party of the conservative Democrats, so they took away seniority that protected the committee chairmen and most of the senior Democrats were from the South.
They had been reelected over and over and over again and they were chairman of most of the committees, though not all of them. And most of them were very good chairmen. Most of them were gentlemen and treated everybody fairly.

A good example was Wilbur Mills, Ways & Means Committee, and George Mahon of Appropriations. I could maybe not name all of them now, but the new Democrat majority made every committee chairman subject to the selection of a majority of their caucus. And that changed everything. In addition, they packed the Ways & Means Committee. The Ways & Means Committee had historically been 25 members, 15 majority and 10 minority. That had been as far back as anyone could remember. Well, they packed it to 36 and then put a bunch of their Watergate freshmen Democrats on the committee. Wilbur Mills created some of his own problems, and when he was no longer chairman, the new chairman was just totally partisan, taking no input from Republicans on the committee.

I remember so much about that, of course, all those years were a lot more impressionable on me early on than later on, but there was a delightful Democrat from Boston named Jimmy Burke who never voted for any tax increase and never voted against any spending increase and he would say, “My people like spending. They don’t like taxes.” And he got away with that. I mean, he was just amazing. And he went up to a Republican on the committee, I’d been on the committee for six months and he said, “Jerry, you know, Bill Archer’s been a real good addition to our committee. He works hard. He attends all the meetings. He does his research right and he articulates well, but he’s got one real problem.” And the Republican said, “Well, Jim, what is that?” And he said, “Archer thinks this is all on the level.” And so there was that sort of thing that went on, too.

Smith: My sense is, 20 years earlier, Ford established himself very early as someone who worked hard, read everything, took this stuff home with him on the weekend, asked good questions. I mean, a workhorse, not a show horse. So those same qualities would shine through at any time. That also suggested not everyone on the committee was equally dedicated.
Archer: I’ve used the term frequently that there are two of horses in Congress, a workhorse and a show horse. And to me the workhorses are the ones who really got things done. The show horses got the press and so on. But Jerry Ford was definitely a workhorse, not a show horse.

Smith: The Agnew resignation, did it take you by surprise?

Archer: Actually, it did. It did not take some other people in the party in Texas by surprise who had become convinced early on that his ethics left a lot to be desired.

Smith: That’s fascinating, because one of the interviews we did was with Jerry Jones who, at that point, this is in the spring of ’73, Haldeman and Ehrlichman are still on the White House staff, and Jones has just been reorganizing the White House personnel office for Haldeman. He gets a call from Haldeman. Again, this had to have been March, April of ’73. He wants to know how many people worked directly for the vice president. And Jerry did some figuring and he said, “Well, I guess around 50.” He said, “Good. I want undated letters of resignation from every one of them,” which led Jones in retrospect to believe that they knew long before the Wall Street Journal ran its story that summer about Agnew’s problems, which ultimately led in October to his resignation. But the people around the president, including presumably the president, were tipped off to something that could very well turn out badly. It came as news to you?

Archer: Oh, absolutely. I was just not plugged in to that sort of thing. And I found, too, that as far as any ethical behavior was concerned by another member, I was generally about the last to know because I had my attention fixed on the legislative matter I was working with and I didn’t pay an awful lot of attention to that sort of thing.

Smith: Do you remember how you found out about the Watergate break-in?

Archer: I don’t. You know, that’s amazing, but I don’t. But, actually, it was not that momentous a revelation when it was first announced. It was like some sort of petty kid prank kind of thing and did not take on the magnitude, and actually did not, until Nixon really got involved in it. I kind of dismissed it when I first heard it. I said, “This is ridiculous. What in the world would they hope to gain by this?” And I think it could have been squelched very quickly if Nixon had handled it differently. In fact, I and several other Republicans went to the White House and urged the President to turn the FBI loose, find out who had broken the law, and let them pay the price, whatever it was, and go on. But, little did we know that he was already involved in the cover-up.

Smith: What was his reaction?

Archer: Well, I didn’t actually talk to him personally, so I didn’t get any reaction. All we knew was that our suggestion was not accepted.

Smith: Were you surprised by the tapes?

Archer: Yes, I was.

Smith: Both by their existence and their content?

Archer: Well, yes, more by the fact that they existed. I found it hard to believe that that was going on, although Johnson really started it as we know now, and Nixon just continued it. I don’t know what I would’ve advised him on that, but I know a lot of people said, “Why didn’t he just destroy the tapes?” I guess, to his credit, he was not willing to do that.

Smith: What was the mood in the House Republican caucus as these events unfolded, say, up to and including the Agnew resignation? Did you all feel you were in some sort of runaway train? What was it like?

Archer: Well, it was very demoralizing and certainly when the Watergate situation began to unfold, it was very, very depressing. Every time that I would go back home, there would be a TV camera at the airport wanting me to explain certain things about what was going on of which I had no knowledge. But it was like I was a part of it and that was the way most members were treated. So, it was terribly stifling and it also created the image with the American people that, “Well, if they’re up there, they’re probably crooks, too.”
Smith: And Ford’s role, it must have been an awkward one in some ways. On one level, [he was] the White House’s man and yet he was the caucus’ man and he was his own man. How did he handle that?

Archer: Well, I’m not privy to any personal discussions with him about that. He seemed to just sort of ride along in his usual way which was unflappable and doing what he believed was the right thing to do. It had to tear him up.

Smith: There is an element of the Boy Scout in Ford. I mean, he was an Eagle Scout after all. And I think he was genuinely shocked that Nixon lied to him. I think that, in the end, is what happened.

Archer: Well, yes, he had to be. He really had to be, and I think Nixon shocked an awful lot of people because you can think whatever you wanted to about Richard Nixon, but I would never, even though he had been demeaned by the media and everything else, I never would’ve thought that he had been doing what he was doing. It just surprised me and most everybody else.

Smith: Particularly with your constituents, with conservatives, whether the language on the tapes was almost as much of a problem as the activities that it described.

Archer: It’s hard to separate it, Richard. I mean, it was a whole very, very unacceptable ball of wax that he was covering up a violation of the law, although be it a relatively minor one in its actual essence. And he made it into a major issue and then his language just seemed so inappropriate, particularly for a president in the White House.

Smith: I guess what I’m getting at is, did it become progressively harder to defend?

Archer: Oh, absolutely. Absolutely, because I didn’t want to believe it at first and until the smoking gun tape finally came out, I was basically defending Nixon, and then it became impossible after that. And so, the rest of it is pretty much history.

Smith: When Agnew resigns, there’s a vice presidential vacancy to fill. Was there an organized campaign? I’m not saying at Ford’s instigation.
Archer: Ford did not, to my knowledge, instigate any campaign to become vice president. There was clearly a need for someone who would be acceptable to the Democrats, but somebody who still was a solid Republican. And when they began to look around, it was pretty clear there was really only one person that fit that mold and that was Jerry Ford. And again, as we’ve talked about his relationship with the Democrats in the House, I remember sitting on the floor the day that he was actually nominated and when he spoke there was acceptance across the chamber. It was the Democrats and the Republicans saying, “This is the right choice. This is the right person.” They knew that the country needed that and they got what they were looking for.

Smith: During his vice presidency, he was out of town a lot, which was interesting. I mean, again, talk about being in an awkward position, defending the president and yet not becoming so close to the president as to impair his presidential effectiveness down the road. But presumably, he was here quite a bit, too. Did you see him during that period?

Archer: I do not recall seeing him. And it may be that he came to one or more of the Chowder & Marching Club get-togethers on Wednesday evenings, but I just don’t remember.

Smith: You mentioned the smoking gun tape. Was that when you realized in your own mind that the Nixon presidency was over?

Archer: Sure. Absolutely. Until then, I was not prepared to vote for impeachment, but after that I knew that I had no choice.

Smith: Did you see Ford at all during that period or was it after he took the oath of office?

Archer: I did not. I did not see him that I can remember.

Smith: For people who weren’t around then, that first week in August of 1974, when the transition occurred with the only president ever to resign in American history, what was the mood like in this town?

Archer: Well, I think everybody knows the mood was extremely down. There was concern about what the capabilities of our government were. There was just a depressing pall that was over the whole country. I think there were some people who were greatly relieved to see Nixon go. And from the standpoint of the Republicans, I think probably the majority felt relieved that they didn’t have to go through an impeachment process.

Smith: Of course, you had to go through the pardon process.

Archer: Yes.

Smith: Before the pardon occurred, had there been discussion among your colleagues about what to do with Richard Nixon? Or any contact with the White House?

Archer: I don’t think so. I don’t remember that there was and I think it came as pretty much of a surprise when Ford pardoned Nixon.

Smith: And an unpleasant surprise?

Archer: I don’t think so. I think in my mind and the other Republicans that I’d talked to, they sensed that he did the right thing for the country even though it created some real negativity for him. But that it now pushed this aside and we could move forward with not be encumbered with the past.

Smith: Of course, you had a safe district. You could be statesmanlike.

Archer: Yes.

Smith: There are a lot of Republicans that lost their seats in ’74 and they may have lost it without the pardon, but over the years—

Archer: I don’t think the pardon had much to do with the loss of Republican seats in ’74. It was just that the brand “Republican” because of what Nixon had done was so negative that it just was hard to overcome. That was my worst election, too, in ’74. I only got 79% of the vote.

Smith: It will come as no surprise that Mel Laird had a plan to do other than what President Ford did on the pardon. That he was telling the president, “Don’t rush into this. Wait until I get back.” His plan was to put together a bipartisan delegation, members from both houses, to go down to the White House and, in effect, to petition the president to consider a pardon.
Archer: Oh, did he? I didn’t know that. I know Mel pretty well and I’ve had a lot of talks with him, but he never told me that.

Smith: He didn’t? Because I wondered whether that something he’s polished a little bit in his own mind over the years since or whether in fact it was originated as he indicated at the time. The question is, and obviously this is speculative, given the mood of the country and the political mood of this town, how realistically could Ford have “prepared” the country for the pardon? I mean, the first trial balloon, it seems to me, would’ve been shot down before it got beyond the trees.

Archer: I would tend to agree with you. I think that would have been so inflammatory that you would’ve had people just putting out rhetoric that was radioactive.

Smith: Wasn’t Richard Nixon radioactive at that point?

Archer: Oh, yes. Yes. Absolutely.

Smith: Including among Republicans?

Archer: Yes.

Smith: Maybe especially among the Republicans.

Archer: Yes, he had become totally negative to Republicans, politically, and that’s why what Ford did was the right thing, I think, for the future of the country. But it was interesting, because Mel was talking to me a little bit later and he said Ford counseled with him, now whether or not he would say this, but he did tell me this, counsel with him on almost every major decision he made before he did it. And this was the one decision that he did not discuss with Laird. And Laird said, “I was driving to the golf course on Sunday and I was going to play golf with Ford and I heard it on the radio and I nearly drove off the road, I was so shocked. And when I got on the first tee, I said, ‘Jerry, you have made the biggest political mistake of your life! Now, let’s go on and play golf.'” That’s the way he described it to me. I don’t know whether he told you that or not.

Smith: Yeah, that’s consistent.
Archer: In any event, he and Ford really were close over the years.

Smith: There’s another Laird story that we’d love to have your reaction to. Jumping ahead to the spring of ’75 and the fall of South Vietnam. Laird, of course, who was the architect of Vietnamization obviously has an emotional investment in the success of the policy. He has, for lack of a better word, convinced himself that Ford didn’t fight hard enough and that if he’d really, really tried, he could’ve gotten the, whatever, 700 million dollars out of Congress to prop up the South Vietnamese. And again, he was there, I wasn’t, but it sounds unrealistic given the mood of the country and the Congress, particularly after the ’74 elections.

Basically people wanted to pull the plug. Is there anything that our President could’ve said that would persuade a majority of Congress to vote for additional military funds for the South Vietnamese?

Archer: Probably not. I guess we’ll never know, but it would’ve been a real uphill battle to get a majority of votes to do that. I remember those years pretty well because the Vietnam War was just really bad on this country and bad on young people. I saw it in my district and work through the district. Young people lost confidence in the United States and didn’t have much hope for their future. We don’t need to have a long discussion about the war because that’s all history, but I know I had stuck with Nixon all the way through and his efforts to try get us out with some degree of success. I took a lot of criticism even back in my district for that. That, “We ought to get the heck out of there and just turn it over to the Vietnamese and forget about it.”

I would not take that position until finally we had mined the Port of Hai Phong, which in my view should have been done much earlier, but that’s neither here nor there. And we had begun to bomb some of stuff that had been off-limits before. And then, we were so desperate to have a peace agreement that Nixon had sent Kissinger over there to offer a billion dollars to the North Vietnamese if they would just sign a peace agreement. He was in Hanoi talking to them and attempting to get them to agree to that, and we had our mine sweepers pulling the mines out of the Port of Hai Phong at the same time to show what good guys we were, and “Won’t you please sign a peace agreement?”

And they came with a 100 million dollar appropriation request to bomb the North Vietnamese in Cambodia and I thought, “I can’t believe they’re doing this. You’re stroking the head of the octopus in Hanoi and yet you’re talking about cutting off its tentacles in Cambodia.” I voted with the Democrats to cut off the funding and I think that passed by only two votes. And I became persona non grata within the Republican Party for having done that. But I’m convinced it was one of the best votes I ever made. It made absolutely no sense to take that added risk for our bombers and to spend that extra money and to think we were doing any good at all. So that was a watershed moment for me in my political life as a Republican in the Congress. But I just don’t remember much about Ford’s situation at that time.

Smith: Another thing - if you remember, immediately after the fall of Saigon, Congress wanted to pull the plug, not only on the war, but on funding for resettling refugees. And they basically reneged or were about to. And Ford went to the country and put together this kind of crazy quilt coalition that had George Meany and the American Jewish Congress and others who reminded people about our tradition as an asylum for oppressed peoples - that we really had a moral obligation. It wouldn’t have happened without that effort, which, again, leads one to believe that Laird engaged in maybe a little bit of wishful thinking to believe that—

Archer: Well, I think so. I think so. But that’s a judgment call that we’ll never really know.

Smith: Let me ask you, because I assume one thing you and Gerald Ford certainly had in common was fiscal conservatism when it came to the budget and I think he vetoed 66 bills, most of them he managed to sustain. How difficult was that given the numbers you had after the ’74 election?

Archer: It was difficult because the whole complexion of the House had changed after the ’74 elections, and to try to overcome the spending proclivities, particularly for the Watergate Babies and the Democrat majority, was not easy. He did draw the line and he was very good about that. But even though he was a political animal, and he had to be to get to where he was, he still would not let that override the thing he knew was the right thing to do. I respected him tremendously for that, and I guess there were others that respected him, too.

Smith: We had a recession and it was a deep recession at the time.

Archer: Yes.

Smith: Worst since World War II, which must have been even more politically in some ways a foolhardy/courageous, depending on your perspective, not to spend federal dollars.

Archer: Yes, yes. Absolutely.

Smith: How difficult was it, coming into ’76 with the Reagan challenge in Texas? I mean, I’m not sure where you came down, but how difficult would it be for Ford against Ronald Reagan?

Archer: Well, Reagan, of course, swept Texas and controlled our delegation to our national convention.

Smith: Did that surprise you, the outcome of the primary? That the magnitude was so great?

Archer: Oh, it did, a little bit. It did. And I had taken the position early on that I was not going to get involved in any intra-party fights. There was a big split in my district when I was first elected to Congress. You had the Goldwater people and you had the Bush people, basically, in my district. And I just said, “Look, I want to work with all of you,” and I had all of them working in my campaign together and I continued with that through the rest of my career. I just would not get involved in primaries.

In fact, that may have hurt me with George Bush when he ran for the presidency, because he called me and asked me to publicly endorse him and I said, “I just can’t do it. I’m going to vote for you,” and I did vote for him, but “I can’t publicly endorse you.” And the Reagan people put a lot of pressure on me and I said, “No, I’m just not going to get involved in a primary.” And I didn’t. But they clearly were very, very emotional and the pressure never eased. When we went to our state convention, for example, my wife was National Committeewoman from Texas, and they said, “Well, you’ve got to now commit publicly to Reagan.” And she and I had both said, “We’ll work like heck for him for the national convention, but we’re not going to commit before then.” And they put down an ultimatum to her and said, “Well, you will either commit to Reagan or you will not be National Committeewoman” and they pulled her out right at the convention. So, yes, I was right in the vortex of all that, but I never got involved in it.

Smith: What were the factors that you believe led to Reagan’s sweep in the Texas primary?

Archer: You know, I’m not sure. They were very well organized, number one.

Smith: Is it safe to say, they inherited, among other things, the Goldwater activists?

Archer: Yes, they did. And Reagan had come out looking so good after his GE televised address that it just sparked a lot of emotion amongst people and caused them to really want to get out and work for him. Here was somebody who offered a new approach to throw off all the things that they didn’t like that had been going on in Washington.

Smith: And had star quality.

Archer: He had star quality and he was able to take advantage of what Obama used to get elected, which was change, hope and change, for those people who were strong conservatives. And they got out and they just totally outworked, they were better organized and they outworked the Ford campaign.

Smith: Which must’ve been a little embarrassing to Jim Baker.

Archer: Yep, a little, but I don’t think a lot.

Smith: Did you go to the convention in Kansas City?

Archer: No, I did not go to the convention. They would not make me a delegate since I had not endorsed Reagan before the convention. And that was fine with me, I didn’t really care. But I do remember what happened at the convention which was not too comfortable. They put the Texas delegation right in front of the Ford box. Have you heard about this?

Smith: No.

Archer: The Ford box was at a level that was just slightly above the floor and they deliberately did this when they seated the Texas delegation. And the Texas delegates, a number of them, came with rolls of toilet paper and threw them back over into the Ford box. I mean, it wasn’t very comfortable.

Smith: You know, the fascinating thing is that when people talk about, “Reagan,” I often say, “Well, which Reagan are you talking about? Are you talking about the Reagan who put Dick Schweiker on his ticket in ’76 because he wanted to win, or the Reagan who apparently was going to put Gerald Ford on his ticket four years later because he wanted to win?” I mean, the pragmatist in Reagan tends to get overlooked to the true believers. He was that unique combination.

Archer: No, he really was. He was incredible and somebody who came out of no political background at all. He was pretty amazing.

Smith: One effect of the Reagan presidency was to decouple conservatism from a kind of traditional fiscal responsibility to the point where people said, “Well, deficits don’t matter”?

Archer: Reagan never really embraced that.

Smith: No, he didn’t, but one unwitting consequence of supply-side economics, for example, was to shift the emphasis away from “Deficits do matter” to “Well, they don’t matter as much as they used to.”

Archer: The other thing, too, is in this business up here you never get completely away from politics, and politics is always pressing you to move, to do something that the people find attractive and appealing - and lowering taxes is attractive and appealing. Raising taxes is not. Spending is attractive and appealing. Cutting spending is not. And the Democrats had the spending issue that they could always use and so now the Republicans are coming up, and Jack Kemp and I talked a lot about this, with the approach that is going to make us more popular with the people. We’re going to be the tax cutters. And that was a change that happened at that time.

Smith: But there are unintended consequences of change. I mean, who would’ve predicted even in 1981 that almost 30 years later we would be where we are in terms of the deficits and a lot of conservatives saying, “Well, deficits don’t really matter.”

Archer: Well, the conservatives are beginning to come home now, though, that deficits do matter.

Smith: Democratic deficits matter more than Republican deficits.

Archer: I think even if you still had Bush in the White House, the conservatives would be saying, “Wait a minute. A trillion dollars? No, thank you.”

Smith: A couple quick things. While Ford was in the White House, did you see him from time to time? What kind of interaction—

Archer: Well, yeah, he continued to be a member of the Chowder & Marching Club. He hosted an event every year in the White House for the members in the Chowder & Marching Club. I didn’t see him much other than that, except that I was, and this was a very, very memorable moment in my life. My secretary came in one day and said, “The White House is calling and they want to know if you would like to come and have dinner with the President.” And, of course, I said, “Yeah. Cancel whatever it is.” And I’d forgotten how much, I think that it may have been the very same day that I was expected to go down there. And I did. Ford was president. And the White House was basically empty.

I pulled up and parked right outside the White House and went in and the staff took me up to the first floor and Ford was in the Red Room, I believe, on the first floor. And I walked in and he was sitting back just comfortably smoking his pipe, and he said, “Bill, why don’t you get a drink. What would you like?” And somebody took my drink order and brought it back. Rumsfeld was there and two other congressmen had been invited; one of them was Otto Passman from Louisiana and I don’t know what the connection between him and Ford was, and the other one was from Oklahoma, both Democrats. And he said, “You know, I don’t have any business to discuss with you. I just wanted to get a couple of friends in here to have dinner with me.” He said, “I’m a bachelor.” Betty was in the hospital with her breast cancer and he said, “I just want to have a few friends here and just put our feet up and visit a little bit.” And we didn’t talk about legislation.

Smith: Did he talk about her? I mean, did he talk about what she was going through?

Archer: No, he really didn’t. He didn’t dwell on that. I’ve forgotten, frankly, the subjects that we did talk about, but it was so personal and so comfortable. And then we went into the family dining room and we had dinner and at the end of dinner, they were just serving dessert and he said, “I’ve got to apologize to you. I’ve got to leave. I’ve got to go to the hospital.” But it was just a very warm, personal moment.

Smith: I have to ask you. We’ve heard from other people who’ve been with him in the House that it wasn’t intentional on their part, but they found themselves still calling him Jerry. Did you see that?

Archer: I did see it, but I never did after that. I called him Mr. President because I guess I am too much of a traditionalist. I’d gotten to know George Bush very well. He was my number one constituent for the entire time I was in Congress and I called him George all the way through, but after he became president, never again did I call him George.

Smith: In the ’76 campaign, obviously they started out behind and they basically caught up. Why do you think in the end they didn’t pull it out?

Archer: I’ve thought about that a lot and I believe a variety of things. I believe the pardon was a significant factor that hung around his neck even later. I think, particularly from a Texan’s perspective, he was damaged by the Reagan campaign in the primary and there was a carryover from that, at least in Texas. I don’t know about any of the other states. The Reagan activists just never could get into the fold and do the campaign and do the things you need to do in an election. But the other thing is, as you mentioned, the economy was terrible and we had inflation and we had unemployment and we had stagflation and it was a perfect opportunity for somebody to come in and say, “Gosh, we’ve got to have change,” and Jimmy Carter happened to be that person. Maybe if the election had been a month later, Ford might’ve won because nobody hated Ford. There were not any big negatives as we see today in the political arena, but it was just that they were not feeling very good about their lives economically.

Smith: And, it was, as you say, the climate for an outsider. The irony is, four years later, it was another outsider, who evicted the first outsider.

Archer: Well, and the conditions were even worse then. And as good as Reagan was, and he was outstanding, I’m not sure he could’ve won except for the basic economic conditions that existed.

Smith: Did you see Ford at all? I mean, you must’ve run into him from time to time after his presidency.

Archer: At the last five-year celebration that we had of the Chowder & Marching Club, he came and attended that and I saw him. That was the last time that I saw him. That was five years ago.

Smith: When he died, I was wearing two hats. I was with ABC at the first part of the week and with the family the second part. And I can tell you a lot of folks in the media were surprised at how much public reaction there was. It almost seemed to build, as the week went on. Some of it, I think, was that there was a whole generation being introduced to him for the first time. You know, a lot of the people weren’t alive then and they liked what they saw. He seemed, by contrast with the ugliness of politics today, he seemed pretty attractive.

Archer: Well, he was just inherently a very good human being and I think that came through to people. In addition, there was not the negativity that was thrown at him. The system today with, you mentioned the cable shows and bloggers and the whole bit, the system today can demonize anybody and I think that’s very sad, but it happens over and over and over again. And, fortunately, he was not in an era where the name of the game was to demonize somebody who was your adversary or your opponent. I think that helped him a lot. But he was a beloved individual.
Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Archer: As someone who was dedicated to this country, trying to do the right thing, respecting everyone else and a down to earth, non-arrogant individual even though he had climbed all the way to the very top. And the fact that he was at the top was not because he had climbed over other people’s backs.

Smith: That says it perfectly. Thank you so much.

Smith: How did your paths cross?

Bresnahan: Our paths probably first crossed when Representative Ford became vice president. At that time, I was assigned to Spiro Agnew as vice president and had been on his detail for five years. When Vice President Ford entered office, I had already been transferred off of the Agnew detail. I was in the Protective Support division of the Secret Service. I was in Washington and was assigned to a couple of speeches Vice President Ford made in D.C. That was the first time I really had come in contact with him. I certainly knew his name from the years that he’d been in the House and he was very influential in all those years, but I never had any contact with him until that time.

Smith: Let me ask you something and back up a bit. One of the interviews we did was with Jerry Jones, who was in the Nixon White House, and who at that point had reorganized the personnel office for H.R. Haldeman. Jones told us a fascinating story. Haldeman and Ehrlichman were still there, so it’d be spring of ’73. And he got a call one day from Haldeman, who wanted to know how many people reported directly to the vice president. Jones did some quick mental arithmetic and said, “Oh, about 50.” And Haldeman said, “Fine. We want undated letters of resignation from every one of them.” Which raises two questions. One, and I realize it’s both speculative, is whether this was a hangover from the general Nixon ’72 election order that basically wanted to reshape the administration, although it was several months later than that. Or, two, whether at that point, they would’ve already known that at the very least some kind of investigation was underway.

In other words, long before the Wall Street Journal broke the story about the investigation of the Vice President, is it logical to assume through the Justice Department, if no one else, that the White House would’ve been aware that he might be in trouble?
Bresnahan: I don’t have any direct knowledge of that. In the past Vice President Agnew refused, not always successfully, to cooperate with Haldeman and Ehrlichman.

Smith: Okay.

Bresnahan: And so there was a natural knocking of the heads there. I recall times that I heard about, I didn’t actually see it, but I heard about it, where memos would come from Haldeman that ‘the Vice President will do this,’ ‘will do that,’ and the Vice President sent it back and said, “I don’t work for you. I work for the President and if the President would like me to do this, I’ll be more than happy to do it.” And so, the order would have to come from the President and that used to drive Haldeman, especially, and Ehrlichman, crazy because they wanted control.

Smith: Was he a proud man?

Bresnahan: Mr. Agnew?

Smith: Yeah.

Bresnahan: Absolutely. And a great guy.

Smith: Was he?

Bresnahan: Oh, a terrific guy.

Smith: Fun to be around?

Bresnahan: He was fun to be around. His whole family was fun to be around. I mean, we’re getting back before President Ford, but he was a terrific guy to be around. Very friendly, very funny, completely misrepresented in terms of what people thought of him. I’m not saying, because I really don’t know whatever happened that took him down. I mean, I know the stories of it, but I don’t know how true it was or anything like that, but one-on-one, he was as nice as he could be.
Smith: During the ’68 campaign, there was this picture, caricature maybe, that was developed of him as racially insensitive. And it’s interesting to hear that the caricature is not very accurate.

Bresnahan: I think that was maybe not the start, but the continuation of politics that we see today, where they try to assassinate a person’s character. I think you’re talking about the incident with the ‘fat Jap’ and that was something that would be like if they called me by my nickname and my nickname had some sort of a racial tone to it. It was not intended that way at all and he was not that way at all. He was a fair guy. He made decisions and he stuck with them as far as I can remember. And he did what President Nixon asked him to do pretty much without question.

Smith: And he became a political phenomenon. I mean, almost larger than the White House had bargained for.

Bresnahan: He really was. He was almost like a Sarah Palin – came out of nowhere, was a county commissioner in Baltimore, Maryland. I grew up in Silver Spring, Maryland, so I voted for him for governor in, I believe, it was 1966.

Smith: And people forget he was the liberal in the race, running against George P. Mahoney.

Bresnahan: Well, yes, but he was a Republican. I certainly did not have any understanding of politics in 1966, I was still in college and not interested in politics, but I do remember voting for Agnew. He was a Republican and I was a Republican. I didn’t really know too much about him, but I remember on the ballot was an issue to raise the governor’s salary from $10,000 per year to $25,000 per year. All of the governors before him had worked for $10,000 per year, which was more money then than it is now, but it wasn’t very much. And I had hoped that I would certainly make $10,000 a year when I got out of college and so that wasn’t very much money. So, I think, for some of the things that he got in trouble for were things that governors had been doing previous to that. Not to say it was correct.
Smith: No, no. There was a deathwatch, let’s face it, at the end. How did he handle all of that?

Bresnahan: You know, it really went fast. We were in a fighting mode, ‘we’ being his group of Secret Service agents. We liked him a lot so we called ourselves ‘we’ although we were not political. We liked him; the politics didn’t matter much to us. We didn’t want to see him get hurt, but if you look back, I think you’ll see that just weeks or so before – it seems like weeks to me now – he went out and was going to speeches where he was being considered the next president, because he was vice president and at that time, it looked like President Nixon was going to go down and he was going to be the president. So, right up until that point, it looked like everything was going to go along smoothly until the trouble came. And I’ve always felt, and I have no evidence of this whatsoever, but I’ve always felt that Haldeman and Ehrlichman finally got their pound of flesh at the end.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that because, in a totally unrelated way, Nelson Rockefeller had an osteopath and buddy for thirty years, a guy named Ken Riland. Through Rockefeller, he came down and did the same thing for President Nixon and Warren Burger and a bunch of people. And he ran afoul of Haldeman and Ehrlichman and spent four years being investigated by the IRS - indicted, acquitted, but hounded. And it was very clear what the source of the problem was.

Bresnahan: There are more stories. I don’t know if this is the forum, but there are more stories of their efforts to dominate the White House and the Secret Service.

Smith: Really?

Bresnahan: I recall that the Secret Service had developed and purchased a brand new armored parade limousine, which at that time, in 1972, was the finest protective vehicle ever built. And the Secret Service brought it around one day and they asked President Nixon if he’d like to see it because it’s going to be a car he was going to ride in. And he said, “Yes, I’d like to see it.” I’m getting this story a little bit secondhand, but he came out to look at the car and they showed him some of the things in the car which were safety features and so forth, and he was pretty impressed with the car. He went back in and then they put the car away and sometime either that day or later, Haldeman came out and said, “The President will never ride in that car. You didn’t go through me to get approval to see that car.” And, generally, that’s the story. There could be details in there that I didn’t know about because I’m getting it more of secondhand through the grapevine.

But in that inauguration in January of ’73 - I was involved with that inauguration - Vice President Agnew rode in the finest car ever built, not the President because of what Haldeman had done. So, basically, the President was in a very good car, there’s no problem with his car, but this was the newest and the best and he wasn’t riding in it.

Smith: Was that the parade where you had problems with the protestors along the route?

Bresnahan: They were throwing things. Yes. I have some pictures at home. I happened to be doing the advance and I was working what we referred to as the ‘right rear’ of the vice president’s car and I had some paint on my shoes. They had thrown stuff. Nothing actually bad, in fact, I didn’t know I had paint on me until the end of the parade and I looked down and there was a slash of red paint across my shoes. But that was the inauguration where the White House staff ordered the Nixon girls to ride in convertibles. The intelligence that we had was that the demonstrators were going to throw rocks and if one of those girls had been hit in the face or somewhere with a rock, it would’ve been pretty devastating.

Smith: You know, it’s interesting, but one of the really difficult things today, forty years later, is to make people understand what an almost insurrection any culture there was, particularly in Washington. Richard Nixon likened it in some ways to the Civil War. That didn’t justify what happened, but the context is usually the first thing that gets lost when people attempt to explain Watergate and its consequences.
Bresnahan: You asked me if Agnew was a strong personality, and in this particular inaugural parade, his children were supposed to ride in an open car also. He told his Secret Service supervisors, “Just have a closed car available for the family in case I order it.” And, at the last minute at the Capitol, he said, “Put the family in a closed car,” and that’s what we did. We rolled in a closed car, put him in a new limo, and went into the inaugural parade that way. I had heard, I don’t know this firsthand, that Haldeman was furious that anybody would’ve upstaged this situation. But, from a security point of view, we knew we were going to get rocked and we weren’t on the Nixon detail, so we could not help the presidential detail, but we could make sure that our people were safe and that’s what the supervisors did.

Smith: When Ford becomes vice president, you worked some events in D.C. that he did.

Bresnahan: Yes, I was perimeter security at, I think, one or two speeches at that time when I left the Agnew detail, I went to an area called Protective Support Division because they didn’t have any place to put us because the resignation happened so quickly. We were supposed to be with Vice President Agnew for six months after he left office and something happened in the administration and there was a call that went out that the Secret Service was to leave, and this was within weeks of him resigning. He was out in California and they discontinued his detail on the spot. I was back in Washington, at the residence and we discontinued on the spot. So, then they sent us over to this Protective Support Division, which they don’t even have anymore, and that division was kind of a manpower pool.

Vice President Ford came in and had some speeches. I don’t know when they were planned and so forth, but we went and helped with security at those speeches and that’s the first time I really saw him.

Smith: For all of the professionalism of the agency, you’re also human beings. Was there a time, a moment when you either personally, or collectively, reached the conclusion that the Nixon presidency was doomed? Was it when the Court ruled on the tapes? The ‘smoking gun’ tape is the most famous. I imagine in the abstract, it was unthinkable, because obviously nothing like this had ever happened before, but was there a time somewhere when you thought this is going to end badly?

Bresnahan: First of all, I wasn’t that sophisticated to know what was going on. In fact, when I’ve told my wife, she’s heard it hundreds of times that I wish that I was paying better attention to what was going on. I was more involved with ‘Where are we going to go?’, ‘What’s going to be the next trip?’, ‘What’s my next assignment?’, than I was in what was going on right around me. But I think that we thought there was a good chance that President Nixon would resign about the time that the Vice President was doing some of these speeches where he was being mentioned as the next President of the United States. And so that was weeks or months prior to his resignation.

Smith: Which, of course, put Ford in an impossibly awkward position. I mean, on the one hand, he had to be loyal to the President and, on the other hand, he couldn’t be so loyal as to undercut his own integrity.

Bresnahan: Exactly.

Smith: That’s a real tightrope.

Bresnahan: He had a picture in his office in Rancho Mirage sitting in a chair in an outer office outside of the Oval Office. And he was sitting there and he’s reading a magazine, which he did all the time, he never just sat. He was always doing something. He said to me, “Bill, you know what I was doing there?” And I said, “No, sir, I have no idea.” He said, “Right there, I got up from that seat, walked in and found out that I was going to be the President of the United States.” The White House photographer took that picture and it’s quite historic. I don’t know if he knew what was coming. It didn’t look like he knew. He was very calm, he was just flipping through a magazine, killing some time, waiting to be invited into the Oval Office.

Smith: That’s interesting because it raises this large question. And, again, obviously it’s speculative on your or anyone’s part, but there is this quality about Ford - that he’s good old Jerry, the Boy Scout, the Eagle Scout, a guy who genuinely went out of his way to see the good in people. And the flip side of that was that he was genuinely shocked, I’ve heard him say, when Nixon lied to him or when anyone lied to him. Was he too nice to be president? Because, you know, the job requires a certain amount of ruthlessness. For example, not cleaning house more thoroughly early on, which is something Rumsfeld was urging upon him. And yet, he didn’t want to tar all the innocent people in the Nixon White House. Many of them were very capable. And he had to provide some continuity. He didn’t want to tar all of them with the brush of Watergate.

Bresnahan: Once again, at that point I wasn’t very sophisticated as to what was going on, but now I know what it takes to walk into the presidency. You need that transition period that we give our elected presidents, months of transition, to interview and hire chief of staff and different secretaries and all of those things. Ford never had that time. So, it would make sense that he would kind of keep the continuity that was there rather than go in and blow it up. Even though he had 25 years, 23 years, of experience in knowing people and who he might want to put in this or that job, it takes a little time to work your own administration in when you have to come in so quickly. And, as far as being tough, he’s tough. He was tough.

Smith: Can you illustrate that?

Bresnahan: He would stand up for what he wanted whether it be something we were doing or whether it be something on the outside and if somebody said something that he didn’t feel was true or correct. He wouldn’t be rude, he was never rude, but he would say, “I don’t believe that. I think” this or that, whatever the situation might have been. He used to have a saying, I don’t know if I can come up with it now, something about you can disagree without being disagreeable. And I thought he really kind of lived by that.

Smith: Yeah, when you look at his relationship with someone like Tip O’Neill. It wouldn’t happen today. In fact, it’s hard to make people today understand.
Bresnahan: We miss that, but that’s my opinion. No, he could be tough when he needed to be and he could be tough all the time. Whatever was necessary.

Smith: Did you see the temper?

Bresnahan: Where I actually saw his temper more than I ever saw it in any political situation, was in his athletic endeavors. He was the most highly competitive athlete that I had ever been around. It came out on the golf course and he could get furious at himself, at a poor play. He was a good golfer; he was capable of shooting in the 80s, but then sometimes he’d shoot over 100 and, boy, we kept our distance. In those days, he was former President, so we could keep our distance a little bit.

Smith: Were there signs to look out for? There are people who say that if you were up close, you literally could see the red ascending.

Bresnahan: I never saw it. That probably is true, but I never actually saw that. But, the signs that we knew, I was younger and I was somewhat athletic myself, so I was into games and sports and things. I knew when he would tee off and hook a ball terribly into the other fairway or something; I knew this is not the time to ask him a question. So, you picked your spots and because you knew from your own experiences, he doesn’t want to talk to me right now. He just wants to get out there and take care of whatever this problem was.

Smith: Do you think it bothered him, the whole Chevy Chase caricature??

Bresnahan: I can’t see how it wouldn’t have bothered him a little bit, although I think he and Chevy Chase became pretty good friends. You know, I tried to be an athlete and if you tease me about the way I do my sport, I might laugh at it, but I would rather that wasn’t the way. So I assume that was the case. It was a little unfair. This guy was an All-AmSmithan football player back in the 30s and he used to laugh because people used to make the joke about the fact that he played with a leather helmet and had gotten hit in the head too many times and he would make fun of himself on that one. So, I don’t think it bothered him a lot.
Smith: I sometimes wondered whether it maybe bothered Mrs. Ford more than it bothered him.

Bresnahan: You know, I don’t know. I don’t know that. She never said anything to us about that. When your partner gets criticized, usually that person is more offended by it than maybe the person being criticized.

Smith: On August 9th, 1974, the Nixon appearance in the East Room and then the Ford swearing in, where were you that day?

Bresnahan: Let’s see. When did Agnew resign?

Smith: Agnew resigned in October of ’73.

Bresnahan: Okay, I was probably at that time in our training division because I’d gone off the detail, and gone to the training division with a short stop at that Protective Support Division that I mentioned before.

Smith: So, during the Ford presidency, when did you come to work for him?

Bresnahan: I was lucky enough I had learned to ski a little bit, and when Ford became President, the very first year, we were going to come to Vail. The Secret Service was looking for people that could ski because obviously President Ford was going to go skiing and that's when Larry Buendorf – the first time I think I met Larry, he was on the presidential detail at that time. The Service put out a teletype requesting anyone that knew how to ski to give their name up if they would like to possibly go to Vail at Christmastime. And this was a long time ago, but somehow I think I put my name in and I got selected. And so we were all sent out to Vail, Colorado a couple of weeks, I believe, before Christmas, to go through kind a test.

Smith: And I assume there was a whole lot less here then than there is now.

Bresnahan: No, we were just in Vail then. There was no Beaver Creek. In fact, President Ford skied the very first day Beaver Creek ever had a run. He skied on that run before it was open because I skied with him that day. I remember that. But we were sent out here and they put us through a training session and so forth and, luckily, I made it through because I wasn’t that good, but neither was anybody else. So, we had one good skier, a fellow named Dave Beihler. The rest of us were kind of somewhere in between. So, we got to stay and then we got to come back at Christmastime and be with President Ford and for the next three Christmases, I believe he was in office three Christmases; I got to ski with him every Christmas. That was my only time with him that I recall as president.

Smith: And they stayed at the—Bresnahan: The Bass House.

Smith: The Bass House. Okay. Private residence in Vail?

Bresnahan: Right in the center of Vail. He could walk to the chair lift from there and we did.

Smith: Did that give you security concerns - the fact that it was right in the middle of a fairly congested—

Bresnahan: We were able to seal off the neighborhood and keep the neighbors happy. I hope we kept them happy. We tried. It was a special problem to take a president on a chair lift and then down an open ski slope, and Larry Buendorf was in charge of that. He basically put the plan together that we would do. We had formations that we ran on skis that were very similar to what the agents assigned to the president do when he’s walking around or moving around anywhere else. And so we came out and we practiced these formations and practiced what we would do in each circumstance. I think we did a pretty good job. In those days, the security was not like it is today.

Smith: After the two assassination attempts in California, was there any significant rethinking of or tightening of security?

Bresnahan: Oh, I think every time we have an issue, the Secret Service looks back at every ounce of whatever information they can come up with and they see how we can do it better. What did we miss? Not necessarily what did we do well, but what did we miss here? How did we miss this? And so every time we have an incident, things change.

Smith: It’s interesting because when we were talking to Larry, he said the problem with the Squeaky Fromme incident was that basically everyone did what they were supposed to do and it was almost an element of luck that he happened to see what he saw. Because, he’s convinced that no one else physically was in a position to prevent her from getting off a shot. You think of these guys who are still beating themselves up over the Kennedy assassination, but clearly you can be the most professional people in the world and do everything you’ve been trained to do and there are variables beyond your control.

Bresnahan: Yes, and those variables were more back in those days than they are these days. You wouldn’t see President Bush or President Obama now walk across the Capitol grounds in Sacramento. If they did, there wouldn’t be any people that had not been checked standing near them. So, all of those things are an evolution of protection that has come up as a result of the things we did there that we thought we could do better. So, most of what you see now of the president - in fact, I noticed with President Obama on TV, you don’t see very many agents around him and they have worked their protection so that the agents can back off a little bit and give him some space to do whatever the TV cameras want to do.

Smith: That’s interesting because, presumably, every presidential family brings their own experience and outlook and resentments, appreciations. It must have been tough for the Ford kids. I mean, he never thought about being president. Mrs. Ford certainly never thought about living in the White House. But then for teenage children - Susan famously - but the others weren’t that much older.

Bresnahan: Well, I came back and Susan was either a senior in high school, or I can’t remember if it was the first year in college, somewhere around there. She was probably 17 or 18 years old, came back to Vail to ski. And once again, they called on the skiers to come back, and who would like to come back and ski with her? Well, I raised my hand. And so I came back and skied with Susan, and she and a couple of her girlfriends came and stayed in Vail. I don’t know if it was spring break or some sort of break from school and we skied with her and assisted in her security here. Susan, I think, unless she was fooling me, liked us. We tried not to infringe upon her teenage years. I’m sure we did. I wouldn’t have wanted some guy walking around with me when I was 17 that my dad had control of. But, at any rate, she seemed to like us and we tried to leave her alone as best we could to make her own decisions.

I think Jack was the oldest son. Jack, at his age, didn’t really need a couple of guys hanging around with him, but he more or less put up with it and then I think we finally got a group of guys with him that were more in his age category, and I think it probably smoothed out then because Jack was of the age he didn’t need some sort of senior person keeping an eye on him. He was probably over 21 and he was a young bachelor. He didn’t need us hanging around. But eventually we got the right combination and I think Jack liked his guys. We had no problems with Steve and Mike. Of course, Steve went on to be a TV star and I think Mike became a minister. So, we were with all of them and it worked out pretty well and we didn’t have any major problems with them.

Smith: Let me ask you something, because I think to outsiders, let’s face it, it’s hard to imagine how this relationship gets defined and presumably redefined with every incoming President. It’s clear that you are always there, you’re inescapable. There’s both a professional respect and yet there’s also presumably a line of familiarity that you don’t want to cross. You’re not members of the family, but to outsiders you must look like you’re almost members of the family. How does that get defined? We’ve been told that the Fords were particularly appreciated - or example, on Christmas, they would really try hard to make sure they didn’t have events so that the agents could have a holiday of their own.

Bresnahan: Yes, many of the presidents have stayed in the White House on Christmas Day so that the agents weren’t traveling away from their families on Christmas. Now, very often, on the 26th, they’d go to the ranch, depending on which president it might be, or they’d go to Camp David or wherever they might go. Camp David wasn’t too much of a problem because that’s close enough to home. But most of them would take that into consideration. And, of course, President Ford came out here at Christmastime, but most of the agents that came out here with him more or less volunteered to come at that time. I mean, the supervisors of the presidential detail would ask who would like to go - to try to get enough agents who volunteered to go on that particular trip so they wouldn’t have to take the guy who has three children and missing Christmas would be a hardship for him. We were able to do that. The supervisor organized a detail of a lot of single guys, after that particular trip they would go back and they would get time off and the married guys would take the next trip. They tried hard to fall within those guidelines if they could. If the mission came up and we had to do it, you have to do it.

Smith: It almost applies more to a former president where they’re out of office. I don’t know if there’s such a thing as a standard length of service on each detail or whether each one is different. I’m trying to understand as a layman how that unique relationship is developed. How close is it? How detached is it?

Bresnahan: It varies from person to person. It also varies from agent to agent. President Ford liked Larry Buendorf a lot. We had another agent who played professional baseball, was an athlete, and he came over to the Secret Service. We had another agent that was with him that was a professional football player. And he had some sort of a relationship with those guys because of their things in common. Bruce Bales was a professional player and he was always talking to Bruce about baseball. David Cahill, had played for the Los Angeles Rams and the Washington Redskins and President Ford always talked to him about football. Football was his big sport because, of course, he played and was very good at it. So, he would talk to them about the sports and when he saw them, he’d say, “See what the Redskins did? Did you see what that team did?” that sort of thing.
So, there was some sort of man to man relationships there that were of interest, but when President Ford went into his house, we didn’t go with him. We weren’t supposed to and didn’t need to. I don’t think it’s like anything I can think of - but it was a friendship when he walked out. He’d say, “Good morning, boys, how you doing?” We’d get in the car and we’d go to wherever he was going. And when we were skiing when he was president, he’d walk out and say, “Good morning, boys. Looks like a great day. We’re going to have some fun today.” And go off skiing.

Smith: Well, Larry told us, for example, he’d be in the front seat of the car with the President and he said, “There were times we’d drive hours and nothing would be said.” The other thing, he wasn’t going to start a conversation - Larry wasn’t.

Bresnahan: No, because you never know, even when he’s former president, what he’s doing in the backseat. He’s reading the paper, he’s reading a magazine, and he might even be scrolling down some notes or writing a letter. So you don’t want to make small talk unless he starts it. Now, if the former president or president in the back seat says something to you, you certainly respond to it. And sometimes they ask you, “Did you see this article or that article?” And if you saw it, sometimes they’d ask you, “What’d you think?” And, in my case - like I said, I wasn’t overly sophisticated - so I kind of stayed out of that. But there were times when situations were going on around us that he would ask something on his mind and he wanted to have somebody to discuss it with. He’d say, “What’d you think about so-and-so doing this or that?” And if you had knowledge of it, you’d say, “Well, blah blah blah. What do you think, sir?” I’d try to push it back on him because he obviously knew what was going on and I didn’t.

Smith: You came out with him in January of ’77?

Bresnahan: I reported to Rancho Mirage in May of ’77. I was assigned in Washington, D.C. I think I was in the Washington field office at that time. I got a call when they were putting the detail together – either that or teletype, I can’t remember how it happened – they were looking for people that wanted to go to Palm Springs, and I had been in Palm Springs in 1967 with President Eisenhower.

Smith: Really?

Bresnahan: Can you believe that?

Smith: That’s great.

Bresnahan: So, I had a history here that I knew about Palm Springs and I said, “This has got to be a great assignment.”

Smith: What was Ike like? I mean, that was just about before his health really went into a tailspin.

Bresnahan: We actually took him back to Walter Reed from Palm Springs and he passed away in Walter Reed later in 1968, I believe.

Smith: Or ’69.

Bresnahan: Okay, I have it in my mind as April of ’69, because I started with him in April of ’67.

Smith: At that point, again, the whole idea of Secret Service for former presidents was relatively new.

Bresnahan: It was relatively new and I was a brand new agent, stars in the eyes, out in Palm Springs, out in California. I was single. I was making more money than I ever dreamed. So, it was a great time for me and we worked our eight hour shifts and we had our days off.

Smith: Now, where did the Eisenhowers stay?

Bresnahan: They stayed in El Dorado Country Club. He had a friend, if my memory serves me, it was McCullough Chain Saw - owned a house out there and he stayed at that house.

Smith: Played a lot of golf?
Bresnahan: He wasn’t playing as much then because he was starting to get older, but he did play. He played maybe once or twice a week, if I recall, and pretty much with my age in the Service, I was residence security. I didn’t go out with him very much. In fact, Mrs. Eisenhower would call this grocery store that she dealt with and order what she wanted and they would bring the groceries in. The groceries came in a box, catsup and mustard or whatever it was. We didn’t want the delivery people to go into the house because we didn’t know who they were. So, I got the groceries from the guy and thanked him. They had an account, so there wasn’t anything to sign. I took the groceries into the house and the General happened to be in the kitchen as I was bringing the groceries in and he said, “Oh, thank you very much” and I thought he knew I was an agent and he reaches in his pocket and he tipped me 75 cents. I kept it.

Smith: By the way, there were those who would say Gerald Ford wouldn’t have tipped that much.

Bresnahan: I don’t think that’s true. But anyway, I still have the 75 cents that President Eisenhower gave me, the three quarters.

Smith: Were you impressed by him?

Bresnahan: I really never got to know him, but he was very nice. And with my limited contact with him as a brand new agent, really not having much contact, he was very nice. I ended up going with Mrs. Eisenhower to Main Chance in Phoenix, which was a spa in the days before spas were really a big thing. I got to know her just a little bit because I was around her a little bit. And she was very nice, too. Very nice. But those were early days, later we went back to Walter Reed and I got off of doing a temporary assignment there on that detail. I’m going to guess, if April is the right date, then I got off in March and went back to the Washington field office where I belonged because I was still a young agent and I needed to go through my on-the-job training, which I hadn’t even gotten yet. So, I wasn’t around when he passed away in April. But the last year he was out in Palm Springs, I was with him.
Smith: Mrs. Ford, did you have much contact with her?

Bresnahan: Yes, I did. I was with them for two tours and you mentioned before that the Service likes to not have anybody stay in one spot too long anymore.

Smith: You can see why.

Bresnahan: Yes, you can get stale. I would say a four-year assignment is about max and I think that’s probably what they’re doing now. So, my first assignment in 1977 started in May and four years later, I transferred to the Los Angeles field office. And I was there for about two years and then I got promoted and came back to the Ford detail. So, I was with them for eight years. So, over those eight years, we got to know them fairly well. And, because of Vail, my family got to know Susan and Mrs. Ford and, in fact, my girls – I have two daughters – and my wife were invited to Susan’s wedding. So, that was pretty unusual. And then, during President Ford’s funeral in Palm Desert, my oldest daughter happened to be with us at that time – she and my wife were fortunate enough to be guides for the funeral area. And they got to help out there which meant a lot to them because they had known him pretty well.

Smith: There was something like 50,000 people who went through Saint Margaret’s. I still find that extraordinary.

Bresnahan: They had a bus base set up and that’s where my wife and my daughter worked at getting the people on the busses and then to the church and then back again and off the busses. Then, at the end, they were allowed to get on a bus themselves and go through the church. That was an experience that they still remember.

Smith: What was his day like? Did it change at all? We know he was a workaholic. We know he worked Saturdays. Some think he would’ve worked Sundays if he could’ve had any staff.

Bresnahan: When he was former President, he was in the office every day, seven days a week. Now, he came into the office sometimes and he would sit in there because it was comfortable and he would sit in there and read. He was an avid reader of periodicals and newspapers. I think he read every major newspaper every day. And that’s before we had everything on the internet. He was reading, he was getting the newspapers and reading them.

Smith: We’re told he never became computer literate.

Bresnahan: Uhm, I don’t think so.

Smith: Mrs. Ford did, we’re told.

Bresnahan: He might have been able to look at his email, but I’m not sure of that. But he read periodicals, Time magazine, Newsweek, Newsweek, every week when they came out, he’d read them cover to cover. And sometimes he was happy with them and sometimes he wasn’t, but the newspapers, he read every day. The New York Times, Washington Post. In fact, one of the things we always wanted to do is when we got on the airplane is to be sure we had the latest edition of the newspapers to keep him busy for the flight. I remember one time we were going into New York and he wanted to get a New York Times in the morning. We got there at 6:30 in the morning because we’d fly all night on a red-eye. And he only had large bills, he asked me, "Do you have any small bills?" And I said, “Sure.” He said, “I want to buy a newspaper.” And so I gave him two dollars or something, I don’t even recall, and so he bought the newspapers and we went on about our business in New York.

We flew back to California that afternoon and the next day, he would be running around the office trying to find me. I’m off because I just took that trip. He’s looking for me for two days to pay me those two dollars back. He did not forget those things and I think that was probably like he told me, he said when he was growing up, sometimes his family didn’t have a nickel. That’s all they had was a little bit of change. And I think when he grew up, that impressed upon him that if he had a debt, he was going to settle it and he would. He would chase you around until he could give you your money back. Not that two dollars made any difference to me, but it made a difference to him.

Smith: How would you describe his sense of humor?
Bresnahan: He had a good sense of humor and he loved a good joke. He wasn’t big on something too off-color. A little bit off is okay, but if the joke got a little bit rough—

Smith: But among those who knew him, it’s well-known, Mrs. Ford has a much more ribald sense of humor than the President.

Bresnahan: Yes, she could get a kick out of something that was a little bit more off-color than what he did. It was kind of funny because you could see at events with him as a former president - I didn’t see him as much when he was president except to ski - and he could get a little nervous around people because he was always a little bit nervous of what they might say.

Smith: In what sense? That’s interesting.

Bresnahan: Well, he just seemed to be, if people would come up to him, he was on guard. You could tell that he was on guard. And he wasn’t going to get tricked into saying something into a microphone or something that he would regret.

Smith: Because he was pretty accessible to the press.

Bresnahan: Yes, when we traveled around, usually, he would do interviews.

Part of tape unintelligible. Conversation resumes with Ford family intervention in 1978…

Smith: How difficult was that?

Bresnahan: You know, it was only difficult for us in that we knew kind of after it started that it was going on. I remember that Barbara Walters came out shortly after they got out of office, and did an interview with Mrs. For. And I was furious with Barbara Walters because she went after her, and it was a little like the press would pick on Reagan towards the end of his 80 years and it was obvious that his memory wasn’t as good as it used to be. And she was kind of having some issues and, of course, I like Mrs. Ford and I wasn’t crazy about the press. I thought Barbara Walters went after it a little too hard, so it made me angry. Of course, I didn’t say anything, but that’s when we knew something was going on. Shortly after that is when the family got together and they did their intervention.

I was, in some ways, fortunate enough to go with her to some of the meetings. The Betty Ford Center that she has now - when you first arrive, you go and you’re saturated into the Center and you stay there and you do day in, day out rehab. So she did her rehab in San Diego at the naval base.

Smith: How difficult was that?

Bresnahan: Actually for us it wasn’t difficult because she was headed towards a better life.

Smith: She wasn’t resisting it.

Bresnahan: No, not at all. She fell in line and she knew there was an issue and she knew she needed to get some help and she did. The thing that was interesting about it is they didn’t make any special arrangements for her. When she went to San Diego, she was in a group of ten people and they would be sailors, wives of sailors, they would be working people. She was the most prominent person in the group, but in the group, everybody was the same. They would tell their stories and we could hear some of that. When they would get into some of the very personal things, when she would be in with a counselor, we didn’t go there. But the general sessions, we were around. And it really enlightened me as to what alcoholism was and how difficult a disease it is to deal with. I had no idea. I thought, you know, if you’re drinking, why don’t you just stop?

Smith: Forty years ago, it was a very different culture. People just drank a lot more.

Bresnahan: Well, yes, most of our parents, smoked and they had a drink when they came home and most of the time that was not a problem. And only later on, and I think she pioneered some of that - of the fact that she would go through that rehab—

Smith: If you stop to think about her impact since leaving the White House, there are very few presidents who have the kind of impact on how real people live their lives between the breast cancer and the alcoholism and drug addiction, you know.

Bresnahan: She was out in the open. Yes. And he was very supportive.

Smith: And he stopped drinking at the same time?

Bresnahan: He stopped drinking. When she went through that, he said, “I’m not going to drink anymore. I don’t care about it that much anyway.” So he stopped and he’d literally, as far as I know, didn’t drink anymore. I mean, I don’t know if he ever had a glass of wine anywhere, but he stopped drinking. And in their younger lives, he used to talk about when they were first dating and they’d go on ski trips, in those days, what you did in the evening on a ski trip is you went to dinner and you drank and you had a great time. So that was part of their socialization, but as he got older, as we all do, it’s not that important. So he just stopped.

Smith: He was very self-disciplined, wasn’t he?

Bresnahan: Oh, man! He worked out every day of his life. He had a pool at the house and he had a pool in Vail that he had access to. It wasn’t his, but he had access to it. The one in Rancho Mirage was at his house. And he would go out every day, almost until the end, and get in that pool and swim laps. And then he’d get out of the pool and he’d do sit-ups. I don’t remember if he did push-ups or not, but he’d get in the pool and he would do a certain number of laps and he tried to keep track of the time, even as he got older. And I wasn’t around towards the end, but the agents that were said, he would get in that pool and they would have to help him out as he got into his 90s. But he wanted to get into that pool. He didn’t do it when he was traveling that much because it wasn’t really available, but the minute he got home, into the pool and work out. And he kept fit. He was very fit.

Smith: Did you see them as grandparents?

Bresnahan: Yes, but that was more internal in the house. And I wasn’t around him as much when the kids came to Vail to ski. I know he would take his grandchildren and take them down to ski school and get them into ski school and get them started. In those days, he wasn’t skiing anymore. His knees had gotten so bad that he couldn’t ski anymore. But he took on the task of taking his grandkids to the ski school.

Smith: I’m told here in Vail especially people were very good at sort of leaving him alone. Which was not the case everywhere. Let’s face it. The ultimate celebrity is a former president.

Bresnahan: Yes, people were pretty good.

Smith: And lots of people want autographs and that’s got to be one of the banes of existence just because you’re public property.

Bresnahan: The only thing that he didn’t like – two things, actually. He didn’t like to give an autograph while he was playing golf. And maybe someone else has told you that, too.

Smith: No, but I would think golf is all about concentration.

Bresnahan: Yes. And he really didn’t like to give autographs to anybody he thought might be a collector. When a little kid comes up to him and asks for an autograph, he would do it as long as he felt like the kid just wanted an autograph of a former president. And he was good about that. But, boy, when he was concentrating on golf, you do not want to ask for an autograph.

Smith: And I’m told on weekends when he was watching football, it was another almost trance-like state.

Bresnahan: Well, I didn’t see that so much because he’d be in the house or he’d be in the office when he was doing that. So, we could hear the TV going, but he’d be in there either with a friend or with someone or by himself watching the game. We wouldn’t go in and sit down with him and watch the game. We weren’t on those terms with him. But, he would come out and say, “Ah, did you see that game?” or whatever it was. And if it was Michigan and they lost, he was upset. And if they won, he was ready to go. And he’d take a bet. If you wanted to bet against Michigan, he’d take you on. Now, he’d take points from you, but he’d take you on.

Smith: You said you were there four years from May of ’77. Did you go with him when he went to the Sadat funeral which I think was September of ’81?

Bresnahan: No, I didn’t go with him to the Sadat funeral.

Smith: Okay, because that’s supposedly the genesis of the friendship with Jimmy Carter.

Bresnahan: No, I wasn’t there for that. It was ’77 until about ’81. Sometime in ’81 I went to Los Angeles. Was there for two years and then I came back again. So I came back in ’83, I think.

Smith: In ’77 then, in ’80, there was some talk, I don’t know how serious it was, about maybe he’d run again in ’80.

Bresnahan: Could have been.

Smith: And one senses that probably was something Mrs. Ford would not have looked favorably upon. In any event, they had a good life going.

Bresnahan: We went to the convention, I believe there was talk about a co-presidency where he’d be the vice president but he’d have some responsibilities and so forth. I remember that because it was in Detroit and I was working midnights. So, we were asleep during the day when things were going on. So when we got up, we all wanted to know what was going on because I was getting excited because I might be headed back to D.C. again which would’ve been fine. I was born and raised there, so to go back there with another vice president would’ve been okay with me. We were excited about it and it looked like it was going to happen. And then I went to bed and when I woke up that night, it was over. The decision was made and, typically, if President Ford negotiated, he negotiated, negotiated, negotiated, and when it didn’t work out to what he wanted – cut it off. And then we left Detroit. That was the end of that. So, I don’t know anything about any negotiations.
Smith: In later years, you were there ’83 to ’87?

Bresnahan: Yes, ’83 to ’86. I think I transferred back to D.C. in ’86.

Smith: Then, did you see him and President Carter together at all through that period?

Bresnahan: I don’t think I ever did. I did ski with President Carter, but I never got to know President Carter at all. But, I was in the Denver field office and went and skied with President Carter when he came to Crested Butte, Colorado. But I never talked to either one of them about the other. I just know that President Ford, when he first was defeated by President Carter, was not happy. Just like any athlete, he did not like to take a loss. And he couldn’t deal with that.

Smith: Was he depressed or angry?

Bresnahan: No. Angry. Angry or frustrated might be a better word. He wasn’t angry at President Carter, he was angry that he didn’t win. You know, he fought hard and he lost the fight and he wasn’t happy about that. And he mellowed pretty quickly. He didn’t seem to dwell on that. I never saw anything that I would consider being depressed. He just said, “Well, we’re going on to the next thing.”

Smith: I wonder if he ever got sick of being asked about the pardon.

Bresnahan: I think he did and he was asked a lot and the answer was always the same. And, just like the picture I mentioned earlier where he was sitting waiting to go in, people always thought that he knew and that was part of the deal. I don’t think words were ever exchanged or anything in writing. I think that probably Haldeman and Ehrlichman knew that Ford was going to do the right thing in terms of the country. I think that they picked the right guy.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Bresnahan: After I retired, I continued working for the Secret Service at doing background investigations, when I was out in California and a lot of times, I would be doing what we referred to as ‘updates’ on agents that are current and were on that detail. I don’t recall seeing him then. So, I don’t know the very last time I saw him. I do remember that when his knees were not hurting and he was walking around in the Rancho Mirage area, he was spry. He didn’t have the gray hair and he had hair, so he didn’t look his age at all. And then the next day, you would see him and he’d come out and he had some pain in his knees and all of a sudden, he looked his age. But then he got his knees done. I wasn’t around for the knee replacements. I was around for one knee surgery. In fact, I was almost in the operating room when they were doing it because we wanted to put an agent in there. And what we came up with as a compromise is I was just outside. I could see him through this window in the door. And I stood there and watched the surgery. We really weren’t too concerned about that particular situation. But once he got his knees fixed, he was doing pretty well for awhile. I don’t recall seeing him when he was past 90.

Smith: And his health really was very good up until right about then.

Bresnahan: Right about that time and really almost within months before he passed away that the agents would tell me from the detail when I would come back and talk to them (when I was doing their backgrounds) that they were helping him out of the pool and things like that. But he was still getting in that pool every day and doing his laps. And I said, “Boy, that scares me to death.”

Smith: Well, especially at this altitude. Especially those last two summers.

Bresnahan: He didn’t come up here towards the end.

Smith: He actually came up here the last summer.

Bresnahan: The last summer?

Smith: Both the last summers and it was a subject of real controversy with his doctors, his friends. I remember a conversation with Mrs. Ford and she said, “You know, we’ve had the quantity of life. Now we want the quality of life.” But, I mean, it was tough.
Bresnahan: I talked to some of the agents that were on his detail and they said that he actually went doctor shopping on that deal, because the first two doctors he talked to said, “Sir, we don’t think you should go up there. It’s not really good for you.” So he went to another doctor and that doctor said, “You know, you want to go to Vail? Go.” He says, “You’re going to be somewhere when you die, so go to Vail.” So, he said, “Fine.” And that was it, he came to Vail. So, he had a tough time, I think, that last year. It was a tough time. What year was that?

Smith: 2006.

Bresnahan: Okay. I was around, but I was not with them. I’ve always been in Vail ever since 1977 when I came with him, but in talking to the agents, he had a tough time. I think they went back early that year.

Smith: I think they did. Yeah. There was a trip to the Mayo Clinic in between.

Smith: Todd Maturnich, who’s thoroughly professional and discreet, was a little uncomfortable in talking to us and wound up giving us one of the best stories. It was maybe three months before the President died. It was the last time he came out of the Eisenhower Medical Center. And the agents picked him up and they said, “Now, we’ll go home.” He said, “No, we’re going to the In-and-Out Burger.” And they went to the In-and-Out Burger, he gets out of the van, he walks into the In-and-Out Burger, and he stands in line to get his burger.

Bresnahan: I’ve got a story about McDonalds. This is when he was still playing golf when he was younger. He was playing in Palm Desert, I don’t know which course he came from but one of the courses in Palm Desert, and the three men he was with wanted to go to lunch. And President Ford was always in a hurry, he wanted to get back, he had things to do at the desk, and so forth, and he didn’t want to sit down and have a two hour lunch. So, he said, “Okay, fine. Let’s go to McDonald’s and get a hamburger” is what he used to call them. So, I was in the car and he said, “Let’s pull into McDonalds” and there was one right there in Palm Desert. So we pull into McDonalds, we got out of the car, and I am with him, I just followed him in because this is totally off the record, we don’t know what’s going to happen. We follow him in and he gets in line and he gets up to this little girl and this young girl wasn’t even born in 1977, so she has no idea who this gentleman is in front of her. And he goes,
“What do you have?” And she points like this at the menu which is behind her. She’s looking at him and he’s looking at the menu. “That’s what we got.” And he looks up there and he goes, “Can I get a hamburg’?” And she goes, “Yes, sir.” And so he ordered a hamburger and a Coke or whatever he got and she never knew that she had served the former President of the United States. It was quite funny because he knew about McDonalds but he likely had never been inside before because he didn’t really know the system. So it was probably similar to the In-and-Out Burger story.

Smith: Now, when you’re out with him in the limo did you radio back to the command post and say, “Change of plans. We’re going to McDonalds”?

Bresnahan: Yes.

Smith: And what did they say? “Okay”?

Bresnahan: Yes. It’s no problem if we didn’t know we were going there, nobody else knows we’re going there. So we’re not too concerned when we do these off the record type things.

Smith: So when you sent the report that you’re going to McDonalds, did they come back and say “_____”?

Bresnahan: No, they were used to that. They might have radioed back and said, “Bring us back a Big Mac.”

Smith: They knew the system.

Bresnahan: Yes, they know the system. Those things were always kind of funny because when he would get out in the public and into a routine that he wasn’t used to, it was funny to watch him.
Smith: I assume even just getting on a plane you’re surrounded by people and presumably a lot of them recognized him.

Bresnahan: Well, as former president, I traveled with him a lot, just like Larry did. And I would always make sure for my own sanity and my own protection that we had the seats that he liked. He wouldn’t ask me to do it, but I knew that if I wanted to have a comfortable trip without him being upset, I’d better find the right seats. He’d travel first class on a commercial and he liked to sit at the bulkhead if there was leg room, because he couldn’t sit like this with his knees bent because it would hurt his knees. So, depending on what the aircraft was, where he would like to sit. I would try to call the airline prior and make sure we were in the seats we belonged in. And sometimes you didn’t tell the airlines who it was, but since you’re a first class customer, they treated us pretty good. I said, “Well, my friend that I’m traveling with” because sometimes he would travel under his own name. Sometimes he would travel under other names.

Smith: Really?

Bresnahan: I can’t remember if Penny would use her name for the reservations, but we would use sometimes different names and sometimes his because I remember that coming up, too. But I always made sure when I was traveling with him that we got to the seats we were supposed to and then when we got to the airport, the airlines would give us the courtesy of putting us on the plane first. Then he would get in on the window side and I would get in next to him in the seat blocking people from actually coming in and trying to shake his hand or whatever. And sometimes people would get on and would recognize and they’d reach over and he’d shake their hand, but I wouldn’t let them get in too close to him. And what he would do is he’d get right into his reading and so a lot of times people would see him and go, “Oh, there’s President Ford” but they would see that he was busy and give him the courtesy and keep moving.

Smith: One airline story that would’ve been after your time, but he was trapped. He had no choice. He saw Oliver Stone’s JFK, which is a travesty. I mean, from start to finish.
Bresnahan: Yes, it would be for him.

Smith: And especially for him. I wonder if he watched movies or tended to work.

Bresnahan: I don’t believe he watched the movies very often. He would read and he was funny because when we were, we did a lot of red-eyes, because he didn’t like to waste time. So, he could sleep on an airplane as well as he could sleep in his bed. And he would get on the plane and as soon as the plane started to move, he would go to sleep. He was like a lot of politicians, when he wanted to go to sleep, he’d go to sleep. And he was out cold. I’d be sitting next to him and he’d say, “Bill, I’m going to take a little nap. When the food comes, wake me up.” So, we’d take off and you know how long it takes until they bring the food and in those days, first class had some pretty good food. The food would be coming and I said, “Mr. President, the food’s here” and I’d give him a little nudge. “Oh, okay” and he’d wake up and he’d eat his dinner. He would often say, “Now, I think they’re going to have hot fudge sundaes,” which he liked, so he said, “Wake me up when the hot fudge sundaes come,” and he would go like that and he was out cold again. To be able to sleep like that, what a great thing! Ten minutes, maybe fifteen minutes, the hot fudge sundaes would come and I’d have to shake him to wake him up. And he’d wake up, he’d eat his hot fudge sundae, and back to sleep again. And then he would wake up when we landed in New York.

Smith: Meanwhile, you’re awake the whole time.

Bresnahan: Oh, yeah. That was funny. He would say to me, as we’d land in New York, “Oh, boy, I really slept good on that flight. How’d you sleep?” And I said, “Sir, I don’t sleep. How would it look if your Secret Service agent was asleep next to you?” “Oh, right,” he would say.

Smith: Sounds like you liked him.

Bresnahan: Oh, I did. I did very much. He was great to me and always very nice. We had a deal in Vail when we would travel like that, once again, we would leave very early in the morning to go. He was going to his boards and different things that he would go to.
Smith: Would he fly out of Eagle or would he go to Denver?

Bresnahan: We had to go to Denver. Eagle really wasn’t doing that much flying unless we got a private plane. Sometimes if we had a private plane and he was doing an event and they’d provide him with a private plane, we’d fly out of Eagle. But most times, we’d fly out of Denver and we would leave at 5:30 in the morning to get an early flight and there was a donut shop in Vail and the guy came to work at 3:00 in the morning because donuts, you make early in the morning. The baker’s there and it wasn’t even open and I got to know the guy. So, I would go and knock on the door because on my way to the Ford house I’d get him a cup of coffee and I’d get a bag of donuts for both of us because if he had coffee and donuts, then I could eat coffee and donuts. So, we’d get coffee and donuts and when he’d come downstairs in the car, I would get in the microwave (and he took his coffee black) and warm his coffee up just before we went out and would pass it back to him. “Oh, did you get any donuts?” I said, “Yes, sir” and pass the bag of donuts back. But that meant at 4 o’clock or 5 o’clock in the morning, I could have a cup of coffee to keep me going, so it was kind of a mutual deal.

And the funny thing was that Larry Buendorf was taking a trip with him. After we had done this a couple of times, Larry was going to take a trip with him, and it was one of those 5:30 in the morning things, and he called Larry at home the night before and said, “Larry, can you stop and get some coffee and donuts?” Larry called me the next day and said, “What have you started?” But, Larry went and got the coffee and donuts. He was a good guy. He took care of us and we took care of him.

Bresnahan: I wasn’t surprised by the reaction over what had happened to him and the respect that people had for him. I was surprised that so many people thought that we would be devastated, the Secret Service agents with him. People came up to me and were giving me condolences. I appreciated that and, you know, I felt bad, but I knew that he was 90 and I knew that we can’t live forever. I felt bad that he had passed away, but I knew that it was going to happen and so I wasn’t devastated like a family member might be. I happened to attend a memorial service in Vail during his memorial service. During the service his Vail friend done a film of all the people making comments about his life and things where he had touched them. During the film people kept coming up to me and kind of patting me on the back and saying, “We’re sorry.” That was kind of nice and I was very glad that my wife and my daughter got to be a part of the memorial in Palm Desert. That turned out very nice for them, too.

Smith: Clearly they were both very active in this community. I mean, very visible, very much involved, and not just names on a board.

Bresnahan: Oh, you could see them walking down the street a lot of times. He would go into town and get his haircut. He had a barber named Karl. Karl happened to be Mrs. Ford’s hair dresser, too. Karl did haircuts and he did ladies’ hair. So, you would see Mrs. Ford going into Karl’s and you’d see the President going into Karl’s. The Fords would go to Pepe’s for dinner or The Left Bank. They had a series of restaurants around town that they would go to regularly and they were very active in the community.

The big deal was the Fourth of July parade. Every Fourth of July, the Fords were the grand marshals of the parade. And they would sit on Pepe’s deck. If you get a chance to go over to Vail and see that, they would sit up there and watch the parade. And I’ve seen the parade probably every year since 1977 and it hadn’t changed since then. The fire trucks and a real down home AmSmithan Fourth of July parade. The Fords would come every year to do that and every year, he would light the Christmas tree. They would come to Vail and they would hold the Christmas tree lighting. They would wait until he got to Vail to light the town Christmas tree. He often took the grandkids to that.

Smith: He had a good life.
Bresnahan: He did. He had a very good life. He worked pretty hard and he enjoyed his golf.

Smith: And he lived long enough – I mean, poor Lyndon Johnson who died the day before the Vietnam peace agreement was announced – and Gerald Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon.

Bresnahan: Yes, I think he didn’t have any regrets. He regretted losing the election and you know, when an election’s that close, that had an impact.

Smith: Yes, they wanted an outsider.

Bresnahan: Yes.

Smith: They’re voting against Washington.

Bresnahan: Yes, but he didn’t let that get him down. He was upset about it for awhile and then he got over it.

Smith: Last question. How do you think he should be remembered?

Bresnahan: I think he should be remembered the way that he wanted to be remembered and that was as a person that came in at a time when we were in crisis and straightened the crisis out and carried us through. He would’ve liked to have had another four years to push whatever agenda that he had at the time, but he wanted to be remembered as getting us out of that mess. And for us that were around during that, that was a mess. We had the Vice President involved and we had the President involved and it was a tough crisis for us and he did pull us out of that.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: I’m fascinated by your involvement with the Brown case and Thurgood Marshall. How did that come about?

Coleman: Well, I had clerked a year for Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter and during that year I got to know Mr. Marshall.

Smith: You were, in fact, the first African American law clerk?

Coleman: I am not African American, you call me “colored, Black, Negro” but I’m not African American. I probably had ancestors living in northern Italy, along northern Europe long before you did. I’m serious.

Smith: But you were the first Black law clerk at the court?

Coleman: I knew him from that and it also happened that Thurgood Marshall was born in Baltimore right next to the house where my mother lived, so I had gotten to know of him a long time ago, and I was working at Paul, Weiss at that time in New York. He said, “Well, two weeks from now we’re having a meeting to decide whether we should go after segregation in public grade and high schools. I want you to attend.” So I attended and after that he asked me would I work with him. I said, “I’ve got a full time job.” So I worked at Paul, Weiss until about six o’clock and then I’d go down work with him at the Legal Reform Offices until eleven o’clock p.m. and catch the last train to Philadelphia. I was living in Philadelphia and working in New York.

Smith: What was your role in the actual case? Did you co-author the brief?

Coleman: I wouldn’t say that. Mr. Marshall clearly was really in control. I think I made some great contributions. In fact, if you ever read Simple Justice, you will see – spelling out things I did. I certainly felt how they should handle the case. I think that most people would say that I and Lou Pollak wrote most of the brief. Lou was, at that time, a professor at Yale, but he had clerked for Rutledge when I had clerked for Frankfurter.

Smith: Did you feel welcome at the Court?

Coleman: Oh, yeah. I had a great time. All of them were very good, the law clerks. My co-clerk was Elliot Lee Richardson, later of Watergate fame and also held at different times three Cabinet office - we’d gone to school together. No, I had a good time, although I must confess that one time when I was working with Justice Frankfurter, Elliot stuck his head in and said, “We’ll go down to the Mayflower to eat.” I said, “I’ll be out in fifteen minutes.” When I got out Elliot said, “It’s kind of late, let’s eat at the railroad station.” So I ate there and when we came back I noticed that Richardson and Frankfurter were crying, and they were crying because Elliot had called the Mayflower and the Mayflower said they wouldn’t take a black person.

Smith: This would have been in the mid 40s?

Coleman: This is 1948-49.

Smith: Your paths first crossed with President Ford, because of the Warren Commission?

Coleman: Yes, the Warren Commission. I was one of the senior counsels on the Warren Commission. He was a member and I got to know him then. Also, I’m pretty sure I visited him with Thurgood Marshall to talk about certain civil rights issues.

Smith: How responsive was he?

Coleman: He was superb. I think when the history is written it will demonstrate that people like President Ford and Eisenhower did much more to bring about change than anybody else, although a lot of other people talked about it.

Smith: It’s interesting, because in the case of Eisenhower, the famous Eisenhower judges who…

Coleman: Very significant. I got to meet Eisenhower because my wife’s father was a doctor in New Orleans, and he was on the Republican delegation to the ’52 convention. He and a gentleman named John Minor Wisdom, who went on to be a great judge, were the two that led that delegation from Taft to Eisenhower. So Eisenhower always was very nice to me, and I really got to know him fairly well.

Smith: How hard has it been over the years defending your Republican status?

Coleman: Well, it’s been hard, I think in part because the Republicans really never tell the true story. There’s a wonderful book by a guy named Norton on Eisenhower and the civil rights movement and he has in it things that Eisenhower did that even I didn’t know. For example, after the Supreme Court decided the Brown case, it set it down for re-argument on what the decree should be. Well, before the re-argument, Eisenhower ordered all the schools in the District of Columbia to be desegregated, which is something I never knew. But he just did it. I knew enough about the military to know that they have a certain pattern and he warned, felt that it was wrong for any President to ever interfere and put troops in a state. And secondly, he felt, after he’d been in for some time, that there should be desegregation.

I talked to him once and he said two things changed his mind. One: “when I went to high school there were no blacks; I then go to West Point and there are no blacks; I then, like any other military man, get sent South to train and there were no blacks in key positions.” He said, “the two things that changed my mind was - one: the Tuskegee Airmen who flew and never lost a bomber. They flew and they really protected.” Also, and I had this verified by a German, when we start going through Europe, the Germans felt if you let the armed U.S. troops go through, that the people carrying the goods and military supplies were the black people and they would be scared to go through. But they all went through. Finally at the Battle of the Bulge, something that very few people know, for three days the blacks held that line until General Patton got there. Those are the things that really changed Eisenhower’s mind.

Another thing, the first key person to ever work at the White House with Eisenhower…
Smith: Was it Frederick Morrow that was on the White House staff. Did you know Fred Morrow?

Coleman: Well, I thought the guy’s last name was Rice. Wasn’t it Emmett Rice? Now it’s his daughter who is the one appointed to the UN. I think you will find it was Emmett Rice, he was a great economist. Also there is another story, and the American people just have not understood life. There is a guy, Wilkins out of Chicago, a lawyer who was the deputy secretary of labor. At that time the secretary of labor was somebody who never attended Cabinet meeting. So Wilkins had attended all just about of them. So Eisenhower was the one that started the Branch Rickey Commission, really to help get blacks in. I was on the Branch Rickey Commission, so I got to know him again there.

Smith: One sensed with Eisenhower, across the board, not just with this issue, that, “The job of the President is to persuade, not publicize.”

Coleman: That’s right, and that’s been the great tragedy. Now if you’ll read this Norton book you’ll find out that Lyndon Johnson was admired very much. In fact, I voted for him when he ran against Goldwater. But Senator Johnson would not let them put the provision in the [1957] bill dealing with voting. He stopped that, of course. When he got to be President he put it through, so he gets all the credit. But Eisenhower had drawn a bill and that was part of the bill, but he [LBJ] wouldn’t let it go through.

Smith: He offered you an appellate judgeship, didn’t he?

Coleman: Who?

Smith: Lyndon Johnson.

Coleman: Oh, Lyndon Johnson. Yeah, he offered me to be on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit - but I said no because I had three kids to support. The interesting thing is that what it was, he was in a big fight with Joe Clark, who was the senator, over what they were doing – with Vietnam or North Korea – one of them, one of those battles going on. But I was practicing over at Richardson Dilworth, which were also the leading Democrat in Philadelphia, so Johnson felt if he nominated me that Joe Clark couldn’t attack me for some reason. But I told him no.

And [I’ve] also been told there is this document which says when he nominated Thurgood Marshall for the Supreme Court of the United States, that if Marshall had not gotten through, that he was going to nominate me. I know that because one guy who was on the committee afterwards saw me and said, “You know the vote was tied, but then I realized that Marshall was your friend, so I voted for him.” So my practice of law continued.

Smith: Let’s go back to the Warren Commission. What was Ford’s contribution to that commission?

Coleman: Well, Ford – they all insisted that it be done right. Earl Warren and Ford, and it was a long time when they rejected the idea that Senator – senior senator from Pennsylvania – Arlen Specter had. They rejected it, but finally they all found the backup facts to believe him. My responsibilities were to determine whether it was a foreign conspiracy, whether Castro had anything to do with it, whether the Russians had anything to do with it, and that part. Specter was the one that really developed the one bullet, and it turned out – I think he’s right – it’s been fifty-five or sixty years now and nobody has come up with somebody else.

Smith: Has any information that has surfaced since then, done anything to affect your conclusion, particularly in terms of foreign involvement?

Coleman: No, I think it was right and actually something we didn’t put in the report, I guess I can say it now, was that Oswald, when he saw his wife who was separated from him, said, “By the next day you will know something about me which will make me very important.” We certainly didn’t think we should say that the reason why he killed the president was because he was trying to satisfy his wife.

Smith: You know, that’s fascinating, because one of the things that President Ford said in the last years of his life went very much to this theory that marital problems, including sexual problems, may, in fact, have…
Coleman: That’s why we would not put that in the report because nobody would believe it. But he was the guy. And another problem we had was that when it happened, the Russians thought that somehow they were involved in it because they had had Oswald up in Minsk for about a year or two training. When they went out on hunting - the rule was, the men couldn’t come back until every guy had shot the animal. And Oswald was such a lousy shot that he couldn’t hit the person, so finally, somebody would stand behind him and shoot so he thought he got one so they could come back.

But when he was in the Marine Corps, he was given the highest rating as sharpshooter. So we just felt that there were people in Russia that were trying to make themselves look good, because they thought that if they trained the guy that killed the President of the United States - our relationships weren’t that great at that time. And also at the time with Castro – found out that he had nothing to do with it.

Smith: But did you know, at that time, what was revealed, in fact, during the Ford presidency with the CIA revelations about the plots against Castro, about the attempts of the American government to eliminate Castro?

Coleman: Oh, yeah, we knew. The Secret Service and the CIA gave us all the information that we needed, Earl Warren insisted and President Ford. They read the documents and they were as prepared as we were when we briefed them.

Smith: How did you become secretary of transportation?

Coleman: Well, I was sitting in my office one day and I got a call from Don Rumsfeld saying would I come down and see the president tomorrow? I met him and talked with him and then he offered me – the first three jobs I turned down-

Smith: Do you know what they were?

Coleman: Well, one was another Cabinet spot and then there was one at the UN, and he then said secretary of transportation. I really didn’t know they had a Department of Transportation, I didn’t know what the hell the guy did, and really you could never say to man like Ford, “I don’t know what you’re talking about.” So I said, “Let me think about that one.” I went home, fortunately my daughter was home from Yale Law School that weekend, and she said you should do it, because they didn’t have that many people in the Cabinet. I called President Ford and said, “If you still want me, I’ll be willing to do it.” So I did it.

Smith: And it is an extraordinary agenda that you had.

Coleman: Oh yeah.

Smith: Talk about déjà vu, the energy crisis, the fifty-five mile per hour speed limit, which of course today, conservatives all want to repeal. The reorganization of railroads.

Coleman: Railroads, the Concorde coming to the United States. More important, when I took office, twenty five percent of the highway system was not completed, tied up with mainly environmental problems.

Smith: That’s the Interstate Highway System.

Coleman: Interstate Highway and I got them all unglued and got the money to do them all. The one mistake I made was, I did not insist that they change the federal tax from a certain cents to a percentage. Because if it had been a percentage they’d have much more money. There was a memo in a file…so they really, really wouldn’t affect the price charged because the dealer would take that in consideration when he fixed his price.

Coleman: There were two miles done when I got in. And the only thing the federal government would say, they would lend a billion dollars to Metro. Fortunately, I had a wonderful lady working with me, and at the end 118 miles was planned and it all got done. I must say the Mayor of Washington helped me a lot because he was willing to take some of the highway money and put it into transit and that helped us to get moving, and after that we got the rest of the money.

Smith: The landing rights for the Concorde. That must have been controversial.
Coleman: Oh, yes, it was very controversial. The French and the British were saying, well we won’t let it land because we (the US), at one time, were trying to do a high speed plane and we stopped doing it and therefore we didn’t want our competitors coming in. And there were all types of information, what it would do to surrounding territories. So I thought that the best thing to do was have a public hearing. I sat in the public hearing and actually somebody told me that the British wouldn’t come in, but they did come in. Then I wrote the report and at least the Second Circuit said I thought it was a good report. Did you ever read the Second Circuit opinion?

Smith: No, I haven’t.

Coleman: I also did the same thing on I-66, which was all jammed up. I felt that the Secretary should sit down and hold a public hearing, then write an opinion as to why he did things.

Smith: And what happened on I-66?

Coleman: On I-66 for umpteen years, that’s the one that goes right outside of Washington. It wasn’t built because some people thought it was environmentally unsound. It was too wide, not narrow enough, and I just got it done, and also talked to the governor then, and I said, “Well, also, you’ve got to make sure that your employment figures for people doing the job reflects the people that live in the area.” And he said, “Are you trying to blackmail me?” And I said, “I don’t think you should use the word blackmail anymore.” He turned out to be a good friend.

Smith: The requirement of airbags in automobiles.

Coleman: Oh yeah. Once again, we had people to look at it and what would happen and I had a very good general counsel, a guy named John Hart Ely, and we really worked on it and got it done.

Smith: Also, fuel efficiency standards.

Coleman: Oh yeah. President Ford was good, and if we’d had another week, I think we would have won the election, and I think…
Smith: I’m struck by all of these elements. If you put yourself in today’s Republican Party, I’m not sure any of these would get majority support. They would be seen as government overreaching.

Coleman: I thought they were necessary to do, and we did them.

Smith: So where does that put him on the spectrum – certainly he was a fiscal conservative.

Coleman: He was a fiscal conservative, but he understood what had to be done, therefore he did it. He was not for just spending federal money to do things that don’t make sense. But for those, it made sense. Once I got a system where I could also get people employed, like building the railroads and everything, like from Washington to Boston, I just slipped that in. But instead of saying they have to be black, I would just say it would have to people similar to those that live in the neighborhoods. Well, hells bells, _______. And we really did it. We had a good time.

Smith: Can you think of an instance where he overrode you on something?

Coleman: No, I can’t think of an instance, but I know an instance where he wanted to override me. Ed Levi came in one day, the attorney general, to a Cabinet meeting. And his first issue was, what do we do with New York? The A.G Levi thought that you give them money and let them work the system out. Ford kind of passed over that, and the other issue was the bussing in Boston. The Attorney General said we should stay out of that and his solicitor general wanted to file a brief on the side of the white parents - that it was illegal and everything, and I finally said, “You know, this really amazed me. You talk about the first problem and you’ve got one mayor who is supposed to spend all this money and do everything, but yet, when you talk about a federal judge who is the only one trying to change the system, that you shouldn’t let him do that.” I went on and on.

President Ford finally said, “You know, Bill, I never believed in bussing. When I played football, even when I got hurt, I still walked to school.” I said, “Mr. President, if you would go on the television and say that’s the reason why you’re against it, I’ll support you.” He kind of laughed and we stayed out of the case and then what happened in Boston happened.

No, he was a very decent guy. Not only that, but on his foreign policy, he and Kissinger, first time our nation really recognized the Chinese, he got the problem dealing with Formosa/Taiwan, whatever you want to call it, and he was really solid and I think, with all due respect to President Carter, if he’d won the election again, I think we’d have a better country today.

Smith: How did he use the Cabinet? What were Cabinet meetings like?

Coleman: Well, he’d have a Cabinet meeting, but more important, on Saturdays, he would make himself available from one to five. The reason not until one was because he and Tip O’Neill used to play golf in the morning and then he’d come in at one o’clock. You’d raise the problem and he’d sit there as a judge sometimes, and Jim Lynn would have his ideas, I’d have my idea. One thing - Jim Lynn could read my report but I couldn’t read his. I thought that was unfair, so we finally got so the Cabinet officer could read the report of Jim Lynn to head up the OMD and that really was a good idea. On the other hand he would leave to go off to Asia.

Smith: Did he encourage back and forth debate within the Cabinet?

Coleman: Oh yeah, back and forth with the Secretary of Treasury. No we’d have real debates. I remember one time when the Attorney General came, said that we decided that no Cabinet officer could use the car to go to and from work except the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, and Secretary of Defense. I said, “Why are you exempting them?” They said, “Well, they get threatened all the time.” I turned to Carla Hills, Secretary of HUD and said, “Carla, tomorrow morning write me a letter threatening me and I’ll write you one.” So we kept the cars. We had a good time. But he listened, he was bright. And sometimes he said, “Let me think about it,” and come back the next day.

Smith: You said he was bright. There is this notion, the stumbler and all this sort of thing…the old line that LBJ stuck on him. Tell me about his intelligence.
Coleman: In fact, a young man who was in his class at Yale said that he got the highest grade in the course on how you handle governmental ethics. That he got the highest grade. He was an awfully good student at Yale, did quite well, and he was a good lawyer. He and Phil Buchen – they were good lawyers. Levi was a very good lawyer. They would talk – really talk legal issues and really demand you come back or write up what you want to do. Like on the Concorde, I just said, “Chief, stay out of it – and I’ll let you know five minutes before I announce it. One remedy is that you could fire me other than that - just stay out of it.” So that’s the way it happened.

Smith: He probably appreciated that.

Coleman: Oh, we were always good friends. Afterwards I got him to go on one of the boards I was on.

Smith: One of the interesting things about him - clearly he was perfectly comfortable surrounding himself with people of high IQ and combative personalities.

Coleman: And he brought Elliot Richardson back from London to become secretary of what? Education, I think. No, he was really bright and he really knew how to run the government. The whole time he never had a majority in the House or the Senate, but he got most of the bills through.

Smith: How did you observe the Kissinger-Ford relationship?

Coleman: They respected each other. Henry obviously was very bright. But I think on most issues, President Ford would agree with Henry, and there was no conflict of that type. Kissinger is awfully bright.

Smith: It is interesting, for example - and Ford tried to make it clear there was nothing personal - but that he simply believed it was better policy if the National Security Advisor did not also wear the hat of Secretary of State. That it was supposed to be, not an adversarial relationship, but differing.

Coleman: Brent Scowcroft was a superb person, it really worked. We had some issues and Carla Hills had some issues, and she was able to get a lot done.

Smith: He was a strong supporter of mass transit.
Coleman: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Again, I say it with a certain element of surprise in my voice, because you don’t think of more recent Republican presidents, in particular, as favoring this agenda.

Coleman: Oh, come on. That’s not true – you wouldn’t have the highway system if it weren’t for Eisenhower.

Smith: No, no, I’m saying more recent. Ronald Reagan’s view of government, which has prevailed in the Republican Party for a generation, I would respectfully suggest would be less inclined to support these kinds of initiatives.

Coleman: Yeah, but I think the present President Bush has gotten a lot of unfair raps. I know for a fact that at 10:45 on the last day that he [Clinton] was in office, he told the new Bush that the guy had the weapons – and that’s why Senator Hillary Clinton has never come out against him, or it probably would have lost her the nomination. But not only that, you’ve got to recognize that after the Kuwait invasion, and they got out, and I thought Jim Baker and Colin Powell were very skillful in bringing that about, there were nineteen resolutions passed by the Security Council, each one saying that he’s got to let the inspectors in. He wouldn’t let the inspectors in.

Finally, when they got to the last time, the French wouldn’t agree and Colin, who met with them and said, “Well, how much time do you want?” And he said, “Nine more months.” So at the end of the nine months if he hadn’t let us in, we could then go in with you. And the French said, “No we can’t guarantee we’d do that.” And then Colin said, “Well, do you realize that we’ve got a fleet out there and it’s costing us x dollars a month to do, and under the NATO your pro rata share is x. Would you at least pay?” They said no, and that’s when President Bush ordered the U.S. troops to go in.

I really think that the problem was after going in, nobody knew that the Shi’ites and the Sunnis and the Kurds were separated, and I blame that on the universities. Nobody came down. I also blame it on the fact that shortly after they went in, the Democrats that originally supported him, began to say, “Call off the troops.” Now if you were an Iraqi not knowing which side to pick, what would you do? I just really think that somebody has really got to do that.

Smith: Tell me about probably the most historic initiative to come out of the Ford presidency, one that was in your bailiwick, and that was deregulation. Beginning with the trucking, and…

Coleman: Trucking deregulation and then we halfway did deregulation with aviation industries and carriers, but that finally got completed under the next people.

Smith: How difficult was that to do?

Coleman: Well, all I’m saying is, when I have to go over to tell the union for the trucking that we were going to support deregulation, the guy threatened to throw me out of the fifth floor. Actually, it was helped because Kennedy, at that time had a superb staffer. It was Justice Breyer, then a staff member in Senator Kennedy’s office. I know Justice Breyer and we worked it out and we got that one done. And Ford, at the end, would not do something else unless they did that. So that’s how that got accomplished.

Smith: Why would the trucking industry, or the unions, in particular, object to deregulation?

Coleman: Because they thought that would affect their bargaining power and how much money they’d get. As long as you had the regulation, and the regulators pretty much catered to the unions, therefore the unions got what they wanted. Look at the automobile situation now. You’ve got new people coming in with these foreign cars, they’re making cars in various places in the United States, and they are charging much less money and not making as good cars. You just have to make a readjustment, and I’m pretty sure anytime a Republican tries to make a readjustment, they say he just doesn’t think much of labor. That just isn’t true. You’ve got to realize what you have to do.

Smith: I know President Ford philosophically was committed to economic deregulation. The railroad – that was part of the package, wasn’t it?

Coleman: No, because we spent so much money. I really can’t remember, you ask me stuff about twenty-five, thirty years ago, I don’t remember when we got started. I do know though, that I was very much against what we ultimately did, namely to create Amtrak. What I thought should have happened, was that the Pennsylvania Railroad, that half would be sold to the Southern Railroad and the other half to the Chessie. And I say that only to give credit to Liz Dole, because that is what she did. And it is much better now that she did it. I tried to do that and I couldn’t get anywhere because the federal district judge in New York that was handling the bankruptcy just wouldn’t listen to me. He thought his idea was better. And so they did and they lost money for seven years and then Liz Dole came in and she also did a better job on the Pennsylvania railroad station idea. I tried like hell, but she was the one that really straightened it out.

Smith: Did you oppose Amtrak conceptually?

Coleman: Well, I said it should not be made into a governmental corporation. It was Consolidated Railroads or something. I said the way to do it was to sell half of the whole Pennsylvania line and split it up that way, and then you’d have two lines who competed with each other. And that’s what’s done now.

Smith: And the airline industry. How did that begin?

Coleman: Well, we were working on that. I was only there about twenty-two months and the pay was lousy – but we were working on that. Now I really felt that what you should do is either have two U.S. airlines who were awfully good to handle the foreign stuff and then have the other handle the travel in the United States. Or you could say that you divide the world into four parts and have them divide it up that way. Now we represent Northwest and they just merged into Delta. I told them the next step is that they should get one of the foreign airlines, I think Chinese airline or the Brit and put it together because that’s what you really need to make the money these days.

Smith: Do you regret airline deregulation in light of all that’s occurred?

Coleman: Well, what I regret is that we didn’t stay in long enough to really work these things out. I worked out with the automobiles the whole question of the airbags. How you had to do it: you had to talk to each one separately and together. And I remember that I talked to all of them, because I said it should only be $50 or $55 for the airbag. One guy insisted that I should say $55, but a cost adjustment for each year, if prices went up. I agreed to that.

Then I realized, when the other person came in, he never asked that. I thought it would be the worst thing in the world for him to go back to Detroit with a worse deal than the other guy got. And I just said, “Look, if you ask me for this, I think I’ll give it to you.” And he was surprised and he went back and he finally called and was very thankful. You’re working with people, but you really got to – I think the Cabinet officer has to get his or her hands dirty and really get into it. What bothers me now is that, usually, the Cabinet officer doesn’t get that far into it. I think that’s what you have to do.

Smith: And Ford supported you on each of these initiatives?

Coleman: Oh yeah. President Ford always supported me. But I had known him from the Warren Commission and he thought I was pretty reliable.

Smith: Was there a line between politics and policy?

Coleman: No, he really meant that – he said you do what you think is right. Because in Memphis with whether the road went through the park – he said, “I don’t want you to handle that based upon the fact that I’d get more votes one way or the other. I want you to do what’s right.” Constantly he did that. No, he was a good person. I think if we had another – and I think what killed him was that investigation they had about whether he’d taken some money from unions or something, and it took about four more weeks to get done, showing that he had nothing to do with it. Another week and I think we would have taken it.

Smith: You saw him every year at the reunions, presumably.

Coleman: I saw him every year at the reunions, but also he was on a board with me and I saw him – I think it was Amex – he went on that board with me.

Smith: Tell me about that, because he took a rap in some quarters for going on boards and supposedly commercializing the ex-presidency.

Coleman: No, we made some great contributions. We got some important business and corporate things done. And also I saw him because my next door neighbor, Joe Robert, has a place in Beaver Creek and I’d go to see him. Then Ford had a place there and we’d always go down and see him. So, I saw him and I would talk to him some on the phone. And if I went to California, because our law firm has a big office there, I’d drop in. He and his wife were always very, very nice to me.

Smith: Tell me about his service on the Amex board. What did he contribute?

Coleman: Well, he contributed. We had the whole question of whether – sometimes it was price regulation and how to handle that – or whether we should be exempt. And then we had some other questions as far as international relations, which were very important things. The company was very successful at the time he was on, the time I was on it. They finally sold it to somebody else and I don’t think it’s as successful as it was, but it was very successful.

Smith: But he was a very active board member?

Coleman: He was very active. He did other than just sit there – he was very active and he would talk.

Smith: Did he ever tell you about his college football player friend Willis Ward, the African American player.

Coleman: By the end of this present administration of the new guy – I want you guys to call us something other than African Americans.

Smith: Fair enough. But that friendship clearly influenced him for life.

Coleman: Oh, sure. He was a real guy and he touched all the time and he was very close to Thurgood Marshall.

Smith: Was he?

Coleman: Oh, yeah. Thurgood thought a lot of him, because a lot of time he’d go see him and get things done or otherwise wouldn’t...No I think his heart was in the right place. But he wanted to do what’s right, and he made great strides, put me in the Cabinet, he put Carla Hills in the Cabinet.
Smith: In fact, you were the first black Republican Cabinet officer.

Coleman: Bob Weaver is supposed to be the first who was appointed by Johnson to HUD, but I always say he was the second, I was the third. You know who the first one was? Alexander Hamilton. He had one-sixteenth black blood in him. No, really. If you go back and read the debates on the Constitution, you can feel that he wanted to do more than that Three-Fifths clause. I always felt that Alexander Hamilton was so superior to Thomas Jefferson that it wasn’t even funny. But that’s alright. When I correct people sometimes, they look at me kind of funny.

Smith: Tell me something about Gerald Ford that most people don’t know – something that might surprise people – maybe at odds with the public image.

Coleman: I don’t think it should surprise, but I think until three weeks before the election he was as friendly to the Democrats as he was to the Republicans. He could cross the aisle and get things done. And secondly, I think he knew more about the world than people thought when he took office. And thirdly, that he was a very decent man and he wanted what I want for this country, just to be the greatest country in the world and that we’re all American citizens with different abilities and take advantage of them. We’ve got to do a better job of educating our children than what we’ve done before. And that’s all I know about him.

Smith: Were you in the Cabinet, I know you joined the Cabinet in ’75, do you remember when in ’75?

Coleman: About late January of ‘75

Smith: So you were there, you were in the administration, for example, when Saigon fell in April of ‘75?

Coleman: Oh, yeah. When we had to pull them out. I was sitting at the dinner one night and I was sitting next to the head of the Navy and the Coast Guard was under me and I jokingly said, “Well if your Navy can’t get those guys off the beach, I’m pretty sure my Coast Guard can.” He did not like that humor. But he stayed nice to me afterwards.
Now there was a break down because the problem under Lyndon Johnson - when you start to say, “I’m not going to give you any more money, I’m not going to give you troops,” you lose. And I just think that we made mistakes there the same way on this whole question of North Korea having the atomic weapon and the Iranians having something. People criticize Bush, but if anybody is to be criticized it really should be Clinton because his secretary is the one who went there and negotiated and he said, “Oh yes, I’m making point A and if you give me so much money in food, I’ll clean up” and that was done. So he actually was making point B, and that’s why we’re still having the problem now. In the meantime they certainly knew how to move it down to Iran. Those are real tough issues.

Smith: Did you ever discuss, after the fact obviously, the Nixon pardon with him as a lawyer?

Coleman: Well, he discussed it with me only because there were several times I discussed it – brought it up. I told him I thought he was right. There is no evidence that Nixon ever knew anything about the break in. The only evidence was after the break in, that he knew about it and felt that if it were disclosed the wrong way, it would adversely affect him as the Presidential election was in full force.

I told him I had a partner, Richardson Dilworth, who was a great one in Philadelphia. He was running for governor. It turned out that one of the secretaries, administrative aides, who worked for one of the richest partners in our firm, a guy named Doug Paxson, that she took some of his money and they found out about it and said don’t do it again. But she kept on working there. Well, a year later when Dilworth was in the midst of campaign, they found out she stole more money from the same guy. And they said, oh you’ve got to fire her – get rid of her. Dilworth said you can’t do that, can you imagine what the press would say if I’ve got some person working for me and twice they steal money and they’re still working? How in hell could I be a good governor – so we just dropped the matter.

It’s just something that you do. I’ll never forget that and I just felt the same way about that. Or the same thing that really adversely affected President Ford when that false accusation was made about the union. By the time they got it cleared up, because Levi moved very slowly on it, they’d had only about two weeks with that clearing up.

Smith: Ford was lucky. He lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking, I think, on the pardon.

Coleman: And he stepped in at a very difficult time. The country could have really gone into a real crisis and he stepped in and did what’s right, and the man he put on the Supreme Court certainly is no “conservative” – he’s a liberal – very good. I had to read all his opinions before…

Smith: How did that come about?

Coleman: When he got the vacancy, Ford had Levi read them all, he had me read them all, I think Carla Hills read them all. And he talked with him. That’s the one that he thought should take. He took him and he performed as a good justice, not liberal, not conservative. He does what’s right.

Smith: It’s interesting, he was probably one of the last justices appointed on the sheer basis of ability – without ideology entering into the equation. He told us, because we interviewed him, he told us in his confirmation hearings no one asked him about abortion. Which also suggests what a different climate prevailed then.

Coleman: Abortion is a tough issue, and even a worse one is whether people of the same sex can do something and call it a marriage. As long as they can do it, it’s legal, you can’t use a word which traditionally means something else, and I blame the newspapers for that – I think the newspapers are not what they used to be.

Smith: Last question: were you surprised at all when he died and there was really such an outpouring. And it seemed to grow as the week went along. Did that surprise you at all – that the people responded?

Coleman: No, in retrospect, people think that he made a difference. Just like a great baseball player – he hits that home run in the World Series – he made a difference. And people realize that. After he left, he certainly remained interested in public matters, but he didn’t interfere and I think he was treated well because he had done a good job and people realized that. And they felt Carter did a terrible job. Okay, you’ve kept your word, it’s twenty minutes to twelve.

Smith: Thank you.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this. We appreciate it. Tell us a little bit about the paths, both personal and professional; that you traveled that eventually crossed paths with Gerald Ford.

Gill: I came over from Michigan State in 1957. In the fall of ’57, when he was running for re-election as Congressman - he’d already been in office, I think, about ten years by that time. I went to work for a television station here in town, the leading TV station owned by Time-Life Broadcasting, and Jerry would literally work himself to a lather on election day, even. Walking the streets, going from house to house, right up until eight o’clock, until the polls closed. Then he would come to the station because we had people out at all the different clerks’ offices, waiting for the returns to come in and we’d have them first. He’d come over and sit and watch the returns come in.

I had a lot of fun with him because he was so tired he’d fall asleep. We had a room next to the newsroom in those days. We had groups come down and wait – kids groups would come down and wait to go on the air. I’d help him get a table set up and he’d lay down on the table and go to sleep. I remember once going up, I guess part of that first year, and seeing Jerry. I knew he had a good sense of humor, he really did, and I’d shake him and I’d say, “Hey, jeez I’m sorry. You’d better come look at the returns.” And he’d come look at them at them and, boy, just light up. Because he was always way ahead.

Smith: That’s interesting because he really never had a competitive race after the first one.

Gill: No, he beat a guy who was an absolute Neanderthal.

Smith: Barney Jonkman.

Gill: Jonkman, I think, was his name. Yeah. And I think Arthur Vandenberg, who was senator then, talked him into running against Jonkman.
Smith: On what do you base that?

Gill: About Vandenberg? I probably read it somewhere at some point. I did not get it from Jerry. I don’t know that because that was probably ten years before I came to town.

Smith: But his dad had been active in local Republican politics.

Gill: Yes.

Smith: President Ford’s father would have known Vandenberg.

Gill: Yes, he would have.

Smith: Did you know his parents?

Gill: I did not, I didn’t know either one of them. And actually I never really knew his family that well. I knew Betty, but I didn’t know the kids. The kids were young then and growing up, and they didn’t bring them to meetings and they tried to keep them, I think, kind of out of it.

Smith: Again, it’s remarkable someone who really didn’t have to campaign at all, would campaign as hard as he did. Was it partly just because he loved campaigning?

Gill: I think Betty Ford, really a swell person, married a young attorney and thought that she was going to settle down in Grand Rapids, Michigan and have a nice family, and when he got the scent of the political trail – he never, never would have gotten off. And he never did. I think she, and I’ve got to tell you, I felt so bad for her at times because she felt so bad that she had lost him, lost him to politics.

Smith: Now, what leads you to that? Are we talking about the early days now?

Gill: Well, the early days and the late days. For example in the national convention in Chicago, I covered that for the station. I was given the assignment of following him everywhere because by now it had become fairly well, at least rumored at that time, that Nixon had asked him to be his vice presidential running mate.

This section redacted for Gill’s lifetime

The happiest day of her life, and I think, I’m sure you were here at that time, I was with the city and I ran the news media for the – was it when he came back as president, or when we opened the Museum – I had the news media – when they had the performance in the Grand Hall – were you here for that?

Smith: No, I was not.

Gill: Okay. They had the performance in the Grand Hall and they had all of Jerry Ford’s favorite people, as far as entertainers go. One of them was Bob Hope. Bob Hope and Betty danced on the stage and I’m telling you, it was just magic. She was just absolutely flying. It must have been the opening of the Museum because, if he was past being president, or she wouldn’t have been that happy. She was just a kid again.

Smith: You could tell – almost night and day.

Gill: Yeah – like throwing a switch.

Smith: Of course, by that time, too, they’d had the intervention and she had beaten the alcohol and the pills, so it was a whole new life, as well.

Gill: Oh, yeah. It’s a real question in my mind as to who did more for the country, Jerry or Betty.

Smith: Well, you stop and think – we were talking to Dorothy Dowton, who had been his personal secretary in the White House, earlier today. And Dorothy is someone, who, like a lot of women, had a bout with breast cancer. She confirmed that it was simply something you just didn’t acknowledge. It was in the closet and Betty Ford, almost singlehandedly, changed that.

Gill: Oh, she singlehandedly did. My wife had breast cancer, too, and had it removed at the Betty Ford Breast Center here in town.
Smith: Really?

Gill: Yeah.

Smith: Grand Rapids has obviously changed physically a lot – and I think probably culturally a lot, too. Take us back to the late 50s, early 60s, when Congressman Ford had become sort of a local institution, but was just beginning to be a national figure.

Gill: Physically, you mean the town?

Smith: Both physically and culturally.

Gill: I came over, got this job offer from the station while I was still at Michigan State. As a matter of fact, I drove over here every night for the first six months because I was still going to school during the day and they wanted me to work. “If you want to work a job here, come now.” So, I came. I had brought my wife over before I accepted, and we drove up and down Monroe Avenue. Where Old Kent Bank is now and the gas company were old factory buildings. They were all shuttered. There were people living in them with their little hot plate things – cooking soup, cooking whatever they could. Every once in a while a fire would start and the firemen would come and put it out and two or three nights later, same thing. The town was grey.

Smith: Shabby?

Gill: Oh, way beyond shabby – way, way.

Smith: What was here, on the current site of the Ford Museum?

Gill: What was here – I believe at that time Voigt Mills may have been here, or perhaps nothing more than a few rambling buildings, factory buildings. There was a mill right downtown; the flour mill, Voigt Mills, and they had a wheel going and that’s why the dam and rapids and all that. There was an island in the middle of the river and they closed that in. It’s just amazing. The hotel – Pantlind – was all but down and out – run by a couple of brothers – the Roberts brothers. I’d go down there and eat once in a while and we went down there – I’ll never forget – my wife and I went down one evening because it was supposed to be the last day that the hotel would be open, or something like that.

I was having dinner and one of the Roberts brothers – one of them was the upfront man – the other one ran the kitchen, and he came over and he says, “Hey, can I join you? I have something to tell you.” I said, sure. So he sat down. He said, “This is the happiest day of my life.” He said, “Rich DeVos just bought the hotel and he’s really going to fix it up.” He says, “I’ve got to show you around.” And he insisted, after we had dinner he took us all over the hotel, showed us the Presidential Suite up on the top floor. And he was so happy, and rightly so. And they have really turned things around, the people like DeVos, Van Andel, Secchia, although Secchia sometimes…

Smith: A bit of a lightning rod?

Gill: Oh, my, yes. I think there is nothing more typical about Pete than his story about when he was named ambassador. I’m sure you know this one. They took him out – I think he went down to Naples, and they took him out in a glass-bottomed boat to show him around the harbor and fish, whatever. And he’s sitting there looking down, and he’s being introduced to the media in Italy as the new ambassador. And he says, “Ah, there’s what’s left of the Italian navy that we sunk.” Something along that line.

Smith: Not very diplomatic.

Gill: Incredible. He and I never really saw eye to eye. I’ll leave it at that. We’ve had some good run-ins. Of course, he’s got money and I don’t.

Smith: The river, obviously, has only recently been rediscovered.

Gill: Yup.

Smith: What was it like fifty years ago?

Gill: It was not totally unlike what it is now. You have the fish ladder, you have all this lovely stuff along the banks now. Of course, the buildings and structures along the banks made it look trashy, indeed. They have cleaned it up, thanks a lot to the environmental efforts.

I’ll tell you a little story about a guy I worked for. I was in charge of public relations/advertising for Union Bank, which turned into Chase now. The Frey family owned it. Ed Frey hired me because he was going to tear down old City Hall. I didn’t know that’s why he hired me at the time. The elastic between him and the community. But anyway, he had a great idea. He was going to have a marina right downtown and he spent a lot of money having engineers look into it. Finally, I think what really killed it was the Corps of Engineers couldn’t be persuaded to dredge all the way from here to Lake Michigan, which is what they would have had to have done.

Smith: And presumably that would have required Congressman Ford’s support.

Gill: Well, it would have, and he would have had that, I’m sure. But I just don’t think – maybe Jerry told him it can’t be done.

Smith: Let me ask you something because it’s a funny story, because it’s counterintuitive – the Sandy Calder sculpture must have divided the community.

Gill: Oh, fun. People put wrecked cars there the night before the dedication – on the plaza. They wanted a fountain, for God’s sake. When they didn’t get it…Bob Blandford, who was a city commissioner at the time, and really a gusto guy, he had a wrecked car dragged in and put on the plaza. We had to get it out of there in a hurry.

Smith: It’s interesting because Ford secured the funding through the National Endowment, either for the Humanities or the Arts. By his own acknowledgement, at that point he had never heard of Alexander Calder.

Gill: Yeah.

Smith: But I guess took a real interest in seeing it.
Gill: Well, there were a couple of people who made that happen. One was Peter Wege, and Nancy Mulnix, who was just determined to get him to do that. They worked on Jerry a lot and she’s very persuasive. Peter Wege is an heir to the Steelcase fortune and he threw a lot of money at it and Jerry knew where he was coming from, so…

Smith: Is Nancy around?

Gill: Nancy is around. Unfortunately, she had a divorce not long after the situation here. She left town for a lot of years, came back and she is a nurse now somewhere here in town. I ran into her a couple of times.

Smith: She is someone we should talk to. The interesting thing, the sequel is, that apparently – I don’t know whether the opposition died away once the piece was actually installed, but Dick Ford told us the one thing that his brother said about this museum. They wanted to put up a statue of him, and he didn’t want a statue of himself. But the only advice he had was, whatever art you get, make it representational. And, of course, they wound up with the spaceman, recognizing his work with NASA. So, I assume that’s a critique of…although he gave Sandy Calder the Medal of Freedom in the White House.

Gill: Yeah? I’ve got to tell you a Dick Ford funny one. My wife and I rented their condo down in Naples one winter for a couple of weeks. We went down and I’ve always got to head for the john right away whenever we land somewhere, so I’m going to the john, and I go in and I close the door, and here upon the bathroom door is a picture of Jerry looking down like this, and Dick had put something up there, some comic thing. And when we got back I saw Dick somewhere and I said, “You know, that’s the funniest thing ever.” He said, “We’ve got to keep him down to earth. We find ways.” I think he was president at the time.

Smith: It was really interesting, when we were talking with Dick I don’t think he was holding back, but he told us something that astonished me. He said, “This is going to surprise you, but I never talked politics with my brother, because everyone else did, and usually they wanted something. And so, we had almost a politics-free zone.”

Gill: You know, that’s smart, really, for him, very smart.

Smith: Smarter than some presidential brothers.

Gill: Oh, yeah. We were down in Plains, Georgia once on vacation, going down to Florida. It was the time when Billy Carter had his little gas station going across the street. We went through Plains to see what it was like – to see the peanut store and all that. They had put up a large, artificial Christmas tree in front of the depot on Main Street. Billy had warned them not to do that because he wanted a natural Christmas tree. They’d gone ahead against his wishes. So the last anybody saw of that artificial Christmas tree was a pickup truck dragging it out of town at about forty miles per hour. They were something else. Didn’t he go to Africa or something trying to get business, or something.

Smith: Libya.

Gill: Oh my God.

Smith: Grand Rapids in early 60s – how conservative a town was this?

Gill: How conservative a town was it?

Smith: Yeah, and in particular, the influence of the Dutch Reformed culture and nightlife of the city.

Gill: I’m forgetting. There was no nightlife. This is the greatest stretch GR’s ever made in that direction. And they still don’t have much here to get convention goers to go to. That’s too bad.

Smith: Can you imagine, for example, to take one name of someone who packed the arena. Can you imagine Elton John playing a concert in Grand Rapids in the 60s?
Bill Gill  May 7, 2009

Gill: No, I couldn’t, and, you know, the arena is what has done it. That’s what done it. It has spawned all the other activity around it. Most of it good; some bad, and the bad get shoved out at some point. I’ll tell you just briefly – I don’t know how much time you guys have...

Smith: We’ve got time.

Gill: When I first came over here and was a reporter with the station, we had little towns right around us, close around us – suburban towns – they were thinking about becoming municipalities. They were townships and they wanted to become municipalities because cities were starting to grab property from them, annex it. I was assigned to do a documentary – a half hour documentary, maybe it was an hour - on the pros and cons of becoming a municipality. And so I went out to several little towns and talked to the township people involved. I went to municipalities and talked to them and then I interfaced it – the good, the bad, and hope this helps you make up your mind, gives you some information so you can vote on Tuesday.

I did this and we were going to run it on a Sunday night – this was back when stations could get time in prime time to run their programs. The network didn’t own everything. We got an hour between nine and ten o’clock on Sunday evening, golden time for that kind of thing. We started promoting it – the minute the first promotions hit the air, I get a call from the mayor of one of these little towns – Hudsonville, just south of here between here and Holland. He said, “You’ve got to be kidding me. You can’t show that on Sunday.” And I said, “Why?” He said, “Because we can’t watch television.” I said, “Why?” He said, “Because our religion won’t permit it.” Ugh. I said, “You’re kidding me, aren’t you?” He said, “No, no, no. I’m not kidding you.” I said, “Well, then nobody will be watching from your town and they won’t know it’s on. I’m sorry about that.” He said, “You can’t do this.” I said, “I’m sorry, we’re going to.”

I talked to management. Management said call them back and tell him we’re going to run it at nine o’clock Sunday night. So I called him. He said, “Well, I’ll tell you what, we’re having a special meeting of the city commission tomorrow night, and we want you and the management from the station to appear before the city commission.” I told the manager, and the manager says, “You go.” So I went out there and they took me apart, practically, and I’d been told to say that we’re going to run it at nine o’clock Sunday evening. Don’t look.

This section redacted for Bill Gill’s lifetime.

The hypocrisy is so thick, was much thicker than now. When we first came here we had a toboggan on top of our car on a Sunday. We’d been asked to come over to some friend’s house for dinner, or brunch, and they were going to go tobogganing, and we had the toboggan on top of the car. We parked in front of their house, got out, started to the door; this guy, friend, said, “Bill, could you park your car around the block, kind of?” He didn’t want anyone to know we were going to go tobogganing Sunday afternoon.

So, I don’t know. It is not as much the fact that they have these beliefs, it is the hypocrisy of them. Did you ever hear of a Dutch antenna? I did a job for Holland and Zeeland, they were going to combine their water and sewer services, and I ran a campaign for them and it worked for them. But while I was over there, this guy, he just moved over from Detroit, and was running this system, and he’d drive me around town to acquaint me with it. And we’d go by a beautiful home, he was telling what they sold for and yabba dabba, and he’d say, “And that one has a Dutch antenna.” And we’d drive on, and he’d see another one. That was in the days when you had antennas on the top of your house. You had to turn them to get the signal, no cable. And he’d say, “That one has a Dutch antenna.” I said, “What is a Dutch antenna?” He said, “They have them in their attic so when they change channels, nobody knows they’re watching TV on Sunday.” It’s the utter hypocrisy of it.

Smith: We were talking to Seymour Padnos and he was describing the late 40s when Ford first ran for Congress. It obviously hadn’t changed much in ten years, but he said that the liberal elements would go out on a Saturday night, buy a Sunday paper, put it aside, read it on Monday.
Gill: Sure…or in the basement, where they had the drinks, also.

Smith: But that’s interesting because [there is] this story in 1948 when Ford decides to run for Congress and he decides he wants to get married. There has always been a little bit of confusion, not so much over the sequence – he indicated to Mrs. Ford early in ’48 that he wanted to get married, but he had something else he had to do first. And he couldn’t tell her this big secret. Well, he was going to take on Jonkman, and he wanted to take him as much as possible by surprise. But it has always been contended that there was a little more to the story than that. That, in fact, he did want to marry her, but he didn’t want to risk marrying her as a divorcée…

Gill: Yeah, I’ve heard that, too.

Smith: …before the primary.

Gill: Yeah, I’ve heard that, too, and I wouldn’t doubt that that’s the truth because Jerry had guile about him. He was a politician.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Gill: Well, he always had the personae of being, and he was, he was a great guy, I loved the guy. I didn’t always agree with all the stuff he did and all the positions he took, but I realized the party was twisting him into it, and I did all I could to help him. But they were out of control at that time, just as they are now – scrapping among one another and wouldn’t agree to anything. I’m trying to think of something specific…

Smith: He clearly was ambitious. He wanted to be Speaker of the House.

Gill: Oh, that’s all he ever wanted to be. That’s all he ever wanted. He didn’t want to be president, he really didn’t.

Smith: You said you were at the ’60 convention, were you at the ’64 convention?

Gill: No, I was not.
Smith: So, here’s someone, now by the mid-60s he becomes Minority Leader, after the Goldwater debacle. And all sorts of additional demands are placed upon him. He’s traveling very extensively. Did he still get home frequently?

Gill: Oh, yeah, he got home. As a matter of fact, I think most of the time he would leave Betty with the kids in Virginia and come home for the weekend. He really took care of his constituents, and he had a good working office here. He had a good staff and you could ask for something and you could be sure that if they didn’t get it, they had done their very best to try to get it for you.

Smith: He excelled at constituent service?

Gill: Oh, yeah, he really took care of anybody that wanted help. He’d try his best to help them. I think that was genuine, too. But he knew he had to do that in order to remain in office, otherwise somebody would come up behind him and start a better campaign than he was doing.

Smith: Tell me, was there a significant African-American population in Grand Rapids.

Gill: They weren’t voting very heavily then at all. And I think the population, this is a guess on my part, ten percent or so at the most – if that. But they weren’t voting hardly at all in those days. And this is what, of course, submitted it for Obama. He had solid support from African-Americans.

Smith: Yeah, but who have predicted that he would have carried Kent County?

Gill: I would have. I worked for him.

Smith: What that suggests is, a lot of folks who liked Gerald Ford, voted for Barak Obama.

Gill: Yup.

Smith: What does that say about the changes?

Gill: Well, the changing times. I think Jerry, if he looked at what Obama’s doing now with the giveaways to banks or to church companies, and all that money out there, and all that debt he’s building up, I think he’d go nuts. I really do. He wouldn’t be able to stand it.

Smith: He was a true fiscal conservative.

Gill: Yes, he was. And I don’t like this, either. I keep hoping that Obama is going to be a man of his word and will work on reducing the deficit. Otherwise, we’re going to be in worse trouble than we’re in now. So, we’ll see.

Smith: The Republican Party, I take it, as long as Ford was in Congress, was pretty unified here in West Michigan?

Gill: Yeah. They were not like they are today. I don’t know if you are aware of it, but they just booted the Utah governor who was supposed to come here and talk to Kent County Republicans. And this lady who is an absolute Looney Tune makes donuts – she and her husband.

Smith: Do they have holes?

Gill: That is a very good question. She took it upon herself, by herself, to tell him not to come.

Smith: It’s interesting – I don’t mean to get off on a side road, but it is consistent with that. You probably know there is an effort underway, and it’s moving forward, to put a statue of President Ford in the Rotunda of the Capitol.

Gill: I thought that was a done deal.

Smith: It is, but it wasn’t for a long time. And, in fact, what happened was – in some ways he would be very proud of this – it was held up by a couple of Republican state senators in Western Michigan, who ostensibly were claiming that one of the statues of Senator Chandler - which is going to the Detroit Historical Society as part of the deal – that you can’t rewrite history and you shouldn’t move Chandler and so on. Well, in fact, they were refighting the old Reagan/Ford wars. These new conservatives – to whom Jerry Ford is some sort of dangerous liberal.

Gill: Yeah.
Smith: And, in the end, what happened was that at the end of the session, it was coming right down to the wire, a black senator from Detroit asked for the floor of the Senate. He got up and he said, “Let me tell you a story about Jerry Ford.” Well, it turns out this guy is the grandson of Willis Ward, who was the president’s black friend at the University of Michigan. There was an issue when Georgia Tech said they wouldn’t play and Ford was going to quit the team, and all this. So he got up and he told this very powerful story, and it was gavelled through. But the irony is, it was a Democrat from Detroit, African-American, and not a Republican who saw to it that his statue will be in the Capitol. Which tells you something about the Republican Party today, even in Kent County.

Gill: I’ve got to tell you, this friend of mine, Bob Eleveld I was telling you about. I don’t know how well he knew Jerry, but he has been county chairman here. He’s an attorney here in town, been county chairman, gee, I don’t know how many times, and was a good county chairman. But he’s a moderate. And he and I just commiserate because we brought McCain here, as I said, when he ran against Bush the first time for the nomination. And he came out against him at the same time Milliken did, because I walked to them both. You need to say what you believe. They’ll talk to you about – you know – but try to get them to take a stand publicly, “Well…maybe I can get in and rebuild the party.”

Smith: When Ford became vice president, did that come as a shock?

Gill: Not really. Did you ever see the letter I wrote him, by chance – Ford?

Smith: I don’t think so.

Gill: Well, I’ve got a copy of it. I’ll give it to you, but I can tell you briefly about it, if you want me to, about that part of it.

Smith: Sure.

Gill: He always had a group that he’d talk to when he came to town, but when he got down to…
Smith: Can you remember who they were? Some of those folks? Were they sort of the kitchen cabinet?

Gill: Yeah. And it was broad in the beginning. He would go over here when the Pantlind was the Pantlind. This was in the early years when I knew him in the 50s. They had a little restaurant right on the street called the Knife and Fork. I called it the Knife and Ford, because he was always there when he came to town. He didn’t really make the rounds as much as he did sit in the Knife and Fork and drink coffee and talk to people. He enjoyed it.

Smith: He liked people.

Gill: Oh, he did, he liked to talk to people and listen to them. And he would listen, he really would. I don’t know if it was part of an act or not, I don’t know, who knows what’s real and what’s not. But, anyway, I’d catch him there. I caught him there one day and he starts ragging on me because he was sending, and all the other Congressmen, too, but Jerry was always there – they would send out a little film clip. There was no video tape in those days, just a little film reel, Your Congressman Reports. You could count on him. He wanted to know why in the world we aren’t running them all the time. I said, “Jerry, they aren’t that interesting.” I said, “Everybody expects that you’re doing those things, and you can’t just keep running them over and over if they are not of interest to the people, to the viewers.” “Well…[mumbling].” I said, “You know, you ought to do something different. Why don’t you talk to old Everett Dirksen?” He was in the Senate then. I said, “See what you guys…” And I’ll be durned if three or four weeks later, they didn’t announce the Ev and Jerry Show. Did you ever see that thing?

Smith: Yeah.

Gill: Oh, God. They were like Abbott and Costello. I don’t know who sic’ed them on the networks, but they started giving them to all the networks and the networks would feed them to the stations, and stations all over the country were running it. I was so happy over that.

Smith: He was not a natural showman.
Gill: No, no. He was not. He was a straight man and Everett Dirksen standing there with this ludicrous face of his, and that voice. They were fun.

Smith: Back to when he became vice president. Did FBI agents descend on the town?

Gill: Oh, wow. Let me tell you just a little bit about – and I’ll leave you a copy of this letter. I was reminding him – what got me to write the letter to Jerry. After I got off to other things, I was with the university out in Jersey for a while, and that kind of stuff, and came back. I left the university and came back as news director at 8 in September of ’74. Nixon – they already had the Watergate hearings. They were still underway, and it was very clear Nixon was going to be gone one way or the other. Either he was going to leave on his own or they were going to impeach him. So, Jerry, by then was vice president. Agnew had resigned under fire – or was he impeached?

Smith: He resigned.

Gill: And Jerry had become vice president. Nixon finally made good on his offer for him to be his vice president. He was coming to town and making rounds of the whole country, I think, I’m not sure of that. But I would be willing to bet that he had the same kind of meetings wherever he went in the country, and he was traveling widely at that time. But he had a group here, it was four guys; myself, a high Republican official, a preacher, and a marketing manager here in town who had done work for him. So it was a marketing man, myself, I was news director, and the station was about a block from his little offices over on Cherry Street.

We met there with him about two months. It was the last time the group met with him there about two months before Nixon resigned and he became president. And he was absolutely lost. Just didn’t know what to do. He said, “I have a feeling that he’s going to be impeached, it looks like a certainty.” And he says, “I just don’t know what to do. I’m supporting him, yet I wonder where we’re going with this thing.”

Smith: Did he entertain doubts as to the president’s guilt – or innocence?
Gill: Well, he says, “I believe Dick. I’ve been in Congress with him since the beginning. I believe him.” So he wasn’t really expressing any doubt, if he did. And everybody just kind of sat there kind of stoned because it was very clear to the rest of us that Nixon was a goner. It was just a question of how long he’s going to be able to hang on. Finally I said, “Jerry, you know, you’ve got to back off. It’s like a big tree falling in the forest. If you get hit by it…the American people are really, really, counting on you and you’ve got to maintain your credibility, or you won’t be able to handle it once you become president.” I said, “You’ve got to back off.” He says, “I can’t, nobody else will support him. Nobody else is behind him.” I said, “Doesn’t that tell you something?” And the rest of them then chimed in and said that you really do, you need to back away. And I think we put a real doubt into him. But I’m not suggesting that – I think he talked to a lot of people and I think he got the same advice everywhere he went.

Smith: But it’s interesting that – I don’t want to put words in your mouth, but clearly, if he, at that point, was expressing concerns about the likelihood of impeachment, that meant he was wrestling in his own mind with the likelihood that he would be president.

Gill: Oh, I think you’re right. Oh, absolutely, I think you’re right. But he did not want to seem to be…the guy was loyal to a fault – to a fault.

Smith: Well – it’s almost a flip side of his admirable qualities. He was always a bit of an Eagle Scout, and with that went a genuine desire to believe the best of people, and I think he was genuinely shocked when he belatedly realized that Richard Nixon lied to him. Isn’t that naïveté on his part?

Gill: Of course it is. And it was part of his makeup, I think. I think good boys far outweighed the bad ones with Jerry. I don’t think Jerry was an extremely intelligent man. He was a political man. I think his morals were beyond reproach. You didn’t get any foot tapping out of Jerry. And he was just a family man and I think and I’ve heard him remark on this himself, I think he believed in living the Boy Scout life. He was an Eagle Scout and he lived that life. And I can’t disagree with that. I was, too. I wasn’t an Eagle Scout, but I was a Scout.

Smith: But it also comes back to this. For example: he becomes president, and on August 28th he has his first press conference. He goes into that press conference believing that everyone is going to want to talk about Cyprus and Turkey and Greece and inflation, and everything except what everyone wants to talk about, which is Richard Nixon. He didn’t handle it terribly well, and was angry at himself, and I think he was angry at the world. I think that press conference was the triggering event that led, ten days later, to the pardon. Now the pardon might have happened anyway, but it goes back again to this kind of naiveté, having been in Washington as long as he had been there, to not sense the mood of the press corps.

Gill: I think you’re right. Do you know the part that Phil Buchen played in that situation?

Smith: I don’t think so.

Gill: You know who Phil Buchen is?

Smith: Oh, yes. Sure.

Gill: Phil was his early law partner and was his personal attorney after he went to the White House. He relied on him a lot. Phil was a great guy, I don’t know if you ever met him. He was just a great guy. He and I went to the same church, and all that stuff – a very liberal church. Duncan Littlefair was the pastor, married my wife and I. Anyway, Phil Buchen, I know, came back to Grand Rapids and met with Duncan Littlefair, who was not Ford’s pastor, but who was Phil Buchen’s pastor. And they talked about it and he persuaded Ford to listen to them.

Smith: He, being who – Phil or Duncan Littlefair?

Gill: Phil Buchen persuaded Ford to listen to Littlefair and him, and they talked to him. I’m 99 percent certain that is what swayed him into taking the course that he did.
Smith: On the pardon.

Gill: Yes. And he may have anyway. Who knows? But they were very persuasive that you really need to wipe the slate clean on this thing. Otherwise it’s going to dog you and the country, and you don’t need it.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say it’s a very liberal church, presumably Duncan Littlefair was liberal theologically, politically, and yet, coming from the left, why would he be urging Ford to…

Gill: Well, Duncan was a different kind of a guy. He didn’t always come out of left field. He was very rational. He didn’t always come out of right field. He was very rational.

Smith: That’s fascinating. Was Buchen as close to Ford as anyone?

Gill: I think he was probably closer to him than anyone, really. I really do. They always, always remained very close friends. You know, I’m ashamed to say, I believe Phil died – I’m not sure.

Smith: Yeah.

Gill: He did? But otherwise I could get you to him.

Smith: It’s a fascinating window. Was there much unhappiness when people here learned that Ford was going to be retiring to California rather than Grand Rapids?

Gill: Well, I guess so. I guess you could say unhappiness, I was looking for the right word. I guess sorry-ness, sorry that he was doing that.

Smith: Were they hurt?

Gill: Yeah, it hurt. It hurt because the town, the district, had always supported him and everybody liked him, and they wanted to see him present, badly.

Smith: Do you remember the ’76 campaign – at the end when he came back. That must have been a very emotional…
Gill: It was.

Smith: And he lost it, didn’t he? Out at the airport at the mural? Were you there?

Gill: I’m trying to remember. He had lost the campaign to Carter?

Smith: No, this was at the end of the campaign, when he – I think on election day, actually – they dedicated the mural out at the airport.

Gill: Oh, oh. No, I was not there. Paul Collins did that for him, didn’t he? I wrote a thesis for Paul Collins when he was a young strapping guy. Somebody sent him to me, I was with the bank at that time, and he wanted to raise money to go to Africa. And I wrote him some stuff to carry around to businessmen and he walked around with it. And durn if he didn’t get the money. And he went. He’s done very well.

Smith: As an ex-president, though, Ford came back here frequently.

Gill: Oh, yeah, he did.

Smith: I mean, well into his eighties and his ninetieth birthday was probably his last big public appearance.

Gill: I wasn’t really in touch with him then because by then, as I said, everybody with a buck had made really good friends with him, and they wanted time with him and I always felt like I was just butting in.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Gill: Yeah. I guess the last time that I really had a chance to talk to him at all, was when they dedicated the Amway Grand Plaza. He came back here for that. I’ll tell you a funny story about that. I was communications director at that time and I was running the media and we had an unbelievable crowd because they were having a Canada, Mexico, I believe, he had four or five presidents here. And they were having a little summit. I got to talk to him for a while then, but they locked us up – locked the media up. Have you heard this?

Smith: No.
Gill: It wasn’t right. The Secret Service always takes over, you know, when they come to town. I’ve worked with them a lot with people coming to town, and when they come to town you might as well figure out that anything you’ve been told by anybody else doesn’t mean a damn thing. They are going to handle it.

They locked us up in a room over here in the hotel and said you must stay there until everybody has had dinner and then we’ll let you out and you can come out for the speeches. So they went away and left us alone there, and everybody was saying, “Gee, they’d better give us dinner, we’re hungry.” And so I ordered out for, I don’t how many, God only knows, truckloads of pizza, kegs of beer, and they came in and set it up. Everybody had lots of pizza, everybody had lots of beer.

At some point the trigger started going off with the guys saying, “Oh, my God, I’ve got to take a leak.” Finally, and I beat on the door, trying to get the Secret Service to come. Nobody. So Sam Donaldson was there, and he was just as irascible as he is now, he actually climbed up on a table, says, “If somebody doesn’t unlock that damned door, I’m going to unzip and let her fly.” This was a panic call, so I practically tore the door down. Finally got a Secret Service guy there, and they set up a channel for us of Secret Service people from there to the men’s room.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction when the president died? I mean, the overwhelming public reaction?

Gill: You mean as far as him going to California.

Smith: No, when he died – at the time of his death.

Gill: No, I don’t know, because I think everybody was expecting it.

Smith: But in terms of the public response, the long lines, the crowds…

Gill: Oh, no. The town loved the guy. They loved him. And they had forgiven him for going to California. They didn’t like it but, hey, he’s got a right to have a life after he’d gone through what he has.
Smith: Quickly, this place – putting it here instead of out in the suburbs somewhere, what’s it done for the town?

Gill: It, along with Grand Valley State University, has just made this side of the river. The west side was settled mostly by immigrants who came here to work in factories, and they were good people, but they were poor people and their houses were not all that good, and run down and they were right downtown, essentially. They managed to, with the expressway, and this, and the college, they managed to really clean up the area a little, if you want to put it that way. It’s a good thing.

Smith: Thank you. I feel like I know Grand Rapids much better.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. I guess the most obvious question is, what does it feel like to be back in this room?

Laughlin: It feels fantastic, very emotional, I can see him pulling this chair up over there and pulling up very close, almost to knee, [and saying], “What’s on your mind?” And I can say, after ten or fifteen minutes, he’d lean back, “I have some observations for you.” It was beautiful the way it was so simple. And I don’t remember the subject, but it was wonderful.

I can remember another time – I probably shouldn’t talk about – when I came and he was in here, but Penny was gone and the other gal, Judy, she was gone, and he came tearing out. Oh, he was upset. Oh, God, “They don’t leave me anything to sign papers with, damnit.” And he was scrounging through the desk, then he went over to Penny’s desk, grrrr, “Got to find something to sign. How can I sign papers if they don’t…they steal all my things.” Something of that order. He was really incredible. That’s the only time I ever saw him a little upset.

Smith: It was sort of a legend, I guess around the office. Like a lot of folks of his generation, and I shouldn’t say just of his generation, he was not particularly computer literate.

Laughlin: That’s the way we’re supposed to be.

Smith: And I think machinery, generally, was not his friend. When did you first meet him? How did your paths cross?

Laughlin: I had a luncheon that was arranged in San Francisco with American Enterprise Institute. They were about broke, and they were trying to raise money at a club. I guess I gave them a little bit, but I went back and then I had an invitation from Washington to a dinner. I suppose I had another appointment on the East coast because I don’t think I would go back with an outfit I didn’t really know. At any rate, I went to this dinner and it inspired me. Chris DeMuth and Gerson inspired me, and I think I probably had maybe two bottles of beer and I gave them $200,000 because I thought they were a worthwhile – which to them was an enormous…they were holding on.

So I got invited – the way I met the President - to an early American Enterprise Institute meeting that President Ford sponsored.

Smith: Was that the World Forum?

Laughlin: The World Forum. It was wonderful. Julie will attest to the fact that – I went to meetings. I was a younger man, I had no education in business, so I went to every good meeting I could find. And I had been to many of the best at IBM and graduate schools like Stanford – I went with the young president for a week or two. When I went to this meeting I thought, my God, I have never sat at a table and the President is there – and across from him is the former president – my God. Helmut at this end from Germany and Jim Callaghan – wow, holy Toledo. I started watching.

Jerry was running everything and it was so quiet and so easily done. Discussions would come up and sometimes little arguments. He had a way of listening intently and knowing just when to add something, if he wished. If people were about to argue too heavily, he had a touch. And I’ve since read about it, but he started out as an Eagle Scout, and Congress and so on. But it was marvelous and I was impressed. And yet he was so quiet, he didn’t try to impress anybody, he was very comfortable within his own skin. So I started spending a lot of time observing what he was doing because leadership had started to fascinate me.

I got involved in all kinds of experiments in our own company and constantly had meetings. And there was no question in my mind – that was the best week I had ever had for a meeting. And I kept thinking of Jerry. Although he was quiet, for me he didn’t slam down, let everybody know – “Hey, I’m the boss, you’d better respect me.” So, anyhow, that’s where I met him and about the second year his wife invited me to lunch. They tried to have lunch with the guests. So I felt really good that I had lunch with Jerry Ford. Little did I know that he would become a great influence on my life through one way or another.

After four years, or, I don’t know, five years of those meetings, Jim Callaghan and I had become quite good friends, Helmut I had gotten to know better. Giscard, I never could get to know too well.

Smith: Let me interrupt – this is such, in some ways, a motley gathering. Jim Callaghan, who was a classic old-line British Socialist and Helmut Schmidt, who was certainly to the left of Ford’s politics, and yet they seemed to hit it off famously.

Laughlin: Oh – they were like brothers.

Smith: I would be interested in your observations. First of all, of how you thought the others looked upon President Ford – what their relationship was with him.

Laughlin: How they got along?

Smith: Yeah, and what they thought of him.

Laughlin: All of them – we played golf every afternoon with Gerson and some other guys, presidents of companies that are not doing well now. But everybody that I talked to just thought Ford was…whether they were Democrats or not – they thought he was wonderful. I do have a story to tell you later – which you’ll see a little different side of him – of somebody who didn’t like him, who was a world leader and international peace prize, Arias.

Well, I had an idea – we were going to lunch, Jim Callaghan and I had gotten to know one another better and better, and I had an idea. I turned to Callaghan and I said, “God, it would be fabulous, I can see it right now – a beautiful mansion, an old, old mansion outside of London in the country, where these four get together – no agenda, no press, no recording, no filming. They just get together.” And he said, “I say, old chap, that’s a good – I think – would it be alright with you if I take that to the boys tonight?” At five o’clock the boys, those four, always met for cocktails. Nobody else was allowed, and I said, “Sure.” Well, I couldn’t wait until our cocktail party started and Jim came over and he said, “Bill, it’s passed! We’re going to go to your house.” I had offered $100,000 to pay for whatever, or whatever it cost. I didn’t even think of that part. There was no effort at bribery – it was just that I could see something exciting happening. Wait until you hear what happened.

They went to a library and they just sat around and I sat up on a – the library had a little wall around it – and I sort of sat there and never said one word, and they sort of started getting in a dialogue. And it was incredible. It went on for four, maybe five hours. But it was inspiring. It was absolutely inspiring. If we wanted to do away with nuclear today, that’s the way to do it. Get a few very intelligent, well-read, well-experienced men and/or women, and we could do it. We’ll never do it at the United Nations or in big groups.

So I was like a kid. I was jumping up, and oh jeez, I can’t talk about this.
Well, I can talk now a little bit about it. That evening at cocktail hour, the ladies, the wives started down the stairs, but fortunately at about five or ten minute intervals. The first one who came was Helmut’s wife and she said, “How did it go? How did it go?” I said, “It was unbelievable! Your husband – oh God, was he great! He was Alexander Hamilton.” “My husband was Alexander Hamilton – wow!” Man, she was so excited I just couldn’t believe it. Well, one of them, my memory is a little bad on the names – another one came down and it was Jim Callaghan’s wife, whom I’d gotten to know a little, and Jim was John Adams in my mind, or possibly, no it was John Adams.
“My husband? Really?” Here they are, foreigners talking about American history. Then Giscard, I don’t really remember, but it was exciting. Well, Betty had had an operation and she was still here, she did not go. So I, very much like a kid, (Julie, when I returned, wasn’t I like a little boy?) Wow – and I’ve never forgotten that.

It was a great lesson to get experienced men, who have really been around and had enormous responsibility for war or peace or all kinds of things, to be able to sit together as friends and do what they did – without an agenda. These were important issues, going back into American history.
Now, I think that there is another story that I got to know Callaghan and Helmut even better. And this is where it sort of changed my life a little. With Callaghan, I’d been a guest at his house in the country, which was a thatched roof, leaking water all over the place, not enough money to repair it – and we were sitting there in the garden and I had been asked early: if anybody could ever get Margaret Thatcher and Jim together, you could. Well, thank God, his daughter was there and his wife, we were in a beautiful English country garden, and I brought that up and he went through the ceiling. Turned red, I thought he was close to a heart attack. So the daughter was there and she came to my rescue and the wife came to my rescue and we settled that forever. I had talked Thatcher into saying, “I’ll meet with him,” but, at any rate, I learned constantly from each of them in different ways.

Helmut, at a meeting – Jerry had a double knee operation and in that double knee operation he could not attend a meeting of these former heads of state – about thirty-five of them, InterAction Council. So he sent a letter that Kissinger couldn’t make it, but Helmut, you might remember Bill Laughlin because of Ditchley – that’s where we went – and Helmut did and Helmut invited – really, Jerry invited me. That’s where it changed my life – to get with – meeting as the only one with no credentials at all. I was a dishwasher and a pots and pans boy. So I thoroughly enjoyed it. I was invited…am I getting off topic?

Smith: No, that’s fine.

Laughlin: I was invited to this first meeting – Jerry was not there – I was like a little kid, I was so excited, but toward the end of the meeting I started getting bored and a little depressed. I said, “What’s wrong with me? What is this?” There were about forty- forty-five there, so I thought and thought, and “Ah-ha, I have it.” All they do is talk about problems. I’m an entrepreneur, I don’t care about problems – I find it exciting to come up with creative approaches. So Bob McNamara was there for one day as a guest, so I went to Bob and I said, “Bob, am I nuts, or is this worthwhile for all these people to get together to talk about the problems? Why not have time in smaller groups for solutions?”
He said, “I’ll be damned. I’m supposed to be the whiz kid. I never heard of you, but I will never forget. Go ahead and talk to Helmut, he’s the chairman. But don’t talk to him if he’s sitting all by himself because he has a terrible temper and he’s very emotional.” So I did eventually talk to Helmut – I was invited back to another meeting as a civilian and I was told that Helmut wanted to see me at lunch time. So I went into a room and the first thing you know, there is some wine and a guy there to serve wine, and what the heck? Why does Helmut want to see me and what’s this about? So in comes Trudeau – there were six and finally Helmut came and he said, “Bill, Jerry thinks you’re a pretty good guy, and I think you’re really unique, you’re different than the rest of us.” I thought he was going to give a talk when we sat down. He said, “You’re to sit next to me,” he changed my chair next to me, “Tell us what’s on your mind.”

So I talked sort of like I’m doing now, I guess, a little nervously. And, I told them whatever ideas I had, and the next thing you know I was a member for life – the only non-head of state. Now, Jerry had changed my environment by moving this way, but the thing that Jerry did at the next meeting – he and I flew together. Penny arranged it – we flew together out of Los Angeles to Mexico, and went to a meeting there of InterAction Council. This was just another meeting, I thought, and they had not yet organized it to have solutions. But Arias from Costa Rica talked and he blasted America and after he finished it was very quiet. One guy raised his hand and Helmut started to call on him and Jerry said, in a very calm voice, “No, Helmut, no. I am taking the floor.” Now, I can’t remember exactly, but it was beautiful. I got tears. He talked about America. As a great historian, you would have loved it. He went through all the good things we’d done in the world. And everybody was so quiet, listening to every word and it was very articulate, very organized, from 1917, it could have been even a little earlier, but right through the Depression to World War II to Berlin, and when he finished, you could hear a pin drop.

But he finished with this, “Mr. Arias, you seemed to have ignored and forgotten history. You brag about what a wonderful country that you don’t need any army,” he didn’t say damn fool, but it sounded like it. You damn fool, “for God’s sake it was the American army and navy that protected you all those years. Sir, you’d better think about that.” And with that he finished and I want to tell you, wow. And when we went to lunch right after, our friend, his aide, always, whenever he flew or traveled, we just talked about it. He was sent to my table – I was with the president of Japan and his group – “Bill, the President wants to have you for lunch. Only you. Do you see him over there? There’s a table for two and an empty chair. That’s yours.” I said, “Really? Really?” So I walked over there, and as I started he said, “Listen, don’t call him Jerry today. Call him Mr. President.” It was beautiful, absolutely. The man was unbelievably – he was in control of his emotions, he never swore, he never raised his voice, he just went over a pretty accurate history, and that night when Helmut joined him for dinner, I did, Helmut and Jim Callaghan, and I think Trudeau, two others, I can’t remember for sure, but he wanted a small group. But here’s the closure: he had asked that his car be driven up to where we were going to have cocktails in a religious – a Catholic building of a hundred or more years, and it was beautiful. We had a cocktail. The road was cobblestone and it was very hard. They said, Jerry, you have to walk, and his knees still hurt. So he got there and we had maybe two drinks and then we came out.

There were thousands of Mexican people – thousands. Very low roof – no higher than that – lower almost than this picture, thousands of people. “President Jerry, President Ford,” (clapping hands) “Bravo.” They cheered, I’m walking behind Ford and I had tears running down, and it was chilling. The next night he had to go give a speech in Washington for the Press Club, and the next night Helmut took the lead. He couldn’t get one (clap). Helmut doesn’t like that. But the whole experience that he gave me to really use the creativity, maybe that I have on different things, was wonderful. And I’ve had a wonderful life, I will always look up to him and when I trace his history – if you go Eagle Scout five times, University of Michigan, he made a bigger impression than just his football – just as captain of the team. He was impressive all the way.
If you follow him along into the Congress and then as he slowly moved up the ladder in the Congress and then to the vice presidency, and then to the presidency, and then back to the gift every year that he named this meeting, every year of intellectuals, of statesmen, of political leaders, of people from all over the world discussing the problems of economics, the problems of the poor and whatever. It was marvelous and the fact that – I’ve been twenty years on the board at Hoover – and a group like that – it’s not very friendly. American Enterprise is very friendly and they loved Jerry. Everybody loved Jerry.

Smith: Who were some of the other folks on the board when President Ford was active?

Laughlin: I wasn’t on that board, but there were practically none – Julie you just mentioned two or three that came to visit me.

Julie: (Inaudible)

Laughlin: He was very young and I think he is chairman now.

I got very ill, so I haven’t been to one of those meetings for how many years? Five? Seven?

Julie: Yeah.

Smith: Now you mentioned Giscard was sort of the odd-man out in the quartet. Was he a little bit harder to know?

Laughlin: Very hard to know. He and I were having lunch some place and we were having a pretty good discussion, I thought, and a woman came along and he just dropped me without even finishing the sentence. I just felt, I don’t know how he fitted into that. And he also was the first one to drop out of the foursome. He was not at my last meeting. I can’t speak for him because I never had…with Callaghan, he had me up to the university, what’s the name of that?

Julie: (Inaudible)
Laughlin: Swansea. What’s the big one – the whole state that he’s from?

Julie: Wales.

Laughlin: Wales, and he gave me an honorary degree at Wales, and all I did – he asked me to give a talk on leadership. I used a lot of Jerry Ford on leadership. And as a result, the students gathered together and did what I suggested, and they started going out to poor people and helping them. And it went from Swansea to the University of Wales, where he went. So he and I were really very, very close and I knew him a lot better, in a way, than Jerry. Because one thing I would never do is take advantage in any way of a friendship. I think that is crude and rude and stupid.

Smith: How frequently would you see the President in and around the desert?

Laughlin: Not very frequently. I do know, because I purposely looked for that. He was incredibly well-known for his constant effort to help fundraising activities and good organizations. He and his wife were involved in everything and I have a very strong feeling when somebody like President Ford has done such an incredible job in his lifetime, that people like me should not, in any way intervene, or try to win over friendships – I just wouldn’t do it. We would have to have a reason.

I called Helmut and all I will say is that when Jerry died, that he was incredibly emotional. I got a lot of time with Helmut because I was a problem-solver. I could solve problems. I didn’t have particular things to problem-solve, Jerry knew how to take care of the whole community and do all these things, and so I got along very, very well with Helmut on that basis. I got along tremendously with the president of Japan, Fukuda-san. And, in fact, I had Julie get a coat for his 88th birthday – as the big one – a beautiful, like a black leather – it was way too big for him – he’s a little guy. He had all heads of state from Asia at that birthday party and my present was the only one allowed to be opened in the big room. And he went berserk, it had a big Japanese sun and had America all over it, and he loved fun. I used to go after meetings with him for a couple of hours.
Now with Jerry, I just think we had a relationship of respect and care and I was very, very aware of all the people that he knew that maybe he hardly knew, that he was polite to – he was such a wonderful listener and gentleman. But it just so happened, he more or less didn’t come – he was getting older – to the meetings anymore and my hunch was that he left that part to me. Somehow.

Smith: Did you get to know Mrs. Ford at all?

Laughlin: A tiny bit. I met her there and I met her here and she had lunch for my wife and myself over at their house. The couch used to be over here. And, anyhow, my wife, on my advice, said come informally and I damned near got killed. She had on new tennis shoes, and Mrs. Ford got all dressed up, and oh my God, oh did I catch it.

Smith: Tell me about the personal qualities of the President. He had a sense of humor…

Laughlin: He had a sense of humor – a tremendous sense of humor. He was a great listener. He had a quality of leadership about him that you just sensed – at least I thought I sensed it. That day I told you about when he asked me to talk about what I was thinking of, my God, you could practically feel him absorbing what I had to say. When I talked to him in the airport or on the airplane, or we flew back from Europe together, he was very tired. He had a bad mattress, and was very tired from that experience in England. We talked, but never about political issues, or about…I guess I probably talked a lot about management and organization and how to get things done through people and I never felt strained. I never felt I was going too far.

Smith: Do you remember the last time he went to the World Forum?

Laughlin: No, I don’t, because I wasn’t there. I had the same problem he had. I had an oxygen problem – had to go to the hospital – how long was I not able to go? Five years?

Julie: At least five years in Beaver Creek.
Smith: Tell me about Beaver Creek, because for years, certainly towards the end of his life, their friends were urging the Fords not to go every summer. And they were adamant – they obviously loved the place, and I gather they were loved there. They were really part of the local community. Just describe the place.

Laughlin: Well, when I heard that he was going there, and I had seen he had been in the hospital in Philadelphia, was it? I thought he should not go because I had had this problem myself and still sort of have a little bit of it.

Smith: And how would you describe the problem?

Laughlin: It’s a hard problem. In my case, with fibrillation, so I have a hard time breathing. I get very weak, I stagger.

Smith: And altitude obviously effects it.

Laughlin: Altitude – I went back a second year and I was in the hospital the night I got there. I checked into the hotel and I was in the hospital. Incidentally, I had the same doctor he had. Not there, but at Mayo. The way I thought about, I should call him, and then I thought, “No, I’m not close enough. He’s not buddy-buddy.” I don’t run around telling everybody I know President Ford. I did tell some people, “I don’t think he should go.” I think it was a bad mistake, but on the other hand, he and his children and his wife had been there years ago from Grand Rapids, I guess, skiing, with their Golden Retriever, and they just had a wonderful time. Those cocktail parties they had on their porch every night for our group were just fantastic. They were relaxed.

Smith: Tell me about the house.

Laughlin: I never went inside the house – never. I went down with Penny – I’ve always been very, very careful not to, in any way, invade the privacy of someone like that. I have had people at a very high level that I’ve known better – well, Callaghan and Helmut. I can’t really say that I know Helmut better. To me, Jerry Ford was very superior to that whole group. He was the ultimate in leadership. If you study leadership and the psychology of it and the administration of it and the techniques and the creativity and the humanness, the most important thing of all, is caring for people, I believe. Caring – especially for those down lower. Jerry Ford had that.

Smith: How did you see that expressed?

Laughlin: In every action that I ever saw him make publicly and the way he ran the meeting. In the way he met people, it was very warm. The way he was criticized in Mexico, the way he told the American story – from his heart – and the way at the end he criticized, he didn’t swear or raise his voice. It was a little sarcastic, like maybe you should know better, but I think that, for example: there are twenty-one airlines in America. One airline alone, which is relatively new, only twenty-plus years old, if you took the stock of that one company, it is worth more than all the others together. It’s Southwest. And if you ask or follow a career like the founder and president, he was not unlike Jerry. He was 80% - they asked him in his farewell retirement, what did you do? He said, “I didn’t do anything. Our people did.” And if you went around Southwest where the black baggage man is and say, “Hey, did you ever meet the head…?” “Oh, my God, yes. He stops by every couple three weeks and we talk about his kids and my kids.”

There is a caring attitude that Jerry Ford had, you couldn’t do that as president of the United States, but that’s how he got ahead in Congress. That’s how he got ahead as a Scout. I did not mention AEI’s headquarters, those scholars, and you must know this, they loved him. If you go to Hoover – I have to be very careful here – Hoover is great. Tremendous scholars, unfortunately, we have a new organizational concept which I think is going to change things forever. But you go there, there is the sun camera, there is a little mildew in the library next door, and it gets over there and it’s not so easy – last time I was there, because of my illness, I’d just gotten over pneumonia.

I have not been there for quite a while, but the last time was in the spring with the commanding general of our Middle East forces, talking about the big bomb and what the odds are. And he was light and fluffy and full of fun and we had a great talk. We sat together very closely, and we agreed on most everything, but he did make a little comment. “Boy, it’s a little heavy around here, isn’t it?” (sniffing) And it is a little different. It’s well-run, though. Well-run. It’s just that it seems to me that they have a lot more fun with Gerson and with their presidente. So that’s something that Ford had, not to the extent that the Southwest guy had, because you couldn’t in that kind of a job.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Laughlin: No, I don’t remember the exact last time. About a year and a half, two and a half years ago now. It’s odd that I had the same nurse that he had, the same doctor here. I can’t remember.

Smith: Had his health deteriorated at that point?

Laughlin: Yes, the last time. And my health did also. They wanted me to come to that meeting I designed for InterAction Council…

Laughlin: Yeah. The doctors wouldn’t let me go. They said I’d be dead before I got there. Now my doctors tell me if I really watch it I can go to one in Saudi Arabia next summer. But it seems maybe odd that I say it was so wonderful to meet him, he inspired me. I observed him. I spent a lot of time observing leaders. What are they so good at? And I’ve never seen anybody run a big meeting close to what he could do. Sixty, eighty people, all big wheels. In my office people listen to me.

Smith: Maybe because he was so self-effacing.

Laughlin: That’s the best word. He was. He was very humble for a man of such success.

Smith: Did you ever play golf with him?

Laughlin: I never played golf with him. My wife and I saw him when he came out to the Bing Crosby from the White House, and he was late and he fit it in. And we waited for him on one hole and he hit the ball way in the rough. No, I never did play. Looking back, I sort of regret that I didn’t – I wasn’t a little more forward – I was, at that time, I was president of the World Presidents’ Organization, and I was in the State Department as an advisor at a high level.
In fact, one night I wore the wrong suit to dinner. They said get all dressed up, so I got my Irish suit, and afterwards the undersecretary asked me to come and have a cocktail with him and some other guy and a couple of staff. They said we have some private things to talk about, would you go to the bar with these two young people? And they said, “When you come and the President is coming over here you’re supposed to wear blue.” And this was Irish brown tweed, I think. Wow.

Smith: Tell me one last thing. Describe the, for lack of a better word, the charitable landscape of the desert. The Fords were clearly quite active, quite visible, as you indicated, in a number of causes. How does that work?

Laughlin: Well I think it works well because people are coming from all parts of our country here. And in their hometown or their home region, they have a Boys & Girls Club, so they come here and they want to engage.

Smith: Is there a season of the year?

Laughlin: Oh yes. I definitely think. Let me give you a different example on the same subject. I, at Hoover, suggested to them – when I first got on the board, it was a mess – the president of Stanford, the head of – oh, they fought.

Smith: Glenn Campbell?

Laughlin: Glenn Campbell. So I suggested they needed a public relations group of the board. Have a new group – a fundraising group. And that was the beginning. I had a number of other suggestions later. Well, in the fundraising – nobody showed up for the first meeting, I was the only one in Washington to show up, and I told John Raisian, I said, “John, look, if I ever ask you to have board members in a meeting, they’d better be there. I’m an easy guy, but I don’t come all the way to Washington to just sit here by myself. And they have to do all the work, anyhow, because I am more creative.”

Anyhow, they didn’t do very well, and so I went to a board meeting and I said, “Look, what you’ve got to get in your head for your professionals, go where the money is. It’s not going to be in Sun Valley in the winter because the wealth can be there, but they ski all day, they want a cocktail, a quick dinner and go to bed. They’re tired. Go to the desert. Go to the best country club down there – the richest. And the same thing in Florida, in Palm Springs, Florida, and you will be surprised.” So they went to the vintage, it’s become unbelievable. And now that’s been, how many years ago? Long ago. We have now a record 140 trustees, a number of billionaires – so the desert is the place where you can bring a think tank down here because, look, they play golf January and February. If you hit it late in February or early in March, they’re bored. They want two or three days – so bring George Schultz, your superstars and you’ll win.

Well, the desert has a number from almost every group that come here, wealthy people. And when they come they give money to foundations, they give a lot of money to foundations. If you look at the hospital, there are about 300 people who give $250,000 because they used creativity. The creativity was simple: if you give $250,000 or $50,000 a year, they take seven of their best nurses, full-time, so if you got sick, you’ll have an ambulance take you right, the nurse will be waiting, you’ll get your beautiful room, you’ll get President Ford’s room or someone like that, and there will be a doctor there. It so happens two years ago they lost $27 million from people who didn’t pay their bills. It offsets it. If people who come here already - a certain percentage - love charity, they love to help people.

Smith: Five minutes.

Laughlin: Five minutes to go? Can I hold out?

Smith: You’re doing just fine.

Laughlin: Penny said you’re a great guy. She didn’t build it up enough.

Smith: Tell me, for people who didn’t know him, people who never met him, or he’s just a name in a textbook, or maybe they saw a film clip when he died, what’s important for those people to know about Gerald Ford?
Laughlin: What a marvelous, caring humanitarian he was. What a marvelous team member he was. Team in Congress, team in the White House with all, an ability to get along with the other party. I think it’s very important to know that you don’t have to have an outgoing personality, a rah-rah-rah kind of thing, that he had a lifelong career from Eagle Scout to work toward this. And during every one of those years, they were learning years where mistakes were made, but from the mistakes is a new idea – a new way of doing things.

Smith: I had a very clear sense that they really made an effort, as much as they could, to have younger people around them. You live in a bubble, and people who only see you through that bubble are afraid to approach. They only see you in the official capacity. It’s almost a prison of sorts – that fame and celebrity and wealth, and certainly all of the trappings that go with being a president or a former president. I wonder if they ever felt, in some ways, cut off from the kind of natural interchange that I think they enjoyed.

Laughlin: I never got that impression. That’s another reason I didn’t try a little harder, because I felt they already had their lifelong friends. I think that’s important that everyone have close friends, and I just made an assumption. I had a different situation, say with Margaret Thatcher, that I met through another group I was in. She and I hit it off right away, and we got to talking about a project and I was very forceful with her. In fact, don’t we have a picture showing me with her, where she is pointing at me like this and I’m pointing at her? I think there was something about his personality…he was an American I really admired so much. I know what it’s like to have too many things to do. I regret, in a way, now that I’m talking to you, I’m regretting it a little more every moment that I didn’t push harder.

Smith: Was he a workaholic?

Laughlin: I think so. I would be pretty sure. Work, work, work, work. And I just can’t think enough about how fortunate we are in our country to get people like that. I think all too often our media destroy people. In a job like that, they make mistakes – you have to make mistakes. And it gets to be a more public relations for a particular point of view of the Left or the Right. Where I would prefer that we chase hatred away and have love, and bring that love to a marriage to bring children up so the children understand values and caring about people. And I think Ford was sort of like that. But I think if I tried to explain it that way, I don’t know…what do you think he would do?

Smith: I know what you’re saying. Emotionally, he never left Grand Rapids.

Smith: No, and the example of his parents was a very powerful one. I think all of his life.

Laughlin: Yeah.

Smith: And that’s a perfect note on which to conclude.

Laughlin: You’re greater than I thought.

Smith: Thank you so much for doing this, we appreciate it.

Timmons: Thank you for coming by.

Smith: Professionally you started in this town with Bill Brock. Was it in the mid-‘60s?

Timmons: No. In 1955 I came here to go to college, but I had to work. I went to school at night at Georgetown and I got a job on the Hill for Senator Alexander Wiley from Wisconsin. So from ’55 to ’62, I was in the Senate as a staffer. Then I went back to Chattanooga and was campaign manager for Bill Brock, who is a contemporary and long time friend of mine. He asked me to come back to Washington in January of ’63 as his assistant.

Smith: So you were really in on the beginnings of what we would call the modern Southern Republican Party.

Timmons: Yes, I think so. And Brock was one of those, of course.

Smith: How difficult was it to elect a Republican in 1962?

Timmons: Incredibly difficult. Brock was the first Republican to represent our district in forty-two years at the time. And the only way that he won, really, was that they had a Democratic primary and the losing side in the primary decided to plague on the party’s nominee and supported Brock. A lot of great stories from those days, but he stayed in the House until he went to the Senate, and served one term in the Senate. But, yeah, there was a lot of movement in the South rejecting the Democratic philosophy and moving to the Republican side. But it was a hard choice for a lot of people whose parents has been Democrats and brothers and sisters were Democrats and sort of ostracized them.
Smith: Well, let’s face it, memories of the war in some places – when they talked about the war, they talked about the Civil War, not World War II.

Timmons: One of my grandfathers was still alive when I was young and got involved in Republican politics. I visited him on the porch one summer night, probably a year before he died. He had been a Democratic ward heeler, a surgeon, had served in the state legislature. He was a union guy, too, very active in all of that; a tax collector. I mean, he was really, for a Southern ward heeler he was the epitome of it. And I was Republican. I sat on the porch with him and he said, “Bill, I wish I had some money in my estate so that I could write you out of my will.” And he would have; he wasn’t joking. So, yeah, it was heavily Democrat, although I must say it was a conservative Democratic area in the South by and large with the ____________.

Smith: Would he have been, for example, a strong Roosevelt supporter?

Timmons: Yes, very strong.

Smith: You could begin to understand. Today you look at the New Deal coalition and you think this makes no sense, until you get to the personal level and you talk to people like your grandfather. Then you begin to understand how all of these unwieldy, seemingly opposed pieces hung together.

Timmons: Well, the TVA, Tennessee Valley Authority, was really instrumental in the economy of the valley in eastern Tennessee and down through there. Roosevelt obviously got all the credit for that, as he should have, and my people felt that jobs were important. And it was cheap electricity, and so forth. So that was running through people’s minds for Roosevelt.

Smith: We’ve talked to Senator Brock. He obviously had a really tough re-election fight in ’64, as a lot of Republicans did. He’d been a strong Goldwater supporter. Were you at the convention?

Timmons: For Goldwater?

Smith: In San Francisco?

Timmons: Yes, I was a floor whip.
Smith: You were?

Timmons: Yeah.

Smith: I have to ask you because my book opens with the Tuesday night when Rockefeller spoke and almost taunted the crowd and the crowd lustily responded. What do you remember of that?

Timmons: Of the speech?

Smith: Well, yes, and the mood. How divided was the party?

Timmons: Well, the party wasn’t particularly divided because all the delegates there were Goldwater delegates by and large, except for some in New England, and so forth. Scranton was the opposition candidate and emotions were pretty high because of what they thought was the Rockefeller wing of the party controlling everything for years. And they now had the ascendancy for the conservative movement. And so it was pretty bitter. But there were not a lot of Rockefeller/Scranton delegates there. In fact, one of my jobs was to lock the door to the convention hall so that busloads of students that Rockefeller/Scranton had bussed in to try to storm the floor, couldn’t get in. I was standing there with Fred LaRue, I guess, and we’d locked the door and wouldn’t let them in. They were out there, hundreds of them, screaming and shouting and trying to get in. There was also a lot of falsification of passes. We found a lot of them had the same number and everything. You’d lick your finger and it would smudge the ink, you know. So there was a lot of that going on, and that all kind of came together as things that made Goldwater delegates upset.

Smith: You get the sense that if he hadn’t existed you would almost have had to invent him. He was the perfect foil.

Timmons: That’s right.

Smith: For where you wanted to take the party.
Timmons: That’s right. And there was nobody else, really. Evidence the fact that he took Bill Miller, a nobody, as his running mate. What did that add? So you would have to invent somebody.

Smith: Obviously things don’t go well in November, but you hang on, come back. And there is this effort to reinvent the rump that remains in the House of Representatives, including finding new leadership. What was the problem with Charlie Halleck? Or was it a combination of post-Goldwater, and people just wanting a fresh face?

Timmons: We’re talking about Gerald Ford in this interview, so Ford had become the conference chairman in ’63 and Brock had been one of the Young Turks supporting that effort for new leadership. Because Brock represented at the time – he was 32 or something – and a lot of other young people. Rumsfeld was another.

Smith: Charlie Goodell, Bob Dole.

Timmons: Goodell, Dole, and on and on, I can’t remember all of them. But there’s core group of young people who wanted new leadership. And they supported Ford in ’63, and then in ’65. The natural progression was that Charlie Halleck had to go because he represented the old view. I don’t think it was liberal/conservative, it was more leadership potential.

Smith: And generational?

Timmons: And generational.

Smith: Let me ask you a big question. The older I get, the more it seems to me that generational politics trumps almost everything else.

Timmons: Yeah. It’s very, very important. Philosophy in a lot of people is immensely important obviously, because you’ve got fringe groups on both ends. But generational politics is extremely important. You see it in Obama, who appealed to young people and turned them out to vote and McCain was seen as the old guard. So generational politics do matter.
Smith: It would help to nail down something because there has been talk over the years that there was a possibility of Mel Laird being a candidate for that job. And of course in the end, it went to Ford. Does that ring a bell?

Timmons: Well, I remember Laird, who I guess became conference chairman after Ford became leader, and I don’t recall that there was an actual challenge to Ford. Because the two became very close all the way through their professional lives. But there could have been. Laird was ambitious, and of course, so was Ford. So, I just don’t recall that specifically.

Smith: But your sense is that the Ford election in ’65 was as much as anything else, a generational desire for change among the freshmen?

Timmons: Oh, yes. In fact, they called them Young Turks; the group around there – Jack McDonnell, and all of them. But an interesting side bit to this was that when Ford was running for leader, he wanted to dump Les Arends as the whip. Arends was Halleck’s whip. Kind of an older generation guy and Ford wanted to dump him in favor, I think, of Laird or somebody – probably Laird. And Arends, - I, of course, wasn’t there but I’m told - said, “Jerry, don’t do this. I’ll win and you will be embarrassed.” Well, Ford tried and Les won and had to serve with Ford. They got along great because everybody gets along with Ford at the time. But he tried to dump Arends, the whip, and Arends beat him.

Smith: That’s interesting.

Timmons: There a little humility there, I guess.

Smith: It’s also been suggested that you had the Ev and Charlie Show, which became the Ev and Jerry Show, and that at least some folks, particularly the Young Turks, looked at Dirksen and they saw an old lion who was sometimes too friendly with the Johnson White House. That Ev would go down and cut his deals over a couple of drinks with the President. And they wanted someone speaking for House Republicans who was perhaps a little bit less amenable to the administration. Does that ring a bell?

Timmons: Well, it could be, I don’t recall that specifically, but it makes sense. Knowing the attitude of the Republicans in the Congress, that made a lot of sense.
However, I guess Hugh Scott replaced Ev Dirksen, which didn’t accomplish much in that regard either – as far as generational politics go.

Smith: That’s true. And it’s hard to believe today – today’s Republican Party would not choose Hugh Scott.

Timmons: You’re right.

Smith: They might not nominate Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania. Tell us briefly, because everyone waxes nostalgic about then as opposed to now. I mean, up on the Hill in terms of just the basic civility that existed, how were things different in those days. And what was the role of the Republican leader in pushing a program when you didn’t have a whole lot of troops?

Timmons: Yeah, well it was a kind of accommodation and I think that Leader Ford had to find ways to accommodate the Democrats without compromising his principles and the party’s principles. And therefore, he was seen rather as a pacifier in the fights that could have happened. [There was] so much more civil dialogue in those days and discussion. President Nixon had great support among Southern Democrats – Joe Wagoner and the group, and Ford was involved in all of that, of course, by dealing with those Southerners to try and get a majority on certain issues. But everybody could sit down and talk. There weren’t the kind of strong feelings that people have today – party politics.

Smith: Let me ask you: how different is it? I was talking to Walter Mondale about this. And actually even Ted Kennedy later on, when we were talking to him, when a new representative went to Washington in the mid-‘60s, you found parties that were broadly liberal and broadly conservative, but also happened to have wings. So that, for example, Mondale was told – well Dole said when he went to DC, he was told, “Go spend some time with Senator Eastland.” Ted Kennedy said he was told, “Spend some time with Dick Russell.” And it wasn’t just spend some time with the Old Bulls, but the fact is, spend some time with people who are ideologically your opposite, but are in your party.

The fact is the Republicans had a liberal wing. The Democrats obviously had a conservative wing. So that within your party, you had to learn to deal with people who were you ideological opposite before you functioned in the larger institution. Isn’t that by and large gone today?

Timmons: Yes, I think it is.

Smith: And what is the consequence of that?

Timmons: There are heated exchanges every day up on the Hill in both the Senate and the House, within the limits of the rules, on political and ideological issues. And there seems to be very little middle ground. Gerald Ford would have sought middle ground, I think. I’m not sure the current leadership cares about that.

Smith: Why was there middle ground to be found then as opposed to now?

Timmons: From the Republican point of view, there was really no choice. The numbers were overwhelmingly Democratic, and if you wanted to impact legislation in any way, you had to accommodate and compromise. And the Democrats, some of them, were willing to do that, particularly the Old Bulls. Most of the committee chairs were Southern conservatives in those days and their philosophy was not unlike some of the Republicans. So there was an opportunity to negotiate and deal, particularly on budget matters.

Now that all kind of fell apart later. But also in those days staff was very small. There was one Senate building when I came and now there are three. There were two House of Representative buildings and now there are three. Staff of four or five people, and of course a decade or so before that, there was one or two people on the staff. So it had grown some. And now, Lord knows, it’s twenty or thirty. If you’ve got a committee, it’s even more. So the staff takes a greater role now, I think, than they did in those days.

Smith: Is it safe to say - Ford certainly did, even though he had a safe district - that members were much more inclined to go home more often than is currently the case?

Timmons: Right. I think so. There are some that are afraid to go home now. But, no, I think so.
Smith: Do they spend more time raising money now than they did then?

Timmons: Oh, absolutely. No question. A House member starts the day he is elected to raise money for the next one, and some Senators raise money four, five years out.

Smith: Presumably the parties have less control, less influence even, today.

Timmons: Yes.

Smith: It’s more about media, and the media have become more confrontational. Clearly cable TV drives this, and you need a new storyline every 24 hours. So Joe Wilson’s the center of attention today and tomorrow there will be someone else.

Timmons: Yeah. They are all seeking news and creating news, in some cases. But raising money and running for re-election is paramount to most members of Congress these days, as opposed to thoughtful consideration and research on legislation. Even with the huge staffs they’ve got, it’s hard. People made a lot out of how nobody’s read these health care bills, a thousand pages. A great majority of members, both Democrat and Republican, probably will not read it by the time they vote on it. Part of the problem is that you take a paragraph in the bill and it says amendment to such and so and so, line 84, da da da. That means nothing until you go back to the original act and see what it’s amending and that amends something else. So it’s not just “read it though like a novel.”

Smith: It was a different Republican Party then. It seems to me Gerald Ford, in many ways, was almost the perfect representative of a party that was grounded in the Midwest. You were beginning to develop a Southern wing.

Timmons: But a lot in New England, too. In those days you had a strong group. Massachusetts had two Republican senators, and over half the House delegation was Republican.

Smith: Was it Ford’s strength that he got along with and was trusted by everyone?

Timmons: It’s his character. I think that everybody will say is that he had sterling character. He understood people. He appreciated their positions, he had empathy for hardships in different situations. His character, which includes personality, was just superb. Nobody that I know of, other than maybe Elizabeth Holtzman, ever questioned his character because it was really great. You could trust him, he was honest, straightforward. One word that encapsulates the whole thing is decency. He was the most decent person you’d ever meet.

Smith: And what was it with Elizabeth Holtzman?

Timmons: I think she was kind of off the reservation a lot of times. And Ford didn’t like her, either, after she attacked him personally on so many things. It started way before Watergate, but Watergate kind of brought all that out.

Smith: That’s interesting. It started before he was vice president?

Timmons: Yeah, I think it goes way back when she would not only talk about him and the Republican Party - she was a flame-thrower, as we would say. We just finished talking about [the first] that there was not that sort of vituperation back then. But now here’s an example, and there were several others. But by and large, the Old Bulls in the House liked Gerald Ford. And under the Twenty-fifth Amendment, when he was named vice president, there were very few votes against him in the House and the Senate. Very few. And so it meant that most Democrats supported him, and they liked him.

Smith: Conservatism also, however, has changed dramatically over the last forty years. What kind of conservative was Gerald Ford?

Timmons: I think he was an economic conservative, and a liberal foreign policy person.

Smith: A product of World War II consensus?

Timmons: That’s right. He always supported defense appropriations. He had little interest in social issues back then and was a strong supporter when he was in the House of President Nixon on virtually everything. The only thing I can think of that they disagreed on was Nixon wanted to use some highway money in the highway trust fund for mass transit. And Ford, coming from Michigan, opposed that vigorously. That’s the only one issue that I can think of.
Smith: How was that resolved?

Timmons: In favor of Ford.

Smith: Now, you say opposed. I assume that would be behind the scenes, in the discussions?

Timmons: There were discussions, but I think it was also a public thing. It wasn’t bitter or mean, it was “I disagree with the President on this,” and the highway trust fund is sacrosanct and must be used for what the monies were raised for. Good logical argument. Of course, he’s from an auto state, too. And Nixon was trying to find a way to move some money into mass transit for all kinds of reasons.

Smith: It’s always been said that Ford’s great ambition in life was to be Speaker of the House.

Timmons: I think that’s true. I think he said that several times.

Smith: When Nixon is elected in ’68 and he makes some decent gains in Congress, although obviously they’re still in a minority status. Of course Ford looked at ’72 as a possible Republican landslide and was disappointed when they didn’t pick up as many seats as he’d hoped. And that’s when he told Betty that he would retire after ’76. He said in his book that Erlichman went once to meet with he and other Republican leaders on the Hill, and didn’t help matters by falling asleep in the course of the meeting. What your job was at that point? You joined the administration when?

Timmons: After the election of ’68, __________________ during the transition and then moved into the White House in January of ’69 with President Nixon. I was the deputy assistant. And my responsibilities were the House of Representatives. Kim Ballou was responsible for the Senate, and we worked for Bryce Harlow, who was the assistant to the President.

Smith: Tell us about Bryce Harlow, who is a legendary figure, but I don’t think people know very much about why he was so revered.
Timmons: Oh, just a super guy. He and Ford were so much alike in character and integrity. Bryce Harlow came here from Oklahoma to work on the Hill, and he worked for the House Armed Services Committee. He was a young staffer. During World War II he was assigned to the Pentagon and worked there in Legislative Affairs and then Eisenhower brought him into the White House. He was a valuable assistant there doing some congressional work, but mainly as a speechwriter. He had a tremendous vocabulary and understanding of words and how to fashion speeches. He stayed close to Eisenhower after Eisenhower left office, and he obviously knew Nixon from the Eisenhower days; so he was kind a natural person for Nixon to appeal to, to come in. And he was, at time, kind of the grey-beard of legislative affairs. But he knew every member of Congress - well not every member - but the important members of Congress. Understood how they thought, what could be expected and not expected of them. And of course he knew President Nixon well for years. So he was an ideal person to come in there.

Smith: Is it safe to say that he was one of the relatively small number of people who really enjoyed Richard Nixon’s trust?

Timmons: Yes, I would say so. Nixon turned to him several times, even after Bryce left the White House, to come back in. And so did Ford. Ford liked him a lot and they were close. Everybody liked Bryce. Kind of like Ford, everybody liked Ford with very few exceptions. So he worked in very well there. He started and when I succeeded Bryce in the White House as the assistant for legislative affairs, I followed the same routine that Bryce had, which was to set up once a week an hour or hour and a half, in Republican Leader Ford’s office, a gripe session. Same thing with Hugh Scott in the Senate, different day, and asked Ford to schedule people who were complaining about things so we could sit down and talk to them firsthand.

We did that once a week. I took notes and we talked to these members and tried to satisfy them the best we could. So often it required us to come back to the office and try to figure out whatever they were – bridge or dam or some policy issue or whatever. We tried to do it in ten, fifteen minute segments so we could get more people in there. That’s why sometimes it was an hour and a half. And we told Ford that we did not object if Democrats wanted to come. So occasionally word got around and Democrats would go up to Leader Ford and say they wanted an eyeball with Harlow/Timmons at the next meeting, and he would schedule it in his office.

Smith: Great idea. Had that ever been done before?

Timmons: No, not to my knowledge. And so I think I was ________ about it. So on one of those occasions, because of some policy issue, we brought Erlichman. Not just us, but John Erlichman to sit in and listen to what was going on. Allegedly he dozed off or closed his eyes or something during one of those sessions. The legislative office, I often think, is really situated not at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue or at the Capitol, but on 8th Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, halfway between the two great bodies, suffering the slings and arrows from both directions.

Smith: You know, that’s classic because there is this notion out there - when people use the shorthand, they speak about the Nixon White House. Well, I don’t know what the Nixon White House means, or any White House for that matter. But nevertheless, the notion is taken hold that presumably, beginning with the President on down, those immediately around him, had an attitude bordering on contempt for “the Congress.” What’s your response to that?

Timmons: I think that’s true. I think that certainly with President Nixon it was true.

Smith: Was it based in part on his own experience there?

Timmons: I think so. He was an outsider all the time. He would sit on the House Un-American Activities, and the Senate for what – two years, I guess. But he knew the mindset up there and figured that they were all against him and against any changes, and therefore, the heck with them. He would go his own way. Talk to the American people, try to get something done. He was the first president in 140 years to come into the White House without control of Congress. And people don’t recognize what problems that presents a president. And of course, Ford inherited that. The current president, Obama, has absolute control in both bodies, what a luxury that would be for a president in the White House. We didn’t have that, Nixon nor Ford, so it was very, very difficult to work with Congress. While Ford was a creature of Congress, I think later, after he’d been in the Executive Branch for a while, he began to say, hey, these guys are not serious, they’re acting politically as opposed to the public interest.

Smith: Given that attitude toward Congress generally, how did that effect the kind of working relationship with the Republican leadership in the House? If Gerald Ford is a man of the House, and his friend the President, who has very different attitudes perhaps, toward the body, how did that work?

Timmons: Very, very difficult in both the Nixon administration – I was only in the Ford administration for a few months, but we tried to set up as many one on one or small group meetings as we possibly could. And Ford was eager to do that, of course, and would go back to the Hill on occasions. Nixon didn’t like to go back to the Hill, but he did agree to - and I think people don’t understand this - a lot more meetings than one would expect of him. One on one, small group meetings, breakfasts, lunches, dinners, we always invited members of Congress to State Dinners. We got kind of a quota and we worked through Ford and Scott on who to invite. So it gave them a little more stroke. They could dole it out and call a member and say, “I’ve arranged for you to…” And we tried to build up the leaders that way.

We talked to them about proposals that were coming before they hit the press and before they hit Congress. If it was a statement to the Speaker and the President Pro Tem of the Senate, we would try to give leaders a 24 hour notice, talk to them. State of the Union Address, I went up when I had the House responsibility with Ford, and actually had a draft of his State of the Union speech, and we sat together and he went over it and he made some good suggestions – change agriculture to farm, you know, things that you can understand. So we did that frequently, again, to build up the rapport with the leaders in the House and the Senate.

Smith: Now, presumably that was easier in the House because Nixon and Ford had had a longstanding relationship.

Timmons: Yes.
Smith: It is reputed that Hugh Scott had a reputation for leaking. Was the Nixon-Scott relationship more problematic than the Nixon-Ford relationship?

Timmons: Oh, yeah. The Nixon-Scott relationship deteriorated, I think, with each day. It was not healthy.

Smith: What contributed to that?

Timmons: Well, I think the leaks and the fact that Scott would criticize the administration publicly, where Ford would do it privately.

Smith: What would he say in private? What kinds of things would he find fault with, or how would he communicate that?

Timmons: He would say that the President must understand the role of Congress here, and he cannot come forward with this kind of thing, he’s got to change it, or wait until next year. We’ve got too much on our plate. I mean, those kinds of advices that he gave the President directly, and less frequently, about what he is picking up from his members. Not his own views necessarily, but what his leadership group thinks. So he would always give us advice on that. We didn’t always take it. But it was always good, I think, what Ford suggested we do regarding pushing different pieces of legislation and how to handle different issues. And I don’t think Scott participated in that regard.

Smith: There are those out there who suggest Nixon’s contempt – strong word – for Congress extended to Ford. You didn’t see that at all?

Timmons: No, no. He was very fond of Gerald Ford. And Nixon, of course is a whole different subject, but he had some imperfections and one of them I think was criticizing everybody, his family, and his staff. If somebody tried to analyze all that they’d come up with some kind of reasonable conclusion. I can’t, but he would get over it. Talking about Nixon now. After a meeting I’d bring in someone and he’d say, “Bill, stay back,” and somebody would escort the member out of the office and he’d come over and use his finger and punch me – I’ve probably still got bruises there – “Tell me the purpose of that meeting! What did that accomplish? I don’t understand why I had to meet with them.” And on and on and on. My stock answer was, “Mr. President, that’s money in the bank. That’s an investment that will come back and reward you.” Which was partly true, but it also got me off the hook and saved my chest from more bruises. Ford never did that. He would have people in and he would puff his pipe and he would enjoy that sort of discussion, I think, because they had a different kind of rapport.

Smith: Nixon famously said that he was an introvert in an extrovert’s profession. And I’ve often thought that the extraordinary thing about the Nixon presidency is not how it ended, but that it happened at all. I wrote a book on Tom Dewey once, and in some ways there are parallels between them.

Timmons: Right.

Smith: Did Nixon enjoy being president?

Timmons: I think he did. I think you wouldn’t understand that by meeting with him or talking to him or listening to him or looking at his stuff, but I think he really did. And he worked all the time. I mean, he was a workaholic. He’d go to Camp David or he’d go to Key Biscayne or he’d go to other places and he would always take a big bag full of work. He would go over them, writing notes in the margins and calling people from afar. I got more than one call from San Clemente or Key Biscayne, saying, “What do you mean by this?” And I’m sitting at home with no notes or anything and at some kind of disadvantage.

But he worked very hard and I think someone who didn’t enjoy the job would not have done that. They would have taken a pass on some of that stuff. And he enjoyed the prestige of the job and the history of the job. He was well-read on protocol and what the office of the presidency means. When he finally resigned, he used that as one of his excuses, which I think was legitimate from his point of view – that he didn’t want to diminish any more the Office of the President of the United States.

Smith: It’s been suggested that one of the keys to understanding this very complex man is that he was kind of a closet intellectual, who didn’t want people to know that about him.
Timmons: That’s right, he criticized the New England elite, but in fact, he was one himself, in a way. But while he criticized so many people, I can’t remember him ever criticizing Gerald Ford. He criticized me, Kissinger, Haldeman, Erlichman, and he would push people around. But Ford, he had great respect for him, and as far as I know, never criticized him openly. He did talk about how House Republicans ought to get together more and so forth. He didn’t blame Ford.

Smith: Let me ask you about the Justice Douglas “impeachment.” I know there is still debate over whether, in fact, Ford was really trying to impeach him or what he was doing. First of all, you have the Abe Fortas situation in 1969, and then of course, you had the Haynesworth and Carswell nominations that went down in flames. Is all of that related to this or would that have happened in your opinion if none of those things had happened?

Timmons: I really don’t know the background on that. Ford later on, I think, kissed and made up. Maybe in some way, ______ into the White House or something in his declining years. But that was quite bitter at the time.

Smith: Did you ever have any discussions with Ford about it?

Timmons: No, I can’t recall. Maybe I did, but it was thirty-five years ago, so I just can’t remember. But it did come up in Ford’s confirmation hearing in the House. Maybe the chairman, Peter Rodino brought it up. Ford answered it some way. But I think he pulled out some papers that had some naked women or something.

Smith: I think he had the magazine.

Timmons: The magazine of some sort, yeah. And that caused a problem because they said he shouldn’t have done that. I think he admitted later it was a mistake, not as criticism of the Justice, but using props like that.

Smith: It did make the case, though, pretty effective.

Timmons: Oh yes.
Smith: We come to ’72 and the President obviously wins the landslide victory and you don’t pick up that many seats in the House. Did you know, or was it common knowledge, that one result of that would be Ford’s retirement, sooner rather than later?

Timmons: No, I didn’t know about it. I had always assumed he would stay there and become Speaker one day when lightning struck.

Smith: Do you remember where you were when you heard about Watergate, if we define Watergate as the break in?

Timmons: Oh, yeah, I remember exactly. I was Nixon’s convention manager in ’68. When the other candidates were Reagan and Rockefeller in my ________, and then in ’72 I was convention manager again, although I was on the White House staff. In those days you could get away with doing stuff like that under the pretext that the President was going to be there and he was entitled to have some advance work. Truth of the matter is, I was convention manager and we were having a meeting over at the Committee to Re-Elect the President. I guess it was a Saturday in the morning, which I had called to talk about convention mechanics mostly – hotel rooms and buses and transportation tickets and the rules committee and so forth.

While Nixon didn’t have an opponent really, it seems to me John Ashbrook or somebody may have said he wanted to be president. It was really a free ride. And then somebody came in the door and said, “Have you guys heard that the Democratic National Committee was broken into last night? I said, “No, I hadn’t heard about that. Thank you.” The guy left. So what? Why would anybody break into the Democratic National Committee, trying to steal something probably? And if it had been McGovern’s office, that would create some more signals, I think. The Democratic National Committee? So we went on about our business and it was only later that we found out all the…

Smith: Over the years and to this day, there are people who say, “He couldn’t have been responsible for this because it was so stupid.” And one thing about Richard Nixon, he wasn’t politically stupid.
Timmons: Well, I don’t think anybody, even John Dean, has ever alleged that Nixon knew about it beforehand. The cover up is different, but the break in…Woodward and Bernstein accused me on the front page of the Washington Post of being one of those that received the illegal fruits of the break in. I protested and had Ziegler go out in the press office and deny it. Didn’t know anything about it. But then McGovern picked that up and used it in campaign ads with my name and teleprompter receiving the goods, as it were. Because Woodward and Bernstein must be right, they always have sixteen sources and they are wonderful and so forth. So I protested. And so I call the general counsel to the President and I said, “I want to sue these guys. This is not fair that I’ve been slammed here and surely by now they know that I wasn’t involved in this thing.” “Oh, no, you can’t do that. ________ you have no __________, you have depositions, and it would be a big issue. It will just fan the fires. This will blow over. You can’t sue.” The counsel was, of course, John Dean. His advice might have been right, but in later years, I’ve harbored some suspicions that maybe he had….so that’s how I heard about the Watergate. And quite frankly, even then, didn’t think it was a big issue. Didn’t foresee the kinds of things that would happen.

Smith: Well, who could? It’s interesting, I only heard Gerald Ford disparage two people in all the time I knew him.

Timmons: Is one sitting across the table from you?

Smith: Oh no. One was Gordon Liddy, and the other was John Dean. And in both cases the worst he could say about them was, “He’s a bad man.” That was as bad as it got.

Timmons: I agree with him in both cases, but I would add some more to the list.

Smith: Understood. Maybe a little more colorful language, too. There’s a sense that at some point, what goes by the umbrella name of Watergate, in effect paralyzes the Nixon White House. Is that an exaggeration? When did it become a crisis as opposed to a distraction?

Timmons: Probably sometime in ’73. I’m not sure. And it took the form of members of Congress not even considering Nixon legislation, not listening to us on issues and ramifications of what would happen if they passed this or that. And at some point, it seems to me, late ’73, that that kind of set in.

Smith: That would have obviously complicated Ford’s job. Did you have a sense - was he trying to be a good soldier during that period, was he trying to warn you off?

Timmons: He was a good soldier, all the time, a very good soldier. He felt, like the rest of us, that this was politically inspired by the Nixon opponents, the Democrats in the Congress; and that it wrong and while it was stupid for people to break in the Watergate, that the President was not involved. That’s what everybody inside thought at the time, including Ford.

Smith: We talked to Jerry Jones. At that point Haldeman and Erlichman were still there, so early ’73, or before April of ’73. And he [Jones] was in the personnel office at that point, sort of reorganizing it for Haldeman. He got a call from Haldeman one day, who said, “How many people work for the Vice President?” And Jerry did some mental arithmetic and said, “Maybe around fifty.” And Haldeman said, “I want undated letters of resignation from everyone.” Now, Jones sort of looked back and wondered…

Timmons: This was for the Vice President’s office?

Smith: Yes.

Timmons: Because we got the same thing from Haldeman for the regular White House staff, too, earlier.

Smith: Okay, earlier.

Timmons: Because everyone was complaining. They said they thought we won the election in ’72, and here we’re being asked to submit letters of resignation. So they got around to the Vice President a little later apparently.

Smith: Well, Jerry wondered if they didn’t know – and now we know, of course, that this investigation in Maryland had been going on I guess for some time before Elliott Richardson took it over. Whether in fact, those around the President were aware that the Vice President might have a problem. In other words, before the story appeared, I think it was in the Wall Street Journal that broke the Agnew story, did you know?

Timmons: No, I had no idea.

Smith: So it came as news to you?

Timmons: I was shocked. Just shocked. The President and Agnew, as it turned out, didn’t get along very well, it was not a close bond. But we tried to brief him up on legislative activities so he could function as the President of the Senate. [I] just had no idea and was disappointed.

Smith: The selection of Ford as vice president, there’s a lot of stories around that; that the President, if he’d had his druthers would have liked to have put John Connally in that office. What was it about Connally that so appealed to the President?

Timmons: I think his take-charge sort of attitude. He was aggressive.

Smith: Self-assured, positive, typical sort of personality when one thinks about a big Texan.

Timmons: A Lyndon Johnson sort of thing. That he’s right all the time and nobody dared challenge him. So soon after Congress confirmed him as Secretary of the Treasury, President Nixon asked me to ask him over to a leadership meeting, a Republican leadership meeting we were going to have with House and Senate leaders which we had regularly, like every other week; and asked Connally to be prepared to talk about something – I can’t remember what it was, but I said, “Yes, sir.” I went back to my office and I called Secretary Connally and I said, “I just came from the President and he would like for you to come over to a Republican leadership meeting next Tuesday and speak about (something).” I didn’t ask him if it was alright, I told him what the President wanted. He said, “Bill, you know I like you, but tell the President that if he wants me to come over there, he should call me.” Uhhhhh, so I said, “Oh boy, I’m going to get canned right now.” And I walked back into the President and said, “Mr. President, I hate to tell you but…” and related the story. And he laughed and he said, “Don’t worry about it, Bill, I understand. I’ll call John.” Boy, I got out of there quickly while I still had my hide.

The problem with Connally is that (?) didn’t only push around by Haldeman or Erlichman, by and large, because they had a lot of stories about the Berlin Wall and Ziegler, Haldeman, Erlichman, here, here, here, and he didn’t want it to be known or seen that he was kowtowing to staff. He was Secretary of Treasury and he and the President had a personal relationship and they will talk it over. And he came to the Cabinet meetings…

Smith: And Nixon admired that. The selection process for a replacement for Agnew - how would you describe that? Was there consultation with members of Congress?

Timmons: Not in my case.

Smith: Of course it happened very fast.

Timmons: Oh, it was three days, I think. Two or three days, and I supported Gerald Ford, of course, because I knew him so well and had worked with him perhaps closer than Nixon because of the nature of my job. But also, I thought he would be easily confirmed and Connally could not be confirmed easily, probably not at all, but not easily. George Bush was another one that was bandied about some and he had been the Republican National Committee chairman and I wasn’t sure that he could be easily confirmed. I would have been happy with any of them, frankly, from my personal perspective. But Ford was easily confirmed.

I felt that he and Nixon had a good relationship and he’d been so supportive of virtually everything that Nixon proposed to the Congress that he would have been my choice. I think we received a number of calls and letters from member of Congress for Ford. I didn’t go out and solicit them and didn’t sit down and ask them what they thought. I knew what they would say, generally. There was some opposition to Connally coming in on the telephone or in the mail.
Smith:   Bob Byrd famously said that there would be blood on the floor if you attempt to nominate Connally.

Timmons:  Bear in mind this was before emails and computers and cell phones. This was the old-fashioned landline telephone and loose leaf books on your desk. What a difference technology has made. So we were all very pleased with Ford. In fact, in the White House Pat Buchanan had circulated a little memo that supported Ford. Maybe the President had asked him to poll people, I can’t remember. I had signed up for Ford, I think there was a list, ‘What do you Think?’ So we were all happy. He got into an awkward position for Hugh Scott. I don’t think he expected it, but still people would say, “Well, one leader got it and the other didn’t.”

Smith:   This is a cynical town and over the years there has been a cynical notion that Nixon, in effect, looked upon Ford as his insurance. The idea being that with Jerry Ford here, they’ll never impeach me.

Timmons:  Nah, I don’t think so. I’ve heard that and __________ would be the next person in line and so forth. I just don’t believe that.

Smith:   The vice presidency is always a difficult job. And it’s interesting, one reason why Ford really tried to bend over backwards to be understanding of Rockefeller, who had a very difficult vice presidency, was his own experience. Ford didn’t like the job. And it went beyond the unique circumstances of that time. What was the attitude of folks in the White House toward the Vice President who was, let’s face it, out of town a lot and who presumably, at least in the eyes of some, was not sufficiently outspoken or vocal enough in his defense of the President? Was it a damned if you do, damned if you don’t kind of situation?

Timmons:  I think so. I think Ford was out campaigning for lots of people and doing lots of things, and he was not in the attack dog mode that Spiro Agnew was. And so there was the difference in operations style. He was quiet, self-confident, but not aggressive, and I think in light of being burned by the previous vice president, that extended over a little bit into Ford’s vice presidency. The fact that, well, we’ve been burned by this; we’ll kind of let him just do his Constitutional duty presiding over the Senate and a few other things.

Now I made a point of going over to see him at least once a week to brief him on legislative affairs, particularly on issues that may be coming up in the Senate where he would have to break a tie. He didn’t have any, but I made a point of doing that when he was vice president. Almost every week when he was in town, and Bob Hartmann sat in on those, and I think Dick Burris sat in on those. I didn’t do that for Agnew. He didn’t ask for it and I didn’t do it, but with Ford I did, because I thought he’d be interested and it might be helpful in some cases.

Smith: Did he ask you about Watergate?

Timmons: He never did. I think I was the first person to hold over - to be named to the Ford White House, as I recall. Not because of me, but because of continuity of the legislative agenda and the fact that members would call and have somebody to complain to other than the new president. And he had said at that time when I went in to talk to him - I said, “I should leave because they are going to kill you, just keep badgering you until you get rid of all the Nixon people. And I’m happy to go. I have three children, have twenty-two years in the government, I have no savings, I’ve got to look after the family.” He said he understood that, but wanted me to stay. And also he said that people would think that Ford was getting rid of people who were in the Nixon White House that had no relationship to Watergate.

He was very sensitive. This was the integrity of the guy and the decency of the guy. He was looking out not only in my situation, but the Cabinet and other people. He wasn’t going to fire them because they didn’t have anything to do with Watergate and they shouldn’t be punished and ostracized for something they had nothing to do with and no control over. It’s amazing to think that President Nixon, I think, under similar circumstances would have probably canned everybody he __________ without that. But that shows to me the decency. So I agreed to stay on through the legislative session, which, this was August and they had a break and then had elections.
Smith: Let me just clear up one thing. Was there a moment in your own mind when President Nixon’s survival became politically impossible? Was it when the Supreme Court ruled on the tapes? Was it when the so-called smoking gun tape was released? Or was it a more gradual dawning?

Timmons: It was a gradual realization that the support wasn’t there, was eroding fast. The House Judiciary Committee - on their Articles of Impeachment where he had strong Republican support and three or four Southern Democrats. And we were taking pretty careful nose counts on those things. So indirectly, it was the effect of releasing the tapes and the transcripts and the smoking gun and so forth, when people jumped ship. Even Republicans said, “I can support the Articles of Impeachment.” And then we shipped it to the Senate to see what a trial would show if he were impeached by the House and that started to erode too, because of dripping out every day. We would go up and say, “That’s the end of it. Don’t worry about it. We’ll regroup.” The next day, poof, something else. Just awful. And so I guess in the summer of ’74 you could sense the erosion of support for the President. And that effected, of course, legislation.

Smith: Was there any informal or formal, for lack of a better word, advice seeking with the Vice President, who after all knew as well as anyone the House, in terms of how to wage this battle? Were there any kind of consultations in terms of individual members?

Timmons: I don’t know who talked to him, if anybody talked to him. I would hope they did, but I don’t know that. I was not party to the discussion. How do you handle the Peter Rodino committee and the articles and so forth? And lawyers were pretty much in control of this then. Haig was intimately involved in it all, too. And we were all deliberately kept in the dark. We found out about these things when they were released publicly, most of them.

Smith: Mel Laird has a fascinating story. Laird, who came back in somewhat reluctantly to the White House, said that about a month after he was there he got a call from Fred Buzhardt. It seems like all roads lead back to Fred Buzhardt when it comes to the tapes. And I guess Fred Buzhardt had been his counsel at the Pentagon.
Timmons: Yes, I think so. And the President only allowed Fred to listen to the tapes there for a while.

Smith: Buzhardt tipped off Laird, which I’d never known, and that’s why oral history is invaluable. He tipped off Laird, he said, “Be careful what you say, I’ve been listening to the tapes. He’s in it up to his neck.” That’s Laird’s characterization. At which point Laird had to sort of debate with himself, do I leave, do I go? He stayed a while. Then when we saw Haig, I’d always assumed Haig had listened to, at the very least, the smoking gun tape. He said, “No, I never listened to any tapes.” He said, “Fred Buzhardt gave me some very good advice. Which is, ‘Don’t ever be alone in a room with a tape.’” And I assume that’s a reference to the eighteen and a half minute gap. So it does seem like Buzhardt is behind the scenes, and a much larger player in all of this than a lot of accounts have suggested. It’s also suggested by some that Al Haig, whatever his other flaws, was something of an unsung hero in trying to bring about a dignified, Constitutional conclusion to this.

Timmons: Yes, I think that’s true. And I think he did an admirable job. He, of course, will tell you he did, too. But that doesn’t detract from the fact that he held it together for a while. I think Gerald Ford appreciated that, although he brought Rummy in, but he had to do that. For Haig, it was time for him to go.

Smith: Now there is a famous meeting, and maybe there was more than one. But there is a famous meeting, at the end that the President had with his corporal’s guard of loyalists. I think there were some Southern Democrats in that room and other folks. Were you there for that?

Timmons: I set it up.

Smith: Was it at the very end?

Timmons: The night before he resigned, yes. August 3rd, or whatever it was. And he went on television, but he didn’t actually resign the next day. But that night he went on television, after he’d met with his loyalists. Well, once we heard that he was going to resign…

Smith: How did you hear that?
I guess Haig told me. My office was right next to Haig’s and Kissinger’s and a few feet down from the Oval Office. So we talked a lot in the corridors and bathroom and went in each other’s office. Then I told Haig that I thought that, “We should first get the leaders down here to meet with President Nixon privately and he can tell them. And then he may want to have his best friends come down. See what he thinks.” I didn’t talk to him. Haig talked to him and said, “Yes, he thinks it’s a good idea, bring down the bipartisan leaders and he’ll meet them in his Executive Office Building office at 5:30 (or something). And at 6:30 we’ll have his friends down to meet in the Cabinet Room. And here are people he wants you to include.” I saluted, contacted the leaders, had them come down. They came to my office first, several wanted a good glass of Scotch whiskey, which I provided, and then we walked from the West Wing over through to the Executive Office Building and met with President Nixon. I stayed there while he told them what was happening and it was kind of a glum, dreary sort of thing. Then I walked out with them. There were thousands of people outside the gates shouting and screaming. Speaker Albert turned to me and said, “I hope the President knows, and you tell him, that I had no part of any of this.” I said, “Yes, sir.”

They left, just in time for me to go over and check the acceptances to the evening event, Democrats and Republicans, best friends. And I got to putting some more chairs around and so forth and they came in and sat down. At the appointed time the President came in and sat down and told them what he was going to do the next day and he said, “I hope I haven’t let you down,” and we’ve been good friends and so forth. Very nice little speech. I looked around the room and everybody was crying – these Old Bulls – I mean, at that time they were sixty, seventy years old, tough, who would do anything to get ahead and they were bawling. Gee whiz.

Then the President tried to get up. We put so many chairs in you couldn’t get his chair out, so I jumped up and pulled his chair out for him so he could get out. He wasn’t crying, but everybody else was. And then he walked into the Oval Office and I told them that I had set up in the theater a television screen since they wouldn’t have the time to get back to the Hill or their homes, anybody who wanted to go over there could see the speech on television and have refreshments. And about half decided to go see the television and about half went home. But the President maintained his composure.

After that I don’t know how he could have gone on television. He did a good job on television, but wow, it was so emotional. I wouldn’t want to strike a match in that Cabinet room because of the intensity of feeling and so forth for him. Ironically, some of them would have voted against him to save their own skins or whatever reason. They didn’t have a chance unless they were on the Judiciary Committee. I always told the President he would never be impeached, and he wasn’t. So that was that bipartisan thing. Ford was obviously there, and Les Arends was there, and somewhere I’ve surely maintained a list. In fact somebody, I think John Rhodes, published the list somewhere – in the Congressional Record or something.

Smith: But the President, you said, maintained his composure throughout?

Timmons: Now, some people have said that because he had trouble getting out of his chair, that he was drunk or emotionally upset. It wasn’t the case. We had pushed so many chairs together he couldn’t get out, and I pulled the chair out for him and he was able to go on.

Smith: The next morning, were you in the East Room?

Timmons: Yes.

Smith: What was that like?

Timmons: Really sad. Just sad for most of us who were loyal. My wife was there. Some of the television clips you see nowadays, you can see us quite clearly, much younger, obviously.

Smith: More tears?

Timmons: More tears. And it was a very sad occasion and he went out and the Fords went out with them outside and onto the helicopter. So it was really a sad occasion for those of us who were loyal.

Smith: How difficult was it for the loyalists? We’ve been told from people who were in the room that later on comes the swearing in, and I think there was a receiving line and a reception down in dining room. And according to more than one person, you could see the Nixon people sort of peel off, go back to their offices. Which is not difficult to understand. The question, I guess, is what’s that say in a larger sense? In terms of meshing – you’ve already said that the President went out of his way to do the decent thing for the vast majority of Nixon people who were not involved with all these. Don Rumsfeld told us he told the President, “You should get rid of these people fast.”

Timmons: Yup.

Smith: But what were the tensions, in those early days between the Nixon White House staff which remained, and the new people?

Timmons: I think there was some tension. The Ford vice presidential people, I think, probably felt slighted some over the year that he was there, and the Nixon people recognized that and sensed it and so there was some of that there. It wasn’t bitter, but I think it wasn’t a warm and fuzzy sort of relationship. “There’s a new day coming and new people and you accept it” sort of thing.

Smith: How polarizing was Bob Hartmann?

Timmons: Very.

Smith: And what made him a polarizing figure?

Timmons: He had been with Jerry Ford for years and years and years in the Congress as his top guy; his speechwriter, very able speechwriter; and he was the person to go to for Ford. Ford had other staff, of course, but Hartmann was the king of the Hill. And when he came to the White House as vice president, he still retained that position, albeit there were others now brought in and the job changed some because it was the Executive Branch, not Legislative Branch, and there’s no floor votes and a different kind of environment.

Let me say, I got along with Hartmann, both [when Ford was] on the Hill and as vice president, and even when he was president for the few months I was there. But when Gerald Ford became president, Hartmann could see his strength eroding in relationship to Ford. Ford started with everybody welcome to come in the Oval Office.

Smith: The Spokes of the Wheel.

Timmons: Spokes of the Wheel.

Smith: Was that the congressional mindset?

Timmons: I guess, yes, it’s the congressional mindset. It doesn’t work in the White House. Ford finally realized that; Rumsfeld convinced him of it later. So Hartmann didn’t control access like he did before and he didn’t like that. And then the President had other speechwriters and Hartmann didn’t like that. The nature of his personality was rather abrasive.

Smith: Was he possessive of Ford?

Timmons: Yes, very much so. And of course, that was broken with Rumsfeld. He couldn’t go in to see Ford without going through Rumsfeld, and Rumsfeld didn’t want to bother Ford with too many little trivial things. He let him focus on the big issues and that created a real problem for Hartmann. So, Hartmann was not well-liked by most people. But his loyalty was never in question to Ford.

Smith: Boy, you should hear Al Haig, even after all these years. He gets very excited on the subject of Bob Hartmann.

Timmons: And Rumsfeld would, too, I think, if it was raised. Interesting that Hartmann, even long after Ford left office, I think he felt slighted by Ford, I think. I talked to him once or twice and asked him about Ford. He said, “I haven’t heard from him in two years,” or something. I could kind of sense all that. At the funeral for Ford, nobody realized Hartmann’s declined health at first.
Then, it was called to our attention that he was in a wheelchair. We said, “Well, we can roll him in a wheelchair; it’s no problem.” So he was able to participate. The planners for the funeral were family and those very close to the family and the Fords; they had been long since detached from Hartmann, and weren’t aware of his poor condition. I think he turned bitter after his White House tour. And probably blames others.
Smith: We are talking to his widow next week.

Timmons: Roberta?

Smith: Roberta, yeah. A couple quick things and we’ll let you go. As you said, you were not there that long, but you were there during a very busy and historic period. The whole business of changing the mood; those first few days, bringing in the Congressional Black Caucus – what was behind that?

Timmons: Reaching out. He had pledged that he would reach out in his confirmation hearings in the House and the Senate, and that he would be a conciliator, and that he was very anxious to do that. He’d even go up to the Gym Committee – that’s the people that run the House gymnasium for members. He would go up to them and he was trying to do all kinds of things to try to use his character and personality to convince them that he’s different from President Nixon and that he really values their judgment and opinion. So the Congressional Black Caucus was one and a whole assembly of other issues, but he was really trying to reach out in his early days.

Smith: He understood at that point that symbolism was substance.

Timmons: Yes.

Smith: In that mood.

Timmons: In that context, that’s right. And he wanted to be open. Unfortunately, people felt they could call him directly right on the telephone, doing this in the first few days.

Smith: There were a number of calls?

Timmons: Oh, yeah. And we had to intercept them, of course, through the switchboard and redirect them because we were inundated with hundreds and hundreds of telephone calls every day in the legislative office from members of Congress, their staff, either Cabinet officers, people in the administration in the White House. Pink slips…you can imagine what would happen if the President had to….

Smith: They thought he was still in Congress.
Timmons: Right. “Surely he’ll take my call. He may not take your call, but he’ll take my call.” So they were redirected and we had to explain to them. Mail was horrendous. I say there was no email in those days, but the post and the mail came in all the time on all kinds of issues. Some trivial; some important. And we had to review, as I said earlier, his speeches for any congressional impact, and statements to Congress, to write if we thought that would be well-received or not received, or have you thought about this or that? Not so much on policy, but on style and tone in our legislative office.

Smith: Were you privy to any discussion of a pardon?

Timmons: No. I was shocked. I was called, maybe by Hartmann or Haig, on Sunday – I think it was a Sunday, in fact, I’m sure it was – to get to the office immediately. I said okay. Drove down and found out that he was going to pardon the former President and we had to make telephone calls to leaders of Congress and tell them about it. There is a famous picture, I think in the New York Times, with Ford in my office with Hartmann and maybe Haig, I can’t remember, standing there, and I’m at my desk with the telephone. The caption was, “He is contacting members of Congress.” Well, I think a lot of people thought since they were in my office and I was on the telephone, that I had something to do with arranging the pardon, which I didn’t even know about. I think it was the right thing to do. He was sharply criticized by members of Congress and it hurt him, probably cost him the election. It’s debatable, but I think it probably did. And with the passage of time, I think most people believe it was the right thing to do.

Smith: At the time – it has been suggested – that there was a little bit of hypocrisy on the part of some members of Congress who publicly were very outspoken in their opposition to what the President was doing, but who privately took a somewhat different stance. Did you encounter any of that?

Timmons: No. There were very few people who privately said, “Good job, Jerry.” A lot of people - although not the loyalists - but a lot of people were openly critical. I’m sure there were a number of them playing both angles.
Smith: Can you come up with an alternate – I mean, I’ve tried. I’ll never forget, I once spent two and a half hours with him war gaming this, and by the end of the evening, he convinced me Mel Laird, for example, had a plan. Mel always has a plan. And Mel’s plan was he was going to bring a bipartisan, congressional delegation down to the White House, who were going to ask the President to pardon Nixon. Now, the problem with that - I mean, thirty-five years later, tell me if I’m wrong - is given the supercharged political atmosphere at that time in this town, a trial balloon would have been shot down before it got to the trees.

Timmons: Oh, yes. It was a silly idea. I never heard of it. But it was a silly idea. Congress would have gone absolutely berserk. The press would have been all over it for days and days and days. He would not have been able to do it, eventually, if this was before the fact. And I don’t know who Laird could have gotten – a bipartisan group – two people, five people? Who’s going to go down and recommend that? Gee whiz.

Smith: Well, that’s Mel.

Timmons: Yes, yes, I know.

Smith: A couple quick things. The decision to go up to the House and testify – how did that come about? Because that is – to this day – the only time in American history it’s happened.

Timmons: Yeah, I opposed it at the time.

Smith: You did?

Timmons: Yeah, and several other people did, too. He decided himself to go up there. And the problem was there was all this speculation that there was a deal cut between Nixon and Ford, and our friend, Elizabeth Holtzman and Peter Rodino and so forth were demanding answers. They never asked him to come to the Judiciary Committee, but they wanted explanations, explanations. So somebody drafted a letter that he signed which probably wasn’t as responsive as they wanted and sent it up….They said, “This is an insult to Congress. This doesn’t answer any of the questions we asked and we demand he reply in detail.” Again, they never asked him to go up there. Some of the discussion in the White House was, how do we handle it, what do we do? Provide details? There will always be more details because you can’t cover everything. Even if it was twenty pages long, there’d be some paragraph that would require elaboration on it. And he said, “I’ll go up there and testify.”

Smith: He did?

Timmons: He did himself. And some had suggested that. I can’t remember how the staff was divided, but most of us felt it would be a mistake because one, you don’t know where it would lead. It was a hostile committee, had just voted for articles of impeachment for Nixon, and while Ford had been confirmed by the House for his vice presidency, through that committee, the vote was not unanimous. And so we felt it might lead to all kinds of things that he couldn’t answer, and it would just keep the door open and cause more problems. Also, the historical precedent of it. Somebody had researched it and said that the only time that something close to it had happened was – was it Washington? I don’t know. But nobody had ever come to testify under oath and so forth. They didn’t swear him in, did they? No.

Smith: No, I don’t think they did. That technicality was preserved. It was a voluntary appearance.

Timmons: Right, a voluntary appearance. He did and did a good job, I think. Holtzman said it didn’t satisfy her and he didn’t answer the questions.

Smith: Was there anything he could have said that would have satisfied her?

Timmons: No, nothing. She was partisan, activist, and she wasn’t going to be satisfied. And there were several others like that, too, but she was the paramount one. So he went up and I guess it turned out to be a success. That died down then, the deal died down, but still the precedent was set.

Smith: You had upcoming elections.

Timmons: Yeah.

Smith: What was a horrible atmosphere to begin with, became worse.
Timmons: Oh, yeah. Well, you know, people look at what he inherited here. Inflation is double digit; unemployment is close to eight, seven and a half percent, something like that; not either/or inflation or unemployment, he had both. The economists said it was going to go much worse, predicting disaster. Watergate shifted the balance of power some to the Congress. China relations were stand stilled, the Soviet Union détente was nowhere and the Vietnam Peace Accord was coming apart. And you had a very heavily majority Democrat Congress. He inherited all that stuff to come in there. It’s a wonder he survived the four months I was there. But he went on to do a good job, I think, under the circumstances.

Smith: Did you hear, when the pardon came, and particularly with the elections coming up – Bob Dole, who was in the fight of his life, for example, in Kansas. Were there complaints from the Hill?

Timmons: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Do you remember any of that?

Timmons: No, I don’t remember who, but there were lots of complaints.

Smith: Like, why did he do this now?

Timmons: Yeah, why did he do it, why did he do it now? And then some other implications on that, is he going to pardon other people? Not just Nixon. And did Nixon accept the pardon? What’s the rationale in that? If he wasn’t guilty…you get all these little ramifications.

Smith: But try to imagine if he hadn’t pardoned Nixon. That administration would have been consumed and the country would have been consumed.

Timmons: A great national nightmare, as Ford said, would have been true. It would always be there and it would deter everything positive, and the election not that year, but in two years and so forth, would have all been effected by that. And so he did the right thing.
Smith: Remember, right before the election, he goes out to California and Nixon is at death’s door. He’s in the hospital and pretty clearly, the people around the President said, “Don’t go visit.” Was there a discussion of that?

Timmons: No, not that I was involved in. I’m sure the advance people and whoever the chief of staff was, Haig or Rumsfeld, may have suggested he not do that. But he did. Again, we go back to the decency and the character issue. He did, and he went in and the doctors said, “Don’t upset him,” or something, and he went in and chatted briefly. Phlebitis, I guess; Nixon had that recurring problem. And I think Ford was happy he did that.

Smith: What does that raise? There’s a big question philosophically about the conflict in the presidential job between, in some cases, doing the decent thing, and doing the politically necessary thing. Is there a conflict?

Timmons: Oh, yes, all the time. Every president has that in one way or another. You’ve got to do what is necessary for the economy, for the war effort, for poor people, for rich people, for whatever. You’ve got that to do what’s right. And you’ve got to do what is morally right, which doesn’t always jibe. And you’ve got to make a decision. And Ford made both kinds of decisions. On cargo preference, for example, which gives 20% of shipping to U.S. vessels, which the seafarers wanted very badly. And the president of the seafarers – I can’t remember his name – supported Ford. Ford agonized on that, and agonized on it, because he didn’t want to have to call this guy and tell him he was not going to support that. He did, finally. But every president has got these kind of issues. It’s the good days when they join together, both the morality of it and the policy of it – that’s great. But so often it’s the other way.

Smith: One way of telling the story of the Ford presidency, again, I realize you were only there for the first act, was of someone who came into the office, necessarily thinking like a congressman; who over time learned to think like an executive.

Timmons: Yeah, I think Ford fits that mold. The old adage in town is that former congressmen make lousy executives in the private sector and the government. There have been a whole series of failures of people that had been in Congress and come down to the government or somewhere else and just couldn’t hack it, because it’s a completely different lifestyle, work style. And Ford had the advantage of having about a year in the vice presidency and having some transition into that; and when he became president, he of course, had a lot more of issues from the executive point of view. And I think eventually he became a good executive and not so much a legislator.

Smith: And in some ways the tragedy was that just about the time he mastered the job, he lost it.

Timmons: Yeah.

Smith: And finally, the vice presidency. The story is there were three names that were seriously considered. Rockefeller, George H.W. Bush, and Don Rumsfeld.

Timmons: And when are you talking about? For what year?

Smith: When Ford chose Rockefeller. Do those three names ring a bell with you?

Timmons: Certainly Bush was in there. I don’t remember Connally.

Smith: No, Rumsfeld, Bush, and Rockefeller, supposedly were the three finalists.

Timmons: It got down to, the best I can recall, to Rockefeller and Bush. I don’t remember Rummy – by this time he was in Europe, I guess, NATO ambassador. Ford always liked him. There was some competition among the other two.

Smith: And were their supporters making their feelings known?

Timmons: Yeah. We got some telephone calls and Bush’s people set up an office downtown here with volunteers to call members of Congress and the White House and so forth. I’m not sure he was involved, although I suspect he knew about it.

Smith: Was there any kind of organized Rockefeller…?

Timmons: Not that I could see.
Smith: And what led the President to choose Rockefeller?

Timmons: I guess one his confirmation. He felt he was well-liked. Two, he had a lot of experience in policy issues, domestic policy issues particularly that needed to be done. And three, I think he liked him personally. I sensed that.

Smith: Did you see the chemistry between them?

Timmons: Yeah, I think he did.

Smith: Because they seemed like two very different men.

Timmons: Oh, yeah. They were different men, but I think they got along. And Ford tried to bring him in to the policy arena a lot more. In fact, Jim Cannon, who was a Rockefeller man, was made head of domestic policy.

Smith: There is a sense that it was a mistake for the President, again, maybe thinking like a congressman, to tell the vice president-designate, that he would, in effect, be in charge of domestic policy. And the theory has been advanced that that was Henry Kissinger’s way of making sure that he stayed out of foreign policy.

Timmons: Right.

Smith: And then, of course, comes Rumsfeld and it just couldn’t work. Plus the fact that Rockefeller was not a staff man. He’d never been number two.

Timmons: Right. To anybody.

Smith: Did you foresee problems?

Timmons: No, I didn’t at the time. I thought it was a good choice.

Smith: Were there complaints from the conservatives?

Timmons: Oh, yes, a lot of them. In fact, Rockefeller lost three or four Republican senators on his confirmation, the Twenty-fifth Amendment procedure. Goldwater, Helms, Bill Scott, I think that’s probably it, and several Democrats. He was confirmed, obviously, but some of the conservatives, the most conservative members of the Senate and House did not support him.
Smith: And he had a very rocky confirmation hearing. Were you involved in that?

Timmons: Oh, yes. We had so many different issues, but boy, they really went through everything that he had and owned.

Smith: The phrase that I heard is “financial voyeurism.”

Timmons: Yeah. It went on for a long time. In fact, Ford had to get involved to try to move them along to get him confirmed.

Smith: How so?

Timmons: Well, he had a statement to Congress about it. He talked to members about it.

Smith: Of both parties?

Timmons: Probably. I can’t remember, but I would think so, because the Democrats controlled the process. We were getting right up to adjournment in December, and if they got home – and this was after the new Congress comes in – and my golly. And he saw Carl Albert sitting out there so he pressed, pressed, pressed to get the confirmation done and it did just a day or two before they adjourned, I think. So he was very much interested. That was one of his priorities. And I think Rockefeller appreciated that. Rockefeller was always a gentleman about this, even when he was, I’d say, dumped. He was a gentleman the whole time. Seemed to understand the politics.

Smith: Good soldier.

Timmons: Good soldier, yup.

Smith: You have a wonderful story about your introduction to him. And the role that you would be playing in terms of managing the confirmation process.

Timmons: Yeah. President Ford had to go out to the press office first and talk to the press a bit, which he handled very well. And then he [Rockefeller] came into my office, the legislative office in the West Wing of the White House, to discuss confirmation. I asked him a number of questions. We talked about the process and how it would go. We had just been through Ford’s, the first person to be selected under the Twenty-fifth Amendment, and I asked him to think about the worst thing that could come out during the confirmation hearings. “The most troublesome thing you could imagine in your background. Don’t tell me, I don’t want to know, I don’t want anybody to know, but you know and you figure the proper response and rehearse it and make sure it’s good.” And I was thinking about his marital situation, that was kind of the thing, but I didn’t think about anything else. But he said, “Bill, there is one issue that’s going to be very embarrassing to me.” And he said, “But people think I’ve got more money than I really have.” I said, “Oh?” He said, “Yeah, I’ve only got $150 million in Manhattan property, another $200 million in Standard Oil and $300 million here and Argentina,” and he went through a whole bunch of multimillion dollars and said, “And you add that all up and people think I’ve got more money than I’ve really got.” I thought to myself, “Well, I should have such a problem.” And then he said, “And that poor working guy out in the street, the guy’s making $50,000, what’s he going to think about this?” And I said to myself, “I’m making $42,500, and the guy would think a lot about it.” So that was that story, I’ve told it several times before. It’s true. Rockefeller, of course, was honest in this. He wasn’t deceptive in any way.

Smith: Last question. I assume you were at the ’76 convention.

Timmons: I was Ford’s manager.

Smith: Yeah. Describe that convention. How bitter was it?

Timmons: You know, I always knew it was going to be very, very close - but I always thought Ford would win. I never was pessimistic about it. Looking at the delegate count, and the states in question, and Clarke Reed in Mississippi, and all that stuff. The Reagan people selected their test fight on a rule, 16-C, I think it was called, which would require the presidential candidates to name his vice president before the convention voted because Reagan had picked Schweiker early in the campaign and that was a negative for him and cost him a lot of votes.

Smith: Including Clarke Reed?
Timmons: Yes. Clarke Reed needed a lot of wining and dining and care and attention all the way through. But that really hurt in the South and particularly in Mississippi. So we had all these issues coming up and they wanted to fight on that. And we went through our vote count very carefully and I think the Ford people won that rule fight of 16-C by about 120 votes. Which was about the same number that he eventually was nominated. And so that was by and large the big fight. It wasn’t on the nominating vote, it was 16-C. And they recognized that and they tried to get an emotional issue on foreign policy on the plank and that was a big fight, too. That this plank repudiated, really, the Nixon-Ford doctrine on foreign policy – bringing up Kissinger and…

Smith: Détente.

Timmons: And détente and all that, the Helsinki Accords. And the RNC rules committee had rejected it. The convention rules committee had rejected it, but it got enough votes in the convention rules to get a floor vote, so that’s what the Reagan people wanted because it was not popular and they thought they could swing some votes. And so we had a big discussion on how to fight and whether to fight and we decided not to fight it. It was an embarrassment, it was silly, but who cares in the final analysis? Getting the nomination is the important thing. And Ford didn’t like it either. Of course Kissinger didn’t like it at all, and Rockefeller didn’t like it. And they were right. But politically, why fight on that? You’ve won the thing on the 16-C vote; you could possibly lose this plank and that may start a stampede; so we prevailed to let it go and the heck with it. And I still think that was probably the best decision. Which leads to an interesting story my colleague Tom Korologos tells. He saw Kissinger on the floor and Kissinger is very much upset about this and said, “If you guys let this stand, I’m going to resign from the State Department.” And Tom allegedly said, “Well, Henry, if you’re going to resign, do it now. We need the votes.”

Smith: It sounds like Tom.

Timmons: It does.

Smith: Did you have a candidate for vice president?
Timmons: No. I wasn’t involved in that. I was happy with Dole, but what upset me most was the process. As convention manager, all the conventions – Nixon ’68, ’72, Ford in ‘76, I had Reagan’s manager in ’80, and Reagan in ’84. Those were the ones I was convention manager for the candidate, not the party, and I always put together a paper on selection of vice president. Even to Nixon. Things that needed to be considered. No names, but what needs to be done; the process. Talk to this, talk to that, make the announcement here, make the announcement there, call in leaders, and all that kind of stuff. And vet the person.

Smith: Rationalize the process.

Timmons: Right. Nobody has ever followed it. Not a one and not Ford on that occasion. He had his buddies around and they talked it through.

Smith: That brings up the last question, because I have to ask you: it was even more bizarre in ’80 – was the Ford-Reagan thing serious?

Timmons: Yeah, it was serious for a while there, but let me go back to Kansas City. I had worked out with John Sears, who was Reagan’s manager long before the convention, that the winner of the nomination would go to the loser’s hotel the night of the vote, and discuss holding the party together, and maybe even vice president. But who knew at that stage? We both agree that was good for party unity. We went back to the Goldwater thing when that all fell apart and the New England governors and Midwest governors wouldn’t support Goldwater. We said we’ve got to overcome that. And he agreed, and we did.

So after Ford won, I called Sears and said, “Can we bring the President over to your hotel, according to the agreement?” And he said, “Well, I’ve got to check now. Things are pretty bad over here.” And I got a ______, and I said, “Well, it’s kind of important to the party.” So he did call me back an hour or so later after talking to Reagan. He said, “Yes, the governor will see Ford after the convention session at the Alameda at Reagan’s headquarters. But there is one condition. That Ford not offer Reagan the vice presidency.” I said, “Well, I’ll pass that onto President Ford and if that’s a condition, he will do it.”
I went into Ford’s office, which was just two or three doors down and he was sitting there – they had kind of an Oval Office set up with a flag and everything – and he was smoking his pipe and Cheney was there. I said, “Well, Mr. President, I have some very bad news for you.” He said, “What’s that?” “The condition is that you not offer Reagan the vice presidency.” Boy, he smiled and puffed about six puffs and he was just so happy about that because he was worried that Reagan wanted the vice presidency. And he didn’t want to have him because of bad feelings through the campaign. Don’t sell the Panama Canal, and all this stuff that went on, and so that was kind of bad blood there and they both performed well after that, I think.

The Ford people felt Reagan didn’t campaign hard enough for him, the Reagan people sat on their schedule for three or four weeks when the Ford people wouldn’t call them to schedule anything. They said, “Look we have to support candidates around the country…” They called me a couple of times and said, “Call Cheney and tell us what…” So it was kind of a mix up there. So that bad blood was there and coming to ’80, I don’t know actually who suggested it. I always thought it would be Bush because they ran together and normally he’s got a lot of support there and couldn’t win the nomination at the Detroit convention, but he had a lot of support and he’d handled a lot of issues. They didn’t always agree with Reagan, voodoo economics and all that.

So, somebody had suggested they consider Ford and so we set it up in a little team of people with Ed Meese and Deaver and those people. I had brought Baker into the thing in ’80 because he wasn’t coming to the convention and I brought him in. However Reagan people didn’t like it because he was tied to Bush and some of the problems. But, no, it was seriously considered for a while, and I will to my dying day, deny this co-presidency thing that Walter Cronkite or somebody had said and people have written about all the time. I know because I was the only one that could type, and I typed the agreement.

Smith: There was an agreement?

Timmons: Several agreements – talking points, I guess. It wasn’t something they would sign but it was for both sides to look at so there was no misunderstanding on discussion. So as the discussions went on, I would revise and type the thing, and finally, when it kind of fell apart, I took the last copy, folded it up, took Meese into the toilet in the hotel, and flushed it down the toilet with him as a witness. And I wish I had kept it now, because it would have proved my point.

There was a lot of discussion on the vice president’s role, meeting with the president often, having a voice in policy, comment on policy, personnel, special attention to the Congress because after all, Ford had been there, and Ford wanted some active role in the defense department. Because that was his real love, you know, from Appropriations days. No co-presidency, and no fact that you would give up the authority of the president. These were the sort of things that were normal courtesies, you would think, but in light of the past history of the vice president, they are ignored often.

Smith: He’d had the job, unhappily. He’d seen Rockefeller.

Timmons: That’s right and he wanted some understanding, as former president, content outside of government, that he would have a meaningful role. And that was what that was all about. And people said, well, Kissinger and Greenspan wanted to have jobs. Well, I’m sure they did, but that wasn’t part of any paper that I typed up. And so he would have an enhanced role of historical vice president, no question about that, but it would not be a co-presidency.

Smith: That’s perfect. I’m so glad to get that on the record. Because you are right, the great urban legend – and it really was – Ford being polite, I think it was Walter Cronkite used the phrase and Ford just sort of passively went along with it.

Timmons: Now some of the Reagan people who distrusted Ford put out a bunch of things that he had asked to be something that the Reagan people, in their purity, couldn’t stand. But they were not people involved in the negotiation. They were kind of on the fringes, guessing.

Smith: Thank you very much for doing this.

Smith: You have Grand Rapids roots.

Watkins: Right. Yes.

Smith: Tell us about your story before the Ford White House.

Watkins: How I ended up there? Well, we grew up with the Seidmans. My parents and Bill and Sally Seidman were very close. My parents are Bob and Betty Watkins. We spent summers together at Lake Michigan. We’d go to their house frequently on Sundays for skiing in the day and hamburgers at night. They had a big indoor pool and we’d swim. They’d come to our place occasionally. And we spent our Christmas days together. I just knew Bill very well.

Smith: Bill strikes me as something of a renaissance man, a man of remarkably diverse interests.

Watkins: Right, very eclectic and even somewhat eccentric as well, but in a good way.

Smith: Yeah? How so?

Watkins: He liked art and he liked making mobiles. He was always organizing things. He organized Thornapple Slopes which was a ski area on his farm with rope tows. We all learned to ski there so it was great fun. He did a lot of gardening. You would not think of him as a gardener and he wasn’t a very good one, but he did a lot of it.

Smith: He was an enthusiast.

Watkins: Yeah, he had more property in Grand Rapids. He thought about developing it. That’s when I started working with him, but he ended up giving it away to the state of Michigan for a cross-country skiing park. So he liked that. He was always starting television stations and he’d get everybody involved. My parents did a lot of things with him on the business side as well as the social side. Fourth of July, he would be the one who’d collect money from the other parents and go buy fireworks. And he would have lobsters and clams sent in from Maine to Lake Michigan. Just a wild man.

Smith: He struck me as someone who lived every day of his life.

Watkins: I would say so, yes. He had a lot of activities.

Smith: And Sally, they were a real partnership?

Watkins: Yes, they were very close. Sally ran the household with the six kids. Sally was a very excellent athlete and loved the arts, and she did a lot of different things in her own right, but basically she held down the fort, which was a challenge.

Smith: Now, he was instrumental clearly in the creation of Grand Valley State University, which I guess is 50 years ago.

Watkins: Yes, actually this year it’s coming up.

Smith: How does he come into the Ford picture?

Watkins: Well, knew Ford somewhat, but not real well, from Grand Rapids. Phil Buchen, of course, was very close to Ford. You know, they were law partners. Phil Buchen lived right down the street from us.

Smith: Really?

Watkins: He was a very good friend of my dad’s.

Smith: Tell us what your memories about Phil Buchen are.

Watkins: I thought he was this wonderful, stately, distinguished guy who was very friendly and easy-going. You could sit and talk with him. But you know he was handicapped, he had the polio, which was a curiosity. But he was a very well respected lawyer around town and he was really involved with the start of Grand Valley, too. My dad was on that organizing committee and so were all kinds of people in the community. Bill was the one who would always pull people together. He was very good at that.

Smith: Catalyst.

Watkins: Yeah, catalyst. Put them all together. Sometimes he’d bring them out to his house. He had this big dining room table and Sally would make hamburgers. They’d have this meeting and things would get organized. That’s about the way it worked.

Smith: So when did your path first cross with Gerald Ford?

Watkins: Well, he was our congressman, so we always knew who he was as kids. Actually, his house was about two blocks from mine, I think. Was it Rosewood Street? We were on Cambridge Boulevard which was literally two blocks away. But he never lived there. It was a rental place. It was his congressional district home.

Smith: Now, was this East Grand Rapids?

Watkins: East Grand Rapids, yeah.

Smith: Okay.

Watkins: In fact, Bill Seidman’s house, when he was a child, was also right down the street from ours. So it was all in a very similar area.

Jerry Ford used to come to my high school about every two years to give a little talk and that was always interesting. I would think about skipping the assembly just like high school kids do. Little did we know he would become president. So that was how we got to know him a little bit. When he first became vice president I flew down to Washington with Bill and some other people and they had a reception up at the Capitol Hill Club. I think that’s the first time I ever really met him. It was funny, because they took pictures and I never knew what happened to those pictures. One day when I was working at the White House, somebody in the photo office said, “I think I found those pictures. It looks like you only the hair is longer.” Turns out it was, so they dug up the old photo.

Smith: Now, why were you on that trip to Washington?

Watkins: Well, it goes back to how this all started. After college, I went to Alma College in Michigan and I really didn’t quite know what I was going to do with myself like so many kids. But I knew Bill always did interesting things and I figured, “Heck, I should go talk to him.” So I did. I went up to the house and I remember sitting by the fireplace and he said, “Well, what are you interested in doing?” I said, “Well, maybe land development” et cetera, et cetera. He said, “Well, let me think about this. Let’s have some dinner.” And so the three of us had dinner, Bill, Sally, and me, and after dinner, he said, “I’ve got this project. It’s those 400 acres I was telling you about. I’m thinking about developing it. What do you think about working with me on that?” And I said, “Sure.” And he said, “You’re going to be my partner.” I said, “Well, that’s cool. Partner with Bill Seidman.” So we worked on that for awhile and then he ended up giving that away to the state, so it didn’t make a dime.

Next his father had died and Bill had a little more money and he said, “I want to buy a ranch in New Mexico. I’ve been doing some looking. Why don’t you go out there and look around in Colorado and New Mexico? I’ll give you my son’s van and some money and while you’re there, check out the ski areas, because I want it near a nice ski area.” And I’m going, “Oh, that’s a tough assignment.” So, out I went, skiing.

Smith: So, has Bill always been a skier?

Watkins: Yeah, he’s pretty good. He learned to ski at Dartmouth when he was in college, so that’s where he started out. He was not a great skier, but he loved to ski. So I was running around looking at ranches in New Mexico and he and Sally came out for a visit to look at a few. Meanwhile, he had started working for Ford as vice president.

Smith: And what was the nature of his professional function with Ford at that point?

Watkins: Well, I think it started out, and I really wasn’t closely involved, but Bob Hartmann was there and he was more of a speechwriter than a manager. It was a much bigger office than a congressional office and needed organizing. I think it was Phil Buchen that recommended to Jerry Ford that they get Bill Seidman in. He’s the kind of guy that likes to organize things. It turns out that really was the case. So Bill came to Washington.

So, we’d been looking at ranches and all of a sudden Jerry Ford becomes president. Bill says, “Why don’t you come down to Washington? We’ll talk about a few of these ranches you’ve found. I’ll give you a tour of the White House.” You know, fun stuff. “Sally’s going to fly down with Rich DeVos. Why don’t you go with them?” So I said, “Sure.” This is one of those stories you just go. Rich DeVos sends a Rolls Royce over to pick us up in the morning at Seidman’s house. It was to the airport, hop on a private jet, blast to Washington, and a limousine to Seidman’s house. That was on a Friday morning. That evening, Jerry terHorst came over for dinner. It was a couple of days after he had resigned. So it had been in the paper. It was pretty amazing. Bill goes out in this backyard of his house and had this little Hibachi and cooks burgers. And it was fun to see that. That was a Friday.

Smith: Let me ask you something because there has always been a debate concerning the exact motive or motives, maybe cluster of motives surrounding terHorst’s decision. Obviously the public reason given was the pardon. There are a number of people with whom we’ve spoken who claim from personal knowledge that it’s more complicated than that - that, in fact, terHorst found the job overwhelming and not to his liking.
Watkins: I don’t know that personally. That there may be some truth to that, too. It was probably a combination of things.

Smith: I’m wondering. This was right after his resignation. Do you remember at all -

Watkins: Yeah, it seems like Bill said something at one time or another that was “all of a sudden you’re thrust into a very visible, big-league job.” There may be some truth to that. I don’t know for sure, though.

Smith: Did you know terHorst?

Watkins: No, that was the first time I ever met him. Anyway, so the next morning, Bill says, “Come down to the White House and I’ll give you a tour.” This was Saturday morning, he went in early, “Come on down about ten.” So I go down there and get through security and go up to his office in the Old Executive Office Building. And he says, “I have some bad news. I can’t give you a tour of the White House. I’ve got a meeting with the President.” I said, “That’s a pretty good excuse.” And Bill, in his usual fashion, says, “You see that pile of papers on my desk over there? Why don’t you start sorting them out and then drafting answers?” I went, “Well, okay.”

So I sat down and looked, and they’re all from the chairmen of the board from this or that and all had to do with the economy. Bill was the Assistant to the President for Economic Affairs. The Chairman of Chrysler had written. And I said, “Okay” and I started drafting responses and I remember some of the words were like ‘Apparently your letter was lost in the shuffle.’ We used that a lot. And, so, anyway, I never did get my White House tour, but he said, “Why don’t you stick around for a couple of weeks and work on the Conference on Inflation?” “Yeah, sure. Why not?” So that started and it was quite an experience.

Smith: Describe the purpose of that.

Watkins: The Conference on Inflation? Well, remember the economic times were not dissimilar to today. It was stagflation and things were in pretty bad shape. It was just bringing together all the great minds, all the economists, business leaders, labor leaders, into one forum with people from the Senate, House, and the Executive Branch. It was quite a collection of folks over the course of two days or so.

Smith: And right in the middle came Mrs. Ford’s hospitalization.

Watkins: Was that right? I had no idea. Wow.

Smith: Yeah, because he went up to Bethesda and came back to the conference I think maybe the second day or something. It was a Saturday when she had her operation.

Watkins: I forgot about that. Good point.

So anyway, they had me working on the Conference. And I’ll never forget that they had a big reception at the White House and you’d go in there and just go, “What am I doing here? This is just an amazing Who’s Who.” So I finally did get my White House tour that way. And then Bill said, “We’ve got some follow-up work to do. Why don’t you stick around a couple more weeks?” And Sally said, “You’re going to need more clothes.” She took me out to Britches and got me a suit. Of course my parents paid her back. And then one day we’re driving home and Bill says, “Ah, hell, why don’t we just put you on the payroll.” So that’s how it all started.

Smith: What was Bill’s job?

Watkins: Assistant to the President for Economic Affairs and head of that Economic Policy Board. I think if you really look at the Economic Policy Board, they really structured it very well. There was excellent participation from the relevant departments and the people within the White House staff that were key to coming up with economic decisions.

Smith: And again, for people who don’t know, my understanding is that was a brand new organization.
Watkins: Yeah, it was a new organization, basically a new model. It was built on small former models. But that was a lot different. Bill’s role was that of honest broker. I’m picking up words from Roger Porter because I worked with Roger. But it was designed in a way that all the options would be on the table and they would go through those options, discuss the pros and cons and then you’d come up with a recommendation for the President, if it was an issue they wanted to elevate it to the President. Sometimes it was a Treasury Department issue that would affect other departments, so they could decide it right there. And a lot of it hinged on the President not letting people do end runs through the back door with, “You’ve got to do this for my department” or “This is what I want you to do. Please do it.” I think President Ford was good about laying down the law that, “I want everybody to be involved in this if I’m going to make the right decision.” So, that’s probably one of his real strengths.

Smith: One senses that he wanted to hear as many viewpoints as possible argued out, if necessary, in front of him.

Watkins: Yes, or even argued out before it got to him. Just as long as they come up with good, clear cut options, so the pros and cons are presented. I think there are some other presidential models - you’d know a lot better than I do - that “Let’s let them fight it out. I’ll listen to different opinions.” They’ll come in different doors. With President Ford it was more, “You all come and get together, and in an honest and fair way come up with your options and your recommendations. We’ll do it that way.” It avoided the under the table, back door approach to presidential decisionmaking.

Smith: Now, that said, there’s some strong personalities and strong temperaments on this because I remember talking to Bill, to pick one obvious example, the whole business about “bailing out New York.” And one sensed that you had, for lack of a better word, the sort of doctrinaire conservatives, Simon, Greenspan, in particular, on one side and Bill, this is the part where he made his alliance with Rockefeller. How would you describe Bill’s politics and, for lack of a better word, his economic politics?

Watkins: I describe him as quite conservative, too, maybe a little more of a realist at the same time. The economic education I got primarily came from Simon, Seidman, and Greenspan, just sitting in the background and listening here and there.

Smith: And how would you describe each of them?

Watkins: Well, Simon was challenging – we actually became real good friends later, but the first time I met him, he yelled at me. Roger Porter and I were sitting in a conference room over in the old Executive Office Building on a Saturday morning. We were in the staff chairs and Simon was like sitting where I am, running the meeting and Roger and I were whispering to each other and he stands up, comes over, and starts yelling at us for being too loud. And I’m going, “Oh, this is cool.” All I can remember is that he had penny loafers on. But then I got to know him, ironically, through Susan Mercandetti and through Bill Seidman. Susan’s good friend was Mary Simon, his daughter. I can tell you a few off-color stories or two about that as well, but anyways.

Smith: But in public, Simon had the reputation for being pretty intimidating.

Watkins: Yes.

Smith: Formidable.

Watkins: Yeah, he came across as a pretty tough, strong guy. He had those big thick glasses and would look at you intently.

Smith: And I take you saw both sides?

Watkins: Yeah, I really learned to like him and like I said, we became pretty good friends, but it was because I was introduced on the social side as well as knowing him from running around the White House. I remember one time I ran into the Roosevelt Room looking for Seidman. I’m just cruising along - some rush job - and there’s President Ford and Bill Simon talking. And I run right in and I said, “Oh, excuse me!” I didn’t know what to say, so I said, “Did you see Bill Seidman?” And I think it was Simon who said, “I think he’s in the other room, there. No problem.” Like just old buddies, just easy, but a little intimidating stepping in front of him and the President.

And Greenspan, he was a lot younger then as head of the Council of Economic Advisors, although he had the strong philosophies.

Smith: Almost libertarian.

Watkins: Yeah, at that time, I don’t remember him being quite soft spoken. He was younger than Simon and Seidman.

Smith: Yeah.

He told us he brought Ann Rand in to the White House and introduced her to the President. Wouldn’t you have loved to have been a fly on the wall?

Watkins: Yeah, the only one better than that was Raquel Welch, when she came over.

Smith: Tell us.

Watkins: Oh, she came in for March of Dimes or something like that to see the President. Everybody in the Old Executive Office Building, whether it was Seidman or Simon, made it a point to get over there around the same time. She was in the waiting room in the White House and had lots of company. Those are some things that happened.

Smith: Recreate for us the discussions that would go on in this group where you had these strong-willed people; people with clearly delineated philosophies. I mean, how did it work?

Watkins: Well, I think Roger Porter deserves a lot of credit. He was older than I was, but he was still very young. He would go out and pull things from the different departments, whatever issue it was. Say, it was international trade, you’d want Commerce and State and whoever else, say, the Department of Agriculture. Bill and Roger make sure those all got into that options paper. It gave them something to look at, in advance of their meeting.

Smith: And Roger’s role was?

Watkins: He was the executive secretary on the Economic Policy Board.

Smith: Okay.

Watkins: I went to very few of those meetings. It was usually only Roger and Bill from our office, and occasionally Bill Gorog, later on, who became Bill’s deputy, but that was a year or so into it, maybe nine months into it. That was intentional because Bill Seidman didn’t want to give the perception that he had a large staff. He wanted one or two people, Roger being the guy who did all the paperwork, so it wasn’t like we were trying to create some sort of dynasty within the White House.

Smith: One way of looking at the Ford presidency is tracing the trajectory of someone who, on day one, was very much a man of Congress and who learned over two and a half years the difference between the congressional mindset and the executive mindset. Woven into that is this notion that, well, he was surrounded by all these Grand Rapids people - as if he had to outgrow that. What’s your response to that?

Watkins: Well, there was a Grand Rapids crowd and I remember there were a few people that didn’t last very long for one reason or another. It might’ve been good. Maybe they left on their own, but I think he liked having a few local people with Grand Rapids roots around, too. I think having Seidman and Buchen around was quite comforting in a way. I mean, these are guys that he trusted. I wouldn’t say more trust, because he knew other people from the Hill and he’d been in Washington for many, many years.

Smith: But you stop and think, also, here’s someone who comes into this office under unique circumstances with no transition. He’s got a staff on day one that were all Nixon people. And one of the stories we’ve been told multiple times is of the swearing in, followed by a reception, and then, I guess, there was something down in the dining room and you could see the Nixon people kind of peel off. It does raise this question of how did he balance continuity and change; being fair to the vast majority of Nixon people that had nothing to do with Watergate, with the political reality of giving the country something fresh?

Watkins: I can’t really answer that because I was so new myself. You got the sense, though, that it wasn’t like they were trying to throw all the Nixon people out because a lot of them certainly stayed.

Smith: Did you sense any tensions between the groups?

Watkins: No, not really. I think if there was any, it was probably at a really high level within the White House. But there were quite a few people on Bill Broody’s staff or in the scheduling office who stayed and that was fine. Everybody got along well. Had a great time.

Smith: Was Haig still around when you were on?

Watkins: No.

Smith: Was Rumsfeld in charge?

Watkins: Yeah.

Smith: How would you describe Rumsfeld in those days?

Watkins: I thought he was a pretty impressive guy. I guess you could say a cool guy. He was always pretty nice. If you would see him in the hallways, he would always say ‘hello.’ Bill used to say they had some problems with Rumsfeld, but overall, he said he was a very well organized guy and very competent. I always thought he was a good speaker. He would come and talk every now and then and it was kind of motivational. I don’t know if it was him or somebody else that said, “We’re all dispensable and it’s a privilege to be here,” I took that to heart.

And Cheney was fun, too.

Smith: Was there a difference between the two in how they ran things?

Watkins: Cheney and Rumsfeld?

Smith: Yeah.

Watkins: I think when Cheney came on board a lot of it had to do with age. He was very young. He was a very competent guy, but Rumsfeld was with his peers and Cheney was all of a sudden working with senior guys like Seidman, Greenspan and Simon. I think there was probably a little less tension in the air, in some respects, things went smoother just because of that.

Smith: What was your exposure to the president himself?

Watkins: Oh, I’ve got a good story. Just in general, I’d see him in the hallway occasionally. I’d say, “Hello, Mr. President.” And he’d go this way and I’d go mine. He knew I was from Grand Rapids because of Seidman and Buchen and he knew my name, but I don’t think he put my name and my face together.

This is my favorite Washington, D.C. story. A young guy named Jeff Krolik worked for Nelson Rockefeller. I don’t know if you’ve ever talked to him, but you should some time. He lives out in California now. But Jeff and I were housemates. So he works for Rockefeller and I work for Seidman and we got wind that the Rockefellers were going to take the Fords to the National Theater to see Bubbling Brown Sugar, a wild tap-dancing, Harlem-based musical. So Jeff and I said, “Well, we’ve got these little Secret Service pins. Why don’t we get some dates and we’ll take them over to the National Theater and we’ll get there early. We’ll stay out in the lobby and when the President and Vice President come in, we’ll introduce our dates to the President and Vice President of the United States?” You know, this would be cool!

So, sure enough, we did that. We get there and we’re waiting in the lobby and in come the Rockefellers and the Fords and we all said ‘hello’; we introduced our dates, just like we’d planned; and they go in and down the aisle. So we said, “Well, we’d better go find our seats”. So we go down the other aisle and – excuse my language – but I go, “Holy shit.” They put us right in front of the Rockefellers and the Fords and this is in the orchestra section. It’s not like we’re hidden off in a box somewhere. And it was just before the show started and my date’s going, “Should I slide down in my seat?”

At the intermission, it was a lot of fun. We all started talking about Harlem and Betty Ford said, “I used to hang out up there.” Jeff had gone to Dartmouth, so he and Rockefeller had plenty to talk about. Of course he was working for Rockefeller. We all got chatting and we forgot we were talking to the President and Vice President and their wives and that the rest of the theater is looking at us. And later we thought, “Wow.”

Smith: But they enjoyed the show.

Watkins: Yeah, the show was great. We all loved that. And afterwards, we were shaking a little bit. We felt like we should’ve asked them to go to the Old Ebbitt for an omelet like you used to do in those days. Of course we were hoping they’d invite us over to their place. That was a pretty incredible night.

And then another story is that we’re out in that White House tennis court, actually two stories - quick ones. Everybody used to sneak out there. Bill Seidman used to say - I did his scheduling among other things - and he said, “If anybody calls, don’t interrupt me unless it’s a cabinet secretary or the President or something very urgent.” I said, “Okay.” And he said, “Tell them I’ll be in the Greens Conference Room.” That was code for the tennis court. I was out there another time. We were playing tennis and all of sudden a presidential helicopter comes in, bringing President Ford back from somewhere he’d gone and we thought, “Oh, we’re in trouble now.” You could see him looking at us and we thought, “Uh oh, we’re outta here.” Anyways, that was a good story.

Smith: But he, unlike some presidents, didn’t decide who used the tennis court.

Watkins: No, not until the next president. And Bill Seidman always claimed that that was his doing. Bill told Hamilton Jordan that the key to Power in the White House was who controlled the tennis courts. After that, President Carter decided he’d control it.

And then I remember the Kansas City convention was a lot of fun.

Smith: Now, you say a lot of fun, but it was also bitter.

Watkins: Yeah.

Smith: You literally did not know going in?

Watkins: Oh, no, it was rough, the delegate count and all that, but I wasn’t involved in that. I helped Bill on the platform committee and then there really wasn’t much for the two of us to do after that. So – this is another tennis strategy. We’re staying at the same hotel with the president, so we reserve the court. Bill said, “You reserve it and I’ll reserve it and we’ll get it for a couple of hours a day every day.” That was another power play. I had guys like Bill Simon come up and, “Can I join you guys for tennis this afternoon?” I remember one time I played with Simon, Gary Brown, a congressman from Michigan, and Jerry Ford’s brother, I think it was Jim. And here I am, it’s my court, and I had these guys. When you’re serving - I was a pretty good tennis player in those days, and I had Bill Simon in my sights. You think about when he was mean, and then serve and just blast him. So there’s good times.

Smith: Did you detect philosophical and/or personal differences between, for example, Simon and Rockefeller? I mean, you had the New York City bail out.
Watkins: I just wasn’t that close to that. I remember the issue very well, but I wasn’t close to the way those two interacted.

Smith: But Bill did form an alliance with Rockefeller.

Watkins: They got along very well and it was not just that – Bill served on a committee that Rockefeller headed up? Was it energy?

Smith: He had one big Rockefeller grand plan.

Watkins: Yep, grand plan.

Smith: The Energy Independence Corporation.

Watkins: Yeah, and Bill was a part of that and I remember he just said, “I really enjoyed working with Rockefeller.” And Rockefeller was just such a great guy – I really liked him, too. I didn’t know him well, but Jeff Krohk said Rockefeller would say, “Hey Jeff, how’s your friend Dirge?” That happened more than once. He seemed like just a great guy and very warm and friendly. One time on a Saturday morning, I’m talking to my mother in Grand Rapids and they were looking at the offices we were going to give up and I said, “Mom, the Vice President just walked in.” He said, “Hi, how are ya? Well, say hello to your mother.” But no, Bill and Rockefeller just hit it off personality-wise and there may have been some issues they didn’t agree on, but it really wasn’t a problem.

But Simon and Seidman was a situation where a lot of people thought it would be a tense almost unworkable relationship. But they sat down very early on and talked. They found out that they had a lot in common personally and socially. They were able to work very well that whole time period and became very good friends.

Smith: So you didn’t see Rockefeller’s unhappiness as vice president?

Watkins: Not so much with Simon. You know, there were always the Rumsfeld stories and things like that.
Smith: I haven’t talked with Jeff Krolik.

Watkins: Did you know Dick Krolik by chance?

Smith: No.

Watkins: He did work for Rockefeller. I think worked for Time Warner, but it was Time back in those days. Jeff’s dad was very close to Rockefeller, so Jeff started working with him from a very young age. He was probably three or four years younger than I am.

Smith: Really?

Watkins: Yeah.

Smith: Did he retell the Rumsfeld story?

Watkins: Seidman?

Smith: Either Seidman or Jeff.

Watkins: No, mostly what I heard about Rumsfeld, of course, was from Seidman. And you’ve probably heard all those stories ten times over again.

Smith: Was it just chemistry?

Watkins: No, I don’t think they disliked each other, it was just Rumsfeld had his way of doing things. And, you know, if you’re chief of staff, you’re entitled to talk to the President directly, obviously, and sometimes that blew over into the policy arena with the Economic Policy Board. Don’s over here doing what he wanted to do and then there was some of his more grand schemes to be the vice president.

Smith: That was gossiped about?

Watkins: Yeah, that was not unknown.

Smith: Nelson went to his grave believing that Rumsfeld did him in.
Watkins: Yeah, and I remember the stories, because of Governor Ray Shafer from Pennsylvania.

Smith: Right.

Watkins: He was counselor to Nelson Rockefeller and I got to know him pretty well after the administration. In between Seidman, Shafer, and all these stories about Rumsfeld angling for the next vice presidential slot. After doing Rockefeller in, and with Rockefeller’s New York delegation and Shafer’s Pennsylvania delegation, that was not going to happen. That was it. You are not going to take over the vice presidency. Now, all this is secondhand, of course.

Smith: Is that from Shafer?

Watkins: Mainly from Seidman, but Shafer talked that way, too. You know they saw some scheming going on.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Mrs. Ford?

Watkins: Not much. I saw the kids or most of them at the last Ford dinner here in town. And it was fun to see Jack. You know, we’d had some adventures together back in those days.

Smith: Tell us about Jack.

Watkins: Well, Jack…you know.

Smith: No, I mean.

Watkins: Well, at the Ford dinner, he said, “Hey, come on”. We hadn’t seen each other in many years and I have all these Jack Ford stories. He said, “I’m married now. Don’t tell anybody.” I just see him as kind of - he got around, back in those days. I remember some friends had rented a house in Annapolis on the Severn River and Jack came down. Susan Mercandetti and a friend of hers came in from Boston, a very attractive young lady. They hit it off and the next thing you know, Jack and the friend headed back to the White House.
That must be a real treat. You meet some guy and find out he’s the president’s son and he takes you back home to meet the parents.

Smith: You remember he also hung around with Bianca Jagger and Andy Warhol.

Watkins: Yeah, that’s right; he had that colorful crowd there for awhile.

Smith: Where did that come from?

Watkins: I don’t know.

Smith: It doesn’t sound like West Michigan.

Watkins: I don’t know. I was too naïve to realize, but I probably could’ve picked up the phone and called some Hollywood little starlet and said, “Hey, you want to come to the Fourth of July at the White House?” It might’ve worked.

Smith: And then Kennerly was virtually a member of the family.

Watkins: Yeah, he was running all over the place. Do you know Paula Ahalt? Did you ever meet her? She was Kennerly’s girlfriend. She worked in the photo shop.
She was a neat, girl and became a real good friend of mine later. As I said, David had the run of the place.

Smith: What do you remember about the Kansas City convention? Our sense is there was a lot of blood on the floor.

Watkins: I just remember it was so tense there towards the end, when they were counting delegates. But again, Seidman and I weren’t really involved with that part. It was the week before when we spent a lot of time on the platform committee.

Smith: Remember, there was a real issue - the Ford people had to decide whether to sort of roll over and let the Reagan folks have their way with the foreign policy plank.
Watkins: That’s right.

Smith: And the wonderful story that Tom Korologos tells, because of course, Kissinger immediately threatened to resign. And Tom said, “Henry if you’re going to do it, do it now. We need the votes.”

I mean, just inside the platform committee, was there a lot of animosity, between the two sides?

Watkins: I remember a lot of debate, but it didn’t seem hostile. It seemed reasonable.

Smith: Civilized.

Watkins: Civilized. Sometimes people were fairly firm but again, not over the top. Even though it was very tough, I think people remembered we were still in the same party and we’ve got to win this thing. It was either going to be Reagan-Ford, I do remember that getting a little tense from time to time.

Smith: And the campaign itself, were you still at the White House?

Watkins: Well, yes. Bill originally housed me on the Council of Economic Policy, but I was really his assistant. And once we got into campaign gear, I moved over to the White House because I could be more political that way, and a lot of the senior staff was doing political activities at that point. This is where I got the big Staff Assistant to the President title for three or four months. It was a nice way to end up. We were really just doing some intense scheduling, getting Bill out and around the country.

I worked with Margaret Tutwiler who was over at the Republican National Committee and she was our liaison for Bill. I got to work with Margaret a lot and got to know her pretty well. We had Bill going all over the place. In fact, Bill, the whole couple of years there, was considered the one with the busiest schedule of any cabinet secretary or senior staff member. It was just “go” all the time. I had to learn how to cancel events with groups where he was going to give a speech and to make sure that we had a substitute available all the time. Sid Jones from Treasury we used him a lot and Jim Baker. James A. Baker III, was at Commerce Department and I called him up and said, “Do you mind going to Youngstown, Ohio in two days?” He said ‘yes’ all the time. He was great.

Smith: What was he like in those days?

Watkins: Well, he seemed like a very impressive, interesting guy. I got the sense he was probably going someplace somewhere down the road. No one ever thought he’d end up where he did, which he did was huge. But he was a very good guy. Wonderful guy. And very nice, too. I was glad I got to know him. So every time he sees me, he remembers me, probably because I was bossing him around.

Smith: Do you remember where you were on election night?

Watkins: I went out to Grand Rapids on the trip.

Smith: You were on that last swing?

Watkins: Yeah, I remember President Ford voted at East Grand Rapids High School and that was impressive. I went to that high school, too, as did Bill Seidman much earlier.

Smith: Were you at the airport where they unveiled the mural and he sort of broke down?

Watkins: No, because that was… on his way in? I think it was on the way in, I don’t think it was on the way out. But I remember going to the airport with him in the motorcade and all that. As a matter of fact, I have a picture of me shaking hands with him on his way back to the plane. I flew back commercial and I got back in at eight or nine and by then the handwriting was on the wall.

Smith: What was the mood? Did you think you’d caught up?
Watkins: Yeah, we knew we were catching up. I was always worried and a couple of the younger staffers and I used to talk and we’d say, “You know, President Ford clearly has a wonderful track record.” Way back even before his presidency, he did a lot of pretty impressive things that I think younger people were beginning to recognize. But the one thing we were trying to get - and I remember telling Seidman - Jimmy Carter was always talking about ‘vision.’ He had all these visions of the future. And Jerry Ford really wasn’t talking that way. We conveyed to Seidman and others that, “We need to think about the future here. It’s not just running on your record, but where we are going.” And Jimmy Carter was pretty effective with that. It didn’t turn out so well, but…

Smith: What was Bill’s response?

Watkins: Well, I can’t remember. I don’t think we were disregarded because we were young staffers, but we felt this was just something that younger people will align with and the kind of message they’d want to hear. But that last couple of weeks was exciting; you saw the polls changing favorably.

I remember the night when there was the big gaffe with the Polish comment. We were sitting in the Executive Office Building and went “Oh, no.” You knew what he meant, but we were just afraid the rest of the country didn’t quite recognize that. He was right and we knew what he meant, but we knew that it was going to be taken wrong.

Smith: He was also stubborn.

Watkins: Yeah.

Smith: It took a week to revise.

Watkins: Oh, that could’ve been easily corrected because he was right, but it was just a matter of how you say it.
Smith: Did you see that stubbornness? Because, you know, it was part of his make up. And a temper, which he spent a lifetime controlling.

Watkins: I never saw him lose his temper, fortunately. I knew he was tough, though. I don’t think anybody thought he was a pushover or anything like that. You knew he was that tough football player, a little quieter, but you knew he had that inner strength and you didn’t mess with that.

Smith: Did you see him after the presidency?

Watkins: Not much, no. I saw him in Washington once just sitting at an event and got a quick ‘hello’ and that was about it.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Watkins: I think he was one of our greatest presidents, but for different reasons than others. Part of it was his integrity and his straight-forward honesty, and likeability as well. But I think he held that office and managed that office in a way that was really top of the line. It wasn’t like he was fighting World War II or the Civil War or something like that which a lot of other presidents became famous for. He was one of our greatest presidents at kind of a quiet time. I mean, there was plenty going on, Vietnam and the economy. Everybody’s got something going on, but I think he was just so solid. Right now I think people would love to have a president like that again.

Smith: Do you remember your reaction or your friends’ reaction to the Nixon pardon?

Watkins: Yeah, there wasn’t a lot of love for Nixon and I think a lot of people thought it was a deal, kind of cooked up in advance. I think it took awhile for people to understand.

Smith: Did that include folks back in Grand Rapids?

Watkins: Yeah, a lot of them. I think it took them awhile to realize that you really didn’t want that hanging over your head if you’re the president. It wasn’t just compassion to Richard Nixon. It was "Get him out of here. We can’t deal with this."

Smith: “I’ve got a country to run.”

Watkins: Exactly. So I think people bought into that over time. Maybe not everybody still.

Smith: But in a lot of ways, time was good to him. He lived long enough to see the country come around to his way of thinking.

Watkins: Oh, absolutely. By the time you went to the funeral at the National Cathedral, you could see that everybody loved him at that point. So, yes, he ended well.

Smith: I was going to say, were you surprised at the amount of public reaction when he died, because he’d been out of the public eye for awhile. I think right then the country really, really needed to feel good about itself.

Watkins: Yes. And I think they could reflect back and say here was a man who kind of brought the country together. The Vietnam War, he quietly ended it. It really was a big deal, but the way he managed it, it wasn’t like we lost the war, it just got over. So I think in the history books, he was looking very, very good to people. And just such a wonderful guy, too.

Smith: Who else should we talk to?

Watkins: Oh, Susan Mercandetti. H.P. Goldfield. Do you know H.P. Goldfield?

Smith: No.

Watkins: There are a lot of younger people: I’ll come up with a list.

Smith: That’d be dynamite. Erik’s collecting names.

Watkins: Yeah, I talked to Marty Allen about this, too, and said, "You know, there were a lot of young people who were on that staff." The senior staff and the Cabinet are fading away quickly.
Smith: Yeah, we just missed Jim Lynn, which is a real shame. He passed away about a month ago.

Smith: When did your paths first cross?

Barrett: Well, I was working as a public information officer in the army up at the Carlyle barracks at the army war college. And I had two tours at Vietnam and they had sent me back to graduate school to get a degree in journalism/public communication in Syracuse. And when I finished, the command general staff sergeant said, “You’re going for what we call a utilization tour. You know, the Congress is after us for sending too many of you guys to graduate school on the taxpayer’s dollar and we don’t utilize you. It’s just for your credentials, so to speak. So you will be at the war college for three years. Don’t call us. We don’t want to hear from you.” Bah, bah, bah-bah-bah.

After about eight months, I get a call saying I was being considered for the position of army aide to the president - got the call from the White House. I remember it was ten after 10:00 on the 10th of July – all the tens. Brent Scowcroft, who was the military assistant, hadn’t gotten to NSC yet. Nixon was president. July 10th, 1974, you know better than I the state of things right then. So, they called me ten after 10:00 and said they needed my answer by 11:00 o’clock. So I went in and talked to the general who said a whole bunch of good things happen to me, I’ve been lucky in that way. Next thing you know, it’s that afternoon, I’m in a helicopter. They picked me up at Carlyle barracks, they flew me down, put me into the Hay-Adams.

The next morning, a car picked me up, put me over on a JetStar at Andrews and flew me out to San Clemente. Nixon is out there. And the final revelation and the final condemnation of the fact that Nixon did know about the break-in was a completed news item on the 11th of July, you know, in terms of things were bad before then, but this was really bad. People thought I wasn’t knowledgeable of all this stuff at that time, I was just a military guy. And everybody that knew - Haig, chief of staff - everybody out there knew that Nixon was either going to resign or be impeached. So then the game started and who the new military aide for the president was, on a scale of 1 to 10, dropped to minus 9 million.

I used to go in there and sit each day. It was amazing. This little military office out at the temporary place in San Clemente. I’d go in there, get there on time at 7:30. The last thing I did with any confidence was, you went through this big gate at San Clemente. You must have been there some time. No? They had a big gate and, typical White House, the gate guard which at most places would be like a private, maybe a corporal, they had a master sergeant at the gate there. They’d given me the pin to show that I was cleared in and the last thing I’d do with any confidence was I’d salute the guy at the gate, “Morning. How are you?” Then I’d look in the rearview mirror as the gate was closing and think what the hell am I going to do now? You’d literally sit there because it was panic and then - ba-da-boom - the dominoes fell like a son of a gun.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Nixon?

Barrett: I saw him. They tried every once in awhile to rejuvenate the process because the Pentagon sent you over there and say, “Okay, we think this is the guy you want.” But then the White House staff has to decide and your last interview was with the president. So, they went back to Washington. I was out in the Sequoia, myself and Jack Brennan, when they brought Bebe Rebozo in and he and Nixon are sitting on the stern of the Sequoia. Bebe’s job was to find out [if] he was settled down enough and everything else, that if he said he was going to resign, that they could rely on that and go ahead. Then they sent me up to Camp David. Another person that had to put their seal of approval on you was Rosemary Woods. I had breakfast with Rosemary Woods up at Camp David.

Smith: What was that like?

Barrett: Oh, it was bizarre. By this time, I’m figuring out - even I know - this guy’s toast. It’s too bad. So, it just kept on cascading and then he gave his speech on the 8th. His resignation speech was a major speech and the next day, Ford took over. And that was it.

Smith: What was Rosemary Woods’ mood?

Barrett: I remember just a few people like Haig. Of course he was down here, but like Ken Cole, Rosemary Woods, the few people I was in contact with, there was really almost a commendable façade of normalcy; like maybe it wasn’t their pay grade to be deciding whether the first president in history ever is going to resign. There was just this demeanor, and that’s what made it so bizarre. You’d leave these little appointments that you had and then you’d go back and pick up the paper or put the television on, and then you’d just been in la-la land with somebody there. And then he took over. I still thought I was going to get my walking papers. I figured that he’d have some obligation to guys who had been with him as vice president. I didn’t know how the system worked. Or somebody else might have an input as to who they wanted in there as an aide. It was about the 21st, 22nd of August when it sort of worked down to my level, or at least got to me, and I got a call. Cheney had come in and was helping. Rumsfeld was going to replace Haig and then Cheney ultimately replaces Don. So, I get a call to go on over to the Oval Office.

First time I’d put on my uniform, the rest of the time I was in civilian clothes. I went over there and I walked in. The first thing he did - he’s behind the desk - he gets up, just immediately comes out and he introduces himself and everything. And the first thing he says is, “I’m sorry there’s been so much confusion.” He says, “I hope you’ll consider staying with us.” Just like that. So, I’m a major and he’s Commander-in-Chief. In subsequent times, you’ve probably seen the liberties that I was privileged to take with him and everything else. But I always tell this story where he said, “I hope that you’ll consider staying with us.” “Oh, I’ll get back to you.” A major, you know, but that’s the tone of him. The first thing he said, “Would you please consider staying with us?”
Smith: There’s a wonderful story. Of course you know they were living out in Alexandria that first week. And the first day that he’s moved into the White House and walked into the West Wing and there’s a guard opening the door, saluting.

Barrett: Mmm, Marines.

Smith: And the president walks over and says, “Hi, I’m Jerry Ford. I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?”

Barrett: Yeah. We went to church, and we went over to the house, and he was living in the house. Went to the first state dinner with King Hussein from the house in Alexandria. And so, after church, we went over. Everything’s being boxed up, they were going through all the confusion that every family goes through when they move, only theirs was a little bit more, but they got more help, too. But, he walks into this room downstairs and there’s an open box and there, folded but not put in the box yet, were his Navy uniforms. And he says to Betty, “Well, look at this Betty. We ought to see whether Goodwill or somebody wants this.” Just like that. And she says, “Oh, Jerry.” And I say, “You know, Mr. President, I hate to tell you. I don’t think that’s your call anymore. They’re going different places with that stuff.” But he said, “Well, you know, we can’t be moving this stuff around. It has to be Goodwill or something like that,” talking about his uniforms.

Smith: That almost surreal modesty was very real.

Barrett: Yeah. It was hard to imagine. That’s what I said. He never would’ve made it through a 25-month primary and general campaign period. He’d be the first one to admit it. He would’ve also admired Obama’s rhetoric because he knew, you know better than myself, not only with Ford but with the other guys you’ve been around, that he just had the greatest regard for somebody who had that gift of speech. Not just articulation, but eloquence. Because he didn’t have it, he knew he didn’t have it, and he just would’ve had a tough time being the kind of guy that he was.

Smith: He got better, didn’t he?
Barrett: Absolutely.

Smith: Because there is that age-old argument that Reagan did him no favor by running against him, but in some ways he actually made him a better candidate.

Barrett: No, he was good. And he knew. I remember one time when we were in Chicago, Terry O'Donnell and myself, Cheney. And he gave a speech in this high school like a gymnasium and he’s up there and he’s giving a hell of a speech. It’s just coming out right, it’s really good. This is like the fourth stop of the day and everything else. And we could take such liberties with him, he liked it. He loved jokes. He never told a joke in his life. I don’t know if you ever heard. I never heard that man tell a joke. He loved to hear them and he had a great sense of humor and he would laugh like a son of a gun, but the joke, himself, he never could tell one.

We knew he was going to come off that stage feeling full of himself because he knew, “Well, I hit that tonight.” We were back in what was a cafeteria kitchen, old pots and pans, big place. So, what happened was, we all hide behind pots and pans, you know, these big islands of stuff. Kennerly, myself, O'Donnell, Cheney, we're hiding. And we took this mascot, they'd given him a tiger, which is the school’s mascot and it was sitting tiger and it was about that high, stuffed. And we put it in the elevator and we put a sign around it that said, “Nice speech.” Because we knew the whole ride back we were just going to get it.

He walked in, he’s waving and everything, he turns around and looks at the elevator and looks around right away and, “Alright, where are you guys.” And he was just like that. He was just something else.

Smith: He had a great sense of humor.

Barrett: Oh, he had a great sense of humor and he loved the stories. He’d [inaudible], “Bob, do this”, “Do that.” And some of the stories about people, he just loved it. He loved the laughter and everything else.
Smith: My sense from being around him and little bits of pieces from others, most politicians love to gossip and I sensed he wasn’t a gossip. I mean, he liked political back and forth, but he wasn’t someone to gossip about other people’s lives.

Barrett: He had unbelievable discipline. I’m going to say a number and deliberately make it a little bit absurd, but I guarantee you that he could keep fifty confidential relationships without blinking an eye. Like, for example, you’ve had lots and lots of time with him, Richard, other people and everything else. I bet you nobody, nobody knows things and he’s gone and nobody will ever know certain things about the Warren Commission, as a case in point. And that could have been such an exploiting big thing. If he had any grandeur or any of the quality that you’re talking about now, he could’ve made, if not a fortune of dollars, he could’ve made a fortune of interest by just discussing the Warren Commission and Kennedy for the rest of his life.

Smith: That’s fascinating that you say that, because the way he did it was so typical, it was so under the radar. The only thing I ever heard about it, and then I thought “Oh, Jesus!”, after the Profiles in Courage award, he did an oral history and in the course of it, he let slip the fact that, they didn’t put it in the report at the time for reasons that would be obvious, but that one of the theories that was advanced by a number of folks that he apparently found credible as to why Oswald did what he did was because he was sexually impotent. And he had to demonstrate to Marina that he was more of a man than she thought. And, given the climate of the day, they wouldn’t put that in print. That’s a pretty extraordinary revelation.

Barrett: It is. It is.

Smith: And yet he, it dribbled out during the course of this --

Barrett: You know, he had extraordinary discipline. I remember after she went into Long Beach, end of February ’78, and she comes out and she’s battling the first period of time when it’s more difficult and stuff like that.

Smith: There was nothing automatic.
Barrett: No. So, three months go by, now it’s time for them to go to Vail for the summertime. So, we get up to Vail and we arrived and she’s downstairs unpacking. There’s like three floors in this house they used to use and we’re on the center floor. You’ve probably seen him do this a lot, too, just talking how considerate he is. He’s in his house and he’s with me, you know, we’d been together quite a while through almost everything, a good number of years and all that, but always, a number of times he did this. He would look to make sure no one was around because he was going to say something that if someone else heard it and it wasn’t meant to be heard by them, that’d be offensive. And he looked around the house. Of course, there’s nobody there except he and I and he said, “Bob,” and you know, boy, he wanted it. He loved those two martinis a night. Loved it. And we always used to fear if he went to the third one, if the day was a little bit tough, because he could turn. I used to say Ford was 98% koala bear and 2% wounded grizzly.

The thing that made it so interesting was you never know when that 2% grizzly was going to show. You kept on getting put to sleep by that 98% koala bear and then all of a sudden and he would turn into the lineman and center from Michigan and he would actually - like Les McCullom once said - “You know what happens to that man when he gets mad? He grows.” That’s Les McCullom, Air Force One. Because he came on to the plane one time angry. He was just this way. And he looked at me and he said, “You know, it doesn’t work when one’s drinking and one isn’t drinking, so I’m going to stop.” He turned that glass over that night and never had another drink in his life.

Four or five years later, Susan is the daughter that wraps all of us fathers around their thumb. You know, the daughters rule. The sons rule their mothers. And so Susan is smoking and we’re smoking with her and sometimes we’d be sneaking and sometimes ________________. We’re sitting in the office out in Rancho Mirage and he says in his totally ineffective way as far as Susan’s concerned, “Well, you know, Susan, I’m pretty concerned about the fact that you’re smoking.” And Susie being this snippet little thing that she is, she’s great, she says, “Well, Daddy, I’ll stop smoking cigarettes if you stop smoking pipes.”
He got up from his chair, he went over, - I bet you the collection, I don’t know, but it has to be worth a quarter of a million dollars. I mean, there were ivory pipes and every head of state and every time he went somewhere, he got another pipe. He gathered up all the pipes in the office, there were a bunch of them there. Got a box from the conference room in the office out in Rancho Mirage. All the pipes. Leaves, goes all over the house. Takes all the pipes, calls Penny in and says, “Send these to the museum.” Last time he smoked a pipe. Forty-two years smoking a pipe and he stopped, like, on a dime.

And that same thing goes back to what you’re saying. He, a relationship with a Tip O’Neill or something with a Rockefeller or something, like he used to say, “He wouldn’t say you-know-what, if he had a mouthful.” And he didn’t. And the other thing was I used to kid him all the time. He’d get angry and he’d try to use profanity. And I said, “Mr. President, don’t do it. You got no rhythm. You’re really lousy when you use profanity.” He couldn’t complete one of the words. He’d say, “Well, Jes-!”, “Well, God da-!” He’d never get through the word, let alone the sentence that had profanity in it. And that whole thing was him. He had an unbelievable amount of stuff inside him when he left this world, I guarantee you. And he kept it all.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story. Stu Spencer confirmed it and actually sort of embroidered it with a sequel, which is what makes the story great. Stu’s in the campaign, ’76. It’s not going terribly well and he’s got a candidate who is not a great campaigner. They had all these surveys. And part of the problem is that the president would go out because he loved it. He would go out. He would give one of these Hartmann speeches that wasn’t great and the numbers would go down. What are you going to do? So, Friday night, he’s in the Oval Office, the only people there, himself, Dick Cheney, and the president. It’s the end of a long week and he’s frustrated and he’s trying to find a euphemism and the president isn’t getting it. So he finally says, “You know, Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you’re a fucking lousy campaigner.”

Well, first of all, what other president could you say that to? And Ford, it just washed over him. But the sequel is what makes the story. That story appeared when Germond and Witcover wrote their book about the campaign. And Stu went ballistic. He called Cheney to chew him out, he was really upset. And Cheney lets him wind down and finally says, “Stu, there was a third person in that room.” And it suddenly dawns on Stu, the president told the story on himself. Which is extraordinary.

Barrett: That’s it, you know. He just had this quiet discipline, he had an inner strength - and outer strength, too. He was a strong person, physically and morally and so forth. He had his own little edges of it, it was different than your morality or my morality and so forth, but within the context of himself, he just had everything buttoned down so tight it was unbelievable. It was just amazing to watch his discipline. Like the doctor, when he had a lot of the problems with a little bit of the strokes and everything toward the end and so forth, wouldn’t let him swim. They were concerned about something happening, about that whole balance thing and stuff like that. So, he didn’t like that.

I used to have to arrange for swimming every time we’d go anywhere. He just had to have a swimming pool. You could get away with it every now and again, but had to have that swimming pool. And he was always surprised by the response that people had to him. He just never associated himself with being a president, you know, just Jerry Ford. So he called the doctor and he said, “Doc, can you come over here, make a house call?” Of course, the doctor says yes. He said, “It’s really nice, he’s coming over.” So he comes over, Ford takes him outside and says, “I want to show you something.” So, he goes in to the shallow end of the pool and he gets to the point where the water’s up to about his chest, gets his back to one side of the pool, across the narrow side, and starts this, like, running against the water to the other side. He runs around and comes back and he looks at the doctor and says, “Can I do that?” And the doctor says yes. So, that’s what he did for an additional period of time before that went away, too. He was just amazingly disciplined and after that stuff, it was just great.

Smith: There’s a poignant story which may or may not survive the cut, and you may have heard this. It was toward the end, not the last summer they went up to Vail. I think it was the summer before the last summer they went up to Vail.
And he was in a hurry and Reverend Cert wanted to drop by. And the president was eager to return to Vail. And Penny’s trying to forestall this, and “What’s up? What’s up? What’s going on?” She says, “Reverend Cert would like to come by and give you a blessing”. “Screw the blessing!”

Barrett: He was so funny with all this stuff. Like I said, the unexpected behavior, he was so predictable, he’s so reliable and he just kept on going, then all of a sudden (snaps). I tell you, this was when he was president. Century Plaza Hotel. We’re up on the top floor, whatever floor it was they had the presidential suite on, we were there, and we were going to go down to the mezzanine level. It wasn’t the very lowest floor, but it was a like one level above for a political rally out in there, ’76. And it’s time to go, so we come out and we all walk down, the entourage, four or five agents, Terry, myself, Lou Cash, and Kennerly and so forth. We all get into the elevator. They’ve got the Secret Service. This was great. When something like this happens, the Secret Service is always fun.

So the doors close and they’ve got it all cleared to go all the way down. The thing goes down two floors and stops. The door opens up and there’s a guy you could only describe as Happy Herbie from Iowa. You know, I mean, like he’s out in California. He’s got one of these full-brimmed hats on, it’s a bluish hat. He’s got on a shirt, it’s kind of a plaid shirt and so on. And he anticipates this door and the door opens up and this guy sort of goes and backs off. Now the doors close again ready to go down. The elevator goes up.
They’ve got some circuitry screwed up, the elevator’s going up. So Ford was like, you hear the breathing start, you hear the breathing start just like that.
“Sorry, Mr. President,” says the agent, and everything else. You always love to see the Secret Service get caught up in this deal, you know, everything is so perfect. The thing goes down again. Stops at the same floor.

Now, in the course of the 40 seconds this took, this little Herbie from Iowa has gone from being absolutely and totally intimidated and in awe of this situation to being totally in charge of this situation. Because the door opens up again and this guy goes (looks up confidently). And you could see the Secret Service. The doors close again and he says, “Goddamn it all, if it stops here again, let him in on!” We rode down. But he’s just great. People just have no idea the laughter and the crazy stuff that we used to do together. And I mean everybody.

Smith: Of course, there’re stories about reporters on the ’76 campaign. And even that whole relationship. I mean, it was no accident that one of the eulogists was a journalist because of the message that he sent. He liked reporters.

Barrett: He did, he liked them. He thought they were a good bunch of guys. He liked to hang with them and he really had no qualms about it at all. I was telling Erik earlier today, it was a different deal, though. It’s changed quite a bit. Exposure to cable, punditry versus reporting, the idea that information moves so fast, so competitive, and da-da-da-da-da, ad nauseum. That’s the way it is right now. But back then there was fairness.

Like Helen Thomas, she wouldn’t give you a break if Betty Ford had a drinking problem, it wouldn’t matter a bit if it was impacting his ability to be president or if it kept him from going to a state dinner overseas. Oh, no, that was fair game. But if it didn’t, they’d say, “How’s he doing?” And I’d say, “Oh, he’s doing fine.” But then they would watch. Your credibility was at stake and the next time they saw him, if he wasn’t fine, they’d be all over you like a cheap suit. But if he was fine, they didn’t report about Betty Ford the whole time that she was away.

Smith: How much of that was known? More precisely, how defined was it? Because people sort of used the euphemism “Mrs. Ford’s problem” and no one ever really defined what it was.

Barrett: No, it wasn’t, but, I don’t think that, certainly not me, I mean was around a lot up in Camp David, a lot of their personal times. The aides, a little bit different in that regard, you’re with them a lot. But I think, like when she went to Long Beach, we had a real interesting _______ Persch(?), the doctor, the Navy doctor. She had gone through and was still sort of going through detox and she went through some heavy times. And we went to this office and Persch(?) is sitting there, this military place, it was a long narrow office and there was a desk at the end but there weren’t two chairs in front of it.
There was a chair on the side and President Ford and her were sitting on this side. I’m sitting on this side and he and Mrs. Ford are sitting on the other side. And we were going to go out and Persch(?) and I are going to see two hundred reporters assembled there and I’m going to read this statement. And he’s sitting there next to her, and boy, he never left her side through all that stuff. May be late in arriving over the years of seeing it and everything else, but once it arrived, I mean, boy, oh, boy, he was something. That’s why she was able to be everything she was, because he _______ everything to her after that.

Smith: It was a rough time for her?

Barrett: Oh, yeah, it was brutal. She was frail, Richard. She was never a large woman, the dancer, the model and everything else, but, boy, oh, boy, when the intervention took place, it was so delicate and everything else. I mean, she looked like such a small thing in his arm next to her. So, Persch(?), we’re all set to do this and I know what the meetings about and everything else and so forth, and Persch(?) then says to her, and she’ll tell you the same thing, “Mrs. Ford, is there anything you want to add to this statement?”

And I’m like watching a tennis match, not knowing what had gone on the previous four days she’d been there. “Is there anything else you want to mention?” Then, finally, she says, “Well, I could say that I’ve also had a problem with alcohol.” Whereas, up until that time, you put it at the feet of loosely prescribed Valiums and so forth and everything else. But he wanted a specific reference in there saying “I also have a problem with alcohol.” Just like that. So, she gets emotional, not crying or anything else like that, but that goes into the statement. And then he jumps me like one of those 2% grizzly bear moments and we’re literally two feet closer than you and I are. And he doesn’t come out of his chair, but he leans forward –this was for her that he did it – and said, “Now, Goddamn it, Bob, you go out there and don’t you say anything else, Goddamn it!”

Persch(?) was good, Persch(?) was amazing. They were very lucky. And she’ll tell you the same thing, what a difference he made. Unbelievable gentleman, unbelievable. But Ford was all over me like something else. And we went out and showing you the press again, all these people, I got his words ringing in my ears. We go out there and I read this statement, okay? And at the end of this statement, I say, “Mrs. Ford’s doing fine. It’s not without great challenge for her right now. And I hope that this statement will suffice for your needs right now. And if you could just give her a few more days, we’ll get back to you with something else then.” With that, a hand pops up, just like that. And the guy got about half the question out, “When did she realize tha—“ Before I can make a mistake and maybe have the president take my head off when he heard about me doing it, before I can do it, all the voices in the audience, “Hey, hey, knock it off. Knock it off.” The press sat the person down and I walked off the stage. It was the press and they were unbelievable. Unbelievable. I loved it. Really nice.

Smith: Did he feel guilt about all those years when he was climbing the ladder and…

Barrett: You know, I haven’t seen this thing, the film that’s got Kate Winslet and Leonardo diCaprio in it about the 50’s.

Smith: Revolution Road.

Barrett: I haven’t seen it, but I heard it’s a pretty tough film maybe ______ somebody. But I think that’s their era. That’s the whole deal. And, you know, you drank, you had cocktails, martinis at lunch, all that type of thing. And I think that the way he was raised, he just presumed certain things about a wife. He presumed certain things about motherhood. Things were probably changing around him, but he didn’t necessarily pick up on it. And what he was doing in his own mind he was doing correctly, he was noble, he was dedicated, he was providing for his family, he was moving ahead, he was serving his country, you know, blankety-blank-blank. None of this would have been at the expense of good thinking about her, but in terms of her needing anything— I don’t think that it ever did, but when it broke, we all had to credit Susan. She was the one who pulled this whole thing off.

Ford and I were on a trip. We were up in Buffalo, New York, and he’s got, like, two more stops. There was one in Virginia it was an in honorarium thing, you know, it doesn’t sound like much for what they get these days, but it was about $10,000. Then there was another event, maybe in Washington, if I remember right. I don’t quite remember where it was. I get a call. Susan. “We’re going to do this intervention thing with Mom.” Blankety-blank-blank. “You got to get him home.” “Oh, yeah, jeez, okay.” So, you know him as well as I do, as a child of the Depression, the idea of him giving up $10,000 was like. I used to kid him, “Have I ever asked you for a souvenir?” He goes, “No.” I said, “Anyway, have I ever asked you for an autograph? I mean, I’d ask you for somebody else that wants it.” He says, “No, you never have.” I said, “Well, I want something.”

This was after he was challenging some expense that he had that somebody owed him for a paltry amount, it was for some $3.80 or something like that. So, I said, “Well, I finally want something, sir.” He said, “Well, what is it?” I said, “I want the first nickel that you ever made.” And I jumped up out of the chair and I dove and started fumbling with his pocket. And I said, “And I know it’s right in here.” And he, “Well, you--! Well, they owe me that money!” I mean, whether it was a dime or a dollar or whatever. So, I said, “Okay. The first thing I’ve got to do is get—“, because the first thing he’ll do is say, “I’ve got to do these events.”

So I called Kissinger and I say, “Okay, if I can get Kissinger to substitute for him, maybe I can sell this to the event people.” So I called Kissinger. He’s down in Dallas and Ed Haeger had him down there for some event. Haeger slacks. That Haeger family was something unbelievable. So I get to him and he says, “Bob, certainly I’ll do it, but I’m in Dallas, I’ll need some—“ I said, “Okay, I’ll get back to you.” So, then I called Ed. And he used to come to the Ford golf tournament in Vail. Great, great people. And this is how everybody was around them. I started to ask, “I got this problem here,” and I didn’t want to get too detailed about it, but I said, “We got to get the president home because Mrs. Ford’s not feeling well.” Blankety-blank-blank. And I said, “And I’ve got Henry Kissinger ready to fill in for him, but I’ve got to complete this whole loop.” He’s in Dallas, Ed’s in Dallas, and I said, “And I need—“ and he said, “Stop. Bob, you take him home” and he says, big Texas accent, “Don’t you worry about a thing. I’ll take care of Henry. You get him home.” That was it.
At 11:30, I went in and woke up Ford and I told him the whole deal, this, that and everything else. It went so fast, da-da-da, “Susan called”, “the doctor said this”, blankety-blank-blank, and “I’ve called the people here and I’ve got Henry and Henry says he’ll do the events.” And we went home, red-eyed back. And got in there, went down to the office at nine o’clock the next morning. The kids had flown in simultaneously throughout the day we were traveling. And that all commenced at that time. But I don’t think until that moment, again Susan’s to be heralded for that, but at that moment, at that moment, just like the pipes and just like the drinking and everything else, at that moment, forever, and that was 1978, I guess. I took Mrs. Ford to Moscow I guess in January of that year.

Smith: That’s where some people noticed.

Barrett: Yeah. The Bolshoi. That was the year before, I think. That was ’77. That was a trip unto itself with everything that happened there. But at any rate, when it happened, from that date forward, if you were to ask, “Mr. President, tomorrow night, there’s a group of so-and-so, would you…?” “Well, let me check with Betty.” From that moment on, he never made a move that would’ve been anywhere at the expense of her inconvenience or her health or anything like that. And I believe that’s why he didn’t run. He told me when we went through that whole routine in Detroit. I came back upstairs. There were meetings there. That’s a whole other set of stories with Greenspan, Marsh, myself, with Meese and Wirthlin on the other side of the table. I’m convinced to this day that was one of the most brilliant scams maybe orchestrated by DIVA, you know.

Smith: Because obviously the stories take hold in popular, I won’t call it mythology, that somehow Ford was putting out these unreasonable demands.

Barrett: No. What happened was, it was Ford’s birthday, Bastille Day. The deal was that Reagan, the nominee, arrived in Detroit. We’re on the 70th floor, oddly enough, and they’re on the 69th floor. There was this circular staircase you could go back and forth. So, we get to Detroit, and here’s where the orchestration of it came in. I can tell you an awful lot about President Ford and I can guarantee you that I’m right when I say something, and I can guarantee you when I’d be wrong, and I can guarantee you when I don’t know what the hell I’m talking about. But a lot of people thought, they’d make people like you with the Foundation, or me in that position, they make you into a temple door. None of us ever had the authority. Ford just amassed all the detail.

I never made a decision regarding a dollar for him. I never made a decision saying, “Ah, no, I don’t think I’d like him at that event.” Baloney. I was always so easy because he was always so easy. So you could never get in trouble, you know? “Mr. President, do you want to go speak to that group?” “Quite frankly, Bob, I don’t like that” or “Yes, I do”. Okay, that’s it. Pick up the phone and that’s it. But if I said ‘no’ even though it was his ‘no,’ sort of like your Spencer-Cheney story and so forth, people would never believe it came from him.

Every once in awhile, when I knew the mood was right, “Hold on a minute. Just hold on a second. Mr. President it’s so-and-so, he’s from blankety-blank-blank…” “Well, I just can’t make that,” and he would reinforce that. That’s where my strength came from, is knowing him so well. But in terms of being a door, no. So, we go up there and everybody wants to see him, but they don’t just want to see him. There’s always I’m called down to see about the podium or I’m called down and when I’m down there, Dole arrives to talk to him. Another time, Howard Baker arrives to talk to him. Another time, former secretary of the Air Force, I forget his name. And these are all people that are going in, talking about this other deal.

So, then it’s his birthday and he goes walking over to Reagan’s suite. Okay, we walk in. Bill Casey’s there. Reagan comes out. Bill Casey and the two of them, just Reagan and Ford, go into a room, double doors, and Bill Casey sits down on a corner of the couch here, end table here, and I’m sitting in a chair here. And Casey goes, “Well, you know he’s going to ask him to be vice president.” You remember how Casey talked. “He’s going to ask him to be vice president.” And I said, “Oh, jeez” because I knew where Ford’s mind was, with everything that’d been done, that he’d been talking about. And I said, “Bill, boy, you people are a lot more knowledgeable about this stuff than I am, but I’m telling you, fine, fine, fine. But be sure you have a back-up plan. If this isn’t on the level, you have a back-up plan. Because I’m telling you right now, it isn’t going to happen. I don’t care what happens.”

And I was panicked, okay? So we come out, Ford and I get in the elevator, just the two of us going up again. He said, “Well, he asked me to run with him. You know, Bob, he is the nominee of the party and I sort of owe it to him” and everything else. Ugh, and I’m saying, “Boy, these days… This place is going to turn into chaos real fast here.” So we get back to the room and he says, “Why don’t you and, like, who?” “Well,” I said, “Jack Marsh is here and you trust the living hell out of him. And Alan’s here.” And he says, “Well, he’s going to get Ed Meese and Dick Wirthlin” and it was somebody else I couldn’t remember.

So we start to talk and I’m there with Kissinger. Kissinger also got a bad rap as if he were looking for a resurrection. I was there for every word that Kissinger had with them. There was as much of a discussion, in terms of certain things having a potential from them, like in terms of Ford’s strength. Like I said something once, I said, “It’s all well and good, but you may not – and I’m going to say this so carefully – you may not be understanding Washington.” I said, “Ford’s got 30-plus years here. He’s respected by both sides of the aisle and he’s got an unbelievable presence in the Congress. There’s not as much in the Senate or anything else,” I said, “And there’s no way, no matter how perfectly Ford behaves or any of all that was around him, there’s no way that somebody’s not going to get to him and then all of a sudden you’ll say, ‘You’ve got an un-loyal vice president.’”

Then they came out, “Well, you know, if we put to his strengths certain things” and they started talking about defense, National Security Council, talking about certain domestic policy, you know that he would’ve been – budgetary stuff, things like that. That was as much brought up in terms of spheres of influence, just like it’s no big difference whether you’re mandated by a title, Richard. You know what I mean? Otherwise, you’ve got Joe Biden now handling that economic deal with Obama’s blessing and so forth. Additional resume, so to speak. And that’s all there was to it, you know.
Smith: It’s amazing how things get calcified in history because it was Cronkite who used the phrase ‘co-presidency’ in the context of he was trying to describe this thing to Ford and Ford just sort of didn’t either pick up on it or didn’t—

Barrett: See, he wouldn’t have seen the danger in something. He was just talking to someone he had a lot of regard for. They were close and that was just a conversation. That just happened to be on the air in front of millions of people, you know. But he would do that now and then. But, anyway, the co-presidency, there was never anything approaching it, you know, and so it continued. We had a meeting and so we took the information back to Ford and they took it back. Who knows what’s going on. Then we go back for another meeting.

Now, it’s about close to 8:00 o’clock. Nine o’clock, Reagan’s going over to the hall to take the nomination to announce his vice president. We’re in a meeting. The same people are in a meeting. All of a sudden, out of the blue, there was some point, it wasn’t a very contentious point, it was some of the same kind of points we’d been talking about. All of a sudden, out of the blue, Meese said, “That’s it for now. We’re not getting anywhere, here.” Meeting’s over. We’re sitting there. You just couldn’t believe how fast it was over.

Smith: Who said that?

Barrett: Meese. And they’re gone. Okay? They’re gone. So I go back to the President. He’s inside, he’s in his trousers, he’s got on a sleeveless t-shirt and he’s got his suspenders hanging down the side of his pants. And I start to tell him what was said. I never did get the chance to get him. I told him later on about what I just told you. But at that point in time he just says, like, very tired, very weary, “Well, Bob. I’ve just been thinking. It just wouldn’t be fair to Betty. It just wouldn’t be fair. Tell them no. Tell them no.”

So, with that, I go upstairs through this back staircase, okay? And the room is in turmoil. The hangers-on and the staff and everything else is outside the doors and Reagan’s obviously on the other side of these doors. And with that,
Deaver comes out and just rushes away and maybe three minutes later Bush comes walking in with him and goes in. Just like that. So, I said, “That’s it.” I just disappeared. I’m walking out and Deaver’s got, I forgot his name, it’s strong right-wing contributor to Reagan. I can’t remember the name right now. It will come to me. And this guy is irate and he’s making some bad comments, “That Goddamn—I don’t know what the hell he was thinking with that Jerry Ford.” This, that, and the other. And Deaver’s saying, “No, no, no. Don’t worry” and everything like that.

I’m not totally unconvinced that this wasn’t a real smart deal. They went in there and Reagan had to have somebody to the center of himself and if you had left that convention open for three days without throwing something in to totally muddy the water, I think it was Deaver at his finest. Really at his finest. That he threw the whole elephant into the room, so to speak, and it consumed everybody and it was going to be Bush all along. If not Bush, some other centrist type of guy because he had to have it to give himself any balance.

So, that was it. Then he goes and we’re supposed to see Barbara Walters and I had to blow off the interview. She was so upset. She wrote a letter back to me saying, “Bob, if you would just make a point in calling a couple of people to let them know that I had that interview, because people were saying that I behaved badly.” She tried to intercept us on the stairs and everything else. She was a good friend at the time, you know. And he decided that it was better on Walters’ venue to put this out, it would’ve been better, and he proceeded to do so.

Now it’s the next day. Phil Donahue calls and says, “You know, there was so much confusion” and this, that, and everything else and blankety-blank-blank. And Ford says, “You know, Bob, I would like the chance to get this out on my basis and that’s a perfect venue.” So we went in and did the Phil Donahue Show the next day and he got to say all of what he wanted to say in the Jerry Ford kind of way, and it was nice, and it was good for the party and everything else. Everybody acted honorably and all that type of stuff and everything. Then we finally - I was beat black and blue - now we’re on the plane going back to Vail and I’m thinking, “I’m done with this thing.” And I’m sitting opposite, my back to the front of the plane and he’s sitting in the seat where he usually sits and he goes over and he kicks his shoes off just like that and he says, “Well, Robert, not a bad convention. Not a bad convention.” He says, “I gave a good speech and I got Bush as vice president.” And I looked and I said, “They were conniving. Were you conniving, too?” And he never would say that, but it was almost as if he played the card or maybe when Reagan and him were in the room that’s the kind of confidences that he would walk away with.

That he said, “Jerry, you know what I think. I think you’re a great party guy, but here’s my problem.” Blankety-blank-blank. Who knows? Casey telling me. Who knows? But all I’m saying is the way that thing unfolded, if not at the eleventh hour, at the nine o’clock hour, was just as I described it to a T. And I said, “My God.” And it would be like Jerry Ford to have responded to Ron Reagan at that point.

Smith: That’s a great story.

Barrett: He was something.

Smith: He took some heat for “cashing in”.

Barrett: I have an interesting tale. Let me ask you. I know where you’re going with all this, but with all your knowledge of the institution and everything else, let me ask you something. And tell me if I’m right about this.

Smith: Yeah.

Barrett: I think he established this whole thing that we’ve come to know as the post-presidency. And the reason I say that, Richard, is that even from my adult lifetime, I can go back and I can remember things being told to me about Roosevelt. I can remember a little bit, some small, small things, based on my age with Truman. I can clearly remember Eisenhower stuff and then forward blankety-blank from there. You have to remember that, basically, Ford was in a close election. Was it 1.2% of the popular vote, right? An 8,000 vote in three different states and he would’ve been president, okay. So the pardon definitely had taken its tolls in terms of people one way or the other. But it was a close election and he didn’t lose because no one liked him. He lost because of Nixon and the pardon. He lost because of change and ________.

Smith: Sure.

Barrett: So, it was a close election, but I maintain that Ford was the first presidency in all the years I just danced over in terms of my lifespan. I maintain that he was the first president that left office with esteem and energy. Because if you go back, Roosevelt dies, Truman ultimately has great esteem, but he didn’t have it for the longest time. Ike was at the end of a second career and went back to the farm at Gettysburg. Kennedy gets killed in office. Johnson was sicker than anybody realized, goes to the farm and essentially dies thereafter. And Nixon leaves in disgrace.

Some of them had the energy, but not the esteem. Some of them had the esteem, but not the energy. Ford comes out at 63, 64 years old, with one strong Goddamn physical presence. This, that, and everything else. And, basically, one out of two people wanted him to be president. So, all this largesse just flowed to him, the whole idea of boards and honoraria, and golf tournaments and stuff like that. But he was the first president that did it. And he established this for all these people that have since gone into that. The library, the fund-raising, the foundations and all that.

Smith: Now, that’s interesting because parts of this story never get told. The part about the Mitchell criticism of him “exploiting his office.” People never factor in all the charity work that he did, all the campuses that he visited. But more than that, no one ever factors in, and apparently this is one thing that brought him and Carter together, was the realization that they had to raise, to them, a ton of money to build a presidential library. In his case, two libraries. And the dollar signs, although modest by modern standards, appeared to him to be…

Barrett: Monumental.

Smith: Absolutely. He had no money.
Barrett: Yeah. But the other thing, when he left office, he had $640,000. That was the net worth in the Alexandria home. Now, the person that really set him on his way, and he’s a really wonderful guy because this was a special gift to this person to represent Ford, and that was Norman Brokaw from William-Morris. Norman had Eastwood and Marilyn Monroe and he had been through everything. This, that, and the other. But for him, he was so respectful of that institution. That was something different. And while Norman could be that little son-of-a-gun of a Hollywood agent, he wasn’t with Ford. And nobody, “Ah this event is just not right for him.” No matter how much money was attached to it.

Smith: Can you think of the kinds of things that he would turn down?

Barrett: Well, he turned down a number of speaking engagements, like individual engagements, because they were a little bit too—well, he remembered some of the people. That’s what it was. They were maybe not helpful during the ’76 campaign, you know, like in a pretty overt way. I mean, he wouldn’t have done it otherwise. There were some foreign trips that he didn’t want to do. We ended up doing the foreign trips by adding all the stops in together. We’d go to Israel. We’d go to Syria. We’d go to Jordan. We’d go to Saudi Arabia. We’d go to the Emirates. And you’d balance a trip like that. He got more comfortable when I started to do that type of thing.

The other thing is that people, for the most part - and I think this is a somewhat latter day situation that’s developed - people don’t presume a president to be poor, a former president to be poor. Like, the nature of what a president needs just to be a part of what people are calling upon him to do requires a great deal of money. It requires a lot of travel, a lot of hotel expense, a lot of participation. Are you going to have the guy live in a ______ townhome in Pennsylvania? People just presume a former president be affluent.

Now, by today’s standards, he got to be affluent, but he didn’t go crazy like it’s since become possible. Like, you might say that he got a stock deal by way of Sandy Weil with CitiGroup as Sandy moved through Travelers and the different companies that he had. But that was a modest type of thing that other people on the board were getting, too, in terms of stock that he kept and stuff.

Smith: Tell me about the kinds of work that he did on boards. We’ve talked to a couple people--

Barrett: Drove people nuts. People would call me up and they would say, “Bob, does he have to make every one of these meetings?” He never misses a meeting. When he took that money, this was a serious responsibility for him. And I used to get the packets. The packets would come in for a board meeting. The packets would be that thick. They’d be financial statements and this and any legal matters and everything else. And for days before, he would be all over that stuff. And he went in.

There were some funny times, too, though. Marvin Davis owned Twentieth Century Fox. He knew Marvin from Colorado. And so Marvin, in his grandiose way of doing things, he gets a board and he’s got Jerry Ford on the board, got Henry Kissinger on the board, got Edward Bennett Williams on the board, and Art McClelland, used to own the Cleveland Browns, on the board. Now, some of the other players from Hollywood that were on the board were Sherry Lansing who was director of production and stuff like that, Norm Levy who was a really knowledgeable Hollywood guy that was on the board, and Harris Cattleman who was TV, Twentieth Century Fox TV. They had M*A*S*H and some property at the time.

These meetings were bizarre under Marvin. God love him, he was funny. He’d sit there, Marvin, 390 pounds. He’d have a chair bigger than this. I put my hands, “Eh. Eh, so Sherry. Tell ‘em what we got going.” And she’d say, “Well, we’ve have this wonderful—It’s going to be a little bit risqué. We’ve got this film Porky’s.” You know, that little porn film, high school. And they’d come out and she’d be talking like this and you got Henry and Ford sitting there. And, I love this one. She says, “We’ve got a really good film coming out with Christopher Reeve. The Cardinal.” Do you remember that film? The Cardinal? Where he played the corrupt money-building cardinal for the Vatican, stuff like that? So, she gives a synopsis of that and Marvin says, “Well, what do you think Jerry?” This is a board meeting. President Ford would say, “Well, I don’t know, Marvin. I mean, you’ve got to be very careful when you go near this religious stuff.” “Henry?” “Well, I tell you. I always ask Cardinal ______ in New York City…”

The meeting would be bizarre. There would be no form or substance. Somewhere along the lines they weren’t doing that well at the time. They were doing okay, but then towards the end of the meeting, Harris Cattleman, big, white curvy hairdo, Hollywood style, he’d be sitting there. “Harris! Tell us what’s happening.” Harris would say, “Uh, we just sold 38 episodes of M*A*S*H residuals to the following markets for $38 million dollars.” “Eh, let’s go to lunch!” Everyone would get up and go to lunch.

So, the board experiences were interesting, but that was the aberration. The rest of them, he was so diligent. Nobody makes all the board meetings. I’ve been in a corporation. There might be nine of them scheduled a year. And if you make seven of them, you’re a damn good director and that type of thing. He never missed a board meeting. He never missed a board meeting. It was just amazing. And I think he wouldn’t be at all reluctant from picking up the phone. You don’t have the clout. There’s a regard. You know how hard it was for us, all of us involved, yourself even more so, to get something for the Foundation or to get something by way of the archives or to get something for the Library or to get some staffing deal or to get some budgetary line moved over here or there. It’s not like that Congress or that Senate is intimidated by him. We got some things and we didn’t. You know what I mean?

Smith: I always said the difference between him and, say, Lyndon Johnson. Johnson’s library as long as Johnson was alive would’ve been a national memorial.

Barrett: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: And President Ford, in some ways, was too nice.

Barrett: There’s no doubt about that. That was clearly a political liability of that man. He was just too damned decent. There’s just no doubt about it. There’s a lot of times, a lot of people, myself included, I got much quicker and more vocal and everything than he is and so forth, but I would’ve taken on certain people from physically, if he ever told me to, to something else. And Cheney’s certainly capable of it. You know that Rumsfeld was capable of it. You know that Terry or all of us would’ve done it. But a lot of times, it was just, “Well, let it go. Let it go.” And there was a lot of consequence from that, too.
Bob Barrett   March 1, 2009

Smith: A couple of things. For one, how did his relationship with Nixon evolve?

Barrett: You know, I’ll tell you. I don’t mean to do this and maybe it’s the third time I do it and I hope it’s not too much, but that would almost be something that’s more your bailiwick, you know, with the historical study and all that stuff.
Because, like, I was always surprised by Ford’s references and most of the time it was in print, oddly enough. I didn’t hear him ever say anything to me.
I mean, we talked about Nixon quite a bit. We talked about everything quite a bit. But he would use the phrase, “Dick was a friend of mine.” He would say ‘friend.’ And I never, in all the times subsequent, whether the resignation and the papers and the tapes and until they got a resolution on what was going to possibly go to go to court and what wasn’t, and blankety-blank-blank. Maybe that undid something that Ford, before I was around him, had a greater idea.

I tell you, those two are like oil and water from a personality point of view.
One of them is, like, he may be naïve, Ford, he may be this, he may be not.
This is not a man suffering from a lack of conscience or social well-being. I think that Nixon was a marvelously intelligent person, but I think he was one of the most socially insecure people I ever met. I know, out in San Clemente, it was the first day there, you could see it in the man’s body. There was always this suspicion. It was ‘them.’ That type of thing. It’s the story we were talking about standing at the counter, that these kind of people. Okay, he’s brilliant. You don’t have to be brilliant. You have to be articulate and you have to be secure. People have to feel the kinship and so forth.

That some people can become the highest level occupants of some of our offices is beyond me. I’ll give you another just so you don’t think I’m being pompous one way or the other. I think two of the most socially inept people I’ve ever seen are Al Gore and Richard Nixon. And Ford was not socially inept. He was like a hot knife through butter with people. Anything else you want to say about him.

Smith: Also, he liked people.

Barrett: He loved them. Golf tournaments, ski tournaments, ________, it was effortless to represent him. It was effortless.

Smith: Way back, were you surprised when the pardon occurred?

Barrett: I was with him and let me tell you what happened. That was on a Sunday and he was going to play golf at Burning Tree, I think it was Burning Tree. So, we get set to go. I’m anticipating that that’s today. And this whole thing settles up, goes through the whole thing, and goes on. And blankety-blank-blank. And I get in the car with him afterwards and he goes to play golf. He was totally, totally at peace.

He would talk to me a lot. There were times that I would talk back and there would be times that I knew that I’m just supposed to listen here. But there was no, “Well, I’ll let him chew on that” or “Well, I’m glad I got that…” Nothing. I mean, like, he was reading himself the newspaper in the car on the way over. You’ve seen him do that a thousand times. He loved his newspapers on airplanes or the car. And he’s just reading the newspaper. It was a misjudgment on his part. He should’ve floated it, but that wouldn’t be Jerry Ford. ________ You know, like, “I should go talk about our relationship with China and somebody’s going to ask a question” And he could say, “Well, I could never conceive a pardon at this moment.” That’s all he’d have to do. Let them all stew. Let all the venom come out with the actual pardon. Let that go for two or three weeks, then he comes back and says, “For the good of the country”. And it would’ve made all the difference in the world.

Smith: It’s funny, because Mel Laird - champion schemer of all times - he had a plan. And he thought he had an understanding. Now, who knows? But the plan was to bring in 30/35, members of Congress from both parties, both Houses, at the right moment, who would basically appeal to the president to consider pardoning this. The problem is, I remember once spending two and a half hours in a hotel room in Grand Rapids war-gaming this. And I remember thinking, “Yeah, it was the right thing to do, but there had to have been a more adroit way of doing it.” But you know the problem is it’s so difficult to put ourselves back in that climate. And I don’t know if a trial balloon ever would’ve gotten above the trees before it was shot down in that supercharged climate.

Barrett: I told him, and he put it in the book A Time to Heal, I said, “You know what you did, Mr. President. We were all addicted to Watergate and some of us were mainlining, some of us were snorting, some of us were sniffing, some of us were smoking, but we were all addicted.” And he said, “We’re going cold turkey.” And I said, “And you’re really pissing us off.” And that’s what the people need. And the people would say, “Okay, can’t we just have an arm? We want Nixon’s right arm. Give us a hand.” Something like that. So that’s why you would think that any type of, as you said, __________, your viewing of it.

But you’re absolutely right, because that still lingered all those months later and it was definitively, he says ‘No,’ but the election was so close that along with the economic news coming out later, along with the wrong running mate. He probably would’ve been better off with Rockefeller instead of Dole. Ford says correctly so when somebody wants to blame the pardon for him losing the election, he says, “Well, in an election that close, you can’t say that that was it. It might have had a contribution to it.”

Smith: Ford was so fortunate, in contrast with LBJ who dies just four years later, even before the announcement of the peace agreement. And President Ford, on the other hand, lived long enough, first, to know that people had come around, and then that Profiles in Courage award which captured the whole process.

Barrett: In there with the Kennedys; it doesn’t get any better than that. I always said that to people. I said, “You know, he could’ve lived longer. I wish we had him around longer, because he was good in so many ways right up to the very end.” Even months before, when I was out in California, he was certainly debilitated and this, that, and everything else, but there was still humor. And you had to speak in a different kind of way to get it, but there was still, even then. I said, “It would’ve been nice to have him, but even then 93 is a hell of a run. And when you’re standing there and all this stuff you’re looking at is in front of you as possible things that people don’t know or understand or appreciate, and then all of a sudden all that comes around to stand behind you as a back-up and everything else. That’s a pretty nice deal. Ninety-three years and that’s a pretty nice deal.” And he would’ve been the first one to say it, you know. “We did okay. We did okay.” No doubt about it.

Smith: How difficult was it for him those last few years? I don’t know what you think about the DeFrank book or the process. Put Tom aside, just talking about the president, they had a great relationship. But depersonalize that. My bias, [but] I think it’s a probably an unhealthy thing for a former president to say, “Okay, you’re going to be my scribe and I’m going to pour out my heart and soul and trust your judgment to edit this and decide what I want to be my last will and testament.” Because commercial publishing demands not nuance, not subtlety.

Barrett: He’s still thinking of relationships a la 1975 and he wasn’t that good at recognizing the blogging, technological explosion of competition, that punditry that replaced reporting.

Smith: With all due respect, because you’re his friend, but, you know, the story that Bob Woodward was thinking of doing a book about Ford. Maybe he was. I don’t think we’d want to see it. I think we’ve seen what he had in mind. We saw it before the funeral.

Barrett: Right. Exactly.

Smith: And I don’t think it actually moved the meter historically.

Barrett: No. Well, all you have to do is you have to remember, Bob Woodward stood up at the National Press Club in front of his peers and looked at Jerry Ford and said, “I had the information right, but I interpreted it wrong.” “And,” he said, “I want everybody to know, to hear that now.” Now, see you can go on and write anything you want about Ford now, but when you do that mea culpa coming from a personality of a Bob Woodward at the National Press Club with all those people there, Bob can write any kind of book he wants about Ford and have it be seen as a responsible thing. See, Tom’s a great guy and everything else, but in a different version of a personality. We were talking about _____, Tom’s got this little, quiet personality. He’s very suspicious. Tom was born super suspicious, you know. Remember Haynes Johnson from the New York Times?

Smith: Yep.

Barrett: The only person more suspicious than Tom about all things, Haynes Johnson was that way, especially about Nixon. You know, Reagan asked the three of them – Carter, Nixon, and Ford – to represent him at the Sadat funeral. I took them over there. And that was another whole story on the airplane.

Smith: And was that where the Ford-Carter friendship began?

Barrett: That’s where it went into another land. That’s where it got to the point Brent said, “Oh, God. Can we throttle back on this a little bit?” But it did and that was a lot of time. That was a hell of a trip, like, all the stewards and attendants on Air Force One. It was fun. I think a lot of people have lived a much more significant life than me in terms of the presidency and stuff like that, but I don’t know of anybody that got to do what I had to do on that trip.

Smith: What was the dynamic between the three of them initially?

Barrett: Well, they all arrived and went to the White House. They had the pictures there, the famous pictures taken there. And then they’re out in the plane. They’re in the cabin part of it and, you know, like, Haig and Cap Weinberger and the other people out there in the _____ compartment, which I thought was really tacky on their part, but not unusual. So, it was pretty good and they all handled it pretty well. You have to remember, nobody’s writing speeches. I mean, these guys did a hell of a job on that trip. There was no time for this. There was no coordination, “Okay, you touch on these points. I’ll touch on these points.” They all had had a personal albeit different relationship with Anwar Sadat and with Jehan, his wife. And they all held that relationship dear.
So many world leaders have told me that that’s the world leader of the twentieth century so far. That’s the bravest and the best and the brightest that they’ve seen. A lot of people say that. So, it worked out very nicely. They went before the Egyptian Parliament; they went before the American community, the diplomatic community. And they’d speak in terms of Nixon would speak first because he was the elder statesman. And in spite of being the victim or sitting there having heard what this one just said, the next one would pop up and it would be an entirely different thing. Nixon was funny with the American community. It was a great line and I really liked him at this point. It sort of has to do with the Frank Langella representation of how we could be so mischievous. He got up and he says, “It’s very special to be here among so many famous people. And I guess in case myself in from these people.” (?) You know, like that, he just let it go.

Then, go back, at the end of the trip, we’re all back on the plane. Hotter than hell. We’d gone through the procession and now we’re about twenty-fifth for take-off because we only have former heads of state with us. And they were having the heads of state take off before that before this 27,000 took off. So we get onto the plane and everybody’s hot. It worked and everybody did it. Everybody did their thing for America. And the presidents are coming on board and I walk back on the plane, you know, tie loosened up and everything else. There were press people, Steve Jones, Haynes Johnson, and I can’t remember who the third one was. So they say to me, “Bob, is there any chance we can get some time with the presidents on the way back?” I said, “I haven’t asked them, but I’ve come to know them,” I said, “I’m sure that will work out. I’m sure they’ll be generous with that. No problem at all.” I said, “I’ll come back and let you know.”

So then I go back toward the front of the plane and the Secret Service goes, “Bob.” So I got over there. I said, “What is it?” He said, “Nixon’s not coming.” I said, “What?” He said, “Nixon’s not coming.” I said, “Where the hell did he go?” I mean, we’re in Cairo. He said, “He’s flying to either Morocco or Algeria, _________. And he’s flying SaudiAir.” SaudiAir was really badly thought of because they had suspended operations to make it difficult to get to the funeral of Sadat who they still resent - had made the peace with Israel. I said, “Jesus Chris, that rascal.” Just like that. I said, “Let him go.”

So, I walk back, Haynes Johnson is sitting there super _____ . I said, “Ah, I’ve checked and I’ve got some good news and I’ve got some bad news.” They said, “What is it?” I said, “The good news is the presidents would be delighted to spend some time with you.” They said, “What’s the bad news?” I said, “There’s only two of them.” And Haynes Johnson says, “Where the hell did that Goddamn son-of-a-bitch Nixon go?!?” He says it just like that, just unbelievable. And Tom had that type of thing. He sort of thrives on this conspiratorial. It’s just part of his demeanor.

Smith: You know, it’s funny, because when you read the book, he makes such a big deal out of this little slip of the tongue where the president, “Well, he’s vice president”. About some appointment or something like that. And it’s like you’d think the whole Watergate story pivoted on this little incident.

Barrett: Well, I think that people are prone toward that. Depending on how much time you have around the president, you sort of correctly covet a certain memory about something a president says to you, or a great athlete or a great celebrity. And for the celebrity of a president or the athlete, it’s just one of 20,000 things he said that day. You know what I mean? But you heard it and you make something out of it.

Smith: Do you think Ford had any idea, when he was doing those interviews, do you think he purposefully was engaged in this as a way of communicating?

Barrett: I think incrementally he probably didn’t establish, you’ll know what I mean by this, like, he wasn’t gifted. He probably didn’t really establish a rhythm that was uniform throughout that whole process with Tom. You follow? You know, way back, hell, he lived so long. He was virile and so capable all those years. But, you know, it was, what’s the name of the Grand Rapids Press? They had their annual meetings with him. We had, who else was in there? Brokaw was doing it for awhile. Tom DeFrank was doing it for awhile. Phil Jones would do it. There were a bunch of them that would have these obituary oriented times with him.
So, I think as he goes along, because he continued to have varied thoughts regarding the Reagans and latter day politicians and the Clintons and stuff like that. You know, like, he sort of maybe accelerated the rhythm and like he created some angst in the person who’s hearing it and stuff like that. But he was capable of doing that. Clinton came to Vail in - it must have been in 1995-ish, maybe ’95, ’96. And it was a big deal. Like, “What the hell is Bill Clinton going to Vail for?” Democratic presidents go to Aspen. Republican presidents go to Vail. And it’s basically true. You’ve got the whole demeanor of the population, the business, and this and everything else. But, truth be known, their daughter, what’s her name?

Smith: Chelsea.

Barrett: Chelsea. Chelsea was very interested in ballet at the time and we had formed a very nice partnership with the Bolshoi ballet as a result of the trip to Russia that I was talking about earlier. And they would come and put on performances at Ford Amphitheater. Beautiful set-up. God almighty.

Smith: They loved it in Vail, didn’t they?

Barrett: Ah, they loved it. I’ll tell you about the last golf tournament if you want to hear about loving Vail. Beautiful thing. So the Clintons come and they not only come to Vail but they stay in Len Firestone’s house who was just the pinnacle of Republican fundraisers in California. So Vail, and Leonard Firestone’s, and California, and a Goddamn Democrat. I mean, jeez! But it was because of Chelsea. So they play golf. I set up for them to play golf. Jack Nicklaus wanted to play with them, so it was Jack, Ford, and, a very interesting little story. I bet you don’t know this one.

Ford, Jack Nicklaus, Clinton, and the fourth was supposed to be Tom Apple, a golf pro at Arrowhead Country Club in the Rockies. So, at the last minute, Clinton calls Ford and says that he’s got a fourth. And Ford has to call Tom who, of course, was very excited about playing but absolutely understood. Like, he didn’t think he was supposed to be in there in the beginning anyhow. So, the replacement for Tom, so the $64,000 question to Richard Norton Smith: Who was person that Clinton substituted for Tom Apple, the golf pro?

Ken Lay. Enron. How’s that fit? That’s a constricting and expanding kind of world that sometimes makes sense and doesn’t.

So, at any rate, they’re there and the Clintons could not have been better. We had an after party after the Bolshoi deal. Outdoors. It was great. He played the saxophone. He was perfect. And she was perfect, too. Hillary was perfect. They were great. And everything was a splendidly successful visit. And Ford and Betty, as you know them, were just perfect there. And everybody in Vail in spite of being Republicans, they had nothing but, “Well, that’s pretty nice that that sitting president would come do.” So now it’s Monday afterwards and I’m over at the house with him. We’re having lunch. The only person that’s out, Mrs. Ford is out. The only person in the house is the woman who is a cook

Smith: We’ve interviewed her.

Barrett: Oh, yeah. So we’re sitting there at the table, you know, just Ford and I. And I said, “Alright, everybody’s gone.” I said, “What’d you think?” Just like that. So, like I was telling you before, it’s his own house, in this case Beaver Creek, and everything else (looks around), “Well, I’ll tell you one thing, Bob. He didn’t miss one good-looking skirt.” That was the way he put it. “He didn’t miss one good-looking skirt.” And he said, “But, you know what? I don’t know what’s at his core.” He says, “I just don’t know what’s at his core.” But he leaned forward and points his finger and he says, “But you tell all our Republican friends that don’t you underestimate this guy. Don’t you underestimate this guy.” He says, “I’ll tell you what, he’s better than John.” John Kennedy. You always forget Ford and Kennedy were contemporaries. We think of John as so much younger. They were contemporaries. He had a lot of regard for John.

Smith: They had offices across the hall from each other.

Barrett: Yeah. He had a lot of regard for him. He says, “Truth be known, John was still an elitist.” He says, “And he loved the press and he knew how to make the press work for him.” “But,” he said, “he hated the rope line.” He said about John Kennedy. He said, “He hated the rope line.” He says, “This guy loves the rope line and the rope line loves him.” He says just like that. He says, “The rope line loves him.” That’s what he said about Clinton.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Barrett: It was about, let’s see, it had to be late spring of, he died in 2006, might have been February or March. It seemed more like it would’ve been April or May that I went out there. It was funny. John Purcell, a friend of mine from Vail, and he used to make Ford laugh so much, John is a very expert boats man. I’m a neophyte boats man, I can do fine. And, Ford, I used to ride him all the time and he used to ride me all the time about being Army, you know, because he was Navy. I said, “You know, what’s the Navy do?” I said, “When have you won a war unless you stand on the ground?” You know what I mean? And he’d go, “Well, …” And we’d go on and on like that.

So then John would visit him and I’d have to completely tidy up after him afterwards because he would say to the President, he’d say, “Bob comes up to see me in his boat, Mr. President. He’s taken out my dock three times!” “Well, I’ll tell you, he’s an Army guy.” For as thwarted and as difficult as it was for him, he’d go, “Have you crashed into any docks? You Army guys, they shouldn’t let you on a boat.” Just like that. Through great labor, but that was the start of the conversation. He’d take it much slower and haltedly that I just did it. But I knew exactly where he was going and I’d say, “I come all this distance. I come 3,000 miles. I got to walk in and sit and listen to that?” “Well, you’re Army…” It was great. Just great.

Smith: Was it tough for his people in the second Bush administration? Because obviously there’s been a lot written, a lot speculated upon?

Barrett: I don’t know.

Smith: He didn’t talk about it?

Barrett: No, he didn’t talk about it. And it was of no interest to me because I really enjoyed what I was able to do with him. You know, like the golf tournament. I just know he stayed so viable, so energetic. The celebrities, the corporate people, the politicians, both sides, having the Danny Rostenkowis, the Marty Rousseaus, and Tip O’Neills out to his golf tournament as well as the Bob Michaels. And then the Eastwoods. Everybody was there. Bob Hope. It was just great. It was just so great for him to do all this stuff and the travel and everything else. It was just a wonderful, wonderful, wonderful, wonderful time.

I used to speak to a few classes and so forth, people would ask me to speak. And I’d say, “You know, let me tell you something about what it was like.” I said, “It never occurred to any of us in the Ford administration to be self-aggrandizing. It never occurred to us to want something.” I said, “Now, before you think that I’m saying ‘Aren’t we special people?’ I want you to parse my words. It never occurred to us.” You see, now, the only time somebody deserves great credit for being moral is when something occurs to you and you say, “No, I’m not going to do that. It’s wrong.” I said, “It never occurred to us. And you know why? Because he was so Goddamn good. He was so good that there was no way that any of us could ‘Well, you know, if you do this for me, I could get you into this dinner’ or ‘If you do this for me or make a contribution over here…’” I said, “We didn’t do it.” I said, “And it was all because of him. He was just so naturally good.”

He wasn’t a prude, you know what I mean. He liked a little bit of a racy story and this, that, and everything else. But he was a Boy Scout. He was an Eagle Scout. He was, with all those qualities, not to shove down your throat, not to be anti-gay, not to be bad-mouthing choice, or this or that. Nope, never at anybody’s expense. But he genuinely was that good without being a prude. He was that good. And all of us, I bet every White House since then, you know, they all still do the same thing, the pictures go up and the carpeting is good and everything is pristine and stuff like that. There was never, I’ve never felt the casualness that we felt.

I mean, passing the press in the hallway like we did. This, that, and everything else. Their reverence of Kennerly or the relationship of, like, I’ll show you some pictures of Cheney, O’Donnell, myself, and Kennerly, we were in the control car all the time together, you know. Cheney is falling asleep. We used to put up signs on him “Wake up, Cheney. You fell asleep and had a wet dream.” And we’d leave him in the car and we’d go into the event. And he’d come out.

And Rumsfeld, when he was on the staff. We’d go down to an event and we’d get in back. It was all crowded and Kennerly’s cameras and I’ve got the football. Ford’s in the limo ahead. And then we’d pull up to some place, I think it was down here in Florida as a matter of fact, and Rumsfeld starts to go, “Goddamn…” There’s something wrong with the set-up and everything like that. So Kennerly’s sitting in the back. Rumsfeld’s sitting right there and Kennerly says, “I can’t tell. You think he’s pissed?” Within earshot and everything else. And Terry says, “Well, I don’t know. I don’t know if you can tell yet.” And I go, “I think he’s just venting. You know, some people have a need to vent.” And he would go on with this banter until he finally went, “Why don’t you guys shut the hell up already!” I mean, that’s the Chief of Staff, that’s what we used to do.

And, of course, there were times to be taken seriously, like, we cried. We did everything with an extreme of dedication, emotion, passion, and foolishness. You know, bop-bop-bop-bop-bop-bop-bop. And I, myself, and Flip Wilson, we entertained at Ford’s birthday at the White House. And I set up the routine like I had taken the president. You know how the president always gets the physical on his birthday? So I went through the routine. I put a hand up to introduce him and I said, “I was with the president of the United States today and as you know the president’s received a very somber military deal and,” I said, “at this time I want to bring in the assisting medical personnel that’s assisting.” And Nurse Geraldine, remember the routine that Flip Wilson used to do? “I, hear, I love this, I love this man!” And we just took his ass apart. It was just, “I saw parts of this man this country will never see!” I mean, that’s how much freedom. It was just great.

Smith: Do you miss him?

Barrett: Oh, yeah. I miss him. It ended up from ’74 until 2006. It was 32 years. You know what I mean? And I know there were a lot of people that had a more, but that was a long time. You know? And there was a lot that happened after he left office. Like just quantitatively and qualitatively. Like the trips overseas. He was so well regarded overseas because overseas his lack of eloquence and so forth doesn’t matter because the interpreters take care of that. You don’t need to be. So his words and his expression and his demeanor. I mean, if we were in France with Valéry Giscard d'Estaing or whether we were in Great Britain with Callahan or with Schmidt. Schmidt loved him. All these people came to his forum. I mean, they were fantastic. And in Saudi Arabia, he and I went, and I sat with him and he met with King Saud, you know, Saud’s father. And he would carry messages at the request of either Reagan or Jimmy Carter at different times and so forth. But, I mean, we would go to the Emirates and the same thing. Like the butter, a hot knife in butter. He would sit down at this totally Arab presentation with the pig in the center and they just loved him. Loved him.

Chinese trip, the trip to China, when we went all over China, down the Yangtze and everything else. There were 30 of us on a boat that was designed to carry 600 people cruising down the Yangtze. Brent was with us. And the Chinese Ambassador to the United States was our tour guide. Unbelievable guy. He had grown up and was educated in Germany. And Brent was sitting in the back of the boat one night and Brent said, and this is the kind of great conversations that we had, Brent said to the Ambassador, “Well, how did you become a Communist?” He said, “I was an oriental in Germany during the 30’s, late 30’s.” He says, “And there was no sort of room for anything like me in anything that they had to order so the only place I could have any socialization was with other Communists.” So he became a Communist. That’s what he said. “So, I became a Communist.” Just like that. But, I mean, they just loved him. Loved him everywhere.

Smith: How should he be remembered?

Barrett: Oh, let’s see. I mean that’s a very, very nice opportunity certainly not to be squandered. I would say that he was probably the best across the board representation of America that ever ended up being president. Other people, you know, whether it’s a George Washington or it’s an inspirational Kennedy or an intellectual Woodrow Wilson or a quasi-spiritual Abraham Lincoln, but that middle slice of America, I don’t think there’s ever been anybody that was more American. Navy, he’s a hell of a Navy hero, you know that. He never made anything out of that. But he goes down three times to pull guys out of a burning engine room with ammunition and everything else. He didn’t say shit about that stuff. He was the best that the country had to offer. And there’s millions and millions like him.

Smith: That’s perfect. Perfect.

Smith: Some of this, obviously, is familiar territory, but hopefully some of it’s new, too. You came to Congress in ’61, from western Kansas. Had you met Gerald Ford before you took your seat in the House?

Dole: No. The only people I knew were our senators and I had met Phil Hart, of course. Anyway, no.

Smith: The Republican Party in the House in those days, one senses, was pretty different.

Dole: In the minority.

Smith: Was that the psychology?

Dole: Yeah. It was never going to change, so might as well do the best you can with 180 – I think we got to 180 once, didn’t we? 170, 160.

Smith: And what does that do to the psychology of the minority?

Dole: Well, if you had any initiative and wanted to do something, I don’t remember – I know among the big guys there was bipartisanship, but I’m not sure. I remember working with a few Democrats on issues. But you almost get the feeling, well, you’re just a second class member and it’s not going to change. It is a permanent minority. You get paid well, so maybe you’ll stay here.

Smith: Does that encourage an exodus to the Senate, for example? Is that a factor?

Dole: Yeah, you go from one minority to the next. But in the Senate you have a lot more freedom, you can do about anything you want in the Senate, except get a bill with your name on it. That’s not going to happen when the Democrats are in control, or vise versa.

Smith: But the party in those days, if you look at the Republican Party in the early Sixties, not just in the House – but it’s a Midwest party. It’s grounded in the Midwest because you had very few Southerners at that point. That was about to change. But it was basically a Midwest party with obviously a few from the East and the West Coasts and all that.

Dole: We had one guy, Bruce Houser, from Texas. He was our Southern Bob, and that’s about it. You’re right. Texas qualifies for the South in a way, southwest.

Smith: What does that mean? I think of the Midwest as a place where…

Dole: That’s where we started, in Wisconsin and you get the leadership, whether it’s Dirksen or Halleck, or Gerald Ford. I’m trying to think who we had on the Eastern – Bob Wilson, he’s from California. It was a Midwest-centered party.

Smith: Did that mean it was a more pragmatic party?

Dole: I think so, yeah. I thought Ford was pretty pragmatic. He didn’t have any lists he kept on his conservative rating with the ACU. John Ashbrook – remember that name?

Smith: Yes.

Dole: I worked closely with Ashbrook on the American Conservative Union. And we used to meet monthly to put out our ratings for the month, and of course, since we were doing it, ours were always very good. We were the stars of the conservatives. But he was a very bright guy from Ohio, and for a long time the Conservative Union was pretty important with a lot of new members from around the country, and had a pretty good following with the media because it wasn’t a nut cake organization. It was conservative.

Smith: It was also about ideas, it wasn’t just tactics and name calling.

Dole: We just didn’t look up their votes, aye, no, aye, no…and Ashbrook was a man of ideas, too. He was really a bright guy. He died at a very young age.

Smith: What kind of conservative was Jerry Ford?

Dole: In those days a conservative was one who believed in restraining spending, not choking anybody, but restraining and keeping taxes low. And that was it. There wasn’t any Civil Rights, same sex marriage, abortion. That didn’t happen until – Nixon escaped all that, too.
Smith: That’s right. John Paul Stevens told us when he was nominated for the Court, no one asked him about abortion.

Dole: Yeah. When would that have been?

Smith: That’s about the last time – it would be ’75.

Dole: Yeah, that’s about right. I think it became a big issue in ‘74- well, in my campaign. And the New York Times and all the big papers were out there because this was the first race where, according to the media, this was the issue. And it probably was. There were probably other issues, but this really brought people out on both sides. Six months ago I wrote a letter to Bill Roy. I’m getting too old for enemies, and I’ve been told that he felt that I did something with that issue that was unfair, and he wrote the nicest letter back saying he thought it was pretty rough and tumble and a lot of my people were over the top, but he never thought that I’d done anything. Because they carried these fetuses around in jars...kill babies, vote for Roy. Had little ads, one liners. It was awful stuff.

Smith: Did you have any idea at that point, because that really was a sort of turning point in the nature of American politics, and in some ways, in conservatism, too. It became much more a cultural conservatism, kind of a combustible mix between economics and the social issues.

Dole: I remember my first campaign, there were a lot of people who wanted federal aid for education. I opposed it. The one thing you get support for federal aid is farm subsidies, so these farmers didn’t mind. They’re the best, they’ve got their hand out all the time. And even the Farm Bureau, which was at one time a pretty middle of the road, conservative, not so worried about cows and wheat. They were worried about the country and broader issues.

I can’t remember what they used to talk about on the Ev and Charlie Show, but it certainly wasn’t any of these hot button issues.

Smith: That’s perfect, because that brings up – in ’61, I don’t think he was in the House leadership. In ’62 he took on Charlie...

Dole: Charlie Halleck.
Smith: No, first there was Charlie Hoeven.

Dole: Oh yeah, from Iowa.

Smith: That’s right. And supposedly Hoeven said to Halleck, “You’re next.” Or something like that. Do you remember? The older I get, the more and more I think generational issues trump everything else, including ideology. In other words, your generation of Young Turks were at the point where you were dissatisfied with the elders who were running the party, defining the party in the House. People like Don Rumsfeld and others.

Dole: Charlie Goodell, at that time, and Mel Laird. Laird, he was the kind of guy who would put poison in the river and then run down to the town and ask what happened. That guy was tough.

Smith: A conniver.

Dole: Slick, devious.

Smith: Was he a candidate? Because there is some uncertainty until we get to the Halleck thing.

Dole: He was a good buddy of Ford’s. No he was in the leadership. Wasn’t he conference chairman or something?

Smith: Right.

Dole: He was a very bright guy, I mean, he was young, younger than Ford. He was smart. Came from Wisconsin. But he had this quality that you could never put your finger on it, but you knew he was behind it.

Smith: What was it about Charlie Halleck that made him vulnerable? This is after the Goldwater debacle.

Dole: I think Mel Laird may have put in a good word for me with Ford in ’76. We weren’t close friends but…Charlie Halleck was just a wonderful speaker. I think he had spoken at a convention and really wowed them. He could give a great speech, but he had this drinking problem. He didn’t like to travel and that’s about the time we saw – I think you meant Charlie Hoeven instead of Golden – he used to “Where are you going this weekend, Bob?” And I’d say, “I’m going back to Kansas.” “Why in the hell do you guys go home every weekend? When I go home, it’s an event. We don’t run around every weekend.” And that’s about the time when all that started to change. If you didn’t go home every weekend, or if you missed a vote, little things – the old boys, once they’d get them, some of them went home, most of them just stayed here. It wasn’t quite as easy to get around.

Smith: You didn’t have jet planes.

Dole: They weren’t flying on corporate jets yet. They didn’t have their Gulf Streams ordered.

Smith: Was Halleck vulnerable in part because the Goldwater thing was so overwhelming that there was just this desire for something different?

Dole: Bob Griffin was sort of the catalyst there. And he was very bright, young. He didn’t dislike Charlie Halleck – nobody did. But it occurred to him and a lot of others his age, including me and a couple of guys from Kansas, that when you look around you keep coming back to Jerry Ford.

Smith: Why? What was it about Ford?

Dole: Just his personality, I think, primarily. He knew everybody. “Hi, Bob,” hi this, and it wasn’t just a fleeting hi ya buddy like some people are. They want to meet the next guy before they met you. So that’s how I remember it. He used to come around and sit down next to you on the floor and “How’s it going?” cause he’d been there a while. “Anything I can do for you?” He may have been looking down the road. Let’s face it, not too many get elected who don’t want to do something better. Part of it may have been that, but I think most of us felt just genuine friendship.

Smith: And he seemed to have a lot of friends on both sides of the aisle.

Dole: He and Carl Albert were great buddies. I don’t know anybody who disliked Jerry Ford. I assume there was somebody back there that didn’t. But again, the Democrats could like all of us because they figured we were always going to be a little group on the right there. But I was trying to think – in those days we had a Chamber of Commerce rating, and ACU conservative union. We didn’t have quite as many people giving us grades.

Smith: And you didn’t have a 24/7 news cycle, and you didn’t have cable TV, and you didn’t have the internet, which has just transformed – and not necessarily for the better – the political process.

Dole: In the old days you put out those paper releases and then made phone calls to the stations back home – radio. If you were lucky, maybe you could get a TV interview, maybe. But now, it’s a 180 degrees.

Smith: It’s been suggested to us that one reason why Ford was seen as a logical replacement for Halleck, was that there was a feeling that Ev Dirksen was maybe a little too close to LBJ. That Dirksen sometimes was – that Johnson knew how to play Dirksen. That he’d go down to the White House and they’d have a couple of bourbons and they’d swap whatever they wanted.

Dole: Yeah, because Charlie Halleck and Dirksen were old drinking buddies, and I think Charlie figured out Dirksen’s the star, so we don’t need to do anything over here, just see what Ev’s doing. But see, we didn’t have any – well, Goodell and Griffin and the so-called Young Turks, they finally tried a Constructive Republican…

Smith: The Constructive Republican Alternative Program.

Dole: And it was CRAP. So that was a great beginning. But at least we had some people who decided that we’ve got to have alternatives. We liked the same Republicans in the same safe district; there is never any big swift or big change – maybe a few seats here or there. And we needed new blood. I think Jerry Ford wasn’t a backslider, I don’t think. He didn’t have an agenda that would put him up front every time. Sure, he wanted to be noticed, but he wasn’t seeking anything. He might have been quietly, but to us newbies he was just a nice guy and we hated to vote against Charlie Halleck. He came out to Kansas for me and I went out to Indiana for him. He liked me.

Smith: How do you campaign for a job like that? Is it one-on-one, face-to-face – the candidate?
Dole: You mean like Ford?

Smith: Yeah, because I did sense from Rumsfeld, at least, that there was sort of this group.

Dole: Yeah, he was in the group, too.

Smith: Yeah.

Dole: He was my next door office neighbor. He kept trying to get me to run for some House leadership post. But anyway, he had guys like Les Arends, who everybody loved. He was the Whip. He was a corn farmer from Illinois and everyday he’d announce the price of corn. “A dollar and three cents a bushel today. Not going to make any money today.” He’d just go on. And he’d stand over to the side, up near the Speaker’s place and lean on the wall and talk to guys as they’d go by. Never criticism, but always something. “I read something nice about you in the paper, doing a good job, somebody told me you did a great thing in the committee today.” He was really smart.

When you’ve got people like Les working for Ford, and Les was the number two guy, and he was a great friend of Charlie’s, for him to come out for Jerry, sent a pretty strong signal, because nobody disliked him. I remember seeing Halleck right afterwards and he was just – you know, thought he’d been hit by a sledgehammer. I think he thought he had the votes. I always felt the three Kansas votes made a difference.

Smith: Well, they did – just numerically, they did.

Dole: I can take some responsibility for a couple of those.

Smith: Did you get anything in return?

Dole: No, but we said among ourselves – well, if we stick together, at least we’ve got some – if we’ve got a problem we’d go to Jerry and he knew. There may be others that did the same thing. We probably did get something in return, I’ve forgotten. He may have, and I think he did come out and speak on Kansas Day. Now, that was a big thing then. We didn’t expect any pork.
Smith: You go on to the Senate in ’68, and establish a reputation as a strong defender of the Nixon administration. And then along comes Watergate. You’re in the Senate, he’s in the House, did you run into to him? Did you see him?

Dole: He was pretty close to Nixon, as you know better than I do. I never talked to him about, that I can remember, about Watergate, or that I was chairman.

Smith: I think the thing out of all of that, that genuinely dismayed him the most, was the language on the tapes.

Dole: Yeah.

Smith: He was genuinely shocked.

Dole: Oh, I was, too. That’s when I really lost my – I could explain everything else away - but the way he was brought up and the family and the Quakers and his mother - God the four letter words came streaming out like his language. Growing up as we did, if you ever used a four letter word, you got the soap in the mouth treatment. We didn’t do it. And here the President of the United States using the words, that a-hole, it really brought him down from a ten, or maybe an eight to a four. There were a lot of people I think, a lot of little old ladies out there and a lot of older people –

Smith: A lot were Nixon supporters.

Dole: They probably swore a little themselves, but to hear the President of the United States, not just a word or two, but shhhhh.

Smith: That raises a big question about Ford. It goes to the pardon; it goes to a whole lot of things.

Dole: In fact, I never heard Ford use a four letter word – except his own – Ford. We used to campaign saying, “These are two four letter words you can live with. Ford and Dole.”

Smith: That’s a good slogan.

Dole: Yeah. He didn’t run around using them. And I always think people who do that are insecure. They don’t know how to get any recognition, and so they use filthy words.
Smith: Ford said later on, and I believed him, that he was shocked that Nixon lied to him. And it raises the question: there is a kind of a Boy Scout – the Eagle Scout – quality in Ford, which is very admirable. But at what point does it sort of shade over into a kind of naiveté? Was he naïve in some ways? He saw the good in people; and he wanted to see the good in people. And he thought he had no enemies, which is, again, very admirable. Is it affordable in a president?

Dole: Well, I don’t have any doubt, I don’t have any proof that Ford had to do some things to survive and let the country survive, too. I mean, the healing of America – was it 80-20 against the pardon? Now it’s 80-20 for the pardon? We lost the election by eleven thousand votes and there’s no doubt about it, I think he was pretty bitter afterwards because he made the right choice, and I assume that he calculated the politics and all that.

Smith: But maybe miscalculated the reaction.

Dole: Maybe. But I always wondered if there was a big trial going on and he was the president, and they were saying the Republican Party did this and the Republican Party this, and it was only one person. Was it Kevin Phillips who wrote the book about the emerging Republican majority in the country, particularly in the South? And boy, after that it was just shhhhh.

Smith: You felt it, obviously, because you were in the middle of a very tough re-election campaign. Do you remember how you first heard about it? I assume no one talked to you beforehand in terms of advice about this.

Dole: Thank goodness. Yeah, which is a finding that Senator Ervin made in the report, that Senator Dole had nothing to do with the Watergate. Which I thought was very nice of him.

Smith: Do you remember how you heard about the pardon? It was a Sunday morning, were you here or out in Kansas?

Dole: I was here and I was leaving the apartment for some reason – to be on a talk show, I don’t think it was that – I heard about it fairly quickly, and then I remember Bryce Harlow saying, “Well, this story has no legs. Two or three days, it’s out of here.” In two or three days, it was just starting to flame up.
Smith: Did it hurt you in Kansas?

Dole: Yeah, because I was party chairman and some of the Democrats – my good buddies – were trying to indicate that I probably had a – what I said to ___________ in my apartment and all that stuff.

Smith: But then the pardon on top of everything.

Dole: Oh yeah, the pardon.

Smith: Did it sort of toss you an anchor.

Dole: You see these signs when you go campaign, Pardon Me. People are pretty creative, just like they are in these Town Hall meetings.

Smith: Did you talk to him at all? He picked you a couple of years later to be on the ticket. So he obviously…did you ever discuss the pardon with him?

Dole: Nope. Oh, well, I think to the extent that something had to be done. I mean, Jerry was a proud guy. He wasn’t going to get up and mealy mouth and fumble around. He was direct and “I did it for the right reason,” even though he might not have. Who knows what was really kicking in his head? He surely had his political calculator turned on. But that’s alright. It’s about politics. People go, “Everything is politics.” I said, “Well, give me a better alternative, then.” There’re some bad apples in politics, in both parties. And I think Ford – he had a little group didn’t he? A little group of friends? John Burns from Wisconsin, and…

Smith: Well, Jack Marsh, who was very close to him. You pull out the race in ’74, you win it narrowly. When did you begin to think about the vice presidency?

Dole: I don’t know who went off on that. I think Noel Koch – remember Noel Koch? He started thinking that would be a great thing and he wrote some speeches and stuff like that.

Smith: Was one factor the decision to have the convention in Kansas City, for example?

Dole: That was a factor. Ford was in trouble with America’s farmers. I’d been on the Ag committee and was pretty established. We had a good reputation with the veterans, so did he, and I wasn’t tainted with any – nobody ever said that I was involved in Watergate. And I think he thought he could trust me. He had watched me in the House and knew pretty much who I was, and who my friends were. You can tell whether you want somebody around you by the people you see them with. And the people I mingled with were the same ones that got him elected.

Smith: And at the same time, as I understand it, at least, you were also seen as someone who was more than acceptable to the Reagan wing of the party. Now tell me about when Nofziger – wasn’t Lynn involved?

Dole: Nelson Rockefeller also gave me a thumbs up. And who was the national committeeman?

Dole: Yeah, he really liked me for some reason. And he made sure that Rocky put in a good word. And then Lynn was supposed to be my agent. I was never sure he did anything.

Smith: To the Reagan camp?

Dole: Yeah.

Smith: And how long had you known Lynn?

Dole: Lynn? Oh, God, seems like forever. But he worked for me in the committee when I was chairman. I remember we were nominated and my first speech was to a Legion group in Seattle. We didn’t have any staff, so they stuck Lynn Nofziger and a couple of other guys I didn’t even know on the plane. This was the Dole campaign. Talk about being disorganized. And Lynn spent most of his time wisecracking. And to get him to be serious sometimes will drive you nuts, because he had a pun or a joke or whatever.

Smith: How do you run for vice president? I mean before the convention? How do you sort of make your interest known?

Dole: The only guy I know that ever ran really was Dan Quayle. Because the more I look back on that, the more I know how he got on the ticket. He would, every policy lunch when Bush would come up and have lunch with us, Bush would come up early and he had a little room in the Capitol, and Quayle would be in there visiting and he was buttering Bush up every week. It didn’t occur to me until pretty late that this guy’s on the campaign trail.

Smith: Because your name was also in ’88 bandied about as a potential. Would you have done it?

Dole: Ah, probably, yeah. All these guys say they don’t want it, probably wasn’t going to get it.

Smith: We heard names - Ruckelshaus, I guess, was in the mix, Howard Baker was clearly considered. There’s still some debate over whether Ann Armstrong’s name was at least on the list.

Dole: Yeah, I think she thought she was going to get it.

Smith: Really?

Dole: Be a woman on the ticket and all that stuff.

Smith: Because they were way behind, and so you needed a Hail Mary.

Dole: Thirty-one points, I think. And then the WIN program – Whip Inflation Now. And all we had were little buttons. How do you whip inflations wearing a button? But again, Ford - you talk about an indefatigable worker, well, you know, the guy never stopped. And he was in great shape and I assume he had a drink or two, I don’t know. But he wasn’t a problem drinker, smoker. I think he prided himself on his physical condition. So fourteen hour days probably didn’t…

Smith: And he loved the rubber chicken circuit. He just loved being out there. And in fact, that was one of the problems in the ’76 campaign in the race against Reagan. There’s a wonderful story that Stu Spencer tells. Because Stu had been brought in before the convention and things weren’t going well.

Dole: Yeah, I know.

Smith: And it was the end of the week. It was Friday, he was frustrated, he was going through a messy divorce on his own back home. So he’s in the Oval Office with the President and Dick Cheney. Just the three of them. And he’s got the unenviable assignment of politely convincing the President that maybe he shouldn’t go out on the road as much because he had these not very good speeches that were coming out of the speech office, and he’d go out there and his numbers would go down. And so basically they were devising the Rose Garden strategy. But the way Stu tells the story, and Cheney confirms it, only Stu Spencer would say this. He tried every euphemism he could think of, and finally lost it and he said, “Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you’re a f’ing lousy campaigner.”

And Ford not only took it, but later on, when Jules Witcover’s book about the campaign came out and it had this story, Stu was furious with Cheney. And he called him up, “How could you…” and so forth and so on. And finally Dick says, “Stu, there was a third person in that room. It was the President who told the story on himself.”

Dole: But that’s where – as you say – the Rose Garden strategy…I used to say, they sent me out in the briar patch and Ford stayed in the Rose Garden. It was pretty effective. He got a lot of press, didn’t have to give speeches. He’s a wonderful man, a big heart, he’d laugh, but his timing was terrible. He couldn’t tell a joke. He used to tell the joke about the golfer, how he hit three things. The eagle, the… and he just didn’t quite have it timed right and when people were supposed to laugh, they thought there was more coming. He just didn’t have Reagan or Kennedy’s timing.

Smith: He wasn’t a television president.

Dole: No. But you get him one on one in a conversation, because he had exceedingly high credibility – and he was good. But to give a set speech, which he read, and I don’t know whether he used a prompter or not, probably some, but he liked to read them, too. And that’s really too bad because he had all these great qualities, but you’re supposed to be a movie star and everything else with it, and be a great speaker – that’s not what we really want in a president. It’s good if you can have all those qualities, but what you want is an honest man or woman with integrity and some values.

Smith: And judgment.
Dole: And he had it. I’ve got that picture in the next room of all the presidents, and I always say, “Here’s the most unappreciated president I ever served with.” There’s ten of them. Because he knew more about appropriations, he knew more about the issues. If Ford were dealing with health care, God, he’d know every little detail, and that thing is complicated. I was on the health committee, and I’m not stupid, but God, is that complicated. It’s not just about this public plan or this or that, it’s 5,000 pieces. But Ford would have known.

Smith: He’s the last president to brief his own budget. To get up in front of a room full of reporters and introduce the federal budget and stay there and answer every single question until they were done. That’s intelligence.

Dole: Yeah. Everybody has their down side, I’m trying to – you know Ford got a little short with me a couple of times in the campaign when I announced we were going to raise support prices on wheat in Minnesota. He called and said, “If it’s alright with you, I’ll announce the good news.” So, “Yes, sir, Mr. President.” I guess I got the script wrong. There was something else, one other time.

Smith: The night of the debate – your debate with Walter Mondale – did he call you afterwards?

Dole: Yeah. He thought I did great. So did Mel Laird. Called me up and said, “God, I didn’t think you had it in you.” And I said, “Well, we’ll see what happens.”

Smith: Speaking of phone calls, do you remember the call at the convention when he called to ask you to be his running mate?

Dole: Oh, yeah. What was it? Five something in the morning – six? We were right down the hall from the Texas governor.

Smith: John Connally.

Dole: Who everybody thought was going to be it. So all the camera people were lined up, ready to get big John coming out of the room, and I’m trying to think of the ABC reporter who called me and tipped me off. You remember his name?

Smith: Was it Hal Bruno?
Dole: No. He’s a…

Smith: I know, I can see him.

Dole: He said, “How would you like to be vice president?” I said, “Well, I’m already out here, I might as well take the job.” We were just kidding each other. And before long the phone rang and it was Ford. He said, “I’d like to talk to you, think you could come over to the Muehlebach quietly,” come down the back door – all that stuff. So we got over there without being seen. Oh, another time he cautioned me, “You know, Bob, we don’t need any Jack Benny in the White House.” In other words, I know you like to have a lot of fun, but let’s don’t have too much.

Smith: Did Elizabeth go with you over to the hotel?

Dole: Yeah, but she sat in the other room. So we had a pretty good heart-to-heart talk. I think he said he trusted me and he thought I could be helpful with certain groups, and we had a tough row to hoe, we were in the ditch. But we knew Carter never was popular – he’s kind of a pious – very nice man. In fact, he came out to Kansas – you were there – to dedicate the Institute. He was kind of a folksy guy but it didn’t seem like it was real.

Smith: In the course of the campaign, did you run into foot dragging on the part of some Reagan folks? Was that an issue? Was that a problem?

Dole: Oh, both feet, yeah. I met with Reagan in Denver at the airport, New Hampshire, and he was willing to meet with me, but I’m not going to make a lot of press. A defeated candidate for president meets with vice president candidate – that’s no big deal.

Smith: What did you talk about?

Dole: Obviously, we talked about the campaign. But I never knew whether he really cared. His interest was in us losing. No doubt in my mind that Nofziger and some of the gang – they didn’t do anything.

Smith: Did he do the bare minimum? Is that fair to say?
Dole: Very. I mean, Reagan, if he’d gone on nationwide TV, you remember the convention – how he took it over at the end – if he’d have showed up for Ford at a big news conference or something. We only lost by eleven thousand votes. That’s the closest race, I think, in a generation or two that everybody’s forgotten.

Smith: One thing I have to ask you about. We’ve talked to Dick Cheney about this; we’ve talked to a number of folks. Right after you were nominated, there was this idea about going to Russell. And all the people around the President said, “We can’t do it. We’re exhausted. We’ve just been through this terrible convention. Don’t ask us.” We’ve been told that you were looking on at one point, watching this sort of back and forth. Can you describe how it originated and what happened?

Dole: Well, they said, “We don’t have time to notify people.” I said, “In Russell, I think we can get a hold of all the bridge clubs and they could probably postpone it a week. We’re not going to New York City, we’re going to Russell, Kansas.”

Smith: Was it your idea?

Dole: I reinforced the President that there wouldn’t be any problem getting people there. And we’re that close to my hometown and it would make news, and it would indicate the President is going to have a vice president he can rely on and all this stuff. And it sends a signal of whatever he wants.

Smith: Was it his idea? Was it Ford’s idea to go to Russell? I mean, where did the idea originate?

Dole: I think it originated with me, but I think Ford was the one who kind of grabbed onto it, and now all the other people were jumping on it. Not that they didn’t want to do it, there wasn’t any hostility. They were just worn out. But primarily they said, “We can’t do it on this short notice.” I said, “You can’t do it in Russell, Kansas?” What did they have - 24 hours? And it turned out well and we got a lot of coverage.

Smith: Now, there was that famous moment there, where the emotions got to you.
Dole: Yeah, that wasn’t easy. When that happens inside of you is when you try to end it. You know you shouldn’t be doing it, but you’re doing it and you can’t control it.

Smith: But I take it, the memories of what people in Russell had done for you, just came to you.

Dole: Too much. Well, you look out in the audience and there’s a guy that I know had done this. And this guy had given me a hundred dollars or this guy had done this. But, again, it was Ford who jumped up and started the applause, and just in that little 30 second or minute applause, I was able to regain my composure and went on. That’s also the day that my mother locked him out of the house.

Smith: You went to your house.

Dole: Went to the house, there was some fried chicken. We never locked the door in a hundred years. She decided, “Well, I’d better lock it today.” And she couldn’t remember where she put the key. We finally found it.

Smith: And he was perfectly comfortable with the whole thing?

Dole: That’s the thing about Ford. He wasn’t some big shot from the city, he was a normal guy. And it was genuine. I’d go in there and look at those pictures on the wall, and it will give you, I think a pretty good judge – I think I’m a pretty good judge of character. But the one thing that Ford had, and I won’t say that others didn’t have it, but he had it – I shouldn’t use the word in spades – but he had it. They ran around vouching for him, like, “That’s right, Senator Dole’s right.”

Smith: Did you think at the end – obviously, you were really surging in the polls.

Dole: Yeah, one more day – God.

Smith: Did you really think you were going to win?

Dole: Well, Ford did, so I did. I think he really did think we were going to win. As I said [it] was Hawaii and Ohio, eleven thousand votes.

Smith: Were you at the White House election night?
Dole: I was in the White House.

Smith: What was the mood?

Dole: Well, initially, it was pretty good. Then the states started coming – it was pretty good until a couple of hours into it. I don’t think Ford – I think he may have checked in before he knew for certain. Hawaii is a long way out there.

Smith: That’s right.

Dole: And Ohio. Somehow Carter – are there a lot of Baptists in southern Ohio?

Smith: Yeah. It’s more Southern than Midwestern.

Dole: Which never even occurred to me. I thought, “Well, Ohio, that’s a Midwest state.” Yeah, it is part of it. But a little part of it down there is…

Smith: What did he tell you afterwards?

Dole: Every time we’d go somewhere, he’d say, “We made a great team.” I was so upset, I think I told you, when I thought Steve wouldn’t shake hands with me. “But don’t let anybody tell you we weren’t a great team.” Every time I’d see him. He was just trying to make me feel good. I said, “We did come pretty close.”

Smith: Well, you did what you were asked to do. You delivered the farm…

Dole: We carried the farm states, including Oregon.

Smith: Well, and Connecticut and Michigan and New Jersey. You look at the electoral map in ’76 – it’s almost an absolute reverse of the parties today.

I can’t end without asking you, because you saw him toward the end. At the Mayo Clinic – I assume that’s the last time you saw him.

Dole: Yeah, that’s right.

Smith: You’d been up there.

Dole: Yeah, I was up there making a speech honoring veterans, and afterwards I went to the hospital. I was just trying to remember what we…
Smith: I think Mike Ford was there.

Dole: Yeah, Mike. He was very nice. Betty was in the hospital, too, and I didn’t get a chance to see her. Again, I’m just trying to remember – he wasn’t in very good shape.

Smith: Were you able to have a conversation?

Dole: That’s what I’m trying to think. I talked, but he never even recognized I was in the room. That’s was kind of dispiriting. He was that bad. He looked good. I said, “Mr. President, how is everything going? Anything I can tell you about what’s happening?” He just sat there, or was in his bed, propped up. So, I don’t know what that was, that last illness. You look alright, but you’re not functioning. Now how long did that last?

Smith: Just at the very end, I think. It was the last few months. And he certainly talked to a number of people in between. It may have been partly, at that point, medications. They were trying to find the right mix of medications. You know what that’s like.

Dole: Yeah, well, of course you’re always like, “Gee, maybe it’s something I said.” Maybe ’76.

Smith: Naw.

Dole: Then on the way to the airport, there’s no way that guy – he’s had it.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Dole: Well, I think his biggest challenge was the Nixon affair and I think he handled it properly. And history, I think, is going to treat him very well. He had the Mayaguez, or whatever it was, had that, but he never really had a chance – a four-year time to really get into it. I always thought he’d be a star on the domestic scene because he knew so much.

Smith: Yeah.

Dole: Nixon knew foreign policy, but Ford knew domestic policy, and Reagan really didn’t know either one. But he’s sort of like Obama, he’s a quick study and was a charismatic person. And then Carter, of course, knew the stuff.
Smith: You were an honorary pallbearer at the funeral in D.C. Were you surprised at the reaction? I know that people in the media were surprised at how much reaction there was.

Dole: I was, too, because Ford never got any credit for anything. It was all Nixon pardon, Nixon. And he wasn’t a darling of the media. So I figured this could be a little embarrassing. Why are they doing it? People are pretty smart. You don’t want to misjudge the American people. They can read between the lines what people say on the evening news. And there was no reason not to like Ford, except for the pardon.

Smith: Which by then had come to be seen as an act of courage.

Dole: By then people thought, “Well, he was probably right.”

Smith: It was fascinating to see the young people. People who weren’t alive and they were seeing him for the first time in all those clips, and they were comparing that to the current situation and he looked pretty good.

Dole: Yeah, none of us are perfect, and he could probably give you a list of things of his imperfections, but they are very far and few between. And he had a nice family and never had any stories about Ford and women or whatever.

Smith: And then, of course, Mrs. Ford went on to have this extraordinary life after the White House.

Dole: Yeah. It was a great life.

Smith: I think that’s it.

Dole: That’s all I know.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. Tell us a little bit about you before you and Gerald Ford crossed paths.

Goodwin: I was working here in Washington. I was discharged from the service and didn’t have a job and didn’t have any money. So I finally got a job at a local television station here - what is now WJLA, it was then WMAL on FM TV.

Smith: Was that the ABC affiliate?

Goodwin: It was ABC, right. I worked there for ten years from 1959 to 1969.

Smith: What’d you do?

Goodwin: I started out in the training program and then I wound up as Director of Business Services before I left. I left because I bought a radio station in Iowa.

Smith: Whereabouts in Iowa?

Goodwin: In the Cedar Falls/Waterloo market which is the northeast part of the state. I was born and raised on a farm in Iowa and so I was familiar with the area.

Smith: I lived in West Branch for six years - the Hoover Library.

Goodwin: My dad started the Hoover Library. He was the first chairman of the Hoover Library.

Smith: And what was his name?

Goodwin: Robert K. Goodwin.

Smith: Of course.

Goodwin: He started with the Hoover, which was the—

Smith: Allen Hoover.
Goodwin: Allen Hoover. So, that was in the Fifties, I think, wasn’t it?

Smith: Yeah.

Goodwin: Something like that. So, in any event, I worked at the television station here and one day before we moved back to Iowa, I saw an article in the paper about somebody who’d done an advance trip for President Nixon and I thought, “That sounds interesting.” I sent a letter to I forget who it was in the Nixon advance office saying if they ever needed help, I’d be happy to volunteer to try to help, not having any idea what was involved. I’d never been in a political event before and didn’t know anything about it, but it just sounded interesting. Never heard a word. So then we moved to Iowa and then I wrote again when we lived in Iowa to somebody in the advance office and I did get a short note back and they said, “Nice to hear from you. If you’re ever in town, come see us.”

Smith: Was this still during the Nixon presidency?

Goodwin: During the Nixon presidency, about 1970, I believe. So, I came to Washington about two weeks later, went to the White House, and couldn’t get in, the person who I was supposed to see had no recollection of who I was. Couldn’t get in and didn’t see anybody. And, about six months after that, I got a call in the middle of the day one time to see if I would be interested in going to St. Louis to do a trip for Julie Eisenhower. So, not having any idea what was involved, I said yes. And, not even knowing whether I was going to get my expenses reimbursed or what was happening, I went there and met the fellow they went out to do the trip for. We did the trip, including, as I recall, a trip to the top of the Arch which was interesting. Julie was the nice daughter. Tricia was the one who ruined the careers of a lot of young people unfortunately. I guess I was fortunate to be assigned to Julie, so then I got called to do another trip for her, maybe a month or two later. And then we got several calls to do trips for President Nixon. And that’s where I met Red Cavaney. Then I did Nixon’s last two foreign trips to the Middle East and the Soviet Union.
Smith: Which was extraordinary. I mean, those were amazing crowds in Egypt.

Goodwin: Nixon, at that time in the spring of 1974, had not reached the point yet where there was significant talk that he was going to be impeached. But things were not going too well. Nixon knew that anytime in his presidency when he’d gone overseas his approval rating was greater when he came back. So, he instructed Kissinger to look into possible foreign trips for him in the spring of 1974. Nixon was more popular in Egypt than he was in the United States and that trip was quickly arranged. Then a trip on top of that to meet with Brezhnev in Moscow, oriented on the Black Sea in Minsk, was arranged.

So, Frank, Red, and I and a couple other people were sent out to do these trips. We got to Cairo for the first trip. We’d been there a day and I was told to go to Alexandria, a port city on the Red Sea, because Kissinger, in making the arrangements for Nixon to go there, had to acquiesce to Sadat’s request that Nixon come to the presidential palace in Alexandria and spend a night, unknown to President Nixon. In any event, Red said, “You go to Alexandria and set this up.” So, I went to Alexandria on the train and it was like going back through the Bible because you’re seeing the oxen going around the water wheels blindfolded and all sorts of scenes like that like you see in the Bible.

I got to Alexandria and I set up the trip. There’s a limited number of beds in the palace, so I sent a cable back and said, “There are only eighteen beds including the one for the president, so you’re going to have to leave much of the party in Cairo,” because Nixon was coming down on a train. So, they sent back the names of the people with one exception. There was one person who showed up who wasn’t supposed to be of notable interest.

Smith: Is there always one?

Goodwin: There’s always one. And so the day that Nixon arrived, there were huge crowds and on one side of the route - seven miles to the presidential palace - was the Red Sea. On the other side were miles of open apartment buildings with balconies impossible for the Secret Service to secure. And, several days before that, the lead agent came to me and said, “We can’t secure this.”
Nixon had agreed to ride in Sadat’s open limousine, almost identical to the one President Kennedy was assassinated in, so they said, “We’re going to request that, through Dick Kaiser, that the President invite Sadat to ride in his limousine,” the bulletproof limousine. So, Dick relayed the story to me that he went in to see the president about it and the president said, “No, I’m going to ride in the open car.” He said, “If they don’t get me over there, they’ll probably get me over here.” Shortly before that time, Nixon had heard the tapes that would incriminate him and this was in early June or late May of 1974, so that he had a fatalistic approach to it. In my view, might have wanted to be shot over there and be a martyr as opposed to what he faced over here potentially.

Smith: Extraordinary man.

Goodwin: So, anyway, the train arrived with the entourage and he got into the open car – I have some pictures of that, I think, still - and there are these huge throngs of people that are wildly supportive of President Nixon. So, they got to the palace and everybody settled in. By the way, Nixon wanted to do a reciprocal state dinner, so the entire state dinner was flown over 24 hours before. All the china, all the silver, the California wine, the steaks in dry ice, and the staff from the White House; they were working in a hundred plus degree weather putting on this lavish dinner. Then after everybody got to the presidential palace, some of the rooms were less than perfect. A couple of the rooms where they had beds, they had sort of a common toilet area which was in the floor, but where the President stayed and where Kissinger stayed were very opulent rooms. Shortly after they arrived, Zeigler came up to me and poked his finger in my face and said, “Where’s the room for Ms. So-and-so?” Her name wasn’t on the list, so I had no room for her. And, he said, “You get her a room, get her a place to stay right now,” and turned around and walked away. Well, there wasn’t anything I could do because she showed up uninvited – well, she was invited by somebody, but wasn’t on the manifest. Well, that person that showed up was Diane Sawyer, she and Ron were friends at that time, so he wanted her to come down and enjoy the evening.
So then we had about four days off and then went to the Soviet Union and I did Minsk where the Putin memorial was. We were in Moscow for a few days and then went down. Anyways, Nixon came back and, during this time after President Ford had become vice president designate - I was still living in Iowa at the time – I was called and asked if I would arrange a few of his trips, which I did. It was a very small traveling party at the time of, I think, about six people. And we flew around. The only airplane they gave him was a twin engine plane. I forget what it was, but it wasn’t too terribly comfortable. But he made a few trips. Then he had his confirmation hearing and after that, they asked me to come down and do trips when he was vice president. Then, the day after President Ford was sworn in, they called me and asked me to come down and work full-time in the advance office. There were just three of us, I think, at the time.

Smith: When you were on the vice presidential plane and in the entourage, I realize there’s layers and layers in the perimeter—

Goodwin: Not at that time, there really weren’t.

Smith: Okay. I don’t know if you’ve read Tom deFrank’s book. He makes a great deal out of a slip of the tongue by Ford who at one point talked about ‘when I’m [President?]’. I mean, he was in a very awkward position. Was anything said?

Goodwin: You mean when he was vice president?

Smith: Yeah, as vice president, anything in earshot that led you to believe that they were planning or anticipating or—

Goodwin: No, and I wasn’t in a position to hear that because I was living in Iowa and when I’d finish my trip here, I’d go back there and be involved in my own business. So, I wasn’t in the vice president’s suite of offices in Washington during that time. I’d do my trips. I’d be on the plane with him.

Smith: But, on the plane with him they must have been walking on eggs.
Goodwin: I suspect that Phil Buchen and some of the others were kind of planning behind the scenes and not talking to the vice president about it. I would think there were some conversations going on, but not including the vice president.

Smith: Was that your first contact with Ford?

Goodwin: Yes.

Smith: What was your impression of him?

Goodwin: I liked him very much. He was very down to earth. I’ve worked for four presidents and quite clearly the tone of the administration is set by the person in the Oval Office. It was very different from the Nixon White House in the sense that everybody was walking on egg shells and afraid virtually to do anything wrong or they would, as far as the advance people were concerned, they’d just never be on another trip. Red and I did the last big event back in the United States that President Nixon did, which was a rally in Phoenix and we filled the basketball arena at the time with, I think, twelve or fifteen thousand people. That was after Nixon returned in June and before he left in August.

But, there were a lot of demonstrators and there were difficult times then and there were a lot of people who were creating mischief as far as that was concerned. So, they asked me to come down here and work full-time for the president. We moved down here in July of ’74 and we moved into the house where we’re sitting right now and, before the moving van got here, I left for Poland to do a trip for the President, so my good wife unpacked everything with our children. And, from then on, it was just steady travel, domestically and internationally. The big trip I did was the President’s trip to China, the Peoples Republic of China, and I was there for about five weeks. That’s where I met George Bush because he was head of the Liaison Office at the time, not ambassador as the media incorrectly characterized him, because we didn’t have formal relations with the Peoples Republic at the time. But Bush was more highly regarded there than other ambassadors and he could get in to see Teng Hsiao-Ping or anybody he wanted to on an hour or two notice, whereas any other ambassadors had to wait a couple of days.

Smith: Tell us something about Gerald Ford that might surprise people.

Goodwin: Well, not surprisingly, he was a very nice individual who went out of his way to thank people. Whenever I was traveling on Air Force One, he would always go up to the cabin and thank the crew for flying him on his way out the front door. Everybody on the staff liked him. I would say he was the most popular president among the full-time staff from one administration to another that there’s been at the White House. And I’d say what would surprise most people the most is that he was much smarter than he was given credit for being.

Smith: Illustrate that.

Goodwin: Well, I heard him on a number of occasions talking about policy. I was just a fly on the wall, but talking about policy matters and saying “We’re not going to do that. We’re going to do this. And this is what we need to say.” And then, just before the election in 1976, Dick Cheney and the President had drawn out a list of changes they wanted made as far as individuals were concerned in personnel. And there were some very solid people slated to come in.

Smith: Really?

Goodwin: Into the White House and a lot of the so-called dead wood that had come with the President from the Capitol were going elsewhere. Some of them were in over their heads, but that’s not understandable because you can’t go from a congressional office to the White House and expect to, you know—

Smith: Did you have contact with Bob Hartmann?

Goodwin: Yes.

Smith: Did you find him to be as polarizing a figure as many people did?
Goodwin: No, I didn’t find him polarizing. Sometimes Bob wasn’t functioning as well in the afternoon as well as he did in the morning. He was a little bit on the gruff side, but he was nice to me, personally. So, I didn’t have any problems with anybody.

Smith: We talked to Don Rumsfeld. He said he urged the President very early to clean house and to do it as ostentatiously as possible. My sense is that he wasn’t just referring to the Nixon people, but some of his own people from the Hill.

Goodwin: Yes, I think that’s correct.

Smith: And, clearly, Ford was reluctant to do that.

Goodwin: But, at the same time, it’s important to recognize that when he came into office, getting his arms around the job of the presidency, that he was almost thrown into the campaign at the same time. Trying to decide whether to run or not.

Smith: Yeah.

Goodwin: Well, we’ll talk about the campaign later, because there were clearly ways the President could have won the election. But, anyway, I think he was probably just a little bit reluctant to change people so quickly and Don probably perceived that these people were not White House level people and he supplemented them with others who were.

Smith: It’s interesting because it says something about him. I’d be interested in your interpretation. In the case of Hartmann, someone who had been enormously loyal, who had produced the most memorable words the President had spoken—

Goodwin: Well, I wouldn’t say—

Smith: Well, at least the inaugural address.

Goodwin: Yeah.
Smith: And yet, someone who was clearly a lightening rod. It got to the point where there were in fact two separate speechwriting operations going on. And he [Ford] was willing to tolerate that. Can you be too nice to be president? Was he capable of ruthlessness?

Goodwin: Well, the President was definitely capable of making the decisions that needed to be made. I wouldn’t call him a ruthless person by any stretch of the imagination, but he was very capable of making the decisions that needed to be made and, by virtue of the fact that they had agreed on some outstanding people to come in if he had been elected in 1976—

Smith: Do you remember any of those names?

Goodwin: I’m not going to mention them, but there were clearly some very qualified people who were coming in and were going to replace a lot of the people that probably needed to be replaced. So, in my view, he would’ve had a very successful four-year term as president because he was comfortable in the office. I was with him a lot, personally, and he never seemed overwhelmed. He seemed fully capable of doing everything that needed to be done and I just never saw him obsessed with the job, but fully capable of handling every aspect of it.

Smith: It’s interesting, because one of the things even critics acknowledge is that over time he put together one of the most impressive Cabinets in recent years. And, if you stop and think about those people, Bill Coleman or Carla Hills, those are heavyweights in their own right. So, he was clearly comfortable with having around him people of great intellectual fire power and sometimes ego.

Goodwin: Yep.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Goodwin: Did I ever see his temper? Uhm, not really. There was one occasion where he was really frustrated, and that was when we were at Vail. The media used to like to go out and get on the ski slopes. There was a station the press would have assigned to them about halfway down the mountain and they would reluctantly trudge up there and they’d get a shot of the President skiing for the picture of the day. So, on this particular day, he was skiing with the US Ski Team. They’d come in the day before and asked me if the President could ski with them the next day.

So we set it up and he was very happy to do that. And, they were coming down Black Diamond and it was an icy area and, sure enough, he slipped and fell within camera view. The next day, that picture was on the front of the New York Times. The subtext was ‘President’s a bumbler’ and so forth. And here he was skiing at Black Diamond with the US Ski Team; fell; probably wasn’t the only person who fell that day, and it winds up on the front page of the Times. And, the other time, they got him in Poland when he landed in a rainstorm and was coming down the steps of the plane and slipped. So, of course, that picture was on the front of the papers. I think he was probably frustrated by the fact that the press was pretty petty in publishing pictures like that which had no bearing on policy or the country in any way.

Smith: I’ve always wondered how he felt. I mean, the whole caricature that was built up. People forget, Saturday Night Live went on the air in 1975. It was a real sea change in a lot of ways about what was seen as humorous, including the White House. The fact that Ron Nessen would go on the show, too. He knew what a great athlete he’d been. He used to say later on, “Playing football was good practice for this because there are 100,000 people in the stands who are critics, and you’re the only one out there who’s actually playing.” But you wonder if it got to him.

Goodwin: I don’t know that it really got to him. I think that he always struck me as being comfortable in the job and felt that he was capable of doing the job.

Smith: And, above all, one senses, comfortable in his own skin.

Goodwin: He was, and I never really heard him criticize people when there was plenty of room for some people to be criticized, people who did not serve him well. But I never heard him really criticize – other than just one person – even when he let some people go from his cabinet for good reason, he never really was critical of them. He just said, “Well, we needed to make a change.”

Smith: I only heard him speak disparagingly about two people and the worst epithet he could come up with was, “He’s a bad man.”

Goodwin: Yeah.

Smith: That was the worst he could do. One was John Dean and one was Gordon Liddy. He really looked for the good in people. Someone described him as Eisenhower without the medals. That kind of middle of the road, middle American, basically optimistic—

Goodwin: I couldn’t equate that because I didn’t know President Eisenhower, but he was certainly very comfortable with who he was and where he was, I thought.

Smith: Did he enjoy the job?

Goodwin: I think he did. I think he was very disappointed when he wasn’t elected when clearly he should’ve been. And, he would’ve been elected - I think that what disappointed him most was the fact that Ronald Reagan would not campaign for him.

Smith: Was that disappointment clear at the time? I heard it afterwards, but was it voiced in a contemporary way?

Goodwin: Yeah, it was because Reagan made seven appearances that fall. Not once did he mention President Ford’s name after the convention in 1976. I was sort of the point man on the convention out there and so I was very involved in that.
Of course, President Ford’s supporters had beaten President Reagan on the one key issue which would’ve forced the President to name his vice presidential running mate before people voted. And there would’ve been a great deal of mischief, possibly, by the Reagan people at the time.

Then, after that, Reagan would never appear for President Ford. I know for a fact that he was urged repeatedly to go to Ohio and Mississippi and very late in the campaign to Hawaii and I think it’s important to understand that President Ford ended up with 240 of 270 electoral votes he needed. They tried to get Reagan numerous times to go to Mississippi and Reagan would never go. The seven appearances Reagan made were on behalf of the Republican Party around the country. Not once during that time did he mention President Ford’s name. If he would’ve gone to Mississippi, where the President lost by, I think, 11,000 votes, that was seven electoral votes. I was in charge of a cross-state motorcade for the President in New Hampshire earlier in the year that was very successful, so they asked me to do one across Ohio to sort of wrap up the campaign about the third or fourth week in October, I think it was. So, I was out there and just had started to organize it when I was called back and told, “The President’s not coming back to Ohio.” The reason was that John Connally had persuaded the campaign people that Ford could win Texas if he went back to Texas. Well, Carter was campaigning up and down the Pedernales River and nobody in the campaign at the White House stood up to John Connally and say, “Listen, Texas is a lost cause, but we still have a chance in Ohio.”

So, they acquiesced to Connally and I was on one trip with the President. In fact, the President went to an Oklahoma game down there and had been to Texas quite a few times. I had, for some reason, drawn all of his trips to Texas, so I was there quite a bit. But nobody could say no to John Connally. So, what happened was, instead of going to Ohio he went to Texas. He lost Texas by 130,000 votes, which was forecast. He lost Ohio by only 11,000 out of four million. That was 26 electoral votes. And he lost Mississippi by only 15,000 votes out of almost 800,000 votes. So, there’s no doubt in my mind that if he’d gone to Ohio and turned down the trip to Texas, he would’ve won Ohio with those 26 electoral votes. And, if Reagan had campaigned for him in Mississippi, he would’ve won Mississippi. No doubt. And, even Hawaii, where he only lost by 7,000 votes, would’ve been enough.

I did President Ford’s last two big rallies. One, the day before the election on Long Island, New York at the Nassau Coliseum, and about a week before that at Fountain Valley, California. Red sent me out there and he said, “Go out there and do a rally.” I said, “Where?” And he said, “Some place in Southern California. Find it.” So, I drove around for a couple of days and had zero staff, so Red said, “Well, I have this friend who runs a gas station. Go talk to him.” So, anyway, to make a long story short, Fountain Valley is maybe an hour from where President Reagan lived at the time. We wound up with a crowd of 35,000 in what essentially started out to be a parking lot. We had John Wayne there and other people and I made repeated phone calls to Ronald Reagan’s office to get him to come down there and they turned me down every single time. Reagan would not appear with President Ford. Flat out would not appear with him after the convention. Not only, as I say this was at Fountain Valley which was only about an hour from where he lived. And, we offered every amenity possible, motorcades and what have you.

But that was sort of an interesting event. We had 35,000 people and John Wayne showed up. John had been imbibing a little bit on the trip down and by the time he got to where we were doing the rally late in the afternoon, John Wayne was having a little trouble standing, so he stayed in his car. Finally, after the President arrived, just before the program was to start where John Wayne was supposed to be the emcee, he pops out of his car like a perfect actor, gets up on stage, does exactly what he’s supposed to do without a hint of there having been a problem.

Smith: Probably not the first time in his career he was called upon to hit his marks.

Goodwin: Yeah. And then we left and the President was going up to Los Angeles to do a media event. Wayne wound up in the President’s limousine. So as we’re heading up to the freeway, somebody called me and said, “We have Mr. Wayne in the president’s limousine. We need to make arrangements to get him to his house.” So, to make a long story short, I got somebody who had a car to follow the motorcade and just before they got to the freeway, I called Kaiser and said, “Pull into that gas station.” So, the motorcade comes in this gas station. The president’s limousine is there with the flags. John Wayne gets out of the president’s limousine. There were a couple people there pumping gas who were just wide-eyed at this. John Wayne gets out. He was a big, major figure at that time. He gets out and stands there and the motorcade takes off and my guy pulls in with his car. There’s John Wayne standing momentarily at this guy’s gas station by himself by the freeway. So, I think, quite clearly, had Ronald Reagan campaigned for President Ford, he would’ve been elected.

Smith: You were at the convention?

Goodwin: I was. I was there for six weeks doing the planning for it.

Smith: How bitter was it?

Goodwin: I’m not sure that I saw any real bitterness because I was in charge of all of the logistical operations. I think some people didn’t take the diaphragms out of some of the oppositions telephones on the floor so that they could hear, but they couldn’t speak or that when they’d speak they couldn’t hear it out the other end. At that time, the three networks had booths that were on the balcony, sort of like a VIP suite would be at a stadium today and I do recall a couple people getting up there with fishing poles and a sheet that said “Bedtime for Bonzo” and as Huntley-Brinkley were doing their evening news show, this sheet would come down behind them.

Smith: Remember you had the dueling entrances by the wives. You had this sense of constant one-upsmanship.

Goodwin: But that happens all the time. I’d been in charge of presidential debates for a number of cycles and always the wives can’t quite figure out who wants to be the first in for a presidential debate and who wants to be the last in. So, there’s always one-upsmanship everywhere. I do recall that it was difficult to get Reagan to come down to the stage afterwards. We had sort of planned that that would happen, so we knew the logistics of getting him there were not difficult, but he literally had to be coaxed down there on the stage.

Smith: We talked to Stan Anderson.

Goodwin: He ran the convention in ’76.
Smith: He recalls being there in their box making the request from the President and, before he could finish his sentence, he heard the words “Don’t do it, Ronnie”.

Goodwin: Yeah.

Smith: Which, again portends the attitude you described in the fall campaign.

Goodwin: Well, further that night when the decision was made as to whom President Ford’s running mate would be, Reagan entered into that decision in the following way. After that day and evening, I’d been out there going on no sleep for quite a long while, so I wound up about one in the morning in the President’s suite. They were discussing the potential vice presidential running mates. I was not part of the discussion. I was just sitting back on the floor against the wall trying to stay awake because I knew the next morning, at some point, I’d have the responsibility to get everything set up for the media announcement. So, about one o’clock or so, I’m so tired, I left and went to bed. But, at that point, Bob Dole was not even in the discussion. He was one of the five people being discussed, but his name had dropped out and they were focusing elsewhere.

Smith: Was Anne Armstrong’s name in the mix? I know her name was on the list of possibilities, but it’s never been clear whether that was a gesture—

Goodwin: No, she was never one of the final people. The final people were Dole, Ruckelshaus, Connally, and there’s one more. I can’t remember who it is right now.

Smith: Was it Howard Baker?

Goodwin: It could’ve been, but I sort of don’t think it was Howard. I think it was somebody else. But I’ve seen all sorts of lists that were out about it. That’s not to say they weren’t on an original list, but Anne Armstrong was not on the final five.

Smith: Yeah.
Goodwin: When I was in the room that night. So, at seven in the morning, I got a call to set up for the announcement at ten o’clock for the vice president arraignment. I said, “Okay, who is it?” They said, “Dole.” I said, “Dole? He wasn’t even in the discussion when I left about 1:30.” What had happened during the night, they had sent a short list over to the Reagan people. The books all said it went to Reagan, but, of course, Reagan was sound asleep. And they said to probably Nofziger and whoever else - the others - sent back and said that the only person on that list that they would not contest on the floor the next day was Dole. Interestingly enough, President Ford was responsible for Dole even being in the Senate at that time.

The story on that is in 1974 Dole was running against a guy by the name of Doctor [Bill] Roy of Kansas. I had a trip out there with President Ford very late in the campaign, maybe just three or four days before the election. It was a driving rainstorm and a crowd had come to see President Ford appear with Bob Dole. It was a driving rainstorm and these people had stood in the rain for about an hour and so before the President arrived and I said, “Mr. President, this is not a good situation.” He said, “That’s alright. These people have been standing here for an hour in the rain. I can be in the rain.” And he went to that event and there were four or five thousand people there – that’s what they told us, because it was raining so hard we could hardly tell - but Dole was there and that appearance by President Ford was widely credited with pulling Dole across the finish line when he won by a very narrow margin in 1974.

Anyway, back to the convention. The story I got the next morning was that Dole was the only one on the list that the Reagan people wouldn’t contest on the floor the next day. President Ford thought it was important not to have a contest on the floor, and rightly so because nobody could foretell what would happen. And, the last thing you wanted was somebody off the wall being the one the President was forced to run with.

Smith: The second debate with the famous Polish gaffe. Were you there?
Goodwin: No, I was in charge of Bush’s debates in the ’88 primary and the general election ’92 and ’96, but I wasn’t there.

Smith: Did you watch it?

Goodwin: M-hmm. [meaning no]

Smith: Did you have the immediate sinking sensation that some people – by no means everyone – had? There’s grown up this mythology that it was such a decisive factor.

Goodwin: No, I don’t feel it was and I’m quite knowledgeable about Presidential debates. I wrote the debate agreement in 1988 that’s still in effect today. I wrote it from scratch and did all the staging for it. I did all the original staging for it and I know all the details. In 1976, there wasn’t even a written agreement. In 1980, there was a two and a half page agreement. The one I wrote for 1988 was 32-pages and it was the first time anything had ever been put on paper. I’d done all the staging for the primary debates and everything, so after that, after President Ford, I was very involved with Presidential debates. But I’ve looked back and have seen that debate a number of times and I don’t think it rose to the level of what the media portrayed it as being. And, in fact, you could see some semblance of truth to that.

Smith: It was just an artless way of saying that Eastern Europe refused to accept Soviet domination. I mean, he could’ve turned that to his advantage.

Goodwin: But, what the campaign should’ve done was what Jim Baker did for George Bush in 1988, after the debate we did in Winston-Salem with Governor Dukakis where Bush had made a statement, I think, on abortion possibly being a crime that he had to correct. So, the next morning at seven o’clock, Jim called the press together over in Arlington before they left on a campaign trip and clarified what the President had meant the night before. So, I think if somebody would’ve done the same thing with President Ford, it would’ve ceased to be the issue it was.

Smith: But there was no Jim Baker as we know it at that point.
Goodwin: That’s right.

Smith: And the President was stubborn.

Goodwin: Yeah. I don’t think the President felt that he had made that big of a mistake. But Jim came on the campaign in August. Jim’s a good friend of mine, somebody who I have great admiration for. We worked together a lot over the years. But Jim was sort of new.

Smith: Sure.

Goodwin: He came in August. After the convention, I was in charge of making logistical arrangements back in Vail for the post convention meeting. And they said, “Well, get a room for this guy Jim Baker from the Commerce Department – he’s coming out here and he’s going to take over the campaign.” I think if Jim had been there from the beginning, the President would’ve won.

Smith: That’s interesting. In between, of course, you had that event you put together, literally overnight, in Russell, Kansas with Dole. I know that was a source of some friction.

Goodwin: I was not involved in that because I was out in Vail, but, yeah, I think Senator Dole didn’t understand what was needed at that point or what the media was after. And, of course, then, also, in all fairness, Senator Dole put in virtually no effort for debate preparation with Mondale. They had somebody from Rockefeller’s staff traveling with Dole and he was sort of a briefer, he had the briefing books, which were not done in the way they are done today, but nonetheless, they were there and Dole wouldn’t pay any attention to them. The only time he ever opened them was in Houston in his hotel suite the night before the debate when the press wanted to come in and see him studying for the debate.

When Dole ran for President, I got a call one day from one of the senior guys in his campaign who wanted to know if I would take over the preparation for his debate stuff. And I said, “Well, is he going to work at it or not?” And the answer was, “Probably not too hard. He’s probably going to sit in his condo down in Florida and get a suntan,” and so forth. So, I said, “In all fairness, I’d rather not be involved then, because I know how it should be done.”

Smith: He’s certainly not a lazy guy.

Goodwin: No, but Dole’s reason was that he debated on the floor of the Senate every day, so he could debate. Well, they’re two entirely different things. Jack Kemp was the same way. Kemp really wouldn’t work at preparation and he got sort of mopped up by Gore in St. Petersburg. And Jack was an awfully nice guy, a bright guy, a very articulate guy who felt he had addressed about every issue there was to address and wasn’t prepared for the format that you find at a debate like that - which is unique. You don’t find it anywhere else.
But, that was Dole’s reason. He felt that he’d debated on the floor of the Senate and that was enough.

Smith: I’ve never asked him, but I’ve often wondered, because he’d had one debate with Doctor Roy at the end of the campaign and it had not been a pleasant experience – so I’m just wondering whether that was a factor in some ways—

Goodwin: I don’t think so. My hunch is that he just felt that he was on the floor of the Senate every day and addressing issues in this direction and that direction.
Then in 1996, I handled the debates for the Commission on Presidential Debates because I’d done them in ’88 and ’92 for Bush and Janet Brown was under the weather, so they said I was the only person that the Clinton people would agree to have come in and run them.

So, I did and the last debate was in a “theater in the round” type of environment we hadn’t done before. It was in San Diego between Dole and Clinton. Each candidate had an hour of technical briefing allowed to them and I’d written that in the original debate agreement back in 1987 and ’88.
And Dole came and spent maybe 20 minutes. Clinton, on the other hand, spent the entire hour, but the only thing Dole requested was that Mrs. Dole be out in the audience in his line of sight where he could see her. And, so, during the entire debate, he sat there and looked at him and she had sort of a frozen smile on her face because she was trying to get him to smile and to be less serious. So, he sort of felt that he needed to be able to see her. The Clinton people sort of chuckled over that.

So, the fact that he really didn’t care where the cameras were, he didn’t care where the tapings were. There was a line that the candidates were not supposed to walk past or to cross forth and, of course, Bill Clinton is a master of that and he sort of takes over the debate in certain ways. So, he just sort of monopolized the debate, not by speaking so much, but in the way that he presents himself. And Dole didn’t do well in that debate, but I think that was lack of preparation as well.

Smith: Did you have much contact with Mrs. Ford?

Goodwin: Not too much, no. Only at Vail when we were there.

Smith: They loved Vail, didn’t they?

Goodwin: They did. They did. And the President immediately relaxed when he got there and he loved to walk to all of his places, the people he knew - just liked to stroll around Vail. And back then, Vail was not nearly what it is today, of course. You could go from point A to point B in five or ten minutes by walking. And he loved to go out and ski every day in the morning and then he’d work on papers in the afternoon and then he’d always go to a reception or dinner at night. One night, we were at the Ford’s house and he called my wife over and he said, “I just wanted you to know how much I appreciate your letting your husband be out with me so much. I just wanted to thank you for letting me have him for the last year.” She thought that it was very nice of him to say that.

Then, back in those days, security wasn’t what it is today. If I’d leave the White House grounds, for example, at lunch and I’d come back to the White House complex and I’d see some nice family looking through the fence and, if the President wasn’t in residence, I could escort them in because of my White House pass in to see the Oval Office. Of course, you couldn’t do anything like that today. That was just sort of the environment that was there at the time.

Smith: Did it change at all because of the two assassination attempts?

Goodwin: Well, I was with him on one of them.

Smith: Were you?

Goodwin: Yeah. And, yes, I think it did. Both occurred in California just weeks apart. The first one, of course, you know the story of Larry Buendorf jamming his hand in the hammer of Squeaky Fromm’s gun and saving the President’s life. The second time was at the St. Francis Hotel in San Francisco when I was with him. He was about ready to leave the hotel. The police had sawhorses on both sides of the street and there was quite a crowd on both sides. About forty-five minutes before the President was to leave, the Secret Service came to me and they said, “We just don’t like the look of the crowd. Would you ask the President not to go work the crowd and shake hands with the crowd but just to wave?” So, I went up to the President’s suite and told him what the request was and he said, “That’s fine.”

So, that probably saved the President’s life because, normally, what he would do would be to walk around the front of the limousine, walk over to the crowd, and shake hands. Had he done so at that time, he would’ve walked right into the bullet, probably. We walked out of the hotel and I guess I was in the news pictures with him because my wife didn’t know anything about it until somebody from the Secret Service called her and said, “Your husband’s safe. He’s on the plane.” But the President and I walked out in front of the hotel and just then you could hear a sort of pop, pop, pop, and I thought, “Gosh that must make the Secret Service nervous when they hear firecrackers going off like that.” Almost instantaneously, of course, they shoved the President in the limousine. And most of what is written is correct except that I jumped in the Control Car and we raced out to the airport in about fifteen minutes in what was normally a forty-five minute drive.
But, we had no radio contact because, at that time, under those conditions the procedure was not to have any radio contact. So, we didn’t know whether the President was dead or alive or what while we were racing out to the airport with the truncated motorcade. The driver of our car had the local radio on and the report on the local radio was that a ‘good-looking man in the Presidential Party had been shot, so, of course, there was some gallows humor and David Kennerly and some others guessing who that was or who that wasn’t. And Kennerly said, “It couldn’t have been a good looking man because I’m in the car right here.” But everybody suspected it was Rumsfeld. Anyway, we got to the airport and the President was immediately rushed onboard. Of course, Mrs. Ford had flown up from Los Angeles had just arrived at the plane.

Smith: Knowing nothing.

Goodwin: Knowing nothing that had gone on. And, then, as we’re on the plane and flying back across the country, in clear air, just like today, somewhere over Iowa, I guess it was, we hit a downdraft and dropped three or four thousand feet like that.

And for many years, those bullet nicks from Sarah Jane Moore’s gun were still visible in front of the St. Francis Hotel and may still be.

Smith: Did you think at the end of the ’76 campaign that you had caught up and were going to win?

Goodwin: Yeah, I sort of thought so, but again, I was out every day and I was working fourteen, sixteen, eighteen hour days. When I finished the Fountain Valley rally, I took the red eye to New York and started doing the last big rally at Nassau Coliseum – we had about four days to do that – so I was so involved in doing things day to day that I didn’t have a lot of time to think about the campaign. But, I could see the crowds and I could see the reaction the President was getting from the crowds and it was very positive.

Smith: Could you see that picking up? I mean, was there a trajectory to the fall campaign?
Goodwin: Yeah, I thought there definitely was and when we did the cross-state motorcade that took twelve hours across New Hampshire, the crowds were everywhere. In fact, we arrived in Petersburg(sic) an hour late in the evening and there was a huge crowd there waiting and had been waiting for an hour in a slight drizzle. But, during the campaign, all I can say is the events where I was, there was a very strong reception for him. And at Nassau Coliseum, I think Joe Margiotta was the county chairman at the time, sensed that as well. Joe ran things pretty well.

Smith: That was a tradition in Nassau.

Goodwin: Yeah. And I said, “Joe, we need to do this the right way.” And, in about three days, the place was packed and very enthusiastic and the President felt good coming back on the plane after that event. It wasn’t until well after midnight on election night until Ohio came in that the President really realized he probably wasn’t going to win because, I think, all along he thought he was going to win Mississippi and win Ohio. Hawaii was a surprise because it was so close. I think probably in retrospect, they probably might’ve gone out there and done a little more because I think he only lost by about 7,000 votes out there. But, you know in Ohio, what’s interesting is, while he lost by only 11,000 votes, Lester Maddox got 15,000 votes. The President lost by 11,000 votes, but there were 98,000 votes for others, including 15,000 for Lester Maddox, and I’m convinced some of those 98,000 could have been brought over to President Ford.

Smith: We’ve been told it took him awhile to bounce back.

Goodwin: I think it did. I don’t know if he ever bounced back.

Smith: Really?

Goodwin: I mean, later, after he left the White House, he was fine, but I think the morning of the Inauguration – and I was sort of responsible for the Inaugural planning to the extent that he was involved in it – he held an informal coffee at the White House for his Cabinet and senior staff and that’s where he gave the Cabinet chairs - to the members of his Cabinet each having a small plaque on the back with their name and date of service on it - and so forth. He was sort of nostalgic at that time, but I think, by then, probably, he’d come to grips with it. But I think he felt that he was going to win.

Smith: He was a very competitive guy.

Goodwin: Yeah.

Smith: We’ve been told a wonderful line - right after the election he’d go around - obviously in a small circle - and said, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Goodwin: Yeah, I don’t think he ever thought he was going to lose the election. But if you have time, I’ll tell you the story about how he met Mao Tse Tung unexpectedly.

Smith: Yeah.

Goodwin: I was in Peking for about a month. The U.S. Liaison Office had about twelve people in it, so initially, every meeting that I would go to, Bush would go with me. We became very good friends. So, while we were there, we knew the President was going to meet with Deng Hsiao-Ping (?) and others, but we had no idea. The Chinese were very secretive about who was going to meet President Ford for his arrival at the airport in Peking. So, we could never get that information from them and I sent many cables back that said, “Information not forthcoming.” And George Bush couldn’t get it either. The Chinese were waiting to decide at what level they wanted to receive President Ford and to what degree of seriousness they wanted to treat his visit.

So, the last several days before the Presidential party arrived, I asked my Chinese counterpart on my own, because nobody asked me to do this, in regards to the meeting if he thought the President was going to see Chairman Mao. We knew that Cho en Lai was sick and had cancer and was in the hospital at that time, but nobody quite knew what Mao’s situation was. We knew that Mao had three residences, but where he was, nobody particularly knew. So, the answer I got back was, “We don’t think that it is possible for him to meet Chairman Mao.” So, I sent a cable back to Cheney or Red or whoever it was and said, “This is the response I have.” And the day before the Presidential party arrived, it was the same answer. “We don’t think this is possible.” The President arrived at noon on a Monday and left at noon on a Friday and Monday came and went and Tuesday, during the day, I asked my counterpart again if he thought that such a meeting might happen and he said, “We don’t think that’s possible.” Well, Kissinger kept saying to Cheney that there was no way that the President was going to meet Mao on this trip and that was the information that Kissinger had been given before the President left Washington.

So, on Wednesday morning, I’m sitting having breakfast on one side of the small dining area in the Guest House where the President was staying and Kissinger was on the other side. Kissinger says, “Come over and sit with me and then you can tell your wife you had breakfast with the Secretary of State.” Kissinger was asking about the rest of the schedule and I said, “But I just have a feeling there might be a meeting with Mao Tse Tung at some point.” And he said, “No, it’s not going to happen.” The next morning, Thursday, Mrs. Ford and Susan had gone to the Great Wall for a trip. The President had no plans in the morning and had a schedule in the afternoon. That night, there was a scheduled farewell banquet, at the Great Hall of the People. About 11:15 a.m., my Chinese counterpart came up to me and said, “Get your President ready. He’s going to go see Chairman Mao.” “But,” he said, “he cannot take anybody with him.” So, I go and immediately tell Cheney and the President and the President says, “Fine.” We lined up the limo and the follow car and, of course, made arrangements for people that normally traveled with the President – cut a few people out – so, I went to my Chinese counterpart and I said, ‘We’re ready.” And he looked out and said, “What are all these cars here for?” I explained to him and he said, “No. I told you only the President can go.” He said, “Mrs. Ford can go and Susan can go and George Bush can go and Kissinger can go. Those are the only people who can go.” And I said, “Well, Susan and Mrs. Ford are at the Great Wall and he said, “No, they’re not. They’re on their way back here and will be back here in a few minutes,” which was interesting because, in all the trips I made to China then and since, I’ve never see a Chinese use a radio, but anyway Mrs. Ford arrived a few minutes later.

Smith: Probably one of the few times in her life when she was on time.

Goodwin: Yeah, right. So, they said, “No Secret Service can go. The President’s doctor can’t go. Your photographer can’t go. Your interpreter can’t go.” Nancy Tang who was the official Chinese interpreter for the President was there. They said, “None of your White House Communications people can go. Nobody can go except the five people.” And they had this Russian Zil lined up for the five of them to ride in. So, I go back in and tell Dick and I said, “These are the terms. Nobody can go” and I ran down the list again. The President was standing there and he said this meeting was too important not to happen. He said, “We’ll do it on their terms.” So, they take off and for forty-five minutes, nobody in the U.S. delegation – nor the Secret Service - knew exactly where the President was. The Chinese knew where he was, of course, and we had the communications car trail the abbreviated motorcade of just a few cars until they were stopped from going into the Forbidden City, which is the residence that Mao was using at that time, that particular day.

Smith: Right in downtown Beijing.

Goodwin: Yeah.

Smith: I mean, the Forbidden City is right off of Tiananmen Square.

Goodwin: Yeah, but it’s a huge area in there. But he had three residences and nobody knew which one he was at. So, then, after about forty-five minutes, Mrs. Ford and Susan were escorted out.

Smith: By all accounts, the Chairman fawned on Susan.

Goodwin: I’m not sure, but he may have. Of course, they sat in these Chinese chairs with the armrests up like this and, at the end of the meeting, George Bush told me that after Susan and Mrs. Ford left Kissinger and Bush stayed with the President. At the end of such meetings, Mao, usually just sat and whoever he was meeting with got up and left. But Mao had his two medical attendants help him up out of his chair and walked to the door with President Ford, which was a show of great respect for him to have done that. So, only after Mrs. Ford and Susan came back did anybody really know where they had been and where the President still was. So, for about forty-five minutes, there was no contact with the President.

Smith: It’s hard to tell in the pictures, obviously, but Mao was coherent?

Goodwin: Yeah. Yeah. He had several diseases at the time, Parkinson’s disease and several others, but according to what George Bush said, he was quite conversant and carrying on a conversation. So, it was sort of an interesting time.

During that trip was when President Ford asked George Bush to come back and be director of the Central Intelligence Agency. The Bushes would’ve much preferred to have stayed there for another year. As a matter of fact, when they first got there, Barbara was telling me when they walked their dog, they would attract hoards of people because people thought their dog was a cat. They’d never seen a dog since the revolution. People had eaten dogs and so a lot of people had grown up having never seen a dog. When I first went there in ’75, just walking on the street, people would come up to us and feel our long coats because they’d never seen anything like that. The Chinese people could only wear the two different colored types of pajamas at the time – light grey or dark grey. Also - you had to be invited to go into the Peoples Republic of China at that time. You couldn’t just fly in. I think Air France had one flight a week there or something like that. Arrangements had to be made well in advance for those of us to go to the PRC. President Ford had to be “officially” invited as well.

Smith: You know, Nelson Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that Don Rumsfeld engineered that whole shift that not only brought Bush back home, but deep-sixed him, politically, in ’76. Because, remember, one of the conditions of him being confirmed at the CIA – a job he didn’t really want in the first place – was that he would explicitly rule himself out of the vice presidency in ’76.

Goodwin: Yeah, but what happened was Bush could not get confirmed by the Senate committee the former Chairman of the Republican Party. The Democrats were using that as sort of a shield to not vote for Bush as Director of Central Intelligence. So, Bush asked me to help him get ready for the hearings and blah-blah-blah, because they lived just near here in Palisades at the time. So, one day, he came in and he said, “They’re just not going to confirm me unless I say that I’m not going to be on the ticket.” And he might’ve been, I’d say, first on Ford’s list at the time. But, anyway, he went in to see the President and the President reluctantly took the action that you suggested and then Bush was confirmed unanimously by the Senate committee.

Then, I remember going to Bush’s house the day after Carter was sworn in and we’re sitting there drinking a beer and Barbara’s packing up their stuff to go back to Texas. And I said, “I hope you’ll run for President some day,” and he said, “I don’t know. You have to have a big ego to do that. I’m going to go back and think about it.” So, then, later that spring, he started calling me to ask if I would meet him when he came to Washington and drive him to his various meetings. It was just Jim Baker and Margaret Tutwiler down in Houston. He’d call me when he’d fly to DC on Eastern Airlines and I’d meet him and drive him around to the different meetings he was going to. He was starting to put things together for his campaign then. But, no, he didn’t want to come back from China. He would’ve preferred to have stayed there certainly.

Smith: Did Ford have a sense of humor?

Goodwin: Yeah, he had a great sense of humor. Oh, my gosh, did he ever. He had a sense of humor and he used it in his speeches. He had a self-deprecating type of humor that pulled people to him. He was always laughing on the plane about something. Probably a good example of the President’s humor was, on one occasion, he was invited to play in the Jackie Gleason Golf Tournament in Inverray in Florida and he played on the first day with Jackie Gleason—
Smith: By all accounts, he was a piece of work.

Goodwin: Yeah. Gleason, Hope, the President, Jack Nicklaus, and a guy from Long Island who had won a lottery to play with them. There were huge crowds everywhere. Gleason and Hope, at that time, had a $10,000 bet where the loser would pay the winner’s charity. They were clowning around that entire time. The President loved it and Nicklaus, through all this, shot the course record. And the President just loved to be in events like that. I did another golf tournament like that with him at Pinehurst when they dedicated the World Golf Hall of Fame when he played with Gene Sarazen among others. Ben Hogan walked around with the President but wouldn’t play. Nicklaus or Palmer did. Sarazen and one other – I forget who it was – they took turns playing with the President. On one occasion the President hit his ball into the rough and he’s about ready to hit his second shot when Hogan says, “Mr. President, I wouldn’t hit that shot. I’d move your ball, because it’s sitting on a twig. You can’t see it.” He said, “I don’t want you to hurt your wrist.” And you couldn’t see the twig with the naked eye, but Hogan knew it was there. Hogan could see it. And, sure enough, it was there. So, the President did what Hogan suggested.

So, anyway, the night that he played in the golf tournament at Inverray in Florida with Gleason and Hope in the tournament. Jack Nicklaus held a reception for the President and the only golfer who showed up for the reception of all these pro golfers competing in the tournament was Nicklaus. Not a single other pro attended. Of course, that wouldn’t be true today, I don’t think. Many of the golfers would show up for somebody like that today.

On the trip to Vladivostok for the meeting with Brezhnev in 1974, no westerners had been in Vladivostok for over 25 years because it was their only warm water port and they had a lot of their electronic trawlers there and they had other stuff going on in that area. And whenever we flew into the Soviet Union, we would stop at some point and pick up a Russian pilot and navigator on the advance trip and usually they would just sit in the compartment behind the cockpit and smoke cigarettes.
On this particular occasion, we picked them up in Japan and when we got over the coast of the Soviet Union, they took over the plane with our pilots moving out of the cockpit. We went down to what I was told later was about 6,000 feet and we would go a ways that way and go a ways this way and we had no idea where we were going to land. Of course, the technology didn’t exist that exists today, so people couldn’t follow us. The only way people knew where we were when we landed was for someone to radio back our coordinates. So, there was a young guy from the CIA who was on the plane who had a stopwatch and every time we’d go this way, he’d time it and then we’d turn that way and he’d time it and so forth. Then, all of a sudden, we landed on this sort of grass runway between these huge mounds which had MIGS in them, we found out later.

But that young CIA agent was Bob Gates. So, only then did we know where we were. We were taken to this, I guess it was supposed to be a vacation area for Soviets, but it was like a sanitarium, they called it. It was a series of buildings and we were there for a couple of weeks. It was difficult to get cables out, but we were able to do that and the meeting was always in flux. Nobody knew quite what was going to be on the agenda. The President stopped in Alaska on the way over and got this huge fur coat, which he subsequently gave to Brezhnev, and a couple of nights before Brezhnev and the President arrived, we had a huge ice storm. The temperature all the time we were there was never above zero. We had this huge ice storm, and as soon as it stopped, the Russians sent out about a hundred soldiers in tattered coats and with some very primitive pick axes and they spent all night long and all the next day chipping away at the frozen ice on the walkways so that when the Presidents arrived, they would have dry walkways. All night long, we could hear these poor guys out there chipping away at the ice.

In any event, the meetings happened and we were in the motorcade going back to the train that was supposed to take us back to where the plane was located. All of a sudden the motorcade just takes off in an unplanned direction. It’s about six or seven in the evening and starting to get dark and somebody in the Control Car calls me on the radio and says, “Where are we headed?” And I said, “I don’t have a clue.” They said, “Well, aren’t we supposed to be going back to the airport?” And I said, “Yeah, but we’re not in charge of this motorcade, so we’re going wherever they take us.” And I said, “I don’t know where that is.” And, truly, we had no idea. Well, what the Soviets wanted to do at that time was to show the President downtown Vladivostok and so they were taking him on a circuitous tour. But nobody had mentioned that to us and it never came up in any conversation and the President was scratching his head wanting to know where we were going as well. But he felt very good about, whatever transpired at his meeting with Brezhnev, he felt was very positive. And he was very pleased with the outcome of the meeting.

Smith: A couple of quick things. In retrospect, were they too slow to awake to the danger that Reagan posed? Did they underestimate either the likelihood of Reagan running or the threat that he would pose when he did run?

Goodwin: Probably because the President had won - what was it - nine primaries in a row before he ran in North Carolina. And I think they were a little surprised that Reagan won in North Carolina. Until that point, I think they thought it was pretty smooth sailing. But, again, the campaign operation had been through two chairman and neither one was very good. One of them had health problems, also, but there was no strong leadership like there was at the top of Nixon’s campaign operation. So it was just sort of a headless campaign until about Labor Day when Jim Baker took over.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Goodwin: Yes, it was at one of the Ford dinners maybe ten years ago, something like that.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Goodwin: I think as a president who brought stability to the country, who brought direction to the country, and I think it’s unfortunate that he wasn’t elected because, had he been, I think the country would’ve certainly been strengthened economically. I think he had a good sense of what our position... was internationally and was moving in a position of strength in that area at that particular time. Of course, if he’d been elected, we probably wouldn’t have had Bill Clinton in office. We probably wouldn’t have had George Bush in office. Who knows what the direction the country would be in today because none of that would’ve happened, probably.

Smith: And, quite possibly, the Reagan presidency would never have occurred.

Goodwin: Yeah, that’s very true. Very true. The transfer of a few thousand votes in Ohio and Mississippi would have really changed the course of the country to a great extent.

Smith: Last thing. Did you ever see him out at Rancho Mirage afterwards?

Goodwin: No. I didn’t ever see him out there, but I saw him a couple of times back here and he was always appreciative of what everybody had done for him. But, I think, of the Presidents I’ve worked for, he was as strong as any of them and knew what he wanted to do, was comfortable doing it, was not caught up in the Presidency in the sense that he was overwhelmed by it. It was a job that he wound up being in a position to do and he did it very well as long as he was there. I think it’s unfortunate that he wasn’t elected because I think people would’ve had a much different view of him in another four years.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this. I guess the obvious place to begin is the beginning – how did your paths first cross?

Hynes: He became the Minority Leader right after the 1964 election, I think, in December at the caucus of the Republicans. I had just come to Washington. Clarence Brown, Sr., who was a ranking member of the House Rules Committee, hired me to replace his counsel who had left the committee. I was Minority counsel, and I was working strictly with committee business for a few years. But, of course, as you know, the House Rules Committee is like the unanimous consent agreements between the Senate leadership about how to organize the body, how to set the debate, rules with respect to amendments and whatnot. The Rules Committee does that in the House of Representatives.

Smith: And who was the chairman of the committee then?

Hynes: Howard W. Smith of Virginia.

Smith: Old line, southern gentleman, segregationist?

Hynes: Yes. When he didn’t like being pressed by the leadership, he would go down to his country place in Broad Run, Virginia and be unavailable until he could work something out with the leadership. But anyway, when the Rules Committee would be on the floor, as they were for all the major debates, offering their resolution which would set the time of time, the hours of debate, how much time each side had, what amendments, if anything, were authorized or not authorized. And really controlled the debate. That resolution was always the first order of business, and the leadership was always down there on both sides. The Speaker was in the chair as the debate started. So Ford began to see me and that was true for the next several years.
It was after the '68 election when Nixon was elected that I first started working with Mr. Ford. The way it happened was interesting because the Voting Rights Act needed to be reauthorized. It was originally a five year pact done in 1964(?). It was time to reauthorize it. And Bill McCulloch of Ohio, the senior Republican on the Judiciary Committee, he and Manny Cellars both thought that they wanted to do just a straight reauthorization of the existing bill with minor changes. The Nixon administration, led by Attorney General John Mitchell, had substantial changes they wanted to make in the act. And therefore, the Minority staff and the ranking Minority member of the Judiciary Committee were working at cross interests to the administration. And that meant that Mr. Ford was going to have to not only open the debate, but he was going to have to lead the debate on the administration’s bill.

Smith: Was it fair to say that the general thrust of the administration changes would be to weaken the bill, given the famous Southern Strategy of the Nixon White House?

Hynes: I would say it this way: more than I would say weakened, I would say that the bill provided for more freedom, if you will, if certain standards were met. They were different standards than the existing law, but it was still requirements. And they weren’t letting any of the states off the hook, but they were changing some of the requirements. It certainly, from a Democratic standpoint, weakened the bill.

Smith: Okay.

Hynes: No doubt about it, but I don’t think it would be fair to say - the administration bill still had some relatively stiff requirements throughout the South. So anyway, what happened was, Mr. Ford was going to have to do the debate and he did not have the floor staff in the sense that parliamentarian, legislative counsel – the kind of staff the Democrats basically had. The Republican staff just didn’t exist, it wasn’t authorized by the Congress. In effect, the Democrats didn’t have any money for us to do it.
So anyway, Ford knowing and having seen me at my work, asked my boss if I could help him, staff him a little bit on that. And I had about two weeks, ten days to learn the Voting Rights Act. And we survived. He did a good job of covering up what I didn’t know and wasn’t able to help him with. At that point he wanted me to spend more and more time.

Smith: Where did he come down? Now there’s this dispute between, in effect, the White House and McCulloch.

Hynes: There wasn’t a dispute. They were on different sides. McCulloch liked the existing law. They weren’t fighting about it. McCulloch said, “This is what I’m going to do.” And the White House didn’t like it, but Bill McCulloch was going to do it.

Smith: Really?

Hynes: And that’s all there was to it.

Smith: And Ford went along with that?

Hynes: Ford was not going to tell somebody who believed that something was right, that he was ordered to do something that he didn’t want to do. That was not Jerry’s way. He would never do that.

Smith: Okay. Did you have a sense of Ford’s own views about Civil Rights and race?

Hynes: Quite frankly, at the time I was so busy trying to catch up with it that all I was trying to do was make sure I didn’t leave him empty-handed, so to speak. I think that he was – I can’t say in my own mind whether I thought he was doing what the administration wanted him to do as leader, or whether it was something he cared for personally. I don’t have any recollection of how I felt about that.

So we worked on that bill. I was down there more and more helping him at times, and then the situation arose that - at this point Howard Smith had retired and Bill Colmer of Pascagoula was the chairman of the Rules Committee. And his chief of staff was Trent Lott, and Trent and I became pretty good friends because the Republicans and Mr. Colmer had a lot of the same views about policy and things like that. So we worked fairly closely together. And he had someone he wanted to hire, but there was no staff space on the Rules Committee or in the office. There was money around, but there was no rule. So he and I cut a deal; we hired on as Minority staff on the Rules Committee with the money that Mr. Colmer had available, we hired a person that Mr. Lott wanted to have on the staff, it was a good friend of his. And it was Jonalyn Collin(?) who did a marvelous job. She was a great help to me. She basically handled a lot of the work of the Rules Committee on a day to day basis, which freed me up to spend more time on the floor with Mr. Ford.

So then a few years later when Mr. Nixon got himself in the Watergate problem and Mr. Ford was nominated, I was just one of the people he wanted to have on his staff - temporary staff, I guess you’d call it – to prepare him for the hearings. Because, as you know, the Constitution requires if the vice president is disabled or unable to do the work he was supposed to be doing, and Mr. Agnew had resigned because of the problems he had from his days as governor of Maryland, it was just easy for me to get John Linn working up on doing the Rules Committee. I went and worked with Mr. Ford on the confirmation hearings, along with Benton Becker, former congressman Bill Kramer, and Dick Haber. We were the counsel. And the requirement of the Constitution being that you had to have a two-thirds vote in both Houses meant that there were going to be two very serious hearings, and in both Houses you had a situation where the Democrats were the majority. So you could expect for the hearings to be tough and maybe some problems on the floor.

Smith: What was it about Elizabeth Holtzman? Did she stand out?

Hynes: Yes. I think I know the issue you mean, and it’s a good story because it was a situation where the hearings in the House, as you might expect, were more confrontational than they were in the Senate, just by the nature of the bodies.
And some of the Democrats in the House wanted to kind of rough up Mr. Ford a bit, I would say.

Smith: Well, Bella Abzug wanted more than that. She thought there was a path through which she sees we could get the presidency.

Hynes: Carl Albert was the Speaker of the House, at the time that Agnew resigned. If Nixon had had a heart attack, he would have become president.

Smith: Right.

Hynes: And in no uncertain terms, he made sure to his Democratic colleagues in the Judiciary Committee – he was not going to be seen as a usurper of the presidency. He did not want to do that. He was a man of the House, he was a man who really cared a great deal about the system and wasn’t going to have any shenanigans going on, so to speak. And he spoke to them rather firmly, I am told. I was obviously not there – but I’m told he was pretty firm about it. But nonetheless, the hearings were somewhat difficult and Ms. Holtzman was certainly one of the more difficult individuals.

One of the issues that came up that she raised was how could Mr. Ford, on his congressman’s salary, afford to own a ski chalet, as she called it, in Vail, Colorado. And we knew this might come up. One of my jobs was to work with the staff, and I went through all the records of who gave him money in the way of campaign contributions. And what was his voting record – was there any indication to show connections between money coming in for the campaign, and him doing something. And we were very, very careful to make sure that we knew everything; and if we had any questions we’d sit down with the Congressman with a list of questions which he had to answer for. So we knew what the answers were and what he was going to say.

Well, he had the perfect answer for that question about the ski chalet when Ms. Holtzman asked it. And he said to her, he said, “Well, Ms. Holtzman, I have one son in college and I have two kids in high school, one about to go into high school, and they’ve all worked. All the summers they’ve always had jobs and worked and made money and have their own bank accounts. And we took a vacation out to Vail and had a wonderful time. We just loved it. And the kids loved it and they loved to ski, and the family had a conference and we made a deal. And the family – the kids emptied their bank accounts and made the down payment, and Betty and I would pay the mortgage.” It stopped the questioning immediately. That’s exactly the way they did it.

And then, of course, Mr. Ford became vice president and I did not go to the White House. At about the time Agnew resigned, or maybe a month earlier, Mr. Ford had said privately to his own key staff, that he was not going to run again. He was going to retire. And NBC came looking for me, and I had just joined the NBC staff literally a week or two when Mr. Agnew resigned. Mr. Ford was named in another week or two, and I was asked to join the staff temporarily, and NBC said please, go do it. So I went back to NBC where I had a nice career for many years.

I didn’t have a great desire to go to the White House. I don’t know why. I think I was so new at NBC that I was just getting my feet wet and it was interesting work. A network was a very interesting place to work in those days because, as you know, there were only three real sources of national news; it was NBC, CBS, and ABC at night – John Chancellor, Walter Cronkite, Harry Reasoner. People like that who were really giants of the news business, and were true wonderfully qualified journalists. They had reporters all over the world, in the major cities. They had people on Capitol Hill. And it was the place America stopped between six o’clock and seven o’clock or so to catch whoever was their favorite network and their favorite anchorman. And I really enjoyed it. So I went back with ABC.(?)

Smith: Let me back up and ask you, if you could sort of paint in the background of Congress, which was a very different institution in those days. What was it about Jerry Ford that made him a successful leader on Capitol Hill? What were the qualities that he brought to the place?

Hynes: Well, first of all, he had a boiling point that was very hard to get to.
Smith: Really? Because we’ve heard about his temper.

Hynes: He had one. But it was hard to get him there. So he was a kind of a leader who listened a lot more than he talked. The example of Bill McCulloch on the Voting Rights Bill is a good example. He could have said to McCulloch, “You are the ranking member, you have got to go and support the Nixon bill and you have no choice in the matter. If you want to keep your job as ranking member, you’ve got to do it.” He didn’t do that. He looked for another way to get the job done, to support the Nixon bill.

Smith: Is it safe to say he was unlike LBJ in that regard?

Hynes: Definitely. Hugely different. He was the polar opposite. But that didn’t mean that he wasn’t a strong leader, because he was. He was man who led more by persuasion and an arm around your shoulder and say, “I know it’s tough, but we’ve got to do this.” And he did a lot more of that than he did yelling at people and pushing them around. He was likeable. He was a former football player, and an all-American. He was a bright guy, he was in the middle third of his class in Yale at law school, at the same time he was an assistant football coach, and he kept his grades up and did very well. He was a smart man, he was a good man, and he liked to tell a story, he liked a good joke. He liked to sit and have a drink with his friends. He liked to be around people and they liked to be around him. And that, I think, is as much as anything else, why he was a good leader.

Smith: And one senses that he was as effective, maybe as popular, on the other side of the aisle as his own.

Hynes: Oh Tip O’Neill and he were famously friends. And there are some wonderful stories about that.

Smith: Can you think of one?

Hynes: I’ll tell you one because it’s typical of both of them. They both loved to play golf, as you know. One day they were out playing golf together on a holiday or something, and they finished their golf game, they had a drink and they were both walking out to the parking lot where their cars were. As you know, the Speaker had a car and the Minority Leader had a car, and they both had a driver and he was basically a security man, just to make sure that the leadership of the Congress had at least some modicum of protection. These were before the days when anything had ever happened. Nothing had ever happened on the Hill. But they were walking out arm in arm, and Jerry said, “Well, Tip, I’m going to go home and grill out some steaks tonight with Betty and the kids and relax a little bit. What are you going to do?” He said, “Jerry, my friend, I’m going to go back to my office and figure out a way to blank you tomorrow in the forum.” And they both laughed, got in their cars, and that’s how they operated. They were on different sides of the fence, and they were both true to their responsibilities on their team with their members and pushing what they could, but Jerry was always able to get something out of Tip that Tip could give. There’s always something you can give on either side. And Jerry found ways to get as much as you could get from the leadership on the Democratic side because he had a relationship with them that was a very trusting and personal relationship.

Smith: The older I get the more I come to the conclusion that as important as ideology is, nothing is more important in politics than generational factors. And each generation looks back at the previous one. Clearly the Gingrich generation thought Bob Michael was too accommodating – and I’m sure that generation looked back and thought, “why are we just taking the crumbs from the table?” But the fact is, particularly in the ‘60s, this was a profoundly Democratic country, Goldwater had just suffered a historic defeat, Ford was only there out of a certain desperation…

Hynes: There were like 140 Republicans in the House, out of 435. Now, with numbers like that, you are not going to win a whole lot of major victories. You are just not. And even after the Nixon victory in ’68, the Republicans, I think, had a big victory in ’66 – I think about 45-50 members came in. So they were back up to a pretty good number. But still, they were less than 200 members out of 435, and although they had the White House, they didn’t have the Congress.

Smith: Tell me about the people around Ford. There was this popular notion, particularly when he got to the vice presidency, even in the White House, that there was this sort of “Grand Rapids set,” said with a certain degree of condescension, as if these people weren’t quite up to the task. Did you have a sense of the people around him?

Hynes: Not his personal staff, I knew them.

Smith: Did you know Bob Hartmann?

Hynes: Very well.

Smith: Tell us about Hartmann.

Hynes: Bob and I spent a lot of time together.

Smith: Hartmann is very important, and in some ways a polarizing figure.

Hynes: If there was such a thing as Mr. Ford’s enforcer, so to speak, about the way he wanted to get things done, the messages he wanted to get spread out, Bob was that person. And I knew Bob reasonably well, we spent a good bit of time together. We spent more time together as I worked more with Ford, obviously. And I always found him to be very smart, good judgment, got hot – he could get very angry at people – and then the next day he’d be fine with you. It was over. But he tried to make sure that Jerry was protected. He knew everything that Jerry had to know and made sure that Jerry knew it right away.

Smith: One senses that sometimes he protected him from himself. The most famous instance, of course, is when Haig is playing games about a pardon.

Hynes: Those were days when I wasn’t in the White House.
Smith: That’s a historic example. Again, I don’t mean to sound condescending – but the notion of ‘good ol Jerry’ suggests that he saw the good in everyone, which is an admirable trait, but maybe a problematic one in this town. Did Hartmann see his role as filling some of that gap?

Hynes: Well, first I’ll say this: Jerry was ‘good ol Jerry,’ but he wasn’t push over ‘good ol Jerry.’ He wasn’t a pushover at all. He had very strong views about things that he cared about, and he cared about a lot of things. When you become president you’ve got to care an awful lot about a whole lot of things that come to your desk. And I don’t have the feeling at all that Jerry got pushed around very much. And Hartmann certainly wouldn’t have let him get pushed around. I know that he and Mr. Rumsfeld never got along, and the two of them were always giving each other problems. And Hartmann took a lot of crap, but he gave some, too. His view was, “I’m making sure that Jerry doesn’t get hornswoggled. Nobody fools him, nobody tells him stories. He gets the straight scoop, he knows what’s going on. I want to make sure he is as prepared to do his job as he ought to be.” And Hartmann did a hell of a good job of doing it. Every president needs somebody like Bob Hartmann. You need somebody who walks in the room and when he says something to you, you know that that’s the story.

Smith: And presumably, equally important, someone who will say if you are full of shit.

Hynes: Yeah, absolutely. And he was very tough that way.

Smith: Before Haig died, we had a session with him which was one of the more surreal conversations I’ve ever had, and the mention of Hartmann’s name – it was like those two people were put on the planet to alienate each other. And it was very clear that after all these years, Haig entertained intense feelings, and no doubt Hartmann did, as well.

Hynes: I’m sure that’s the case.

Smith: The motives of each, and ‘good ol Jerry.’
Hynes: I’m sure they both felt that way because I saw it just in my social contacts with Bob during the White House years and other years, and afterwards.

Smith: Was he unhappy?

Hynes: Hartmann?

Smith: I say that because he’d been chief of staff. There were those who believed that was a role he aspired to in the White House. Little things – where the office was, and the fact that there was an alternate speechwriting operation. He experienced some setbacks.

Hynes: He didn’t have as much authority as he probably would have liked, although I don’t think, in all fairness, I don’t think Bob would have been the right person to be chief of staff. His title was counselor to the president, and quite frankly, that is probably where he was best suited to be because of his talents, which were huge. He could see a problem coming a long way off. He could see opportunities coming a long way off. He could let Jerry know ahead of time, “This is coming down the track. You’re going to have to see this coming down the track early, because if you don’t, it may run us over. He was very good at things like that, very good. And of course, he wrote like a genius politically. I don’t know that anybody has ever written any better stuff than he has. Usually on deadline, usually short time and usually late at night. He wrote at night. I don’t know how he did it, but he wrote at night and he wrote beautiful stuff.

Smith: Did you know Phil Buchen at all?

Hynes: Yes. I liked him a lot. Very nice guy. Is Phil still alive?

Smith: No.

Hynes: I didn’t think so. He was a lovely man. I first met him during the confirmation hearings because Jerry asked him to come down and sort of be a legal senior advisor to him, working a little bit with Bill Kramer’s group, not my group.
But really giving him top of the mountain, looking out pictures. He was pretty good at it and a lovely man.

Smith: You didn’t sense someone in over his head?

Hynes: I think over his head is the wrong phrase – he had to learn a lot of new things fast. There’s a big difference. I don’t think he was in over his head. He was a very bright guy. And he had Ford’s confidence. And he learned pretty quickly. But the problem of not being in Washington and coming into Washington and suddenly you are in a situation where you are talking about the White House. You are talking about the people who are in the White House who are all strong-minded, big egos, know they can do that job, and by God are going to do it, and nobody is going to stop them type.

Smith: Well, and stop and think, we had all these Nixon holdovers who, to varying degrees, were probably harboring some resentments.

Hynes: Absolutely. And the resentment shouldn’t have been to the Ford people and Ford coming in. After all, that was the Constitution. They had to come in. They really should have been more aggravated at some of themselves for letting things go where they went. But people never want to look in the mirror and say, “I really blew this one.” They want to point to the other guy who is trying to clean up the mess.

Smith: Tell us, in the confirmation hearings, what was the story about Mr. Winter-Berger?

Hynes: Robert Winter-Berger.

Smith: Who was Robert Winter-Berger? He seemed to kind of emerged from nowhere.

Hynes: He wrote a book.

Smith: He did.
Hynes: I cannot remember any more than that. But somehow or other…

Smith: He claimed to have had some influence over Congressman Ford. And I remember in one of our interviews, one of our early interviews with one of the women who was in the office remembered him being, in effect, thrown out of the office.

Hynes: I wouldn’t be surprised. I do remember that name and I do remember that he had written a book and there was a minor dustup during the confirmation hearings, but I can’t recall anything about it. I had nothing to do with it. Don’t know anything about it.

Smith: It was the most exhaustive FBI investigation ever. Did it make Ford uncomfortable?

Hynes: No.

Smith: I’ll tell you the reason why I ask. He said that someone in the course of this and they asked him, going back to a fifth or sixth grade, had found a player on an opposing football team, and they asked him about piling on or something.

Hynes: It was thorough. But I don’t think I ever saw Jerry concerned about it. I know I didn’t. He was about as clean a whistle as you could have in a man who had spent his life in the political arena. He was exactly what you saw – a guy who had a good sense of humor. He was a serious person. He was a friendly person. He would throw his arms around you, you’d walk down the hall together. He was just a typical – at least in those days – Midwesterner. I think that’s one of the reasons why he found that he could work with me because I came from the same basic background – that Midwestern background which is kind of open and straightforward, and you look for the good in people, and doesn’t have a lot of machinations going on in his head every thirty seconds.

Smith: It’s fair to say he was always a real fiscal conservative.

Hynes: Yes. Sure.
Smith: That’s part of that package. And I wonder if part of that in his case, like his generation, was intensified by his experience of the Depression. Going to the University of Michigan, he worked, even sold his blood.

Hynes: Exactly.

Smith: Scraped by.

Hynes: That was a whole generation – the whole generation was like that.

Smith: In the investigation, either publicly or behind the scenes, did the fact that Mrs. Ford had been to see a psychiatrist, enter into any of the discussions?

Hynes: In the preparation for the hearings, my team had absolutely nothing to do with that. Nothing whatsoever, as far as I can recall. I don’t believe it ever came up, either.

Smith: Good.

Hynes: Now there’s a place where it may well be that Phil Buchen, who was a personal friend of longstanding, had to know about it, might have advised on how we would handle it if it did come up or something. But it was not part of the work that we were doing on the political activity level, if you will.

Smith: Before you got into this, in terms of organizing this, saying, “Here are the things we’ve got to be particularly mindful of.” Were there areas – obviously finances and the like.

Hynes: Exactly. We had file after file. We knew every penny, I think, that ever came in from the time he was a leader on. That’s what we were really looking at.

Smith: And there weren’t a lot.

Hynes: No, there weren’t any problems.

Smith: There wasn’t a lot of money in the Ford household.
Hynes: No, there wasn’t. For example, Steelcase, which is headquartered in Grand Rapids, and makes an awful lot of office furniture. And a lot of it was bought by the federal government. And the executives of Steelcase gave some money to their local congressman, not much, and when he became Minority Leader, he got some more money, and he got some money for his pac – the kind he would give to other members who needed money, or candidates when he spoke for them. But we found no connections. There was nothing that said here came some money, and this is what happened on the floor of the House – how Jerry did something. We couldn’t find anything like that. And the solution to the Vail ski lodge was so easily provable – we had the closing out of the kids’ accounts down to zero, and the mortgage payments by the folks. It was a clean, cognitive, easy thing, with such a good answer. The biggest problem we had in the confirmation hearings was that the Democrats were just looking around to find ways to undermine the impression that people had of Jerry Ford. And it just didn’t work. It didn’t work.

The House hearings were much tougher than the Senate hearings. Bob Griffin, I think, was a major player over in the Senate on the committee that handled it, and he and the Democrats were not about – they did not want to rough Ford up – they just wanted to have a good record of how he did this, and how he did that, and let him ______ enough about what he did and who he was to give the public a view of him and get out of the way because I think everybody knew that Watergate was a huge crisis that Mr. Nixon well may not get past.

Smith: In the discussions, either with him during this period, or equally important, with the rest of your team - was anything said to indicate an awareness at least, that you might, in fact, be preparing the next president?

Hynes: I think all of us felt that that was a definite possibility. We didn’t talk about it. And I don’t think any of us ever sat down and said the following: We ought not to talk about it because then people would think we’re talking about it. It was just something we just didn’t go near. But we all were pretty well convinced that this could happen.

Smith:  It did put him in a terribly awkward position.

Hynes:  Yes. And we just didn’t go there. Our job was to get through the hearings, and make sure that any questions were answered in a full and honest way, and just stay away from that kind of stuff.

Smith:  Couple of things and I’ll let you go. Again, the background, the culture, the times, for people who weren’t there, it strikes me how different some things were. For example, that people drank a hell of a lot more forty years ago than they do now. Maybe they should drink more today if it would foster some work across the aisles. It was bipartisan; in some ways it was almost part of that.

Hynes:  Well, the members probably did a little bit more. Now, remember – I was on the Hill for about seven years – and for the first half of it, let’s say ’65, ’66, ’67, I wasn’t working particularly closely with Mr. Ford. You know how the tables are – there’s a table on one side of the aisle and there’s a table on the other side of the aisle – and over here is where the Rules Committee member who is going to handle this legislation stands up and talks. The other side is Jerry Ford’s table – the leadership’s table. I was sitting over here. So he knew me. But it wasn’t until we got into that Voting Rights thing that I really started working with Mr. Ford. But I must tell you that Bob Hartmann often would call people into his office for strategy discussions – how are we going to do this, how are we going to do that? And he’d crack a bottle open and we’d all have a drink.

I was not one who saw too many members drinking because I wasn’t invited.

Smith:  You weren’t over at the Board of Education with Sam Rayburn. Another aspect is one senses that it was a much more civil, certainly a much more bipartisan environment.
Even when the Democrats were rubbing our noses in it, they let us breathe, let’s say. They didn’t keep our head down under water too long. It was difficult, you were losing and you were losing big in the middle ’60s, after ’64. You were losing and losing big for a while. But the people were different. The idea that Tip O’Neill and Jerry Ford were such good friends is an example. And there were huge relationships across the aisle. John Dingle, who was not yet chairman, but was a driving force on the Commerce Committee, and Jim Broyhill, the senior Republican, worked very well together. A lot of members worked well across the aisle together. It was not unusual in those days, during committee markup sessions, to see members walking back and forth from each side of the aisle from committees, talking with each other about things they could work out together. You almost don’t ever see that today. Because if you see it today, the Republicans wonder why a guy is walking over to the Democrats’ aisle and the Democrats wonder why their Democrat is talking to the Republican. So people wonder what you are doing. They no longer think it might be innocent, they think what skullduggery is going on.

Smith: Then it’s on the Internet and you’re off to the races.

Hynes: It’s a problem constantly.

Smith: There are famous stories about Ford and Hale Boggs who would debate issues at the National Press Club. They would drive down together, decide on the way what they were going to debate that day, they would have their debate that day, and they’d have a drink and lunch and go back to the Hill.

Hynes: Well, those kinds of relationships made it much more possible to solve problems. One of the reasons it’s so hard to solve some of these problems today, and granted, they are huge problems – you might say that of a magnitude larger than maybe we had in the ’70s – but the fact of the matter is, the people in the ’70s knew each other a hell of a lot better than members know each other today. Members don’t know many people across the aisle except maybe on their committees and then only from a distance. There aren’t too many relationships that really go personally, where you go to each others houses and your kids know their kids.

Smith: We’ve been told one of the huge differences is, in those days people brought their families. And when you’ve socialized with people, and you’ve played softball with people, and you’ve gone to kid’s plays, it’s tough to demonize the other side.

Hynes: And remember, the systems were different. I’m not exactly sure what the rules were back in the, let’s say, late ‘60s, early ‘70s. But I’m pretty sure I’m right when I say this, that was before you had as much money as you do now to go back and forth. People now go back and forth all the time. And it’s good to go back and see the constituents, but when you are here in town you have a chance to get to know people. You have a chance to sit down and get to be in their house and the kids go to the same school so you see them at a PTA meeting or something. And you realize, no horns, good people. And that helps an awful lot to be able to cut deals and work out solutions that don’t cripple the majorities’ right to do what they want, but it gives the minority at least something to work with. And someday you’re going to be in the minority, possibly, although it’s fair to say in those days the Democrats thought it was going to be forever.

Smith: Was there arrogance in the majority?

Hynes: Well, some people were arrogant because there are always some people who were arrogant. But a lot of them weren’t. I mean, a lot of them worked very well with the other side, and they did it for the good of the country.

Whichever party is in the minority, sometimes they have good ideas; sometimes they are better than the bill that the White House sends up. And that’s important. One of the problems with the health care bill we’ve just passed, not is just its size, and the fact that it was so hard – they were putting it together at the last minute in a lot of respects – but that the Republicans had no input at all. Now, all that means is, we’re going to find more glitches in that legislation than we might otherwise find, because one party just decided this is going to be it, and we don’t need the other guys. And that’s not the best way to legislate, no matter who is in the majority.

Smith: Did you run in to him from time to time in later years? Did you have any contacts with President Ford?

Hynes: Yeah, I did. I was assistant parliamentarian to three conventions. For ’68 and ’72, both in Miami, and in both of those Ford was the chairman. And in ’76, when he was the candidate and Reagan and he were fighting.

Smith: One senses the ’76 convention was intensely fought.

Hynes: That was intensely fought. Both of them came to the convention with about 90% of the votes they needed. Ford had a couple of hundred more. There were less than three or four hundred votes that weren’t determined and that was a real, real tough convention. There was a good story about that convention that tells you a lot about Jerry Ford. The fight in 1976 was over the foreign policy plank; it was very bitterly debated. Ford was too much a détente – he wasn’t firm enough with the Russians, Vladivostok and Helsinki and whatnot. And Reagan really pushed that hard. He didn’t come in until late in the primaries, and he used that foreign policy plank to wedge it in.

Smith: The Panama Canal Treaty.

Hynes: The Panama Canal won a lot of the votes in the Southern states, and came into the convention pretty strong. The foreign policy plank was going to be the big fight of the convention on the night before the nominations. And I got a call from one of Ford’s convention staffers, and the Rules of the House, in a modified version, are the rules of the Republican convention, and I think of the Democratic convention, as well. Because, unlike the Senate Rules, which are more a unanimous consent efforts, in the House, because the numbers are so large, 435, you’ve got to have some rules that will advance the effort and the minority can’t stop it, if the majority is firm to do it. So the rules of the convention are that way, too, because you’ve got three or four days and you’ve got to get the job done. You’ve got to nominate your people, and you’ve got to get out of there.

So the morning of the third day, the convention was going to meet that night on the platform. I got a call from the Ford staff saying on the forum, when Reagan’s team offers their amendment and we debate it, we want to be able to close debate on the amendment. And I said, “Well, the Rules of the House are basically the rules of the convention, and we understand that. And then you understand that the right of the offer of the amendment to close debate is a House procedure. That is, the ________ is always on the floor of the House.” And they said, “Well, we understand that, but we want to close debate.” And I said, “Well, I can’t tell you we’re going to do that. I’ll have to talk to somebody.” He said, “You go ahead, but we want to do it. I’m telling you, we want to do it.” He never said, “Mr. Ford wants this.” He said, “We want to do it.”

Smith: For the uninitiated, what were the dynamics here? What was the advantage being sought?

Hynes: Well, the advantage being sought was maybe, for all we know, maybe Reagan was going to come down and close debate. On the floor, possibly, with a ringing speech. That’s maybe what they were planning, I don’t know. But they wanted to be able to pound the table and say, “We’re going to do the right thing for American foreign policy.” They wanted to have the last big speech. And that was the goal.

John Rhodes, who was Jerry’s successor as Minority Leader – the Leader of the House has always been the convention chair for the Republicans. They want somebody who can manage a body. And I called John and I said this is what’s happened. So and so has said to me that they want to close debate, he sounds very insistent, I told him what the rules were, he doesn’t care, he wants to close debate and he wants to know. And John said to me, “That’s a violation of the rules, isn’t it?” And I said, “Yeah.” He said, “Well, does that close the matter?” And I said, “Not to him.” He said, “Do you think Jerry knows anything about this?” I said, “I’d be amazed.” He said, “I would, too. I’ll get back to you in a few minutes.”

So I don’t know who he talked to, I don’t know if he talked to Ford or not. He may have just counted to a hundred and called me back. And we both agreed we weren’t going to do it, and I was to call the guy back. I learned later that they did talk, just briefly, and Jerry said, “I know nothing about this, nothing at all. And I’m against it.” So, anyway, I called back the guy and I said, “We’re not going to do.” And they got mad at me, but I didn’t care. What could they do, yell at me? I said basically, “We’re not going to change, it’s a violation of the rules, and I don’t think you want to take this any farther because it’s a violation of the rules.” Nothing happened.

I guess the point of the story is, Jerry Ford had presided over two conventions, he knew what the Rules of the House were, he dealt with them every day, and he sure as hell wasn’t going to take advantage of being the President of the United States at that point. Just break the rules of the convention to get a possible advantage, or to deny them an opportunity – he wasn’t going to break the rules.

Smith: Well, remember that the ultimate irony was, they, in effect, rolled over on that rather than give the Reagan people this intensely emotional, galvanizing issue. They turned the other cheek.

Hynes: They did.

Smith: A wonderful story Tom Korologos told us – Kissinger threatened to resign…

Hynes: Tom is right downstairs – you know he’s downstairs underneath the podium, you know, running everything.

Smith: So Kissinger, typically, threatens to resign, and Tom says, “Henry, if you’re going to resign, do it now, we need the votes.”
Hynes: That would be Tom. A wonderful man. And he probably knows where more bodies are buried in this town than anybody I know.

Smith: He and Bill Timmons, together, have buried a few.

Hynes: Yes they have, and they are both wonderfully good guys. They are just quality people. If all the guys and gals who worked the Hill and represented clients went up there and did the work, the quality the way they do it, the place would be a better place.

Smith: How do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered?

Hynes: A very good man, a man of principle, a man of integrity and honor, who proved it every day. A man who was thrust into a job he never sought, never even in his wildest dreams ever thought he would ever get to. There must be a hundred people who have told you that his lifelong ambition was to be the Speaker. And when he told a few of us early in 1974 that he was going to retire and not run, and if you want to get a job downtown, this is the time to go downtown before I announce it. He was saying, “I’m not going to get the thing I want most in life, and I recognize it and I’m going to make a little money and make sure I get my kids through school and take care of the family and everything else.” And he was suddenly thrust into that job, and he was good enough to do it in a quiet, solid way. He was a Ford, not a Lincoln, just like he said. And he did a good job, worked as hard as he could at it, did every day what he had to do. With Betty being ill and everything else, during that time, it was tough on him, but he never lost it, he never threw his hands up, he never said, “I can’t handle it.” He just kept doing the job that he had to do.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: Where did you meet Gerald Ford?

Michel: Well, that was very interesting, I was just an AA at that time, an Administrative Assistant, to my predecessor Harold Velde who happened to be elected in the same class with Jerry Ford. And it just so happened that that year, the Junior Chamber of Commerce in their selection for the Ten Outstanding Young Men of the Year, picked Jerry Ford to be the Politician of the Year. Percy was the Businessman of the Year at that time, and Bud Wilkinson the Coach of the Year. But anyway, we had one of the most active Junior Chamber of Commerce groups in Peoria following World War II, so we got the national banquet and Paul Hoffman was the Speaker.

I was detailed then to meet Jerry at the airport and get him downtown to the hotel. You know how that goes, to shepherd him around to the places he had to be. So that’s how I first met what I never would’ve expected for an eventual president of the United States or minority leader in the Congress. Had I known all those things at that time, I don’t know that I’d have been asking Jerry any more questions than I did.

Smith: What was he like? What was your impression of him?

Michel: Oh, of course he was very young and bouncy and full of vim and vigor and he was all enthused by being named the Politician of the Year by the Jaycees, so it was a nice weekend. I guess it was Friday and Saturday or whatever, I kind of forget.

Smith: Now, Harold Velde was in Congress how long?

Michel: Just four terms. He succeeded Everett Dirksen. He was a former FBI agent during the war and he was just so ticked off that nothing ever happened about the Communist conspiracy, so his big bugaboo was rooting out the Commies.
Smith: Really?

Michel: So, that was his one goal and I think that’s why he was probably limited to four terms. Then, it was controversial, the Hollywood Ten and Bishop Oxnam and stuff like that.

Smith: Was he involved with the Alger Hiss case?

Michel: Yeah, right.

Smith: Ford came from a somewhat different place. Young veteran coming back from the war who had been an isolationist, and then along with Arthur Vandenberg became an internationalist. How would you describe his politics at that early stage in his career?

Michel: I’d characterize it as typically Midwestern.

Smith: What does that mean?

Michel: Basically in those days, obviously it's changed over a period of time, but in those days, pretty conservative. That was the bastion of the hard Right in a sense, although Jerry was never considered to be one of those. But, Everett Dirksen country out in central Illinois, of course he became the Leader. If I’d characterize my own entry into the Congress, it was, “Well, Bob, you just go down to Washington and cut the cost of government and lower my taxes. We don’t want anything. Just get the government off my back.” I think pretty much that was Jerry’s feeling at that time, too, because the philosophy was you do for yourself whatever you can and the government eventually will maybe supplement the shortcomings.

Smith: Now, clearly fiscally very conservative, yet on what then were social issues, particularly civil rights, was a moderate, moderate to liberal.

Michel: Right.

Smith: How would that sit with people in your district?

Michel: I don’t know that he ever ran up against any sort of buzz saw in our caucus that he was too liberal or too moderate, though he succeeded Charlie Halleck and Charlie was quite conservative and a forceful Leader when he was there. Then, of course, times change just like when Halleck succeeded Joe Martin. Times do change.

Smith: Tell me about that because that’s got to be a wrenching experience, whether it’s because of age or other factors. I mean, Halleck overthrew Joe Martin.

Michel: That was a learning experience for me. I remember first being elected on my own after four terms with my predecessor and going in to, “Mr. Speaker,” - you know he’d been Speaker, twice trading off with Rayburn. And I said, “It might surprise you, but I’m not asking for a seat on Appropriations or Ways and Means, as much as I would like it. Just keep me off the Education and Labor Committee,” because, at that time, organized labor was a big force in the political scheme of things, the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, the repeal of Section 14B. And my predecessor had a primary all four times that he ran simply because he was having problems with, in our case, it was the Caterpillar UAW 974. It was a big force, 24,000 members in that one local, so it was a factor. Then, of course, eventually in dealing with Jerry, he’d become Leader, et cetera, et cetera, well, he was quite well aware of what problems I would have to confront in my district to get reelected.

Smith: What led to Joe Martin’s ouster?

Michel: Well, you mentioned the fact that he was getting up in years and there was question about that. And he was a bachelor and I remember when I first would see him, he’d always wear a vest and part of his breakfast and lunch was on the vest. He didn’t have a wife looking after him, but he was a wonderful old fellow. As a matter of fact, the Republicans in Massachusetts in those days, gosh, that was a Republican state, nothing like it is today. That has completely turned around. But he wasn’t nearly the Speaker anymore that I had remembered from watching national conventions and when he and some of the leaders in the party of those times were up there ranting and raving. Well, he obviously was not that kind of fiery Leader anymore. So, I think it was one of those things, an evolutionary thing, younger people coming along. Of course, Charlie Halleck was a real fireball and he wanted to make things move. And, boy, I had pressure put on me by Les Arends because Les was a neighboring district to mine, a whip longer than any man probably in the history of the country, twenty-five years. He was content to not move up to Leader, but he supported his Leader each time, in this case, Joe Martin over Halleck. But, underneath it all, I could see the membership really wanted a change of leadership and went along with voting for Charlie.

Smith: Let me ask you, because my sense is, in elections like this, ideology matters less than generational factors.

Michel: Right.

Smith: That, in fact, generational factors maybe account for a lot more than most people think. It’s almost like an escalator. It’s your turn and then it’s someone else’s turn. At that point, Ford is not in the leadership when you first arrived in Congress. Did you imagine that he was headed for such things?

Michel: Well, first having met him earlier on and so when I’d see him once in awhile, of course, I would address him as “Congressman Ford,” “Mr. Ford,” et cetera, et cetera. And then I guess one of the things for me, you know, the Chowder & Marching Society was quite a force in our Republican party in those early days, Mel Laird, and Jerry, John Byrnes, and Glenn Davis from Wisconsin and Jackson from California, there was Boggs from Delaware and John Lodge from Connecticut. But it was a group of fellows, returning veterans at that time. As a matter of fact, that’s how the whole C & M thing got started - was over a veteran’s pension bill and these twelve fellows got together and said, “We’re robbing Peter to pay Paul. Who’re we kidding here? We’re all veterans.” And they banded together and decided they’re going to vote against it as much as that was an unpopular thing, to vote against a veteran’s pension bill and they beat it by one vote. And then they said, “You know, we might be a pretty forceful little group if we’d stick together and pick out these issues and take them on.” And so that’s how the whole thing got started.

Smith: And Ford was part of that group?

Michel: Right. And Dick Nixon, of course.
Smith: It’s interesting, because in those days, he [Ford] used to tell this story – how he was told one day to be outside a committee room at such and such a time. And it turned out it was the old bulls who were responsible for CIA and basically all intelligence oversight. That was a very small group of veteran congressmen, no staff, no notes. They met behind closed doors as long as it took to answer all of their questions. And they brought Ford in as a junior member which tells you something about what they thought about Ford. What were those personal qualities that made him appealing?

Michel: You know, it’s really hard to put your finger on it exactly, except that against the whole, Jerry always stood out. He was very likeable and approachable. He had no airs about him whatsoever. He was just out there making friends. He was a popular individual, I think. When I look back on my own climb up the ladder, I thought there’s nothing better than emulating Jerry Ford’s approach to things because it worked for him very well.

Smith: And presumably, these old bulls had taken the measure and decided among other things, this guy could be trusted with secrets, which was not universally the case in the House.

Michel: No, that’s true. He was, of course, another one of those in the service, but an officer, too, and they respected that.

Smith: And then the first NASA oversight committee, he’s on that. Then, of course, later on the Warren Commission. At some point before ’64, there’s some grumbling about the Republican leadership. I don’t know that it was aimed at Halleck, but certainly I guess Hoeven of Iowa.

Michel: Yeah, Charlie Hoeven.

Smith: Who was Charlie Hoeven?

Michel: He was from Iowa, basically very conservative, very conservative. You’d have to slot him right over here on the Right. But from that point on, well, H.R. Gross of Iowa would be in there in that group, but he was always right over here on the Right.
Smith: You know, there’s a famous story that H.R. Gross, the weekend of President Kennedy’s assassination, wanted to know how much the Eternal Flame was going to cost.

Michel: Oh, he was a character, I tell ya.

Smith: Ford wasn’t that kind of conservative.

Michel: Oh, of course not. No, that’s the other thing. I think people looked at him and said this fellow’s basically conservative on the fiscal issues and socially moderate, he was no ideologue, let’s put it that way. He was just no ideologue and if we were going to get back into power someday, there’s a big middle ground out there where we’ve got to make points and Jerry seemed to be the fellow that really could very well appeal to that group of people.

Smith: You know, it’s interesting, we talked with Leon Parma, who in those days was with Bob Wilson. He told us something quite extraordinary that I’ve never heard before. In I think it was ’58, when Halleck took on Joe Martin – late 50s – they’d actually approached Ford to see if he had any interest in it and he wasn’t at that point interested in doing it.

Michel: And ’58, of course, was a bad recession year. Boy, I felt it out there because that was the first year I was running for reelection after first being elected in ’56 and half my freshman class got flushed down the tube in the recession of ’58. So, boy, I learned early on, man, I tell you, when the economy is down and as much union labor as I had at that time, you just had to watch your Ps and Qs.

Smith: That’s interesting because one of the things he always used to talk about was Guy Vander Jagt as the example. That, Guy, as he climbed the ladder nationally, lost touch with the district. Ford was someone who really never had to worry about getting reelected, and yet he would go home an astonishingly frequent number of times.

Michel: And that points out that Vander Jagt was so busy as chairman of the congressional campaign committee that he thought that was his forte. And he was good at it, and a good speaker, and a good fundraiser and people all asked him to come. In the meantime, he was losing some strength at home. So you just can’t ignore those folks back home.

Smith: How often would he go home in those days?

Michel: Well, of course, there were several problems. One was the distance and the cost of the airline fare. I drove a number of times and back in those days, Dan Rostenkowski, the Democrat from Chicago, and Phil Crane and Harold Collier and I, we were in a station wagon, we’d leave on a Thursday night and that’s before the interstate and we’d drive all night. I’d drop them off in Chicago and I would go 160 miles down to Peoria afterwards and then go back the following Monday night or Tuesday. Boy, I tell you, that wasn’t the best way to commute back and forth, but it was limited. The cost and the distance and the fact that it wasn’t as easy to do as it is today.

Smith: Presumably, you spent a lot less time raising money.

Michel: Oh, that’s true. When people ask me today, that’s one of the first things that I’m just flabbergasted at, the amounts of money that are spent. As a matter of fact, people ask me, “Well, what’d you spend on your campaign, Bob?” I’d say, “On my first campaign, $15,000 to get myself elected to Congress.” And I remember the time when we had the first million dollar race, Bob Dornan out in California, I thought, “Gee wiz, what’s happening here?” And of course now it’s just commonplace. But, really, too much time, that’s the problem today, spending time raising money instead of legislating.

Smith: I remember that was one thing President Ford complained about. But he also said that it was much better when staffs were smaller.

Michel: That’s another thing. When I first came to Washington then, Ev Dirksen had four people, and he was chairman of a subcommittee on Appropriations, but he had four people working in our congressional office. So, when I came down with Judge Velde to take over from Dirksen, I thought, “Well, who’s it going to be?” Three of the four we hired worked for Dirksen because they were the ones who really knew what was going on. But then it kept getting larger and larger and larger. I know Dave Obey who’s still in the saddle today, was one of those instigators way back then, “We need more staff. We need more staff.” Then it just kept growing and growing.

Smith: What happens when you need more staff? Does it mean you need more work?

Michel: Initially, when people were still sending telegrams, when I was first elected, that made a difference. We didn’t have faxes and you didn’t have this instant communication; you had to rely on a letter principally. Telephone calls were too much, too costly. Even the telegrams, only the rich people would send you a telegram. So it was a different line of communication, but you really tended to your mail. I could tell, for example, on a Monday or Tuesday whether the Women’s Christian Temperance Union had met last Thursday night on some thing because then the following Tuesday or so, in come these pink and blue letters telling me to vote against whatever had rankled them.
But it was different communicating in those days, simpler, I guess in a sense.
But then everything has evolved since that time to the degree that you got so much going in the way of communication just to answer the emails and the faxes. That’s how it grew, I guess.

Smith: Tell me about Ford’s relationship with Ev Dirksen.

Michel: Well, of course, I really considered Ev to be my mentor because he represented the district I had represented before Judge Velde. Same number of counties, six counties. And he was in the House for sixteen years and Jerry respected that and the gift of gab that Senator Dirksen had. Jerry really enjoyed working with him. Basically conservative, but also at critical times to buck Colonel McCormick’s Chicago Tribune, he had his view of the world out there on foreign affairs because he made a lot of trips abroad. His modus operandi and philosophy, I think, Jerry felt that suited him very well. And I think he probably took a note from him and thought, “Look, he’s the Leader.
He’s basically conservative, but yet on social issues, he knew where to go.”

Smith: Dirksen was a great showman and Dirksen generated a lot of copy and some people resented that. Ford didn’t seem to have resented that at all, as if, he could wait his time. Dirksen himself, someone asked about their relationship and he said, “Congressman Ford is the sword and I am the oil can.” But as far as you could see they got along very well?

Michel: Oh sure.

Smith: Even though Dirksen had worked with Halleck before, that didn’t come between them.

Michel: No.

Smith: First of all, Ford runs against Hoeven in ’62. Did you support Ford?

Michel: Yeah. I was generally in that group. Mel Laird, of course.

Smith: Tell me about those Young Turks, because you had Mel Laird, you had Charlie Goodell, you had John Lindsay. It was a different party.

Michel: Oh, yeah, we were from all parts of the country, too.

Smith: You really didn’t have a Southern party at that point.

Michel: No.

Smith: But really the Midwest was sort of the center of gravity.

Michel: Yeah.

Smith: But you had a liberal wing in the Northeast.

Michel: By all means, by all means. And they had to be dealt with from time to time even after all those years that intervened by the time I became Leader, I could pretty well say there was six of them I really had a problem with.

Smith: From the Northeast?

Michel: Yeah. And I’d have to, on close votes even right up to when Reagan became President and I was his Leader for his tax program and economic plan and I had only 192 members on my side. I had to get every one of those solid, plus 26 or -7 or -8 on the other side. So that was my chore, getting enough from the other side to join us so we could vote on a number of key votes when Reagan took over. Just by three and four votes, we won the issues. That was exhilarating.

Smith: ’64, of course, was the Goldwater debacle. Were you at the convention?

Michel: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Do you remember the night they almost booed Rockefeller out of the hall?

Michel: Oh, yeah. Geez.

Smith: What was that like?

Michel: Well, some of these things then, as young as I was, were a new experience for me. I was kind of betwixt and between. I think I traveled in 38 states for Barry Goldwater that year and then nearly lost my own seat to a hand truck driver, a Caterpillar. And so that was a lesson, I tell you, too.

Smith: So, you were a Goldwater supporter?

Michel: Yeah, right. Sure. He had a lot of the really young Republicans and he could fire them up pretty well, you know. But with me, it wasn’t a question of loving him and hating the other, it’s just that I was enthused over Barry’s approach and thought, “Well, we’ll do whatever we can for him.”

Smith: In between, of course, there had come the Kennedy assassination and the Warren Commission. Did it surprise you that President Johnson would ask this relatively unknown Republican congressman from Michigan to be on the Warren Commission?

Michel: Jerry had already gained a reputation for being a real solid individual thinker, as I said, again, no ideologue, but one who had really a great respect for the institution, one who could make it work. So I guess, no, we wouldn’t be surprised at that.

Smith: Yet it sort of flies in the face of the popular image, you know, some of the things that Johnson said about Ford over the years. Pretty clearly, if he’d believed those things, he never would have asked Ford to be on the Warren Commission.
Michel: Yeah.

Smith: Did he talk to you at all about his work on the Commission?

Michel: Not much. At that time, at C & M, you know, we’d have some of the informal back and forth. “Jerry, what’s it like?” Because we kind of had a code of secrecy in the group and whatever we discuss in this group doesn’t go any further, otherwise we’re going to lose the importance of our group. So Jerry was always forthcoming to us to the degree that we were well enough informed to be supportive of what he was doing.

Smith: Did you accept the basic conclusions of the Warren Commission?

Michel: Mhmm.

Smith: That basically they found no evidence of a conspiracy?

Michel: Right.

Smith: After the ’64 election was there immediately a desire among House Republicans for change?

Michel: Well, pretty much so, because we’d been down and then to think we took such a terrible pasting in ’64, the number of seats that we lost again. And, “Geez, here we are really mired down. Where are we going to go?” And, of course, Charlie realized the brunt of that.

Smith: A number of people also said he had a bit of a drinking problem.

Michel: Oh, yes, there’s no question about that.

Smith: Was that more prevalent in those days?

Michel: I think so. Though, shucks, when I was Ev Dirksen’s congressmen, one of my good fortunes was to go over late in the afternoon to see the Senator and that was the time he used to have the folks, that’s how I met Lyndon Johnson, way back when, Flood Byrd was there and all the rest. But, of course, we were from the Peoria area with distilleries, Hiram Walker century(?) and whatnot, and I was kind of the old bartender back there in the back room for the Senator himself. “Hey, Bob, I think I’ll have about three fingers and don’t mix it with anything.”

Smith: Do you think it was covered up a little bit more in those days than it is now?

Michel: Yeah, probably. Right. And as a matter of fact my predecessor had a serious problem with it, too. I learned from that. That was too bad, but that was the case.

Smith: When you run a race like that for a leadership post, the top post among Republicans, how do you put a campaign together? How do you wage that campaign? What’s your constituency? What do you promise? What do you deliver?

When Jerry Ford decided to run against Halleck, how do you campaign?

Michel: That’s a ticklish thing to do and you’ve got to have a good sense up here of where the membership is. He just had to because he couldn’t make the charge without being successful or he’d be in deep doo-doo. When you stop and think how you put your finger on it, it was just by word of mouth and a little bit here and there and groups, not big groups, just two people talking to one another and then two other people talking to one another.

Smith: And Don Rumsfeld was instrumental in that race.

Michel: Right.

Smith: Bob Dole.

Michel: And Bob Griffin from Michigan. Of course, in that group, we had Chuck Chamberlain and Bob Griffin and McIntyre and, who’d I leave out? But they were elected in my class, four from Michigan that one year.

Smith: Do you think it was mostly generational, again?

Michel: Obviously, now that I look back on it, it had to be part of that because this was really a younger group of guys. Mel Laird was very active, always, with Jerry. Of course, I remember when he was first making the rounds to select Jerry as the vice president.
Smith: Well, there is some speculation that in fact Mel’s name was considered in ’64 along with Ford’s as a prospective candidate against Halleck.

Michel: Right.

Smith: I assume not everyone tells you the truth when you ask for your vote.

Michel: Well, that was a tough one for me. Actually, Charlie took a liking to me. I was president of my class. He took me out to Burning Tree with Les Arends the first time. As a freshman, he had me come back to his district to give the Lincoln Day speech. And I really had those loyalties there, boy, I tell you. Of course, maybe Charlie knew I was Ev Dirksen’s congressman. That was a special bond there, so it was a tough one for me when the time really came. Of course, Les Arends really leaned hard on me. I was one of the younger guys then and it was very important that they split up that group.

Smith: How could Les Arends lean on you? What pressure, for lack of a better word?

Michel: Well, there was no real threats other than, “Bob, did you vote?” Talk in those terms. Man, I had a tough time saying - I’m trying to think what kind of response I made, I’m sure it was kind of fuzzy – I said, “Well, I love Charlie,” but I never went so far as to say, “I’m definitely voting for Charlie.” I just left it hanging out there.

Smith: Do you think Halleck was surprised by the result?

Michel: I suppose so. He was hurt and then what really was bad of all things when he was defeated, there was no committee for him. He went back to become, it was, on the House Administration Committee. Incidentally, that was one of the things when I became Leader, I corrected. If I should be defeated for Leader or something, I can still go back to my committee, which was Appropriations, and could’ve been chairman of the doggone committee. But I just thought that was devastating. I thought that was unfair and, for one who had given so much, yes he lost that election, but geez, he’s still a respected elder. That hurt Charlie.

Smith: Did he ever get over it?
Michel: I don’t know if he ever did or not, but in our relationship after that, nothing ever changed.

Smith: And that brings a larger question, because there were clearly people around Halleck that were loyal to him, how did they deal with the new leadership?

Michel: Well, I guess it just kind of automatically fell in place. More and more of them realized, “Geez, we’ve had a devastating year,” ’64 was, “and we just got to do something here to get out of this mold and break out.” So, the climate was right for making the move.

Smith: And presumably Ford had the kind of temperament and personality that made it easy for them.

Michel: Sure. He was conservative enough, too, because I always said, “You can’t be elected Leader unless you’re basically conservative on the key issues of the day.”

Smith: So now, you have a new Leader, and you’re faced with this need to come up with an alternative to the Great Society. Tell me about that, because today, you don’t even hear the phrase ‘the loyal opposition.’

Michel: No.

Smith: You were the loyal opposition.

Michel: Yeah.

Smith: What did that mean?

Michel: That meant that “Gee-whiz, we’re so outnumbered that there’s never anything on the floor, doggone it, that we like. We’re just against everything and we should have what we called a ‘constructive Republican alternative proposal.’” That acronym there, we got criticized a lot for that. And Charlie Goodell, of course, from New York, was very helpful in bringing along constructive Republican alternative proposals and then it got to be kind of a natural thing for us. We really got to have, particularly on a Motion to Recommit, what is it? Well, it’s a sensible proposal as an alternative to the opposition with all its votes. And, who knows, maybe a time or two we’ll win if we don’t get too aggressive or take too big a bite. And then sometimes the question then arose, you just want to make a political statement or do you really want to win something? And we’d have that argument sometimes because “Well, let’s get what we can today. Who knows? There’ll be another tomorrow.”

Smith: What was the difference between how a Sam Rayburn ran the House and a John McCormick? Was there a difference?

Michel: Well, of course, Rayburn was the first Speaker under which I served. I looked up to him like he was God Almighty as the Speaker. But, you know, in spite of that, he, you could see, was really dedicated to the House. He would sit in the chair during those monotonous special order things. Man, today, you’d never have any of the leadership sitting in the chair for the special order things. But he did. When we had the Gwin Party(?), for example, Rayburn came and he really had one heck of a good time and the guys were throwing napkins and bread and everything around the dining room like rockets and Rayburn would laugh about it.

Now, the big difference there between he and John McCormick is that John McCormick always had dinner with his wife. That was what he was known for; he didn’t go to these things. But I had the good fortune of having him as my first subcommittee chairman and the ranking member was big Bud Brown from Ohio. McCormick and Brown were the leaders of my first subcommittee on government operations. I had the wonderful opportunity to learn from both of those Leaders. And Sam Rayburn, he knew the members.

Smith: Were they fair to Republicans?

Michel: Oh, yeah, I think both of them, I would say. Absolutely. They were Speaker of the whole House. They respected the fact that the minority had something to say. I’m trying to think of our Parliamentarian. Lou Deschler was the Parliamentarian at the time and there were some of those questions that would come up every once in awhile and I always thought their rulings were quite fair.
Smith: Let me ask you, on civil rights, you had the Civil Rights Bill of ’64 and then the Voter Rights Act of ’65. Were there any significant divisions within the Republican caucus? You were just beginning to get some summoned—

Michel: Well, obviously then, the real strong proponent was for example you mentioned John Lindsay earlier. And even after all that period of time, the years, for me, it really didn’t dawn on me how important an issue that is for them, as distinguished from what little attention was given to that by my constituents, many of whom could care less. And it was tough for that to finally get through my noggin, that, “Gee, that is an important issue. And, while the people back home don’t talk about it, in other sections of the country, that’s a very important issue.” That you had to wake up to the fact and get with it.

Smith: Yeah. Now, Ford voted for both bills and I suspect a majority of Republicans. In fact, famously in the Senate was Republican votes that passed the Civil Rights bill because you had the southern Democrats who were all against it.

Michel: That’s the big thing Everett Dirksen will be noted for. Had it not been for him at that time, it wouldn’t have happened.

Smith: It’s interesting, because when you go back to the Ev and Jerry Show, in some of the interviews we’ve had there was a sense among some of the younger members, there was a feeling that Ev Dirksen was perhaps too close to LBJ, that he’d go down there at the end of the day. Famous stories, over a couple, more than a couple bourbons they’d cut deals and get bills passed and that Ford was seen as someone who’d maybe be a little bit less in Johnson’s thrall.

Michel: Right. And, well, I think that, and you see it even today I guess, that, geez, you can’t be so lovey-dovey with the opposition so that we’re not getting our say appropriately. There’s no question about Ev Dirksen had a way with all the members and with the opposition. Geez, you only need listen to Jack Valenti when he was still living and he would tell the stories about how many times Everett and Lyndon got together on things and the trade-offs and that was the way things were done back in those days. There’s just far less of that today, you just don’t think of it in those terms. That was the old school of politics. Like I said, Jerry made a marked difference there. They felt that Jerry wasn’t going to be falling in with the opposition as would, they’d say, Dirksen did.

Smith: There are stories about how Ford and Hale Boggs would go down to the National Press Club and debate issues. They’d drive down together, decide on the way what they were going to debate, have their debate, go have drinks at lunch, and then go back to the Hill.

Michel: Right.

Smith: It’s hard to imagine Congress operating like that.

Michel: Right, but that was how it was in those days. You did have the respect of the other side to the degree that, “Hey, we’re in this thing together, but we’ve also got to be opponents.” One of my problems with Newt during my leadership, I said, “Newt, they’re not our enemies. They’re our political adversaries and you’ve got to treat them with respect.” And I said, point blank, “You maybe liked Martin and Rayburn switching back and forth so you’d better loosen up on the rhetoric.”

Smith: What are the factors that made things different then? Some people have talked about more socializing across the aisle. More members had their families here; it was a village.

Michel: There was more time spent here. It wasn’t running home every weekend. Of course, along that line, we always used to criticize that T & T Club, in Tuesday, out Thursday, and they were the Philadelphia and New York lawyers who made their money practicing law over the weekends and came down here as an avocation. We had them in both parties and we used to gripe at those guys an awful lot, of course, in fact, some of the old timers say, “Hey, we’re back in the old T & T days.

Smith: We were talking about the different mood in those days, the socialization that went on across the aisle, the fact that families were here in town.

Michel: And there didn’t seem to be the need to go home every weekend like there is now. Of course, when I first was elected, we had one paid trip back and forth to Washington. So, man, you had to stay here. And I remember, up until the time when my wife would be counseling incoming members’ wives on what do you do with the kids, and she said, “It’s a tough one, but it’s your decision.” Of course, she’d been here ten years during my AA, she had measurement of Washington and the surrounding area. She was a school teacher before we were married and without a doubt, she said, “Our kids are going to be educated at home.” So we both made the decision, there wasn’t a dispute between us because we recognized it was better for them. Of course, it turned out better for the kids, too.

Smith: One of the rituals of those days I knew Ford took part in was the baseball game. Tell us about it.

Michel: Oh, gosh, before they had the old Griffith Stadium and we went out there, it was fun. I would like to play baseball in high school and college so I was very interested. And, of course, we had those games out at Griffith Stadium. Usually the preliminary game before the regular Senators game back in those days and Jerry, of course, was a good athlete and he was playing. Tom Curtis from Missouri was a good catcher. Charlie Goodell as a matter of fact, of course that was later on, but he was my catcher there at one time. We Republicans won eleven games in a row or something like that. I remember my boss played some, I think he stumbled over first base at one time, broke his arm or wrenched it. There were several accidents.

Smith: Do you remember some of the folks who played for the Democrats?

Michel: From Georgia they had Wheeler, “Fireball” Wheeler, I think they called him. Gee-whiz, it gets a little foggy, some of those names. They were good competitive games and we had a lot of fun doing it.

Smith: Let’s move on - Johnson leaves office and Nixon is elected. And clearly Ford entertained hopes of becoming Speaker, particularly if the ’72 landslide would bring in enough Republicans. Did he express frustration with the failure to obtain the majority? That’s when he promised Betty he would run for one more term and then he would retire. Did he talk about that?
Michel: Not really, but I was a strong Nixon supporter. Man, everything, every little speech or everything that he had given or whatnot, I made sure it was in the congressional record and I was a strong Nixon supporter all the time. So, of course, when you don’t win the whole ball of wax, it’s got to be somewhat discouraging. And it’s too bad for Jerry because it would’ve been a different thing if he would’ve become Speaker.

Smith: Did he really want to be Speaker?

Michel: Yeah, just like in my case, it would be nice to be Speaker. I wasn’t ever thinking in terms of going into the executive branch, being president or vice president. That was the furthest thing from my mind. I think it was the same thing with Jerry. He just wanted to be Speaker of the House, the top spot in the House and you’re third ranking. Gosh, you can be mighty powerful.

Smith: That’s interesting because you use the word ‘powerful.’ I don’t often think of him as someone who was accumulating power. What was it about the House? I mean obviously he loved the House and obviously there are lots of people who love the House, presumably including yourself.

Michel: Yeah.

Smith: What is it about the institution, for example, that makes it different from the Senate?

Michel: Yeah, well, they always talk about the Senate as being a clubby affair and you do get the impression that, well at least most of the time, individual senators can get along with one another. And that’s a nice place to be serving and animosity’s not nearly as strong in the House. Well, in the first place, you’re limited in the time you’ve got to speak, so you’d better capsule what you’re going to speak in five minutes and make it good because you’re not going to go on and on like senators would with no time limitation. It lent itself to more frequent exchanges when you really did have a debate. That’s the other thing, today everybody gets up and gives a blurb in one minute when they’re given the time. Nobody yields to anybody else when they’re given a question. But in the old days, “Would the gentleman yield for a question?” “Yeah, sure.”
Then you get a good mix of debate, but you don’t get that in the House anymore today, unfortunately.

Smith: Do you think television on balance has been good or bad?

Michel: Well, I had a war with myself at the time, this thing of electronically covering the House of Representatives. How many showboaters are we going to have up there hogging the doggone screen instead of legislating? I was concerned about it, wondering whether this thing will really work or whether it becomes a show, you know, a theatrical type of thing. And, of course, as a member, I had to give some strong admonishment to a member one time when he came on a floor with a brown sack over his head trying to dramatize a particular point. Or this idea of bringing loaves of bread and stuff on the floor of the House, that to me, demeaned the chamber. I didn’t like to see us get to that point. Jerry was always very scrupulously for decorum in the House, too.

Smith: What do you do when, and I’m not looking for names, but people who either perhaps had a drinking problem or were sort of past their prime. How did you handle those?

Michel: Well, one of the reasons that I guess I never wrote a book is because you can’t write a book and have everything coming up roses. You’d have to cover the situations you’d prefer not to be talking about, and because I don’t think a doggone book would sell just talking about the legislative process. I said, “I could write a real juicy one” and I’m sure there were a few occasions maybe when generally among the members we’d know something about members, you know, having a problem other than drinking and we’d talk about it, “Listen, how do we straighten this thing out?”

For me, the tough thing to deal with was the lapses of ethical behavior in my contemporaries because, first of all it demeaned the institution. We were always getting enough bad publicity as an institution. And to have this exposed or that exposed or that talked about, this was not good. Or for the individual members welfare back home, to get themselves reelected. Sometimes you just had to talk to them like a Dutch uncle and say, “Look, I’m hearing things that I shouldn’t be hearing. I don’t want to be more specific than that but doggone it, straighten up and fly right.” And so I’m sure, Jerry, we never talked about it specifically, but I’m sure if I had them, he had them.

Smith: I always found him unusual, because lots of politicians like gossip and he never did. I almost sensed that he was uncomfortable around the gossiping. I mean, political gossip was one thing, but personal gossip was something that he found offensive.

Michel: Yeah, a waste of time. Yeah, he was always business, all business. And in our group of Chowder & Marching folks, it wouldn’t be Jerry that would bring up things like that, other than when he was Leader to say, “Well, sure, if there’s something I ought to be knowing about here, let me know so we can get this thing corrected.”

Smith: Do you remember where you first heard about the Watergate break-in?

Michel: Oh, gosh, boy, it’s kind of hard to go back.

Smith: Well, I mean, what was your initial reaction?

Michel: I thought, “Oh, geez.” Of course, as I indicated earlier, I was a strong Nixon supporter, but I was pretty surprised that the taping was going on.

Smith: Did the language of the tapes surprise you?

Michel: Right, that really bothered me. Then, of course, another thing I learned about it was if a president’s in trouble, his circle of friends ought not to shrink, it ought to build. And, boy, if Ev Dirksen would’ve lived long enough, he would’ve been the only one who would’ve had the stature and one thing or another to go to Nixon and say, “Dick, fire their (you know what).”

Smith: I tell you a story, several members of the cabinet, led by Mel Laird over the winter of ’70-71, met and they were very upset with the way things were developing at that point. They were particularly upset about Haldeman and Erlichman. Rose Mary Woods shared this view and this group said none of them were going to go to Nixon and none of them thought they had the clout to make Nixon listen. And they thought and thought - who was the one person who could make Nixon listen - and they decided it was Tom Dewey. They were going to get to Dewey when he was in Florida. He died before he could come back. So there were clearly within the cabinet, at least, some real concerns about the directions that the White House was going. As Watergate expanded, became a political burden, how was Ford handling this?

Michel: And, out of all things, that was the year I was elected chairman of the congressional campaign committee and that was my first job up the leadership ladder. And, boy, I tell you, my wife and I would hate to get up in the morning and say, “What shoe fell last night?” It was just a very anxious time because, holy smokes, is there anything good going to happen here? It’s one darned problem after another. And then, of course, we end up losing 47 seats in the House.

Smith: Or is it 74? It’s 74.

Michel: You’re right. Boy.

Smith: I want to get to that, but before that, for example, were there rumors about Agnew before Agnew resigned?

Michel: Not with me. I did not hear. I was floored, although, I will say, I was floored by Nixon at his selection at the convention. I said, “Who is he?” It was kind of like this last time around with Sarah Palin and John McCain. And I guess I did read he was the governor of Maryland or something, but I was just completely floored. Of course, I think, too, when Dan Quayle was picked by George the First. I think your mind has other people conjured up and when it doesn’t happen you’re tremendously surprised.

Smith: When Agnew resigns, in very short order, Nixon turns to Ford. Now, what went on among your colleagues, because the classic story is Nixon wanted John Connally and John Connally wasn’t going to fly, apparently, on the Hill. Is that safe to say?

Michel: Yeah, as much as some of us thought a lot of John at the time.
Smith: And supposedly it was the Democratic leadership, Carl Albert and, to a lesser degree, Mike Mansfield, who in effect impressed upon the White House that, “The one guy we can confirm is Jerry Ford.” Is that your recollection?

Michel: Right. Yep, that happened to be the safest and sure bet and of course I had no qualms about that whatsoever. But going back to Agnew, man, I was just stunned to think that could happen. Maybe at some lower state offices, you’d hear a lot of that stuff in Springfield and whatever, but not here at the national level and the vice president. I was just, boy, taken aback. I couldn’t believe it. And oddly enough, after that was over and I’d played golf with Agnew, with Mel Laird, and I think Bill Rogers, the secretary of state, and after Agnew passed away, I still kept people on my Christmas cards, you know, and one of the nicest notes I got after he’d passed away was from his wife because I’d continued to send a card and I forget now exactly how she told me but it definitely made the impression that people abandon you after awhile and they don’t want to have a thing to do with you. “Bob, you’ve been very kind to remember me and I just wanted you to know I appreciate it.” So that caused me to continue sending out over 700 Christmas cards. At one time, it was about 10,000, when I was Leader.

Smith: Yep.

Michel: But if there’s a widow or a widower, I keep them on my list because I just remembered that incident. You know, people will abandon you and who are your real friends - at least those who think enough to say that you’re deserving of my remembering.

Smith: Talking about real friends, apparently, Ford and Carl Albert must have been real friends.

Michel: Yeah. I don’t know so much about it. Of course, I took a couple trips with Carl Albert and those were experiences, too. I think, when it was a state dinner or something and he’d say, “I’m glad to be here in Yugoslavia” when we were in Czechoslovakia or something like that.

Smith: The mood among House Republicans must have been pretty celebratory when Ford’s name was announced.
Michel: When the word got out and spinning around that, “Hey, we’ve got to come up with a candidate and quickly,” and “Boy, nobody better than looking at our own Leader, Jerry Ford. He’s got the experience and can be confirmed.” We were all excited.

Smith: Did you think at that point that he might be president? I mean, did you entertain the possibility?

Michel: I guess I didn’t think that far ahead at that time, no. I just thought that, “Boy, you make it to vice president, eventually, some time he can run.”

Smith: While he was vice president, did he maintain contacts?

Michel: Oh, yeah, particularly with our C & M group.

Smith: Well, let me ask you, this whole story of Watergate. Did you express or your colleagues express your concern to the vice president to communicate down to the White House?

Michel: Oh, yeah. Yeah, the fellows could really unload. We knew Jerry so well that we could tell him anything. And wanted him to know as much as we knew that would help him do his job better or to be alert of some pitfalls.

Smith: He was in an awkward position, wasn’t he?

Michel: Yes, he was, in a sense, but he handled it with aplomb.

Smith: Did he defend the president in these conversations?

Michel: I guess, he never undercut the president, that’s for sure. Sometimes I think he’d say maybe he’d do it differently, that kind of thing, because he’d never undercut him. But he was less than enthusiastic on some, I can’t remember specifically, there were those times. But again, that was in-house and we could all talk with confidence to one another.

Smith: As the impeachment proceedings began, did the tone of those conversations change at all? I mean, there must have been a perception that we’re talking now with someone who may very well wind up as president.
Michel: Yeah, when you got closer, boy, and I was sticking with Nixon and what finally, oh the fellow from California who was named the Circuit Court of Appeals judge. He was in the House.

Smith: Republican?

Michel: Yeah.

Smith: Wiggins?

Michel: Wiggins, Chuck Wiggins. And Chuck and I, of course, I had to keep bugging Chuck all the time. Railsback was from Illinois, but I knew Railsback, he was going to vote for impeachment, or he was on the other side, so I confided in Wiggins. And then Chuck said, “You know, Bob, our battle is over. I think we’ve lost it. We’ve lost the battle.” That was very traumatic, very traumatic times, when I’d think of impeachment.

Smith: Did you see Nixon at all in his final days?

Michel: No, except that I was there the night when he resigned. I was in the Cabinet room.

Smith: You were?

Michel: Yeah.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Michel: Yeah, I wrote about that. I should probably dig it out of the Dirksen files and send you a copy of what I wrote. I had the presence of mind to take an envelope out of my pocket, because there was no press there. Gene Berch(?) was there and, of course, Sam Devine, Cederberg, Stennis, Eastland, Tiger Teague.

Smith: The hard core.

Michel: The hard core, you aren’t kidding, around the Cabinet room. And the president comes in and Nixon, you know he’s always kind of stiff like that and he comes up to the table and he started out as, I guess you historians you know this, about his mother and his father and back in California and I called my description of that the next day a room full of tears. It was touching. And of course he says, “Fellows,” because I don’t think there were any women there, “Fellows, I just hope you won’t feel I let you down.” And, you know, we had been let down. And then, son of a gun, he got up after that, straightened his shoulders and went out and made his speech. And, of course, then that lead to the next day when Corrine and I were so privileged to be there in the East Room.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Michel: Oh, gosh, that was like I think my spine tingled on hearing a fabulous aria song or something for me, “Boy, here’s Jerry Ford who we’ve known from those early days on. And, my gosh, he’s being sworn in as President of the United States.” It was a really moving thing for me. Boy, and so happy, you know. And, of course, Jerry’s comments about, “Our long nightmare of Watergate is over,” and here I was experiencing all of this and thinking, “What I’ve experienced in my time, this is history in the making.”

Smith: Did the mood change overnight? I mean, I know in his first few days he had this Congressional Black Caucus down at the White House and George Meany and other groups that had not been around the White House for awhile. It’s almost as if he understood the power of symbolism.

Michel: Oh yes.

Smith: Of opening the place. And then, of course, came the pardon. Now, had there been discussions, informal or private, advice sought or whatever about the Nixon pardon before it happened?

Michel: Ever since that happened, I said, “Had it not been for the pardon, the President would’ve beaten Carter, and we would’ve won the election.” But he had to do it.

Smith: How bad was it? How bad was the reaction?

Michel: Of course, having been an original Nixon supporter as strong as I was, my feelings were different than a lot of others who thought that was just terrible.
Smith: Did you tell him that you approved of the pardon?

Michel: I don’t think I ever did.

Smith: Because one story is that there were in fact members of Congress who rushed out in public and denounced it while privately telling the White House, you did the necessary thing.

Michel: Well, I didn’t think it was necessary in my own case to cover my back side or whatever because everybody knew I was a strong, strong Nixon supporter and that you go through so much and that’s enough, impeachment and resigning and the humiliation of it all.

Smith: Now, Mel Laird, it’ll come as no surprise, had a scheme or he thought he had a scheme that would’ve—

Michel: He’s a schemer of all schemes.

Smith: Mel’s convinced himself he told Jerry, “Don’t do this until I get back.” He was going to get a bipartisan delegation from both parties of the House and go down to the White House and petition the president for a pardon. Now that sounds fine in the abstract, but if you put yourself in the political mood of that period, it seems to me that any trial balloon would’ve been shot down before it got to tree level. I mean, how could Ford, in that climate, have “prepared” the country for this unpopular act? Was there an alternative? In effect, he threw himself on the sword.

Michel: Right.

Smith: And what was the alternative?

Michel: I don’t know.

Smith: I mean, he was supposedly being told by Jaworski that it could take two years to come to trial which would consume his presidency.

Michel: Oh, right. And I don’t know, I just think as close as we all were and particularly Jerry to Nixon, “Well, I’ve got the power to cut it short and try to go on from here,” because all that trauma over that. I’m sure he thought it through, I never asked him specifically.

Smith: You said you were head of the Republican House Campaign Committee. You must have heard a lot about the pardon.

Michel: Oh, sure. Jeepers.

Smith: How bad was it?

Michel: It was terrible. I just knew we were going down to terrible defeat and there was nothing I could do about it. And then, of course, during the campaign to be faced with the pardon, you just tried to cover it the best you could, that the president just looked at things and said to have this thing drag on endlessly and how’s he going to bring the country back together to accomplish anything. Then subsequently after time passed, “Son of a gun, if we had been given another two or three weeks, we would’ve pulled that baby out.”

Smith: You know, the great irony, forget Mel Laird’s scheme for a moment. Of course, you know Nixon became very ill and almost died and there was no way of knowing that, but in some ways, if Ford had waited to pardon Nixon until he was sitting on his deathbed, maybe there would’ve been a different reaction.

Michel: That could’ve been different. Yeah.

Smith: Were you down at the White House frequently during the Ford presidency? Was there much contact between you?

Michel: Let’s see, what was I doing at that time? Well I hadn’t gotten up to the point, but I’m trying to think, I’ve got to go back through George the First and Reagan, you know.

Smith: Well, for example, he came up and testified before the House, only President in American history who did that, about the pardon. That must have been extraordinary.

Michel: Oh, yeah, we were all obviously listening and “How did you justify it yourself?” I guess. That whole episode was such a traumatic episode.
Smith: And in the middle of all this is Mrs. Ford’s cancer surgery. Now, had you gotten to know her?

Michel: Oh, sure. Betty and Corinne were real good friends.

Smith: Tell me about it, because we know now that it was rough on her. He was away a lot. The burdens of child-rearing fell on her. That’s probably not terribly unusual for a lot of political wives at that time. Did you sense that she had problems?

Michel: Not really, at our social gatherings, gosh, she was so gracious. And then when we had our C & M meetings, we all had a toddy or two and then you just feel, oh shoot, if there was any giddiness. But there was nothing that gave me any indication that she was anything other than the way my wife was conducting herself.

Smith: Was it tough on political wives?

Michel: Oh, I think it is. I’m reminded now, of course, of my own successor, of course, now he’s the secretary of transportation, but one of their decisions for his not running. I took them to dinner a lot and she’d say, “Bob, you know, our life is nothing like it was with you and Corrine,” because she knew it and they went along with us and could experience it personally. She said, “It’s just not like that anymore and I have no base from which to have friendships and all my friends are back home.” So that’s when she decided, “To heck with it” and she was going home. Of course, Ray, since he had been characterized as a more moderate member, he probably wasn’t going to go anywhere in leadership as much as I kept saying, “Doggone it, Ray, with your capacity and capabilities, you can get up…” Well, he wasn’t sold on that.

But going back to the original question, it’s tough on wives. It’s a combination of things. The fact that, then of course, now, you can go home every weekend, that’s still a problem. You want to be a participant in what’s going on here, but if the sociability isn’t there, that’s hard to put that together. Earlier on, when you couldn’t get the time to go home and you tried to counsel a member on whether or not he brought his family down here or there, I said, “You know, as my wife would tell your wife, that’s one you two have to decide for yourselves.” But I saw, no question in my time, that that caused break-ups in families. No question about it in my mind. You’ve got to be a very strong-willed, number one woman to put up with all that crap, pardon the French. But I always said, “Man, I owe so much to Corinne for how she handled our case,” and, boy, we raised four kids and it worked out just beautifully. When you’ve been married 55 years to the same gal, then nobody’s going to take her place.

Smith:
Yep.

Michel:
Jerry and Betty were such a wonderful couple always. Geez. It was just so wonderful to know them and consider them my friends.

Smith:
So, as far as you could see, she enjoyed being first lady?

Michel:
Yeah, she did.

Smith:
The entertaining?

Michel:
Right, she just handled it perfectly.

Smith:
He, of course, adapted after ’74. How did things change with all the Watergate Babies, so called, who came in and started rewriting all the rules?

Michel:
Yeah, of course, then, that’s when things really started changing dramatically here. There’s no question about that. Just the climate, everything. Thinking back to Watergate kind of reminds me of the day here with all the things that are going on. “Well, that was all Bush”, “That was all Bush”, “Bush”, “Bush”, “Bush”, “Bush”. Then to think, “Geez, when are you going to get out on your own and take responsibility? But then I guess we talk about the doggone cycles in politics, I guess that’s what we’re talking about.

Smith:
Isn’t it ironic that Gerald Ford would spend his life on the Hill, but as president finds himself fending off Congress with the War Powers Act or foreign policy and spending issues. Now, the veto strategy, you ended up sustaining most of those vetoes. That couldn’t be easy.

Michel:
Right.
Smith: How was strategy coordinated with the White House?

Michel: I’m not altogether sure how all that worked with Jerry during his administration because I didn’t play the role like I did with Reagan and Bush, where there was a marked contrast with George W. and Denny Hastert, so much so that I asked, “Denny, what kind of relationship do you have?” “Oh, fine.” But I can tell it was nothing like my relationship with Reagan because I would call down there, of course we were different, we were a minority, and Denny had the majority, George W. probably would’ve said, “Well, to hell with it. I don’t have to go through that routine.” But the times that Reagan was willing to have me bring as many as four groups in a day, two in the morning, two in the afternoon, just ten or so for the old treatment, the ones that are for you are on the right, the ones that are against you are on the list and the swing votes are here in the middle, and, boy, Reagan could play that like a violin. I just had such a good relationship with him that anything I wanted him to do, he would do.

Smith: And do well.

Michel: Right, right. Well, with just the extreme of my request and the people that I was dealing with, geez, Jim Baker, Mike Deaver, Duberstein, man, I just felt like I had a great relationship.

Smith: Yeah.

Ford had a temper he spent a lifetime controlling it. Did you ever see that?

Michel: Oh, not much. I guess I’d never bring that up on my own. “Oh geez, Jerry had one hell of a temper.” Not one to be aware of. It never really affected me that much that way.

Smith: Did you see it?

Michel: But I could tell sometimes he’d raise his voice and get pretty perturbed, but not out of the ordinary. For God’s sakes, he had every reason to be ticked off. I can’t remember the specific details.
Smith: One of the things that really angered him policy-wise was after Saigon fell and Congress decided to pull the plug on funding for resettling refugees. And that made him angry. And he went to the country and eventually got it turned around. In your memories surrounding that period, was it just that overwhelming desire to put it behind us? Did that explain it?

Michel: I think so, it probably always ties in. He was a great one for looking forward. He’d pick up from the experience of the past mistake of one thing or another and try to adjust and go forward.

Smith: The Reagan-Ford contest in ’76, how did that divide the House Republicans?

Michel: I don’t know that it did, I’m trying to think.

Smith: Because, by that time, you had a Southern party, you had Southern congressmen who presumably were more conservative.

Michel: Yeah, right. Of course, Bob Griffin and I were doing the floor deal that time and the one thing I have in the Dirksen Library, is one of my Whip counts at the convention with that procedural motion that we won. Then we knew we had this whole thing.

Smith: Was there doubt going into that?

Michel: No, I mean, you didn’t know for sure. But that wasn’t that big of a doggone win, either, as I recall.

Smith: Stu Spencer said he was amazed and very happy that they made the test vote on a procedural question because, he said, “If I’d been running the Reagan campaign, I would’ve found something emotional like foreign policy.” Something you could really rev up. And, of course, what the White House did was basically give them the foreign policy plank so they wouldn’t have that.

Michel: That was an interesting comparison for me because my youngest son, Robin, was dating Charlie Wick’s oldest daughter and he was sitting in the Reagan box while I’m down there hustling for Ford. Of course, the Reagans came to Robin’s wedding and that was resolved. You get over it and replay it and, my gosh, how things all shake out.

Smith: How brutal was that convention?

Michel: Well, I don’t know. I look back and there were some strong feelings with some people, but I guess I wouldn’t characterize it as real intense.

Smith: It really came down to Mississippi, remember, Clarke Reed and Mississippi. What is it about Clarke Reed who has a reputation for, you can buy him, but he won’t stay bought.

Michel: Yeah, well, there were some characters over a period of our history who were very unique. And every once in awhile, I have to make mention of the fact that Haley Barbour is different than Clarke Reed, but still has those Mississippi roots, but he’s a different personality.

Smith: Were you consulted at all, asked for your opinion about the vice presidency that went to Bob Dole with other Republican House members?

Michel: I don’t know. I’m getting it mixed up now because, you know, Jack Kemp is going to have a big dinner with him for Occidental College. I’m just apprehensive how Jack will look because he sounded terrible on the phone when I heard him.

Smith: Did you stay in touch with Ford in later years after he left the White House?

Michel: Oh yeah, of course, I loved him, we just got the invitation for another Ford reunion. I’m looking forward to it, because boy those are all the old hard core guys who you just enjoyed being with so much.

Smith: In some ways, time was good to him. He lived long enough to know that people had come around to his position on the pardon. And I think people were taking a fresh look—

Michel: Yeah, he has to leave this world feeling that he’d really made a significant contribution to the betterment of things on all scores, adding up. He would have to have said, “Lord, thank you for looking over me the way you have.”
Smith: And, of course, Mrs. Ford, she went on to make history in her own right. It’s extraordinary the impact that she’s had.

Michel: Yes.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Michel: Well, he was a president who filled a gap, boy, at just a very, very critical time in our history. It’s like providence, playing a role and playing Jerry Ford the way the Lord wanted it to be played. He got to be Leader in the House, which he wanted to be, except that he didn’t make the Speaker. But of all things, events unfolded to the degree that he bypassed the Speakership and became vice president and filled the role admirably and went on to become president. And just for that one quirk of fate there, he would’ve been president. He would’ve made it. But all the good that he did and the good will that he has engendered over the years, the Lord would have to say, “Well done, my good and faithful servant.”

Smith: That couldn’t be better.

Smith: Stu [Spencer] – I asked him about this because half the stories appeared in print. Late one Friday, he was exhausted. The campaign wasn’t going terribly well. They were in the Oval Office. The only other person there was Dick Cheney. The president, being the president, loved nothing more than campaigning, and Stu had to find all sorts of evasive euphemistic phrases to suggest why that wasn’t a great idea – because they had surveys that, when he went out – Stu had some harsh words for the speechwriting outfit…

Orben: Everybody had.

Smith: Well, that’s one thing we want to talk about. But Stu said he would go out and deliver these not very good speeches and his numbers would go down. But how do you tell that to the president? So, Ford says, “Yeah, I’ve got to get out and talk to the people.” And, of course, he’s got to go out and eat some of that rubber chicken and do what he loved best. Finally, Stu just lost it, and he said, “You know, Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you are a fucking lousy candidate.”

Now, that’s stunning enough, and Ford just sat there and said, “Oh, okay.” What other president could you say that to? But the sequel is what makes it great. That story appeared in Jules Witcover’s book about the ’76 campaign, and Stu went ballistic when he saw it. He was embarrassed and angry at Cheney. He called Dick and read him the riot act and “can’t believe you would be so indiscreet,” and so on and so on. Dick sort of let him wind down, and then he said, “Stu, there was a third person in that room.” Spencer thought, maybe the president told that story, which I find very revealing in a number of ways.

Orben: Well, I’ll tell you, I have only once heard the president curse, and he never used that word. The worst I ever heard – are we rolling? – the worst I ever heard, if you call it worst – is we were in the White House Mess, waiting for the returns of the New Hampshire primary, and we had a wonderful oyster stew. I don’t know who provided that, but I still remember it. Finally, we hear the word that Ford had won the primary – New Hampshire – and the door burst open and there’s Ford coming in saying, “I hope that’s the last God damn time I hear that the only thing I ever won was the [whatever] district in Michigan.” And that’s the only time I’ve ever heard that.

Smith: But that’s doubly revealing because it suggested, obviously, that is a monkey he carried around on his back – the notion that he had only been elected to a Congressional district.

Orben: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: It legitimized him, in a way.

Orben: What district was it?

Smith: Well, I think it’s the Fifth now.

Orben: I think so, too. It has a vaguely familiar ring. But, yeah, he was hugely up as a result of that. We were all up because - I guess you’ve discussed this with many people in politics - running for office is an inhumane way of spending your time. I still remember on that very first day we were involved in New Hampshire, we went up and I had had a very light breakfast at maybe six o’clock in the morning at home, and hadn’t had anything to eat until nine P.M.

I’m going down to the dining room and I’m told that in Keene, New Hampshire things close at nine o’clock. I see Red Cavaney, who was then one of the advance men, walking across the lobby and I grabbed hold of Red by the lapels and I said, “If I don’t get something to eat I’m going to kill you.” And he managed to get some hamburgers from someplace, and to this day, whenever I see Red, I grab him by the lapels and I say, “If I don’t get something to eat I’m going to kill you.”

Smith: Let’s back up because you had a very distinguished career long before you ever set foot in the Ford White House.
Orben: Extinguished is the more accurate word.

Smith: Including working for my childhood hero, Jack Paar.

Orben: Jack Paar. I wrote for Jack Paar, I wrote for Red Skelton, I wrote for Dick Gregory during the civil rights days, and Red Buttons – a lot of comedians, yeah.

Smith: Who was the funniest?

Orben: Noooo – they’re all funny.

Smith: On their own funny.

Orben: They are all funny. As individually, with the exception of Red who wasn’t a close person, I told each one of them that, “You could write this stuff better than me, because nobody knows you better than you.” But they no longer have the time for it. And that’s true of presidents. Many presidents can write their speeches. Every once in a while, when the speech was not what Ford wanted, he would come in the next day or the next meeting and he’d have two or three yellow legal sheets that he wrote what he wanted. So the same applies.

Smith: It’s interesting because I’ve heard David Gergen tell a variation of that. That he saw something and thought, “Boy, this is really good.” And only after the fact learned that Ford had written it himself.

Orben: Yeah.

Smith: What is the professional and non-professional training/preparation to write for those folks? How did you wind up in the position?

Orben: Oh – at the age of seventeen or eighteen I got a job in a magic shop – a professional magic shop in New York. The Conjurers’ Shop in New York City, and I had been interested in magic as a result of my brother being interested in magic. When I was twelve-thirteen years old, during the end of the Depression, we went up to the Catskill Mountains and I was the Boy with the Radio Mind. We did an incredibly bad mind reading act. I think the audience knew precisely what we were doing, and here’s this fat little kid trying to be a mind reader and throw them money. At any rate, I finally got as a result of all this, a job as a demonstrator in a magic shop. This may seem off the topic, but it isn’t. One of the hot magic books in that time was a book called Smart Talk for Magicians. And I looked at it. It was jokes that magicians could tell – I thought oh, I can do that. When you’re eighteen years old you think this; nothing alarms you. So, I did. And I put out a grandiose book called The Encyclopedia of Patter, and it proved to be a hugely good selling book in magic, and then in show business.

I put out, ultimately, forty more like it, and I became known in show business as a comedy writer. Then I had a humor service that was a topical humor service – came out twice a month – and this was also popular in show business. But then businessmen started to come up, “Well, I could use this stuff,” so they subscribed and finally, politicians, and many politicians – the White House, half of Capitol Hill.

How I got into speechwriting was a little oblique. One of the CEOs that I was doing jokes for on a custom basis, his speechwriter became ill and he asked me could I write the speech. I said, “Sure, I can write the speech. The speech is the easy part. The jokes are the hard part.” And so I did a little speechwriting as well.

Smith: Are politicians, as a class, different from any other group in terms of appreciating humor? They do tend to be a little bit self-absorbed, which I think is the enemy of spontaneous humor.

Orben: What’s the difference with that and show business? No, they are very similar. I think people in show business have a little more innate talent. You have natural performers in politics, and you can name them as well as I could, including Reagan. But in show business you have to have a basic ability to stand up in front of an audience and make it; where in politics, you don’t necessarily have to. Adlai Stevenson was not a barn burner of a speechmaker, but he was a good man.

Smith: Was Reagan a once in a lifetime talent?
Orben: Oh, no. Good heavens, you had people like Mo Udall. We forget now how much of a reputation for humor Barry Goldwater had. The very first time I was ever involved in directly writing for a national political figure, was in 1964 when I was called down to Washington by the Goldwater people. This was before the nomination. They said we think we’re going to make it into the campaign and we’d like you to write special material for Barry. Okay, this was maybe April-May. So we worked out an arrangement where I would send him a page of material a day. Incidentally, all this stuff is at the Ford Library if they ever open the boxes that I sent them. And I did. A page of material a day during the entire campaign.

One thing I still remember about that first meeting is we concluded how this stuff would be sent, where the money, and all that. And then, as the others in the meeting filed out, Senator Goldwater said, “Bob, could you wait a moment, please.” They left and he closed the door and said, “Bob, I have a question, I’d like your judgment on something.” Okay. And he said, “I’m going to do a speech in another couple of days, and I have this joke and I want you to let me know what you think of it.” He told me the most horrendous joke about Bobby Kennedy and three nuns. I don’t think you could do it today on cable television. I’m standing there with my mouth dropped open and he said, “Well, what do you think?” I started to yammer, essentially saying, “Oh, well, it’s a good joke…I’m sure, I’m sure it’s a good joke…but is it really the right joke for this event…,” and I just yammered on.

Finally, Senator Goldwater smiled and he said, “Well, thank you, I appreciate your judgment.” I’m sitting on the plane, going back to New York, and I’m thinking, “He was putting me on,” and he had no intention – I don’t even know where he got the joke from – but he had no intention of doing it. He used a lot of humor during the campaign, which now seems to have wafted away.

Smith: He had a natural sense of humor?

Orben: Very good sense of humor, yeah.
Smith: I remember the delightful story, there was some golf club, I guess, in Phoenix, that had blackballed him. Do you know this story where he said, “Well, since I’m only half Jewish, maybe they’ll let me play nine holes.”

Orben: Or go into the pool halfway. Yeah, he used both. Actually, it was at that time that I was writing for Dick Gregory since 1962. I edited Greg’s first two books. One was a bestseller. Parenthetically, nobody ever asked me during my entire life, what party I was with. To this day, people assume I’m a Republican. I’m not. I’m not a Democrat. Nobody ever asks me.

Smith: But it is fascinating that you were simultaneously writing for Dick Gregory and Barry Goldwater.

Orben: Dick Gregory and Barry Goldwater at the same time. One of the jokes that I wrote for Greg was talking about Goldwater, and as you know the campaign slogan was, “In your heart, you know he’s right,” and Greg used to say, “In your heart, you know he’s white.” It didn’t conflict.

Smith: That was at that height of the Goldwater/Rockefeller fight.

Orben: Oh, yes.

Smith: Did you hear anything about that? Did he talk at all about that?

Orben: No, actually, I only started writing for him when he got the nomination. That was the deal. It was an incredibly rushed time for me because I had already signed with the Red Skelton Show, and I was going out to Hollywood with a contract that I thought was only going to last six weeks. It was one of these strange show business contracts where the contract was for six years, but the first option came up in six weeks. I joined the show at a point where six weeks would bring us to the election, and I figured that since my reputation was writing political humor, they were going to get me for six weeks of political jokes, and then I’m history.

Well, it didn’t work out that way. But at any rate, for six years I was out there writing the monologue for this Skelton show and on the way out to California, the Goldwater people were in touch with me, “Yeah, we want the material.” So at that point I was sending a page of material a day to Goldwater. I was sending a page of material a day to Dick Gregory, and I was sitting down to write the monologue on the Red Skelton Show. People always ask if jokes were interchangeable and I would say no. At the point where I’m writing Heathcliff and Gertrude jokes for Skelton, if one of those pages were sent to Goldwater by mistake, it would not have worked.

Smith: Did you ever run dry?

Orben: Oh, yeah. But you can’t run dry, in the sense that, at the point where the inspiration muse leaves, you have craft to fall back on.

Smith: How did you come to be in the Ford White House?

Orben: That’s a long story. Do we have four hours?

Well, now I’m in California and I’m writing the monologue on the Red Skelton Show, and come the early part of 1968 – well, I’ll back up. In 1968 Ford, as Minority Leader of the House, is asked to do the Gridiron Dinner. That’s ten minutes of humor. The Democrat was Hubert Humphrey, and the thought was that Hubert Humphrey really knew his way around with words. Ford gave something like 200 speeches a year, but humor wasn’t part of them. The brain trust for Ford decided maybe they needed professional help.

They sent somebody out to California – it might have been Bob Hartmann – who talked to Senator George Murphy, for his show business background. Murphy sends him to his friend, Red Skelton. Red Skelton sends him to the director/producer of the show and the producer of the show calls me and says, “We’d like you to do this.” I wasn’t very happy about this because it smelled of no money. As, indeed, it proved to be. One of the things I used to argue with the other writers on the show, here you people are so darn eager to send free jokes to politicians, and I have on my desk a little sign that says, “Anything worth doing is worth doing for money.” And I realized that I’m not going to tell Skelton no…so okay.

Now the interesting thing about that is whoever came out, and I think it was Bob Hartmann, had two names to get in touch with. One was George Murphy and the other was somebody who had written a lot of material for Goldwater in ’64. Me. So, one way or another, I was fated to write for President Ford. I wrote the material and Si [Seymour] Berns, who was the director of the show, who was a good stand-up comic, too, he read the material into a tape recorder and we sent it to Ford. Ford taped it and probably edited it based on what they needed, sent it back. Si and I, again, tweaked it, and back and forth it went a couple of times. It proved to be a hugely successful speech.

At the Gridiron Dinner everybody was expecting Ford not to do well, and for Humphrey to walk away with it. Instead, it was the other way around. I think Humphrey did well, but Ford was the surprise hit. And it had a joke that is frequently quoted. Toward the end of the speech, Ford looked around and Johnson was already out of the race, Humphrey was the presumed nominee, and Ford, looking at, I assume, at Humphrey, said that he has no eyes on running for president. He said he “loves the House of Representatives, in spite of the long, hard, irregular hours. But sometimes when it is late at night, and I’m tired and hungry, on that long drive back to Alexandria, Virginia, where I live, as I go past 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, I do seem to hear a little voice within me saying, ‘If you lived here, you’d be home now.’”

And in fact, in 1973, when he had to do the Gridiron Dinner as vice president, we couldn’t come up with a better line so we just repeated it.

Smith: By that time, though, it was particularly sensitive.

Orben: Ford had come to the conclusion that humor was a good thing. And so, through the years, through Paul Theis, who was then at the Republican Congressional Committee and worked with Ford, I would send material. They would ask me for a specific speech and I would do it. Then when Ford became vice president I was asked to be sort of an occasional consultant, and I was.

When Ford was preparing for the Gridiron Dinner in 1973, there was a lot of speculation about Governor Reagan – does he dye his hair? He had been in town just the week before and people were talking about getting snippets of his hair and testing it to see whether it was dyed. And Ford reprised all of this interest in Governor Reagan’s hair, and he is there to say that “Governor Reagan does not dye his hair. Let’s just say he’s turning prematurely orange.”

Okay, so we’re rehearsing the speech and Vice President Ford looks at me and he says, “Do you think the Governor would take offense at that?” Now, I’m seeing this blockbuster joke of the year go up in smoke, but I think I gave him a fair, honest answer. I said, “You know, Mr. Vice President, Reagan has been in show business a good part of his life. He has gone through a thousand roasts and I am sure he has heard dyed hair jokes. So, I don’t really think so.”

Well, jumping far ahead, it obviously was the blockbuster joke of the Gridiron Dinner, and it took on a life of its own, to the point where ten or fifteen years later, Johnny Carson was still referring to Reagan’s orange hair. Even though, I don’t think by that time, most people knew where it came from. And I’ve often wondered how much of a grudge does an actor, a vain actor, turned politician hold when he hears that joke – and he certainly knew where it came from.

Smith: Well, it’s interesting. I draw the parallel between Ford’s sensitivity there, about hurting Reagan’s feelings, and Hartmann’s famous story about the “long national nightmare.” The line that Ford wanted to cut from the speech because, as I understand it, he thought it was piling on Nixon. Kicking him when he was down.

Orben: That’s right.

Smith: And it’s a parallel.

Orben: And he was a somewhat friend of Nixon’s.

Smith: I see a parallel.

Orben: Same thing. But I wasn’t in a position to say I was going to quit. If Ford had really insisted, we would have taken the joke out. We took out a few jokes, not all on sensitivity lines, but not many. One of the things that I so admired about Ford, and it’s almost unique of all the people I have written humor for... I’ve gone on to be consultant to CEOs of some of the largest companies in the world. And when you first begin, you were always thought of as being the expert on humor. And then by the time it was show time, getting lectures on humor by people who had never written or told a joke in their lives.

I once gave up on a very well known political figure because his wife would take the jokes I wrote and try it out on people and come back and say, “Well, so and so didn’t like that.” I didn’t like working like that. So we come back now to what I was about to say, and fortunately I remembered.

Ford, if he trusted you, if you hadn’t let him down, would not question things. More often than not, the humor that I wrote for Ford was highly specialized, and in some cases referred to things that he was not conversant with. And if there was time, I would explain.

Smith: Does that include pop culture?

Orben: At that point there wasn’t the gap that there is now.

Smith: Why do you think there is now and there wasn’t then?

Orben: I don’t know why.

Smith: Do you think having teenaged children made a difference?

Orben: There always were teenaged children, they didn’t jump from kindergarten. However, when I was brought up, and when I learned my craft, and for years and years after that, the teenaged children, until they started dating, and the younger kids, and the parents would sit and listen to the radio together. They would listen to Edgar Bergen and Jack Benny and all the rest. When it became television, they would watch all the shows together. So there was a common culture. Then it went off on tangents. So no, it wasn’t that sort of thing. It was mostly something going on in that group at that moment that Ford wouldn’t be aware of. And I would explain the joke, but he would never say, “Do you think that will work?” “Well, okay,” and he would do it. So he was wonderful in that sense.

Every other performer, with the exception of Dick Gregory, Dick Gregory was his own editor, so I sent him a batch of material, he would take some of it, but he wouldn’t question material. Others were just awful. Particularly politicians, because in many instances - I realize this is the end of my career but my career is over anyway - politicians are running scared. They’re not used to standing up in front of an audience. And so they’re running scared and they want to make sure they are not embarrassed.

Smith: In one session Don Penny did with Tom Brokaw - I’ve seen the transcript - he says to the president, “In this job you have to be Fred Astaire.” And the president asked what he meant - “you have to tap dance constantly.” And it wasn’t something that Ford had done. I’m wondering, did he adapt to the demands of the job in that sense?

Orben: No, I think Ford – I don’t know that this has ever been written or talked about – but I think in school, Ford, if he was ever in a music class, he would have been called a listener. The teacher goes in back of each student, listening to what they’re singing and if they are nowhere near, at least in the Bronx, you became a listener. I think Ford’s monotone was that. I never heard him sing. When he was up in front of an audience and it was the Star Spangled Banner, he would move his lips. I remember once, at some event, some nice lady, as part of a women’s group, said, “Well, if the president would just stand with us in front of the piano and sing whatever,” and I said, “Well, maybe it would be better if you sang.”

So, I think it was a mixed blessing that calm monotone of a delivery, which was common from where he came from. He wasn’t inventing it, but it was not good for humor. It wasn’t good, essentially, for speech making, but in the early months it was good for the country because, boy, did he sound right. Did he sound like he knew what he was doing, and he did know what he was doing.

Smith: Did he take lessons? For example, we know that in the ’76 acceptance speech there was a huge amount, not only of preparation, but practice that went into that. Was there any of that in the early days of the presidency?

Orben: Oh, somewhere in the archives, because Bob Schlesinger, Jr., who wrote the book White House Ghosts, found the pages. The president had asked me, or Hartmann had asked me, for a critique on various speeches. At least three single spaced pages were written by me, and Hartmann didn’t trust anybody. He brought it to the president. The president read it in his presence, and then initialed it and gave it back to Hartmann, who gave it back to me. We rehearsed every speech. But not too much. I never thought that the president would hold still for extensive rehearsals…and indeed, later on, I learned that he didn’t. But for instance, on the humor events, we’d run through it maybe twice, and I’d tried to give him readings of a specific joke. But everything was rehearsed, and we did the same thing on the plane. I made most domestic trips and on the plane, except toward the very end when there was really no time, I would run through the speech with him.

Smith: Did he ever use a speech coach?

Orben: No. Not that I’m aware of. I was the speech coach and then Don Penny was doing it.

Smith: At what point do you become actually a member of the White House staff?

Orben: Well, seven, eight, nine days after he became president, I figured I’m going to hear from the White House. I’m living in New York and the phone rings and it’s Hartmann, and Hartmann says, “The president wants you down here.” I said, “When?” And he said, “Now.” I said, “I can’t come down now.” He said, “Tomorrow.” I said, “Okay.” I was having dinner with Red Buttons in town and Red wanted to wax nostalgic about the good old days, and so at midnight we’re walking down Broadway – Red is reminiscing, “There’s the Old Latin Quarter etc.” and I’m looking over my shoulder thinking that we’re going to be mugged – and there goes my White House visit.

So, at any rate, the next day, I think it might have been nine days later, but the previous week I had been in Washington working with Vice President Ford. I did a lot of humor for speeches and punching up speeches for the vice president. And so, I remember, he was going out on an eight or nine speech engagement that was, I think, going to end up in Hawaii, I’m not sure about that. But now it’s the week of the resignation, it’s Monday, and I’m down there to work on the speeches. I’m in Hartmann’s office for almost two hours, and we start to talk about the speech and Hartmann is called out and he’s gone for ten or fifteen minutes. He’s back and forth, and each time he starts to say, “Now, if we’re called across the street…,” and finally I said, “Bob, which street are you talking about? Executive Avenue or Seventeenth Street?” because I never thought Nixon was going to resign. Never thought.

So, I’m still there Tuesday working on the speeches that never got done, and a reporter came in. I turned over the speech, facedown, and he said, “Bob, what’s going on?” And I said, “Look, I’m a writer, who’s going to tell me what’s going on?” On the network news that night he was reporting that something must be going on because they brought their writer from New York. And I nudged my wife and said, “A lot he knows.” Well, a lot I knew.

Smith: Did you find out along with everyone else about Nixon’s resignation?

Orben: Oh, yeah. Oh, I had no idea that he was going to do that. And I had no idea that Ford was going to pardon him. I learned about that the morning of the pardon, when I’m still in New York, because I’d been commuting back and forth, when a Broadway actor who I knew called me up and said, “Do you know what that son of a bitch you’re working for has just done?” And I’m thinking to myself, now it’s early in the morning and I’m thinking, “Does he mean Skelton? He knows I’m not working for Skelton. He couldn’t mean Ford.” That’s how I learned. But at any rate, so maybe eight, nine days after the resignation, they brought me down.

Smith: When you were in there that Tuesday, just a couple days before the Nixon resignation, did you have any way of knowing if Hartmann was writing an inaugural address?

Orben: I don’t know. You mean the few words that he was saying?

Smith: The eight minute speech that he actually delivered.

Orben: No, my guess, I doubt it. That’s a good question because I had become very close to Hartmann through the years, up until he died. It would have been a good question to ask. But I would guess no, because Hartmann’s modus operandi was to leave somewhat early, come in the next morning and it was done. He would work overnight.
Smith: What made him a controversial figure within the Ford circle?

Orben: Well, I think Bob was mistreated, I would almost say. Bob had huge faults. I remember when the fellow who did the Ford book asked me to come in for an interview and I said, “Before you get started, you’re going to go through all this Hartmann stuff. He’s abrasive, and this, that and the other thing.” And of course he was. But he also was very astute and a good writer. He knew Ford’s style, he knew what Ford would say – and Ford, again, trusted him. He was curt, he was hard to get along with until you fought back.

He used to have, in addition to the eight o’clock senior staff meeting, a seven o’clock meeting in his office, which I always thought was absurd and told him that. But one time he was saying, “Did you see this in the Washington Post?” And I said, “No, I haven’t.” And he said, “Don’t you read the Washington Post in the morning?” And I told him, I said, “Look, Bob, you give me the limo and the papers in the back, and I’ll read them coming in as you do, and I will be able to answer your questions.” And that was the end of that. He would accept being argued with and fought back with.

Smith: I’m told he was utterly loyal to the president.

Orben: Oh, boy. Yes. And in my mind, Ford needed a few more of those in the administration.

Break

Smith: We were talking about Bob Hartmann’s loyalty and maybe the most historic example of that is his instant, and one might say courageous, response to the Al Haig feeler, for lack of a better word.

Orben: Well, it’s beyond courageous, it was astute. Bob had a very good sense of the total scene and wasn’t carried away by minutia. But he had a picture of where that might put Ford, and he was right. He was a hero.

Smith: Did he, in that sense, compensate for Ford’s credulity? I mean, there was almost an innocence, in some ways, I think, about President Ford. He believed good of people, which is great until they disproved him. It seemed to me, at least, that he wasn’t a guileful person himself, and just as he was a truthful person, he was capable of being shocked when people were not truthful with him.

Orben: Well, that’s very true. I think his personality was formed by his childhood and never changed. He was the same person who came out of Grand Rapids into Washington and retained all of what we now call family values. You may be right. I think Hartmann, in that instance, was protecting him from himself.

Smith: I only heard him disparage two people in the time I knew him. And the worst he could say was, “He’s a bad man.” That was the worst epitaph that he could come up with. One was Gordon Liddy, and one was John Dean.

Orben: That’s an interesting question – I can’t ever recall – coming back for just a moment: this question of, I don’t know why it popped into my mind, but Ford would hear you out, regardless of what. If you disagreed with him, you felt free to disagree with him. And put it as strongly as you could. What he wouldn’t accept is coming back the next day, or later on, and saying, “Well, let me again say…” That wouldn’t fly. I only tried it with him once and I apologized for it. When he asked Chevy Chase to be on that Humor in the Presidency, three-day conference, and I read about it, I called him up and I said, “Mr. President, this is not a good idea. You’re taking a potential viper to your bosom.” And, again, this speaks to what we were just talking about then, President Ford as a trusting individual. He said, no, he talked to Chevy Chase and Chevy Chase said that he was contrite and he would not do anything to embarrass the president. And I thought about it, and I called him a second time. And he accepted it, but he said, “No, Chevy Chase would be all right.” But he wasn’t.

Smith: He was not?

Orben: I don’t think so.

Smith: Really?

Orben: Because the whole thing resurrected this terrible time. I had often wanted to talk to President Ford after the fact of what he really thought about it. Because here is this star athlete, one of the most athletic presidents we’ve ever had, to be presented as a bumbler. And to this day, there are people who think that he was a bumbler. And, as we know, he was anything but.

I know he had a temper because one time I was standing in back of him at an outdoor rally at an airport, and I was maybe three, four, five feet in back of him, and there was a group chanting something off in the distance. And they got louder and louder, and as he was doing the speech I could see a vein on the back of his neck turn red and stand out. So he had a temper. But I never had the courage to ask, “What do you really think of that?”

Smith: And along with that, sort of first cousin to that, was this portrayal of him - where the word ‘decency’ was almost used as a term of condescension. “He’s decent,” which is a euphemism for “he’s not that bright.”

Orben: Yeah. Well, of course, this all goes back to the LBJ, “He can’t walk and chew gum” - that was a cleaned up version of it. But there was always a debate while I was there, which was most of the time, as to “Should we respond to the jokes about the clumsiness and the walking and chew gum?” There was the feeling that this only calls attention to it, which is nonsense because the attention is there. I think Ford overwhelmingly agreed with my viewpoint that we ought to do something about it. But sometimes the other side won, and my favorite response was when he went to a Yale law school event and he opened his speech by saying, “It’s a great pleasure to here at the Yale Law School’s Sesquentennial Convocation, and I defy anyone to say that and chew gum at the same time.” It made the start of all three networks. It was that sort of thing that I think we should have even done more of, because it indicated that he was aware of it and he could brush it off.

Smith: By the time I was writing for him, much later, maybe it was a little bit more relaxed and maybe I was a little bit more of a smartass, and I didn’t have the whole apparatus to say no. And it worked, so he kept on doing it. But the one thing he would never make jokes about was age. It was interesting. Reagan made a career out of it.

Orben: Well, he had to.

Smith: And was very effective at it. But he [Ford] wouldn’t do age jokes.
Orben: That’s interesting. I don’t even think that ever came up. Because, this is besides the point, but two things: one time I’m going through a display at the National Archives and they had pictures from World War II – photos – a picture on the flight deck of a carrier stood out. Sailors playing basketball. I got in touch with the archivist, or the curator, and I said, “Do you know who that is going up for the ball?” “No.” The only reason I knew it was Ford – he had sent me to a reunion of the ship, and somebody had that picture. He was really a good looking guy.

But, you know, he was a male model. Candy Jones, was a model at that time, I was friendly with her through another association, and she said that the other models, the girls, loved to be on a shoot with him because while most of the male models would be facing the camera, he would be looking at the girls. And they would be facing the cameras.

Smith: It’s a wonderful story. And, it does suggest a lack of vanity.

Orben: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: Which is not something you associate with male models.

Orben: I’m not suggesting that he was lusting after the girls, but maybe he was. He was a great looking guy.

Smith: Tell me about his sense of humor.

Orben: Well, I remember one time – he would see the craziness in things – one time we were doing something for the Alfalfa Club. I’m going through who would be at the head table - there would be president so and so, and vice president…and he said, “What do you mean president? I’m the president. Well, might there be something in that that we could have fun in playing back and forth?” And so I wrote a long development of the president there who was last year’s president, and then so and so will be next year’s president and all that. And it went on for about a minute and a half. And as we were rehearsing it, I said, “You know, Mr. President, this is called a running joke. I can’t tell you, if a running joke doesn’t work, how long a minute and a half will seem.” And he said, “Well, it’s fun. Let’s do it.” And it was a huge hit. He would occasionally say things about Kissinger, and I would write them down. Now, always, it was the germ of a joke. You had to make a joke out of it, but he saw the germ of it.

Smith: Now presidents do so many – there was the Gridiron in the old days, and now you’ve got the television, the Correspondents’ Dinner and all of those.

Orben: He did them all. It was the Alfalfa, the Gridiron, the Radio and TV Correspondents’ Dinner, the White House Correspondents’ Dinner, and the Press Photographers’ Dinner. But what was interesting and why there were editorials – I remember there was an editorial in the evening paper, the Washington – not the Times, but whatever it was – saying that it’s nice to hear laughter in the White House again. Because he started every speech with humor, and not the same humor. It was always custom written. Unless you have the Jay Leno staff, that’s almost impossible to keep up. But he scored very, very big with it.

Smith: Tell me about the speechwriting operation, because it did come in for some criticism. How was it structured and how did it work?

Orben: When I came aboard Paul Theis was the editorial director. He had the speechwriting operation and the research department. One of the problems with the speechwriting was that there were never enough speechwriters, particularly as we went into the campaign. There were three writers: Milt Friedman, Pat Butler, and me, and I’m sure in all this research, you’ve learned about Roman Numeral Two, and the shadow speechwriting group that was operating. No?

Smith: No.

Orben: Well, at any rate, our speechwriting operation was always understaffed – at best, we had maybe five, six writers.

Smith: Did that reflect a decision, I think early in the administration, for symbolic, and substantive reasons, to cut the White House staff? Sort of the anti-imperial presidency. I think Rumsfeld boasted about a 10% cut of the White House staff.
Orben: Well, that might be, and for all I know, that’s true. But we just never had enough speechwriters. When I took over in 1976, everybody had been let go except the three that I mentioned: me and Pat and Milt Friedman. We eventually acquired a few more, but we were always understaffed. I remember arguing with Cheney’s group about, my God we’re doing probably more speeches than any president has ever done, and we can’t grind this stuff out with so few writers. And they say, “Well, there aren’t enough slots.” I said, “For God’s sake, let go two of the gardeners.”

There was friction, as you know, between Cheney and Hartman. To what extent this punished Hartmann’s group, I don’t know. But there was a shadow speechwriting operation which we called Roman Numeral Two, because the very first meeting, the first week of 1976, when we were gearing up for the run for the nomination, it was in the Roosevelt Room, and Hartmann had put together a speech, an outline. You don’t put together a State of the Union overnight. And there was discussion about it, and on the other end of the table there was a Roman Numeral Two speech that had been prepared.

We then found out that there was a Roman Numeral Two group. Who was in this, beyond Gergen, I don’t know. But I remember at the end of the election, when we had lost, somebody came into my office and said he was a speechwriter for the other group. I said, “What speech, we never…” Through the entire time that I ran the speechwriting, as much as you run anything there, during the 1976 campaign, I was only aware twice that there was another speech in play.

But coming back to that meeting, Ford really got mad. He threw his pen down and said, “I don’t want this sort of conflict. Hartmann is going to prepare the State of the Union.” Of course, that meant us. But that never went away. And I don’t know why the president didn’t stop it. And I don’t know why Hartmann didn’t argue for more – to have it stopped. I would have loved to had Gergen working with us. Gergen is a wonderful writer, and who else might have been there that we could have used?

Smith: Where was he nominally slotted? Because he was in the White House.
Orben: He came in right at that first week of 1976…he had been working for Simon, over at Treasury, I think. Because I remember calling him almost the end of the year when this thing had been dumped on me. I never wanted this job. And my wife always said they made a big mistake because I could have been so much more effective doing what I was doing, which was adding the humor and punching up speeches. Now, I became a paper shuffler and that’s really what it amounted to.

Smith: What was Hartmann’s role?

Orben: Hartmann ran the speechwriters. I was nominally the director of the speechwriters, but I reported to Hartmann, and the president. Hartmann did some of the important speeches.

Smith: I remember hearing there were complaints about speeches not being done on time, that sort of thing. I hasten to add that was a rap on Hartmann, not talking about the rest of the office. But that is something I’ve heard.

Orben: Well, if Bob was responsible for a speech, it would be the overnight thing. But, I think that was relatively rare. The speeches were always ready on time, and in sufficient time. Actually, the concept was discussed with the president. Now Paul Theis did an interesting thing, which I never had time to do. We would go into the president and there would be such and such a speech. And Paul would come up with three ways to go with it in writing. The president would look it over, and then the president said, “Well, here’s what I’d like to do,” and sometimes it was picking up on one of the three items.

But the big problem in that whirlwind is that you did a lot of speeches where nobody really knew what to say. This is true time immemorial, and so, I think the press calls them thumb suckers. You come up with something and unfortunately, when you do that, it tends to be oatmeal.

Smith: Remember, there was a very substantive, and in some quarters, controversial speech that he gave at, I believe, Tulane, right at the brink of the fall of Saigon. Do you remember that?
Orben: Well, I wasn’t on the plane. That was Milt Friedman going down with – I don’t think Hartmann was aboard, even – usually I was on the plane, but I wasn’t that time. And as Milt told me, and again, this is third hand knowledge, he and the president rewrote the speech, and upset other people.

Smith: Including, I think, Secretary Kissinger.

Orben: Yes, I remember the name. Yes.

Smith: To make it more clear that, as far as the United States was concerned, this war was over.

Orben: That’s the story that I got from Milt when he came back. Kissinger did not take it well…it was never easy challenging Kissinger. I’m probably the only person in Washington, if not the world, who has ever been called arrogant by Henry Kissinger. That takes a bit of doing.

Smith: What occasioned this?

Orben: Well, we were coming up to the Gridiron Dinner, and of course I was writing the material for the Gridiron Dinner, and Rockefeller was also going to be one of the speakers the Gridiron Dinner. So President Ford asked, “Can you help Rockefeller on that?” And I’ve got everything else to do as well, and then Kissinger gets in touch with me and says, he’s going to be one of the speakers, could I do that? And I said, “I really don’t think so, I don’t think I have the time.” I said, “I’ll try. If I can think of anything, okay.” Scowcroft used to call me once a week, and then finally Kissinger calls from the plane and in the middle of shuttle diplomacy, and I said, “I don’t have the time, I can’t do it.”

The next time I’m waiting to go into the Oval Office, he comes out of the Oval Office and says, “You’re getting very arrogant.” And about a month later we’re in Vail and I’m coming in to a meeting with the president. I come in the door and he turns to the president and says, “That boy is sick!” And poor Ford is wondering what that is all about?

Smith: Was Henry sort of a lightning rod?
Orben: The biggest problem that I had, since I never looked on this as a career, and never wanted to be there except for personal loyalty to the president. I had no awe of Henry Kissinger, or anybody other than the president. And so, I remember one time during the campaign, we had written a pretty good campaign speech and Henry comes in with two pages – he had just been to Africa – and it’s an infomercial on what Henry did in Africa. It had no place in the speech at all, so I cut it out. And the next day I go back in with the speech and it’s back in because Henry made an end run. And that’s again, Ford accommodating people. And of course, to some extent you have to.

Smith: Before I forget, because you were there early on, how much friction was there between the Nixon people and the Ford people?

Orben: Well, there weren’t that many – Ford, as I remember it, had said to the Ford group, “They’re all going out of the plane, but not without a parachute.” And so, we still had all of the Nixon writers down the hall. Ben Stein, I wish we could have retained him, he’s a good writer. And poor Ben Stein, he did a few things for us and I had to edit and add some jokes to it. I remember giving it back to him and he gave me such an evil look. Here’s this comedy writer telling me…and he was right, in a way. But at any rate, they all went pretty quickly. Gergen went, they all went, all except John McLaughlin, Father McLaughlin.

My favorite memory on that is, come November, Nessen is doing the briefing on the turkey for the White House. And the press asks, how many pounds, it’s twenty-two, and how big, where did it come from and all the rest, and there was this modest lull, and then one of the press said, it’s in the transcript, “Speaking of turkeys, what does Father McLaughlin do now?” I think a couple of months after that…he was there for a long time what he was doing, I don’t know. We had nothing for him.

Smith: The reason I ask, I think it was Stu – they had gotten into the East Room for the swearing in. Sort of last minute with some members of Congress who were seated.

Smith: It was Stu.
Smith: Was it Stu? And when it was over a receiving line formed, and basically – Leon Parma told the story – Leon got in there – as an old friend, and he had a couple members of the hierarchy. They found chairs for them, and when it was over they left the East Room and this receiving line formed and everyone was encouraged to go down to the State Dining Room for refreshments. And he said you could see the Nixon people, en masse, peeled off and went back to wherever they worked, and the few Ford people and friends and family members went down to the State Dining Room. But it was two very distinct contingents.

Orben: You know, I can see that happening. I wasn’t here for that. But I can see that happening. There was vast distrust of the Nixon people, and likewise. There is something about that I’ve mentioned a few times and it’s never been reported, and I think it is very significant. When Ford was campaigning for the Republicans in 1974, we were out in California, it was a couple of days before the election, and Nixon was in the hospital. Ford went to visit him. Went in by himself, there was nobody else with him. Came out and we get on the plane to go somewhere else. Dr. Lukash sits down beside me and says, “You know, Bob, you might be thinking of a statement from President Ford if Nixon doesn’t make it through the night.” I said, “It’s that close?” He said “It’s that close.” Now, somewhere in the archive there is this statement that I wrote.

Smith: There were the political advisors that all told him not to go to the hospital. Not to see Nixon.

Orben: Yeah, well, sure. But if Nixon had not made it, how history would have changed.

Smith: Were there too many Fourth of July speeches?

Orben: Gotta have a Fourth of July speech!

Smith: But, remember the Bicentennial – at the time of the Bicentennial.

Orben: Oh, the Bicentennial.

Smith: When he was going from place to place…
Orben: Oh, I loved those speeches. Ford, in the midst of everything else, came to us and said, “This is an important historical moment,” and, in fact, there is a little booklet, and I think they were pretty good speeches. But, again, talk about the friction – coming back, Ford wanted those speeches and he wanted them to be good speeches. The second speech, I think, was in front of the Air and Space Museum. It was a good speech, and by the time we got back to the White House, the evening paper, the afternoon paper at that point, said that there was general criticism in the White House of the poor quality of this speech. Ford called a meeting in the Roosevelt Room, and he was mad. He said, “I don’t want to hear anything like this again.” It shocked me, actually. In Hollywood there is a lot of backbiting, but not within your own group and to the press. I’m sure there is some of it, but I was shocked, always when these things got into the newspaper. To my knowledge, that did stop. They didn’t hear the speech because the paper was there when we got back to the White House.

Smith: The acceptance speech at the convention was generally regarded as one of the best he ever gave. Were you involved in that?

Orben: Oh yeah. Oh, my God, yes.

Smith: And how long did that take to put together, and I assume he practiced a lot.

Orben: He practiced with Don Penny, and I must say, the one big credit I would give to Penny is that he wasn’t afraid to use the president’s time. To the point where, I understand, the president got mad. I was so aware of the president’s time, I would have rehearsed the speech twice, and let a lot go. But that speech was put together in a rather interesting way. And at first I had my doubts about it.

Break

Smith: We were talking about the acceptance speech and how it was put together.

Orben: Well, Shakespeare would never have put a speech together this way. This was Bob Hartmann’s idea and I thought this was incredible, undoable. Every State of the Union, all manner of people send you drafts of what they want to say, the Department of Commerce and whatever. So that we got. But then Hartmann’s idea was to let everybody have a crack at the State of the Union. And so all the writers…

Smith: Now, we’re talking about the State of the Union, not the acceptance speech?

Orben: I’m sorry, the acceptance speech. All the writers gave their acceptance speech drafts, and other people gave – anybody who was in hailing distance – gave it. And the idea was to let everybody know: now here was the framework for the whole thing, we’re going to do this, that, and the other thing. These are the points we are going to make, so it wasn’t totally freeform, but make these points in your own way. And then we got a table or something like this, and we stretched them all out and we x’d out what was no good, we checked off what might be good, and then we got that harrowed and winnowed down. And we eventually got a speech out of it that made the points and got the applause.

Smith: And contained the unexpected challenge to the challenger about debates. Do you know where that idea came from?

Orben: No. But you’re talking – I marvel at the people who remember everything. I have no idea. And sometimes you feel a little awkward about not remembering because these are historic things in a way. But, no.

Smith: Were you at the convention?

Orben: Oh, yeah.

Smith: People who were there, you get this sense that the platform, for example – their refusal to let there be a fight over the platform, to concede the foreign policy plank, for example. There is a sense that in many cases, the delegates’ hearts were with Reagan, even if they voted for Ford. Did you have that feeling?

Orben: Frankly, you don’t have a sense of anything when you’re moving paper. The one thing, once we won it, I went over to something at Reagan’s hotel and I was there in the lobby when the motorcade came up and Ford came across the lobby and up to see Reagan. I was hoping that he would choose Reagan. That would have been such a shoo-in, and it didn’t happen.
Smith: And you’ve heard over the years varying accounts, conflicting accounts, over whether people were told in advance, “Don’t raise this.” In fact, there is a condition of the meeting.

Orben: That’s what I’ve read, but how do you make such a condition? That’s absurd, these are two adults. I’ve never thought kindly of Reagan for doing all this. If he hadn’t challenged Ford for the nomination – we were all, in the Ford White House exhausted by the time we won the nomination. And the Reagan group, or rather Carter was rested, and tanned and ready to go.

Smith: What about the counter argument that Reagan, unintentionally, did Ford a favor in that he made Ford a much better candidate by that summer than he might have been, had he not been tested and challenged and forced, among other things, to become a better speaker.

Orben: I’ve heard that. I don’t buy that at all. Didn’t make any sense to me.

Smith: Did you do any writing for Mrs. Ford?

Orben: Only once, for one of the Easter events, some childhood thing. I don’t really remember.

Smith: We’ve talked to a number of people about this, and she’s written about it; was there a sense, within the White House, that she had some problems?

Orben: I wasn’t aware of it. I was totally unaware of it. Should I talk fast for these two minutes?

Smith: We’ve got about ten minutes.

Orben: Okay. I still remember her. When I got down there, this was nine days, maybe, after he became president. They had a gathering party for the vice presidential staff, and I was invited to it. And I still remember, she obviously had a terrible headache, but she smiled through every individual picture with all of us. The only awareness I ever had that she might have been, no – I wasn’t even aware then. I did this childhood type speech for the Easter Egg roll, and she spoke it in a dreamy playful manner. I didn’t know. Sometimes people do that when relating to children, so I didn’t think much about it, but I really didn’t have much to do with Mrs. Ford.

Smith: Speaking about the childish event, there’s a wonderful George Reedy story with LBJ – where the word came over, Johnson is doing an event with retarded children and he wants some jokes.

Orben: Oh, boy. For retarded kids?

Smith: And Reedy, without missing a beat, he’s at his typewriter, he says, “Fine. Tell him I’ve always loved retarded children, I used to be one myself.”

Orben: Oh, that’s very good.

Smith: Are there occasions when you’re asked to produce something that makes no sense?

Orben: Well, I would put it a different way – that’s a challenge. I remember one time around eleven o’clock in the morning, I get a call from Terry O’Donnell that the president just got a phone call from Bob Hope, who was in town getting an award for comedian of the century and he wants the president to present it to him. And I said, “Okay, when is it, tonight?” And he says, “No, it’s two hours from now.” I said, “Okay,” and he said, “There’s a problem. It’s Lincoln’s birthday and he’s doing the Lincoln’s birthday speech, so he’s going straight to the event and the motorcade is leaving.” So I grabbed speech cards, pencils and I run for the motorcade, get in the motorcade, and now here’s the problem: I’ve got to write these jokes and print them in such a way because he’s got to read them right off of what I’m writing. So I see him coming down the steps from the Lincoln Memorial, and I’m not finished yet. So I go up to the limo and I tell the Secret Service, “I know this is unusual, but I’ve got to ride with the president.” And fortunately, they used their heads and they let me in and Ford comes down the stairs and I say, “I’ll explain, Mr. President.” And I’m working away on the thing and he isn’t talking to me, thank God, and we get to the event and they are opening the door and I said, “Please one more minute,” so they close the door and I finish. And he goes out and does it, seeing it for the first time. Now this, again, comes back to confidence. Fortunately the joke doesn’t mean much today, but you rely on craft again. He said, “There’s really good news and bad news, my being here, today. The good news is I’m here to present my good friend Bob Hope with the award Comedian of the Century. The bad news is, how am I ever going to explain this to Earl Butz.” Now, Earl Butz was big news at that time, so that was wonderful. You try to explain to anybody today, and it’s all over.

Smith: I think the last time we ran into each other on the subway, there had been something in the Post that day. There was a story about something – someone wrote, maybe it was Howard Kurtz claimed that Ford had read instructions…

Orben: Oh, this is what I got in touch with you about. Yeah.

Smith: It was something where, supposedly there were instructions for the president within the text, and he read them…

Orben: Yeah, that’s a standard joke about speakers. No, I would never have ‘pause for laughter’ and it was that sort of thing. The only time, and I think this has been written about, when we were preparing for the Philadelphia Bicentennial speech, there was a name in it that human tongues were not meant to utter. And as we rehearsed it, he misspoke each time. You couldn’t change the name, that was part of it. So, what I did, I wrote the joke and pasted into his speech box, and I said, “If you get to this name and you blow it, go to this.” And he blew it, then he said, “I told my wife, Betty, that I knew the speech backwards and I think that’s the way I’m doing it.” Wonderful. So that’s the only time – but you would never put coaching instructions in a speech text.

I remember one time, somewhere in Minnesota or Wisconsin, he was doing a speech for conservationists, and he was talking about what a wonderful thing the government was doing in different areas. He said, “For instance, in the Hudson River, shad are once more in the river. They cough a lot, but they’re back.” And I said, “Mr. President, you’ve got to clue the audience that a joke might be coming, so it’s a sort of dust kicking tempo. You stop, and you smile, and then they cough a lot.” Well, it was a very hot day and he sails right through it. About a second later, there’s laughter – did you hear what he said?

Smith: At the end of the campaign did you think you might win?
Orben: Oh, yeah. I’ve got half of the victory speech. I left the plane in Boston, and I came down on the train with Jim Baker, and I’m working on – because Jim or somebody had been tipped by one of the polling organizations that we were going to win it by one percent. And I think that a lot of people felt that if we had a few more days, we would have won it. Yeah, we thought we were going to win it.

Smith: When was the last time you saw him?

Orben: Well, I think it was probably Rancho Mirage, two years ago. Except when we were in Europe a couple of times, we went to all the events. And, again, one of the things I felt bad about was that I still was in awe of the president’s time. Even though he now had plenty of time. I’m sorry I didn’t keep in touch. I kept in touch somewhat, and I did material for him for the Bohemian Club and things like that. But I only saw him, essentially, on those once a year deals.

Smith: You say you saw him at Rancho Mirage?

Orben: Yeah. Well, Rancho Mirage for the last of the Ford get-togethers.

Smith: Okay.

Orben: When he was no longer able to…you could see the deterioration. Ford worked a room beautifully. The feet never stopped. And the last couple of times here in Washington, he was in one place, and then he was sitting down, and then like a coronation crown emperor’s chair. He was sitting in a chair there.

Smith: How should he be remembered?

Orben: I think, at the time, I felt that history was going to award him huge amounts of credit. We forget how tense those times were. The troops were being alerted, did our system of government work? And with the same calm, knowing where he stood manner, he held it all together. The second speech he made as president was at Ohio State in the field house, 15,000 people, he said, “So much has happened since they asked me to speak here today, I was then America’s first instant vice president, today I’m America’s first instant president. The Marine Corps Band is so confused, they don’t know whether to play Hail to the Chief or You’ve Come a Long Way, Baby.” It really put the whole thing in context. He would have been a far greater president than the one he lost to. Now if there is tape, you haven’t mentioned the assassinations.

Smith: Tell us.

Orben: Unfortunately, I was present at both the assassination attempts. The first time I was still in the hotel working on the speech, and when I came out - the hotel was right across from the Capitol Building where he was giving the speech - everything was quiet. And I came running along and I heard Nessen giving essentially a briefing on the whole thing.

But for Sara Jane Moore, which was just, I think, six weeks later, I was in the motorcade two or three cars back on the left hand side of the street. The motorcade had been split into two columns because it was a small street. We were talking and I suddenly hear the shot. It was like a freeze-frame. You looked out and for a moment it was almost like a painting. Then the next thing I was aware of, people had picked up Sara Jane Moore like a battering ram and were running across the street and into the hotel. Meanwhile Ford is being jumped on and pushed into the limo.

Now we’re tearing along the freeway, 70-80 miles an hour, and in front of us is a press van. It was like a station wagon and there was the lighting guy and the cameraman hooked together with an electronic umbilical cord, standing on the back bumper, hanging onto what looks like a luggage rack. As I say, we were doing 70-80 miles an hour. Our driver, a volunteer, is really tense, and we’re creeping up on them so the Naval aide to the president - I don’t remember his name, good guy - said, “Son, maybe you ought to move over a little bit so that when they fall off, you won’t go over them.” Well, fortunately, they didn’t fall off. But I remember asking Lukash to take a look at the cameraman. He was an older guy and he was ashen white.

But there was sort of a little meeting on the plane after we took off, and I still remember, one of the press asking the president, “Were you shook up?” And Ford said, “No.” And the reporter said, “Well, you must have been because you said judgment instead of judg-a-ment,” in whatever he said afterwards.
We all had the freedom and the feeling that we could kid him and talk. I don’t know that I would have done that to Nixon or George W.

Smith: Is there a final, something surprising about him, something that people don’t know that they ought to know?

Orben: Well, it’s probably been said in one form or another, but he tackled things that he shouldn’t have been good at, and did them well. And I’m thinking in terms of my own specialty, humor. People ask me if you have to have a special bent for humor. I don’t know that Ford had a natural bent for humor, but he liked it and he had the courage to get the words out, and then wait for the laughter. That doesn’t sound like much, but I tell you from a lifetime of experience, it’s a lot.

Smith: Well, I also think he had an incredible work ethic, and I imagine it would almost be a challenge. He knew, to be a successful president, this is part of the job and he would work at it doggedly until he mastered it.

Orben: Well, that’s right, but I think we never saw that. I think that was up in the residence.

Smith: Perfect. This is fun.

Orben: Well, perfect, I don’t know.

Smith: First of all, thanks for doing this. We really appreciate it.

When did your path first cross with that of Gerald Ford?

Schieffer: Well, I interviewed him from time to time. I was a young reporter in Washington when he was up on the Hill, and later when I was the Pentagon correspondent, which was my first beat in Washington. This was when Mel Laird was the Secretary of Defense.

Smith: A legendary figure in his own right.

Schieffer: Of course, he and Ford were great friends. Ford was not exactly a source of mine in those days, but I can remember going up to the Hill to interview him about military stuff, and stuff that was on my beat. Then when he became president, I replaced Dan Rather as the White House correspondent. There had been a lot of controversy about Dan’s coverage of Richard Nixon and he had become the most well-known reporter in America and he had this huge following, almost a cult-like following. Part of this was the fault of Richard Nixon, because they had very shrewdly, when they decided to take on the press, they didn’t take it on as some sort of a monolith, they made it personal. And they picked out Dan and decided they’d dump most of the stuff on him, so he was extremely controversial.

Well, here I was over there covering the Pentagon and about the only people who knew my name was my wife and the people in my neighborhood. Suddenly I was sent to the White House to replace the most famous person in America. In fact, Gary Trudeau, right there on the wall is the Sunday column he wrote, the Sunday strip where it says, “Look, it wasn’t my fault they got rid of Dan Rather.” And it was quite a thing, so I covered Ford from the time he became president and would see him almost daily.
Smith: Let me go back just a bit because everyone talks about how different things were on the Hill in those days. And Ford certainly could be partisan as he demonstrated sometimes, I think to his later regret of the whole thing about Justice Douglas. Nevertheless, there really does seem to have been a very different kind of atmosphere.

Schieffer: Oh, no question about it.

Smith: What was different?

Schieffer: When I came to Washington - 1969 was when I came to work for CBS News - many of the congressmen on the Hill didn’t have press secretaries. The Hill is still the one place in Washington where you can have face to face daily encounters with the newsmakers themselves, the elected officials themselves. That’s almost impossible to do that any place else in Washington, but in those days, even more so. And that was one of the reasons that reporters liked Ford so much. He was so at ease around them.

Now, Jack Kennedy had these great personal friends in the press, Ben Bradlee, later the editor of the Washington Post, for one. Ford didn’t have any real buddies among the press corps, but he had this great working daily relationship with all of them, so he wasn’t cowed by reporters. He wasn’t scared by them. He wasn’t one of these politicians who figured they were always out to get him. He was realistic about it, he knew they were there to write stories and if he said something he shouldn’t have said that they were going to write it. But for that reason, he got along very well with reporters and it was because of that, even after we came to the White House.

If you were on Air Force One, we would sometimes tease him. I can’t ever recall another President that I’ve actually teased. I might have made a smart remark to them some time or said things in jest, but I mean we’d go back and forth and he was just a wonderful person to be around. He was a genuinely nice man. I’ve said many times of all the public officials that I’ve covered in the 40 years that I’ve been in Washington now, I liked Gerald Ford most of all. I didn’t always agree with him, but I liked him most of all.

Smith: Where do you think that came from?
Schieffer: I think it was just his being a regular kind of fellow. He liked to shoot the breeze. He liked to play golf. He liked to tell jokes.

Smith: Really?

Schieffer: I always said that the reason he had Dave Kennerly as his official photographer is he wanted to know all the gossip in the press corps. He wants to know who’s doing who and what the latest news on all of that. And Kennerly kept him, obviously, totally informed. But we used to have more fun with him. We’d sit in the back of Air Force One, and sometimes he’d come back and say, “Now, it’s got to be off the record.” And he’d sit down and have a drink with us. I don’t remember any other President that I’ve actually had a drink with as such. But he’d come back, it didn’t bother him.

Later in his presidency, he came to realize he probably ought not to have that martini that he previously had at the end of the day, but he was still having that martini when he was at the White House. I’ll never forget one time, we were on a campaign trip out in East Texas and it’s late in the day and he came down the back stairs of Air Force One. It’s a campaign rally, and the Kilgore Junior College Rangerettes were lining each side of that red carpet. Old Ford came off there and kissed every single one of them, every one of them. And Mrs. Ford was just furious about that. And, of course, we all let him know, “Hey, this sounds like Mrs. Ford she’s not all that happy about it.” “Oh, well, you know.” He took it in good humor. He enjoyed it as much as we did. I’d like to think that.

Smith: His sense of humor, what was it like?

Schieffer: Well, he just loved a good story. You know, he wasn’t a jokester, I mean, he didn’t really tell jokes, but he loved politics, he loved to talk about politics and he told good stories, but you know he had this infectious laugh. He had a big laugh and it was contagious. He was one of those people, you know there are some people that you see coming and you duck in the nearest door because you say, “Oh, here he comes,” of politicians, he’s number one, he’s got to tell you something about how great he’s done something. But probably if you’re not a reporter, he’s going to ask you for money, and so, they’re to be avoided at all costs.

Ford was the kind of guy, if you saw him coming, and I mean, this was before he got to the presidency, if you saw him coming, you stayed where you were because you wanted to chat with him because he was so down to earth - even after he came to the White House. Dick Gowald who worked for UP and was a friend of mine, UPI, he was Helen Thomas’ colleague covering the White House during Ford’s day, and Ford once told him a wonderful story. He said that when he was the Minority Leader, whenever he’d go over to the White House, he would always get a handful of the matches that used to be out there in the days when people smoked. At the White House, they always had these matches and they were very elegant, they said the White House or something on them.

Ford said he would always get them and put them in his congressional office and put them in a bowl on his receptionist’s desk because he said when the constituents come in from Michigan, they loved to take these as souvenirs. Ford said that one time after he became president, he said at that point, he just really couldn’t believe he was president, and he would go around the White House and every once in awhile he would just pick up a handful of those White House matches because he’d just been doing it all his life. And there were things like that that were so endearing.

Smith: You know, Roosevelt, FDR, designed a matchbook cover and it said, this matchbook stolen from the White House.

Schieffer: Yes.

Another thing, I have another picture on the wall up here and a letter that President Ford wrote one time. Once I was going to interview Ford and it was going to be Walter Cronkite, Eric Severeid and myself. And we interviewed him in, I think it was, the Red Room of the White House. And beforehand, I told my mother that I was going to interview him and she said, “Now, you remember to be polite.” And I said, “Well, mother, I’m always polite to the president.” And she said, “No, I mean to Walter and Eric.”
Well, somehow or another, this story got back to Ford, I didn’t tell him but somebody on the staff told him. Well, I know what happened, Dick Gowald heard about it and wrote a little story on the wire telling this anecdote. Ford sees that on the wire and low and behold, never said a word about it, but one day my mother calls me and said, “I just got this letter from President Ford.” And I said, “What was it?” And she said, “He said, ‘Dear Mrs. Schieffer, I just wanted you to know Bob was not only polite to me, he was polite to Walter and Eric’.” You know, he took the trouble to do that and that’s the kind of thing that he would do.

Smith: How much of that is the old congressman?

Schieffer: Well, it is, it’s all the old congressman. I mean, because that’s how congressmen were and are, you know. But he did it with such natural grace and that’s what gave him such an endearing quality.

Smith: Now, how much of his presidency was defined by the need to outgrow the parochialism of Congress while retaining whatever it was, particularly those personal qualities—

Schieffer: He didn’t have much of a chance. You know, I mean, there wasn’t a chance for him to get much legislation done. Inflation was totally out of control. But I will say this, I was totally against it at the time. I think his pardon of Nixon was probably as significant an action by any president that happened since I was in Washington. I was against it at the beginning, I thought he’d made a horrible mistake, but I later came to realize, and especially during the Clinton impeachment days, what would’ve happened if this thing had gone on and you’d had Richard Nixon in the dock. I mean the country would’ve come to a dead stop for two years with how long it takes these legal things to play out, even for a normal person.

I think it was a real act of political courage. I think he understood at the time, he had at that point decided whether or not he was going to run for president, but I think he understood even then that if he did that, it would probably hurt him if he did decide to run for president. And he told me later in his life, after he was president that he thought that was the main reason why he lost the election.

Smith: It’s hard to imagine what the mood was like in this town at the beginning of August 1974.

Schieffer: Well, for one thing, this had been going on for a long time and we tend to forget this went on for a couple of years and it just kept building and building and building and it was awful. I mean, there were people within the Nixon administration that wanted to kill us, and I mean that literally. When you look back at Gordon Liddy and those people who talked in a serious way and admitted later that they had talked about blowing up the Brookings Institute and setting off a bomb there in order to destroy something by one of Daniel Ellsberg’s psychiatrist, or maybe it was the Pentagon Papers.

But this was really nasty stuff that was going on. They were not trying to go after the press, they were trying to destroy the press. I mean, they went to our bosses in New York, Bill Paley and Frank Stanton and a lot of us didn’t know about that until afterwards - how serious it had been. They’d shielded us from that because they wanted us to keep reporting, but it was like something I’ve never experienced. I mean, I’ve had public officials on my case, I’ve been a reporter a long time. There’s nothing new about that, but this was something that was in a totally different league.

When Nixon resigned, the day he resigned, I was sent out to Andrews Air Force Base and the last time I saw him, he was still president as he went up that ramp of Air Force One and waved goodbye. Then I drove back into Washington and they sent me over to the White House because Dan was still there, but we’d heard he was going to introduce his new press secretary and it was a guy named Jerry terHorst and he was a tiny little guy. Everybody in the press corps loved him. He’d worked for a Detroit newspaper. When Ford came in there and he introduced him to the assembled press corps, Peter Lisagor, from the Chicago paper, a great guy, and he said, “Hold him up so we can all see him, Mr. President.” And Ford just broke out in a laugh and the room just erupted in laughter. And somehow it seemed like maybe it was the first time in a year that anybody had laughed in that press room. It was like after a hard rain and suddenly it had stopped raining. The air was clear and everything was different. It just smelled different in that press room after that. It was a remarkable thing.

You know, they went on to make the speech about “the long national nightmare was over”. That was a brave line. You know, he didn’t really want to put that in, but I guess Bob Hartmann wrote that and then he convinced him that that summed it up and I’m really glad he did because that summed it up.

Smith: It’s interesting, people who were in that room who have told us, and it’s not surprising, that once the inauguration was over, there was a receiving line and then I guess there was a reception in the State Dining Room and you could see the Nixon people just peel away and go back to their offices. And clearly much of that dynamic early on must have been “How do I balance fairness to the people who shouldn’t be tarred with the Watergate brush with the need for change, obvious change, to reassure the country?”

Schieffer: Well, I was not there for that reception. I was still out at Andrews Air Force Base. I got back when he announced the press secretary. But I mean for these people, there were some good people in the Nixon administration, they weren’t all crooks. And each of them, I mean, here they are, suddenly they were going to be out of a job. Suddenly what they had come to Washington to do, and which each of them was proud of, it was now something that were they going to be ashamed of it? I mean, it was a lot of introspection and a lot of people just were rattled. They didn’t know where this was going or what this was all about, and it was this great pall of sadness overall. I think that’s another one of those things that Ford did, because of his sort of all around good humor, I think he had a lot of do to with kind of getting people back into a better humor.

Smith: It’s interesting. When we talked to Rumsfeld, Rumsfeld felt that he should take some pretty sweeping changes early on and Ford was very reluctant to do that - in large measure because, again, he thought it was unfair to most of the White House people who had nothing to do with Watergate and shouldn’t be, as I say, tarred with that.
Schieffer: Well, there was a great humanity about Gerald Ford, and it was not something he wore around on his sleeve or anything, but he was just a great guy. He was a congressman; he had a feeling for people. He and Mel Laird, they were the real politicians in all this. I mean, Laird had become the great counterweight to Kissinger, the grand European strategist as it were. Mel Laird was the former congressman who knew what it meant back in the district when the coffins started arriving. And it was Laird, who I think had as much to do as anyone would with bringing the war to a much quicker conclusion. But he was a great influence on Jerry Ford and I think in many ways he was probably Ford’s best friend.

Smith: Well, it’s interesting because we talked to Laird and everything you say is completely borne out by that. But there are two things that Laird - I won’t say he didn’t forgive Ford - but he was very critical of Ford. Laird, of course, always had a scheme for something.

Schieffer: Oh, always.

Smith: Bob Dole said, “I always thought that Mel was the guy who poured the poison in the stream a mile up and then rushed into town to announce that he was saving everyone.” But Laird thought that he could put together a bipartisan delegation from both houses to come down to the White House to petition Ford for a pardon, and that Ford should wait until he had an opportunity to implement that scheme. It just seems, you were there, but given the mood of the country at that time, how could you realistically prepare the country for a pardon?

Schieffer: I don’t think you could. And now I’m not sure how deeply Ford thought about that. I think he just came to the conclusion that that’s what he ought to do and did it. And whether there was a better way to do it, or there could’ve been a better way, I really don’t have an opinion on that. But I was just so stunned that it happened. I mean, not even in my wildest dreams have guessed that he was going to do that. And I will tell you, the press went too far, as we always do, I mean the pendulum never stops in the middle. We fell headlong in love with Gerald Ford in the first weeks because he was so different. You know, I mean, you’d been there and then going through this thing with Nixon and all of a sudden here was a guy that made his own breakfast and I remember we took pictures of Gerald Ford making his own muffins and this was like Obama’s dog.

Smith: In part because Mrs. Ford had no intention of getting up to make his breakfast.

Schieffer: Exactly, and it was like a teenager in love and because we had been so smitten when he did this, we were crushed. I mean, we were just crushed. And so how he came to that, I mean, I never would’ve thought about it, and I never really came to any conclusions about.

Smith: Well, let me ask you because I think the turning point - it could’ve been in his mind for awhile, he was being told by Jaworski that in fact it might be two years before there could be a trial - but I think the triggering event was on August 28th, he had the first press conference in the East Room. You know, there was that Boy Scout quality about Ford. You could legitimately fault him for a certain amount of naïveté. He really believed going into that press conference that reporters wanted to talk about Cypress and Turkey and inflation and everything but what they wanted to talk about. And he went in and they wanted to talk about Nixon and his papers and his tapes and his legal prospects. And Ford didn’t handle it terribly well and he left angry. I think angry at himself as much as anything else. And I think that was the triggering event. Do you remember that press conference?

Schieffer: I do indeed and I do also remember that he was not happy with himself. Maybe we didn’t know all that much about him, but I remember we all remarked on it and thought about it and you may be right. That may be exactly where it kind of came together for him in his own mind. But you’re right, he didn’t like that press conference that night.

Smith: He had a temper didn’t he?

Schieffer: Oh, yeah?

Smith: Did you see it?
Schieffer: Yeah, every once in awhile, he’d get mad about something and he’d let you know about it and he knew a lot of words which you’d hear on the golf course or around behind the barn at the rodeo. I mean this is a guy, he’d let you know. He’s a big guy. He’s a tough guy. You know, this guy’s a football player and all of that and he was in such good shape.

Smith: Did that bother him, I mean, the way the caricatures took hold that he was clumsy and all that?

Schieffer: It really bothered him. It was terribly unfair and a good part of it was my fault. I think I probably wrote one of the first stories about him falling down on his skis. I had a great experience. Once during the campaign, by now he’d fallen down a lot and we were in Kalamazoo, Michigan and what happened was he was like a kid walking down the street and he says I’m not going to step on a crack in the sidewalk and suddenly there’s no way he can not step on a crack in the sidewalk. I mean, we were in Kalamazoo, Michigan, it was a whistle stop tour in Michigan on the train. He came out the back of the train to make a speech. It was a nothing, you know, it was a basic stump speech. We weren’t going to write anything about it and then of course he turned to go back into the train, the train jolted and he ran headlong into the doorjamb on the back of the train. Well, then we had to do the story.

So in those days, you had to go the local television station to file your story. We didn’t have microwaves and all that, so I go back into town, broke away from the campaign, put a story together and all that, was feeling real good about it and went out to catch a commercial flight to catch up with the campaign that’d gone on to somewhere else. As I walked into the aircraft and was turning to go into the seat, a guy in the back of the plane who worked in our Chicago bureau, I had no idea he was there, and he said, “Hey, Bob!” And when he did that, I turned around and just ran head on into the overhead luggage compartment and literally saw stars, I mean, I fell down and fainted for a fraction of a second. I wasn’t hurt. But anyhow, some time later, after all those stories that ripped about Ford, I felt compelled to tell him about it and when I told him about it, he laughed out loud and he said, “By God, I wish I could’ve been there to see it.” But that’s why you loved him because he loved things like that.

Smith: Did you cover him in the ’74 campaign? He goes out to the West Coast, end of the campaign, Nixon is at death’s door. Clearly everyone around him - Cheney told us yesterday - almost begged with him, begged him not to go see Nixon. Were you on that trip?

Schieffer: You know, I was on that trip, but I really can’t help you much. I don’t remember many of the details, but I remember we talked about it.

Smith: The ’74 election clearly changed things dramatically and permanently up on the Hill. There is a certain irony in that this guy who spends his life up on Capitol Hill will spend his presidency in many ways fending off Congress.

Schieffer: And you know, if I remember, we were on the road for that ’74 campaign, he had made all these commitments to campaign for people, so he kept them all and I mean, I think every single person he campaigned for lost. I’d have to check my papers on that, but I believe that’s right. I think every single person he campaigned for lost that year. But it was quite an election.

Smith: Before I forget, of course, in the middle of all this, Mrs. Ford has her breast cancer surgery. What do you recall of that?

Schieffer: You know, we had not seen very much of Mrs. Ford and we didn’t know her very well, those of us in the press corps. In fact, I think she was spending a lot of her time in bed in those days and I can remember going out in the Rose Garden on one occasion and seeing her up in the window of the White House in the residence there in a gown, in her nightgown, which she had a bathrobe or whatever, but it was clear that she hadn’t gotten up. I mean, she was down there waving to him down there in the Rose Garden, but we didn’t know too much about her, but there were all these rumors that she had a drinking problem and so forth.

Smith: But now when the breast cancer came along, one senses, after the fact, that people tended to almost treat it as a secret. That she brought it out of the closet.
Schieffer: My wife was a victim of breast cancer twice and they didn’t talk about breast cancer very much. And as I say, we had heard about Mrs. Ford and her problems, when she did that, it really did kind of change people’s perception of her and it was a wonderful thing that she did for cancer patients because she urged people to talk about it, to be open about it and people didn’t do that.

Smith: She then of course gave the famous 60 Minutes interview and I think the good grey political advisors in the White House all blanched and thought, “Oh my God, what has she done?” And inevitably the critical mail came in, but within a fairly short period of time, her numbers were much higher than his.

Schieffer: Is this when she talked about Susan?

Smith: Yes, and talked about abortion and if she’d been a teenager, she probably would’ve tried marijuana.

Schieffer: It was an extraordinary interview and it was seen at CBS as a real coup to get that interview. People talked about that for a long time. I mean, she was a real trailblazer in her own way. You know, it’s a funny thing about Ford. He was a solid Midwesterner, just kind of a mainstream, go to church on Sunday kind of guy and she was quite daring in her own way, in a very good way. But she would take a challenge. She would take a risk and I think a lot of women really admired her for that.

Smith: It’s interesting…I’ve always thought Hilary Clinton could not have said those things when she was in the White House. In some ways, we’ve almost regressed. Probably three or four years before he died, she came up with this idea for their Christmas card of the two of them with motorcycle jackets. And he said, “Oh, no, no, I can’t do that. That’s not presidential.” And apparently they made a deal where she could get 75 to send to their nearest and dearest friends who would understand. He went along with it, you know, which tells you something about their relationship.

Schieffer: I think it does.

Smith: She was out in front.
Schieffer: She was, she really was. And she, in her own way, had a great sense of humor. And I think he really adored her in his own way. They had one of those kind of congressional marriages for a long, long time where he was just gone all the time, but they seemed nice when you’d see them together. I mean there was a nice relationship.

Smith: And the kids, did you have any contact with the kids?

Schieffer: Yeah, I got to know Susan later on and she was around. I’ve known a lot of presidential children and seen various ones and, you know, I had a friend one time who used to be in the Senate, and I won’t tell you his name, but he said, “You know, if you’re willing to screw up the next generation of your family, then the rest of running for president is easy.” It’s awfully hard on presidential children. It’s awfully hard for them to live in the White House. But the Ford kids were older for the most part. Susan was the youngest one. And they already had lives and I’m sure it was hard for them, but I always found the Ford children to be more normal than your average run of White House children.

Smith: Talk about the fall of Saigon because here’s another Mel Laird ex post facto. This is where Laird gets emotional and, I suppose, as the architect of Vietnamization, you can understand that. Laird believes that if Ford had really tried, he could’ve gotten Congress to give him the 700 million dollars in the spring of ’74 to prop up the Vietnamese government.

Schieffer: But Laird was afraid that he wouldn’t do that and Laird always said he didn’t want Congress to take the money away. He thought that was the worst of all worlds to have Congress to cut it off and which was one of the reasons that he worked so hard to bring the war to a conclusion. I mean, the main reason he did, he just thought it was a folly. He thought we weren’t going to win and it just wasn’t going to happen. But he didn’t want it to be that president wanted to press on and the Congress stopped it, so that was one of the reasons he did. I think the other part of it was, and I don’t mean this in an unpatriotic way, but there was such a rivalry with Kissinger that I think Laird may have sort of enjoyed sticking it to Kissinger.
Smith: Well, and the strains in the White House. You had Kissinger, who by Ford’s own words, wanted him to make the “go down with the flag” speech. And then you had other folks, including Kennerly, who were saying, “Look, this is over and why are you clinging to it?” Did you sense that division within the White House?

Schieffer: Oh, yeah, and I remember when the stories first started going around that they were going to take Kissinger’s national security hat away from him. I mean, Kissinger, it was like he was not six inches from Ford for the rest of the day. Everywhere you went, it was like it was just some sort of glue, he’d glued himself to him, because Henry didn’t take those kinds of things lightly at all. But there were these rivalries. There was also Schlesinger who was in the mix.

Smith: Was it destined to fail just because of chemistry?

Schieffer: Yeah, and I’ll tell you why. Someone, and it’s not my story, but somebody told me Henry Kissinger would go in to see the president and he would say, “Mr. President as you are aware…” and he would outline the problem. Schlesinger would go in and say, “Mr. President, you don’t know this…” And Ford didn’t like him. Ford didn’t like him because he thought Schlesinger thought he was dumb. That’s about it. And everybody knew it and when he got the chance, he fired him.

Smith: And enjoyed it.

Schieffer: I think he probably did and I think there was some enjoyment on the part of Don Rumsfeld as well.

Smith: Well, part of the problem is that Ford had been on the Defense Appropriations Committee all those years and he knew most of what Schlesinger thought he didn’t know. I think the euphemism is “a professorial manner,” but it came off as condescension.

Schieffer: He was a very good friend of mine, Schlesinger was, and we’re very good friends to this day, but his people skills in those days were not what they could’ve been and he would tell you the same thing now.
Smith: Tell me about the role of Don Rumsfeld.

Schieffer: Well, Rumsfeld in some ways - when I saw him in the second round as defense secretary, I didn’t see much difference - he was pretty much today as what he was then. He was a guy who was very smart, but he was not to be challenged, and it was very difficult for people to work for him to challenge him. He’s not an easy person to work for.

But the big change for me was the change in Dick Cheney, who was a very good friend of mine in those days and I still have very good relations with him. But he was so down the middle, there was no partisan chip, he didn’t seem to have an ideology. As we later understood when he went back home to run for Congress, he did have an ideology, but we all thought, “Well, he’s just somebody who votes his district.” I mean, out there, gun control means a firm finger on the trigger and you can’t be for taking people’s guns away from them.

But I had no idea when he came in the White House for George Bush that we’d see him play the kind of role that he played. That was just totally different. I thought Dick Cheney was the single best staff person to work for anybody, whether it’s some subcommittee chairman up in Congress or somebody up in the White House that I’d ever known. What we did find out during the Bush administration is he did know his way around the PR bureaucracy, and all those years, we just didn’t realize how much he knew about it. He turned out to be a real operator. But the part about his very, very conservative views, that was unknown when he was in the White House.

Smith: What were the qualities in your estimation that made him such a good staff person?

Schieffer: Well, he was open, he was accessible. A lot of the reporters didn’t like Ford’s press secretary who had been a reporter for NBC, Ron Nessen. And Cheney, in many ways, became sort of the de facto press secretary and I used to talk to Cheney three times a day. I used to talk to him and I wasn’t the only one. There were four or five of us, but we didn’t fool with the press office. We’d call Cheney. I mean, he didn’t tell us any secrets. He wasn’t “Here’s the list of all the things we’ve done wrong,” but he was straight. He’d tell you something, and if he couldn’t tell you something, he’d say, “I can’t talk to you about that.” He just laid it down for you.

He was an excellent spokesman and had wonderful, wonderful relations with the press. The reporters that Cheney maintained sort of professional friendships over the years [there] were a lot of them, Tom De Frank worked for Newsweek in those days. Me, I mean, I used to talk to him. Later, I would interview him for Face the Nation. He kind of maintained those ties. He’d always come up to the Press Club, when they gave out the Ford awards.

Smith: Even when it was a little embarrassing, some of the winners.

Schieffer: Yes, yes, exactly. But it was very interesting to just kind of watch the changes in Dick Cheney. I asked him one time had he changed? And he said, “Well, the job changed, I had a different job.” And then he would say, “9/11 did change me.” But I’ve always said and I have no medical expertise whatsoever, but I’ve always wondered if the heart problems he had had some impact on his personality. But that’s for others who have the expertise.

Smith: TerHorst publically resigned as a matter of principle over the pardon, but it’s also been said, not just speculated upon, by a number of folks over the years, that there’s a little more to it than that. That he found the job overwhelming.

Schieffer: I don’t know the answer to that. I always liked Jerry. I didn’t know him that well. I knew him, but I didn’t know him that well. I’ve come to know him over the years in the Gridiron Club, but I don’t know.

Smith: It’s interesting, we talked to Bonnie Angelo. She was offered the job.

Schieffer: Yes, she was. I know that. Yes, she was.

Smith: Which is pretty remarkable when you think about it.

Schieffer: But I don’t know why she didn’t take that.

Smith: Well, I think she had [a child], I think she said he was 7 years old. I don’t know, but a young child and she couldn’t imagine the hours that the job takes. But, boy, what if?
Schieffer: Yeah, that would’ve been a big headline in those days.

Smith: Do you think they were slow on the uptake…the prospect of Reagan actually running, and then the seriousness of the threat Reagan posed. Were they slow to realize that?

Schieffer: Yes, they were and I think part of that was that Ford just didn’t like Reagan. He just wasn’t his guy, you know. And for one thing, he was out there on the West Coast and he hadn’t all that much dealings with him, but he didn’t like him and I think that may have been one of the reasons that they were slow to realize what would happen. And I think Ford always felt had he not had to fool with Reagan in those primaries that he would’ve had a better chance.

Smith: Did you spend any time around Rockefeller during his vice presidency?

Schieffer: Never did. Never did. Met him twice and he was, you know, a hail and hardy kind of guy and everything. One of the things I always regretted, he was one of the politicians that I never really got to get much of a feel for. Just see him from afar.

Smith: The question of whether he was pushed or…

Schieffer: Oh, he was pushed. No question. He was pushed. They just didn’t think it would work. I also think probably it was a safe choice.

Smith: Making him vice president in the first place?

Schieffer: No, I mean I thought it was a mistake to take him off the ticket and I don’t think Dole brought much to it that year. Remember he talked about Democrat wars and he had that bad Nixon “I need to look different” make up problem. Sometimes these cutting quips, they’re great cocktail parties, but it’s as Gene McCarthy found out, they don’t always work when you’re running, I think that was also a part of it. But, you know, having said that, I mean, it was a race between Carter and Ford and after Ford had pardoned Nixon and on top of that said that Poland wasn’t under the domination of the Soviet Union.

Smith: Yeah. What was your memory of that debate?
Schieffer: Oh, I remember that very well. I remember we just gasped when we heard him. And we spent the whole next day, we were out somewhere and I can’t remember where it was, but Cheney was on the bus with us and we were all on the bus, the press, and we were just chasing him around all day and they were working. And Cheney realized what had happened and he understood the significance of it, but it took him a while to convince Ford that he’d said something wrong. It went on all day.

Smith: Ford was a stubborn guy.

Schieffer: Yeah, he was stubborn on something like that. I mean, he’d get his mind set on something and you just weren’t going to walk him away from it, but it was clear that Cheney knew they’d screwed up.

Smith: Stu Spencer has a wonderful story, but it’s the second half of the story that makes it wonderful. Stu hadn’t really wanted to get involved in the campaign but he did, and he came here and things weren’t going terribly well. It was the end of a long week and he was in the Oval Office with the president and Cheney, just the three of them. The problem was that Ford would love to go out and campaign. He’d give these speeches, which weren’t very good, from the speech shop and he’d go out and he’d campaign and the numbers went down. So Spencer has to come up with a euphemism as to why the president should stay home - in effect the Rose Garden strategy. And nothing was working and Ford wasn’t getting it and so he finally said, “Look, Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you’re a fucking lousy campaigner.” Now, think of another president you could say that to.

Schieffer: Especially one who’d been in Congress all his life.

Smith: And Ford just sort of took it, but anyway it’s the sequel that makes the story, because that story appeared in Germond and Witcover’s book about the campaign. And Stu went ballistic and he called Cheney to chew him out and Dick sort of let him sort of rumble on and finally Dick says, “Stu, there was a third person in that room.” It never occurred to Stu that Ford would tell the story on himself. And he did.

Schieffer: I’ll be damned.
Smith: Which is revealing.

Schieffer: And there you are.

Smith: At the convention, I mean, how close was that?

Schieffer: It was really close, I mean, we went to Kansas City thinking, boy we had a great story. We’re going to have a contested election for the first time in nobody could remember when. And I guess it pretty much resolved itself in that weekend, if memory serves. But it was that delegation from Mississippi, it seems to me.

Smith: Clarke Reed.

Schieffer: Clarke Reed, yes. And it’s hard now, the details are all hazy, but it was a great story. It was a great story and Reagan came and, you know, I remember when there was one night, wasn’t there, that Reagan went to see Ford or Ford went to see Reagan.

Smith: And they’re still debating, after the nomination was over, the winner went to see the loser. And the Reagan people had made it explicit the condition for this meeting was that Ford was not to offer the vice presidency to Reagan, which I don’t think that Ford had any intention for reasons that you’ve outlined. And after the fact, some Reagan people were suggesting, “Well, if only he had offered.” And I think that sort of stuck in Ford’s craw a little bit.

Schieffer: I don’t think he would’ve offered it. I wonder if Reagan would’ve taken it. I don’t know. Maybe.

Smith: And then, four years later, you must’ve been at the Detroit convention where there’s this bizarre—

Schieffer: Oh my God, I’ve never seen anything like it, and if ever there was a scoop, I mean, getting Ford up and into that booth with Walter Cronkite. Everything at the convention came to a dead stop while people were looking up there, watching and trying to figure out what was going on. Barbara Walters, I wrote about this in a book that I wrote, she went up and started banging on the door of our anchor booth, “Let me in! Let me in!” And we told her, “No, you can’t come in here.” And we always wondered what she would’ve done if she’d have gotten in there. Would she have gone in there and sat down with Walter Cronkite and joined in the interview which was being broadcast on CBS or would she have tried to grab Ford and drag him off the set? We never figured out what she would do and I always teased Barbara about that in the years after that, but it was one of the great sights.

Smith: Now, I’m trying to remember, was it Cronkite who actually used the phrase “a kind of co-presidency”?

Schieffer: Yes! Yes, and it was all taking place up there and old Walter, I mean, he knew when he had something, he wasn’t going to let it go. I mean he would’ve interviewed him for the rest of the evening if he could’ve made that work. You know, Ford always really liked Walter. Always liked him and so he was enjoying himself and I think he enjoyed being the center of attention and all of that, and Kissinger was supposed to have worked out these arrangements and I guess Nancy Reagan saw it and said, “This is not going to happen.” Because, you know, George Bush had already packed his bags by then. They were checking out of the hotel. I mean, Jim Baker told me all about it. And he gets that call and the rest is history as we say.

Smith: And the inauguration in 1977 when Carter paid his very gracious tribute. What do you remember of the changing of the guard?

Schieffer: Yeah, and I can remember that Carter did that. It’s funny, though, what I remember about that is Carter walking up Pennsylvania Avenue. That was the one thing. But I also remember this, I had covered Ford during the campaign because I was the White House correspondent and then when Carter won, I switched over and started covering Carter which meant that I had to move down to Plains, Georgia. And I stayed down there in Plains until inauguration day. I would fly up to New York on Saturday morning and did the Saturday news because I was the anchor in those days and fly back to Washington where my family was, spend the night with them, get up on Sunday and fly back to Plains.
Our kids, they were little kids about this tall those days, my two daughters, and I remember Thanksgiving and my wife brought them down for Thanksgiving dinner and the only place we could find to eat was McDonalds. And they’d been in Plains for 20 minutes and they said, “Can we go home?” And during the election, they had had the election at school and both cast their vote for Gerald Ford and my mother who was just a yellow dog Democrat, I said, “You’d better be careful. I don’t think I’d tell Momo that.” And I said, “Why did you decide to vote for Ford?” and they said, “Better vacations.” Because they’d gotten to go, we got to go out to Vail for Christmas.

Smith: Clearly the Fords were beloved figures out in Vail.

Schieffer: They were and everybody out there loved them and they loved to go out there. It was a great thing for the press corps. Ford was very nice. I mean, he was nice in the fact that he would make sure that on Christmas day, for example, that he would have no schedule so the Secret Service and the reporters - they’d let us bring our families out there on a press plane - so we could have the day with them. And he would do things like that.

Tom Brokaw and I, Tom was the White House correspondent, the first year we went out there with Ford. Tom and I had this big party for all the press and the White House staff and my mother who lived in Fort Worth in those times brought just literally a washtub full of tamales from Texas. She didn’t like Republicans very much at all, but she loved President Ford and he came to the party and so she went and made him a big plate of Mexican food and she took the shucks off the tamales and he loved them and everything.

Well, later on, as you remember during the campaign, he’s standing there with John Tower in San Antonio and someone gave him a tamale and he just takes a big bite out of it, shuck and all, and my mother said, “That poor man, if I’d have just told him they had shucks on them, he would’ve known to take the shucks off.” She always felt so bad that she had embarrassed him. But we had great times out there.

Smith: Did you think toward the end of the ’76 campaign, they clearly were making up ground, did you think that they might pull it out?
Schieffer: I thought they might, yeah, I thought they did. And, you know, it was very close. But I did think he went into it way behind because he’d taken such a battle with Reagan. But I began to think toward the end that he really might have a chance.

Smith: On election night, were you at the White House?

Schieffer: I was. I was, and we didn’t see very much of him at all that night. You know, he stayed up in the quarters with Joe Garagiola, I remember.

Smith: Joe Garagiola and Pearl Bailey.

Schieffer: That’s right, isn’t it?

Smith: Kind of an unusual trio.

Schieffer: And then the next day he’d completely lost his voice and I really felt bad for him because he wanted to make it dignified and then he couldn’t even talk. I mean, that was just kind of, I was just sad, I sort of felt sorry for him.

Smith: Rex Stouten told a wonderful story because he was up there that night and about 2:00 in the morning, it was decided, at least the president decided, “Well, we’re not going to know for sure. I’m going to go to bed.” But it was not looking good. So Rex followed him across the hall in the bedroom and wanted to say something consoling, so he said, “You know, Mr. President, you really deserved to win” and so on and so on. “You’ve given your entire life in service to this country in uniform during the war and all those years on Capitol Hill and these last couple of years during an incredibly difficult time. And, you know, maybe it’s just time for you to take a well earned vacation.” And Ford said, “I don’t think so.”

Schieffer: That’s a great story. You know the guy meant well, but that’s not what you’re supposed to say.

Smith: Someone else said, and in fact, it took awhile for him to get over it. He was angry at himself and he would walk around the White House and say, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”
Schieffer: He didn’t like Carter either. There just wasn’t any, because they were just so totally, totally different. I mean, Carter had this religious, you know, “I cast my bread upon the waters and God will take care of everything” and Ford didn’t see it that way. I mean he just wasn’t that kind of a guy and he never cared for Carter.

Smith: And yet they, in later years, they became—Schieffer: Oh, in later years, they did fine. I mean, how could you not hate somebody or dislike someone when you’re in that kind of a _______.

Smith: And you saw him in later years. You saw him at the Press Club.

Schieffer: Yeah, I saw him. I interviewed him several times. I’ll never forget a year or so after he was president - I interviewed him a lot as the former president - and I’ll never forget one time I was interviewing him up in Rochester, New York. They had Secret Service and we’d set up our cameras and stuff in this hotel room and the Secret Service came along and they made us get out of there while they brought a dog in, you know, one of those big German Shepherds that sniff for explosives. Well, the dog was in there people would come in and out and we kept fighting and we kept fighting and I thought, “Oh God, one of these members of the camera crew’s got some marijuana in his camera case and the dog is smelling that and now we’re going to have to go and I’m going to have to explain all that so they won’t put him in jail.”

And finally they open the door and they went in there and it smelled, the smell of Lysol was just so overpowering that it took us back and they wouldn’t tell me what it was and finally somebody told me what it was. They’d used a local police dog and the dog had come in there and just taken a huge dump right where the president was going to sit down. Well, these guys, they didn’t want me to be the first to know about it, so somebody, there was no bathroom in there, so somebody had to go in there and pick it up and put it in his pocket and take it out and they said, “Now you can’t tell the president about this.” And I said, “The hell I can’t. Of course I’m going to tell the president about it.” So, he came in and I told the president about it and he laughed and said, “Well, everybody else does, so why not the dog?” That’s Ford.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Schieffer: Oh, I think he should be remembered as someone who had the political courage to do something that was extremely unpopular at the moment. It was the right thing to do, I think history proved it right and I think he was a very significant man. I mean, Gerald Ford was exactly what the country needed at that point in our lives. We needed a chance to rest and recoup and relax and sort of get things back on track. He was perhaps the one person who could do that. I mean, he’d come to the presidency just by happenstance, but I think the country was very lucky to have him at that time. I truly believe the pardon of Nixon was one of the most significant presidential acts of my lifetime.

Smith: I’ve often compared it to Harry Truman’s firing of Douglas MacArthur in terms of being hugely unpopular at the time, but almost impossible to criticize after the fact.

Schieffer: Yeah, very significant.

Smith: Yeah.

Schieffer: But something that had to be done. I’ve never thought of it that way, but that’s a good way to put it.

Smith: That’s perfect. Perfect.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this.

Kilberg: You’re welcome.

Smith: Tell us how your path crossed with that of the Ford White House.

Kilberg: Well, I joined the Ford White House in July, or the end of June 1975, and it was interesting why I wanted to come in there. I’d been a White House Fellow for President Nixon in the ’69-’70 class and assigned in the White House to John Ehrlichman. I left in June of 1971. However, even though I left, I had this psychological need as a young person to have my colleagues and friends know that I could go back, that I had not been part of Watergate, even though I left before Watergate ever started.

Smith: Based on what you had seen and experienced in the Nixon White House, were you surprised when the troubles began?

Kilberg: Well, because I was a real fan and mentee of John Ehrlichman, I was very surprised. I was not surprised that that kind of thing can happen given the general feel in the White House of a ‘we’ versus ‘they’ nature. But as to the individual person of John Ehrlichman, I was just floored. I still don’t think he got a fair deal. I don’t think he was a willing participant in creating a conspiracy, certainly not in having anything to do with the initial act.

Smith: What did you admire about Ehrlichman?

Kilberg: I admired his integrity. I admired his intellectual curiosity. I admired his organizational skills. I admired the fact that he really cared about young people such as me and would work very closely with us and wanted to have us grow on the job. And I admired him because he really had a very progressive domestic agenda. If you take a look at the domestic policies of President Nixon, he was probably one of the most progressive Republicans you’ve ever seen. And whether it was the creation of OSHA, the laying of all the groundwork for ERISA and pensions; whether it was the creation of the EPA; whether it was the first Affirmative Action Plan in the construction industry in Philadelphia; whether it was the AT&T settlement, which my husband actually did as solicitor of labor which involved associates for Civil Rights at the time, but which involved a massive settlement with AT&T with women - back in those days, women were not having the opportunities they have today - whether it was something I was deeply involved with, which was changing the whole definition of Native AmSmithan policy in the country, any of those by themselves would’ve been very progressive. Put together, they really set the Republican Party on a new course and set the administration in the White House on a new course. And I think they were all very progressive.

I think, though we will never know, that that was as much John as it was the President. I think the President set guidelines. The President said what he wanted to accomplish in general terms; I think John was not the one and only that made it happen, but framed it. And without the framing of it and without putting the meat on the bones - as you know, the devil is in the details - it would’ve been, I think, a very different domestic policy.

Smith: That’s fascinating on a number of levels. Of course, Richard Nixon has this reputation as somebody who didn’t particularly care about domestic policy.

Kilberg: You know, I think he did care. I don’t think he cared to get into the weeds, whereas on foreign policy, my impression was - and again, I was right out of school, I was a very, very young White House Fellow and they don’t take them that young anymore for a lot of good reasons - he wanted to be in every detail of foreign policy. I think that’s accurate. He didn’t want to do that for domestic policy, but he certainly wanted to put his imprimatur on it and tell people what direction he wanted it to go.

Even just taking two of the examples I can give is, one, Native AmSmithan policy where he was very actively involved in it in setting the parameters.
And, number two, was health care reform. Now, because of Richard Nixon, you had the creation of HMOs. Now, we all may think HMOs are a terrible thing these days, but back then, that was a major reform of provision of health care services. It was extraordinary. And he very clearly, well, Ehrlichman did - but he sent the instruction to move a number of us over to HEW and not come back until we had the outlines of a deal that everybody could live with. So I do think he cared. And I think his daughters think he cared. I know I’ve had a number of conversations with Ed Cox, his son-in-law, and Ed thinks he cared. I know Julie does, too, though I didn’t have a conversation with Trish about it.

Smith: Let me ask you - you get this sense of Haldeman-Ehrlichman - that it was like Lewis and Clark, almost one person. Were they different people?

Kilberg: I see Haldeman and Ehrlichman like this rather than going in one way. John spent a lot of time, just as one little example, protecting me from Haldeman. I mean, Haldeman had a very different viewpoint of how the White House staff would operate, what collegiality meant, what diverse viewpoints meant, and I think they were very, very different people. As you remember, the Roy Ash Commission created the OMB and the Domestic Policy Council. I think that the President wanted the Domestic Policy Council among other reasons, to insulate in some ways domestic policy from the most raw nature of the political process. And by creating a council and the process of putting John in charge of it, I think he accomplished that. I think if Bob Haldeman, on his own, had continued to go down the path, it would’ve been very different. So, I don’t know - they seemed to be, from a young person’s perspective, they seemed to be perfectly friendly, et cetera, et cetera, but I don’t think they were great buddies or very close. We convinced John to move out to Santa Fe where we have a home after he got out of jail. As a matter of fact I did convince the Council of the Taos Pueblo people to ask the judge to give John community service rather than prison, working with the Pueblos. And the judge said, “No.” But in that process, he started coming out to New Mexico before he went to prison, not afterwards, and settled there. So every summer, his youngest child, Michael - who was the same age as my kids - we spent summers together for seven or eight years until he moved to Atlanta. And even after he moved to Atlanta, I’d go and see him frequently and was with him.

Smith: Was he bitter?

Kilberg: Yes, he was bitter. He thought his dignity had been taken away. He thought everything he’d worked for had been taken away and that he was viewed by people as some sort of pariah and all the good things he did were ignored. He had diabetes and his kidneys failed. He was 73 or so, I can’t remember exactly, and he was up here.

Smith: He was a Christian Scientist, wasn’t he?

Kilberg: He was a Christian Scientist, but he did take medicine for his diabetes and he was not opposed to having treatments. If somebody had told him you have to have a kidney transplant, maybe he wouldn’t have done it, but he was taking dialysis. At any rate, every year for at least the last thirty years, we’ve had a reunion of our Domestic Policy Council. It’s always in November, the week after the election every year, even odd year elections because Virginia has odd year elections. And John would come to those. And it was probably a year before he died, he was pretty ill and his second wife or maybe third wife had already left him, but he had a gal. Do you remember Senator Talmidge?

Smith: Yes.

Kilberg: It was Senator Talmidge’s daughter who then began a relationship with him and was sort of helping take care of him. She brought him up to Washington and she and I stayed with him during our dinner that night and then in the day and then I took him back to the airport. And he said to me, “I won’t see you again.” I said, “Yes, you will because I’m going to come down.” And I came down to Atlanta and it was, I don’t know, maybe eight or ten days before he died and we watched the Superbowl together. You’ll have to tell me what game that was or what year, but it was a team he liked. And he looked to me after the Superbowl was over and he said, “Okay, may I go now?” And I just burst into tears and I said, “Do you want me to leave?” And he said, “No, I want to leave.” He said, “It’s time.” He said, “I want you to know, I’m not going to take any dialysis anymore.” And, by golly, he didn’t. But with his strength, it took him eleven or twelve days to die. That’s a long time for someone in their 70s to live without any dialysis. But he just said, ‘There’s nothing left for me here.” I said, “What about Michael?” And he said, “Michael will do just fine, but I can’t do it anymore.”

Smith: I assume there was no relationship with Nixon?

Kilberg: I don’t know.

Smith: Yeah.

Kilberg: I don’t know. I’d hate to tell you. I have no idea.

Smith: Let me go back to when you were there. There’ve been stories over the years in terms of what the White House’s attitude and, in particular, Ehrlichman and Haldeman’s attitudes were towards Republicans on the Hill. I assume from what we’ve been told, they liked Ford compared to Hugh Scott, for obvious reasons. What was your sense?

Kilberg: I don’t know. Again, I was a White House fellow first in the office of the Staff Secretary which was before the days that Dick Darman under Reagan turned that into a massive public policy bottleneck or hold. But I was there first and then when Ehrlichman became head of Domestic Policy Council, I went over and worked directly for him on that. I had very little relations with the Hill. The only time I had any relations was with the President’s Indian message, which you may or may not know about, but it basically redefined Native American policy from one of assimilation to one of self-determination. And part of that also included two major land mass returns. One was Lu Lake, which belonged actually to Taos Pueblo people, which had been taken inappropriately by the Bureau of Land Management or whatever and the surveying era 64 years before that. And then Alaska native land claims, which were both very important and of great economic importance, including the ability to drill oil. You couldn’t do that until you got this resolved.

This was ahead of energy significance especially in a time of tight energy. As you remember, we went into the Ford energy problem. At any rate, those were the times that I went up to the Hill when I was in the Nixon White House. And in those times, I didn’t sense it…I didn’t see in those two instances any catty comments or anything about actually Democrats or Republicans. I’m sure it existed in spades. I just had no reason to see it.

Smith: So, what did you do in between White House stints?

Kilberg: Well, I left in June. I’d gone to Yale Law School and never had any interest in practicing law, but everyone kept on telling me, including my then new husband, who went to Harvard, “You really need to give this a try.” So I went to Arnold Porter in June of 1971. I was there a little short of two years and I hated corporate law. I loved the people at Arnold Porter. They were great people. And eventually in an attempt to keep me, they put me totally on pro bono stuff. They were one of the first firms in the nation that would sign people on full time to do pro bono work, and I went on to work with a guy you may or may not know, Jerry Strauss, who later became General Counsel to Occidental. But at this point was a partner at Arnold Porter and we took on Buffalo Creek, to put you back many years.

The Piston Coal Company in West Virginia in Logan County would do strip-mining in Buffalo Creek. And they would just pile up the coal, kind of like when you’re in the sandbox when you’re a kid and dig it out. They’d just pile up the coal and did some reinforcement, but nothing that anybody today or even then would consider acceptable. Then there came a major rain similar to what you had in Nashville just this past week. And it just broke the dam and it killed 120 or something people. I mean, it came down that hallow and there was no place to go. We did that case pro bono and I worked on that for probably four or five months, almost camping out in Logan, West Virginia when it was not an easy place to get to in 1973. And then I just said, “No, I can’t do this anymore.” I left.

So I then went and I became Academic Vice President at Mount Vernon College, which was a women’s college at that time. It was trying to decide whether they would remain a women’s institution. They’d been a boarding school and a day school and a two-year junior college. And the decision was whether to take them into a four-year institution and remain women or not, single sex or not. And they wanted a business-type oriented person to do that. So I came in and did that. We decided to become a four-year institution. They decided to go into just four academic areas rather than the whole panoply of majors. And I was actually very happy there. I went there in June of ’73, but then came August of ’74 and I got a phone call from Don Rumsfeld, probably in September.

Smith: Did he know you from the Nixon White House?

Kilberg: Yes, he was Counsel to the President under President Nixon and he was head of OEO and he had an office in the second floor of the West Wing up next to what is actually now the counsel’s office. And I had a little office in the basement of the West Wing, where if you smiled, your cheeks touched walls.

Smith: Still location, location, location.

Kilberg: That’s right. Location, location, location. Next to Pat Moynihan who also – never mind.

Smith: Was he fun?

Kilberg: He was a great, just hystSmithal. At any rate, I didn’t know Don Rumsfeld. I went to the senior staff meetings in the Nixon White House as a White House Fellow, not because I had any right to be there by seniority, but because as a fellow, and this is also interesting - Nixon felt that the White House Fellows was a program he had a lot of respect for Johnson talked to him before he left the White House about it and he wanted the White House Fellows to have the broadest White House exposure. So, I became friends with Rumsfeld through that and also very close friends with Dick and Lynn Cheney who, at that point had two little girls. We used to be there late at night and Don would order us pizza and all that.

OEO eventually gave money for the Indian that occupied the BIA to leave town as head of OEO. And he kids me about that to this day, because when all these Indians left, we discovered three days later that they cleaned out all the art and some national treasures. So, Don had the State Troopers chase after them, et cetera, et cetera, so it’s always been a fun story. But, yes, I did know him and he called me and asked me if I wanted to come back to the White House. And that’s when I said to myself, “You know, I really need to be able to show in addition to the fact that it would be interesting, I need to show people that I can come back, that I had not been tainted by Watergate and that’s very important to me.”

In my career, I didn’t know Jerry Ford, but I instinctively liked him; but at the same time, I couldn’t leave. We’d started the academic year and I just didn’t think I could do that. So I said, “I have to wait until the academic year ends in May and then I’ll come in June.” I may have come in July 1, I don’t remember. But I had this conversation with Don, it was fine and checked off. And I saw Rod Hill who was Deputy Counsel and who was going to be my boss maybe a month or two before I was going to come and he had said to me, “Oh, everything’s fine. Great. Looking forward to having you.” When I appeared the first day in the White House, there was not a piece of paper because Don had gone over to Defense by then, hadn’t he, in May or July of ’75?

Smith: He went late, later than that. It was towards the end of ’75.

Kilberg: That’s right. He was still there, but Dick was his Deputy and was handling all that kind of stuff. And they let me in the gate even though now these days they wouldn’t, but they let me in the gate and I remembered most of the guards. And I’m waiting in what was the West Lobby in the White House and Dick came out and said, “I didn’t know you were coming. Nobody told me that you were going to be part of the staff.” I said, “Well, I’m here. I quit my job at Mount Vernon.” And he said, “Well, we’ll make it work.” But Rod was not a lot with follow-up often and Don had turned it over to Rod and Rod had decided this was great and fine. So, I came without an office, without a title, without a salary, but Dick worked his magic and I wound up in an office far, far away from the counsel’s office in old EOB for about three months until something opened up. But they did manage to pay me and give me a title. I had to wait three or four months to get in the White House mess because they had to go through with the titles, to be the Associate Counsel to the President. The commissioned officers stuff takes time. But I was there. I just had a little bit of a slow start.

Smith: What were Rumsfeld’s strengths?

Kilberg: I think Rumsfeld’s strengths were management, clearly defined objectives, and holding people accountable for results. I would say mostly that. I don’t think he thought nor would he conceive of himself as a strategic or philosophical thinker. He’s very, very results-oriented and liked to see how you’d go about it.

Smith: Obviously there’s a lot of ways to see the Ford presidency, One is the trajectory of someone coming in who had spent 25 years on the Hill, and who, in effect, has to learn to be an executive and a President. And there are those who believe that Rumsfeld was particularly good at coaching him.

Kilberg: Coaching the President?

Smith: Yes, along those lines.

Kilberg: Well, Rumsfeld had been in Congress.

Smith: He had. Yeah, but he had some executive experience.

Kilberg: In the private sector.
Smith: It’s interesting that he called you when he did because a number of people confirmed that he advised the President early on to clean house. It raises a couple of questions which I realize are speculative, Ford felt strongly he didn’t want to tar all the Nixon people with the Watergate brush. He believed in continuity, that there were a lot of very talented people. But it does raise the question of whether you can be too nice or not sufficiently ruthless in situations where perhaps ruthlessness is called for.

Kilberg: No, I think you have to look at how President Ford defined his presidency. And I’m convinced, though again, I stress I was a young staffer, I was not particularly close to him.

Smith: Right.

Kilberg: He knew who I was. He was very kind to me. He read my memos, but I don’t think I was a friend of his as I was with Bush 41. It was just a totally different relationship. But having said that, from what I observed, I think he defined his presidency in large measure as restoring civility to both the White House and to politics, and to give the AmSmithan people a feeling that it was okay, that we were a nation united, and that he was a good guy. And indeed he was a wonderfully good guy. But I really think he viewed that as his role, and I don’t think it was in his bones or his DNA to turn around and punish people by association. I know he came eventually to believe obviously that the President should resign, but I think it took him, from talking to Phil Buchen, who is no longer with us unfortunately, I think it took Gerald Ford a long time to get there. He always liked to believe in the best of people. And he did change. I mean, he immediately changed the White House counsel, obviously.

It’s interesting, also, too, I’m not sure I remember this correctly, but I think the White House counsel under Nixon’s office grew exponentially as he had more and more trouble. I may be wrong with that, but I think so. Our White House counsel’s office was six of us. There was Buchen as Counsel, Ed Schmaltz who was new, he had come from the private sector. But Ed was Deputy. Rod came in when Ed left, so it was Phil Buchen, Ed, then Rod replacing him, then a guy named Ken Lazarus, Dudley Moore and myself. And then one young fellow named Barry Roth and then we had two ‘legal interns’ who were in school. One was H.P. Goldsmith who is now a lobbyist and one was Mark Decker, whose professional history been a lot of real estate and investments. So, that was it until the guy from Idaho who - what was his name? A Senator who caused the whole CIA to be—

Smith: Frank Church. The Church Commission.

Kilberg: Frank Church. The Church Commission. Then there was a whole other group of people that were brought in as detailees in the counsel’s office headed by Jim Wilderotter, who at least I rarely saw. They were there, but there was kind of a Chinese wall. So it was almost as though ‘I don’t need a lot of lawyers and a lot of defensive stuff. I am who I am and this counsel’s office can deal very nicely being small and efficient.’ And we relied on the Justice Department an awful lot and Bob Bork and Nino Scalia, who was head of Office of Legal Counsel then. Nino’s oldest son, Gene, is a young partner of my husbands and he was going through his dad’s papers for some reason and he found a memo exchange - there were no emails back then - on a logistic(?) veto that I had with Nino and Bob Bork. And that’s the kind of stuff we did. I mean, we weren’t there in this defensive posture.

Smith: That raises a couple of things. First of all, I’d be interested just to hear you talk about Phil Buchen. There is this school of thought that says that the “Grand Rapids crowd”, by and large, fell by the wayside, or over time were ground up.

Kilberg: Hartman and Buchen and ______ Smith: Tell me about Phil Buchen.

Kilberg: I think Phil Buchen was a person who was extraordinarily secure in his own skin as to who he was. And I think his battle with polio really made him put the world in perspective. I was not there when they pardoned Nixon, by the way, I think that was his real trial by fire. By the time I got there, I was dealing with busing, the Arab boycott of Israel, the Secret Service and a bunch of issues, et cetera, et cetera, the arts. He was obviously dealing with other things that we dealt with such as economic deregulation. We dealt with deregulation of the airline industry and all that. Plus he was dealing with the Supreme Court, the appointment of Justice Stevens, and I’m sure lots of other things I had nothing to do with. But I never sensed that he often lost his cool.

Sometimes, from sitting in on – I did not sit in on the White House senior staff at that point even though I was higher rank now than I was as a White House Fellow - but in our staff meetings, I never saw him lose his temper. He would tell us sometimes, “You know, I’m out of the loop on this one,” or “Why don’t you all at that level try to find out what’s going on and come back to me.” But he was never kind of “How dare they do that to me?” or this or that. I think he was just delighted and thrilled to be there. Kind of a little bit in awe of “Am I really here?” But he knew that his friendship with Gerald Ford was as solid as it can be and that he would always be his advisor. And he would sometimes go in there, not for hours on end, but for a long time in the Oval Office, and my understanding is that they just kind of shot the breeze and they’d talk about issues and then just talk about their lives and their kids and Grand Rapids and all that. I think he was a very secure person internally.

Smith: People all talk about the normality of the people around Ford, beginning with the President.

Kilberg: Correct. Let me give you some examples. I was thinking the other day, our first child was born in March of ’75 and I came to the White House either at the end of June or beginning of July ’75. And I tried very hard not to go in on Saturdays and indeed in this White House that was not unusual. You didn’t have to. It was, again, a very-low key White House. But when I did come in,
I would bring Jonathan with me because I only had a five day a week nanny.
And I will always remember, one time the President called a meeting in the Roosevelt Room, I think it may have been on busing, I don’t really remember, but I think it was on busing, and I didn’t have a secretary. She wasn’t there. We didn’t have secretaries there anymore. And there was nobody there, so I kind of said, “What should I do?” And was it Nell Yates who was Ford’s Secretary?

Smith: Dorothy Downton?

Kilberg: Dorothy Downton?

Smith: Mildred Leonard, early.

Kilberg: I think it was Mildred Leonard who said, “Well, just bring him” because she didn’t want to watch him. So I had a little blanket and his teething toys and I plopped him down next to me in the Roosevelt Room. The President came in, looked at him, got on the floor and played with him, sat down in his chair and we proceeded with the meeting. Now, of course, once kids start toddling, it’s a little more difficult, but Jonathan wasn’t going anywhere, but it was just that kind of normality. “Oh, a baby. Good!” I mean, can you imagine any of these other guys? They’d just freak out. And it was just the most normal thing. And when we lost, this I remember because it’s on the back of the picture, January 9th, I had Jonathan with me again for some reason and the President saw him and he said, “I think he should sit in my chair.” I said, “What?” He said, “Come on!” So he came in, opened the Oval Office door, and he plopped Jonathan in his chair in the Oval Office and I had photos of that.

When we left the Bush White House, Bush 41, I said to him, “Mr. President, Jonathan has a picture in the chair.” He was now 15 or 16 years old. I said, “He wants another one.” And he said, “Sure!” and he stood behind him, but, again, that was different. I mean, there was a relationship that went back to when I was in college. I mean, I was part of that family. I was very close. I wasn’t that way with Ford, but he just thought, “There’s a kid. There’s my Oval Office chair. Let’s plop him down.” And the day we left office, he invited all the commissioned officers because I would’ve been the equivalent of the associate counsel to the president, I would’ve been the equivalent of a special assistant to the president. So it’s down to all your commissioned officers. How many that would’ve been, I don’t know how many that was.
Invited us all to the state floor to have breakfast, you know, a stand-up buffet breakfast and sit there and talk with them. And he came around, and I’m going to start crying when I think of it, because he came around and talked to everybody.

He thanked everybody for what they did and went upstairs and changed his clothes, I’m sure. And we just were, you know, just dumbfounded because it was just a lovely thing to do. And then a lot of us left and stood on the two sides of the portico, the north portico rather than south, and watched the limousine come up with Jimmy Carter and watched Ford greet him. We were not invited, obviously, at that part when they came up and had their own coffee. I thought, “This guy, 20 minutes ago, was just sitting there talking to the staff.” And when he lost that night - if you remember, they didn’t call it until the next morning - some of us didn’t get any sleep at all and got there really early the next morning and we were just hanging around the press room. The staff was in the press room and he came down and from the Oval Office and said, “I’m going to concede now”, went out to the press podium and conceded, and then came back and just kind of talked to us. And we’re in tears and he’s just telling people it’s going to be fine, it’s going to be alright.

An extraordinary guy. And, I’m sorry, after he left, and this was after Reagan’s first year in office and now I had four kids but only took the older two. John was only six or so and Sarah was four and took the kids to Disneyworld and we were going down. My husband’s a partner at Gibson-
McCutchten, so we were going down to La Quinta and we stopped at Rancho Mirage, the Ford’s family home, and with very little notice I just called whoever it was who was the secretary then out there and I said, “We’d like to drop by.” And she said, “Well, he’s on the golf course, but I’m sure when he comes back, I’ll call and let you know.” Called me up - again, we didn’t have cell phones – but, however, we got in touch, and she said, “Come on by.”
And he spent two hours with us, with the kids, showed them everything. I mean, I’m sure he had a lot of other things to do with his day. And, again, it was not as though he was doing this with someone who was a member of his senior staff who he was very close with. I was a junior commissioned officer, but it didn’t matter because I belonged to him because I worked for him.

Smith: He was very proud of the team that he put together. And it’s interesting. Even people who tend to dismiss the Ford presidency, if you scratch the surface, they’ll acknowledge, “Well, yeah, they put together an amazingly talented cabinet and White House staff,” which also tells you something about the level of comfort, the fact that he was comfortable with people who had huge egos and huge IQs and agendas of their own and never felt threatened.

Kilberg: And that he brought in, he just died recently, Bob Goodwin, right? The guy he brought in to be kind of the scholar in residence who then went to Brookings who kind of wandered around and never had any role? It would’ve driven me nuts. But he would just kind of come around and sit in on meetings and pontificate and then leave. But Ford liked that. He wanted somebody around. That was Ford, wasn’t it? I know it wasn’t Bush and I’m sure it wasn’t Nixon.

Smith: Well, I heard President Ford say one of the appointments he was proudest of was Dan Boorstin as Librarian of Congress and that’s pretty distinguished.

Kilberg: Yes. And you also think – you were talking about the kind of person he was – one of the last things I did was the clemency. In the end we had to make an announcement, which I was in charge of, to create the Clemency Board or did it basically say, “We’re giving amnesty to everybody or everybody coming home.” But remember, he made it possible for all the kids in Canada to come home.

Smith: Which was not a popular thing to do.

Kilberg: No, and actually it was so unpopular that when it came time to announce the policy, everybody turned red and I was the one who went after the White House press corps. And I guess the theory was that these were the young people who were my age because I was – I’m now 63, so back it up.

Smith: Late 20s?

Kilberg: Well, at the end, almost 30. But these were my friends, I mean, not necessarily my friends, I happened to be in favor of the war, but these were my colleagues, you know, people my age and my peers. And he just felt very strongly that it was a part of the healing and he said, “We need to heal the White House and we need to heal this country.” Part of the healing was people needed to be able to come home and rejoin their families.

Smith: People tend to overlook the fact, but it was only three weeks apart - the announcement at the VFW convention of this program and the Nixon pardon. Party of the same effort, along the lines what you said.

Kilberg: What we did in the end of 1976 was we brought it to closure and we declared that everybody could come home. I’d have to go back and look at my notes and you could do that easily, too, in the library. I have it somewhere. I can get it for you. But that reminds me also, not to beat a point, but would somebody please come get my papers? I have tons of papers of President(?). This was when you still could take things legally. I have tons of stuff, most of them are not originals. I think I left the originals, but tons of copies of all sorts of things.

Smith: I’ll pass that on.

Let me ask you. Did you feel uncomfortable at all as the only woman in the room? One senses that you were on the cusp.

Kilberg: I was on the cusp. There was an article that I have at home that’s framed by Isabelle Shelton from The Washington Star. She did this big, huge article on me which says, “What’s a nice girl like you doing in a place like that?” or something because I was the only woman. I suppose I was one of the few women in a professional role in the White House. I certainly was the woman lawyer floating around. I mean, Carla Hills was Assistant Attorney General for Anti-trust, I believe. There was a Women’s Office, but that was very different. I never, certainly not from Gerald Ford nor from anyone in the counsel’s office nor from anyone of the Justice Department that I dealt with, felt that anything was strange.

Smith: Nor Rumsfeld.

Kilberg: Nor Rumsfeld. Nor Cheney. Absolutely not. Lynn would’ve killed him. He was very fair. I always found that I was very lucky to have opportunities that other women hadn’t had before me and I was very sensitive to that. But I never felt, certainly not in the Ford White House, any sense of discrimination or that the quality of my work was being scrutinized in a different way or anything like that. But, if you go back to the Nixon White House, and that’s almost another generation in many ways, and, there - again, there wasn’t such a thing as email at that point in time - in the Domestic Policy Council, they divided it up so everybody had certain cabinet members and agencies you dealt with.

Plus, before that, as the Assistant Staff Secretary, I had to be able to deal with all cabinet members, because all their papers came through me and through my boss. Ehrlichman had to call every cabinet member and follow it up with a letter saying that “Bobbie Kilberg is a member of my staff. She’s authorized and required to talk to you all and you need to take her calls when she calls,” because I couldn’t get anybody to call me back. But it was not the cabinet members. What it was was the gatekeeper secretary, who invariably was female. It was not that she didn’t like the fact that I was female and was trying to have access, it was that she couldn’t conceive that I really could be senior enough to be talking to her boss because I was female. Because it was totally out of their experience. That hadn’t happened before. And their answer was, “Well, if you’re calling me and you’re a female voice, you must be a secretary just as I am, and so if I’m going to put you into my boss, you tell me what you want.” So I had a heck of a time for the first month or two in the Nixon White House - not getting anybody in the Nixon White House to call me back- that was not the problem – but getting any cabinet members in departments or agencies. That was the real issue.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Mrs. Ford?

Kilberg: Very little. I had a lot of contact with Susan Porter-Rose, who was a very close friend of mine. I had very little contact with Mrs. Ford. I was invited once to a tea up in the family quarters, which I think included women from other departments and agencies, but I had very little contact. I’m sorry, I take that back. I did have one experience with her and that is, at some point in 1976, after the people splattered blood when they came through on the tour – it was calf’s blood or something – the Secret Service said, “Enough of this.” They wanted to create a different receiving area which was more removed. You used to come right into, literally, the East Wing without having any sort of additional checks before that. And so, I did wind up having some interchange with her because the design didn’t have to be approved by the Secret Service, it had to be approved by the Capitol Planning Commission and everybody else and she had an interest in what it was going to look like. And I was the legal person who was walking around with all these darn diagrams and schematics and all that. So I wound up having some interaction with her, but it was just maybe once or twice.

Smith: I’m wondering whether there was background noise in the fall of ’75, late ’75 when she does the now famous 60 Minutes interview. And one senses the good grey political types in the White House are aghast initially. And it takes awhile for people to realize, some poll numbers come in - the country’s changing, particularly post-Watergate. People look at her as refreshing.

Kilberg: And not standoffish like Mrs. Nixon.

Smith: And the Ford presidency’s all about restoring not only confidence and dignity and trust, but also openness.

Kilberg: Yes.
Smith: She becomes a symbol of that.

Kilberg: As you know, there’s the staff mess, the Navy mess in the White House. There’s a regular staff mess and a senior staff mess. I don’t know if there was a senior staff mess initially, but by Bush 41 we had one. At any rate, there was this staff mess and I remember sitting around - if you didn’t have a guest - you would sit around this circular table and I do remember sitting around the circular table and having the guys kind of questioning things. I can think of two guys, but I can’t tell you their names, but two guys in particular who are actually people who dealt with the Hill, saying, “Oh my gosh, how am I going to deal with this?” and “Why would you say that?” And I also remember then the head of the CIA.

Smith: Bill Colby.

Smith: Oh, I’m sorry.

Kilberg: But I’m trying to think, because he would come over sometimes and just sit at the round table. And we had a discussion about how refreshing it was because she was kind of like Barb, Mrs. Bush is like that. He felt totally at home with her because that’s just what he got every day at home and if any of this had happened to Barb, she would’ve gotten right up and told everybody right away. So, I remember talking to him about it. I’m not sure if it was at the time of the 60 Minutes interview or not, but yeah. And that’s the other thing the President would do - and Bush 41 used to do this as well - would come say to me sometimes, “I’m just continuing Jerry’s tradition” – he’d just come down often and just kind of plop down and sit in the mess. President Bush 41 would do that, too, but he’d come more often into the senior staff mess.

I remember one time when we were all just very upset about the budget agreement that Sununu and Darman and Gingrich had forged. And Nick Callio, who at that point was head of House Relations, was sitting in the staff mess at the round table, sitting here and facing there and the door was there. And he was just furious about the President. “How can he do that without including us” et cetera, et cetera. The President walks in and I’m going like this and Nick just keeps on talking and talking. And the President comes up and he puts his arms on Nick and starts massaging his shoulders and said, “I know you used to love to work here.” And of course, he didn’t do anything about it. He said, “I understand your frustration and I’m going to try to work through it.” And we just plopped down and tried to figure out a strategy to deal with all this, but Ford was very much like that. I mean, I can’t think of a funny story like that, but I remember his just coming in and plopping him down and sitting with the staff and eating.

Smith: School desegregation. I’m from the Boston area originally and knew Kevin White quite well and did some work for him. And know now that he had national aspirations at one point and they went up in flames at that time.

Kilberg: And that was really one of the remaining major - you had Detroit and the Supreme Court ruled that you couldn’t force the busing of white suburban kids into Detroit. You had to be within the parameters of the city, which didn’t do Detroit much good, if you believed in busing. And then what you had was Boston and with Boston tentacles, if I remember, were a lot longer in the sense.

Smith: Geographically a much larger area.

Kilberg: Geographically, yeah.

Smith: What was the administration’s position?

Kilberg: Well, the administration’s position was interesting. I dragged out Jim Reichling because I was trying to remember all the parameters on that. Ed Levi, the Attorney General, was a major influence on that and he took a very long time to decide where we were at in that and I remember numerous members going back and forth and it just confused the heck out of me because I wasn’t sure where we were. Eventually we had two separate meetings in the Cabinet Room that included Levy, Buchen, myself, David Matthews, and other people. Cheney. I’m going to say Rumsfeld was in that picture, because that wasn’t right because he was at Defense already. And our position - and a lot of people accused us of not being very clear, even at the end - what we eventually got to was that, in order to force busing, you had to have shown that there was an actual practice of past discrimination that lead to segregation and that often related to housing, back to housing, that would require you to remedy that versus saying simply, “Detroit is (or Boston), there aren’t any white kids here, therefore, it’s somebody’s fault and we need to bring the white kids in by force.” Is that de facto versus de jure? It’s kind of complicated. I’m not sure it’s easy to say either way, but I know we used those terms in the legislation, and I don’t know whether our legislation passed. We asked for legislation, but we eventually left it to the courts and it kind of subsided. And if you ask people today about busing, they look at you like, “What are you talking about?”

Smith: Looking back 30 years, was busing kind of an aberration, a noble experiment doomed to fail? What was it? A phase?

Kilberg: I don’t think it was a phase. I think there clearly had been many wrongs. You clearly had segregated communities and in some cases, not only in the South, but in the North, people intentionally creating situations or systems so that these kids were separated out or segregated out, even if they lived fairly close to each other. And I think people had all the good intentions and motives. I think it didn’t work because, in fact, when you take kids out of neighborhood schools and bus them across town or wherever else, you’re leaving a very important component of the educational experience, which is being in a community. You’re losing that and I’m not sure that - because you had tracking systems in these integrated schools - you had that much integration. You had some, yes, but you wound up having, if I remember back to those days, in some of the studies we saw, the white kids on one track and the black kids on another track. Now, was that something that argued against busing?
No. But did it argue against the school systems actually dealing with the systemic problems? Yes.

It was fascinating to me to watch, in college and after that, in the school systems that - and I don’t know why - the kids often segregated themselves back out socially. You had some kids who were really brave and crossed those lines and forged friendships, but a lot of it was their own social segregation back. Now, was that to say that the parents ought to say, “Okay, you all just want to not integrate yourselves with each other, so we’re going to drop it”? No. But I just don’t think it worked. It didn’t improve educational performance, it didn’t improve relationships between the communities, and it took kids out of their communities. Was maybe economic integration the better way, i.e. as people integrated themselves by their income levels, you had true friendships and educational experiences? I don’t know.

But I remember there was one time that the President called over Attorney General Levi, I think it was on a Saturday, and Phil Buchen went and told me to wait in my office and I waited for hours. And they just spent hours, just the three of them, in the Oval office, just talking about it. And I remember then, we wrote up the President’s statement. We didn’t write up the legislation, the Justice Department wrote up the legislation, we reviewed it. But then I think it just kind of died. It went up to the Hill and I don’t remember it ever coming back the other way. Did it?

Smith: I’m wondering about the tension between, in effect, a President putting himself implicitly or explicitly in opposition to Court orders.

Kilberg: Well, that depends how you define the Court orders. What was your experience with White?

Smith: Well I wrote speeches for him and I watched. He was scarred for life by the experience. He started out as this kind of John Lindsay, street corner liberal who, I think, in many ways was redefined by the practical realities of going through this experience. He was a very different mayor at the end of 16 years from what he had been at the beginning. And right in the middle, came this civil war on the streets of Boston.

Kilberg: Yes, correct, but, if I remember right, what the Court said was that you cannot force suburban school districts who are not part of the city - the entity - to bus their children into Detroit even though the result of you not doing that would mean a predominantly, overwhelmingly, 98%, or whatever, black district. What we were saying was a logical extension of that, which was that, unless you could show that there was clear evidence of distinct practices that lead to that segregation, you couldn’t do that.

Smith: Was it a particularly sensitive issue? I mean, in terms of not wanting to appear that you were lending aid and comfort to the Louise Day Hicks’ of the world.

Kilberg: Yes, to those terrible people. And they were terrible people.

Smith: You knew who they were.

Kilberg: Yeah, and Louise Day Hicks was a very bad person. I think the President thought he was doing what was right. I mean, he was a Yale Law graduate, thank you very much. I don’t think he was a constitutional scholar, but he clearly understood the law. And I think he was comfortable with doing what he did. However, I do think also that obviously he spent a lot of time with the Attorney General and Phil walking and talking it through, because I think he wanted to get it right. Would he have spent that amount if he had been Nixon or Carter or Bush or Reagan? Probably not. But he was a lawyer and he was interested in the intricacies.

Smith: Also, tell us about Ed Levi.

Kilberg: About Ed Levi? I don’t have much I can tell you. I was just kind of in awe of him.

Smith: What made you in awe of him?
Kilberg: Because he was a professor and he just sounded brighter and smarter than anybody else and he wore bowties. He’d walk into a room and he could be very condescending.

Smith: Really?

Kilberg: Yeah. And he could be very certain of himself and very dismissive if you had other opinions. So, if you’re a young lawyer, you can be pretty scared of him.

Now, I’m sure Nino Scalia wasn’t scared of him and other people weren’t scared of him, but I was scared of him. I kind of stood behind Rod or behind Ed Schmaltz during that time.

Smith: Talk about an overlooked contribution - in terms of taking a tarnished Justice Department and restoring standards.

Kilberg: Yes, absolutely, and that’s all part of it in that he was very certain of himself and he had very ethical standards and he was going to pose those and that was absolutely fine. You just asked me why I felt I was scared of this person.

Smith: You were just intimidated.

Kilberg: He was intimidating, which was funny because he was small and wasn’t very big and kind of wiry. But he was. But I also do remember having very frustrating conversations with the Justice Department - about that I spent a lot of my time, while Phil and Ed or Phil and Rod didn’t. But the other four of us did, in doing a review of the FBI clearances for positions. Because you’re bringing in new people and you want to be sure of a very strict ethical standard. You’re going to look very carefully at their backgrounds. And I got so darned tired of reading. The FBI would go and ask their set of questions. “Do you beat your mother?” “Do you hate your wife?” “Are you sleeping with so and so and so and so?” And reading this day in and day out, what neighbors would say about people, no basis in fact, just, “I think” or “I don’t like the color of their hair.” And the FBI would just write all this down and give it to you.
Smith: A raw file.

Kilberg: Yeah. And you’d sit there and read it and say, “Where’s the analysis?” “Where’s the backup to this?” “Where’s the substantiation of any of these charges?” And Ed Schmaltz looked at me one day after we had some nominee who turns out to have had major fraudulent finances in some major deal that went south - there was no Google then or anything else - it was just shoe leather. Ed said to me something about, “This guy doesn’t smell right.” I said, “I think you’re right.” So he called up his friends on Wall Street and we began to piece together a story. We discover that indeed this person was being looked at by Morgenthau in New York, which we hadn’t known or had any access to. And we thought, “Here’s the FBI worrying about who’s sleeping with whom or who’s not taking out their garbage and they were paying no attention to all to possible economic malfeasances or whatever.” I mean, yes, they asked what your income was and they checked and made sure you paid your taxes, but there was no analysis on this stuff. And we really worried about that stuff related to ethics and government. It was one of the things that we really pushed the Justice Department to do something about - the FBI was independent - nonetheless to get the FBI to start focusing on it.

Smith: Who was the FBI Director at that point?

Kilberg: It certainly wasn’t Bill Webster. I don’t remember. I have no idea.

Smith: A couple other things and then we’ll let you go. Did you have any contact at all with the Vice President?

Kilberg: Rockefeller?

Smith: Yeah.

Kilberg: Only because I came to New York as a Nelson Rockefeller Republican. My godfather was Ken Keating.
Smith: I’ve been working for ten years on a biography on Rockefeller and so I have a particular interest in the subject.

Kilberg: Ken Keating was my godfather and had convinced me to work for Rockefeller when I was in law school - for his presidential race during the summer instead of going to a law firm.

Smith: ‘68?

Kilberg: ‘68. So, I worked for Dick Nathan on the domestic policy side. I’ll get to the point of if I had contact with Rockefeller. I did not have relations with Rockefeller.

Smith: Get that on the record.

Kilberg: Get that out now. But at any rate, I worked at 30 Rockefeller Center. It was really interesting. Rockefeller set up his policy team for his presidency at 30 Rockefeller Center. It was Dick Nathan, a bunch of people, and then two of us who were junior interns. Then Kissinger was on that same floor with Nancy McGuiness, who was then not his wife. Nancy Hanks was there and Jonathan Moore and just a great group of people and I was literally the youngest person there. We would go to the kitchen, which was on the floor also, during the day and open it up and it was stocked full of Pepperidge Farm cookies and shrimp et cetera, et cetera. Every once in awhile, they would send us over to deliver something or to talk to the delegate counters or the political people who were in some damned warehouse somewhere, blocks and blocks away in New York City, where you have to kind of walk over the rats and everything else. And he just had this food there because you had to keep these kinds of people, who were his type of people, happy - and those other people, who did that stuff, you’d keep them over there.

His office was just a series of old metal desks and tables and all the delegate books around; of course everything was on paper in those days. But at any rate, we had this wonderful, elite, expensive suite and then it came time to go to the convention - and you’ll like this also - and they forgot about me. And eventually the Governor said, “Why isn’t she going?” And they basically said, “Well, we’re out of money. We didn’t think of it. I mean, she really doesn’t have any relevance. You’re not going to sit at the convention and worry about domestic policy.” And he said, “No. She goes. And Mark,” who was a Harvard undergraduate, “goes too.”

And so they put us up, a boy and a girl, in the suite that he had in the _____ where he was going to make the deals. And so we were in charge, our only job was to be sure the suite was secured so Mark and I, there was three bedrooms in here and he had one and I had one and we would rotate and we would be sure that the suite was secure. And all sorts of people came wandering through there. I’m sorry I can’t tell you at this point, I can’t remember who they were, but all sorts of state delegation heads, et cetera, et cetera, would come in and meet with the Governor. And it was clear that it wasn’t going well, because I could see the Governor’s face when they left. We used that suite and I was there that night when the count came and he did not get the nomination. And then I didn’t see him or anybody else for that matter, many of those people, until he became Vice President. And Peter Wallison is a very close friend. Wallison was a partner of my husband’s, so we were very close. And Dick Parsons and I forged a real friendship during that period of time and Dick went off and would come down to my office and plop himself down and talk about how it was very frustrating that the Rockefeller people really couldn’t get through the system and couldn’t really be part. And I was not senior enough to really see that, but Dick really felt that the Vice President was supposed to be - “the concept of being in charge of or having a lot of say in domestic policy” - but, in fact, nobody was really listening. That’s the sense that I got.

Smith: Yeah.

Kilberg: And then Susan Herter, who you know lives in Perocking(?) now about twenty minutes from us in Santa Fe, she for a time was there, too. Remember Susan?
Smith: She replaced Ann Whitman.

Kilberg: Yes, that’s right. At any rate, no, I didn’t have much contact at all, but I did have the sense that they really did not feel that they were really part of it.

Smith: He went to his grave believing that Rumsfeld did him in.

Kilberg: Right.

Smith: Of course, no one ever wants to blame the President and I think a lot of it was it was naïve of him to believe that realistically he was going to be given domestic policy. And to some degree, he wasn’t completely honest with himself. He said, “I’ve known every Vice President since Henry Wallace and they were all unhappy.” On one level, he went with a realistic set of expectations, but someone—

Kilberg: But he’d been the Governor of New York State.

Smith: He did and more.

Kilberg: And more.

Smith: And he was a Rockefeller.

Kilberg: And he was a Rockefeller. And he built single-handedly all of these stone by stone by himself.

Smith: Exactly. But someone close to him tried to talk him out of it during this brief period when he was considering it. And after about fifteen minutes, Rockefeller says, “Look, everything you said makes sense, but you don’t realize, this is my last chance.” And when you really stripped it all away, at the bottom, there it was and it never went away. And that almost guaranteed that he would be frustrated, perhaps more than frustrated.

Kilberg: I do remember Dick Parsons being with us in most of our meetings on busing. I do remember that and I think I’ll go back and try to find that picture for you.
I think he was around the Cabinet Room table as well. I seem to remember that. Again, I apologize. This is all so long ago.

Smith: You’re doing great.

Kilberg: Okay. I’m just sitting here looking at notes about things we haven’t covered and one of the things that occurred to me was the whole concept of deregulation. The one I worked on was deregulation of the airline industry. And who was the guy from Cornell who was head of CMV?

Smith: Alfred.

Kilberg: Alfred, he was CMV.

Smith: There were several. It will come to me, but I can see him.

Kilberg: Yeah, me too. Kind of looked like a younger Alan Greenspan.

Smith: Exactly.

Kilberg: Yes, okay. This is terrible. At any rate, Jim, who then tried to run for the Senate in Virginia. He tried to challenge Warner in the primary. He was on the staff of the CEA, the Council of Economic Advisors. And Jim then became the star at Heritage. Jim was very strongly in favor of deregulation and the CMV chairman, “Alan,” I think was probably somewhere in the middle. But what struck me was when not just the airline industry CEOs came in, but other business CEOs came in, and didn’t like this at all. I mean, it was the concept of businesspeople actually liking the free marketplace - which I thought made a lot of sense - was for them horrifying. And they predicted that there’d be turmoil and lots of airlines would go out of business and the President’s attitude was, “Well, that’s the free marketplace and maybe these airlines don’t –“

Smith: Alfred Kahn and Jim Miller.

Smith: Alfred Kahn and Jim Miller.
Kilberg: And Jim Miller! Thank you. But the President’s attitude was that is the marketplace and if we’re talking about Republican principles and we’re talking about the economy working, it ought to be what succeeds, succeeds and what doesn’t, doesn’t. What happened, of course, was small cities lost their routes. But I think if I went away with one thing, it was just - which was perhaps naïveté - how the business community did not like this concept of making them stand on their own two feet without the defense being a monopoly and how businesses from other sectors of the economy were very concerned about it as well. And from that perspective, the other part of the business community, they just wanted certainty. They felt that you wouldn’t have certainty if you had just total deregulation of the airline industry. But we worked on that, too, and Ed Schmaltz worked on that a lot and Rod did - or was it Rod and Ed?

The other thing I remember was the bailout of New York City. And I was telling this to one of Rod Hill’s daughters the other day. We were at a funeral together. And I told her that one of my jobs was to keep track of Rod. Everybody had their jobs, one of my jobs was to keep track of Rod Hills because he was just full of a million ideas and would just go off and try to implement them on behalf of the President whether they’d been approved or not. And he evidently went to New York one day to find the guy who was in charge of Lazard Freres, Felix Rohatyn, with his own deal to bail the city out without anybody’s approval.

And I guess the President or Phil or somebody got wind of this and I got called into the Oval Office which I rarely, rarely did. And they said, “Get on a plane and go find Rod Hills.” And I said, “Any particular place I ought to start?” They said, “Try Wall Street.” And somebody met me with a car and driver and we went around until I found Rod Hills. And I told him that he had to come back and he was not right(?) he could not speak, because he was not returning phone calls. Again, there wasn’t any email. They didn’t have cell phones then. There was no way to communicate with him, so I went and found him and told him to come home. But I look back at it and think, “That’s pretty cool.” You know, the President calls you into the Oval Office to tell you to go find your boss in New York City.

Smith: Did you sense an internal debate in the administration? I have talked to most of the surviving principles, for example, Bill Seidman, who was quite vocal. He was in the Rockefeller camp versus the Greenspan-Simon sort of purist, if you will. And the speech that the President gave at the Press Club which gave rise to the famous “Drop Dead” headline, was battleground between the two camps. Were you aware of this philosophical turmoil?

Kilberg: I was sort of aware of the fact that some people were more moderate and some people were more conservative. Especially as it came out in the campaign for the presidency or the nomination, that there were certainly people viewed as moderates - which I was viewed as - and people who were viewed as conservatives in the White House. I was never quite sure where Don viewed himself. Or where Dick viewed himself at that point in time. And when I thought, you know, I always put Dick on the moderate camp and then when he went to Congress, we’re very good friends, remain very good friends to this day, but I went, “Wait a minute. Your positions are not what I remembered. You’ve evolved.” And he said he evolved to reflect his constituency. I do remember that. But my only role in the Drop Dead New York was finding Rod Hills. And Rod would’ve been in the Seidman camp.

Smith: I assume that your office was pretty well insulated from politics, but I can’t imagine that anyone in the White House is totally insulated.

Kilberg: No, but we were given very clear instructions that the counsel’s office was the lawyers. We were non-political. We would act in a non-political way. And that we would not talk to any outside parties on any topics. That nobody was to come lobby us outside the White House. Obviously our colleagues in the White House could talk to us, but nobody was to lobby us. That we were not to ever, ever send anybody who came to us to ask for us to send them to a department or agency because they had a problem. That was an absolutel no-no. We cut those people off at the knees. We would do none of that, and Phil was very clear about that and we all adhered to it. And I don’t think you saw one ounce of any sort of scandal coming in with the Ford counsel’s office.

Smith: Last major question, here. There’s this school of thought that says they waited far too long in terms of acknowledging, first of all, the real possibility that Reagan might run and, secondly, that Reagan might turn out to be as formidable an opponent as he was. I don’t think you were involved in that. I mean, Washington is a town where there’s a lot of conventional thinking…but the sense of a White House that in some ways—

Kilberg: Was asleep?

Smith: Well, asleep, but also coming out of the experience of ’74, not a-political, because there’s no such thing as an a-political White House, but a White House wanting to restore public confidence in the a-political nature of its leadership.

Kilberg: My guess is, though it’s just my instinct, that the people that worried about politics in the White House - which the counsel’s office did not - that they were probably surprised that the President wasn’t viewed as acceptable to what was then viewed as the conservative wing of the party. And I think they probably couldn’t quite figure it out because in fact Gerald Ford was quite conservative.

Smith: Fiscally.

Kilberg: Yes, fiscally very conservative with a wonderful demeanor about him and the inclusiveness was very fiscally conservative, so my guess would be that they were somewhat surprised about the intensity of it. But again, we were totally isolated from that. I think my one experience was that at the convention, Dick did give people permission to go out to the convention on their own dime if they wanted to though they had to show that they were taking vacation time, et cetera, et cetera. And if you wanted (though we were not allowed to, the counsels), but if any White House staff wished to volunteer on the campaigns, they had to show me – I was the gatekeeper on that as was two or three other people on the White House counsel’s staff – they needed to submit to me that they had performed every week a full eight hours of government work before they took off to do anything else. We kept scrupulous records to show that nobody was doing politics on government time.

But I was going to go up to the convention and I was part of the group that was still pushing for the Equal Rights Amendment, which, by the way, Gerald Ford endorsed initially and Betty Ford was very strongly in favor of. In fact, I went to speak on the floor of the North Dakota legislature, which is the single unicameral legislature, on the Equal Rights Amendment. But at any rate, I was going to go to the convention with a group of Republican women, Jill Ruckelshaus, Peggy Heckler, Mary Louise Smith, who became chairman of the RNC actually, yeah, at the end of the Ford presidency. A whole group of very respectable women lobbying for that and Dick called me to his office and said, “You’re not going anywhere.” And I said, “Yes, I am.” And he said, “No, you’re not, because Clarke Reed will close the Mississippi delegation from supporting the President if you show up there.” I said, “Don’t be ridiculous.” He said, “Clarke Reed doesn’t like you and you’re not going anywhere.” Clarke Reed was very much opposed to the Equal Rights Amendment.

But Bush, when he was chairman of the RNC, created the Rule 29 Commission, which was designed to look at a variety of party rules to modernize them. And one of the rules that the party looked at was rule 32. And Peggy Heckler, who was the congresswoman then from Massachusetts, from Boston, was on the commission but she could never be there and so Bush said that Peggy said, “Can I have a proxy and could that proxy sit at the table and I want that proxy to be Bobbie?” And he said, “Sure.” So, that drove Clarke nuts, number one, because he thought that was a violation of the RNC rules, but, number two, that rule 32 language that was proposed was to have the national party encourage state delegations to have increased representation of women and minorities as delegates. The Democrats at that time were putting in a quota. We thought our thing was personally very rational. I mean, there were very few women. We wanted to get more. At any rate, I wound up in fisticuffs with Clark Reed on that and he remembered and remembered all the way through ’76 and evidently told Cheney that he did not want me there. I went anyway. I said, “Dick, I’m going just as we say everybody can campaign on my own time. I’m going to put in my timesheet. Take vacation time. I’m going.”

I got there. Everybody else who had come by themselves but were still part of the White House staff got all these fancy credentials and I had this one little credential which I think probably said “Do Not Allow In The Building”. But I get this one little credential and at that stage in time, this was the week before when they were having the platform hearings at the hotel or something and there wasn’t much security in those days. Anybody could go in places. I just remember that I went over to where the White House staff was during the convention and I couldn’t get in. It was just fascinating. I mean, Dick made it very clear I needed to go home. It’s funny. We were having dinner the other night and I was relating this to him and he said, “Come on. I never did that.” I said, “Oh, yes you did.”

The only point of that story that’s silly, my only point was that people were so sensitive and walking on such eggshells that Clarke Reed could make such an unrealistic statement that he didn’t believe, nobody was going to take any chances. And clearly I was going to go and I was going to piss him off. And that meant that one delegate or any delegates from Mississippi were going to move. Everybody was hyper-, hyper-, hypersensitive.

Smith: And the great irony is, in the end, it’s Reagan’s designation of Dick Schweiker as Vice President that P.O.’d Clarke Reed more than you could have.

Kilberg: Oh, of course. Absolutely. And evidently he’s still alive and says very nice things about me these days. I ran into his daughter in New Orleans about a year ago and she remembered those stories.
Smith: Really?

Kilberg: Yeah, he told her about these stories. She and I were about the same age. “There’s this young lady up there that’s causing all these problems.” But at any rate, that just shows you how ridiculously sensitive they were to little things.

Smith: Were you and/or other members of the White House staff sensitive to, resentful of, the media portrayal - in its most extreme form, Chevy Chase - of the President’s intelligence?

Kilberg: Yes. I thought it was totally unfair. I thought the incident with knocking the head and the golf. The golf thing was while we weren’t in the White House, it was afterwards.

Smith: That is right.

Kilberg: Yeah, it was afterwards. But, I mean, obviously knocking the head on the airplane and the Poland thing, I thought was absurd and ridiculous. I didn’t expect that of the press. I really thought that, after they let our their vitriol on Richard Nixon, even though some of it was not deserved, that they too would have an interest in restoring civility and decency. And, instead, they gave us a break for a little bit, but then it was just back to not only business as usual, but ramping up what had become.(?) Sometimes the standard of their profession was: how nasty can you get. But, yes, I really thought that was terrible. Really terrible.

And I also remember sitting there in the fall. Again, by the fall, there weren’t any great policy initiatives coming out that we were working on. We weren’t clearing more people for appointments, so counsel’s office sat around with not a lot to do. I mean we couldn’t do election law. That was being done at the campaign. So I kept everybody’s timesheets while they’d go out and work and help the President. And I remember just sitting there and being very frustrated. You know, feeling that this person that I had no respect for, Jimmy Carter, was just climbing in the polls and I could not understand how anybody could prefer the governor of a small, little state with, to me, no redeeming qualities could possibly be elected over this man that I thought had taken an impossible job and then done it with dignity and grace and an extraordinary amount of respect. I was very, very proud to work in that White House.

And I think back to when Rumsfeld called me and I said, yes, I’ll do it, but I can’t do it until the spring. The thoughts that went through my mind then, which were that I need to go back to show that I can go back, that I’m not tarred by Watergate, even though I left the White House before Watergate, had changed by the time I was in that White House to just saying how fortunate I am to be here because of the person who is here. Not because I needed to prove something to myself or to my friends. Rather, I want to help him do the things he’s set out to do because he’s just such a gracious person.

And he reminds me, by the way, one, he had the same qualities as Bush 41 has and they come out of that same generation. Gerald Ford did not get a nice middle class, upbringing, he was not part of the upper class New England class of President Bush, but they still had that same quality of character and sense of obligation and duty to serve. And the same kind of parents, even though they were from somewhat different economic strata. And they both had an Ivy League upbringing, at least Ford in law school and Bush all through. This is going to sound terribly elitist, but I really believe this - that taught a value system and a sense of responsibility. I mean, our youngest son is graduating from Princeton in two weeks. Princeton teaches that. I went to Vassar when it was single sex and then to Yale law school. I think they taught it and I think it’s something very important and I think they both had that.

Smith: Time was actually pretty good to Gerald Ford, wasn’t it? He lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon. He was thrilled when the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles in Courage award. He said afterwards, “For twenty years, everywhere I go, people ask the same question. Now they’ve stopped asking the question.” The imprimatur of the Kennedys was enough to in effect cut off the discussion. And I just wonder if you were surprised at all when he died at how much reaction there was. Because I was with ABC the first half of the week and then with the family the second half and I can tell you, journalists, particularly younger journalists, were frankly surprised at the amount of reaction. And my theory was it was a whole generation that was discovering him for the first time. They were seeing these clips and he looked awfully good, especially compared to the ugliness of our politics today.

Kilberg: Well, I’m not sure whether I was surprised or not. Because frankly I was so busy just trying to be sure that the service got completed, actually. I didn’t have anything to do with anything that was going to go on in the service, just the logistics of it. But I think that my children, the oldest of whom is now 35 and the youngest of whom is 22 – so how many years ago did the President die?

Smith: Three years ago.

Kilberg: Okay, 32 to 18 or 19. I think they discovered him for the first time and they paid a lot of attention and asked a lot of questions and it was all positive and they sensed, I mean, I think they all felt the sense of his sunny disposition. Not a Ronald Reagan type of sunny disposition, but a different kind of low-key sunny disposition of someone who – I mean, the picture with the pipe. I think they just felt good about him and they thought he led a good life. And I think he did. And you say how proud he was and how good he felt about getting the award from the Kennedy Library. President Bush 41 gave the Bush Presidential Library award to Teddy Kennedy before he was sick. And a lot of people in the senior staff of the White House were furious, absolutely furious. And I said, “No. This is so typical George Bush. It is reaching across the aisle and recognizing and celebrating a life of service, even if he didn’t agree with him on the issues, but the concept of serving your country.” And everybody said, “Oh, but what about Chappaquiddick, et cetera, et cetera?” I said, “That’s just part of it. That’s just part of President Bush’s feeling that somebody can redeem themselves and that you ought to recognize that.”

Well, Gerald Ford did nothing to redeem himself from, but it’s still this concept that recognizing that life is a life well worth living and having lived. And I think what the Kennedys did for Ford was the same thing. And President Bush was very proud of his decision to honor Ted Kennedy and I think sent, not a blistering but a very pointed email to the entire senior staff pointing that out. We all didn’t work for him anymore.

Smith: Frankly, time has been pretty good to George H. W. Bush. I think there’s a growing sense that he’s not just an interregnum between Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton. That he had a very significant and difficult historical assignment, which was carried out very well. And then when you factor in the gentlemanly qualities, you know, the graciousness and the consideration and the decency and the fact that he could form his own friendship with Bill Clinton in a way that Ford and Carter did.

Kilberg: Well, that was a little strange.

Smith: Well, yeah, it is Kilberg: But it’s typical Bush 41. And it took George W., who’s a friend of mine, sometime to get used to that. You know, he said, “What is this? I’m his son!” I mean, he generally said that to me, “It’s really strange, Bobbie.” And I said, “Yes, Mr. President, I know.” But it’s typical. And I would expect, you know, Bush 41 I met when I was at law school and George W. was at Yale, an undergraduate, and I was very young. I was just barely 20 when I got there to the law school and George, we’re the same age, and so it wasn’t that he was behind or that I was ahead, but we wound up being together for two years. He graduated in ’68 and I graduated in ’69 from law school and we ended up spending a lot of time together.

I met his father through that because at one point in time, George Herbert Walker Bush came up to visit and also to straighten things out and explain to George W. how you need to behave at Yale, et cetera, et cetera. But, once he found me, and I never dated George W., we were just friends, he went out of his way when I came down as a White House Fellow to literally adopt me and my husband and he loved doing that. He loved mentoring young people. He loved to see people grow and to grow into their capabilities and I never heard—well, that’s untrue—there are only two people I ever heard of in his life him say a nasty thing about. I won’t tell you who those two people are. And he found the best in everybody.

Smith: President Ford, I later heard him speak disparagingly of two people. I’ll tell you who they are because it probably won’t come as a great surprise. One was John Dean and the other was Gordon Liddy. And the worst he could say was, “He’s a bad man.” I mean, that’s as close to outrage as he came.

Kilberg: Well, I won’t tell you the two.

Smith: Finally, how do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered?

Kilberg: I think Gerald Ford should be remembered for saving the soul of this nation. I think he came in at a very perilous time when distrust, not only of government, but distrust throughout the country was at an all time high. And I think he restored dignity and civility and respect for the office of the presidency. And I think that’s in the end what he would be remembered for. I think the other issues, whether it was the economy or busing or deregulation or foreign affairs, were important, but I think people will remember him for how he restored our sense of self. And I just think that was extraordinarily important and God bless him. Where he really stood up was the Arab boycott of Israel. And, if you remember, that was all in fashion. If any company did business with Israel, they were boycotted from doing business throughout the Arab world. And, as you know also, Jews couldn’t travel to any Arab countries, et cetera, et cetera. And he really stood up against that and made it very clear that it was anti-public policy and that if any corporation was caught not doing business with Israel because of that, that there would be severe consequences. And he also fought the United Nations with it. He took on an issue that he didn’t have to and he took on an issue very strongly and I think gained a great deal of respect in the AmSmithan community because of that.

I was with a friend the other day who worked actually for – would it have been Kissinger then? Where was Kissinger in ’75, ’76? Still there.

Smith: Secretary of State.

Kilberg: Yeah, Secretary of State. She said, interestingly enough because he was Jewish, that Kissinger was the bane of his existence. She said that she remembers getting memos from me and Kissinger just exploding saying, “God damn it, I’m trying to solve the ancient problems with the Middle East and the President’s worried about the Arab boycott of Israel!” But he was, because it was the right thing to do. That’s all I wanted to add.

Smith: I’m glad you did.

Thank you.

Smith: How did your paths cross with the Fords?

Angelo: I’ve known Jerry Ford long before he was in the White House, long before that episode because he was around town, a wonderful political figure whom everybody liked. Jerry Ford never had a detractor.

Smith: Did everyone respect him as well as like him?

Angelo: Uh, no. No. There were people who, you know, the famous thing which the New York magazine wrote - that he couldn’t walk and chew gum at the same time—

Smith: From LBJ’s cracks.

Angelo: Yeah, and LBJ did have a gift for Ford put downs. So, no, everybody did not obviously think he was a great, luminous figure. But I never heard anybody who didn’t like him, which actually is what got him into being president. I think the ground zero, nobody’s going to object to Jerry Ford. What’s to object? He had the experience, he was a man of such integrity, knew everybody and everybody he ever knew liked him. As you know Mel Laird really wanted him to be tapped for that vice presidential appointment, the first kind in our history, hopefully the last. But Mel told me afterwards, he said, “It just made sense to pick Jerry on this because everybody likes him and he has really no enemies. I don’t think it’s that he’s harmless, but he would be very agreeable on whatever he was supposed to do.”

Smith: There is a story - I can’t vouch for it’s authority but supposedly Rockefeller is in the Oval Office and Nixon points to the chair and he says, “Can you imagine Jerry Ford in this chair?” This was after Ford had been confirmed, which suggests that Nixon totally misread the situation. He saw Jerry Ford as his insurance against impeachment.
Angelo: Yes, I do think that that was making the rounds, that kind of thinking, but also that he knew Jerry Ford’s appointment could not be stopped because he’s a man of integrity. So, it was not going to be an appointment with some shades that they had to worry about. I don’t think he ever intended to work with Ford on anything. I think it was something that he had to do because there was a chair there that had to be filled with somebody who could get approved.

Smith: We talked to Jerry Jones, who had been Haig’s deputy. Before that, he reorganized the White House personnel office for Haldeman. And he gets a call from Haldeman, this was when Haldeman was still in the White House, so it’s before April of ’73. And he wants to know how many people worked directly for the vice president. And Jones did some figuring and he says about 50. And Haldeman said, “Good, I want undated letters of resignation from every one of them.” Which Jones interprets as meaning they knew even then that Agnew was going to have problems. Now, that’s just his interpretation. This would be in the spring. Remember, the Wall Street Journal story about Agnew appeared in August of ’73.

Angelo: Oh, oh, and a lot of rumors were going around in Maryland, as you know, from people involved in state government in Annapolis. There was a long tradition of cutting corners, shall we say, with Governor Mandel and others.

Smith: So it’s entirely possible, given Nixon’s political antennae, that they would’ve picked up on some of those rumors before it reached the journalistic community?

Angelo: Well, if they didn’t know, a lot of other people did, because a lot was just going around in Annapolis, which is a small capital where everybody knows everything. So, what was the alternative? Was it down to Agnew and Ford? Was it them?

Smith: Well, no, but when Agnew leaves.

Angelo: Yes, who was the other that Nixon was considering?

Smith: Oh, in ’68, it was John Volpe.

Angelo: Oh, my, names from the past.
Smith: Yes, yes, and a party from the past, a Massachusetts governor. And I wonder whether Nixon thought to himself, “You know, I blundered with Henry Cabot Lodge in ’60, I don’t think I’ll go that route again.”

Angelo: Yeah. He might have thought that. He might. Even at the time there were those of us who lived in Maryland, as we are just this minute, we wondered, “Why Spiro Agnew?” He was not a man of great distinction. I always thought he thought it’d make a good appearance - he was a distinguished looking man - and that he would be totally manageable, which may or may not have anything to do with it.

Smith: Then, of course, he went on to develop a following of his own. I mean, if Nixon had wanted to drop him from the ticket, he probably couldn’t have.

Angelo: I can’t remember well enough to know.

Smith: Other than his attacks on the press.

Angelo: Didn’t he do that mostly after he was in, the nattering nabobs of negativism?

Smith: Exactly. My point is, that once he became vice president, history repeats itself. Nixon as vice president made it impossible for Eisenhower to dump him through the Checkers speech. I mean, he created a constituency - Republican cloth coats and all that. And Agnew, in his own way by going after the press, created this strong allegiance among cultural conservatives.

Angelo: I would have a feeling that also the pols would say he was manageable. He’s not going to give you any trouble. He’s manageable. Well, they hadn’t counted all the brown paper bags stuffed with dollar bills or thousand dollar bills, whatever is the currency of choice.

Smith: As Ford was climbing the ladder in the House, particularly as the Minority Leader, he was away from home more than he was there.

Angelo: Oh, he was away so much. I think he was doing it for the good of the party. He was a party man and they wanted him to come and he came. I can’t remember exactly if Betty Ford told me this directly or it was somebody so close to it that it might as well have been, but she was alone at home on weekends, weekend after weekend, four children, three of them lively boys. What kind of life is that? When you look at it in a detached way, what kind of life is that? And I don’t fault Jerry Ford for many things because I really admire him as a person. I think he stepped into an incredibly, historically impossible situation which he handled very well, until the pardon, and that tore the whole thing apart.

But to leave Betty Ford - you know, somebody who had been a beautiful, lively person, she wasn’t a little homebody, Betty was a person - every week to go out to speak to a smoke-filled room full of nobodies. If it was big party things, that would be something else, but it was he just began to feel, I think, that whoever needed him that weekend, he would go. I think it was a very bad decision on his part. Did it do any good for him or for the party? I don’t know. I would think it would be hard to trace it, but it certainly did make it difficult for his wife, a very attractive, lively - not a homebody kind of person. She was a dancer, professional dancer, you know, and good looking. To just sit at home with four children…in Alexandria she couldn’t even go out easily to the theater or anything.

Remember, he had none of that social status that comes with being vice president or even speaker of the House, but not much with speaker of the House, especially when we had John McCormick and his sweet wife that he never left her. Betty Ford must have been sitting there and saying, “I never had my husband at home and there’s what’s-her-name McCormick,” who was something out of the 18th century or maybe the 19th. And John McCormick would never be away from her on the weekend and he was Speaker. Now, that must have stuck in her craw.

Smith: I think, in later years, I don’t know if you ever heard this or not, he felt guilty.

Angelo: Well, he should!

Smith: I think he really tried to make up for it.

Angelo: I think he loved her. You know, I think Jerry Ford loved Betty Ford, but I think he was obviously troubled by her behavior and whether he recognized it as alcoholism as soon as he could have, but families often don’t.
Smith: I don’t want to succumb to cliché here, but she in so many ways is a stand in for millions of women of this particular time who have real gifts and talents.

Angelo: And were somebody.

Smith: Yeah, and were kind of shoehorned into this traditionalist role, which she performed. I mean, she was a Cub Scout den mother from Grand Rapids, which in some ways later on led to people underestimating her. I mean, they saw the vanilla part of the Fords.

Angelo: Yes, and didn’t know that there was a lot of thinking and anxiety or maybe just resentment at being at home alone. And what does a congressional wife who’s important husband is out somewhere in the hustings, what does she do? I mean, you don’t really have the chance with four children to develop the kind of close, close friends that you might, just the two ladies, go out together. That’s hard. So, I think she was really boxed in and she was not a spirit that was intended to be boxed in.

Smith: Well put. Did you know her at this point?

Angelo: Yeah, yeah. Well, listen, you know how it is here. When you’re a journalist covering the Hill, well, I really covered the White House, but you know the people on the Hill as well. And at that time there was much more socializing, political socializing, than there is now. Much more. The early times, the Pearl Mesta days, now we don’t have Pearl Mestas anymore.

Smith: Plus there was socializing across the aisle.

Angelo: Oh, yes. Absolutely, there was so much greater camaraderie; it was not the nasty, really grim atmosphere that has developed over recent years. And I think that was encouraged to develop, I’m just going to say, by the likes of Karl Rove. He was a mastermind of a lot of things, very talented, of course, but a person like Karl Rove, and there are a lot of them around, did not, were not interested in bon ami, they wanted hard politics.

Smith: And in a larger sense, the way politics have evolved egged on by some parts of the media. I mean, cable TV is all about shouting at people, about opinion, not information. This political culture that developed in which Ford thought, is particularly when he was in the House, you could fight like cats and dogs all day long. You had principles, you had convictions, and you fought for them. But, first of all, after six o’clock you made up and were considered friends and all that. But beyond that even while fighting for your principles you were rewarded, you were judged by the extent that you produced. And production meant legislation.

Angelo: Yes, turning out the votes, your votes. Yes.

Smith: And now it’s as if differences are not meant to be narrowed, but exploited. You are rewarded for preventing things from happening rather than facilitating them.

Angelo: I think we’re seeing an interesting clash on that point of view even as we speak. I think President Obama is interested in the kind of politics that we’re speaking of in the past time where you were civil, you could clash on the floor, but it was never or rarely mean-spirited. It was tough politics, but look at Everett Dirksen and Lyndon Johnson. The two clashed on everything and were such good friends and savored the fact that they could be buddies and they were.

Smith: They were drinking buddies, too.

Angelo: I’m sure.

Smith: One of the factors in the whole effort to replace Charlie Halleck was that the Ev and Charlie Show, was usually the Ev Show. Beyond that, that Ev, for all of his wonderful qualities, was a much more accommodating figure to the Johnson White House and that Republicans in the House wanted a little more of an independent voice.

Angelo: Yes, I’m sure that’s a correct reading of it. Did the Republican Party suffer from that? I don’t think so. I think it was a much stronger party in the context of the Congress than it is today. So, you could argue that it paid off.

Smith: I remember asking Walter Mondale about this; when you went to Washington 40 years ago, whether you’re a Republican or Democrat, you found yourself in a party that had a Right and a Left wing. So that, you had to internally learn how to deal with people with whom you disagreed before you even went out on the stage and tried to pass legislation in the Congress as a whole. And that’s really no longer the case. Plus, Ford’s Republican party was anchored in the Midwest.

Angelo: Yes, it was a moderate Republican party. As we have seen in recent past years, this whole far hard Right conservatives are all tied in with religion. It came after their time and I couldn’t put a finger on exactly what triggered it, but the attitudes that we’re speaking of in the day of Lyndon Johnson and Jerry Ford and Dirksen was a more consensual kind of politics.

Smith: I think today in a lot of quarters, consensus is seen as a dirty word. It’s an equivalent of surrender.

Angelo: Exactly, and that’s the Karl Rove branch of politics. No consensus, we take our stand and that is it. I don’t know whether the Senate as it is now constituted is going to ease up on that or not. I think there was the feeling that maybe they were going to, but I don’t see it. It seems to me that they have made a determination that they’re going to continue to be the really hard line opponents.

Smith: When you saw the Fords in their later years, they would go to every convention and they were increasingly, not ostracized, but they were increasingly isolated. They were pro-choice, pro-gay rights, I mean, things that just set them apart.

Angelo: Even today, they are touchy. But one of the things about covering the Fords and, I can say this but I shouldn’t say it in any way publicly - Jerry did ask me, after Jerry terHorst, his first press secretary, left, following the pardon, although Jerry terHorst says that wasn’t the reason, that there were a lot of other reasons that I have forgotten because I don’t know if I actually believe him on that.

Smith: There is a school of thought that terHorst, in effect, used the pardon and his genuine upset over the pardon, as cover for the fact that he had decided one month into this job that it was just overwhelming.
Certainly, Jerry terHorst has told me that, yes. That it was seen as being because of the pardon, but he said it really wasn’t. So, but there it is. But anyway, after that, I was pleasantly astonished and honored that they tracked me down at a conference that the Life top editors and some of the key correspondents were having someplace in Connecticut at one of those conference centers. They tracked me down and the call came in and it was whispered loudly in my ear that the White House is on the line. So, you go to the phone and it was one of Ford’s top people, his name, of course you would know, and he said, “The President asked me to ask you to be his press secretary.” And I got the feeling that that’s (?) aide who was Bob Hartmann, who’s a wonderful guy, but I think he thought, “What?! Why her?” And I just said really right off, “I can’t do it. I’ve got a 12-year old son and that’s a 20-hour day on a good day job, and I can’t do it.”

So, anyway, the next day I was back in Washington and he had John Scali, who was then ambassador to the United Nations and who had been a journalist and so he was an old friend, he had him call me and repeat that. And I was really honored, but I explained to him the same thing. I would’ve been the first woman press secretary. You know, any ‘first’, it’s like, “Hey, we’re making a little progress here.” And we have with no thanks to me. And I explained to him the same reason and I remember John saying, “This is the president asking. You don’t turn down the president.” I said, “But I have this problem of a lively 10-year old son,” or eleven years old, whatever he was, “and I really have to be there.” He said, “Okay, I can take that to the president.” And that was the end of that.

Betty Ford had already asked me before if I would be hers, but I just could not see any interest for me on being in the East Wing. I would’ve been happy to work with her. But it amazed me that they would turn to me because I thought it was a very bold thing to do. I’m not cut out to be a press secretary. I couldn’t explain that to anybody, but I am not cut out to be. I just like to call them, wherever the arrow lands, and that was just such a terrible time. It was right after the pardon. It was such a poisonous time and all I could think about was going into that press room and having people, some of my colleagues, rip me apart. So I was honored and still feel honored that I was asked.

Smith: That’s a great story. Let me back up, because you mentioned Bob Hartmann. Why was Hartmann such a polarizing figure?

Angelo: He was just a very gruff individual. I had known him when he was a journalist and was head of the L.A. Times bureau. For awhile, his office and the one I was involved in were on the same floor, so we saw a lot of each other. But he was a tough journalist and kind of a gruff figure and I think that that personality trait is a little bit harder than one that’s goes down easily.

Smith: One senses he was also, not just protective of Ford, but possessive of Ford.

Angelo: That’s probably true. Yes, because that happens to a lot of them, doesn’t it? Yes. There are also a lot of them that want their own, to a degree, their own kind of preferences put out there ahead of some others. But Bob was gruff and I think that was it.

Smith: When Agnew left and Ford was nominated to replace him, did you sense or was there anything like a consensus in the press corps that Nixon would be leaving?

Angelo: No, I was going to tell you where I was the night that the choice was being made. One of my colleagues was with Ford, I was with George Bush. George Bush was, it was really like that. I mean and Bush is really such a nice man, Bush the father. And then when the word came in, yes, he was really crestfallen because he wanted it then and would’ve been very good as a vice president. He and I talked about this once later and he said that, “Yes, it was the best thing that happened to me that I was not chosen.” But that’s how close it was. And you were mentioning, who was the other one you had mentioned in terms of being thought of for vice president?

Smith: When Agnew was replaced?

Angelo: Yeah. Well, see, the reason I’m saying is that I just know the two, that one of my colleagues was with Ford and I was with Bush.
Smith: And Rumsfeld had an interest. I think more so during the Ford presidency.

Angelo: Yes, I was trying to think in terms of—

Smith: I think Ford said that the three names on Ford’s list when he had to pick one were Rockefeller, Bush, and Rumsfeld.

Angelo: Yes, that seems very believable, but I was just talking about the first choice.

Smith: At that point, did you think that Nixon might well be forced from office?

Angelo: I think maybe that thought was beyond reality to us. However, I did distinctly feel, “I hope you know what you’re doing” in terms of Ford, because it just looked to me like, as they say in the South, 50 miles of bad road dead ahead. But I actually did not realize, we just had no precedent for that in all of our history, so you would think that they would find some sort of way. But just having to go into that venomous White House at that time did not seem to me like a real prize, but it turned out to be.

Smith: He [Ford] was put in an impossible position, and so what he did was, he got out of town. I mean, he was on the road.

Angelo: Yes, oh listen, I had more travel that year. I was in Hawaii. When we were in Hawaii for about four days and part of it was at a Rock resort, you know those wonderful Rockefeller resorts. I remembered talking to a couple of others, there were just about five of us that’d go with him, but it was because Time wanted me with him wherever he was, in case that moment was when he would become president. And it was not a death watch, it was a selection watch.

Smith: That brings up a huge question, because here’s a guy who really likes reporters, who enjoyed socializing with reporters, and yet he’s in this impossible zone where at some point he obviously has to know this could possibly happen, but he presumably can’t discuss it.

Angelo: But he obviously knew it could happen or he wouldn’t have been going anywhere they asked him that he was invited. At that period in time, we went.

Smith: To stay out of Washington.
Angelo: Right. I saw more odd parts of the United States during that period, but I was happy to have that nice four days of nothing to do, we were not doing a story, there might be a line in where the [vice] president…

Smith: During all those months of travel, down time, socializing, after a couple of drinks, people must have asked him on or off the record, “What do you think of the president’s chances of survival?”

Angelo: They might have. I would not have asked him. To me, it’s a wasted question. I don’t care. Off the record and he says, “Zero”? I don’t think so. They might have, but there wasn’t quite that much socializing. I think Ford knew this was a very unique period to be traveling around the country and not to be in Washington where you were the vice president. Who knows what? So, I don’t think there was that kind of discussion. Or he would’ve said, “I’m not talking about it.”

Smith: But he in effect spent a year or nine months walking on eggshells.

Angelo: Well, yes. Was it as long as nine months?

Smith: Well, yeah, because in October he was nominated, and he was confirmed, I think, in December.

Angelo: Was it that late?

Smith: Yeah, the FBI investigation and then, of course, until August, so eight months, I think, as vice president. Something like that.

Angelo: Yes. And then there came the time really late when it was obvious—

Smith: Can you think back? Was it the smoking gun tape or was it something before that? Some people said the Supreme Court decision, when the court ruled that Nixon had to give up the tapes.

Angelo: Well, that was vital to everything. The question that we all had in the press was, “Why hadn’t he destroyed them before it came to that?” You wonder, given the fact that they contained such incredible information.
Smith: We saw Al Haig about ten days ago and he said he advised the president to destroy them.

Angelo: Yeah, I think that makes sense. It wasn’t against the law, they were his tapes, you can do anything you want to with them. And to hang on to them when they had that totally incriminating evidence on it.

Smith: We talked about mysteries earlier. Has anyone ever to your satisfaction resolved the 18 ½ minute gap?

Angelo: No. Not really resolved it, but who doesn’t think Rose Mary Woods did it? The jokes about how she was reaching for the phone, it got to be just a subject of jollity.

Smith: She was a total loyalist, though.

Angelo: Oh, total. Rose Mary Woods, and I think there’s a genre of women who work to support important men, who are committed to him in a way they would not be committed to their husbands, because there’s hero worship there which does not occur much with husbands.

Smith: As with Ann Whitman and Eisenhower.

Angelo: Yes, you think of it in many, many cases. There were other political ones, too, that’s lives were - well, I think Bobby Kennedy, his wonderful assistant was Angie Novelo, a wonderful person. She really had no life outside of it. Her life at Robert Kennedy’s side as his personal secretary, I mean, she was something more than just a regular secretary, Angie was family friend. She was everything, intelligent. It was obviously such a more interesting life than life outside. People forget that when you are tied to a really dynamic, important political figure, it’s racy. And so I never felt that Angie was giving up anything, I felt she was getting a wonderful insight.

Smith: The sad thing is that it comes to an end.

Angelo: Yes, it does.

Smith: Ann Whitman was the classic example. Who went to Gettysburg after the presidency and hated it and then went to work for the Rockefellers for a number of years and then came back during his vice presidency and it wasn’t very successful.

Angelo: I think that once you’ve been on the inner, inner-circle of the White House, as those very special secretaries were, there were just a few that were in there on everything, people don’t know their names in many cases. Nothing else can be very interesting by contrast.

Smith: Can you remember when you concluded that Nixon was history? That Ford would become president?

Angelo: I guess I really thought so from the minute I was assigned to be with him everywhere he went. I mean, I really thought we were just waiting for the time, we didn’t know when it was going to happen, so we wanted me, in this case, to be with him because it was that imminent. I think I probably thought it before, wondering how. But until the missing tapes, we couldn’t be sure. Look what he had gotten through? Pretty amazing.

Smith: Were you surprised? I mean, Ford was surprised by the language on the tapes.

Angelo: Oh! Well, I’m a stuffy person, I was really stunned, yes. Richard Nixon always seemed very proper, very stiffly proper. He never was at home with himself, which is a bad sign right there. Jerry Ford was never not at home with himself and it’s just the contrast was so incredible.

Smith: There was a little bit of the Boy Scout in Ford, wasn’t there?

Angelo: Oh, yes, and I mean there’s just this in terms of analyzing or thinking about Jerry Ford’s character and behavior, there just is not, in my mind, a negative. You might not like some of his policies. You might think he went down the road without thinking maybe whatever the Republicans wanted him to do. That was it. He took that as his role. He was the carrier of the flag, not the person who was developing the policy. And did it very well.

Smith: You wonder if there was also though - on one hand it’s a very admirable quality in a person, it might not be a very admirable quality in a President - a naïveté.
Angelo: Yes.

Smith: I mean, he believed Nixon.

Angelo: But didn’t he have to? I mean, can you work for a man that you think did those things and be his vice president and say nothing negative, unless you really have convinced yourself this was really not the way it was. I think, of course, by the time the tapes became known - I still remember the moment in the Time bureau when Alexander Butterfield was testifying before a House or Senate committee, I believe, not a court thing, but I believe it was a Senate committee. And just, almost as a throw-away line, he made reference to the tapes or the taping system, I believe it was. And down the halls at Time Magazine, I could tell you, you could hear jaws dropping and people saying, “What is this?” and people getting on the phone to try to find out more. Of course, you couldn’t because nobody else knew. So you were faced with a historic story and nobody else knew.

Smith: Laird told a remarkable story, because, you know, they brought him back into the White House for awhile. And about a month after he was there, Fred Buzhardt came to him. Now, Buzhardt had been his counsel at the Pentagon and Buzhardt wanted to protect his friend, Mel. And he came to Laird and said, “Don’t believe the president. The fact is, I’ve been listening to these tapes. He’s in it up to his neck.”

Angelo: Oh! Buzhardt said that?

Smith: Yes. I don’t think that’s ever been published.

Angelo: I don’t think it has because I certainly remember his coming, but we looked on him as a rescue effort. You know, there’s his old friend who’s coming and obviously a very good lawyer, coming to save the man.

And he heard the tapes and said that? Did he stay there after that or did he leave?

Smith: Laird wrestled with his own conscience about it, but he stayed a while. But the sequel is, I asked Haig, “Did you listen to any of these tapes?” He said, “Fred Buzhardt gave me very good advice. He said, ‘Don’t get caught dead alone in a room with a tape.” So, they were all willing to let Buzhardt be the agent and informer who tipped them off to the fact that the president has real problems.

Angelo: That was Buzhardt?

Smith: Yeah, because Buzhardt was clearly the source. And then there’s this bizarre scene, I think it’s on the 7th. No, it’s a week earlier. Haig lets Ford know the first of August that there’s this “problem tape” and obviously Ford realizes what all this is going to lead to, but he has to go through this charade with Mrs. Ford of visiting the vice president’s house-to-be and talk about drapes and china and pretend that nothing’s going on.

Angelo: That’s funny, because I would’ve thought that part would’ve occurred much earlier.

Smith: No, it was a week before Nixon left that Haig informed the vice president about the smoking gun tape.

Angelo: Yes, yes, I understand that.

Smith: It was about that time that the tape was released to the public which really brought the roof in. But Ford had to go through the motions.

Angelo: Yes, but I thought he would have done that earlier, when he was first picked as vice president. We’re talking several months.

Smith: He was going to be the first vice president to live at that house in the Naval Observatory.

Angelo: That’s right because Rockefeller, who he then picked as his vice president, furnished it but didn’t live in it. His own house was rather grander.

Smith: Yes. So, he had to go through the motions and then put on this performance. Then that night, they went to dinner with Betty Beale, and he said nothing.

Angelo: I would hope not!

Smith: And at midnight, he comes home and he says, “Betty, we’re not going to live in that house.”
Angelo: Oh, did he? But he said it to Betty Ford, not Betty Beale?

Smith: No, Betty Ford.

Angelo: Okay, because to say it to Betty Ford is one of those things, but saying it to Betty Beale who is an excellent gossip columnist...

Smith: So at that point, basically a week before he becomes president, he accepts the fact. What was that last week like?

Angelo: I’m trying to, it’s such a jumble in my mind because we all knew, “When is this going to happen?” All the reports, and you talk to your people, what you could, to your people in the White House. And I remember one of the closest people to Betty Ford on her side, one of really the closest, they were walking down…the [Nixon] family was going on a little river cruise on the presidential yacht, which we had until Jimmy Carter decided presidents didn’t need yachts. And she said, “I know that I felt this is like seeing the czar and the family walking away.” And it was such an image of the czar and his family walking to their death and this family walking to its political death that that stuck in my mind.

Smith: Did you have any sort of contact with him during this period?

Angelo: With Nixon?

Smith: No, I’m sorry, with Ford. I mean, were you still covering him?

Angelo: Oh, yeah, well, we were travelling. Yeah, I covered him right up until the day, you know.

Smith: Was there anything different about him?

Angelo: No, Jerry Ford was Jerry Ford, which was one of the wonderful things in my view about Jerry Ford. The turbulence that might have been going on within him, he did not display. He was a picture of confidence and gravity and, I think, sorrow. He didn’t really want all of this to happen. Do you think?

Smith: Plus, Richard Nixon was his friend.
Angelo: And Richard Nixon picked him for vice president and that in and of itself was a triumph for Representative Ford to be picked as vice president. He’s such a good man, Jerry Ford, that I don’t think he could’ve been harboring any glee.

Smith: Bob Barrett said something, because you don’t think of Ford as a secretive man, but Bob Barrett said, “I guarantee you he took to the grave all sorts of things.”

Angelo: Ah, yeah, secretive is one thing, but discreet is another. And I think he would have been a man – because he had such a moral anchor – Jerry Ford was a man who knew where he was, knew where he came from, knew the principles he should live by and did it. I don’t know a negative in terms of ethics or morality that you could accuse him of.

Smith: It’s interesting, I remember, when I was around him in the later years, you know, most politicians love to gossip.

Angelo: Oh, well, yes.

Smith: He wasn’t a gossip. I mean, he loved to talk politics, but he would politely change the subjects if personal gossip came up.

Angelo: Yeah, that matches what I know about him as well. He was friendly with reporters. I mean, we had such a little group of us going on the death watch, so to speak, of the presidency.

Smith: We heard Phil Jones talk about that airplane that the White House provided him with as sort of decidedly downscale.

Angelo: Yeah, I guess so.

Smith: It wasn’t exactly Air Force Two.

Angelo: No, it was not. You know, I just remember it being kind of a p-l-a-i-n plane, you know? But they got barred from the Air Force. I know that there didn’t seem to be any fancying up done for him. And my feeling is that he would not have wanted it because it might have been a symbol that he did not wish to show at that time. I think he was very circumspect. If anybody talked to him in terms of those questions, he just turned them aside. It’s lovely to see somebody who has that great respect for the serious ethics involved in this whole thing. But Jerry Ford was a man who, as far as I know and I watched him over a number of years, was a man who’s ethics could never be challenged. He did the right thing just by instinct. No one had to tell him.

Smith: He didn’t moralize a lot.

Angelo: Didn’t moralize, no. And was fun. You know, he wasn’t stuffy.

Smith: Speaking of fun - one senses there was real camaraderie on that plane.

Angelo: Oh, yeah, because we were such a small group, and it mostly was just networks and Time Magazine, I suppose Newsweek was it as well, but just the little group of national things, nobody was rushing to their, at that time it was still typewriters, not computers yet, but we had time.

Smith: Were there drinks served on the plane?

Angelo: Oh, sure. Oh, sure. I don’t recall any kind of problem. I don’t recall any kind of problem with any press plane where you can always get it. Richard Nixon cut out the drinks at one point. Richard Nixon, there was nothing too small that he wouldn’t do if he felt that it could hurt you. And I was with Time Magazine on the plane with him many times and Time Magazine was the first to call for his resignation. He was going to Key Biscayne that day and who was on the pool? Time Magazine. Me. That was as uncomfortable as anything could be. Ron Zeigler came back and he said that the president had one special thing to say, and I can’t remember his precise words, but he said, “He takes no note of what Time Magazine thinks about anything.”

Smith: Is that as bad as having the drinks cut off?

Angelo: No! We might’ve even gotten that in the magazine. I certainly filed it. But I was just thinking about the times the little things that Nixon - well, the next time that I was on the pool, the reporter pool, being okay, you circulate from national. Whoever gets on Air Force One, it was not any great favor, believe me, because Nixon would often, almost always, he would eat before leaving, so there was no food. So you might have a cross country trip without any food, which, you know, doesn’t sound bad unless you were so hungry. And then it does. And you knew it was intentional. That was no question. But I was out in California cross-country once, was in the pool, and he threw me off. He had instructed whoever was handling the roster, “No, no, Time Magazine is not going. We’re going to San Diego and so you have to let,” I’ve forgotten the name, lovely woman, a reporter and a serious one, “It’s her paper and we’ve got to put her on. And so Bonnie’s off.” It was alright with me because we never got anything anyway off the plane. Turns out, she was a friend of mine and I said, “I was glad because I realize you needed it.” She said, “I didn’t want it. They asked me to do it. I wanted to be on the other plane, because I had work to do.” So that was their way of just, “Time Magazine is being thrown off.” I took it as a mark of distinction.

Smith: He really spent a lifetime at war with the establishment.

Angelo: Yeah. Yes, but Time was tough on him. As I say, Time was the first major publication to call for his resignation. Now, that’s pretty tough. And we had been all along and we had a splendid Watergate specialist. He was good, right up there with Woodward and Bernstein and they were good about swapping information. Sandy Smith was his name and he’d been one of the old Life Magazine investigative teams and at one point had been an FBI man himself. So, he was doing remarkably astute reporting during the early part of all this story where you could still try to find out how things were happening and what was going on before it became a court kind of deal. So, Time had been hard on Nixon all along and he didn’t take that lightly. And I can understand that. Why should you like a magazine that’s trying to get you to resign?

Smith: Were you in the East Room when Ford was sworn into office?

Angelo: None of us were. It was not press covered. Maybe they got a pool reporter. They probably had to have a pool, the wires. But I was not, but in my office we were all gathered around every conceivable television set watching every minute of it. It was, you know, in your mind, you know, the tape is running, it’s still running and you just see how he looked and how Pat Nixon looked, because I really liked Pat Nixon. I felt that she was given a hard role to play, got nothing in -I don’t want to make judgments - but you felt that she got nothing in closeness or esteem in return from the president’s men. So, to see her as we all do in all our minds, watching that was almost more than you could bear, because she had been dragged into something that was not of her doing at all and this historic humiliation.

Smith: On television.

Angelo: On television.

Smith: It’s more than a footnote, it’s a fascinating detour, the real Pat Nixon.

Angelo: Oh, yes. I liked Pat Nixon so much. I felt she was caged. I felt that Haldeman and Erlichman kept her on such a tight leash. She was actually Pat Ryan. And I traveled with her – I liked to go on her trips just to watch this. And I went places with her that really, basically, no other Washington-based reporters went along with her because it was long and expensive. But one that I remember particularly was a trip that she made, a solo trip to Africa. We went to Ghana, met all these wonderful – up in the jungles of Ghana – all these wonderful kings. And Ghana, of course, is the Gold Coast, and I understood why it was the Gold Coast. They were just wreathed in gold. And Pat Nixon was having such a good time.

We went from there to Liberia where there was a very pro-American president being installed. There was a big parade, the streets were lined – of course, you could do this by edict. But I think they were just excited about this American first lady. The streets were lined just for her. She had a wonderful program arranged for her. I saw Pat Ryan emerge. Pat Nixon was left somewhere flying over the middle of the Atlantic. She was this laughing, smiling, eager, loving person, and I wished…because I liked her so much and felt that she was getting such a raw deal in that whole White House. They didn’t care about what she did unless it was what they told her to do.

I just felt Pat Nixon/Pat Ryan is such a different person and she has never really been seen that way by the American people. I tried in several stories to show her in this exuberant kind of… One picture that is very clear in my mind; she was seeing women dancers, a very special group that was dancing for her in a closed room. It was not out on the street, this was a formal program. I, and a few others in the press, most of them African-based, were across the room from her – maybe six of us. And I thought, this is really a unique experience because all these bare-breasted, black women were doing these really exciting dances, and I thought, I’m seeing Pat Nixon framed by flying black breasts. It was a picture I treasure in my mind.

But I always felt that when he courted her, and he really courted her, he was not really interested at first, from everything you read, and from what she’s made clear. But he did, he assiduously courted her and I think what a difference – something that he really saw - Pat Ryan was who he fell in love with. And I think he was. And as the years settled down she really became Pat Nixon and she had to fill a role and we, the public in general, never, rarely saw her as this Irish, wonderful Irish, Patricia Ryan. And I was very fond of her. I thought she was a special person and was being misused.

Smith: It’s nice to get that on the record. Was Betty Ford, in some ways, liberated by the White House?

Angelo: I can remember having this discussion with one of our distinguished correspondents who had covered Ford constantly in the House, so he had known Ford and he had known Betty. And he said, “Oh, Betty Ford is not going to be happy with this.” I said, “Neil” - Neil McNeill - “Betty Ford is finally getting to be somebody. She is going to be the First Lady of the United States with her own staff, her own interests. She is going to be a liberated woman and love it.” And I think I was right and I think she played her role wonderfully. And she was not afraid to say things that were quite – that other first ladies would have stayed a mile away from. And on television.

Smith: Well, there was the famous Sixty Minutes interview.

Angelo: Oh, yes.

Smith: Now, the sense I have is, in this town everyone is always fighting the last war. So you have a White House full of good, gray political types – men - whose initial, immediate, instinctive reaction was, “Oh my God, what has she done?”
Angelo: Exactly. Oh, she’s saying these outrageous things! And I was looking at it, having been very interested in advancing the cause of women and the women’s movement, and I said, “Here we’ve got a First Lady who is saying the things that a great segment of this country wants said.” And she was tremendously popular for it because she put her chips right there behind liberated women.

Smith: And, of course, before that there was the breast cancer surgery. Tell it to the people in this generation – I think it’s almost impossible for them to understand the extent to which it wasn’t discussed.

Angelo: It was not discussed, and then we had several that made it very public. But most of them after Betty. I remember that day, so specifically, I was doing a cover story, which I have lying around here somewhere in case you wanted to see it, on the travails of Pat Nixon and – who was the other first lady in there, I forget. It’s right over there on my table.

Smith: A contemporary of Pat Nixon’s?

Angelo: The first lady that…

Smith: Ladybird?

Angelo: No, it was not Ladybird. Lyndon really respected Ladybird. He conferred with her. He asked her opinion on things. She was wise, and she understood Lyndon Johnson. And she put up with a lot of things, but she never - he was a man meant for greatness. And I think she was right. She then carved out greatness for herself. What a first lady she was. Can you reach over to the table for a minute and let me see.

When the week began, I was doing a cover story on Joan Kennedy who was Senator Ted Kennedy’s first wife, of course. Who had been sent to or committed herself into an alcohol rehabilitation center that week. And then there was Pat Nixon who had gone through the travails that had never been known by any first lady in our history and hopefully never again. And so I was doing a cover on the travails that the first ladies must bear in public.
So, Ford was speaking to a group out somewhere in this direction, and I said, “The publisher wants a publisher’s picture with me and Betty Ford,” just because I had her quoted in the story. And she said, “Sure. I’ve got to go for an appointment at NIH,” that’s the National Institute of Health, which is just out beyond where I’m speaking of, afterwards. She said, “I’ll wait right outside and then we’ll get the picture and then I can go in there.” And so we did. So the picture of us is in the magazine looking very jolly together.

The next day it was announced that she had cancer. And I thought, she knew that she was going to NIH to get the final word which was going to be that she had cancer of the breast. And she stopped and did her commitment to speak, but then she did something – she could have said, oh Bonnie, we’ll do it some other time. She stopped, took lots of time with the photographer taking our pictures without ever mentioning it. So then I rewrote the cover the next day, and they put Betty Ford’s picture on it, too. Because here’s three first ladies – no Joan Kennedy wasn’t first lady, but political-wise, in these disastrous circumstances, and I was doing the story and she was a source, and then she became one of the principals. And I will always remember her kindness.

Smith: And in fact, the day before she went in for the surgery, the president and she had committed to the dedication of the Johnson Grove.

Angelo: Yes. I can’t remember, I should read my cover story, because it’s a little vague. I can’t remember whether she actually knew for certain that she had breast cancer when she stopped to talk to me, but if it hadn’t been certain she knew that this was the issue. And the Lyndon Johnson thing, I think she’d gone earlier that morning…

Smith: She’d taken the Johnsons through the White House, and she entertained them for tea. In fact, there is a picture. Her suitcase is sitting at the foot of the bed that she is going to take to the hospital the next day. She never says anything.

Angelo: That’s right. I think she did them in the morning, I think it was an eleven o’clock thing, because then she had this speech with this group out at the Sheraton Park Hotel, and that was where I was there and we posed for that little picture with the publisher’s letter – not having a clue. And she was smiling and generous with her time and herself. In retrospect, I thought, what a warm and generous and thoughtful personality. Instead of saying the first lady cannot see you today, we can’t explain it.

I think Betty Ford was so special for many reasons. She had not really been a captive of the political spotlight. Part of it was because she was always home with the children. So she didn’t have the edges all worn smooth. She just was who she was. That’s why she would say on Sixty Minutes, well, yes, something like if her daughter – I can’t remember…

Smith: Having an affair.

Angelo: Having an affair and whatever, that she’d just say, “Well, yes, I’d want her to talk to me about it, though.”

Smith: That was such a lesson to all of us because we found out – guess what? This is how real people talk. This is what they are talking about.

Angelo: That’s right. She was a real person. She had her problems that real people have. We all know that Betty was hooked on certain drugs.

Smith: Did you know then? What did you know? What was surmised?

Angelo: I knew that sometimes she was spacey, and one of her close people said, “That’s because she has to take these medications.” Well, she did have to take the medications, but she was taking them in inappropriate measure. But I was kind of cautioned on a number of times when I was seeing her personally, so that I would not be troubled by it. As far as alcohol – well, I knew that she and one of her kind of informal assistant – I don’t know whether this person was ever on the White House staff, but she kind of ingratiated herself into the…

Smith: Nancy Howe?

Angelo: Yeah. And I know that they would have their afternoon drinks together. And we know, in retrospect, that was the worst thing that could be done with somebody who was having problems with a tendency toward alcoholism. But that was Nancy’s way of getting in. It was not to be admired. So Betty Ford had those things. I was told about them, the possibility that she would seem spacey before they were ever in the White House. I was having lunch with one of her really good friends, just to fill in on gaps that I didn’t know, and she said, “She has to take these drugs.” And that was true.

Smith: It’s not the whole truth.

Angelo: But when she later wrote a book about being an alcoholic, I’ve got a copy of it around, but I can’t remember the name of it right now, it was an absolutely bare, tell-all, how I became an alcoholic; how I finally, finally was forced by Jerry Ford to take action. He was really making it very plain that this could not, he would not put up with it. This was after they were out of the White House. But she did not really attack that. I think it got worse when they were out of the White House, also. Maybe she missed the excitement and the support. Where Betty Ford, she’d not been an actress, she’d been a dancer, she’d been a performer, and then all of a sudden she was kind of shut away in her house across the river in Alexandria. So when she got to the White House, there was a stage for her to perform and then she did it beautifully. Except she was always kind of a little bit uncertain there. It wasn’t really known – there was this feeling that maybe she’s taking too much of her medication. But it was not really known.

Smith: You mentioned the pardon. My sense is that he – this goes back to the naiveté – the first press conference was on August 28th and he went there believing that people were going to talk about Turkey and Cyprus and inflation, and everything except what people wanted to talk about. And he left that press conference, by all accounts, angry, I think partly at himself, I think he thought he didn’t do very well.

Angelo: He didn’t!

Smith: Tell us about that.

Angelo: I can’t recall it in specifics because it was a long time ago and there were a lot of other press conferences. But he didn’t handle the questions very well, and because they were so personal he was not ready for them. A good press secretary would have sat down and said, “Now, you’re going to have to deal with some of these things. Now how are we going to handle it?" And I don’t think they did. So he came in and he was blindsided. He shouldn’t have been.
Bonnie Angelo   March 10, 2009

Smith: But, that’s it. For him to believe, three weeks after Nixon left, that the press corps had lost its obsession with Nixon, is hard to credit.

Angelo: Yes, it is hard to credit. He didn’t understand the adversarial relationship between the press and Nixon. There’s always an adversarial relationship between the press and any president, because they don’t want to tell you and you want to be told. Or you want to have it confirmed when you’ve gotten it from somebody else. But as Minority Leader of the House, people kind of did the things he wanted them to do. As he would speak all around the country, there was no challenge. He was speaking to Republicans, boosting them. I doubt that he ever spoke to a Democratic group, why should he? So he just hadn’t had the challenge. He was not a man who would challenge on his own, it wouldn’t seem proper. And there you go back to his wonderful upbringing.

His mother, and I say this because he talked to me. I wrote a book called First Mothers and how they are a powerful influence on the sons who became presidents. And of the modern ones, those are the ones from Franklin Roosevelt forward - those are the only ones you deal with because the nineteenth century was a whole different world. The mother was the big influence in his life, not the father. Every single one of them. That’s not to say the fathers of some were not also influential, but it was the mother. And in Jerry Ford’s life, which wasn’t – oh his story, I know we don’t have time for that, but his story is so touching – that his mother was married as a young society girl in the small town in Illinois? Is that where he was born?

Smith: He was born in Omaha.

Angelo: So she had a big society wedding – it covered the whole front page. They were, in this town, they were society. So he didn’t come from some nobody.
And that she married a wealthy heir to a major kind of fortune, who was, indeed, based in Omaha. They went on their honeymoon on the train, as they did in those days, to California and go down the California coast - a marvelous trip with your own compartment and all that.
When he got to Portland, Oregon, and they went in the elevator in the hotel a gentleman tipped his hat to her in the elevator – quite properly – and she smiled at him – quite properly. In their room, he struck her – her brand new husband of what – three days? Now that is not a good way to start a marriage. And it only went down from there. Then she left at the end of their long train ride - and he continued to abuse her going down the coast of California - when they got back to Omaha she called her parents and they were waiting on the other side of the river and she fled.

He called and promised to her parents that he’d never do it again – so she did go back to him. And that time she got pregnant and had a son named for him. It was Leslie King. When he was six weeks old, she was holding him in her arms and her husband attacked her with a butcher knife. Now that makes me shiver when I say the words. Then, with the baby’s nurse - they had a lot of money, they were very wealthy people - her baby’s nurse stood watch while they contacted her parents. She went across the river where she could again – the first time she had not quite crossed the river – they took her home.

The stigma was so great that they could not live in their town where they had been such a prominent family. Her father, such a supportive man, took her, with the little boy, little Junie, in her arms to Grand Rapids. He gave up his furniture business. He was one of those small town prosperous businessmen. Started from scratch in Grand Rapids with his daughter and this baby boy. She started going to church there, the Episcopal church nearby, and there she met a man named Gerald Rudolph Ford.

After a proper time he courted her and married her and the baby immediately became Gerald Rudolph Ford, Jr., which he was always so proud of, he was always so pleased. And it was the happiest marriage and family you could dream up after that terrible beginning. The father once came, saw the strapping high school boy working, flipping hamburgers during the Depression, I guess, at lunch time and wanted to take him back to his ranch in Wyoming. And Gerald Rudolph Ford said, “No, my place is here.” He didn’t even entertain the notion.
I just think that that was such a touching - that such a terrible beginning for Jerry Ford to have endured, even as a baby. Then his mother and stepfather had three other sons, and I said to him - he was wonderful talking about this, his eyes teared up, as they would - and I said, “Were you treated differently by your stepfather when he had his own three sons?” He said, “Yes. I was treated better.” He said, “I was the favorite son.” At every turn he could name something for him and it would be his mother and his stepfather’s name – so such a good thing to happen to such a good man.

Smith: I wonder whether, in some ways, it didn’t instill in him – I was constantly surprised at his compassion, at his understanding of people in places in life where you wouldn’t think he’d have much knowledge. It went beyond tolerance.

Angelo: It would be empathy.

Smith: Empathy. That’s a great way of putting it. He was still a conservative, and God knows, fiscally, he was the last real conservative in the White House. Reagan ran up these budget deficits. Jerry Ford vetoed all these bills, used up his political capital. But that didn’t, in any way, effect this kind of empathy – it’s a great word.

Angelo: He really knew the Depression up close and personal. His stepfather had a paint supply company. Grand Rapids was the great furniture capital at that time. In the Depression people didn’t buy furniture, and so then people didn’t buy paint that went into the process of furniture. So they had it really tough and that’s why he was working flipping hamburgers.

They had pictures of him before the Depression, when they would go to Florida in an open kind of car – kind of an open limousine. They lived well, and then the Depression just _____________. So he knew firsthand what it was like. Much worse, I think to have had money, and lose it, I think that gave him the great feeling for people who were suffering, particularly those who, not from their own way of living, but what was done to them. I just think he was a man who cared about people – a lot.

Smith: He liked people, didn’t he?
Angelo: Oh, yes, he liked people.

Smith: You can’t fake that over a career. Nixon and Ford…

Smith: Let me ask you, the pardon. Did it come as thunderclap to you?

Angelo: Yes, it certainly did, to me. Because it came on a Sunday, and I happened to be the person that got the White House call to say, “Bonnie you ought to be here because we’re going to have an important…” Sunday – the magazine is already on the stands. So I hike myself down to the White House, but in the meanwhile I’m trying to find one of my editors on a summer Sunday morning and it was not easy. They were all in their yachts somewhere or whatever. And I said, “It’s going to be important. I don’t know what it is, but it’s going to be important.” I don’t know what I said, I don’t know whether I was ______ enough to say it might have to do with Nixon. I did ask Jerry Warren, who was the one who called me, a couple of questions that were not what it was. It was not a military thing, I knew that. So that just almost led us to Nixon. So then you were at the White House and it was Sunday and you were trying to report this story, your magazine is already closed and your sources are nowhere. It was a memorable day.

Smith: And were there other reporters, obviously, in the same…

Angelo: Especially all the dailies needed something for Mondays. It was just the news magazines that get hit by having – and all those editors were hauled in from their yachts or whatever, in New York.

Smith: I remember having a long, more than one, conversation with him about this because I thought there had to be a more politically adroit way of doing this.

Angelo: Had to be.

Smith: But, you know, it’s funny because we sort of war gamed this. One evening we spent three hours going back and forth, and Mel Laird, who always had a scheme for everything, of course, Mel figured out he could have taken care of this, too.

Angelo: He could of.

Smith: He was going to bring a delegation from both Houses, both parties, to the White House to ask Ford to pardon Nixon. The problem is, looking back, if you try to put yourself in that superheated, overcharged political climate, the first trial balloon would have been shot down before it ever reached the trees.

Angelo: Yes.

Smith: I don’t know how the president could have prepared the country, short of letting the legal process play itself out.

Angelo: Because it would absolutely blow up the whole country. And then you’re going to do it anyway? If you’re going to do it that way, you’ve got to be willing to say, “Okay, I won’t pardon him. I would like to, but if it’s not in the interest of this whole country, I will not do it.” He couldn’t have it erupt and then do it, do you think?

Smith: No. That’s my point. I try to come up with an alternative scenario. What’s the alternative?

Angelo: My scenario is that he should have gotten something in return from Richard Nixon. It’s as simple as that. He had to have admitted things, he had to be plea bargaining. And I think he made a mistake in not doing that. I personally, was disappointed that he didn’t do that. Because you’re letting the man get off Scott-free. He’s just done something that’s never been – jeopardizing our presidency – never before in our country to that extent, by a president himself. And I just didn’t see why he didn’t do that. And I was told that it was Al Haig who talked him out of it.

Smith: Out of taking that approach – that tough approach. That’s interesting.

Angelo: And I was told by somebody who really knew. It was not just an idle person. I can’t recall which White House source, but it was not…
Smith: Let me play devil’s advocate – is it because Haig or, fill in the blank, thought Nixon couldn’t be brought to that point? That, in other words, he had so dug in his heels that…

Angelo: Then don’t do it. Okay, you don’t want to do that? Sorry, we offered you this. We won’t do it. You’re the president now, you’ve got some clout. I think it was Al Haig feeling sorry for Richard Nixon. After all, he’d known him over many more years than he’d known Jerry Ford. Had worked with him, had done all that. Many years. I think he just pled for humanity on the part of Jerry Ford, and that would have been the only way he could go. Couldn’t say it politically. But in the name of human kindness. And Jerry Ford was a kind man. That’s the only way I could figure it out.

Smith: Did you cover him when he went up before the House to, in effect, testify about the pardon.

Angelo: I was not there. It was an in-house representative, wasn’t it? Senate and House reporters – that was really on their territory, and so they handled that. Obviously, I watched it on television because we were seeing a drama of historic proportions. Unlike some cases, we knew it was historic. Sometimes you have to have hindsight to know. We knew.

Smith: You don’t think of him as a tragic figure…

Angelo: Nixon?

Smith: No, Ford. But, there was an element - he felt by the fall of ’76 that he had just really begun to master this job. To know how to do it, and then he lost it.

Angelo: And then he lost it. Yes. And I think the pardon is what lost it because it was a close election, and there were so many people who felt bitterly about that pardon – to give Richard Nixon, who had trampled over all of our American traditions, not to mention our law – to do that knowingly, and then hide evidence. And then to give him that kind of way to come back in glory, I felt that’s what cost him the election.

Smith: We go back to being naïve; do you think he was, in some ways, naïve in underestimating the Reagan challenge? Either in thinking that Reagan wouldn’t run, or in underestimating the appeal that Reagan would have when he did run.

Angelo: We’re talking about…

Smith: Reagan announces in December of ’75 that he is going to run. But clearly, there is a build up through much of ’75…Apparently there were people in the White House who believed that Reagan wasn’t serious about running, or that if he did run, he wouldn’t be a formidable opponent.

Angelo: Now, they may have thought the other, but if they did, I don’t think that a lot of other people who are politically astute were thinking he wouldn’t run. Because he ran for governor of California and people thought -his movie star? – was eight years a governor and a powerful governor. He was not just a pretty face. So to want to be president was a logical step for Ronald Reagan. So anybody who doubted it, seemed to me whistling in the dark. They didn’t want him to run. So Jerry Ford brought it off that time, yeah.

What was the next step on that? Because the next time Reagan ran…

Smith: In ’80 there was some who approached Ford about running...

Angelo: Wasn’t there some sort of talk about a Ford/Reagan ticket in ’80?

Smith: Yeah, and then in the Detroit convention, for a few hours there is this bizarre minuet that takes place. To this day, there is a certain element of mystery surrounding what really went on.

Angelo: And at that particular time, I missed the wonderful inside coverage of _________. I was London-based bureau chief at that time, so I was just wishing I were back to do that. But what I turned out to be instead was the go-to commentator on this American political season. I must have done fifty.

Smith: How important was Donald Rumsfeld in the Ford White House? What did he bring to it?

Angelo: I think Donald Rumsfeld, just by being a personality, was important. And I think he was a friend. That matters so much – not somebody who joined politically, but was a friend. So you have to think that he did have a real impact. Then you see in his second coming, that it didn’t fare so well with George W. Bush.

Smith: I look at the press accounts and it’s pretty clear that there were factions in the Ford White House. Which is nothing unusual.

Angelo: Show me a White House without a faction, and I show you a flagging White House.

Smith: But, the Rumsfeld/Rockefeller rivalry - was that something that was well-known to people covering the White House?

Angelo: You know, this is a hard one for me to reconstruct, because it must have been well known, but looking at it now, the Rockefeller thing seems so dominant that I can’t even remember that it was in doubt.

Smith: Did you know he was unhappy as vice president?

Angelo: Rockefeller?

Smith: Yeah.

Angelo: How can you really know inside? I dealt with him a lot and he was always just terrific to deal with. He was always very enthusiastic or I wouldn’t have been going in search of what he thought if it wasn’t something he was really keen about. I think there were probably times when he felt that he was really doing something important, and that was taking really his skills and using them. Then there were the times when he must have wondered, what do I do now?

Smith: It was such a mismatch in some ways because Ford, in early ’75, announced that there were going to be no new domestic programs until we sort of began to catch up. Of course, to Rockefeller, that’s death.

Angelo: That’s right.

Smith: You get re-elected in New York by coming up with new programs.
Angelo: And that’s really where his heart was, or where his interest lay. Much more, I think, than in foreign policy. A New York governor, so there you are willy ninny.

Smith: And the question is still asked - I have my own answer - was he pushed or did he jump from the ticket in ’75? When it was announced that he wouldn’t be on the ticket in ’76, I don’t know what the journalistic consensus was at the time.

Angelo: I’m trying to reconstruct what kind of machinations there really was.

Smith: Remember, it was part of the larger package – Schlesinger was fired…

Angelo: It happened on a weekend, as I recall, because I was covering down some place in South Carolina, where we didn’t have good – there were certain days for journalists – when you remember your own problems more than theirs. Yes. And it was kind of a Sunday afternoon slaughter of sorts. And your question was whether Rockefeller was pushed or …

Smith: Whether he jumped.

Angelo: I don’t know. At the time I thought he was pushed. When you look at it, not many politicians jump, because they always think that there is going to be a chance. And then they can look back in recent history and kind of show – Jerry Ford is president – and who thought that four years before? Not that it was the same thing, but the unexpected can happen. And what was the alternative? If you jump, what was he jumping to at that point?

Smith: Were you around the president during the assassination attempts?

Angelo: The Reagan?

Smith: No, the Ford.

Angelo: Oh, the Ford. No, I was not. I was not on those trips. Out in San Francisco? No, Dean Fisher was for us that day. I would cover some of the trips, he would cover some and that just happened to one that he was covering. I was horrified, obviously. And these two bizarre girls, you know?
Smith: And Jerry Ford seemed like the last person in the world who you’d want to take a shot at.

Angelo: Why in the world would you do that, you idiots? And you were just glad they couldn’t shoot straight. If you’d had a John Wilkes Booth, it would have not been that way.

Smith: Did you see much of them after they left Washington?

Angelo: No. I wish I had. They lived out there the whole time. After they left Washington I was in London, and then I was bureau chief in New York. Although I was in and out of Washington all the time, I was not covering Washington. I was covering Mario Cuomo, who didn’t run. I had my bags packed, virtually.

Smith: What’s Betty Ford’s historical impact?

Angelo: I think Betty Ford has real impact, and I can’t say that about that many first ladies. I think she was the first one to speak out about controversial things. First one to have a known problem of alcoholism. There was William McKinley’s wife, Ida – she was always having the vapors and who knows what they had back then in their sachet. But Betty was the modern woman. She seemed fearless. She was honest because she hadn’t really been out on the campaign trails enough to know how to circumnavigate the tricky questions. So she said what she thought, and I can tell you – I can’t speak for the male correspondents, but among female journalists – she was a heroine because she said what she thought. She wasn’t namby pamby, to use an old expression.

She took the step that was so remarkable; she changed our whole philosophy in terms of dealing with announcing that you’ve got this dread disease. Nancy Reagan, and then I don’t who – it seems to me we’ve had so much of it - they all do it now. It was Betty Ford that made that the thing to do – to have the doctors brief the press, not to hide it, not to take her away like Grover Cleveland on a boat, a yacht, in the East River as it goes into the bay.
So she was so forthcoming. She had a sense of fun, and a sense of style. She was always good looking, and then the way she dressed. So I think Betty Ford had this special place with women. She dared to do it. She really laid down a marker that made it much easier for other first ladies, some of them like Laura Bush, a very nice person. Everybody likes Laura Bush, but you cannot go wrong with literacy for children. Hardly a challenge, and you hope it had some effect. I hope it did. But not a tough decision.

Ladybird put her stamp on this country in a wonderful way. It was a little more controversial than it is remembered now because there were companies that felt that she was wanting to save all those historic buildings. People forget that she didn’t just plant the flowers.

Smith: Well, and all the billboards.

Angelo: And the billboards. Oh yes. Every time I drive down to my home state of North Carolina, especially when it’s in flower, and there are just miles of blooming flowers along I-95, and I just roll down my window and say, “Thank you, Ladybird,” because she did it. And this country is more beautiful because of it and it’s not going to stop being beautiful. If you tear up those plantings you’d be strung up by the likes of me. So I say that Betty Ford loosened the straps that held first ladies back. If they do it now, it’s mostly because they choose to do it. And I hope they do, because they’ve got power.

Smith: I sometimes use the line, by being herself, she made it easier for millions of people to be themselves.

Angelo: I think that’s perfect, yes. And she had no hesitation about it. If you said, “Be yourself,” she would have said, “Now who else can I be?” But she didn’t mind, she didn’t know the effect of a lot of this. That is one thing – not having been out there on the front lines of politics, she was catapulted into the White House, which is a wonderful thing in the sense that she wasn’t afraid of anything. There are other things that she said that were just wonderful because they were so unstudied. And the country loved her. I don’t think there was ever a negative kind of…

Smith: Well, the right wing took exception – the traditionalists.
Angelo: Did they in any serious manner?

Smith: Remember in Sixty Minutes, have you ever told your husband “you weren’t very good today?”

Smith: Oh, well, there’s that wonderful line where she says, “Of course, I tell him all the time.” Which, of course, you could see millions of wives, all over America, silently cheering her on.

Angelo: And that was when she went really way out there when she was talking about her daughter, made it very clear that she would talk to her about rather adventuresome sex.

Smith: There is a wonderful letter that came in from a woman in Texas. It says, “You don’t understand,” and the writer lists all these qualities that a first lady is supposed to have. And she said, “You are constitutionally required to be perfect.” She was absolutely serious.

Angelo: Was she really?

Smith: The woman who wrote the letter was absolutely serious. I would have loved to see the look on Mrs. Ford’s face.

Angelo: I thought maybe she was being mischievous, the writer. You don’t think so?

Smith: Absolutely dead-on. This is what a first lady is supposed to be.

Angelo: But it also shows that the limitations on first ladies are as broad as you want to make them. You do not have to stay and groan about the wives. I think my first time of actually remembering first ladies would be Bess Truman, who I thought was terrible. Harry Truman adored Bess Truman, he adored her. And she would go away with Margaret, taking Margaret with her for an entire summer, leaving Harry with the world’s problems – and there were problems all the time in the Truman years – alone, first in the White House, and then in Blair House where they lived during the renovation. But I felt she owed him more than that and I resent Bess Truman on the part of Harry Truman. He adored her.
Now I thought one of the most interesting was Mamie Eisenhower who said she and Ike could never have such happy years as they did in the White House. Which was lovely because she’d been the Army wife and done all the proper things when she was supposed to; but there they were together and they really found that they liked each other. So I thought that was lovely.

I think you look at the Nixons and you see – this was no marriage. It might have been way in the early years, but when he would go off to Camp David for a weekend and not take her, but take Bebe Rebozo? I think that was kind of a slap to her. They bought the house next door – very unsuitable, totally unsuitable house for a president – on Key Biscayne on the waters of Miami because it was next door to Bebe Rebozo’s. Well, the Secret Service had to buy two more houses, they hated it. Then he would go off to Bob Abplanalp’s private island – again, leaving Pat back there by herself. She stopped going to Florida because she was just abandoned there.

And I thought, to me, that was a tragically failed marriage and he did it in a way that anybody who was paying attention could see. The women of America liked Pat Nixon, maybe because a lot of them identified with her. But to know that she had been this wonderful – one of my great friends who was a CBS correspondent, Bob Pierpoint, which everybody knows, he was student at the high school in the town they lived in, in California. Was it Redlands – the town?

Smith: I’m not sure.

Angelo: I can’t remember. Anyway, he said at the high school everybody loved Pat Ryan. She was the head of the cheerleading squad, she was the teacher, as often happens in the small town, that everybody just loved. And he said, “I can’t see that person in the Pat Nixon that I cover these days.” So, you see, the White House can have a debilitating effect – or liberating effect. I think Barbara Bush certainly found it liberating. She did whatever she pleased and, I think, loved it. Laura must have, too. There is no indication that she didn’t. So we hope that Michelle Obama, who is certainly setting a track record for doing more things to show, “Hey, I’m a person,” and being out in the town, or having school kids come in to meet her. For one who has covered so many kinds of first ladies, I just kind of look in amazement at how quickly the atmosphere can be changed.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Angelo: Thank you. My pleasure.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this.

Hills: Thank you for taking your time.

Smith: It's hard to know where to begin. Tell us the road that led you to the Ford White House. What were you doing before your path crossed that of Gerald Ford's?

Hills: I was at the Justice Department. I was Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Civil Division.

Smith: During Watergate?

Hills: Well, yes, in that time. I came to Washington at the invitation of the then Attorney General Elliot Richardson. I came to Washington – actually, he came out to see me in California in 1973. I was teaching at UCLA and running a law practice, so I was very, very busy. I kept asking him for more time to come back. He called me in September and said, “I’m under a lot of pressure, could you come back and make a decision?”

I flew back in October with my husband and met with his deputy, Bill Ruckelshaus, and talked about the position. We had lunch with his wife Ann, and talked about schools for our children in the region, and said finally, “Okay, I’ll do it.” We flew home for a friend’s fiftieth birthday – Saturday night – and turned on the radio when I got there. That was the weekend of the Saturday Night Massacre. I called the White House on Monday and said, “I’m sorry, I was recruited by Elliot Richardson, and I don’t know what your plans are, but I am off the list.” And they kept after me to come, and, indeed, although Bill Ruckelshaus had left, others in the Justice Department pressed me to, as they say, fulfill your commitment. And they felt…

Smith: Did that include Judge Bork?
Hills: Yes. And Judge Bork said, “It’s not a pleasant time for me. I’m under a lot of pressure. I really, really would like to have you come.” So I came back another time and met with then Attorney General Saxbe Smith: That’s right - from Ohio.

Hills: He was from Ohio, Mechanicsburg, Ohio. I interviewed with him and he was very different from Elliot Richardson. I asked him whether I would have leeway to hire the kinds of people that I had hired for our law firm, and that I was particularly keen about having deep talent and broad capacity. After about ten minutes he said, “Mrs. Hills, are you only going to hire women?” And I thought, never was there a clearer indication that I’m not getting through. I said, “Who’s going to be your deputy?” And he said, “Larry Silverman, who’s over at Steptoe and Johnson.” I said, “Would you mind if I talked to him?” He agreed, and I went over to talk to Larry – never met him before – and was absolutely captivated by him. So I said, “Okay, I’ll come.” And I came in February and then that was the beginning of my being in Washington when President Ford called me.

Smith: Let me back up. For people for whom Elliot Richardson is just a name in a textbook, what was Elliot Richardson like? And what was his role in all of this?

Hills: Elliot was an enormous talent. He graduated at the top of his class at Harvard. He was a man of great integrity He had served as secretary of the Defense Department, served on Health, Education and Welfare, attorney general, and secretary of commerce. He’d been everywhere. He just made an enormous contribution to government as a very strong man of integrity and independent views.

Smith: Did you, in later years, ever discuss with him those events surrounding the Saturday Night Massacre?

Hills: Absolutely. We became very close friends, he and Ann and Rod. He came back into the Ford administration. He was especially close friends with Rod, who did a lot of different things with him when Rod was at the White House.
Rod has pictures of the four of us doing things together. We had an enormous admiration for the Richardsons as a family.

Smith: Did he ever contemplate carrying out the president’s order? How much of an internal struggle was that that he confronted in terms of firing Cox?

Hills: When he called me and said he was under pressure, I had no idea just how much - being out in the hinterlands – I had no idea the pressure he was under. And I think that he struggled with it in the sense that he wanted to be a loyal lieutenant, but he wanted more to be a man of integrity. And he thought that having made the commitments to Archibald Cox that he had made, he had no choice.

I think his deputy, Bill Ruckelshaus, felt similarly and I think Bob Bork felt that if everyone left the Justice Department at this time of great turmoil – and this was a terrible time of high inflation, high unemployment, disappointment and anger over the Vietnam War – that if there ever was a time we needed a strong rule of law and a strong Justice Department, we needed it then. I understood both sides, and admired both. I thought that Bob Bork staying and holding the fort, so to speak, was admirable and courageous.

Smith: Interesting you say that. It did not imply, necessarily, a personal endorsement on his part of the decision to first Cox.

Hills: Absolutely not. And from where Bob Bork came – he’s hugely criticized. He came from Yale; the Yale faculty was very, very critical, and I think it cost him a lot in terms of his prestige. History will, I think, smile upon him because I think he did what he thought was right for the country.

It’s sort of interesting when I think about the people who worked in the Ford administration – a disproportionate number of them relative to what we see in later years – did what was right for the country, as did President Ford.

Smith: Did you harbor – particularly after the Massacre – did you harbor doubts about “What am I getting into? Do I really want to join an administration whose future may be so uncertain?”
Hills: Yes. I was a bit iffy. I didn’t seek the job, the job sought me. I had four children. My husband was going to have to commute from California, and although it was an exciting prospect, the turmoil did bother me. I was, as I say, I was more recruited by the deputy attorney general than by the attorney general. I was very impressed with Elliot Richardson, and to join a team that he was putting together – of the caliber that he had put together – was an honor. The next step was more of a gamble.

Smith: During that period after you arrived, and before the so-called final days, I assume this was a topic that consumed Washington. And I imagine it must have been, if nothing else, gossiped about continually within the halls of the Justice Department.

Hills: Not really. You’re talking about the final days of President Nixon and…

Smith: The unfolding Watergate scandal and the prospects for Nixon’s…

Hills: I do recall that I was playing tennis with Larry Silverman in September, and word came of the pardon and I was absolutely stunned. Judge Silverman who was deputy said, “Well, there’s goes President Ford’s election,” and that was the kind of talk. It was very closely held. I did not have rumor of it ahead of time, other than as reported in the press. There was a “Would he do it? – No, he wouldn’t.” That kind of thing.

Smith: That’s fascinating. Can you think of a time – was there such a thing as ‘that moment” when you internally decided that the Nixon presidency was not going to survive? Was it when the Supreme Court ruled on the tapes, or the specific, so-called “smoking gun” tape, or was it earlier than that?

Hills: Well, this was a time of great anxiety and, of course, the president was claiming that he knew nothing of the Watergate. The tapes were not widely talked about because, until publicity about the 18 minute gap. People weren’t aware generally speaking that their conversations were being taped. So, the view was generally a man is innocent until proven guilty, and I think in the Justice Department that was really the mindset, although there was a lot of criticism of the style and tone of the then presidency.
Smith: It is interesting – just to back up. We had an interesting interview, fascinating actually, with Jerry Jones, who, at the time, was running the White House personnel office for Haldeman. And he got a call from Haldeman, who was still at the White House so this had to be before the middle of April, ‘73. He got a call wanting to know how many people reported directly to the vice president.

Hills: The vice president?

Smith: The vice president. And Jones does some figuring in his head and he says probably about fifty. He said, “Good. I want undated letters of resignation from every one of them.” Which led Jones to believe that Haldeman, Erlichman, and presumably the president, knew as early as spring of ’73 that Agnew, in fact, might have severe problems - which presumably would have come from the Justice Department. I don’t know when that investigation began, but that’s striking.

Hills: I did not arrive until Feb, 1974. But no one ever asked for my resignation. And I was too busy to look up. It was a 24/7 kind of a job.

Smith: Describe the job – why you were at the Justice Department at that point. I think probably, to most people, there’s a perception that government had ground to a halt.

Hills: Right.

Smith: But, presumably, that’s not the case. Presumably below the surface, the government continues to function no matter what crisis is enveloping the White House.

Hills: The Justice Department was very, very busy. The Civil Division represents all the departments and agencies of government - any suit brought by or against them. They are often quite complex. So we had a lot of litigation, and when a country is in turmoil, you tend to get more litigation. So there were all kinds of cases being brought across the land that we were involved in that ranged from class actions involving the swine flu vaccination to re-lining at HUD. It wasn’t a time of vacation.

Smith: Can you describe – everyone has got their own word portrait of that transition. Does anything really stands out in those last days of the Nixon presidency and the transition to Gerald Ford?

Hills: We were all glued with our ears to the radio in those very last days. First Gerald Ford was appointed vice president and there was a lot of discussion about his qualities as an appointed vice president. And there was discussion in the last days of how he would govern were he a president. But, as I say, we were engaged in tough lawsuits – the May Day Riot suits, the Nixon tapes cases, a lot of Constitutional statutory interpretations that were quite crucial to the country, and so our forces at the Civil Division were scampering to keep up.

Smith: Al Haig, among others, has said that he realized the presidency was gone the day that the court came out with its ruling on the tapes, which I think was unanimous.

Hills: Right, yes. The court issued its opinion in the summer of 1974.

Smith: In fact, someone with whom we’ve talked raised the question, “Could we get away with defying the court?”

Hills: Defying the court?

Smith: From San Clemente, clearly Nixon’s first instinct was, is there any wiggle room in this? Can we – politically, would it fly if we were to defy the court? And the word was passed along, no way. Were you surprised that – really Richard Nixon was surprised – were you surprised that it was a unanimous ruling that went the way it did on the tapes?

Hills: I don’t think I was surprised, but I don’t have any clear recollection. The case was handled in the SG’s office – the Solicitor General’s office – and Al Haig was in the inner sanctum with Nixon – talked to him quite a lot. He was a courier between the presidency and the vice presidency at that time, and so the comments that you mention – letters of resignation and whether they could defy the court – I’d be very surprised with their legal training that either President Nixon or President Ford would think that was a possibility in this country. Particularly with the turmoil in the country. That would have been a match next to a gasoline can in my view, with the unhappiness over Vietnam and Watergate, and then you add the defiance of the Supreme Court. I think they must have dismissed the idea in thirty seconds.

Smith: When did you first meet Gerald Ford?

Hills: On one Saturday I got a phone call. I tried very hard to be home on weekends and not do anything social so that I could spend time with my children.

Smith: How old were your children at that point?

Hills: The youngest was four and the eldest was thirteen. One Saturday in February 1974 I got a phone call saying the White House wants to see you. And I naturally thought it was about one of my cases, and I said, “Who in the White House?” The White House is calling, and I said, who? Well, it was Don Rumsfeld. Don got on the phone and said he wanted to see me but the president also wanted to see me. So I drove down and Don said, “We’d like you to go over to HUD.” And I said, “I’m not an urbanologist. Is this a good idea?” He said, “Well, the president thinks you’re a good manager.” He took me in to to see the president. I said the same thing to President Ford. I said, “You know, I’m not an urbanologist. You’ll probably get some push back on this, and actually I think you need me at the Justice Department because that’s all I’ve been doing all my life, being a lawyer.” And he said, “I’m told you are a good manager. HUD needs a good manager. I’d like you to go.” And so, I figured when the president asked you do something, you do it. So I acquiesced and it wasn’t very long before I was over at HUD.

Smith: Now was there any discussion, not necessarily at that meeting, but from Rumsfeld or others regarding the HUD agenda? In addition to managerial skills, there clearly had to be a sense of what they wanted the department to do.
Less of that, but you must understand that the Civil Division was the trial counsel for HUD. And so I knew very well who the people were at HUD, particularly those who handled their litigation. The first piece of legislation that President Ford signed was the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974.

And what was that?

That changed our whole housing picture. I think John Sparkman, who was then chairman – Senator Sparkman was chairman of the Banking Committee – said it was the most revolutionary change in housing since 1949. What the act did was to let communities, states and localities, decide what to do with the federal monies that they received. On the housing side, instead of having Congress tell them that they would build housing projects, they had a choice of using new, rehabilitated, or used housing – which made a whole lot of sense economically, because a community like Phoenix had nothing but new, and a community like Newark had nothing but old. And so for Newark to be limited to building new housing when it had empty houses that needed rehabilitation and occupancy didn’t make any sense.

And the other side of the act was community development. Up to that time Congress had a long list of specific programs that it mandated for communities - they must have a rat-extinction program, or they must have a parks program, or they must have a lighting program. Congress had seven big, specific programs. The new bill changed that and distributed federal monies based on a formula that weighed poverty and population. I think the age of infrastructure was also a component of the formula. The law required the recipient locality to hold a hearing. A mayor would have a hearing, then the locality may spend it for its critical need – new curbing and lighting, because that’s its need. If the need was to have a new park, then that’s its need – green space, open space – that’s fine. But it had to be on the basis of a public hearing covered by the press. The monies were distributed on formula of poverty, population and age of infrastructure…no earmarks, no special interests.
I often think of that today as we’re stimulating the economy. President Ford felt that the concept of Washington knows best, when San Jose is so different from Little Rock was wrong. A mandatory program misses the mark. And I certainly saw that. On day one when I went to HUD, I could tell that mayors could not leave money on the table. And even though the specific program was hitting maybe their eleventh priority, if there was money on the table, “Okay, we’ll take it.” Whereas, if they could use that money for what they really needed, you would have diminished the cynicism about government.

Can you imagine in a community like Newark, building a new dwelling when there’s a block of boarded up buildings that you’re not using – the citizenry must think, “What are they doing? Don’t they have the sense to know that they could use these buildings and make the neighborhood cleaner and safer?” And so this was a big, big change.

Smith: That’s fascinating because it really does fit in with this whole sense – first of all, I’ve always thought that it’s a mistake for people to look upon the Ford presidency as simply a coda to the Nixon presidency.

Hills: Right.

Smith: That’s a tendency. And it’s more than an interregnum between Nixon and Carter. That in many ways, Richard Nixon can be seen as the last New Deal president. Someone whose political reading was, “I have to accommodate the New Deal majority in the country.” And Ford really represents in many ways, a break with that. The Ford presidency is more about foreshadowing changes that would become consensus. Economic deregulation is a classic example.

Hills: Absolutely.

Smith: But this whole idea of loosening the strings that Washington had used traditionally to mandate one size fits all kind of policy. That kind of pragmatic conservatism seems to be the hallmark of the Ford presidency.

Hills: And he was driven by what he thought was right. Not by politics. You talk about earmarks. He wasn’t for earmarks. He was for doing what was right for the people. And it was courageous. It’s hard to find a president so courageous. When you stop to think that he, with a Democratic House, and a Democratic Senate, but that his twenty-six years on Appropriation made him know what government did and what government should do. He was quite amazing.

He is the only president, in my recollection, who briefed the press on the budget. That’s every department and agency of government. And when I was told that he was going to brief the press on the HUD budget, my heart was in my mouth because I don’t think anybody would have described President Ford as being very articulate, very smooth in talking. Smooth in thinking and he did the right thing, but eloquence wasn’t the first thing that comes to mind. I was so afraid that he would have a problem. He didn’t have any problem. He knew where every dime was going. It was quite amazing. I don’t think any president – not only if they wanted to – could do that. Any president since, none have done it, in any event. He understood government.

Smith: The other side of that – there is this notion out there that it took him a while, in fact, maybe it took him two years to, in some ways, outgrow the Congressional mindset. To evolve from being a man of the Hill to a president. They are different functions in a lot of ways.

Hills: Right.

Smith: He brought those skills with him to office, but then in some ways, it took him a while to realize that they alone weren’t enough. What’s your take on that?

Hills: I don’t agree at all. I found him to be quite a leader. When you think of the decisions that he made that were unpopular – enormously unpopular; granting amnesty to those who refused to serve in Vietnam; applying sanctions to South Africa at a time when big corporations were opposed; the Helsinki Accords – so many things that he took because he felt that they were the right thing to do. Indeed, the pardon of President Nixon – he knew, he certainly knew politics – he knew that that was going to have a horrific cost.

He was a man of the House of Representatives, he knew he had to run in two years. And yet, he felt when the country was in turmoil – and he said that subsequently to me – the country was in turmoil, it was time to draw a line and move forward. And if we had litigated over the impeachment or gone through all the litigating steps, we would have been involved in that for four years, and the country had double digit inflation, it had high unemployment, it had a misery index that was enormous. He wanted to get on about the job of bringing those things down and in twenty-nine months he did that. And so, inflation was brought down to five percent, which is really remarkable, and unemployment was brought down, investment was brought up. He created jobs. I think his economic record was quite, quite good.

Smith: Apparently the folks in the White House, and obviously including the president, were hearing from Leon Jaworski at the outset that it could take up to two years to bring Nixon into a court room. And the thought of having the country and the press obsessed with Nixon and Nixon’s tapes and Nixon’s legal prospects and everything else, weighed heavily upon him.

Hills: I believe that. I believe that when he said this is a time for healing, he really believed that the country would continue to disintegrate if we didn’t draw a line and put the problems of the past behind us and move forward in a more positive sense. If you look at his record, everything that was going down that should not be going down, he brought up. And everything that was going up that shouldn’t be going up, he brought down. And so when he left, people who have commented on his presidency have said his successor didn’t have to initiate new programs, he simply had to continue the path of President Ford. And sadly, that wasn’t done. The economy – again, we got back into turmoil, and I think because of lack of knowledge with respect to the government.

Smith: You don’t think of Gerald Ford as being particularly drawn to urban affairs, urban policy. Was that a misnomer? Did he, because of his work on the Hill, know more about these programs, or have more of an interest than perhaps people might imply? I’m thinking of Grand Rapids, West Michigan, conservative Republican, did he, in fact, have an interest in and knowledge of urban policy?
Hills: He had a great knowledge of how money was spent. He had a strong view that all wisdom did not emanate from the Potomac. And he believed that there was an inefficiency when Washington was specifying how money should be spent. And he must have seen that in Grand Rapids. But, again, having served on Appropriations, where you follow the money, you know what’s happening to the money. He was aware of it. I took any number of appeals up to him while I was at HUD.

Smith: On what, for instance?

Hills: All kinds of issues. My predecessor, Jim Lynn…

Smith: Who went on to become budget director?

Hills: Went on to be head of OMB. As is normal, most predecessors don’t think their successor is doing it just the way they would have done it. So, Jim would call me and say, “I’m not going to let this counseling program go through.” And I said, “Jim, we’ve got a hundred million dollars sunk into a program, and people are coming into housing that have never had housing. And when they get frustrated they pull the plumbing off the wall because they just simply don’t know what to do. They don’t fix things. They need some help. We’re going to invest ten million dollars across the country to work with NGOs and mayors so that they are trained. So people who go in, take care of the places that they are living in.” No, he didn’t want to do that. I said, “Well, take it up.” He said, “You can’t take a ten million dollar program to the president.” I said, “Just watch me.” And what was just remarkable – I mean, this is just one small incident – the president would have us into the Cabinet Room, Jim on one side, me on the other, and the president across the way. Just the three of us. I made my pitch, Jim made his pitch, the president would rule from the bench. In all my time as a prosecutor, I had never seen a judge be so prompt, so thorough, and I appreciated the fact that he ruled for me.

In our dinner, Vice President Rockefeller got up and said, “The person who has brought more of these cases to the president and won them is the one who put this dinner together.” But it was true. He was just terrific about taking on and listening to the issues.

Smith: That’s fascinating because we keep hearing this sense that Ford welcomed a vigorous exchange between opposing points of view. He was totally comfortable with people who might have a little more eloquence; a little more polish; a little more – whatever.

Hills: Absolutely.

Smith: And in the end, no one doubted who was going to make the decisions, or that it would be made.

Hills: Right. He engaged. The Cabinet meeting was interesting.

Smith: Describe how the Cabinet worked under the president.

Hills: He would raise issues so that we were aware, and he would engage, both qualitatively and quantitatively, to the discussion. There were, as you know, very strong, differing views over deregulation, over various programs, over foreign policy. And he was very skilled at participating in the discussion. I would say that most of the discussions that were focused, were more of one on one or one on two, or a group. I can recall several group discussions, so that domestic policy and economic policy were separate from the foreign policy. But he was extraordinarily engaged in the issues. I think of his Cabinet – he really had strong-willed, talented people. He brought in – I don’t know whether you’ve talked to Secretary Bill Coleman – a Frankfurter law clerk, first in his class at Harvard, civil rights lawyer – I mean, a really splendid mind.

Smith: And, it’s extraordinary when, just in the course of one conversation, when you stop to realize, the fifty-five mile per hour speed limit, airbags, the beginnings of deregulation. And also, the Metro in D.C., I-66, finishing the Interstate Highway system, it is extraordinary how much happened in that slice of time.

Hills: Twenty-nine months, and on deregulation, his successor gets a lot of the credit. But airline deregulations, trucking deregulations, you’ll be talking to Rod about that, but he was in the White House as counsel to the president and he’ll talk to you about those issues. But he gives tremendous credit to President Ford. And President Ford also listened – he brought in such a diverse people – a present from the north, Ed Levi, spectacular attorney general. Present from the south, David Matthews. He brought in John Dunlop who was the dean up at Harvard on labor. He was a very different kind of thinker in terms of what you’d call traditional Republicanism. He absorbed these views we’ve talked about. Elliot, who has been in every post that you can imagine.

Smith: Tell us about Ed Levi, I remember working with the president on the eulogy that he gave at the attorney general’s funeral in Chicago - which was a real education. He was a remarkable man. And I do think, in some ways, he’s an attorney general who set a standard.

Hills: Yes.

Smith: Tell us about Ed Levi, and that relationship and how, in effect, the department regained its credibility.

Hills: Well, Ed Levi was an independent lawyer. He was a strong, thoughtful, lawyer. He called it as he saw it. I’m sure that there are some political advisors in the White House who wished he had made decisions differently than those that he did make from time to time, but there is no doubt that he was going to call it as he saw it. He brought great prestige. I was always sorry that I hadn’t had the opportunity to serve with him at Justice. I left before he came, but we were Cabinet colleagues. We had a lot of discussions. We became very good friends and had lots of dinners together, Kate and Ed and Rod and I. Kate was wonderful in terms of insisting on a one table conversation. When there are so many interesting things to talk about, it’s lovely to get differing points of view, and that was her trademark on dinners, and it was lots of fun.

Smith: That’s great. And I take it that he, over time, became devoted to the president.

Hills: Yes, absolutely.
Smith: On the surface, they are almost from different planets. Just culturally, sort of the obvious. But you could say that about a number of the people in that Cabinet.

Hills: You just said what I would say. You look around the table from Bill Scranton – governor, erudite, articulate…

Smith: And pretty liberal by Republican standards.

Hills: And certainly a centrist – and Vice President Rockefeller – certainly a centrist and more liberal than I would – I’m not fond of labels, quite frankly. I think you have to look at the issue, but Henry Kissinger – very strong-willed and certainly a talented individual. So his Cabinet was made up of people who were independent minded and willing to express their points of view – with courtesy, but they did express their views.

Smith: I remember talking to Bill Simon before he died. As you know I’ve been working on this biography of Nelson Rockefeller for years – people who thought that he sort of veered to the right in his later years, overlook the Energy Independence Corporation. It was just classic Rockefeller.

Hills: Rod will talk to you about that, too.

Smith: Well, good. Needless to say, Simon didn’t agree with this. And at some point, and I don’t know if it was in a Cabinet meeting or in a smaller conversation, but there was a very heated exchange about this. And Simon at some point claims to have said, “Don’t let him do to the country what he did to New York.” And the president indicated in front of the group that he was going to support Nelson on this.

Hills: Right.

Smith: And Simon continued the argument privately. And it shows you who was the real politician. The president said, “Bill, you and I both know there’s not a chance in hell that Congress will ever adopt this, but I’m not going to embarrass Nelson.” Which is so revealing.
Hills: I wasn’t in that discussion, but that sounds so like how he might have just ended the discussion. And, of course, there was great pressure for that on the Hill, from certain segments. So, by moving in that direction, he not only let them do their dance on the Hill, but he didn’t embarrass the vice president.

Smith: How difficult was it for Rockefeller to subordinate himself into this job? He said he’d known every vice president since Henry Wallace and they were all miserable. And yet, I talked to someone who tried to talk him out of taking the job when the president asked him to do it. This guy went through all of these reasons why he would be the latest miserable vice president, and Rockefeller, who I don’t think was totally honest with himself about his motives, finally was backed into a corner. He said, “Bill, everything you say is right, but you forget one thing. This is my last chance.”

Hills: Well, I thought that he was a wonderful man. He brought levity and charm – he had served six presidents I think, in one capacity or another. Certainly in knowledge, big city, big state, populous state, politics. And yes, they did disagree on issues from time to time, but they disagreed agreeably and he wasn’t the only one. There were very strong discussions on labor policy, very strong discussions on deregulation - timing and the extent of. There were others in the Cabinet, too, that would war. It’s not unusual, either, turf being what it is in the federal government; there is a certain gnashing at the edges. He was very compliant when he was not selected to run a second time. He could have fussed about it and created problems, but he did not.

Hills: Absolutely. So I give him very high marks for loyalty and his contributions.

Smith: I think the one substantive issue where there really was disagreement, and it obviously didn’t just involve the president and vice president, was the whole issue of aid to New York City.

Hills: Yes.
Smith: I would be fascinated to know your take on all of that, because my sense is that there were two camps. I talked at length with Bill Seidman about this. Seidman sort of aligned himself with the vice president, and then there was Bill Simon and Alan Greenspan and those folks, who are perhaps more classically free market types. Again, the danger of labels. But, there was this famous speech at the National Press Club, and as Seidman reconstructs it, the two camps were at a tug of war, and he thought the president was going to go and deliver this fairly moderate address. And at the last minute - in part because at that point, the Reagan challenge was looming and it was deemed good politics to take a tough stance against what was seen by many people to be an irresponsible city government in New York. [the speech was changed] That’s the background that I have from those folks. It would really be fascinating to know your recollection of how that evolved.

Hills: I think it was the Post that had the “Drop Dead” headline. That’s inaccurate. The president came down more of wanting New York to take on greater responsibility. Whenever you have to work out a situation, you want the folks that have created the problem to take on some responsibility and how are they going to behave. So I think he was negotiating and a harsher headline was put on it than he meant to communicate. So, I would have put him as a centrist on that issue. He did have advice. As I say, on most issues he had vigorous debate. He had a diverse Cabinet and he had a discussion that was pretty robust, and then he came down on one side or another, but often in the middle.

Smith: Were you part of that group that was discussing New York?

Hills: No, other than as how we would provide the funding. In other words, the philosophic issue of helping New York. We were helping New York. HUD was helping New York big time.

Smith: Something like 25% of New York’s municipal budget was already coming from Washington.
Hills: Absolutely. And we were committed to doing that. I thought the president should get credit for that. So, it wasn’t that we were cutting off New York. So this is again what I would put in the era. And if you look at it, New York made it, and I think the problem was in eloquence. How do you express yourself, and maybe by trying to weave between these two groups in the White House, both in the White House. The president didn’t get enough credit for what he was doing, what he was willing to continue to do – which he committed to me he was committed to do – and to try to get them to do more. You don’t just want to throw new money down a hole. You want to know what are they going to do with it. And he was tracking it – he wanted to track it.

Smith: Clearly, when Mayor Beame showed up for the first time, he was not willing to make serious cuts in what had come to be seen as the fabric of New York. Hugh Carey told me years later, he said, “You know, Jerry Ford’s never gotten the credit he deserved for his role in saving New York.”

Hills: Absolutely. That’s what I think. I think that we were working very closely with the people up in New York. We committed to them. We’ll stand by you. What the president was doing was saying, “If we give you any additional monies, we want to know where they are going to go. We don’t want them to just be spread around politically.” And he couldn’t get that commitment and then he got the headline, but his tough stance was really kind of tough love, I would say.

Smith: Did you sense there was a disagreement there between the president and the vice president? Rockefeller must have been in a somewhat awkward position at that point.

Hills: That’s what I meant when I said I was not part of it. I meant I did not hear a disagreement between Nelson Rockefeller and President Ford.

Smith: How aware were you, and presumably other members of the Cabinet, during ’75 - this prospect of the Reagan challenge? It has been claimed over the years that it tended to be underestimated for a long time. That people in the White House were slow to realize just how serious this might be.

Hills: Right.

Smith: Was that your sense of the time? Were you surprised when Governor Reagan got into the race, were you surprised at what he was able to mobilize?

Hills: Well, you remember the economy was coming up, but it was coming up very gradually. I think that if we’d had one more month, if the projections were constant, President Ford would have won. Very close. President Reagan was a competent campaigner. He and his forces offended me hugely in Kansas City as they danced in front of the president’s box and were rude to a point of an embarrassment, I thought. And that always bothered me a lot. I thought anyone could see what President Ford had contributed to his country in so many ways. You can run a campaign, but you can run a courteous campaign, and they were not courteous in Kansas City. It bothered me considerably.

Smith: That suggests that the split in the party was profound.

Hills: Yes, the split was very strong. Particularly strong in California. California had lost Republicans from the time that Bobby Kennedy was shot in the 60s. In fact, Rod was co-chairman with Leon Panetta of the campaign of a Republican who was criticized for not coming home often enough. And somebody in the John Birch Society, Max Rafferty…

Smith: Oh, sure. Tom Kuchel.

Hills: Ran against Tom and beat him. And then Al Cranston, who was controller, Rod also ran a Claremont professor against Alan _____________. And _____________ beat Al Cranston, who didn’t have a job, so he filed for the Senate seat and he beat Max Rafferty in a walk away. So Alan was always very fond of us. He said, “You paved my way to getting into Senate.” After that time, centrists and even[?] re-registered and were either independents or Democrats. First of all, they had registered to vote for Kennedy, who was popular. So you lost a slew of them then. And then when the Max Rafferty’s took over the party – you saw a big slide and big re-registration. So the Republican Party had become quite conservative and quite ideological, and it’s had a hard time recovering. If you think about it, Arnold Schwarzenegger would never have won, but for having run through a general election because the party is very polarized there. That’s unfortunate.

Smith: He [Ford] is an atypical president, isn’t he, in a lot of ways? David Broder famously said he was the least neurotic president David Broder had ever known. And maybe in part because he hadn’t spent his life calculating what it would become to president.

Hills: Not at all, he wanted to be Speaker, Leader. He loved the House. So, when he was picked, it was because people loved him.

Smith: The great irony is then, of course, he becomes president and he really spends the next two and a half years trying to fend off the Watergate babies and others who are pushing back against the executive branch of government. And all of those vetoes…did you have vetoes?

Hills: You bet we did. And I have nothing but admiration for him. When you think of the presidents that have come since and you think, how in the world could they have signed that bill? This man vetoed, I think, sixty-six bills, he sustained fifty-four, if my numbers are right, and he had a Democratic House and Democratic Senate. That he was able to sustain fifty-four vetoes because he was right, was because they respected him. We had the middle class housing emergency bill in ’75, we got the bill up and it was, in the president’s view, and with my recommendation, too broad. Remember, we had…

Smith: It was more than a question of money, it was…

Hills: No, no. It was a question of money, but in other words, it took the middle class and it was paying benefits – we were paying the interest rates on mortgages. Very similar – here in 1975 we had the oil shock, we had distaste over Vietnam, we had Watergate, so there was cynicism about government. You know, you think about our government today and the analogy there. I won’t go into that. But I said to him, “Mr. President, this is going to cost us a bundle because it covers all the middle class, whether they need it or not. Whether the house is in foreclosure or not.” And so he wanted it trimmed back to those who had lost their jobs and could not pay their mortgage. So he vetoed it.

Now, this was a housing bill where it was something the Hill wanted very, very much. Bill Proxmire was absolutely convinced that this would help cure inflation. Spend more and you’ll get jobs. He was wrong economically, but he was my chairman. The president vetoed it. We took it back to the Hill and we worked with the Hill, and with a lot of Democratic help like Ashley, we got that bill back to the president. We killed the override the next day. And we had the bill back within a week, and he signed it at a Rose Garden ceremony. I have a picture of that with the Democrats there who were supportive, helping us get this done. And so, yes, we gave assistance. But he was a president who really worried that the money be properly spent.

Smith: And I assume, probably keenly aware, that not only is there the old cliché there’s nothing more permanent than a temporary program, and by the same token, something starts small and with the best of intentions and balloons over time into something perhaps much, much larger and more costly.

Hills: Well, he had the notion, if you want something – more here – you’ve got to bring it back there. And so he was very disciplined on trying to control inflation and his program worked. He sold it as: one, we’ve got to bring down inflation, and he did bring it down from double digits down to five percent in twenty-nine months. That’s really quite amazing.

Smith: And yet, the irony is, people think about Whip Inflation Now. And that was just a false start.

Hills: Yes. Well, you know, you get these slogans, and if you don’t get the press behind it, they amplify. And we didn’t have Saturday Night Live, as I recall then, but that’s the thing that amplifies the problem. He wanted to whip inflation and the little button campaign was a joke, it was turned into a joke.
But it was a serious issue. If we’d let inflation go way up, we would have had a big problem.

Smith: Can you think of an instance where you really went toe to toe on something and he overrode you?

Hills: No, I cannot. I really cannot. He was extremely supportive. Of course we only had twenty-nine months. He loved the new bill, he thought it was moving in the right direction – away from categoricals – into giving communities the leeway both on housing and community development, to do what they would do. He was proud of what they did with the money. We didn’t have a lot of allegation of fraud because the press was in on it. It was required by the bill that there be a hearing so that the community knew you had the money; what were you going to do with it. And of course, we had seventy-eight head offices spread out throughout the nation who participated, and it was a program he could be proud of.

Smith: Now, you joined the Cabinet when in ’75?

Hills: In March of ’75.

Smith: So you were there in time for the fall of Saigon.

Hills: Yes.

Smith: What are your memories about that period?

Hills: I think that hit him very, very hard. And, again, his efforts with Vietnam and how he treated those who were opposed to the Vietnam War were magnanimous. I just don’t think anyone could disagree with that. But that was wrenching for the country and to see the photographs of people climbing on the roof of the embassy trying to get out in helicopters and leaving behind friends whom we knew would be persecuted. It was wrenching.

Smith: And then, remember the sequel. Congress, understandably, wants to pull the plug, and sort of pretend that this horrible thing never happened. And specifically, not fund, cancel funding to bring refugees into this country.
Hills: Right.

Smith: And the president singlehandedly challenged them on that and put together this crazy quilt coalition. I know George Meany was part of it, and governors like Reuben Askew and others. And he, in effect, went to the country and shamed Congress into putting back sufficient funds to bring out about 120,000 in the first wave.

Hills: You see, there’s another example of doing what is right, not what is politically expedient. And for a president to lie down and fall asleep and just leave it up to the legislative branch is something that he did not do. He really participated with Congress. I can’t imagine that president, President Ford, saying to Congress, “I need some legislation, you draft it.” We drafted the legislation. We went up on the Hill and sold it. Yes, sometimes Congress inflated this or that, and then he decided whether to veto it or to back it. But he was an active president who led the Congress. He didn’t just say, “I’d like to have a bill that looks something like…” and then say, “Well, I’m sorry it didn’t turn out just to please everyone.”

Smith: And then at the same time, in part because of ’74 and this whole new generation – things were changing so rapidly on the Hill – he had a very ambitious energy package. And part of it was the decontrol of natural gas prices, and there was a heated debate about that, not surprisingly. As I understand it, eventually they came to an agreement, a gentlemen’s agreement, a handshake agreement, on a period of time over which this would happen. And Mansfield and Albert came back a week later, embarrassed, and said, “We can’t sell it.”

Hills: That happens. That happens, but then they went to work again. They tried hard. He tried to shape the legislation and give an outline, rather than just, “We need an energy bill, give me something.” He didn’t do that. And also he had people up to the White House that were on the other side of the aisle and worked with them very often. Here was a man who played golf, I would say, every third week or so, with Tip O’Neill. And he’d say, “You know, I don’t agree with Tip on a lot of things, but he’s a decent guy. I like him.” Can you imagine in succeeding presidents…

Smith: There is a wonderful story. Don Penny, who worked on the president’s speeches and humor and all that told the story; the president and Tip had just met in the Oval Office and had a great meeting, and then Tip went out on the driveway and unloaded, mercilessly, on his friend, Jerry Ford. And Don, who wasn’t accustomed to the ways of Washington, saw this. Took it very literally and went back in and told the president, “You won’t believe what Tip O’Neill is saying,” and on and on and on. The president’s at his desk with his pipe sort of nodding, and he said, “That’s just politics, Don.”

Hills: Really, he was very tolerant of that kind of thing, and yet he didn’t engage in it. It’s amazing. He did not – I don’t remember him – I remember him being a little hot under the collar and I can’t remember the congressman, and he said, “You know, I have to be careful because Betty carpools with them…” So, always, he was restrained in a gentlemanly way. I couldn’t imagine him doing the reverse thing with Tip O’Neill. Not at all.

Smith: I only heard him speak disparagingly of two people. One was John Dean, and one was Gordon Liddy.

Hills: Oh, how interesting.

Smith: But I never heard him disparage anyone else. And then he and Hale Boggs would have debates at the Press Club.

Hills: Yes.

Smith: And they would drive down together to the Press Club and they would decide on the way, what are we going to debate today? They would have their debate, and then they would go have a drink and lunch and go back to the Hill.

Hills: It’s just amazing, isn’t it? Very different atmosphere and much missed, I think. I wish we could bring it back. I used to say last year; I just can’t imagine our current president playing golf with Harry Reid.
Smith: Did you have much contact with Mrs. Ford or the family?

Hills: I did, only socially. I mean, she was very gracious. And then after his presidency they went to Beaver Creek. When he was in charge of a World Forum, I never missed one, except when I was in government and was travelling.

Smith: Describe the World Forum.

Hills: The World Forum was put together by The American Enterprise Institute. But Gerald Ford was the chair of it. Rod and I stayed at the home of President Ford and Betty. I often spoke. It was a roundtable – about two hundred people and so they would have people lead in, and they had groups that met – breakout groups.

Smith: And former world leaders.

Hills: Yes. And in the four corners of the room he had Willy [Helmut] Schmidt, and Jim Callaghan, and Giscard d'Estaing, and Gerald Ford. But the one thing I do take away, aside from the fact that he, again, engaged qualitatively in the discussion, in a very nice way, was that people would come back after lunch and these fifty year olds would be sitting there sort of falling asleep. Gerald Ford would be there right to the end, chairing that meeting like a good CEO would. This is when he was thirty years older than fifty years of age. So, he was just remarkable to the end. And he kept his mind and his wit about him. Just magnificent.

Smith: Again, one of the remarkable things - he and Jim Callaghan were politically as different as two people could be.

Hills: Absolutely.

Smith: Classic old British Socialist Labor, old labor, and yet, by all accounts, they were great mutual admirers and genuine friends.

Hills: They were genuine friends. In fact, with all of them, he was a genuine friend and that’s why they made the trek, which is not easy from Europe, to get to Beaver Creek. It’s a long way. It’s by saying “thank you” for the association we’ve had with you. And they came year after year after year. They stopped before he did.

Smith: Apparently they were beloved in Vail, the Fords.

Hills: Absolutely. And they did a lot for Vail. They contributed mightily to the community. And Betty did, too. They would have all kinds of charitable endeavors where they would lasso the Fords and get them to lead the effort. But, yes, they were really beloved. And I think that – I know I’ve talked to the family – and in his later years the doctor said, “Now, don’t go up there because the altitude is too much,” and he said, “I guess I have to go because the quality of life means more to me than longevity.” And so, until the very end, he did go, and it wasn’t great for him but he loved being there.

Smith: The ’76 campaign, you talked a little bit about the convention. They obviously started out way behind, and basically closed the gap.

Hills: Yes. I think if the economy had picked up thirty days earlier it would have been a different outcome. And I often think about that because our history would have been different. Everything was going in the right direction with President Ford. He’d only had twenty-nine months. He had to take away several of those months to campaign, and still they were going right. His successor, a nice man, was inexperienced, and things were undone that ought not to have been undone. It’s so traditional that successors want to wipe the slate clean, clean out the people that were there before, and every new administration is anything but my predecessor. You see it in every single presidency, and it slows things down because you lose a lot of talent. It’s very rare to keep someone over, or in administrations, you have the secretaries there home alone, and no assistant secretaries, no ambassadors, no nobody confirmed.

Smith: That raises an interesting question. As Secretary of HUD, did you have latitude to choose your own people?
Carla Hills  March 18, 2009

Hills: I did, and partly because some of those were leaving. Some of them were involved with the prior administration, and had differing difficulties. I brought in as my undersecretary the general counsel of HEW, John Rhinelander. As I had been the general counsel for all these, I knew all the general counsels and he had been in government a long time, and knew the programs at HUD.

One little vignette. I got to HUD in March. Then we were on a June to June fiscal year. The legislation had been signed. It was President Ford’s first piece of legislation – August 9, 1974. I get there March of ’75. I called together my assistant secretaries and I said, “We’ve got a new bill. How many units of housing are we going to get out for our low income population?” And they all look at one another. I said, “Come on, give me the number.” Well, it turned out the regulations had not yet been drafted. And under the law, you put out your regulations for comment for sixty days, assimilate the comments.

Now, I’m testifying in mid-March before the Senate committee on my budget which ends in June. And I’m going to be asked how many units did you get out in the last budget? And the answer was zero. And that was going to make me really popular. Right? So I had to bring together all of our regional people and I said, “Look, I want a commitment.” And we got those regulations out and the next year we blew them away with how much we got done. But that was, as I look back on it, the reason why President Ford wanted someone to manage the place. It is extraordinary to get a bill out in August and not have regulations drafted, not even started, until March. That is lax behavior beyond a minus grade.

Smith: That raises this larger question, and it’s something we’ve asked several people. It’s at the Cabinet level, and obviously sub-Cabinet level, and White House staff: the metaphor is, we talked to Leon Parma who was sort of shoehorned into the East Room for the inauguration on the 9th of August, with several members of Congress. Following the ceremony there was a receiving line and then everyone was invited to the State Dining Room for a reception. And he said something other people have confirmed to varying degrees, “You could see at that point, the Nixon people just kind of peel away and go to their offices.” Under the circumstances, you could understand, what they’ve all been through. In the broader sense, the president took some heat for not “cleaning out” the White House, and even the Cabinet overnight.

Hills: Right.

Smith: And yet, in retrospect, you see the quality of the Cabinet that he assembled.

Hills: Right – without a transition period. Most presidents have from November to the end of January. He had nothing. Not one day. I think he did remarkably well. I look at that Cabinet and, present company excepted, I would say that it’s very hard to find a Cabinet that matches the quality and the diversity that he put together.

Smith: But it’s also interesting because I had recently occasion to check into this, there were six or seven people who had Harvard degrees. Which, just on the face of it, you can imagine Richard Nixon would not have been inclined to – or Lyndon Johnson – “the Harvards.” Again, this notion that Ford was totally comfortable with himself and comfortable with high powered, big ego’d colleagues.

Hills: Well, and people who had been successful in their own right, and he liked talking with them. They were very different personalities. They had achieved. It’s remarkable.

Smith: You were the only woman in the Cabinet.

Hills: I was the only woman.

Smith: Now, I assume, at that point, you were probably not unaccustomed to being the only women in a lot of meetings.

Hills: That was life then.

Smith: Did you feel comfortable?

Hills: Absolutely. I was the only trial lawyer in the court sometimes. There weren’t many women coming out. I graduated from law school in 1958, and was an assistant U.S. attorney and there were very few women in my class at Yale. And now, fifty percent or more are female. So, there has been quite a change over a generation, or maybe you could say two generations.

Smith: But as a woman, you felt perfectly comfortable in the Ford administration?

Hills: I certainly did.

Smith: And of course, you have Mrs. Ford, who was pushing women’s issues, as we know.

Hills: Absolutely. She was very outspoken and warm and lovely. Mary Scranton was a wonderful woman. These spouses, Lavita Coleman, wonderful lady. Bill Coleman was really quite a remarkable man. When we got together as a Cabinet in a social circumstance, I think it was just – the spouses were just lovely human beings that were working hard for the country in various ways, too.

Smith: Was your name one of those considered for the Supreme Court nomination when Bill Douglas retired?

Hills: Some books have said so. I was not party to those discussions.

Smith: You never heard anything officially?

Hills: Well, subsequently, yes. People said that she was on the list.

Smith: People in a position to know?

Hills: Yes.

Smith: Do you think Mrs. Ford might have had anything to do with that?

Hills: Maybe. You never know.

Smith: He’s probably the last president, if you look at Justice Stevens, who was chosen in the most nearly apolitical manner. We’ve talked to Justice Stevens and he said at his confirmation hearings no one asked him about abortion.
Hills: Well, that was a different time.

Smith: If you look at how that process has degenerated in a lot of ways…

Hills: There are all these black and white questions that are asked, and they go back over writings that I think is most unfortunate, because law school professors should be thinking about all kinds of ideas and champion all kinds of concepts. It’s too bad.

Smith: It’s become another political campaign.

Hills: Yes. The ideological approach, particularly for the court, is most unfortunate.

Smith: Where were you on election night ’76?

Hills: Where was I on election night ’76? I think I was at – I know the next morning I was at the White House – I think I was probably at the campaign headquarters.

Smith: At that point did you think you had a real shot?

Hills: We knew it was really frighteningly close, and the polls were showing that there was a trend line that was uncomfortable.

Smith: You mentioned this earlier; I’ve often thought everyone focused on the pardon, but in fact, the weekend before – I think it was on the Friday before – there was some economic numbers released that suggested – it became famous as “The Pause” in the economic recovery – and I’ve often wondered how much impact that had at the very end of the campaign.

Hills: It didn’t help. People were voting their pocketbooks. And we, I think, framed that phrase “the misery index.” I guess it was Carter who did that.

Smith: And, of course, it came back to bite him.

Hills: It came back to bite him, yes. Because I thought, my goodness, how could anyone have done any better and in such a short period of time than President Ford.
Smith: You say you were at the White House the next morning. Did you see him?

Hills: Yes.

Smith: And what was that like?

Hills: Well, I was just so sad. I was so very sad. When he finally left, it was, I thought, the country has made such a bad choice.

Smith: He’d lost his voice at the end of the campaign. Did you speak with him that morning?

Hills: I think we had a – if it wasn’t the next morning, it was shortly thereafter – the group got together and it was nostalgic.

Smith: And apparently he gave very explicit orders that this was going to be the best transition.

Hills: Absolutely. We’re going to leave shiny, clean desks for our successors. Make it easy for them. And we did. I really worked over at HUD all the way down to the local offices. Let’s be very careful that we have everything in order. We tried to work hard with them.

Smith: Rex Scouten told us a wonderful story. On election night he was up with the president and the family and it was late at night and it wasn’t definite, but it was clear that it was almost – it was gone.

Hills: This is before?

Smith: Yeah. This is election night, and he was with them all. And it was like three in the morning and the president said, “I think I’m just going to get some sleep.” So he walked across the hall and Rex followed him. And he went over to try to say something consoling, and he said, “You know, Mr. President, you’ve spent your entire life in service to this country, whether in military uniform, or in Capitol Hill, and now as president. And it’s a damn shame and you really deserved to win. But, maybe it’s just time for you to get a well-earned rest.” And the president looked at him and said, “I don’t think so.”
Hills: Well, I don’t think so, and none of us thought so. That was the sad thing about it.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Hills: Yes. It was down at Rancho Mirage at a meeting that was prior to the annual dinner. The University of Michigan president came down and made an award to him. I think that may have been the last time I saw him. That has to be – he was weakened, but still showed up. He is so polite, every time that the president, who is a woman, would come to talk to him, he’d stand up. And I could tell that it was making him dizzy. I went over to Susan and I said, “Would you please tell your dad that he doesn’t have to stand up every time.” And I said, “I think it’s having an adverse affect.” I was sitting close by. So she went up and spoke to him. And I went and spoke to the president [of Univ. of Michigan], and I said, “Keep your visits down a bit. I think it’s having its effect upon him.” But he was still clear. We were having a board meeting. I think it was the year that we awarded the medal to Betty. Was that out in Rancho Mirage?

Smith: Yes, I think so.

Hills: Did he come to the one – the next one was Armed Forces – is that right?

Smith: No, he wasn’t at that one.

Hills: I know, he wasn’t there. It was the one before that. I believe, my recollection may be faulty and I may have seen him in another circumstance, but I believe that is the last time I saw him.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Hills: With great affection, great appreciation, and enormous gratitude. I just wish so much that the current crop of political leaders, I don’t even say politicians, but political leaders, would read about him, and think long and hard about how can you rule, not in a bipartisan, but in a holistic sense. How do you take into consideration others’ needs? How do you work with the opposition? How do you make people collaborate rather than have conflict? He was a master at that and I think one of his great virtues was, when people push back and say, well, we can’t do that, he knew government. And if you want an engineer to build a bridge, you want a good engineer. You want a good doctor to fix your knee, you want a good doctor.

Well, we really had a very good president who knew governance, he knew where the money was spent, and if you know the price tag for these programs, you’re apt to rule more intelligently. And then he had such a gracious manner about him. I never heard him say one arrogant thing – not one. He was self-deprecating. Here’s a man who worked his way through Yale, graduated in the top third of his class, was a top athlete, and the press made such fun when he fell down. I mean, have they ever seen a president ski down a mountain that is straight down? Have they ever seen a president play tennis or golf like he did. He was intellectually sound and an athlete to boot, and a gracious – he made fun of himself. You just don’t do any better than that.

Smith: There’s the classic – Kennerly is the source – because Kennerly took the photo in Vienna on the rain-slicked runway and the president was holding an umbrella over Mrs. Ford and then lost his footing.

Hills: And then fell.

Smith: Exactly. And all the people on the White House staff were berating the photographers for doing this and the president said, “Well, of course, they took the picture. If they hadn’t they would have lost their jobs.”

Hills: Oh, yeah. That’s just typical. He’s trying to see it from the other side. Once he tipped over a coffee cup. Well, how many of us have not tipped over a coffee cup? It was so amazing but you get words that kind of stick.

Smith: But, you know, in many ways time was good to him because he lived long enough to know that, for example, on the pardon, the vast majority of people had come around to his way of thinking. At the very least, even if they had disagreed with it, they didn’t question his motives.

Hills: Not at all.
Smith: And the Profile in Courage Award at the Kennedy Library was the icing on the cake.

Hills: And then when he spoke to the Senate here, and they gave him their award, and it was packed. It was really a wonderful occasion. But he had earned all of those accolades and more. And I do think that as history goes on, you’re the historian, how people forget some things, but whether the vote is – you know, I think about prior presidents. We weren’t there when our alleged greats served. So we don’t know whether we’re forgetting some great problem that they had and exaggerating some virtue that they had. But I know that as a man of integrity, decision and capacity to govern, I give him an A+ on each one of those departments.

Smith: That’s perfect. Thank you.

Chris Chase interviewed by Richard Norton Smith, January 21, 2011

Smith: First of all, thank you again for doing this. Tell us how your path first crossed with Betty Ford’s.

Chase: Well, if you want real words about what time it was, I can’t do it.

Smith: That’s okay.

Chase: I lived in New York and she was in California then, I guess, most of the time.

Smith: This was after the presidency?

Chase: Oh, yes. They were out. And she wanted to see some people because she wanted to do a book, and so I think I was with William Morris. I don’t know. But anyway, I went with some people from William Morris out there and she and I had lunch and then she said, “That’s the one.” And I didn’t know why I was the one, except that I was – like her – I was kind of timid. It’s not timid exactly – but I didn’t talk much. I just listened to her and I watched her.

Smith: Was she shy?

Chase: No.

Smith: Because you think of her as a free spirit.

Chase: She wasn’t shy, but she was watchful.

Smith: Careful? Cautious?

Chase: Yes, I think so.

Smith: Was that, do you think, being a politician’s wife? Or do you think it was intrinsic to her?

Chase: I think that was her.
Smith: Then when you are telling her story, and particularly at the end – the intervention and all that – did that caution make it more difficult for you? Was she reluctant to talk about things?

Chase: No, she wasn’t at all. There are things – I don’t think it would be nice to even tell – just funny, if you won’t use it. We were working on one of the books – I don’t remember which one and I said no to something she had just decided on. I said you can’t do that, it will make you look awful. And she said, “Chris, when we did the first book, I was not the writer I am now.” They all think they did it. But I wouldn’t tell that while she was alive.

Smith: No, I understand. How did you work with her on that first book? What was the - for lack of a better word - the mechanics of putting it together?

Chase: You spend a lot of time with the person, and the person goes on and on and on, and then you take it home and you…

Smith: You taped her reminiscences?

Chase: All the time. I don’t know what happened to all those tapes, but I always went home and typed them so I’d have it all. And it was very easy. She is not a hard person to work with. In the beginning she was still drinking and it was very hard because you’d go in the morning – I don’t like to do this because I’m afraid in some way it would get to her.

Smith: I guarantee you that it will not.

Chase: Okay. She would be okay. She’d wake up and she’d have her breakfast and everything. By lunch she’d start drinking and so we really couldn’t work until maybe…right after lunch we’d just give it up. So I had to meet her in the morning and there was always a guy outside – even if they knew you, they’d open your bag and look at it. It was so funny. But she was sometimes just in her nightgown until afternoon.
Smith: She was not a morning person.

Chase: No, I don’t think she was. I don’t know because I did work in the morning.

Smith: Did she know she had a drinking problem?

Chase: Oh, I think so. I think she was very careful about letting other people know it. But she had rough time a lot of the time and that went way back with her, when he was away.

Smith: Was that a significant thing? I often wondered whether he felt some degree of guilt – looking back at all the time he was away and the demands that that put on her. Not that he felt responsible – but he felt in some ways that he had contributed to her problem.

Chase: I think he did. He was away so much and she was left there with the maid and the kids and she was bitter about it. As far as I know. She felt neglected – which she was.

Smith: Well, she saw a psychiatrist for a while.

Chase: That was way later, wasn’t it? I think.

Smith: I thought that at some point in the Sixties…

Chase: I thought it was after she had been through the whole thing and she was going to a doctor as well. But I could be wrong.

Smith: The reason why is – and again, you don’t want to overdo this – but if you look at her in the mid-1960s, with an ambitious, rising husband who’s off doing his job and making good, and a bunch of kids; a woman who had accomplished things on her own, been a dancer and all of this, when you think about Betty Freidan, and a whole generation of women who were looking for their place - in a sense, who were neglected. She really is, in some ways, representative of that. Don’t you think? I’m sure there are people in Washington who took one look and said, “This Cub Scout den mother, Sunday school teacher, West Michigan…” and kind of wrote her off. But there was always a lot more there than on the surface. One senses that she enjoyed a lot about being First Lady because, first of all, he wasn’t away as much as he had been, but secondly, for her, she was onstage again. Do you think there is anything to that?

Chase: I think she was afraid of it a little bit in the beginning, and then I think she liked it, she enjoyed it. I didn’t know much about it – I wasn’t there all the time. When we started working, she was already out. They were not in the White House anymore. But we had to go there for some reason, and she called some man and sent me in, a girl that was working for her and me, through the whole building, which I think you ordinarily don’t get to do that. Out in the garden and everything. And that was really fine, but she didn’t have to do that. We went to the cook and everything. She liked it, she thought that would be a wonderful thing for me to see, and it was nice. It was very nice.

Smith: Was she close to her kids?

Chase: Oh, yes. There were four of them, right?

Smith: Yes.

Chase: And they had to be. I mean, when they brought in that thing they started with her – I warned you.

Smith: The intervention?

Chase: The intervention, when she was so angry that it all kind of broke up and then it came back again. But that first time she was not amused, and she was not grateful that they were trying to make her be better. She was angry, angry, angry.

Smith: Really?
Chase: Yes.

Smith: Angry at them?

Chase: She cried – yes, she was really furious that her family would do that, that they would just embarrass her in that way, which she didn’t like at all. And I don’t remember quite how it…

Smith: Well, then she went to Long Beach Naval Hospital.

Chase: She didn’t want anybody to know that either. I think I said, you can’t hide, because you stood out there on the platform and said that you were a drunk and now she just didn’t want anybody to know anything about it. And I said you can’t do it now. You did it and so you have to stand by it. And it was good. She eventually met a lot of people she never would have met – sailors and soldiers and everything and she was kind of charmed by it. I think they are very stern there on your having to pay attention. I mean, she wanted me to go with her with everything, and so I would go in there and watch them. They played games or whatever it is they did, and I got caught. Because they said, you have to do this, you have to be in this. And I didn’t want to be in it, I just wanted to watch it. They were very stern, I guess is the word. But in the end it was a wonderful thing. They were so many of them saved from dying of drugs.

Smith: We’ve heard that she was in tougher shape than perhaps the public suspected. That her condition by the time she went in was…

Chase: Yes – she didn’t want to tell anybody, though, that’s the thing. You have to say, you’ve got to tell because everybody knows anyway.

Smith: Did she really believe that people didn’t know?
Chase: I think she thought that she could just go into the hospital and get well and come out and that it would be simple. I don’t think that she thought it was going to be a big deal.

Smith: Okay. And did you talk with her while she was in the hospital?

Chase: Oh, yes. I was there. I had to stay – I didn’t have to sleep over, I don’t think. It’s funny, one of her sons, the younger one.

Smith: Steve.

Chase: Steve, yes. Everybody thought that he was my husband and all these people – it was such a strange thing. Steve was there quite a lot. Of all of the children, he was the one that was there the most. And I was there because I was told I had to be there. You remember things like getting across the street – strange, stupid things that aren’t important. But most of the time she was very good. In the beginning, she wanted a certain kind of room and she didn’t want anybody in it, and that all went away. She really liked those guys.

Smith: So the anger and the resentment evolved into acceptance?

Chase: I think so. I think it was a place that she was safe in and people were all having the same problems she had, so that it was quite comforting, I think, to her. And I think she was probably a little proud of herself that she would do it. That they could force her to do it is a whole other story. I don’t think she got up one morning and said, okay, I’ll go there. I think she was sort of pulled there.

Smith: Sure. Was the President a frequent visitor?

Chase: Yes, and he was feeling bad. He’s a very sweet man, really, and he felt that it was his fault, a lot of it that she had been left alone. And, actually, right up until they did the intervention, I don’t think he said much about it. But then when that happened, he was right there.
Smith: It’s interesting, because he stopped drinking, too.

Chase: I didn’t even know he ever drank. She blamed it all on being alone with four kids. And actually, she was mad at him a lot of the time and she didn’t know it.

Smith: Exactly. Which I’m sure is a common reaction of people. I’m sure there are lots of people in that dynamic, in that situation.

Chase: Yes, I think so.

Smith: It’s never been terribly clear to me what role the drinking played and what role pills played. She clearly had the pinched nerve, and she had this condition that was painful and for which she was medicated. And was it simply that sort of unwitting combination of prescription medication and alcohol multiplied the impact?

Chase: I don’t think we could ever figure it out because for one thing, she didn’t want to admit that she drank. And so I never knew whether she made up the thing about all the pills. I saw her drinking; I never saw her taking pills. And maybe she took all the pills in the world, but that wasn’t what was going to kill her.

Smith: You’ve worked with a number of people on books. How was she generally speaking, to work with?

Chase: She was swell. I mean, I had a lot of fun with her. She was not in any way a problem.

Smith: By the way, it’s fairly well known among their intimates, although I don’t think the public, that she had a much more ribald sense of humor than he did.

Chase: Yes, she was funny. And she was pretty smart, too, I think. I remember something that was funny. We were talking about him being elected and he came in – we were talking about that – and he said, “Girls, girls, I was never elected,” that’s not the right word – what is it? Anyway, “I was not elected, I was put there after Nixon left.”

Smith: Inaugurated.

Chase: Inaugurated, yes. But he thought we were very shabby then. We had it all wrong, so we thought that was funny. But every once in a while he would stop in and help a little bit when he was home. He did a lot of – he was very busy. Bob Hope and he went and played golf all the time. He enjoyed his life. And then when he wasn’t in the White House anymore, he was still on all those…

Smith: He was on a lot of boards.

Chase: He was on a lot of boards and that made a lot of money.

Smith: In fact, he took some heat for “commercializing” the ex-presidency.

Chase: He was on a plane.

Smith: He loved to travel.

Chase: He did.

Smith: And that never changed. I mean, he may have very well felt guilty about leaving her at one point, but he didn’t give up his travel.

Chase: It’s true. I think probably she saw him more when they were in the White House than when he got out. I don’t know about that.

Smith: A theory is that the problem became more of a problem because, when they moved out to California, by that time the kids had basically grown up and were on their own, and he was on the road and she was alone.

Chase: Well, I remember when they built that really big house. Do you remember the guy that was their close friend and did so much?
Smith: Leonard Firestone was their neighbor.

Chase: Leonard, yes, he was a great man. Wonderful man.

Smith: We’ve been told that she saved his life.

Chase: Well, she certainly tried to. He just was angry, as she was. She talked to him about drinking, and he was really just furious.

Smith: What was the source of his anger?

Chase: Because he didn’t want to be fixed – he drank and he was a very pleasant, nice, funny man. But he did not want anybody to do that. And she had been through that and she knew what it was like for him. And I wouldn’t be surprised if she saved his life. There was a very rough time there at one point.

Smith: In my eulogy in Grand Rapids, I talked about the cliché that people, as they get older, become a little more conservative. Maybe it’s nostalgia for the past, or maybe they have more to conserve or whatever. He was always a fiscal conservative, but in a lot of other ways, he actually became more liberal with age, and on a number of issues. I’m wondering whether it was her influence. Stop and think: he was very involved with her in the work of the Center. And he saw all of these people, good people, accomplished people, friends, whom he liked and admired, who happened to have a weakness. And the compassion factor – I just wonder whether that was part of it. We’ve been told ten years before he died he told friends that gay marriage was coming and they might as well get over it. Attitudes that you wouldn’t associate with a conservative Republican president.

Chase: Leonard was very generous to everybody. And when Mr. Firestone had the last – when it was in that icy part of the world where they had a new house – I think he gave the Firestones the house. Certainly gave them land to put a couple of houses on while I was there. He was a very good friend to them. He went dancing when he was about two hundred years old. He’d go out.

Smith: She, of course, had been a dancer.

Chase: Yes.

Smith: When she went to Studio 54 – first of all – tell us about Studio 54. What prompted that?

Chase: She wanted to see it. She came into New York and she had read, I guess, a lot about this stuff and what happened there. She really wanted to see it. And the other girl and I…

Smith: Penny Circle.

Chase: Was it Penny then? Yes, we went and it was a strange place. I had never been there, but there was all this screaming and there were all these people with their nose up against the wall. And the guy that owned the place was saying, “Dance, dance. Nobody wants to see you watching.” It was a horrible place. Betty was very interested in it. And she sat behind that curtain – we were all there – and she was sitting on a couch, and some crazy woman from Canada who was married I guess to the head of Canada…

Smith: Margaret Trudeau.

Chase: She got down on her knees and crawled across to Mrs. Ford, sort of like wanting to lick her shoes or something. It was funny. The weirdest night I’ve ever seen.

Smith: Did the Secret Service come, too?

Chase: Yes, there’s always somebody. That’s kind of fun. If you go to a movie with them, even, one of them is on either side and a guy is on either side of them.
You never are alone – ever. There are two people following you all the time. But that thing was strange – like, crazy girl down on her knees.

Smith: Penny remembers this vividly because she had never seen it before. She went into the ladies’ room and there were lines of cocaine…

Chase: There was a guy in there, too. We went in – I went in with her because she wanted somebody to go with her, and there is this guy standing in the middle of the room. And I said, “Sir, this is not for you. This is a ladies’ room.” And he said, “I’m not going to hurt anybody,” and just kept on with whatever he was lighting up. He would not go out. It was an odd night. She was staying at the Waldorf. It’s this odd thing – you come off the elevator and there were men there – all up the row.

Smith: I’ve been told they liked New York.

Chase: She did. She liked it. She liked to come, and she came without him several times.

Smith: To go to the theater?

Chase: Yes, went to the theater. She liked New York and everybody liked her.

Smith: One thing that I found surprising, and I don’t want to exaggerate it - notwithstanding that she had been a dancer, she’d been on the public stage, giving a speech was really tough for her. There was an element right before of what can only be called stage fright. Did you ever sense that?

Chase: No. But actually I heard her do a lot of speaking and I think she got to a point where she was very good at it. I’ve read some of the things I thought, I didn’t know she had done that – that was good what she did. But I think with the dancing, it probably wasn’t as much dancing – it sounded good and it looks sort of exciting and everything. But I don’t know that she ever was in a company, I doubt that.
Smith: My sense is that her father’s death was always sort of tiptoed around a little bit. The question of whether it was an accident or suicide. Remember he died of carbon monoxide poisoning.

Chase: In a car?

Smith: In a car. Which begs the question. And I just wondered – going back almost to your first comment about her caution, withholding things, whether that was one of them. Susan has said, for example, they all assumed that he took his own life. But it seemed it was something that she was very, very uncomfortable with. Were there subjects that she really wanted to avoid or that you felt were painful?

Chase: I don’t remember her ever talking about her father. But I was not in that place. Once I met her when they brought me out there and we started to work, and those people I could watch and see and know. But I never really knew anything about her early life. What she said I took as the right story.

Smith: That intrigues me.

Chase: She had an interesting thing with that first husband where she actually – he was not a great guy – and she was about to get rid of him, to divorce him, and he got sick and she stayed for two or three years and took care of this guy, and then when some miraculous thing happened where he got better, where everybody had said he was going to be dead tomorrow, and he got better, and then she left. And I thought that was an amazing thing. But by that time I know she didn’t like the man, the man had disappointed her in many levels, she stayed for five or six years, I think, taking care of this guy. So she’s done some good stuff. Stuff I wouldn’t have done. I would have somehow got rid of him. But she just waited until he was better.

Smith: Do you think that experience made her reluctant to contemplate remarriage?
Chase: I don’t know. I think, like a lot of us, she wanted to get out of the house and there he was. I don’t remember if he was a big handsome man or what, but I don’t think she knew much and she was young and had no idea what it was going to turn into. So I think a lot of it was just, “Oh, God, I have to help this guy,” and she did it. I don’t know many people that would.

Smith: If someone tells you something that you don’t believe – or that is incomplete – or that needs in some ways to be challenged. Do you feel comfortable pushing people?

Chase: Once in a while. It’s like when I said to her, you can’t do that. And she said, yes, we can. But then she would do it. No, I had no problems at all with her, nor I guess, she with me. But I lived with them. I had to go to dinner and I had to whatever. Whatever house they were in, in the summer and the winter, I was there.

Smith: And how long was this period? Several weeks, several months? Or were there different periods when you would be with them.

Chase: I’m sure, but I cannot remember a single one. Whether it was a month that I was there, I would think maybe that was right.

Smith: For example, when the first book was about to be published, and that’s when the intervention took place, and I think you added on chapters.

Chase: That was horrible because she didn’t want it. The people from Random House, I guess it was Random House, said this book cannot be done unless – she had just come out – and the whole book was sweet and nice they were pointing out flowers in a nice glass of water, and here’s this terrible thing – terrible for her because she did not want to be exposed like that. She was very unhappy about that. And there was nothing in the book about it – nothing. And so these people that were going to publish it just said we can’t, we can’t unless you put another chapter in and tell what’s happened, we’re not going to do it. And so she said she wasn’t going to do it. She said no. So I said, well, the only thing I can tell you is you’re not going to have the book because they are not going to do it. And she thought about it – she was already in the hospital – she thought about it and after a bit I think she wanted the book, and so she said, “Okay, Chris. Do it.” So I wrote a whole thing – I don’t remember it. But she did not want that known at all and she did not want that chapter in that book. I don’t know how I got onto this.

Smith: But that’s fascinating because it is a continuing form of denial.

Chase: Yes, and she wanted a million people knowing that she was a drunk, too. Because she was a very careful woman. She had very nice clothes, she kept her make up, her hair, everything was perfect, and I think the idea that she was some sodden drunk really outraged her.

Smith: That’s fascinating. I think that is a core issue here, and I wonder – she was famously unpunctual.

Chase: I didn’t know that.

Smith: Talk about opposites attracting – he was never late. And she was never on time. And it was sort of a joke in the family. And I’ve often wondered if, in fact, it was a manifestation of this perfectionism. That she was not going anywhere until she had done everything humanly possible to be as nearly perfect as she could. Which is a real burden, in some ways. It goes beyond liking clothes.

Chase: The whole world is so different. I remember at one House where a lot of people from China arrived with presents. People come to you when you’re in that position, with big boxes as though it were Christmas. And they just sit there and open it up and thanking Mr. so and so. The whole world is so strange there to a regular person.
Smith: Can you explain to people who weren’t around in 1974-75…

Chase: God, was it that long ago?

Smith: Well, what a big deal it was at the time of her cancer operation. And the degree to which breast cancer was in the closet. She really transformed public attitudes.

Chase: She did.

Smith: Describe what the attitude was then. What was it she changed?

Chase: I’m not sure. She talked about it, which most women would not have done, you know. And she talked about it loud and clear. She wanted women to know that there was a future and not to be so frightened and all that. She just did it.

Smith: It’s hard, I think, for people today who take for granted the openness, to realize just how secretive the subject was.

Chase: I imagine it must have been very hard for her to make the decision to do it. But then she liked very much having helped. Why did she start that place, if she hadn’t really been like that. She wanted to be somebody that was useful and that people would admire. I guess everybody does, but she did it.

Smith: As you say that, it occurs to me whether it was a conscious ambition or not, you stop to think; here was a woman who for much of her life, like millions of other women of her generation, had these talents, these skills, these latent abilities, but really didn’t have outlets for them. And ironically by going public with her alcoholism, she created an institution, and arguably made a bigger impact on how ordinary people live their lives than some presidents ever do.
Chase: Absolutely. It’s strange, I think, until the children all got there and said you’ve got to quit, I don’t think she was taking anything very deeply. And then when she finally just said, okay, she never stopped. She said she had to go and be healthy and other people had to go and be healthy and build a place where people can go and be healthy. Once she decided to do it, she did it. She did it all the time. It was interesting because she was a pretty, young woman when it all started, and she liked good clothes. She was in so much trouble, remember when she had the face lift? And suddenly everybody, including my mother, said, “What a ridiculous woman.” Up until then, everybody had thought about how she’s a worker, she’s out there helping everybody, and then this silly woman comes along and has a face lift. And people really were horrible to her about it, really, really bad. It cut off a lot of stuff, I don’t remember what that was.

Smith: It made her seem frivolous?

Chase: Yes. And they wanted to think of her as this wonderful, strong woman.

Smith: You don’t think of Mother Theresa getting a face lift.

Chase: Right, she’s not going to do it. He asked her to do it, she won’t do it. No, I think she was surprised that people didn’t like it.

Smith: It’s fascinating that you say that, because I’ve often thought – again, we all tend to put labels on people – there’s a kind of shorthand and Washington does it more than any other town. And the fact is that she didn’t fit into any obvious pigeonhole. On some things she was a traditionalist; and she was an activist. She was a pioneer, and she was a woman who worried about her husband and her children and her grandchildren and her face.

Chase: She was shocked, I think. When she said, “I’m going to have a beautiful face to go with my beautiful new life.” It was something like that that she had said to people. And all these women were saying, “This is awful.”
Smith: She also had a great one-liner. When people would ask her why did you have a face lift, she said she wanted to look like her portrait in the White House.

Chase: Great. It apparently hurt her in many ways that hadn’t been expected. Not just by her but by other people that were working with her saying, “Oh, God, she’s in deep shit now because people are saying this is a wonderful woman, all she thinks about is herself and her looks?” I remember that. She did send at one point one of the girls to test a doctor – to see if he could do something good. I think it was something at the knee or something, but she wanted a good doctor and had people looking around for that.

Smith: Did she have a lot of friends?

Chase: Yes, she had a lot of friends. A lot of actors and actresses – I mean I had dinner with a lot of those people that were friends of hers. She had a lot of friends, I think. The family had a lot of friends, you know.

Smith: When they were in Vail, they were beloved out there. Among other things, a lot of people think that they really put the place on the map.

Chase: I bet they did.

Smith: Particularly as a summer resort.

Smith: Did you go out to Colorado with them?

Chase: Yes. It is nice. I don’t remember much, but they moved around a lot. I remember that thing that went up and somebody got caught in that. I was just thinking about those strange things. Always, though, Leonard was there a lot. He bought their stuff and his stuff right together, two houses. I had a house all to myself. He said to me one day, he said, “You don’t want to be in the house with everybody all the time.” And I said, “I don’t care.” And he said, “No, no, no. Right across, you go through these bushes and there is this beautiful little house and a lady comes and leaves cookies that have just come out of the oven.” And I once had slept there – I had broken up the whole place because it was cold when I woke up this one morning, and I went to this place and tried to set _____________ and suddenly the whole house seemed to blow up. And I thought, “Oh my God, I’ve destroyed this entire place – and they’ve been so nice to me.” And what it was, it was an earthquake, and I really believed that I was just standing there and everything was….and oh, they are going to kill me. I ruined this beautiful place. It was an earthquake. He’s very useful.

Smith: Did the President check in at all while you were working?

Chase: Oh, sure. He would just tease us. I told you that one thing where he said, “Girls, girls, I wasn’t elected.” He would read something if we wanted him to, he didn’t come around much, but he was there. They both actually had to fly a lot. God, I hated it. But sometimes it would be some little thing – she and I were sent to be someplace and it was a small plane, and there were just her and me and they brought us lunch on this little bitty plane. And then we came down and there was a red thing going all the way to the front. You know, you have this little bitty thing and you’re going to make a speech in there. But there was a red carpet wherever she went. And you never touched – if you had to stay over and you had a bag – you never touched that. They picked that up and it was at the hotel when you got there. Very high living, really. I remember that. A lot of that was fun, a lot of it was irritating.

Smith: I think you said before that she was very conscious of her weight.

Chase: Oh, yes. She didn’t eat a lot. No, she was very careful. And she kept her figure as long as I knew her.

Smith: Did she cook at all herself?

Chase: Never. Not once did I see it. Maybe I would have – I didn’t know them then. I was thinking I don’t know that she even cooked when she was home with the kids and everything. Because they had servants all the time. But no, I don’t think she had any wishes to cook.

Smith: I know later she was a reader. She read quite a bit. Was that something you were aware of?

Chase: No, but I could have forgotten it. I’ve forgotten so much that it upsets me.

Smith: There were two books – was the first book judged successful? The Times of My Life.

Chase: Yes. That was a big lightweight, fun book, really. The other one…

Smith: Betty: Glad Awakening.

Chase: All about what she went through – good works and everything. It wasn’t as much fun or as charming, I think as the first one, but it had news in it. It had some stuff that might help people.

Smith: Did you ever talk politics?

Chase: No. Sometimes if you’re sitting at the table and they’re arguing about something, you hear stuff.

Smith: Did you have a sense of what her cultural/social views were? She had a reputation, obviously, for being somewhat more liberal.

Chase: I don’t think she ever would have gone against him, though. It was truly a Republican person. I don’t know what she, in her heart, felt, but I don’t think she ever blamed him for anything.

Smith: Did you ever hear them talk about Nixon?

Chase: Yes, I did. They despised each other, you know. I don’t remember what it was, something I think that Betty felt - that he had wrecked her husband’s chance at something. I don’t even remember all that. Was it the presidency?
Nixon and he had not liked each other at all, at all.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw her or had contact with her?

Chase: I have a bunch of letters, and none very recent at all. I would say maybe 1990.
I haven’t heard anything from her. And you don’t want to do it yourself, you know, bother somebody. I never called her. I got a lot of phone calls, but I think she is tired. I haven’t seen any pictures of her, haven’t seen any stories of her. It’s almost as if she were in a nunnery or something. I don’t know, maybe she’s just protected to go out and protected to go in, and that’s it. I don’t know what you’d feel like if you’re a hundred and three years old.

Smith: How do you think she should be remembered?

Chase: It’s hard to say because there is such a split. I was reading something the other day, and it was people saying what a silly woman she was, and how she got credit for all this stuff that other people did. Just really mean. It was a book review and it was perfectly nasty about her. And then there were other people that think she is a goddess. I think for the most part, people liked her. You didn’t have to admire her, or think she was a wizard, but I think she was a nice woman and she was decent to people and she tried to help. So I don’t know why anybody would go after her. But they do, they do just to get it in the paper. I’m surprised at that, especially because it was a woman that was printing it.

Smith: Well, she became in some ways a lightning rod for criticism, particularly from the social right. They objected to her views on abortion, and they objected to her support for the Equal Rights Amendment. There were people who thought she should have been a more traditionalist – not have outspoken political views of her own.

Chase: Yes, walk six miles behind him or something.
Smith: Although, apparently her husband didn’t feel that way.

Chase: No, he didn’t. He really liked her. I was surprised, when he died, I didn’t know how old they were, and I just thought how could it be him that died. He’s so strong and she was so much more fragile. I think she was surprised. It was awful.

Smith: Devastated.

Chase: Yes. Terrible.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. We’re interested in knowing about AEI and President Ford’s relationship with AEI. How it evolved over the years and things like the World Forum and other events. A little bit about AEI; how it existed before Gerald Ford was part of it.

DeMuth: The American Enterprise Institute goes back many, many years. It was founded in 1943, and was active, for example, in decontrol of the economy following World War II. That was one of its early missions. It pioneered the idea of the think tank, which has now become very common. There are lots of think tanks in Washington, but the basic techniques were developed by people at AEI in the 1950s. Which was to commission topflight academics to do serious research; not lobbying propaganda, but serious research on important policy issues; foreign policy, domestic issues, economics across the board; and then to take that work and produce it in a kind of brief, digestible, document that even a congressman can understand. And circulate them very aggressively around on the Hill, arrange for academics to give testimony before Congress on something the United Nations or farm policy or tax policy, or whatever.

It was a very small outfit, but doing serious work, getting attention in the mid-1950s, and it had a strong free-market, pro-private enterprise cast. And it sort of set itself against the establishment wisdom of Washington. It’s never been a partisan organization. But Washington is a company town, everybody is enthusiastic for big government, more government, and AEI has always been: slow down, let’s look at the virtues of the private enterprise system, private solutions to problems, and so forth.

I know that our work came to the attention of young Congressman Ford very early on. I can’t give you the date, but when was his first election?

Smith: He was elected in ’48.
DeMuth: ’48. It was within a few years. It could have started with a 4, it could have been the early 50s. We have in our files a letter from Congressman Ford. I don’t think it had been solicited. He’d read one of our studies and he found it very interesting and valuable and encouraged us to continue to work and try to make the debates more productive up on the Hill. So this is all way, way, before my time. But I know that he had warm relations with AEI going back a very, very long time.

Smith: And when did you come on board?

DeMuth: I came to AEI at the end of 1986, and I served as its president from ’86 through the end of last year, 2008. I’m now a Senior Fellow here.

Smith: Let me back up a little bit, because, clearly during that time you’ve also seen at once both the growth, and in some ways, the fragmentation of conservatism.

DeMuth: That’s right.

Smith: And when I think of Gerald Ford while he was in the White House, there were a number who thought of him as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. Which didn’t obviously prevent him from being challenged from the right, and certainly by the time he died, many people thought of him as – or Bob Dole, someone else I’ve worked with – as being almost apostates to the…

DeMuth: Old-fashioned, moderate Republicanism.

Smith: Yes. Could you label them primarily, first and foremost, economic conservatives as opposed to social conservatives? Is that a valid distinction?

DeMuth: I think the conservative moment beginning in 1980 with Ronald Reagan became a much, much bigger movement, looking much more like we associate with the Democratic Party. When you become very big, you have lots of different schools of thought within the party, and things become more fractious. It’s not necessarily a bad thing. When you are successful, there are a lot of people who are trying to control the agenda, and some people want to work on social issues, and some people want to work on business issues, some people want to focus on foreign policy.

And the conservative movement for many years now has had neo-conservative foreign policy hawks, pro-business deregulation, tax-reducing conservatives, and social conservatives. You see it throughout the last thirty years. Republicans are for tax reform, but when you talk about the details, the social conservatives want big exemptions for children. They want to use the tax code to give people incentives for good behavior, and the economic conservatives simply want to lower marginal tax rates. So you get these kinds of debates.

Gerald Ford, his coming of age in the Republican Party, was, for the most of his career, a minority party. He was a leader of the minority, and he was a legislator. He wasn’t a governor, he wasn’t a talk show host, he wasn’t a crusading columnist. He was somebody whose job it was to forge compromises from a frequently pretty weak position in the embattled minority. And he had views that were different than those that dominated the party beginning in the 1980s, although, I think that by the end of his career, he was pretty happy. He was a social conservative in that he believed in strong families and he was a very ethical man and believed in the importance of strong cultural norms. But he was not pro-life on the abortion issue. He was pro-choice. Betty was very pro-choice, and they’d always been that. And that kind of, as it is for many people, sort of gave him a little bit of distance from the new conservative party, and he would see that.

Smith: It’s fascinating you would say that. I think it is an excellent overview of where he came from and how he was perceived in his later years. I wonder, also – the older I get the more I think life is defined less by obvious ideological differences, and more by generational distinctions.

DeMuth: Yes, there was some of that.

Smith: And I think Ford’s Midwestern conservatism, because he came into the party at a time when its center of gravity was shifting, but to the Midwest. There was very little of the Southern party.
DeMuth: The movement from the Eastern establishment westward. And, for a time, it kind of was right there over Michigan, but it kept moving and ended up in California.

Smith: Yes.

DeMuth: But he was not really a Rockefeller Republican either. He was his own distinctive brand, and there was a certain Midwestern, Herbert Hoover style, no-nonsense practicality to him.

Smith: Someone once defined him as Dwight Eisenhower without the medals.

DeMuth: Yeah, very similar.

Smith: But, going to the social issues, there is a sense of, again, generational and geographical coming out of the Midwest. A lot of what we debate today as social issues - basically people simply were too reticent to make part of the public conversation. There was an element of privacy about these issues. They weren’t something for the government to address. I mean the consistency of his conservatism, a kind of a healthy skepticism about social engineering, about what the government could do. He wanted it out of the boardroom, he wanted it out of the classroom, and he wanted it out of the bedroom. And those latter issues really weren’t even on the agenda until some ways after his presidency.

DeMuth: And of course, Barry Goldwater was also a consistent libertarian, pro-choice guy in the same way.

Smith: When we talked to Justice Stevens, no one raised a question about abortion at his confirmation hearings. Which seems remarkable, until you go forward and think of the Clarence Thomas hearings, when there was great skepticism voiced that, in fact, as he said he hadn’t debated these issues. But then when you go back and think about the time when he would have been in school, if senators weren’t asking nominees for the court about abortion…It just brings home how remarkably accelerated is this period of change.

DeMuth: I can think of a couple of episodes involving AEI that illustrate both the differences and the similarities. Abortion became a very, very hot issue pretty much after even his presidential administration. It became much more salient because of the Supreme Court decisions and people really hadn’t, I think, seen it coming before then.

But first of all, on economic issues, Jerry was a very strong traditional conservative and a very bold one. Ronald Reagan – I never worked for President Ford - I did work for Richard Nixon as a very young man. And I later worked for Ronald Reagan in the Reagan White House. I worked on regulatory policy; specifically deregulatory policy for Ronald Reagan, about which he had very strong views.

But the deregulation movement was actually begun by Gerald Ford. He had very strong convictions; he had a top team of people at the White House, such as the economist Paul MacAvoy, and some young people such as Paul O’Neil and John Snow. They were just kids at the time that later became very important. He appointed the first strongly deregulation-minded person to a major agency – John Robson – to the civil aeronautics board. He proposed very, very aggressive deregulation of motor carriers and railroads. And when he was excused from further duties by the voters in 1976, he came to the American Enterprise Institute and he was a Distinguished Fellow and remained here as a Fellow for the rest of his life.

But for his first year out of office he was actually right here. I’m not sure exactly where his office was, but he was here. And he brought with him a team of people that had worked on various issues, but most of them were deregulators, and produced several volumes of important work proposing very thorough elimination of government controls over prices, entry into certain industries, and so forth. And it still, in AEI’s history, it’s one of our proudest achievements – this volume of original research that was used by Jimmy Carter, who also was very, very good on deregulation and later by Ronald Reagan.

But it was Ford who really got it started, and he had strong convictions on the matter. You may have a tape someplace in your vast archives of Paul MacAvoy coming in to see him about a bill that the President had asked to be drafted for deregulating the Interstate Commerce Commission. And Paul began by saying, “Mr. President, before we go through the details, I want to tell you that I’ve consulted with the leaders of all the trucking companies, and the teamsters and all the trucking unions. All of them are completely opposed to this.” The President sucked on his pipe, took a puff or two and said, “Well, Paul. It must be a good bill. I’m for it.” He understood how the interest groups get hold of policy and twist it around to their advantage. He was there long before Ronald Reagan was.

Smith: That brings up a fascinating question. The conventional wisdom sees the Nixon/Ford presidency – certainly Jimmy Carter tried to cast it as such – as an unbroken entity. And I’ve often suggested that, in fact, Ford is not a coda to the Nixon presidency in policy terms. But in many ways he was a curtain raiser, and deregulation is the classic example. In some ways, Richard Nixon is the last New Deal president; someone accommodating himself politically to the consensus that he grew up in as a result of the FDR coalition. And I think Ford really represents a break with that.

DeMuth: Nixon railed against the Washington establishment. He hated the bureaucracy, distrusted it and so forth. But he never really stood up to it. He accommodated it. The Nixon administration was a time of great regulatory growth. Nixon was the pioneer for affirmative action, racial quotas were born in the Nixon administration. He created the EPA. I was one of the junior bunnies in the White House working on that.

Smith: OSHA?

DeMuth: OSHA; Consumer Products Safety Commission. The effective establishment of the Highway Traffic Safety Administration, it had been around a little bit before, but it was created in the Transportation Department. It was a time of great regulatory growth, and in some cases, these are at the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Environmental Protection Agency very different sorts of things.

Nixon actually was what I would call an immoderate environmentalist. In other areas, he wasn’t an enthusiast for anti-trust, but anti-trust grew evertheless on his watch, and he used it as a tool against the TV networks, who he hated even more than he hated the bureaucracy. So the bureaucracy grew and Gerald Ford did not challenge it to the extent that Reagan did. But he was very, very different from Nixon. His term was so brief that we don’t know what the record would have been. He came in under very difficult circumstances. The Nixon pardon, inflation was getting out of hand, not as bad as it would get under Jimmy Carter, but he was very, very constrained. But even given those constraints, when he made a decision, he was fearless in taking on the Washington establishment. So he was very, very different. And I do think he established a few beachheads that later presidents – in some cases Jimmy Carter, although Jimmy Carter was different in other aspects. But Ronald Reagan kind of took advantage of some of the early steps that had been taken.

Smith: Well, he’s also – going back to his traditional economics – he is arguably the last president, even in a very weakened political stance, to use whatever capital he had, particularly in form of the veto, in confronting his old colleagues on Capitol Hill.

DeMuth: Right. I know. He was terrific with the veto pen. He loved it. He said, “You’re president, one of the things you do is you read the Constitution, you veto stuff.” And he would do that.

One area where thinking in conservative circles changed, and where he was a skeptic, began in the late ’70s and early ’80s, was on tax policy. And President Ford was a traditional Republican budget balancer, strict fiscal conservative…

Smith: It was almost a moral imperative.

DeMuth: It was a moral imperative. There were changes in thinking in the conservative wings. A lot of them begun right here at the American Enterprise Institute in the late ’70s, and there was a strictly economic component to it, which was: in some cases, tax rates are so high that we can reduce the rates and actually raise more revenue. That was supply-sidism. There was another wing that was much more nakedly down and dirty political. And the argument went, “For decades now, the Democrats get in and they become very popular by all sorts of new spending programs. Then they run up deficits and things get to be a mess and they throw the rascals out. The Republicans get a turn. What do the Republicans do? They raise taxes to pay for all these fun things the Democrats did to make themselves popular. The Republicans never get any credit for it; they get the blame for raising taxes. This is a bad program. Let’s try something else. When we get in, let’s cut taxes and maybe the deficits will lead to pressure for reducing spending.”

Now, there is a lot right and a lot wrong in that argument, and I’m not arguing for or against it. There was simply a change. And I can remember my first encounter with the World Forum. As an academic I’d published things with AEI and I’d been involved with AEI, but it was before I came here as its president. I was working in the Ronald Reagan White House in Office of Management and Budget in 1982. We’d won some pretty big tax reductions in ’81 and we were going after more. At the 1982 AEI World Forum held out in Vail, Colorado, it was in Vail or Beaver Creek that year, it later moved to Beaver Creek, it was the second World Forum where President Ford had gotten together with his three best friends and peers as head of state or government when he was in office.

Smith: And a motley group.

DeMuth: Philosophically diverse collection: Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of Germany, President Giscard d’Estaing of France, and Prime Minister James Callaghan of Great Britain. And he was there with them. And in those days they would have their sessions, but they would also hold press conferences afterwards. In June we were in the middle of some big budget and tax battles. In June of that year at the World Forum the President held a press conference and was fairly critical of Reagan’s reducing taxes in the face of big deficits. Now this was really exciting for the New York Times. This is a way to really make mischief for Reagan.

I think it was the only time the World Forum ever got on the front page of the New York Times, and we were just furious at the White House because a former president, who was held in very high opinion, was criticizing Ronald Reagan. It was a difficult…but you see, it illustrated – he was from the old school. He said, “Why would you be cutting taxes? We have these deficits and we’re going to be leaving this to our grandchildren.” Now, I was on the Reagan team then, so I’ll say, we were taking some pretty big cuts out of government spending as well. We certainly ended up taking more reductions in taxes than we did in spending, and we not-knowingly ran up some deficits for a military buildup, which we think turned out to be a pretty darn good investment by the end of the 1980s.

Smith: Right.

DeMuth: But that was one illustration. And we would see these. When I got to AEI and we had newer generations of Republicans coming in like Newt Gingrich, people from the Reagan administration, you would see this tension. It wasn’t an unhappy tension. It was a good tension. We had very, very lively arguments over these things and you could see the different schools on fiscal policy contending with each other.

Smith: Generational again?

DeMuth: It was very much a generational change, very much.

Smith: And then also, I imagine when you get to Gingrich, stylistic; the more confrontational approach as opposed to, for lack of a better word, the civility or get along to go along, or minority status, whatever.

DeMuth: There was a stylistic – there was that difference. You could call it generational. But also by this time President Ford really was an elder statesman and Newt Gingrich was a scrappy young congressman, and he ended up coming to really like New Gingrich. They got along quite a bit. Newt is quite brilliant, and Gerald Ford was somebody who could appreciate quality. You could tell at the beginning, when I was first bringing Newt out, that he was a little uncomfortable with this. I can remember on some occasion, Newt made some reference to something that he had done, I forget what it was. And President Ford allowed as how he thought that that was a little bit too aggressive. He was a little bit above the fray and everything. And I leaned over to him and I’m not sure if I said this to the whole meeting, but I said, “President Ford, am I wrong in thinking that when you were a young congressman, you led a movement to impeach William O. Douglass?” He puffed for a second and set back and roared with laughter. He remembered what it takes to be a scrappy congressman. He could kind of remember some of the old days.

Smith: And people forget.

DeMuth: And that, I think, helped warm him up to Newt, because he could kind of see himself as a young man.

Smith: Exactly. He came to Congress by knocking off this entrenched, moss-backed, isolationist, and then, of course, he knocked off Charlie Halleck as Minority Leader. So, again, it’s that escalator, you move up, you forget where you were at the beginning. But there must be, particularly at that time, now we’ve moved on, obviously – but there must have been a time when it was an article of faith for a lot of conservatives to draw a sharp contrast between the Ford White House and the Reagan White House. Both in terms of substance, policy, and political success. And that must have made for some awkwardness.

DeMuth: It did. And I don’t think that he ever – I think that the competition between him and Ronald Reagan was a little bit too direct and constant for him ever to become completely emotionally reconciled. But I can tell you that by the end of the 1980s, and especially as it was clear that the Soviet collapse was for real, and was really happening, he came to have a genuine appreciation for that achievement.

They were alike on many things. Reagan was an adamant free-trader, and Ford was an adamant free-trader from the very beginning. So there were issues where he really appreciated Reagan, and as a firm anti-Communist, you never heard him say that the Soviet Union collapsed of its own weight. This wasn’t anything that Reagan had to do with. He appreciated and admired Reagan’s foreign policy achievements. And he was very proud, proud in the right sense of the word, that in his brief time as president, he had brought to the forefront of national politics so many people that went on to great achievement later on, after the Republican Party had changed. Not just Dick Cheney, but Carla Hills, Donald Rumsfeld, Alan Greenspan. Now the only one of them who was a big player in the Reagan years was Greenspan.
Cheney was in the Congress, Rumsfeld and Hills were off in the private sector.

Smith: And Jim Baker.

DeMuth: Excuse me, and Jim Baker, that’s right. And some other lesser characters. Yes, of course, Jim Baker. And he enjoyed getting together with them. He enjoyed talking politics with them. And you could see that one of the things that gave him most gratification from his years in office was that he had been such a shrewd judge of talent. And, unlike many presidents, had never feared – he just wanted the brightest people around. The political calculuses – he never wanted yes men around, he just wanted extremely able people.

Smith: Which also tells you volumes about how comfortable he was in his own skin.

DeMuth: That’s right.

Smith: And that gets to this unique relationship he had with the folks you were talking about. Lord Callaghan – forget the Lord – that old line labor socialist; Helmut Schmidt, who certainly wasn’t on his economic wave length; and Giscard who may have been a “conservative” but who lots of people think of as French and aristocratic and top lofty. And they all seemed to connect with Ford.

DeMuth: They got along wonderfully. They did. Health interfered and they were not regular participants by the end of the 1990s, but for ten years they would be there every year, and it was a wonderful thing to watch. There was a certain amount of understandable – well, when we were in charge things went much better than that. But for the most part, it was providing to the people who were in office now, some of whom had known them, some of them had not, who were dealing with very, very, difficult, hard questions. Questions where there is no good answer. Very constrained. The stakes seemed very, very high. There was real wisdom in these gentlemen being able to remind people that they had seen problems that were just as bad in the past, and the world had survived.

Smith: Who came to and participated in the World Forum? What happened at these events, and when you mentioned current policy makers, would there be representatives from the Reagan administration who would participate during the 80s?

DeMuth: Oh yes, and I’d have to go back and look. But you would find the president and the vice president – they never came – it’s very hard for them to come. Although, Dick Cheney came for every one of his years as vice president. But George H.W. Bush did not, when he was vice president. But Alan Greenspan was a regular participant. And there were several Cabinet secretaries, top people from the White House, people from the military and defense establishment who would come throughout those years.

Smith: What kind of presentations, discussions went on?

DeMuth: The World Forum has a unique style. For about half the President’s years we sat around a single table. It was a very big table, a very long table. You almost needed binoculars to see the other end of it. And the group consisted of four hosts. The host was really the President and Betty Ford and their three friends from across the ocean. There would be legislators and officials from the American government and from governments in Asia, Latin America and Europe.

After the Soviet Union came unglued, in the early days of Gorbachev and Glasnost we had a lot of important Russians, including Yegor Gaidar, who was prime minister, and some very important people that were part of the Yeltsin revolution and its aftermath. And younger legislators and government officials from Europe, from the UK, Brian Mulroney came a couple of times when he was prime minister. Always had a good contingent of Australians, and a good number of business executives. Some of them were people that had been long time supporters and pals of President Ford.

President Ford kept up a little bit of business involvement. After he was in the White House he was a director of American Express and some of those people. But we worked hard to bring in younger rising generations of business leaders. We would sit around the table and each session would be an hour and a half. We would have sessions on big, broad issues like the current state of the economy, international security challenges, reform issues in Washington. We would have things focusing on developments in Asia and in Europe.
Economic development issues in Africa. And we would always begin with three or four people who were real statesmen, currently in office, or people such as President Ford.

Actually, President Ford and Schmidt, Callaghan and Giscard, the way it came to be – people who were currently in office would talk about major issues and they were off the record. We eventually stopped doing press conferences. It may have been a little sore point for me from the times I was on the receiving end. But they were completely private, and there would be very candid presentations. There would be three or four set ones and people would have charts and slides and have some data to put out there. And then we would have an open discussion. And we would try to get people from different perspectives, people from the business community, people from foreign governments to talk about these things. And we would have very serious, substantial and quite candid conversations. The President was always the moderator. He would call on people and I would kind of be scurrying around and I’d ask you and I’d ask you, “Will you…?.” And then I’d give the President a list and he’d say, “Well, why don’t we call…” And so the two of us would handle it that way. He would, unhesitantly, jump in and he was always very polite. But he if disagreed with something, he would disagree, he would argue.

He would often bring episodes from his own days in Congress, in negotiating a health care bill in the 1960s, or the Civil Rights Act, some of the big legislative issues when he was a congressman and introduce some reflections or perspective on the current developments. And he and Schmidt, Giscard and Callaghan, would usually wind up. They would summarize what had been said, they’d try to add a little texture of wisdom on top.

Smith: It was a council of elders.

DeMuth: It was, but we never wanted it to be an old man’s club. We would be on the phone and he would always be pressing me to get new people. He’d read about such and such in the newspaper, and he knew so and so. What if he gave a call to this person. He was very active in recruiting, and very keen on trying to bring younger generations in.
Smith: When did the Forum end?

DeMuth: The Forum is still ongoing. We held the World Forum in Beaver Creek, Colorado in Gerald R. Ford Hall, which is the name of the hall where we’ve always held it, that they’ve now named after him, last month – July of 2009. The last Forum that he attended was 2005, and you’ll have to correct me, I think he was 91. It was right before his birthday. He was speaking on his birthday. He didn’t come to all the sessions, but he came to most of them. He was sharp as a tack and he gave a welcoming talk that was interesting, gracious, and there were lots of his old friends – the Cheneys, the Hills, Alan Greenspan, and a lot of people that had been coming to the World Forum year after year. So he was a wonderful host.

His health prevented him from coming in 2006, so that was the first one we’d held without him. He was in Rancho Mirage and I went down on Sunday afternoon when it was over and we spent a lovely afternoon talking about the World Forum. A man named Harlan Crow, the son of Trammel Crow, the long time close friend of the Fords. Harlan was the son and taken over the business. He’d gotten to know the Fords himself quite well. Harlan and I went down and we spent a long afternoon with Betty and Jerry and then we went out to dinner. That was the last time I saw him. He had gotten a little bit distant when you are talking about current affairs, but when we got into details with the Forum he kind of remembered people, and had questions about this. He wanted to know what Newt said about such and such, that kind of thing.

We tried the technique that you sometimes do with people that are quite old and not quite on top of current developments and we raised a couple of questions about his early days as a lawyer in Grand Rapids; about that famous war story on deck when he almost got swept off in a big storm out in the Pacific. We raised those issues and he became absolutely lucid, and energetic, and so more of the conversation was in early days in the ‘50s than it was about the World Forum. But it was a perfectly, great, great day.
Smith: I sensed that they were beloved figures around Vail and Beaver Creek. That the Fords were really more than first citizens, that they really had a profile and a presence.

DeMuth: They had lent their name and their presence and that had been very important to the strictly development aspects of Beaver Creek. At the first World Forums that were held in Beaver Creek, there was one hotel, there was this village hall, and there was one hotel and a few private homes, but it was really out in the boonies. And you look at it today and it is very, very highly developed; and they were part of that. But it was just not a development program; they were real citizens of the community. They participated in a wide range. They helped build the chapel – that was a project that was particularly dear to them. They worked on cultural welfare issues, they had opinions on this development and that development, and they were not above the fray. They were real participants. I don’t think they were beloved anywhere more than at the American Enterprise Institute. But Vail was certainly up there.

Smith: And tell me, you must have gotten to know Mrs. Ford.

DeMuth: I got to know Mrs. Ford very well, an unfailingly gracious lady. At the World Forum we never just took the spouses, mostly wives, and had them go out for the ice carving demonstration with the chef. We always integrated them into that, but Betty was always kind of the leader of the ladies auxiliary, so to speak. And she spent a lot of time with them. She spent a lot of time with my wife and children when they were little, and would come. But they were part of the conversations, as well.

Smith: Including the spouses of the other leaders.

DeMuth: That’s correct.

Smith: The Callaghan relationship is particularly intriguing to me. They seemed to be polar opposites in so many ways, and yet they maybe in some ways, they became closest. There’s a story that Callaghan was in Grand Rapids, and wanted to be driven around town. Later on he said, “I wanted to see where Jerry came from. Now I understand him better.” Which is an interesting effort on Callaghan’s part.

DeMuth: Their politics were very, very different. Their political viewpoints were very, very different. But they had both had very, very challenging terms in office. And they had both been retired earlier than they had wanted to, Callaghan by Margaret Thatcher, and I think both of them came to – I think if we were going to talk about tax policy or deregulation – they’d have very, very different views. But their personal friendship and the fact that their political experiences had certain things in common, led to a genuine warmth of friendship and affection. Callaghan was a man who, although he was a tough partisan when he was leading the Labor Party, he did have capacity, I would say more than that of Helmut Schmidt, to really transcend partisan differences, to put himself in the shoes of the other person; to understand different points of view and to argue with a real twinkle in his eye.

Smith: Lastly, how do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered?

DeMuth: I will remember him as a man who brought to office a great deal of personal dignity and genuine devotion to the public good, and much less of a political strategizer than any president after him, any president of either party. It could be that George H.W. Bush comes the closest, which is actually better in the long term as something that can be argued about. But Gerald Ford, when an issue came before him, he always asked what is best for the country. And he acted on it, even if it was politically risky, or something that was politically likely to fail or to redound against him. He was not a tactical president.

Now, he was a practical man and I’m sure that he made many political compromises as our chief executive. But he was a man of great fidelity; what he thought was good policy. To the general public he’ll be remembered as the man who brought an end to Watergate and provided this respite from the very bad years that came before him. And I think that his historical, his reputation in history, will grow, and it will certainly outsize the number of months that he was in office. I think that the Kissinger memoirs were a pretty good example of that. When you see what he did to navigate U.S.-Soviet, U.S.-
China relationships during those years, there was a tremendous wisdom and [more] foresight than any of us realized at the time.

Smith: That’s interesting, because clearly, Helsinki and the Helsinki Accords were seen in one light at the time they were signed. And, in fact, Carter, who ran against him from both the right and the left, attacked him, only to become a great supporter of the Accords over time. Would you agree that now, in the light of everything that has happened since, they are at least seen as a milestone on the road to the West’s victory of the Cold War?

DeMuth: Absolutely. And in the early 1990s when we were all trying to come to grips with what had happened, and the collapse of the Soviet Union – and of course, all of the attention, particularly among conservatives, was on what Ronald Reagan had done. I had a couple of sessions focusing on the Helsinki Accords and I felt pretty strongly about this, but it was also a way to do a little educating of the conservative/triumphant/Reaganite/triumphalist. Because many of those people had been people that excoriated President Ford for the Helsinki Accords.

And if you go back, he actually knew what he was doing. It might have failed, but this idea that he got the Soviet leaders to acknowledge the importance of human rights inside their country – just as you can say Gerald Ford started the deregulation movement and Reagan ran with it – that move, which was so criticized by conservatives because the deal was something they didn’t like, in retrospect, it was a brilliant deal for our side. And it really did – was the beginning of what later became known as Glasnost. I don’t know the year, I think it was 2003 or 2004, after we’d had a few discussions of Helsinki, I made a point of attracting to the World Forum Natan Schransky. And Schransky gave a talk at the World Forum, which we have published.

It was opening night and I had him give a talk. He acknowledged that the beginning of what he was able to accomplish as a dissenter in the old Soviet Union, began with the Helsinki Accords. The President had never met Schransky. So it was the first time that they had met. And Schransky – that he could actually be there and share the podium with the man who had provided this wedge, this opening, in the domestic politics of the old Communist Soviet...
Union. I know it was a moving moment for Schransky, and I think that it was – Ford at this time would have been 89 or 90 – but for him to have this living legend who had made the Helsinki Accords breathe and come to life inside the Soviet Union, it was a very big moment for him.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this, especially here which, as you say, has a lot of memories.

Roberts: I’m thrilled to do it.

Smith: There is a lot of nostalgia for the way things used to be. Not that the Sixties and Seventies were exactly an era of good feeling. Is it misplaced nostalgia, or is it justified?

Roberts: There is a lot of justified nostalgia. Jerry Ford, in the last interview I had with him, said to me, “Cokie, you know, your dad and I, when I was Minority Leader and he was Majority Leader, would get in a cab and we’d go someplace like the Press Club, and would say on the way down, ‘Okay, what are we going to argue about?’” And then they would get there, and there would be a real argument. He said, “We really did disagree about the means to an end, but then we’d get back in the cab and be best friends and go back to Hill. We might argue there, too, but we were very good friends.” That is gone.

Smith: What do you think are the factors that have killed that kind of culture?

Roberts: I think a whole lot of factors are involved. There is, of course, the media component; the drawing of district lines is a very real deterrent to comity, when members of Congress choose their districts and their voters instead of the voters choosing their members. They don’t have any reason to listen to anyone who disagrees with them because they have only like-minded people in their districts. The kind of ginning up of partisanship by various interest groups, I think is also to blame. But, as someone who has read and written a good bit of American history, I have come to believe that the period where my father and Jerry Ford first came to Congress and started to serve was the aberrant period; that this partisanship that we suffer through today is the norm. And at least people are not calling each other out on the floor of the House and going to Bladensburg and shooting each other in a duel.

Smith: Was it an unusual period because of the shared World War II experience?

Roberts: Yes, I think so.

Smith: And then, presumably, also a kind of artificial consensus was imposed by the Cold War.

Roberts: Right. I think World War II and the Cold War had everything to do with it. Also, think how self-conscious these men were as veterans – that huge class of 1946, which was a Republican class. But my father came and he had been elected in ’40, defeated in ’42, served during the war, then came back in in ’46. So this enormous Republican class – that he was a Democrat elected in, ’48, this enormous Democratic class that Ford was a Republican elected in, these men were very self-conscious veterans. As you know, they ran as the men who went, not the men who sent. And they knew who the enemy was; it wasn’t the guy across the aisle, it was the dictator across the ocean. And I think that the fact that the whole country had gone to war, that there was not just the Rosy the Riveter, and all of that, but there was rationing, there was a sense of sacrifice that was so strong that it really brought people together in a way that was not common.

Smith: I remember once when I was doing a project on Bob Dole, and went out to talk to Walter Mondale, I pitched an idea which he embraced – the notion that forty years ago each party had a left and a right wing, disproportionate in size. But nevertheless, you came to town and you had to learn within your own caucus how to deal effectively with people who might not be on your wavelength philosophically, which is something that presumably is lacking today.

Roberts: Well, that’s what I was basically saying about the drawing of district lines. That the only way you can get in trouble in Congress today is from the right if you are a Republican, and from the left if you’re a Democrat. It is somebody saying you are not pure enough. And so if you compromise, if you talk to the person across the aisle, you can get in trouble at home. The one other thing I forgot to mention, and it’s very relevant to my memories of the Ford family, is that the families all knew each other. We all moved here. Transportation was not easy. We lived here and then we lived back in the district for a period of time, usually summertime. We all went to school together; our parents were in PTAs together; we went to church together; we ran into each other at the dry cleaner; we knew each other.

Smith: It wasn’t just an annual softball game.

Roberts: No, it was very close. One of my best, best friends growing up was Libby Miller, Bill Miller’s daughter. And she and I are still in touch. That was just the way life was, it was a much more congenial setup. For the men who didn’t bring their families here, they were batching it, as it was called, and they would all come to dinner at the homes of the people who did have families here. The wives would cook for them. And those would be bipartisan evenings.

Smith: Can you pinpoint a time when that began to change?

Roberts: Yes, I think it really changed with the class of ’74. The Watergate Babies came in and so many of them represented areas that were not Democratic. So, in order to get re-elected, they set up district offices and started traveling home every weekend. They got, and you can obviously check this, I’m pretty sure that that was the year they got travel allowance upped so that they could go home all the time. And the difference between my father serving in Congress and my mother serving in Congress, when she was elected in 1973, was huge. She was back in the district every weekend. And that was just simply not the case when we were growing up.

Smith: And it is also interesting, parenthetically, the Joe Wilson incident with the President – I did some research. The fact is, Ford in April of ’75 went up to the Hill to talk about aid for Vietnam, and two members of Congress walked out on him. And they were both members of the class of ’74. Just representative of an era when…

Roberts: We have a house in South Carolina and we were there for Thanksgiving and there was a cartoon in the local paper of kids going Trick or Treating, and one of them is up at the door and says, “Obama Lies,” and the other kids are behind him saying, “Shoot, we should have dressed as Joe Wilson, he’s mopping up.”

Smith: Isn’t it revealing of the political culture that an overnight celebrity, with millions of dollars funneled both for and against him…

Roberts: It’s crazy.

Smith: Yeah. Do you remember your early contacts with both the Fords?

Roberts: I remember Mrs. Ford as always being just beautiful. In that era there were all kinds of teas and fashion shows and all kinds of things like that, that the Congressional wives did for good causes. She and my mother often were the ones who wore the small size that the models actually wore, so they were sashaying down the runway. She was always just this gorgeous person. But in later years we knew she was frail. There was a sense of fragility there.

Smith: Did you know she had a problem?

Roberts: No, no. And you know, nobody talked about stuff like that. And by the way, if we were talking about people with drinking problems, we would have been talking about the whole city at that point.

Smith: It was a different culture, wasn’t it?

Roberts: Oh, gosh, yes. It was hard liquor and it was early and it was often.

Smith: Well maybe that fostered some of that comity.

Roberts: A lot of people do believe that. Everybody would repair to Sam Rayburn’s Board of Education for some bourbon and branch, and people did get along a lot better under those circumstances.

Smith: Was she always kind of a free spirit?

Roberts: Yes. I think Mrs. Ford was not as willing as some of the other wives to just do exactly what they were supposed to do. And my mother was so willing to do that, having been raised in the South and all of that. It was kind of really refreshing to see Mrs. Ford.
Smith: On the other side of that, did you sense any unhappiness?

Roberts: No, but I wouldn’t have. I was a kid. What I mainly remember as a grownup, until I re-met her as a real grownup, was after my father’s plane went down, she was so upset. It was just a couple of months after the two families had been to China together, and had become quite close, and she was really very, very, undone by it. And was very sweet to all of us.

Smith: And the Congressman at that point?

Roberts: Congressman Ford was the Minority Leader, and he had – let me just say this on tape: Congressman Ford is the Minority Leader, Congressman Boggs is the Majority Leader. Their wives and staffs went to China in the spring of 1972, and it was quite a trip. It was China in 1972. So they were constantly mind-boggled by everything that was going on.

Smith: Impressed?

Roberts: Impressed by a lot, in fact. It was the cultural revolution and the kids in this country were having long hair and sex and drugs and rock and roll, and in China they were behaving. They would have gone to jail if they didn’t, but still for the parents, it looked pretty good. And I remember they came home. I had two little bitty kids and they came home with funny toys and all of that. So they really spent different times together than you do on Capitol Hill. That’s always true in a Congressional trip, but it was particularly true in this trip.

Smith: I assume those trips are still taking place.

Roberts: They are not as common – __________ are not as common as they used to be because they get so much bad press as a boondoggle, when in fact, they are very, very useful. And they are a huge source of bipartisanship. But, at any rate, the families – the two couples and their staffs had really gotten quite close. So after my father’s plane disappeared, and there was this long search, Congressman Ford was here, at this house, regularly, checking on everyone and seeing how everyone was doing, but on the phone all the time. It was a very difficult time, as you can imagine. The plane was missing, and actually, it was never found. We went to Alaska immediately, but then after we got back, it was just this limbo time and so he was very, very gracious.

Smith: Does something like that haunt you for years?

Roberts: Yes. You know, it’s funny, we went to all the briefings, all that, and the SR71, the spy plane went in and conducted the biggest search ever and found like logs and stuff – from 80,000 feet. I intellectually understood that it was very likely that the plane had frozen up and sunk to the bottom of Prince William Sound. But when I moved back to this house in 1977, the kitchen wallpaper really did need cleaning up. And I was a little hesitant to do that, thinking that if he came back he might think strangers were here. So, sure, you have these odd things.

The other thing to remember about the relationship between my father and President Ford was, of course, they served on the Warren Commission together. And that was somewhat searing because of the criticism, but also it was not easy taking that testimony, and I think that that also made them closer than they would have been under other circumstances.

Smith: That’s fascinating because, of course, as a young Congressman, the Ford you talk about, his office was across the hall from JFK. Often their votes would cancel each other out on domestic policy, but not on foreign policy - part of this (Cold War) consensus. It is interesting because a lot of people don’t make the connection. When LBJ called for that investigation, Ford was not at that point Republican Minority Leader. He was just another member of Congress.

Roberts: But he was always a member of Congress that everyone admired and listened to. He came in, in the Vandenberg tradition, and that was huge. This town was still in a position where forging the institutions to try to maintain peace after World War II was still very much on the agenda. And to have that Connally-Vandenberg coalition in the Senate that really set the framework for all of the _________ institutions and all that, was something that was almost a movement. I don’t know how to describe it, but particularly once McCarthy came along and all of that, this was the other side, and Jerry Ford was very much out of that tradition, and everybody knew it. So he could be someone you could count on to be a sensible person in a situation like this.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that. First of all, has too much been made of LBJ’s wisecracks about his intelligence?

Roberts: Yes, because LBJ made cracks like that all the time. I mean, the tapes are wonderful. I’m such a nerd that I just sit and listen to them. But that was LBJ and he said some pretty insulting things about my father, too, and they were very close friends. So, yeah, sure. It’s interesting.

Smith: Early in the fifties, he’d only been there a few years, but early in the fifties he was told by one of the old moguls to be outside a committee room at such and such a time. And it turned out that he was being vetted, if you will, or what passed in those days for oversight of intelligence. Which apparently was five veterans and one promising newcomer. No staff, no notes. They sat there until all their questions were answered and no leaks.

Roberts: Wow.

Smith: Which, again, suggests that early on he was perceived as someone who could be trusted, if nothing else.

Roberts: Those guys loved LBJ – I mean JFK – LBJ was another issue. They respected him and liked him, but these members really loved Jack Kennedy. He clearly had some aspect to his character that made them very fond of him. And, of course, he was in that class of ’46.

Smith: So that personal element lent an extra pain, almost, to service on the Warren Commission. Then also, you’ve got this crazy Clay Shaw business in New Orleans and all that. How did all that factor in?

Roberts: It was awful. And it’s still going on. Here we are in 2009 and…

Smith: President Ford once found himself on an airplane…

Roberts: With one of these nut cakes?
Smith: Oh, no. Worse. They were showing Oliver Stone’s JFK. I mean, you want to get him started? It was – well, you can imagine.

Roberts: I can imagine. We actually, at the point when that movie came out, Sam and David Brinkley and George Will and I were taken to see the movie mid-day at some theater in Washington. And we all just howled with laughter. But at any rate, the attachment to Jack Kennedy made the Warren Commission service harder, and then the criticism of course, made it very difficult. And I think that had the effect of bonding my father and President Ford.

Smith: In the last years of his life, after he got the Kennedy Profiles in Courage Award, which was a huge thing. He said, “You know, for twenty-five years everywhere I go people ask the same question. And since that, they don’t ask me anymore.”

Roberts: Isn’t that fascinating?

Smith: It was extraordinary. The imprimatur of the Kennedys. But I think he did an oral history while he was there. It is really fascinating and I wonder whether you’ve ever heard this: he said one of the theories, and I guess they didn’t expound it in print, largely for questions of taste, but one of the theories that they kicked around explaining Oswald’s motive was that he was in this very unhappy marriage, that he was impotent, that his wife was calling attention to that fact, and that he was going to show her how much of a man he was. Which may be off the wall, but it’s interesting. To hear somebody like Ford discuss that as something that was, in fact, discussed.

Roberts: But just think about what you’ve just said; the question of taste. What a concept!

Smith: From that to the Starr Reports.

Roberts: Exactly. I have, though. I have the book, the Final Report of the Warren Commission, signed by all the members. So my father clearly thought that was something that was historic that he wanted his children to have.

Smith: And I assume he never waivered in his view.
Roberts: No, Oliver Stone tried to make a case that my father questioned the findings. What he said was that with the information that they had, which is, of course, how you cover yourself as a member of Congress.

Smith: I think I heard President Ford say the members of Congress who were on the panel insisted on this language.

Roberts: Right. Because they know what it’s like to have facts change on the ground.

Smith: For people who weren’t around here in ’73-’74, can you recreate a sense of…

Roberts: Not really, because I wasn’t around here in ’73-’74. I was actually out of the country for the entire Ford presidency. That’s what I tried to convey to you, that I really could talk about more the growing up part and then the recent years. But we were in Greece for the entire Ford presidency. So it was quite something. But, you know, one of the things that that had the effect of, was to give you a sense of the strength of American democracy. Because I remember Ben Rosenthal, who was in Congress at the time, and he had been chairman of the subcommittee that dealt with Greek relations, and was very anti-junta and it was a big deal. He came after __________ fell, and he made the point to people there; never underestimate the strength of the American democracy. The President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, was forced to leave office and not one soldier left his barracks to defend him. Now it wouldn’t occur to us that that would happen, but to look at it from that perspective is really something.

Smith: There is a wonderful story about the first day. Of course they stayed in the house in Alexandria for a week or so while the Nixon’s stuff…

Roberts: Yeah, I noticed that in the piece that I was looking at last night.

Smith: And so the first day that he actually went into the West Wing as a resident, a Marine guard was saluting. Ford, ever the Congressman, walks over and says, “Hi, my name is Jerry Ford. I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?” Isn’t that a Congressman?

Roberts: That is a Congressman, that’s also a gracious person, and that was probably something of a change in the White House at that moment.
Smith: Mrs. Ford, in her first week there, walking through the family quarters around the permanent staff she’d say, “Good morning.” And they wouldn’t speak to her. So she went to the usher and said, “Do they not like us?” and he said, “But you have to understand, it was very different under the Nixons. You didn’t talk to the presidential family.”

Roberts: That’s too weird.

Smith: But word got around and everything. The other wonderful story, to contrast with LBJ; we talked with Gary Walters. It was his first weekend in the usher’s office. Sunday morning he knew the Ford’s were going to church, and he gets a call and it’s the President. He asks, very politely, if maybe at some point, they could come up and take a look at the shower because he has no hot water. So Gary says, well, it’s Sunday and there’s not a plumber, but we’ll take care of it while…He’s says, “No, that’s alright. I haven’t had any hot water for two weeks. I just used Mrs. Ford’s shower.” Can you imagine Lyndon Johnson saying….?

Roberts: No. Among other things he was entertaining people in the shower, so…

One other thing, though, that students of Congress should understand about Jerry Ford, is he was on the Appropriations Committee. And the Appropriations Committee is different from the other committees. It is much more bipartisan. The joke is there are Democrats, Republicans and appropriators. And it drives the members of the other committees completely crazy how the Appropriations Committee sort of gets together and sort of runs the place. But that is the case, and that does make for a lot more comity.

Smith: It also explains – remember, Ford was the last president who could get up – it was almost like a party trick – in front of a room full of reporters and introduce the budget and actually take them through the budget.

Roberts: And know what was in it.

Smith: And answer every question that was asked. It didn’t communicate itself to the American people. He was never a television president; he was the least self-dramatizing of men.
Roberts: Which was so refreshing. But the understanding of how exactly the budget works is something that very few presidents do. And being on the Appropriations Committee is the place you learn that.

Smith: I realize you were out of the country, but looking back at the trajectory of the Ford presidency, he had to, in effect, not necessarily unlearn being a Congressman, but he had to learn the difference between being a Congressman and an executive.

Roberts: Being a Congressman is really terrible preparation for being president. It’s no accident that we’ve only elected a few people directly from the Congress to the White House. And most of them - I mean, Warren G. Harding, Jack Kennedy, and Barack Obama – these are not people who were known for their work in the Senate. They really weren’t of the institution. Jerry Ford was very much of the institution. He’d spent his life in the House of Representatives, which is where he wanted to be. So, I think it is very difficult to then go from the place where everything you are doing has to do with consensus and bringing people together, and finding the grey areas where you can just sort of fudge it so that people can vote for it, and all that. That’s very different from being in a position where you have to lead and you have to draw bright lines, particularly in a presidential campaign.

Smith: And communicate.

Roberts: And communicate. And you not only have to communicate differently than the way you are with your buddies, but you have to communicate on a medium that was not that common at the time. Even when Walter Mondale ran in 1984, he said, “Well, I just wasn’t so good on television.”

Smith: The old line: Mondale gave a speech, it was typed better than it was delivered.

Roberts: Right. It’s true. That is true. During that campaign, I remember one day in particular, it was some Jewish organization here, it was a big thing, like the big meeting of the B’nai Brith or something. And I had the speech ahead of time and it was a terrific speech. And, of course, I had picked out the sound bites ahead of time. If I had used those sound bites it would have looked like I was sabotaging him, because he was tripping all over himself, and all that.
And then Reagan comes in to the same group. They move the flags so that they frame him. He gives this beautiful speech. My basic reaction to that is if you’re not good at this, get good at it, because it’s a trained…nobody was born being good on television. But Ford was that many years earlier.

Smith: And he did get better. There is this notion that Reagan actually made him a better candidate. Obviously, you can argue both ways – that the Reagan challenge fatally weakened him.

Roberts: You’d probably know this better than I would, as a presidential scholar, but my memory is that any time you challenge a president in a primary, he loses.

Smith: Yeah.

Roberts: That was the biggest thing that happened with Bill Clinton with nobody challenged him in ’96.

Smith: Two quick things and then we’ll talk about the post-White House. Rex Scouten told a wonderful story. On election night he was up with the family, and about two-thirty in the morning or so, it’s not looking good. Ford says, “I’m going to bed.” So Rex follows him across the hall because he wants to say something consoling. And he said, “You know, Mr. President, I don’t know what’s going to happen, but if you don’t pull this out it’s a shame. But just stop and think; you’ve given your whole life in service to this country. The war; Capitol Hill; these last two incredibly difficult years. Maybe it’s just time for you to take a well-earned rest.”

Roberts: What did Ford say?

Smith: Ford said, “I don’t think so.”

Roberts: If it had been Johnson, it would have been saltier. Speaking of going into the White House under those difficult circumstances, my mother was the only Democrat at his swearing in.

Smith: Really?
Roberts: Yes. So that’s how the families had gotten so close. She had been elected to Congress in March of ’73 in a special election, and when he had that small swearing-in, she was the only Democrat there.

Smith: Wow. And afterwards, time was pretty good to Jerry Ford.

Roberts: Yes.

Smith: You think of poor Lyndon Johnson, who literally died the day before a peace agreement was announced.

Roberts: That’s right. He died January 22, 1973, I remember because my father’s service was January 5th or so. What had happened was that Congress had come in, for the 4th, to clear the seat vacant and then we all went to _______________ and had the service, and then the special election was declared. But Johnson came to that service looking awful. And then he died a couple of weeks later.

Smith: Were you not terribly surprised?

Roberts: I kind of was surprised because you kind of thought he’d go on forever.

Smith: He was a force of nature.

Roberts: But he was clearly unwell. He also had his hair down to here. He looked like some interesting Mark Twain character, it was very interesting. Anyhow, Mrs. Johnson and my mother were really best friends.

Smith: Everyone loved Lady Bird.

Roberts: Oh, she was wonderful. She was just wonderful. But that’s true. Time was good to Jerry Ford, but also, he made it good. And his collaboration with Jimmy Carter was really something special. And I remember President Bush saying to me, President H.W. Bush saying to me, “You know, I doubt that Bill Clinton and I would ever be able to do what Ford and Carter have done.” And then they did do it. And so I think that not only was the collaboration and the graciousness that President Ford showed to the man who defeated him, something that was special on its own, but it set a model for future presidents.
to follow. And that’s a good thing, particularly given the partisanship that the country is suffering through.

Smith: I sometimes wondered if one of the things, though, that perhaps aided that relationship was that they both ran against Ronald Reagan.

Roberts: That probably is a bond, right. “Shoot! Did you see what he did to me? Look what he did to me!”

Smith: Mrs. Ford. I think it’s hard for this generation to get its arms around just how forbidden a subject breast cancer was.

Roberts: Ah! The word cancer was really not even used. People would be described as having a wasting disease. And of course, one didn’t use the word breast. So, for Mrs. Ford to go public and say that she had breast cancer has probably saved millions of lives. Nancy Reagan being the other person who followed on. To do this in the 1970s, nobody, nobody had done that. And the courage that that took, the going into klieg lights saying this, it’s embarrassing. I’ve had breast cancer myself, and had to be public about it. And it’s not easy. And that was in the 21st Century. If Betty Ford had not paved the way, I think that that would have been very much harder.

Smith: And he’s part of that story, isn’t he?

Roberts: Very much part of that story. The pictures of him at the hospital with her, and him talking about the day of the surgery, him just welling up and saying the doctors say she’s going to be fine. You have a sense of their real devotion. You know, I remember when they did move into the White House, even though I was living abroad, looking at the pictures in the paper and saying, “Oh! They’re sharing a bedroom!” And, until I had noticed other White Houses as a kid somewhere along the line, I had never heard of married couples not sharing bedrooms.

Smith: They were the first since the Coolidge’s.

Roberts: But then, growing up, I saw these pictures of White Houses, and saw that the presidents and first ladies had separate rooms, which I found passing strange.
But then, I noticed that they were in the same room, and by that time I was grown up with kids of my own, and I thought, good for them.

Smith: It’s funny, I’ve seen that concerned Americans wrote to protest. They just thought this was offensive somehow.

Roberts: Well, remember TV sitcoms. Everybody was in twin beds. Boy have times changed, and not necessarily for the better.

Smith: And my favorite letter was after the Sixty Minutes interview, which really is a turning point. If you go back and actually look at the transcript of that interview, I remember thinking, I’m not even sure Hillary Clinton could say those things. In some ways, we’ve almost regressed. But the immediate reaction in the White House – everyone always fights the last war – “Oh, my god, what has she done?” And it took a little while, and some polls to come in and the country had changed. It was a time when people wanted authenticity, more than anything. She fit the bill.

Roberts: But also, again, as I was saying, about the China trip. What was America going through at the moment? All the kids were giving their parents grief. And to have the First Lady basically say, “Here’s the way it is, folks, and I would have to deal with it.” That is exactly what every mom was feeling.

Smith: There was a letter from a woman in Texas who wrote in – dead serious – saying, “You do not understand. You are constitutionally required to be perfect.” No irony. Perfect wife, perfect mother, perfect…on and on. And it’s in the Constitution.

Roberts: Well, you know the role of first lady is such a difficult role and it’s so ill-defined, or totally undefined, and Americans project all of their own ideas about marriage and women’s roles and all that onto that one woman. And there is such a kind of fear of her, because there is this kind of sense of “she’s got power that we don’t understand, and she can’t be fired.” There is a kind of almost Greek tragedy sense of fear of women here. It’s almost like Madea(?). Women are, in some ways, always doing something irrational, and perhaps a little evil.
Smith: My reference to Mrs. Clinton wasn’t meant to be critical. In some ways, I think Mrs. Ford, because she had this pre-existing image as this Cub Scout Den mother, Sunday schoolteacher, from Grand Rapids, actually had a little bit more breathing room, in effect, to be counterintuitive. Which I think in some ways was denied Hillary Clinton.

Roberts: I think that’s exactly right. Good point, because she was seen as…

Smith: Child of the Sixties…

Roberts: Rhymes with witch. All of that.

Smith: You mentioned an interview you did with President Ford in ’93. Had you done others?

Smith: 2003, I’m sorry.

Roberts: No, but I had seen him in various places, and he was always incredibly gracious. And we always had fun just reminiscing. A lot of the men from that era – Mel Laird is another one. There’s a real sense of camaraderie still, and with the kids. We were Congressional brats – that’s what we called ourselves, and all really had that sense of camaraderie.

Smith: I’ve heard Susan talk about it. Her dad really was a workaholic, and he’d go in on Saturdays, and I think he’d go on Sundays if there was anyone to work there, but he’d go on Saturdays. The kids would play in Statuary Hall.

Roberts: Right. Well, that’s the other thing. We loved the Capitol. The Capitol was our playground. And, of course, there was none of this nutsy security, and we had birthday parties in the Speaker’s dining room, we would ride on the Senate subway – it was just the one little wicker subway – and the men who ran it were sweethearts, who would basically babysit us. And our parents just brought us to the Capitol. I remember when I was seven years old – this is a pathetic story – of waking up on my seventh birthday, and saying, “Great, I can go in the public gallery now!” Because until then you were only allowed in the family gallery, and if you could go into the public gallery, you could take people on tours.

Smith: A real turning point.

Roberts: Now this still occasionally is true, I’m happy to say; any night that there was a presidential address, a State of the Union, or a Joint Session, you would see the dining room filled with Congressional families. And the difference then, though, was that we would also come up for big votes. It wasn’t on television, if you were going to see a debate on some significant piece of legislation, you had to be there. So we went, and it was great because we got out of school.

Smith: On balance, what do you think the impact of television has been on the daily functioning of Congress?

Roberts: The daily functioning has been, I think, - I think television has had its pluses and minuses. It does bring it to people’s homes and they get to see the workings of the place, but it also does mean that there is a lot of posturing. Particularly in the one-minute speeches in the morning – the special orders in the afternoon. The real thing, however, that had an impact on the functioning of Congress was the automatic roll call. The electronic roll call. Because it used to be that it took forty-five minutes to call the roll, and a lot of votes were by teller vote. That meant that a lot of people didn’t know how you voted. And now, roll calls are called on all kinds of things, just so that various interest groups can have their score cards. And that has not been a very salutary development.

Smith: Gotcha, lots of gotcha.

Roberts: Particularly on the journal, voting on the journal every day. ____ was absent, five millions times!

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw President Ford?

Roberts: I saw him at the Republican Convention in Philadelphia – what year was that? That was when he had his little…

Smith: Well, that was 2000.
Roberts: So that wasn’t the last time I saw him.

Smith: Maybe that interview you did in 2003?

Roberts: Maybe that was the last time I saw him.

Smith: When you saw him in Philadelphia, did you detect…?

Roberts: He was fine. I was very upset when I heard that he’d had a little – ischemia or something like that?

Smith: Yeah, exactly.

Roberts: Because I’d seen him and thought he was great.

Smith: Apropos nothing, within twenty minutes of that news becoming public, I got two calls – one from Julie Nixon Eisenhower, and one from Tricia.

Roberts: You know, they are nice women. I saw Tricia at Mrs. Johnson’s funeral, and she is a nice woman. She really is.

Smith: People don’t realize that there is this fraternity of presidential families.

Roberts: That’s right.

Smith: It totally transcends politics.

Roberts: Because they’ve had an experience that very few other people have had, and only each other has had it. Once I interviewed Martin Luther King, III, and he said, “You can’t imagine what’s it like to live this life.”

Smith: With that name.

Roberts: With that name. None of the siblings married, none of those children ever married, and he said, “I just think there’s nobody who can share this.” And I said, “What about the Kennedys?” And he said, “Well, I’ve reached out, but no.”

Smith: Yeah, that’s interesting. Do you remember the last time you saw Mrs. Ford?

Roberts: The last time I saw Mrs. Ford was 2003. We were at the house; we had a very, very, nice visit. She looked wonderful. I was out of the country for the funeral, but my mother went to the funeral and saw her there. They really were close. But Mrs. Ford and I had a wonderful visit in 2003 where she talked a lot about the Betty Ford Center, and she was in the process of bringing Susan in to do more. But she was so knowledgeable about everything going on there, and about addiction. What a contribution she has made. It’s just unbelievable.

Smith: When you combine the impact of breast cancer and alcohol and drug dependence; I’ve often said, there aren’t a lot of presidents who have had the impact on how ordinary people live their lives that she has had.

Roberts: I think that Betty Ford and Eunice Kennedy Shriver are two people who have had more impact on literally millions of people, than any politicians I can name.

Smith: I didn’t realize you were out of the country. That week I was sort of wearing two hats. I was with ABC for half the week and then I was with the family, and I sensed – and actually, some of it was pretty explicit – as the week went on, there were people in the press who were surprised at how much response there was.

Roberts: Response to?

Smith: To the President’s death. Because he’d been out of the public eye and all that, and I think there were a number of factors. I think we needed something to make us feel good about ourselves at that point. But also there was a whole generation that was discovering him for the first time through these old grainy clips. And he looked pretty good compared with politics today.

Roberts: Right. Exactly. We were just on vacation and I was getting my mother up here. Oh my god, it was like Normandy. But it was very, very important to her that she come, and she was quite angry with me for not leaving all the children behind and…but I was in touch with Susan.

Smith: How do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered?

Roberts: I think Gerald Ford should be remembered as the person who tried to bring the country together at really one of the worst times, other than the Civil War, in our history. To understand how bleak the period was is just terribly important. We were feeling dispirited about the country. There was this war going on that nobody liked, there was a generation at war with their parents and not feeling any of the sense of pride in the country that all the rest of us had been raised with. There was a president who had lied and cheated and done all kinds of things that embarrassed us and enraged us, and then to have this regular, good man come in with his regular, good family, and wonderful wife and say, “The long national nightmare is over,” it was a great moment of hope. It couldn’t last because the country was too divided and was too upset. And there was no right answer there. But he did his best and he carried that on after his presidency and I think did contribute to the healing over the decades after he was defeated.

Smith: Perfect. Thank you.

Smith: Thank you for doing this.

Frey: Glad to do it.

Smith: One of the things we’ve been delving into is the whole question of the political environment that produced Ford that shaped and reflected him. Clearly West Michigan changed an awful lot over the last fifty years. How defining was the influence of the Dutch in this city, in this region?

Frey: I think you see that in some of his vetoes as sitting president. You see his frugality, his thriftiness.

Smith: A lot have said he was tight.

Frey: Frugal, I’d say. And there is a difference. But he was very mindful of some of the real basic Dutch, Midwestern values of thriftiness and balancing the books, so to speak. Living within your budget, and not living beyond your means. And you could see it through the whole pattern of his life. Frankly, in today’s world, that’s a less cherished value than it was then. Sometimes then is better. I think we’re going to go back to then. I think we’re in the process of learning the lesson all over again, both nationally and individually - because part of our economic and fiscal challenges are the result of the excesses of financial institutions - but also the excesses of individuals, whether it’s credit cards or mortgages or whatever – excess spending. Excessive spending.

Smith: In a curious way Ronald Reagan decoupled conservatism from fiscal responsibility.

Frey: Budget balancing.

Smith: He opened the door to credit card conservatism.

Frey: Right.
Smith: And we’re paying the price.

Frey: People are coming back to the fiscal fundamentals of the party, the Republican Party, which was sort of pirated by President Clinton there for a while. I think we are coming back to some of the basic fiscal tenets of the party and rightfully so.

Smith: Now, your family clearly goes back a long way in this town. What are your origins?

Frey: My grandfather, John E. Frey, was born here on the west side of Grand Rapids, at the corner of Straight and Douglas in 1880. He started Union Bank and Trust Company in 1918. The bank was subsequently chaired by my father and then myself. The Frey family has been here well before 1880. My two biological sons are fifth generation, so we have been here a long time. This is our family home and the city of my birth and several generations of Freys.

On my mother’s side, I should just add parenthetically, my mother’s family moved here in 1911 or 12, the Taliaferros, and were originally from Virginia. But this branch came from Missouri and my grandfather Taliaferro was chairman and chief executive officer of the American Seating Company during the great years of American Seating Company when it was, in fact, the premier manufacturer of school seating in the country. And then in World War II it converted to war time production. It was the major employer in Grand Rapids for thirty or forty years.

Smith: During which the town was transformed.

Frey: It transformed a lot, although there were years when I didn’t live here. I left to go to private school and returned about twenty years later and it had changed a lot, and it continues to change. I’ve tried to play a role in helping it change for the better and making it a more economically vibrant and more diverse city in terms of its culture and institutions. And so it’s changed a lot. There is more change on the horizon. If you don’t like change, this is probably not where you want to be. But I think we’ve retained some of our core values. Most of the changes have been physical changes, economic changes, cultural changes, but not value changes.
Smith: Well, that brings up a point. If you were describing Grand Rapids to someone who had never been here, what is it that sets it apart, not so much physically or geographically, but in terms of the culture, the values?

Frey: I think it is very Midwestern. We’re not blessed with an abundance of truly great architecture, but we’re Midwestern people and our core values have stayed steady through all the economic turmoil that we’ve currently experienced in the state. But I think it’s basically Midwestern, a very friendly city, for the most part. Private people, perhaps, but very frugal, dependable, hardworking, diligent, certainly a very prayerful culture. Churchy, as described by others. But it is what it is and it’s not atypical of other upper Midwestern cities. We’re equal distance between Chicago and Detroit. We’re never going to be a megatropolis, but we can be a terrific, fabulous, mid-size city and retain the virtues, if you will, and the culture that was embodied in President Ford, which he carried through all his life. He never strayed from his principles, and I think that is one of his greatest attributes.

Smith: I said in his eulogy that emotionally, he never left Grand Rapids.

Frey: Right.

Smith: I think that’s true.

Frey: Whenever I saw him in a crowd, he just had this glow in his eyes, a smile that wouldn’t quit and a genuine affection for his constituents and for his mission. And he was true to his mission, he was true to himself, comfortable in his own skin, and understated, and yet a tower of strength and highly principled. And if you talk to those who served with him from his early years in Congress all the way through to his presidency and afterwards, he was the same Gerald Ford that you knew, whenever you knew him. And the level of his seniority did not affect the man.

Smith: We were talking to Greg Ford and he said something I thought was remarkable. I asked him the last time he saw his uncle. He said it was in March of 2006. He got out there and he said they had forty-five minutes together. At one point Greg said something, not that he intended to do this, but he was kind of curious if he were ever to go into politics. He said, “You know, Uncle Jerry, I’d really like to know what is the most important thing for someone to know who is going into politics. What in your life sort of defined your success?” And President Ford said something very interesting. He said, “I always made other people’s problems my own.” Which is a very interesting way to sum up looking back how he saw his career.

Smith: When did you first meet him?

Frey: As a very young man, he was a congressman. We lived in the southeast part of town, East Grand Rapids, where Congressman Ford lived. I may have met him before, this must have been early ‘50s, and he came to our house on a Saturday morning to discuss some pending legislation with my father. I was home and I met him at the door and introduced myself and somehow that sticks in my memory. There may have been an earlier meeting, but on this occasion I would have been maybe nine or ten – something like that. And it’s one of those special moments and I’ll just never forget it. It was a sort of interesting moment, my father and Jerry Ford spent probably an hour, an hour and a half together on some legislation that was pending in Congress and he left to go on to another commitment.

Smith: On a Saturday morning.

Frey: The first of many meetings, and they were always interesting, they were always fun, and enormously important.

Smith: What made him such a successful congressman?

Frey: Well, he paid a lot of attention to his constituents; he was always available. While in the Navy on in my second tour of duty I was stationed in Japan, and spent a lot time in Vietnam; I was in the war zone – frequently, not in combat, per se, but in the war zone. I got out of the Navy and I was doing some job interviewing and stopped in Washington and had a good talk with Congressman Ford and he was a great listener, a great listener. Because of our mutual Navy experience, (my father who served in the Navy on Guam had the same experience in World War II) there was a special sort of affinity there and we could relate to each other. He asked all the right questions, and I’m not sure I gave all the right answers, but I gave him the best answers I had. We had a great conversation. After I was out of the service and we had more meetings subsequently all the way through his passing. Special guy.

The Vietnam war was winding down and the fleet was being downsized and some naval base was being considered for closure or reduced capacity.

Smith: It’s interesting because someone who, by modern standards, had essentially a safe district and didn’t have to come home as often as he did - by all accounts he did come home.

Frey: He came home often, and as I said earlier, he was faithful to his constituents, made every effort to really pay attention to what was going on in his district, he listened to constituents. He absorbed it, he retained it. This was not a cameo appearance, we were not doing a walk on – he was genuinely interested in people’s lives their concerns and what their views on various issues, and I think that’s made him a great congressman. He became the influence that he was in the House of Representative – he knew what was going on in the streets and on the farms and in the cities and suburbs of Western Michigan, of his district. And he never forgot from whence he came. He just had such great bearings and great orientation, and he was so well grounded, if you will, in Western Michigan.

Smith: People over and over again say, “What you saw is what you got.” That almost begs a question of whether there was, maybe not as visible, and in the best sense of the word, ambition, calculation - guile is a pejorative. But here’s a guy who was going places, who obviously wanted to be Speaker of the House and all of that. I wonder if, at some times in his life, he didn’t use that reputation – nice, good old Jerry. In a sense, putting to use for him?

Frey: The President was a very moxie, individual and that could have been. He was in some respects self-effacing, but ambitious - I would say appropriately aggressive in the right circumstances. He was a highly competitive individual. All of his athletic and academic activities reflect that, suggest that, and confirm that. He could have used that personality trait to advance his career, but it was not in any way but in a truthful, forthcoming, forthright manner, which was the essence of the man.

Smith: Were people here surprised to see this projectory when he became Republican leader of the House, and then the leap to the vice presidency?

Frey: I don’t think you could be surprised. He was so respected and revered by his fellow Republicans in the House; and even the Democrats – of course that was a different era, a different process, if you will, of how legislation got passed that we don’t have today to the extent we had it then. But I don’t think we should be surprised. I think he was so well respected, even if you disagreed with the man, that to see him continually move up in the leadership chain was not surprising. In fact, it’s a confirmation of all that is great about this country and about the person as well as the process and what you can do with the great set of characteristics, attributes, faculties and energy that he brought to the task. I don’t think we should be surprised; we should be proud that we sent him there.

Smith: There must have been local critics. We were talking to Werner Veit earlier today, and he made it clear that he and the paper were somewhat to the left of Ford, although having the same veneration, almost. But they were very critical of the pardon at the time. But I was wondering even before that, when he became sort of a local institution, whether there were people taking pot shots?

Frey: I’m sure there were. There’s always somebody saying how could he? But there’s always this part of the human condition, there’s always the naysayers, the ankle biters, those who would hound you – whether it’s jealousy or whatever – people who would second-guess the success of an individual, for whatever reasons they may have. But they are, in this case, so far in the minority. You have to listen to all who have contrary views, but I would say those who disagreed with his progression up the political ladder all the way to the White House would be small in number.

Smith: Do you ever find it ironic that he was largely responsible for the Calder?
Frey: Most people would not attribute the acquisition and placement of the Calder – that was perhaps not one of President’s personal areas of interest and perceived skill set - but it was the National Endowment of the Arts who helped do it. It was something the city wanted, and if it was not high on his priority list, he recognized that it was high on the community’s priority list and would work tirelessly to make it happen, which he did.

Smith: How controversial was it locally?

Frey: Well, actually, I was not here at the time. This was late mid-Sixties and I had finished graduate school and then off to the Navy for three plus years, I’d been deferred through graduate school. I was commissioned in Newport, Rhode Island, and then off to my first tour of duty I went. Although I did get some clippings from the then Grand Rapids Herald and the Press. I knew it was controversial in many quarters, but as we look back, it was really a national first for the NEA and the city and it has become sort of our hallmark. Our logo, if you will.

Smith: It’s also intriguing that as president he gave the Presidential Medal of Freedom to Sandy Calder, just before Calder died. So there was some connection for him there.

Frey: I guess I had forgotten that fact. He understood the need for public art in the cultural mix, even if maybe it was not his own personal first priority in terms of his passions. But he certainly respected the place that it had in our culture, both nationally and around the world.

Smith: We had been told that he did not want a statue of himself here at the museum. So they did the spaceman and he was happy with that. We’ve also been told that he gave genial, but firm advice to people that, “whatever you do make it representational art.”

Frey: You may end up with a statue – I don’t know if the final decision has been made for all time – but for those of us who are trustees of the Ford Foundation we try to live by his direction.

Smith: Now, by the time he was president, were you back?
Frey: I was living in New York City at the time. I got out of the Navy in December, 1970, about one or two months early. They were issuing early outs for some of the officers – I was a Lt. JG, stationed in Sasebo, Japan, but was on Yankee Station frequently and it was a great experience. I was all over Asia, primarily in Vietnam and so forth. And then I moved to New York because I was a bachelor and wanted to work for a bank in Manhattan. I can remember the headline in the New York Times, “Gerry Ford becomes vice president,” Jerry with a “G.” And he was so unknown to most of the country. I think you’ll find there is an above the fold article in the New York Times library that was a little bit embarrassing, perhaps, at the Times, having misspelled his name. I had moved back to Grand Rapids when he became president in August 1974.

Smith: What did you think about the pardon?

Frey: I think, as most people did, that it was sort of a bolt out of the blue on that Sunday morning. Not expected or anticipated by some, although there was always that sort of occasional undercurrent as if it was something the President was thinking about. I think that the trauma of the Watergate process was so gut wrenching, that when Vice President Ford became the president in August, it soon became apparent that he was spending an inordinate amount of his time related to “Watergate” and Nixon-related issues; a huge distraction for him personally and the Cabinet; and just the uncertainty of it all and where it was going to lead, and for how long it was going to take to get there. The process itself could have taken not just months, but years, and that would have incessantly invaded the time, energy and focus of the President who had so many critical issues that demanded his attention.

So I think in hindsight, and hindsight comes in different time frames. Sometimes it’s weeks, sometimes it’s twenty years and thirty, but I think almost to a person today, the wisdom of it, and I would say the courage of it at the time he did it, was pretty amazing. And it really speaks to the individual and to the level of comfort that he has in his own skin and his own judgment. It would have been very easy, in some respects, to pay less attention to it, let the process go where it was it was going to go, and be in the headlines, either above the fold or below the fold, day after day, month after month, year after year. Today I think President Ford’s decision is pretty clear to almost everyone that he really just cut it short. I think those that think there was some sort of deal struck, I think they are misguided and unfounded in their belief.

Smith: Thankfully Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking. He said, “For twenty years everywhere I go people asked the same questions.” When the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles in Courage Award, they stopped asking the questions.

Frey: It really sort of put it to conclusion and it could have been some other circumstance, but that sort of stopped it for all time.

Smith: It’s unstoppable.

Frey: It sort of said, “That’s it. Move on.” I always, in my heart of hearts, wish the President could have had one full term of his own to let the public get a full measure of the man. With all respect to President Carter and the election, the challenges of the two and a half year presidency, there would have been a much more substantial evaluation then and now, because we would have had a chance to really see some legislation passed, do some really great things instead of being on defensive for a good part of his presidency.

Smith: Now, presumably, you got to know him much better after he left office. Was there resentment locally when he decided to locate in California?

Frey: I think there was some head scratching, but I have to go back for just a moment. A wonderful memory of mine is that I had just moved back to Grand Rapids in 1973-74, and I think it was 1975 or 6. The President came on one of his visits to Grand Rapids and stayed with my parents. The Secret Service came in and had the house wired with all these special phones and the President spent the night. I came over to my parents’ home and had a wonderful visit with the President, mixed him a drink. He’d had a very long day. He stayed with some other friends from time to time, Bob Brown, I think, and perhaps some others. But it was a really special moment because he was sort of off duty. I remember because my parents lived next door to Bob and Mary(?) Pew, and the Pews came over and had drinks as well with the President and he had his valet with him. It was a wonderful couple of hours with a sitting president who could talk about anything, it was off the record and all amongst friends. There was nothing particularly sensitive discussed, it was a fun moment.

But people appreciated Betty Ford’s health issues, her back and related issues – I think it was asthmatic issues, perhaps. I’ve sort of forgotten all the medical issues, but they had looked at a number of different climates that would give them the privacy that they earned and deserved, as well as be more helpful to her medical conditions. I think people were hoping that he would come here, or hoping that maybe he would retain a residence and spend a portion of the year here or maybe in northern Michigan, that way they could have some privacy. But I don’t think that anybody, for more than a short period of time, took exception to their decision to select Palm Springs because he was so loyal to the city, and came back frequently.

Smith: Has Marty told you this wonderful story about Mary Pew, who apparently, umpteen years ago, was a potential suitor?

Frey: They actually dated.

Smith: They did? Okay. Has Marty told you this story? One evening he was going on about Grand Rapids and the name came up and so on. Once prompted he started going on about “Gee, just think, I might have married Mary.” And Mrs. Ford said, “Now, just think, if you had married Mary Pew, instead of being President of the United States, you could have been president of Steelcase.”

Frey: There you go.

Smith: Perfect shaft. But he took it. One saw that they had that very kind of comfortable relationship. She had a sharp wit and he almost enjoyed the darts.

Frey: Well, they did date. Mary reminded us about that during that evening over at my parents’ house. It must have been in the ‘40s, I guess; obviously before he married Betty.

Smith: Now, there was obviously some controversy about where the Ford Library-Museum was going to go. And isn’t it the act of a congressman to split it down the middle? When this came up with Werner, I said, “Were you upset about that?” He said, “Well, actually by that time people in Grand Rapids just wanted to make sure we didn’t lose the whole thing, so we were delighted to get the museum.”

Frey: I was living in New York City. Well, I can’t recall all the facets – there was really a question of where to locate the museum in the city. There were some that were wishing that it would be on the east side of the Grand River, and it turned out it’s on the west. It’s been a great location, a great site. I think, my own personal view is, that the President’s loyalty to the University of Michigan was extraordinary and special and deservedly so. I think most people think at the time the decision was made to split the library and museum that it was the right decision then, but with the renaming of the school of public policy, the Ford School of Public Policy - that hindsight always being perfect, and 20-20, that the Ford School undoubtedly is and will continue to be the focus of the President’s legacy in Ann Arbor. And at some point, maybe consideration should be given to uniting the library and museum to Grand Rapids. I do not think the GSA would permit another bifurcated presidential museum and library in the presidential system.

Smith: No, that’s safe to say. And I think the trick is in convincing the University that they are not actually losing a library, but they are gaining a foothold in West Michigan.

Frey: And it could easily be identified as such. That’s a whole different issue for another day. But I think it would increase attendance, I think it would be more operationally effective from the budget standpoint. There are lots of issues to talk about. But it is what it is. It was the right decision for the President when he made it, but I don’t think you’ll see another split facility in the presidential museum system going forward.

Smith: I know he wanted very much to put it downtown. I understand that Fred Meijer had some land and it was very generously offered. There is a sense that a lot of people looked at this and thought that it was a curious place to put it. But in many ways, hasn’t it been a catalyst for what followed?
Frey: It really has. It really accelerated the growth and development of the near west side of the city, which for the most part has been industrial and residential. As you look around the museum has a fabulous view to the east and the north and to the south. It’s been a huge success. And so I think it’s been a catalyst for growth and investment, mostly private investment in the west side of the city. And it’s going to continue to move in that direction. So I think it’s been a great pick, it’s a great pick for the President’s burial site.

Smith: And that was always part of the package.

Frey: Always part of the package; I understand that. It’s a very special place, and reflects his loyalty to the city of his birth.

Smith: Now you must have seen a great deal of him in his later years when he came here.

Frey: Right.

Smith: Did you go to a football game with him or watch football with him?

Frey: I did not have that opportunity, but on several occasions when he was here or we were in Palm Springs or Ann Arbor in his later years, we always had a few quiet moments to talk. He knew my grandfather who was born in 1880, died in 1962, and he was chairman of the bank, Union Bank and Trust Company. I can remember the President saying, “Gosh, Dave, I remember your grandfather so well and your dad.” The President and my father went to the University of Michigan together. They were fraternity brothers. The President always kidded me, “Your dad was pretty tough on me down at the Deke house.” They were both members of Delta Kappa Epsilon. My father was in the class of ’32 and the President was class of ’35. So really, the family relationship goes back to the late nineteen twenties, if not the early 1930s and so it’s been a great friendship and a very respectful relationship and a very special one that has spanned a lot of decades and it’s going to keep going.

Smith: How did he change over time? Let me put that in a more specific context. I’ve often wondered whether he didn’t change and the Republican Party moved ever further to the right - or a different set of issues came up and illustrated that difference. There were a number of issues on which, as I said in the eulogy, most of us tend to get more conservative as we get older, and he certainly never stopped being a fiscal conservative. But he seemed to become more tolerant. And I often wondered how much of that was her influence on him and how much was just the experience he had in life.

Frey: I think that clearly his wife, Betty, has been a huge influence on some issues.
And he has such love and affection and respect for her, and was an advocate for her views on a lot of issues, which I think he shared genuinely. And he was a fabulous listener, he could digest things. I think he aged very gracefully, for the most part. His basic personality didn’t change much. You may not have the same energy level as you get a little bit older, but I found him a remarkably consistent person both in style and thought and action. I think the party has moved in a different direction. But certainly the process has moved in a different direction. And the style that made him so successful in the ’50s and ’60s and ’70s is a different style today, much more confrontational, much more along party lines. Still, negotiation is important, but it’s a different era. But I think he was true to himself, true to his views, willing to change when circumstances changed and world events caused change. But I found him remarkably stable in those things where he could be true to himself and true to his views, and true to his convictions.

Smith: At least one opinion that changed, from the time he left office until later in life, was his opinion of Jimmy Carter. It took a while, but they became very good friends.

Frey: I think in the heat of the battle, when you are fighting for your political life, particularly for the presidency, some things get said; some things get done, not necessarily by the principles, but by secondary, tertiary staff people, well intentioned as they are, to sort of create issues that would not otherwise be created. I think that it really turned out to be a remarkable relationship and friendship. It took a while after President Carter had served in office. I think it was on the flight to Sadat’s funeral that they sort of bonded, and subsequent to that had some great time together and very respectful and I think some genuinely warm feelings towards each other. As different as they might be on a number of issues, they got over it finally and were able to put all this stuff aside and had a pretty good one on one relationship.

Smith: That’s a great example for their successors, in both parties.

Frey: Absolutely. The Carters were here when we rededicated the museum. It was a fabulous dinner. The senior Bushes Mrs. Johnson, Caroline Kennedy Schlossberg and, oh gosh, it was a great event.

Smith: You must have seen him in the crux of the Foundation, and his fiscal conservatism. Tell us about it.

Frey: We had a meeting of the Ford Foundation in the Amway Grand Plaza Hotel several years ago now, when the Foundation was much more modest in size. We were talking – a number of the trustees, maybe fifteen of us in the room with the President – and we were talking about the investment portfolio. Well, the President being a child of the Depression, his parents having lived through the Depression, as did my grandparents and parents, and that was a huge influence on any young person…it was a huge influence. And the President was concerned with this. He said, “We should be 98% in bonds.” And Fred Meijer was in the room and myself and Pete Secchia and a few others and in the conversation. “Mr. President, that may be a little too conservative. If we want to grow the principle of the Foundation we should be more diversified.”

So after a long discussion we moved from a predominately, almost exclusively, bond portfolio to a much better mix of assets. I had explained to the President that’s what we had done in the Frey Foundation in terms of diversity of our assets. And how we needed to grow the Foundation in order to sustain our grant making. I think he thought about it, it took him a while to get there, but at the end of the day – several weeks later, he signed off on a different mix of assets that would help us grow this Foundation over a period of time.

Smith: And, obviously, it grew far beyond what its originators envisioned.
Frey: Both by the investment portfolio and by gifts. We’ve had extremely generous donors to the Foundation. We still need to grow it some more, but between our investment performance and our gifts we really are doing quite well.

Smith: And you’ve weathered the storm over the last couple of years?

Frey: We have. There’s been some uneasy moments for all of us, both individually and for the Ford Foundation, and even if you think you’ve got a well-balanced portfolio, when you get some of these dramatic and traumatic shifts in the market, you’re going to take some temporary – hopefully temporary – some asset diminution. But the markets recover. And it’s still true today that equities over the long haul will serve you well, but you do have to have a balance.

Smith: Did he have a sense of humor?

Frey: He had a great sense of humor. And I can remember he had a great laugh. It was more of a chortle, maybe, than a laugh, and it was genuine. It was deep, it came from well within him; he had a great sense of humor. It had to be the right moment and the right person. He had this great chemistry and it had to be the right person, right time, and when it came out it was wonderful to hear, wonderful to see. It was fun to be with him. I think he was a good storyteller.

Smith: Actually, it’s funny. Penny and I were co-conspirators, because I was writing a lot of his stuff in the later years, and she would make him practice and practice and practice. He wasn’t a natural joke teller. He said one time, “If I had to do things over, I would have spent much more time mastering communications skills.” So he knew he wasn’t a natural spellbinder. But the sincerity showed through.

Frey: The sincerity, the genuineness, his truthfulness came through. I think in hindsight, that’s probably one of the things he could have spent a little more time on, as it became more of a communications age. Knowing the President went to Washington in the late ‘40s, television wasn’t then the nation’s primary communication vehicle. Whatever you do, you need to be a great communicator, an effective communicator. Some are better than others, but it’s not personal politics but because television is so persuasive and it’s increasingly important.

Smith: He spent a lifetime, very successfully for the most part, controlling his temper. Did you ever see his temper?

Frey: Not frequently. I think most of what you saw with his temper was a clenching down on his pipe, or something that sort of conveyed a concern. But I never heard him say an unkind word toward anyone, which speaks volumes for the man, no matter what his thoughts, or whatever concerns he had about individuals or circumstances. I never heard him issue an unkind word towards anybody. So it takes me back to what my mother, [when I was] a young boy would say to me when I was a young boy, “If you can’t say anything nice about someone, don’t say it.” He was very civil. And he was the right person in the right place at the right time, all through his career. And he had a wonderfully diverse and enriching career – from his naval experiences, or even as a young boy here, all the way through the presidency.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Frey: I do remember the last time I saw him. I saw him in Ann Arbor at the groundbreaking of the Ford School of Public Policy in November 2004. I have a picture in my office of the President and Sandy Weill and myself. That was about two years before he passed away. He did not make it back for the dedication. This was an indoor, ceremonial groundbreaking, and he was sort of frail at that point. Then I was with him at – the last Gerald R. Ford Foundation trustee meeting he attended in Palm Springs in June 2005, about 18 months before he passed away.

Smith: And he announced that he was Deep Throat.

Frey: Oh, that’s right.

Smith: And there’s one time he practiced and practiced, and by all accounts, he pulled it off. Had the place just stunned.

Frey: It was like, oh my gosh. And after a second you could hear the laughter fill the room, and that was a great moment. I’m so glad Judy and I went out to Palm Springs for that meeting. It was very difficult for him to travel at that point. And I’m not so sure he left Palm Springs after that.

Smith: Up until he was around ninety he was still getting around, and then the doctors really prohibited it and I thought that was a kind of death. Because he just loved traveling. He liked rubber chicken, he just loved it all.

Frey: He’d been doing it for so many years, and when you stop doing something that you love, and you’re used to it, it’s like the wheels start falling off the wagon.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction at the time of his death?

Frey: I can’t say that I was – I think he was respected and revered, and I think the outpouring for him, particularly here – was pretty remarkable. And by his own design was a modest funeral for a very modest person. He could have had a much more elaborate service, but it reflected the man and what was important to him, and it was comfortable for the family. He was very sensitive, as you and others know, of his relatively short presidency, and that he was an unelected president. He wanted to make sure the service was respectful of the scale and style of other elected presidents. It was a very moving moment for me and for everybody who knew the President.

You never know what you have until you don’t have it, or maybe appreciate what you have until you don’t have it. And I had so many moments when I think how much I miss this good man – for who he was and what he did. For how special he was and yet he had such an understated style, but so dependable and so remarkable in so many ways. So I am not amazed. If I am halfway typical of the country, what the country values in its leadership. The outpouring of goodwill for this man was genuine, it was nothing other than a heartfelt goodbye. He was terrific then and now…he had this great respect.

Smith: Would he have been surprised to see the lines?

Frey: He would have been, but he probably shouldn’t have been. But that was also his style. Even after he left the presidency, he had this modesty about the fact that he had served as president. You don’t see many people who were respected, revered and adored like this individual. It is very rare to be respected and liked – he was both.

Smith: Last question: how do you think he should be remembered?

Frey: I think he should be remembered as he is remembered. I think it is really important that those of us who are involved in the President’s Foundation continue to educate, to promote in the best sense of the word, his legacy, his contributions to the country, and the world. I’m very much in favor, and we’re working very diligently, to have a definitive biography written and published about this President. I am an advocate for that as part of his legacy, because he really does need that to cement his place in history. The School of Public Policy in Ann Arbor and this museum, as well as the library in Ann Arbor will collectively promote and secure his place in history. I think his legacy will continue to grow, even given his short presidency. So I am optimistic. So we are committed to making sure that his place in history is secure for all time. He’s the real deal.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Smith: We often ask people to tell us something surprising about Gerald Ford, something that might surprise people.

Gergen: I’ll tell you what surprised me. It was that he was a lot brighter than what I’d been told. And just a smart man, more informed and more talented. And I think one of the biggest mistakes we made on the White House staff was to underestimate his (George W. Bush’s) - underestimate his talents and capacity. I have written about the fact that I found it agonizing to go through the speech preparation process in the Ford White House, and I’m happy to talk all about that. But it was as if we were writing speeches for See Jane Run. Everything was reduced to single syllables because he would stumble over them; simple declarative sentences.

We thought, and to some degree in our arrogance, this is what suited him best, because otherwise he might stumble. But after he left office, I got a call from his team one day saying President Ford has a speech he needs to give and he’s got a draft and he’d like you to look over it. “Can we fax it to you? He’d like to call you at home tonight and talk about it.” I said, sure. And I got it and it was a very complex speech. It was beautifully written, but very complex; lots of three or four syllable words, and I thought somebody has written an elegant speech, but it’s not Ford. And what he wants me to do is to “dumb it down,” to put it into simpler language. Something that he would feel comfortable with. And so when he called me that night, he just said, “Well, how did you like the speech?” And I said, “Well, Mr. President, it’s a wonderful speech. Really elegant, but it’s not quite you. Did you want me to work on it or whatever?” And I could hear him chuckling in the background, he had a pipe. And I talked a little bit more and I talked myself further and further out on a limb. And finally he said, “Well, I just wanted to…” He said, “For a long, long, time, I’ve never had the space in my life to write my own speech. This is the first time I’ve done it for a long time, but I wanted you to read it.” And I said, “Oh, my God.” But my biggest sensation was, we totally misunderstood just how capable this man was, that he could have given some of the most impressive speeches and oratory. That he really was a thoughtful and deep person. It was like so much of Jerry Ford that he was so self-effacing. He was so humble, but he would never correct you. On the other hand, he did not want you sort of belittling him.

Smith: Was that the problem with Jim Schlesinger?

Gergen: I was just going to say…Jim Schlesinger is one of the brightest people I have ever met in public life. The man has candle power far surpassing that of almost anybody else. But as defense secretary, when he started lecturing President Ford about how the appropriation process worked on Capitol Hill, and Ford had spent years doing this himself and being master of it, I think frankly the President was pissed off. And he fired him. He just didn’t want to have to put up with that guff. But you could see that. We did have some inklings, and early on when I first came there – I’d been there in the White House at the end of the Nixon days, and I stayed on for part of the early Ford period. Then they flushed me out, with every good reason. They wanted to get the Nixon people out of there.

Smith: That’s a huge question – that period. Rumsfeld told him to basically clean house.

Gergen: Right.

Smith: He was reluctant to do that for a number of reason. Stepping back, how did the meshing go? How did the Nixon holdovers deal with the Ford incomers?

Gergen: It was not an easy transition. There continued to be an arrogance and smugness on the part of the some of the Nixon people; and yet the scandal had engulfed us. For those of us who worked in the Nixon administration – I was a young kid at the time, and I thought it was like playing for the Chicago Black Sox. I thought we were finished in baseball, in effect. I thought none of us would ever come back and we would be written off. But when President Ford arrived, as nice as he was, he had only a small coterie of people around him, and they were very mixed in their attitudes toward the Nixon people. Almost to a person, they didn’t like the Nixon people. By definition, they wanted to do everything different. If Nixon had walked on the left side of the road, they wanted to walk on the right side of the road. They didn’t want a Haldeman around, they didn’t want a strong chief of staff, all the things that are obvious.

Smith: And was Hartmann the personification of that?

Gergen: Hartmann was the personification of that, and Bob, I think mellowed some in the years since, but he did see us as the Pretorian guard – that’s what he wrote about later on. He very much wanted to be protective of Jerry Ford. I happened to think he was right, his instinct that wanted to protect Jerry Ford was right.

Smith: From himself?

Gergen: I think he wanted to protect him from the Nixonians. I think he wanted to preserve the Ford that he knew as the man of integrity and not get splashed out. Because, you know we had all these questions then about the pardon and everything else that arose very quickly.

Smith: Is there a thin line between being protective and being possessive?

Gergen: Yes. And I don’t think you can see quite where the line is. But he had been there for Ford, he was his guy, and every president I know has got someone who is sort of protective of the boss. But Hartmann had outsized influence, and he was also erratic, so you never knew quite where you stood with him. You couldn’t go in and have a conversation because he was very hard to approach. And I think it was quite clear that President Ford, having been thrust into these circumstances, didn’t have the kind of team you’d normally have coming into the presidency. He had a congressional team; he had a House congressional team. That’s a very mixed bag and the President of the United States needs the best that he can get. President Ford knew he needed some help; and so he, I thought, was more welcoming, personally, and more respectful and more to do well by. (?)But the team was not.

For example, I had been head of the Nixon speechwriting team at the end. It was a speechwriting and research team. It was unclear what my future was. I assumed that over time we would all be asked to leave, but it would be a graceful exit of some sort. Al Haig was still there as chief of staff and I got a call from Haig one morning saying they just put the word out that there is a new head of the speechwriting team – Paul Tice – you’ve been replaced. He said, “I tried to stop it. I tried to do it in a more dignified way, but they just sort of basically cut off their head.” And he was really angry because they bypassed him to do it, Hartmann had bypassed him.

Smith: One senses that Hartmann and Haig were put on the planet to piss each other off. We talked to Haig before he died, and the thing that got him red-faced with anger, thirty years later, was Hartmann.

Gergen: Well, it was possible to hate Bob Hartmann. He engendered that. But, by the way, he also enjoyed – it’s one of these things like Franklin Roosevelt in ‘36 – “I relish my enemies.” So he didn’t suffer people because they didn’t like him very much. I got tossed out on my ass, but then they came back to me and said, “Well, would you like to work for Paul Tice?” And I said, “Not on your life, I’m not doing that. I’m out of here.” But there was a lot of stuff like that that went on that was messy.

Smith: But you were the mainstay – there were literally rival speechwriting teams, organizations. What does it say about the President? His loyalty to Bob Hartmann notwithstanding. Can someone be too loyal? Can you be too nice? Tolerating Hartmann and all that, professionally, let alone personally. How can this system – if you want to dignify it as such – work?
Gergen: Not well. It was tricky. That’s why eventually he had to have a chief of staff, and that’s why eventually, when Dick Cheney came in, he needed to have more power. He couldn’t make the place work; it was riven with tensions and rivalries. I’ll give you an example: the State of the Union Address in 1976. I had just come back, I think, in the fall of ’75, I had just been a short time. And Cheney was running things. Rummy had gone to Defense by then. It was Rummy and Cheney together who had invited me to come back to the White House. They needed help on communications and one thing and another, and I got a fancy title.

But when it came to doing the State of the Union speech, there was a very strong view among Dick Cheney and his top lieutenants – I was one of those – that this needed to be a very thematic speech. Bob Teeter, a pollster, was urging that, to be very thematic, not be a laundry list. And then Hartmann came up with the first draft, he was tasked with doing the draft and working with the President. And it turned out to be a total laundry list, which is exactly what the bulk of the people around the President didn’t want. So I was tasked, over Hartmann’s objections, but with the President’s approval, I was tasked along with Alan Greenspan to write an alternative, which we did. And it was very thematic. And then we had a showdown meeting in the Oval Office, I think, early of an evening, and there were like sixteen of us in the room in a big circle. We had these two different drafts. Everybody read the two drafts. We had a big discussion about the merits and demerits of each draft. Hartmann was “Urff, urff,” and so finally….

Smith: At least he was sober.

Gergen: Yeah. And finally the President said, “Okay, I need each one of you to vote individually. I’m going to go around the circle and ask each one of you which one you prefer.” The vote was fourteen to two in favor of the Greenspan/Gergen draft. The two votes against were Hartmann and Jerry Ford. And guess which speech he gave.
Smith: Lincolnesque.

Gergen: Lincolnesque. Five votes against, Lincoln says, “I want to do it the other way. The ayes have it.”

Smith: But that raises a question. One way of seeing the Ford presidency is a trajectory, over two and a half years, of outgrowing the congressional mindset.

Gergen: I felt that he became much more comfortable in the office. I mean, we all remember that this was not the office he sought. He wanted to be Speaker. He always was a creature of the House; he loved the House of Representatives; he loved the people; he was one of these people who was a grand bipartisan—a partisan—but a grand bipartisan. And that was the institution he assumed. He was so much himself there. Usually for the presidency, you have to go through a lot of psychological preparation, as well as intellectual preparation. It is a very different job from anything else in the United States. It is a unique position. Most people spend a lifetime trying to get there. It’s a slippery pole, as we all know, and it takes an extraordinary amount of ego to get there. And you have to do a lot of crazy things to get there in terms of the craziness of the American campaign.

And so Ford hadn’t gone through any of that, and he brought a congressional mindset, but he was serious about the nation’s problems, but he didn’t know quite how to go about solving them. And he didn’t quite know how to be president. He’d never played that role before. One of the things that saved him, and why I think he was a much better president, especially in the rearview mirror of history, was not only his integrity, which was, I think, enormous, but he also was so self-effacing. He was so accepting of who he was that he was extremely comfortable to have people around—in fact, wanted to have people around—who was better than he was in what they did. So he was extremely comfortable with talented people like a Kissinger. And he was extremely comfortable with a Greenspan and others.
Smith: The Cabinet he put together was pretty impressive.

Gergen: I think if you look at it, by the time he left office, he had assembled one of the best Cabinets around. I think if you look back over history, the Ed Levis of the world – were just really high quality people at the Justice Department. And he drew other people like that – Bill Coleman and there are so many others that went on to serve the public for years later. But he had to grow into the presidency itself. I saw a dramatic change when the campaign – and through the spring primaries of ’76 – remember I came back late ’75, left in ’74, came back in ’75 – through the campaign’s early primaries, we were sort of in a mess. Once Reagan got his voice and started whipping us, it got rough and tumble. And Dick hadn’t been given the controls.

Finally, Dick not only won his confidence, but the President realized I’ve got to have a strong chief of staff to make this work. And he gave Dick a lot more authority. And Dick Cheney, in those days, was a very substantial, and I think, terrific chief of staff. I had parted company with ______________ later on that was a whole different story in the George W. years. But I had a lot of respect for Dick Cheney in those years. There were a number of us who thought he’d be a great national candidate one day. Because we’d worked with him and at the age of thirty-five he was terrific.

Smith: Let me make sure I understand, in terms of acceding him power - was it that Rumsfeld had had that power and Cheney wasn’t initially given the same kind of authority?

Gergen: No, I think it was that Rumsfeld had – one had less power than Haldeman did, less power than Haig did. Ford really did believe in the Spokes of the Wheel concept. But when Cheney came in, because he was young, and he wasn’t Rumsfeld, he even had less power than Rumsfeld. When this was all over and we were already to depart, there was a farewell party for Cheney. We gave him a – Terry O’Donnell brought it, I think – it was an old bicycle tire, and it was all gnarled up and broken and spokes were coming out. But this was a theory that we had – the Spokes of the Wheel concept – and it didn’t work. Boy, Cheney got that up and rolling. There was a pretty darn good team those last months. We were coming from thirty points back.
David Gergen

October 8, 2010

Smith: A number of people have said the atmosphere in the White House was different working under Rumsfeld than under Cheney. Specifically, Dorothy Downton, the President’s personal secretary - Rumsfeld tried to get her fired. Didn’t happen.

Gergen: I’ll tell you when I got into a really, really awkward situation. When I had left the Nixon White House, I went to work for Bill Simon, who was treasury secretary. Tough, no-nonsense, very conservative. And he and I got along very well together, and I became very close to him, and worked for him for a year. And when we were there, and I can’t quite remember when it was, but when Dick was trying to run things early on, there was a movement outside the White House by a number of Ford friends – I think it was Charlie Bartlett, the former journalist, who was behind a lot of this.

Smith: The old Kennedy friend.

Gergen: Yes, the old Kennedy friend, who went to Bill Simon and said you really ought to be chief of staff, because they need somebody to take charge there. We’re going to lose the White House now if we’re not careful, and so forth and so on. And they had long conversations and they came to me to – and I was working for Dick and believed in Dick, but I also thought he had too little authority. And they had a letter from their group that they wanted to get to the President, and asked me if I would give it to him. This was very awkward for me because I wanted to be loyal to Dick Cheney, I believed in him, and yet I also knew this thing was not working. And Bill Simon was a friend of mine. So I eventually did get to the President, and I think I talked to Dick about it because he knew I’d been involved and I think he was – I can’t remember the exact circumstances – but it was just really hard because I was in a dilemma. I didn’t know quite what to do with it. But I didn’t want to be sponsoring Bill Simon - as much as I liked Bill Simon, I didn’t want to sponsor him. But I also know the place needed to be shaken up. And I was so pleased when we made that shift and Dick really moved in. I think the place really humped them because we had a president who had really grown into the job, we had a staff that was clicking, we had people who liked each other. By and large, it was the most congenial White House staff – I’ve been on four White House staffs, and I have to tell you – I think it was the most congenial staff. You didn’t have to keep your back to the wall. After we got past the Hartmann chapter…

Smith: I was going to say – it seems like the mirror image of the original.

Gergen: Yes. And things had fallen into place and people sort of knew who they were. After a while, even though I’d been replaced by Paul Tice, for example, he and I became very respectful of each other and I wanted to see him succeed. He was a sweetheart of a guy.

Smith: By the way, do you know what job Hartmann was going to have in the second Ford administration?

Gergen: No.

Smith: Ambassador to Ireland.

Gergen: Oh, wow. The US News, in the Whispers column had me replacing Cheney in the second term, and I don’t believe for a second that was true. But you never knew quite what was going to happen there. But I did think there was a loyalty factor to Jerry Ford. People just liked him. The Ford Alumni Group were named, I think, the strongest of all the former president alumni groups that I’m aware of. The Nixon alumni group went on, but it was sort of like, we’re not going to go down, we’re in the ___________ together. And the Ford group really came together because they liked Jerry Ford and came back every June for his birthday.

Smith: Do you think the Reagan challenge made Ford a better candidate?
Gergen: Yes, I do.

Smith: Was that offset at all by undercutting…

Gergen: There is no question that the Reagan challenge strengthened the internal White House workings and put some more starch into the President because he knew he was going to have to fight for the job. But it also left him thirty points back, and with a Republican base that was divided. And he had to drop Nelson Rockefeller as a part of that challenge. And I think that was one of the hardest things he ever did, let’s put it that way.

Smith: Did you see evidence of an unhappy vice president?

Gergen: Of Nelson Rockefeller? I didn’t know him well. I just knew some of his team, they were very much like a third body altogether. I mean, you had the Nixon people, you had the Ford people, and you had the Rockefeller people. Some of them __________________, Joe Canzari went on to serve Reagan, I think, admirably. But they were sort of seen off to the side. I think Dick Parsons was floating around that group, as well. But it was almost an independent organ.

Smith: Did you see Ford’s temper?

Gergen: I saw his stubbornness. I never saw him throw his glasses across the room or anything like that. But he was one of the most stubborn men I ever met.

Smith: We all know about the Polish gaffe, which I guess took almost a week for him to take back.

Gergen: It took several days. We couldn’t convince him. Well, he was living in a bubble up there. He made the statement. We saw the polls change. Right after the debate was over people said he won the debate. And then the media started replaying the Polish thing and by noon the next day - Bob Teeter was polling them hourly – we’d lost the debate and we knew we had to reverse it. He was out with his traveling team, Dick Cheney was back in Washington, and everywhere he went he was greeted by these enthusiastic crowds. So, the view from the plane was, hey, they love us out here. You guys are just using polls, it’s just New York, you live in a different world. We’re here in the real world.

Finally it got so bad Cheney had to fly out to Air Force One and pierce the bubble and say, “We’ve got to deal with this.” Do it for the best of intentions, but you’ve got to reverse it. And he did. But it took several days. It cost us. I don’t think it cost the election, but it cost us. I’ll tell you what it did was, we were coming up in the polls and it was stalled. We started up again, but there isn’t any question, if we had never stalled it could be he’d caught Carter altogether. I’m not so sure.

Smith: Doug Bailey describes it better than anyone…what the strategy was in ’76. Which is basically: if the election were about Ford he would lose. You had to make it about Carter. So it was about engendering doubt in this unknown commodity.

Gergen: Hard to do.

Smith: Yea.

Gergen: Because the narrative about Ford had been told in such a way it was very hard to overcome; stumbling, doesn’t understand, doesn’t know, the pardon, all the rest, the economy haywire. We had a bad economic situation.

Smith: I’ve often thought that while everyone focuses on the pardon as “the reason,” the fact is, you had basically caught up, and then the weekend before – Greenspan refers to it as “the pause” – there were economic numbers that came out that suggested this rocket recovery had stalled out. And I’ve often wondered if there was a critical mass of people who were prepared to vote for Ford, but when the slightest sort of infraction came along they said, “Well, I don’t really want to commit to four more years of this.”

Gergen: I think that’s right. And you’ve got to remember there was a romance about Carter. He wasn’t Nixon, he wasn’t Ford, he wasn’t an insider; and that was working powerfully in his direction. And he did seem like a – there was something almost Obamaesque about the Carter campaign. It was well choreographed.

Smith: By the election, did you think you were going to win?

Gergen: No. I didn’t think we were. In fact, I’d say that in my heart of hearts, as much as I wanted Ford to win, I thought from the country’s point of view, maybe the time had come for a change, and new people. Get some fresh blood in, and all of us probably ought to take a rest. You do begin to realize after eight years of any administration that things wind down a lot. People were tired and the country needed some kind of lift. I didn’t realize what we were coming into. I’ll tell you what it really did, it revived the Republican Party. The out years were particularly productive for Republicans in terms of going back to the drawing board intellectually and refreshing and coming up with a whole series of ideas that Reagan could run with four years later. It prepared the table for Reagan. If Ford had won, there would have been no Reagan.

Smith: That’s true. I don’t know if you saw him after the election, because a number of people have said to us in varying degrees, it took him a while to bounce back.

Gergen: It did take him a while to bounce back. And he was angry at Carter. He didn’t like Carter.

Smith: The line we’ve heard is, he said to people, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Gergen: Well, he was. They finally, I think, put aside their differences, on that flight to Sadat’s funeral during the Reagan years.

Smith: That’s right. I’ve often wondered whether one of the things that brought them together was Ronald Reagan, and the fact that they’d both run against Reagan.
Gergen: That’s right. The word was, they were flying back, I think they spent a lot of time together talking and they were sort of aligned when they got back. And Ford thought that Carter had gone from chicken shit to chicken salad. But Nixon had gone to ___________, or Nixon was isolated off or something.

Smith: Nixon went on to conduct his own royal progress to the Middle East.

Gergen: Yeah, they were there together. I have a picture of all of us just before we left on that trip, Ford, Carter, Reagan and Nixon. I know there are four presidents in that picture. And they let staff people jump in for some shots. A lot of fun.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Mrs. Ford?

Gergen: Had very little contact with Mrs. Ford. I had continuing contact with him. I went to the dinners. He called me about some things, and I wrote a piece about him which he was really pleased about when the Kennedy Library gave him the annual award for courage. From the Kennedys for his pardon. I wrote a piece in the New York Times, he wrote me a note, he called me; we talked from time to time and I saw him in various places. I went out when they opened the Ford Policy Institute at the university – I saw him there. He asked me to come out and speak. I really was drawn to the man as a human being.

Smith: Don’t you think that time was good to him? Poor Lyndon Johnson, who died the day before the Vietnam Peace Agreement, such as it was – and yet Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking. The Kennedy Profiles in Courage Award was the imprimatur. He said to me, everywhere I’ve gone for twenty years, people have asked the same question. Since then they don’t ask the question any more.

Gergen: Is that right?

Smith: Yeah. It had that much impact.

Gergen: Well, it was. I always thought it was a courageous thing to do; I just thought it was hap handed in the way it was presented.
Smith: But you talk about in later years, the contacts that you had with him.

Gergen: I can’t remember exactly, but there were just notes that would come and an occasional phone call, or I’d see him somewhere.

Smith: In my eulogy I talked about the fact that most of us as we get older become more conservative. With him, it seemed the opposite. Whether he was reacting to the Reagan takeover of the party.

Gergen: It was partly that, I think it was probably Betty. Betty is a very modern sort of woman who has evolved over time. The two people I’ve seen the most adaptive like that have been Jerry Ford and George Schultz. George Schultz has gone through an extraordinary evolution in thinking. And you see he is very green, he’s very much for getting these prison laws in regard to drugs that he thinks is crazy, and destabilizing Mexico. He’s for a zero nuclear world – I just have a lot of respect for people who continue to grow and think. Bob Dole is one of those. But I thought Ford aged extremely well. And I also felt that his tenure in office looked better and better. You go back to the Richard Peeves’ apology to him in the American Heritage. It is really quite remarkable. I really did feel that captured what happened – that there were a lot of people, especially in the press, who had misjudged him.

But, you know – I want to go back to one of the things – I came in there late ’75. And going through the budget process and being in the room with him as he made decisions about the budget, came to the conclusion that he understands the federal appropriations process and the budget and the Congress better than almost anybody I’ve seen. He’s really good at this. He knew the numbers, he knew what the programs were, he knew what the first weapons systems were – he knew all this stuff and he knew a lot about the rest of the budgeting. So it was in that January/February when he presented his budget. Typically what a president does is send the budget up to Capitol Hill. It’s a big thick document and then he may come out and make a few sentences and then leave and have a press conference for the press that is conducted by his budget director. The only person who had ever done that himself, the only president who had ever done that was Harry Truman. He did it himself, he briefed on his own budget. He is the only person who had the mastery of the budget. And so after hearing this for a while I went to Cheney and some others, Jim Jones, Jim Cavanaugh, and others, Jerry Jones and Terry O’Donnell and recommended strongly that Ford do his own briefing and surprise people. It was going to be a complete surprise.

He was terrific. And for a while then he really convinced a lot of journalists – this guy is smarter than we thought he was about the innards of government. Now he may not be the wise man or the strategist that Richard Nixon was, or the master of the process that Lyndon Johnson was, but he certainly can hold his own here. And it made a difference. All I would add to that is that we didn’t fully appreciate that inside, especially on the speeches.

Smith: I always say he is the least self-dramatizing of presidents. In an age where so much of the presidency is theater - that he really never was comfortable with.

Gergen: I agree. He would do it, but it was his _______________. He was a guy who was part of a club, got things done on Capitol Hill, did it well, liked his constituents and had a good life.

Smith: Were you surprised by the degree of reaction when he died? He’d been out of the public eye for a while.

Gergen: I was surprised because I hadn’t realized just how much warmth there was. I think there was a nostalgia about what he represented. He was a World War II representative, and he did represent those values. I think we miss that generation a lot. Almost everybody I’ve ever worked with in that World War II generation who has died has gone out with flags flying.

Smith: I remember you once saying that you had come to the conclusion that military service, if not essential, was hugely beneficial to a president.
Gergen: I do believe that. We had seven presidents in a row from Kennedy through Bush, Sr., who were the World War II presidents - as you know better than I - who all wore a military uniform. And I think it made a big difference. And, of course, before that Eisenhower and Truman. FDR had not, but he’d been very involved as assistant secretary of the navy. And I think that service in military uniform while young shaped the political culture of that generation and made it much more civic in nature. One of the reasons why I am now such a proponent, and went down to the Ford Institute when it was opened and tried to do all these other things - I’m a very big proponent of service, national service. Not everybody, but having both military service and domestic, civic service like Teach for America, I think make a huge difference for this next generation. I think that one of the big failings of people who came of age in the Sixties and Seventies was the fact that so few served. And it was so divisive and there were such deep resentments about it.

Smith: I just sent this essay off to Time on the Kennedy/Obama parallel. And there are surface parallels, but the huge, huge difference, it seems to me, is: Kennedy takes office 28 years after FDR begins his revolution in the course of which, because of the Depression and the war, there is fostered a collective sense of thinking. A solidarity born of shared trauma. And a trust in government, and a rallying around the president, culminating in the Bay of Pigs and so forth. Obama kicks off his presidency 28 years to the day after Reagan pronounces government more a problem than problem solver. And the Reagan consensus has not gone away.

Gergen: But there is no sense of national cohesion.

Smith: Exactly.

Gergen: And there is no sense of “we’re all in this together.”

Smith: Exactly, it’s “what’s in it for me?”
Gergen: So I’ve been extolling the new generation because I think it’s a great hope. I have to tell you, I was shaken a little bit when I went to see Social Network and this portrayal of Mark Zuckerberg may be unfair, but I came out and I found a lot of young people around here think, “Well, Mark Zuckerberg did what you have to do to succeed in life.” He was a visionary? “Oh, yeah. He had to run over a few people, but, so what? He looked pretty good.” And I came out and thought he was a jerk.

Smith: What I find astonishing is, just a couple of years after Wall Street – its greed and excess – almost took us all over the abyss, that so much populist anger is directed at Washington instead of the crooks on Wall Street.

Gergen: Yes, I was just with an investment crowd two days ago and made that point. I said, “It’s astonishing to me, but people like Rob Portman, who is running out in Ohio, who has this investment background, and worked for George W. is fifteen points ahead.” What’s going on here? I don’t see this being directed at Wall Street right now. I do see it directed as way too much government. And I think Obama, somehow, has taken all that anger and channeled it on himself.

Smith: Yeah.

Gergen: And I don’t know why. We’re going to be a long time trying to figure this one out.

Smith: Last thing: when the famous Sixty Minutes interview took place with Mrs. Ford, people in the White House said, “Oh my God, what has she done?” My sense is though, that before too long people began to realize that, hey, wait a second, there’s another side to this, and that for an administration that’s all about openness and candor and honesty, she may be a real asset.

Gergen: Betty Ford turned out to be an enormous asset, a huge political asset. And I think the President came to appreciate it. She was always an asset in his life, I do think he saw that. She was home, she was anchor, she was protection, she
I saw that. I will remember to this day that when Richard Nixon resigned, we were down at the helicopter and he had that famous wave and the helicopter went off and then we sort of went back to reality. The President and Mrs. Ford were walking together back toward the White House and he reached out for her hand to walk back. And I really thought, she’s important to him.

Smith: Do you know what he said to her as they walked back in?

Gergen: No.

Smith: He just whispered in her ear, “We can do it.”

Gergen: That’s nice. That’s very nice. And so I always felt that, but I think he felt she was a bit of a loose cannon publicly.

Smith: But it turned out, that’s what people…

Gergen: That’s what they liked.

Smith: Authenticity.

Gergen: Right, there you go. And I think she opened the place up a little bit, especially after all the bitterness and all the anger, the incriminations of the Nixon years. I think she was very fresh.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Gergen: I buy into the notion that Jerry Ford was first and foremost, in terms of his national contribution, he did begin to heal the wounds. And we were extraordinarily fortunate to have a man of his integrity come in at the moment he did. This whole notion from Bismarck that God looks after fools and drunkards and the United States of America, I really thought that there was something almost Providential about Ford coming into office.

Smith: Is the other side of that coin that, in effect, by January of 1977, he had performed his historical mission?
Gergen: Yes. I thought he had – whatever he went on to do as president would have been more conventional and this was special – this period of needing to get to across the valley. And it was not just Watergate, it was also Vietnam. We had just come through seven or eight years where confidence in government and confidence in the public officials had plunged. The highpoint of public confidence in the presidency and government was in ’66 and ’67 and a decade later or so when Ford came in, it was almost demolished. And so he really did begin the rebuilding process. Didn’t complete it. Actually, Reagan did a lot more later on. But I also felt that Ford was one of the last “good guys” to run the country.

Smith: David Broder said, “He was the least neurotic president.”

Gergen: Yeah, and there is something for the normal Midwestern guy who shows you can do it. Mr. Deeds Goes to Washington.

Smith: I’ve often wondered, if there had been a full term, whether there might not be a kind of Trumanesque aura around Ford.

Gergen: Possibly. If he had a big comeback, what are you going to do? You sort of had a Clark Clifford type – overcome the odds and won. He wasn’t as feisty as Truman, nor was he…it would have been hard to govern. He’d lost so many seats in ’74. It would have been very hard to govern. Some things might have gone differently, I’m not sure we’d have seen the Iranian revolution turn out quite the way it did. There are others things would have gone differently. But I think for the period he had, the shortest presidency in the 20th century, it was an enormous contribution, and I think we should be grateful to him. But, again, go back to – I think people are so tired today of the manufactured, the gauzy, the invented, the inauthentic – to have somebody who could do that office pretty darn well and hold the country together, and be so normal and be so likeable. That’s a good thing.

Smith: Do you think the kids helped in that sense?
Gergen: Yeah, I think the family helped a lot. Betty first and foremost, but the kids – it was sort of an all-American family and you wanted them to succeed. They weren’t pretentious. They were thrust into it. Every president since Kennedy forward, other than Ford, has been thrusting for that office – has reached for that office. It was very different, as you know. Used to be – say an Eisenhower – you almost got drafted for it, basically got drafted. And Truman came in. But every person since has been sort of grasping for office.

Smith: Someone has described Ford as Eisenhower without the medals.

Gergen: I like that.

Smith: That same instinct for the middle of the road and the pragmatic, not ideological, approach.

Gergen: And I think what the country longs for now - I think we’ve had enough of the specialness – let’s just get somebody who is very sensible. And I don’t know whether we can find them or not.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Smith: For starters, how did your path first cross Gerald Ford’s?

Kennerly: The day that Nixon was going to make his announcement on his replacement for Agnew, who had resigned, it was going to be in the evening, East Room ceremony at the White House, and I was the Time Magazine photographer. I had been covering Agnew. In fact, I had some really good pictures of him. I was dogging him around the country for Time Magazine.

Smith: What was he like to work with?

Kennerly: Who – Spiro Agnew? Well, actually, my first memory of Agnew was quite a good one. I think he was as shocked as anybody that he was picked to be the running mate. Unfortunately for him, if he had just stayed as governor of Maryland, he probably never would have had to resign in disgrace. But I was a UPI photographer here in Los Angeles in 1968, and Dick Halstead was UPI’s chief photographer, so he came out with Nixon, who after the Miami convention, came out to California to Mission Bay to formulate his campaign strategy and all that. I was sent down here as a UPI photographer in LA to help Dick out, and one of the things that I did was to cover Agnew. Back then nobody cared about the vice presidential running mate.

It was a Sunday morning and Halstead said, “Go cover Agnew going to church.” I went over to where he was staying. He had some Secret Service protection – it wasn’t that heavy. I was standing there. There was no press vehicle or anything and Agnew saw me and said, “Hi, how you doing?” and introduced himself. He said, “What’s wrong?” And I said, “Well, sir, I’m supposed to go cover you, take pictures of you going to church and there’s no accommodations [meaning a press car in the motorcade]. Just you and the Secret Service.” He said, “That’s okay, you can just get in the Secret Service car.” And those guys flipped out. But that’s what happened; I rode with them over to the church. He was very nice, very approachable. He had some kids that were probably about my age, so that was about it. I came back to Washington and he really wasn’t a big figure back then. Anyway, he resigned.

I have a classic photo of him in the back of his limo the day after he resigned that ran in Time. But then, of course, the speculation immediately leaped forward to who was going to be his replacement. John Connally was on the list, I don’t know who all; you probably know – Howard Baker, whomever. I chose the Gerald Ford straw. We were going around trying to get pictures of all these people. I went up to the Hill on, I think it was Friday morning, and Paul Miltich was his press secretary in the House and had been forever. I called Paul Miltich and said, “I’m from Time Magazine.” He said, “Oh sure, come on up. How about eleven o’clock?” It was so easy. So I go up and I meet Ford for the first time. I think I had photographed him a couple of time during the Ev and Jerry Show [Sen. Everett Dirksen, Minority Leader GRF], which was at White House press briefings.

But I didn’t know Minority Leader Ford at all so I went into his office. He was just terrific, and I said, “I’m here for Time Magazine. You’re on the list.” He said, “Well, you’re wasting your time.” And I said, “Well, but you’ll have a nice picture for your wall.” So I took some photos of him in his office in the Capitol and one of the photos that I took, I had him by the window and there was kind of nice light coming in, I call it Rembrandt lighting. But I spent about ten or fifteen minutes and then left. Then that afternoon…

Smith: Let me stop – he did not seem to you like a man who was waiting by the phone?

Kennerly: Gerald Ford did not seem like a guy who was waiting by the phone for this call. Now, I can’t remember when he got the call; I honestly don’t know. But I will tell you another story a little bit later about when he became president. No, he was so relaxed. Do you happen to know when he got the call? Do you remember?

Smith: Well, that’s not clear because, of course, there was the call at home which was…
Kennerly: …the event was that night, though. So he must have gotten the call the night before then, I think. Actually, it’s a question worth answering, but I can’t answer it.

But no matter what, he was really relaxed and he said, “You’re wasting your time,” – very good natured. I thought, wow, this is easy. If everybody’s like him, my life would be terrific. So that night there he was in the East Room. I wasn’t there. Dick was there, Dick Halstead. But the photograph I took of him was the Time cover picture. And it was his first Time cover and my first Time cover, and John Durniak was the director of photography at Time – this is back when magazines had money – assigned me to cover Ford full-time. And that’s unheard of. Nobody had ever covered a vice president – there was the resignation…

Smith: Was it the assumption that…

Kennerly: Well, but that was an early assumption [that he would become president]. There was an early assumption on the part of some people – it wasn’t rampant speculation because that was October of ’73.

Smith: October.

Kennerly: October of ’73. And Watergate was mounting, but it wasn’t at a critical stage. But anyway, Durniak said, “I really want you to cover him.” And I and about seven or eight or nine others, Phil Jones from CBS, Maggie Hunter from the New York Times, I think Ann Compton, to some degree, for ABC and there was another ABC person. No photographers.

Smith: Tom DeFrank.

Kennerly: Tom DeFrank of Newsweek, and Time, on and off, David Beckwith, of Time. So that became the sort of merry little band; we were traveling around with Ford. He was so easy to be around. So I got to know him and I got to know the family. They went to Vail in December of that year and I went to Vail. I mean, basically, Time Magazine was paying for me to learn how to ski.

Smith: What were they like in Vail?
Kennerly: In Vail the whole family was there. It was something they did every year, and it was really informal.

Smith: Now, did they have a condo at that point?

Kennerly: The Fords had a condo in Vail, right in the middle. It was at the hotel, like the Vail Hotel or something. It was right in the middle of the village. And it was like a two or three bedroom condo. It wasn’t particularly ritzy.

Smith: So it was kind of crowded with the whole family.

Kennerly: It was crowded. In fact, I actually stayed with the Fords the first night I got out there when they arrived in Vail. I think the Secret Service didn’t like me much back then. But there was a tradition. The whole family got together; they were all good skiers, including then Vice President Ford. But at the end of that particular trip, we went to an Asian restaurant, I think it was a Chinese restaurant – it must have been – because at the end they brought out these fortune cookies and passed them around. There were about fourteen people there, and Vice President Ford cracked open his cookie and read it and slammed it down on the table. He looked kind of shaken, so I said, “So what did it say?” And he said, “Aw, nothing.” I pried it out from under his hand and it said, “You will undergo a change of residence in the near future.” And I looked at him, and he said, “No, no, I hope not.” He was so worried that people were going to think that he was trying to force Nixon out, even then.

Smith: That brings up a large question, because we’ve been told by a number of people he really did not enjoy the vice presidency, in part because he was forced to walk this extraordinary tightrope. But also, he didn’t like the job.

Kennerly: He loved being a legislator. I don’t think he liked the job because it had no particular power; he wasn’t close to Nixon. I think there are a lot of reasons for it. Under the circumstances, the minute he went into the job, speculation basically was that he would be taking over the job from Nixon. He was almost an anti-Machiavellian type of person. He was not someone who was orchestrating and pulling the strings. Now if Nelson Rockefeller or somebody else had had that job, Nixon would have been looking over his shoulder the whole time. Nixon would have started out at the end of the plank, as opposed to just slowing walking it.

Smith: We have been told by a number of people on the staff, however, that the Nixon staff were not particularly warm toward the Ford staff – the vice presidential staff.

Kennerly: The Nixon staff basically hated the vice president’s staff because they were so totally different. Bob Hartmann came with him. He was his chief of staff as the VP. [He] was this gruff old newspaper guy and had a lot of enemies. I always found him to be an interesting character because he was kind of the last of the good old days type – double-fisted drinking…

Smith: Straight out of The Front Page.

Kennerly: Oh, yeah. He was a character. My background was really that, too, in a way. I don’t know if Jack Marsh was working for him at that time. Probably not.

Smith: Let me ask you, because in his book, Tom DeFrank makes a great deal out of a verbal slip.

Kennerly: Which was?

Smith: As he presents it, I want to do justice to it. There is something about the…

Kennerly: About the tie?

Smith: Yeah, something that Ford makes some reference to – I think it was an appointment or something of someone – but something about how when I’m there, or something like that. And as Tom describes the scene, there’s this kind of intake of breath and realization that I’m somewhere I don’t want to be, and he swears Tom to secrecy and – what I’m trying to get at – was that particular story the larger, in some ways, tougher conundrum that he was in? Clearly as things went downhill for Nixon, there had to be people thinking whatever the odds are, we’ve got to prepare this guy to be president. And yet, he couldn’t give the slightest indication, publicly, or apparently privately, that he was even entertaining that possibility. How virginal was he throughout this period?
Kennerly: Well, I spent a great deal of time with him, usually on the road. That was mainly where I’d be covering him, and he was almost pathological about not talking or hinting at or suggesting that he might take over the presidency. To him it would have been the ultimate act of disloyalty, more than anything. And I think that if you looked at his generation – Nixon was in the Navy – people forget these kinds of attachments for World War II. I’m a post-World War II kid, but I know a lot of people, obviously, most of them gone now, who were there, and there’s a sense of loyalty. They were in Congress together. I think he liked the Nixons. He found him to be kind of a remote guy, to a degree, but they seemed to get along fine. Nixon chose him in part because he knew he could get confirmed. He’d probably wanted John Connally, according to everything I’ve heard, because Connally was really more like him. Which is, why would you want that guy there? I don’t know.

Smith: It is also why he was non-confirmable.

Kennerly: He was un-confirmable, that was the main reason. Ford was the guy that got along with everybody, and so he picked Ford. Let’s go forward from where we are, because I think his vice presidency was really not about much of anything other than waiting around.

Smith: Walking the tightrope.

Kennerly: He was walking the tightrope, which he probably hated.

Smith: In the end, doesn’t it come down to a contest, in effect, between loyalty and maintaining one’s integrity?

Kennerly: I think at the end he had both. I think he was loyal to a fault, but he was a man of great integrity. I think to him there was no black and white. There were real grey areas about that. It’s just the way he thought: this is the way you do things; I didn’t want to let anybody think I was going after his job. I don’t know one person who would ever say that – who would ever contradict that. The fault part of it was not just calling a few advisors in, probably, and saying, “Look, I don’t want the job. I don’t expect to get the job, but I’ve got to be totally up to speed.” I don’t know how much Nixon helped him out, which is a good question. Like: did Ford get all the briefings; was he in on all the big meetings, all that kind of stuff that the modern vice president is just there as the right hand?

Smith: Again, to go back to the book.

Kennerly: DeFrank’s book.

Smith: Yeah, DeFrank’s book.

Kennerly: The book that is filled with faltering recollections of President Ford toward the end of his life.

Smith: Do you want to offer an opinion? Did President Ford know what he was doing?

Kennerly: About what?

Smith: Did President Ford bequest a posthumous legacy in a sense, knowing that Tom, or anyone else that he was talking to – was there an element of naïveté in his conversations with these people, or did he know exactly what they were likely to do in terms of exploiting those conversations?

Kennerly: That’s a good question. I think it all goes to: what did he say and when did he say it? And I think, as he got older, I noticed from conversations I had with him where his recollections were not exactly acute – I mean, he didn’t have Alzheimer’s, I don’t think, but he was getting really old - and so there were faulty memory scenarios there. I never looked at him as a naïve person, I always thought he was very politic and I thought he was always very smart, and I knew there were certain people that he really didn’t care for, but he would not overtly say something. The worst thing he would say would be – like about Jim Schlesinger - “I really didn’t like that guy.” That’s what he said. For him, that was like a stunning admission and it’s almost like he would say, “Now you can’t repeat that.” But he was always very candid with me, and one of the things I loved about him, there were many things I loved about him, really.

When I think about the age I am right now, it’s the age he became president. I’m 62 – I think he was either 61 or 62 years old. I always looked at him as a much older guy, because I was 27 - like my dad, he was older than my dad. I think he wasn’t naïve. He knew what he was doing. Sometimes I think the good natured side of him probably took him off track a little bit.

But when it came time to talk about Reagan, for instance, after the fact, we got some good stuff under extraordinary circumstances. You should get all those transcripts. I hope you can get them. And Cheney did an hour and a half interview with us. So if you could put those together…NBC has those. You should talk to Brokaw about it.

Let me just go back first. Let’s get him to the presidency. A week to the day, the night of August 2nd, I had a long scheduled dinner on the books with the Fords at the Old Angler’s Inn outside of Washington, which is a good thirty-five, forty minute drive. And considering what happened, it probably was one of those deals that seemed like a good idea at the time, but he couldn’t cancel it. So I drove with them in the car from Washington out to the Old Angler’s Inn, it was just the three of us; Mrs. Ford and I. This is the day…

Smith: …this is the day after he had been told by Al Haig about the smoking gun.

Kennerly: That’s right. The night before, apparently.

Smith: August 1st was the day he was told.

Kennerly: Then it was the next night. It was Thursday – now I remember, because August 9th is the day he became president. It was the 2nd of August, we were in the car and we were talking about all sorts of things. I don’t remember specifics. The things I tend to remember from the good old days are really important things that people said, because I hear a lot of bullshit, day in and day out, as we all do. If he would have said, “You know, I hate to say this, but I think I’m going to become president,” if there had been anything like that – but I think if Gerald R. Ford had decided to become a professional poker player, he would have been a billionaire, because the guy knew how to play his cards. He held them so close, including from his family and the closest advisers.
Smith: There are those that have said to us and they can’t prove it, obviously, but they say you’d be surprised about how much he took to the grave with him.

Kennerly: Maybe. One thing he didn’t take to the grave with him I don’t believe, was a deal on a pardon. I don’t believe that.

Smith: That’s a good point, a point worth making.

Kennerly: But at any rate – we had dinner. Roy Rowan was there. Roy wrote that book on the Mayaguez – remember? The Four Days of Mayaguez. Roy and I had been in Asia together for Time. He was the Time bureau chief. He’d been in China. He wrote a wonderful book about the revolution of 1949. He was covering that and he was living in Shanghai other when I was with Time in Hong Kong. We were having a dinner party. It was him and David Burnett, and some of my pals, people Vice President Ford liked. He knew every photographer in town by their first name because it was a small group covering the Hill. Wally McNamee of Newsweek, George Tames of the New York Times, on and on. So we had this group of ten-twelve people. It was really in honor of Roy Rowan, who had just survived cancer. The Fords stayed until it was getting later, [then] he said, “Well, I’ve got to go.” But they stayed for the dinner and the drinks and afterward and then took off. And, of course, it wasn’t a week later on August 8th when Nixon announces it – the first we know about it. And I was there.

So flash forward through that hectic week – and I think there was a trip in there somewhere and I can’t remember – where he went down to Mississippi or someplace – I can’t remember. It’s all part of the record. But obviously it’s just a matter of time; it’s like a deathwatch for Nixon at that point. And I’m inside the chicken coop, and all these other photos are dead ducks because they hadn’t been covering him. I was like as close as you could get at that point, in proximity with the family - with the Fords. So the night on August 8th, when Nixon was going to give that speech. [I was at their Alexandra residence.]

Then Vice President Ford comes out on his lawn in Alexandria, in front of 914 Crown View Drive, and talks all about Henry Kissinger. It was like, at that point, Nixon was going to resign, it was going to happen the next day, and so I was there to watch Nixon lift off and wave goodbye from the helicopter. The Fords standing next to David and Julie Eisenhower and…

Smith: In that last week, building up to the actual transfer, were you around Mrs. Ford?

Kennerly: I spent a lot of time with Mrs. Ford.

Smith: Did she talk about what was happening? Or what it might all lead to?

Kennerly: I don’t ever recall her saying anything about it. I don’t know – I probably should remember that, but I don’t. He had that old joke, that initially when Nixon had called, can you call back on the other line? …blah blah blah. Which is what you were talking about, I think. It would have had to have been the night before because the next day is when he was announced as the VP, by Nixon.

Smith: It was that night. Believe it or not, it’s hard to believe, but it was that night. They were told to be at the East Room in two hours.

Kennerly: Well, then he didn’t know. [when I photographed him in his office earlier that same day.]

Smith: The call that came back…

Kennerly: Then he didn’t know that morning – then guess what? – of course, he wasn’t anxious about it because he hadn’t been asked, if that’s true. When I was in the office with him, he did not give – he could be a great poker player – but Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford did not give any indications that this was going to be a happening thing. He also is not a guy to lie about stuff, or even misdirect. He may have done that on the pardon a little bit, because he got caught short on that one.

But, anyway, he gives the talk on his lawn, reassuring the world and the foreign leaders that Henry Kissinger is there and everything is fine. And the next day Nixon leaves; I’m in the East Room when he was sworn in; and at that point, I was in flux. I had thought about – he had not even remotely hinted that he might want me to work for him, which very much goes in line. I’m sure Hartmann and he must have talked about it.

Smith: Would Hartmann be the one person to whom he could, during that whole period, kind of unload?

Kennerly: I think so. I think Hartmann was the single most important person to him. It later became…

Smith: Does that explain the loyalty later on, when Hartmann becomes, in many ways, not only a lightning rod, but a liability?

Kennerly: Yes. Hartmann and he were really tight. He was always like, “Oh, Bob did this…or Bob did that.” It was almost like having a Billy Carter brother scenario. And Mrs. Ford and Hartmann just were like this….Mrs. Ford would never let him come up to the second floor of the White House.

Smith: Really?

Kennerly: Oh, yeah. Occasionally, at the end of the day, I was always the one going home and having drinks with the President and Mrs. Ford; sitting up on the couch talking about something. I mean, Dick Cheney talked about that one time. We were at Ken Adelman’s house for dinner with Cheney – this was before Dick was a VP. Adelman always liked to stir up stuff, so he said, “Well, Dick, how did you let Kennerly get away with all that stuff?” He said, “Are you kidding? You’ve got to understand, David Kennerly was the last person to see the President every day. He’d go up and have drinks with him at the President’s request – almost every night.” He said, “Kennerly wasn’t worried about me. I was worried about Kennerly.” But I never had an axe to grind. The only axe I ground was with Hartmann. I felt that he was doing the President a disservice and I wrote him a memo about him - and I rarely wrote memos.

Smith: Explain to me – one way of looking at the Ford presidency, the trajectory of someone who spent twenty-five years on the Hill, who has to learn to be president.

Kennerly: Well, it’s like the no more Mr. Nice Guy, which he was, essentially.
Smith: And part of that: here is a guy who is so loyal to Hartmann that he’s got, in effect, two separate speech operations going, and he’s perfectly willing to tolerate that. He may complain about it – but even with the State of the Union Address. Clearly, his presidency is suffering because this guy’s ego is getting in the way of a smoothly functioning professional speechwriting operation.

Kennerly: I wrote a memo to President Ford – and I’m not a memo writer. I was the last photographer – I didn’t like putting anything on the record. I did it two or three times during that whole period. I’m not a bureaucrat, obviously. I was twenty-seven years old for Christ’s sake. I came in there pretty much fresh out of Vietnam – two and a half years of Vietnam, and came back to the States and that was mid-’73 and Watergate and all this shit is hitting the fan over that. And so then, to kind of skip ahead, I got from one big-time battle into another one, was what it boiled down to. I’m not a bureaucratic person, it’s just not me. But I was very loyal to President Ford, he was somebody that I loved, trusted, admired – I don’t know how else to put it. I mean, he just let me be myself and take the pictures without any micromanagement.

I’ll tell you the story about how I got the job, but just to keep you on this track – on the Hartmann thing, I was so concerned because I had to go listen to every one of those Goddamned speeches. Photographers have a very low tolerance for this kind of thing, particularly when you hear it over and over and over again. We’re always joking about stuff and making fun of people – it’s just the way it goes - and it’s not even malicious. But you would hear President Ford go on and give one of those “give them their money’s worth” speeches of 45 minutes to an hour long as a congressman, because he had kind of an old-fashioned idea of what the people really wanted to hear. He was essentially – he had not moved the speechwriting apparatus from a congressman from Grand Rapids into the President of the United States mode. And so in a lot of the ideas and everything – basically, I got into it.

Smith: Was that hard for Hartmann, to make that transition?

Kennerly: I don’t know. We never really talked that much after we got in there, because he just couldn’t stand me now. At that point. I was a young guy, I had no real responsibility outside of taking pictures; plus I was me. I’m a little more subdued now, but not much. But what I did see was that the speechwriting operation was really damaging the President. I wrote a memo of how he should get rid of Hartmann. And not only did I write it, there was one copy of it. That’s it, I never made a carbon of it. I took it in and I talked to Mrs. Ford about it, and she thought I should talk to him. And I just said – I almost pleaded with him – to do something – not even fire the guy, but just like do something to get somebody running that show that wasn’t going to kill him. He was a matter of ridicule at that point. It was a matter of ridicule – people talking about – he was not a good speaker anyway particularly. And you combine a guy who is not a great speaker with bad material and you’re really screwed, essentially.

So I sat down and I made him read it. It was at one of my cocktails after work scenarios. I pulled it out and I gave it to him. Mrs. Ford was sitting here, he was sitting there, and I was sitting on the couch. I said, “You’ve got to read this. It’s a very difficult thing that I’m doing here, but I want to tell you what I think. And I can only do it properly, and I wrote it myself and there it is.” And he read it, and he put it in his pocket and he said, “Well, thank you for saying that. I really appreciate your honesty and your directness.” That was it. And nothing really happened.

Smith: Is there such thing as misplaced loyalty?

Kennerly: Sure. Of course.

Smith: And is that a Capitol Hill hangover?

Kennerly: I think it’s a human hangover. He was not the only person to do that. A lot of people did it.

Smith: To be a successful president, you need to have a certain element of ruthlessness. And I don’t think of him as having that gene.

Kennerly: I’m not disagreeing with that. Well, he could have fired me for all the shit I was doing, too. I mean, dating famous women, and getting my name in the paper – except he got a kick out of it, fortunately for me.
Smith: Did he get more of a kick out of vicariously living your glamorous existence than he did having his press secretary being on Saturday Night Live?

Kennerly: I’m sure, although he never said anything really bad about that. Everybody else was aghast that Nessen did that, but you have to understand that President Ford had three boys. Probably the closest in temperament to me would have been Jack Ford, who was more out there. For one thing, President Ford didn’t get married and have his first kid until he was like 36 or 37 years old, which is what I did, also. President Ford, in the good old days, was a bachelor, had a lot of good looking girlfriends. He loved women. He was a model at one point, a football player, lawyer, you name it. I mean, the guy was having a pretty good bachelor life as far as I knew, and liked women. He liked looking at them, and he knew that Mrs. Ford would kick his ass if he looked too long, but that is the way it went.

Smith: Including Vicki Carr.

Kennerly: Oh, I know, believe me. Candice Bergen, who I was dating, I took her to a ball for Ali Bhutto– we went to a State Dinner for Ali Bhutto, and we left early. The next morning – I’m always in there early – the buzzer rings and it’s the President, “Come up here.” He said, “Where did you go last night?” I said, “Ah, well, we got tired.” He said, “I wanted to dance with Candice. Edgar Bergen is my old friend.” I said, “You didn’t want to dance with her because of Edgar Bergen, don’t give me that.” But it was funny. He was great. It was so fun to be around him.

Smith: Why did that never get through to the public – the warmth, the humor, the qualities that you saw?

Kennerly: Oh, I think it’s just the way it goes.

Smith: He was the least self-dramatizing of political figures.

Kennerly: But he wasn’t a quipper like John F. Kennedy. I don’t know where Nixon’s sense of humor was. Just didn’t have that ready retort. Don Penny, obviously, came in and helped out with some of the humor stuff. That was my engineering to get him in there.
But just to go back to the night he became president. [August 9, ‘74] He had a small group of people over to their house on Crown View Drive, and I was one of them that he had invited. There was like Phil Buchen and the Parmas. There weren’t many people, it was not a celebration so much as it was a very quiet acceptance of the fact that he was now the president. One of the things that was in, Extraordinary Circumstances that came out of that interview – did I give you the transcript of the interview from 1995 that I did with him?

Smith: I don’t think so.

Kennerly: It’s quite a good interview. I did it in Rancho Mirage. Sitting there I’d go through photographs with him, which is how we did those other ones later. But one of the little gems in there, I thought, was when I showed him the photo of them looking and waving goodbye to Nixon. I said, “What were you thinking there? That was such a big moment. He’s lifting off and you’re going to become president.” He said, “Well, to be honest with you, I couldn’t wait to turn around and walk in there, get sworn in and start my new job.” He said, “I really felt there were so many things that needed to be done.” I’m paraphrasing – but that’s it essentially.

I was always surprised by that. I never heard him say that and I don’t think he really thought about it so much until he saw the photo about – there I am; there goes Nixon; I’ve got to go in, get to work.

Smith: Do you have a sense that the relationship with Nixon was never the same? Especially after the pardon.

Kennerly: Of course not. Of course it wouldn’t be the same.

Smith: There is a sense that, and I think he did say publicly, or at least allowed himself to be overheard saying that Nixon never said thank you. Which would be the tip of the iceberg.

Kennerly: Well, I do know that the night that Nixon announced he was going back to China, which was on the eve of the election…

Smith: New Hampshire primary.
Kennerly: The New Hampshire primary – I was upstairs with him again, having dinner, and I was really pissed off about that. Because I thought that’s the biggest “* you” I’ve ever seen in my life. That’s precisely what I thought. I was railing and going on and on upstairs with just the three of us. And I came down and I railed to Nessen and Jerry Jones afterwards, I’d had a couple of drinks. But President Ford was not disagreeing with my assessment. He never would have put it the way I did it. But I thought that was going to kill him, politically.

Smith: We talked to Stu Spencer about this, and he basically agreed with you. He said, “Nixon knew exactly what he was doing.”

Kennerly: It was such a hideous thing to do. “Thank You - it’s * You.” I mean, forget being thanked. I’ve never seen anything like that. It just was like trying to put it off on old Jerry for his own misdeeds or something. I don’t know, I never really knew the guy. The night of August 9th I was at the house. I took some pictures and President Ford – now President Ford for 20 minutes [a joke – it was more like 9 hours...] asked me to stay afterwards. He said after everybody leaves, I want you to stay, I want to talk to you. Considering all the people on the face of the earth that the new President of the United States would be talking to, but there was something about him and we had such a great relationship – I made him laugh, he always would like roll his eyes at the stuff I was doing. So we sat on the couch in this living room and you have to understand, I’m still a kid from Roseburg, Oregon. I mean, I’ve never been around great wealth. I come from a very lower middle class family, and here I am sitting with the President of the United States. I know the guy really well, and I’m saying, “Mr. President,” and I keep thinking “I’m having this conversation.” He wanted to talk about the White House photographer’s job. I had thought about it and I had figured he would probably offer it to me. There were other people who wanted it, like George Tames desperately wanted it, the New York Times guy. He figured he’d probably earned it; having been around all that time. But he said, “How do you look at this job? How do you see the job of White House photographer?” I said, “Well, I’ll be really honest with you, the way Ollie Adkins was treated was so horrible. He never was in the Oval Office for very long and everybody was telling him what to do. He worked for Ziegler and Haldeman and Erlichman. The secretary could tell him not to go into the Oval Office. It was really pathetic.”

And I said, “I’ve got a really good job. I won a Pulitzer Prize in Vietnam. I love traveling around the world and doing my thing.” And I said, “I would be interested in working for you under two conditions. One is I work directly for you, and number two, I have total access.” He’s like puffing on his pipe, and he said, “You don’t want Air Force One on the weekends?”

Smith: He had a sense of humor.

Kennerly: He did have a sense of humor. That was funny. It’s like how brassy can you get? The guy is President of the United States. But I said, “Look, I can’t do it otherwise, I can’t.”

Smith: On the other hand, you’re leveling with him, which he would have respected.

Kennerly: Oh, totally. But there was another thing that happened that night. He said, “Well, I’m not offering the job right this second,” because he was a friend of Ollie’s. He said, “I want to talk to Al Haig about this.” And he looked at his watch, and he said, “Oh, let’s go watch the TV, I want to watch the swearing in.” And so we went into the study. This house is no bigger than this room, in square footage. And turned on the TV and the TV didn’t work. And he goes, “Betty, this TV’s not working.” Then one more TV was up in their bedroom, and so it was that I, Mrs. Ford, Susan Ford, and the President, watched the local news swearing in of Gerald R. Ford. I said, “Well, I’ve got to go.” But he rose up and took my hand in both of his and he said, “If you came to work for me, wouldn’t that be a problem with your colleagues after everything that’s happened with Nixon?” I said, “You know, those guys all like you,” all those other photographers, “and I think they would be happy to have one of their own in the White House.” And that’s how we left it.

The next day I’m over at Time Magazine and I get a page on the intercom and it’s a very frantic sounding telephone operator. I call in and she says, “David, President Ford is trying to get hold of you!” I said, “Well, tell him to call back,” and she said, “He’s on the phone!” He was on hold. He had picked up the phone and called over there and he said, “So how would you like to come to work for me?” I said, “I’d love to.” The Time office was across from the White House, it was in the Motion Picture Association building next to the Hay-Adams Hotel at the Time office. He said, “Well, that’s good. Well, you’d better get over here right now, you’ve already wasted half a day of the taxpayers’ money.”

And that’s how I went into the White House. I will say that there were two occasions where he asked me not to shoot something. He asked me if I wouldn’t mind not going in, and they were both occasions – one of them was Earle Butz getting fired, and another was the chairman, George Brown of the Joint Chiefs getting chewed out for some statement he’d made about the Jews running the newspaper business or something. In this day and age, that guy would be gone, he wasn’t then. But they were so intensely personal, and I said, “I don’t want to be in the room for that.” But that was it. I was in every top secret meeting, in everything.

Smith: Based on that intimate, ongoing, unique relationship, tell us a couple things that would surprise people about Gerald Ford.

Kennerly: The question would actually be better put the other way: like, from his generation there was a lot of racism. Just the way people grew up in America. And I think that one of the things that probably wouldn’t surprise people, but they wouldn’t know, was how absolutely colorblind he was as a man. As a person who grew up in the Middle West in a white area, I never heard him say or demean any person on the basis of race or religion. That alone is an example of a good person, it is foundational to me.

Smith: Is that the Eagle Scout?

Kennerly: Eagle Scout.

Smith: And his upbringing?

Kennerly: Probably. I think that’s how we all learn. I was in Boy Scouts. I come from southern Oregon where black people were just a rumor. I’d never seen a black person except maybe on TV later on. But I had no knowledge that anybody existed that weren’t all white. I grew up in an area where they had Impeach Earl Warren billboards along the highway, which I had no idea what that meant. What year would that have been?

Smith: Oh, late ‘50s, early ‘60s.

Benton Becker told us a wonderful story.

Kennerly: He’s another person that has memory adjustments.

Smith: I know what you’re saying, but filtering for factuality.

Kennerly: Filtering is lawyeristic.

Smith: Earl Warren died while Ford was vice president.

Kennerly: Right. I was at the funeral. I shot it, actually.

Smith: And Benton said, “You know, Mr. Vice President, I think it would be a really nice gesture if you went up to the Supreme Court to pay your respects.” And Ford thought for a minute and said, “Well, the White House wouldn’t probably be very happy about that.” He said, “Let me think about it.” In the course of the day Becker discovered without ever being told, that in fact, Ford had, on his own had gone up to the Court to pay his respects. And sure enough, apparently the next time he saw Nixon, Nixon said something derogatory. But it’s a revealing, very small, but revealing about the relationship and the decency.

Kennerly: Like I say, that’s not a surprising thing, except I think it’s worth talking about to a degree. When you hear those Nixon tapes about all the shit he was saying about different people – across the board. He was so not like that – he was just the opposite of that. Even to the degree of being prudish. If I had an off-color joke I would never tell him; I’d always tell Mrs. Ford because she would think it was funny. He would look at me kind of quizzically. So – okay, we’re not going to do that anymore.

Smith: We’ve heard from a number of people that she likes a good raunchy story. And she and the girls would tell stories and he would come in, hearing them roaring with laughter, and they would tell the story and it would go right over his head.

Kennerly: Exactly. That’s true. I totally agree that’s true.

Smith: But we were also told that he was genuinely – I don’t know if you’d call it naïve. He said, and I have absolutely no reason to question his sincerity, that he was shocked that Nixon lied to him. And by the same token, I think he was shocked by the language that he heard on those tapes.

Kennerly: Oh, for sure. Because he didn’t think like that, or speak like that. Terry O’Donnell and I probably spent the most time with him, those long trips in the car together. The dynamic back then was on a presidential trip, you had the limousine, the Secret Service follow up car and then the chief of staff’s car. It was the chief of staff, me, the driver, personal aide, and either the doctor or the military. That was it. That was part of the package if some bad stuff happened, that’s the primary thing. So Dick Cheney, Donald Rumsfeld, Terry O’Donnell and the various rotating military aides were around all the time. But the people in the room, I was always the other person in the room. Nobody was in there as much as I was because I went to economics, national security, whatever staff meetings. Generally the chief of staff or deputies, so it was either Cheney or Rumsfeld, but I was always the other person in the room. And so, I observed him more closely than anybody possibly could have.

Plus, as a professional person, I’m taking his photo, but not just taking pictures, I’m in there trying to get the essence of the people and the drama, the moment and all that stuff. And the worst thing he would ever say was, “God dammit!” if he said that, he was truly angry, really pissed. I would be like, whoa! One of the best ones was O’Donnell, Cheney and I – I don’t know if Dick told this story – but we were at the Republican National Convention in Kansas City, and there had been this Reagan demonstration going on and on. And I think it was Jim Rhodes, I think was the chairman. Who was the congressman – not Jim Rhodes?

Smith: Jim Rhodes from Arizona who would have been the Minority Leader.
Kennerly: Right. He was the guy with the gavel, and the prime time slips by with all these Reagan people chanting – the heart and soul people who really wanted Ronald Reagan there. And it was by a razor thin margin that Ford beat him. President Ford had taken so much time working on his speech – this is what Don Penny did for him – they got a good speech. The President practiced it. He said, “Oh, I don’t need to practice that.” “No, no, no. You do.” And they made him do it. So he was locked, loaded, ready to rock and roll on this speech. He had a nice tie and a new suit from Britches in Georgetown, compliments of Mrs. Ford and I - getting him to take those plaid suits out – assassinate them. And so he was ready.

I’ve never seen him so mad. It was like Cheney and I and O’Donnell were sitting there, and he goes into his bedroom and the time has gone by now – a half hour even, before he’s even getting over to the arena for when he’s supposed to speak in the prime time moment. So he goes into the bedroom and he slams the door. The door opens up again and he comes back out and it’s like one of these Cary Grant moments where Cary Grant is really pissed off. And he says, “Call over there and you tell that Goddamn Rhodes to get that meeting in order. We’re going over.” And we’re going like, “Whewwww, this guy is mad.”

Smith: How much of that was getting up for the…

Kennerly: Oh, no, no, no. He’s not an actor. He was not an actor. And I watched Ronald Reagan getting ready to go up and give a speech and he would almost like, as he’s being introduced, you could see this transformation. And so, as you husband your resources, tell you you’re on camera. I mean, Reagan was a genius at that. But President Ford wasn’t like that. He was just mad, and he knew that it was slipping away, and the time, and less people were going to see it, and he was so popular that his material is what he was going to be doing. Anyway, that was one example. It was pretty rare, though. It’s like if somebody you know doesn’t normally lose their temper, loses it, you notice it like a hundred times more. And that’s what happened.

Smith: Let me ask you – I suppose when we started this I was influenced by Rockefeller’s semi-paranoid…
Kennerly: When is that book coming out, by the way?

Smith: I’ve got a deadline of two years.

Kennerly: You told me that two years ago.

Smith: July, 2011. It’s a huge – I have 600 pages written.

Kennerly: No, no – it’s going to be so interesting. I can’t wait.

Smith: I want to talk to you about that, too. Let me tell you how my view has evolved, for whatever its worth.

Kennerly: Now, how are you going to deal with this material. It’s a lot of stuff. What will be the culmination?

Smith: What we’re doing here?

Kennerly: Yeah.

Smith: This will eventually wind up in the library. But it’s the Foundation’s property, and it will be available for online, it will be available for filmmakers, it will be available to new exhibits in the museum.

Kennerly: Well, it’s great because there are fortunately enough people around that can still talk about it.

Smith: It’s interesting, we’ve talked to a number of people – Ford, in effect, had to learn how to be a president. He had to learn how to be an executive.

Kennerly: And I can tell you, by the way – don’t let me forget to tell you the moment when I think he took it over.

Smith: Okay. But that Don Rumsfeld was actually invaluable in coaching, for lack of a better word, and in fact, Rumsfeld brought to that process that element of constructive ruthlessness, to which I referred earlier. For example, Rumsfeld said, and we have a number of other people confirm this, he strongly advised the President to clean house early. Not to let it go as long as it did. And the interesting thing is, of course, Rumsfeld has always been fingered, particularly by Rockefeller, and I think by Bush, as the architect of the massacre at the end of 1975. Whether or not that is the case, that’s a separate issue. But my sense is that Rumsfeld…

Kennerly: What difference does it make if it is the President’s decision, if he thought it was a good idea? That’s where you get advice. Anyway, continue.

Smith: But my sense is that Rumsfeld, first of all, served the President by making it clear that he would not come back to the White House given the spokes of the wheel. That that was unworkable, and a condition of his taking the job was getting rid of it.

Kennerly: That the President was the hub and…

Smith: And then all these people – which is very congressional.

Kennerly: I know.

Smith: I’d be interested in hearing your general take on the roles played by Rumsfeld and later by Cheney.

Kennerly: Yes, I think that is a really good question. And I think the good news is, for me – you see, Rumsfeld and Cheney are both incredibly smart people. And Rumsfeld, to me, has always had, like Robert Kennedy had, this reputation of being ruthless and all that. I do not see that. I think he’s tough, though, really tough. He was definitely tougher than President Ford in a lot of ways. Whether he coached him, I don’t know if that’s the right word for it, but if you go back into the time where Charlie Halleck was overthrown as the Leader, led by none other than young Congressman Donald Rumsfeld. I mean, that guy was like a Viet Cong sapper. You know, he’d come up under and blow the fence up, and Ford would walk through. And that’s what he did. And he did it, not in a bloody, nasty way, but it was just hardball politics.

I don’t know if it’s his Chicago upbringing, his wrestling background, grappling with not only issues, but people, and you have to come out on top there. There are very few ties in the wrestling business. Rumsfeld - and I watched it all the time - was the perfect chief of staff, even though he closed a lot of backdoors – I mean with Hartmann and the old buddies and all these people giving advice. It wasn’t that Ford wouldn’t talk to them, but there are only so many minutes in the day and I think Donald Rumsfeld helped hone the President in on what was important. But if you looked at the schedule, you could also say that Rumsfeld wasn’t doing his job because it was like tons of stuff on there. A lot of people would have said, “Oh, we don’t need to do that.” But Ford wanted to do it. And so it wasn’t Donald Rumsfeld like controlling him in any way, but he was helpful, and I think he did streamline it.

Dick Cheney was his disciple, and a totally different kind of personality. But Cheney learned – the chief of staff model that Rumsfeld used was to be very much in the background. You make sure all the information that should be getting in and needs to get in, gets in, in a fairly neutral way. And that goes for the NSC staff, everybody – Brett Scowcroft is also that way, by the way. He was surrounded by people who actually weren’t that political. I say that to people now about Cheney and Rumsfeld not being really political, and I truly mean it. Everybody has their point of view, they weren’t trying to push their point of view on the President of the United States. I was in too many meetings about that. One of the big ones was when George Walker Bush accused Rumsfeld of engineering him taking over the CIA job in order to get him out of the way.

Smith: At the same time, Rockefeller believed that he was part of getting rid of Nelson. It was all the same operation.

Kennerly: Well, Nelson’s liberal to moderate background is what got rid of Nelson. It’s the one thing that Ford probably told you he regretted more than anything. I think he hated himself for dumping Nelson Rockefeller. He liked Rockefeller, but he didn’t figure he could get out of the very conservative national convention alive, and I think he’s right. Reagan would have taken it. I don’t think there’s any question about it. That was a tough, hard, political move that he made. Rumsfeld is not the Machiavellian person that people make him out to be, from my point of view. But he’s tough.

Smith: You didn’t see Rumsfeld at that time as someone who was manipulating events to be on the ticket in ’76 himself?
Kennerly: If he had wanted to do that, why would he have become secretary of defense? And why would he have taken that job? Why not be at the right hand of the man, like George Bush looking at Dick Cheney when he was deciding on who was going to be his vice president, and said, “It was you all along.” That was weird. But Cheney was the same way. Cheney was an honest broker. By the way, they weren’t keeping out the old buddies and everything. There was time for them to come in. If somebody really needed to get through to him, they could. But they saved the President a lot of time with “You’re not in Congress anymore, Toto.” That was the reason.

Smith: Just from being around them, did you sense a change in the Ford/Rockefeller relationship after Rockefeller was, in effect, dumped?

Kennerly: I told you that I thought Nelson Rockefeller - I think I mentioned to you, the only letter I ever wrote to anybody over there was, I wrote a letter to Rockefeller after he had been dumped, expressing my admiration to him with the way he handled that… and I wrote a very heartfelt letter because I really liked the guy. I said, “It must have been terribly disappointing what happened. But the way you handled it was inspirational to me.” About how someone could deal with something of that magnitude of being - I’m paraphrasing – something that negative. And he goes out to the convention and stands there. He’s in the meeting with President Ford when Bob Dole came in. You know what? That was unbelievable to me, what Rockefeller did. And I’m sure he was…you have all the information about that, but publicly, he was damned good on that one. And not embarrassing the President, or being petulant about it, or whatever.

Smith: The fact is, he actually delivered the votes that provided the margin of victory over Reagan.

Kennerly: I think he was unbelievable. I saw it.

Smith: Did you get a response at all from your letter?

Kennerly: He sent me a nice note back, just thanking me. He thought it was a very nice thing. Plus I had the only picture of him flipping the bird signed. He didn’t want to sign it, but he did. He signed it “Rocky!” And Bob Dole is in the background of that picture, which makes it even funnier.

But I’ll tell you, this is a very good Rockefeller/President Ford story. The night of the State of the Union – so it would have been in ’75 – the last State of the Union before going into the election year and all that, a friend of mine - one person you should talk to is Jerry McGee, who is here in town, and he can tell the story himself because it is really a funny story. Don Penny and Jerry McGee, at that point had been helping out President Ford and all that and it was looking down to the election, so the President gave the State of the Union speech, so it was January, ’76.

They went back to the second floor of the White House, and the President was sitting on that couch with the window behind him, and other people are in there. Jerry McGee is sitting and by the chair is a little phone on a hook and the couch is against the window – President Ford is there. So the phone is ringing and the President says, “Go ahead, Jerry, answer.” So Jerry picks up the phone. This guy is an advertising person from New York and he’s extremely funny, but he’d never been in a situation like this. And he goes, “It’s the White House operator, sir. Henry Kissinger wants to talk to you.” “Oh, okay.” This phone had this really long cord on it, I have pictures of this in the archive, so the President says, “Yes, Henry. Thank you, Henry. Thank you so much, Henry.” He hands it back to McGee, he hangs it up.

The phone rings again and the President says, “Go ahead, answer it.” He says, “It’s the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.” He says, “Oh yes, Warren, thank you, Warren, I appreciate it.” He hands it back. The phone rings the third time and so McGee just answers it, “Hello, the President’s residence. It’s the Vice President.” “Oh, yeah. Let me take it.” So he takes the phone and the President saying, “Yes, Nelson, thank you Nelson. Oh I appreciate that, Nelson. Thank you very much.” And hands it back. McGee hangs up the phone and President Ford leans back, puts his feet up on the coffee table, folds his hands behind his head, and says, “It’s always good to hear from number two.” And then he said, “Don’t tell anybody I said that!”
It was so cute. I don’t know how else to put it. It was so funny. Here’s this guy, this multimillionaire, vice president, and here’s this guy from Grand Rapids – Gerald Ford’s not even his real name [it’s Leslie King]. I mean, Rockefeller is like an institution in America.

Smith: But it’s the tag line that’s intriguing. How cognizant was he? Did he live with this fact that anything that he said might at any time be repeated, in or out of context? Was that just a situational…?

Kennerly: No. I think it’s because he let himself be like a human being. Like any of us would say – here’s the rich kid on the block and he works for me – that’s what it was. And it was not malicious, it was funny. I’ll never forget it because it was his reaction after he said it. It was like “I can’t believe I just said that.” In the context of today’s world it’s so….

Smith: Let me ask you: his first press conference is on August 28th and I’ve always thought that it was the tipping point that led to the pardon. Because - you talk about naiveté - here’s someone who’s spent twenty-five years in Washington.

Kennerly: That was in the East Room?

Smith: Yeah. And he’s convinced himself that the press is going to want to talk about Cyprus and Greece and Turkey and inflation, all of those things that he’s trying to deal with.

Kennerly: Right, because he inherited that – right in the middle of that.

Smith: And of course, the press didn’t want to talk about that. They wanted to talk about Nixon.

Kennerly: Of course.

Smith: And the story is he was angry afterwards. Partly because the press wanted to talk about Nixon, partly because he didn’t handle it terribly well. I’ve often wondered if that was, in fact, the catalyst that brought about – maybe earlier than it might have otherwise – the decision which came just ten days later to pardon Nixon. Did you hear conversations in the Oval Office before the pardon?
Kennerly: Yes. Well, the one in particular was on September 5th. Benton Becker was in it. I photographed the meeting. Phil Buchen, Al Haig, Benton Becker – Becker is being dispatched to San Clemente to try to get something out of Nixon.

Smith: A statement of contrition, which presupposes that the machinery of a pardon was moving forward.

Kennerly: That was a very tight group, though, obviously. A lawyer – two lawyers, Al Haig, who was the chief of staff, and me, but that was a pretty small group.

Smith: But that presupposes a fundamental decisions had been made by that time?

Kennerly: I honestly don’t know. I know he must have talked to Hartmann about it, or maybe Mrs. Ford. I don’t know when that light bulb clicked on. I don’t know when the wheel started moving. Benton was involved in it. That was the first time I really remember that there was a discussion about it. I may have heard it before, but…

Smith: Were there people trying to – for political or other reasons – argue him out of an immediate…

Kennerly: I didn’t hear any of that. There could have been. I wasn’t at every single thing.

Smith: How would you characterize Haig’s role at that point?

Kennerly: Well, Al Haig, he was Nixon’s guy, obviously. He was chief of staff and I think he should get a lot of credit for keeping things kind of going down the middle. I was only on the outside of the fence up until President Ford got in there. If there were conversations with Haig and Nixon about any of that, I wouldn’t have been in the room for it, because even though I was there 95% of the time, the other 5% - who knows?

Smith: Were you surprised when the pardon was announced, or did you know before?

Kennerly: No, I knew it was coming.
Smith: And Sunday morning…

Kennerly: Well, afterwards I told him – after the shit had hit the fan about the pardon – I said a week later, we were going to some event in an elevator and I said, “So Mr. President, did you think by pardoning Nixon on a Sunday morning that no one would notice?” And he got mad at me because at that point he’d lost his humor about that particular scenario. I think his numbers went down to about where Truman’s were after he fired MacArthur. Probably in the same neighborhood.

Smith: Did he misjudge the intensity of the public reaction?

Kennerly: Yes, he did, I’m sure of it. Because after he signed the pardon – there are some really interesting pictures, by the way, in the little anteroom.

Smith: He’d gone to church beforehand.

Kennerly: Went to church.

Kennerly: Pardoned Nixon, and then he went and played golf. A good Republican president, what the hell – he’s not going to Disneyland. “So, Mr. President, you just pardoned Richard Nixon – what are you going to do next?” “I’m going to Burning Tree.”

So I can’t remember who he played with that day.

Smith: Mel Laird.

Kennerly: Oh, Mel Laird.

Smith: Who insists to this day, that if only he had done what Mel Laird wanted him to do, which was…

Kennerly: Make sure that Nixon’s plane crashed on the way to San Clemente.

Smith: Mel always had a plan. And Mel still says he was pissed at his old friend Jerry for doing this. Mel’s plan – he was going to bring a delegation, bipartisan delegation, from both Houses of Congress, to the Oval Office to petition Ford.
The problem with that scenario is, it’s fine thirty-five years later in this antiseptic – but in the culture of the time, the first trial balloon would have been shot down before it ever got to tree level.

Kennerly: Right.

Smith: You couldn’t prepare the country for…

Kennerly: I think Ford knew, he knew it was going to be negative. There’s no question about that. And that’s why he kept it so tight, for one thing. Once he’d made up his mind to do it, he was going to do it. I don’t think he wanted to get talked out of it or worried about what the reaction was. That was part of it, too.

Smith: Here’s another thing…

Kennerly: And Ted Kennedy was one of the strongest critics, and then of course coming all the way around, which was a big deal for him.

Smith: But here’s this thing: it goes back again to what I sense was Rumsfeld’s role, and what I say was his necessary ruthlessness.

Kennerly: Rummy – who you mean, “I was out of the country when it all happened,” Rumsfeld?

Smith: For example, right before the election that fall, Nixon is ill.

Kennerly: Phlebitis. I was there. I was in the hospital. They wouldn’t let me in.

Smith: And there were people trying to talk him out of going.

Kennerly: I remember.

Smith: What?

Kennerly: Well, this brings up another good point, which was midterm elections in October. President Ford had a scheduled trip to Dallas, Houston, somewhere in Texas and John Connally wanted to see him. And at that point John Connally is under indictment for this milk scandal thing, but it was a big deal. Connally had sent word to the President that he wanted to see him. And every single person on the staff said you shouldn’t see him, you don’t have to see him, you’ve got a busy schedule, and there may have been another God damn it in there. “John Connally is a friend of mine and that’s it. I’m going to see him.” And whoever it was, I don’t know at that point, it was either Rummy or Cheney on that trip. And somebody said, “Well, you know, two minutes after he leaves that room with you, everybody is going to know about it.” He said, “I don’t care.” He said, “Because you’re under indictment doesn’t mean you are guilty, and he’s a friend of mine.”

Fast forward to the 1976 campaign. Now here he has really been a good friend of John Connally, who is a dick, and the way that John Connally repaid Gerald R. Ford, was when Ronald Reagan announced that he was running in the Republican primary, Connally said, “Oh, these are both good friends of mine, I can’t support either one of them in the primary.” John Tower, who I will always admire for stepping up to the plate, came right over to the White House, endorsed President Ford, who said, “You know, this may be a losing battle in Texas, because they are really conservative, and John Connally…”

So what happened was the day that Ronald Reagan picked Dick Schweiker as his running mate, who was considered fairly liberal – was shocking, actually - before they went into the convention, right? the phone rings, and John Connally just happens to be coming up to Washington and would love to stop by and see the President and maybe give them an endorsement.

I heard that and I was very, fiercely, loyal to the President – I could say stuff nobody else was going to say because I’d get really mad about something. So, he takes his call. He says, “Sure, tell him day after tomorrow,” or whatever. And so that evening I rode up in the elevator with him. He could tell I had something on my mind, I was really mad. We walked out of the elevator and went across to their bedroom, and he said, “Okay, what is it?” I said, “After what John Connally did to you, you saw him in his darkest hour and he paid you back by sitting on the fence. And now Reagan has picked a guy who will probably cost him the nomination, and Connally is going to come up here.” I said, “I just think that is horrible. If I were President of the United States, I wouldn’t do it.” And he looks at me and kind of smiled and puts his hand on my shoulder and says, “That’s why you’re not president Dave.”
Flash forward again to the Republican convention. John Connally honestly thought that Ford was going to call him up and put him on the ticket. I was in all those meetings. You can talk to Cheney about that one, too. All those people’s names were swirling around. And Connally was coming up to see him, and this goes to the not so naïve, and not necessarily un-ruthless Gerald R. Ford. So Connally – they have the meeting. I kind of look over, he shakes his hand and leaves. I said, “Now you’re not seriously considering picking him as a running mate, are you?” He says, “Dave, you remember what he did to me. Are you kidding?” I laughed. It was always in there and it was like, he knew, and he was an incredibly smart politician. It had to do with why he got along so well from both sides of the aisle.

Smith: Tell us about Mrs. Ford’s cancer surgery.

Kennerly: Well, I was there when he got the word on that one, and in fact, I think he was just devastated by that. He cried. They were so close and he could see the possibility that she might not make it. And there was actually a really interesting public moment when there was this big economic summit.

Smith: Summit on Inflation.

Kennerly: Whip Inflation – but it was Greenspan and all these other guys. It was a bipartisan thing. It was at one of the hotels, I can’t remember. And we had just come back from the hospital, having flown out in the helicopter, and she had gone into surgery and he had to make an appearance here and he broke down in front of this group. And there is a picture of him sitting there – I shot it. It was so touching. But I was with him during the whole time and the kids were there in and out. But I was really there for him and it was like really he was truly in anguish about it. Forget being president, or anything else. I guess he was thankful that she was getting such good care, and obviously it all paid off, but it was a tough one. I felt this almost familial relationship with her, was very close to Mrs. Ford, and everybody was worried. Back then it was not a sure thing.

Smith: Let’s face it, it’s hard for people today to understand – you didn’t talk about.
Kennerly: Well – then. Mrs. Ford should get sainthood for all that she’s done. If you want to talk about miracles on two different levels: having breast cancer and talking about it – nobody talked about it. No women talked about and men just didn’t want to hear about it. And also President Ford was so supportive of that. As a guy born in 1913…

Smith: People talk, understandably, about her courage and her trailblazing, but in a curious sort of unheralded way, in his response, he also sort of set an example for how husbands should respond to this.

Kennerly: He really did. Steve Ford talks about that, actually. If you haven’t talked to Steve, you really should talk about that because Steve makes that very point about his dad stood right by his mom, and then the whole business with alcohol and drug rehabilitation and all of that. And that’s very noble and all of that, but I don’t think it was quite as groundbreaking – no, it was groundbreaking. I know my parents generation – my parents were actually younger than they – that alcoholism runs in my family. I have personal experience with that and I know how difficult that is and people never talk about it. The older generation, they became kind of, oh you go to the Betty Ford Center. Now it’s a household name for recovery and dealing with your problems. I’ve had five or six of my friends go through the Betty Ford Center and she saved their lives.

Smith: We get conflicting – and it’s not something we dwell on – but sort of a conflicting sense to what extent her “problem,” however defined, was noticed, relevant during the White House years.

Kennerly: I’m a good person to talk to about that. I spent so much time with her, and now I tell this to people because I have my own personal difficulty growing up with my mother drinking. So I was pretty damned sensitive to it. It wasn’t like this is an academic problem. But even then I was sort of like I didn’t know for sure as a young kid, but as you get older you see it, obviously, because for one thing, you start drinking yourself and know what it will do to you. But I spent so much time with her and I never felt like – and I’m not a doctor by any means – again, I’m an observer, but also with some kind of sensitivity to that, it never struck me as being this huge problem. And I think there may very well have been. One of my friends said, “I didn’t know my dad drank until he came home sober one day.” Maybe there was some of that, but she didn’t drink that much, and I think she was mixing the two. And her speech patterns were a little slow, but they always were, kind of always considered. You know her really well.

Smith: But it’s safe to say, it did not significantly impair her performance as First Lady.

Kennerly: No. I honestly believe that. There is no cover up. She’s the one that’s told all, she’s opened the closet.

Smith: And the other thing is, it’s interesting, opposites attract. He’s so punctual, and she – has she ever been on time in her life?

Kennerly: Right. But he did love her dearly. There’s no question.

Smith: It’s almost a measure of his love.

Kennerly: And also, if you think about the ERA, and the fact Mrs. Ford – that was not a Republican point of view, the Equal Rights Amendment.

Smith: The Sixty Minutes interview.

Kennerly: Oh, I remember that.

Smith: My sense is, there is an immediate, predictable reaction, followed by a kind of, gee, we didn’t stop to anticipate that reaction, i.e., that is of subsequent polls which were a lot slower in those days. But nevertheless, they reveal the country was changing, and that while there were certainly people who took exception, a lot of them Reagan supporters to begin with on the right, but they were outnumbered by people who found it refreshing and candid. And the irony is the message of the whole Ford presidency about openness and transparency, she, in the one interview, embodied that as much as anything that happened in those two and a half years.

Kennerly: It’s funny because transparency was not even a word that was in the lexicon then. That’s all latter day. But you’re right, she talked about what if her daughter was having an affair. Normally, an unmarried person going out with other unmarried people is not an affair, it’s like you’re doing it, or whatever. And drug use, talking about how I would hope that my kids would talk to me. Those are all real rock solid ideas, being a good parent.

Smith: Basically she was simply acknowledging the existence of these issues - no one ever asked Pat Nixon about those things.

Kennerly: Well, no. And I think you look at the kids and you think that it wouldn’t even cross your mind. But the Ford kids were really kind of – young Susan was what? Eighteen? And Jack was out there with Bianca Jaeger and doing all this stuff, and I was in league with him.

Smith: Was that an issue? Were there people at the White House who were worried about Jack and his behavior?

Kennerly: Oh, absolutely. Yeah, but see, I was like the Henry Kissinger of the West Wing to the East Wing. That’s why Rumsfeld and Cheney knew that part of my value was that I was a direct link to the family - things that they didn’t want to talk to the President about. One time they asked me to say something to Mrs. Ford about something, and they didn’t want to talk to the President about it. I said, “I’m not going down that road. This is up to him and her.” She had made some statement in the book about they wanted her to tone it down a little bit. It was either Rumsfeld or Cheney. They asked President Ford, “Do you think you could get Betty to tone it down a little bit,” and he said, “Hey, if you want her to tone it down, you go ask her. I ain’t doing it.”

So, basically, she drove her own ship. But it wasn’t like the Clinton administration where there was really the North and South Korea. There was a DMZ, East Wing to West Wing, and Mrs. Clinton had her own political agenda and really ran this political operation separate from Bill Clinton. Mrs. Ford wasn’t like that. She had the things that she really believed in. It was a much quieter, lower key situation. Obviously, older people, too.

Smith: Did she enjoy being First Lady?

Kennerly: I think she did. I think she enjoyed being First Lady because she made people happy, and she was so much fun to be with. I mean, witness that last picture of her on the Cabinet Room table. Never before or since will there be a picture like that taken. And it showed her sense of fun and that mischievous quality that she has.

Smith: Tell us about your trip to Vietnam and the context.

Kennerly: The context of the trip was, I was in a meeting. It was a top secret meeting in the Oval Office, and Fred Weyand, who was the Army chief of staff, was in there. Graham Martin had been in Washington getting some dental work done or something, Henry Kissinger, Brent Scowcroft, and me taking pictures. The meeting was about sending Weyand to go over to Vietnam to see what, if anything, could be done to save the government. The North Vietnamese had invaded, they had come over the DMZ and they’d also attacked along up near one of the other borders.

Smith: This is early April, end of March, early April of ’75?

Kennerly: It was the end of March, because the trip – I remember the dates – I went the last week of March. Things were really looking bad. They left the room and I said to the President, “You, know, I would really like to go with the General.” And the President thought about it and said, “You know, I would really like you to go, too. I’d love to have your point of view on what’s going on.” Because I had no axe to grind, I was there as a journalist, photographer, I’d been all over the country and Gen. Weyand was actually a hero in the ’68 Tet offensive, so he knew the turf.

Smith: Let me ask you, and this may not be answerable, but, to this day there is a legitimate debate over what – not so much over whether South Vietnam could have been saved, that’s another whole thing. But about inside the White House, the notion of going to Congress and asking for the $750 million. Did the President really believe, ala Henry Kissinger, that a) he could get it; and b) that it would do the trick; or was he, in effect, necessarily going through the motions? Because then you had the Tulane speech where Kissinger wants him – one has the sense, at the risk of oversimplifying, one has a sense that Kissinger wanted to go down with all flags flying.
Kennerly: No, Henry Kissinger was never going down with all flags flying. Not if he was on the ship. The ship might go down, but it wasn’t going to be with him at the helm.

Smith: Right. I’m trying to get a sense of what the internal dynamics were, how realistic Ford was, what he really believed he could get out of Congress. Because I would trust Gerald Ford’s assessment of what he could get out of Congress a hell of a lot more than Kissinger’s at that point. And that’s simply because of Ford’s experience with Congress.

Kennerly: That’s true.

Smith: And it’s critical to know whether Ford thought he really could get….

Kennerly: You know, there were big appropriations – I think, for one reason, that’s why he sent Weyand. He wanted to get a response from a military guy. And Weyand had been in charge of III Corps during Tet, which is the Saigon area, and even though it was a political disaster, Weyand and company had actually driven the Viet Cong out and all of that. He, as a military guy, had done a great job, but he understood the country. So Graham Martin and I flew on plane to Saigon. It was Graham Martin, it was General Fred Weyand…

Smith: What was Martin’s frame of mind at that point? Did he think it was salvageable?

Kennerly: Yes. He definitely was going to go down with the ship. He would have. He believed until the end. I stayed with him at his residence and I spent a night. He had a son who was killed. He talked about that and it was pretty sad, but Graham Martin didn’t want to allow – when I showed up there, of course I knew all the news people and they wanted to try to arrange to get their Vietnamese civilians out. They knew that the end was most likely coming and thought these people would be at risk because they worked for Americans. I went to talk to Graham Martin about it, he said, “What about all the Vietnamese that work for us, the government?” He said, “If I condone letting anybody especially come in and start this sort of a secret evacuation, the whole thing is going to go to hell.” And it made me resentful about Martin, but I totally understood his point of view about that. And I knew a lot of the people that were in question there.

Smith: There really was no way you could secretly airlift people out?

Kennerly: Once you started, that was it.

Smith: It’s tantamount to surrender.

Kennerly: That’s right. And what was interesting for me as a professional observer, I went over on that last business, I was up in the Nga Trang with the American Consul when he was evacuated and I went up on a helicopter. A ship had been commandeered by the South Vietnamese soldiers – a whole ship was filled with soldiers fleeing south. They shot at our helicopter, which was the first my parents – AP put that story out – and my parents who thought I had this nice job at the White House discovered I was back in Vietnam getting shot at. The President had to call them up and tell them I was okay, which he did.

But the main thing was, I went up north; I saw what was going on; it was like the handwriting was on the wall pretty clear. I don’t know what that appropriation would have done. It might have bought some time, I’m not sure. It was a handy way to blame Congress for the end of it. I’m sure that was in somebody’s mind. I’m not certain that President Ford thought that directly. But then the CIA, because I had this presidential order given me carte blanche, flew me into Phnom Phen.

I went into Phnom Phen and there was no one at the airport, they were all behind sandbags. The airport was under fire and the CIA guy told me, “Look, I’m just going to taxi by the terminal and you’ve got to jump out.” It was one of those short take off/landing [called a “STOL”] planes that they used in Laos. I said, “That’s fine. I don’t want you to get blown up.” I jumped out and he took off, and I thought, oh this may have been a really stupid thing I just did. And so I got a ride into town; went to the embassy and got a top secret briefing a map showed Phnom Phen was here and there were all these red arrows pointing there and it was like, uh oh, this is essentially over with. The ambassador said they were going to evacuate.
Smith: Phnom Phen fell before Saigon?

Kennerly: Yeah, it fell a week after I was there. In fact, if you saw the Killing Fields, it was right in that period, and a bunch of my friends decided to stay around Phnom Phen. And my suggestion, quietly I said, “Get your ass out of here.” I said, “There will not be the U.S. Calvary coming to save you because it’s going to be too late. There’s no way they are going to commit troops. I can tell you that right now. I wouldn’t ask if we get an SOS from you guys after you stay here and the Khmev Rouge are coming down your throat.” And guess what happened? Got back to the White House; SOS. Scowcroft and I talked about it and he said, “Well, what do you think about it?” I said, “You can’t do it.” I don’t think he was going to do it, but I said, “They know.”

Smith: Did you and General Weyand fundamentally agree on your assessment of what you’d seen?

Kennerly: Well, I was hearing what they were saying. In fact, I was just looking in the book, and they were preparing their report and the President was in Palm Springs, and I went over there. I think they were saying that possibly they could hold them off for a certain length of time, I don’t know what the assessment was. It wasn’t a pretty assessment. One of the chief CIA guys was on the plane with me, also.

I told the President, I showed him photographs. I said, “This is what is going on, and anybody that tells you that Vietnam has more than three or four weeks left is bullshitting you.” That’s what I said, and he was really downcast. Saigon fell three weeks later. I’d been in Vietnam, not just that trip, but before, and then I was in the room when the decision was made to pull out of Vietnam for over two years. And it was in the Roosevelt Room, ironically, under this portrait of Teddy Roosevelt, you’ve got all the guys sitting around like the President, Vice President, head of the CIA, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Kissinger, and they are sitting there right after Ford pulled the plug and like, no one is saying anything.

Smith: Pulling the plug meant what?
Kennerly: Evacuating all the Americans that were left in Vietnam. Pulling the plug meant…

Smith: And as many of our South Vietnamese friends as possible?

Kennerly: One of the reasons – and I will say this that I truly believe it – that when I came back with my photographs, and they were pictures of refugees from around the country, Cambodia, wounded people, it was pretty grim. And I replaced all the photographs on the White House wall – all these cheery photos of state arrivals and all that – color pictures. They still do it to this day, and they are nice to see for the staff. And I put up the pictures I’d shown President Ford of refugee kids, of wounded evacuees, of the ship filled with fleeing South Vietnamese soldiers, on the walls. And someone, overnight, had taken all the pictures down from the day I went up. And the President got so mad about it that he ordered, personally ordered, that all those photos go back on the wall. He said, “You people who work here have to know what’s going on over there. This is a horrible situation we’re in and you have to know what it is.”

And when I told him about a lot of the Vietnamese people that I’d worked with who were there, I said, “One thing that really concerns me, and Graham Martin feels this way, is that it’s your obligation to try to get as many Vietnamese who are high risk Vietnamese people out of there.” People who had worked for the intelligence agencies and the military authorities. People who wanted to leave, we’re not going to make anybody leave, but the opportunity has to be open. And there were some in the State Department, at high levels, who felt that way, and at the highest level just wanted to close it down, get the Americans out and throw that chapter into Gulf of Tonkin. And President Ford felt very strongly about continuing the evacuation, which was a very dangerous thing that was going on – and kept the door open for thousands of Vietnamese who got out because of him.

Smith: Did they wait too long to take Reagan seriously as a challenger in ’76?

Kennerly: I don’t know. Those political discussions – a lot of those were happening offshore from the White House. My favorite picture in the book, the Extraordinary Circumstances book, one of my favorites, is Reagan and Ford sitting two blocks from where we’re talking right now in their tuxedos, in what looks like a scene from Godfather III, at the Century Plaza Hotel. It looks like a Julius Shulman architectural picture from the ‘60s. And Reagan, looking very elegant, is sitting there and Ford is talking to him, and it was Halloween in 1974. President Ford was at some big fundraising thing, that’s why they were all dressed up like that.

I don’t know if Reagan, in his mind, was considering the run. I’m sure he must have been. He looked at Ford and probably thought, “I can do this.” But when you get around to – I don’t know at what point they started taking him seriously – certainly, but when he dumped Rockefeller, sometime prior to that, where they said, “Look, the hard, true-blue conservative Republicans want Ronald Reagan. He’s like an amazing candidate.”

Smith: At the end of the campaign, in ’76, did he think he was going to win?

Kennerly: Ford?

Smith: Yeah.

Kennerly: Yeah. I think it was that close. People don’t realize how close that election was. With Gore and Bush, I think you had two candidates that most people overwhelmingly didn’t want. It was sort of this is what you got, this is what it is. Ford almost overcame Carter. Carter was a bad candidate, and it was so close. I was there in those meetings.

Smith: What was that night like?

Kennerly: It was a horrible night. Up on the second floor it was Jake Javits and Cheney sitting in a room…that was up in the residence; that was like two o’clock in the morning. Cheney is up there smoking cigarettes and then I slept on my couch in my office. It still hadn’t been called at that point. It was so close that anything would have tipped it.

Later, I went back upstairs and the President was alone having breakfast. It was around seven a.m., he’d only slept for three or hours, if that. And at that point, I was the first person to talk to him when he knew it was a wrap. And it was sad. And I’ll tell you what happened later that morning, and it boils down to Terry O’Donnell and I. The President had almost lost his voice, and I have a picture you can see the President sitting behind the desk and Cheney’s over underneath the Washington portrait by the fireplace, and they called Carter to concede. And Ford kind of croaked out, “I can’t talk.” He’d lost his voice campaigning, and, “Dick Cheney will say something.” And so Cheney read the concession statement.

Then the kids came down and Mrs. Ford, and we were in the Oval Office and it was really not a pleasant time. But they wanted a picture behind the desk like the one they’d had the day on August 9th, so I took a picture of them. The one I really like with Mrs. Ford sort of reaching over and chucking Jack under the chin, like, you know, try to buck up. Mrs. Ford was always like the cheerleader of the family. And then there is a smiling picture which doesn’t mean anything, but then they went out to the press room and Mrs. Ford read the concession statement. The kids were there.

And then Terry O’Donnell and I and the President walked back to the Oval Office and the rest of them left. I had a picture – I’ll never forget this, it was so poignant to me – the President puts his arm around Terry and he said, “I probably never told you this, you’ve done such a great job, you’ve been so dedicated, you’ve spent so many hours,” he said, “If there is anything I can do for you, let me know.” And I’m taking a picture of that and I just burst into tears because, once again, the guy is thinking about somebody else. You know, he’s just lost the presidency and yet he’s concerned about Terry O’Donnell. The picture - Terry and I both totally lost it. It was so typical of him, that’s why I loved working for him.

Smith: Did it take him a while to bounce back?

Kennerly: I think as he got older, he got more bitter about it. But what was so ironic is like becoming friends with Jimmy Carter. Who would have thought that? And not friends with Ronald Reagan.

Smith: No, in fact, I think one of the things that brought Carter and Ford together was they both ran against Ronald Reagan.
Kennerly: Yes.

Smith: They had that in common. A couple of quick things. When was the last time you saw him?

Kennerly: I saw him and he was still able to sit up in his chair, but it was toward the end. He was so frail. But he told some great stories. He was still in pretty good mind, but it was like he wasn’t totally on track. But he was old. In fact, most people don’t make it that far. It was so great to see him. And getting back to the DeFrank book, DeFrank made such a big deal about being the last reporter to see him. I mean, who gives a shit? Honesty. It’s like, I don’t care about that. The question is, who was Gerald R. Ford in the prime of his life? He was a great man, he was a good friend, he was somebody who should be revered and honored. And not for some recollections when you’re like kind of over the hill and past the point.

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the public response, which seemed to just build as the week went along?

Kennerly: Of course, I was. Because he was only president for like a half hour, essentially.

Smith: And he’d been out of the public eye.

Kennerly: That’s right. Two and a half years, and he died in, and I think considering everything else that was going on in the world, I think people were just fond of him, even if in retrospect people didn’t know him, knew that he represented something that was good. He was from a generation of people who, in his own words, felt that you could disagree without being disagreeable. He had lessons to teach people; still does. And I didn’t learn too many of them myself, but I know that they were good lessons.

I really lament the fact that he didn’t have a four year run in his own right. Who knows? I mean, things still would have gone to hell in many cases, but one thing that wouldn’t have happened, for instance, and I’m convinced of it; there would not have been American hostages in Iran. He would have gone down with the Shah and if the Shah was evacuated at some point, then so would the Americans have been. Not this chicken shit way of doing diplomacy. Honestly, that was what caused that situation. I don’t know that it would have made any difference, except that I’m pretty sure that wouldn’t have happened, because that all just eroded just so slowly, like watching the blood seep out of a body.

Smith: Have you had any contact with Mrs. Ford since his death?

Kennerly: I haven’t seen her in a while. It’s been at least three months, really. Well, I took the book over to her, she loved the book. And it was really such a tribute to him and to her, and what was great about it, and your piece and everything that was in there was just all straight ahead stuff. It wasn’t being reverential about him, it was just like, “Here’s the guy.” The good news, the bad news.

One moment that I did want to talk about. The New York Times asked me to write an OpEd piece after Ford died [we should get a copy of this for the record]. And they wanted like my favorite picture or whatever it was. There are so many photos, of so many different things. People ask me my favorite picture and I cannot answer those questions. But I thought about it, and I didn’t write it. They asked me one time if I would do something ahead of time, but I could not sit down and write like their obit, which makes sense. I couldn’t do it until he was really gone. And then I only had twelve hours or less to write it.

And I thought about the picture, and the photo that I ended up with, which they used, was him during the Mayaguez incident, and he has his glasses on top of his head, and I thought that was the moment where he really assumed command of the presidency. I thought the picture showed a resolute person. It showed a determined man. It showed a good leader. And he managed the Mayaguez thing effectively, and Marines were killed and all that, I know; but it was handled in a really smart way and he made decisions that were important and he did not lean on Henry Kissinger or anybody else. He made his own decisions after the information came into him about what was going on.
One telling aspect of that was, that there were political people who thought that we had to kick the shit out of these Cambodians for taking the American crew, and basically, making the Cambodians pay for what the Vietnamese did to us across the border. And he just wasn’t having that. He did not make those decisions based on politics at all. In fact, he pulled back in a couple of cases on using greater force, and it worked out. But from then on, he didn’t have to come out on his lawn and talk about how Henry Kissinger is going to be here. Henry Kissinger almost lost his job at one point there.

One of my moments was that Henry Kissinger, early on, and I like him a lot, he’s just a great character and I’ve gotten along with him really well, but every time that Bob Hartmann or one of the guys would drop something to Evans and Novak about Kissinger, and undercutting him all the time, he would call up Ford and threaten to resign. One day I was in one of my sessions sitting up there having a drink. Kissinger called up and Ford said, “Well, I’m sorry you feel that way, Henry. But naw, don’t worry about it. I know, I know. It’s one of those things.” So he hung up and said, “Henry, he’s so upset about this Evans & Novak column, he’s talking about quitting.” I said, “Mr. President, just accept his resignation and he’ll never do it again.” And I’m not sure if he took the advice. But Henry never resigned.
Nixon Leaves the White House After Resigning

August 9, 1974

I was on the South Lawn of the White House as President Richard Nixon and First Lady Pat Nixon, their daughter Julie Nixon Eisenhower, son-in-law David Eisenhower, and Vice President and Mrs. Gerald R. Ford, walked from the South Portico of the White House toward the waiting helicopter.

Richard Nixon, the first president to ever resign that high office, climbed up the stairs of the helicopter, looked back at the White House, then gave a brisk wave to the dozens of staff who had assembled to see him off. I took a sequence of photos as the drama unfolded.

At first Nixon looked grim, but suddenly the crowd broke into cheers and started applauding. His mood shifted, and suddenly, if for just a few moments, he became the old campaigner, arms lifted above his head as he flashed the "V" sign. Then he turned, and disappeared inside the chopper.

Of course it wasn't a campaign, but one of the darkest days in presidential history.

Gerald R. Ford watched the spectacle, and as the helicopter lifted off, banked toward the Washington Monument, he walked back into the White House. In a few minutes, exactly at noon, in the East Room, Ford would become the 38th President of the United States, and Richard Nixon, flying somewhere over the Midwest heading toward California, became a private citizen.

The following day President Ford appointed me as personal photographer to the president, only the third person to serve in that capacity. I left the White House job when Ford did, January 20, 1977, after Jimmy Carter was sworn in as the chief executive.

Smith: The first thing I want to ask you: you obviously had a very impressive career before you ever joined the Ford camp. When did you stop being the youngest person in the room?

Mathews: I don’t know; time took care of that. I think it was more significant that I didn’t come from Washington. Yet even though I didn’t have a Washington background, I had experiences that served me well when I got to D.C.

For instance, I lived through the desegregation crisis. George Wallace was the governor of our state when the University of Alabama desegregated. I was at Columbia working on a PhD in history and came back to the university in the summer of 1963 to help with desegregation. The governor’s stand in the schoolhouse door was political theater. African American students were already in the dormitories and preparing to go to class. I became President a few years later, and a university that had served part of the state had a chance to be the university for all of the state. The challenge was no longer just ending segregation; it was fostering integration, which was a different. When I came to Washington, however, the focus was still on desegregation in a very acrimonious, political controversy.

I also had some experience in trying to reform health care. Alabama had very good medical care available in the medical school at the University of Alabama in Birmingham; yet 60 miles away, we had third-world health statistics. So I worked with the legislature to begin a College of Community Health Sciences in Tuscaloosa, which focused on rural areas.

In addition, I was familiar with working with elected officials because before coming to HEW I had served as the university’s liaison with the state assembly, and my grandfather and great-grandfather had both served in the legislature.

There was also a long history in social work at the university that helped me in Washington. And my wife’s relatives had been very much involved in social services. Her cousin, Loula Dunn, came to Washington during the Roosevelt administration to head the Emergency Relief Administration. That was a useful connection. In addition, the university had done a lot of work with the disabled, and what I learned from those programs served me well.

I was pleased to be associated with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare because it represented the compassion of the American people.

Smith: Interesting. It traditionally has been seen as a political graveyard.

Mathews: Yeah, but if you look at the people who developed HEW, particularly Nelson Rockefeller, they made a contribution by bringing the federal programs that served people to one department, which provided opportunities for coordination and mutual reinforcement. The department also reflected some of the enduring values of America. It was, for example, the agency for administering the social compact between generations: the tradition of one generation caring for another.

Smith: I wonder what kind of institutional history there was. I mean, for example, were there people who remembered Mrs. Hobby?

Mathews: Not if she had her way. She didn’t seem to dwell on her experiences as the first Secretary. Mrs. Hobby went back to Texas and her newspaper. Other past secretaries often stayed in touch and shared what they could with their successors. Consequently, the department has had an institutional memory, particularly of people like Nelson Rockefeller, who was well respected. Some of his furniture was still around. There were also distinguished veterans, such as Wilbur Cohen and Arthur Flemming, who, like Nelson, were very helpful to me. All were truly public servants.

Smith: Did you know George Wallace?

Mathews: Oh yes.

Smith: What was your relationship with him? And did you see him change; did you see him evolve?

Mathews: As a young legislator, he served with my grandfather, although I have few memories of that era. I knew him best for his stand in the schoolhouse door at the university in 1963. He said he was carrying out a promise he made to perpetuate school segregation. I also knew a lot of people who went to school with Wallace, including Frank Johnson, whose rulings as a federal judge checked the governor and brought about desegregation. In addition, I had ties to other progressive southern governors. In the 1960s, these governors were part of a network of educators and civic leaders in the South that included Jimmy Carter, Terry Sanford, and LeRoy Collins. Some of them remembered George from his student days when he was so liberal he was thought to be “pinko.” They saw Wallace’s about-face as opportunistic.

When Wallace first ran for governor in 1958, he said he wasn’t fit to serve if he couldn’t treat all citizens equally. Yet after being defeated by John Patterson, he later went on to pledge “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever.”

My personal encounters with Wallace came when the university assigned me to work with the state legislature. We clashed over a proposed speaker-ban bill like one North Carolina had passed to keep Communists off the campuses. The real targets of the bill were civil rights leaders who were accused of being associated with the Communist Party. Of course, the universities were opposed to the bill, and my job was to try to stop it in committee. I found a committee member who was the father of a classmate; he was sympathetic to our position, and his vote helped prevent the bill from coming to vote on the floor.

The University’s president at the time, Frank Rose, took a very courageous stand opposing the bill, and Wallace wasn’t happy with its defeat. I was outside George’s waiting room some time after that. When he heard my voice, he came out of his office to talk about the speaker-ban bill. He said in effect, “I’m going to help you. I’m going to give you a Confederate flag and a pole to fly it.” And he put money for both in the appropriations bill. Our response was that we already had a real Confederate flag in the archives, which had flown when Union troops burned the university in 1865. We didn’t need to prove anything to anybody. So, we were on opposite sides on most, but not all, issues.

Wallace didn’t oppose my efforts to get funding for the College of Community Health Sciences. And we also received funding for another college dealing with environment and energy. Alabama is an energy-rich, mineral-rich state, so there wasn’t significant opposition. Later on, after Wallace was shot and in terrible pain, he would call at night to talk to people. Sometimes he would call me; he’d talk to me about old times, or if I wasn’t there, he’d talk to my wife, Mary, and if she wasn’t there, he’d talk to the kids. I went by to see him after he’d won his last race for governor; sitting in a wheelchair, he could recite every ballot box in Alabama and the tremendous number of black votes he had received. By then, Wallace had confessed to making a mistake in supporting segregation, and the black electorate had supported him.

Did you see where Wallace’s daughter came out for Barack Obama, even campaigned for him?

Smith: No, I didn’t. Isn’t that something? Talk about the new South.

When I look at HEW during the Ford years, you had more than your share of hot potato issues. Let’s back up. How did you get the job?

Mathews: I have absolutely no idea. I had met Ford during the Bicentennial. The university was one of the first to have a Bicentennial program. Ford recognized that, and the White House asked if I’d come up for an award. (I was serving on the National Advisory Council for the American Revolution Bicentennial.) Other than that, I didn’t give much thought to Washington until I got a call from somebody with the White House who wanted to know if I was interested in HEW. I have a good friend by the same name as the caller (Walker), and I thought someone was pulling my leg. I didn’t take the call seriously until the White House called again. President Ford later said that calling me was his idea. He had inherited a lot of people from past administrations, and I assumed he wanted some who were his own choices.

Smith: Did you have a job interview with the President, or what was the process?

Mathews: After meeting Ford, I interviewed with the chief counsel and other staff. The time was short; Cap Weinberger was determined to get back to California, and President Ford wanted to complete his Cabinet.

Smith: Did you talk to Weinberger at all about the issues?

Mathews: Yeah, I talked to Cap about many things; he gave me good advice, and he was always on tap if I needed to talk to him.

Smith: What were the most pressing issues when you arrived?
Well, they fell into two categories, those issues that came from broad political trends, and those that came from specific policy controversies. In 1975, one of the most significant trends was that Americans were losing confidence in government. Pundits at the time thought maybe Vietnam and Watergate were to blame, but the lack of confidence persisted into the 1990s and beyond. In fact, contemporary polls show real hesitation about trusting government.

The other thing that was happening, as you know, was that we were dealing with what has been called “the new American political system.” We’ve always had interest groups, but the groups that related to HEW had become much better organized. Their members had taken positions on the staffs from Congress, as well as within the bureaucracy. Their heightened influence added to a shift in power away from the President and elected officials to the bureaucracy and the courts.

The tone of politics was also changing, becoming more moralistic and less pragmatic. Everything was a right. The civil rights movement had been a success, and other groups contended that they, too, were championing rights. But if everything becomes a right, which is absolute, how is the government, with its limited resources, to set priorities? There are no priorities when it comes to rights. Yet, if you’re in the government and there is an issue about whether the complaints of Mexican Americans or African Americans should be a priority for OCR’s compliance staff, the administration is in an impossible bind.

Going back to the loss of confidence, I would add that citizens were not only losing confidence, but also losing voice. These feelings may have had something to do with a shift in focus from the general interest to a focus on particular interests. Consequently, a large number of Americans were increasingly of the opinion that “folks like me” don’t count. Special interests aren’t bad, and every conceivable group was available to represent every conceivable interest. They were well organized and effective. Still, people didn’t feel like the political system represented them as a whole. Personally, we usually integrate our interests, but interest groups aren’t integrated; to be effective politically, each one is like a dedicated missile aimed at one specific target.
Smith: That’s interesting because one of the organizational innovations of the Ford presidency, which is with us today, was the Office of Public Liaison—clearly designed to address these group aspirations.

Mathews: That was helpful. And particular interests don’t necessarily conflict with the interests of all. It was a problem of balance. The more influential organized interest groups became, the more the balance tipped away from the less organized citizenry and the interest of the public as a whole. That same shift has occurred in the legal system; for instance, a community playground closes because it can’t afford the insurance to protect against personal injury.

The influence of organized interest groups was enhanced by increased reliance on regulations. The administrative state operates through regulations, which aren’t made through open debate the way laws are made. Furthermore, the legislation that the department had to implement through regulations was often very general; in some cases, only a few sentences added to in a bill. And this addition may have been passed without debate, which made the intent difficult to interpret. Consequently, the “taking powers” of the state, as Oliver Wendell Holmes put it, grew as regulations multiplied. I thought this raised a serious question: who would regulate the regulators?

In addition, as you know, there has always been an issue about the right balance between state and federal power. We benefit in many ways from a strong federal system, but in the 1970s, the balance had shifted decidedly in favor of Washington, as the federal advisory committee on government noted in the 1980s. This trend had implications for the department because many of its programs depended on effective state and local government. The department also depended on viable communities. For example, as Margaret Mead pointed out in health, whether or not you get well has a lot to do with the networks of nurture in a community. Roughly put, if you have the same problem I have, and more than six or seven people care that you get well but fewer care that I do, you’re likely to get well and I’m not.

This shift in balance of power away from local jurisdictions compromised that wonderful American invention of allowing sovereignty within sovereignty. Not allowing for divided sovereignty has plagued other countries, and in the United States, we have to rebalance power constantly.
These were the broad trends that were in the environment in which the department had to operate. In that environment, there were also specific policy issues that arose out of crises. The integration crisis is an example.

Smith: Let me interrupt just because I remember—I’m in Boston. Tell us about Boston.

Mathews: Oh, yes, I was about to mention Boston.

Smith: Tell us about Boston and the administration’s response.

Mathews: Well, the federal judge there, Arthur Garrity, issued a desegregation order that followed the 1973 decision in the Keyes case. This put the court up against a very formidable and adversarial Boston School Committee or board. Violence erupted when the judge’s ruling required busing children from a low-income Irish neighborhood to a distant, low-income African American neighborhood.

Smith: South Boston and Roxbury.

Mathews: Yeah, South Boston and Roxbury. The two had clashed in 1968, following the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. And before then, in the 1950s, the Irish neighborhood felt it suffered from federal housing policies. So there was a tinderbox in the city, and the federal judge’s ruling supplied the spark. Initially, President Ford refused a request from state officials to send in the federal marshals. He said that maintaining safety was a local responsibility. But by the next year, the Justice Department sent federal marshals, and the Federal Community Relations Service was there. At HEW, we provided funding to ease the transition through the Emergency School Aid Program.

I also sent a special assistant there, Dr. Joffre Whisenton. He was the first African American to get his doctorate at the University of Alabama, where he had been my graduate student. I believe an official from the Office of Education, Herman Goldberg, was there as well. They were looking for the kind of civic organizations that had proven helpful in other communities like Pontiac, Michigan. For example, governors like Reuben Askew of Florida, as well as Robert McNair and John West of South Carolina, had created biracial committees. These were very constructive, not necessarily in getting people to like one another, but at least in preventing the destruction of a community that was in the process of obeying the law. There were some civic organizations with similar objectives in Boston. But battle lines had hardened there; it was an extremely difficult situation. And this is why I said earlier that Washington was still focused on desegregation.

Smith: Was there a sense that a lot of people in the South felt there was a bit of a double standard?

Mathews: Oh, yeah. Even members of Congress who weren’t from the South, like Edith Green, were saying, “What’s good for the goose is good for the gander.” Yet many northern urban areas were ill prepared to deal with the challenges of desegregation.

Smith: And in some ways as segregated.

Mathews: Yes. De facto.

Smith: De facto segregation.

Mathews: Yeah. And President Ford’s position as a member of Congress had been that he was for civil rights legislation. And at his confirmation hearing as Vice President, he said he considered de facto segregation as illegal as de jure segregation. He liked the Esch amendment, which would have prohibited school systems from transporting kids past their nearest or next nearest school.

After Boston, on the eve of the election, President Ford had to come out with his own plan for desegregation. To explain how that plan was put together, let me tell you the story about differences in the way the Justice Department and HEW went about preparing this plan. Although I saw the signs that busing wasn’t working as intended, I told the President that it was probably a mistake to give the impression that there was some alternative to busing, which had been successful in certain cases. The desegregation issue had been framed in a way that made more extensive busing inevitable. As long as the government required specific ratios of black to white students, there was no way to achieve the necessary racial balance without transporting some students, usually African Americans, out of their neighborhoods.

I was pleased that when the President came out with this plan, he didn’t give the impression that there was an alternative to some busing. He wanted to limit it, while acknowledging it had been useful in certain cases. The bill he proposed was a hybrid. Ed Levi and the Justice Department wrote part of it, which had to do with limiting the use of busing, and I took what I had learned from the citizen biracial committees and tried to get them institutionalized in the form of a quasigovernmental agency.

My models for this agency, to be called the National Community and Education Committee, were the National Endowment for the Humanities and the National Science Foundation. The President needed a national plan, yet we had to depend on local citizens. Whatever citizens felt about desegregation, if they didn’t want their city torn up as Boston had been, they had to come together. They could create the kind of organizations that could counter the people who were organizing to oppose desegregation violently. And if you were in Boston, you knew how effective the citizens rallying against desegregation were, particularly when encouraged by the school board. So, that’s where we came out.

Smith: Let me ask you, because it’s not unusual for there to be tensions between the White House and departments, but I’m wondering, this is also playing out against the backdrop of an impending challenge from the right in the form of Ronald Reagan.

Mathews: Yeah.

Smith: Did you ever sense how that factored into decision making at the White House?

Mathews: There was no pressure from the White House to respond to the Reagan challenge. Our principal contact was Jim Cannon, head of the Domestic Council, and he was quite professional. A good friend of mine, Doug Cater, who was in the Johnson White House said, “You’d better hope there’s nobody like me in the Ford White House.” President Johnson is said to have kept his departments on a short leash and depended on the White House staff. I was fortunate to have Jim, a fellow Alabamian, in Doug’s role. We really weren’t that different in our outlooks; he seemed to share my nonpartisan inclinations. I had grown up in a state where I didn’t see a Republican until I was 30 years old. I was an independent, and never have been interested in partisan politics. Any need to respond to the Reagan challenge wasn’t a consideration, not in the conversations that Jim Cannon and I had.

Smith: Bill Coleman remembers at one Cabinet meeting, he wanted to keep the administration from getting too far out in front, filing a friend of the court brief or something at some point. And of something the President said, consistent with what you said earlier, “Well, you know, Bill, I just don’t think anyone should be bused beyond the nearest school.” And Coleman said, “Well, if you agree to that, then we’re both in agreement.” Does that ring a bell?

Mathews: Yeah. The discussion occurred while formulating the President’s plan for desegregation. Keep in mind that another Coleman, James Coleman, had authored two reports on the schools. The first had shown the ill effects of segregation. Nobody had to tell me about the bad effects of segregation because I had seen what it had done to the South—the energy that it had drained away from everything else. It was an injustice to everybody. And I saw what could happen to an institution, the state university, when it was free of that burden. So there was no question in my mind that we had to integrate the schools. But in his second report, Professor Coleman warned against the unintended consequences of extensive busing.

Smith: To desegregate.

Mathews: Desegregate, yes. And integrate the schools.

Smith: In a nutshell, what was the difference?

Mathews: The way I use the terms, desegregation is a legal matter. It is unconstitutional to have a law that says certain people can’t attend a public school because of their race. But integration is a far more complex social matter. It isn’t the same as homogenization; it’s about forming working relationships. Different people may have lived together in the same place for a long time, but their relationships may not be on equal terms and their interactions quite restricted. To integrate is to foster positive, respectful, pragmatic ways of dealing with one another. When you bring African American students into an all-white institution, you learn about the challenges of integration. For example, these students have to have some space that they can call their own. They may want a choir that will sing gospel music, as well as one that allows them to sing Handel. So integration is a great social challenge. I was talking with a young musician in New York, and he said, “You know, we all go to desegregated schools, but we don’t live in an integrated society. People don’t know one another.” That is a different challenge than desegregation.

Smith: And did the President understand that?

Mathews: I think so. In fact, one Saturday, in June of 1976, we convened a meeting at the White House, so the President and his staff could see the biracial committees and the things they had learned the hard way about integration. Then members of these committees explained what they did and what the challenges were. The President understood them.

As I said, President Ford broadened his stance on school desegregation toward the end of his term in office. He refused to use his office for a Constitutional amendment to prevent busing. But it was clear from what James Coleman was reporting about the effects of busing and from what Norman Cousins was writing in the Saturday Review that busing was having unintended consequences. By 1976, the schools were already beginning to resegregate. Whites were moving, some—but not all—because of race. The middle class, not just whites, had been moving out of the cities since the 1950s. (Of course, the black middle class at that time was very small.) But economic class, as well as race, was a factor. And as our schools began resegregating, we needed to address a number of problems like those contributing to high dropout rates.

In response to the backlash against busing, Congress passed several anti-busing amendments, led by Senator Robert Byrd for the Democrats and by Representative Marvin Esch for the Republicans.

What made integration difficult to bring about was the tone of the political rhetoric at the time, which was aptly characterized in the title of Dan Carter’s book, The Politics of Rage. Everybody was mad with everybody about everything just at the point that the country needed some innovation and creativity. Judge Garrity himself said, “I’m boxed in.” And I thought that turning to local biracial committees locally, while no panacea, was a way to begin to get out of the box. Unfortunately, renegotiating racial relationships was stymied because the rhetoric wouldn’t allow it.

This was doubly unfortunate because America is continually renegotiating race relations, sometimes with great intensity. We renegotiated them in the Constitutional Convention, and we renegotiated them again in Plessy v. Ferguson after years of Klan violence. Then we renegotiated them after World War II when black soldiers came home and decided they didn’t want to ride in the back of buses anymore. The school desegregation crisis wasn’t just about desegregating the schools; it was about renegotiating racial relationships. Fortunately, America did substantially renegotiate the relationship by the 21st century, and while the relationship is continually being renegotiated, the country has moved beyond where it was in the 1970s. This has not only happened in race relationships, but also in gender and other relations. This renegotiation was going on in the Ford administration even though we were not able to solve the school desegregation problem.

Smith: We talked to Justice Stevens, and it’s hard to believe, but he was there. He said in his confirmation hearings, no one asked him about abortion.

Mathews: Really?

Smith: Yeah, which undoubtedly makes him the last of a kind. How much of an issue was abortion?

Mathews: It wasn’t as explosive an issue as it became later. Politics was just beginning to become hyperpolarized, as it is today, although you could sense the tightening of the lines. Still, politicians could differ on the floor of Congress and go to dinner together that night. There was controversy, but I don’t recall the abortion issue being as ideological as it has become.

There were other divisive issues in the Ford administration—remember the brouhaha over genetic engineering? Scientists in the labs had figured out how to modify a special strain of E. coli so that you could change its characteristics and the way it behaved. There was a great deal of fear because a new bug has no natural enemies. Would it get out of the lab? Would it attack somebody? Nonetheless, President Ford supported going ahead with genetic research. He opted for science, and we’re better off for it.

Smith: Several of your Cabinet colleagues have mentioned that their jobs, in some ways, were made easier because of the connections and the trust and the relationships that Ford brought from Capitol Hill. That he could pick up the phone and ease their labors.

Mathews: Oh, yes. He did that in the swine flu case.

Smith: Describe that, because everything old is new again.

Mathews: Yeah, there has been a lot of news about an H1N1 flu recently. A flu virus is totally unpredictable. It can change its characteristics, and it doesn’t give you any advance notice. In January of 1976 there was flu outbreak in New Jersey in one of the forts.

Smith: It was Fort Dix.
Mathews: Fort Dix. And more than 200 young soldiers showed signs of having been affected by a new flu virus. A dozen or more soldiers had to be hospitalized; one died. That was a clear warning. You didn’t have to remind Americans in Ford’s generation of what a flu virus could do because people remembered the terrible pandemic in 1918. Still, we tend to underestimate flu. Flu kills. I mean, just in a normal season, flu will kill an estimated 36,000 people in the United States from flu-related complications. Swine flu had come in a relatively mild form in the spring of 1918, and then had hit with deadly force in the regular flu season.

In 1976, the folks at CDC did their job; they called the best scientists that they could to determine what kind of virus had caused the Fort Dix outbreak. And the department had to decide what we were going to do for the fall. It took about six months to prepare and test a vaccine. So we had to respond immediately to be prepared for a possible fall outbreak. Vaccines are prepared by injecting fertile chicken eggs with a flu virus. The eggs then form protective antigens. Fortunately, there were some roosters available that we could use to fertilize eggs. We had to take advantage of that and move ahead to prepare the vaccine and then test it. The tests went well. There were no untoward effects. And there had been none when swine flu antigens were put in the flu vaccines that had been used in the military during the 1950s and 1960s. So we had some experience with the type of vaccine we were preparing.

By August, we had the vaccines in vats, but we ran into another problem, one that required the President’s intervention. The insurance companies were nervous. As you may know, insurance risks are assumed by companies around the world. If there is a risk in one country, the insurers in that country take part of the risks, and then they pass the rest along to insurers elsewhere. Still, the extent of the risk in nationwide immunization programs is considerable, and it was difficult for the U.S. insurers to find partners in other countries. You cannot inoculate on a mass scale without the risk of some injury, even though mass vaccinations are the only way you can prevent a pandemic. (You have to immunize a large enough population in order to get a herd effect.)

It was August: the flu season was coming up in October, and we had a big problem with insurance. The federal government was going to have to assume some of the risk, and the issue was, how much? Once that was determined, we could negotiate with the insurers to get protection for vaccine manufacturers. But we needed legislation to move forward on the risk the government would take. Congress, however, was hesitant. At that point, the President intervened and called his friends on the Hill to say the liability problem was serious; you’ve really got to do something about it. And Congress passed a tort claims bill to protect the vaccine manufacturers (except when found negligent). That is how we got the insurance problem settled; it was because of President Ford’s credibility in Congress.
We put the vaccines into the proper doses, and almost 50 million Americans were inoculated. Nobody knew whether that would be possible because we have a decentralized health care system. Yet the system worked reasonably well and, fortunately, swine flu did not reappear in the fall.

Smith: Was that disproportionately aimed at the very young and the very old?

Mathews: This particular flu hits the population it’s not supposed to hit—the young and healthy. It was a young, otherwise healthy soldier who had died. That was alarming. And even those who were middle-aged had no protection.

We also put in place a very strong surveillance system. And we did pick up some cases of a neurological disorder called Guillain-Barré Syndrome (GBS). Guillain-Barré is not necessarily associated with vaccines. It is brought on by any number of things, including vaccines for flu and other diseases. Back then we didn’t have a good gauge for judging what was the norm for cases of Guillain-Barré. But the surveillance picked up a spike in the GBS cases within a few weeks of the vaccinations. We did the prudent thing: stopped immunizations in mid-December 1976. Later, the Carter administration determined that the risk from something untoward happening with the vaccine was less than the risk of the flu. So they reintroduced the vaccines, I think it was in February of 1977, a few months after the suspension.

Smith: We talked to Vice President Cheney who remembered a meeting in the Cabinet Room with the President and Jonas Salk and Dr. Sabin—the giants in the field. Do you remember that?

Mathews: I do. This is what we did. The Centers for Disease Control (CDC) recommended that we have a national immunization program. They said we just can’t afford to take any chances with the health of the American people. I think it was the right call. But at HEW, we checked with people who were not at CDC to see if there were any dissenting views in the medical community. The White House did the same with its contacts. Then we jointly brought together all of the independent parties, including Sabin and Salk. The reason for having them both there was that they seldom agreed about anything. If there was to be dissent, it was quite likely that it would come out at the meeting in the White House.

In the meeting, we went over the data and the recommendations and asked if there were any second thoughts. Then the President said, “I’m going to go into my office and if any of you have something to say to me, come and talk to me.” Nobody came. He went on camera, announced the program, and then took the shot. I think he may have been influenced by a World War II mindset; if you’re going to lead the troops, get out front. I do remember saying to him, “this is a no-win situation. If the virus is virulent and comes, we’re going to be accused of not being prepared enough. If it doesn’t come, we’re going to be accused of squandering millions of dollars and God only knows what else. I’ll be happy to make this announcement and you can stay presidential.” “No, no,” he said, “I’ve got to do it myself.” Out he went.

Smith: It’s revealing. Wonderful story. That raises the larger question about his style of leadership. How did Cabinet meetings operate, for example? Were they frequent? Was it more a kind of information sharing? Was there debate, general debate over policies?

Mathews: The Cabinet meetings were lively, but you have to see them in the context of the other contacts with the President. I found Ford very accessible. I have talked to Cabinet Secretaries in other administrations, and some said they seldom saw their president. We, however, had easy access. I called him on several occasions to ask about how to deal with various problems. I never was unable to pick up the phone and talk or make an appointment.

Of course, as you would imagine, there were debates in Cabinet and other meetings. These were substantive, and Ford had wonderful ways of dealing with differences. I remember we had some flap over the Social Security System in a meeting of the President and the system’s three trustees: the Secretaries of Treasury, Labor, and HEW. We were disagreeing about something or other when Ford motioned to Bill Usery, the Labor Secretary, saying, “Come on with me. Let David and Bill Simon, the Secretary of Treasury, work out these differences.” And we did. These sorts of meetings were quite common.
Smith: Carla Hills, among others, has regaled us with stories of friendly disagreements with OMB that would wind up in with the President, Solomon-like, hearing them . . .

Mathews: Having to decide where the money went.

Smith: Did you have a situation with that?

Mathews: I did once, right after I had arrived. The issue was whether to continue funding for medical scholarships when a shortage of physicians appeared to have been eliminated. I was concerned, however, about the lack of doctors trained to practice in rural areas and inner cities. Remember that my experience in Alabama was with developing a new way to practice medicine in rural areas. Putting one doctor alone in small communities wasn’t going to work. They couldn’t even keep up with the number of patients. We had to design an educational program for primary care physicians that would show them how to involve their communities because communities and their social networks can affect people’s health. Today, we are quite aware of the social determinants of health. A lot of hospital admissions are connected to behaviorally related illnesses, type 2 diabetes, for example. If you want to change behavior, you can use an educational campaign or impose various sorts of prohibitions. But peer group influence and support, social scientists have shown, is more likely to bring about change. I found an ally for the kind of community-based health care that I was advocating in Margaret Mead, who had been calling attention to social indicators and community involvement for some time.

I thought we should continue scholarships to encourage students to go into community medicine. But that was not in the OMB budget. I made my case based on my experience and got the money back. That was a very pleasant victory. You didn’t win many victories over OMB because they control the budget.

Smith: And the President was a fiscal conservative.

Mathews: Indeed, he was a fiscal conservative. And that meant we weren’t going to be able to start any expensive programs. But I didn’t find Ford draconic, and he didn’t have an antagonistic attitude toward HEW. Evidently some White Houses considered HEW to be the worst of the worst.

Smith: Particularly Republican administrations.
Mathews: Yes, that’s right. Yet Ford never indicated anything like that to me, or certainly I didn’t feel that in dealing with Jim Cannon and the White House staff. I remember OCR, which was especially controversial. It was the lightning rod of all lightning rods for the department. Every rights-based interest group was focused on OCR. And the office had been named in numerous federal lawsuits, such as the Adams v. Weinberger case on discrimination against African Americans.

Smith: OCR being?

Mathews: Office of Civil Rights. In the Adams case, OCR was sued for not handling complaints from African Americans fast enough. There was a backlog of cases. The court said OCR must handle these cases immediately. However, as I mentioned before, when OCR shifted staff to comply, the Mexican American community then sued on the grounds that it was being neglected. That group wasn’t being totally neglected, but OCR had to obey the Adams court order.

OCR, with limited resources, was getting bombarded by one group and then another. I recall asking for an additional 400 staff; we didn’t get that many, although we did get a hefty increase of 150 positions. Still, that didn’t address the fundamental problem, which was that the department was under so many different court orders that it was pulled in multiple directions. Finally, the Carter administration asked the courts to consolidate some of their orders because the department was in an impossible situation.

Smith: From its beginning, I have a sense that HEW had been viewed as an administrative challenge, a real hodgepodge of agencies and functions. What were the challenges in an administrative sense that you faced?

Mathews: HEW was, at that time, the largest department in our government. It is said to have had a budget that was larger than all but six of the budgets of other countries. So in a sense, it was the seventh largest country in the world. And what looked like a hodgepodge of programs was actually components of a fairly coherent vision for the department: compassion for those who needed help; protection for those who needed to be protected against dangerous foods and drugs; justice for those who were underserved. The department had some historical memory of that vision for putting the pieces together, although it was somewhat obscured by contemporary pressures.
Under pressure from various interests, however, the department was subject to being Balkanized. Each interest group focused on its own office in HEW, and each office tried to respond to its own constituency. This Balkanization worked against comprehensive policies. Such separation was unnatural (health, education, and welfare are interrelated), and some of the Secretaries (like John Gardner) kept the pressure on for inclusive and complementary strategies. I admired these Secretaries and, consequently, was never a fan of breaking up the department.

Smith: And that brings to mind one of the real initiatives of the Ford presidency, which was deregulation.

Mathews: Yes, right.

Smith: And how did HEW fit into that?

Mathews: We were at the center of the regulatory universe on the most sensitive subjects. We had to handle these sensitive issues case-by-case. One of the things we did in the interest of regulatory reform was, as I mentioned, to raise the question, of who regulates the regulators? We also made changes in the federal procedures to put draft regulations before the public early on. Our political system is predicated on the assumption that laws shouldn’t be passed without full consideration. What is that line in Thomas More’s Utopia about not acting on proposals until time had been allowed to reflect on them? That’s a cardinal precept in our democracy. Nonetheless, as I said before, regulations, which have the same force as law, don’t have to be debated openly.

We changed the federal procedures to require a notice of intent to regulate before a regulation could be posted in the Federal Register. Otherwise, in the interest of expediency, the bureaucracy would publish a draft regulation, that was, in effect, a final regulation. We were trying to change that process with an early alert, the notice of intent. We also publicized draft regulations more broadly than just in the Federal Register. I mean, how many people sit down and read the Federal Register every day? The wider publication, we hoped, would allow “just folks” to comment. The system favored organized interests, not average citizens. Interest groups tracked the regulatory hearings; they were already close to what was happening because they had former staff in the regulatory agencies and on the Hill. They were in an ideal position to influence the regulations, which was their job. We were not trying to block their influence, but simply trying to open up the process.

Smith: One senses the thrust of the Ford presidency was economic deregulation. No one ever suggested rolling the clock back in terms of food safety and the like.

Mathews: You are right. In the final analysis, the department had to regulate, and citizens wanted some things regulated. They didn’t want food safety deregulated; they didn’t want their drugs deregulated. We just wanted to open the process to more voices.

Smith: Was there a wall between the 1976 campaign, the overt politics of that period, and what you were doing every day?

Mathews: There is no such thing as a wall in an election year. It just colors everything. However, electoral politics was kept at arm’s length at HEW. Some Cabinet officers like Ed Levi said, “It’s not appropriate for the attorney general to be out campaigning as a partisan.”

Smith: Levi, I take, is a very impressive guy.

Mathews: Yes, he was. He was a solid fellow—the kind of person that you’d like to see in government. Ford came into office under unusual circumstances, and many of us who came into government then may never have come otherwise. Some of us didn’t come up the usual party ranks. I am an independent, although I did some work for the Ford campaign at the end of the administration. I took exception to Ford being stereotyped as not “swift on the uptake” and remember doing a campaign ad comparing Ford to a dependable long-distance runner, someone you could count on.

Occasionally, we would get weird accusations coming out of the presidential campaign, like the charge that the swine flu initiative was a scare tactic intended to boost Ford’s popularity. There wasn’t any talk of the presidential campaign when making the swine flu decision. It could be that some overenthusiastic staffers thought they could use the flu campaign for political benefit. Who knows? I didn’t think the flu scare was a vote getter.

Smith: Tell me about your overall impression of his intelligence.

Mathews: Ford was a very bright man. And he knew how to get things done. He had an especially keen social intelligence: the ability to read people, to know what was possible. Ford was sensible and pragmatic. Yet America was entering an ideological age. Maybe Ford was the last true pragmatist—someone who concentrated on making the political system work. That seemed to me to be his abiding vision of government—it ought to work for people.

Smith: Among his great frustrations in losing in 1976 was that he felt that he had just, in effect, mastered the job, when he lost it. That he had learned the difference between congressional leadership and executive leadership. That he had really grown into the office, learned how to be President.

Mathews: He held very high standards for himself. He could be disappointed with his performance. And those were dark moments for him.

Smith: Did you see him right around the time of the election?

Mathews: Yeah, off and on. Everybody was traveling right around the election. But after the election, yeah.

Smith: What was his mood right after?

Mathews: My sense of him after the election was of resilience. That he knew himself well, and he knew how to bounce back from a defeat.

Smith: Someone who was around him said the next day, and for some time thereafter, he would sort of walk around the White House saying, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Mathews: I’ll tell you a story about Ford’s resilience. I have known Jimmy Carter for some time and respect him. He was part of that little group of Southern progressives I mentioned earlier—Terry Sanford, Reuben Askew, and a few college/university presidents. During the election, Ford and Carter didn’t have a lot of good things to say about one another. Nonetheless, they joined forces in 1983 to promote a stronger role for citizens, and I had the opportunity to work with both of them again. After I left office, I teamed up with the dean of public attitude research, Dan Yankelovich, to work on a concern we shared about the lack of opportunities for average citizens to understand government policies, particularly those policies that affect people’s daily lives: the education of their children, their own health, their economic security.
I came out of Washington determined to try to do something about creating a more knowledgeable and public voice. And the Kettering Foundation gave me that opportunity. I thought the country needed a Domestic Policy Association to be an equivalent of the Foreign Policy Association. Dan Yankelovich and Cyrus Vance had created an organization called Public Agenda that seemed an ideal partner for this venture. Dan had noticed in his work on public attitudes that there was a qualitative difference between first opinions and more considered judgments. He saw polls would go up and down, and then right before an election attitudes could stabilize. People had moved in making up their minds and had come to a conclusion. Opinion had changed into judgment. So to assist in this maturing of attitude, we designed citizens’ briefing books that are fair in the presentation of a range of legitimate policy choices. These books help people move from first impressions to more reflective and shared judgment. This was the beginning of the National Issues Forums (NIF) books.

The first NIF book was on financing Social Security. Alan Greenspan was then heading a bipartisan commission to look at the looming deficit, and he was nice enough to let his staff work with us on this briefing book for public forums. Then we faced the question, who is going to hear the result of these forums? We talked to Fred Friendly, a great media guru who said that nobody in the press was going to be interested because the outcomes of the forums were going to be dull. So I went to Plains, Georgia, to see Jimmy Carter. I told him what we were trying, and asked him if he would cosponsor a presentation of the results of the Social Security forums at the new Ford Library. He agreed and joined Jerry Ford. I’ve forgotten whether this meeting was before or after the two former Presidents’ flight to the Sadat funeral.

Smith: I think it was before, just before.

Mathews: Yeah, perhaps it was. [Actually, the funeral was October 19, 1981, and the meeting was February 9-10, 1983.] I recall sitting at one end of a table in the library with President Ford, while my wife, Mary, sat at the other end with President Carter. I had said to Mary, “If the conversation goes badly, just rattle the dishes.” Well, it didn’t; the two former Presidents had become good friends, which was nice to see. And the reports on NIF forums have become an ongoing series. In fact, all of the presidential libraries have now done these forums on the election issues.
Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Mathews: Here, in Washington, on his 90th birthday.

Smith: Yeah.

Mathews: What I remember about that occasion, and you will, too, is that he wanted to do well and thought his speech wasn’t up to his standards. For those who heard him, we thought the speech was fine, but Gerald Ford had really high, exacting standards for himself. I got that same impression from talking with his son, Mike Ford.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Mathews: In context. I think if you take Gerald Ford out of Grand Rapids, you’ve missed a good part of what he was all about. I’m from a small town right across the river from the community where Nelle Harper Lee lives—the place she wrote about in To Kill a Mockingbird. I could relate to Ford because Grand Rapids was not simply a geographic location. It was home; it was a place that he had strong feelings for and a place he understood. I could explain the things that I had taken away from my own town, Grove Hill, Alabama, and he would understand what I was talking about.

Ford’s unique qualities also become apparent when you see him in the context of what was happening in the 1970s in the political system.

There’s a very interesting book about the 1970s, It Seemed Like Nothing Happened. The author, Peter Carroll, shows that the decade was actually a time of great transition. Ford was well-suited for a decade of transitions because he was a president who remembered who we were and where we had been yet also had a sense of where we needed to go. For example, having experienced the integration of the armed services, his generation knew that the segregationist regimes were wrong. I’m sure you heard Ford talk about the impact of his personal experiences with his black teammate in football.

A president who can look back and forward at the same time has a perspective that visionaries are not likely to have because visionaries are prone to miss what is behind, perhaps even demonize it. And somebody who is rooted firmly in the past is going to try to hold on to that too much. So I think if you put Ford in that context, you can see what he really meant to the country.
I think Gerald Ford will also be remembered in the context of today’s hyperpolarized political system. Ford was a staunch Republican, yet his partisanship didn’t preclude personal friendships with Democrats. He had very good friends on the other side of the aisle. And he brought that capacity for building good working relationships with him to the White House. It was a constant as he tried to move the political system in the direction he felt it should go. Sometimes he was successful, and sometimes not. There were a lot of vetoes. Still, Ford didn’t change his style; he didn’t have an enemy list that I know of. I don’t know that anybody could have saved us from the hyperpartisanship that we have now. But Ford helped foster bipartisanship by who he was and what he did.

Smith: The older I get the more I’m inclined to believe that ideology, although it may be important to many people, is ultimately trumped by generational politics. Go back to Grand Rapids—Ford was of a generation of conservatism, which had a healthy skepticism about the ability of government to engage in social engineering. But it was consistent skepticism. It said, I don’t really want government in the boardroom, or the classroom, or the bedroom. And it evolved into a kind of social conservatism, which on the one hand said I don’t trust Washington, but was perfectly willing to use government to enforce its own social agenda.

Mathews: Yeah.

Smith: And I’ve often thought that the Fords were almost marooned at the end of his life with the Republican Party.

Mathews: That’s right. He was certainly an economic conservative, and I wouldn’t disagree with you on his understanding of the limits of government. However, in terms of my dealings with him at HEW, he was moderate to progressive on social issues. Take his position on Title IX, which had to do with women’s rights, including the right to have access to intercollegiate sports. He was also very helpful to us in higher education on affirmative action. If you took all of the African Americans with PhDs that institutions of higher education had promised to hire, it was something like a hundred times the population that was available. The government accepted all of the promises, yet it didn’t do enough to increase the supply. So we created a program at HEW called the Graduate and Professional Opportunities Program; it identified kids early on and put them on track for academic careers that their circumstances would otherwise have precluded. Ford was very supportive of the program; no problems with OMB. The Carter administration picked it up and succeeding administrations funded it until 1995. These are some of the reasons I would count President Ford as a moderate to progressive on social issues by today’s standards.

Smith: And what’s the story behind Title IX?

Mathews: Well, Title IX is the Betty Ford story. I’m sure of that.

Smith: Speculate for us.

Mathews: It’s just a matter of fairness. Betty was very much a champion of women’s issues. You have to remember that the Fords’ generation was not too different from my parents’. Competitive sports for men dominated. That was the case in my high school in the 1950s; and at the University of Alabama, men’s sports certainly flourished under coaches like Paul “Bear” Bryant. If we didn’t win the national championship in football, alumni thought it was a bad year. After Title IX was implemented and I returned to the university, I realized that we needed an equally good sports program for the women who wanted to participate. Although the student affairs office started the program, the athletic department took the responsibility shortly after its inception. Paul Bryant’s attitude was if there were to be a sports program, it should be excellent, and his department should manage and pay for it. The women’s program at Alabama continues to do exceedingly well.

The Fords had that same attitude. Of course, there have been some problems with Title IX. There will always be questions of what’s fair to both men and women, and there will inevitably be disputes over the standards for compliance. Yet implementing Title IX, which wasn’t just about sports, was the right thing to do.

Smith: I sense that Mrs. Ford was an influence in many ways.

Mathews: I always felt that. She was never pushy, and he never said to do something because Betty insisted. But I can’t believe that she didn’t have considerable influence.

Smith: Anything else?

Mathews: Two other things in the Ford administration we ought to talk about a little bit. One is fraud and abuse in welfare. Paul Light has done some very good research on public administration. But he missed something and admitted it when he asked me about a study that he was doing for Congress on HHS. It had to do with the creation of the Office of Inspector General in HEW, which was established in the Ford administration. Remember, the courts had ruled in ways that opened the doors to welfare in the mid-1970s. Cases were mushrooming; costs were skyrocketing. The volume made the system susceptible to fraud, although I don’t want to imply that all problems resulted from criminal behavior. Many problems had to do with discrepancies between what the federal government wanted and what the social service agency required.

That caveat aside, fraud was a serious problem, and we added an inspector general to the department to investigate it. Later on, in 1978, Congress passed an act authorizing the office. But it was created within the department in concert with the Ford administration’s position on fiscal responsibility.

There were other innovations in the Ford administration, such as an effort to empower local committees, which we’ve already talked about.

The second issue has to do with the Social Security System. The system was entering a crisis because, you remember, the Nixon administration had double indexed the benefits, thinking inflation was coming. The government was making generous payouts, assuming that inflation would hit the salaries, and they would go up. Well, that didn’t happen. As a result, the Social Security System was in danger of running out of money. This problem was compounded by a growing imbalance between the number of workers paying into the system and the number of citizens receiving benefits. We, the trustees of the system in the Ford administration, demonstrated that the problem was real and serious, that it wasn’t a partisan ploy. Using the department’s analysis, I met with Jimmy Carter and Walter Mondale to demonstrate to their satisfaction that a real crisis was looming. Fortunately, the Carter administration took measures to shore up the system for a time.

There were other significant handoffs to the Carter administration, which says something about the Ford administration. The Carter administration completed some things that we had begun, and their follow-through should be acknowledged.

Smith: I’ve often thought—people tend to think of the Nixon-Ford administration—but in fact, Nixon is the last New Deal President in many ways.
Mathews: That’s exactly right.

Smith: And Ford is much more about anticipating future developments than he is about completing old business.

Mathews: That’s right. To my way of thinking, the Nixon and Johnson administrations had themes much like those in the New Deal. I think of Ford and Carter as transition presidents. They came in at a time when the presidency had been weakened, Congress was fragmented, and the interest groups were more powerful. Ford and Carter deserve to be judged by what they did that began to rebalance the system, even though the results of some of their efforts weren’t evident until after they left office.

Smith: We’re on the same page.

Mathews: Good. What we are saying about the connection between administrations, even when they are of different parties, reminds me of a recent book by Gareth Davies, See Government Grow. It deals with programs that begin in one administration but don’t mature until much later. Do you know Gareth? He’s at Oxford and has written one of the best histories of our welfare system that I’ve seen; it’s neither right nor left. In the book I mentioned, Gareth wrote about Johnson and his major initiative in education, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which was related to his War on Poverty. Republicans denounced that program but later spent more on it than the Democrats had. Gareth concluded that although Americans are antistatist, they like everything the government does. Whether or not that is true, what one administration plants often flowers much later in another.

Smith: How did you first cross paths with Gerald Ford?

Mehney: I met Jerry probably in the late ’60s – ’69-’70, when he was a congressman. And then in 1972 - I started my business in ’66 – built a new building in ’67, which was 10,000 square feet and every year we added on to it. And then in 1972, we doubled it. I think it went from 70,000 up to 140,000, we put in an exercise room for our people, sauna, bath, racquet ball court, and all that. I asked Jerry if he would come and cut the ribbon. We knew each other, but we really got to know each other after that. He came and cut the ribbon as a congressman.

Smith: Tell us about your business.

Mehney: I was a Kawasaki motorcycle distributor in five states and probably was very instrumental in putting Kawasaki on the map because I became very, very close to the Japanese. We brought a lot of their engineers over here. The thing about Japanese engineers - all engineers are good - but the Japanese engineers – “Oh, ah so, we understand what you want and what you need. We can do that.” European engineers, on the other hand, say, “This is the right way to do it. This is what you’re going to get. This is it.”

Smith: I assume, in 1972, this was a city and a culture less accustomed to welcoming foreigners?

Mehney: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Than it is forty years later?

Mehney: Yeah. Even back when I got in the motorcycle business, although there was still that sentiment out there, Pearl Harbor and all that. This is interesting, because my first year in Japan was 1967, and I made a point to try to learn their culture and how they thought and all that. It’s really an amazing culture and customs. Like when President Nixon was in China, and he toasted with the president of China; our people didn’t think anything about that. And I said, “Holy cow, this is something special,” because the Orientals, the Chinese and the Japanese, if they don’t respect you and don’t like you, they don’t toast with you. Period. And they don’t usually invite them to their homes. I said this is really special because you have to really be special to be invited to one of their homes.

Knowing their culture and everything has made a big difference. I know how a lot of Americans still feel about the Japanese because of Pearl Harbor. I said, “How do the Japanese feel about the Americans because of the A-bomb?” And they told me; on the contrary, they think it was the right thing to do. They do not hold Americans guilty at all because they had been lied to by their leaders. We’re winning the war; die before you surrender. And they knew the United States had two choices: drop the bomb or invade. If they invaded there could be millions of people killed from both sides.

Smith: Have you been to Hiroshima?

Mehney: I’ve never been there. They’ve taken me everywhere, but I’ve never been there.

Smith: We went a few years ago. It’s an extraordinary place, very moving.

Mehney: I thought that was unique on their part. And the other thing that was very interesting; they showed me everything. Kawasaki was a conglomerate; they made their ships, they made their best planes in World War II - not the Zero - but the best ones and they were bombed on from the U.S. I saw some of the ruins and all that. But what was really unique, during the Vietnam War, there were only two companies that made that twin, Vertol helicopters that the Marines use – Boeing, Kawasaki. They all were taken to Kawasaki for reconditioning, and Kawasaki was also making a two-man camouflage jet bomber. They showed me all that, but they said, “You cannot take pictures of it. But we’ll show it to you.” So I couldn’t take any pictures. And the reason why the Japanese people, even today, you’ll understand this, under no circumstances do they like war. They’d been through it. They’d had it on their home ground. They’d been through it, so if the Japanese people knew Kawasaki was doing this, they would be frowned on by their people.

Smith: I assume you didn’t get Congressman Ford on a motorcycle.

Mehney: No, but some of his buddies did; one of his close buddies, Dick Gillett, rode a motorcycle. I had him on a motorcycle and he used to drive it back and forth to the country club.

Smith: Let me back up a bit because we hear how almost legendary a figure he was as a congressman. What was it about Congressman Ford that made him so effective? And so popular?

Mehney: I guess you’d say it all – because he’s ‘Jerry.’ He insisted on being called Jerry, even as a president. He really listened to the people; I think he wasn’t controversial, and he tried to work things out on both sides of the aisle. He had friends on both sides of the aisle and I’ll tell you about that a little bit later. I’ve watched him from a congressman to a vice president and to a president, and his personality never changed, it never went to his head. He was still the same person. No ego. Humble, and just really a good, honest person.

Back to the motorcycles. He was never on a bike, but his youngest son, Steve, was in high school and his parents caught him smoking. And his mother and dad said, “What will it take, Steve, to get you to quit smoking?” And he was probably sixteen years old at the time, and Steve says, “Dad, if you buy me a motorcycle, I’ll quit smoking.” Now, what do you do as a parent? What’s worse – smoking or motorcycles? Jerry called me and he said, “What should I do?” And I said, “Well, Jerry, do you have a farm – places he can ride the motorcycle to keep him off the road?” He said, “Yes, we do. There are places here we can do that.” I said, “Then I would get him a motorcycle.

I’ll tell you what, you send Steve back here for four or five days, and we have a big field in the back of our facility and I’ll have my best guys train him how to handle a motorcycle.” The worst part of a motorcycle is the first week or two of ownership. Your instincts aren’t there. You’ve always got to pay attention to what’s ahead of you. “You do that, and we’ll offer that to you.”
The interesting thing is that because I had Dick Gillette, I had like nine Detroit Tigers, Mickey Lolich, Bill Freehand, Mickey Stanley, and others of the Tiger’s World Series, on motorcycles - and what I would do, I would give them the motorcycle, title it in their name so they are responsible for it and they’ve got to pay the insurance. At the end of the year, they give it back to me and I give them another one. I said, “I’ll do the same thing for you, Jerry.” Politically, that’s probably not correct, but that’s what happened. And we did that and Steve came and we trained him and for three or four years he honored it, and quit smoking and Jerry was very, very appreciative of that.

Smith: That’s a great story. So in ’72 you have your ribbon cutting. And then obviously life gets very interesting for him.

Mehney: Right.

Smith: Let me ask you, because we’ve got conflicting reports - someone who I probably shouldn’t mention suggested that he was part of what I would call for lack of a better word, a kitchen cabinet. A very small, informal group who met and who, while Ford was vice president, not long before Nixon’s resignation, pressed him to acknowledge the fact that he might be president and get ready, etc., etc. And other people have said, “Well, we’ve never heard of the existence of such a group, and it doesn’t sound like Ford.” Does any of that ring a bell with you?

Mehney: I don’t buy any of that. It’s interesting. I talked to Jerry Ford that Friday morning before Nixon announced that he was going to be vice president. That morning, as a congressman; and I’ll tell you the conversation.

Smith: Was Ford vice president at this point?

Mehney: No, no. Ford was congressman. Maybe it was a Saturday. It was a Friday or Saturday, whenever…

Smith: Before he was nominated to be vice president?

Mehney: Nixon announced it that afternoon or early evening. I talked to him early that morning because I had to catch a flight to Dallas because my sister was getting married. I talked to him before I left, and when I got there I watched the news conference, and during this conversation in the morning – we were talking about some other things – but then I said, “You know, Jerry, there’s a lot of talk about you being the next vice president.” And he said, “Yeah, there is. And the reason why is because the Democrats know I have no ambition to be president. They know that I just serve this and then at the end of the two years, or whatever it is, I go away.” And that was appealing to him. “I got along with both sides of the aisle and I’m very non-controversial.” And that’s big to them. So it would be an easy thing.

But you know what he said? “But you know who Nixon really wants?” And I said, “No, who?” And he said, “Connally. But they know they can’t get him because he does have aspirations to be the president. He quit the Democratic Party and join the Republican Party – that would have been a war so we couldn’t afford to do that.” And I said, “Well, you know Jerry, it’s not every day somebody asks you to be vice president.” We kind of chuckled and I said, “As a matter of fact, it’s not every day somebody from Grand Rapids is asked to be vice president.” And we chuckled about that. I would bet you my life that he did not know that, that morning.

Smith: Okay.

Mehney: Even though he knew he was in the picture.

Smith: That also raises another interesting thing, a very interesting thing. And it’s kind of hard by its very nature to nail down. Everyone talks about him being a man without guile, which is not necessarily a man without ambition, or even calculation. And I wonder whether he knew there were people who underestimated him, people who tended to write him off for whatever reason. “Good old Jerry.” And whether he used that - appearing naïve, particularly in a place like Washington, is not a bad strategy. My hunch is by the morning of that day he probably had a pretty good idea that he was [the choice].

Mehney: You’re right – there’s no question, if he knew what was going to happen he wasn’t going to tell me. That’s just my impression by reading between the lines. And I could be all wrong, but that’s my impression. And I was also told later on, he was at home on the telephone in the afternoon when he got a call from the President, and he put the President on hold for a minute while he was finishing his phone call. So that also tends me to believe that maybe that was the phone call that…

Smith: Iced it.

Mehney: That iced it. And so that’s why I feel he didn’t know about it in the morning. And the other thing that I think is very interesting, and I don’t know if anybody has ever said this in your interviews, but I was also told he took three people from Grand Rapids. Phil Buchen, who was a very close friend and very well respected attorney here in town; of course, Bill Seidman, who everybody knows; and then his buddy Jack Stiles.

Smith: Tell me about Jack Stiles, because he clearly was an important figure in all of this and he may be the least well known, certainly outside of the local community. Who was Jack Stiles, and why was he as close as he was?

Mehney: I can’t answer that because I didn’t know him at the time. I know the name. The interesting thing is, I am part owner of Thousand Oaks Golf Club, which is all the land that Jack Stiles owned at one time. In fact, when Jerry was still playing golf, I wanted him to come back and play there one time because this is all solid oaks and rolling woods, and everything else, and he had his retreat there. And this is where he got away and I know he had a lot of his political friends go out there, because it was twelve minutes from downtown, but you think you’re up north. And when Jack went to Washington, kids from two school found it and by the time we got it and started clearing it, which was in 1998, it was trashed because they partied there all the time. And then when Jack was killed in an auto accident, a friend of mine is the one who bought it from his estate, and that’s how I got involved in it. But that’s about all I know. I think Jack Stiles was probably very politically oriented and knew a lot of politicians and they did a lot of things together and all that. Jerry is a very loyal guy to his friends and his people. Very loyal.

Smith: That’s interesting. Tell us about Phil Buchen.

Mehney: Phil Buchen - I happened to be in high school with his daughter, she’s two years behind me, so I knew him – but I was young and respected him. But to me, he was a brilliant guy, very trustworthy and a very solid person. And when you’re in Washington, you’ve got to have somebody like that. And the story that was told to me, and I believe it, because I heard it from good sources when it became known – when Nixon got into trouble – what does he do? And supposedly Buchen and Ford went to Camp David together to discuss it. And I think Phil was there to tell him what he can do, can’t do with the law, from that point of view. And that’s when Jerry decided we cannot afford to go through a long ordeal with a trial with Nixon and he pardoned him. Cost him the election, but the two of them, that’s what I was told and I believe that, where they went up to Camp David and they made that decision. The best thing we can do for the country is end it. And he was spot on. Unfortunately, the rest of the people in the country didn’t understand it.

Smith: When the pardon was initially announced, what kind of reaction happened here in Grand Rapids?

Mehney: You know, I don’t remember any kind of reaction one way or the other. Maybe because I agreed with that decision, because the last thing you need is to tear the country down. And he did the right thing, and unfortunately – I was invited to the funeral and all the things that went on at the funeral, and the whole country – now they all come up and praise him for that decision. It’s too bad they couldn’t have done that in his lifetime.

Smith: He lived long enough to know that most people had come around. So he had that satisfaction. Of course, the kids grew up in Washington, really. And Mrs. Ford was there. Did you know her at all?

Mehney: Yes, and my impression is, she was happy for him to be vice president and go back home. She didn’t like the limelight, she didn’t like all the stuff that goes with it. She’s just a very nice person that doesn’t care for all this stuff. But she would do whatever for Jerry. She was just hoping, I think, that he would serve his two years as vice president and then come home.

Smith: They were going to come back to Grand Rapids.

Mehney: Come back to Grand Rapids. And they moved to California for very good reasons, mainly because of Betty’s health and all that. It was much better for her to live there than here. But this is still always home to them and they were always very special here.

Smith: Were there people upset at the time that they moved to Palm Springs, California?

Mehney: There were people that were; but that’s shallow. They don’t really understand that this is the best thing for Betty for the health reason. A lot of people move to Arizona and Palm Springs for health reasons. That’s the best thing for her. And I think they eventually got over that and they realized it. But at the beginning you heard a little bit of rumblings here and there.

Smith: And he did come back.

Mehney: A lot. And always did whatever he could for the community. Well, look where he’s buried. That says it all right there.

Smith: Yeah.

Mehney: And that’s where Betty will be, too.

Smith: Did you see him at all during the presidency?

Mehney: Yes, two things: one, Guy Vander Jagt, and I don’t know if anybody has ever talked about Guy.

Smith: Can I tell you what President Ford said? Obviously, they were friends – but he held up Guy Vander Jagt as the perfect example of a very talented congressman who forgot where he came from. In the sense that as he went national, he spent less and less time back home, creating a situation where he was vulnerable. It’s interesting that Ford, who had a safe seat, throughout his congressional career, never made that mistake.

Mehney: Right. And that’s true, he’d come back here. Like Cedar Springs, it’s a little small community north of here, for the annual Red Pajamas, or whatever they called it.

Smith: Red Flannel Days.
Mehney: He was always there. I mean, Jerry never did forget and was always here. But Guy Vander Jagt – now Jerry became president, and from my perspective, that really wasn’t his ambition or goal. But once he got there, he loved it. He absolutely loved it, and that’s why he ran again. And he was doing a lot of good, too. Guy Vander Jagt had an idea; there’s an artist in town. You’ve heard of him, Paul Collins. You see his work, black artist. And I knew Paul. I met Paul right when I got started in the motorcycle business in 1965. Paul is one of these people who can really do a portrait of somebody and you almost think it was a picture. He has a great talent. And Guy came up with this idea: let’s have Paul depict Jerry’s life and some of the key things that really mean a lot to him in his lifetime. And they set up a committee, and it was a black committee and then Paul asked me to be on the committee. I was the only white guy on the committee. Bobby Butler was the chairperson.

Smith: That raises a question - because African-Americans generally vote Democratic. Was he involved with that part of the community?

Mehney: I can’t honestly answer that, other than my gut shot feeling here locally, yes. Let’s say they are more for him than what they would be throughout the United States, because history shows usually 80% of them vote Democratic. But he had no racial bones in his body at all. It was very good and I’ll tell you one of the things that happened. What Guy wanted to do, it was his feeling, you unveil this thing about thirty days to forty-five days before the election, because you have a black artist doing this thing with Ford. Terrific idea.

Smith: Yeah, very good idea.

Mehney: Terrific idea. So this started probably in the summer a year before the election. I was invited to a State Dinner in Washington – Linda and I were invited to a State Dinner, which was a thrill. And it was in the fall. At that time I said we need to raise money to pay for this whole thing, to pay the artist. So I came up with the idea: let’s do reproductions and if Jerry will sign it and Paul will sign it, I’ll number them and we’ll sell them for two hundred dollars. We’ll do one hundred and fifty of them. I thought, “Gee, the President of the United States puts his signature on that, you get a copy of it and there’s only a hundred and fifty. At two hundred dollars, I’m doing you a favor.” So when I was at the State Dinner, I asked Jerry if he would sign them and he said, “Absolutely.” And so it was a done deal.

Well, then, the next two or three months gone by, four months, nothing was happening. And I was getting nervous. I said, “You know, I’m going to get out of this thing because I’m not going to embarrass him and I’m not going to embarrass myself.” I’m in Florida on spring break, and I’m at a club eating and I get a call from Guy Vander Jagt. And I don’t know how the hell he knew I was there, or how he found me; but I guess they can find you wherever you are. He begged me to stay on. So I came back and I said, “All right, I will,” and I told Paul, “You and I are making a deal. I’ll guarantee you the money, you guarantee me that gets done, because there is not going to be any embarrassment here.” And so we did that.

Well then, I had an idea to help plan that event, and so during that time I had conversations with Jerry also. I had the whole thing outlined. I said, “What do you think about this?” Back to your one question: one of the inner city schools, grade school, first grade through sixth grade, they made cookies and sold them and raised $75 to help this cause. So that kind of gives you an idea what they thought of him in this town. And I thought that was precious. So I went to the grade school and interviewed the principal, and I said, “During our unveiling, I want six kids, a first grader, second grader, third grader, fourth grader, fifth grader, sixth grader. And all they are going to do is they are going to be part of the program; when the right time comes up, they are going to give a bouquet of roses to Betty after the unveiling and then they go sit down.” And then I talked to Rev. Abney, I don’t know if you’ve ever heard of Rev. Abney, but he was the Reverend at the Church of the Pentecostal Choir, which is nationally known. An incredible choir. I asked Rev. would he bring his choir and sing at the unveiling, and had everything planned out and Jerry endorsed everything.

Smith: By the way, had he seen…

Mehney: The mural? No.

Smith: He knew nothing about its contents?
Mehney: No. And I’ll get into that. So now we’re at the ceremony and now it’s the unveiling and he goes on the stage and he unveils it. I don’t know if you’ve seen the mural or not.

Smith: Oh sure.

Mehney: He unveils it. He starts to cry. He’s looking at his parents, he looks at his kids, and he starts to cry. Of course his car’s there, his first home and a lot of the different things. He starts to cry. And the people who were invited for the unveiling at the airport are the ones that really donated to the mural, and their wives or whatever, and so we had quite a number of people there. And I’m up on stage and looking out and everybody is crying. It’s just all the way through the whole thing. And he talked, and of course his lip was quivering and all that, and he was having a rough time because it meant so much to him and got so sentimental when he saw it.

Then after we got through that, it was time for the kids to go up there to give them the roses. You have these black kids go up and give the roses and they are supposed to go and sit down. Jerry grabbed three of them; she grabbed three of them; and was just hugging them and wouldn’t let them leave. And they are just standing there. Then the Pentecostal Choir played God Bless America, and the whole place went down.

Guy’s whole idea was to do this thirty days before the election. You know when it was done? The day of the election. And I’ll guarantee you that if he would have done it thirty days before, he would have won the election because he would have picked up another fifteen-twenty percent of the black vote because they see that; the real man as he is. Guy had all that foresight, which I thought was tremendous.

Smith: It’s a great story.

Mehney: And after he lost the election and the way he was so gracious and how he handled everything; you’d hear it on the streets: people would say, “Jeez, I’m sorry I didn’t vote for him,” because now they saw the real man.
Smith: Yeah. I think that must have been a source of frustration, particularly to people here who felt they knew him - that the rest of the country didn’t see. Or they saw this caricature of Chevy Chase – all the bumbling.

Mehney: And then I think the news made a big deal out of that. He was a star football player; you’re not clumsy, being a star football player in the Big Ten.

Smith: Did you have contacts with him after the presidency?

Mehney: We always shared Christmas cards, and when he came to town, yes, we had contacts with him. I’m not one that pursues somebody and tries to hang on to their coattails. I respect their privacy and so we’ve always remained good friends. All the years, every time I’d see him, he’d bring up Steve and thought I’d saved his life. It was almost embarrassing to me. I didn’t do anything anybody else wouldn’t do. He was very, very appreciative of that and so was Betty. I knew Steve much more than his sister and his brothers, but I knew them a little bit. But Steve was special.

Smith: Was Steve like his dad? He looks like his dad. He’s almost a dead ringer for him in some ways at that age. But I wondered if he was in personality or temperament.

Mehney: That’s hard for me to answer.

Smith: Were you involved at all when all of this [the Ford Museum] took place?

Mehney: I was part of it, but a peon part of it. When we had the grand opening, I was in charge of the fireworks. I love fireworks. What kid doesn’t like fireworks? You grow up loving fireworks. They gave me a budget and I can’t remember, Zambelli or something like that – a big fireworks company out east, Pennsylvania or somewhere. I contacted three people and when I contacted them I said, “You know, this is for President Ford. I’ve got a ten thousand dollar budget, but I need thirty or forty thousand dollars worth of show. What can you do?” And I said, “I want to do something very, very unique for this.” And we came up with; can you do a portrait of Jerry Ford in fireworks? And right across the river here, because a lot of the people are on this side of the river – we’re shooting the fireworks from over by the building over there, so everybody got a great view. And I’m in the pits with the people doing the fireworks, which was a thrill for me. And this thing was probably thirty yards wide and ten yards tall. It was a huge board. And they lit it off, and I can’t remember if it was the ending or the beginning. I think it was maybe in the middle, whatever it was; they lit that up of Jerry Ford and I could just hear the ohhhs and ahhhs, I wish I could have seen it. But I understand it was just gorgeous. It was a great big portrait of Jerry.

Smith: Was that the first time that fireworks on a large scale had been done downtown?

Mehney: That was number one. And now they have the annual one ever since then. They get four or five hundred thousand people down here every September. I can’t come because its football night and I coach football for a high school. That’s the only one I’ve ever been to.

Smith: Really?

Smith Would you tell that story about the State Dinner - your conversation with the President?

Mehney: Okay, yes. When I was at the State Dinner, after dinner people were kind of moseying around. I was talking to Jerry for quite a long time, which I know doesn’t happen because you’ve got to keep moving or whatever. I was talking to him ten-fifteen minutes. And a lot of it was – we got into the mural and all that sort of stuff, but just other things. Some people from the press realized it and they came up to me afterwards and they said, “We noticed you were with him for an extraordinarily long time. What were you talking about?” Well, I know what I wanted to tell them; but I didn’t. I just said, “Well, we were just talking about the fact that the Michigan/Michigan State game is coming up and Jerry wants to go to that game but the Secret Service won’t let him,” because that’s after Squeaky or whatever her name was, after the shooting. “They wouldn’t let him do that and he was kind of upset because he really wanted to see that game.” And that’s the answer I gave the press, but really not what we talked about.

Smith: I assume that’s the only White House State Dinner you’ve ever been to?
Mehney: That’s the only one I’ve ever been to. Probably the only one I’ll ever be to.

Smith: Pretty impressive, isn’t it?

Mehney: Oh, very impressive, and it’s a real ego trip, really. It’s very, very impressive to do that and see that. I don’t remember all the people that were sitting at my table. I think Barbara Walters was there, but we had a good group of people. Henry Kissinger was there, and so you get a chance to meet a lot of these people.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Mehney: That I don’t remember. On one of his trips to Grand Rapids.

Smith: There was the ninetieth birthday that they did. I think that was his last trip back here. Were you surprised by the reaction at the time of his death?

Mehney: You mean how...

Smith: How much there was. Not only locally, but really, nationally.

Mehney: I’m not surprised by it. But boy, it sure made me feel proud. And particularly when the ceremony was here and I was one of the lucky ones invited. And to see our town outpour the way they did for that man, it made me feel proud to be a Grand Rapids person. That was just incredible.

Smith: There really never has been anything like it, has there? And probably won’t be again.

Mehney: No. My dad is an ophthalmologist, and Jerry was one of his patients and he used to always remind me that – and also Senator Vandenberg, who they thought was going to be president, was one of his patients – and he said, “You know, I took care of one president and almost did two.” He bragged about it, he loved that. That was really something special.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Mehney: Well, actually he should be remembered, even though it was a short time, as one of our great presidents, because he came in at a very tough time, and he got the country back together again. And he put down unnecessary spending, he vetoed a lot of things, he did all the things that had to be done. So even for a very short time, he did a whole lot. And probably because he was only there a couple of years, he won’t go down to the kind of recognition he should get. Because not many people go into tough times like that and do what he did.

Smith: He was a true fiscal conservative, wasn’t he?

Mehney: Yes.

Smith: I assume that is part of his legacy from Grand Rapids?

Mehney: Yeah. Grand Rapids is a very conservative town, and as you know, we’re predominantly a Dutch town. They are a hard working, ethical people and they put a great foundation on this community that’s still here today.

Smith: That’s interesting.

Mehney: This is a great town. And thanks to the generations ahead of me, the icons, the DeVos’, the Van Andels, the Meijers, the Cooks, the Pews, and there are a number of others, look what this town has done. What other town in this country have you seen like this and has what we have to offer.

Smith: It’s true.

Mehney: And thanks to those families that give to this community, because they love the community.

Smith: And presumably, the decision to put this [museum] downtown was at least one of the catalysts for what followed and is still ongoing.

Mehney: There are a lot of catalysts and this is one; and when you look at the Meijer Gardens, this place, the [public] Museum, which is now down on the river and all that, there is life in our downtown.

Smith: It’s funny – you wonder though, why it took a while for people to rediscover the river. The river really in many ways is the catalyst for a lot of this.

Mehney: Back in the old days, because we were the furniture capital, that’s how they got a lot of their wood, through the barges from Lake Michigan – right downtown here. And of course, maybe one reason it took a long time is a lot of the old factories were along the river and they were kind of trashy and all that. It just took time for somebody to have the foresight to redevelop it.

Smith: And what was down here before this place was built?

Mehney: I don’t remember exactly what was right here at that time. But there were different older buildings over on this side.

Smith: We know that Fred Meijer offered some land on the outskirts of town for the site. But I guess President Ford felt pretty strongly about wanting it to be downtown.

Mehney: This was the right thing. I think the Grand Rapids Museum – the reason I’m a little aware of that is Peter Cook and I raised the money for the carousel.

Smith: Oh.

Mehney: And there again, Peter is one of my very close friends and he was also very close to Jerry. Peter and I had the last ride on that carousel. I think it came from Pennsylvania. And to watch Peter Cook riding that horse and singing away and having a ball was just precious.

Smith: There’s a famous story about when the museum was dedicated, and the President and Mrs. Ford riding the carousel. Let’s just say she took to it more naturally than he did.

Mehney: Yeah. And unfortunately, that carousel, or the museum went through a political nightmare as to where they were going to build it. People wanted it in different places and finally it prevailed where it is, and I’ll tell you, it couldn’t have been more perfect, either - that carousel out over the river and all that. Funny story about that, Mr. Frey, EJ Frey – he’s another one of our icons, had done a lot for this community and of course, his kids are doing the same. And he bought one of the – what Peter and I did, we came up with ideas, we’re going to sell these animals and you put your name on it, so you owned that animal. And that’s how we paid for it. And Mr. Frey bought one, and this thing is going into turmoil, three or four years before they made a decision, and Mr. Frey called me. I’m good friends with his kids; I played football with John, his oldest son. And he called me and said, “Dave isn’t there something you can do to get this thing done? I want to see it in my lifetime.” I started to laugh and I said, “Mr. Frey, I’m a peon, you’re the icon, you’re the one that can get something done.” And the unfortunate thing is he did pass away before it was finished. He really wanted to see it, and I kind of felt bad for that. But then everything started, as you see now, Medical Mile and so forth is really making a difference, too.

Smith: Is there still a Dutch influence in this town?

Mehney: I would say there still is, but it’s probably not like it was fifty years ago. I mean, if you mowed your grass on Sunday in a Dutch neighborhood – that wasn’t the thing to do. That’s all kind of gone away.

Smith: We’ve heard wonderful stories about people who would buy the Sunday paper on Saturday night and not read it until Monday.

Mehney: Yeah.

Smith: Or paperboys who knew in Dutch neighborhoods, you didn’t throw the paper on the porch on Sunday, you hid it behind this tree or that barrel. Werner Viet told us when he started the Sunday paper he had a delegation of eight Christian Reform ministers call on him and get on their knees and pray for the worst of all sinners, the one who encourages sin in others.

Mehney: But that all slowly has changed. Just like when I was high school in the Fifties, the Christian High School was here, it’s a very good school. No dances, no movies, things like that. Of course, today they have it all, which is better.

Smith: We’ve talked to Rich DeVos at some length, and it’s interesting to listen to Rich, who I guess is trying to bring elements of the Church together. There are, I guess, divisions – and he’s really trying.

Mehney: I think that’s one of his crusades right now, and if anybody can do it, he can.

Smith: Well, that’s true.

Mehney: And he’s spot on, too. That’s the thing. I’m not a religious person, but I really strongly believe everybody should have the right to do what they want to do.
And to have some of the disasters that we have had in this world because of religion makes no sense to me.

Smith: Finally, what has this place meant to the community – the fact that it’s here, that he’s here, what does that mean to Grand Rapids?

Mehney: Oh, I think that’s huge, in my opinion. Think it’s huge the number of people who come to Grand Rapids and they go through this place. I don’t know the numbers, you’ll know the numbers, but this has got to be one of the more popular presidential sites in the country. We get a lot of people come to Grand Rapids and it’s because of this, it’s because of the whole thing – the Meijer Gardens, the museum, everything that’s really been going on here. And in my opinion, this is part of it; Jerry is part of it; but also, our other leaders. You go to any city that’s great, it’s people like the ones that we have here that are willing to put back to make the city special. And this is a very special thing.

Smith: All you have to do is compare this side of the state with the other side of the state, or this city with any other city in Michigan.

Mehney: The people are very, very productive. Just to give you an example of this site, when Kawasaki bought me out they were going to move everything to Lincoln, Nebraska where they have a manufacturing plant - I was part of helping them find places back then. And the manufacturing plant is still there. And they were one of the very first companies to come over here and do that. They did that I think in the late Seventies, around ’75-’76, to make certain motorcycles and jet skis and, at that time, also snowmobiles. And they looked all around and they settled there. But then when they bought me out, they were going to move everything to Lincoln, Nebraska. And I said, “No.” I had two buildings side by side. I said, “No, I’ll leave, you stay.” That way I kept fifty jobs and I just moved next door.

Since then, because of the work ethic that we have in this community, all the other divisions, other than motorcycles, that’s still located in California, but all their other divisions are right here in Grand Rapids. And that’s because of the people and the work ethic. And so that says a lot about our community.

Smith: It does, indeed.
Mehney: They could have gone to Lincoln, they could have gone to California and they chose here and they are still here.

Smith: It also suggests one more reason why Gerald Ford was, in so many ways, emblematic of this community.

Mehney: Yeah.

Smith: A reflection of its values and outlook.

Mehney: The proof’s in the pudding. You saw what he’s done for this community and he’s always come back and everything else. And I guess he could have been buried anywhere he wanted to be, and he picked Grand Rapids. That says it all.

Smith: First of all, obviously, thank you very much for doing this.

Cheney: No, no, it’s nice to be asked. It’s an important subject.

Smith: Before your path crossed with Gerald Ford’s - what’s the concise, Dick Cheney autobiography leading up to, I guess, August of 1974?

Cheney: I grew up in Wyoming, graduate of Wyoming High School, recruited to go Yale – got kicked out twice. The second time they said, “Don’t come back.” Built power lines and transmission lines in the west, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, and then got serious about getting married, and said, I’d better go back and work on my education, which I did at the University of Wyoming.

Lynn and I got married a year later. She was then an instructor. We were the same age, but she moved rapidly through her academic requirements and I didn’t. But I got both my BA and a Masters’ at Wyoming. While I was there, I did a stint in the Wyoming legislature as an intern, which was a new concept in those days, in 1965, with the Republicans in the State Senate – my first political job.

I wrote a paper about that experience and won a national competition and was then selected for a follow on a year later, in 1966, to spend a year with the governor of Wisconsin - all supported by the Ford Foundation and the National Center for Education and Politics. We moved to Madison. Lynn started graduate school, and then I started in Madison. After I finished with the governor, I did all the coursework for a PhD in political science. I had my dissertation left to do, passed my prelims, then went off to Washington to work on a dissertation on another grant – this one from the American Political Science Association.

I spent what was supposed to be a year on the Hill. I moved there in the fall of ’68. It was the year we had Tet and Bobby Kennedy and Martin Luther King assassinated, riots in the cities, the Democratic National Convention. It was a wild time. Liz had been born in Madison, so we had at that stage, a two year old, and moved as poverty-stricken graduate students. All of a sudden we had $500 a month tax free and thought we were in hog heaven. A guy named Don Rumsfeld came and spoke to the group as part of the orientation program that they ran for the Fellows. And I was impressed.

We had to negotiate our own arrangements with members of Congress; we were free help to them. But I asked to interview with Rumsfeld. Went and did an interview with Rumsfeld, and it didn’t last very long. It was the worst interview of my life, and he threw me out – thought I was some kind of fuzzy-headed academic. I thought he was about the most arrogant young man I had ever met. And we were both right to some extent.

I went down the hall and went to work for Bill Steiger from Wisconsin. He was a great guy and a friend of Rumsfeld’s. Working in Bill’s office was a woman named Maureen Drummy, and Maureen had been involved in getting me the fellowship to go to Wisconsin originally. She was a significant player in terms of moving me along in my career, because she would show up, like in the National Center for Education and Politics, and had been involved when I won the award after the state legislature, and then recruited me to work for the governor. Now she’s working for the Congressman and put me on the payroll there.

Shortly after I went to work for Steiger, Rumsfeld got nominated by Nixon to be the director of the Anti-Poverty Program in the Office of Economic Opportunity. Bill was advising Rumsfeld about that because they were friends and Bill was on the committee. I sat down one night and wrote an unsolicited twelve-page memo to Rumsfeld, telling him how he ought to handle himself in his confirmation hearings, what he should do with the agency once he took over. It was a little presumptuous of me because I hadn’t been asked for it, but I gave it to Bill and he really liked it. So he passed it on to Rumsfeld. Then I didn’t hear any more about it for a couple of weeks.

Then Rumsfeld got confirmed and sworn in and I got a phone call from a guy named Frank Carlucci, who was a Princeton buddy of Rumsfeld’s, a foreign service officer who was temporarily detailed to help him over at OEO. Frank invited me to come down the next day and be part of a transition advisory group. They were getting a bunch of academic types and policy wonks together to advise on the transition at OEO. I went down, there were about forty or fifty of us gathered in a room. Rumsfeld came in and spoke and gave us his marching orders and then left. After he left his secretary came in. She said, “Is there somebody here named Cheney?” I held up my hand. She took me out and walked me back into Rumsfeld’s office and Don was working at his desk. This was his first day on the job. The room isn’t even furnished. He’s obviously pressured for time, but he looked up at me and said, “You. You’re Congressional Relations. Now get the hell out of here.” He didn’t say, “I’m sorry I threw you out last time, or I liked the memo, or how would you like to come to work for me. He said, ‘You’re Congressional Relations. Now get out of here.’”

So I went out and asked where Congressional Relations was and they pointed me to it. I went down and took it over and ran the Congressional Relations shop at OEO the last several months of my fellowship. I’m still getting paid by the Ford Foundation and the American Political Science Association. That led into a four year stint with Don. We worked at OEO, we also worked at the White House. We split our time – part of the time during the day at the White House and part of the time at OEO. And then later on, full-time at the White House for about a year, and then when wage-price controls came in, we took over the Cost of Living Council. I was the director of operations for the Cost of Living Council, had three thousand IRS agents who were responsible for enforcing it.

Smith: Was that philosophically difficult?

Cheney: It got more and more philosophically difficult all the time through this. Terrible experience.

Smith: Would you dissent from the Nixonian view that “we’re all Keynesians now” in that instance?
Cheney: The Democrats passed legislation giving Nixon the authority to control prices because inflation was supposedly a big issue. They never dreamed he’d do it. And then he took the authority and used it, imposed the ninety day freeze, and then we moved to flexible rules and regulations. But it was a fundamentally bad idea.

A great story I love about Nixon wage-price controls: we started them in August of ’71, and we moved to flexible controls ninety days later. But we got to the point where we trained the American people to believe that whatever the price of hamburger was, it was the government’s fault. If it went up ten cents a pound, Richard Nixon was the guy that raised my hamburger price. But we got on to the summer of ’72 and it’s the re-election campaign. We had a big meeting over in the Cabinet room one day with the members of the Cost of Living Council, which is about half the Cabinet - anybody with economic responsibilities. John Connally is the chairman of the Council, as Treasury Secretary. Rumsfeld is the executive director. And Nixon was in this meeting.

The debate was whether or not we should refreeze food prices going into the campaign, because there was the perception out there in the public mind that food prices were going up like crazy. So we had this big debate, and in the middle of it Nixon told a story about Nikita Khrushchev. He said he’d been talking to Khrushchev once, and Khrushchev had told him that sometimes, in order to continue being a statesman, you have to be a politician. If the people believed there is an imaginary river out there, you don’t tell them - the politician doesn’t tell them there’s no river there. He builds an imaginary bridge over the imaginary river. Therefore, obviously, we’ve got to refreeze food prices. Food prices had gone up zero point zero percent. There had been no increase in food prices, but there was this public perception that there was.

Anyway, it was that kind of a program, and it moved me in a decidedly conservative direction. The idea that you’re going to have the federal government controlling, literally, wages, prices, and profits of every man, woman, and child in America was just fundamentally a bad idea.
Smith: Out of sequence, but I have to ask you: can you imagine Gerald Ford imposing wage-price controls?

Cheney: No. But it’s interesting, Arthur Burns was a big advocate of wage-price controls. Part of this harked back to his World War II experiences, I think. I think Nixon had been part of that for a while, before he shipped out back during the War.

Smith: That’s right. He always claimed that that’s where he really got his loathing of bureaucracy, if not necessarily bureaucrats. He was in the OPA.

Cheney: Yeah. Well, anyway, it was a bad idea. We got down to the end of this ’72 election, and I’d been given a choice. Back in the summer of ’71 I was working helping set up the Committee to Re-elect the President, when Rumsfeld got tapped for the controls. And I was given a choice whether or not I went to CREEP, the Committee to Re-elect, or whether I went with Rumsfeld on controls. I picked controls. That was a good choice. Most of the guys that I would have been working with ended up in a lot of trouble after the ’72 election – Watergate.

When the campaign was over, the morning after the election, as I recall, Haldeman and Erlichman asked Rumsfeld, and all the other agency heads to pick up resignations from all the political appointees and their departments and agencies. Don refused to do it. He said, “You tell me who you want me to fire and I’ll fire them. That’s your prerogative.” But what they were going to do was collect all these resignations and then keep some of them and give the rest of them back. And he thought that was a terrible way to treat people and said so.

I always had the feeling that, in part, triggered his assignment to NATO. He went from working in the White House to being the ambassador to NATO in January of ’73. When he did that he gave me a chance to go with him, but I really didn’t want to go to NATO. Went to work for a private company there in Washington, an investment advisory firm, and for the eighteen months that the administration was unfolding - Watergate was at its peak - I was outside government, watching all of that unfold.
Don was thinking seriously about running for the Senate from Illinois in ’74. We actually opened up an office out there – set up a secretary – I was sort of the link to it. Then as things got worse and worse on the Watergate, we finally had to fold that up. It was just going to be a terrible year to run, so we dropped that idea. Then August 9th, I had come back from Wyoming and left Lynn and the girls in Wyoming. We’d been on vacation out there. Lynn was helping a friend of ours who was running for Congress in his campaign. So I went back to Washington early. I got a phone call – this would have been on the 9th (?) of August. I’d gone to a friend’s house for dinner, and then went home. When I got home there was the phone call from Don’s secretary – Brussels, saying that he was going to be coming back to land at Dulles the next day…afternoon about two o’clock. Would I meet his plane? So I did. This was the night that Nixon went on the tube and announced his resignation.

The next morning I watched television coverage of Nixon’s goodbye speech in the East Room, and then Ford’s swearing in. Got in the car and drove out to Dulles, met Rumsfeld, and there waiting for him out there was one of the White House drivers with a letter for him, which he opened up and it instructed him to come straight to the White House. It said the president wanted him to run the transition signed by Bill Scranton. He turned to me and asked me if I could spring myself for a couple of weeks to help out with the transition. I said yes, and we reported into the White House.

This is the afternoon, I guess, of the 9th of August. Ford’s been sworn in, and he spent the afternoon meeting with the ambassadors and so forth. I did not know Jerry Ford. I’d been in a meeting once where he presided on the Hill, when I was a staffer. That’s the only time I’d been around him. He didn’t know me at all, and I didn’t deal directly with him during the transition. The transition is about ten or twelve days long, is all. It focused on the domestic side of the house. He said not to mess with the national security side. You may remember the night that Nixon announced that he was going to resign, the cameras then cut to Jerry Ford out in front of his townhouse in Alexandria, and the first words out of his mouth were, “I’ve asked Henry Kissinger to stay and he has agreed.”
He gave clear instructions to the transition team that they were not to dabble in the national security arena. He didn’t want anybody involved with that. We were to look at domestic policy at OMB, the relationship between the White House and Cabinet and so forth. But the idea was to wrap it up as quickly as possible. You didn’t want two tracks running on the regular White House operation ongoing, and then sort of lay over transition on that. You wanted to pass the football, so to speak, as quickly as possible.

Smith: In that initial phase, in that transition, was there discussion of this “spokes of the wheel” concept of running the West Wing? And did that play any part in Rumsfeld’s departure? Was there any discussion of Rumsfeld staying on, for example, on a more permanent basis?

The reason I’m asking is because a number of people have indicated that there’s a consensus that it didn’t work. That it was well intentioned, but that it couldn't work. That it is emblematic, essentially, of a Congressional mindset imposed upon an executive institution. In fact, I think Rumsfeld told us, but other people have told us about Rumsfeld, that he had made it a condition of his coming back, that that was going to go. That the White House was going to be organized differently. Does that ring a bell?

Cheney: My recollection of it is that, you start with a proposition that there was a conventional wisdom that said the reason, or one of the reasons, Nixon had created and then there had been Watergate and the cover up and so forth, was because of the way Haldeman had organized and ran the White House - that the strong centralized staff system was part of the problem. I, personally, believe that was not true, and I’ll come back to that in a minute. But, anyway, that’s literally what everybody believed out there – the press, the Congress, the Ford people that were moving in – some of whom had been with him in the House, with him as vice president.

Ford is the one, I believe, who came up with notion of the spokes of the wheel - that there wouldn’t be a chief of staff. That there wouldn’t be any one person in charge – there’d be eight or ten people, all of whom would have equal access to the president. It was a fundamentally bad idea, but they didn’t know it at the time. Al Haig is still around, and Haig’s not leaving. Haig has been the guy that provided continuity during those fourteen months of Watergate. Nixon leaves, Haig’s still there. We’re there for the transition and Haig’s still there. Nobody had gotten up the gumption to ask Al when he was going to leave. It just hadn’t been addressed. It is a messy period of time. You’ve got the old Nixon crowd, you’ve got the new Ford crowd. One of Ford’s first responsibilities is to find a vice president to replace himself, where he picks Rockefeller. That happened during that transition period. And I do not recall, I’m not aware of – Don would know better than I would – that there was any discussion of his coming back to be chief of staff at that stage.

We left in late August, I want to say around the 20th, 21st, 22nd, of August. He went back to NATO and I went back to my firm in Washington. We’d completed the transition. And then, on the 9th of September, I think it was the 9th, Ford pardoned Nixon. All hell breaks loose. I always thought, at the time, I didn’t disagree with the decision, I did disagree with the timing. I thought he could have waited until after the election, which was just not far away – a couple of months away.

Smith: Well, remember, Nixon almost died.

Cheney: Oh, yeah.

Smith: It’s crass, but if you take advantage of that fact, I mean, you would have eventually had some sympathy out there.

Cheney: That’s right. It could have been posthumous or something. Yeah.

But about a week after the pardon - this is mid-September - I’m on a business trip in Florida. I get another phone call from Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld, as I recall, is back in Chicago. His dad is very sick, a bad case of Alzheimer’s, and is in a home in Chicago. Don asked me if I’d meet him that weekend in Washington, that he’d been asked to come back and talk with the president, and would I meet him on Saturday, as I recall.

So I did, at the Key Bridge Marriott, and we got together that morning. He said he thought he was going to be offered the job as chief of staff. He wanted to know, if he took it, would I sign on as a deputy. This is before it’s been offered. I said yes. So he went and met with the president and then came back and said it’s a done deal, and wanted to make sure I was committed. I said I was, so the agreement is reached that Don’s going to be chief of staff, Haig’s going to depart, and I’m going to move in as the deputy.

We first went over to the White House – maybe it was that Sunday, I remember it was on a Sunday – and we’re in the big corner office, the chief of staff’s office. Haig is gone. George Joulwan is gone. George was the deputy to Haig, later became a general. You’ll come across George, I’m sure. Don left and went down to the Oval Office, and when he came back he brought the president with him. Brought him in and introduced him to me. It was the first time I’d ever formally met Jerry Ford, and it was remarkable in the sense that he immediately, unquestioningly, adopted me as part of the operation.

Don wanted to function in a way that we’d take turns in terms of our regular meetings with the president, or travel. If he was on the road with the president, I’d be running things in the West Wing, and sometimes I’d take the trip and he’d be in the West Wing. Sometimes he’d go in at five o’clock at night for the daily wrap up, sometimes I would. And Ford very quickly adapted to that. I was always, not only very pleasantly surprised, but impressed with the extent of which, once you signed on, he wasn’t suspicious or cautious. “You’re on the team – you’re part of my team,” and it was full speed ahead from the very beginning.

Smith: Let me back up just a little bit, because we talked with Haig who had an interesting take, which he repeated, repeatedly. Ostensibly, it concerned the complaint that he’d made to the president about Bob Hartmann. Clearly there was no love lost there – and we won’t go into the details – but he felt strongly. The president, according to Haig, said, “Al, you’re just going to have to let me handle this.” And Haig’s response was, “Well, that answers my question. You don’t want me to stay on.” It sounds like Gerald Ford.

Cheney: Yeah.

Smith: I don’t know whether it sounds like Al Haig or not. Was Hartmann possessive?
Cheney: Hartmann was bad news. What Bob could do, he could write a good speech for Jerry Ford, and he wrote some good ones. He was not the right guy to be running the place. He’d been the chief of staff when Ford was vice president, and I remember there was a story, I think it was the Wall Street Journal, that ran before Ford becomes president about how screwed up the vice president’s staff is. It’s Hartmann’s bailiwick and it wasn’t a happy shop. I’ll be direct about it. Bob was the kind of a guy on writing speeches who would say, “You can’t see it because the president hasn’t seen it yet.” And after the president had seen it, he said, “You can’t see it because the president signed off on it, and we’re not changing it.” He made it impossible to work with the policy types. My God, you want Alan Greenspan to look at the economic speech and so forth.

Smith: Is that part of the transition from a Congressional office to the Oval Office, that he never made?

Cheney: I think so. When you are in the Congress, you’ve got the principal, the member, you’ve got a speechwriter, and that’s all. He wasn’t going to check with anybody, the two of them were going to work it out. When you got down to the White House, the day that Ford became president and the Nixon folks moved out, Hartmann moved from his Old Executive Office Building office, when he’d been with the vice president, into the office right next to the Oval Office. I think it had been Rose Mary Woods’ office. There is the Oval, and then there is a bathroom, a little hall there with the bathroom on one side, on the other side is a little cubbyhole of an office. Then at the end of that is sort of a regular-sized office and Hartmann took that office. It was a mess.

When Rumsfeld and I took over we’re trying to manage the paper flow, the people, the schedule, that’s all stuff we’ve got to control if you’re going to run the place. And we would find stuff. I would get everything coming out of the president’s outbox – it would come across my desk. And there was stuff in there that I hadn’t sent in. Somebody is feeding the beast from another source someplace.

Then we had a situation where, I think it was Bill Timmons, wrote a memo to the president and it showed up in Evans and Novak. Hartmann had gone in, taken the Timmons memo off the president’s desk, took it out and leaked it to Evans and Novak. So, it’s a zoo, and we’re trying to get control of the paper flow and the scheduling and everything.

Smith: Was the president made aware of that fact?

Cheney: I think he was aware of it, because what I did, I came up with a concept and then Rumsfeld sold it to him – that the president needed a private office. He really didn’t want to go traipsing over to OEOB like Nixon did all the time to his private office. What he needed was that office where Hartmann was. That needed to be the president’s private office, so we set it up that way. We had the president, as I recall, tell Hartmann - because he wouldn’t take it from anybody else - tell Hartmann, “Bob, you’re out.” And moved him down the hall and he got the office that I had when I was the vice president. I just left here. It’s the office that eventually went to Mondale, but ever since, it’s been the vice president’s. Nice office. Bryce Harlow used to have it.

But the fact was, that let us gain control of the paper flow and the scheduling in and out, and the president understood what we were doing. But it was a graceful way to manipulate the process, to cut Hartmann out. I think Hartmann figured out he’d gotten screwed, too. But there wasn’t anything he could do about it, because the president was the one that said, “Bob, this is how it’s going to be.”

Smith: That’s a huge question. Let me go back, because on the 9th of August – I realize you weren’t there, but we talked to people who were in the East Room, who have vivid recollections of both Ford people and Nixon people. That once the ceremony ended, there was a receiving line, and then there was a reception in the State Dining Room. And, with very few exceptions, you could see the Nixon people sort of peel off and go back to their offices.

Which, in a lot of ways, you could understand. But that raises the larger issue of how difficult was it to integrate existing staff? What was the president’s attitude?

For example, Don Rumsfeld said he urged him early on to make changes in the Cabinet and staff. The sense we get is that he was reluctant - certainly he was reluctant to tar folks with the Watergate brush simply because they had worked in the Nixon White House. How did you handle all of that during those first few months?

Cheney: My feeling was, we had two conflicting objectives and we had to satisfy both. One was, we had to convince the American people that this was a new day in the White House, the old crowd was gone. The folks that brought you Watergate and the cover up and all of that, they’re toast. They are no longer running the show. Secondly, you had to convey to the world out there that this was a place…that the changes that had occurred didn’t signify any change in fundamental U.S. policies, especially in the world, internationally.

You had these conflicting pressures for continuity and change. And it shows up in things like the president’s directive to the transition team that first day, “Go deal with the domestic side of the business. Give me recommendations, Cabinet and OMB, and so forth. Don’t touch national security. Stay out of Defense, CIA, State Department. Henry’s got both the State Department job and the NSC job.” That held for about fourteen months. Of course, when we came around later, we changed it.

Another important problem here was that Ford did not have a staff that could move in and take over the White House. It wasn’t like he’d been out running a major national campaign for president, and he wins the election, and you’ve got a couple of months to put your people in place, and you’ve got a huge contingency out there of folks who want to come in and take jobs. You’ve got a guy who’s been a Congressman from the Fifth District of Michigan, and the Republican Leader in the House, which - those aren’t big management jobs. And he’s been operating with his old friends, Phil Buchen, who was his law partner from 1940 Michigan, and Hartmann had been with him forever as a speechwriter. And it wasn’t what you would call a dynamic set of people that he moved in with.

Then you still had Al Haig around in that first month. Nobody was in a position, nor was anybody charged with the responsibilities to fix it up, clean it up, to say, “You’re in, you’re out,” and put together a good organization. One of the things that Rumsfeld and I did, I think we brought some order to that process. We did make some Cabinet changes. For example, the president wanted to bring in Bill Coleman to be Secretary of Transportation.

Smith: Had he known Coleman?

Cheney: He’d known Coleman and liked him. And, of course, I think this was the second time there was an African-American Cabinet member. We had a problem though, because Claude Brinegar was Nixon’s Transportation Secretary and he didn’t want to leave. And he agreed only to leave if we would first fire Alexander Butterfield, who was running the FAA, part of DOT - a lot of bad blood between Brinegar and Butterfield.

Smith: Because of Butterfield’s role?

Cheney: Butterfield was the guy who revealed the existence of the taping system. You were going to get your fingers burned if you do anything with Butterfield. I got the job of firing Alex Butterfield, which I did. Called him in and told him he was through. And then Brinegar quietly left, as he said he would, and we brought in Bill Coleman. Bill got to be transportation secretary. So there was stuff going on.

The thing that Don and I did was, we staffed up with some people from outside, but we kept some key people that had been working for Nixon that weren’t tainted by Watergate, hadn’t been involved in any way. People like Jerry Jones, who became our chief scheduler. We brought in Bill Walker to run the personnel shop. We kept Red Cavaney, who ran the advance operation. Terry O’Donnell had come on board earlier as the president’s aide – we kept him. Brought in Jim Cavanaugh from Domestic Council, he’d been working up there and he became one of my deputies. Mike Duvall, who was a Nixon advance man. He’d worked in the White House going back to ’67 or ’68. He’d even been there under Johnson. And so we used some of those talented folks.

But you had to have a new – how to make the trains run on time. We had other situations: Dave Gergen. Gergen was in the speech shop and he got into a big fight with Hartmann and Hartmann fired him. So I got Gergen a job over at Treasury, working on Bill Simon’s stuff. And then when Don left and I took over as Chief of Staff, I brought Gergen back and put him on my staff, and he was our secret speechwriter.

Smith: One hears stories that the speech operation needed help. That it was often late, often disorganized, and infrequently attuned to the fact that it existed for one purpose only: which was to make the president sound and look good. And yet Ford sort of put up with it. There was the famous State of the Union address, I guess, where…

Cheney: Dual competing drafts of the State of the Union – oh, yeah. I was afraid you were going to bring that up. The speechwriting thing was a hell of a problem. The normal temptation is to think that you make a policy decision, and then you write a speech to explain the policy. That’s not the way it works all the time. Lots of times, it’s the process of having to write the speech that drives policy. You don’t get the decisions made on policy until you know you’re going to have to give a speech. You have the State of the Union address in a couple of weeks and you’ve got to resolve all these issues so you can announce the policy at State of the Union time.

To the extent that speeches drive the policy process, they’ve somehow got to relate to the policy process and there has to be interaction there. And, as I say, Hartmann just refused to do that. Ford never would fire Hartmann. I made an effort at one point to get him to appoint Bob as an ambassador. To get him out of town. And he wouldn’t do it. He wouldn’t do it. He knew Bob was a problem.

We had a situation for a while there when I brought Gergen back in to write speeches. Of course, I’m really treading on toes here. You’ve got Hartmann over there with a speech shop and doing his thing, and I’ve got Gergen, who’s not a part of the speech process. But what would happen was, I’d go down at night and the president would give me the latest draft that he’d gotten from Hartmann on a speech. I would take it, I’d have Gergen rework it and rewrite it. I’d take it and give it back to the president. The president would give it to Hartmann, as though it were the president’s own words. Hartmann would accept that. We went through these travails. I’d say on the time we had competing drafts of the State of the Union speech, as I recall, I was commuting back and forth to Baltimore. Because this is the TOYM Awards - the Chamber of Commerce gave every year – picked ten outstanding young men in America. It was a big deal, and I got picked that year, and Bill Bradley did and David Boren from Oklahoma. We were having this big weekend over in Baltimore and I’m commuting back and forth to attend these sessions where we’re duking it out with these competing drafts for the State of the Union speech.

It was a real problem, but basically because the president tolerated it. In Hartmann’s defense, Bob wrote some of Ford’s better work. But he was very hard to deal with. We had other little tidbits. This isn’t going to come out. Bob’s dead now, I suppose, I can talk about some of it. I can remember being in Vladivostok and my room was right across the hall from Bob’s and I happened to be there at my door one morning, getting ready to leave and Bob put down his suitcase outside the door for the baggage car. It was full of bottles. I guess he was a heavy drinker. You could just hear them rattling in there. It sounded like somebody was dumping out the garbage at the bar after a bad night.

We once traveled all day long on Air Force One. I got back fairly late in the day to Andrews, and got on the helicopter. Bob was booked on the helicopter to fly into the South Lawn with the president and myself and a few others. We got on the helicopter – there’s no Hartmann. We wait a couple of minutes. Still no Hartmann. So I sent somebody back to check, and Bob’s passed out on Air Force One. The president waited and waited, and finally we had to leave him and take off. It was that kind of behavior that just was beyond the pale.

The stewards used to keep score. He never knew this, but they’d keep track of how many drinks they served him. He was a big martini man. I’d frequently, at the end of one of these counts, I’d just get a piece of paper with a little number on it, and that was Hartmann’s consumption for that day. It was big time.

Smith: And Ford tolerated it?
Cheney: Ford tolerated it.

Smith: Throughout his presidency?

Cheney: Yeah.

Smith: One way of looking at the Ford presidency is he is someone who really did grow into the executive role over time.

Cheney: He did.

Smith: But that did not preclude…

Cheney: It wasn’t perfect. There were natural tensions. Hell, there are in every White House. Each one is different. But what I’ve learned now, I’ve worked in – I guess we’ve had five Republican presidents since Eisenhower and I’ve worked for four of them. The fifth, I’ve worked very closely with, was the Reagan years and I was part of the House Republican leadership. Each one of them is unique. We, as political scientists, we’re trained to find those common themes and threads and institutional propositions that apply across all administrations. The thing that I’m absolutely impressed with, after all these years, is each one of them is really unique, and really reflects the personality of the guy in the Oval Office and how he got there – the kinds of problems he faced. Now, the president was willing to make some other changes. We had patches there where he made some really big changes.

One other Hartmann story and then I’ll quit. During the campaign in ’76 he had Pat Butler working for him, who later went to work for the Washington Post. Pat’s a good guy. There was a dust up on Air Force One and Pat had written, at my request - we decided we quickly needed a statement on some foreign policy issue - so I got Pat working on it. The president could get off at the next stop and issue a statement. Then, when Hartmann found out that Butler had written something at my direction, and he hadn’t been in the loop, he fired him on Air Force One. So I brought Pat up and I said, “Okay, you’re hired. Now you’re working for me.” So, it was those kind of situations. You had people around Ford, like any president does, who are loyal to him and who stick with him, and he doesn’t like the idea of getting rid of those people.
Smith: That answers one question: I was going to say, was Hartmann quick to fire people?

Cheney: Once he got worked up, he’d pull the trigger on somebody.

Smith: Was the Schlesinger thing destined? Was it just bad chemistry? One senses that Ford resented what he saw as a certain patronizing attitude on the part of a very bright man, who didn’t always conceal his IQ.

Cheney: His intelligence. Yeah.

Smith: And, in fact, Ford had spent a lot of years on the House Appropriations Committee. He knew a lot of things that…

Cheney: George Mahon was one of his best friends – the Democratic chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee.

The Schlesinger thing – it’s important – it was bad – and it got worse as we went along. In the end, he addressed it as part of this larger package, when we made a whole series of changes. We replaced the vice president, took away the secretary of state’s second hat, as NSC advisor, replaced the CIA director, replaced the secretary of defense, replaced the secretary of commerce - new people throughout. But I think it probably would have happened even if there hadn’t been those broader moves – it would be my judgment on it. And the president, I’ll always remember that morning, because it’s when I took over as chief of staff and Rumsfeld was going to go to Defense, but he hadn’t really signed on for that yet.

Smith: He indicates he was reluctant to do it.

Cheney: He was. There’d been a leak on a Saturday night that this shake up was in the works and so we decided we had to accelerate part of it. I got hold of Colby, the CIA director, and Schlesinger of Defense. The night before I worked with Jack Marsh on this and we got word to them that they were to be in the Oval Office the next morning. Colby came in first, and the president picked up his resignation. Colby took it like a man. It was pleasant and he departed.
Smith: And he was offered an ambassadorship or something?

Cheney: I can’t remember on Colby. On Schlesinger, I went in before Schlesinger came in. Schlesinger was waiting in the outer office. I went in and said, “Now, Mr. President, have you thought about maybe offering Jim something? Making him an ambassador some place, or at least give him the offer to save face here a bit.” And he looked at me and, as he was occasionally got, chewing on his pipe, he got red spots on his cheeks on both sides. That’s when you could tell when he was pissed off. And what he said to me was – and he was not a man who ever used a lot of vulgarity – but what he said to me, he said, “Dick, get him in here so I can fire him.” So, I did.

Smith: Sounds like that had been welling up for some time.

Cheney: When you say Jerry Ford didn’t like to fire people, that’s one he enjoyed. I’m a Jim Schlesinger fan, and I like him and I think he’s a bright guy and he did good work at DOD. But I think you’re right, a big part of the problem was, the president had expressed his dissatisfaction to Schlesinger about how the Defense budget was getting cut, and he wanted Jim to do a better job on the Hill – marshalling support for it. Jim’s reaction to that was to hold a press conference criticizing George Mahon, chairman of the Appropriations Committee. Wrong move.

Now, whoever was responsible for those cuts, it wasn’t Jerry Ford’s bosom buddy, George Mahon, who was a great gentleman, and as I say, one of the longest serving members in Congress, and they had a very close relationship. The other thing that hurt was in the spring of ’75, when we had the evacuation of Saigon at the end of the Vietnam war. The North Vietnamese are taking Saigon and we’ve got people at the embassy getting off and getting on helicopters and so forth. The plan was, as I recall, in the middle of a State dinner for the Dutch, or somebody, that when the word came down from the Pentagon that everybody was out, then we’d go out and announce that we’d completed the evacuation and all the Americans had been safely been able to evacuate the scene. So that word came over and they went out and announced it.
Then we got another call from the Pentagon saying, oops, we screwed up, gentlemen. There are another 50 or 60 Marines still on the ground at the embassy. What they’d done is trigger on the ambassador. The ambassador always said he’d be the last man out. So when he came out, somebody made the mistake of saying, well, everybody’s out. But they weren’t. The president was embarrassed by that and angry that it wasn’t better handled. So there were things like that.

Smith: Sure.

Cheney: I think Kissinger and Schlesinger didn’t get along. Henry got a lot of time in the Oval Office with the president and Schlesinger didn’t. It was the right thing to do and it had to happen. Sometimes things don’t work.

Smith: It will come as no surprise to you, Mel Laird has a ex-post facto theory about how things could have been done better. Of course, he’s got his theory about the pardon. He said he told the president, “Don’t do anything until I get back,” and he was going to put together a bipartisan delegation from both Houses and they would come down and petition the president to do this. The problem - given the political climate of the time - that any trial balloon would have been shot down before it got above the trees. I don’t know how you could prepare the country for that news. Now, you’re right, you could have waited until after the ’74 election. Apparently, Ford was being told by Jaworski or at least Jaworski’s representatives that, in fact, it might be two years before there could be a trial. Which, if you factor that in, you can understand why. He’s a new president and he sees this dominating his entire term.

Cheney: Yeah, I’ve talked to him about it over the years. When I went up one of the first things I did after Don and I came back and took over, was, shortly after that he had to go to the Hill to testify before the Judiciary Committee. I went along that day and sat back in the committee room and watched him. I really came to believe that he’d reached the point that this was the right thing to do, and politics never entered into it. If he’d considered the political consequences, or how to do it so that it would be politically less damaging, it would have somehow been out of character with the decision he made and the reason he did it. I think he really did do it based on the notion that the country didn’t need any more of the grief that this all represented. He needed to put Watergate behind him and it was a terrible continuing burden on him and on the presidency, and once he decided to do it, it was like firing Schlesinger, get him in here so I can fire him.

Smith: But I wonder if there is not a certain element of naïveté, because, remember - of course you weren’t around - but August 28th was the first press conference. He went there sincerely believing that they were going to talk about Cyprus and Turkey and inflation and everything except what they all wanted to talk about. And he came out of the press conference, I think, angry at himself because he hadn’t handled some of the questions very well, and angrier that the press seemed obsessed. I assume all kinds of emotions were boiling at that point. But supposedly that is a turning point in terms of deciding, if not now, when? Isn’t it a little naïve on the part of a president to think that…

Cheney: Yeah, but you can ___________ on that. It was just a few weeks after the pardon – this is early October. It’s the first time I was ever in charge of a presidential trip. We went on a campaign swing through the West. We started in Kansas City with a Lick Your Plate Clean speech. I don’t know if you’ve come across this.

Smith: No.

Cheney: We’d had the Economic Summit earlier. Again, Don and I weren’t around, but out of that they’d done a big speech, an economic speech on television. They had more material than they could use, so, they decided to give the second half of the speech in front of the convention of the Future Farmers of America – all the young kids out there in their blue corduroy jackets and the gold symbols on them and so forth. They were having their convention in Kansas City and he went there and gave that speech, and he talked about lick your plate clean – fight inflation and so forth. The Lick Your Plate Clean speech, was the way the staff referred to it.

We went from there on out to California, en route to California, he got word that Nixon was back in the hospital. We were staying at the Century Plaza Hotel. He called me up and said he wanted to go visit Nixon - called me up to the front of the plane. I argued with him. I said, “Mr. President, here we are, the election is a month out [sic], we’ve still got all this controversy over the pardon, the last thing we need to do is to go down and meet with Nixon and have that dominate the headlines. It is just going to blow away anything we are going to try accomplish with this trip. We’re trying to elect Republicans.” And he said, “Damn it, Dick, he’s a friend of mine. He’s sick. He’s a former president of the United States. I want to go see him.”

So I scurried around and got helicopters lined up and one landed in Century Plaza parking lot there in Los Angeles the next morning. Got on the helicopter and we flew down and it was Long Beach Naval Hospital or someplace down there. We went in to the hospital and they had the press sort of gathered in this fairly big room, and then Ford had to go through some swinging doors. On the other side of the swinging doors he was greeted by Pat and the girls, and then walked on down to the room that Nixon was in. It’s a new wing of the hospital and Nixon was the only patient on the floor. When they got down to the door where he was located, the door was jammed, they could not get it open.

So, you’ve got the press out there, outside these swinging doors wondering what the hell is going on. You’ve got the president and Nixon’s family standing in the hallway. Nixon’s laying there, tubes running in every part of his body. He’s pretty sick. They finally got a carpenter up to take the door off the hinges so that they could get in. Nothing works. When it goes bad, it all goes bad.

Smith: A euphemism for the campaign.

Cheney: Right. So we finish there, we went on. We had a campaign in California, and Oregon and Utah. Stopped in Grand Junction, Colorado, where we did the speech – a big rally. They had baseball stands full of people and a flatbed trailer parked across the pitcher’s mound. It was homecoming weekend at La Mesa’s Junior College there in Grand Junction. So the homecoming queen and all of her attendants were lined up in their finery on the flatbed trailer, and Ford got up and got ready to speak. He looked down the line of young lovelies and walked down and gave every one of them a kiss. Then he went back to the mike, he got ready to make the speech, looked down the line again, and he went back and did it a second time. Everybody got a second kiss.

We then got on the airplane, flew to Kansas, did a rally for Bob Dole in a terrible thunderstorm. I think when we got all through and looked back on that trip, Dole was about the only guy that got elected. Everybody else went down in flames, Watergate era. New Yorker magazine ran a cover of Bozo the Clown above the president. I was convinced when I got back that Rumsfeld was never going to let me out on the road again because nothing worked. It was a dismal kind of experience.

The speech thing entered into that again, with the Lick Your Plate Clean speech kind of thing.

Smith: We’ve been told that Whip Inflation Now, in fact, was a product of the speech shop.

Cheney: Yeah. And the last day we were there, we’d had a breakfast with the Cabinet upstairs in the residence. After that was over with I walked him back to the West Wing for the last time, said goodbye to the secretary. People are crying and so forth. He went around, once last look around, and then left and went back up to the residence to meet Carter, who was coming down, of course. The crew came in and started stripping the place – the Oval Office – of all his pictures. They opened the drawers in the desk and in one of the drawers – they had drawers on the front of the desk – and one of them held cufflinks and stuff like that. The other one opened up and it was full of Whip Inflation Now buttons that he’d put in there two and half years ago and he was going to pass them out. He never got rid of very many of them. They sat in that drawer all that time.

Smith: That’s great.

One quick thing, the selection process. Someone who was very close to him told me they had this discussion. I believe the president called Rockefeller and he’d asked for a day or something to call back, and a conversation took place. This guy went through all the reasons why Rockefeller would be miserable and unsuccessful, and there’s a long list. Finally he [Rockefeller] said, “Look, everything you say is true. But you don’t understand, this is my last shot.” And so I think he wasn’t totally honest with himself as to why he took it. Yes, he took it because the country was in a crisis and the president asked him, that was all true, but it wasn’t the whole truth. And it was almost doomed before it began. You do wonder how deeply the president had thought about it before he did it. It makes a lot of sense on the surface, to give someone who has a global reputation and a lot of good people around him, and appeals to the other part of the party, although he obviously alienated a larger part of the party, and all of that. Rockefeller was led to believe that he would be in domestic policy, like Kissinger was in foreign policy. And that was a mistake, clearly.

Cheney: Interesting. Well, what I remember about him, the selection happened during that period of time which, technically - while we were having the transition – was one of the first things Ford does. There was speculation about George Bush. I got a phone call from Bill Steiger, who was my old boss, lobbying me on behalf of George Bush. They had an organized effort to try to promote Bush for it. And the other guy who was under serious consideration, because Ford told me this himself sometime later, was Rumsfeld. He really had three choices: he had Rumsfeld and Bush, whom he believe represented the future of the party – young guys, dynamic guys that he would have ordinarily picked. But he really felt, as a guy who had been a Congressman from Michigan, and that was it, that he needed somebody of real international stature. And that’s why he went with Rockefeller.

I also believe, although I have no evidence to support this, that Henry Kissinger played a major role in all of this. Those first words out of his mouth, when it’s first public that he’s about to become president of the United States, “I’ve asked Henry to stay and he’s agreed,” I think Henry had an important impact on some of these decisions. And, of course, Henry was a Rockefeller protégé.

Smith: True.
Cheney: If we go on and move forward in terms of timing, I became convinced that we could not win the battle against Reagan in ’76 - we couldn’t capture the nomination with Rockefeller on the ticket – that he was too much baggage. He came from that wing of the party. Ronald Reagan had been the guy that had clear sailing to the nomination in ’76 until Nixon resigned, and all of a sudden Ford’s on the scene. If we were going to win the nomination and fend off Reagan, we needed to have the ability to create the idea of competition for the vice presidency. We needed to be able to dangle it in front of all those various players out there, which is what we did. The president asked him to get off the ticket, in effect.

Smith: Before that, because Bo Calloway had made some remarks, and Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that Rumsfeld did him in, thought that Calloway was a Rumsfeld person and that all this was orchestrated and so on. Which strikes me as, at the very least an exaggeration. Calloway was pretty much a loose cannon, or was he acting on his own?

Cheney: Well, Calloway was…

Smith: Who was his sponsor?

Cheney: Well, I suppose I was, as much as anybody. When we put together the campaign committee, we got a problem in the sense that we’re going to get a challenge from the conservative wing of the party. And we needed to take action that would allow us to help fend that off. If we’re going to run a Nelson Rockefeller style of presidential campaign, we’ll probably get our butts kicked the same way he did in California in 1964. The Calloway selection, Bo had been a Republican Congressman from Georgia. He was secretary of the Army, as I recall when we moved him in. I eventually had to fire him, he got into this deal with using Army letters to talk about his ski area, or some such thing – somebody else I had to let go.

But it wasn’t because he was anti-Rockefeller that he was picked. Any Southern Republican who had a base in the conservative wing of the party would have been anti-Rockefeller. Bo’s problem was probably that he talked about it. But I don’t remember that being a special problem. I had a terrible run in with Rockefeller. Rockefeller was convinced I was out to do him in. At the convention in Kansas City, we were slated to - after the president gave his acceptance speech - bring out the vice presidential candidate and raise hands and bring out the families and so forth. And we had a problem, because we had the new vice presidential candidate, Bob Dole, and we had the old vice president, Nelson Rockefeller. And Nelson Rockefeller did not want to go out after Bob Dole. He was the vice president of the United States, by God, he was going out. So we had that fight to resolve.

Then he’d given his speech that afternoon to the convention and in the middle of the convention the mike had gone out, the sound system had gone down.
He had confronted me underneath the podium during that evening, once we got there. Backed me up against the wall and just laced me from one end to the other. I was totally innocent. I had nothing to do with turning out the sound system. But his conspiratorial mind said, Cheney controls everything, Cheney did it.

Part of the problem that we ran into was really created by Ford and Rockefeller. Now, they got along fine, nominally, but on the one hand, Ford made the decision to give Rockefeller control over the domestic council, but then at the same time, we had enunciated a policy across the administration that there aren’t going to be any new starts.

Smith: We’ve been told that a major factor behind that decision, and when it was announced, was to basically brush back the vice president who had a habit every Thursday of coming into the lunch with the president with a shiny new program with an indeterminate price tag. and with all of the force of his enthusiasm and personality behind it. But it hadn’t been cleared up and at some point the president, and I don’t know in what words, but made it clear that he’d like to end that.

Cheney: My feeling is, I’d have to go back and maybe check this, but we announced the “No New Starts” because of the economic situation, because we were faced with inflation and recession and so forth. We also had a situation where the Democrats had overwhelmingly controlled the Congress,. and it wasn’t like we could get anything through, _________ we wouldn’t want it anyway.
What we had was a veto strategy in terms of dealing with Congress. We put the No New Starts marker out there for good and legitimate policy reasons. Rockefeller just refused to abide by it. He would come in for these weekly sessions with the president and he always had a new proposal. I’d go down that evening, or sometimes the president would even call me right after Rockefeller left, and I’d go down and he’d hand me the new proposal and he’d say, “Dick, what do we do with this?” And I’d say, “Well, Mr. President, we’ll staff it out.” And so it would go to OMB and then get fed out through the system, and the answer would always come back, “This is not consistent with our basic fundamental policy,” and get shot down. Rockefeller became convinced I was out to do him in. It was another one of the charges against me.

I think Ford felt badly about it, but he wasn’t willing to violate the policy until the very end. And you may remember, one of his last official acts was to send up Rockefeller’s energy proposal, this monster of a big spending project.

Smith: The Energy Independence Corporation. A hundred billion dollars. For anyone who says Rockefeller moved to the right to chase the caboose…the fact is, he was going to fund it with the same moral obligation bonding that he’d used in New York. He hadn’t changed at all, really. The story is, supposedly, that the president, at one point, and I don’t know where, but that Bill Simon was arguing, this thing had been discussed in the Cabinet and Simon kept up the argument pretty vociferously.

Cheney: For or against it?

Smith: Against, not surprisingly. And the president said something to the effect that, Bill, we both know Congress is never going to let this go anywhere. But he didn’t want to embarrass Nelson. Does that ring a bell at all?

Cheney: Yeah, I think what he did for Rockefeller as he left, he felt that he ought to go out of his way to make it the last message he sent to Congress. It was right towards the end, just before the inauguration, and I really felt that he felt he owed Nelson one; he’d told him no so many times. He also had a lot of sympathy for anybody serving in that job. He hated the job, Ford did. He told me that on more than one occasion, the nine months he spent as vice president were the worst nine months of his life. He told me that after I got to be vice president.

Smith: Was that because of the unique position that he was in of having to defend Nixon, but not defend him too much. Or is it just endemic to the job?

Cheney: I think it was both. No question, there was a unique set of circumstances. They’ve got him out on the road, flying around in an old Conair prop job. They don’t even give him a jet, doing fundraisers, trying to build support in the party, and Nixon is going down in flames back in Washington. I think that was a terribly frustrating experience. If I’d had to do that as vice president, it would have been a bummer. But I think he also felt, over the years, that it was a nasty job. It was reflected in what he demanded from Reagan in 1980, when they were in Detroit and Reagan is trying to get Ford to go on the ticket, and Ford is saying, “Okay, but I’ll only do it if I get control of the National Security Council. I want a major say in OMB, personnel,” and he started ticking off all this stuff.

I sat through a session in Detroit because I was a delegate to the convention that year from Wyoming, and there was all of this stuff going on, swirling around Ford. I was not directly involved until I got a call from Howard Baker and John Rhodes from the Senate and House leader. And they asked me to come down to the hotel, the main convention hotel, which I did together with Bob Teeter. They had Bob and I in because they knew we were close to Ford, and they had some major problems with what was going on here. They thought we might be able to come in and shed some light on it, maybe, and bring some sanity to the situation.

Teeter and I sat there and listened to Bill Casey, on behalf of Ronald Reagan, run through this list and we couldn’t believe it. They were willing to give him a hell of a lot. Now, fortunately in the end, cooler heads prevailed. I had the feeling that Ford didn’t really want the job and one way he could get out of it was ask for the moon, and he did. And the Reagan people figured out you can only have one president at a time. I think he had a mixture of sentiments about the job, about Rockefeller. You will appreciate very much the fact that Rockefeller stayed true to the cause, even after he’d asked him to get off the ticket.

Smith: He was a good soldier.

Cheney: Delivered the delegates from New York, boy, when we needed them. He could easily have got off the reservation and I always felt, after the fact, Ford sometimes had second thoughts about having pushed Rockefeller out. I think it was the right thing to do.

Smith: That’s interesting, because I’ve seen this, I’ve talked to him about it, and I’ve seen it in other interviews he did: Ford could surprise you. He could come to you with a fresh take on a situation that you hadn’t thought about, and all of a sudden you thought, well, of course. In some ways maybe it’s leapfrogging guilt, because, clearly, the question of whether he [Rockefeller] was pushed or whether he jumped - he was clearly pushed. And I think Ford felt some guilt about that on a personal level. Maybe it’s a bit of rationalization, but you know what? It’s a damn good one. He said, “I don’t think Nelson would have been happy as vice president in a second term,” which was clearly…

Cheney: Clearly the case.

Smith: Absolutely. So I think then he convinced himself that he was doing Nelson a favor by…

That weekend, when the story began to leak, and one of the problems with Rockefeller was he went up to Pocantico for weekends. He wasn’t a part-time vice president, but Happy was up there with the kids, and he would go up there on the weekends. So, anyway, he’s up there that weekend, and on Sunday he’s playing golf with Laurance, and the phone call comes, calling from the White House, that this is leaking. The person who took the call to him told me he wouldn’t take the call. And he was finally asked, point blank by this individual, “Are you telling me you won’t take a call from the President of the United States?” And he said, “That’s exactly what I’m telling you,” and he played golf.

Cheney: I never heard that.
Smith: He was angry. His anger lasted about – and there is only one other person who ever saw him angry, Mac Mathias.

Cheney: At that incident?

Smith: At that incident. And right at that time when Mathias was trying to say something consoling and…Rockefeller, who was also not one for vulgar language, Rockefeller says to Mathias, “Who wants to hang around with those shits, anyway?” And it was in the heat of the moment, but he delivered New York and played a significant role in delivering Pennsylvania.

Cheney: Well, after we fired Schlesinger and Colby that morning, then we got on the airplane and flew to Jacksonville, Florida for a summit with Sadat. As we were landing in Jacksonville, he called me up to the cabin again and told me to get on the phone and get Rumsfeld’s commitment to serve as secretary of defense because Rumsfeld wasn’t on board yet for that. All of a sudden that morning I’d started as Rumsfeld’s deputy, and by noon, or whatever it is, I’m acting on behalf of the president, trying to get Rumsfeld to go to the Cabinet job. Then I think we came back that night and then on Monday, I believe, is when he had Rockefeller in, and formalized the process.

Smith: He brought the letter, I think, at that point, that he had drafted over the weekend.

Cheney: And, as I say, I still believe the vice presidency played a crucial role in that nomination fight in ’76. With Reagan, it led Reagan to go with the Schweiker ploy, which hurt him badly. That’s what gave us the Mississippi delegation. I don’t think that would have ever happened if we’d been running with Rockefeller as our running mate.

Smith: Let me ask you, I’ve been told you can tell us better than anyone else, tell us about Clarke Reed and Mississippi. Mr. Reed has a reputation of someone who can be bought, but doesn’t always stay bought. What transpired? Was the Schweiker thing, in fact, just what he needed to do what he was already inclined to do?
Cheney: No. Clarke was, of course, a long time Republican chairman in Mississippi. He’d been a Nixon man. By this time in ’76, Reagan was running flat out out there. We’re winning Florida and New Hampshire. He’s winning North Carolina and Texas and so forth.

Mississippi has got the unit rule. They’ve got thirty delegates, but they’ve got thirty alternates as well, and what they do, they all take half a vote and all vote together and whichever candidate got a majority of the votes, then all thirty delegate votes went there. So you could have a delegation that was split 31-29, counting the delegates and the alternates, and whoever got the thirty-one would get the full delegate support. So, it was unique that way.

There was a hell of a contest. Reed was nominally neutral as the party chairman. Billy Munger was the Reagan chairman. I’d go on down to Mississippi to meet with the delegation because we were doing everything we could to round up uncommitted delegates, and that was obviously one of the key targets. I met with Clarke and a lot of the delegates he had together for a delegation meeting. I think it was in Jackson that weekend. Then I got on the airplane and flew back to Washington.

When I got off the airplane, I heard that Reagan had announced that Schweiker was going to be his running mate in this effort to reach out to the left. And it was clearly aimed at trying to shake the Pennsylvania delegation. I went to the White House, I got hold of Drew Lewis, who was our chairman in Pennsylvania, and who clearly the Reagan people were working hard. Drew, to his credit, said, “Tell the president I’m with him. There’s nothing to worry about in Pennsylvania. It’s solid, it doesn’t matter what he does with Schweiker. We’re Ford people.”

Then I had the president call Clarke Reed. Clarke was pissed at Reagan and what he’d done picking Schweiker. And in the anger of the moment, he committed to Ford, and that created some real tensions inside the Mississippi delegation. I think if it hadn’t been for the Schweiker ploy, he would never have had the incentive. He might have well have stayed neutral until things sorted out and they got down to the convention.
The actual vote was cast at the convention, in a delegation meeting, when we won the vote. But I’m going to say; once Clarke committed, he stayed committed. I think it tore him up. Years after that I’d see him occasionally and dealt with him some. We really put him through the wringer. He wished to hell he’d never had to go through that process. I don’t think he was looking for an out so much as he reacted with a flash of anger at the Reagan ploy on Schweiker, and the president called him at exactly the right time and put the arm on him and got him to commit.

Smith: It’s interesting. Stu Spencer – we spent six hours with Stu Spencer…

Cheney: Did you?

Smith: Oh, gosh, great stuff.

Cheney: Stu’s full of good stuff.

Smith: He talked about Reagan and it’s fascinating listening to a pro dissect the opposition. He said Reagan is someone who, if you throw him off his rhythm - he’s a rhythm candidate, he says - you throw him off his rhythm, it takes him almost a week to get back. And the ad about Governor Reagan couldn’t start a war – apparently Reagan was so angry he punched a hole through the plane wall. Suffice to say he was off his rhythm.

Cheney: I never heard that.

Smith: But listening to Spencer talk about it - he was ecstatic with, I guess it was Sears, who decided to make it a procedural fight at the convention.

Cheney: Yeah. 16-C.

Smith: Because, of course, Stu believed you needed an emotional issue, and foreign policy was that issue. I guess Henry wasn’t happy about it, but by ceding the platform, you in effect, nailed down the nomination. Does that ring a bell?

Cheney: Yeah. Again I come back to the idea, the reason they tried 16-C, and I think John Sears was the guru behind a lot of this, is because of the opening for vice president, and to try to get Ford to designate who his running mate was. Once they got in trouble with Schweiker, then you could change 16-C and force
Ford to do what Reagan had done when he picked Schweiker, and pick somebody, and that was going to piss off somebody in the party. So it was not an unreasonable choice, but, in effect, it was forced by the fact that there was a vacancy in the vice presidency, not on a decision that had been made seven months before. And once we won on 16-C, we were focused on that, we thought that that’s the key fight. And it was.

What followed after that, after the rules were adopted that night was the platform fight, and Jesse Helms had gathered together this foreign policy plank for the platform that was beautifully done. It was tough, didn’t name Henry by name, but you knew who that querulous bastard was who was leading Ford astray, and who was for détente, and all of these various and sundry issues. It led to a great meeting we had up in Ford’s suite at the hotel. Kissinger was there and Rockefeller, Korologos and Timmons. I’m sure Stu was probably there, and the president.

Rockefeller and Kissinger are arguing vociferously that we have to defeat that platform plank. They want us to go war, go to the mattresses, kill this plank, and our thinking, looking at it, this is late at night, we’ve already won on 16-C, our people are in bars all over Kansas City thinking we won the fight. We’ll never get them back. If you go to a vote on this, we’re going to lose. And that will undo all the good we did with the rules fight, and could, in fact, reverse the whole dynamic of the convention. Then Henry threatened to quit. He said, “If you don’t go down and fight this fight and beat this on the floor, I’m going to quit.” And that’s when Tom Korologos piped up and he said, “For Christ’s sake, Henry, if you’re going to quit, do it now. We need the votes.” A memorable, memorable moment.

Smith: Doesn’t that sound like Tom?

Cheney: It sounds exactly like him.

Smith: Was Ford just kind of observing all of this?

Cheney: Oh yeah. As I recall, he was sitting there observing all of this. But he made the decision. He backed those of us who didn’t want to go have this fight. And so, what we did when they brought the plank up, we just agreed to it. There was never a vote on it. And it was exactly the right thing to do. That was the end of the rebellion. We’d won the key fight, and we went on about our business.

Smith: Stu, by the way, tells a story, so I’ll give you an opportunity to tell me whether he’s telling it accurately or not. It’s a wonderful story, but only half of the story has ever been in print – it’s the second half involving you that makes the story so great. Stu was not thrilled with the way things were going, and it was the end of a long week. He did say one of the frustrations he had originally on the job was that he spent half his time fending off all Ford’s buddies on Capitol Hill who would come to him to tell him what was wrong. He went in and told the president, in no uncertain terms, and it stopped.

So, anyway, he’s there and he’s trying to think of a euphemism, because he had these numbers – the president would go out and loved to campaign, and he had these not very good speeches from the speech shop, and his numbers would go down. He couldn’t come up with a euphemism, so finally he says, “Look, Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you’re a fucking lousy campaigner.” Now the only other person in the room was you. First of all, what other president could you say it to? Which is revealing in and of itself. But the great story is the sequel, because, when Germond-Witcover’s book comes out the story is there. And as Stu tells the story, he called you, very upset, going on and on and on, and you let him kind of rumble, run down. And finally you said, “Stu, there was a third person in that room.” And it never occurred to Stu that the president might have told the story himself. Which is a great story.

Cheney: No, I remember, it was when we took in the campaign plan. I’d had Stu and Foster Chanock and Mike Duvall, guys who worked for me, pulling together the fall campaign plan, and this is, I think, before the convention. Stu and I took it into the Oval Office, and what I remember was the president saying, “What’s this?” And Stu was looking at him and saying, “Mr. President, this says you are a lousy fucking campaigner.” That’s the language he used. And the president sort of reared back. He wouldn’t take that off just anybody, but he would take that off Stu. And, as you say, he’s one of the few people that the president would listen to that and respond to it.

Smith: There’s also the funny story, I think it’s in one of these interviews that Brokaw did, I think it was with you. Where the dinner for Queen Elizabeth - if Her Majesty had looked at the guest list - she would have been astonished at how many delegates and uncommitted delegates and wives were attending this state dinner.

Cheney: Yeah. About half the Wyoming delegation to the national convention was there that night. I mean, these people had never seen…they were wearing their boots, and white tie – it’s a special occasion.

No, the story I love about uncommitted delegates, I don’t know whether we’ve ever talked about it or not, was, as we went through this process, uncommitted delegates became like gold. We’d do anything to get your hands on an uncommitted delegate. We had this woman from Brooklyn who would announce she was for Reagan, and then she would announce she was for Ford, and so forth. Finally, we got hold of her, and I asked her, “What do we have to do to get you to commit to the president?” She said, well, she wanted to bring her family down, and have them meet with the president in the Oval Office. So, she did, and on the appointed day they showed up in the West Wing lobby – the scruffiest bunch of people you ever saw in your life. We took them in and shoved them into the Oval Office. I didn’t even go in, I couldn’t stand to watch. They came out about thirty minutes later, the president made the sale, and she committed, and she stayed right with us.

Then the dinner for the Queen. With the Bicentennial year we had all that good stuff to use. We finally get down shortly before the convention, and the Fords are in bed late at night upstairs in the residence. In those days Pennsylvania Avenue was open and a guy jumped that fence off Pennsylvania Avenue and headed towards the White House carrying a long length of something in his hands. The executive protective guy was out there and hollered at him to stop. He didn’t stop. Fired a warning shot and told him to stop. He didn’t stop, he kept coming. So the guy did the only thing he could, he took aim and shot him and dropped him right there on the North Lawn of the White House.

All hell breaks loose. I mean there are sirens going everywhere, police cars. The guy who did the shooting had only been on the force about six months and he was really shaken up by it, so they got him down in the Secret Service command post underneath the West Wing. Then all of a sudden, this happens sometimes - a situation like that - it got very quiet for just a moment and one of the older agents leaning over against the wall announced, he said, “Gentlemen, if that fellow we just shot was an uncommitted delegate, we’re in deep shit.” It’s a true story, actually. So the uncommitted delegate stuff was very important.

Smith: Was the White House slow, originally, to recognize either the inevitability of the Reagan challenge, or the seriousness of the threat that he posed?

Cheney: I think that there was a hope that there would be a way to get Reagan not to run. We had Tom Reed, who was secretary of the Air Force, who had been, I think, Reagan’s national committeeman from California for a long time. He was fairly close to the operation. We worked through Tom to try to feed back into the Reagan organization to find out what was going on. We talked to him about Cabinet jobs - if we could get him into the Cabinet - make him part of the Ford team. We even tried that.

Stu, when he signed on, of course, was very important because he knew the Reagan operation better than anybody else. I think Stu always took it seriously. I certainly did. We didn’t have a lot of time. By the time the president gets sworn in, in August of ’74 - by the summer of ’75 we’re going flat out getting organized. Then of course the campaign really kicks off in the New Hampshire primary in February.

Smith: Mrs. Ford, and her relationship with the campaign: there is this storyline that certainly some of the things she said, most famously the Sixty Minutes interview, produced at least, an initial wave from some, of outrage – succeeded, as time went by, perhaps to the surprise of many in the White House, with poll ratings that were much higher than her husband’s. Although, presumably, not among those who were going to vote for Ronald Reagan anyway. How much of an issue was that? How did you deal with it?

Cheney: Well, I didn’t think it was much of an issue. I have a recollection, I can’t remember where it comes from, but of talking to the president about it. Raising it with the president that Mrs. Ford was out doing Sixty Minutes, did he know where she was? And him saying, “Look guys, you want to get her to do something else? You go talk to her, because I can’t.” I think many of us saw it, it certainly eventually got to the point where we saw this is Betty Ford, and she’s the real deal, and I didn’t see this as having that big an impact, negatively, politically. People weren’t going to vote or not vote for Jerry Ford based on Betty. Also, she’d been through the cancer stuff. I know that was hard.

Smith: In the realm of euphemisms, was there an awareness that she had a problem at that point?

Cheney: No.

Smith: No.

Cheney: No, I mean, I dealt with her a lot, I dealt with the East Wing a lot. I spent a lot of time with the president. There were staff problems in the East Wing, there always are. You bring in a woman who’s been the wife of a Congressman and all of a sudden she’s got a staff and social secretary and everything.

There was the night we were in Germany on a formal visit, staying in an old castle. I got called about midnight by the president to come on down to his room. I went down and there was he and Mrs. Ford in their pajamas and robes and they wanted me to immediately fire the social secretary.

Smith: I bet Nancy really…

Cheney: Nancy Lammerding or something like that.

Smith: She’s gone now, bless her soul, but what a piece of work.

Cheney: I talked them out of it and said, “Let me wait until we get back to Washington.” We were right smack dab in the middle of this big trip, I think we were coming out of Helsinki, or going to Helsinki, and said, “Here in the middle of the night I fire the social secretary and it’s going to top tomorrow’s lead. We’re not going to get what we need out of it.” So they agreed that I could do it when I got back, but I had to do it.

And then we had been through the bit with the Korean, Park-sung, whoever…

Smith: There was Nancy Howe.

Cheney: Nancy Howe and her husband committed suicide or something? So there were management problems over there. At one point the president told me that he’d sent Rick Sardo(?) over to clean things up in the East Wing. Rick was a Marine colonel who was one of the military aides, one of the senior guys in the military office. Rough, tough Marine, twenty years in the corps, or something like that. About two weeks later I walked into my office one morning and there is Rick Sardo. He is a basket case. He’s been over there and they’ve worked him over and given him the East Wing treatment over there and that was one Marine that had taken all he could. We sent him back to the Pentagon. He wasn’t up to the task. Those were tough assignments.

Smith: I just finished doing an oral history project for the White House Historical Association in which we interviewed all the surviving White House social secretaries, who are a fascinating group of people. You really can trace the evolution of a lot of things. But, clearly, one of the things that emerges is the use of state dinners and other devices for political ends. We talked a little bit about that in terms of ’76. How were East and West Wing relations coordinated? Whether or not it was social times, but speeches, or travel - how did that work?

Cheney: I’m trying to remember. When we would put together the guest list for state dinners, and we had a whole bunch of them…

Smith: Because of the Bicentennial you had an unusual number.

Cheney: Because of the Bicentennial. And when the Queen came, we had to accommodate more people, so we set up a tent in the Rose Garden, and Bob Hope was there. These were great events. Everybody wanted to come. It generated a problem with the Cabinet because Bill Simon thought he ought to be included in every state dinner, and Bill didn’t take no for an answer. The president had established a policy, aside from Henry, the secretary of state, that we were going to rotate Cabinet members to these deals. So Simon raised all kinds of hell, but we stuck with it, wouldn’t let him go in.

These were sought after invitations, and I think Maria Downs became the social secretary, and she was somebody who was very easy to work with. She was very close to my secretary, Kathy Emboly(?), they knew each other. I still hear from Maria to this day. We could work through Maria with just about anything we wanted. These guest lists would be put together and there would be recommendations that would come in from various places. The Fords enjoyed doing it and I’d say we did more, probably that summer, than we did the entire years of the Bush administration.

Smith: But your impression was that Mrs. Ford enjoyed her job as First Lady.

Cheney: Yeah, I thought she did. And, as I say, I was unaware that she had any problem. If there was a problem there, it wasn’t obvious at the time.

Smith: Mentioning Bill Simon. One of the really defining things about the Ford presidency, first of all, is the caliber of the Cabinet, and the people around him. But, secondly, his degree of comfort with strong, sometimes contentious, egos, and how he used the Cabinet and advisors. Could you talk a little bit about that?

Cheney: Yeah, he was, there was no question, he was comfortable with strong people, and with debate, discussion about the issues and so forth. He enjoyed that. We’d have a tough economic issue to decide and we’d get the economic policy council, or whatever we called it, get them together in the Cabinet room and there would be a big debate. He usually would not make a decision there, he’d end up back in his office and he relied on a few key people lots of times.

In the economic arena it would be Greenspan, maybe Jim Lynn. Sometimes Arthur Burns. But lots of times he’d say, “Get Alan over here,” and we’d get Greenspan in and then the two of them would sit down and talk about the bigger meeting. Everybody got a chance to be heard in the bigger meeting, but he’d sit down and have that close relationship with somebody he really trusted. And Greenspan is about as good as you could get in the economic arena.

Smith: Alan Greenspan tells a wonderful story about one day he went over. Simon and Arthur Burns were discussing Simon’s idea to sell some of the gold reserves and they got into it. I mean, really got into it. Ford listened to this whole thing and then, ten minutes later, Greenspan’s phone rang, “Come on over.” And he walks into the Oval Office, and Ford says, “What the hell was that all about?”

Cheney: Yeah, he would do that. But one of the things I was always struck by, and I think the president appreciated this, too - in his later years we talked about on more than one occasion, the extent to which people who were important in later administrations, sort of got their break, or were an important part of his administration. We used to see in our annual dinner - I probably attended there on more than one occasion - where he had people like Jim Baker, who’s our campaign chairman who ends up, obviously as Bush’s campaign chairman and secretary of treasury. Secretary of State Rumsfeld, two tours as secretary of defense, myself, Scowcroft. You could look at the first Bush administration and a lot of what you got there were people that were trained by Jerry Ford. He had some great people that agreed to sign on for him, and then served in later administrations.

Smith: I have to ask you, because the one sort of down side of that - it must have been really awkward for him and Paul O’Neill, in the later Bush administration. Was that ever discussed?

Cheney: He never talked to me about Paul afterwards. We all had a fondness and affection for Paul. And I’m partly responsible for what happened to Paul because I recommended him to the president to be secretary of the treasury. A lot of other people supported it – George Schultz, Greenspan and so forth. But I got him down to meet with President Bush, and Bush really liked him, and we went through that whole exercise and got him on board as secretary of the treasury, and then it didn’t work. And I’m the guy who had to call him and tell him that it wasn’t working and the president wanted to make a change.
Paul was fantastic in the role he was in, in the Ford administration. He was the deputy director of OMB. You could have had anybody to be director of OMB and Paul was the go-to guy, career guy, came up through the ranks, and one of the best I’ve ever seen on the Federal budget.

I knew him also because we were both CEOs together. When he was running ALCOA, I was running Halliburton, and I felt badly about the way it came out. In the end, there were a couple of problems. One was that Paul didn’t tend to be a macro guy in terms of economic policy. He was more like a budget officer or a CFO. And the other problem was that the administration, Bush administration, the administration I was part of, didn’t, especially in the early years, effectively use Cabinet members in key policy decisions.
Economic policy would get made by a group of guys in the White House, but the secretary of the treasury wouldn’t even be in the meeting. I think that was frustrating for Paul, too. It was one of those things that was a great idea, everybody thought it was a great choice; turned out not to be, and it wasn’t all Paul’s fault.

Smith: You can notice, too, Ford’s affinity for O’Neill in those OMB days, the fact that Ford was the last president who could get up and actually introduce his own Federal budget. Which, when you stop to think about it, is pretty mindboggling.

Cheney: Oh, yeah. That was a great event that day, and it was a deliberate effort on our part to knock down that whole notion that Ford wasn’t up to the task. Lyndon Johnson had said he’d played football without his helmet, or some such thing.

Smith: Describe Ford’s intelligence.

Cheney: He was very, very comfortable with intellectual arguments, with bright people. We had some great sessions up in the solarium that Bob Golden organized, where we’d bring in outside experts in various subjects and sit around on a Saturday morning and talk about complicated questions - immigration patterns into the U.S. - interesting stuff. He was never intimidated by a guy like Henry Kissinger, obviously one of the brightest people that ever served in those posts. He had a great ability, I always felt, to get along with foreign leaders. I know some of those relationships lasted a lifetime.

Smith: You think of people like a Jim Callaghan, who was an old Socialist (Labor), and Helmut Schmidt, and Giscard, who’s not the warmest personality in the world. And yet the one thing they agreed on was they all held Ford in enormous regard.

Cheney: And for years they would all come to this summer deal we did, and still are doing, out in Beaver Creek. There was stuff he knew. He could tell you how many park rangers there were in the National Park Service in 1954. He knew that stuff. And he was, of all the presidents I worked with, he was, without question, the best prepared on the budget of any of them. On the day that we had him brief the press corps, that was I guess, the first time since Harry Truman, when the budget was much smaller, that the president had gone out and done the briefing himself. Usually it was the Cabinet and OMB director. I remember we had all of them arrayed on the stage up there that day, but the president did the brief over in the State Department auditorium. And it was a great performance. It really helped us put to rest this whole notion that was out there that Ford was a bumbler, stumbler kind of a guy. He got a raw deal from the press in many respects. Here was this guy who was a great athlete, football player, skier, and the press would run over and over and over again footage of him falling on the ski slopes or slipping on the stairs coming out of the plane.

Smith: Did it hurt him? I know he never publicly let on.

Cheney: He never let on publicly that it did. It made me angry. I can’t believe it didn’t, but he’d tell jokes about it. Go do the show with Chevy Chase. Now, having been vice president for the last eight years, you get to be a punching bag for the Jay Leno’s and David Letterman’s of the world, it goes with the turf. I happened to be watching Jay Leno last night and now he’s doing to Biden what he used to do to me. The vice president is a standing joke. But the president, it bothered me when they did it to him. Partly because I thought it was such a distortion of who the guy really was, and partly because it was a problem for us in terms of trying to manage the campaign and his poll ratings, and everything else. And then we get into something like the Polish question in the second foreign policy debate.

Smith: You take the words right out of my mouth, because clearly he was very, very stubborn about it. You were clearly making headway in that campaign. People forget how far behind you were at the outset, and you were really making it up. There was a consensus that you won the first debate, and then I guess, I think was before the second debate that Carter had his famous Playboy interview that further slowed his momentum.

Cheney: Lust in his heart.

Smith: Yeah, exactly. And then you get this, the Polish question. And they did give him an opportunity in the course of the debate to…

Cheney: Max Frankel came back and asked him a second time. No, I was with him that night in the Green Room before he went on, and then sat and watched it by myself in his Green Room while he was out on the stage. Saw him make that mistake: “Poland is not dominated by the Soviet Union.” Frankel had been trying to get at the, or Ford thought Frankel was asking about the Sonnenfeldt Doctrine. I don’t know if you know about the Sonnenfeldt Doctrine. Helmet Sonnenfeldt and the State Department had been over and briefed our ambassadors in Europe and the argument about the doc was it supposedly involved our recognition of some sort of legitimacy of the Soviet domination of Eastern Europe.

Ford was primed to shoot down the notion that that was administration policy. He misunderstood, I think, the question. But what he’d pulled up was an answer that he’d been primed to give on the Sonnenfeldt doc. Basically, it came out that Poland is not dominated by the Soviet Union. And then Frankel came back and he repeated it. After it was over with I rode with him in the car back to the house where he was staying in San Francisco. I think Henry called him in the car or something and praised his performance. So I dropped him off for the night, then I went down to the St. Francis Hotel, where Stu and I and Scowcroft were supposed to go brief our press corps – give them the spin. I can remember walking up on the stage and Lou Cannon, from the Post, hollered at me from the back of the room. He said, “Hey, Cheney, how many Soviet divisions are there in Poland?” and it was downhill from there.

The next day we flew down to Southern California. I went up and talked to him in the cabin of Air Force One, said I really thought this was out of hand. Carter was having a field day, the press was going bananas, we’re getting phone calls from the Washington office saying what the hell are you guys doing out there? I said to the president that we need to go down and make it clear that you understand that Poland is still under Soviet purview. And he threw me out. So I got Stu and took Stu back up, and he threw both of us out.

We landed in California, we went through the day and finally we got him to – it was at breakfast the next morning with businessmen or something, as I recall – and he was primed to stand up and say that Poland is not dominated or whatever, to give the correct answer. And he did, but then he adlibbed something on the end of it, “if they are,” or something like that. Well, the press went bananas again. We finally got in the Valley someplace there doing a rally in front of a courthouse. I was over with the press and they were just having a field day.

So when the rally was over with, the president got finished speaking, we took him back into the mayor’s office in the courthouse. Stu was with me. Sat him down and said, “Mr. President, this is just killing us. You’ve got to go out and explain that you understand who the hell is running Poland at this point.” I said, “I want to call the press bus around, pull them over here in the parking lot and we’ll hold an impromptu press conference. You can go out and do your mea culpa.” He said, “Okay, damn it, I’ll do it.” So, we waited a couple of minutes, got the press all lined up, and then we got ready to go and I was walking behind him as we went out and I said to him one last time, I said, “Now, Mr. President, you have fixed in your mind what it is you’re going to say?” And he spun around on his heels, jabbed his finger in my chest, and said, “Poland is not dominated by the Soviet Union!” and then laughed like hell, went out and delivered his lines the way he was supposed to and that was the end of the story.

But he had a sense of humor about himself under those difficult circumstances. He didn’t like having to apologize, he was very stubborn. Stu, he’d be around over in the corner laughing his fool head off, watching all this back and forth.

There is a picture, a favorite news story in Kansas City. This is the morning that Ford has announced that Bob Dole is going to be his running mate. He and Dole came up with this scheme that we’re going to go to Russell, Kansas the next day and do a big rally. I’m appalled. Everybody is strung out, we’d been working this convention, we’d been in this huge fight, we finally won, and I said, “Mr. President, this is going to be the first stop of the whole campaign. It’s got to go well. We cannot have a train wreck out there. There isn’t even an airport in Russell, Kansas.” We’re going to go in fifty miles away. I said, “Where in the hell am I supposed to get advance men. What are we going to do about a crowd and so forth.”

Dole was there listening to all of this back and forth, and Stu was, too. I think I’ve got a picture of it. They are watching me argue with the President and he finally got to the point where he said, “Damn it, Dick, do it.” So I said, “Yes, sir, Mr. President.” We had people on buses and we were trekking them into Russell, Kansas, and went all night and bought radio announcements all over the western half of Kansas. We just really busted our butts trying to raise a crowd in this little Podunk town where Dole is from.

The next day we’re flying in by helicopter to Russell, Kansas, and there is a humongous crowd. I mean, there are people everywhere. Those advance guys did a great job. And the president reached over and tapped me and said, “See, Dick, I told you we’d get a crowd.”

Smith: One last Kansas City question. To this day, there is still debate over whether the Reagan camp made it a condition of their meeting after the nomination that Reagan not be asked to be on the ticket. And my understanding is that that is, in fact, the case. But there is some effort, I think, to suggest wiggle room after the fact. Some people around Reagan, not necessarily Reagan himself, and we talked about this a little bit with Stu, suggesting why didn’t you ask Reagan? If you’d asked him, he would have said yes, and all of this. What is your recollection of that?

Cheney: Well, by the time we got to Kansas City the relationship between Reagan and Ford was strained, to put it mildly. I don’t think Ford – Ford found it difficult to accept the proposition that Reagan had actually challenged a sitting Republican president for the nomination. He didn’t like it, he didn’t like Reagan. Before we went to Kansas City I’d done a poll - I had Teeter do a poll, about twelve candidates for vice presidents. Ford had asked me to run the search. We had Ann Armstrong on there, we had John Connally on there, and Dole and Baker and all the usual suspects. And I’d also had Bob do questions on Reagan. And what it showed, overwhelmingly, was that the best choice you could make was Reagan. That’s what the data showed.

I took it up to Camp David. I don’t remember whether Stu was there or not, Teeter was, and briefed Ford on the data on Reagan and tried to make a pitch that he really ought to consider Reagan for his running mate. He didn’t want to hear it. The relationship at that point was, as I say, severely strained and he made it very clear that he didn’t want to hear anymore talk about Reagan for vice president. This is before the convention. Got to the convention and I’d worked a deal with John Sears that whoever won the nomination fight would go to the hotel room of the loser that night and we’d have a unity meeting, bind up the wounds of the party, for the sake of the press and so forth.

The night after we’d won the 16-C fight, and it was clear we were going to win the nomination, I had Bill Timmons contact Sears, and Sears agreed, but he had two conditions. One was that it had to be a one on one meeting, didn’t want anybody else in the room except the two of them. And secondly, we had to promise we would not offer the vice presidency. I went back to the president and confirmed to both of those conditions, and then had Bill convey that back to Sears. Now, Sears was the interlocutor, he was the guy, and if he was doing this on his own, and Reagan really was dying to have it, I’d find it really hard to believe.
Ford went in and he had with him a list when he went in to meet with him. I don’t remember whether Stu went in or not. He wasn’t all that well regarded in the Reagan camp. But Paul Laxalt greeted us as the Reagan guy, then the two of them met and one of the things that came out of that was that Reagan reacted positively to Bob Dole. He was on Ford’s list. We had another problem which was about the same time. There was a revolt developing in the ranks of the state chairman, and they really wanted Reagan on the list. We had to find somebody to dampen that down. We had the normal meetings that went on all night as we got advice from people on who ought to be the running mate. Rockefeller and a whole bunch of other people participated.
Different groups would come in.

Smith: Was Ann Armstrong seriously considered?

Cheney: She was on the list of people we polled about. She cost us about twelve votes, the simple fact that she was a woman. Twelve percent of the vote.

Smith: Really?

Cheney: Yeah. The country still wasn’t in a position where a woman VP was going to work. But anyway, when the president went to bed, there were a lot of people who thought it was going to be Howard Baker. The next morning, I was staying right there on the floor, just a few doors down from him, he called me down. I remember Betty was still in her bathrobe. The president was still going dressed. He told me, he said, “Dick, I’m going to go with Bob Dole.
Get me Dole on the phone.” So that’s how we ended up going with Dole.

Smith: Did he explain the rationale?

Cheney: Part of it was that it was a way to cap out. First of all, Dole was acceptable to Reagan, which was important. Secondly, it was a way to sort of cap out the movement for Reagan on the floor among the state chairmen, because Dole had been national chairman, Republican national chairman. He was known to everybody and getting out there fast with the Dole announcement was – he would be acceptable. I think those were the main considerations why we went with Dole and why he made that decision. I think he’d seriously entertained Howard Baker as a possibility, but after a few hours of sleep, that next morning he decided on Bob.

Smith: At the end of the campaign, did you think you had a 50-50 chance, or better than a 50-50 chance?

Cheney: I thought we had a chance. I’ve always felt very good about the campaign, to this day.

Smith: Mark Shields says it’s the best run campaign he’s ever seen, and that’s coming from…

Cheney: Yeah, he’s no fan of mine.

Smith: That’s an unusual observation.

Cheney: But he felt good about it because we gave it our absolutely best shot. And it was almost an impossible task from the outset. With Watergate, and never run before, and the standing in the polls, thirty points down, Labor Day behind Carter. But we really felt like we’d put all into it, and it was a great group of guys working the campaign. We loved Jerry Ford and loved working for him. He had people like Spencer and Baker and so forth, and these guys became lifelong friends out of that experience.

Smith: Two quick things at the end. He went home to Grand Rapids and at that point, I guess really lost his voice, or was losing his voice. It’s been said that there was a desperate, frantic appeal last minute to go to Ohio, which, of course is where he came in so close. Does that ring a bell at all?

Cheney: I seem to remember campaigning in Ohio. Yeah, he found out about the talking car and he loved it – he’d pop open a roof so he could stand up – and have a microphone there. I rode around for eight years with a talking car and never used it once for talking to people. I remember we’d been driving down the street and you’d see him stopping their cars and start talking to people. They would start running for the exits, they didn’t know what the hell was happening. But he loved that.
He got towards the end, he had lost his voice. Ohio was a special problem. We lost Ohio. And we lost it in the southern belt, the Bible Belt. If you go down along the Ohio River, there are a lot of counties down there that are really more southern than they are northeastern industrial. That’s where we lost Ohio. We needed one other state. If we got Ohio, I think we needed four more delegates or something like that.

Smith: Would he review, for example, the TV spots and all that? Was he signing off on all of that?

Cheney: I think he signed off on a lot of the spots. I remember we showed him the TV spots, the storyboards, for example, on the concepts.

Smith: And then the Election Eve broadcast, I think it was broadcast from Air Force One, with Pearl Bailey and Joe Garagiola. Those relationships were clearly very special.

Cheney: They were, and we were looking for a way to maximize our impact. When you’re thirty points back, you start to do the arithmetic every 24 hours. You’ve got to persuade another million people or something to shift their loyalties. And we came up with this concept. We had Edith Green, Democrat from Oregon, who was a good friend of his from his House days, Joe Garagiola, who was great, and a couple of other people – especially the two of them. And we would go in and hit a town in the morning and get footage of all of this and then we’d buy a half hour of time on the local channel and have them talk. They’d run footage of what we’d done earlier that day, and then you’d have Ford and Garagiola and so forth doing the whatever it is we were doing. Basically trying to pedal the ticket. And it had some impact. It was a way we could get a larger audience.

The other thing, we were to some extent constrained by the new campaign law. We had to worry about how much we were spending. We actually ended up with some money in the bank when we finished, but we were so concerned about not going over, that that affected it as well, too.

But then at the last, the tail end of the campaign, we went home to Grand Rapids, for that rally down at the old Pantlind Hotel the night before the election. That worked out. The next day we went and the president voted early in the morning, as I recall, and then we had breakfast at the little restaurant where he always had breakfast on election day. Then went from there to the airport. At the airport there was this beautiful mural that had been painted by the city fathers, I guess, on the wall. Ford got up there and spoke, got very emotional. The whole crowd got emotional. Hell, the press corps is crying. I mean, that’s a crusty bunch. It really was a remarkable moment, and it was almost as though that were the climax, not the election that night.

When we got on the airplane and flew from Grand Rapids back to Washington across the eastern half of the country, there wasn’t a cloud in the sky. It was one of those beautiful fall days. You know that people who might otherwise stay home were going to be out to vote. We started to get some results in the afternoon, but it wasn’t gone by any means. I think we expected that it was going to be hard.

We stayed up until about two o’clock in the morning. Bob and I basically were working out of my office, going up and taking up returns to the president, who was upstairs. He had Jacob Javits with him and I think maybe Garagiola was probably there. We finally decided about two o’clock in the morning to shut it down, that we weren’t going to make any statement that night.

Got up the next morning and clearly, we’d lost. He had lost his voice. I can’t remember – I think the sequence was: we went into the office, had a picture taken with the family standing behind the desk, and had a statement. The family then went out with the president, into the press room and Betty got up and spoke on behalf of the family because his voice was gone. And then he and I went back to the Oval Office to call Jimmy Carter. He called him from the desk, and I sat over by the fireplace, there was that telephone over there by where the president usually sits. He got Carter on the phone, and could just barely whisper. He introduced me and it was my job to read the concession statement to Jimmy Carter, which I did not enjoy doing, but I did. That was the end. That’s how it all wrapped up.
Smith: Who would have imagined that thirty years later you’d be sitting in a pew with the Carters at the funeral.

Cheney: At the funeral – yeah.

Smith: I’ll tell you, Rex Scouten, very professional and very discrete, but told one wonderful story about election night. It was around two o’clock in the morning and the president – because he was up there on the second floor with them – and the president is going across the hall, I guess to go to bed. And Rex followed him. He just wanted to say something consoling. He said, “Mr. President, you have spent your entire life in service to this country, in uniform and during the war…

Smith: The nomination of Justice Stevens – which really does stand out as maybe the last time it was handled that way. Not least of all, as he points out, in his confirmation hearings no one asked him about abortion, which is pretty extraordinary. And I was amazed to find out that he had not been interviewed by the president. How did that come about?

Cheney: In my experience, now, which includes watching the Bork battle back with Reagan, and Scalia, Clarence Thomas. I was with ’41 when he announced Clarence Thomas up in Kennebunkport that day. Then in screening candidates for President Bush, I chaired the committee that reviewed everybody’s credentials. Stevens was sort of the last of the old process, if you will, way of doing things, in the sense that it was all pretty much turned over to Ed Levi, who was then the attorney general. The bar associations still played an important role in those days. And pretty much what emerged with John Paul Stevens, and I like the guy, I’ve seen him socially and so forth, and he’s really a first class gentleman. He is totally, totally, out there to the left in terms of his views, and I don’t know that there is much he has voted for that I would agree with him on. But I think the president was looking for a first class jurist, if I can put it in those terms, and I don’t recall that politics entered into it. This was not unique with Ford, it was more the way things worked in those days. And it was before the abortion decisions.
Smith: I wonder whether, in some ways, if it was almost an extension in some ways of the Levi pick. You had a Justice Department that clearly needed to be cleaned up to be sure that jurisprudence was seen as not tainted by politics or cronyism.

Cheney: I think there was more the view that there was the law, and judges interpreted the law and made decisions accordingly, and that there wasn’t a political dimension to it. And there hadn’t been for some time.

Smith: But that’s a lot given his role in the whole Bill Douglas impeachment.

Cheney: You mean Ford’s role.

Smith: Yeah, Ford’s earlier role. I’ve always wondered whether he regretted it.

Cheney: My impression of those controversies, though, dealt more with the personal qualities, or flaws, ethical lapses of individuals, and it didn’t really have much to do with whether they were conservative or liberal or believed in an expansive view of the Constitution or a strict constructionist view. It just wasn’t an issue. Those kinds of considerations weren’t a big deal back in the early ‘70s, until after you got by Roe v Wade, and some of those other issues that where, today, you could have the most qualified jurist in the world, but if he’s wrong on a couple of those issues, there are elements in the Senate who will never vote for him no matter what.

Smith: And people do forget, but he introduced Judge Bork at Bork’s confirmation hearings.

Cheney: The president did, yeah. I had forgotten that. One of the interesting things on Stevens – just a little sideline – we’d run into some trouble with the courts on military commissions and so forth, and set up to deal with terrorists after 9/11. But if you go back and look, the military commissions questions came up after World War II – the court ruled at that time that they were okay, and relied on those precedents for what we did this time around. And then the court came back and shot us down. A vote against approving these back in the ‘40s was Justice Rutledge from, I think, Wisconsin, who voted in the negative, and in the minority, but his view or the view espoused by him was the one that prevailed in the most recent set of decisions. The guy who was his law clerk, back in the ‘40s was John Paul Stevens. I’ve always been intrigued with that. He went from being a clerk in the ‘40s on the losing side, and then when he was writing the decisions on the majority…interesting tidbit.

Smith: The fall of Saigon. We talked a little bit about it, but in terms of what that must have been like for Ford. Mel Laird, again, it will come as no surprise, I suppose as the architect of Vietnamization is entitled to think whatever he thinks, and he loves Jerry Ford, but he resents his failure in the spring of 1975 to get Congress to approve whatever it was – 700 million dollars in military aid. And again, it just seems hard to believe in that climate – and the best evidence of that was the moment the city fell they tried to pull the plug on any resettlement funding. Plus there was a debate going on in the White House between Kissinger and some of those, including in the speech shop, who wanted to put this behind us, maybe prematurely. What was your recollection of that?

Cheney: I’ve talked with Henry about those days, too. It’s come up - I’ve talked with him four or five times a year for the last several years. Kissinger comes to see me and we talk about everything. Lots of times he harks back to those days, the Vietnamization, and so forth. Draws on lessons from that experience in terms of what we were doing. I don’t believe he ever felt Ford did anything other than go flat out to try to get the resources that were needed so that the South Vietnamese could stay in and fight.

I guess the thing I felt, what stands out in my mind is the speech at Tulane. This is right after we’ve finished the evacuation, whatever it is, of our people from the embassy and so forth. It’s really close after that. It was a speech the president gave that sort of said that it’s over, it’s behind us. It’s done now, we did that, we’re going to move on. I can remember being with him when he did that speech, and there was a great sense of relief because it was a conflict that had dragged on and on and had been extraordinarily expensive - fifty-eight thousand American lives. It was clear we weren’t prepared as a nation to do any more than we’d already done. There wasn’t the feeling, if there was a feeling out there that, gee, if we’d just tried harder, we might have prevailed. It was, I think, a national sentiment that was reflected in Ford’s view, that I shared, which was, we gave it our best shot, now it’s time to move on. I take issue with my friend Mel Laird.

Now, in 1966, this is three years before he becomes secretary of defense, I’m working for the governor of Wisconsin, and late one night Mel is with us. We’d done a fundraiser clear up in northern Wisconsin for the party, and we’re flying from there down to O’Hare in a small plane, to get Mel and make it possible for Mel to make a connection back to Washington. There are just the three of us and the pilot. And he was warning Warren Knowles, who was then my boss, to be very, very careful about Vietnam. “Don’t get too far out,” he said, “They are screwing it up. The administration is messing it up.” He said this one is going to go south on them. He was pressing it in his forecast and then he found himself three years later secretary of defense.

I’ve heard him talk about it in meetings of former secretaries of defense. He refers to it as that damn war. I always felt Mel had a very unpleasant experience. I think he did as good a job as he could, I don’t mean to be critical of his performance, but it was a real bummer of a time to be secretary of defense – having to go through all through of that. He did the best he could, but he had a very bad hand to play. But I don’t think there was anything Jerry Ford could have done to alter that outcome. I think the die was cast.

Smith: But, by all accounts, Ford was angered by Congress’s attempt to shut the door in terms of resettling refugees. And he pretty much put together this kind of crazy quilt coalition, and it was George Meany and the American Jewish Congress and others who finally got some funds out of Congress. One of the really touching things at the time of his death was to read tributes from Vietnamese-Americans, some of whom literally had come in the first wave, who thought of him as their president because he’d rescued them and their families. And the fact that that staircase is in the museum, in spite of Henry Kissinger’s thinking…

Cheney: The one up to the helicopter.
Smith: Oh, yeah. But, again, you wouldn’t expect it from Ford. Ford said, “It’s part of our history, we can’t forget it.” But more than that, that staircase is every bit as much a symbol of the desire for freedom as the piece of the Berlin Wall that’s out on the front lawn.

Cheney: Yeah.

Smith: When you saw him in later years, he obviously was very proud of his alumni. Did you have any discussions about Iraq and Afghanistan?

Cheney: No. I don’t recall any conversations about Iraq or Afghanistan. We used to see him every year at the reunion dinner in Washington. Then we’d do the Beaver Creek thing. I think Lynn and I have only missed one of the Beaver Creek sessions in twenty-five years or whatever it’s been. And for several years they had us stay in the house with them there at Beaver Creek. We had our bedroom and they’d always put us there. The last few years, Alan and Andrea would come and they would stay in the house. And I actually swore in Greenspan for his last term as Fed chairman in the living room of the Ford house there in Beaver Creek. The audience was Andrea and Lynn and Jerry and Betty Ford.

Smith: By all accounts, they were beloved figures in Vail, the Fords.

Cheney: Absolutely. Yeah, he and I never talked about Iraq or Afghanistan. I don’t know what he thought about them. He was careful, he never got involved in sort of commenting upon what the incumbent was doing. We did some special things with him. We had, I think the first year I was vice president we put up a big tent on the lawn and had the big dinner at the vice president’s residence.

Smith: I remember. Happy Rockefeller came back.

Cheney: Happy Rockefeller was there. We gave her a tour. Then we did it in the Rotunda of the Capitol one year. Did it at the White House one year. I always was involved in arranging those, put them together.

Smith: He was thrilled, the ninetieth birthday down at the White House. And then, very poignantly, I think it was the last time in Statuary Hall, where I think you and Secretary Rumsfeld were singled out. I’d written his remarks that night, and I guess afterwards he said, “That’s the last time I’m speaking in public.”

Cheney: It was hard for him.

Smith: He was angry at himself.

Cheney: It was hard for him. He’d started to show the years by then. But, no, he was great and I always felt that, I hoped, and think it was true, that he was proud of the service I rendered because he got me started. He signed me on that Sunday in the West Wing. I was all of thirty-three years old. A year later he made me chief of staff. We went through a lot of good times together and a lot of hairy times. When I ran for Congress, he came to Wyoming to help. I got him set up with a lecture at the local community college and then he stayed with us at our house in Caspar there. Actually used the bathroom upstairs and the tub overflowed and we got water in my office. We never told him that part of the story.

Smith: He was not a mechanically deft…

Cheney: The curtain wasn’t inside the tub or something. And then he went from there up to Jackson and was the keynote speaker at the Republican state convention. This is 1978. I’d worked it out with him that I didn’t want him to mention me in his convention speech. We wanted to have all of that be totally nonpartisan. We were refighting the Republican battles of ’76, because we had Reaganites and Fordites and so forth in delegation, and he handled it beautifully. It could not have been better. But I think he loved seeing me run for Congress, to say he’d had a lot to do with that.

Smith: Was Congress his first love?

Cheney: I think so. I think he would have loved to have won the presidency again. It just wasn’t to be. We gave it our best shot.

You mentioned a minute ago, of finding myself in the pew with Jimmy Carter. I suspect, I don’t have any reason to believe this, I know he was heavily involved in planning his funeral, and you may know more about it than I do. I had a phone call from Jack, I guess, asking me if I’d do certain things, and deliver a eulogy in the Rotunda at the Capitol and that sort of thing. But when I think back on it, the day that he put, well, you spoke that morning, and Rumsfeld and Carter in the church in Grand Rapids. And then we went out at graveside and I’m standing there with Jimmy Carter, and I had the opportunity over the years on more than one occasion to let the president know that I didn’t think much of his friend Jimmy Carter. I thought he was a turkey. And I often wonder if he didn’t chuckle to himself when he made those arrangements and know exactly what he was doing – that I was going to have to be sharing the day with Jimmy Carter.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Cheney: I remember the last time I talked to him. That was a special moment because I called him and told him we’d been successful in naming the aircraft carrier after him. I got to deliver that message. He obviously was ecstatic with that. But this was towards the end. He was having good days and bad days. But he loved that fact. John Warner had called me. John had been working it on the Hill, and he called me and Jack Marsh had been involved and a bunch of them. They wanted to know if I wanted to call the president and tell him that there was going to be a USS Gerald R. Ford. That was the last time I talked with him.

Smith: Was it tough delivering that eulogy in the Rotunda? You did it very well.

Cheney: I loved that speech I made that day, and John McConnell was crucial and instrumental in it. No, I really felt good about being asked. I talked in there about, I remember opening by saying that we had the opportunity, because he was given the gift of a long life, to tell him many times in his presence how much he meant to us and what we thought of him. So I felt very good about doing it, about being asked to do it.

Smith: Plus, you know, poor Lyndon Johnson, who dies two days before a peace treaty is announced. Gerald Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon – not that he lay awake at night worrying about it. But the amazing thing was the Kennedy Library.
After that he said, “For twenty years everywhere I go, people asked the same question. They don’t ask anymore.”

Cheney: He loved that fact that they gave him that award.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Cheney: Well, I’m a huge Jerry Ford fan. The opportunity to work with him when I did, under those circumstances, in the aftermath of Watergate, coming in as he did under the twenty-fifth amendment – it’s unique in our history. I think you’ve got to give him enormous credit to some extent for what didn’t happen. For all the train wrecks that were avoided by virtue of him being there and his presence and his willingness, for example, to step up and pardon Nixon, knowing full well the political burden that he’d bear as a result of that. So I give him very high marks.

Smith: Perfect. This is great. Thank you.

Whip Inflation Now, 22
Smith: It’s hard to know where to begin, so let me just toss a question out. In some ways I feel like I know more about your mom than I do about your dad, and yet I read somewhere the president said probably your dad was the person who had the greatest influence on him, of anyone in his life. Tell me about your dad, and what were the qualities that presumably not only got transmitted to Jerry, but to you and your brothers.

Ford: Hopefully.

Smith: Well, I think probably.

Ford: There is no question that, in my opinion, I think Dad was a predominant force in the development of any characteristics of Jerry’s that have gotten note – such as his integrity, obviously. Even the small point like being on time. We never had to worry about Jerry when I’d establish a golf game. He was there. There was a little problem with brother Tom, however. It’s just a comparison. Jerry, Jim and I were extremely punctual. Tom didn’t get the message.

Smith: Was that something your dad drove home?

Ford: Oh yeah, if you said were going to be home at such and such a time, even if you were a boy, you were there at such and such a time. No, it’s time wise, but if you were given a job to do, it was expected to be done, period.

Smith: To someone who didn’t know your dad, describe him – both physically and in other ways.

Ford: For those days, he was a relatively big man. He probably was six-one or two when he was in his youth and weighed over two hundred pounds. That was pretty big in those days. He was a very, very hard worker. Put in hours like people couldn’t believe. Then he got involved in community service and politics. Put forth the same amount of effort there. Yet, obviously in his opinion, was some concern for his life and safety of the members of his family because they just, about two years ago, found a revolver that he buried up in the attic. It was his because it had the newspaper wrapped around it. This was in the attic of the house we lived in on Santa Cruz, and this was the time when they were “fighting” the McKay machine. There were things done that people question now, but there is no doubt in my mind that they did happen.

Smith: That is fascinating. Would it be fair to say that Jerry got his interest in politics from your dad?

Ford: I couldn’t be absolutely sure of that, but I would bet ten to one that he definitely did. He saw Dad’s involvement and Jerry was, like the three of us, encouraged to participate in extracurricular activities as well as being involved in everything that we could involve ourselves in. Growing up - Boy Scouts we were associated with in the high schools or the junior high schools. As each one of us came up, we became scouts and subsequently Eagle Scouts because Jerry had established a pattern, which I think was influenced very significantly by Dad.

Smith: Jumping ahead, but I have to ask you, how did your dad get involved politically? Then tell me about Frank McKay.

Ford: I can’t tell you much about Frank McKay, but I think my dad became involved politically when Bill Ver Meulen and a lady by the name of Koeze, and a couple of others – I can’t remember right now – were very involved in the effort to destroy the McKay machine. That was, to my knowledge, Dad’s first real involvement. I think he got involved partially through church and partially through business. The people who knew him asked him to get involved.

Smith: What was the McKay machine?

Ford: It was, strangely enough, a Republican machine. But there was some dubious projects. One of which was the first waterline to Lake Michigan. Tales are told of truckloads of materials that were signed for that were never delivered. That was part of the presumed connivery of the McKay machine.

Smith: Did they have pretty much a hammer lock on…

Ford: They had a very definite hammerlock on the elections. Once the elections were completed, the individuals that were elected, cow-towed very definitely, to whatever Mr. McKay apparently determined what was right for whomever.

Smith: The story is told, didn’t Jerry get an appointment one day with McKay?

Ford: Well, I’m not real privy to that. I know that he got an appointment with McKay, to inform him that he was going to run against Bartel Jonkman. And Mr. McKay kept him waiting, I think two or three hours, and then when Jerry saw him, it was like a five minute discussion in which Jerry presumably said to Mr. McKay, “I’m going to run against Bartel Jonkman.” I understand his reply was “Well you’re wasting your time.” Or something to that effect.

Smith: Presumably Jonkman was part of the McKay organization – or at least was the incumbent.

Ford: At least was the incumbent with great support from Mr. McKay.

Smith: Tell me about your mother.

Ford: As I look back at it, I wonder how in the dickens she raised four boys. I mean we were pretty independent souls, and she put up with all the idiosyncrasies which we possessed.

Smith: Such as?

Ford: My own idiosyncrasies, I had two of them. One of them, I hated vegetables, and I oft times remember I was instructed not to leave the table until I finished my vegetables. Fortunately my good buddy, the dog, whose name was Buddy, got more vegetables than any dog in Grand Rapids, I think. I also had another peculiarity; I loved, for some reason, to apply adhesive tape, whether I needed or not, on various parts of my body. She overlooked all those little idiosyncrasies, which each one of us possessed, I’m sure.
Smith: Did Jerry have idiosyncrasies? He had a temper.

Ford: He had a temper before the war! But he changed after. I’ll give you two instance: when he’d come back to take a vacation after he graduated from college, it was out at Yale, I was eleven years younger, but I was available for tennis and then I caddied for him in the mornings for golf. Then he and a couple of others would play tennis, normally every afternoon that he was in town. His temper I can remember vividly (which he denied). When he was in a sand trap, there was a big tree limb that went across the top of the sand trap and he took two shots to get out of it. The third shot just barely got out. With this he went, psst, and wrapped the club around the tree and left it.

So, in my opinion, all of us had tempers, definitely. I had a short fuse. In fact, my short fuse was probably worse than Jerry’s. But just to make a point: one time my only claim to fame was as a reasonably good tennis player. Dad ascertained that if I could control my temper I’d be a much better tennis player. So he thought if Jerry could play a little tennis with me – that perhaps he could show me that losing one’s temper would be detrimental to my game. I was either thirteen or fourteen at that time, and he hadn’t played tennis in probably ten years. Unfortunately, it was the only sport at which I really excelled. After about fifteen minutes, I was not the one who was throwing the racquet – Jerry was. So that was an indication of his temper before the war.

Smith: So the story about your mother getting him to read the Rudyard Kipling poem If - as if that were kind of a cure-all – is that a little bit of an exaggeration?

Ford: I don’t think so – I think that’s true, because she was directing it at his temper. My younger brother, Jim, never had the temper, but Tom did, and I did, no question. But after the war, Jerry didn’t. I remember one of his campaigns back here in Grand Rapids. He had a political luncheon down at the Kiwanis’s Club, as I recall, in south Grand Rapids. A friend of mine invited me to be his guest and he gave his little speech and a minister who was in attendance in the back of the room, stood up and made some… I was thinking, you’re not going to last one minute. I was waiting for him (Jerry) to explode, come off the dais, and he just said, “Well, Reverend, obviously you and I have some points of disagreement.” I thought, “Oh, wow.” That was a new insight into my brother.

Smith: He was a very disciplined person, wasn’t he?

Ford: Emphatically.

Smith: You saw that – he took care of himself all his life. He was a workaholic.

Ford: Absolutely. Which I think, getting back to your previous comment and question, I think that Dad was a workaholic and sometimes my wife accuses me of being a workaholic. I’m sure that applies to my brothers Tom and Jim as well, and it came from Dad.

Smith: And yet, there is the story when your mom passed away, in church, they went home and found her appointment books which were filled for the next month – is that true?

Ford: Oh – she was a goer! In fact, the best story I can tell you, after all four of us were married she took my sister-in-law, Janet, and my sister-in-law, Barb, Tom and Jim’s wives, and my wife to Chicago for a weekend of shopping on the train. They got there, roughly at twelve o’clock or so and had lunch. Mom, I know, wanted to take them to Marshall Fields, because she was from the Chicago area. All three of them declined – said we’re going to take a little nap. So the next day she tried to get them to go out early to go shopping with her. They did go with her in the morning, but in the afternoon when she went back again, they declined. So, for two half-days out of three, my wife and my sister-in-laws were resting while grandma was out shopping.

Smith: Was she that way, pretty much throughout her whole life?

Ford: Emphatically, yeah. She was very busy socially, and particularly in a garden club. She was big on gardens, very big on gardens. We had a garden in the back yard on Santa Cruz that was probably a yard wide and was on three sides of the back yard, with a gate coming in the backyard. That must have been close to ninety feet, at least – maybe a hundred feet and that deep. Mother and Dad would work there every Saturday and every Sunday afternoon. In my case, I ascertained that was something I was never going to do. So my appreciation for flowers is not that great.

Smith: Were any of your other brothers pressed into service in the garden?

Ford: No. We were never asked.

Smith: Really?

Ford: They were quite content to do it all. I mowed the lawn, when it was my time, but…

Smith: What chores did you boys have?

Ford: Before the war, when we lived on Union Street, I remember I was only maybe six, seven years old at the time – eight or nine, I guess. I remember that Jerry’s responsibility was banking the coal-shoveled fire furnace. That was his job every night. I know that, and probably became my brother Tom’s job when Jerry was elsewhere employed.

Smith: Walk me through, because I know you lived in a number of houses. What is the first house you remember?

Ford: First house I was in was Union Street, and from Union Street we went to 2163 Lake Drive, and from there we went to 1011 Santa Cruz and from there to 959 San Lucia.

Smith: Let me back up. What are your memories of the Union Street house?

Ford: I remember Jerry and Tom had a route in which they sold magazines, and I can remember seeing the two of them go out with those newspaper sacks full of magazines. I guess they were delivering them, as far as I know. I remember that, and I can remember in my case getting knocked over by a Model-T, or something Ford. It ran right over me, but never hurt me – like that. That’s about the only two or three memories I have of Union Street.

Smith: You would have been how old at that point?

Ford: I was born there, obviously, and we moved out in, I think ’28 to Lake Drive.
Smith: Now that was sort of the upscale – kind of moving up in the world – pre-Depression house?

Ford: Yeah, that’s right.

Smith: And what do you remember about that place?

Ford: It was virtually a brand new house. I think it was only – we moved there in 1933, and I think the house was probably built right in the end of the good times, just before the Depression. So the house was very big, by our standards as compared to where we slept on Lake Drive – the four of us slept in one room. Now moving over there, we had two to a room, and eventually, one to a room – so it was quite a change.

Smith: I’m just trying to construct in my own mind, the story where, once really hard times hit, where – didn’t your dad lose the house?

Ford: I think he did, but that was before I was born. I don’t believe, in fact I’m certain of it, obviously, moving from Union to Lake Drive – those were my early years, and I’m not aware of anything before that. But I’ve heard tales of that.

Smith: Tell me about the paint factory. Because that opened right about the time that Wall Street collapsed.

Ford: It was six weeks before the collapse, and he borrowed money to buy it from a man by the name of Simmons – Simmons Wood Finishes. They had two separate manufacturing specialties, one of which was material for the furniture trade, such as fillers and stains and varnishes. They had a very small line of house paints, etc. for the painter. My father at that time was office manager of Simmons Wood Products, I guess it was called. Which became subsequently Grand Rapids Wood Finishing. But he went to that gentleman and, again, as I understand, said he’d like to buy out the painter side, and Mr. Simmons was apparently quite happy to unload it. So they did. And as I said, they were in business for six weeks before the crash came.

Smith: And then what happened?
Ford: All I can remember, truthfully, it seems odd that I can, I was, at point in time, six or seven years old, but I remember the meals became much plainer. I have a recollection of milk not being as available, but that’s the only two things I can recall.

Smith: Now in terms about the business, the story is your dad didn’t want to lay anyone off.
