Ford: I understand that’s true, also. As far as I know about it, he did not. He promised them, I guess I’d call it bonuses, when the company got on its feet, and which I also understand, he then honored and paid them.

Smith: But, then, when the Depression really hit hard, did you move to a smaller house, or did you stay in the house you were in?

Ford: The house on Lake Drive, a big wooden edifice, but with the restriction that the four of us slept in one loft-like deal. So then when dad moved us in 1933, it was quite an upscale. Then they stayed there until maybe 1952, in the house on Santa Cruz and moved to San Lucia.

Smith: You, obviously, know the story better than anyone, of how your brother found out about his (birth) status. Did you know? He was what, sixteen or seventeen at the time?

Ford: Yeah, seventeen.

Smith: What did you know?

Ford: I knew nothing about that. In fact, people think it is rather strange, but I personally never knew that brother was my half brother until I was probably twenty-four, twenty five. My brothers Tom and Jim knew, and when I asked them they said, “Oh, yeah, we knew it.” But it wasn’t any big deal and was never discussed and I certainly didn’t feel any differently towards him than I did my other two brothers.

Smith: It’s interesting, because he always referred to your dad as his father, never his step-father.
Ford: Oh, yeah. Emphatically. He took the name Junior, as you are well aware, and Art Brown, the individual who, in my opinion, was the most important factor in the genesis of this museum, was probably one of his closest friends, I think.

Smith: Of course, he had some pretty unpleasant experiences involving his birth father, but you weren’t aware of those at the time?

Ford: Not aware at all. Never heard it until I read it in print.

Smith: Never talked about it?

Ford: Never talked about it. He may have talked to guys like Art Brown about it, but unfortunately Art has passed on. He would have been a fabulous source of anecdotes, I’m sure.

Smith: Was he a popular kid?

Ford: Oh, no question about that. I’ve only known, in my lifetime, four natural athletes, personally. He was one of them. He could do anything athletically. It was incredible. I can remember times we’d go on picnics or something – I can’t even remember where – but they’d ask him to throw horseshoes, and he’d win. And he hadn’t thrown horseshoes, I know, since the last time he’d did it the year before. He was an accomplished athlete, obviously, in football and basketball and track. But he was also a great swimmer. There was a Grand Rapids swim team that I saw a picture of. A guy name of Bubby Rose had it, and he was on the Grand Rapids swim team in 1928. I wasn’t aware of that, but I saw the picture.

Smith: It must have stuck in your craw, if not in his, that later on, in the presidency, to be depicted as this kind of bumbler.

Ford: Oh, nothing angered me more than LBJ’s famous comment about, been too long without a (football) helmet. Chewing gum, and too long without a helmet. That was indicative, in my opinion, of some of the uncharacteristic comments from the other side. They normally didn’t do that, because he was so well liked on both sides of the aisle. But occasionally some guy, particularly the midnight commentators, would make reference to falling down the steps at Geneva, I think it was. Not mentioning that there was a rain storm and also that his knees, at that point in time, were gone.

Smith: Did it bother him?

Ford: Not as much as it did me. No, he fluffed it off. Just said, “It’s politics,” or something to that effect.

Smith: Did he have girlfriends?

Ford: Yes, he did. He had some girlfriends in high school that remember. I think her name was Mary Ann Hondorp – I think was one of his girlfriends – at least there is no other reason for me to remember the name. Then, of course, everybody’s well aware, he dated a gal by the name of Phyllis Brown for quite a while.

Smith: Who, I understand went on to have multiple marriages, and I guess toward the end – when she volunteered to drop by the office and was not encouraged to do so.

Ford: I think that’s true.

Smith: Do you think Mrs. Ford – she had no reason to be jealous, obviously – but do you think she was sensitive about Phyllis?

Ford: I think because people kept asking about it. I don’t see her jealous, I just don’t think she thought it was an appropriate subject.

Smith: When he wanted to go to the University of Michigan, I take it there was really no money in the family to support that.

Ford: There surely wasn’t. But, as you know, he got a job at the hospital, I think it was, and then he got $100 from Harold Steele, who was a friend of my father’s as well as being coach at South High School. Then my aunt and uncle sent him two dollars each week, which helped a lot in those days. As I said, his job helped him also. Then he came back in the summers.

Smith: I think he said from time to time he sold his blood.

Ford: Yes, he did. Yeah.
Smith: Did you know Arthur Vandenberg? How visible was Vandenberg in the community?

Ford: Well, he didn’t have to come back to Grand Rapids very often. He was so solidly entrenched here that he spent more of his time campaigning on the east side of the state. But as I think has been indicated previously, everybody believes, as do I, that after my father, Arthur Vandenberg was probably the next most influential male person in his character development.

Smith: What was it about Vandenberg that you think influenced your brother?

Ford: I saw just a little bit of it after the war. I can’t remember a specific conversation, but I think Jerry admired the way he could accomplish things with members of the opposition and not have it be a knockdown-drag out discussion, or with repercussions later. I think Jerry admired that style, and I believe it’s exemplified by the very close relationship that he and Tip O’Neill had. They could fight like dogs on the floor of the House, but they were great buddies afterwards, I know they were. I saw on many occasions, the camaraderie between Tip O’Neill and Jerry.

Smith: He clearly had developed an interest in politics by 1940. He is in Philadelphia shouting, “We want Willkie!” in the convention - the first convention he would attend. Which is a little ironic given the fact that he is sort of an isolationist, and Willkie’s politics were not that. But he was obviously swept up in the whole Willkie movement.

Ford: I do not know this, but I suspect that because Dad was starting to get involved in politics at a very minimal level, that he was aware of it. Dad was supporting Willkie, and, to a degree, I’m sure that influenced him and he became somewhat more determined to pursue a political field.

Smith: After the war he came back here and set up the law practice with Phil Buchen. The way this story is told, that’s all kind of a precursor, almost an automatic first step toward a political career. By that point was it pretty clear that he wanted to go into politics?
Ford: We lived together – we shared a room, after the war at Mom and Dad’s house on San Lucia. I was aware of the fact that he was out, and this would have been in ’46-47, so for a year and a half, maybe, we shared that room and I can’t say that I was aware of the fact that he was anything more than peripherally involved – I knew he was involved in something political – but I didn’t know what it was.

Smith: This raises a question, did he play his cards close to the vest? Was it something that he…

Ford: No, it’s like the fact that I didn’t know he was my half-brother. If you didn’t have anything to say that was important, you just didn’t say it.

Smith: Now that’s about the time that he met Betty.

Ford: That is correct.

Smith: Do you remember that?

Ford: I remember he was dating her.

Smith: It seemed to develop pretty fast.

Ford: Apparently, yeah. He got back in ’45, they were married in ’48. I was married the year before. He was my best man and my other two brothers were involved as part of my wedding. I knew that after the church he was going to pick her up to go to the wedding. That was expected.

Smith: Let me ask you, maybe you can clarify something, I know that he had asked her fairly early in ’48, he indicated he wanted to get married. But he couldn’t tell her when, and he couldn’t really tell her why he couldn’t tell her when. And, of course, he was going to run for Congress. Now there are two versions of the story, and they are not mutually exclusive. One is, he really wanted to take Jonkman by surprise, which he pretty much did. And the other is, he really didn’t know, at that point, how conservative Dutch-Calvinists would react to his marrying a divorcee.

Ford: I think that’s true.
Smith: In those days that would have been, or could have been an issue?

Ford: Oh, I know it was an issue in those days. And would have been, I suspect, a very significant impact on his electability. There isn’t any question about that. That just wasn’t done, and particularly in the circles of the Christian Reformed, the Dutch Reformed churches, and for that matter, the Catholic churches. With those three churches, the Catholic Church being predominant on the west side of the river and the Dutch and Christian Reformed on the east side of the river, he’d have had a very difficult time, I think.

Smith: That’s fascinating. Now, I realize you can’t answer this, but at some point he must have come clean with her, or she figured it out or something. Do you think they ever had that discussion about why you didn’t ask me?

Ford: I think she probably figured it out.

Smith: Obviously, it didn’t stand in the way of their getting married or being very happily married.

Ford: No, not a bit. After it was a fait accompli, I think then, that he’d been in there for two years and – big deal.

Smith: What do you remember about their wedding? For years there has been this story that he showed up with one brown shoe and one black shoe. The variation is he showed up a black suit, but with brown shoes, dusty shoes from campaigning.

Ford: I think that’s true, but I’m not sure.

Smith: Do you think she knew what she was getting into, in terms of marrying someone for whom politics would always be at the center of his life.

Ford: Well, I think that she envisioned the life of a normal Congressman as it was portrayed in newspapers and magazines in those days - but not to the extent of the fact that he would be gone for so many, many days each year. I don’t believe Betty anticipated that, and that was a difficult position to put her in.
Smith: I sensed, in later years, he had a greater awareness of the burdens that were placed on her in terms of raising the kids. Basically she was left, in many ways, to raise the kids while he was out on the road.

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: Did you sense unhappiness?

Ford: No, not a bit. They’d come back for summer – we had a cottage down at Lake Michigan – and the deal was, the first nine weeks of summer from the first of June on, my other two brothers and I would rotate: first third, second third, third third, and Jerry always got it from the second week in August through Labor Day. So we would see him every year for as long we kept the cottage, and whenever he came back to Grand Rapids, if he wasn’t speaking at some dinner or something like that, which quite frequently he was. But when Mother was alive, he pretty much squired her on engagements when he came home.

Smith: Was he good with the kids?

Ford: Oh, yeah. They all adored him. He did everything right and didn’t make any mistakes, in my opinion. So I guess they got used to being raised to some extent by their mother as opposed to, well, there’s Dad.

Smith: Of course, it reversed the roles. It sort made her into the disciplinarian.

Ford: Yes, it did.

Smith: Which carries its own burdens.

Ford: Even the little bit of time that my family went down to spend just maybe a day with them, it was Betty that was directing the kids hither, thither and yawn. We went down there a couple of times, maybe three or four times, I guess, and each time, when Jerry was there, Betty was the disciplinarian.

Smith: Were you surprised at the degree of success that he had in the House? It seems that almost from the beginning, the old Bulls sized him up as a workaholic, a work horse, not a show horse. This is a guy who asks more questions and does his homework and we can trust him. And they invited him in, whether it was CIA oversight, or whatever. They gave him a lot of responsibility, even if he wasn’t a household name. A Kennedy or a Nixon – they weren’t interested in Congress – they had their own objectives. But it seems like almost from the beginning he was singled out for a lot of responsibilities that a young Congressman might not necessarily have.

Ford: I think that one of the things you notice, is, just as you said, he was a workaholic. I can’t remember which general said it after he retired, but it was before Jerry was anywhere in the hierarchy of the House. There was a general quoted in the newspaper that I read that said, “Congressman Ford is more knowledgeable on the Defense budget than anybody in Congress.” Well, that certainly would have been obviously recognized by the powers that be in the House, and they rewarded him accordingly, in my opinion.

Smith: Did you always know – was his ambition always to be Speaker?

Ford: I would say, yes, I knew that. There was never was any discussion about his running for president. Never. I never heard a word about that. I think, as he has reported, the only thing he was interested in was basically becoming Majority Leader of the House or House Speaker.

Smith: Did he talk to you at all about his work on Warren Commission?

Ford: A little bit. I personally had some questions about the final conclusion, but if I recall, the conclusion says, in essence, based on the evidence available, it is our opinion that Lee Harvey Oswald committed the crime. I think that’s a very, very accurate depiction of the efforts of the Warren committee. I asked him a couple of times, it just didn’t seem like that guy could get off two shots, or something like that. He said, “All I can tell you, Dick, is we believe he did.” That was the end of the discussion. But it was a minor discussion topic – not very big.

Smith: His relationship with Nixon, obviously it evolved. Did he talk about it, in later years? One sensed that, there is this Boy Scout quality in your brother - an inclination to believe that other people are as honest and decent and trustworthy as you try to be. It may not be the best trait for a politician trying to get things done in Washington. When the Nixon tapes were released, the thing that you sense bothered him the most was the language on those tapes.

Ford: The language bothered him and the duplicity that was obviously part and parcel of the tapes. I think the fact, not only the swearing, but the fact that he’d been lied to - I think that those two factors were absolutely devastating to Jerry.

Smith: Is that naïve?

Ford: No. This is our upbringing, I think. I think that we were taught to believe that everybody is right and good, and until they prove differently, you must accept them on that basis. But by the same token, once they’ve destroyed that illusion by factual efforts, then, obviously in his case, Nixon, per se, was done. And I know in my own personal cases, individuals that I think of over the years, I reacted absolutely the same way. Guys that were close to me on one occasion, then lied, ceased to be friends of mine – period. I’m sure that’s the same thing Jerry had.

Smith: And your sense was that it really did destroy the trust that had existed?

Ford: Oh, there is no question in my mind. Maybe it didn’t, but not in my mind.

Smith: It is interesting, because I know Mrs. Ford was quoted as saying the day that the Nixons left, and they moved in, in effect, was the saddest of her life. I assume that is a reflection on the personal level – these friends who were being publicly…

Smith: Let me back up. Before he became vice president, obviously Watergate happens. Did you talk about that with him?

Ford: My own personal relationship with Jerry, from basically the youngest age, was – we didn’t talk about things – and I didn’t ask him about things. So as a consequence, of perhaps all the people that he knew, I think I was one of, maybe the only, individual that never discussed politics with him - except with one exception, never. Because I saw him down at Lake Michigan wander into the water, and standing there trying to enjoy himself in maybe two or three feet of water, and people coming up and talking to him. I saw it on the golf course, I saw it on the tennis courts, and so I, personally, never, ever, discussed politics with him.

Smith: As part of that, he wouldn’t necessarily volunteer opinions – at some point he must have – as this thing began to close in on him…

Ford: I said that I didn’t, but Jerry, during all the time of the Watergate problems, when he was vice president, he’d come into Grand Rapids, we lived on almost a direct route from downtown out to the airport. Every Sunday night, or most every Sunday night that he was in town, he’d stop and sit down and say hello. My wife would, as soon as he was seated, start in and just bewail the faults of Mr. Nixon. “Jerry, you can’t believe that, can’t believe that.” I remember he said, “Well, Ellen, you know, he was raised by the same standards that we were raised, and unless I find out differently, I have to believe him.” It didn’t make any difference – the next time he came into town, my wife would start in on him again.

Smith: Did she ever say, “I told you so.”

Ford: I don’t think she ever did.

Smith: Do you think he was surprised? When the tapes were released, that had to have come as a shock. That is not the way you were raised, the language - as you said earlier. Was there a point beyond which his faith was shattered?

Ford: This is my guess: I think about two to three months before the tapes were exposed he had reached the conclusion that Mr. Nixon was not being honest with him. I think he then, as a good party man, was put in an extremely difficult position of trying to deny that while had occurred, he had to support Mr. Nixon, but not appear to be grabbing for the presidency.

Smith: You are right. It is an impossible position because, at the back of his head, much as he didn’t want to acknowledge it, there had to be the knowledge that this could play out in such a way that I find myself in this office and what’s the good of destroying my credibility in a lost cause - a cause that I no longer believe in. It was an impossible position that he was in.

Ford: You phrase it succinctly.

Smith: How did you find out he was going to be vice president?

Ford: Somebody called us about five or ten minutes before and said you’d better turn on the TV. I have no recollection as to who that was.

Smith: You go back and you look at that and it’s unbelievable. I think of Mrs. Ford, what she must have gone through, and the kids, too. Because literally, they were told to be in the East Room in two hours, and be introduced to a national television audience. It just turned their lives inside out, I assume.

Ford: Oh, I’m sure. They must have been in a fog. What do you mean we’re going there?

Smith: Any yet, the next day, he came back for the Cedar Springs Flannel Day Parade.

Ford: Yeah, he did. That’s true, because he’d made a commitment to do it. He came and I think that is typical of “I said I’d be there, so I’m going to be there.”

Smith: You obviously were following this very closely, can you remember what you thought? This is going to end up with Nixon leaving.

Ford: But I thought, it would be postponed past the – as I remember, he pardoned him on December 9th?

Smith: He becomes president on August 9th. Nixon announces he is leaving on the 8th, the swearing in is on the 9th and it was a month later that the pardon took place.

Ford: In September, obviously. Your question was whether I had suspected, and when I suspect it – I had no inkling that he was going to pardon him – none.

Smith: Go back a month earlier – when Nixon resigns. How did you find out that your brother was going to be president?
Ford: As I said, about ten minutes before, somebody called us and I can’t imagine who – somebody called us and said you’d better turn on your TV – so I guess that’s how we knew.

Smith: Okay – so that’s not the vice presidency, but the presidency.

Ford: Yes.

Smith: He didn’t tip you off that this is about to happen?

Ford: No – no way.

Smith: When was the first time you talked with him after all of that?

Ford: Probably three weeks would be my guess.

Smith: Really?

Ford: Yes. I figured that everybody in Kingdom Come was calling him, and he didn’t need one more call from a brother. I don’t know, very frankly, if Tom or Jim called. Tom might have, Tom was a little more politically involved than Jim and I were.

Smith: How would your parents have felt?

Ford: Oh, they would have been extremely proud, no question. In fact, I think Jerry said the biggest regret he had was that Mom and Dad didn’t live to see it. There is no question that that is probably true.

Smith: So he certainly never asked your advice about the Nixon pardon?

Ford: No way. He did not.

Smith: Were you surprised when it happened?

Ford: Oh, yes. No doubt about it. Absolutely. It shocked me. My first reaction was the same as everybody else’s – how could he pardon that crook? That was the expression used in the newspaper and elsewhere, and it was probably indicative of my feeling as well.

Smith: Were there other people in Grand Rapids who felt the same way?
Ford: Oh, amen. I would bet that 50% of the people that voted for him over the years were as flabbergasted as I was. We didn’t necessarily think that he’d done the wrong thing. It was just that, well, maybe he should have waited a little bit longer and made sure that there weren’t some other things going to come forth. So the precipitousness of the action was, I think, just overwhelming.

Smith: Did you discuss that then or later?

Ford: Nope, I never did. Again, my philosophy, I guess was rather strange for a brother, but I felt very strongly that everybody and his brother, every time they saw him was, “why are you doing this…” I just felt that everything he did, as far as I was concerned, was basically the same as I believed and would do. So there was no use my having any comment.

Smith: Did you find yourself defending him at that point against…?

Ford: Oh, yeah. I was a little vociferous in my comments to individuals who described his motives as anything other than pure and clean. I had some contentious discussions with quite a few people.

Smith: Who thought there had been a deal…

Ford: Thought there’d been a deal, or something, there’s more coming, or he should have waited another month to make sure, etc.

Smith: Then, of course, two weeks after the pardon, comes the news of Mrs. Ford’s cancer surgery.

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: What a month.

Ford: I can’t imagine how they ever got through it.

Smith: How did you find out about that? Was that also through the media?

Ford: No, I think, as a matter of fact, Jerry called us on that. Didn’t talk to me – I was on the road, I think. But he talked to Ellen and told Ellen.
Smith: He must have been pretty profoundly affected.

Ford: Ellen indicated that, yes.

Smith: When did you visit him in the White House?

Ford: Oh, boy. The family visited him twice in the White House, if I remember correctly. The first time was maybe six months afterwards when I took all our family up there for a weekend. They had to go out to dinners, but we were there with them for one dinner out of the three nights we were there, and had a great time in the White House. Then I went there on one occasion by myself when I was in the area. Then the last time we went, it was not to the White House. We all went to Camp David and Tom and Janet, and Barb and Jim, myself and Ellen, went up to Camp David along with Gail’s mother and father. We had a great weekend up there at Camp David. That was special.

Smith: They really liked it up there, didn’t they?

Ford: They did because people couldn’t ask him, “What’s your opinion on this…what’s your opinion on that.” He got up there and I think they looked at it as a true retreat.

Smith: Were you aware at all of any of Mrs. Ford’s problems during that period.

Ford: Yeah, on occasion, when I’d see them, she appeared a little bit non-attentive. But, that was always after dinner, or maybe before dinner. I attributed it to being nothing but, “she’s had a drink, maybe,” or “she can’t handle it as well as the next person.”

Smith: I guess when she quit, he quit, too, didn’t he?

Ford: I believe that’s true. I don’t know that, but I believe that’s true.

Smith: Tell me about the ’76 campaign. Remember, at the very end when they came back here out of the airport and he kind of broke down. It’s funny because Marty this morning said, “I wish he’d done that earlier in the campaign, I wish he’d shown those emotions.” It might have been very politically advantageous. What are your memories of that event?
Ford: When he arrived?

Smith: Yeah, and at that point did you think he just might pull this thing out?

Ford: Yeah, on election night. He was downtown and I think Betty was with him, and they were at an election eve party that we were at. We didn’t expect him to come back to Grand Rapids, but he did. I thought, up until the very end, that he might pull it out. I tell you, really, truly, my feelings were - it was a big disappointment, and I understand it - but for his health it probably saved his life. I can tell you in 1976, when we went down there to Camp David, he was in the poorest health I ever saw him in, up until a couple weeks, obviously, before he died.

Smith: Really?

Ford: Oh! He was gaunt, he was tired, he was beat. He’d been working trying to get re-elected twenty hours a day, sometimes. So, he physically was just beat to a rap – terrible. So I was happy, from that standpoint.

Smith: How long do you think it took him to get over that? It took him a while.

Ford: Yeah, probably two weeks, would be my guess, he’d 95% forgotten about it. I can attribute that to athletics. I really, truly can. You give it your best effort, and if it isn’t successful, there is nothing more you can do about it. You tried, and you tried as hard you can – as long as you believe you did – then c'est la vie. So I think that that was ingrained in him for his competitiveness as an athlete.

Smith: Were you surprised when later on he and Jimmy Carter became friends.

Ford: Not particularly. I wasn’t too surprised. They certainly weren’t for the first four years, because Jerry campaigned, as you know, for Reagan, almost as hard as his campaigned for himself. It was incredible.

Smith: Which is pretty generous considering what…

Ford: Oh, you bet your boots. I thought it was more than generous. But I think that Jerry recognized that President Carter’s hometown values were pretty much the same as ours.
Smith: I was talking to Marty, too, about whether there was criticism locally when they decided to go live in Rancho Mirage, instead of coming back here. I’m sure you ran into some of that.

Ford: I ran into a lot of it.

Smith: What was it like?

Ford: I attempted to explain it to a lot of people, but basically, like myself, if I can get away from here for six months a year, I'm going to do it. The difference was that they didn’t want to keep going back and forth somewhere because, as I explained to people, of the neck problem that Betty has. You’ve seen it when she talks, she has to move her whole body. I remember, very specifically Jerry telling me that they had gone to the Eisenhower Medical Center - I don’t know exactly what the problem is in the cervical area - but Jerry told me that the doctors there told them they could attempt the operation, but the success was no better than 50-50 and it might be considerably worse. So they felt that, you can live with it. But it was aggravated very significantly by cold weather. So that’s what I told people. In my opinion, that’s why they chose California.

Smith: Yeah. When they had the intervention and everything that followed, did that all come as news to you?

Ford: Yeah. Except, when they went to Moscow and Betty got the tour of the palace, she was obviously in distress, not herself. So when Ellen and I saw that, I think frankly, we were immediately hopeful that they would have an intervention shortly, or soon.

Smith: Isn’t it extraordinary what she’s done since?

Ford: Oh, incredible!

Smith: And wasn’t he proud?

Ford: Yes, he was, and rightfully so. She’s done a heck of a job. A fantastic job.

Smith: The wonderful thing is, he’d joke about it, but she got the Medal of Freedom long before he got the Medal of Freedom. There was never any rivalry. You sensed that he was just – recognition and medals and all at that point didn’t mean that much to him anyway – but to see her recognized meant a lot.

Ford: Yup, I agree.

Smith: I got hoodwinked into the effort when the Kennedy Library was going to give him the Profiles in Courage award. He wasn’t going to go. He wasn’t going to go to Boston, and it took several people, including, I think, Mrs. Ford, to make him appreciate just what a historic – and it’s almost like – well, he said afterwards, people don’t ask me about the pardon anymore. It’s like that was…

Ford: …it’s over.

Smith: It’s over, yeah. When the Kennedy Library recognizes you…

Ford: He probably figures it might set up again – he probably weighed that chance against the award.

Smith: But he was very modest, wasn’t he?

Ford: Emphatically. Again, I go back to athletics. He never made any big deal about his accomplishments, even his football accomplishments, which were pretty noteworthy. But the other athletic accomplishments that he had, he never made a big deal about it. He was just, as you said, he was modest.

Smith: Tell me about how this place [Ford Library and Museum] came to be here., I guess he’d been sending papers over to Ann Arbor. Was there, in fact, an assumption that the whole complex was going to be in Ann Arbor?

Ford: A gentleman by the name of Art Brown was the genesis of this museum, and he was a teammate of Jerry’s at South High School. He approached Rev. Lyman Parks, who was the mayor at that point in time, and said that perhaps the mayor would be interested in appointing a committee to consider the possibility of some sort of recognition of the president, like maybe naming a park after him, or putting a bronze statue up or something like that.

So, Rev. Parks contacted Jerry’s office. Jerry’s office called me and Jerry said, would you come up with a list of names for people that could be put on the Ford Commemorative Committee – it wasn’t called that at that time – it was subsequently called the Ford Commemorative Committee, and get back to me. So I contacted good friends of mine, Mary Ann Keeler, Kay McInerney, Don Matheson, and called Jerry back and gave him the list. He then added Bob Griffin, I remember very specifically. Jordan Shepherd was another I recommended. But then Jerry put Carl Morgenstern on the committee and I think we had about twelve at that time. Joe Sweeney might have been on at that point in time, but I think he was on a little bit later. Then Jerry called and added to the list Rev. Parks, and then the committee was officially formed and Carl Morgenstern was elected as chairman. He got Fred Meijer to be on the committee, which was the wisest thing they ever did to help get the thing going. Fred was a tireless worker for this museum, just incredible.

At that point in time, after the committee had been formed, Phil Buchen was the contact and we wanted to get some of the materials down here to display to build up some enthusiasm for the naming of a park or something like that. Phil directed me to contact the archivist, who was the director of the museum at that time, or the library, I can’t remember his name. He was not particularly cooperative, and in effect, said that, “Well, Mr. Buchen says,” or something like that, so we wrote a letter to Phil and we thought the matter had been taken care of. Then as we got going, the committee, they said, Fred Meijer particularly and Mr. Morgenstern, “Well, maybe we ought to build a museum,” and I contacted Jerry and he said, “Well, that’s never been done before, and I don’t know if the archivist will approve.”

Smith: In fact, splitting the facility.

Ford: Yeah, splitting them. It’s going to make the raising of funds that much more difficult. Well, see, which was fine. Subsequently he called me and said, in effect, “I think you should go ahead – it has potential. If you can see some means of generating the necessary funds for a separate museum edifice, go ahead.” So Fred Meijer got going and contacted a number of people and we thought we had the thing locked in because we had formed the committee by that time. I was down there at Thanksgiving in ’76, and Jerry reaffirmed, very significantly, that there was no question that he wanted the museum here in Grand Rapids, if it could be accomplished. There were several other comments back and forth, and the legality of it and how the funds would be split, and if someone contributed a million dollars, then sixty percent going to Ann Arbor and forty here – there were some things to be worked out. But eventually the committee did get going and we obviously were successful, but there were a lot of times when it was touch and go.

Smith: One of the things that brought him and Jimmy Carter together - people talk about the imperial ex-presidency – the fact is, you are out of office, and all of a sudden, you’ve got to raise millions and millions of dollars, and I think President Ford said it was the hardest thing he ever did.

Ford: Oh it was, no question about it. He no longer had any clout, so to speak. We approached the city and the city said it was against the law for them to give any money, but what they would do, is, if we would pick the site, they would run through imminent domain, and acquire the land for the site. The county said they couldn’t give us any money because it was against the law, but they would build the pool. So they built the pool, the city condemned and then purchased by imminent domain, all the buildings along here, and then we went to the state. Fred Meijer, Mr. Morgenstern and myself, and I can’t remember the other – it might have been Jordan Shepherd – my brother Tom had gotten out of politics by then, he had been defeated when they gerrymandered this downtown district. He’d found a job after eight years in the legislature with the Senate Finance Committee. The chairman of that was Senator Hart – not the Phil Hart over at Detroit – but Senator Hart, and I don’t believe there was any relationship.

So, we went down there and made a pitch to him, which happily brother Tom, I’m 99% certain, had pitched him before we got there, so the job was a little easier with Tom being down there. Senator Hart said, “Well, we can contribute a million dollars, but that’s all.” Well, that was a big, big million dollars. It was just about the last amount of money we got, as I remember. It was the last significant amount of money we ever got, obviously. The committee at that point in time, had been enlarged to what it is down there, but a lot of effort by a lot of people. And, a lot of testy meetings went on, I’ll tell you that. But when it was finally dedicated in ’81 it was well worth the effort, obviously.

Smith: He was very proud of the place, wasn’t he?

Ford: I’m sure he was, I know that he, in the end, was happy that the museum was built here.

Smith: Was there ever any doubt about the gravesite? That it was going to be part of the complex?

Ford: No. That was in it from the beginning, as far as I’m concerned. He’d indicated that he wanted it and it was maybe a subject of discussion with him and Betty for maybe a day or two, but he called back extremely promptly and said, “Yeah, set aside the site.”

Smith: In his later years, he came back to town frequently, so I assume you saw him pretty often. Would he still try to drop by and get together when he was in town?

Ford: When he came back in town, most times Ellen and I’d have dinner with him and when my brother, Jim was still alive, he would join us. Tom, by that time, was living in Lansing and his wife was down in Carolina, so he was never in town. But I’d say, yeah, out of every six times he came into Grand Rapids we’d have dinner with him at least three or four of those times.

Smith: And he did come frequently? When I was around, I thought he was coming back pretty frequently.

Ford: I’m just guessing. When you say frequently, I’d say four or five times a year.

Smith: Which to me, I think that’s pretty frequent. I couldn’t get over it, for the 25th anniversary when we did that series of lectures and he came back from California to introduce Justice Stevens and Alan Greenspan. Then of course, the Billy Graham event.

Ford: You wouldn’t have known, I don’t believe, that that day, Justice Stevens and Jerry and I and Marty played golf.
Smith: What was that like?

Ford: Justice Stevens was my partner, and I was very grateful. He had a much higher handicap than I happened to have. I was supposed to be the one winning the holes, but he did and not me.

Smith: What was the interaction between the two of them.

Ford: Oh, it was good natured kidding. More so than I was used to on a golf course. But Jerry admired Justice Stevens, no question about it.

Smith: By that time had he gotten over his temper on the golf course?

Ford: Oh yeah. As I said earlier, the temper he had before the war was never in evidence again. Never.

Smith: When he came back for his ninetieth birthday, did you sense his health was beginning to fail.

Ford: No, I didn’t. Other people said something, but I didn’t think he was. In fact, I was obviously in denial because the only thing I saw was, I went out to California when maybe he was eighty-nine years old. He knew that myself and Dr. Bob Brown, who was on the committee, were coming out. Bo Schembeckler was with us and another friend of ours from Grand Rapids, and we wanted to have lunch with him. So Mike Ford brought Jerry and we had lunch with him. He and Shenbeckler were at the other end of the table and they talked animatedly for almost two hours – with a little bit of lunch in between. Mike kept saying, well, we’d better get going Dad. I thought well, gee, he seems to be doing pretty well. But other people said he didn’t move as well. I said, “Well, he’s eighty-nine years old.” But I didn’t see it, as other people did.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him or talked to him?

Ford: Oh, talked to him – yeah, I talked to him probably a month before he died, would be my guess. It was not more than a minute or two because I could detect very easily he was extremely tired. I just said, “How you doing – and are you sneaking out for any golf?” “Naw, but I’m going to try.” “That’s great.” In hindsight I should have known it, because I remembered distinctly he went from eighteen holes to nine holes to six holes, I guess down to three holes, and that should have been the tipoff to me. In hindsight I see it, but I didn’t then.

Smith: At the end, during his final illness, were you tipped off before he passed away, or did you get a call then?

Ford: No, I think we got a call. I’m not real clear on it. I think we got a call – it was morning time here, if I remember correctly, from Susan, I think. She called. But not before he died. I knew he was in poor health and I knew that he was sleeping a lot, but didn’t know that that was anything other than temporary.

Smith: You must have been overwhelmed by the reaction, particularly here, but elsewhere as well.

Ford: Oh, yeah. In regards to here, the whole family was aware of it, obviously, and my family was as impressed as I was. The number of people who were standing in rows going down Lake Drive, and when they made a final swing through East Grand Rapids, which is where he lived, they were ten and twelve deep. I expected we’d see maybe one-deep lines all the way, and it was fantastic. I’ve commented on that oft times to people and they’ve said, “Well, yeah – I believe it.” It wasn’t a good weather day either and the time, till two or three o’clock in the morning, people were still streaming in there. Fabulous.

Smith: And in Washington – what do you remember about…

Ford: Same thing – you expect a number of people at the church, but the number of people that were standing alongside the street, driving out to the airport, I never would have suspected that.

Smith: Didn’t the procession stop outside the White House – the morning of the service at the cathedral, where the staff were standing outside?

Ford: Yes. That was very impressive also – fantastic.
Smith: I’ll never forget, when were planning, the one thing he was adamant about, there was to be no cortège through the streets of Washington.

Ford: I would have known that – you could have asked me.

Smith: Why do you think?

Ford: Again, it was the modest temperament – his character. He, I believe, felt that was just too pretentious, not his style.

Smith: The service at the cathedral was very imposing. Maybe I’m biased, but it seemed like the service here was more personal.

Ford: Oh, I think that’s true. Oh definitely. A number of my friends had called and wanted somehow to get seating arrangements, and I said, I don’t have anything to do with it. “Well, I’ve been a member of that church for so many years,” and I said, “So have I.” But I said, “I have nothing to do with it.” I might even have said, “Call Marty Allen,” or something.

Smith: Mrs. Ford – it was pretty amazing how she held up that week.

Ford: Yes. You could see that she was extremely tired when we went over to the Amway Hotel. You could see that she was extremely tired - and understandably so. Those four or five days of very stressful, difficult times, and she kept going through it. It was the poorest health I’ve ever seen her in.

Smith: Do you keep in touch with her?

Ford: Yeah, I call her about once every month and a half or so just to say hi, and how you doing?

Smith: My sense is that she is still grieving.

Ford: I don’t know if she is grieving, I know she is still missing him, very definitely, and I guess that’s the normal reaction. Extreme grief and just missing him.

Smith: One final thing – maybe an off the wall question – but, if you were going to tell people something about your brother that might surprise them. Something that the public image doesn’t necessarily communicate – something about him that’s really essential that they ought to know – what would that be?

Ford: Something that he probably didn’t even know. I think he was almost idolized by his younger brothers – he just set the standards so high, which in retrospect, I’m very grateful for. Mother and Dad did not really involve themselves in how well we were doing at school, or how involved I was in athletics, or in extracurricular activities, but his image and things that he’d done, we tried to emulate. Whenever I would see him, when I was still in school, he would always ask, “How you doing?” or something to that effect, and then transfer it over to athletics, “How you doing in basketball?” - whatever.

Smith: Was he the kind of big brother you could go to for advice?

Ford: I never had occasion to do so. I think that if I had, he would be very willing to have given it, but I just never did. Oh, there was one isolated time that doesn’t apply.

Smith: Do you miss him?

Ford: Oh, yeah – you bet. He was always fun to be around. His comments, in my opinion, were always concise, and some degree of gravity to them, which I think was typical of him. Say what you’ve got to say and that’s it. So, when we’d be sitting around the table with the family, he was in the discussions no more and no less than anybody else.

Smith: I’ve been told you’re more politically conservative than he.

Ford: Oh, yes. I think brother Tom was more conservative than Jerry, but I would like to correct that a little bit. Jerry always called himself, I think, a social liberal, and a conservative financial individual, and I think that pretty much covers the whole Ford family. There are limits to where I personally would disagree with him, without anything specific, but spending money on some other country when some of our own people have problems as great. There is a certain financial limit that you just have to draw as being the limit.
Smith: For example, when Mrs. Ford, in the White House, the famous Sixty Minutes interview, where she said some things that were pretty controversial at the time what did you hear from - this was a pretty rock-ribbed conservative area, itself – what was the reaction locally?

Ford: It was pretty favorable actually. Even some of my very, very devout Catholic friends and some conservative Dutch friends, said, well, she said it. I think my reply was, “Yes, she did.” I would then maybe soften it a little bit, “Well, it’s time it was brought up and maybe some of these discussions ought to made.”

Smith: It is amazing how she almost overnight, without intending to, really changed the role of First Lady. Simply by being herself, I think she made it easier for other people to be themselves.

Ford: Again, this is my opinion, I can’t substantiate it, but I think that is characteristic of this area of West Michigan. I feel that modus operandi now permeates the people in this area. They’ve had such good examples of unselfish people doing so much for this city that they are willing to not make any one big issue of such paramount importance that it divides us.

Smith: When he was in the White House, he was looked upon as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. But it was a different kind of conservatism – it was economic conservatism. It was a very healthy skepticism of what the federal government could do constructively, it was paying attention to the bottom line fiscally. But on a lot of “social issues,” I’ve often thought that his generation, particularly Midwesterners, thought that there were a lot of things - what I call a decent reticence - there were just things you just didn’t talk about. To talk about abortion, those were just things – that’s a family matter – that’s not something to be part of the political agenda.

Ford: Nope.

Smith: In those later years, when he and Mrs. Ford would go to the conventions, and they were pro-choice, every four years they’d be lonelier and lonelier and lonelier. They were simply being true to themselves and to that different kind of conservatism.
Ford: Well, as you full well know, I think he vetoed sixty-seven appropriation bills, and Congress overrode him on what was it – fifty-seven?

Smith: Actually, he had a better record than that. He got two-thirds of those sustained.

Ford: I thought it was fifty-seven that was sustained.

Smith: Yeah, very close to that.

Ford: Which was indicative of his conservative background. I think that people in this area look at any candidate more from the standpoint of his financial approach to any problem, and then social issues. You’d better adhere to this line first, now we’ll talk about that line. And I think that is typical, myself. It certainly is in my determination of whom, or for whom I’m going to vote. I can be a little bit not as hard lined over on this side as this side – the right.

Smith: It is interesting because, you go back to sports, back to athletics. He said himself, if he could do things over, he’d probably would have spent more time learning communications and all of that – public speaking. People testify to the fact, almost every year, he’d come back, often before the Michigan-Ohio game. He’d go over to Ann Arbor with no fanfare and he’d give a pep talk to the team. People who were there have testified, not once, but repeatedly, that he was as eloquent and persuasive and powerful and everything else, in that setting, where he was talking sports, and character, if you will – cheering them on – then he was the most gifted natural speaker in the world.

Ford: I’m not surprised. I’ve never heard that, but I’m not surprised. Anything in which he believed fervently, as he did in University of Michigan football, he would praise that particular facet very significantly and with great feeling.

Smith: We’ve covered a lot of territory.

Ford: The last comment I would make - for Mr. Morgenstern, and Jordan Shepherd have passed on – they were the two most influential members of the Ford Commemorative Committee that built this edifice. I know you are going to talk to Fred Meijer, but I would encourage you to have him tell you some of the problems, which he was more cognizant of than I am. Because of his generosity, we were able to fly down to the Truman Library and the Hoover Library to see them as some sort of a guide for us. In the blackest and bluest days, he was still cheerful, saying, “We’re going to make it, don’t worry. We’re going to make it.”

Smith: And that’s what you need.

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: Is it true that he was offered land on the outskirts of town?

Ford: Oh, absolutely. Fred Meijer offered him a big orchard out there in the corner of Nap and the East Beltline. It was a great site, would have been fabulous. There was another parcel on the corner of I-96 and the East Beltline that I think where the West Michigan Heart Building is now, that was also offered. But the committee determined that this would be a great building block for the rest of downtown. That’s when they approached the city and county and said, “Can you help us?” Then they started going to individuals for contributions. So Fred Meijer can be much more insightful than I can on that.

Smith: Isn’t that interesting, because that’s a real part of your brother’s legacy, the revitalization of Grand Rapids.

Ford: Well, the community did recognize that and felt that this would be, in preference to the other sites, which were great, this one, if we could get it, assuming the city could get it through imminent domain, would be far better for everybody.

Smith: If you can try to imagine this town, with this place not here – think of all the history that would not have happened. All the things that we now take for granted.

Ford: The unfortunate thing, this is not history you would know, but there was a building just to the north of here and it was a building that was one of the first buildings for a machinery company. There was a German schoolhouse and the intent was for it to be built as a museum after this was in. It was going to be built by the Jackoboices family and furnished to what it looked like in those days. Tragically and unfortunately, it burned down, and when it burned down, then we were able to acquire that property to the north here with a little help from the government, obviously. That would have made a great addition to this area – to have had that German schoolhouse which was at one point in time, probably as big a schoolhouse as there was in the city.

Smith: Last thing, since you mentioned schoolhouses, tell me about South. I know you didn’t go there, but South – there’s this sort of legend about South High. I mean in the sense that South High was a very diverse, in many ways more representative school, and that your parents felt strongly that Jerry would get a different kind of education going to South than maybe to Central.

Ford: I think so, because in those days South was the working class families and Central was all the big furniture manufacturers and their offspring attending Central. So Central had a reputation of, the old expression “a little bit more on the snob side.” I guess that’s probably fair. At that point in time you look where all the big family homes are that are now converted to apartments. Those houses in there are, fortunately, a lot of them still around, but that’s where the big manufacturers and the bankers and lawyers built their places. They are gorgeous, fabulous houses. Have you ever gotten up there?

Smith: Yeah.

Ford: They are incredible.

Smith: It’s got to be one of the ironies of history, that your brother secured the money for that Calder sculpture. I don’t think of him as being a Calder-kind of guy. Although after the fact, he understood what a great boost to the city it was.

Ford: Very true. I think I was with him. I wasn’t sure it was going to be a big asset, but it is.

Smith: Modern art doesn’t strike me as being his cup of tea.

Ford: Interestingly enough, the space astronaut statue out here… I was the committee chairman when that piece was picked… we interviewed about six or seven artists for their conception of what would be proper and correct for this and the only thing Jerry said, “Make sure that it’s representational.” So I think we accomplished what he was looking for.
Smith: Well, I heard the story that it is a space man because he didn’t want a statue of himself. Have you ever heard that?

Ford: No. I don’t think so. Never. I was committee chairman, so that never was a discussion. I think he would have felt that that was too much.

Smith: No, no, that’s my point, that it is a space man because he didn’t want – I guess there were people who said, well, let’s put a statue of the president, and he didn’t want a statue of himself.

Ford: I agree with you – he didn’t. But the subject never came up. I knew that he wouldn’t want one of himself and he specifically – the only thing he said was, “Make it representational.” So he learned something about art in the meantime – obviously, like we all do.

Smith: I can only imagine when he went up there and visited with the Rockefellers, I can just see him seeing Nelson’s art collection which is not representational.

Ford: Hardly, or when he went to the gentleman’s in Palm Springs – Annenberg. He went inside there one night – I was going to have dinner with Betty and Jerry and they very kindly insisted that I come along and, even I was overawed by the art that they had. It was incredible. It is nicely displayed, almost like the entryway to a museum, but as we came in, I followed Jerry and Betty around and we saw every piece that he had. They were all fantastic, but you’re right, I think he was into the representational mode.

Smith: That’s a perfect note on which to conclude. Thank you.

Ford: You are welcome.

Smith: I guess the obvious first question is, how did your path cross that of the Fords?

Garbarino: When I was living in Trammel Crow’s house. I was married and my wife and I were living in Trammel Crow’s house.

Smith: And who is Trammel Crow?

Garbarino: Trammel Crow is a real estate developer out of Dallas, Texas. We had been living there for a couple of years and we received a call from Mrs. Crow stating that President and Mrs. Ford would like to view the house. They were thinking of staying there over the holidays. They’d always come up for Christmas with their family. That’s the first time we met. We gave them a tour of the house.

Smith: Was he in the White House then or was this after?

Garbarino: No, this was 1980. This was after. And so what had happened was they loved the house, but they decided to stay at another home in Vail that they’d been staying at for years, the Bass house in Vail Village. And, then Leonard Firestone, Ambassador Firestone, stayed in that house. The Firestones asked me to come up and manage their new property in Beaver Creek. And so I moved up in 1983 and that’s when I really got to know the Fords. I lived in Ambassador Firestone’s home at the time.

Smith: It’s clear from people we’ve talked to in the desert as well as up here that, although he may not be a terribly familiar name to the public, Leonard Firestone’s a very significant figure in the Ford story.

Garbarino: Yes, they’re good friends with the family. In fact, it’s a very interesting story. When the Fords invited President and Mrs. Clinton out back in 1993, Leonard Firestone, Ambassador Firestone, offered his house to the Clintons and Ambassador Firestone went to his home up in Jackson Hole, Wyoming. And also when they had the AEI Group come up in June, we would have dignitaries stay in Mr. Firestone’s home as well.

Smith: And he and Mrs. Ford were really co-partners in creating the Betty Ford Center.

Garbarino: Exactly. They were and that was really important to Mr. Firestone. And that was a real bond, too, with Mrs. Ford and Ambassador Firestone.

Smith: Was the house that was built up there truly a joint venture? Was it something that Mrs. Ford took the lead in designing? What was your sense of how it came to be?

Garbarino: My sense was Mrs. Ford took the lead in it. She really did. She was very particular and she knew exactly how she wanted things. My job was to make everything fine when they did arrive. If things weren’t quite right, President Ford would just take me aside once in awhile and laugh and say, “Dick, maybe we should do this a little differently,” and whatnot. But it was her house.

Smith: In terms of the layout and the look?

Garbarino: The layout, yes, and everything.

Smith: One senses it was a house built at least in part for entertainment.

Garbarino: Right. At that time, President Ford didn’t ski any longer, so they would come up the end of May, June and stay until October. Then the whole family would come up at Christmas. And at that time, Richard, when they would stay at the house, very few people came out for the summer like they would. People thought of Vail-Beaver Creek as a winter resort, not so much a summer resort. And it just kind of started to pick up more, but they would stay all summer.

Smith: That’s interesting. That raises a question. What did they do with their days? I mean, were there enough friends around to socialize with?
Garbarino: A lot of Vail friends. Of course, she was involved in the Betty Ford Gardens and in the early 90s, they had built the Gerald R. Ford Amphitheater. They were involved in that and a lot of projects in the valley he volunteered his time on. And Mrs. Ford would, at times, make impromptu visits at different AA meetings and whatnot.

Smith: Really?

Garbarino: Yes, she did. I was very impressed with that. She would do that as well.

Smith: She must have been the ultimate celebrity spokesperson.

Garbarino: Yes, she would just go in and as they’d introduce themselves, she would. So they really integrated themselves into the community with a lot of different charities. But they loved the summers up here. Before President Ford passed away that last summer, he wanted to come up one last summer. They wanted to see the view from their bedroom of the ski runs. That was important.

Smith: And, of course, you know, everyone was telling them, including their doctors, “You shouldn’t do this.”

Garbarino: Yep. He shouldn’t have been up.

Smith: If there’s anything such as a typical day, what was a typical day like?

Garbarino: A typical day for them is he would swim early in the morning. He loved swimming. Back when I’d teach skiing up here, I threw out my back and he got me into swimming and let me use the pool. I went from there to a larger pool and whatnot to use. But he would swim and he would read, I would say, four newspapers a day. So, he would read. They’d have lunch. He’d play golf. When he was home. Initially, right after the house was built, I would say the first ten years, he travelled quite a bit, too.

Smith: And the mail. I mean, it’s legendary. In some ways he never stopped being a congressman in the sense that you answer your mail promptly.

Garbarino: Yes.
Smith: And there are funny stories in the desert, after 9/11 and the anthrax scare - he didn’t get Saturday mail. And he didn’t understand why he didn’t have Saturday mail because people worked Saturdays as well. I don’t know whether they did up here as well.

Garbarino: Yes, they did. Somebody was up there.

Smith: You answered your mail. And so, literally, there were members of the staff, it may have been Secret Service people, who put on those spacemen outfits and got his mail for him so he could have his Saturday mail.

Garbarino: Oh, they’d pick up the mail and, of course, you’d have the x-ray machine in the Secret Service area. I remember being there a number of times. They were really watching how they were handling things.

Smith: Were there ever any security concerns, particular concerns, or scares? I mean, he was someone who had been the target of two assassination attempts. I wonder whether that made him any more, or Mrs. Ford, any more security conscious.

Garbarino: I think they felt very secure up here. You saw how you entered the house up in that cul-de-sac. As you enter the house, you have the one road up and back. When they would leave, I would live in the house by myself. I remember one time I was back checking on things and the swimming pool and a gentleman was on the deck looking in the house. I went out and I introduced myself and he said, “I heard this is the President’s house.” I said, “Yes, it’s President Ford’s house. You shouldn’t be up here.” But I’ve never had any really anybody too bold.

Smith: Were tourists more or less a constant presence?

Garbarino: Yes, especially right after the house was built for the first few years. A lot of people came out. A lot of people were aware that the President had a house there because, then, as Beaver Creek built up, the Ford house was one of the first houses up here. So, people knew President Ford had a home up there but they weren’t quite certain where. Beaver Creek security did a very nice job of not saying where the house was.

Smith: People forget, before the Kennedy assassination, former Presidents had no Secret Service protection. So the Eisenhowers in Gettysburg originally had tourists knocking on their front door, wanting to have their picture taken with Ike and Mamie.

Garbarino: Oh really?

Smith: Yeah. And I just wondered whether you ever had anything of that kind of interaction with people.

Garbarino: No, I never really did. It was just that one gentleman that came up to the pool. Nobody really knocked on the door. It was pretty quiet when they took off and I would live in the house. They would leave and I would live in the house throughout the winter until they arrived and then I would leave again and then come back, for security purposes, as well as managing the property.

Smith: What was her day like?

Garbarino: Mrs. Ford’s day was very similar in the sense that she would read as well as the President, but she would go out a lot to visit friends, luncheons, and, again, whatever events that she was invited to. She was quite busy. Actually. I was impressed with both of them for their age, how active they were.

Smith: Do you think that was deliberate on their part?

Garbarino: Maybe so. They were very active.

Smith: Fight the aging process in some ways by being active.

Garbarino: By being busy and him being active, reading and swimming. He’d go out and hit golf balls. They would take the dog for a walk around the cul-de-sac, down the hill, up the hill. Very active.

Smith: It was my sense when I was around him, that they almost went out of their way to have younger people around them, that maybe that was a little bit of part of the process of staying tuned in, at least, to a younger culture. I mean, he was certainly always a fiscal conservative. Clearly. But in terms of a lot of social issues, I’ve often wondered whether it was that the Republican Party just kept going further to the right, leaving them where they were. You know, she’d been outspoken on issues in terms of a woman’s right to choose, but they were also outspoken on gay rights and things that you didn’t expect to hear from a former president, much less a ‘conservative’. What was your sense of their views, their attitudes? How much of an influence was she on his outlook? And having kids, I mean, relatively young kids and grandchildren, which also kind of keeps you plugged in, as opposed to sitting with a bunch of old guys at the country club all day long, griping about the state of the world.

Garbarino: It was interesting because they really loved having the kids and the grandkids up. But they were very open-minded. She was very open-minded to anything, anybody, she was very much that way. And I think she influenced him that way as well. It really struck me because, at first I thought he was pretty conservative, but then he seemed open to a lot. He would laugh at a lot of what young people do and whatnot and sometimes he’d just shake his head. But he was pretty open-minded. Both of them.

Smith: You think he remembered he’d been young once?

Garbarino: I think so. I think he always had a glint in his eye. You know, especially if for any reason he thought was in trouble with the missus, I would see that glint.

Smith: Explain to me - maybe it’s just a case of opposites attracting, but punctuality was a religion for him.

Garbarino: Oh, yes.

Smith: And that’s not the case with Mrs. Ford. Any stories? Any observations?

Garbarino: Well, it’s really interesting because I would travel with him the last few years. When he would have engagements and whatnot, the family asked if I would travel with him as an aide. And that was an eye-opener for me. You learn a lot about somebody when you travel with them. When I was managing the property, I would see him once in awhile, every couple of days, and we would chat about things. But when we were on the road, it was an eye-opener for me. I knew he was punctual and I would have the trip sheet from Penny. Sometimes, I’d call Penny with questions. But what struck me, he was very punctual, but yet when we would go somewhere, wherever he went, he would stop and he would talk to the doorman, he would talk to the bell man, anybody within the hotel we went, he was “Hi. I’m Gerald Ford.” And he struck up a conversation with them. “Where are you from?” I was amazed with that, even though there was a time we had to be here or here or there, he would take that time. That impressed me. So, I saw him in a different light. But yet, when we had to be from point A to B, I’d make sure the breakfast is in the room at a certain time. We’d have the newspapers out. And then, “Okay, it’s time to go now” and then we’d go.

Smith: There are those who say you didn’t disturb him when he read his papers.

Garbarino: The newspapers were big. And I had to make sure that we had the right newspapers at the hotel at a certain time so he’d have the newspapers at breakfast. And then we’d go over the schedule and then go from there. He’d want the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, if we were in Michigan, we’d have the local newspapers, too, for wherever we were at. He was quite a reader. But, you’re right, he had to have that newspaper in the morning and he was very much into his routine. Of course, I think we all get that way when we get older. He really had a routine down.

Smith: She was not a punctual person.

Garbarino: No.

Smith: I mean, it was part of her charm, but clearly, 50 plus years of marriage didn’t budge her. Was it a kind of almost a running gag?

Garbarino: Yeah, I think it was.
Smith: He clearly adapted himself to her schedule.

Garbarino: Yeah, you could see him roll his eyes when we were leaving from point A to B and she still wasn’t quite ready yet.

Smith: Is that perfectionism on her part? For instance, one thing that I think would surprise people is that she found public speaking to be a real trial in a lot of ways. No one would ever guess, but it’s like any really good stage performer, if they don’t have butterflies in the stomach, they’ve lost something. And that anything she could do to cut down that margin between perfection, which is what she wanted, and how she felt. I just wondered whether that was part of it, or whether it was just a force of habit.

Garbarino: You know, I think she was a perfectionist. She wasn’t ready to leave until, if she was with a hairdresser or whatnot, she knew she was ready to leave. She was confident that she felt good about herself and everything was perfect. Then she would come. And I think he realized that, though, too.

Smith: And clothes mattered to her, didn’t they?

Garbarino: Yes.

Smith: I mean, she loved clothes. She wore them well, obviously that makes a difference. She’d been a model.

Garbarino: She had a great sense of humor. And what really astounded me, was, one time, Richard, I had a gentleman over to the house, we were looking at doing work around their tub area in their master bath. And you had to step up about two feet. This was when she was in her 80s and she would just jump up. She was flexible! And the subcontractor I was with was just astounded. But because of her dancing, she was so very limber, very quick, but also had a great sense of humor.

Smith: One thing that would surprise people, she had, shall we say, a much more ribald sense of humor than he did.

Garbarino: Yes.
Dick Garbarino

June 24, 2010

Smith: To the point where Ann Cullen, for example, talked about how he’d come in and say, “Alright, girls, what are you laughing about now?” and they would tell this dirty joke, which just sort of soared right over his head.

Garbarino: Exactly. That happened a couple of times. Mrs. Ford was just roaring and she would look at the President and say, “I’ll tell it again to you later, Jerry.” And he would just walk away. It was really funny.

Smith: Everyone says he had a sense of humor. Though he was not a gifted joke teller. How would you describe his sense of humor?

Garbarino: Very dry, but you hit the nail on the head. He wasn’t a real joke teller.

If we would travel somewhere, we would go to the plane or the limo going somewhere, he would ask, “Dick, do you mind calling Betty?” And I would give him the phone because I knew he didn’t know how to use it.

Smith: A cell phone?

Garbarino: Yeah, and whatnot. And then it was really interesting. We’d talk more business than anything else. Once in awhile, I’d see something in the paper, if we were flying somewhere and say, “Look at this” and he’d go “Ha ha ha” and go back to his newspaper again.

Smith: He was not a high tech guy.

Garbarino: No, he was not. In fact, Mrs. Ford was.

Smith: Really?

Garbarino: Mrs. Ford was. I mean, I would go to Mrs. Ford and say, “You know, I think we need to do this. This, mechanically, is going to be an issue.” And I would tell her about it. I would tell him about it, but he really didn’t have the interest that Mrs. Ford did.

Smith: For example, was she computer literate?
Garbarino: Yes, she did use the computer. I remember she did use the computer and, oh gosh, that was ten years ago and she was using the computer quite a bit. Very computer literate.

Smith: And I think Penny said he got to the point where he could play solitaire on the computer and he could get email, but he couldn’t send email.

Garbarino: Yes, that’s true.

Smith: That was sort of the dividing line.

Garbarino: I’d email him, but he’d never respond.

I’ll tell you a funny story. I was out in Palm Springs back in 1993 visiting them and they took me out to lunch at a restaurant called the Thunderbird Country Club. Before we left the house, Mrs. Ford said, “Dick, this is the oldest country club in Palm Springs, and, by the way, there are a lot of old people there.” And we were laughing. We had lunch and towards the end of the lunch, the waiter came over and put a note in front of the President. I noticed it because I was sitting between President and Mrs. Ford and there was, I think, it was either Ann Cullen or maybe Penny was with us, I’m not quite certain. And he took the note up, read it, set it down, and we kept talking. And I could just see Mrs. Ford’s curiosity and finally, she said, “Jerry, what was the note about?” And he took a glance through the dining room and he said, “Somebody here knows who Deep Throat really is.” I thought I was going to die. But he said it just so straight. And he looked at me and I said, “Sir, do you get that often?” and he said, “More than you think.” He just made a comment, he said, “Look around in this room. Do you see anybody that would know that?” The waiter didn’t say who it was from or whatnot, but it was really funny.

Smith: The last time that they’d met with the Foundation, I think it was actually here, maybe in 2004 or 2005 when they had their annual meeting. It was right at the time that the cover finally got blown on Deep Throat. And I think it was not quite official, but there was all this feverish speculation. So, anyway, it they went through the whole meeting and everything else. And then he had his informal remarks at the end, summing it up, and he said, “Now, I just want to close this evening with an announcement.” And everybody kind of sat back. He said, “I’m Deep Throat” and he walked off and sat down. Everyone was silent for a second and then they realized it was a gag, but no one expected it, which made it ten times as effective. And he got better. Well, you saw him on the road. He got better as a speaker, I think, with age.

Garbarino: Right. In the evenings, we would go over his speech. When we’re on the airplane, usually we flew private and corporate airplanes and he would sit next to me. I’d notice he’d have 3 by 5 cards and he’d go over it and over it and over it and then that night, usually in the hotel room, he would want to read it. And I remember seeing him before and seeing him, obviously, speaking with different groups and he looked much better, I thought. I thought he did a good job, especially with his age. He did well. I was really surprised with that.

Smith: He loved to travel, didn’t he?

Garbarino: Yeah.

Smith: I often thought his health was really pretty good up until he was about 90.

Garbarino: Right.

Smith: And then, I guess the doctors told him, “You’ve got to cut out the travel.”

Garbarino: And so did the family. The family was really concerned. I traveled with him when he was in his middle 80s and at that time, he would do well with it. He loved it. He loved being on the road. He loved speaking. He really enjoyed it. But then I think the family realized, you’re right, the doctors and everybody else, when he was around 89 or 90, said he should cut back. Then I just traveled with him to functions - to the White House for his 90th birthday party.

Smith: Tell us about that.
Garbarino: That was really interesting. We stayed at the Willard. We were there just for two days.

Smith: That was always the hotel they liked.

Garbarino: They really loved the Willard.

Smith: They never used the townhouse that’s provided up at Lafayette Square.

Garbarino: Not when I was with him. We always stayed at the Willard Hotel. We were back there for that function. We also went to Capitol Hill for his 90th birthday and then we were at the White House that night for dinner. A very nice dinner, really, really interesting. And Bush gave a very, very nice speech and whatnot and then they were all in the main dining room for dinner, the East Room, I guess. And then Penny and I went on with the agents and had a nice little tour of the White House from there.

Smith: I’m told that there were still some members of the permanent White House staff who had been there when the Fords were there and were grateful for the chance to reconnect. We’ve been told from a number of people in the White House that that staff really cherished the Fords. I don’t think every family that lives in the White House has the same kind of rapport with the staff, but I think they did.

Garbarino: Yes. And it was interesting, too, when I flew back with him for President Reagan’s funeral. When I went back with him for President Reagan’s funeral, I saw some of the older Secret Service agents, some of the agents who used to be on his detail and whatnot. And they’d all just, “How’s he doing?” I think they really enjoyed him. He traveled a lot. They couldn’t keep up with him a lot sometimes with all the travel. They were just amazed at how he could travel.

Smith: Did he talk about Reagan?

Garbarino: Did he talk about Reagan? No, not to me personally, he really didn’t. What was interesting was, after the funeral and we got on the airplane coming back, I was struck all of a sudden, they were concerned, I guess, they were approached by the Air Force and how they wanted to handle things when President Ford passed on. And it was interesting, that conversation, that they were having when that was going on. But what struck me about that, too, was when we were back there and the coverage I saw on television they were talking about the love story between the Reagans. And what I realized when I was on the road with the President, there was a real love story with President Ford and Mrs. Ford. We would barely get off the airplane and he’d ask for my phone, like I told you earlier, to talk to Mrs. Ford. We’d get to the hotel, he’d call Mrs. Ford. Before he’d go to sleep at night, he would call her. And that struck me, because, again, I never saw that until I traveled with him. That was a true love story between the two of them.

Smith: The week after he passed away, I think millions of people were introduced to it for the first time.

Garbarino: I agree with you wholeheartedly.

Smith: I’m getting ahead of myself, but the fact that there was so much reaction.
You know, for someone who’d been out of the public eye for awhile, and I thought it was a combination of things, including the fact that there was a whole generation who were being introduced to him for the first time. They were seeing these old clips and they were comparing it with the ugliness of today’s politics and he looked pretty good. Plus, they saw the Ford family and the obvious closeness and, you know, the values and the love story that existed between them.

Garbarino: The love story was really interesting. I remember we flew back and we watched the funeral services in Simi Valley for the Reagans, and it was quite emotional to watch, especially seeing Mrs. Reagan in person and how she looked just tired. You could tell she was very tired. But I told my friend that was watching with me that night, I said, “You know, the real love story, nobody really talks about the Fords, but that’s quite a story in itself.” And then, what really struck me, too, was I never knew that they had such a close relationship with the Carters. I never realized that until one trip I was on with President Ford. He asked me what I was doing the following day when we were flying home and if I could come up to the house. He said, “The Carters are going to stop by.” They would stay in Crested Butte, Colorado in the summer. And I’ll never forget sitting in the Secret Service area where you had that one window where you could look out at the drive and the Carters pulling up, getting out of the car, and the Fords walking out the door and all hugs and they really, genuinely liked each other. And I harkened back to the ’76 campaign when, at that time, it was nasty. Not compared to what we see today, but it was interesting.

Smith: It’s strange. I did the last eulogy in Grand Rapids and if you’ve ever been in a situation like that, you’re in a fog. The thing I’ll never forget I could hear Rosalyn Carter weeping in the pew. And I thought to myself, “Who, thirty years ago, would’ve imagined this is how the story ends?”

Garbarino: Isn’t that something?

Smith: And that wasn’t faked. When we left Washington and flew back to Grand Rapids, President Carter was walking up and down the aisle of Air Force One with the Fords’ youngest great grandchild on his shoulder. An amazing scene.

Garbarino: See, I was on Air Force One that whole trip. I remember that. That was amazing, wasn’t it? Yes.

Smith: And then you say, “Gee, why can’t we have statesmen instead of elder statesmen?” Why is it that we have to wait until they’re no longer politically viable for these kinds of relationships to blossom?

Garbarino: I agree and when I told people about that meeting, they couldn’t believe it. People my age said, “Really? They are?” I said, “Yes.” I was very pleased seeing that and they just enjoyed their company.

Smith: Let me ask you something; obviously you don’t have to answer this. I only heard him speak disparagingly about two people. One of them was John Dean and the other was Gordon Liddy.

Garbarino: And I can probably understand why.
Smith: Yeah, in both cases. Did he ever let his hair down in that sense and talk about other political or other figures?

Garbarino: No, but I remember what struck me, one time I was with him on a trip and that was at the time President Bush 43 was thinking about going into Iraq and there was all these rumblings. We were on a trip and I’ll never forget he questioned that. He really questioned the wisdom of that, because, gosh the names of some of the people escape me, but the people from Bush 41’s administration were writing columns and saying “No, this shouldn’t be done.”

Smith: Well, Brent Scowcroft was outspoken.

Garbarino: Brent Scowcroft really was adamant against that. He was reading this and in his own mind, too, he said, “I don’t think this is right.”

Smith: And it must’ve been awkward, at least, because so many of his people, Cheney, Rumsfeld, Paul O’Neill, for a while—

Garbarino: He had a great photograph, by the way, Richard, of Alan Greenspan, Vice President Cheney, at that time he was chief of staff, and Rumsfeld. And Mrs. Ford gave it to ________ and it was really interesting. In 1977, it was taken. And I agree with you. I think it bothered him because he knew some of the players and he didn’t understand that. I could tell he wasn’t real comfortable with that.

Smith: That’s interesting. He was still a party man, but the Carter relationship is all the more in some ways unusual because they had such diametrically different approaches to the role of a former President. Obviously, if a president asked you to do something, he’d do it. And he demonstrated that in a bipartisan way. But he was loathe to interject himself into a situation, particularly foreign policy, where there’s only one president and only one secretary of state. And he clearly, until the end of his life, cherished the relationships with Cheney and Rumsfeld and Greenspan. Those relationships were never damaged in any way by any of these potential policy disagreements.
Garbarino: No. The Cheneys were up every summer. And that summer when I think he was with Halliburton at the time, in the private sector, they were up here every summer and very nice. You know, he made it a point to introduce me to everybody. I was really very proud of that. It was very nice of him to do that. If I happened to be in the area, “Dick, I’d like you to meet so and so.” It was really interesting to be part of that. And, one day, Richard, I remember walking into the house and I went to the upstairs living room and they were on the speakerphone with President Clinton when he was in the hospital and had heart surgery.

Smith: Really?

Garbarino: On the speakerphone in the living room and “How are you doing?” I was struck by that. I had no idea and I guess the Clintons really appreciated the fact that they invited them out for the Bolshoi Ballet because Chelsea really, at that time, was into dance. And they were very good hosts to the Clintons and I think they maintained that relationship.

Smith: It’s interesting, because I was involved in the periphery at the time of the whole Lewinski thing when he really took heat from the Right, President Ford did, for this Op-Ed piece in The Times that proposed, in effect, a formal rebuke by both Houses of Congress nationally televised and then the country would move on. We would short circuit impeachment.

Garbarino: He didn’t want to have to anything to do with that. It was interesting.

Smith: Who were his close friends?

Garbarino: Obviously, Leonard Firestone was a very close friend. Dee Keaton, who had the house on the other side of the Beaver Creek house, they were close friends. Kaiser Morcus, at the time. He had a hotel here in Vail. Now he’s the President of some Palm Springs restaurants. They seemed to be close friends. But he really kept in touch a lot with Jim Callaghan.

Smith: And there’s another kind of opposites attracting, because you stop and think. Here’s a kind of a classic old line Labor Party socialist. And Helmut Schmidt was certainly as far to the left. And Giscard, whatever his politics might be, is not exactly a hail-fellow well met. And yet they all seemed to just click.

Garbarino: They always enjoyed their time together. They would come up to the house and they would all just get together impromptu on the decks of the homes and whatnot. Callaghan was a very interesting fellow. I used to take him on hikes and drives. He always loved going to Leadville, Colorado. He loved the history.

Smith: Really?

Garbarino: I’d take him to Leadville, to Aspen, and back here. Then he reciprocated. It was very nice. My wife and I went over to England and he took us through Parliament and, in fact, I sat next to Neal Kinnock, and Callaghan leaned over and he said, “He’s going to be an up and comer.” And I just laughed. Remember when Joe Biden got in trouble for plagiarizing his speech? But it was interesting because they were just so down-to-earth when you brought them here to this level in Beaver Creek. It was really interesting how the dignitaries took it all in and were relaxed, very relaxed. I think a lot of it had to do with the Fords and the Fords introducing them to some of the people in town, and everybody got along quite well. It was really interesting.

Smith: What was his role in the World Forum? I mean, aside from the fact that it probably wouldn’t have existed without him. What was the World Forum?

Garbarino: It was a group of past world leaders along with corporate heads. To be honest with you, Richard, I don’t know who worked with him in putting that together. It was the AEI Group, I know that. They were the ones that put it together, but he was always the figurehead of that. How much more of a role he had, I couldn’t quite honestly answer that. But he was the one that brought the groups together. It was very interesting.

Smith: What were they like as grandparents?

Garbarino: Very good grandparents. In fact, I would ski with the grandkids because I still teach skiing up here part-time, but he would always make a point in calling me from the desert and say, “Dick, would you mind skiing with a couple of Mike’s kids?” Very close to the kids. Very excited when Jack had the two boys, Christian and the oldest son. One of the really interesting stories is he would take them down to ski school when it was busy at Christmas. He would have each one of his granddaughters, Mike’s daughters, holding their hands, standing in line with everybody else. He could’ve easily tried to break through the line or had the agents take him up to the front of the line. He had the agents stay outside. He stood with the two granddaughters and the reason I know this is I had friends of mine that worked ski school and they’d tell me these stories. How impressed they were and how nice he was with everybody. That he made sure his granddaughters were all set, they were with their instructor, and then go up and pick them up afterwards.

Smith: One of the really poignant stories we have is from the gal who they hired as their cook, Lorraine Ornelas. And she’d gone through the Betty Ford Center. And she’d never seen snow and she’d never been on an airplane and was petrified at the thought. So, when they were coming up here, the President got the pilot of the plane and they walked around the plane explaining all of the engines, everything, how safe it was, and all that. Then, when they get up here, he took her to the ski school, got her ski lessons. They literally made her part of the family.

Garbarino: Sure.

Smith: And she said, “I learned so much from President Ford, but above all, I learned about discipline and having a purpose in life.” And that’s a pretty good lesson.

Garbarino: That is, because Lorraine had an interesting background and for her to be thrown into this was fascinating. They loved her.

Smith: Well, it’s mutual. What was Christmas like?

Garbarino: Christmas was a lot of fun. It could be a bit hectic with all the kids in ski school and the different events, Christmas tree lighting in Vail every year. He’d participate in that for the town of Vail.
Smith: Was there room in the house for all the kids?

Garbarino: Yes. Yes, room in the house for all the kids. Quite a gang there. That’s when I was on Defcon 5 always wondering what was going to happen. But it worked really well, because the house was very comfortable. And that was very special to them. They’d usually come up for about three weeks.

Smith: Really?

Garbarino: Yes. It was really interesting. You know, we talked about his schedule. One winter, he had a date set where he was ready to leave, they’re going to go down to the desert, usually a couple of days after New Year’s Day and we had a heck of a snow storm. Vail Pass was horrible and the airport was closed. And he would get antsy. When he was ready to go, he was ready to go. He would get very antsy. And I’ll never forget, one time I said to him, “Look how beautiful it is outside, sir. It’s amazing.” He said, “Yeah. Yeah, you’re right, but you know I was scheduled to leave today.” And I said, “The worst thing you could do is get in your car because you can’t get out of Eagle Airport. If you get stuck or if you get in an accident between here and Denver, you’re stuck in a car for five or six hours. Enjoy the view. This is beautiful.”

Smith: Do you think it was a little hard for him to slow down and smell the roses?

Garbarino: Yeah, exactly. “We have no control over this weather, but,” I said, “boy, it’s beautiful.” And it was. It was absolutely beautiful outside. Then he was kind of relaxed about it.

Smith: He was a fiscal conservative. I mean, that’s a euphemism in some eyes for ‘tight’. I often wondered whether the experience of the Depression seared into him as a very young man the value of money, the importance of not wasting anything. He was not the world’s biggest tipper.

Garbarino: Yeah, I understand that.

Smith: I mean, nobody’s perfect.
Garbarino: Yeah, exactly. He and my father remind me so much of each other in that way. They both grew up in the Depression. I admired him because he kept an eye on the utility bills for the house. I mean, of course, you have a house in the winter up here and gas heat can be quite expensive. But I would get a call once in awhile if a bill was more than the last bill. And I would say, “Well, sir, it was colder this month.” But he would keep track of those things. But it didn’t bother me because my father was the same way. He came from that generation.

Smith: Yeah, it was nothing personal.

Garbarino: It was nothing personal at all.

Smith: It was almost in the bloodstream.

Garbarino: I think so. I think it was. As far as tipping goes, if we went out to restaurants together or whatnot, I never saw how he handled that.

Smith: We’ve heard stories from various golf courses that suggested that he was not a spendthrift. He left the White House with very little and he’d never had much. And I assume didn’t ever expect to have much. And some part of him must have been kind of pinching himself that he had been able, among other things, to provide for his family in the way that he obviously wanted to, and enjoyed the success that he had.

Garbarino: I think he realized he had a great marriage. Very fortunate to be where he was.

Smith: Did you ever hear about Phyllis?

Garbarino: Phyllis?

Smith: Phyllis, the old girlfriend from 60 years ago.

Garbarino: No, I never heard about Phyllis. But he was so down-to-earth. That’s what I liked about him. You could tell, sometimes, he was overwhelmed with the house itself and whatnot, but he felt very fortunate to have what he had. But family was the important thing to him.
Smith: Before I forget. We were talking about friends. Frank Gifford and Kathy Lee were good friends and I know that when they went through their problems, highly publicized, that the Fords called and told them they were praying for them and wishing them all the best and just lending a kind of quiet support. Which also brings up this question. Again, I don’t think a lot of people automatically assumed, because he didn’t wear it on his sleeve. But the importance of faith to both of them. That was a significant factor in their lives.

Garbarino: Yes. I’ll never forget. I think it was his 85th birthday party that they had at the lodge and the Giffords were there right when that was all going on. And they were just involved in everything. Clint Eastwood and his wife were there. A number of people were there. It was really interesting.

Smith: That’s interesting, because this community, one senses, is accustomed to seeing celebrities all the time. Did the locals sort of leave them alone?

Garbarino: Yeah, they would know who he was. They would never really bother him. I think what bothered me more than anything was when people would go up and say, “Hi, Jerry.” I have this in my mind how I kind of cringe when they’d say that. But he’d turn around and say, “Hello. How are you? How’s your day going?” He would get in line like everybody else in the supermarkets and so would Mrs. Ford.

Smith: Really?

Garbarino: Yeah. People would see them and would be excited to see an ex-President and some of them would approach him, some of them wouldn’t.

Smith: I assume autographs were the bane of his existence. I mean, not necessarily the kid who wants the autograph, but the professionals who are selling his signature.

Garbarino: There were?

Smith: Yeah. When you traveled with him, what kind of buffer were you between him and the public, generally?
Garbarino: When we’d initially go, we’d get out of the car and people would come up to him and want to shake his hand and whatnot. He would receive everybody. Very seldom did anybody want his autograph when I was with him. He would talk to them and move on and talk to the next person, but he would stop and take his time and chat with everybody. And, of course, when I was with him, too, when he was getting a bit older, he would get tired pretty easily and would retire in the room and we would go out to dinner or else we would have dinner in the room. Then when he’d go out to play golf, after he’d give a talk, the norm was he would give a talk and then we’d play nine holes of golf. And people would approach him all the time on the golf course. But he was very accessible, I thought. That’s what impressed me. I didn’t expect to see that. I don’t know why I didn’t expect to see him as accessible as he was and just willing to talk to anybody.

Smith: When you would go out golfing, did he dress conservatively? Did he have the crazy tangerine—

Garbarino: You know, he was more conservative. I saw some of his clothes. He had a pair of pants with Bob Hope’s face all over the golf pants. But he was a pretty conservative dresser.

Smith: Also, it was well-known that he never threw away clothes. He had old suits.

Garbarino: He had old suits when they couldn’t come up anymore and we decided to put the house on the market. Susan came up and we went through some of the clothes. I mean, there were things we found that I thought, “Oh, my God.” He would keep everything. And that, again, came with that generation, I think. My dad was the same way and would just hold on to whatever he had.

Smith: Did he call you Garbini?

Garbarino: Call me?

Smith: I’m told that on occasion, he would call you Garbini.

Garbarino: No, instead of Garbarino, what’d he say? Garbino. I think it was Garbino. It wasn’t always Garbarino, but he was pretty close. Then he’d have Garbarino right on the money. Penny and those guys would laugh. They had a nickname for me - Gambini. That kind of thing. But he was pretty right on with it. I was divorced and I had a young daughter. I'd have my daughter periodically and they were just always so kind. They always wanted to see Danni and before she left here, I’ll never forget, Mrs. Ford said, “We want to have a picture taken of Danielle.” Danielle and her mother moved back to Iowa. And Danni was out of school and I had Danni out, she was 12 years old. Mrs. Ford went up, beautiful clothes, dress changed, President Ford made it a point to go up and put on a nice shirt and I have a beautiful picture of the three of them on the deck of his house. They didn’t have to go through all of that trouble. They could’ve just walked out on the deck and had a quick shot. Those are the kind of people they were.

Smith: That’s revealing. How did he deal with aging? Was it frustrating?

Garbarino: He was getting frustrated because you could tell he had a hard time walking. He had two knee implants. I think with aging, he would get frustrated. That’s when once in awhile he would have a little temper tantrum periodically - because of that.

Smith: I was going to ask you about his temper because he spent a lifetime controlling it. But nobody controls it always and I wondered if you’d seen it.

Garbarino: I saw it a couple of times, but I wish I had his temperament in the sense where he would just blow up and then five minutes later, “It happened and I’m over it.” He would let it go.

Smith: Like a summer thunderstorm. It comes out of nowhere and it’s gone.

Garbarino: Oh, exactly. If the private airplane was late in getting to the airport to pick him up or this or that, then he’d get real antsy and sometimes he would lose it but then it would go away. But then he would be fine five minutes later. I was always amazed at that.

Smith: Toward the end, how did you feel? Clearly the doctors were telling him, “You shouldn’t come up here.” Did they talk about that at all?
Garbarino: He would tell me on the phone before they’d come up, I’d usually talk to him and once in awhile I’d go down to the desert and see them before they’d come up. But he told me on the phone, I’ll never forget, towards the end, he said, “They don’t want me to come up, but we want to come up.” They were determined to come up.

Smith: Between the Fords, the Ford family, the staff, Penny, you, the cooks, Secret Service, where did people stay? Hotels? How’d people get around? Where did people park up at the house? How did that work, that many people in that small an environment?

Garbarino: That’s a good question. Penny and the staff would have their own apartments throughout Vail. Obviously the Secret Service would usually stay at the Charter Hotel. If they were up for Christmas, they’d have apartments throughout. The cook, Lorraine, would stay in the house. So, there was very limited parking up there, but they would park just in front of the house. Let’s see, Penny, Ann and Judy each had their own separate cars up there, but they all had apartments throughout the Vail Valley, yeah. That was about it for cars up there. The cook would always live up there. Once in awhile they’d have a cook that wouldn’t live in the house, but that was where the cook would stay. With them in the home. That’s how they would arrange that up there as well. And he would get upset if there were too many cars around there because he was really conscious of the neighbors. And especially when we had a group up for the World Forum, he was always concerned there was going to be too much disruption. And I knew all the neighbors and I would just go around and tell everybody what was going on and what was happening. Steve Fossett was great. He would buy pizza for the guys because they would do the checkpoint right in front of his house. That’s when Fossett was doing all the balloon trips and whatnot.

Smith: Did he offer to take the Fords up in a balloon?

Garbarino: No, I don’t think he ever did. He had dinner with the Fords every once in awhile. He was really nice. The Fords really liked him. I thought I’d heard the one time Fossett crashed his balloon off the coast of Australia, he almost made it around and he lost his passport and everything. I guess President Ford was instrumental in getting him back here from Australia and somehow working with the State Department. But they always liked Steve. And it was a pretty close neighborhood up there as well.

Smith: You traveled with him in those last years. You know, he took some heat from people for ‘commercializing’ the former presidency. Specifically, people criticized him for serving on boards.

Garbarino: Yes.

Smith: Our sense is, after talking to a number of folks, that he was never window dressing on any board. I mean, he took those very seriously.

Garbarino: Exactly. Yeah. In fact, a lot of his travel was going to different board meetings. He never missed a board meeting. He was really upset if he couldn’t make a board meeting. But when I traveled with him, we didn’t really go to any board meetings at the time. He was just asked to speak or go out of town.

Smith: I guess they would go every December to New York and she would shop and they would see shows. I think they liked New York a lot.

Garbarino: They liked New York. I never went with them on the trip. I was supposed to go with him on one trip, but it was canceled. It was more of a business trip. Mrs. Ford wasn’t going on that trip. But I went with him to D.C. and different other trips.

Smith: Did you ever go with him on foreign travel?

Garbarino: No, I never went with him on foreign travel. Penny would go with him on foreign travel as well. They didn’t go overseas that much when I started working with him. It was just his age and he really didn’t want to fly that long and we made sure everything was so or that a corporate jet was provided for his comfort as opposed to commercial.

Smith: The last summer up here, was it tough? Was it kind of touch and go?
Garbarino: It was very tough. Then he went to the Mayo Clinic for a period of time. I think he had a couple of mini strokes. And so he was up at the Mayo for a good part of it. Then they went directly from the Mayo as I recall back down to the desert. And that was it. That was his last time up here and that was the summer of 2006.

Smith: And my understanding was that he went to the Mayo because he had said something to the effect that, “I don’t want to live like this.” And the folks at the Mayo Clinic had convinced him, notwithstanding his age, that they could in fact address the problems, circulatory problems and all that. And I guess when they got there, they decided otherwise. And then I think actually Mrs. Ford wound up having some leg surgery done.

Garbarino: She had to have a leg stint. I think that was it as well. Because the doctors sat next to me on one of the legs on Air Force One. I was with the physician that worked with them up at the Mayo Clinic. Yes, so she had issues as well at that time. And Mrs. Ford was having more and more problems with oxygen. What was fascinating about President Ford, as I mentioned earlier, he would swim at that pool at 85 100 feet in his late 80s and 90s. He made it a point to go up and swim every day. It was that last summer, obviously, he couldn’t. Then he really, really was slowing down. That’s when he went to the Mayo. He wanted to get up here one more time. They came up and they went to the Mayo Clinic and then back down to the desert. The last time I saw him was about two or three months before he passed away. I went down to the desert that fall, I think it was October. And he was pretty excited. Rumsfeld gave him a model of the fleet that was going to be named the Gerald R. Ford fleet, one of the smaller carriers. He wanted me to see that when I met with him the last time. It was pretty emotional because when I saw him that one time, I thought, “You know, I don’t think I’m going to see him again.” And sure enough, that happened. You could just see where he was just very, very tired. But he was a very interesting man to work for.

Smith: Do you miss him?
Garbarino: Yeah, I do. I do. In fact, I made the comment the other day, I said, “It’s not the same.”

Smith: Do you think a lot of people in Vail feel that way?

Garbarino: I think a lot of people feel that way. A lot of people feel that way. I was glad they named the Gerald R. Ford Village Hall of Beaver Creek after him. Just small things. I was driving back from Denver and you see the Gerald R. Ford Highway. You glance at that and all these things go through my mind. And the way he treated my daughter. My daughter is Navy ROTC and going to the University of Wisconsin. And I said, “Wouldn’t it be something, Danielle,” because they loved her, they really were so kind to her. And I said, “Wouldn’t it be something if you served on one of his ships named after him? That’d be amazing.” But, no, that was quite an experience in my life. Twenty years.

Smith: Two last things. Can you think of a story or anything that might surprise people? That might tell people something about him that might come as a surprise? Also, how sensitive was he to the Chevy Chase caricature?

Garbarino: You know, it’s really fascinating. It was back in the 80s, he came out with that book Humor and the Presidency. I don’t think it really bothered him that much. I think at that time during the campaigning, it did a bit, the way he was treated on Saturday Night Live. I think people would be surprised how athletic he was. I remember, Richard, and I was living in Vail at the time in ’77, I was watching him ski one day, and this was when he was President. And I think it was ’77, he’s making absolutely beautiful turns skiing. And the press corps was down at the base of the mountain. Beautiful turns and there’s not a camera, not one shot of those beautiful turns. The moment he caught an edge on his ski and accidentally just fell sideways, that’s when the shutters flew. That’s when everybody was taking the photos and I don’t think people realized how athletic he was. What a good athlete he was. He was a beautiful skier, very nice skier. A man of his age doing it. I learned a lot from that one moment. I thought, “This is what it’s all about, isn’t it.”
Smith: Well, you have to develop a thick skin.

Garbarino: That’s what struck me, too. You have to have real thick skin. But that’s one thing I don’t think people really realized - how athletic he was.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Garbarino: That’s a good question. Probably as one of the most honest men that ever served our country. And, knowing him personally, and up front with everything, you just had to be straight with him and he was straight with you. Honest.

Smith: He deliberately made an effort to see the good in everyone. I think that was part of what he was brought up to believe.

Garbarino: To see the good in everybody.

Smith: To see the good in people. But I’m wondering whether that left him vulnerable in any way to people who thought, rightly or not, that they could—

Garbarino: That they could take advantage of him in a sense?

Smith: Yeah.

Garbarino: You know, I never saw that. I can’t say that I ever did. It could’ve happened, but I never did see that. He found the good in everybody. It’s really interesting. Once in awhile, you know, you could see him shake his head after he met with somebody, but then he had something good to say about them afterwards. But that’s how I’d like to see him remembered, as a really fascinating, very bright man. But very honest as well.

Smith: We saw the pictures on TV from D.C. and Grand Rapids and everywhere else. What was the reaction locally when he died?

Garbarino: I was fascinated by the lines. I was fascinated when we arrived in Washington that first night, that evening, and the people that were along the highway going into Washington. But what really struck me was the group in Grand Rapids. We were sitting at the Amway, the Grand Rapids Amway, and the line of people waiting to pay their respects…but what really struck me, too, was the family, with the kids standing in line greeting everybody coming through. They did the same thing on Capitol Hill as well. That said a lot to me for the family. That struck me. It really did.

Smith: Thank you so much for doing this. How did your path cross that of Gerald Ford?

Penny: Well, David Kennerly is the prime reason I ended up working for President Ford. There was a young man named Jerry McGee who was at Ogilvy & Mather at that time who called me and said, “Would you want to do some library footage for the new President, in case he wants to run for the office?”

Smith: What is library footage?

Penny: It means to travel around with the new President. Just stock footage so that if there was stuff on him where people would say, “I can make commercials from his presidency.” And as you and I both know, the circumstances of him becoming president were the most unusual in the history of the country. I had my contacts in Washington and having been there previously in ’64, I called up and I spoke with several of my friends, both at the agency and at the Department of Defense and they said, “Don, this is perfect. You get down there and if you can be of any help, we’ll let you know. Just tell us when you are coming.”

So I went down there and one of my handlers at the agency suggested that “be of whatever help you can to them, you obviously have background with [__________]. You know the people in town.” I had met Howard Baker and Bob Dole early on and was writing humor for a number of people like Sam Nunn and guys on both sides. Bill Bradley, whatever. And as luck would have it, when I went to see the President the first time in the residence, everybody is taking pictures of him and I and three or four people from my production company and so forth. I just jokingly said, “Sir, would you mind if I sat on your lap while we took this shot?” And Jerry Ford, as you know, I used to tease him by saying, “You sound just like Tommy Smothers, ‘Well, I’m from the Midwest and I don’t pretend to be a [__________].’” Anyway, I sat on his lap and I have the photographs. I have wonderful pictures and it was an immediate click. I said facetiously after this, “You know, it was like Pinocchio and Jiminy Cricket, you and me. Or Brer Rabbit and Brer Bear.”

Smith: Why do you think that was? Was it opposites attracting?

Penny: I just liked the guy a lot. He sensed that. He said, “You know, I appreciate – you’re like me in a way.” I said, “What do you mean?” He said, “I can sense that you’re a sweet kid.” I said, “Yes, I grew up in Brooklyn pretty much on the streets playing stickball.” And he said, “Well, I grew up in Grand Rapids and I prefer street kids to academics.” He said, “I think maybe I’d like to talk to you about making speeches because I’m real comfortable talking to you, or anybody, one on one; but I’ve got to tell you something, Don, when I walk out into a theater, I’m never quite who I want to be.” I said, “Well, that’s pretty normal, most people don’t need applause. And the last thing they want to do is get out in front of a crowd and be sort of like sorted out and made an individual. I understand that.”

This man had genuine humility. He was, as I said facetiously, the difference between actors and congressmen is wardrobe. The egos are understandably large. Jerry Ford possessed a great talent to listen. I watched him with people, men and women. And I sensed immediately, within minutes, they trusted him and he put them at ease. Now as a director working with professional actors, the first thing you say to them is, “Don’t act, just react.” Jerry Ford was the best reactor because rather than jumping in, he’d listen to you and hear you out.

Smith: What about him - as the relationship began to develop - what was it? I assume there must have been some things about him that diverge from the public image. For lack of a better word, the Washington label, the stereotype that everyone gets tagged with. Did you ever sense - am I’m seeing a guy that I’m seeing in the media portrait?

Penny: Actually, I knew him to be always Jerry Ford. I never saw him, ever, ever put on any air. I remember his naïveté when I first started working with him and he was making a speech and [droning speech pattern], and said, “Sir, you are what we refer to as a humfer.” [Ford] “What’s that?” “That’s a guy who hums and talks at the same time.” [Ford] “What?” I said, “Let me explain. You are from the Midwest and you have a tonal thing…Words have colors and when you learn how to use those colors in verbiage…” [Ford] “I don’t understand what you’re saying.” I said, “Okay, sir. Say ‘screw you!’” [Ford] “Why?” I said, “Just say it with anger.” [Ford] “Screw you.” “There’s no anger there. These words have meaning, they are important. There’s passion. What you are lacking right now is that emotion. And I know you do it purposely because you want to be perceived as very calm, and that ain’t what attracts people. And so if I can suggest to you that you need to learn how to take a written piece and turn it into a spoken piece, which means you have to be an actor.” [Ford] “Oh, God, I’ll never be an actor.” I said, “I already know that. That’s why I came up with the line that we’re going to give you a charisma bypass.” And he looked at me at one point and he said, “Oh, so I’m an old warhorse, can you make me a better one?” I said, “You’re doing that already.”

I was never more proud in my life than when he went into that old [Senate] chamber years later and did a twenty minute speech and was terrific – because he listened and he learned from a guy who knew how to get a performance out of an individual, whether it be an actor or a CEO.

Smith: That’s part of this larger narrative. Almost, a trajectory. It seems one way of looking at Ford’s two and a half years is as someone who came into the office in many ways unprepared, and with a certain set of life experiences and a skill set developed to a high degree on Capitol Hill. And then he had to learn how to be president. And it’s just not being an executive, but it’s all of the theater that goes with the office.

Penny: He never learned how to assume the mantel. I remember when I first saw him with Kissinger, and Kissinger said, “Well, Jerry, in this situation the president would do this and do that,” and after three or four times I said to him – well I didn’t like Kissinger, I thought Kissinger to be full of shit and being in the Kissinger business, primarily. And Ford, “Well, well you know he’s very important.” I said, “Yeah, I know, I know how important he is. He got the Nobel Prize after having killed 30,000 people in Cambodia. Bullshit. You ask me, being from Brooklyn, okay?” And three or four weeks later I was in the room with David Kennerly and Kissinger said, “Well, Jerry, in this situation,” and Ford, knocking his pipe against, said, “Uh, Henry, I’m the President,” same naïveté, [Kissinger] “But I never meant anything.” But he put him away.

Jerry had that worth, truth and sincerity, and you can’t beat that. George Burns was asked by Johnny Carson when he did the Sunshine Boys, he said, “Well, you were always a standup comedian, now you’re an actor.” “But what’s the difference?” He said, “Well, being an actor means you really have to relate to truth, and once you learn how to fake that, you got it made.” Jerry Ford never learned how to fake anything and that was a great strength for me in terms of working with him and making him feel words in the heart as well as coming out of his medulla. I said, “You know, you’re a lot smarter than you look and sound.”

Smith: That brings up another question; tell me about your sense of his intelligence.

Penny: Oh, very smart guy. I used to like to tease him because, as I said, when he was sitting down, making a speech and they were shooting him, there was a dullness. Then he got up, he’d rolled up sleeves - he was a handsome guy - and he started really talking and so forth, and we weren’t shooting him. I said, “Whoa whoa, stop. Mr. President, you’re energy is one hundred percent better when you are standing up and speaking, like you’re a football coach.” [Ford] “Well, I am a football coach.” I said, “I know, sir, I’m trying to say that when you get up…” [Ford] “Okay, so what do you want me do?” I said, “Just get up and let it come out.” He was immediately one hundred percent better.

Smith: It’s interesting, the people who saw it, and I, unfortunately never did. But up until the end, almost every year he would find a way to get back to Ann Arbor before the big game with Ohio State. He invariably would go out and give a pep talk to the team. And people who have seen it, who have no reason to exaggerate, say literally, it was night and day. The image of Ford speaking, and then you have a football coach, in effect. And it was passionate, and it was eloquent and it was moving and the kids were blown away. But it was literally, two Fords.
Penny: My wife is a Buckeye, not just a Buckeye. You know those people in the Midwest are abnormal when it comes to… I believe that the Lord never intended for more than ten people to be in one place at one time. When you have 100,000 people screaming bloody murder – and I said, “Americans have learned how to do war, we call it football and we don’t have too many fatalities.” But the point was, when Susan, my wife, said, “Mr. President, you know, I’m a Buckeye.” There was a pause, and he said, “Susan, there aren’t more courageous, wonderful ballplayers than the kids from Ohio State. I happen to be a Wolverine, and I want to tell you something. When those twenty-two boys get out there and play, they are all Americans. Of course, I pretend like I’m…but the bottom line is, I’m just as proud as punch of all them.” I just thought, wow.

Smith: You talk about a naiveté. I’ve often thought, here’s a guy who had spent twenty-five years in Washington, and you don’t get to be where he got without some ambition and a lot of insight, etc, etc. Yet here’s a guy who goes into his first press conference as President, having totally convinced himself that the reporters were going to want to talk about Greece and Cyprus and inflation, and everything except what they all wanted to talk about, which was Richard Nixon. And my sense is it was that experience and his anger, partly at himself for how he handled the questions, that was a tipping point. Two weeks later came the pardon. Is it naiveté? Is it that stubbornness; is it that ability to convince yourself of something? Is it the Eagle Scout that believes the best in everyone? What combination of qualities takes a politician who spent a quarter of a century in Washington and takes that set of expectations into the lions den three weeks into his presidency?

Penny: I asked him in front of Kissinger – we were having a meeting about speeches he was going to be making. And I said cold - we were given permission to ask questions - “Mr. President, why did you pardon Nixon?” And Kissinger almost said, “Well, I don’t think we should…” And President Ford said, “Don, when I came into this office, the first question people were asking me each day was, ‘What are we going to do about Nixon?’ And I finally called Phil Buchen and I said, ‘Phil pardon him.’ And Phil said, ‘Jerry, on what basis?’ On the basis I’m pardoning him. I’m the President. Pardon him. I can’t do this job if people keep coming in here and telling me what are we going to do. The bottom line is, I don’t want to hurt the man’s feelings. He’s been hurt enough. He’s paid the price. He’s the only president who’s resigned in office. Please pardon him.” Phil Buchen was confined to a chair, he wheeled out and that was it.

Afterwards, I said to the President, “If you say what you just said to me to the media, to anybody, they’ll know you are telling the truth. There’s no deal.” And he said something I’ll never forget about this thing, “I didn’t want to hurt him anymore Don, I didn’t want to hurt him anymore.” And I knew; I was in tears. I thought what humanity. You see, that’s the first thing. People perceived him as a politician. He wasn’t. Jerry Ford was a naval officer, football player and one hell of a human being. His feelings changed. He said, “You know, when I was a youngster I was an isolationist. I thought Lindberg knew what he was talking about. I figured the last thing we wanted to do is go back to Europe and fight another war. Of course, I was as wrong as everybody else who perceived that we didn’t belong over there. Well, we didn’t have any choice, we never did. Did we handle it well? Hell, no.”

What pleased me about him was, yes, he was naïve, but he was not only intelligent, he was educated. I could talk with him about history, because that’s my thing, and at one point I said to him, “The speech you are going to give today to the tank corps – Ft. Campbell, Kentucky – had a couple of errors in it, sir.” [Ford] “What do you mean?” I said, “Well, whoever wrote this speech didn’t really…” [Ford] “What are you talking about?” He said, “Come to lunch and we’ll talk about it.” I walked into a couple of guys in the Pentagon, “Okay, Don, what’s the problem.” I said, “Well, the opening of this speech is when our troops went to fight with French and the British in World War I.” “So?” I said, “We never fought with the French and the British. General Pershing said to Marshall __________, we’ll do it on our own, and then went to ________ and blew the hell out of those bastards and that was the war.” And he said, “Okay. What else?” I said, “Well, the second paragraph says in the great tank offenses in World War I.” “What’s wrong with that?” “There weren’t any. There was the Battle of Cambrai in 1916 where the Brits sent over 200 tanks and the Germans shredded them and killed everybody. I wouldn’t call that a tank offense because some of guys you are going to be talking to are probably either there or know about that.” “Okay.” I felt like Woody Allen with all these stars and everything. And afterwards he had a big laugh; he said, “I’m glad you did what you did because it helped me.” Relating to his naiveté, he always played it very cool.
When he had the big fight with Schlesinger and fired him.

Smith: Was that just bad chemistry?

Penny: No, it was a thing called arrogance on the part of Mr. Schlesinger, who obviously - and this is the other thing, when I would sit in some of these meetings. After that I would say, “Mr. President, I don’t know if I should be in these meetings.” He said, “You’re my writer, Kennerly’s my photographer.
I want the pictures and I want the input that you’ll get from these things, because, Don, you said it to me correct, you’re not from politics and you don’t care about politics. You’re from the entertainment world and the communications world. I need you to know as much as you can know before you put stuff on paper.” And we had writers like Pat Butler, who is a wonderful writer, who as a youngster got fired every day because I kept talking to him and Bob Hartmann, was his name…

Smith: Tell us about Bob Hartmann.

Penny: Whoaaaa, Bob Hartmann.

Smith: Clearly a polarizing figure.

Penny: We became friends through Cary Grant, as a matter of fact, at the convention, after many, many months of difficulty. When I first went to the White House, Hartmann called me and said, “Get over here.” He said, “You’ll report to me.”
I said, “Bob, are you a comedy writer?” “No,” he said. I said, “I don’t report to you, Bob. And I don’t work for the White House.” I wasn’t, at that point; I was working for the Campaign to Elect. Hartmann was a bully and a prick.

Smith: And a drunk.

Penny: Ford said to me, “You need to talk to Bob before noon.” I said, “Why’s that?”
He said, “Because he drinks.” I went to Brent Scowcroft and I said, “Brent…”
And he said, “Don we all have the problem,” and Rummy said to me, “Oh, I’m so glad you’re here!” I said, “Wait, wait. Don’t put me in the middle,” which is what they did. So Hartmann and I had a major confrontation where it almost came to blows. John Osborne called me and he said, “I heard you and Hartmann had it out.” I said, “No, we had it in.” Doug Smith, who is one of Hartmann’s fellows, called me to say that Hartmann is very upset and, “If I were you, I’d listen to everything he had to say.” I said, “I’d be happy to do that, but anybody who pushes me around – see I’m from Brooklyn – I don’t _______ somebody, I’ll punch him in the mouth.”

And the bottom line is, I said to Bob Hartmann in modesty, “Bob, what I want you to know is that I’ll be happy to talk with you, because you are a good speechwriter.” He was, he wrote good speeches, and I said, “But your perception – you’re smarter than I – is wrong. For example, Bob, how much money have you got?” He said, “Well, I’ve got a lot of money. I’m very wealthy and I earned every penny of it.” I said, “Now, let me tell you something. I don’t need you, I don’t even need Jerry Ford, but I think he needs me, so I want you to step back and shut the fuck up.” [Hartmann] “Well, you don’t have to use that kind of language.” I said, “Yeah, I do. Because you see, in language, there aren’t dirty words – there are dirty people, but the word is strong and I’ve been trying to tell Jerry Ford how to use those kind of words with passion, without saying the word.”

Smith: What does it tell you though, about Ford’s – on one hand I guess you could say loyalty – but you could also say judgment; that he was willing to adapt the presidency to Bob Hartmann’s peccadilloes.

Penny: That’s exactly what he said to me, “Don, I’ve known him a long time, he’s a good man.” And I said, “Mr. President, he’s a good man and a fine writer, but he’s a bad boss. He’s not a competent leader, and the problem with him is that you’ve got him in your mouth and you’ve got to make a decision - either him or me. And he’s been with you for thirty years, so I don’t have much of a chance there, except that I know what I’m doing in that area and he doesn’t. You make the decision.”
And at the convention, when he made the speech, I took Bob’s authored speech and we rehearsed it and he did it real well. Cary Grant came in the room and said, “Hello, Don. How are you?” Both Hartmann and the President said, “How do you know him?” And Jerry answered, “Well, Don was second unit on Operation Petticoat and we’re old friends,” and so forth. Well, I saw a new respect come from Hartmann and I saw Jerry Ford giggling, saying, “Oh, that’s nice.” At which point, Hartmann, to his credit, said to me, “You did a hell of a job on the rehearsal.”

Smith: It is universally regarded as, if not the best speech Ford ever gave, the best performance Ford ever gave.

Penny: Hellooo….

Smith: And what did you have to go through to get there?

Penny: Oh we fought like cats and dogs. It was Brer Rabbit and Brer Bear. He would go, “Ohhhwwww,” And I would say, “Naaaa, naaaa, don’t do that, don’t do that.” [Ford] “Well, if I want to do that, I’ll do that.” On the second debate, when he said, “Poland is not under the influence…” Brent Scowcroft and Dick Cheney put on Bob Barrett’s army uniform, which was twice my size, as a joke. Ford looks up, he says, “Okay, I’m laughing. What is it you really want?” I said, “Sir, I know…” and these two guys are pushing me, Cheney and Brent – these are two giant guys, and I said, “Mr. President, I know what you meant to say, what you meant to say was that in their hearts and minds, the Polish people, like all human beings, are free. But sir, if you go to Poland, on any given streetcar you’ll see a T34 tank with a Russian soldier in it. They are under the domination of the Soviets.” “Well,” Ford said, “I am not going to change what I said.” I said, “Sir, remember the line, ‘I am not a Lincoln, I’m a Ford’? Well, it’s about time you started thinking about trading up. And if Mr. Lincoln were here with me he’d say, ‘Jerry, listen to him.’” Because I had something going, too, which is the truth. And to answer your question, this is one smart guy. And if he didn’t believe it, Mrs. Ford would say, “He’s right.” And I did that any number of times when she talked about things that he felt embarrassed about. Like abortion or whatever.
Smith: Was that just because where he came from, in his generation, in his family values, you just didn’t talk about those things?

Penny: He knew and felt exactly the way she did.

Smith: Really?

Penny: Oh, yeah. Jerry Ford, I said, “Sometimes you are very liberal.” [Ford] “I am?” I said, “Oh, yeah. You have this wonderful open mind and I see, for example, being from Brooklyn, a Jewish kid, and you once asked me, ‘Why are Jews so funny?’ and my answer was, well, it’s hard to kill us when you’re laughing.” He said, “Yeah, you people are real smart.” I said, “We’re not any smarter than anybody else, but we keep looking over our shoulder because over the past 5,000 years a lot of folks have wanted to do us in because we’re a perfect target, and we ain’t the only ones. Looking all over the world and what they did to certain people and countries in Europe. They would have wiped them out because they were minorities.” I keep having to refer to the fact that his native intellect was massive. Jerry Ford grew up in a hard way. The woman who took him out when he was just a tiny little infant from being around a man who was abusing her. She had enormous courage and he inherited that.

Smith: Did he ever talk about that?

Penny: Once or twice to me. That’s how close we got.

Smith: I was going to say, that was sort of a sacred memory.

Penny: Twice he said, “I never talked to anybody in my life about it. How come I’m talking to you?” I said, “I don’t know, but I’m honored and hope you know you can trust me with what you’re saying.” And even as we speak now, I would never want to do anything. But to his credit he said, “Don, you know, I grew up not much better than an orphan. And when I was a kid a teacher in school said, ‘There is somebody who wants to see you down at the drugstore.’ And I went down there and it was my father, my real father. And he gave me five dollars and I never saw him again and I was pretty angry about it.” I got that pretty clear. And he said, “Jerry Ford, my dad, my stepdad, he was a good man and he gave me trust.” And you know when people come from a broken home, they don’t trust. Kids don’t trust. I’ve had many friends who grew up and said to me, it’s always been a great thing, “Why am I talking to you now?” And I said, “I don’t know. I’ve just got to tell you all my life I’ve had the great privilege of having somebody say, ‘I trust you.’” There is just no greater compliment.

Smith: Well, of course. You mentioned anger. He had a temper.

Smith: What did you do to prompt it?

Penny: The very thing you asked me about, I kept saying, “Say it again. Say it again.” [Ford] “No.” I said, “Say it again.” Finally I said, “You can throw the desk at me, it ain’t going to change anything.” He said, “God damn, you’re the most stubborn little bastard I ever…” I said, “No, sir, you’re the most stubborn, big bastard.” And somebody wrote an article saying, “Big Jerry Ford needed little Don Penny.” And I took that as a great compliment. As I said before, at one point he said to me, “You’re my conscience.” I said, “Sir, that’s not true. You’re your conscience. I’m just, if you will, just picking at you, saying, ‘come on, stop.’”

Smith: I take it there was some part of him that instinctively rebelled against practicing because it seemed artificial?

Penny: Oh, yeah. I said, “You know, you and Frank Sinatra have something in common.” He said, “What’s that?” I said, “You don’t like to rehearse.” Now when I played Jimmy Carter, I teased him, I said, “You know, Jimmy Carter’s going to do this. [fast talking]” and you’re going to go [slow mumbling], and listen carefully to this guy because he’s got his facts down.” Now Jimmy Carter’s intellect was one tenth of Gerald Ford’s. Jimmy Carter was busy parking if he wanted his car in places and making sure that nobody had this and had that. He was an incredibly limited man in that he had serious ability, having graduated from the Naval Academy.
I was amused when I became friends with Jody Powell, saying, “I’ve got to tell you something, he’s claiming to be a nuclear physicist. There aren’t any in the Navy uniform. Then they changed that to a nuclear engineer, there weren’t any of those either. He was aboard a U.S. submarine as a laundry and administrations officer before he took a hardship discharge to run the peanut thing, which he never did. Two guys from Plains ran the operation. As his mother said, “There’s not much there in terms of business.” And to his credit, Carter, like a number of the presidents I became familiar with, like Reagan, had what I call an intellect to a certain point, an IQ about 90, not more.

I worked for Reagan for thirty years and I was always amused by the fact that Reagan, being the actor he was, looked at his father-in-law, Loyal Davis, and did him. Loyal Davis said to Ronald Reagan, “There are five words: the budget, (and so forth). Stay with those five words, Ronnie, and if they want to talk about something else, just say, ‘Get back to it.’” And Reagan, to his credit, one day we were working on a Gridiron speech and he’s sitting there behind the Oval desk and I’m working and he looks at me and he says, “Not bad for two broken down old actors, is it?” And I looked at the President and said, “That’s funny,” And he was great.

Jim Baker and Don Regan before he left, would come in. At one point when Baker came in, he was just taking over. He said, “Mr. President, this is today’s agenda if you want to change any of these meetings and so forth…” The President said, “Well, that’s okay.” And when Baker left he said, “Why were they thinking I would know anything about agendas?” At one point he was reading and he says, “Don, what’s parity mean?” I said, “You mean parody, or parity.” He said, “P A R I T Y.” I said, “That means equality. You get six, I get six.” “Oh! God, I guess I should have known that.” I said, “Well, I’ve got to tell you something. We are all just heavily flawed, including you.” He used to say if they treated him in Hollywood the way they treat me in Washington I never would have left.

Smith: Not to get off on Reagan, but because I did the Reagan Library, it was interesting - a guy who would ask questions – of George Wile – like, “What makes the Blue Ridge Mountains blue?” Which, when you stop to think, it’s a perfectly reasonable question. And that the guy was comfortable enough with himself to ask a question like that. History casts them as adversaries but Ford and Reagan had a lot of similar qualities.

Penny: I wrote a joke that Ford would say: “Reagan and I have a lot of similarities, we both played football. I played for Michigan and he played for Warner Brothers.” There are no retakes in the Oval Office. The jokes were easy for me. Now Reagan’s wife, Nancy, was real pissed off at me because I’d spent thirty years with him and there I was on the other side of the fence. She never forgave me for it until a certain time came later on when he was President and she said, “Don, we need your help.”

Smith: They always remember how to get hold of you when they need you. That’s bipartisan.

Penny: And the one thing that struck me, we were talking about Jerry’s naiveté; Bill Lukash came up to him at the convention. He said, “Now, Betty’s got the nerve problem _________. When you two go out there, ________ and so forth, whatever you do, don’t pull her arm up in the victory thing. Don’t pull her arm past…” [Ford] “Okay.” They went out there and Ford grabbed her arm and I saw her wince, and I said to Lukash, “God damn it.” He [Ford] went back into the dressing room and went into the bathroom and he cried. He was so upset, having forgotten. And that’s when I realized who he was. In some ways he was a little kid, his enthusiasm - he meant well - and her courage.

Smith: Did you know about her problem, however defined?

Penny: Oh, I got into trouble with her. I saw her slip a pill and take a martini and I said, “Did you just take that?” and she said, “Yeah.” I called Bill Lukash and he came up. And she said, “You ratted on me.” I said, “Yes, m’aam.” She said, “Don, why did you do that?” I said, “Betty, you can’t drink liquor and take pills. You are poisoning yourself.” “Well, why didn’t you just tell me that?” “Well, m’aam, I’ll tell you the truth, I felt that both you and Jerry Ford were drinkers.” I’m a Jewish kid from Brooklyn, ________ was all I knew about and I never wanted to drink that crap. I didn’t know what to do.
Bill Lukash and I became good friends. We worked out in the gym. And I just thought this is a great guy and we became good pals. He and Bud McFarland and I were in the gym together and we became buddies. And he also said the same thing. So you’re in show biz? And everybody was interested. Like with President Johnson, at one point he said, “Who is this actor that Lynda is going out with?” And his name was George Hamilton. And he says, “An actor? Uh huh. What is he?” I said, “He’s an actor, sir.” He asked the question, “Well, why isn’t he in Vietnam?” I said, “Why?” And he said, “Well, he’s young enough to be in the army.” Well that night George Hamilton and Lyndon Johnson had a few words and that was the end of George Hamilton. But whereas Lyndon Johnson and Jimmy Carter and George Bush had their own peculiarities and talents, Jerry Ford was of all of them, the most natural man I have ever met. This is a man who had no pretensions, and who had great strength because he came from truth. It’s all he ever did.

Smith: You told Tom Brokaw, a wonderful story involving a tailor in Georgetown.

Penny: Saul ________________.

Smith: Yeah. Why don’t you relate that?

Penny: One day I was talking to Mrs. Ford. I said, “I don’t want to insult the President, but (whistle), he’s wearing those powder blue leisure suits with the big things and he has these shoes with socks that have clocks on them and these….Jesus Christ, Mrs. Ford.”

Smith: She was very clothes conscious.

Penny: She gave me a picture of him in shorts with a little bangs haircut. And I said, “Even then the pants were too short.” I said, “Mr. President, I’m a natty guy from Brooklyn, you know. And I’m a little disappointed in your outfits with the white belts, with the thing…” [Ford] “So?” “Well, I’ve got a friend, Ralph Lauren, in New York. I’d like to bring him down and have you look at some suits and ties.” [Ford] “Okay.” And then he forgot about it. And Saturday mornings I’d go up and have a cup of coffee and he’d be watching a game.

Don Penny   December 13, 2009

“This little Jewish tailor, he’s got a number on some outfits, he’s coming over from the men’s clothing store,” I’ve forgotten the name of it.

Smith: Britches?

Penny: Britches. I’d gone over there and Saul had fixed suits for me and we’d become good buddies. “Okay, fine.” I went to Saul and I said, “Saul, I’d like you to come to the White House and fix up…” He said, “No, I don’t think so.” I said, “Saul, it’s not like the camps. You’ll get in, you’ll get out. I promise you.” He shows up; Ralph Lauren had sent down a bunch of suits and the manager of Britches had brought all the stuff over, the President is looking at all these suits. He said, “Don, how much does this suit cost?” I said, “I don’t know, sir. Four or five hundred dollars.” [Ford] “Five hundred dollars? My first house didn’t cost five hundred dollars.” I said, “Mr. President, you have to…” And Mrs. Ford said, “Jerry, just shut up. Just shut up.”

Well, okay. Before Saul came over the President is watching a ballgame. I said, “Mr. President?” [Ford] “Yeah, Don?” “I just want to tell you that Saul is from the camps,” and I did the whole thing. “________________, I’m watching a ballgame.” Saul comes in and shakes hands and he’s afraid to look. They go into the bedroom of the residence, and Saul is fixing the pants and so forth. I’m watching TV with Kennerly and Mrs. Ford is making us a grilled cheese sandwich. I look in this thing and I see these two guys in there and I see them. Ford is talking to Saul and I see Saul get up and I see the men embrace. Saul puts his arm…the President. Kennerly and Mrs. Ford do a ________________, so she must have known something. The two guys come out, both guy’s eyes are red. I walk in, Kennerly and I and two Secret Service guys are walking Saul back to the car in the West Wing. I said, “Saul, what the hell happened?” He said, “I was fixing his pants and he said to me, ‘Don told me about Auschwitz and the camps and so forth.’” And he repeated everything I ever said that I thought he hadn’t heard a word of. That was Jerry Ford. So I take him to the car and go back up and he’s watching the game again. It’s Saturday morning. I said, “Mr. President?” [Ford] “What?” “Can I?” [Ford] “What?” “I just want to tell you I think you are a terrific guy and I love you.” He said, “Don, I think you’re a terrific guy, too, and I love you. Now can I watch the ballgame?” “Yes, sir.” Jesus Christ on earth.

Smith: That also goes to another topic that we’ll talk about a little bit more. He was the least self-dramatizing of presidents.

Penny: Oh, jeez, could he be blurry. I said, “Mr. President, don’t you care…” [Ford] “No.” “Aren’t you?” [Ford] “No.” “What do you care about? I just want this.” For example, one day during the Bicentennial I said, “You know, I think we should give Robert E. Lee his citizenship back.” He said, “What?” I said, “Well, you know, after the Civil War some fifty-sixty thousand Confederate officers signed an amnesty that we’ll never fight again. And to his credit, Robert E. Lee signed it, too. But a congressman pigeonholed it and it was never…Jack Marsh, Jim Cannon. Jim Cannon from Brooklyn is going to get Robert E. Lee his citizenship back? Okay, that’s great.

And we went down there with this piece of paper and put it at Washington _______. Dean Percy and I went in and put it up there and there were twelve flags on – not even on, what do you call it? Flagpoles. On branches because the Confederates didn’t have any flagpoles at the end. And the sarcophagus was then at the Washington ______ before they moved it. And Ford said, “How did you know about…?” I said, “Sir, I can read and I majored in college in history. And my mother’s family is from Atlanta, Georgia, and they were there in 1845 before the Civil War. One of the few Jewish families in Atlanta, and my ancestors had a company that made kitchen tables, wood tables.” Gate City Table Company, which still exists. They now make it out of Formica and stuff like that. So he said, “Oh, so you know about the Civil War?” I said, “Yes, I do.” And we talked about the fact that he and I had been born not that long after World War I. I was never more impressed with a human being in my life, or such simplicity, and I was so taken with the fact that men and women in his company would sense it.

Smith: How important was Mrs. Ford?

Penny: She was and is the mainstay of his life. In the second debate at William and Mary, I think it was, I was exhausted. I was very tired. I was sort of sitting in a chair rehearsing, working with him, and I must have fallen asleep. The next thing I knew, the President picked me up out of chair and put me in the bed and Mrs. Ford was at the door. I got up and she said, “He loves you more than he loves me.” And he looked at her and he said, “What?” I said, “No, he loves you most.”

She said to me one time, she said, “When we first started dating he’d been with everybody in Washington and here’s a guy who was handsome as he could be; and we started going out.” And obviously, he’s all man. And I said, “No.” He was scared to death of marriage because of what he’d been through as a kid. He was not a trusting person in terms of a marriage. He had not seen a good one. And he married her. She was herself a woman who was a veteran in that she married a man older than herself who was in a wheelchair. From what I understand, she took care of him. She had a great love for him; she truly, really loved him. And he would say, “Oh, Betty.” At one point we went to a State Dinner and the singer was a young Mexican girl.

Smith: Vicki Carr.

Penny: Vicki Carr. We were dancing, Vicki and I. Vicki’s husband at the time, was Danny Moss, a friend of mine and the manager of a business. And I was dancing with Mrs. Ford, the President was dancing with Vicki Carr and she innocently said to him, “What’s your favorite Mexican dish?” And he said, “You are.” And Mrs. Ford’s hand grabbed my hand and so forth. She walked me over and she said, “This is Don Penny, our best dancer.” As she was going away I heard her say, “You are….,” And I thought, oh jeez. And he said to me the next day, “You got me in a lot of trouble.” I said, “I didn’t do anything,” and that story has been retold many times in different ways, but that’s what happened.

My mother and dad met them, Rosie and Max, I took them up to the residence and Mrs. Ford – because my dad was sort of like a New York cab driver, knew everything. Never in doubt, always knew. And after they left, Betty and Jerry were sitting there and they said it must have been tough being Max’s son. I said, “Yeah, it was tough. My father knew everything.” Because he said, “Jerry….,” And I thought Jesus Christ; he’s the President of the United States. At one point when she went to the hospital he was just so beaten up. He talked to me about that because like a lot of guys, he didn’t know how to handle it. He can handle anything.

Smith: This was the breast cancer surgery?

Penny: They had a sincere and great love and you could see the man when he was with her. Same thing I felt with Lyndon Johnson and Jimmy Carter. They related to the women.

Smith: People have often paid tribute to her courage and her candor in making it possible, really, for women to discuss what had been kept in the closet. But, in fact, he also, by his reaction had an enormous impact on how men responded to this.

Penny: And to his credit, I said to him, “You know, I’m a metrosexual, sir.” He said, “What’s that?” I said, “It’s a guy who’s in touch with his feminine side, who’s not an asshole. And isn’t a macho jerk and the testosterone does not flow. I listen.” [Ford] “Oh, well, I’m very aware of women.” I said, “Yeah, I laughed when Kennerly said you were in Texas and all these great looking…he said, ‘Does this get you turned on?’ I said, you know, I’m older but I’m not dead, David.”

Smith: What was the relationship with Kennerly? Was Kennerly almost a member of the family?

Penny: Oh, yeah. The President loved David. How could you not?

Smith: Was part of it because he could play the smartass?

Penny: Which he did brilliantly.

Smith: The irreverence?

Penny: David Kennerly is a remarkable person. I got to know him and I said, “Jesus, if you had any humility, you could be president,” because it’s true. Ford listened to David. David had been in Vietnam and was a pretty savvy young fellow. He was in his twenties when I met David, I remember with the Mayaguez situation, David said to him to him - he had all these four-star generals, he said - “Wait a minute, how many of you guys in this room have been in Vietnam?” And nobody had. He said, “I think this is the work of a local commander. I don’t think this is the Cambodian government.” He was right. And Ford, to his credit – I wasn’t there – but he said, “How many people are we going to lose? And I guess it was General ____________, I’m not sure which one it was, said, “We could lose forty-fifty guys.” “How many guys we getting?” He said, “Forty-fifty guys.” So we’re killing a lot of boys to get ______________.

Everybody left and I understand that Ford sat there with his head hanging and he said, “David was going to tell me. This is not an easy job, is it?” It was then that I think he first realized what he was about in that job. And at one point he looked up from something he was reading and he said to me, “Don, I can do this job.” I figured, oh God. I had this vision of like eight years in the White House – I said, “Noooo ____.” But his humility, as you said, when I first met him, he took the job because they gave it to me.

Smith: Did they wait too long to take Reagan seriously? One gets a sense that the campaign was very slow in getting off the ground.

Penny: When I got there I realized that the campaign was being run poorly. Grey Advertising and a couple of guys come out twice a week. And I said to David, “David, these guys, the drags are terrible.” I brought back Jim Jordon who was one of the guys from BBD&O, and Charlie Welsh who was my good buddy, who was the head of Wells, Rich, Green. Then they hired two fellows whose names escape me, to do the campaign.

Smith: There was Bailey-Deardorff.

Penny: Bailey-Deardorff was hired. It was too little, too late. I raised some money in New York for him, but he was tight. And to answer your question, if we’d had another four months we would have won.

Smith: Where were you on election night?

Penny: I have a photograph of me and President Ford. I was up in the residence with him. We walked into the bedroom and it was a November night and there was the Washington Monument and I was really upset. The first thing I said, I looked up at him, “You don’t look anything like it.” He said, “What?” I said, “It’s a joke, sir. The Washington Monument.” He said, “Don, you know, we have a lot of work to do yet.” And Mrs. Ford came in and there I was with the Fords, my ex-wife was there, Charlie Walsh and Susan. I have the photographs. I was crying and I said, “I’m so sorry.” He said, “It’s okay, it’s okay.” And that was the measure of the man. That hurt him deeply.

Smith: It took him a while to bounce back?

Penny: Oh, yeah. It was a terrible experience.

Smith: We’re told the next day, and for some time thereafter that he was angry at himself, and he said, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Penny: He didn’t like Jimmy Carter. And that’s why I was surprised when they became friends. He said, “Don, I misjudged him.” See, that’s the thing I liked about him. When he was wrong about something he said he was wrong. Oh he was so much fun. We got in the elevator and _____ went burrrrr and all the Secret Service guys would break up and laugh and then the doors would open and it’s a lot of _____________ and so forth. He said, “Oh, don’t do that. It gets me __________.” One time we were in the elevator and Kennerly was saying, “You know, you have to do the radio thing,” and he lost his temper.
“God damn, David, I know I…..!” And he looked at me because I was ______, and he said, “Well, you know I knew…” I said, “Okay.” But I laughed because Kennerly was shriveled up and was hiding in the corner and Ford was really upset. He was a big fellow. He had a temper.

Smith: The public didn’t see that very often, did it?

Penny: Well, he made sure they didn’t. It was part of his makeup. Again, he wouldn’t talk about the abortion stuff, because he’s like, a guy. Guys, for the most part
- I’m part of a caregiver’s thing now that my ex-wife has cancer – guys sit there and don’t talk; the women talk. And the lady who is the counselor said simply, “You’re talking about it?” And I said, “Yeah, because I’m feeling.” I do counseling over at the VA with a bunch of guys, Richard, who are in their seventies – black men, for the most part, with a sixth grade education, who haven’t got a nickel to go get a cup of coffee. That’s how old I am – I speak of a nickel cup of coffee. Now it’s a dollar-fifty. But I sit there and the anger in these guys, the frustration, there’s a lot of testosterone going around in that room. President Ford is basically a very shy man.

Smith: Really?

Penny: Oh, yeah.

Smith: What makes you say that?

Penny: I’d see him do a brilliant job of being outgoing when he was cringing. Saul was a good example. Afterwards, Mrs. Ford said to me, “The President wants you to invite Saul and his wife to the Israeli State Dinner.” “What?” “Yeah, invite him.” So I went to Saul and I said, “Now you’re going to go to the dinner. Now, the first thing, when he comes down the stairs and goes by, don’t grab the jacket and give it a whatever.” And he laughed and he said, “Don, a State Dinner.” We’re standing there and (music begins) he comes down and so forth, and Saul, and his wife’s name is Esther, history right there? Okay. And after the dinner we went into the hall and went to the Marine Commandant, and said, “Do you know Hava Nagila?” He said, “Sure.” Now that opening thing is eight guys can walk in with the Israeli flag, Star of David, all look like my Uncle Al, and Rabin and so forth, playing Hatikva, the national anthem. And, of course, we were all in tears.

Here’s Saul and Esther – they were in the camps. Now they are in the White House with the President of the United States. Anyway, the Marine Commandant starts playing, and I get in the middle of the floor and I’m dancing doing the ______ with Rabin and Saul, the three of us. Ford comes over and he grabs me, “How do know how to do that?” I said, “I’m Jewish.” He said, “Funny, you don’t look it.” The place just broke up.

At the end of the evening, if you remember Yankee Doodle Dandy with George M.? I tapped down the stairs with it, I called my daughter who was then eleven years old and said, “You wouldn’t believe tonight.” And Ford went upstairs and I went up and had a drink with him, and he was very touched. He said, “You know, there weren’t a lot of Jewish people in Grand Rapids.” I said, “I understand.” He said, “We had Jewish people, but to ask you a big question, I met so many different people here,” which leads me to the best Gerald Ford story I’ve got. Which was when Giscard D’Estaing was coming.

Smith: Which would seem to be temperamental opposites.

Penny: Exactly. But the President and I were rehearsing a speech and he says, “And I want to welcome the French president, Mr. Justin…” I said, “Hold it. What did you say?” He said, “Justin …” I said, “You mean Giscard D’Estaing?” He said, “I said that.” I said, “Sir, you didn’t even come close. And do me a favor. See, remember when we were in Iowa and you said, ‘It’s great to be here in Iowa…Ohio,’?” I said, “Sir, just say it’s great to be here because you fluff a lot and people don’t like it when you say it’s great to be in Ohio and we’re in Iowa. And here, sir, you’re really going to blow this whole thing with Giscard D’Estaing.” [Ford] “No I won’t.” I said, “Yes, you will.” [Ford] “No I won’t.” “Yes, you will.” [Ford] “NO I WON’T.” “Okay. Okay. Can I just tell you how to do it?” (Ford sighs) “It’s four names.” [Ford] “Four names?” “Ja Scarred Des Tang, Ja Scarred Des Tang,” then I did him, I did the speech. “It’s a pleasure to welcome Mr. Ja Scarred De here, Des Tang… I got it…and it’s a pleasure to welcome Just Scarred…” “Close, try again.” [Ford] “Jess Scarred Des Tang. Giscard D’Estaing.” “You got it!” And I said to myself, I know he’s going to blow it. He got up and I’m standing in the back, _______________ He said, “I want to welcome Mr. Justin Garston to….”

Jesus Christ, because everyone was saying, “What did he say?” Frenchman gets up, to his great credit, he says, “Monsieur President, I want to tell you how much I admire the fact that you are the first politician to pronounce my name correctly.” And Gerald R. Ford looks over at me and he goes….everyone is saying, “What the hell is going on?” That’s Gerald R. Ford. He was never impressed with himself for a minute. And when he did something he thought was good, he went, “Hey!” Like whoa, like a football player would say, I scored! I scored!

Smith: Did he grow in office?

Penny: He was who he was.
Smith: Did Reagan make him a better candidate?

Penny: No, it made him a worse candidate.

Smith: Really?

Penny: He was very intimidated by Ronald Reagan.

Smith: But the notion that Reagan forced him to become a better speaker and to do all of this.

Penny: Oh, in that sense, being a football player, he realized, “I’ve got to play a much better game here.” And he was __________, and in that case, he would pay real attention. And to his credit, Hartmann was a real value. The only thing that Hartmann’s problem was, he was very angry at guys like Rummy and Dick who he perceived as enemies. Because, in fact, he had been with Ford for thirty years. And to his credit, he was a Navy captain; I was a lieutenant commander at the time, but…

Smith: Is it safe to say he was possessive of Ford. Not only protective, but in some ways – understandably – possessive.

Penny: In my heart, I believe that Bob Hartmann thought he was a smarter man than Gerald Ford. And you know what? He may have been. But his main problem, I used to call him the Snow Toad, (croaking). And of course, humor is a major weapon and I used it because Bob Hartmann was a terrific target. And whenever he’d attack me, I would turn it around and put it right back at him. And I said to him, “You want to do comedy with me, pal? Okay. We’ll check our wits at the door, but be aware of something. I’m going to get you.”

We were going up a bunch of stairs to an airplane thing and he had said something really mean to John Osborne, “Heck, Penny’s not even a writer.” And I said, “You know, you’d better stop putting me down, because you’re putting down the President.” He said, “His latest new thing is a comic from Hollywood,” and he said, “Well, you little son of a bitch.” And I said, “Pal, if you want to take this out…” and Dick Cheney grabbed me, took me into the men’s room, hysterically laughing, and I got two arms over Cheney and I said, “Let me go back I’ll kill the son of a bitch.” And he said, “You could.”
But at that point I realized that Hartmann had intellect, there’s no doubt about it. He could write. And as you say, he did it for thirty years and at one point he says, “He’s mine!”

Smith: Yeah, that’s what I mean.

Penny: And finally I said to him, “Bob, Jerry Ford was a football coach and you were his coach, weren’t you?” That’s when I got through to him. He said, “Jesus Christ, yes.” That’s when we stopped talking to each other. Bob Orben, who was the head comedy writer and so forth, who was a terrific guy, not really funny to me, he was writing whiz-bang jokes and whatever. But he was there before I got there and I related to him. He was a nice man.

Smith: But I understood that it got so bad at one point that there was the Hartmann speechwriting team and then there was this sub rosa speechwriting team, which included Gergen at one point. And the President was willing to tolerate this. We’ll find a way to make it work.

Penny: See, that was the thing about him. I think he saw us as a football team. Defense, offense, and at one point he flattered me tremendously, he said, “Penny, remember what you are.” “What do you mean?” He said, “You’re a quarterback.” I said, “You think so?” He said, “Absolutely. You’re calling plays here. And I’m going to block for you. And that’s when he said, ‘You’ll stand in as director of communications because Bob Reno (whatever his name was) is out.’” Before Gergen took over I would do what I had to do each day and it was then I realized this man has a real sense of teamwork.

Smith: For the last nine years I’ve been working on a biography of Nelson Rockefeller.

Penny: Oh boy, another pal.

Smith: And I was going to ask you if you had any interaction with Rocky?

Penny: I met Rockefeller when I was thirteen years old when I was the hat check boy at the 21 Club. My uncle, Jerry Burns, was one of the owners of the club, and it was Burns and – I’m trying to think of the other family – Kreindler, who owned 21. I was Donny, the boy who took the coats. I was going to Dwight Prep School in New York, and so the Rockefellers were nice people and started 21. People don’t know it, but Nelson Rockefeller was in college with Jack Kreindler and they had a place called the Black Cat during prohibition, where they did their thing. The Rockefellers sold Kreindler and Burns three brownstones on Fiftieth Street. Then they realized they’d made a mistake because they were going to build – this was 1930 – and they gave them ten grand for the three brownstones, where they built 21 brands and whatever.

Rockefeller and I had an experience many years later. I’m walking around late at night in the EOB, and you know, the walls are ______________ I would go (horn sound), and I’m walking around, going to ______ and walking past the Vice President’s office and there he is in shirt sleeves at two o’clock in the morning. And he says, “What the hell are you doing?” I said, “Marching, sir.” And I realized…and he looks at me and says, “Um, I know you. Donny at 21. I’ll be God damn, what are you doing here?” I said, “Well, I grew up, sir, somewhat.” He said, “No, obviously you didn’t.”

So the next morning Ford is calling me, he’s laughing and he’s saying, “Rockefeller called up and said you got a kid in here named Don Schneider, who I know as Don Penny, but I knew him when he was at 21,” and so forth and so one. Ford calls me and says, “You’ve got to stop marching.”

Smith: He was not a happy vice president.

Penny: No. He realized he had made some big mistakes in his life, and being a politician was really…his brother who ran Chase…

Smith: David.

Penny: David was another guy I was friends with. I had an account with Chase for twenty years as a PR working with Tom LeBreck(?), who is the president. Carlson was one of those guys I was a little concerned about because he’s smart, I wasn’t sure, being an interloper, whether I had credibility with what I felt was the middle management guys – like John, because John had a tough way to go. He had Ron Nessen – in itself an effort – and he’d been there I guess for the previous guy, I’m not sure. Anyway, where were we?
Smith: About Nelson.

Penny: Anyway, his conclusion to me was, Gene – I’m trying to think of his last name – the guy from Chase with whom I worked with very closely. Gene…

Smith: Champion?

Penny: No. Gene…grey-haired guy, I’ll think of his name. And he was the guy working with and for Rocky. But he was an incredible gentleman, and so was Happy, and they treated me and Susan, my lady, then, not my wife, but became my wife, very well. He was a terrific guy. He had a lot of anger. He was real pissed off. And of course, Ford tried everything he could…and it didn’t work too well.

Smith: And he went to his grave convinced that Don Rumsfeld did him in. Because remember, look what happened: George Bush got deep-sixed at the CIA, Rumsfeld got a Cabinet slot, his guy got the chief of staff job, and Rockefeller was dumped.

Penny: It’s unfair to accuse Don of doing anything like that. I had a couple run-ins with Don. A very close friend of mine was an acting army secretary, Les Brownlee and deserving of the job, as opposed to the man Harvey who got the job who didn’t know a God damn thing about it. And as you and I both know, a lot of guys got jobs they shouldn’t have had and they took them instead of saying, I’ll stand in front of instead of behind this guy. He knew what he was doing. (?) And I was always impressed with the fact that John was a youngster, but he was doing exactly what he needed to do. And he was one of the few guys I thought who was not there for himself. Because the thing that bothered me the most when I came in as an interloper, so to speak, and this was a fourth rate corporation, which the White House has always been. And some of the stuff that went on, I thought, Jesus, if this was a regular company, that guy would be out on his ass.

Smith: What was the difference between how Rumsfeld ran things and how Cheney ran things?
Penny: The best joke that Cheney ever said at the dinner, when he said, “Well, there’s Don Rumsfeld, who is (whatever),” and he looks at me and he says, “There’s Dick Cheney, my assistant.” These guys, at certain points, started believing their credits. I don’t know how John feels, or he would feel, but what disturbed me the most and what Brent Scowcroft said about both. He said, “You wouldn’t recognize him, Don. They are not the guys they used to be.” I came after 9/11 to realize how really upset they were, and between you and me, scared shitless. And would you be any different? I don’t think so. And to his credit, Dick Cheney is still, if you will, trumpeting the call, which I think is not wrong. How he did it, Rummy did it? Arrogance is always as deadly as a bullet in the heart.

Smith: It must have been awkward for Ford.

Penny: Oh, Jesus Christ. When I talked to him about it – and there again, I was humbled by the fact that he talked to me. I teased him after, I said, “You are becoming very Jewish,” because it was like King David. He said, “Don, you know how I feel about them.” I said, “Sir, they’re your boys, as I am.” He said, “That’s right.” He said, “Do I agree with what’s going on? Of course not. Have I tried to say anything? Well, Don, he was aware of the fact that I knew that when the elder Bush talked to Dick he said to him, ‘I don’t want my son questioned by the media as to whether he’s talking to me, because I don’t want that.’ That’s why you are going to do the job of finding the next vice president. And when they can’t find one, you’re taking the job because I’ll talk to you, Dick. And you’ll talk to him.” And poor old Dick, dope that he is, took the job, putting himself in a rock in a hard place. And to his credit, he took it very seriously because Dick is another kid from Wyoming. I wish he was as smart as his wife. He also scared the shit out of me when he got so sick. I said to him more than once, “What do you need this for? You’ve got money. Come on, Dick. The girls are fine,” and we went through the thing with Mary when she announced. And he said, “Alright, so a liberal Jew is going to tell me what to do here?” I said, “I’m going to tell you, keep your mouth shut and act like an adult.”
Smith: It’s interesting about the Fords – as the years went by and the party moved farther and farther to the right, particularly on social issues, they became an island of sorts. It wasn’t just abortion, he is to this day, I think, the only president to sign a gay rights petition. And I wonder, did he change? Did she change him over time? Or was it a combination of the party went farther and farther to the right, and they were in some ways marooned. As I said in my eulogy, most of us get more conservative as we get older. Our sympathies narrow along with our arteries. With him, it seemed to be the exact opposite.

Penny: He made the analogy to me of Lyndon Johnson because he and I talked about Johnson. He said, “Don, when he was considered a turncoat – it was like Richard Russell – after all those years of siding with the no civil rights crap, and all of a sudden he turned on them and made it happen.” He said, “Don, I’ve learned a great deal about this job. I’ve learned through the experience I’ve had with Lyndon Johnson.” I didn’t realize Johnson treated Ford badly. And so did a lot of other people who perceived themselves to be much smarter and they weren’t. And of course, I never had the chance to say to Lyndon Johnson, “You made a mistake about Jerry Ford. First of all, you didn’t play football.” And the bottom line is, he didn’t play for Warner Brothers. We’re talking about the real deal here. I agree with you that he grew as he aged, but to answer your question as to whether she had an impact on him – no. I think he had an impact on him and he went to her and said, “I see your point.” I watched him, I know you could say he grew, but become more experienced. And you and I both know that intellect is important, but experience makes the difference.

Smith: Tell us about the last meeting you had with him.

Penny: Penny Circle said come down. He came in, he was obviously on his last legs. My daughter was there and he took her hand; I’ve got the photograph right here, and he’s holding her hand. And I saw my old friend, my dear old friend, getting ready to go. I put my arms around him and hugged him. I’ve got one picture of the way he hugged me, and that was Sunday. He said he didn’t hug anybody.
My wife and I walked into the dinner, that June dinner, he was at the other end of the hall and he was talking to Colin Powell, and he saw me. And he walked over and he picked me up off the ground and hugged me. And Susan said, “He loves you.” And I said, “Yeah, I love him, too.” He not only changed my life, it was sort of a redemption to see a man who truly cared first about his country. It’s so easy to say he was a great American, and a great patriot. He gave me myself back because I had become quite cynical, as had a lot of people, and Jerry Ford gave me – well, I once said to him, “You know, I once said it would take the President of the United States to convince me that I had any talent because my father was such a hard taskmaster.” And Gerald R. Ford said, “You are a talented boy, Don.”

Smith: Were you surprised by the outpouring when he died? Because he’d been out of the public eye for quite a while and yet, it seemed almost to build as the week went on.

Penny: People came to know, don’t you think, Richard, that this man who was given such an incredible task and punished for it, and laughed at and made to feel less than. And he hunkered down and got through it. He was not so much my hero, although he came close to being that, because I didn’t want to be him, I just wanted to be around him.

Smith: I can’t let you go without asking, did he resent the jokes? I mean, you only have to be human to…

Penny: I’m sure that when I wrote that thing for him at the dinner where Chevy Chase was there, and Bob Orben gave him the line, “I’m Gerald R. Ford and you’re not.” And I did some gags. I put some silverware in front of him, and he pulled the silverware and dropped it on Chevy Chase. He had him then. Chase was begging for mercy. We had the fake speech, he dropped it and ______ came running to get the speech. When Chase did the jokes, I was there. Ford was hysterical. He was laughing. He said, “He’s a funny guy.” I said, “Yes, sir, but he’s making you look silly.” He said, “No he’s not. He’s not, Don. It’s okay.” And all during the time that I watched him, like the time he gave Brezhnev the parka, it was an example of one smart dude. Brezhnev said, “(speaking in Russian) No, I can’t take it.” Ford says, “Oh, yeah, you can.”
And from that point on, there was no problem with the negotiations. Jerry Ford was the most natural human being I ever met. And to his credit, I think he went to his Maker feeling comfortable.

Smith: He had a good life.

Penny: He lived an important life. A lot of successes in the world, very few importants. Gerald Ford was an important. As he said, “I am a football coach.”

Smith: Thanks for doing this. How did your path cross that of Gerald Ford?

Wilson: Well, it was interesting. I was at the State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

Smith: You were another Midwesterner? Was Wisconsin home?

Wilson: No, I’m from Kansas, born and bred in Kansas. Started my whole career at the Kansas Historical Society and then went to the Eisenhower Presidential Library. That’s how I got with the National Archives in ‘68.

Smith: Is it safe to say that the Eisenhower Library had a bit of a reputation as a training ground within the agency?

Wilson: Yes, that’s true, which was kind of unusual given the fact of the location and the administration, which I won’t go into detail. But I think part of it was because, when LBJ set up the Johnson Library, he had to kind of give a little due to every other presidential library in order to get what he wanted. And, so, there was a big staffing input in the late ‘60s.

Smith: Was that the golden age?

Wilson: That was kind of the golden age, yes. So, I was from Abilene and was at the State Historical Society finishing my dissertation. It was kind of an interesting opportunity. Because of some family problems and my father’s death and everything, they recruited me to go back out there as a historian.

Smith: Go back out to the Eisenhower?

Wilson: Back to Abilene and to join the Eisenhower staff, which I did. I spent nine years there and gradually became Deputy Director of the library.

Smith: Now, had the President passed away at that point?

Wilson: A month before, but I had met him on other occasions and really got to be close with Mamie and David.
Smith: Maybe closer than Steven Ambrose.

Wilson: Maybe, certainly a more balanced view. So, it was going home for me and worked out pretty well. I was Acting Director for a couple of years while the Director was on leave, so I had a good basis for administration work. It was kind of an unusual period where, you know, of course, you go to get a Ph.D. in the 60s and think you’re going to teach. Public history was an emerging field at that point.

Smith: Looked down upon by some academics?

Wilson: Looked down upon by quite a few, but it was a great opportunity for me, personally, because there was no competition up there, having the degree and some experience in the archives world. It kind of put me on a quick path, which probably ended up my being such a young Archivist [of the U.S.]. Nevertheless, it was good training ground and, in fact, it was kind of the golden age of training period. The GSA would send all their people [for management training]. For example, I got to spend a summer at the Truman Library. I did a lot of training courses – anything you could imagine for leadership and management activities.

Smith: I noticed - correct me if I’m wrong - part of that golden age included the fact that those libraries, the older libraries had, as a dedicated member of the staff, an oral historian.

Wilson: That’s correct. Mack Byrd was the [Eisenhower Library’s] oral historian at the time, who was a rather senior scholar, but once Columbia kind of closed down, the library took over a lot of that oral history. And we did quite a few. I was involved in some of that early planning and activities.

Smith: You said you became close to Mamie and David.

Wilson: Yes.

Smith: There’s a stereotype of Mamie. Tell us something about Mamie that might surprise people.
Wilson: A very warm person. She was a character in her own right. I don’t think she ever got out of bed before eleven in the morning.

Smith: And loved soap operas.

Wilson: And loved soap operas and she liked to have her evening cocktail. But there was a travel issue. She had a problem with her inner ear. She would often come out there and spend long weekends and was very faithful to the library in its early years. The funniest stories, though, evolved around her Secret Service which she considered her children. They’d have to tuck her in at night and everything else.

Smith: I’ve heard rumors that they were not above fixing her dishwasher - that they were domestics as well as agents.

Wilson: Absolutely, and she regarded them as domestics and chauffeurs and other things, and most of them were with her for the whole time. It wasn’t like they rotated like they do today.

Smith: I assume that’s just the outgrowth of a military wife.

Wilson: I think so.

Smith: I mean, you have a staff.

Wilson: Absolutely, and they took it that way. They loved her. It was a very warm relationship. David was an interesting personality because he was working on his grandfather’s biography at the time. He was a strong researcher, a very dedicated researcher. He would come out for two or three weeks at a time and do research. I can remember he would love to bring his kitten along and he’d ride and his hands were all scratched up from being in the car with the cat. Because we’re contemporaries, I kind of became his keeper when he was in town, so I’d take him to the country club to play golf. We timed it one year so he came out for the member-guest golf tournament. He’d never played in a tournament in his life. He’d always played with his father-in-law, whom he called Mr. Nixon.
Smith: Really?

Wilson: M-hmm. Always Mr. Nixon. So, he said he really didn’t know anything about competitive golf because, if they didn’t like the shot, they just took another. So, when we went out to play - I can remember the first tournament - we went out and he got up and hit a booming drive, just a beautiful shot. Of course, a little crowd had gathered and somebody said, “Terrific shot,” and David just turned around and said, “Well, it should be. My grandfather spent a million dollars to have me be able to make that shot.” But, he was a delightful person to have around. We spent a considerable amount of time together and he did very good research. His grandmother, though, was always upset that he didn’t take the bar.

Smith: Really?

Wilson: And would tell him that every time she saw him.

Smith: Do you think the Eisenhower connection either prepared you for or in some ways recommended you to President Ford?

Wilson: Yes. I believe that’s certainly the case. It was interesting. In that selection process, President Ford made it very clear he wanted a professional historian to lead the library. Partly that was driven by the University of Michigan saying, “We want your library here, but we want somebody that’s qualified to be on the faculty and that can be part of the cadre there and be an adjunct to the University.” Interesting thing. He set up David Matthews as the chairman of the search committee and David, of course, was the young Ph.D., former president of the University of Alabama, the bright, shining star on the watch.

Smith: It’s amazing. We interviewed him a year ago and he still looks young.

Wilson: He’s amazing. David and I got to be very good friends and had a close relationship, but I wasn’t sure I wanted that. The Archives was pushing this. David Matthews, you know, urged me to send in a resume. I can recall David telling me that they said, “This is the one we want to look at.” So, I received a phone call to go to New York to the Astoria. Astoria?
Smith: The Waldorf?

Wilson: The Waldorf. And, I mean, I’m 34-years old, 35, and I’d never been to New York.

Smith: Really? You are a Midwesterner.

Wilson: Yeah, I was a Midwesterner. I went east to college to graduate school in Cincinnati. That was east. And, so, I got on a plane, but I wasn’t sure I wanted to do this.

Smith: Was it in part because of the bifurcated nature of the institution?

Wilson: No, that didn’t bother me. A two-year presidency, you know. They [the National Archives] really pressed me hard to take the Nixon project on and I refused that because I didn’t want to spend the rest of my life in litigation. So, I wasn’t sure what the motivation was, but I was kind of the candidate for the Archives at the time. So, I agreed to go. I was so nervous. I mean, I’m staying at the Howard Johnson in downtown New York City. I go over there and get there a little bit early and David Matthews and President Ford were meeting and having coffee. Fortunately, the Secret Service outside the door were like Mamie’s, they were characters. They put me at ease. They started telling jokes, they were kidding me, and I relaxed, and by the time I got in there, I was very comfortable.

And, I say this about President Ford, he immediately put you at ease. There was something about him, maybe it was the Midwestern part of him. At the same time, there was always a reserve with him. You know, it was an interesting combination. He could make you feel very comfortable in any meeting setting and any kind of thing, but I never got very close. It was seven years with him and I really wasn’t close like I was later with George H. W. Bush - became part of the family. But it was a very cordial meeting. David asked very good questions, and I think in some ways I was interviewing them as much as I was being interviewed, because I had to be convinced that I really wanted to do this and take this on. And he convinced me. He said, “I’m committed to making this a first-rate presidential library. I will be involved. I will be engaged, even though I live in California and Colorado. Whatever you need, I will be available to be called upon.” And just the ideas that he threw out. One thing, I think President Ford was always underestimated for his intellect in terms of creative ideas and looking to the future, not looking to the past. That always struck me. So, it was very cordial.

Smith: Did he explain why this institution, uniquely, was in two cities?

Wilson: No, he wasn’t defensive about it at all. He said, “I really feel strongly that Grand Rapids is my home and that’s where the museum portion should be.” And, of course, at this point, the library’s already been built and the museum was nearing completion. So, I’m coming in not to design or plan the building. I’m coming in to be the first director. So, it was a case of not really having to explain all that much. It wasn’t an issue in those days. It became an issue after.

Smith: Won’t it be ironic if the system evolves to the point where foundations build museums and the archival portions are in D.C.

Wilson: Are centralized.

Smith: Yeah.

Wilson: Yeah, and I wouldn’t be surprised if that isn’t the model. In fact, with the new law or requirement, I think they’re driving it to that. Or the endowment requirement that’s 60% now. Incredible. I mean, we struggled with the 20%, [at the George H.W. Bush Library] really negotiated very hard.

Smith: One of the things, of course, about that time in his life and thereafter, he took a lot of heat for ‘commercializing’ the former presidency. And I don’t know if he ever talked about that with you. The component that almost got left out was that he had to raise the money to build the museum in particular. And those were dollar amounts that he had never dealt with, certainly in his political career.
Wilson: Absolutely. We had examples of pledges being made on the back of golf score cards. He worked very hard at it and I think this was like many presidents, you’ve got to put them in the context of their times. This was not an unusual thing. He was a fairly young man when he left office.

Smith: Without money.

Wilson: Without money. Never had an opportunity to make any money. Certainly didn’t have a big campaign chest to carry into a retirement package. So, I never felt he was that defensive about it and I never challenged him about it either. I thought he always handled it very appropriately from my perspective as library director at the time. So, at any rate, they did offer me the position and I came away very convinced that this would be a good, fresh opportunity.

Smith: Were you more impressed with him than you expected to be?

Wilson: Yes. That was my first meeting with him and that respect and that admiration continued to grow the more I dealt with him. A remarkable man in many ways.

Smith: What do you think the public didn’t know?

Wilson: The public didn’t know that this man had a great mind and steel trap memory. I loved to tell the story about my third year there. We were going over the budget for the next year and I proposed this budget and made some alterations and he said, “Don, two years ago, this was the number that you used here and now you’re projecting here.” He said, “That’s fine, but can you give me a little more explanation of it?” You know, I had to fumble through my papers to go back and look at those numbers and review it.

Smith: Was that the old appropriator at work? The Appropriations Committee?

Wilson: I think it was the Armed Services.

Smith: Armed Services?

Wilson: Yeah. I think that he had a way with these numbers and an ability to recall. The other remarkable thing about him in my tenure with him was that he really was reluctant to look back. He was always wanting to look forward. And I can recall specifically one time I mentioned that we ought to do a conference, a symposium, on the 25th Amendment and succession. And he looked at me a minute and he said, “Don, good idea, but wait until I’m gone. We don’t need to do that while I’m living.”

Smith: Really?

Wilson: He said, “I want to look at current events. I want to look at how we can impact current activities in the political scene.” And that’s where I think you had the evolution of the Jimmy & Jerry Show.

Smith: Did that begin during your tenure?

Wilson: Yes.

Smith: I shouldn’t editorialize – I think one of the things that is left out contextually, for example, of Tom DeFrank’s book and some of the interviews that were done at the time of his passing - it’s easy to go back to 1980 and find all kinds of things he said in public. But the fact is, over a period of time, that changed. One of the things they had in common was that Ronald Reagan ran against both of them.

Wilson: I think that’s right, but I think more than that, Richard, the former presidency is a small select fraternity and they share so many experiences. One of the most poignant times that I had at the library, was the first time President Carter came to the library to do this joint program with President Ford. And, he took him through the museum and they went into the Oval Office area. I was taking them through, guided them into the room and they were chatting away and all of a sudden, there was this silence. To me, it seemed like ten minutes, but I’m sure it was about two minutes. Neither one said a thing. Neither man said a word to each other, just looked at the Oval Office. And I looked back and there were tears in both of their eyes. It was so moving to me and I didn’t say anything. I just walked out and we went on with the tour. So, I just felt like that was a bonding moment.
Smith: It’s a great story. In advance of that, was there any trepidation? I don’t mean on his part, but maybe on yours?

Wilson: Yeah, mine. Sure.

Smith: How was this going to go?

Wilson: How was this going to go? And, even after - I think I’m editorializing a little bit – I was a little bit shocked at Carter’s presentation at the University of Michigan when he was alluding to the fact that Ford and he could solve the Mid East problems. I think the bond there was the fact that they were closer on foreign policy, that there wasn’t a lot of distance there. They could agree on a lot of the things and a lot of the domestic [differences] had taken a back seat by then with the Reagan era. So, I don’t think there was any kind of tug of war there philosophically. They were both looking kind of outward and into the future. But I’m still amazed at the personality difference and how well they got along, because, in my opinion, President Ford had no ego and President Carter does.

Smith: That’s an interesting observation. In another way, they had a lot of shared values. I mean, in some ways, a small town in Georgia and West Michigan are not as far removed as might appear.

Wilson: I think Grand Rapids is a little different than Plains, but yeah, the rural values. And I think you had this Dutch Reform kind of reserve and this Southern Baptist kind of religious parallels there. Because both were fairly conservative religious values.

Smith: Yes.

Wilson: And I think that probably played into it a little bit as well, but it was a true friendship and one that maintained itself over the years. Not with some of the other former presidents. Not in the same way.

Smith: Clearly, Jimmy Carter has always been a party of one, and I’m sure there were other former presidents who scratched their heads and wondered, “How can Jerry Ford have this—?”
Wilson: Yeah, I worked for a couple of them. But I think this was an amazing ability of President Ford’s and I think a lot of it had to do with the fact that he never displayed any ego. I mean, I’m amazed to this day that Henry Kissinger and President Ford were such great friends and it was a mutual admiration. It wasn’t just friendship, it was a mutual admiration. There are not many people who can say that about Henry Kissinger.

Smith: As you say this, it occurs to me that there’s ego and then there’s a particular kind of self-confidence which is sufficiently confident in itself it doesn’t require the trappings of ego.

Wilson: No, and he was very comfortable with himself. And I think he was comfortable with this and I think that was never more apparent than in the ability for him to pardon Richard Nixon. He took such heat over that and such vilification out there, particularly in the media. That brings to mind another story; one of the poignant moments of my career there. That was when Fred Friendly was visiting. Fred Friendly, of course, the president of CBS News, had started this series on the Constitution and we were there to do a program on the Constitution. I was taking him through the museum and we came on the Nixon pardon letter which was on display there. And, again, we had this moment of silence and thoughtfulness as he stared at that letter. And Fred turned to me and said, “Don, you know, I thought he was dead wrong.” This was thirteen years after the event. He said, “Now, I know he was right.” And I thought that coming from the top of [a major] news media - that showed me how much self-confidence he had to have in himself to make that decision.

Smith: Time was good to Gerald Ford. I mean, he could’ve been self-confident as anyone, but it still had to have been a source of considerable gratification to know that over time people had moved in his direction.

Wilson: And I think you and I both agree, Richard, that it really came forth at his funerals.

Smith: And before that the Profiles in Courage Award, which caps the whole story.
Wilson: I couldn’t agree more. He was a person I’ve always admired tremendously. Now, his involvement as the library went on through the formative years I arrived there, to the day the museum was dedicated - we set it up and I had to make the two work, the going back and forth. And I can’t tell you how many trips I made back and forth.

Smith: Did you come to have second thoughts, not about the job, but about the physical arrangement?

Wilson: I had second thoughts about the distances, yeah. It was hard to administer a library and museum 120 miles apart. Some of that was the fact that, as we entered, we left the golden age of presidential libraries for the austere age. There was not a lot of staff. You had to have people you could really depend on in both places to carry out the kind of programming you wanted to see done. I felt my first obligation - my first duty - was to incorporate the library into the University of Michigan and I think we did that pretty successfully. We had a lot of help from faculty and we had a lot of help from the administration. [President] Shapiro was excellent and others. But, again, we were almost separated from the university by being on the North Campus, so the partnership with the Bentley Library became more and more important as we went through that era. Of course, that eventually paid great dividends for me when Bob Warner became the archivist of the United States. He was the former director of the Bentley Library.

Smith: Was there ever consideration given to actually having the library incorporated in the university library system, in effect, turning out the federal NARA oversight? Was that envisioned as a down the road possibility?

Wilson: No, never in my tenure there and I was there ’81 to ’87. In ’85, I of course moved to Grand Rapids because we lost the museum curator - director and I felt the library was in solid hands and the museum needed to be incorporated more with all the things that were going on in Grand Rapids at the time of the new museum and Amway and Grand Valley State moving down. There was a lot of hands-on needed, so I spent the last two years over there. There again, it was a lot of back and forth and it never failed that the weather changed at Lansing. When it was summer, it started raining. If it was winter, it started hailing, sleet or snowing. So it was always a challenge.

Smith: He really thought of Ann Arbor as a second home, didn’t he?

Wilson: Yes.

Smith: I mean, the university had a much larger place in his heart than mere nostalgia.

Wilson: Right. And I think that showed with the fact that he agreed to help with the capital campaign for the university, which didn’t help the library a lot. It kind of hurt the library, in fact, but he felt so strongly about his experience at the University of Michigan. Interestingly, you didn’t get that same feeling of Yale. I mean, he was proud of Yale and proud to be a graduate of Yale, but it was the undergraduate years at Ann Arbor that I think made the indelible impression on his life and went with him all his life.

Smith: I only heard speak disparagingly of two people.

Wilson: I bet I can guess one.

Smith: One was Gordon Liddy and the other was John Dean.

Wilson: No, I didn’t guess it. I had another one.

Smith: What was your experience?

Wilson: Mine was with Secretary Schlesinger.

Smith: Ah, yes. Was it just chemistry?

Wilson: Chemistry, because there was never anybody I suggested for a program or suggested to bring to speak or anything else except Secretary Schlesinger [where he objected]. And I think it was that they just clashed. I don’t know what it was.

Smith: We’ve talked to a number of people who suggested that the polite word is ‘professorial.’ Another word is ‘condescending.’
Wilson: Yeah, and it surprises me a little bit because you had a lot of other people around him who could be a lot more professorial than that. And, it was interesting because there was never anybody in Congress that he ever [spoke about negatively to me].

Smith: Maybe it wasn’t simply that Ford thought he was being condescended to. But having spent as many years as he did on the Armed Services Committee, he particularly resented being condescended to on a subject that he knew.

Wilson: Yes, I think that’s probably right. I never met the man. Obviously, he never participated in any of the library events.

Smith: We’re trying to get him to sit down for an interview.

Wilson: It’d be interesting. I think there’s probably an untold story there that may go back to the congressional days a little bit. I don’t know.

Smith: When I said my sense is that he hated to fire people, Henry told us, “Not Schlesinger. He didn’t hate firing Schlesinger.”

Wilson: Rocky relationship. But that’s the only one that I ever [heard] of the cabinet, of the congressional - I guess I never had a really good conversation with him on Dean or the other one.

Smith: His relationship with the university - while you were there he agreed to be a part of this big fundraising effort?

Wilson: Yes, and that caused some controversy. I guess more internally than externally.

Smith: Internal in the university?

Wilson: No, more I think—

Smith: In the Foundation?

Wilson: In the Foundation. Yeah. I mean, there were some raised eyebrows. Nobody would ever come out and verbally criticize, but there was a “I wish he hadn’t have done that,” “That’s too bad because that really makes it more difficult for us.”

Smith: He was a true fiscal conservative.

Wilson: Yes. Yes, he was involved in every discussion of endowments, every discussion of finances. And as I told the story about the budget, I mean, I would sit down with him every year and we’d go through the budget item by item. I didn’t work with many people like that, although, I’ve got to say George H. W. Bush was a little bit that way.

Smith: Really?

Wilson: Yeah, very detailed oriented.

Smith: Probably none of them at the beginning can imagine over time that the endowment needs to grow to the point that they have, what with Washington cutting back. And if you want to do any kind of substantial programming, you’ve got to turn to the Foundation.

Wilson: Yes. As long as I was on that Foundation side of it, I fought that tooth and nail. I thought there were some areas where that was legitimate. But I thought and still believe there are core issues at a presidential library that the government is responsible for - for the Archives to be maintaining. That’s why they’re created. If not, then they need to change the mission and focus. As you say, there may be that coming down the pike - where their whole concept [of Presidential Libraries] has changed.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Mrs. Ford?

Wilson: Some. It was limited and it was interesting because, in those years right after the presidency, I think there was a clear understanding [between them] that the clinic was hers, the library was his. And he was very respectful of that and she would come to events. She would come and participate, but she never was, I felt, that involved. I don’t know what your experience was, but I never got her. Now, Susan was and Michael was. Mike I had most of the contact with, I think, in terms of the family. And, of course, his [the President’s stepbrother was quite involved because he lived there. Other than that, the family didn’t participate to a great extent. But she was certainly very gracious and accommodating whenever she was on site. She would make appearances and do certain things but you could always tell there’s that line that, “Okay, now I want you to do this over here and of course I’ll help you with that.” Never involved in active fundraising. She would be a hostess at some of the events, but she never really participated in some of the programs.

Smith: The gravesite was always part of the plan. Any references to planning?

Wilson: Oh yes. Yeah, I’ve served several presidents, former presidents, and, you know, we would have at least once a year a meeting on the funeral arrangements. What they wanted to do with the gravesite or how it was to be set up. Now, we were always very circumspect in those early years, where a lot of people didn’t know what it was out there. We didn’t really advertise it as the future gravesite or anything else. But certainly with the Army, we had to review plans, we had to do that and he would participate, and it didn’t bother him.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Wilson: I really didn’t ever experience it myself.

Smith: Heard about it?

Wilson: I heard about it and I saw where I could see it, but always it was very business-like when I was with him. I mean, I was never in a situation where I saw that. He would express disgust or he would express, “Well, that’s not the way I want to see it” or something like that. But it was never what I’d call a temper at all. Not like LBJ’s legendary temper.

Smith: Sense of humor?

Wilson: Good sense of humor and a lot of people underappreciated that. A droll sense of humor. And he would love to tell stories every once in awhile and he’d sit in his office down there and he’d get in there and tell stories. And, particularly, around his confidants, Rumsfeld, Cheney. He always kided.
You know, we even had a conference on humor in the presidency and he loved that.

Smith: And Chevy Chase showed up.

Wilson: And Chevy Chase showed up, yes. He could laugh at himself. He really could. There again, he was comfortable with himself. There was not the ego factor. And he and Chevy Chase became very close. I mean, certainly during the events, there was a good camaraderie there and there was a good sort of feeling.

Smith: He must’ve been very proud of that place.

Wilson: Yes. And I think particularly the museum. It was a beautiful setting on the river.

Smith: Contributing to the revitalization of Grand Rapids.

Wilson: And I think that was important to him, that he saw this as a way that helped revitalize the downtown part of Grand Rapids and give back a little to the community. Now, at the University of Michigan, it’s a lovely building, but it could be any university building. I mean, it’s special inside and it’s a kind of special place, but it’s not unique like the one in Grand Rapids. And the Grand Rapids building is a beautiful building and a beautiful setting and certainly is a key component to the downtown area of the city.

Smith: Now, you became Archivist [at the U.S.] from the Ford Library?

Wilson: Yes.

Smith: How did that happen? Was he involved?

Wilson: It was a lot easier becoming director of the Ford Library and Museum than becoming Archivist, as you recall. There were a couple of false starts. John Agresto was - my nomination was announced—

Smith: By President Reagan?

Wilson: Well, no, by the Detroit Free Press.
Smith: Okay.

Wilson: And that day was turned around by Don Regan and John Agresto was named. It turns out it was a battle between the California Reagan group and the White House Reagan group. And I was the candidate of the California Reagan group.

Smith: Even though you were at the Ford Library.

Wilson: Even though I was at the Ford Library, which is another story I’ll tell in a minute. This was, remember, late in his second administration. This was the only agency created by Ronald Reagan during the eight years of the Reagan administration. The only federal agency created. It was a very small agency. The only significance to the close associates of Ronald Reagan was the fact they wanted to get this legislation for a presidential library through Congress without any controversy. To do that, they felt they had to have a professional historian and not a political appointee at the National Archives, who was responsible for certifying the recommendation for the legislation. So, particularly, Ed Meese and, to a certain extent, [Mike] Deaver and some others, but probably Ed Meese and even the Hoover Institute people, were kind of pushing me. Because, you know, there weren’t that many academics out there that had the credentials that would be acceptable to the historical community, or the archival experience to be acceptable to the historical community, that could be nominated. Because this was the first nominee as a new agency out from under GSA - as an independent agency and presidential appointment. The Senate wanted to set a term of ten years. The House wouldn’t do that, so it became serving at the pleasure of the president. But it should be a professional appointment, that would not change with the change of administrations. Kind of a judgeship, if you would. So, I was the trial balloon. Anyway, when Agresto was named ahead of me, I mean, I’m sitting out here in Grand Rapids and, “Fine.” I think I have the best job in the world anyway, so it’s not a heartbreaker to me.

Smith: And who was John Agresto?
Wilson: John Agresto was Bill Bennett’s deputy at NEH. He was Bennett’s candidate and Don Regan’s candidate. At any rate, I said, “Fine” and thought it was over. Well, Senator Mathias and some others became concerned. They were captured by the historical associations and the Society of American Archivists and others and put a hold on the nomination. So, he never got the hearing stage and after a year, when Don Regan left the White House, Senator Baker came in. This was becoming an embarrassment. Here’s the library legislation that needed to go up and we don’t have anybody there to handle it. So I guess because I was the number two - at any rate, that’s how it came about a year later. My name went forward and I think it had a lot to do with Senator Baker calling President Ford and saying, “What about Wilson?”

Smith: Did you have a chance to review the transcripts?

Wilson: I can remember when I went to ask President Ford, I said, “I’ve been asked if I would accept a nomination to be Archivist of the United States.” And he chewed on his pipe and he looked at me and said, “Don, you’d be a great archivist. I’d hate to lose you. Now, my only question to you is, do you want to get in bed with those bastards?” Which tells volumes, but I’m not sure it’s time to tell that yet.

Smith: But it does say a lot because, by now time’s gone on.

Wilson: This is ’87, this is ten, fifteen years.

Smith: I’ve always wondered whether one of the contributing factors was that he and Mrs. Ford were politically marooned long before the end of their lives. And part of it was the party went over here, and he stayed where he was. My sense was he evolved on an issue by issue basis and I assume she had something to do with it. I assume having children and then grandchildren had something to do with it. But I’ve always wondered if the first necessary element was carried over resentment against what he used to call the ‘hard right’. Not in a purely personal way, but in a philosophical sense.

Wilson: But I think he was much more of a moderate Republican and one that we’ve seemed to have lost in the ensuing years. I think H. W. Bush came out of that same school of thought and evolved. In certain issues he was over on far more of a conservative side, and on other issues, he was not. And he would bend with the needs of the country as would President Ford. What I called a pragmatic politician. And I think we’ve lost a lot of pragmatic politicians in the current environment. I think you have a position here, you have a position here, and there’s no movement or tendency to gravitate to another position based on the needs of the time.

Smith: Did you ever see him together with Tip O’Neill?

Wilson: Yes. And I got to know Tip O’Neill better under President Bush. He was friends with all of them and they all admired him and he was to me the epitome of the pragmatic politician. I think they learned from him. I really do. I think President Ford took a lot of lessons from him and I know President Bush took a lot of lessons from Tip O’Neill.

Smith: That’s interesting. So, when you got the job, how was that in terms of the relationship with President Ford. Did he, in fact, accept it?

Wilson: Oh, yes, and we worked together in terms of coming up with the new director. That’s when I recommended Frank Mackaman and they went through the whole process. I think it was a good arrangement for the time being, but I think he wanted to take the library beyond what Frank’s capacity was to do that. And that’s not saying anything negative about Frank, but he just came out of the Everett Dirksen [Senate] and I think he never mentally left the Everett Dirksen Center concept and was trying to apply a lot more of that to the Ford Library than probably was going to be acceptable to the Foundation or President Ford in the long-term. I think in the short-term it was fine and a comfortable relationship. But I think in the long-term, they wanted to be more dynamic and that’s when it went to you.

Smith: I have to tell you, I didn’t have quite the friendly reaction from some Reagan folks at that point.

Wilson: And in terms of transition, no, I would go to the meetings, annual meetings, as archivist and it was very friendly. And I was on a pretty close basis with the Ford Foundation members as well and the family. But I think, Richard, what you brought up is a very important point in that through my seven years there, six and a half or seven years, it was always a business-like relationship. I mean, certainly friendly and certainly supportive. He never questioned, second-guessed, or challenged anything I recommended. I mean, it was a very comfortable working relationship and I could’ve spent my twenty years there very easily and probably some days thought I should’ve. But, at the same time, there was not a day to day interaction or even phone calls. It was always if I needed him, I usually went through Bob Barrett or a channel to get to him and he would respond. But it wasn’t what I’d call an intimate working relationship that I had later on with H. W. [Bush]. But that’s different personalities and that was a lot of different views. But certainly he ranks up there as one of the most respected men in my life, and influences in my life, because I just admired him so greatly.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of reaction at the time of his death?

Wilson: Yes. I was surprised and gratified because I thought he deserved every bit of it and should’ve received a lot of the recognition long before. But it was surprising.

Smith: Because he’d been out of the public eye for awhile.

Wilson: He had been. He was a remarkable man athletically. I mean, I would see him with his knees almost as big around as his calves before he had his knee replacements, and he was in pain for a lot of those times, but would never show it and just kept going. I mean, he was like the Energizer bunny. Tremendous energy.

Smith: It’s odd. I’ll never forget at the last service, when I did the final eulogy - the thing I remember is Rosalyn Carter weeping. And I thought, “Who would’ve thought thirty years ago that this is how the story ends.”

Wilson: It’s a great tribute to him.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?
Wilson: I think he should be remembered as a man of great courage. A man of strong leadership skills. I think he was without doubt the right man at the right time as he put it in his own words to ‘heal this nation’. It had to be a horrific period for him to go through and it took a man of great courage and stamina to do that. I believe that the nation finally came to appreciate that during that time. He was a devoted civil servant. He spent twenty-five years giving. As he said, he wasn’t going to run again before he became vice president. He said “I’m going to be a lobbyist and make some money. I have a family that deserves that” and for years he traveled [for the Republican Party]. He did all the party activities that needed to be done. I just think it kind of epitomizes the public servant that you’d like to think represented us in Congress.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Wilson: I’m trying to remember when the last time I saw him. The last time I saw him was at the dedication of the George Bush Presidential Library in ’97. That was it. And we had a very nice reunion and I took him through and we had a great time. It was a good experience.

Smith: And he got along well with his fellow members of the ex-presidents club.

Wilson: He really did. I think more than any of them, he was the cement.

Smith: Facilitator?

Wilson: He was the glue that held them all together. Although, you’ve seen what’s envolved with H.W. and Clinton and that’s genuine. That’s not put on. Again, I’ll tell you a funny story, because right after the event, as I took the former presidents through on the tour and the President said, “Don, you take them through,” and he’d hang back with Scowcroft and Powell and so I’m taking them through and afterwards, he said - Bill Clinton, who was President Clinton at the time - it was a great museum. I’m really pleased. And President Bush looks over at him and says, “Bill, when you get ready to build yours, this is your man. Here’s the man who fired me, basically, as Archivist. He said, “Here’s your man.”
Smith: I’m sure it was nothing personal.

Wilson: No, he knew what he was doing. So that afternoon after the event, after we were wrapping up, I said, “Mr. President, I really appreciate your sentiment there, but I don’t think Bill Clinton is going to ask me to do anything with his library since I was fired on his watch, basically.” I was urged to resign. And he just laughed. He knew exactly [what he had done]. It was his sense of humor.

Smith: It wasn’t as if Clinton had a candidate to replace you, as we know.

Wilson: As we know, that was not the case. And I don’t think it was Bill Clinton, in all honesty. This was Senator Glenn’s staff that was bound and determined to get me out of there.

Smith: Do you worry about the future of the presidential libraries?

Wilson: I do. I’m concerned. And I’m concerned because I think it’s a great institution that has served the public extremely well in educating what you like to call a ‘civic minded’ public that’s not getting that education in the classroom. And, that’s much of what I’m trying to do now in my ‘retirement years’ - trying to pass on a civic legacy that really is underappreciated these days in my estimation. And I worry about the future of our country if we don’t understand our history better and if we don’t understand what these leaders were doing within the context of their times. You’ve got to know the context of their times to know how great as leaders they were. And, to do that in a Smithsonian-type setting is just not going to cut it. So, I worry that because of any short-sightedness on the part of Congress that they worry about - which is not even one weapon in this modern warfare annual budget - to not maintain these cultural institutions is a disaster in the making.

Smith: Perfect!

Smith: First of all, thanks so much for doing this. You have a unique position in the Ford story because you’re one of a dwindling band who can talk with authority about Ford’s years in Congress, and indeed, were instrumental in his becoming Minority Leader.

You came in in ’62...

Rumsfeld: Right. I worked in the House of Representatives from 1957 to 1960. One of the Congressmen I worked for was Bob Griffin of Michigan. So there was an earlier connection.

Smith: So you had contact with Ford earlier.

Rumsfeld: Slightly. Gerald Ford was way up there and I was staff assistant to a couple of Republican Congressmen. I did, however, have an interesting connection though to Congressman Ford; one of the pilots with me in the Navy, Jim Dean, who was shot down by the Chinese, was from Grand Rapids. His wife went to Representative Ford when I was working on the Hill and came to see me. So I had an awareness of Gerald Ford back then. Some years later, 1974, Henry Kissinger and I were going into the Peoples’ Republic of China after we left Vladivostok, where President Ford had met with General Secretary Brezhnev. I was going through some papers and there was my friend Jim Dean’s name. Kissinger had been asked by the government to raise the question as to whether Dean’s body was found or whether he was in prison and if so, if they would release him.

Smith: You were part of a pretty impressive group of Young Turks, who arrived on the Hill in ’60, ’62, ’64, many of whom went on to great things in the party and nationally. Tell us about those people. You had people like John Lindsay and Charlie Goodell and, of course, Mel Laird had been there a bit by then. Bob Dole came on in ’64.
Rumsfeld: No, Dole came in ’60. He was two years before me.

Smith: ’60 – okay.

Rumsfeld: Our offices were next to each other.

Smith: Were they really?

Rumsfeld: We’d walk back and forth to votes when they’d ring the bells.

Smith: Is it safe to say he was more of a rock-ribbed conservative in those days?

Rumsfeld: Dole was a reasonable conservative. He had a wonderful sense of humor that never really showed in his presidential campaign. The American people never really got to know him, I don’t think. Candidate Dole for President was a different Dole than I knew as my friend next door when we were in Congress.

Smith: The point is, the Republican Party, and for that matter the Democratic Party, fifty years ago, unlike today, each party had a left and a right wing. There are obviously different portions, but the Republican Party in the early ’60s – the center of gravity was in the Midwest. You were just beginning to make some inroads in the South.

Rumsfeld: And the ’64 election, when we lost so many people in the North, and we picked up four or five seats in Alabama and several other places. I think one in Mississippi.

Smith: How difficult was Goldwater in your district to sell?

Rumsfeld: Difficult. My district was heavily Jewish. It was in the northern part of Chicago: Rogers Park, Evanston, Wilmette, Glencoe and Skokie, where the Nazis used to demonstrate against the Jewish community. Barry Goldwater, despite his name, was a concern to the Jewish community in the United States. A wonderful man, personally. I enjoyed working with Barry Goldwater. I supported him. Of course, when it was over, I won, but not by a lot and we ended up with only 140 Republican members in the House of Representatives in January, 1965, after that election. And there were so many Democrats, as I recall, some of them had to sit on our side of the aisle in the House. It was a reverse landslide from a Republican perspective.
Smith: So, you were thinking about making some changes in terms of the leadership?

Rumsfeld: Well, it actually started before then. Bob Griffin came to me after I’d been elected in 1962, even before I’d even been sworn in, and told me there was going to be a Republican caucus. He said “We’re going to run my friend Jerry Ford for GOP Conference Chairman against Charles Hoeven of Iowa.” He asked me to help round up votes for Ford among freshmen Congressmen. So I became a rabble rousing bomb thrower before I was even sworn in. I went out and tried to recruit, and did, recruit some votes for Gerald Ford. Of course, it did not make my delegation chairman very happy – Les Arends, who was the number two under Charles Halleck, Hoeven being number three after Arends in the Republican leadership hierarchy.

Smith: How do you win a race like that?

Rumsfeld: Those leadership races are tough; they all know each other well. I was the vote counter for Ford. Goodell, Griffin, and I were organizing for Ford. I kept the vote count on members of the House – the 140 Republicans. I either had them recorded as being for Ford, leaning Ford, unknown, undecided, leaning Halleck, or for Halleck. We checked the members regularly. I gave the report I kept to the Ford Library. Have you ever seen this document? It’s in my handwriting. It’s interesting. In fact, I had the book copies. I sent Ford the original.

Rumsfeld: It went to the Ford Library, because President Ford asked me repeatedly for it. It shows our conclusion as 40 each member.

Smith: And did people lie?

Rumsfeld: Oh, my goodness – yes! And of course, we triangulated, we’d have three or four different people check on each one of them to find out where they were.

Smith: What do you promise?

Rumsfeld: I think we were in the committee room – a big room. Back in those days they had kind of a condescending attitude about women members of Congress, so they had three women Representatives be the vote counters. The three female members of Congress sat at the front with the ballot box. Every member walked up and dropped his or her vote in. There were 140 Republican members elected. As I recall there were 139 in attendance, but when they counted, there were 141 votes. Not a good thing. It was awkward. They had to have a complete new vote and very carefully watch as people were putting their ballots in the box.

Smith: No hanging chads.

Rumsfeld: That’s right. Ford was elected by a one, two or three vote margin. Very close.

Smith: Why?

Rumsfeld: Why? Because when you suffer a defeat like that in ’64...First, a lot of people don’t want to serve if it is that one-sided. If you are in a very small minority, you don’t have much voice; your votes don’t make much difference. The goal was to try to put in office somebody who would be comfortable and hospitable to Republican members offering constructive alternative proposals that would be generally incorporated in motions to recommit, to give Republicans an opportunity to put forward Republican positions. And the feeling was that the Halleck hierarchy was not interested in that. Charlie was a decent man. He was intelligent and had been effective in his own way. But, the Congress had Everett Dirksen, the senior member of the Illinois delegation in the Senate, and Halleck in the House. They had the Dirksen-Halleck press conferences every week. We thought that Gerald Ford would present a face for the Republican Party that would give us a better chance of increasing our numbers. Why be in Congress unless you are striving to be the majority party? Why would you not want to accomplish that? We felt we would have a much better chance with Gerald Ford.

Smith: It has been suggested to us by more than one individual that at least a subliminal factor was, Dirksen was a kind of guy who almost got along too well with LBJ. That Dirksen from time to time was perceived to perhaps be in the president’s pocket – or at least a little bit too friendly, or too willing to make concessions.

Rumsfeld: I’ve heard that. He was a master legislator. He even managed to help me get a bill passed in the overwhelming Democratic Congress. It was legislation to celebrate Youth Christian Temperance Week. I had the Women’s Christian Temperance Union in my district and they wanted to have this done. I put in the legislation and Everett Dirksen was the only Republican who was chairman of a Senate committee when they were in the minority. Every other committee except for the one that decided what would be celebrated in our country. He was a master. His saying was, “The oil can is mightier than the sword.”

Smith: Woodrow Wilson had a wonderful expression. He found it very annoying, that there was Better Homes Week and Gardens Weeks, and Be Kind to Your Animal Week, and Wilson suggested they ought to pass a Mind Your Own Business Week.

What was it about Ford that inspired – because I assume this was not an ideological contest, per se – more generational?

Rumsfeld: It was clearly generational, and presentational. But Gerald Ford was the member we could find who we believed could win, who had the chance of beating Congressman Halleck.

Smith: Were there others? For example, over the years it has been suggested Mel Laird might have seen himself as a candidate.

Rumsfeld: No. Mel ran for conference chairman to replace Ford, and, as I recall, defeated Peter Frelinghuysen for conference chairman when Jerry Ford gave up the conference chairmanship to run for minority leader. Everyone liked Ford. He was respected. He was a serious person. He didn’t spend a lot of time on the floor of the House of Representatives and we had some trouble because some members didn’t know him. He’d been around a while, but he spent a lot of his time on the Appropriations Committee and the Defense Appropriations Committee particularly.

Smith: And I assume those feelings basically existed on the other side of aisle, as well, toward Ford?

Rumsfeld: Sure.

Smith: I mean, friendship, respect.
Rumsfeld: Yes. Of course, it was a different time. I had as many friends on the other side of the aisle as I did on the Republican side. We all did. I’d go down and play paddle ball with Tiger Teague of Texas and Albert Thomas of Texas and John Dingle of Michigan, all Democrats.

Smith: It’s interesting to hear Alan Greenspan talk about some of the factors that led to the change. He said one of them, he thinks, is the jet plane. Because now members from the West Coast, instead of bringing their families to live in D.C. – that’s something that you hear over and over again – that, in fact, families were brought to the District.

Rumsfeld: And much less so now. You try to have a gathering for an evening celebration for some purpose and to include members of the House or Senate on a Thursday or Friday or Saturday or Sunday, you don’t get anybody. They’re not here, the overwhelming majority. Unless they live in Virginia or Maryland, they’re not here. That’s one thing. The jet aircraft.

Another thing, I think, is the gerrymandering that has been developed to a fine art in our country. Today there are relatively few Congressional districts that are considered contestable. The threats that members feel tend to be in the Democratic Party from the left, and in the Republican Party the threat comes from the right. That tends to polarize the situation, and you don’t have this pressure, or natural political process that led people to work things out in the middle and to try to fashion compromises that would make sense for the country. So you end up electing people who tend to be most representative of their political party as opposed to their district. That’s, I think, maybe as or even possibly more important than the jet aircraft.

Smith: One senses that for Ford, pragmatism was not a dirty word. Consensus was not surrender. That at the end of the day, and I’ve heard him say this countless times - at the end of the day, people sent you here to get things done. And you worked as hard as you could to advocate your position, but you were willing to cut a deal most of the time. And that does seem to be largely absent today.

Rumsfeld: There is certainly much less of it today.

Smith: The amount of time you spend raising money clearly is different from…
Rumsfeld: Oh my goodness, I should have added that. These members, they have to raise millions of dollars now. And every day, or so, they have to dedicate a portion of their day to raising money. I never had to do that. You only run every other year, but these people are campaigning twenty-four months in every term. It is a different environment. And, of course, Congressman Ford developed very close friendships with people like George Mahon. When people criticized George Mahon, who Jerry Ford sat next to hour after hour on the Appropriations Sub-committee, Ford was uncomfortable. He didn’t like it.

Smith: There are wonderful stories. He and Hale Boggs would debate each other at the National Press Club and they would ride down together, decide on the way, “What are we going to debate today?” They’d have their debate, and then they’d go and have lunch and go back to the Hill.

Rumsfeld: Hugh Scott and I co-chaired the Republican Truth Squad in the 1968 election. Hubert Humphrey was running against Richard Nixon. We had a plane and followed Hubert Humphrey everywhere he went. He would make a statement and then he would get ready to go to his airplane, but he’d always stop by and say hello. We had nice visits, and then we’d have a press conference and we’d beat up on Humphrey. But it was always in a gentlemanly, but substantive way – where we would disagree with each other, but we were not disagreeable.

Smith: I think two weeks before the ’76 election, President Ford visited Humphrey in the hospital and was told, “You’re going to get some votes out of the Humphrey household.”

Rumsfeld: Is that right?

Smith: Yes.

Rumsfeld: He was a wonderful man, Hubert Humphrey. He was a happy warrior. He really was. He had an excellent sense of humor.
Smith: What was the emerging Republican position, if there was such a thing, on Vietnam during the mid to latter part of the pre-Nixon presidency? How did you grapple with that?

Rumsfeld: In the House?

Smith: In the House.

Rumsfeld: It was ambivalence and a mixed feeling. It was a feeling that the Tonkin Gulf Resolution that President Johnson carried around in his pocket and waved under people’s noses as having given him the authority to do that which he was doing, was a stretch. It was a feeling that he was unfair in the 1964 campaign against Goldwater. He had the ad where a little girl was picking petals off the daisy with a mushroom cloud behind her, implying that there would be a nuclear holocaust if Barry Goldwater were elected. Those of us on the Republican side felt that was unfair, and over the edge. I don’t remember the precise words, and I don’t want to be unfair, but he clearly left the impression that if he were elected, he would not increase the troops in Vietnam and that Barry Goldwater, if he were elected, would.

I remember going over to Cam Ranh Bay, as a member of Government Operations Sub-committee on military operations, and talking to the people who were building this port in Cam Ranh Bay. We asked them, “What’s the port going to accommodate?” They said, “It will accommodate 500,000 U.S. troops in Vietnam.” And there was Johnson saying just the opposite. I don’t know what we had then, I think we had less than a hundred thousand troops there in that election period.

The feeling was that President Johnson was not being straightforward with the American people, and that is something that many were uncomfortable with. I was uncomfortable. We did not want to be unsupportive of our country or the men and women serving over there, and for the most part we were supportive. But there was clearly discomfort with the president.

Smith: Do you have a sense of what his relationship with Ford was?
Rumsfeld: No. Except that he made some quite negative, derogatory remarks about Gerald Ford playing football without a helmet, and that type of thing.

Smith: What about Ford’s intelligence?

Rumsfeld: Well, that is interesting. I’m seventy-six years old now, so I’ve lived a long time and most, if not all, of the Republican presidents in my adult lifetime have been criticized as being not very swift. Think of Dwight Eisenhower – I don’t know how people got away with it, but they complained about his syntax and played too much golf, and wasn’t a clever Eastern elite. Here’s a man – think what Eisenhower did for this country. Ronald Reagan, Gerald Ford, they made fun of him not being smart. Gerald Ford went to University of Michigan and Yale law school and was an accomplished, knowledgeable person about the things that he paid attention to – like the budget. He probably knew more about the federal budget than any president in the history of the country.

Smith: Do you think there is a bias, a cultural bias – sometimes when I was in Michigan, I came to the conclusion that people make the mistake of thinking that because some people, say in Michigan, talk slow, they think slow. That there is that – some of it is Eastern elitism – no doubt about it.

Rumsfeld: Of course. I’m from the Midwest, so I would not think that way.

Smith: No, I’m saying outsiders looking at Midwesterners.

Rumsfeld: Yes, I hear what you’re saying. But think of Ronald Reagan. His letters came out and people saw in his hand writing what a fine, thoughtful, insightful person he was. It was Clark Clifford who called Reagan an amiable dunce. And George W. Bush went to Yale and then to Harvard Business School – obviously an intelligent person.

Smith: We now know that Reagan made a career out of being underestimated. I’m wondering if there was anything of that in Ford as well.

Rumsfeld: No. He was straightforward. There wasn’t guile there. He was what he was. He was a wonderful human being.
Smith: Did it hurt him – the Chevy Chase and all of this? It’s one thing to have a thick hide, but did you sense that it hurt him?

Rumsfeld: Sure it hurt him. I was with him in Salzburg when he got to the top of the stairway in the rain, going down from the airplane, going to see President Sadat of Egypt. Always a gentleman, the President took Betty by the arm. Then an Air Force sergeant handed him an umbrella. He ended up going down a long slippery set of stairs, holding onto an umbrella and Betty instead of the rail. And here is this man who is a graceful athlete - I played tennis with him, I skied with him, I knew his capabilities. He didn’t get mad at me, as chief of staff of the White House. He didn’t get mad at the Air Force sergeant. When we got to the house and went inside he said “Rummy, I am so mad at myself.” That was typical of Jerry Ford. He didn’t take it out on others. He knew it would be the dominant story of his meeting with Sadat.

Smith: In fact, I think Kennerly tells the story because he was there. Needless to say, a number of people pointed a finger at the photographers and the president said, “Well, of course they took the picture. If they hadn’t, they would have lost their jobs.”

Rumsfeld: Exactly.

Smith: Can you imagine Lyndon Johnson reacting in that way? He always wanted to be Speaker of the House.

Rumsfeld: Yes, he said that and it made sense for a person who had served there that long. On the other hand, I don’t think he thought twice about accepting the vice presidency. His horizon, until he was asked to be vice president, was to be Speaker of the House. Fair enough. When he was asked to be vice president, he didn’t say no, I want to be Speaker of the House. He said yes.

Smith: Can you think of a moment, post Watergate break in, obviously, pre-August 8th, when you concluded, if you did, the Nixon presidency was unlikely to survive?

Rumsfeld: Oh, I know precisely when it was. I was living in Belgium. I was U.S. Ambassador to NATO. I didn’t understand French or Flemish, and therefore the local television went over my head, and papers in English arrived late. I was off with my family somewhere and my wife got a Herald Tribune, and started reading it. She didn’t want to read it in the car because our children were there and we had a young son, and he’d met President Nixon, and she didn’t want to stir up the youngsters. She said to me, “You’ve got to stop and read this.” I said, “Fine, in a while,” and we kept driving. We were heading towards the house of the Belgium Ambassador to NATO, Andre de Staercke, in the South of France. Finally we stopped. I read the paper and I knew. It was before any announcement had been made. I think it was the day before Nixon resigned. That night the paper indicated to the country he was going to resign the next day and that Vice President Ford would become president the next day at noon.

Smith: So the smoking gun tape had been released.

Rumsfeld: Apparently. I missed those tapes and hearings being overseas. I didn’t follow much of it.

Smith: One of the things we found in doing these interviews, is how many roads lead back to Fred Buzhardt. Mel Laird told us, because he’d been Buzhardt’s counsel at the Pentagon. And when Laird came back in the Nixon White House.

Rumsfeld: Buzhardt had been Laird’s counsel.

Smith: Yeah. But when Laird came back into the Nixon White House, somewhat reluctantly, he hadn’t been there a month when Buzhardt saw him and said to him, “I’ve been listening to these tapes. The president is into it up to his neck.”

Rumsfeld: Is that right?

Smith: And then we asked Al Haig, because I’ve always assumed Haig listened to some of the tapes. I’ve assumed that Haig listened to the smoking gun tape. Haig said no. He said, “Fred Buzhardt gave me some expert advice. He said don’t ever get caught alone in a room with a tape.” Haig insists that the initiative, “on the pardon,” that Haig’s document with all of the options, was something drafted, not at his instigation, and he claimed not at the president’s instigation, but something that Fred Buzhardt on his own crafted…

Rumsfeld: Interesting. See, I missed that whole chapter of our history.

Smith: You were summoned back, when?

Rumsfeld: I was. Well, I read the paper and then we drove to Ambassador de Staercke’s house, who was the dean of the North Atlantic Council. My secretary had called and said that Vice President Ford’s office called and wants you to return to Washington, D.C. fast. So now, it would have been probably five or six o’clock at night, European time. So I had my office at NATO in Belgium make arrangements for me to fly back. They ended up sending a military plane to the Nice airport early the next morning which took me to London. Then I took a commercial flight to Dulles and landed at 1:05 PM, one hour after Ford had become president. I was met by someone from Ford’s office with an envelope and a note saying I was to be chairman of this transition team - Ford’s transition to the presidency.

Smith: Let me go back with one question. Given your long standing and very close relationship, during Ford’s brief vice presidency, those eight or nine months, did you ever have a discussion with him about the possibility of his becoming president?

Rumsfeld: No, not that I recall. It was such a wild thought that a president of the United States would resign. It had never happened. I would go back to the U.S. every six weeks or so from Belgium to work with Secretary Schlesinger and Secretary Kissinger and occasionally see Vice President Ford, see people on the Hill and figure out what I needed to do at NATO to fit in with U.S. policy. Occasionally, I’d go see Howard Baker, who was a good friend, or Bryce Harlow. They were the two people I might touch base with.

Smith: The Wise Man.

Rumsfeld: Yes. Occasionally, I remember seeing George Schultz, who was a very close friend. I remember being with him one night and Clark McGregor was there. We were having a dinner with Milton Friedman who was a friend. Every time the subject came up you could see it progressing from not much to something, and then to something quite significant. But I don’t remember ever discussing it with Vice President Ford. I can remember distinctly talking to Bryce Harlow and Howard Baker.

Smith: So you came back on the 9th – did you see the president on the 9th?

Rumsfeld: I did. I was ushered into the White House and told that he wanted me to manage his transition to the presidency. He told me who would be the participants. They were, as I recall, Bill Scranton, who served in the House with President Ford. Rogers Morton, who served with both of us in the House. Jack Marsh, who also served with both of us in the House, and who had served on Ford’s vice presidential staff, and whose office had been just down the hall from me. He was a Democrat – dear friend, and fine man. President Ford asked me to get going.

Smith: Let me ask you because there is this extraordinary scene when the swearing in took place – Leon Parma was one of the people who was sort of shoehorned into the room with some of the Congressional folks and he noticed, he told us, and other people have confirmed it – once the ceremony ended, there was a receiving line and then there was a reception in the state dining room. And he said you could watch the Nixon people just peel away and go back to their offices.

Rumsfeld: Interesting.

Smith: And it raises the larger question of how you were going to integrate the existing White House staff with whatever newcomers there were going to be. One senses that the president wanted to be fair to people who shouldn’t be tarred indiscriminately with the brush of Watergate. And yet, there was political pressure to make changes.

Rumsfeld: He felt strongly, that he did not want people to be unfairly treated, or to be rushed out under a cloud or a taint or an impression of possible wrongdoing. It was a very complex, multidimensional set of problems he faced. The whole time there was a special prosecutor that was active. He had a large staff and was busy trying to find out who’d done something wrong. Everyone in the place, including the vice president, who’d been selected by Richard Nixon, and the vice president’s staff, and the White House staff, all had been there. And the question was, as Howard Baker said, “What did they know? And when did they know it?” And nobody knew for sure.

By then, of course, Erlichman, Haldeman, Colson, and Mitchell were gone. It was a tainted White House. It was a discredited White House and the Gerald Ford was suddenly the president, but the tainted White House was still there and he was sitting on top of it. He felt, and I think rightly, like he had stepped into a flying airplane and he didn’t know the crew. The ones he knew he liked, he’d been around them in the House. He had no inclination to think badly of people, generally. And he felt a dilemma. He felt the need for continuity and reassurance in the country, so he took a series of steps that emphasized his clear desire to reassure the world and reassure the country.

And he felt, at least a lot of people were telling him he should feel, a need for change. So continuity and change were tugging him in different directions, and that he needed to reassure the country, but also a need to undertake the kinds of changes that would move the White House, the presidency – the institution – from an illegitimate, tainted on, to a legitimate, untainted presidency. If he did not make sufficient changes that people could see and feel, it hurt him and, in my view, it also hurt the people who stayed because there was still a cloud. They were still in a tainted White House and the only thing to make it and everyone still there untainted would be to have sufficient change for the people to see it as a Ford Presidency, and I felt, he had to do it soon, and do it decisively. I’m not talking about fifty percent, or anything like that, but to do it in a way that no one who left would be seen as leaving because he or she had done something wrong but leaving because we had a new president and he wanted a new team.

He needed to bring in his own team. But, for whatever reason, Jerry Ford being Jerry Ford, tilted way over to continuity as opposed to change, and did not make the kind of changes he needed to make to reassure the country that he was presiding over a legitimate Ford presidency, not a continuation of a Nixon-Ford presidency. He was sworn in and said he was going to keep Henry Kissinger. Henry is an enormous talent, but the way it was done was almost a sign of weakness to do it before he was ever sworn in as president. He announced he was going to keep Al Haig before I was back in the country.

As a result he had the two most visible symbols of the Nixon administration since Erlichman and Haldeman had gone, as Ford’s first two decisions. Then he announced he was going to keep the Nixon Cabinet. He did a series of things favoring continuity instead of change that I think were quite harmful to him. Our transition team tried to urge him to recognize that he needed to get better balance between continuity and change. Bill Simon, as I recall, came in and recommended that the whole Nixon Cabinet resign as a way of ensuring nobody went out under a cloud, so there would be a new president and a new team, and they could be off running on the country’s business.

But President Ford wouldn’t do it. He had an open door policy. A staff member could walk in, someone the president had known for ten years, and say “I don’t want to leave right now. I’d like to stay for three months, but I’ve got to leave after that.” As a result there was no impression of change. It was unfortunate.

Smith: And that doesn’t even begin – it hints of this spokes of the wheel concept.

Rumsfeld: I haven’t gotten to that. He announced that.

Smith: There is this notion that it took him most of his presidency to outgrow the Congressional mindset.

Rumsfeld: Yes.

Smith: Which has many admirable things. The personal qualities that people were drawn to, that they found trustworthy is a wonderful story. The first day they had left the house in Alexandria and were finally moving into the White House. And the president’s first day on the job, he walks up to the West Wing, to the door, and there’s a Marine there standing, saluting and opening the door. The president walks over and sticks out his hand and says, “Hi, I’m Jerry Ford, I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?”

Rumsfeld: Yes.
Smith: Now, that’s Congressional, in some ways. But that’s also Gerald Ford, I guess.

Rumsfeld: It was.

Smith: But, we’ve been told, for example, that when you were invited to come in and sort of put things in order, that one condition of that was that the spokes of the wheel were going to be replaced.

Rumsfeld: Oh, I had to. It was a terrible concept. I knew it wouldn’t work. It worked fine for a minority leader. It works fine running a Congressional office.

Smith: And basically, what was it?

Rumsfeld: It was the theory that he would have the Cabinet and the senior staff all have an open door policy, and be able to come in individually and deal with him directly as he did as minority leader. So in walks some cabinet officer and says to the President, with no one else in the room, “I’m thinking about endorsing this piece of legislation,” And Ford would say, “that sounds fine to me,” and the Secretary would go off and do that. And then a month later I find out about it or the general counsel finds out about it, then the decision gets considered within the White House staff and they find out there are many reasons why he can’t do that, but he’s already done it. Then when the President finds he needs to reverse the decision the Secretary feels he has to resign, because he had the rug pulled out from under him. The president said he could do it, and it was embarrassing, when the decision had to be revoked because it hadn’t been properly staffed out beforehand.

The President became a better executive every day he was there. And by the time he left office he was a very good executive. But he had begun by announcing he was going to be the anti-Nixon. He was not going to have a Haldeman or an Erlichman. He was not going to have the palace guard.

Smith: Which appeared to be change.

Rumsfeld: Yes. He had appeared to have all spokes of the wheel approach him, where the spokes all come to him. I said to him, “Well, that’s just fine. You know what happens in the center where all the spokes come in? The grease gets overheated and has to be changed. If you have someone doing it for you, that’s one thing, you can change him. If it’s you, you can’t change yourself and it’s just going to burn you up.” I told him it wouldn’t work. So I went back to Belgium.

When my father died, and I came back for the funeral, President Ford asked me to come to the White House and talk. He said, “I’ve got to change Haig.” The hostility between Ford’s vice presidential staff and Haig were a serious problem. I wasn’t in the country, so I didn’t know. But he said, I’ve got to change Haig. You’ve got to do it.” I told him I wouldn’t think of doing it with anything approximating spokes of the wheel arrangement. There’s no way for it to be successful. He said he’d get off it but he needed a little time to turn it around.

Smith: So he was willing to, even at that point, sort of acknowledge mistakes?

Rumsfeld: Exactly.

Smith: And move on.

Rumsfeld: Yes.

Smith: What was it about Bob Hartmann that was so polarizing? Because, clearly he and Haig were put on the planet to annoy each other. That’s putting it mildly.

Rumsfeld: Yes.

Smith: If you hear Haig today, he’s still hot under the collar.

Rumsfeld: Well, you know, no one likes to have people leaking things to the press and damaging you in those jobs. Those jobs are tough enough, but if you have insiders working against you, they are impossible.

Smith: And was that perception, at least, there?

Rumsfeld: That was the perception. I wasn’t around during that period. But that is what Al felt, and I think that’s what probably the president felt. He felt it was volatile. He couldn’t have it like it was.
Smith: In retrospect it’s so easy to say this, but it’s not dissimilar to the selection of Nelson Rockefeller. If you thought for five minutes, of the temperament of these people. Al Haig couldn’t stay. For Al Haig’s sake, he couldn’t stay. And certainly for Gerald Ford’s sake, which is not to minimize the heroic service that Al Haig rendered during those critical days.

Rumsfeld: He did a terrific job for the country. Oh my goodness, yes.

Smith: And likewise, Rockefeller was never cut out to be number two. He should not have been told that, “You’re going to have domestic policy,” that you’re going to be the domestic Henry Kissinger, which I think, in part was, because Kissinger wanted to make sure he wasn’t poaching on his terrain. And Rockefeller wasn’t totally honest with himself as to why it took it. Someone close to him tried to talk him out of it. Because I think he asked for a day or so to think it over and he called this person, very close advisor, who went over all the reasons why it would be a disaster…

Smith: And Rockefeller acceded to all these, and then at the end he said, “But, Bill, you don’t understand. This is my last chance.” And when you get down to all that was said and done, that’s why he took it.

Rumsfeld: Well, it was a shame for the president to pick somebody and then not be able to nominate him a year later because the convention wouldn’t accept him.

Smith: You know, Rockefeller went to his grave believing that you were responsible.

Rumsfeld: I know, but he was paranoid about things like that. He imagined things. I had nothing to do with it. Absolutely nothing. The president didn’t tell me who he was going to decide to select, but it became very clear that he couldn’t get Rockefeller nominated.

Smith: Plus, I’m also told from some people in this project and in my other research, you recall at one point, I guess fairly early in ’75, the announcement was made that there was going to be at least a halt in new domestic programs. In a sense, get the country…

Smith: Yeah, and of course, Rockefeller was taken aback. And at least one person said one contributing factor to that was, every Thursday at their lunch, Rockefeller would come in with a new program, usually with a large price tag attached.

Rumsfeld: But as you point out, Rockefeller was not designed to be a vice president. He’d been governor of New York. He was a Rockefeller. He was used to having people work for him. He was used to paying people to work for him. And he was used to getting his way. And if he didn’t get his way, he didn’t like the people who had disagreed with him. I don’t think he was used to having people disagree with him.

Smith: Did he get personal in that sense?

Rumsfeld: Oh, yes, very.

Smith: By the way, I don’t think he aged well. There are lots of folks who say that Rockefeller in the mid Seventies, was not the Rockefeller of the Sixties.

Rumsfeld: I didn’t know him then. I knew David Rockefeller and liked him. I knew Laurance and served on a board with him and liked him. But I never did know Nelson until he became Vice President. But I started out trying to figure out a way to be helpful to him and to try to how to make it work. It is a tough job being vice president. It takes a certain acceptance that you’re vice president and not president. I’m told by Lou Cannon that his staff would be dumbfounded at his inflated idea that he was really going to be the president for domestic and non-national security affairs. And he would say this. And they would shake their heads and think, no way. There can only be one President.

Smith: And the irony is, someone who had spent as much time in D.C. as Nelson had – he’d worked with presidents, he’d been in the White House, he knew how it worked.

Rumsfeld: He didn’t. He had no idea how the modern White House worked. He didn’t. He went and told people that I had designed the spokes of the wheel arrangement that Gerald Ford had adopted.
Smith: Really?

Rumsfeld: Yes, he didn’t understand anything about what was going on. And it was too bad. He was tough on people.

Smith: For example, any idea, I assume, has to be staffed out.

Rumsfeld: If you want to protect the president and have a coherent administration, ideas need to be staffed out.

Smith: And was that a source of controversy?

Rumsfeld: Oh, my Lord, sure. He walked in to see the president. Apparently the president, of course, was not a seasoned executive at that time, and I wasn’t in the room. I said fine, they could meet, I don’t need to be in their meetings and I felt it would be good for them to have that relationship. But the problem was he would either suggest to the president that he ought to have an energy proposal…

Smith: The Energy Independence Corporation.

Rumsfeld: Or, the president said to him, “Why don’t you tell me what you think about energy.” And Rockefeller would go off and come back in with a package that was his energy proposal.

Smith: A hundred billion dollars.

Rumsfeld: A hundred billion dollars. He showed it to the president. The president says, “Gee, Nelson, thanks, that’s nice.” And I come into the office half an hour later. Ford gives it to me. I said, “What do you want me to do with it?” He said, “Well, let’s staff it out.” So I staff it out. Well, my goodness, you’d think I’d committed a crime. Nelson Rockefeller said, “If you staff that out, you’re sandbagging me. I’ve already staffed it out. The staff’s already for it.” So I started checking with people around the White House to see if they were for it and, of course, I don’t think any of them had told Nelson directly they were against it. Because no one told Nelson they were against something of his, they just didn’t do it or they would be bullied and punished. Except me.

Smith: Why?
Donald Rumsfeld  March 31, 2009

Rumsfeld: They were afraid of him. He hires peoples and he dispenses largesse. He’s Vice President of the United States. And he talks right over you. He was animated, energetic, enthusiastic and forceful.

Smith: He was an intimidating guy.

Rumsfeld: He was. And people were intimidated. So the president said, “Well, I think he’s talked to these folks,” So I’d check with those folks and they’d say, “We think it’s a terrible idea. It’s going to sink out of sight like an anchor up on Capitol Hill.” And I’d finally go back and tell the president the truth and the president would say “Well, here’s where we are. I’m going to have to send it up to Congress.” It was more his relationship with Nelson at that point even though he knew it was not going to pass. And Nelson was out to the press saying I was sandbagging him. So I said, “Mr. President you do what you have to do, but you’re going to look silly sending this thing up there because nothing is going to happen. It’s going to just die.” And it did. And it should have.

Smith: Brent Scowcroft tells the story about how you could say no, very politely, and he would come back over and over.

And Brent liked him. He found him kind of a character, but he got this idea - because he was paranoid about a number of things. He was convinced that Bill Colby, for example, was a Soviet agent.

Rumsfeld: Yes.

Smith: When the Metro was being dug, he came up with this idea that if they just created a spur, it would be secret, no one would know about it, under the White House. Brent sort of listened to him, and humored him. And he explained very gently why that was probably impractical, why you probably couldn’t keep that a secret. Rockefeller kept coming back.

Rumsfeld: Well, you know, he probably knew that when they built the pyramids, they’d kill everyone who did the construction and knew the secrets.

Smith: Were you late in awakening either to the likelihood that Reagan would run, or the formidable candidacy that he would wage?
Rumsfeld: First of all, I, for whatever reason, I suppose because I’d been ambassador to NATO, and I was sitting in on the NSC meetings at the president’s request, I did not pay close attention to the political side. Dick Cheney did. And he was good at it, he understood it, and he liked it. But, no, my interaction with the president was that he was concerned about that, and asked me to go over and I think, suggest to President Reagan - I met with him in the Madison Hotel, inviting him to become secretary of commerce. Ford had meetings with him from time to time. No, the president was clearly concerned about it, and sensitive to it, and I’m sure his political people were, as well.

Smith: The whole Alexander Solzhenitsyn flap – it’s still confusing, but apparently at some point the president evidently did, in fact, invite him?

Rumsfeld: I think I was out of the city or someplace. I was not engaged with it. I believe Dick Cheney was, I recall the NSC advised that Ford not meet with him. It was probably because of their interaction with the Soviets at the time, on détente, and whatever else they were dealing with. And so, a regret went out. It obviously ignited a firestorm. I believe he was speaking to a labor union group or getting an award. The next thing you know, the people in the White House start trying to overcome the National Security Council’s recommendation that the president not meet with Solzhenitsyn. I wasn’t in any of these meetings that I recall, but at some point the president or Dick Cheney or somebody in the White House, invited Solzhenitsyn in, I think, and he declined.

Smith: Yeah, I think that’s it.

Rumsfeld: Does that sound about right?

Smith: The whole relationship between the president and Secretary Schlesinger, was that just bad chemistry? It’s been suggested that Gerald Ford knew a lot about defense. He’d spent many years immersing himself in the subject, and perhaps there is a certain professorial quality, about the secretary and it just didn’t quite mesh.

Rumsfeld: Yes. He never told me, he, being the president. He never told me precisely what his problem was. But if the two key players on the National Security Council, after the president, are the secretary of state and the secretary of defense. It was clear that President Ford had a very close relationship with Henry Kissinger. He developed an excellent working relationship with him.

Henry had two positions. He had the National Security Council staff and he had the secretary of state’s staff. So, of the three players, Henry was two of them. So Henry, as the National Security half, would decide who would go to meetings. And I would attend frequently at the President’s request. I don’t know whether it was the president or Henry decided they wanted to have a separate meeting on a subject that clearly deserved something that would be engaged by the Department of Defense with statutory responsibility. It could have been the president because he wasn’t comfortable with Jim, or it could have been Henry because he wanted to further his positions and could do so much more easily in a limited audience. I don’t know the answer to that question.

All I know is, that when I would go in and try to get Jim into the meetings and see that the Department of Defense was represented, that the president was stiff about it, often.

Smith: I assume that was very unusual.

Rumsfeld: It was, but he (Ford) simply didn’t enjoy being with Jim. And I don’t know what caused it, whether it was something that had happened between the two of them when he was in the Congress, or when he was vice president. But the only time I saw a real spike in Gerald Ford on the subject was when – well, a couple of times. One time was when apparently Jim Schlesinger made some remarks about George Mahon, Gerald Ford’s friend. And he (Ford) had a minimum of high regard for that. There was also a situation that came up, I think, during the Mayaguez – no it was maybe during the…

Smith: The fall of Saigon?

Rumsfeld: Maybe the fall of Saigon, when he felt Jim was responsible – I did not think Jim was responsible for whatever went wrong – I’ve forgotten what the detail was. But there was some miscommunication, and I felt it was not Jim’s fault, but the president took it to be Jim’s fault. That was the only other time I ever heard any specifics. But it had to be something deeper than that; that had happened.

Smith: You know what is interesting – the fact he didn’t tell you the source of the problem, because there is something I noticed in the later years – but I’ve asked some other people who tend to confirm this: lots of politicians love to gossip, and my sense was he actively discouraged it, didn’t engage in it.

Rumsfeld: Correct.

Smith: Would change the subject politely if it came up.

Rumsfeld: That’s right.

Smith: And, indeed, Bob Barrett said, “None of us will ever know what things he took with him to the grave.”

Rumsfeld: Yes, that’s true. But, it was too bad because Jim is, of course, a talented guy and a valuable contributor in government, and could have benefited the administration, had he been able to play a traditional role in the NSC process.

Smith: Let me go back, because when you came back - were you in town at the time of the pardon?

Rumsfeld: No, I was back in Belgium.

Smith: You were? It will come as no surprise to you that Mel Laird thinks he could have solved that, too. Mel’s got a plan for everything. And his plan was, he told Jerry, “Don’t do this, don’t rush into this…”

Rumsfeld: So he knew? Mel did?

Smith: Like the day before.

Rumsfeld: Is that right?

Smith: Yes. And Laird’s plan was, he was going to get together a bipartisan delegation from both Houses. They were going to go to the White House and they were going to ask the president to do this. The problem with that is, unless you put yourself inside that supercharged atmosphere, it seems to me, I don’t know how any trial balloon could have survived. I mean, I don’t know how the president could have “prepared” the country for the pardon, because the first sign that it was coming, there would have been the uproar that, in fact, ensued. Was there an alternative?

Rumsfeld: I don’t have any idea.

Smith: Did you ever discuss it with him?

Rumsfeld: No, no, no. It was all done. It was history by the time I came back. My view of it is that Mel might be right. That it is conceivable that if – you’re right, it would leak – but we know it was a terribly damaging thing to him the way he did it. So let’s just accept that.

Smith: Right.

Rumsfeld: Now, let’s muse as to what might have happened. Is it conceivable that he could have gone to the special prosecutor and acclimated him to the idea? Is it conceivable he could have talked to some members of the Supreme Court? Is it conceivable he could have talked to the Democratic leadership, and let it leak? And let it go out there. He hadn’t done it, therefore, you’re not going to have the firestorm and the volcanic eruption that occurred and the resignation of your press secretary, who you’d appointed five minutes earlier.

His staff – he didn’t have anyone on his staff who could support him on it because he didn’t tell anyone on his staff, except for three or four people, as I understand it. Benton Becker and I don’t know about Bob – probably Bob Hartmann, he probably wrote something. You’re saying Mel, I didn’t know, but he told relatively few people. And since we know that the way it was done turned out to be quite damaging to the president, one has to at least be willing to explore the possibility that there might have been a way – it may have taken longer, it may have been harder on Richard Nixon, which he did not want to be hard on Richard Nixon.

He issued instructions to his staff – he didn’t want people saying negative things about Richard Nixon. He wanted to treat him in a dignified, respectful way. He felt he’d been a colleague and someone he’d worked with and he didn’t want to see him badly treated by his administration. And letting it get out for a week or two or three or four, would have been very uncomfortable for Richard Nixon.

Smith: The irony, of course is, if he had waited a couple of months, when Nixon was at death’s door, maybe there would have been a different climate.

Rumsfeld: Conceivably.

Smith: Needless to say, he was advised not to visit Nixon in the hospital.

Rumsfeld: By me.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Rumsfeld: He wanted to call him from time to time. He wanted to visit him, he had a very admirable, human, desire to not see a person he considered a friend, down, hurt, wounded. And I said, “I agree. That’s nice. And I don’t disagree with your natural human emotions, but the fact of the matter is, you’ve got to become President of the United States on your own feet, standing on your own ground, and not have this be seen as the Nixon-Ford administration. Or you’re not going to be a successful president and that’s not good for the country, and you’ve got a higher purpose. And you can do it without in any way being negative or harmful to the former president. But he did things which caused great damage to himself, great damage to his administration, great damage to the people associated with him. That has taken this ship of state off course, and it’s your job to put it back on course. And to the extent you diminish your ability to do that, you’re harming him, and you’re harming yourself, and you’re harming the country.”

Smith: Is that part of the process of learning to be president? In other words, the difference between a Congressman who could act on your own, sort of heartfelt instincts, and a president who, in some ways, has to be ruthless?

Rumsfeld: Not ruthless. He has to recognize what the priorities have to be for the country.
Smith: It’s an indulgence for him to go visit a friend, if it results in the consequences that you described?

Rumsfeld: In that case, yes, if it diminishes your ability to govern, at a time that you have to be able to govern.

Smith: Had he heard from the family? What was the sort of mechanism by which he learned that Nixon was in bad shape?

Rumsfeld: I don’t remember. I know that there were constant phone calls. The whole staff was Nixon staff. The relationships between Ron Zeigler and the people that had transferred out to San Clemente with President Nixon were all friends of ours and friends of the people in the White House, and so it was constantly coming in. And there were request after request after request, one type of thing and another.

But, I mean, the same thing happened with Tip O’Neill. Tip O’Neill, a good guy, a friend of mine, a friend of the president’s. He liked him. I walked into the Oval Office one day and the president said, “Here, Rummy, I’m going to go to Tip O’Neill’s birthday party on Thursday.” And I said, “Fine, I’ll staff it out and figure out how we do that.” So, the next day I come back in and I said to the president, “I’m awful sorry to tell you this, but you’re not going to be able to go to that party. That party is being paid for by some folks you do not want to go to a party paid for by them.” And, “Damn it, Rummy, I’m going to go! Tip’s my friend, I’m going to go!” I said, “That’s just fine, but you’re not going to go to the party. You are the President of the United States. This thing is being paid for, it’s fine for Tip to do it, he’s a politician, he’s a local politician and he can do what he wants. But you cannot go to that party, given the fact that this party is being paid for by people who you do not want to be associated with, and we will not let you be associated with. If you want to go to that party, you’re going to have to walk up there, but I’m damned if I’m going to let you go to that party.”

And he just was determined to go to that party. He just – Tip’s his friend – and he’s darn well going to go. He didn’t go.

Smith: Tell us about his stubbornness.
Rumsfeld: Oh, it’s kind of appealing. He’d get a little red dot on his cheek, and he was stubborn. Oh, the worst example of stubborn was the Max Frankel question in the debate, where he just would not, could not, back off and accept – I mean, here’s Scowcroft – I wasn’t there – but Scowcroft and Cheney are just looking him in the eye and saying, Holy Mackerel. And Frankel looked him in the eye and said, “You’re not really saying this, are you?”

Smith: He gave him a chance to back off the limb.

Rumsfeld: He gave him a fair chance, you bet. And instead, he grabbed the nettle and beat him with it. “You bet your life I think they’re not subjugated,” or whatever he said.

Smith: And then it took days to get him to…

Rumsfeld: Oh days, days. And finally he heaved a pencil at the door, and Cheney said or Scowcroft said, somebody, that he heaved the pencil and then laughed, and said, “Alright, we’ll clean it up.” It was too bad, but that’s a perfect example. I guess we’re all like that in one way or another. We get something in our mind. I was stunned to listen to it again the other day for some reason – the Max Frankel question. I forget why. And it was so clear, and he gave such a chance, and then the comments he made the second time around were just so far off base.

Smith: And all he had to do was say, “I’ve been to Poland. I looked into their eyes. They don’t think they’re dominated by the Soviet Union.”

Rumsfeld: Yes, but I know why he said what he said, because all of the Congressmen from ethnic districts like I was and he was, every year on Captive Nations Weeks, we’d get up there and say, “We do not concede that the Poles are permanently subjugated…” He just kept leaving out the word permanently. He had it in his mind. I’ve said all those things, but I always knew they were subjugated, but I never conceded that they were permanently subjugated and that we would throw them up to the Soviets for the rest of their histories.

Smith: The fall of Saigon. It will come as no surprise that Mel has some history about that, too. Mel loved Ford, but he still, to some degree, blames him. Mel believes that it would have been possible, in the spring of 1975, to have persuaded Congress to appropriate several hundred million dollars for the South Vietnamese.

Rumsfeld: Boy, he sure wanted to – President Ford. He didn’t persuade them, and they didn’t do it.

Smith: But not for lack of effort on the president’s part.

Rumsfeld: I can’t say that, I wasn’t involved in it that much, but I know that the president wanted to, and he went up and asked. And I think there were those who suggested he not ask because he would be defeated. And he said, no, we want to do that, and I think he did go up and make the request. Is that right?

Smith: I think it is right.

Rumsfeld: I think so, isn’t it?

Smith: And he certainly was outspoken himself, sort of denouncing the Congress for not doing it.

Rumsfeld: I think the funds that he asked for were not funds to continue, they were funds to be used to assist the people who were helpful to us while we were there, and were kind of a closeout fund. I don’t know what Mel’s position that he thought he could get the funds and win the war.

Smith: I think he thought, even at that point, that somehow the fall of Saigon could have been avoided militarily. You are right, that after the fall Congress pulled the plug and wants to forget that we were ever there. That, I think, is my candidate for Ford’s finest hour - when the president reminds the country that we have a tradition of providing asylum to victims of oppression, and he puts together this crazy quilt coalition – you’ve got the American Jewish Congress, and George Meany, and I think some state governors. Anyway, they campaigned and, in effect, shamed the Congress into restoring funds to bring out a substantial number of Vietnamese.

Rumsfeld: Yes.
Smith: I take it there was a debate inside the White House – there was the famous speech at Tulane where the president, in effect, says, “The war is over,” and the kids, of course, all go wild. And there apparently had been a real back and forth. Kissinger didn’t want him to say that and Hartmann wanted him to say that, and, it was being played out on that level. At what point did it become clear to you that this was, at this point, a rescue operation, or likely to be? How rapidly did this situation develop?

Rumsfeld: Once the signal is out, that it looks like it might be the end, it becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy, and you kind of hit a slope and then it accelerates and compounds. And people behave rationally, fearfully. In the case of people who are helpful to us, they’d fear what’s going to happen to them. In the case of people who are against us, they behave rationally, and they seek opportunities to have it be a disaster and accelerate. It was a terribly sad time for any American to see the people being pulled off the top of the building by helicopters. It was heartbreaking.

Smith: What was it like for him?

Rumsfeld: Oh, it had to be just heartbreaking.

Smith: Were you going through daily meetings and everything?

Rumsfeld: Oh, my goodness, several meetings a day. Yeah. And then there was confusion at the end. As you may recall, where it was announced that the Americans were all out, and I got a call or somebody did from Schlesinger saying that they weren’t out. We still had some X number of Marines who were the ones on the ground guarding the embassy to keep it from getting ripped apart and people trying to pull themselves into the last helicopter. And finally the president agreed that we should go down and say they’re not all out, in case something happened to those folks. But it was a terribly tough time for me and I know for him. And I think for everybody.

Smith: Few presidents have ever walked into the Oval Office with as much hanging over their heads, including things not of their own making. He had to clean up Watergate, restore trust that had been shattered, he had an economy that was going into the dumper, and…
Rumsfeld: Right now, you read the papers today and they frequently refer to the ’74-’75 economic situation. In the papers about what’s going on now, it was a tough economic time.

Smith: Plus you have this whipsaw, because apparently, at first, inflation was defined as the enemy. And then almost overnight, it turned out well, no, recession is looming.

Rumsfeld: Stagflation.

Smith: How would you describe his command of economics?

Rumsfeld: He was comfortable meeting with the economists. I’d been deeply involved in it in the Nixon administration when I was director of the Economic Stabilization Program, and so, I was close to Alan Greenspan and all of the economic people that he would be dealing with, and therefore, in some of those meetings, and [he] was comfortable with them. He had dealt with them before and knew some of them.

He had Bill Seidman as his economic advisor, and of course, Bill Simon was secretary of treasury and was the principal economic spokesman. We were fortunate that Alan Greenspan had been nominated by Nixon was confirmed after President Ford came in, at our recommendation. I had talked to the president about it and said Alan Greenspan’s nomination was pending as the chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors and we want to encourage the Senate to promote that and put it forward, which they did.

But, it was a funny time. You had these summit meetings that were hastily put together and when the economists get together and agree, watch out. These people came from around the country and the next thing I knew, there was this speech being done by Bob Hartmann and it had not been washed with Greenspan and the other people in the administration. The people in the administration, there was Simon – the people that had statutory responsibility for these areas – it had not been sufficiently washed with them, and the president, unfortunately, was faced finally with this awkward situation of having to deal with a speech that had been written but not staffed out. And it was unfortunate. I, at the last minute, urged him not to do it, not to give that speech.

Smith: Was that the Whip Inflation Now?

Rumsfeld: Yes, and to say that this was so important you were going to take more time and think it through and put it off until we had a package that we could be proud of. Unfortunately, he went ahead and it was almost ridiculed, which is tough. Few things are more harmful than ridicule for a politician.

Smith: I tell you, though, remember the ’75 State of the Union address – he did something no president before or since has done, and probably never will – when he started out by saying, “The state of the Union is not good.”

Rumsfeld: Hartmann wrote some very good speeches with him – the two of them as collaborators. There is no question that the president gave some excellent speeches. And to the extent they were that type – directional as opposed to substantive – Hartmann could do an excellent job with them. They worked well together.

Smith: Was part of the problem simply that Hartmann saw himself, not without reason, as kind of the ultimate loyalist, and it’s a very, very, short step to becoming possessive and to maybe thinking that you’ve got, if not a monopoly, then at least a patent pending on knowing what’s best for the guy you’re so devoted to?

Rumsfeld: Well, I’m no psychiatrist or psychologist, and I don’t venture into those areas really, but, he, with good reason, felt a very strong loyalty to President Ford. He’d worked with him in House, he’d worked with him as vice president. He saw with a good, clear former journalist’s eye, that the staff that existed in the White House was not Ford’s staff, it was Nixon’s staff. And he, as the guardian of the vice president, and the guardian of the new president, distrusted most of the people – not for any good reason, but on principle.

He distrusted them with respect to the extent of their loyalty to Gerald Ford as opposed to their loyalty to Nixon and the Nixon White House. And I think the effect of that on Bob was to cause him to maybe feel kind of like you’ve described, and also maybe to find ways to try to make the president look good at the expense of some people that the president was working with. But it never works that way. It doesn’t make the president look good. It makes it look it’s a disorderly house.

Smith: And the ultimate irony is that that White House was so determined not to have another Haldeman, that Hartmann, in some ways, reproduced a little bit of the Haldeman, for lack of a better word, paranoia about people.

Rumsfeld: See, my impression is a little different. My impression is that Hartmann was the ultimate loyalist to Ford, and Ford tolerated it.

Smith: Yeah.

Rumsfeld: That Haldeman, while he was a loyalist to Nixon, he was doing Nixon’s bidding. And I do not think that Hartmann was doing Ford’s bidding.

Smith: Okay. That’s an important distinction.

Rumsfeld: And I think that is a distinction. And I give Haldeman credit for trying to be true to what his president wanted – not that it was a good thing to want, necessarily.

Smith: The speech process – I’ve talked to a number of people – the whole business surrounding the New York City fiscal crisis, there was clearly a tug of war going on. Ideological and, my sense is, you had Hartmann and Bill Seidman and by implication, the vice president in one camp. And folks like Bill Simon and Alan Greenspan, who wanted to take a much tougher approach toward the city. Now, I’ll preface this; years later Hugh Cary said to me, “You know, Jerry Ford has never gotten the credit he deserved, because in fact, it was his tough love approach that ultimately drove New York to do the very difficult things that it wanted to avoid.” Is that your characterization?

Rumsfeld: I agree.

Smith: But how intense was that debate?

Rumsfeld: Well that article that said “Drop Dead, New York, Gerald Ford,” which he never said, which he never would have thought of saying, was harmful. Now, he didn’t lose New York by much, I don’t think. I’ve forgotten. But it left an impression that wasn’t true to what he’d said.

Smith: But it was the speech that he delivered at the Press Club, over which there had been this, sort of ideological and policy tug of war. Do you recall that?

Rumsfeld: I don’t. I know you’re right – that the vice president wanted New York to receive some largesse and that Bill Simon was very strong on the other side. I don’t remember how others sorted out on it. Do you?

Smith: So then, finally, there comes the shuffle at the end of 1975. I think you indicated you were very reluctant to go to the Pentagon.

Rumsfeld: I was.

Smith: And, presumably, going back on what you said earlier, you really would have preferred, your own part notwithstanding, that this had taken place much earlier.

Rumsfeld: The president should have made the changes he wanted early. And it would have left the impression of a Ford presidency instead of a Nixon-Ford presidency.

Smith: And yet, I think you would concede, in time he put together a stellar Cabinet.

Rumsfeld: A good group. Absolutely. I thought that the timing of it was awkward for the people he was naming. He had a Democratic Congress – they’d have to get confirmed. From my standpoint, I agreed philosophically more with Schlesinger than I did with Henry on détente. And the Strategic Arms (SALT) negotiations. And I told the president, I said, “Look, I’m clearly not going to make recommendations that are going to be notably different from Jim Schlesinger’s. I agree that the budget has to go up. I think he’s done a good job.”

And when I talked to Paul Nitze about it, with the president’s permission, Nitze said, “Look, you don’t have any choice,” and he said, “The president doesn’t have any choice.” I said, “Why?” I said, “He could wait, he could get through this period.” And he said, “No, no, the President of the United States has to have a secretary of defense in whom he has total confidence.” And Nitze was a friend of Jim’s. And he said, “They don’t get along, it’s obvious. And Kissinger and Schlesinger don’t get along.” And he said, “The president has to have someone he has confidence in. It has to be someone who can do the job, and it has to be someone who can get confirmed. Tell me two other people that fit that template.” And, you can’t.

It just happened that I happened to be there and knew the president well from Congress, and had been involved with those issues pretty steadily for a period of years. And liked Henry Kissinger and was perfectly willing to work with him, but to not necessarily agree with him on everything.

Rumsfeld: Sure. He was understandably concerned that it would diminish his ability to conduct the foreign policy of the country on behalf of the president. If you’ve seen us losing something, one post, and that’s why he was adamant that it be Brent Scowcroft who succeed him. And so people would see it as him really still being there.

Smith: It put Scowcroft in a somewhat awkward position.

Rumsfeld: I suppose.

Smith: Or at least potentially. Tell me something, because here it’s almost like you’re riding two horses. You’ve got détente, whether people want to call it détente or not, but you’ve got this pursuit of détente, and at the same time, you’ve got these proxy wars going on, particularly in Africa.

Rumsfeld: Right.

Smith: How do you ride those two horses? How do you have a coherent foreign policy called détente when the Cubans are doing what they are doing and Angola and…

Rumsfeld: It’s hard. I was more in the Reagan side of those issues. I felt the word détente was harmful. Not because it was French, but because it left an impression of a relationship that was admittedly not normal with the Soviet Union, by a darn sight. But acceptable. It was a relaxation of tensions, and you do that with somebody that you find at least moderately acceptable. And here they, the Soviets, were engaged in mischief around the globe, subjugating Eastern Europe, and the Russian Republic. But worse than that, what bothered me, was that I knew that the Soviet Union was investing an enormous fraction of its gross national product in defense, and producing increasing numbers of things – ships, guns, tanks, planes – and that we were doing the opposite. That we’d come down and had been declining in terms of our investment. And that we were still suffering from the denials that occurred during the Vietnam war when the Johnson budget was not increased sufficiently to take up the slack for all the money that was going into Vietnam, as opposed to going into defense investment and capabilities that would enable us to deter and dissuade the Soviet Union from mischief in the world.

And I felt that we had to increase the defense budget, and we had to reverse the trends which I saw as adverse to the United States. Henry felt that it was important that we be able to say, and the president tended to side with him, that we were the strongest nation on the face of the earth, and that enabled us to do more in foreign policy, and it also, with the increasing drum beat coming from the right with Reagan, it was a counter to Reagan.

The truth was, we were in kind of a band of rough equivalence, as Schlesinger characterized it, and I did. But the trend lines were wrong. They were coming up and we were coming down. And while we were in this band of rough equivalence, our circumstance was adverse, and I felt that unless we were willing to face that, we would not be able to persuade the Congress to raise the funds, invest in the funds, appropriate the funds that we would need to avoid sliding into an inferior position. I felt that détente, the concept of détente, took the edge off of the need to invest and reverse those adverse trends.

Rumsfeld: It is. And while you can say that it was a perfectly rational position if we’d been clearly superior, and then when you’re in that position, you can operate and say, “Well, let’s have a relaxation of tension.” We can afford it, and we’ll try to work out things with them. But if you’re sliding down and they’re coming up and you start saying, “Let’s relax tensions,” it’s from a position of relative weakness, and weakness is provocative, and so I was concerned about it. And obviously, it put me in a very difficult - in my confirmation hearing and in my remarks - because Reagan increasingly picked up what I was saying and took it to a position that was adverse to the president, which I didn’t. And it was a complicated time for all of us.

Smith: And in the end, in some ways the president almost backed out of détente.

Rumsfeld: He stopped saying détente completely. And he also agreed to increase the defense budget.

Smith: Now, that’s interesting, because I’ve heard Colin Powell say that a number of weapons systems that came online, that were actually used during the first Gulf War, either were initiated, or preserved in the Ford years

Rumsfeld: Oh, they were. Absolutely. He did a good job. The stealth airplanes were in their early stages. The M1 tank, the main battle tank that was so successful in the Gulf War was something that I approved, with a turbine engine and a 120 mm cannon as opposed to a 105 mm.

Smith: And wasn’t one of the sticking points at Vladivostok…?

Rumsfeld: Cruise missiles.

Smith: Cruise missiles. What was the background?

Rumsfeld: Well, that was an awkward situation for me, also. The cruise missile, I, for several reasons, felt was a very interesting weapons system. You could put a nuclear weapon on it or a conventional weapon. You could launch it from the air, an air launch cruise missile, you could launch it from the ground, a ground launch cruise missile, you could launch it from the sea, and you could launch it from under the sea. So that flexibility was very attractive and they had good precision.

Now, the problem with it was, if you are trying to limit weapons, and you’re in negotiations, that thing that makes the cruise missile so attractive, its versatility, its flexibility – conventional, nuclear, land, sea or air – makes trying to control it almost impossible. So what you have to do is give it all up. So if you were engaging in a negotiation on deployed nuclear weapons, you have to include all cruise missiles because they have the potential to be nuclear weapons. I was unwilling to have cruise missiles barred, and a new weapon is never something that the military is terribly interested in. It’s funny, they like what they have and they want more of them, but there was not a strong basis for it. And the U.S. came close to agreeing to give them up.

Smith: At Vladivostok?

Rumsfeld: Yes, or in negotiations subsequent. I was uncomfortable with that, and President Ford was terrific. He came to see me after he was out of the presidency. I was chief executive of a company in Chicago. He brought me one of his [dog] Liberty’s puppies. He brought me a copy of his book, A Time to Heal. We got in the car and he said, “Rummy, here’s my book. You’re not going to like it.” I said, “Why’s that?” I said, “I bet I do.” He said, “Well, I kind of hold you and Brezhnev responsible for our not getting a SALT deal.” And I looked at him and I said, “Mr. President, I can live with that.” And he laughed. He was such a wonderful, warm person.

I was in that awkward position of representing what I believed to be the situation that was most logical from the Department of Defense, and he, the president, had to make a decision, and he did not feel that he wanted to overrule that, and therefore there was no SALT deal.

Smith: We’re in the home stretch. Were you at the ’76 convention?

Rumsfeld: It’s another one of those Rockefeller myths that I was trying to become vice president that he promoted actively with the press. He was a busy little beaver when he wasn’t working on energy.

Smith: Was he a big leaker?

Rumsfeld: Oh, my goodness gracious! He was. But in any event, I had been told that when I was young, I had tonsillitis, and the therapy of choice in Chicago was to zap you with radiation. And that people who had that ended up getting tumors in their thyroids. I noticed that my thyroid had a tumor, I could see it. So I had voluntary surgery, I think a week before the convention or something like that. I was apparently under consideration for VP, but I purposely decided to have that done then, and I ended up going to the convention, I think, for one day at the request of the president. He wanted his whole Cabinet there, and I went there.

Smith: How did he deal with the Cabinet? Because you’ve obviously seen different presidents, different styles. We’ve been told stories about how he’d have meetings in the Roosevelt Room and have Jim Lynn there and Cabinet officers, who would basically make a pitch for the program, and the president, like Solomon, would decide.

Rumsfeld: Sure he would. Yes. But most Cabinet meetings were in the Cabinet Room, not the Roosevelt Room. But the smaller meetings were sometimes in the Roosevelt Room or in the Oval Office and I’d go in and plead budget needs and meet with him. But he was comfortable dealing with people. An awful lot of the things were budget matters that he dealt with, with people. And generally, you’d try to have the relevant people in the room with you so that things didn’t backwash like they did on the Rockefeller energy program. And you’d have them right there and they could hear the president and see the interaction and hear the arguments. I liked Lynn in meetings when he was running the budget. I liked Henry in meetings when we were discussing something that was of a national security nature.

Smith: Justice Stevens’ nomination, which really stands out thirty years later as almost the last time that a president – I’m not suggesting that he had no concern for his ideological persuasion – but you got a sense that it was his brilliance, his intellect, his raw legal talent, that led to his nomination.

Rumsfeld: I have no recollection of it. Excuse me, do you know when he was nominated – Stevens?

Smith: Unintelligible.

Rumsfeld: When did I become secretary? November or December? November 20th?
Smith: So you would not have been…

Rumsfeld: And when was he nominated – after that? I have no recollection of any discussions about Stevens, but I do know that Ed Levy was the president’s attorney general, and Ed Levy was from Chicago. And, as I recall, Stevens was from Chicago. And my guess is that Ed Levy knew him well and was undoubtedly the principle player, along with Phil Buchen, as to who would make these decisions. And I’m sure the president received a recommendation from Ed Levy.

Smith: He never interviewed him.

Rumsfeld: Is that right?

Smith: He never interviewed him and you know, the Justice told us that in his confirmation hearings, no one asked about abortion. And, of course, this was three years after Roe v Wade, which – it’s a different planet. We’re about out of time. I want to ask you because you had what must have been one of the last meetings with the president. You saw him and you had some very important business to transact. Tell us about that. It was about a month before he died.

Rumsfeld: I’m trying to think. Joyce and I were in Taos, New Mexico with all of our family – children and grandchildren – and I had talked to the president and I don’t remember why, a month or two before. I remember he called me asking me to do a eulogy when he passed away, as I suspect he did to you. But for some reason I talked to him. It may have been about the USS Gerald Ford. But in any event, I was sitting there Thanksgiving and we were in New Mexico, and I said to Joyce, “Let’s fly over and see him.” I think it was the Friday or Saturday of that weekend, and I had some USS Gerald Ford hats and a picture of what the ship might look like, that I’d brought from Washington, and we just flew over and spent half a day with him.

I remember walking in, he was in a chair, one of those chairs that had different angles and reclines and could go kind of sit up. He heard my voice at the door and he yelled, “Rummy!” (loud) like that. And he kept needing someone to lift him and move him in the chair because he couldn’t manage it
- to get comfortable. He was uncomfortable. But he was wonderful. We talked about the USS Monterrey, which he had served on, and the difference between that and the USS Gerald Ford.

Of course, I, when I carrier qualified in the Navy, the carrier I landed on for my first six carrier landings was the USS Monterrey. It was the ship they had at Pensacola for student aviators to land on to qualify to become Naval aviators. But we had a wonderful talk, Joyce and I did, with Betty and the president, and I think Steve was there. We talked about old times and talked about the ship. We talked about his service on the Monterey, and I guess the typhoon that he went through – and had a wonderful time.

Smith: Was there any talk about current events – did he talk about Iraq?

Rumsfeld: No.

Smith: Reminiscing more than…

Rumsfeld: Just reminiscing.

Smith: Did you think it was probably going to be the last time you saw him?

Rumsfeld: You know, it turned out he died a short time thereafter, and I felt so fortunate that we’d gone. He was a dear friend.

Smith: How should he be remembered?

Rumsfeld: Oh, I think probably as an official who served his country in the military and the legislature and in the executive branch with what I think anyone who dealt with him would have to say was a basic human decency, and integrity that is admirable, and not always found in public service. That he was not about Gerald Ford, he was much more about the country, much more about the ideas that he was interested in. That he had a tolerance level for criticism and understood and had a respect for the dynamics of the political process in our country. And was not uncomfortable living with that. It didn’t mean you liked all aspects of it. It didn’t mean you respected all aspects of it, but he was a person who had experienced a great deal, and understood our country and loved it.
I think he’ll be remembered as somebody who came in at just a terribly difficult time and managed to help right the ship of state, and put us on a steady course at a time when we had gone through a wrenching experience of Vietnam, a wrenching experience of Watergate. The first president to have to resign in our history, and I guess maybe the second vice president who had to resign in our history, and he did it with good humor and he did it with courage. And he did it every day that he was there and with an increasingly skillful deft hand.

Smith: Terry O’Donnell said, and it’s apropos of what you said, leading up to this. He said, “Gerald Ford would have been a great second term president.”

Smith: He’d mastered the job?

Rumsfeld: He had. He’d gotten very good at it and he enjoyed it. He was comfortable in it. And he almost won it.

Smith: Bob Barrett said, “The thing afterwards, was he’d go around the White House and said, ‘I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer!’”

Rumsfeld: Is that right?

Smith: Yeah. But, in time they became friends, too.

Rumsfeld: Sure.

Smith: I can’t thank you enough.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this.

I guess the first obvious question is what was the path that eventually crossed with Gerald Ford on Capitol Hill?

Downton: When I graduated from high school, I went to Davenport College in Grand Rapids, now Davenport University, I believe. But at that point in time, it was Davenport College. We had to do a research paper on a place we wanted to work that we didn’t know anything about. I was taking a legal secretary course and I pretty much knew everything about court reporter, legal secretary, whatever. So, at that point in time, The FBI Story was on TV, the weekly with Efrem Zimbalist, Jr. We had watched that as a family and my younger brother said, “Why don’t you write there and at least get some information?” They had women working there. “And you can do your paper and we don’t have to listen to it anymore.”

You know, I didn’t know what to do. So I did. I wrote in and I got a lot of information from them along with an application. So my father said, “Why don’t you fill it out and see what happens?” So I did and the next thing I knew, I was being investigated by the FBI to see whether or not they would consider hiring me. Well, they offered me a job in Washington, D.C. in their print division to begin with, much to the chagrin of the people at Davenport College because they already were going to place me with a law firm. So, they said, “You’re not going to go work for the FBI.” And I said, “Yes, I am. I’m going to Washington, D.C. I’m going to work for the FBI. And if it doesn’t work out, then I’ll come back.” And so I did. I was very young at that point in time.

My parents took me to Washington, D.C. The FBI were fabulous to work for. I have only good things to say about that period of time. That was still with John Edgar Hoover as the director. When my folks took me, they wanted me to at least know someone in Washington, D.C. At that point in time, my father had a friend who was a fellow pastor, and his sister, Ruth Mahder her name was, worked for Congressman Ford on Capitol Hill. He had just become Minority Leader. So we went up to Capitol Hill on Saturday and Ruth’s not working that day, but we met the people on staff and what have you.

Ruth called me later. We got together and what have you, it worked out great. Well, about a month later, I had a call when I was working for the FBI from the administrative assistant, Frank Meyer, his name was. And he wanted to offer me a job as secretary to the press secretary. At that point in time, because he was Minority Leader, he needed to expand his staff. And, one thing, when you work for the FBI, you promise to stay for a year. It’s an unwritten acknowledgment, but you do do that. And so I told Frank, “Oh, no, I couldn’t even think about that.” He said, “Well, why not?” I said, “Because I promised to stay for a year and I like my job. There’s no reason for me to leave.” And he said, “Well, if that’s the only reason not to, I’ll have Congressman Ford call J. Edgar Hoover.” I said, “No! I don’t want you to do that. No. I like my job. I’ll stay right where I am.” I said, “No, thank you.”

I didn’t think anything more of it until I was home at Christmas time in December and I got a call from Frank. He said, “Dorothy, when is your year up?” And I said, “In January.” He said, “Okay. Now, I have another job I want you to consider,” and that would be actually being one of his secretaries. He gave a lot of dictation to both Ruth Mahder and myself, but he was getting busier and busier and needed more help. I said, “Well, I’ll be happy to come and talk to you about that.” So when I got back to D.C. after Christmas, I went up and talked to Frank. We had a wonderful visit. I ended up staying at the FBI for one year and two days. So, I met my promise.

I started then working with Frank. And, like I say, a lot of dictation and I learned how to do a lot of the constituent letters and whatever. I started doing them, some on my own, he would give me some to answer on my own and whatever.
Smith: I assume mail was critical.

Downton: Yes, it was essential. We took every letter we got seriously, whether it was a request for a tour, or information, a social security problem, whatever. Yes, it was very serious. And Frank would dictate a lot of the letters to Ruth and myself and then we would type them up and Congressman Ford would sign them. He would take them home with him, usually at night, and sign them in the car on the way home, because he had a chauffeur as Minority Leader. So Frank would come through and pick all of our mail up from our outboxes and he’d package them up and Congressman would take them home and he would read and sign them and bring them back the next morning.

Smith: Now, were the District offices and Minority office separate, or was it all in one place?

Downton: He kept us all together on Capitol Hill. He could’ve had a separate congressional office and minority leader office, but he decided to keep us all together. So, I believe at that point in time some of us were paid as congressional staff and some as minority leader staff. But he kept us all together. We were in H230 of the Capitol, a wonderful, wonderful office. We had the best view of Washington, D.C. You could look right down the Mall. It was beautiful. We were there for seven years and I continued doing a lot of the correspondence and whatever.

Whenever Congressman Ford would want to make a speech on the floor, he would sometimes ask Frank because he wanted to dictate to someone. So Frank would say, “Dorothy, would you take the dictation?” I said, “Sure!” You know, I was young and it didn’t matter to me. I thought ‘sure,’ it didn’t scare me. We got along very well. So I would go into his office and he would dictate whatever it might be and I would type it up and he’d take it with him to the floor. I believe that’s how he got used to working with me, because of the dictation.

When Frank passed away in August of 1972 right during the election campaign, Congressman Ford came back to Washington, D.C. He had been in Grand Rapids at the time campaigning. Frank had always helped him on the campaigns. He came back and he took the staff all together. He got us all together in his office and he said he didn’t want to hire another person to run his office. We all knew what we were doing and he was going to ask his personal secretary at that point in time, Mildred Leonard, to be the administrative assistant and help run the office. He would be more actively involved in that. And he was going to ask me to be his personal secretary to take over a great deal of what Mildred had been doing. And I believe that is why he did that because he was used to working with me taking dictation and whatever. We got along very well and so there was no problem.

Smith: Tell us about Mildred.

Downton: She was a very, very dedicated lady. Very, very nice. Very strong Catholic. In fact, I believe her sister was a Sister in the Catholic church. Very, very nice lady. Worked long hours. Dedicated, loyal, kept things confidential that needed to be confidential. Just a real nice lady.

Smith: Was it difficult for her to make the transition to the White House?

Downton: I think it was in the fact that she had worked so closely with him for so very many years and then all of a sudden she was up on the third floor of the Oval Office area. She still did a lot of his personal correspondence because she knew a lot of his friends from Grand Rapids and whatever. She did a lot of the personal correspondence and she would usually see him about once a week and he would sign the personal letters and this, that, and whatever. I think that was hard for her.

I believe at that time in President Ford’s view, he thought it would be easier for her because she wouldn’t have all the stress of the schedule and things of that nature. She, when he was Minority Leader, completely handled the schedule. Did everything. And then, when Frank passed away, she continued to do that in addition to going through the correspondence, things like that. So she had a great deal to do when he was Minority Leader. Less so when he became vice president. That, I think, is when that started to change.

Smith: And tell us about Frank. Had he been with the Congressman a long time?
Downton: He had been with him for a long time, I understand, yes. He was a wonderful gentleman. He was from, I believe, Grand Haven, if I’m not mistaken. When he passed away, I believe his wife moved back to Grand Haven. And he was a wonderful gentleman. Very Christian Reformed. Very strong. He made sure that the young people on the staff wrote home every week. He said, “Now, you must stay in contact with your family. I want you to be sure you write home once a week. Either that or call home whenever.” He was very strict in that regard. He ran a tight ship. He really did.

Smith: What were the rules? What was the climate like?

Downton: Frank did not participate in a lot of things that other administrative assistants did. At the time, the administrative assistant ran the office. That was the title and usually it was a man. And they would have groups, you know, where you would get together for lunch and things like that. He never participated in anything like that. He ate lunch at his desk. He came in probably at 7:00 in the morning. Started in on the correspondence. Made sure everything was taken care of. Everybody knew what they were doing. He’d hand out the mail and whatever. He was very aware of what Congressman Ford’s schedule was. He made sure he would stay on time or whatever. He ate his lunch at his desk and he was probably there until 5:30, 6:00 every night. And usually after Congressman Ford left, then he would leave.

But he was very, very strict. He would sit in his office in shirtsleeves. He would take his jacket off and he would have his shirtsleeves rolled up and he would be going back and forth between the Congressman’s office and whatever. But he was a very easy person to work for. You know, for instance, when we would take dictation, we would go over to another room so that we wouldn’t be interrupted with phone calls and this or that or whatever. He was very easy to work for. But yet you knew when he asked you to do something, you did it. He was strict and he wanted you to be there on time. And you would leave on time or whatever. They were also very concerned about the safety of the staff to be sure that we didn’t have any problem. If we had a car, I didn’t when I first started working there, but when I got my first car, I was absolutely thrilled. And Frank was able to get me a parking spot right in front of the Capitol building.

Now, I understand it’s all barricaded off, that there’s not even anything allowed there. But it was right on the bottom of those huge steps you walk up. And when I would come in the morning, the officer would move the little marker, and I’d go in and he’d put it behind my little Volkswagen and it was great. Now, I know that’s not even allowed. After that, then, he was able to move me. It’s all done on seniority and whatever, he was able to get me into the parking structure. And so that was great. But they were very, very concerned, he was very concerned about the safety. When I took the bus, he was concerned, “Where do you get on and at what time?”

Smith:  Congressmen Ford travelled a lot because of his Minority Leader position. When he was in the office, did he see constituents?

Downton:  If he was in his office and a family would come to visit, yes, he would. Yes. The gal who took care of the tours and things of that nature was Anne Kamstra. She was from Grand Rapids. So when someone would come in, she would immediately identify where they lived and what they did and whatever. She was very, very good at helping them. And she was the receptionist and so if he was in, yes, and he was available, she would introduce them and they would go into the office and they would have a photo taken. We had a little Polaroid camera. He would be either sitting at his desk and they would be around him, or he would be standing by the window and they would be around him and she would take the photo.

He would take the time, yes. He felt if someone took the time to come see him and he was there, he wanted to see them. It may have only been five minutes, but yes, he enjoyed that.

Smith:  For all the travel and demands of the job, probably more than the congressman of today, he still tried to get home.

Downton:  He did, yes. He went home quite often. And, well, he had to campaign every other year. And when he would go home, they had, I guess you would call it, an old motor home or a bus that Frank would drive and they would go from spot to spot, every little town. They didn’t just go to Grand Rapids, they would go wherever they needed to. At one point in time, he had part of Ottawa county, which is where I lived, and he would go through every little town and invite people to come. They would do this regularly, spend days doing this. And any problems they had, veteran problems, social security problems, whatever, “Please come and talk to me.” And then he would pass it along to someone in Washington who would work on it and whatever. He was home a lot. He did. He spent a good deal of time in the 5th District.

Smith: And you knew that his great ambition was to be Speaker of the House?

Downton: Yes, yes. Exactly. Yes, and I always felt bad that he was not Speaker of the House. He would’ve been a tremendous Speaker, I believe.

Smith: How did he get along with John McCormick?

Downton: Oh, he got along very well with John McCormick. He was such a nice gentleman. And he would give the impression of being very stern because he was this tall, handsome gentleman and he could give the impression of being quite stern, but he wasn’t. He was very, very polite, even to us. I had mentioned when President Nixon was inaugurated and he made his ceremonial visit to Capitol Hill, Speaker McCormick invited our staff over as Minority Leader staff to meet President Nixon and have a photo taken and whatever.

He arranged everything for us. He was a very, very nice gentleman. I think Minority Leader Ford got along with him very, very well. I do believe. He also got along very well with Hale Boggs.

Smith: Tell us about that relationship.

Downton: They seemed to just hit it off very well. They actually did the China trip together and Frank went along. Frank went along on that China trip that Tip O’Neill and Congressman Ford did. I believe Hale Boggs was Majority Leader at that time, if I’m not mistaken, and President Ford was Minority Leader. And, at that point in time, they were breaking history, by making this tour through China. And Frank had gone along as did Hale Boggs’ administrative assistant. But Frank took cassettes along and he dictated things that they did and saw and whatever. So when he came back, I transcribed those. I spent several days doing that project, but it was fascinating to see what they did and how things went there. It was very, very nice. But they got along very well, him and Hale Boggs.

Smith: Everyone talks about how different it was then than it is now. And you do sense that there was more social interaction? That, for one thing, members tended to bring their families with them to Washington. That’s no longer necessarily the case.

Downton: Right.

Smith: Hale Boggs and President Ford would debate at the National Press Club and the story goes they would ride down together to the Press Club and decide what they were going to debate. Get down there and have their debate. Go have lunch and go back to work. You wouldn’t imagine that happening today.

Downton: I don’t think nowadays, no. I think the rapport is different now. In those days, and we’re talking, what, 30 years ago perhaps, I think that they realized that they could get along even if they disagree. He had some very strong friendships with people on the other side of the aisle and they would disagree on policy, but they would still be very close friends. And I think that was one of his strong points that he could compromise. When he was Minority Leader, he could talk to some of the people on the Republican side and say, “Come on, now, we’ve got to give a little here.” And he did a lot behind the scenes that I don’t think people realized how much he really did to promote agenda and this, that, and whatever to help move things along. He really was quite a very good facilitator in that regard.

Smith: Really?

Downton: Yeah.

Smith: He was really fiscally conservative.

Downton: Oh, yes.
Smith: Pro-civil rights?

Downton: Yes, he was.

Smith: The party of Lincoln.

Downton: Yes, absolutely.

Smith: What was your sense of his relationship with LBJ?

Downton: I think that was rather tense, myself. I don’t think that you would consider that necessarily a warm friendship. He did ask him to be on the Warren Commission, which he took very seriously. He was, I believe, the youngest person on the Warren Commission and he took that very seriously. He really did. It was very nice of President Johnson to ask him to do that. But I don’t believe there was a strong friendship, or I don’t think there ever could have been. I think President Johnson was just such a different type of personality. It just didn’t click. It just was like it just didn’t work.

Smith: You know, he made the famous cracks about Ford’s intelligence.

Downton: Playing football and all that. Yeah.

Smith: Yeah. Was that out there? How did the Congressman deal with that?

Downton: Well, he handled it better than we did, because we, as his staff, would take it personally. And he would say, “Oh, no, don’t worry about that.” And he handled anything like that very well. He had really thick skin for that, much more so than we did. Like I said, we took it very personally. When he was president and he would have some of these very unfavorable editorial cartoons, he would not take offense. In fact, every once in awhile, he would have the artist autograph it. And he would have it framed and we would hang it my office. And he would chuckle at it when he would come in and look at it. He had a wonderful ability to hear criticism and to not be personally affected by it.

Smith: It’s quite a gift.
Downton: I could not do that. I would take it personally. And I didn’t like that at all, but he handled it very well. He was very even-tempered, I think, in that regard. I’m sure it hurt, but he didn’t show it. He could handle that very well. I admired him for that.

Smith: And there was Everett Dirksen. They were very different.

Downton: They were very different. And I think Everett Dirksen was so outspoken and so out in front of everybody and in everyone’s face and I think when they started doing their Ev and Jerry commentaries, I think everyone thought, “Oh, well, Everett Dirksen’s going to take this over and nobody’s going to listen to what Jerry Ford has to say.” Well, after awhile, they did listen to what Jerry Ford had to say because he would let Mr. Dirksen go on and say and rant and rave and say whatever he had to say, and then he would very calmly say whatever he wanted to say and what the House members were thinking and whatever. And it came across just fine. I think the longer he did that, the better he got at it. And he let Everett Dirksen have the spotlight and he didn’t mind. That also was a very rare gift.

Smith: Very rare.

Downton: Yes.

Smith: Especially in Washington.

Downton: Yes.

Smith: Did you get to know Mrs. Ford at all during this time?

Downton: Yes, not so much at that point in time. I got to know her more later. But as time went on, she would come into the office if they were going to an event that evening. The chauffeur would pick her up and then come and pick him up. Sometimes she would come into the office and whatever. As I say, I got to know her more later when we were in the White House. And then obviously when he was former president, I had more interaction there. But at that point in time, as I said, she would come into the office. I would talk to her on the phone every once in awhile if she needed something, what have you. But at that point in time, when he was Congressman and Minority Leader, she was pretty much with him in the evening and things like that. She did not have her own staff at that point in time. When he became vice president, I believe, is when she actually got someone to start to help her with her schedule and things like that. And then obviously in the White House she had her own staff.

Smith: And we’ve heard, I think from the kids themselves, it was not unusual for him on weekends that he would come into work.

Downton: Oh, yes. Yes.

Smith: And they’d hang out in Statuary Hall.

Downton: I used to say as long as the mail was delivered, he was there to see what was in the mail. And this happened in California, too. I worked on Saturday. Mail is delivered on Saturday. You have to see what’s in the mail. He was the type of person who I finally decided he cannot relax until he’s done with his work. He was very orderly, very disciplined. He read his newspapers. Loved to read the newspaper. He’d read his magazines. He wanted to see what came in the mail. He wanted to stay current. He didn’t like being behind.

And so mail was delivered on Saturdays, so why wouldn’t we be there to look at it? So when we were in the Capitol Building as Minority Leader, when I joined the staff in ’67, we worked every third Saturday. Frank had it arranged so that we didn’t work every Saturday. He was here every Saturday, but there were two or three of us there every Saturday. We’d get the mail and this, that, or whatever. And, yes, if he was in town, he was there, too, and sign mail and look at mail, whatever it might be. And, yes, the kids would come along and they could roam. In those days, you could roam around the Capitol. You could look at all the history and all the beautiful statues and whatever. You could learn an awful lot. What a wonderful place to roam. Now, I don’t think you can do that anymore.

Smith: Penny Circle tells a funny story. At the time of the anthrax scare following 9/11, the postal service finally said, we’re not delivering the mail on Saturday.
And he couldn’t understand why they weren’t delivering the mail on Saturday.

Downton: No, no, I’m sure.

Smith: And it got to the point where, literally, a couple staffers would put on these outlandish spaceman-type outfits and work going through the mail.

Downton: I believe it.

Smith: And, you know, it’s Saturday and it’s mail duty.

Downton: I believe it. When I was in California, I was there until November of 1980, and if he was there, I worked every Saturday. Not all day, but until noon, one o’clock, whatever it might be, until we went through the mail to see if anything was there, whatever, he was there. He’d often go play golf in the afternoon or something like that. But if he was out of town on Saturday and came back Saturday night or whatever, then I would usually stop on the way home from church on Sunday and see him after church on Sunday morning. Then he would go on and play golf or whatever. He always wanted to know what’s going on, what’s in the mail. He didn’t want to miss anything and he wanted to stay current. He didn’t like getting way behind.

Smith: Very disciplined man, wasn’t he?

Downton: Oh, very disciplined, yes. Yes, very disciplined. Very much so, yes. As I say, he couldn’t relax, I don’t think, until he was done with his routine, his reading the newspapers, the magazines, the mail, signing the mail. You know, doing whatever it is he felt he needed to do. I think that was his comfort zone. I really do. He loved it.

Smith: Now, the relationship with Richard Nixon must have evolved over time. Obviously they’d been friends. They’d been colleagues.

Downton: I believe they started the same year.

Smith: I think two years apart.

Downton: Two years apart?
Smith: Yes.

Downton: Okay. Was Nixon first?

Smith: Yes.

Downton: Okay. Alright.

Smith: But it must have gotten complicated over time.

Downton: I think it did get very complicated. I think I enjoyed the period of when he was vice president because he travelled. Well, Nixon hardly left the White House. And he travelled a great deal. In fact, Mr. Ford was a great baseball fan. He loved the Detroit Tigers, as did I at that point in time. He threw out the first ball for the baseball season when he was vice president, and it happened to be in Cincinnati. It was the game when Henry Aaron tied the baseball homerun record at that point in time. He was going to fly to the game and that’s one of the few times that I went with him on a trip. He invited my husband and myself, Dave and myself, to go with him to that opening day game because he knew I liked baseball. And then he gave me the bat he got from the Cincinnati Reds. He gave me that bat. He says, “Here, I think you should have this.”

We had a wonderful time. We didn’t stay for the whole game. We saw Henry Aaron hit his homerun and then we left, but we had a wonderful time. There had been a hurricane or tornado, I think, somewhere in the area, Pennsylvania or Ohio, and we flew over that in the airplane so we could see that from the air and report back to the president on what he had seen as damage and this, that, and whatever. Cincinnati was fine. There was no problem there, but there was in the path that we took when we went there. I remember seeing that. That was one of the few times I travelled with him and that was fun. We had a good time at that game.

Smith: Was he more relaxed out of the office?

Downton: He was, yes. Yes, he was. He enjoyed his sports, I know. He liked the Tigers, he followed the Detroit Tigers. And, of course, Michigan football. He would watch every game if he could and whatever. Follow that very carefully. Oftentimes, if I would be there on a Saturday afternoon, he’d have the game on TV. He’d be watching whatever was on TV. Things like that. He loved that a great deal. But when he was vice president, he was gone a lot. Like I said, Nixon hardly ever left the White House. So he was gone. He went. He was out there doing what needed to be done publicly.

I think he did a very good job. I think, served Nixon very well. I’m not sure that everyone would’ve been as aware of the situation as President Ford was. He was very in tune to what was going on to the point of excusing himself from a cabinet meeting when they started talking about whatever was happening and this, that, and whatever and he felt he shouldn’t be there to participate in the discussion. I think he was very in tune to what was going on and I think he did his best to, I don’t want to use protect the president, but to let the president do whatever he needed to do in his own time.

Smith: When Watergate first occurred, what was the sense in the office?

Downton: Well, I think at first nobody thought anything of it. It seemed like just such an insignificant, stupid thing. And it was like, “Well, why is everybody making such a big deal about this?” And then the consensus was, “Well, why did they have to do some stupid thing like that?” There was no reason to do this. I mean, it was not a close election. And, “Why in the world did they have to do this?” That’s, I think, what everybody thought. “How stupid” and “Why would somebody want to do this?” It was just ridiculous and that’s why we couldn’t understand why.

Smith: Did you sense his attitude changing? I mean, clearly people found out more and more and then, in particular, when the tapes were released, some of the transcripts of the tapes, a lot of people were shocked with Nixon’s language.

Downton: Oh, yes. Yes.

Smith: Did you get a sense of how the Congressman and then the vice president was handling all of this?

Downton: I think, I noticed it more of him when he was vice president, but I think he, as far as I saw, became quieter. He didn’t say anything. He just listened and watched what was going on. He didn’t say anything. He was very, very, I don’t want to say withdrawn, but he just didn’t say anything.

Smith: That’s interesting, because he was in an almost impossible spot.

Downton: Oh, he was in a very, very awkward spot. He was in an extremely awkward spot. And I don’t think people realized how awkward it was for him, because he did not want to be vice president. He wanted to be Speaker of the House.
And that took away any chance of him being Speaker of the House. Here he was now vice president to an increasingly unpopular president and, as you say, he is seeing all and hearing all of these things that are being released in transcripts and tapes and whatever. He did, he became quieter. He didn’t say very much. I think he realized, “Well, okay, I’m going to have to do what I have to do.”

Smith: Do you remember anything that would indicate before he actually became president that he expected that to happen?

Downton: Honestly, no. The only clue I had was, I think, perhaps two days before Nixon resigned. He went on TV at night and gave a speech that he was going to resign the next day. I think two days before that Vice President Ford called me in the office. He said, “Dorothy, do you know where the Bible is that I used when I was sworn in as vice president?” I said, “Yes, I know where it is.” He said, “Well, where is it?” I said, “I have it in my safe” because we had a safe in the office where I kept things of that nature, actually. He said, “Good. Are you sure it’s there?” I said, “Yeah, it’s there.” And he said, “Why don’t you go and get it? Why don’t you bring it to me?” And I said, “Oh, great. Good.” I said, “Do you want me to put it back?” He said, “No, why don’t I hold onto it?” I said, “Okay.” And he just looked at me and I looked at him and smiled and he said, “Thanks for keeping it for me. I’m glad you know where it was. I appreciate that.” I said, “You’re welcome.”

And I think he may have asked me if I remembered what he had it open to when he was sworn in as vice president. I don’t recall now what it was, but it may have been his favorite proverb, Trust in the Lord. I’m not sure, but I think he may have asked me that at the time, because I believe his son Mike picked out the passage, if I’m not mistaken, for vice president. And, so when I handed it to him and I think he asked me that at the time and then I specifically said, “Would you want me to put it back?” He said, “No, why don’t I hold onto it.” And, so I don’t know if he left it in the office. I think he took it home with him.

Smith: It sounds like it was one of those times where what you didn’t say was a kind of communication.

Downton: Yes. Exactly. Yeah, because at that point in time, like I say, we just looked at each other and smiled and I go, “Okay.”

Smith: Did people in the office - I mean, it’s human nature - obviously, you’re going to speculate what’s going to happen and what’s going to happen to you.

Downton: Absolutely.

Smith: Was there much of that? And, did he try to damp that down?

Downton: If any of that was going on, he would not have approved. He would not have liked that. I think everybody just kept doing their job and kept quiet. And especially, at that time as vice president, he had a bit of a larger staff than the staff of Minority Leader and Congressman. Now we’re the staff of the vice president. He had a lot of a staff, so he did not have as much contact with each person any longer, to know each one by name and whatever. We were on the second floor, I believe, of the Office Building. At that point in time that’s what it was called. I think now it’s called a different name. We had a wonderful suite of offices. It was great. I really enjoyed that period because it was almost easier for us. He travelled a lot. I’d see him when he came back, you know. We did what we needed to do and whatever. It was a, I don’t want to say, relaxing period of time, but it was not as stressful, obviously, as when he became president.

Smith: Let me go back to the beginning of the vice presidency. Spiro Agnew resigns, which must have come as something of a shock because it’s the first time it happened. And then, in very short order, he’s nominated. Now, what are you recollections of that period?

Downton: Well, that is very interesting because at that point in time, that week when Agnew resigned and Nixon was going to appoint the first vice president of that amendment, the 25th amendment, I believe, Dave and I were home here in Michigan. Dave was meeting my parents and asking permission to get married. And so we were not in Washington, D.C. at that time. But, believe it or not, and you will believe this, on Friday night Nixon was on TV to announce his vice president. Dave and I had come back. Dave had to work on Saturday and so did I. I had to work that Saturday; it was my Saturday. And so Friday evening we were at Dave’s sister’s home in Bowie, Maryland and letting them know how things went with my folks and this, that, and the other - our wedding plans and whatever. So we turn the TV on and listening to this.

Meanwhile, as we were driving home, we heard Hugh Scott, I believe, say, “Well, I don’t know who’s going to be vice president, but it’s not going to be Jerry Ford or me.” And Jerry was standing right next to him at that point in time. And so, I’m thinking, “Oh, okay.” So, I wasn’t too worried at all. And then here we are watching the TV that night and I was flabbergasted, because, like I say, that took away any possibility of him being Speaker of the House. But I can also see where he wouldn’t say ‘no.’ I mean, if the president asks you to do something, you do it. And I don’t know that he was his first choice. I don’t think he was. I’m quite positive he wasn’t.

Smith: John Connally was his first choice.

Downton: Yes, that’s what I understand. But apparently he was talked out of that by his staff and whatever. I don’t know if that hurt him at all to think that he was not his first choice. Probably not. I think he just realized, “Well, if I’m going to do this, I’m going to do it the best I can do.”

Smith: Well, apparently the people who had a lot do with it were Carl Albert and Mike Mansfield who went down to the White House and told the president, “The one person we can confirm quickly is Jerry Ford.”
Downton: Right. And I think that is because of the high regard they had for him being able to work with, like I said, both sides of the aisle. He had very, very close friends on the other side of the aisle and that didn’t matter to him. And I think that remained. He had some extremely close friends such as Tip O’Neill and whatever. And I think they gave President Nixon very good advice. I don’t know that John Connally would’ve been approved. It would’ve been a long, drawn out affair and we don’t need that.

Smith: Tell us about a very important person in this story and also, frankly, a very polarizing person in this story. And that’s Bob Hartmann. When did he arrive? What was his role and the relationship that he had?

Downton: Actually, Bob Hartmann joined the staff when he was Minority Leader. The press secretary was a gentleman by the name of Paul Miltich. He was Minority Leader before he needed a press secretary. Nice gentleman. He did a lot, wrote a lot of the speeches and whatever. Several years later, as Mr. Ford got more into the Minority Leader position, Bob Hartmann joined the staff. He then started doing a few of the speeches, some of the press releases. He was doing a lot of work behind the scenes with the leadership and whatever being sure that everybody knew what was going on and whatever. He dealt a lot with the congressmen, the minority staff, let’s say.

When President Ford became vice president, Bob Hartmann became chief of staff and he was the type of person who knew what he wanted to do and he would do it no matter whose feelings would be hurt. He could be very brusque. I always got along with him very well. His secretary, he had two secretaries, Neta Messersmith and Gail Raiman. I got along with both of them very well. They were very close friends. I got along with Bob Hartmann very well. I never had a run-in with him. I never had a disagreement with him. I knew where he was coming from and he knew what I did. And I think he respected me for what I did for President Ford. But he did rub a lot of people the wrong way.

Smith: Even his critics acknowledge his loyalty.

Downton: Yes.
Smith: I mean, in fact, almost a fault. There was a sense that people become almost possessive.

Downton: Yes. Yes.

Smith: And I wonder if that was part of that dynamic. That Hartmann, from his own perspective, had every reason to believe that he played a unique role and was totally loyal to the president. But that can almost block your vision in some ways.

Downton: Yeah. But I think what happened was I think he enjoyed the period of vice president, when Ford was vice president. Because he was chief of staff. He had an excellent assistant, Frank Pagnotta, who could do anything. I mean, you could ask him the silliest question and he would know where to get the answer. He was very good at getting things done. And, so, he had a very good person underneath him. Mr. Hartmann was not exactly a detail person, but Frank was. And so, therefore, that worked out great. His strength, and I always thought this, was his speechwriting. He wrote the speech that President Ford gave both when he became vice president and president. And I think those are outstanding speeches. I think he did an excellent, excellent job.

I think when President Ford became president, I think Mr. Hartmann was sort of put in a box, not by President Ford, but by others and he resented it and I would’ve as well, if I were him. But I think he had a hard time getting out of that box and I think that hurt him a great deal. He was an excellent speechwriter. He, I think, was brilliant in how he could use the words that President Ford was so familiar with and down to earth, you know, and talk to people normally and not talk above their heads and whatever. They got along very well.

I think President Ford knew how to handle Mr. Hartmann. I think he realized how valuable he was. He did not want to hurt his feelings, because I remember at one point when he was president and it was time for the State of the Union message, there were different versions of the State of the Union message. One was Mr. Hartmann’s and one was the other folks’ and President Ford’s right in the middle of the staff conflict. He had asked me, he said, “Dorothy, are you doing anything tonight?” I said, “Well, no.” He said, “Well, would you mind coming back to the White House after dinner?” And I said, “No.” And he said, “I’m going to give you some dictation and I’m going to ask you to stay and do it and then you can come in late tomorrow.” I said, “Well, do you mind if Dave comes with me?” because we only lived four blocks from the White House and I was going to walk back and forth. So I said, “Do you mind if Dave came with me?” He said, “No. No, not at all.”

So, we met back at the White House, like 8:30, 9:00 at night, and he had these two versions of the speech and he took parts of one and the other and put it together as what he wanted to say and he dictated it to me. He went back to the residence when he was done. Then I stayed and typed it up and put it on his desk so it was there. Actually, I put in our drawer. He had a drawer in the credenza right behind him. It was my drawer and everyone knew that was my spot. So if I had something for him, I would put it in there. If he had something for me, he would put it in there. So I put it in there so he could have it first thing when he came in in the morning.

I understand that’s when he called the people together the next morning and said, “This is what I’m going to give.” And handed it to them and let them do it into the version for the large text and whatever that they use. And so, that was an awkward time. That was very awkward. That was difficult for him because he didn’t necessarily like confrontations on his staff. And that was bothersome to him.

Smith: Well, a waste of time, obviously.

Downton: Oh, absolutely a waste of time.

Smith: He’s got more important things to do.

Smith: That raises the larger question because there is almost a trajectory of his presidency. I mean, you could tell it in a lot of ways, but one thematic approach, piecing together from what a lot of people have said is, he went into the office never having been an executive.

Downton: Right.

Smith: And, of course, originally he thought the spokes in the wheel, that in some ways he could transplant a congressional office organization to the West Wing. And that didn’t work for a number of reasons. But in a larger sense, a story of his presidency is his learning to be president, which is a unique job.

Downton: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: Your memories of the 9th of August; were you in the East Room?

Downton: Mhmm. Yes, we were. In fact Dave and I and, actually, I believe, Bob Hartmann’s secretaries Neta and Gail and I believe we were sitting right behind the Ford children in the East Room. We were not there for Nixon’s farewell or anything like that, but, yes, we were there for the swearing in. We were still in the vice president’s office, so we came over and we were there. I must say, I enjoyed that because it was one of the few times that we were seated and we’re not standing somewhere in the background or wherever.

But it was very, very nice and we knew how historic this was. I had every confidence that he would do a very good job just being a normal, down-to-earth person. Not the airs and graces and whatever. I thought this was going to be a very good progression. This was going to be good, you know. He’s going to handle this. We went back to the VP office and I think it was later in that day that I got word that he wanted to see me, you know, to see whatever it was or whatever. We went over to the West Wing because we had to see what the situation was. The awkward thing was that, and this was very true, and I can see it from both sides, but of course I’m looking at it from my side, the Nixon people did not want us to stay there. They did not like us. They didn’t even like us as the vice president’s staff. We were considered beneath them because we were normal folks, so to speak, and we came from the Hill and they had this adversarial relationship with the Hill.

Smith: And from Grand Rapids.
Downton: Oh, yes, and in Grand Rapids. We were in the boondocks. And we obviously resented that because we were proud of where we came from. We were proud of his 5th District and how well he represented it. And we were proud of Michigan.

Smith: Were there, and I don’t mean names, but was there an incident or did people say things?

Downton: I think it was more an attitude. I mean, as I say, the vice presidential staff grew and so we were getting more and more people on our staff and in just walking around the Old Executive Office Building. We never went to the White House. We were always in the Old Executive Office Building in the vice president’s office. Just walking around and just seeing the atmosphere and the attitude. It was oppressive in some regard because they did not want us there. They did not like us. At one point in time, they referred to us as the “Drug Fair people”, the lower-crust working people. You know, I was like, “Oh, come on, there’s nothing wrong with us!” You know, we had been on Capitol Hill, we knew what we were doing, but we weren’t in their mindset.

Smith: This leads us into this larger question. We talked to a number of other people. One was Leon Parma, who was sort of shuffled into the East Room for the ceremony and he vividly recalls afterwards there was a receiving line and I think there were people invited down to the State Dining Room for the reception. And he said you could watch Nixon people peel off.

Downton: Yes. Yes.

Smith: And you can understand.

Downton: Oh, yes, you can, but the funny thing is they didn’t want to leave. I mean, they didn’t want us there, and they didn’t want to leave but yet they weren’t exactly fond of President Ford. And so what was going to happen? I mean, you got to give this a chance. And they didn’t want to do that. And President Ford graciously offered for many of them to stay in their present positions or whatever, but it was very awkward. It was not an easy transition at all. But then, this was the first time this had happened so we were breaking new ground. And we got through it. We probably as the vice president’s staff got closer. Because it was we’re no longer the Minority Leader’s staff, no longer the vice president’s staff, now he was now the president. And we probably got even closer and whatever. And we worked through it. But it was not an easy time. And it was not an easy time for the country. I mean, everyone didn’t know what was going to happen. But I think President Ford handled it beautifully. And we were all very proud of how he handled that period.

Smith: It’s very interesting because one of the first things he does is he brought in the Congressional Black Caucus and George Meany. Understanding the power of the symbolism of inviting people who had not been in the White House for a while.

Downton: Exactly. They had been shunned. And he also got rid of the tapes. There was no taping of his conversations and that wasn’t necessary.

Smith: The story that there was so many microphones in the Oval Office, they didn’t find one for a week or something like that.

Downton: I just find that incredible. I really do. But, no, that was all gotten rid of and whatever. That wasn’t necessary.

Smith: Do you have a sense of what the relationship was with Al Haig during that period?

Downton: I think he got along with him well, but I think he also realized this was not going to be a long term relationship, which I think Al Haig would’ve enjoyed. He would’ve wanted to stay. But I think he finally realized this wasn’t going to work.

Smith: It’s interesting because Haig, when we interviewed him, sort of put the onus on Hartmann.

Downton: Oh, did he? That’s interesting.

Smith: And he went to the president complaining seriously about Hartmann. And, the president, as Al repeats it, says, “Al, you’re going to have to let me do it my way.”
Downton: Exactly. No, he would not like that. He did not like those types of confrontations.

Smith: And Haig, sort of excitable, said, “Well, that answers my question. You don’t want me to stay.” Which, you know, judging from things we saw later in Haig’s career, it’s not terribly surprising.

Downton: No, it’s not. No, it’s not.

Smith: But you could also have said that chemistry would not have lasted very long.

Downton: No, not at all. No. In fact when you speak of chemistry, the chemistry was better when Cheney was chief of staff than when Rumsfeld was.

Smith: Really?

Downton: Uh-huh. From what I could see, yes.

Smith: What was the difference between the two?

Downton: Well, at that time, Rumsfeld was very hands-on, and very much in every office and whatever, and very much in control. And Cheney, when he took over, I believe Rumsfeld was secretary of defense and then Dick Cheney became the chief of staff. And it was just more relaxed. He was open to listen to everybody and whatever. It was just a much calmer feeling, I think. It was a better relationship for everybody, I think, including Mr. Hartmann and John Marsh and all and Phil Buchen and, I mean, everything was much calmer. There wasn’t this, I don’t want to use the word sense of urgency, but there wasn’t this “Why’s Big Brother watching me?” or anything like that. It wasn’t this fear of Rumsfeld always watching everybody and everything and having his finger on everything.

Smith: And yet, it’s amazing because Rumsfeld is a bureaucratic master. And the funny thing you hear from so many people is he never left fingerprints. He had his fingers in everything, but he never left fingerprints.

Downton: Yes, he had other people.

Smith: Yes. Yes, inside the bubble
Downton: Right. Exactly. He was a master. There’s no doubt about that. And I don’t mean that against him, but, I mean, it was more cohesive, I think, when he became secretary of defense. And Dick Cheney, everybody now, I mean, I hear people about mention Dick Cheney and whatever. He was a great guy. I got along with him great, he and his wife. And when he came to California several times when I was still with former President Ford, he was not at that point in time the Dick Cheney that most people think now. I think the White House did very well with him as chief of staff. And I think everyone was comfortable. They knew what they were doing. I think they had a good set up, but it took a while to get that in place. It did take a while. The transition was difficult.

Smith: Do you remember, he became President on the 8th. There was a trip to Chicago, a VFW Convention, and the amnesty program which took a lot of people by surprise.

Downton: Oh, yes. Yes.

Smith: Then on the 8th of September, there was a pardon. What do you remember about the discussion? Was there a point, where there was an on-going discussion about pardoning Nixon? Or was that something developed only at the end? How do you recall?

Downton: From what I understand, I had not heard any discussions about it or any talks about it. I heard about it on Sunday night on the news, just as everyone else did.

Smith: Really. So you had no idea?

Downton: No, I had no idea that that’s what he was going to do. I believe he dealt with a few people on that and having negotiations and whatever. I always thought at the time, what disappointed me was Jerry terHorst was his press secretary. Nice guy, great guy. And I was disappointed in his reaction. I understand where he was coming from, but I wish he wouldn’t have left, because I think he would’ve done a very good job as press secretary. I really do.
There is a school of thought that that wasn’t the only reason that he left. That the job was overwhelming and that he really hadn’t anticipated just what the demands of that job would be.

Exactly. Exactly. But it came about – like his resignation letter. He got that and I thought, “Oh, this is not a good thing.” I understand where President Ford was coming from. He totally thought that this would put an end to it and the sooner the better. I think perhaps, looking back, of course anybody can look back, I think perhaps it would’ve been better if Nixon would have been formally charged, or something of that nature and then done the pardon. But to do the blanket pardon for whatever could be out there, I think that really upset some people. I really do. Unfortunately, I think some people did not forget that. He really did think, honestly, that this is the way to get this thing over with and get Nixon out of here and not talk about it and not have it be the source of conversation and whatever. That was in his soul, I think. And bless him for doing that, but I think it probably would’ve been better received if he would’ve waited a little bit.

And remember, Nixon almost died that fall from phlebitis.

That’s right.

And if Ford had done it then, maybe there at least would have been some degree of civility.

Right.

Exactly.

But, like I said, we can look back at that, and it’s easy to do, but at the time he sincerely felt, “Let’s get this over with.”

And he was lucky enough to live long enough to realize that most people would come around to his way of thinking.

Yes, in fact even, I don’t mean to say even, but even Ted Kennedy, when he got the award, the Profile in Courage award, acknowledged that was the right thing to do at the right time. And that was a huge acknowledgement coming from the Kennedy family. And I have to give him a lot of credit for doing that because it is true. It did get it over with and whatever, but it also set him up for a lot of people who were very, very upset. I think perhaps he did not realize the depth of - I don’t know if I should say the word hatred, but maybe it is hatred - that people felt towards Nixon and how he had let people down and they weren’t going to forget that. They wanted something more, I think. And that’s too bad. That’s sad. But, what’s done is done, and I just think now people do realize that really was the courageous thing to do.

Smith: He also had to pick a vice president.

Downton: Yes.

Smith: Were there others considered besides Nelson Rockefeller?

Downton: Yes, there were. I believe there were at that time.

Smith: George H. W. Bush was supposed to be one of the names.

Downton: And also ________ Mann, when he ran for election, I should say. And Rockefeller stepped aside and there was a whole other discussion of who it would be. Howard Baker was mentioned, he was senator from Tennessee, I believe, if I’m not mistaken. And actually, at election time, Ronald Reagan was mentioned, too, as his running mate. Even though they had the very contentious primary battle, there were people who wanted Reagan to be his running mate. There was a lot going on there.

Smith: Did you have much contact with Rockefeller during his vice presidency?

Downton: I met him, yes. I didn’t actually sit down and visit with him or anything like that, but I would see him, shake hands with him, whatever. Wonderful gentleman. I know, like we had talked earlier today, he didn’t want to be vice president, but he did it. And he did a good job. He did. He was, I think, very good at that point in time for President Ford. They’d meet weekly, at least weekly. They’d keep each other up to date and whatever. He changed the seal of the vice president. Did you know that? Yeah, he did. He was a neat guy. I really had a lot of respect for Nelson Rockefeller. And then when it was time for the election run and he stepped aside, I had a lot of respect again for him.

Smith: Did you see any change at all in the relationship between the two men?

Downton: No, I didn’t. I thought they complemented each other in that regard. I thought they did a good job.

Smith: Mrs. Ford’s breast cancer surgery - that must have caused a shock.

Downton: Yes, yes, it did. It did a great deal. That was a Saturday and I did not work that Saturday. President Ford was going to have a meeting, I believe.

Smith: It was the inflation summit.

Downton: Yes, he actually told me on Friday, he said, “Don’t bother to come in tomorrow because I’m going to be busy.” I had no idea that they were also going to be going to the hospital. But he said, “Don’t bother to come in tomorrow, because I’m going to busy all day, so enjoy your day.” In fact, I think Dave and I took a trip into Williamsburg, if I’m not mistaken, just got out and went for a little drive. And we heard on the radio then about her surgery. And, thankfully, it worked out well. I admire her greatly for how she handled it and how open she was. Actually, Happy Rockefeller then, as a result, had, I believe, a double mastectomy, if I’m not mistaken. I believe that she really set the standard for being able to talk about breast cancer. And I also have had a mastectomy.

Smith: Can you describe - I think people today don’t appreciate just how closeted a subject it was.

Downton: Oh no, it was just not spoken at all. It was something you’d talk about very privately with your best friend, but hardly even with your husband. You just wouldn’t do it. And the fact that Mrs. Ford was so very open and even had a picture taken in the hospital in her robe and whatever, throwing a football. And whether he got mad at her…because he didn’t want her to do that.

Smith: Yes, because it was too much strain?
Downton: Yeah, because it was. But I’m not sure which arm she used, but I mean it was because, like, “Don’t show off. That’s not a good idea. You don’t need to do that.” But I think that was her way of saying, hey, it was going to be alright. She handled it beautifully. I remember when I had my surgery, I was a resident here in Michigan, I was no longer with them, Mrs. Ford called me. And I thought that was just so nice. That was a neat thing to do. We had a nice conversation on the phone. And I think she has helped a lot of women in that regard. But you are so correct, it was not spoken of. I mean, maybe best girl friends, best men friends, but you would not hardly even talk to your brother about it or your father. You just wouldn’t do it. And even the day she was to go to the hospital, she met with Lady Bird Johnson and her daughters and she didn’t even tell them. She gave them a little tour of the family quarters and whatever and she didn’t tell them. Her bag was packed right there to go to the hospital. You know, she was tremendous in that regard. A wonderful, courageous example for women.

Smith: I’ll ask you one thing and get it out of the way. Were you aware at any time during the White House years that she had other problems?

Downton: A little bit. But I can understand how easily it could happen. I think the combination of the medicine she was taking and whatever, and a drink or two, I think, was very difficult. I noticed it more when we were in California, when we first moved out to California.

Smith: One explanation has always been that she thought, “Oh finally, we’re going to have this normal life with my husband.” And actually he was travelling again.

Downton: He was still travelling. Yes, he loved to be on the go. He enjoyed, I think, that period of time after the White House when he’d give speeches and travel. He was on several boards of directors and he took an active interest in that. He didn’t just lend his name for that. He’d be gone for 5, 6 days at a time and he did fine. And, of course, she was home and that was difficult for her.

Smith: By then the kids were grown up.

Downton: Exactly.
Smith: So she was alone.

Downton: She was alone, yes. Yes. Susan got married when we were first in California, she was alone. The boys were gone and whatever. She still had a staff, you know, someone to help her with her correspondence and things like that, but it was quite different. And settling into a whole new area and whatever. And, yeah, that’s difficult, too. There was no longer a lot that she could do and I think I noticed it more there. Although she continued to have, and I will always remember this, she had continued to have a problem with her neck and her back, her pinched nerve and that is painful. That was a continuing problem that I know that she has dealt with and I think that has contributed to some of the medication that she took.

Smith: Were you surprised by the intervention?

Downton: Actually, I was very glad that it happened. I remember at that point in time, I had to call Mike and be sure that he could come. And I remember at the time, I think I had to get him out of a meeting he was in. And I said to whomever I was talking, I said, “Look, I really need to talk to him. This is his dad’s personal secretary. I really need to talk to him as soon as I can.” So, they got him, you know, and I explained to him, I said, “Look, your dad really wants you to get here.” And he did. I give him credit. He did. And they were there. And I know it was difficult, I know it was a difficult time, but they got through it and she went off to the clinic and came back stronger than ever. And then she went ahead with her Betty Ford Clinic and whatever. That’s an amazing thing to do.

Smith: It truly is a remarkable story.

Downton: It is. She is a survivor of phenomenal proportions considering what she has gone through what with the cancer and the drugs and the alcohol. She is phenomenal in that regard. She is a survivor.

Smith: She tells people, the hardest thing is he’s gone. “I don’t know why I’m still here.” And she’s clearly still grieving.
Downton: Oh, yes. Yes, but there’s still some things she’s got to do. There’s still reasons for her to be here, which is good. I talk to Lee Simmons every so often and he still checks in on her and helps and this and that and whatever. So he pretty much keeps me up to date on what she’s doing. He said the family is there quite a bit, the boys and especially Steve is nearby. So that’s good.

Smith: The intervention obviously had to be planned in advance, pretty intricate in getting all the kids together and so on and keeping it a secret.

Downton: Yeah, pretty much. I don’t believe she was aware of it at all.

Smith: So was that something the president was involved in?

Downton: He, I believe, and the doctor had talked about it. And then I think Susan was the spearhead and was very prominent I think in helping him, and then got the boys involved and whatever.

Smith: And I guess he stopped drinking, too, didn’t he?

Downton: Yes, he did, which I give him credit for.

Smith: And, later on, there’s this story he and Susan, something came up about smoking. And he quit his pipe because he was concerned about her smoking. Basically, they made a bet. And he, again, going back to the discipline of the man.

Downton: Yes. He was very disciplined and very, as I say, couldn’t relax until he was done with what he needed to do. But he was also very detailed. He really was in what I did with him which was one of the reasons we got along as well as we did because we were both very detailed people. We did fine. He was very detailed, very accurate. Very aware of what was going on.

Smith: Was the fall of Saigon, was that the worst day of the presidency?

Downton: I think that would probably be a pretty good assessment. That was a low, low period. Yes, that was disappointing.
Smith: You’d seen it coming for a matter of days, if not weeks. And it was clear there was a debate. I know Kissinger wanted him to sort of go down with all flags flying and there was another camp that said you’ve got to separate yourself from this thing. It’s a loss. Did you sense those tensions?

Downton: I didn’t so much at that point in time. I learned more about it later. But you could definitely tell that there was something going on, that something that was terribly occupying his time. It was a very, very difficult time. I don’t think he’ll ever forget the helicopter leaving the embassy and whatever. I just don’t think he would ever forget that image and what it meant. That was tough.

Smith: What was Kennerly’s role?

Downton: Oh, he was everywhere. He had free access. I think there were only a couple of times when he was not welcome in the Oval Office, maybe only two or three times. But he was the type of person that you wouldn’t know he was there. Like, I know some of the pictures he had taken of me with President Ford, I didn’t realize he was in the office at that time doing his thing. And then he would come show me later. “Oh, Dorothy, do you like this? You can have this.” Or “Here’s a photo I took,” and I didn’t even realize he was there.

Smith: He was a bit of a smart-aleck. I say it because, not critically, I say it because it tells you something about President Ford that he wanted to have at least some of that around.

Downton: Yes, I think it was good for him because he could joke with him and I think he realized he’s going to help me not take myself too seriously. And you need that, you need that to be able to do that. And Kennerly, we all called him Kennerly, no one called him David or Dave. I think President Ford did, he would call him Dave a lot. But we all called him Kennerly and he was such a character, you never knew where he’d pop up. But he was an excellent photographer.

Smith: And, remember, before the fall of Saigon, the president sent Kennerly over to Southeast Asia because he knew he’d get an honest appraisal. And he did.
Downton: Exactly. Isn’t that interesting? Isn’t that something?

Smith: The Mayaguez must have been some of the flip side of the fall of Saigon the way it turned out.

Downton: Yes, thank God. Yes, that was very tense. There were some tense moments, but he handled that beautifully and came through that very well. That was very, very good.

Smith: There’s probably no such thing as a typical day, but if you could sort of distill the routine that you went through, what was your day like?

Downton: Well, I would usually get there about eight and if he was not in the Oval Office, I would go in check my drawer. We had a drawer in the credenza behind his desk where, in a lot of the photos, you could see pictures of the children and Mrs. Ford and whatever. There were two drawers in there and the one drawer was my drawer. And anything he had for me, he would put in that drawer and vice versa. If I had something for him, I would put it in there. So, if he was not in the office at that point in time, I would go in and check and see what was in my drawer and whatever. We had a system when I was in, not the office where Nell Yates was, the receptionist, and Terry O’Donnell who kept the schedule. I was not in that area. I was on the other side where there’s a door that goes into a hallway and on one side is the men’s room and on one side is a little kitchen where the steward could get tea, coffee or whatever. And then on the other side of that was a doorway into my office. And so that’s where I was, I really had a very private office. In order to get in that office, I had to go through the little kitchen area, so I was well protected. I had bulletproof glass and everything else. So I was by myself and in a very private office.

Oftentimes, when he would come into the bathroom, he would then knock on my door and see if I had anything for him that I could briefly give him or this or that or whatever. I would always seem him at lunchtime. He would come in. We had his private study, we called it, at the end of that hallway. We created a private study for him and in there we had his album collection or his stamp collection, things like that, just to make him feel nice and comfortable.
We had, for instance, when Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip came, well, then the queen gave him an autographed photo, silver frame. He had several of them from Helmut Schmidt in Germany and Anwar Sadat and whatever. He would have them in there and on his desk and whatever just to make a nice presentation. He ate his lunch in there, read magazines, papers, and whatever. So then I’d always see him again at that point in time at lunchtime. Then he’d go back in again and do his afternoon schedule.

Then, when the swimming pool was built, he would take a swim before he went back to the residence. So he would go in through that little area and through the study and then go out that way to the swimming pool. So then he’d stick his head in again and say, “Anything else I need to know before I’m off” and this, that, or whatever. So I would usually see him at least three times a day, first thing in the morning, at lunch, and before he left. When he travelled, then he would call, of course the White House switchboard could get me wherever I was. But he would call often when he was campaigning or whatever. I didn’t travel with him other than, like I said, to the opening day baseball game, but I stayed there and did what I needed to do with the banking, bill-paying, whatever it might be. And he’d call for updates and this, that, and whatever, so we would talk, even in California when he was former president, when he was travelling, like I say, for four or five days at a time, he’d call several times a day.

Smith: What parts of the job did he enjoy the most?

Downton: That would be hard to say. What’d he enjoy the most? I can tell you what I think he enjoyed the most. I think he enjoyed meeting with people and listening to others’ ideas and, “How can we solve this problem? What can we do to take care of this?” I think he enjoyed that give and take. He enjoyed meeting the various basketball teams, the national championship basketball teams and whatever. He enjoyed that.

Smith: Sports.
Downton: Yeah, he loved that sort of stuff. Pele or whatever, yeah, he enjoyed that. He enjoyed that. I think he very much enjoyed meeting some of the foreign dignitaries. He hit it off with some of them very well.

Smith: Who comes to mind in terms of having almost instant chemistry?

Downton: Helmut Schmidt in Germany.

Downton: He just got along with him just great.

Smith: And it’s funny because their politics were very different.

Downton: I know, I know. He thoroughly admired Anwar Sadat. He thought a great deal of him. I think he really thought a great deal of the man, the French president, Giscard d’Estaing.

Smith: Giscard.

Downton: Yes, they’re also two different personalities, but they seemed to get along very well. They really did. He admired Queen Elizabeth, I know, a great deal, just admired her whole being, I think.

Smith: And that visit was memorable in a number of ways.

Downton: Oh, yeah. It was, it was very nice.

Smith: There were a few SNAFUs. Could have contributed to the…

Downton: But that makes you human, too. I think he thoroughly enjoyed the July 4 bicentennial celebration. The pageantry, I think he really enjoyed that. I think that whole patriotism and 200th anniversary and whatever, I think that really meant a lot to him. Yeah, he enjoyed that period.

Smith: Do you have a sense of what he enjoyed the least about the office?

Downton: Probably the staff bickering. Probably the in-fighting. That bothered him because it was like, “This isn’t necessary. You’ve got this job and you’ve got this job and don’t argue. Each do your own thing.” He didn’t like that. He didn’t like any conflict like that on his staff. I think that he just didn’t like that at all. That bothered him.
Smith: He had a temper which I think he spent a lifetime pretty successfully controlling.

Downton: Yes.

Smith: But not always.

Downton: You could tell when he was angry.

Smith: How did that manifest itself?

Downton: I could usually tell looking at his face. And if I were presenting a question or whatever and I didn’t get a detailed answer that I wanted, I could look at his face and think, “Okay, don’t ask anything more” or “Enough’s enough.” Or, at one point in time, we were going through a number of his collection items. This was after the election and so we needed to decide where these things were going to go, to the Museum, to the Library, to California, wherever. And I think he was just plain getting tired, and he’d had enough of this. At this point in time, it was probably 6:30, 7:00 o’clock in the evening and he wanted to go back to the residence and I just looked at him and I could tell, okay, that’s enough. Let’s stop for the day because we don’t need to do anything more. You could tell, I think, from his face, I could tell. Because when you work with someone that closely, you can tell their mannerisms and their look and whatever.

Smith: What about his sense of humor?

Downton: Oh, he had a very good sense of humor. And I think that’s one of the reasons that he got along as well with Kennerly as he did because they had this joking type of a relationship which I think was good. But as I had indicated earlier, some of these editorial cartoons that I took offense at, he would laugh at. And he’d have me get them framed and hung in my office so he could look at them every so often. He did not mind that.

Smith: Did he wait too long in ’76 to take Reagan’s challenge seriously? Was there a sense that either maybe he might not run or maybe wouldn’t be as formidable a foe as he turned out to be?
Downton: Well, I think that period of time may have been, in President Ford’s mind, he may have been thinking back to his Minority Leader days when they always used to say that the 11th commandment was not saying anything bad about a fellow Republican. And I think he didn’t realize that Reagan was as committed, that he was actually going to do this. And once it took hold, I think he realized, “Oh my, I’m being challenged in my own party.” And we had to go forward, we had to get into it, but it may have been like you said a little too late when it got going, unfortunately. I think that was tough. That hurt him. I think that hurt him. I think for a good period of time that became very strained. Because I remember once when I was still in California and Reagan was going to do some type of a commercial or an ad for the fellow who was running I think for governor at the time, and they came to President Ford’s office so they could do it together, it was very strained. Very, very strained.

Smith: Just the body language?

Downton: Yes, yes. And the poor guy for governor was completely out of it. He didn’t win. But it was very awkward, very strained. I think that hurt him to think that he would be so publicly challenged by someone in his own party. But he got over. He really did. There were many other times when he met with Reagan when Reagan was president and they would meet people together and whatever. He was always very cordial, very warm and whatever. I mean, he was not the type of person who held a grudge.

Smith: In November of 1976, obviously they had come from way behind. A lot of folks thought that it was a toss-up by election day. Where were you?

Downton: Actually, after he went to the residence that night, then I did go home. And so we continued watching on TV. There are still those who think that if he would’ve asked for a recount in Illinois, it could’ve been a different result. But he didn’t want any part of that, which I give him credit for. He could not talk anymore, he lost his voice at that point in time. The next morning, when it was still somewhat in doubt as to what was going to happen, I was in the office and Dave came with me that day, he was in the office with me, and President Ford came walking in the office. This was I think right before their announcement. And he said, “Well, it’s over.” And I said, “It doesn’t have to be it!” And he said, “Yes, it’s over. We’re going to do the announcement.” He gave me a big hug, he shook Dave’s hand, and said, “Thank you for all you’ve done. You helped me.” He was very gracious in that regard. But it was hard. I mean, it’s not easy to lose a national election, I don’t care what party it is. It’s not easy because you’re so into it. You’re so involved and there’s no way you can sit back and say, “Oh, okay.”

Smith: Did it take him awhile to get over it?

Downton: It did. He was quiet. He was thinking what he was going to do. I think he was quiet. I remember the day, you know how they do a formal come to the Oval Office and do a formal visit and whatever and it was the day when President Carter was going to come. I went in that morning and I had said to him, “Are you going to bring” I think I called him Mr. Carter, because he was not then president or whatever, President Elect, that was just not necessary, I said, “Are you going to bring Mr. Carter in to show him my office and your study?” And he said, “No, he’s coming here to see the Oval Office and I will show him the Oval Office.” I said, “Okay.” I thought this is really unusual. He just really cut me off.

So I went back to my office and I said to the steward on duty, “You know Carter is coming here today for a visit.” I said, “Would you have time?” - those silver frames I mentioned earlier, they get very tarnished. I said, “Would you have time today to clean up these silver frames just in case? We want everything to look real nice.” He said, “Oh, sure. Sure. I’ll take care of it.” And he did. Everything looked great. So, maybe about 11:00 o’clock, 11:30, I heard the door open. It was opened very hard. And I heard President Ford say, “Here’s the head” because, both being Navy men, that’s the term they used. He said, “Here’s the head and here’s the pantry and here’s my personal secretary.” And President Ford opened the door and he stood in the door and ushered President Carter in.

So I stood up and shook his hand and he said, “Hi, I’m Jimmy Carter.” And I felt like saying, “I know who you are. You don’t have to do this. You’re not campaigning,” or whatever. But I just said, “How do you do?” and whatever.
And then he said to me, “Where are you from?” And I said, “Michigan.” And he said, “Oh,” - you know, like that’s got to be the worst state of all fifty states as far as I’m concerned. And President Ford, bless his heart, said in a very commanding voice, “You don’t have to worry about her. She’s going with me.” And the look on President Carter’s face was, “Oh, I didn’t mean it that way.” But it was an awkward moment, and I really appreciated him stepping up and saying what he did. He stood in that doorway and didn’t go anywhere. And when Carter came in, I showed him the photos, the things on the wall and whatever, and he got quite a kick out of that. He thought that was really nice. But President Ford definitely said, “Oh, you don’t have to worry about this situation. She’s not going to be here.”

Smith: You wouldn’t think that day that they would become good friends.

Downton: No, not at all. It was very tense. I mean, he did what he needed to do, but from the way he cut me off that morning when I asked, “No, he’s coming to see the Oval Office. That’s what he’s going to see.” It was like, this was not his nature. And so I thought, “Oh, this isn’t going to play this way.” I’m glad that I did ask [the steward] and all because he did show him the study and everything looked great and that was a nice gesture on his part.

Smith: Do you remember the last days at the White House?

Downton: Yes.

Smith: What was that like?

Downton: I remember the last day, January 20, because I was in my office at the time clearing up, making sure I had everything that I needed to take. I was temporarily going to be in the transition office off on Lafayette Park and I wanted to be sure I had everything sent. And about 10:30 or so, 11:00 that morning, the White House telephone people came in and they needed to start changing the phones, and whatever. And so I thought, “Well, okay, this is about time.” And so I gathered up everything, made sure they had everything. Dave was with me at the time to help me carry what I needed to carry out and over to the other office. And so we left the White House and went over to the transition office there off Lafayette Park and got settled in. I was there for just a few weeks before we moved to California.

Smith: A couple of things and then we’ll wrap it up. You were in California you said through 1980?

Downton: I believe I left in November of 1980.

Smith: Clearly there had been this flirtation in ’79, early ’80 with running again. How did that evolve?

Downton: Well, what bothered me was when he came to the convention in Detroit. The Republican convention was in Detroit. And they had all of this talk about him being Reagan’s running mate. You know, and I’m in California getting upset. I was like, “Oh, no!” And so he called on the telephone to check on everything and I said, “What in the world is going on? I don’t like what I’m hearing.” He said, “Well, what are you hearing?” I said, “That you’re going to be his running mate!” And he just started laughing. He just said, “Dorothy, don’t believe everything you hear.” And I said, “Oh, okay. That’s all I need to know.”

Smith: That’s good enough for you.

Downton: Yeah. That’s good enough for me, yeah.

Smith: Had he thought about it? Had there been people who came to urge him to run for president?

Downton: I think there were some that did who said, “You should challenge. You should do it.” But I think the more he thought about it, it was like, “No, this is not what I need to do.”

Smith: Presumably Mrs. Ford might’ve weighed in.

Downton: Oh, yes. Yes.

Smith: She had no desire to go back into the political world.

Downton: No, no. They had served their time and done a tremendous job.
Smith: And of course this was just after the intervention and everything had taken place.

Downton: Exactly. Exactly. So she was still healing, they were both still going through that period. You know, where they needed time. And it worked out fine.

Smith: He seems to have adapted to the new life very easily. Whatever regrets he had, he seemed to have put behind him.

Downton: He did, because he kept busy. And see, I think this was his nature, too. In fact, I remember several Fridays where we’re getting ready to leave and he’d say, “So, we’ll see you tomorrow.” And I was like, “Tomorrow’s Saturday. Do we really have to come in tomorrow?” And he said, “Well, sure. There’s mail.” As long as he kept busy, he was fine. But he needed things to do. He needed his reading. He needed his newspapers, his magazines. One thing very nice that President Carter did do is that he did keep him updated. We got an update every week delivered by the Navy, actually, through San Diego. And he’d have to sign for them. And after he read them, he’d have to destroy them.

So he was kept up to date and that was very nice. He appreciated that a great deal. And those sorts of things, I think, helped fix that relationship. They became, as you said, very good friends and that was good. He did not hold a grudge. It was not in his personality, not his temperament. That’s all to his credit.

Smith: I remember, there’s a story, up in Vail, he walked to the post office to pick up the mail.

Downton: I believe it. I do believe it, yes. He was incredible. I think that work ethic was instilled in him at a very young age by his parents and he couldn’t break it. Why would he? It served him very well as a congressman, as Minority Leader.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Downton: Yes, actually, he came to the University of Michigan for the dedication of the business school that one of his friends was supporting. Several years ago, actually, it was my birthday, November 11th. I think it was in ’04, one or the other and he came and Mrs. Ford came, and they were going to be there for the dedication. Lee Simmons had told me they were going to be there and he said, “Come on over and see us.” So, I went over. That morning, it was an awful day, raining and whatever, but I went to the Campus Inn and they had arranged with the Secret Service to let me come up on the elevator and whatever and I met with Lee and John Nunn was there.

I visited with him and we had a nice visit. And I sat and chatted with him for maybe 15-20 minutes or so. Perfect gentleman. I took along photos to show him our house and things like that and he wanted to know what Dave was doing and I told him he was a railroad engineer. And he was astounded. I said, “He loves it! He loves it.” But we had a wonderful visit, just the two of us and he asked a lot of questions. I told him I was working for the Associated Press at the time. And he says, “You are?” And I said, “Yes, but I’m not a reporter. I’m an administrative assistant.” He said, “Oh, I know. That’s just fine.” He was in very good health and, like I say, a perfect gentleman.

Smith: Plus he loved to be back in Ann Arbor.

Downton: Oh, he loved it there. He did. It fit him like a glove. And when I got up to leave, I said, “Well, I’ve got to get to work and you’ve got things to do, so I’d better get on the road.” And I still remember, he was sitting on a couch, I was on one side and he was on the other and he stood up. I said, “You don’t have to get up.” And he said, “I have to get up to give such a nice lady a hug.” And I thought, “Oh, that’s really sweet!” And that’s the last time I saw him.

Smith: That’s a nice memory to have. Were you surprised by the reaction when he died? I was with the media part of the week and then with the family, and I know people in the media were amazed that there was this much reaction and it seemed to build as the week went on.

Downton: Yes, indeed. The folks here that I worked with at the Detroit AP, I think they were very surprised. They were on top of everything and we had our Washington correspondent and our Lansing correspondent. They were all in Grand Rapids. I saw them all at the funeral in various spots doing their job. Our photo editor and photographer were there. We had excellent coverage. I think they were surprised at the amount of outpouring and the genuine caring that people in western Michigan showed, the fact that they were there all night long in line. I think they were astounded. I remember our Lansing correspondent say she was shocked when she saw how many people came out in January weather with children in strollers, and they were there all night long. She was amazed. And these are hardcore news people who it takes a lot to amaze them.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Downton: I think he should be remembered as a great man who did what he needed to do for the country. Not always what he wanted to do, I mean, he really wanted to be Speaker of the House. That was not in the cards for him. But he did what he needed to do. He did what he thought was best at the time. I believe he used his best judgment. He went forward and I don’t think he had second thoughts then. I think he just kept going. He was a very compassionate man. Very, very disciplined man. Very religious man.

Smith: That didn’t always come across, did it?

Downton: No, that didn’t always come out. It didn’t, but he really was. He was very religious and I think that goes back to his mother, actually, and his stepfather. I think the upbringing in Grand Rapids, that is ingrained in you. It’s a quality that I think a lot of people today are missing, unfortunately. A very well-meaning man. I don’t think he had a mean bone in his body. He did what he thought was best at the time, and I hope he will be remembered in that light. He had some tough things he had to deal with and I think he did an excellent job. I was proud to be part of his staff and to be with him and to help in whatever I did. It was an honor.

Smith: And it sounds like he was a good boss.

Downton: He was a very good boss. He was strict. He was all business, but he was, he was a good boss. We would kid about working late or working on Saturday or Sunday, like I say, but we got used to it. That was part of it that was ingrained in him, and so then we did it. But, yeah, he was very detailed. I admired that a great deal. We got along well, we really did. I enjoyed it.

Smith: One last thing before I forget: Did he find it hard to fire people?

Downton: Yes. No, he was not comfortable with it. He was not comfortable, as I said earlier, with any in-fighting on the staff or any staff problems. In fact, I think that was one of the few times that Kennerly was not allowed in the Oval Office, was when I think it was with Secretary Schlesinger and he had to ask him to hand in his resignation. I think that was one of the few times he was not allowed in the office.

Smith: And that relationship was just, again, the chemistry didn’t work.

Downton: It didn’t, no, it didn’t jibe at all and you knew that. You knew that. You could see that from the different personalities. And that happens nowadays and you just need to move on. But he was a very caring man, I think. Very strong and determined in his own mind. He knew what he wanted to do and he did his best to do it.

Smith: He said that his greatest regret was that just as he had mastered the job, that he really learned how to be president, then he lost it.

Downton: Yes, then he was out of it. I still think that if that campaign would have lasted maybe two or three more days, I think that we could’ve had a different turn out. I really do. Or another week, or whatever. But if he had had three days, because he was coming on strong. He really was, he was really coming on strong. But it wasn’t to be and we made the best of it.

Smith: Well, they had a pretty good life afterwards.

Downton: Yes, they did. They had a good number of years, which is really good.

Smith: And really he kept his health right up until the last couple of years.

Downton: He did. Like, when I saw him, he was great. He was moving all around on his own and not needing any help. Like I said, “You don’t need to get up,” from the comfortable couch, but he insisted. He said, “Yes, of course I do.”
So, yeah, he was very much his own person. I think he was comfortable with who he was and I think that means a lot, too.

Smith: Especially to that office.

Downton: Oh yes. Yes.

Smith: Because we all see what happens to people who aren’t comfortable with themselves.

Downton: Exactly.

Smith: Dorothy, this is wonderful, really.

Smith: First of all, tell us about the road that led to your involvement with the Ford campaign in ‘76.

Bailey: Well, John Deardorff and I had started a political consulting firm, Bailey-Deardorff, in the late ‘60s after we both worked for Nelson Rockefeller in 1963 and ‘64. John stayed on as executive director of the party in New York and I went to Washington as staff director for the Wednesday Group of House Republican liberals. But we’d planned to create what Deardorff first called Campaign Consultants, Inc. It was the first national Republican political consulting there was; which became the first national political advertising firm, and we had some remarkable early successes. Whether we lucked into it - I tend to think we lucked into it - but in fact, we got pretty good at it. But because we were the first and because we had won a number of early races like Ed Brooke and Dick Schweiker and people like that, a lot of people came knocking on our door. We had sort of a pick and choice of candidates to work for and in that case, if that’s true, then your record ought to be a winning record.

Smith: Have you ever worked for a candidate you didn’t much like?

Bailey: In 1970 we got so big for our britches that we staffed up before we signed on the candidates. A big mistake because that gives you a burden of overhead costs that you have to meet, and therefore you have to have races, and therefore you have to work for certain candidates, whoever those candidates are. And we ended up working that year for two or three candidates in races that they didn’t win and probably shouldn’t have won. They weren’t bad people but we weren’t excited about it and we never made that mistake again. By and large our rule became, if you can’t vote for them, if in fact, you were registered to vote in that state and if you couldn’t vote for him, why on earth would you work for him?
In 1968 we had the opportunity to work for Nixon’s presidential campaign and turned it down because we didn’t like him. It doesn’t mean that he wasn’t a good president, in many respects, because I think he was. But he obviously had a paranoia that was dominant.

Smith: That’s interesting because, fairly or not, I assume by that point, you were tagged as at least moderate to liberal Republicans.

Bailey: We were tagged fairly as liberal Republicans. In fact, I still call myself a liberal Republican and I’m probably the only one around.

Smith: But see, that’s fascinating, and it gets back to your comment about the Wednesday Group. For today’s political junkie, describe a time there were enough liberal Republicans to form a Wednesday club.

Bailey: We had a Wednesday Group in the House which consisted of – at its high point – about two dozen members who some would call themselves liberal. Most would call themselves moderate or middle of the road. But the fact of the matter is, by today’s standards within the Republican Party, they were certainly liberal. This was John Lindsay, before he was mayor of New York was a Republican congressman from Manhattan who was among this group. Mac Mathias from Maryland, Brad Morse from Massachusetts.

Smith: Was Charley Goodell in that group?

Bailey: Charley Goodell was not in that group, although I think he was invited to be in that group. But he chose not to go quite that far to the left.

Smith: Until he became a senator.

Bailey: And this was a group that worked on a whole bunch of issues. They were very much against the Vietnam War, they were very much against the draft. The staff wrote a book with them, for them, on how to end the draft; which became the formula by which the draft was ended in this country.

Smith: Is it safe to say these people were, whether they wanted to be or not, labeled as Rockefeller Republicans?
Bailey: Well, they certainly were labeled as Rockefeller Republicans. For some that was not a fair description. Bob Ellsworth from Kansas was in the Wednesday Group and very active in it, but he was a very active Nixon man, for example. He was one of those that met with us to invite us to join the Nixon campaign, in fact. But this was a pretty liberal group of people. Browning Reed from New York – by today’s standards totally unacceptable within the Republican Party. They wouldn’t even be talked to.

Smith: That raises a huge question. And that is, how did this group get along with, and more importantly, how did Ford, as House Republican Leader, get along with this group?

Bailey: Well, Ford’s leadership in the House was the result of his easy going, welcoming personality. He was not an ideologue in any sense of the term. He was a pretty conservative guy, but ideology did not dominate his world. And therefore he got along with moderates in the House. He was able to talk with them; they were able to talk with him. And this was a group that was instrumental in getting – I’ve forgotten even what the leadership fight was - but Charlie Halleck became the Republican leader largely because this group encouraged and pushed him along.

Smith: Okay, first Halleck had beaten Joe Martin back in the late ‘50s. Then after the Goldwater disaster Ford knocks off Halleck.

Bailey: I think some of this group helped Halleck in the first place, and then helped Ford against Halleck.

Smith: Right. That makes perfect sense.

Bailey: You’re bringing it back to me. I mean, the fact is that both Halleck and Ford were pretty open people and they were open in the middle. Open to the right and open to the left. And were not ideologues in any sense of the term.

Smith: There is such a focus – understandably – by the media and others on ideology as the defining component in these contests. I guess the older I get, the more I wonder if generational factors aren’t at least as important, particularly in an institution like the House.
Bailey: I’ll tell you one thing, Richard, that I think is enormously important that has been lost here, and it doesn’t have much to do with generation, and it doesn’t have much to do with ideology. New members of the House now, and this has been true now for close to twenty years, fifteen years, anyway – new members of the House tend to leave their families back in the district. They don’t come to Washington with their families, with their wives. And the reason they don’t is that they are told that it is so busy that they won’t have time to do that.

But one of the factors is, and I don’t mean as a conscious decision by Gingrich or others, but one of the things that was changed when he caused that to happen was, when the wives stay home back in the districts, they are not here to be sort of the social glue that brings a whole bunch of people together. I mean, there were dinner parties where Democrats actually went and had dinner with Republicans – can you imagine such a thing? And they liked each other. They got to know each other. There was a social life that enabled people then to talk to each other when they saw each other on the floor. I don’t believe that Republicans talk to Democrats. They don’t.

Smith: But another factor – when you stop to think - forty years ago, if you were a newcomer, whether it was the House or the Senate, particularly the Senate, but the House as well – the fact of the matter is, each party had wings. I was talking to Vice President Mondale about this – Bob Dole talks about when he arrived here, he was told to be sure and spend time with Senator Stennis. He’ll show you the ropes. But even within your own caucus, if you were a Mondale arriving in Washington in the mid ‘60s, there was still a substantial Southern conservative – hostile to civil rights – wing of the party. And by the same token, there was a liberal wing of the Republican Party, so that inside the party you had to learn to work with people who were your ideological opponents.

Bailey: Probably the biggest difference in politics between the years when Bailey-Deardorff was active and today, is that in both houses of the Congress there were a whole variety of people, in both parties, who were more interested in getting things done on their particular areas of interest, than they were in perfection of some ideology. It just is true. And Bailey-Deardorff became, and this is bringing it back to your first question, Bailey-Deardorff became particularly effective for some reason that I’m not sure I quite understand, in working in gubernatorial campaigns and candidates for governor. Governors actually govern. They have to do something. They can’t sort of just pontificate all day long.

Smith: Or play to the base.

Bailey: They have to get things done and the way they get things done, particularly in states where the members of the two parties are competitive, is to work with people on both sides of the aisle to form their majorities to get their legislation through. To me it was very instructive the other day when the (Sotomayor) nomination in the Senate was approved. There were nine Republican votes for her. Those nine included four of the six former governors; former Republican governors who are in the Senate and those four were all from states like Ohio and New Hampshire and Tennessee and Missouri that are competitive with both parties. Governors understand that in order to get anything done, you’ve got to work with the other side.

The two governors, by the way, former governors in the Senate who didn’t support her were from South Dakota and Idaho, where governing tends to be a one party function. So there is a different mentality entirely to those who are effective in that office. Same thing is true of mayors and same thing is true of presidents. Somehow we’ve allowed legislatures to sort of pontificate and think that ideology is everything; and in fact, my judgment seriously gets in the way of good government much of the time.

Smith: Gerald Ford, when he was in office, was widely seen as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. In very short order, however, he was virtually marooned in his own party – I mean once out of office. But even in ’76, he was targeted by an almost successful insurrection on the right. One senses that if it was purely an emotional decision – if you consulted people’s hearts rather than their heads or their pocketbooks – that he might not have prevailed at the convention. Did Watergate create the vacuum in which, for lack of a better word, the hard right was able to seize the initiative and define the party?
Bailey: Well, Watergate certainly helped. It is very interesting. Nixon will be forever remembered by Watergate and justifiably so. There’s not any doubt about that, but what is truly interesting is that his domestic policy legislation accomplishments and proposals were radical by comparison to his party and by comparison to what the Republican Party stands for today.

Smith: I’ve often called him the last New Deal president. He’s the ultimate pragmatist, some would say cynic – and he was the last president, arguably, to be guided by the long shadow of FDR and what was perceived to be the New Deal political consensus about the role of government. So COLAs and OSHA and EPA – all of that expansion of government wasn’t necessarily because Richard Nixon in his heart particularly wanted it, but because his political calculating machine told him that that’s what the consensus required if he were to be re-elected.

Bailey: And so when Nixon was rejected by the country and by his party, it was convenient also to reject most everything he had worked for. But I think the Goldwater movement before Nixon’s presidency had laid the basis and there was this charismatic fellow, who was elected in ’66 in California as governor, Reagan, who was remarkably effective.

Smith: And there are many who believe to this day, that he actually came a lot closer even in ’68 at that convention in Miami; that if it had not been for Strom Thurman holding the South, and for whatever happened in New Jersey - people forget how close a run thing it was.

Bailey: And so comes 1976. Here you have this natural heir of the Goldwater, of the Republican Party, particularly the Republican Party that had been freed of Nixon. I mean, remove Nixon from the Republican Party and then what’s left – the natural heir to that is Ronald Reagan. There isn’t any question about that. But he’s not the president. The sitting president, the incumbent President of the United States is Gerald Ford. Who is not, by the way, an ideologue. He is not.

Smith: And is it fair to say that Reagan, which is part of the dynamic why these two men really never much cared for each other, went to each one’s definition of legitimacy. That is to say, Reagan really did believe that the Republican Party is a hierarchal place and it was his turn. That he was the natural choice and Watergate only enhanced that. That philosophically he was where the Republican Party was and was going; and therefore, to break the Eleventh Commandment didn’t really count because there was a greater good. Whereas, obviously, the Ford partisans said you don’t challenge an incumbent president, particularly one who is trying as hard under such difficult circumstances. Plus, he’s the only Republican that has a chance of winning in November.

Bailey: I’ve never thought that the challenge by Reagan against Ford in the primaries was inappropriate. It would mean that if Ford wasn’t the better person in my judgment to be the candidate(?) but nonetheless, I didn’t think that was wrong. What may have been wrong was how little support Reagan gave to Ford after he was chosen, because that was something that was unfortunate.

Smith: Did Reagan make Ford a better candidate? Because the argument has gone on for years that Ford, by being pushed the way he was, became a better speaker, became – fill in the blank.

Bailey: It is certainly true that he became a better speaker. It is certainly true that the Reagan candidacy helped him focus. It was also a significant distraction in the sense that all the political thought process – I don’t mean the President’s himself – but everybody else’s thought process – was about how to get the nomination, not how to win the election. There were a lot of things that if the Ford White House had gotten an earlier start on, I don’t think Ford would have faced the difficulties that he faced against Carter. I think also, that the Reagan challenge created such a divide within the Republican Party, that was one of the reasons why Ford was so far behind, so late in the game. But I do think you can argue that Ford became a better candidate because of some of the things that Reagan did. But his candidacy was all the more difficult because of what Reagan did.

Smith: There is a school of thought that says that the Ford White House waited too long; that they were somewhat naïve; that they tended to underestimate either the probability of Reagan actually challenging him; and/or Reagan’s strength once he did. That it was a White House that perhaps was asleep at the switch, to some degree.

Bailey: Well, clearly, they underestimated. And I think, clearly, they severely misjudged whether the primary battle was over once they had won the very early battles. I’m not a good one in all of this Richard, because you know we didn’t join the campaign until the convention or immediately thereafter. And one of the reasons that we didn’t join the campaign, I suspect, I don’t know, nobody has ever said this to me, but it’s bound to be true, that Bailey-Deardorff was so moderate and so liberal that we would become an issue in the primaries.

Smith: What do you remember of the convention? Because we’ve heard from a number of people who have bittersweet memories; who recall a convention of a party that was clearly very, very divided. And that did not necessarily leave Kansas City healed.

Bailey: Oh, they were divided. There wasn’t any question about that. I don’t really remember those parts of the convention. We were there to do a bunch of filming and taping and we were there to get as much as we could get for potential use in the general.

Smith: Let me go back. How were you hired for the fall campaign? How did that happen?

Bailey: As a practical matter, the Ford campaign had no money. They could not hire an agency for the fall campaign until they were the nominee of the party under the very new campaign finance laws. So, once the California primary was done, they had been through two or three agencies, and we don’t need to discuss them. Some of them were bizarre. Teeter and a couple of others told us clearly that we were going to be hired immediately after the convention. And to come to the convention and get this done and start working on the plan now because you’re it.

Smith: Who was running the campaign at that point?
Bailey: Our sense was that at that point, the people that we had contact with, that in effect running it, were Teeter, Cheney, Spencer.

Smith: Tell us about Bob Teeter.

Bailey: The class act of politics. I mean there were pollsters and then there were pollsters. This is a fellow who understood the statistical theory, understood the shortcomings of polls, but also understood what polls could do. And he was remarkably accurate, remarkably even tempered, an absolute joy to work with, and he would never, ever disagree with you directly. In fact, I thought about this many, many times; if you watched Teeter in a meeting, and somebody said something that you knew that Teeter disagreed with, Teeter would say, “That’s right, and?” and then he would launch off in the exact opposite position. His capacity to communicate effectively was brilliant. And he had the very deep trust and affection of almost anybody who he ever worked with and for.

Smith: And that transcended ideology?

Bailey: Yeah. If you asked me today, what was Teeter’s ideology? I have no idea; I have none.

Smith: Now, Stu is a powerful figure. We spent about six hours with Stu.

Bailey: Six enjoyable hours?

Smith: Just a delight. Lots of laughter, a few gasps along the way, but the semi-famous story about what he went in and told the President – do you know what I’m talking about?

Bailey: I’m not sure. I don’t think I ought to admit that I know until I know what it is.

Smith: Okay. He was not terribly happy, I think he was going through a divorce, and he sort of took this job in part just to get out of Dodge. And he arrived and he found chaos. But, it’s the end of a week and it’s not been a great week and it’s a lousy, dreary, rainy Friday and he has this unenviable task of basically dissuading the President from going out and campaigning, pressing the flesh as much as he likes to. He’s tried all sorts of euphemisms, and he was in the Oval Office and the only two people there besides him and the President was Dick Cheney. Finally, Stu being Stu, he just sort of snaps because the President is not getting it. Stu says, “Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you are a fucking lousy campaigner.” And, one, the fact that he could say it to Ford tells you volumes; but it’s the sequel that makes the story - because in the Germond-Witcover book that appeared, that story was there. And Stu was embarrassed, angry, humiliated. He called Cheney to chew him out for telling him this story. Dick lets him go on and on and on and he finally says, “You know, Stu, there was a third person in that room.” And the fact that Ford told the story on himself multiplies the impact. I mean, it tells you a lot about Stu, but it tells you even more about Gerald Ford.

Bailey: Exactly. It’s one of the dominant facts of the Ford campaign that, until the very end, until the last few weeks, wherever he would go, his poll numbers went down. It’s just astonishing.

Smith: What were the factors that you attribute that to?

Bailey: I have no idea. Well, I shouldn’t say that.

Smith: Well, the factors that led – what we’ve heard is one of the themes of the Ford presidency is the learning curve involved in having spent a quarter of a century in the minority, in the House, and in effect, outgrowing that and learning to be an executive, learning to be a president. At the same time that all this learning is going on, in the furnace of a white-hot campaign, the part of Gerald Ford that loved, as long as he was able to do it, getting in a plane and going to some obscure place on the map, and talking to an obscure audience and eating undistinguished food, and delivering undistinguished oratory - that was just mother’s milk to Gerald Ford. And that presumably carried over. Plus there are those that believe that the White House speech operation was subpar in some ways. Anyway, the combination of all those things…

Bailey: Here’s my view of the reason his polls suffered whenever he went anywhere. It wasn’t a negative reaction to him as much as it was a reminder that he was the president and he succeeded Richard Nixon, and that if you focus on Ford, you like Carter. If you focused on Carter, Ford had a chance. That was certainly true throughout the general election. One of the theories of the campaign as far as we were concerned, was keep the focus on Jimmy Carter. If the question in voters’ minds was do I know enough about Jimmy Carter? And then Gerald Ford would be elected president. If the question was do I think that Gerald Ford ought to be re-elected, then Jimmy Carter would win.

Smith: Let me understand though; was that primarily because people saw Ford as Richard Nixon’s heir, as Richard Nixon’s pardoner, or because of some set of qualities that Ford…?

Bailey: I think it’s a combination of things. Part of it is this is Richard Nixon’s choice and Richard Nixon is a traitor to this country. That’s the worst possible, right? Part of it was, to independents anyway, and to those in the middle, Nixon led us down the wrong road. It would be wise to put all of this behind us, let’s move on to something else. And part of it was that Gerald Ford – they really didn’t know [him] and some of the things that they got to know about him such as the pardon and such as Saturday Night Live and so forth, were not particularly attractive. So you put all those things together, and you don’t want the public focusing on Ford, you want the public focusing on Carter. Now, does this mean that everybody voted that way? No. But that group of people undecided, in the middle who were going to swing, could conceivably swing one way or the other, all fell into this description, whereby if the election was going to be determined by those people, you wanted those people thinking about Jimmy Carter and who is this guy?

Smith: That raises a couple of things because what may be the single most effective jingle in modern American politics. Maybe it was all about redefining Ford, or reminding people why they ought to like Ford, but “I’m feeling good about America,” brilliantly both in a head-on way and a soft-sell fashion, reminded people by the summer of ’76 that the mood of the country very different from what it had been two years earlier. And some responsibility, some credit for that had to go to the man in the White House.

Bailey: Well, there isn’t any question that that was part of what was true and people, I think, saw this. They didn’t equate it necessarily with Gerald Ford, but it’s very difficult when you are speaking to young people, and I’m sure you’ve had the same experience, you’re speaking to young people and they can’t imagine what the hell you are talking about when you talk about the state of the country in 1974 and 1975 and what it had been through for the last ten-twelve years. Just an incredible period of time where the emotions of the country had been rubbed raw. After the Kennedy assassination and the civil rights riots and Bobby’s assassination and Martin Luther King and the civil rights laws and Vietnam and Watergate, suddenly there was this calm. And there was this calm guy who was President of the United States.

Smith: And the press thought it was dull.

Bailey: Correct. And by comparison, it certainly was. But to most people, you could make that argument. You didn’t want to overdo it, but you could make that argument and the music was not about Gerald Ford, the music was about the country.

Smith: Where did it come from – the idea and the execution?

Bailey: I wish that Bailey-Deardorff could claim all the credit in the world; we can’t claim any of it. It was a guy by the name of Bob Gardner in San Francisco, an advertising guy who had been there during the primaries, who wrote it and we loved it. Everybody loved it. We had also had some experience in working with music in campaigns, and we thought it was the right thing to do and used it as the backdrop for both five minute stuff and for thirty second and one minute ads and used it throughout the campaign, I suspect in your lifetime and mine, it probably is the most familiar piece of political music that either one of us can think of.

Smith: Let me go back. This notion of fashioning a campaign strategy to re-elect a candidate who had this impact on the voters, for whatever reason; and in a sense, making it about his opponent and not him. At some point, presumably, you must have been in the business that Stu had been in. I mean, finding the language to explain this to the principle. How did the strategy get set, what was his reaction, and was this something that happened after the convention?
Immediately after the convention, we had been working on it immediately before the convention and during the convention, but immediately after the convention, we gave to the President and to Jim Baker, who then came on to take charge, basically, and to Cheney and to Teeter and to Spencer and the whole crew, gave to them an advertising plan and we said, “Look, we haven’t got enough time to debate every day what we ought to do. We need to have a plan that says here we are on the 20th of August, or whenever it was, and here’s the election and here’s what we’re going to do and here’s what we’re going to do and here’s what we’re going to do. And we’re going to go do it, but we want you to see this plan and to sign off and say go do it. And as long as we do that, when we’re done with something, before it goes on the air, we’ll bring it back and let you see it.”

By the way, President Carter never looked at any of his advertising before it went on the air. Amazing. We’ll show you what we’ve done, but we want you to see it in advance. We don’t want to have this debate every morning at seven o’clock. And when we come up with an idea that is contrary to this, then we’ll debate it and discuss it. We just simply said that’s the way we operate, and in this particular campaign we haven’t got enough time to approach it any other way. So we gave them this advertising plan, which is exactly the plan that was followed with one exception on one ad. We can talk about that. But part of the theory was, you know, America has a president it doesn’t even know. This is the only guy - and we weren’t telling anybody any secrets – the only guy ever been in the White House that has never run nationally and therefore the public really doesn’t know him. They don’t know him, they don’t know his family. They don’t know all the things that they normally know about a president or a candidate for president. They don’t know as much about him as they know about Carter in many respects.

Is part of that because – I always describe Ford as the least self-dramatizing president in memory?

A large part of it. I mean, this was an ordinary guy. This is a wonderfully simple, straightforward, ordinary guy.

David Broder said he was the least neurotic president in my lifetime.
Bailey: Correct.

Smith: And did he pay a price for that?

Bailey: Well, I don’t know.

Smith: In the short term?

Bailey: Yes and no. The reason I say I don’t know is that if you make Gerald Ford neurotic, then what have you got?

Smith: But how do you dramatize vanilla? Or decency? An Eagle Scout – how do you sell…?

Bailey: One of the things you did, and this is part of what we did, was to tell the story of Gerald Ford and his family. Back in those days there were such things as five minute spots and we did them and we had the music and we had great footage and we had great people. The whole family was like him. They were ordinary, honest-to-God people.

Smith: Let me ask you because I remember, twenty-five years later, the reaction from people who did not know the story about his mother and his birth father. In some ways he was an astonishingly contemporary figure in that he was the product of a broken home with a gutsy mother who was ahead of her time in a great many ways, and all of that. But that part of the family story, I don’t think, really ever got through to the public. Was it because you didn’t talk about those things in those days? Was he reticent about it? Or because no one thought it was politically advantageous?

Bailey: I don’t think it was because it was a conscious decision not to talk about that because it was dangerous. What is true, one of the prices that we pay for the kind of advertising world that we’re in is that you have to make choices as to what you say and what you don’t say. I don’t mean choices about keep telling the truth and ignoring falsehoods or whatever. It is more when you’ve only got thirty seconds, or only got sixty seconds, or you’ve only got five minutes. What is it that isn’t known about this guy that you want to be known. And if you had to make choices, the clear first choice was get the family out there, because that’s an all-American family.
Smith: Including Mrs. Ford?

Bailey: Absolutely. Absolutely, because her story resonated with people.

Smith: Was there a divide in the White House? One senses that when the famous Sixty Minutes interview was done there was a disconnect between the immediate reaction – because everyone fights the last war – the immediate reaction of people in the White House who thought, “Oh my God,” and the startling, to them, reality that America had changed and was changing. That particularly post-Watergate, her candor, her outspokenness, epitomized almost more than anything Gerald Ford himself could do, the desire to restore honesty, authenticity, whatever you want to call it, to the White House. They didn’t realize what a political asset she was.

Bailey: Correct. And frankly, I’m not sure that anybody in the campaign appreciated it. But there was an instinctive judgment that made the Nixon paranoia - cover it up, hide it, don’t let anybody see the truth - was exactly the wrong thing to do with the anti-Nixon candidate. And therefore, the notion of openness and candor and let it all hang out was essential – politically essential. If you could not trust this guy, how in heaven’s name are you ever going to vote for him? You have to have that measure of trust, and trust only comes from candor.

Smith: Did she help with woman voters?

Bailey: A lot.

Smith: There were those famous buttons, “Vote for Betty’s Husband.”

Bailey: Sure. I don’t think it was as prominent as in later years. We’ve come to think about the gender split and so forth. I don’t think that was as prominent in those days, but I don’t think there is any question that she was talking about things and experiencing things that women across the country knew about.

Smith: Yeah. I want to ask you – I’m jumping around here – but, you mentioned in your book about a five minute ad that, I guess, never ran. Tell us about that and what it was supposed to do and why it didn’t run.
Five minute ads were four and a half minutes in length – the first thing you learn about them, and they were common on network TV. Remember than in 1976 most TV was network TV, not cable. They ran in the last five minutes, last four and a half minutes of an hour segment. And so they tended not to interrupt prime time, but they tended to be five minutes of eight, or eleven twenty-five, or something like that – some time period like that. The interesting thing about a five minute spot - I’m spending some time on it because I think it’s important for you to distinguish. Two interesting things about a five minutes spot: one is, with thirty second advertising, in order to make your point, the campaign has to run the ad often enough so that you can see it probably three, four, five times, because you are not tuned into it. It comes and goes, and more often than not, you don’t even get the point. But if you see it five or six times, it can start to sink in on you. Five minutes, by and large, you only really need to see once, because if it’s well produced it gets your attention, “Ah, this is interesting,” and you settle in and you start to understand what is being said.

The certain thing about a five minute spot, the difference between it and thirty seconds – I can make a thirty second spot, Richard, to get you to vote against my opponent – in thirty seconds. Because all you really need to know is one thing to vote against him. But if you’re going to vote for somebody, you need to know more than one thing, you need to know their personality, you need to know their stands on issues, you need to know quite a bit about them. You need to know a kind of full story. So thirty seconds is great to get that one thing across that causes you to vote against somebody.

Five minutes is a lot of time to get a story across with a beginning and an end that reinforces. In that context, there were three or four five minute ads that were planned for Ford. And then one, and this is the only diversion that there was from the initial advertising plan that we did for the campaign, it struck me that there was an opportunity to do a five minute ad that would run in the last week of the campaign that was so powerful that it could reach out and grab hold of you and shake you and turn people’s votes around. Now, that’s a very risky thing to do if you are ahead in the polls. You don’t want to turn people’s votes around, but if you think you’re going to lose, then if there is a way to reach out, responsibly reach out and grab you and shake you and make you not so certain of how you were going to vote; whether you were going to vote for Ford or Carter or are undecided. If you could turn the whole electorate into undecided, if otherwise you were going to lose, that would be pretty good because you had another chance at it.

There was one opportunity that we had, and that was to create a five minute spot that emotionally rang all of those bells of the last twelve years. Of the assassinations, of the wars, of Watergate, and to reinforce emotionally with people what they had been through. To take them through that again, and shake them in a way that caused them to rethink how they were going to vote. Now, if you could do that, it would be pretty interesting.

There was an opportunity in September - we were filming where the President was speaking before a crowd at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, and he was giving a sort of standard stump speech to a crowd of mostly students, but a lot of others. Very enthusiastic and so forth, and Betty Ford was there and it was very exciting and just as he was saying the words about trust – and you have to trust your president, it’s not good enough to say trust me, trust must be earned, it was the words he was using – and that really was a comment about Jimmy Carter’s being an unknown person. Just as he was saying this, as we were filming it, a shot ran out and the President looks up and looks down and he keeps speaking, but he kept looking around and there was a bunch of scurrying and the audience was looking and everybody was scared to death.

This is a president who had already gone through two assassination attempts, and it was an instant reminder to everybody in the room of the assassinations that we had been through and yet he keeps making this point about trust, trust must be earned. He gets to the conclusion a few seconds later, and people stand and applaud and he wipes the sweat off his brow and looking up in the gallery and everybody then realizes that, in fact, it was a cherry bomb - that some prankster had set off a cherry bomb in the audience. There was a sort of sense of relief, but what an interesting opportunity because we captured every bit of it on film.
So I went back to New York and with some very competent editors put together some man in the street stuff about how Ford had really done remarkable things and the economy was looking up, we were at peace and all that kind of stuff. And then some introduction of Ford and how he is seen by a variety of people and then it brings to this audience in Ann Arbor and he is speaking, and there is no introduction of this. There is no warning on the film of this, and suddenly there is this shot and it just horrifies you. And then things calm down a little bit and the announcer says, voice over says, “There is a new calm in America these days,” I can’t remember the exact words, “After Vietnam, after Watergate, after all we have been through, when a president can parade openly through the streets of Dallas,” the picture shifts to a president in an open limousine waving with a very thick bullet-proof vest, I might add, waving to the crowds in Dallas as his car goes through the city, “There has been a change that’s come over America. The people and their president are back together again.” And then he gets out of the car, and now we have morphed into another scene, I think it’s in New Orleans or maybe Mississippi, I don’t remember which, but he’s getting out of the car and diving into the crowds and you pick up a sentence of his from the convention speech and so forth and wrap it up.

But basically what this was an effort to do was to say to that voter, “Do you understand what this election is all about? Do you remember what we have been through? How are you going to vote? How are you going vote? After all you have been through and now you have a president that has calmed the waters of this country, how are you going to vote?” And so I finish it and we put this together, of course, at a time when we were way behind in the polls, but throughout the production time and by the time we take it to the campaign, and to Jim Baker and Spencer and Cheney and the rest, there are now maybe three weeks left. We had started closing the gap significantly and were making some steady progress. I showed it for people in the campaign and they just went crazy. First of all, the Secret Service just has a nightmare and I’m respectful of this, I mean, in their mind, it is inviting the nut cases to come forward. But in the campaign, Jim Baker in particular just thinks this is nutty, absolutely screwy, I have a screw loose someplace.
Smith: He understood what you were trying to do?

Bailey: Yup. But he said, you’re going to lose the state of Texas. And I said, “Well, forgive me but aren’t we going to lose the state of Texas anyway? He said, “John Connally tells me that we will carry the state of Texas. But you can’t make a reference to Dallas that way without losing the state of Texas.” We did lose the state of Texas by 500,000 votes.

Smith: Was that an unfortunately Texas-centric viewpoint for the campaign manager to have?

Bailey: Well, it’s not unusual. Jim Baker is great, but he’s like all the rest of us. You start talking about my state, then I’m going to have better views about my state than you do. I know more about my state than you do. That’s the view of everybody.

Smith: Did the President see it?

Bailey: I don’t know, not from me.

Smith: Which raises a larger question, how did that work? He presumably passed judgment on his own...

Bailey: We provided to the White House, to Dick Cheney, and to the campaign all the ads before anything ran, and I’m absolutely certain that he looked at all of them. I don’t know to this day whether he ever saw this ad. Among other things, it never ran, so nobody would ever feel that it was necessary. There was another very big doubter for very interesting reasons. Bob Teeter did not like the ad; he was really worried about the ad for two reasons. One is he wanted to see, and perfectly appropriately, he wanted to see if he could, how a focus group would react to the ad. Because here’s this theory that everybody is going to change their minds. Okay, fair enough. His second theory – and I’ll tell you how the focus group turned out in a minute – or I’ll tell you how they told me the focus groups turned out in a minute. The second reason was be wary about Texans talking about Texas and be even more wary of Michiganders talking about Ohio and Ohioans talking about Michiganders. Now, you know as well as anybody, that there is no bigger sports rivalry than there is between Ohio and Michigan. Now, I’m an Ohioan, Teeter isn’t – he’s a Wolverine – he’s not only from Michigan, he’s from Ann Arbor. So his view was that this would cost us the state of Ohio. If you show all those University of Michigan students and Ford speaking at the University of Michigan in an ad, you’ll lose Ohio.

Smith: Fascinating.

Bailey: Now, I think – I can’t prove it – I think that’s an exaggeration.

Smith: That does raise a large question. Are campaigns, like government, better at preventing things from happening than making them happen? When creativity rears its ugly head?

Bailey: It is true in government that almost anybody can shoot it down. If it’s up there, it’s going to be shot down. And in this case, there were a number of people who had some serious doubts. And in the end, by the way, I was among those who agreed that it should not run, but not for the reasons that they gave. Remember that this was designed for a campaign we felt pretty sure we were going to lose. But in the last week we were gaining so much momentum that it was perfectly believable that we were going to win the election, and you know as well as I do that on Saturday before the election, the Gallup polls put Ford ahead. So the conclusion was that we shouldn’t run it and this was intended for the last week, and I agreed with it, that we shouldn’t run it. Maybe I was also bowing to the inevitable because they did hold a focus group and the focus group just hated the ad. My reaction to that was, “Yes, so they hated the ad. So what’s the next conclusion?” Because if you show an ad to a focus group and then ask their opinion of the ad – what are they going to say?

Smith: This is my problem with focus groups: it’s like keeping a diary. Keeping a diary is a distortion. You may set out to be as truthful and honest a reporter as possible, but the very fact that you are keeping a diary is…And a focus group, by the same token…

Bailey: If you are going to take a test after you’ve seen something, you’d probably watch it a little differently, but it doesn’t really matter. The whole theory of this ad was, of course they are not going to like it. That’s why it was designed to shake them up. If it was designed to shake them up, of course they are not going to like it. That’s what they are going to tell you. That doesn’t mean that it doesn’t necessarily work to our benefit in the long run. And let me add one more thing: when I said this, of course, they would just go bonkers. I said, “You understand, I’m not saying that as a result of this, that Ford might not lose much bigger than he would otherwise. What I’m saying is, force voters to rethink when you know collectively what they think now is going to hurt you, and when they rethink that, it might hurt you more.

Smith: You can imagine, or at least I can imagine sitting here listening to you, I can imagine an ad that would eliminate the Ohio-Michigan rivalry, almost in the style of the famous daisy ad. A series of sledge hammers, black and white images that would absolutely hit you over the head with a two by four about the turmoil of the last decade. I mean, just as simple as that; that in fact brings you to this oasis.

Bailey: It was an extraordinarily emotional moment for this country. And that if you could cause people to remember what they had been through and then cause them to realize that after all they had through, my God, there’s this nice guy who is President of the United States and I feel good.

Smith: You said - by the way, I think you’re right – the last minute Gallup poll that showed Ford ahead may very well have contributed paradoxically to his defeat. Why do you believe that?

Bailey: It goes back to something I said earlier. I think the basic thesis of the campaign, from my standpoint, was that it was going to be decided by people in the middle who, if when they went to vote, the dominant thought they had was, “I don’t know enough about Jimmy Carter,” then Ford is going to win. Those same people, if the dominant thought or the first thought they had is, “That guy Ford really shouldn’t be president,” or “Ford was chosen by Nixon,” or “Ford was…,” whatever. Then Carter was going to win. If they’re thinking about Carter, Ford’s going to win. If they’re thinking about Ford, Carter’s going to win. And as long as the polls – we didn’t have twenty polls a day, which we do now – but as long as the polls seem to say Carter’s going to win, Carter’s going to win, Carter’s going to win, then my thought as one of those voters in the middle is, “God, who is this guy? I really don’t know enough about him.” And so that’s the thought that’s going to be on my mind when I go vote, so I’m going to vote for Ford.

Smith: Wasn’t it also true that literally days before the election there were some economic numbers that came out. Alan Greenspan dubbed it The Pause, which may be fine in theoretical circles, but given the heightened emotions of that period, it just reinforced people’s doubts about the recovery, and the President. You had come so far, but when it became clear that you had come that far, people just kind of sat back and said, “Well, do I really want four more years of this?”

Bailey: One of the undeniable things about a close election, Richard, is that you can find a hundred, if not a thousand, reasons to explain what happened. I think there were some economic numbers that might have contributed. I think the poll might have contributed in a negative way for us. I think and I have said this publicly, so I might as well say it again, I think that the performance of Bob Dole in that campaign, particularly in the debate with Walter Mondale, probably cost some voters. I don’t know how many who were planning to vote on Ford, they were thinking about Ford, they were thinking about Ford, they get in the voting booth and they realize that they can’t vote for Ford without voting for Dole and they go the other way. I think that’s possible. There are so many explanations for any election that is that close.

Smith: You had an alternate vice presidential candidate in mind, didn’t you? Or at least if you could have made the selection?

Bailey: It wasn’t ________, it wasn’t John, but it is our understanding that the group that met with the President on the night before he made his selection public, left that meeting believing that Bill Ruckelshaus would be the vice presidential choice. Now, others that you’ve talked to probably have already told you what happened. I don’t know exactly what happened, but obviously the next morning the choice was Bob Dole. Although Ruckelshaus was called, it’s my understanding he was called and told to get himself to Kansas City.
Smith: Really?

Bailey: Bill Ruckelshaus would be a very interesting interview for you.

Smith: Absolutely. And he presumably would have been the surest defense against the Nixon hangover?

Bailey: I think so. Let’s put it this way, what does Bob Dole do for you in terms of the Nixon hangover? I think the answer is nothing. Bill Ruckelshaus is clear evidence of a sort of anti-Nixon behavior.

Smith: Do you think they were worried about a floor fight? And if they’d gone with Ruckelshaus there might have been?

Bailey: Quite possibly. And when I say I don’t know what happened, I suspect there probably was some communication with Reagan or Reagan’s people that caused Ford to pull back. That’s my guess.

Smith: Yeah. I have to ask you about the New York Post headline, “Ford Ad Man Linked to Porn.” Far be it from the New York Post to try to…

Bailey: This was before Rupert Murdoch bought the Post, that’s how bad this story is. We did a bunch of man in the street commercials.

Smith: Where did that come from? Was a technique that you had used in other campaigns?

Bailey: Yes, we had done that in some other campaigns, and we liked to think that we sort of invented it for the political genre, anyway.

Smith: Why don’t we see that more today?

Bailey: Lazy. Or maybe they don’t understand that real people, not reality TV, but real people are probably the last believable people there are in terms of politics, anyway. We can talk a little more about that, but we did them sort of coast to coast with a film crew that had worked with Bailey-Deardorff for years; cameraman, soundman, and assistant. The soundman was a fellow by the name of Michael Scott Goldbaum, and he worked out of New York and he was spectacularly good. I had suggested to him that he take all of the sound tapes of those interviews and, if he wanted to, do some work and put together some radio commercials of man in the street, and get them to me and I would be happy to take a look at them and see if we could play some.

And so he was doing that in his studio in New York under a gigantic poster that said, “Ford is Making Us Proud Again.” But that wasn’t all he was doing. He was also interviewing for lead roles in some porn film that he was doing. And so he would have women come in and be interviewed and auditioned for the job. Obviously, we didn’t know anything about this, but somebody at the New York Post discovered it and a woman reporter by the name of Lindsey Van Gelder, went and applied for the job. Now, I don’t know how deep into the interview she went…

Smith: It sounds more like a porn name than a reporter’s name.

Bailey: In any event, I got this call, this is now the Thursday before the election, I get the call. I’m in New York at a production studio and I get a call from the New York Post saying, “Did you know that your soundman is doing this, and what in heaven’s name are you up to? Do you know about this?” And I said I don’t know anything about it and so I put the phone down, picked the phone up and called Michael and asked him. He told me everything about it and I said, “You do understand that you are fired, absolutely fired now? Done. Don’t ever talk to me again. I don’t want to see your face, I don’t want to hear your name. I don’t want to have anything to do with you ever again.” I called the woman back at the Post and told her that and so I didn’t get very much sleep that night. I know that the story is coming out, I’m flying back into Washington the next day, but on my way out of the hotel I grab the paper and there is a banner headline, “Ford Ad Man Linked to Porn,” and “He’s Fired On the Spot.” That’s what it said. And I’m thinking, oh my God, this is the Friday before election in an election where we are so close.

Smith: Of course, it might help you in New York.

Bailey: And so I fly back to Washington and I come into the Ford offices and by that time they all had knowledge of this story, but they also had knowledge of the Gallup poll coming out the next day and they were all giddy. Everybody was terribly amused that I was really upset about this story and what it might cost. Everybody was trying to calm me down. But I went into my office and sort of had my head in my hands and there comes a knock on the door, and there’s a friend named Jed Summer who worked for the campaign. And he said, “Doug, listen, it looks like we might win on Monday, or it looks like we might lose. And if we lose, I just wonder whether you’ve got a position for me in any of your work.”

Smith: Have you ever considered the possibility that it might have been that story that undid your lead in the Gallup poll?

Bailey: Yes, it has occurred to me. The fact of the matter is that you can’t imagine that happening today without it being picked up by everybody and being made front and center cable news and bloggers and millions strong. Nobody, nobody to my knowledge, other than the New York Post, carried that story. Nobody picked up on it. Nothing. Zap. Nada.

Smith: That is amazing. The debate - there were three of them. We forget there were three of them and two of them went fine. And one of them went fine for the most part. But, anyway, the famous Polish gaffe. You had been involved – I assume you were part of a team. How did the preparations for the debate go?

Bailey: There was the sort of standard preparation for the debate that you can imagine somebody standing in for Carter and so forth. And I didn’t have anything to do with any of that. I didn’t attend those sessions, but Teeter and Cheney and I, a couple of days before each of the debates, would meet with the President and say, “Look, here’s what we think you might try to focus on more than anything else. If there are a couple of points that you can make, these would be the points to stress.” This was not an effort to – we didn’t want to over-prepare him, and he knew all these subjects, obviously, inside and out, and it wasn’t necessary to do all of that. But it was worthwhile, we thought, to stress a couple of things and to stress a couple of things to stay away from, and a couple of things to try to hit.

On the foreign policy debate, we were very excited because in the first debate Ford was expected to lose badly, and he at least held his own and most people thought that he had won, maybe because they expected him to lose and you get into that. But that was on domestic policy and the only thing that people really remember about that was a twenty-eight minute pause because the sound went out and there is the President of the United States standing there for twenty-eight minutes not doing anything and the guy who wanted to be president standing there for twenty-eight minutes. When you think back about it, you think how odd is all that?

In any event, we were very excited about the foreign policy debate because this was one where Carter had no experience – zero. And that Ford had an advantage could seize, and our conclusion was that the way to seize it was to put Carter on the defensive. While Carter would try to put Ford on the defensive because Kissinger was a controversial figure, Ford should put Carter on the defensive because of lack of foreign policy experience and the whole point was that Kissinger is my secretary of state and will be my secretary of state. I know that will upset some folks, but that’s going to be the way it is and I think America needs to know that from me just as they need to know from you Governor Carter, who your secretary of state will be. That’s particularly true because you have no experience whatsoever in foreign policy. And I don’t mean that you ought to tell anybody tonight in this debate, but before the election, they have a right to know who your secretary of state will be.

Smith: The paradox of this was, you’ve won the convention by defeating the concept that you had to name your vice president. So much for consistency in politics.

Bailey: Yes, consistency – what has that got to do with anything? Teeter thought it was exactly right, Cheney thought it was exactly right, I thought it was exactly right. The President agreed - it’s exactly right. That really makes good sense. And he made a few mental notes to himself, and he was ready for it. So comes the debate, - the debate hall was in San Francisco, wasn’t it? I’m not there, I’m in St. Louis doing some still editing, not only a preoccupation, but an occupation. But I watched the debate, of course, and in the very first question, Carter’s answer included the comment that Henry Kissinger is the President of the United States, and he sort of takes off on Kissinger a little bit.
Comes to Ford and Ford doesn’t say anything, it was an opportunity, but he didn’t seize that opportunity.

Then in one of the next questions, the next question to Carter, I believe, was a question from Richard Valeriani of NBC News, who said, “You really don’t have a whole lot of experience.” This was not a planted question. He said, “You really don’t have a whole lot of experience, Governor, in foreign policy, and therefore, wouldn’t it be appropriate to tell the American people who your secretary of state would be, your secretary of defense, and your national security advisor?” And Carter said just what you would expect him to say, “Oh those are decisions that ought to be made after the campaign, not in the middle of a political campaign and we’ll get to that after November.” Sort of the standard expected. But it was a massive opening for the President who chose to use his rebuttal time to talk about Israel and something that Carter hadn’t said about the Middle East.

And I’m just going crazy, so much so that when in the debate Ford later said something about Poland, or implied that Poland was no longer under Communist control, I didn’t pay really that much attention to it. I was really so upset about his not taking the opportunity that I didn’t see the size of the mistake. And then when the New York Times reporter, I think, gave him an opportunity to clarify and he didn’t do it then, it was clear that he had misspoken. Why he had, I have no idea. But then I do know why he didn’t – there is some Dutch in him and he just got stubborn. He was not going to admit that he had misspoken; he had said what he intended to say; it didn’t come out quite right; but he wasn’t going to admit it. Whereas, anybody who has anything to do with politics knows that the public does not expect their officials, whether they be president or congressman or anything else, to be perfect. And if they admit to an error and a gaffe, it doesn’t amount to a hill of beans. He could have put that behind him in short order. And, in fact, it took him a week, I think, to explain that he really had misstated and that he was sorry.
Smith: And repeated, heroic-foolhardy attempts by both Cheney and Spencer to impress upon him the need to walk this thing back. And literally, they were thrown out of the cabin on Air Force One more than once.

Bailey: When he finally did it, then we started – it wasn’t that Carter was gaining any during that period of time – it was just an absolute dead heat. There was no movement in the polls.

Smith: The momentum had stopped.

Bailey: Momentum absolutely stopped dead and the moment he retracted the statement, or corrected it about a week later, the momentum started again.

Smith: What was contributing to that momentum? Doubts about Carter?

Bailey: Almost all of it was doubts about Carter.

Smith: Is some of that in a way an extension – people forget – of the race for the Democratic nomination? Carter lost most of the later primaries as people began to entertain some doubts.

Bailey: There was never great excitement in the Democratic Party about Jimmy Carter. There was not. I don’t mean that negatively toward the guy, there just wasn’t terribly great excitement about it. And one of the things that happens in an election, is when you’re not excited about the guy, even though you might vote for him, if you feel that he doesn’t need your vote, you might vote for somebody else. And that’s what happened in those later primaries. It wasn’t as if Carter didn’t have the nomination; I knew he had the nomination, but, “I’m not excited about him, so I’m going to vote for Jerry Brown or somebody.” But that was a real signal that Carter did not have a sort of uniform support within the Democratic Party.

Smith: We learned subsequently, of course, that George McGovern voted for Ford, Bess Truman voted for Ford, and when the President went to visit Hubert Humphrey in the hospital, he said, “You’re getting some votes out of the Humphrey household.” It was kind of fudging, but it’s almost as if the people who knew him the best…
Bailey: Most of those people who knew Gerald Ford well, or even slightly well, also knew Richard Nixon well, or slightly well. And to them, the comparison was just overwhelming. This guy is sick and this guy is just the most natural human being alive. And that comparison was so compelling that anybody who knew both of them…

Smith: There is an argument, and it goes back to Broder’s remark about the least neurotic president, Bert Russell said that in many ways Ford was the president that Americans said in the abstract they wanted, but either didn’t fully appreciate, or understand or whatever at the time. And that it was really only after the fact, in some ways, when he died, that you saw a lot of this surface. And I mean by that, by that time the contrast with the ugliness of our current politics, the contrast with – a whole generation was being introduced to him for the first time and they saw these clips and they were comparing that against what they had experienced in recent years in the White House and it looked pretty good.

Bailey: Right.

Smith: And it contributed, I think, to some of the crowds that were…because this guy was out of the public eye for thirty years.

Bailey: I think there came to be an appreciation of – there is another way of looking at this. That Ford was the first sensible, sane human being to be president in quite a while, or at least in a calm America. But looking back, he was also maybe the last, because whether you start it with Reagan or you start with Bush or somewhere, there had been just a sort of long run of very tumultuous times – different kinds of tumult that they had known earlier. But compared to what went before him and what has come since, Jerry Ford, my God, he’s my president.

Smith: He’s been called Eisenhower without the medals. This is a kind of centrist, undramatic.

Bailey: Steady.

Smith: No flash.
Bailey: One of my favorite Ford stories, it just sticks in my mind so completely and has no historical value whatsoever, but I’ll tell it. I was with him once in the White House with a group of half a dozen women and I can’t remember why they were there, but there was some political award they were giving him, or he had agreed to meet with them to service some political contact purpose. It was in some kind of small room; we were all sitting there and the President comes in and he shakes hands all around and he sits down for a few minutes; and then he gets up and he obviously wants to leave. And the women, of course, want him to stay just as long as they can keep him there. And so they keep talking and he starts backing out of the room, just getting closer and closer and closer to the door. And as he’s doing that, he goes right up against the door jam and bumps his head against the door jam, sort of like a Saturday Night Live Chevy Chase thing, and I thought to myself, “Isn’t that Jerry Ford?”

This is the anti-Nixon. Nixon never took a step that he hadn’t plotted out absolutely in advance. Here’s Jerry Ford, walking backwards and not caring where that door jam is. It was just a perfect little vignette of Jerry Ford as an average guy. He is an average, nice guy, without any of the Nixon paranoia, without the self-importance that dominates this city.

Smith: A couple quick things and we’ll let you go. 1980 – there was speculation about a Ford race.

Bailey: There was a point when John and I thought, we had done some work with Howard Baker who was sort of in and out and proved not to be going anywhere. And there was some talk occasionally about Ford, and John and I thought that if he was going to do it, now was the time, he’s got to do it within the next two weeks was our conclusion. I don’t remember ever being asked to do this by anybody, but we called him up and said, “Can we come and see you?” And so we went to Rancho Mirage and Alan Greenspan was there that weekend. And so he sat in on the meeting and basically we said, “Okay, here are the pluses and here are the minuses. Here are some reasons to do it and some reasons not to do it. Is it some kind of a lead pipe cinch that you could be the nominee? Absolutely not. But if you are thinking about it, you’ve got to do it now.” I don’t remember exactly when this is, but sort of like the middle of March, maybe the 20th of March.

Smith: Of ’80?

Bailey: Of ’80. Very late in the game, but, you know, a former president getting into the race, he would clearly have some focus. We were not encouraging him to do it. Part of me, of course, wished that that would be the case, but a part of me recognized that one) that it was very unlikely; and two) that unless he was really…. As I remember it, the President said that he had thought about it a little bit. What he said was that he had, at some times, been inclined to do it, but that on balance, he thought that it was not the right thing to do because it was really important to change presidents. And that his challenge to Reagan would be a distraction from the job at hand. A little of irony and whether he was aware of the irony of what he was saying in terms of Reagan’s challenge to him, I don’t know.

Smith: It has also been reported that Mrs. Ford only half jokingly threatened to divorce him.

Bailey: Oh, I absolutely don’t doubt that. And frankly, she was not in that meeting. Always very cordial to us and very cordial that weekend to us, but she was not in that meeting. And I have no doubt that she had no interest whatsoever, and frankly, I think the President was probably just being pleasant to us.

Smith: Well, the bell rings and the old warhorse heads for the track.

Bailey: And, of course, he’d like somebody to come around and say, “Maybe you ought to think about running.”

Smith: Or save us. Did you see him in later years?

Bailey: I saw him a couple of times. What a levelheaded, even-going guy he was. He did decide in that meeting – by the way Greenspan was flat out against it, totally against it for whatever reason.

Smith: Do you remember why?
Bailey: No, not particularly. And as a sitting president, he could barely hold onto the nomination running against Reagan, after Reagan had basically thought that he had sewed up the nomination that would have been a very difficult chore. And would have made Ford – I don’t mean that this was part of his decision at all – but if you look back now on history and think of Jerry Ford, that is likely to be a dominant fact if he chose to challenge Reagan and not win, that would have been a dominant fact in how he was remembered. So it was a very unlikely thing to have happen.

Smith: They had a good life, too, by then. They’d had the intervention, she’d licked her problem, they were happy.

Bailey: Yup, absolutely.

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the reaction when he died because of the extent of it? Again, given the fact that he had been out of the public eye for quite a while, that there were the kinds of crowds that turned out. I know the media – people were surprised to see.

Bailey: I can’t say that I was surprised. The fact is that, and maybe it’s just that, I ascribe to other people the feelings that I’ve had. But he is so anti-the stereotypical figures that you think of in politics and in Washington, that it is, I think, not surprising that there are an awful lot of people who warm to him. I was thinking of that the other night when Ted Kennedy’s funeral procession went right by there and across the bridge. A big crowd. Ted Kennedy drew a kind of affection from a certain kind of people for quite different reasons, but Ford drew the same kind of affection for his own reasons. In many respects it is interesting; he and Carter were very much alike as human beings. As human beings, very, very, much alike. And, in fact, you can take the whole sweep of fifty years from Jack Kennedy on and the only two normal people – I think you could conclude that the two only normal people who were in that job were Ford and Carter.

Smith: What do you remember of election night ’76?

Bailey: I remember being more disappointed by that election than any I had ever been in because the stakes were so high for the country, and everybody who had worked in it, including me, was just totally and completely exhausted. We had done everything and the campaign had gone remarkably well.

Smith: And the final broadcast, it is very unusual, on Air Force One, with Pearl Bailey and Joe Garagiola.

Bailey: It was John. The whole Garagiola fandango over the last week, ten days, was due to our production.

Smith: Was that because Garagiola, for whatever reason, just sort of relaxed the President?

Bailey: Absolutely. It was like he didn’t have to be in charge. Garagiola was in charge of the program and all he had to do was be there and show up and do his thing. He didn’t have to worry about it because he liked Joe and Joe liked Jerry.

Smith: And Pearl Bailey?

Bailey: I don’t know that relationship at all.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Bailey: Well I hope he is remembered, and I think he should be remembered as a person who brought the country back from the brink. It’s very difficult, I think, to appreciate how close to the edge the country was – sort of psychologically and in a whole variety of other ways. Even that five minute spot that we talked about earlier - I show it to people now and they don’t get it. And they don’t get it because they don’t understand what it means to have a president assassinated and have race riots in the cities, and for the country to lose not three thousand or four thousand people in the war, but fifty-nine thousand dead, and not a sexual game in the White House, but a serious legal infraction by the president in an effort to cover it up and lie to the American people.

All of those things, when that all happens within ten-twelve years, it kind of brings the country to a point where if it doesn’t have the right kind of president, lord only knows what will happen. And Jerry Ford was the right kind of president. I don’t know what went through Richard Nixon’s head when he picked him, but he was a kind of savior for this country. I’d like to think he would be remembered that way.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Smith: How did your paths cross originally with the Fords?

Mr. Lynch: We got involved with the Crystal Ball and bidding on things and charitable functions and they were involved with that.

Smith: Now was this after they’d left the White House?

Mr. Lynch: Yes. And we took a trip to the west coast with the Fords, with about seven or eight couples. I think it was a fundraiser.

Mrs. Lynch: That’s right. You used to play golf with him also.

Mr. Lynch: That was later, but first we went to the west coast on a golfing trip.

Smith: Did you expect to be intimidated at all?

Mr. Lynch: No, I was never intimidated. He was just a great, great guy.

Mrs. Lynch: They were wonderful.

Mr. Lynch: He loved us and we loved them.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, they were really so much fun to be with.

Smith: That’s interesting. What kind of fun?

Mrs. Lynch: Well, you know, they had a great sense of humor and we traveled and things would happen and they didn’t get harried about it and neither did we.

Smith: Can you think of anything? It’s well-known that she had a somewhat more ribald sense of humor than he did.

Mr. Lynch: She was funny.

Mrs. Lynch: Yes. You know, he was so good on these trips when we would go overseas. We went mostly Mediterranean, Greece, Italy, and places like that. And people would come and just interrupt him while he was eating. This used to bother her because she was worried about him. But he would stop and talk to anybody who came along and said, “I’m from Michigan,” or sailors or just tourists. He always had time for them. Always. And it was difficult because, you know, we were all together. There’d be a big group of six or seven of us, maybe five, well, of course, not counting Secret Service. They were kind of funny, too. I always admired the fact that he was really good about talking to everybody. I mean, he had no reason to. He wasn’t running for anything anymore.

Mr. Lynch: He never complained about anything. He had a knee operation and was still on a cane when we were on our first trip to the Mediterranean and he was going up and down a lot of stairs. It was amazing. But we always hit it off from the very beginning. He was just a very approachable guy.

Smith: Did he talk politics?

Mr. Lynch: Never.

Mrs. Lynch: He didn’t, but I would ask him. Frank wouldn’t ask him much, but I would ask him.

Smith: Did he ever talk about Nixon? For example, did you ever ask him about the pardon?

Mrs. Lynch: I’ll tell you about an incident, I don’t know whether I should or not, but at one point we went to Rome and we were at the American Embassy. Peter Secchia was the ambassador then. They had kind of a question and answer bit with all the people who worked at the embassy and one of the questions was, “What was the most difficult thing that you had to do as president?” Apparently he said something and somebody didn’t hear him and they said, “Pardon?” and he said, “That’s it!” But he didn’t discuss it, no.

Mr. Lynch: I think he knew when he pardoned him that he was probably not going to be reelected. But he did it for the country, I think.
Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, he did. He had a noble soul. He really did.

Smith: Who were his friends here?

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, my gosh. Everybody was his friend.

Mr. Lynch: All the old timers in Vail. It was a different village then. Everybody knew everybody.

Smith: Describe Vail then and how it was different.

Mrs. Lynch: It was just like a big family party. Everybody knew everybody else.

Mr. Lynch: It was the best of times. It’ll never be the same. It was a little more rustic, but then again it was down to earth and there wasn’t any caste system out here. Everybody was the same, whether they worked on tables or were multi-millionaires, it didn’t matter.

Mrs. Lynch: You could be at a party with the President of the United States and the head of big corporations, a few ski instructors, a bartender, you know, people who just ran their own businesses. It was really nice. Really nice.

Smith: We’ve been told that one of the things that they particularly appreciated - it was a town accustomed to dealing with celebrities, and people were pretty good about leaving them alone.

Mrs. Lynch: They were. They really were. There weren’t people taking pictures of them all the time or anything like that.

Smith: No autograph seekers?

Mrs. Lynch: He didn’t do autographs. I don’t blame him. It was bad enough he had to talk to everybody.

Smith: I think part of it was that he realized that there were people who were selling them, the collectors who were profiting.

Mr. Lynch: He was a very humble man. He was.
Smith: What makes you say that?

Mr. Lynch: Well, he never had airs. He never had it where “you can’t expect me to do that” or “somebody is out of order” or something like that. I’ve never seen the guy angry.

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, I’ve seen him angry.

Mr. Lynch: He’d get angry if he didn’t get his lunch on time.

Mrs. Lynch: He had a terrible temper. Very rarely, but when something bothered him—

Smith: What caused it when you say you saw it?

Mrs. Lynch: Usually he’d get grumpy if he didn’t eat.

Mr. Lynch: It was a sugar thing, I think.

Mrs. Lynch: I don’t know what it was, but it could be a very small thing. He wouldn’t get mad and “Do you know who I am?” It wasn’t stuff like that. It was small things that most men get mad at, but when he got mad, he got mad.

Mr. Lynch: He was just a great guy. He was a man’s man. No question about it.

Smith: One of the things I observed over time in that most of us tend to get a little more conservative with age. Maybe it’s nostalgia, maybe we have more to conserve, whatever. And he certainly was always a fiscal conservative. But on a lot of social issues, you wonder whether it was the Republican Party just kept moving to the Right and they stayed where they were…or whether, for example, going through Mrs. Ford’s problems and all the compassion that that called forth - whether that affected other parts of his world view as well. But by the time he died, it wasn’t just a woman’s right to choose, but gay rights - I mean, things you don’t associate with the Republican Party.

Mrs. Lynch: I think Betty had a lot to do with that. She was the so-called broad minded, more liberal one of the two and she had a terrific influence on him. He was crazy about her.
Smith: Tell me about their marriage.

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, they were just wonderful. I mean, they would have a minor tiff about every couple of weeks or so, but they had a very, very good marriage. But she did have a very big influence on him. She was smart. She had accomplished a lot. She’d been through a lot and I think he admired her for that.

Smith: One wonders whether he felt any degree of guilt for all those years when he was climbing the ladder and he was on the road. She basically raised the kids.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah.

Mr. Lynch: But, so did everybody in those days. That was not _________ bothered by that.

Mrs. Lynch: They would sponsor or be at all of these shows and one time we were at a show - it was a singer and I don’t remember who it was – but he requested that they play for him, dedicated to her, You Are the Wind Beneath My Wings. And it was kind of sad because we were all, you know, kind of weepy about that because most people won’t do that. You know?

Smith: That’s a wonderful story because, I think one of the things people came to realize the week of the funeral - everybody knew about the Reagans – but the Fords really did have a great love affair.

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, they really did.

Mr. Lynch: Hell, she lasted through all that … All those affairs in the capital and then Palm Springs.

Smith: We’d been told at ABC, beginning at St. Margaret’s in the desert, “Don’t be surprised if you see her in a wheelchair.” Of course, we never did until the very end and then only briefly. And then she made that long walk all the way down to the gravesite.
Mr. Lynch: She was standing up for all that time.

Mrs. Lynch: Man, I don’t know how she did that, either.

Smith: The next week, the story is, she came back to the desert and someone commented on that and she said, “I just did what my husband would’ve wanted me to do.”

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, exactly. And it was a wonderful service. That was another great thing. It wasn’t hokey or overly sentimental. It was just the way they were. I remember one time we were on a ship and she said to me, “What are you going to do now?” It was right after dinner. And I said, “Well, I’m sorry, Betty, but I’m going to the bar” and she said, “Well, just because I don’t drink doesn’t mean I don’t like to hang around bars.”

Smith: Really?

Mrs. Lynch: That’s what I mean by fun. She was so much fun.

Smith: Yeah. But I would think that would be an extraordinary test in some ways.

Mrs. Lynch: She never had a drink in her hand or anything like that, but she could go anywhere and be friendly and nobody would notice. It was very nice. And, of course, Europe, they were very grateful to him for a lot of things he did.

Mr. Lynch: He saved Italy.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, Italy and France.

Smith: So, would he be recognized by “men on the street”? Not just Americans over there?

Mr. Lynch: Oh, yeah. When we were at the Parthenon over there, people would clamor from all over the place. It was unbelievable. He was waving.

Mrs. Lynch: And when we were at dinner with Jim Callaghan, the former British Prime Minister—
Smith: Of course, they came back every year for the World Forum. And, on the face of it, you think, Jim Callaghan is a classic, old line, Socialist, Labor Party, you know. Helmut Schmidt was certainly to the left. Giscard is a toplofty aristocratic type. Yet they all seemed to hit it off with President Ford.

Mrs. Lynch: And they were quite fond of him. We sat between them and we were all talking and I was listening to what they had to say and they were all very good friends.

Mr. Lynch: Callaghan was a charmer, though. He was smart. Of course, his wife had Alzheimer’s which is kind of sad.

Mrs. Lynch: She was there, though.

Smith: Really?

Mrs. Lynch: See, that’s what I mean when I say they’d come out for him.

Smith: What was he like on the golf course?

Mr. Lynch: Like everybody else. He was fine. He was a pretty good golfer. I mean, they made fun of him, but he was the best athlete we’ve ever had by far.

Mrs. Lynch: He was a great athlete!

Smith: Did he or she ever say anything—?

Mr. Lynch: Never.

Smith: Because I wonder if she was bothered by it more than he was.

Mr. Lynch: And he was a great dancer. He was a great dancer.

Smith: Was he?

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, he was a very good dancer. Excellent.

Mr. Lynch: Of course, that shows you what the damned press can do.
Mrs. Lynch: We know she was a dancer, but he was a very good dancer.

Smith: Did she say anything? I mean, you said she minded it more than he, but, you know, the whole Chevy Chase business, the whole caricature of him as bumbling—

Mrs. Lynch: She would make a crack that was not _____ that was just her in annoyance, but they never really criticized anybody. At least not in my presence.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that. I only heard him speak disparagingly about two people and the worst epithet he could come up with is, “He’s a bad man.” One was Gordon Liddy and one was John Dean.

Mrs. Lynch: Well, I heard him say something about someone who cheated at golf, but I’m not going to say the name.

Smith: Interesting that it was the cheating that did it.

Mrs. Lynch: It was the cheating. Yeah.

Mr. Lynch: Everybody knew about it for crying out loud.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, well, he’s still alive, Frank. He might shoot you.

Mr. Lynch: I don’t care.

Smith: He really was an Eagle Scout, wasn’t he?

Mr. Lynch: Yes.

Mrs. Lynch: He was a very noble soul, I think. For instance, we were strolling along the French Riviera. I mean, you know the French Riviera; everybody is naked, by God. And I don’t know whether it was the Secret Service or other people of the party that said, “Hey, Mr. President, come down and take a look at this” and he just went, “I’m not interested in that.”

Smith: There’s a wonderful story in Tom deFrank’s book that sounds so much like him. When Frank Gifford and Kathy Lee had their problems, the Fords called and said they were praying for them and wanted to be there for them, be of help and so on. And someone who was visiting with the President, who had been on the White House staff, remarked, “Out of everyone I know in Washington, everyone I’ve worked for, you are the only person who I know has been totally faithful to your marriage vows.” And Ford got quiet for a minute and then said, “Well, you know, there are ten things that can happen. Nine of them are bad, and the tenth you can get taken care of at home.”

Mrs. Lynch: Well, that’s like that reporter that said to him, “How often do you sleep with your wife?” and he said, “Every chance I get!”

Smith: And the funny thing is, when they moved into the White House and it became clear that they were sharing a room, there were concerned Americans who wrote in to protest. But things were changing. Just stop to think about the impact she has had.

Mrs. Lynch: A huge impact.

Smith: I mean, it’s hard for people today to realize how forty years ago people didn’t talk about breast cancer.

Mrs. Lynch: Or any kind of addiction.

Smith: She’s had more impact, arguably, on how ordinary people live their lives than a lot of presidents have had.

Mrs. Lynch: Well, I remember two things. They gave us a book that, on the cover was President Ford dancing with Queen Elizabeth. And Betty said, “You know what they were playing when they were doing that dance? The Lady Is A Tramp.” She’d gotten a big kick out of it.

Smith: You wonder if the Queen did.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah. Another time she said, they were coming up the elevator with the Queen in the White House and it opened and there’s Steve in his underwear running around for some reason. You know, a teenager. And they gasped and the Queen said, “Oh, I’ve got a few of those.”

Smith: The maternal language is universal.

Mrs. Lynch: Yes. And you could see that, you know, their attitude made people just cozy up to them somehow in just a regular way.

Smith: How were they as grandparents? Did you see them with the grandchildren?

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, they were crazy about their grandchildren. Yeah. As a matter of fact, at the funeral, I met the great grandchildren. So, they loved their grandchildren.

Smith: And, of course, that house they built was big enough, so all the kids could come for Christmas. That was an annual tradition?

Mr. Lynch: Yeah.

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, yeah. They all came for Christmas. Well, at least most of them came. When Susan got divorced she said, “Susan’s going to undo what we didn’t want her to do in the first place.”

Smith: That’s a classic line.

Mrs. Lynch: But it was just short little things like that. She never would amble on or go on and on about anything really.

Mr. Lynch: I remember one time in Venice and Betty was sitting, I think, next to me for some reason and whenever she got a drink, she’d push it to me. One guy was trying to figure out who the heck am I and I said, “I’m Betty Ford’s designated drinker.” So we got a laugh out of that.

Smith: Did she talk about what she’d gone through at all?

Mr. Lynch: Not to me.

Mrs. Lynch: She did to me, but I don’t want to repeat something that I felt she was just sharing to me.
Mr. Lynch: She’d throw out (?) terse kind of comments sometimes, but she wasn’t a moaning—

Mrs. Lynch: She had a very hard time and she mentioned a few things that she regrets, but, basically, it really wasn’t her fault. She was on pain pills or something for something else and that happens, whether you want it to happen or not.

Smith: My sense is that they were both very compassionate people.

Mrs. Lynch: They were. They were, because if anybody got sick or if they had a friend who was having a hard time or something - Betty had a lot of friends that would come here to visit her for a week or so. You know, just old, old friends that they were being nice to and they were always calling you if you were sick or write a note or something. It was always something really nice that they would do. She used to call me all the time, especially if I was sick.

Smith: I assume one of the difficult things of being 92 is you’ve probably outlived most of your friends.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, and I don’t know who’s guarding her, but you can’t near her. Even Sheika can’t get near her. Because I used to call her on her birthday, but the last couple of times, they’d say, “She’s doing something else,” or “She’s in therapy,” or “She’s sleeping,” or something. So, I thought, “Well, maybe they really don’t want to be bothering her.”

Smith: I don’t think she’s ever gotten over his loss.

Mrs. Lynch: No, I don’t think so.

Smith: She’s told people, “Just tell them I’m retired.”

Mrs. Lynch: Well, it’s tough if you’re 92 and she’s very frail. She was frail when she was running around.

Smith: But isn’t it interesting, because she does look so frail, so vulnerable, and yet, at 92—
Mrs. Lynch: She’s tough. She’s very tough. I don’t mean that in a bad way. She’s got that fiber. She really does.

Smith: It sounds like they were fun to travel with. And, you know, with traveling, you can’t control things.

Mrs. Lynch: They were just fun and it was never a problem. In fact, you know, if you’ve ever traveled with them, you know that everything kind of goes smoothly and the traffic doesn’t bother you or anything else because, you know, you’ve got all these Secret Service people. I said to her, “I’m never going to go anywhere without you” and she said, “Well, that’s okay with us.”

Mr. Lynch: They were just fun to be with. There was no deep causes or wrangles or anything like that. It was a joy.

Smith: I take it they were involved in a lot of things in the community.

Mrs. Lynch: Yes, they were and they would show up at everything. That’s another thing that was really good. Of course, it was the Ford ski races and the celebrity cup and Ford & Friends at the amphitheater and the golf; something was always around him, which was good for us.

Mr. Lynch: And he always showed up, whether it was cold or inconvenient or horrible. He’d be there.

Smith: There are those who say that they did as much as anyone in terms of establishing Vail as a summer destination.

Mrs. Lynch: Yes. Yes.

Mr. Lynch: Vail wouldn’t be here without those two.

Mrs. Lynch: Really. Because he was an avid golfer and he was a terrific skier, too. He was a great athlete. I mean, he was a football player. Those stupid press people. Don’t cut that out.
Smith: She must’ve enjoyed building the house up at Beaver Creek. Word is that she had a lot to say about the design.

Mrs. Lynch: Yes, she picked out every little thing.

Smith: Well, he got his pool house and he got his study.

Mrs. Lynch: Of course, that’s one thing you could see as you went up on the chair lift. He knew people would say, “That’s where the Fords live” if they knew. He had that long skinny lap pool because he did that every day, no matter what.

Smith: Even toward the end when he would have to have a Secret Service agent with him to help him out of the pool…for someone that age to be that vigorous athletically—

Mrs. Lynch: One time we were visiting them in California and we had to go to church, so we had to borrow their car.

Mr. Lynch: You’re going to tell them this? This is inside a gated community and inside a house with Secret Service men _______ the car.

Mrs. Lynch: And Betty calls up the Secret Service and said, “Those stupid Lynches locked the keys in the car.” So, then they made up this big story about the Secret Service had to go to the jail to find a guy who would break into the car. You know.

Mr. Lynch: This thing went on and on and on forever.

Mrs. Lynch: We never lived it down. “Here come the stupid Lynches who locked the keys in the car.” It was really funny.

Smith: You had running gags with them?

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah. Well, that was a running gag. “Don’t lock the keys in the car.” That’s too funny. That was a little embarrassing.
Smith: Now, Beaver Creek, I take, was an outgrowth of Vail? Sort of a logical extension of Vail?

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, it wasn’t that logical, I don’t think, but they started it and its got a different feel. It’s more European in the sense that there’s more high rises and big beautiful houses. It doesn’t have this homey, little village-y feel that Vail has, but they were very happy over there. Of course, the Firestones were right next door.

Smith: And they were great friends, weren’t they?

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, and of course, they were next door, also, in the desert.

Smith: Dee…?

Mr. Lynch: Dee Keaton.

Smith: Dee Keaton. Yeah. He was clearly a good friend. Who is Dee Keaton?

Mrs. Lynch: I’m not sure. He lived on ________ Court, too.

Smith: Yeah, he was part of that group.

Mrs. Lynch: And who’s the guy who lives in the—

Mr. Lynch: He was in the financial business and then he got into a violation of the civil codes, financial codes, and he ended up going to jail for a year or something.

Mrs. Lynch: I didn’t even know that. I mean, I never knew him.

Mr. Lynch: The guys from here, John Purcell and the others got on a line with the convicts as he was handing out stuff as they went to visit him. Got on the line and went through with them. Got up and there was his friends. He was there for about a year. White collar. He was quite a guy.

Smith: How did they handle getting older?

Mr. Lynch: Who? The Fords?
Smith: The Fords.

Mr. Lynch: A hell of a lot better than any of us.

Smith: I sensed that they liked to have younger people around them.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, they did. That’s right.

Mr. Lynch: They were active, even when they were older. They’d be at the shows at the amphitheater.

Mrs. Lynch: They didn’t get pushed around, either, because, you know, they had these things that the hair people or whatever would promote and they would say “Come over here and sit here, and they’re going to sit there.” And we usually sat with them. So when they said, “Oh, we don’t have room for them,” she’d say, “Well, if they don’t sit here, I don’t sit here.” So, there was no problem about what they wanted to do or being pushed around by anybody. And, at the same time, they never pushed anybody around.

Mr. Lynch: You know, I can’t ever recall them ever pushing anybody around.

Mrs. Lynch: No, they never did.

Mr. Lynch: And that’s not usual for powerful people.

Smith: Did they have favorite restaurants? Favorite places that they went? We know about the Left Bank.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, we always went to the Left Bank. I can’t remember. Oh, one time, they’d never been to the Gas House, so let us take them to the Gas House, which we did.

Smith: And what is the Gas House?

Mrs. Lynch: Of course it was such a dump! It’s on the corner and it’s a gas station and there’s a sign that says “Eat Here and Get Gas”.

Smith: Not exactly presidential.
Mr. Lynch: A cheeseburger type thing. I mean, he loved the cheeseburger as you know from all the stories.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, there was all this talk about the Gas House. I had heard horrible stories where they sold drugs and everything else, but I don’t know for sure.

Smith: So, they enjoyed the experience?

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, yeah, they did enjoy it. Then the Greenbaums were here. They were very good friends with the Greenbaums and they had a place in Beaver Creek, also, at the Village Inn or whatever that place is. A beautiful, beautiful view.

Mr. Lynch: Right on the mountain.

Mrs. Lynch: They had a lot of good friends here. There are so many I can’t even remember. Of course, a lot of people who were connected with the Betty Ford Center they were very friendly with.

Mr. Lynch: Didn’t the Greenbaums come with us to the Gas House?

Mrs. Lynch: I don’t remember. I can hardly realize that I remember any of these things.

Smith: You’re doing great. And he would light the Christmas tree every year.

Mrs. Lynch: Yes, that’s right.

Mr. Lynch: And, you know, it isn’t easy when it’s nine o’clock at night and it’s 20 below zero and he was there.

Smith: The last couple of years, the doctors really didn’t want them to come up here, but they were adamant.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, they came no matter what, but they didn’t stay as long. Of course, the kids came, Jack and Steve and Mike came more, I think, as they got older because, I think, they were worried about them.

Smith: So they would come and sort of keep an eye on them?
Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, of course, we all had lunch with Pepi here and all these old guys were lined up and Steve took a picture and it looked like Mount Rushmore only, you know, fifty years older with Pepi and Frank and all these men. There were just about ten people there or maybe eight. I forget all else who were there, but it was a funny picture. Steve sent me the picture and he said, “What do you think of this?” I forget who the other old guy was.

Mr. Lynch: I don’t know. I see all these old guys and I find out that I’m older.

Smith: Aging is rough.

Mrs. Lynch: It’s horrible.

Mr. Lynch: You have no idea.

Mrs. Lynch: It’s really horrible. I can’t imagine what it’s like to be 93.

Mr. Lynch: I was a scratch golfer and I played golf the other day and it was the worst round of golf I ever had in my life.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Mrs. Lynch: I’m trying to remember that.

Smith: Was it that last summer? That last summer was kind of rough. They did go back early.

Mrs. Lynch: And we did see them very, very briefly in the desert, because we had The Vintage in Indian Wells. I know it was very brief because they were not well. It was hard.

Mr. Lynch: I cannot remember.

Smith: He was a proud man.

Mrs. Lynch: He was.

Smith: I mean, his appearance—
Mr. Lynch: The way he would carry himself.

Smith: Yeah.

Mrs. Lynch: And he was a good-looking young guy, you know.

Smith: Yeah, he’d been a model.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah.

Mr. Lynch: Yeah, he was handsome.

Mrs. Lynch: And he knew it.

Mr. Lynch: So was I. What happened?

Mrs. Lynch: I’ve almost shut the last time out of my mind because it was so hard, not only to see them get older, but to get older, myself.

Smith: It was a little bit like looking in the mirror?

Mrs. Lynch: We couldn’t do the things we used to do.

Mr. Lynch: It’s scary. Your body doesn’t respond, simple as that.

Smith: Were you surprised at the amount of reaction at the time of his death? You know, he’d been out of the public eye for awhile.

Mrs. Lynch: I wasn’t surprised because I knew a lot of people felt about them the way we did and I bet they had more close friends than almost any other ex-president. They’d sort of go off into the sunset and had their own little coterie and that’s it, but the Fords were always open to people.

Mr. Lynch: But, he was very popular. When we would travel and, as I said, at the Parthenon, everybody from all corners of the world loved him.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, they did.

Smith: Was he a good sailor? You said you’d been on boats.
Mr. Lynch: Yeah.

Mrs. Lynch: Oh, yeah.

Smith: He’d been in the Navy.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, they were both good sailors. I forget what they called him. They called her ‘Big Mama’. “Where’s Big Mama? She’s late again.”

Smith: Had they agreed to disagree about punctuality?

Mrs. Lynch: That was a slight bone of contention, but he had the Secret Service complaining about it, so he felt that they were his stand-in, I suppose, because he never would do much. He just did something else.

Smith: I suppose by that time he was used to it.

Mrs. Lynch: Yeah, he did get used to it.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Mrs. Lynch: I think he should be remembered, first of all, they were both in very trying circumstances and they weathered it very well. I mean, he was appointed vice president and was in the limelight all of a sudden. He was just this congressman from Michigan and he handled it very, very well and he did make that noble move for the pardon. And it was probably more difficult for her and she handled it well and she handled her problems well. And she didn’t make a big secret. Everything that happened, they were very open, very friendly, they were very good people. And, as I say, they were noble people, because they certainly rose to the occasion. People always make nasty cracks about any ex-president and they’re still doing it, but I think they’ll be remembered very well, because he didn’t make any huge, big – I mean, any one of us can have a slip of the tongue – but, still, the way the press treated him, he didn’t deserve.
Mr. Lynch: I remember him - it’s funny to say this - not on a national or international level, I just remember that he was a hell of a nice guy and a good friend and a pleasure to be with. I enjoyed his company immensely, probably more than anybody else, and we just didn’t get into the political side of it.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: First of all, thank you for letting us take a few minutes to talk. This will wind up in the Ford Library archives. We will get you a transcript to review.

You said you came to DC in 1956.

Carlucci: Right.

Smith: A very different town?

Carlucci: Yes, indeed. My first apartment was over in Anacostia and none of that had been built up. The area around the Navy Yard was practically jungle. And there was no Kennedy Center. It was a very, very different place.

Smith: Dwight Eisenhower’s in the White House?

Carlucci: Yes, he was. He was in the White House and John Foster Dulles was Secretary of State.

Smith: And you were in the Foreign Service?

Carlucci: Yes, I had taken the Foreign Service exam and came in at the bottom of the Foreign Service.

Smith: What does that mean?

Carlucci: It means that you start off as a vice counsel or a third secretary, depending on whether you’re assigned to an embassy or a consulate and you start to work your way up the ladder and hopefully to the top.

Smith: The top being…?

Carlucci: Well, the top being today career ambassador. I’m not sure I made that. It’s unclear. I think I was a career minister when I retired.

Smith: What were some of the positions you held along the way?
Carlucci: Well, overseas, I served in South Africa, the Congo, Zanzibar, Brazil and Portugal, the latter as ambassador. I also served in some seven different departments of government.

Smith: Now, let me ask you about Portugal. Was Salazar still alive?

Carlucci: No, I was in Portugal during the Ford administration.

Smith: Which is when the revolution occurred?

Carlucci: Well, what happened is that Henry Kissinger was Secretary of State and he didn’t like his ambassador to Portugal. He thought he was too soft on the Communists. The Communists had virtually taken over the country. The President was a Communist sympathizer, the Prime Minister was an out and out Communist and the ambassador, at least in Henry’s eyes, was weak. So he fired him and for reasons that are still unclear to me, I was plucked out of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and shot over to Portugal out of a cannon.

Smith: Really?

Carlucci: And had to cope with the, as they say, then Communist regime. And gradually we worked our way out of that through the electoral process. Henry and I had some differences.

Smith: How did Kissinger formulate and/or communicate policy?

Carlucci: It was very much ad hominem. I mean, Henry was the towering figure in the State Department and he made it quite clear that Portugal could not stay in NATO if it was a Communist country. He called Mario Soares a Kerensky to his face and his theory was that Portugal should be isolated. My analysis of the situation convinced me that Portugal could be retrieved from the Communist hands and that we needed to push for elections and the democratic parties, particularly the Socialists, would win the election. Henry and I had several exchanges on this score, some of them quite heated.

Smith: Face to face?
Carlucci: Oh, yes. Yes, I told him that his statements were pushing Portugal into the arms of the Communists. And he said, “Well, if you’re so damned smart, you make the statements.” And I said, “I will.” It was that kind of dialogue. I did have a conversation with Don Rumsfeld, following which Henry told me that the President wanted to see me. Following which we reached an agreement to give my option an opportunity. Thereafter was very supportive.

Smith: Now, Rumsfeld at that point was still chief of staff?

Carlucci: Right.

Smith: And had you known Rumsfeld?

Carlucci: Oh, yes. We went to college together.

Smith: I’m just trying to get the sequence of events. You and Kissinger have a fundamental disagreement, it sounds like. Did you bring that to Rumsfeld’s attention? Did he contact you?

Carlucci: I brought it to Rumsfeld’s attention made no commitments and didn’t say what he was going to do. But in my next meeting with Kissinger, Kissinger told me that the President had asked to see me, so I assumed that was a result of my conversation with Don Rumsfeld.

Smith: Tell me about your meeting with the President.

Carlucci: I didn’t meet with him. I told Henry that since he and I had agreed, there was no need for me to meet with the President.

Smith: Did you ever have any word from the President concerning your performance? Your ideas? The situation generally in Portugal? Was this all channeled through Kissinger?

Carlucci: It was all channeled through Kissinger. I saw a press quote years later, when a coup attempt took place in Portugal, President Ford commented to somebody on his staff that he thought that it’s a good thing that we have a good ambassador in Lisbon. So I had known Jerry Ford for some time.

Smith: How did you first know him?
Carlucci: When he was in the Congress.

Smith: Was this before he was Minority Leader?

Carlucci: Basically, it was when he was Minority Leader. I remember we had a meeting when I was in OMB and I think he was chairman or ranking on the agriculture committee. I wanted to do something with the food stamp program, reduce it, and I called on him. I think that was our first meeting. That would’ve been way back in 1972.

Smith: It was during the Nixon presidency?

Carlucci: The Nixon presidency, yes.

Smith: Okay, he would’ve been Minority Leader. What was your impression?

Carlucci: Very favorable. He listened. He understood the issues. And he gave a very tempered and sensible response. I can’t remember the details but I liked him instantly.

Smith: Now, he was on Appropriations for many years.

Carlucci: He really understood the intricacies of government. I can remember one time, Cap and I went over to protest a budget decision and we sat down with Ford alone. And he ran through the government program better than I could, even though I had served in OMB. He really was very sophisticated in terms of how the government operated.

Smith: Isn’t it a shame in some ways that that didn’t communicate itself to the general public?

Carlucci: It is because he was masterful. He made his own decisions. He didn’t have a lot of staff around him briefing him. He just dominated the subject.

Smith: Let me ask you because you were there while Watergate was unfolding. The people who weren’t around Washington then, in the last months of the Nixon presidency - what was the mood like within the government?

Carlucci: Very depressing. I can remember I was out at Aspen at one of their courses. I was Undersecretary of HEW and I called Cap Weinberger or he called me, I can’t remember who initiated it. And we discussed whether the appropriate thing was to resign. And I can remember Cap saying, “Well, this won’t last much longer in any event, so it’s probably best not to resign.” But we were thinking of that as a possibility.

Smith: Was he disillusioned?

Carlucci: Cap?

Smith: Yeah.

Carlucci: Yeah, I think he was. Cap was a person of good spirits and absolute loyalty to the Commander in Chief, but I think in this case, he was disillusioned.

Smith: It’s interesting, because, I think there’s a little bit of the Boy Scout in Ford. And I think the thing that shocked him was the language on the tapes, and the fact that Nixon lied to him.

Carlucci: Well, that’s what hit me. I was at the particular Cabinet meeting where he lied to his Cabinet and I thought that was just outrageous.

Smith: About what?

Carlucci: About Watergate and whether he knew about it. I was very impressed with Nixon. I had known him as a foreign service officer. I had been director of OEO. I’d been deputy director of OMB. I thought he was brilliant and quite effective, although as you know, his language was very coarse and he would fire for effect. He’d say, “Go run a tape on those bastards.” And if you knew him well enough, you’d say, “Well, we don’t need to do that.”

Smith: One theory of how the Watergate break-in happened is that Haldeman knew him inside out, knew when to disregard orders. But a Colson, let alone a Liddy, would’ve saluted and done whatever they were told.

Carlucci: There’s an interesting book by Bud Krogh that he just wrote a couple months ago that recounts his mental process in dealing with Nixon’s orders. And he now says he was completely wrong. But when he received an order from the President, he automatically thought that when it came from the President, it was legal.
Smith: Do you think John Mitchell took secrets with him to the grave?

Carlucci: Possibly. I wasn’t that close to the Watergate episode to make a real judgment on that.

Smith: At the time of Nixon’s resignation, Ford’s swearing in, do you remember where you were?

Carlucci: Well, I think I had just come back from Aspen and I was in Washington with Cap when that took place.

Smith: Weinberger didn’t stay on terribly long, did he, into the Ford Administration? Several months? A year?

Carlucci: It was a couple of years.

Smith: Was it?

Carlucci: Yeah, it was David Mathews that took over when Cap left. But he stayed on for awhile.

Smith: And did they get along fine?

Carlucci: Ford and Cap?

Smith: Yeah.

Carlucci: Oh, yeah, very well. But it was hard not to get along with Jerry Ford.

Smith: You know, we hear that. What was it about Ford that --?

Carlucci: Well, let me tell you a story about the man. When I was undersecretary of HEW, Cap was on travel, and a bill had reached the President’s desk, it was a social services bill. And I was summoned over to brief the President - just basically Jerry Ford and me. I don’t think anybody else was in the room. And he said, “Frank, what about this bill?” And I said, “Mr. President it’s a bad bill. Let me tell you why it’s a bad bill.” And I went through it piece by piece and I said, “But I must tell you, if you veto it, you’ll be overridden in a minute.” He said, “Well, that doesn’t concern me. If it’s a bad bill, I must veto it.” And he vetoed it and he was overridden in a minute. An extraordinary man.

Smith: Guts.

Carlucci: Yeah, a lot of guts.

Smith: And he was a real fiscal conservative, wasn’t he?

Carlucci: Oh, yeah.

Smith: I mean he was a traditional fiscal conservative.

Carlucci: As you said, he was a bit of a Boy Scout. And he was as straight as an arrow. And no question that he saved our country from great difficulty and that his decision to pardon Nixon was courageous and probably cost him the presidency.

Smith: There’s a parallel between what you described as his willingness to veto a bill, even though he knew it’d be overridden, and it might in the short-term cost him politically, with the much larger decision to pardon Nixon.

Carlucci: It’s the same thing. He was a person of principle.

Smith: What was the problem with Ford and Jim Schlesinger? Was it just personal chemistry?

Carlucci: I don’t know because I was on the domestic side. Well, I was in Portugal during that period and my contact with Jim was limited to courtesy calls when I’d come back on consultation. I do remember one Cabinet meeting before I went to Portugal when I was undersecretary and Cap was away and I attended in his place. And seeing Jim Schlesinger talk to the President in what appeared to me to be a condescending tone. And I thought, “My goodness. How long is that going to last?” But I have no inside information.

Smith: To be fair to Schlesinger, was that typical?

Carlucci: That’s Jim!

Smith: Is he just professorial?
Carlucci: He talks to everybody that way. He talks to me that way. He’s a lot smarter than the rest of us.

Smith: And doesn’t hide the fact.

Carlucci: That’s right.

Smith: Okay, that explains it. Did you have a sense of the Kissinger-Ford relationship?

Carlucci: No, other than that one observation. I was not involved in the Defense Department at the time, so I had no sense of the relationship.

Smith: And then, of course, Kissinger loses one of his hats. I mean, Brent Scowcroft is made national security advisor. As someone who’s held that job, I know what Ford’s rationale for splitting the job up was, how would you explain - is it a good idea to have two people hold those separate jobs? Or can it work with one person holding those two jobs?

Carlucci: I think it’s a mistake to have one person in the two jobs.

Smith: Explain.

Carlucci: I think Henry, in retrospect, concedes that.

Smith: Really.

Carlucci: And that’s why Scowcroft became national security advisor. They’re different functions. It’s been written in a couple of books, including George Schultz’s book. George and I had some difficulties when I was national security advisor and he was secretary. He in essence took the view that the national security advisor shouldn’t chair meetings, shouldn’t meet foreign ambassadors and shouldn’t travel. And I said that I did not sign up to be an executive secretary and said, “George, I’m just not going to pay any attention to that.”

There was a certain amount of tension though George concludes in his book that I ended up being okay. But he said that he had some difficulty with the concept. There was always that tension. I think it’s by and large a healthy tension. At one point, George told the President he’d resign. And I went to the President and said to Ronald Reagan, “What do you want me to do?” And he said, “I don’t want George to resign.” So we tried to work it out and indeed we did.

But there’s always some tension between the national security advisor and the secretary of state. But I think the President needs that tension in that they’re different jobs. Secretary of State is out front, he’s the public representative of the administration on public policy. The national security advisor is a coordinator, he shouldn’t be running programs. He should be presenting policy choices to the President and seeing that the President’s choice is implemented. That’s a very different function than secretary of state, so I think they should be separate.

Smith: Well that dovetails with Ford’s rationale. I mean, he had to reassure Kissinger that it was nothing personal, he wasn’t being demoted. But Ford believed very strongly that they were two separate functions and that they complemented one another.

Carlucci: I agree with that.

Smith: I’m curious. When you were in Portugal, was General Franco still alive in Spain or did he die while you were there? He died in November ’75.

Carlucci: He died while I was there. Portugal set the example for Spain. If Portugal hadn’t gone democratic, it’s really questionable whether Spain would’ve.
And Spain set the pace for Latin America.

Smith: In terms of the evolution away from dictatorship to democracy?

Carlucci: Absolutely.

Smith: That’s interesting. Do you give Franco any credit at all for in effect creating an environment where that peaceful evolution was possible?

Carlucci: I’m not enough of an expert on Spain to answer that question, honestly. I certainly give the king a lot of credit. Most Spaniards do. Whether Franco deserves some of the credit is over my pay grade.
Smith: I’d be interested because, even thirty years later, Spaniards are still adjusting, rewriting their history, redefining the meaning of the dictatorship. How do the Portuguese today deal with both the Salazar period and the Communist sequel?

Carlucci: The Portuguese are very proud, justifiably so, of their move to a democratic system. Here is a tiny country that had a vast empire. Divested itself of that empire; overthrew a fascist dictatorship; went to the brink of Communism well it was all but taken over by the Communists; went to the brink of civil war; drew back and installed a fully functioning democracy which has survived to this day. All in the space of two years with very little bloodshed. It’s a remarkable achievement and it’s a case where the credit is due to the people themselves. They did it. So they’re justifiably proud of what they did.

Smith: The Angola situation, were you consulted at all? Hadn’t Angola been a Portuguese colony?

Carlucci: Yes, and I had some dealings with the Portuguese on Angola, particularly the resettlement of the Portuguese refugees who fled Angola. There was quite a number of them. And it was a difficult issue for Portugal to resettle them and we provided the air lift for them so I was involved to that extent.

Smith: And I believe it was in Angola where Congress actually voted to cut off funding for US support of anti-Communist forces.

Carlucci: That was the Tunney amendment. It was Tunney and there was one other senator in the Midwest, I can’t remember his name, but there were two of them that pushed through that amendment.

Smith: Was that part of a broader post-Vietnam reaction?

Carlucci: Reaction against covert action of any kind.

Smith: Of all the messes Ford had to clean up the CIA, or at least forge a new identity in some ways for the agency. There was the Church Committee investigating. There were obviously a lot of stories appearing in the press about past abuses by the agency. How would you characterize that? Was it inevitable?
Carlucci: It was very damaging. Just like some of the things that are being done today are very damaging.

Smith: You see a parallel?

Carlucci: Oh, yes. Damaging to the morale because people say, “If we obey orders and we’re going to be investigated by some subsequent administration, why should we take any risks?” And the Church Committee led to the phrase, I’m not sure who exactly coined it, ‘rogue elephant.’ If you read the Church Committee hearings, you’ll find out that the CIA was anything but a ‘rogue elephant.’ The actions that people are critical of, the toothpaste for Lumumba and cigars for Castro, were basically ordered from the top level of the administration and the CIA was simply ordered to implement them. And the case for the poisoned toothpaste for Lumumba - the CIA man in Leopoldville - I was there at the time working with him. He simply put the toothpaste in a safe and forgot about it. He wouldn’t carry out that order.

So it’s a serious mistake to blame the CIA personnel for implementing what an administration orders them to do, particularly if they get opinions from the Justice Department that say it’s legal.

Smith: ’76 is the Reagan challenge to Ford. You were in Portugal and out of politics?

Carlucci: I was totally uninvolved.

Smith: When did you come back?

Carlucci: I didn’t come back from Portugal until the Carter administration when I was made deputy director of Central Intelligence.

Smith: Did you see Ford at all in his later years?

Carlucci: I saw him at social occasions. There was an annual dinner that they had in Washington where I saw him. I think I saw him once on a train; he was traveling with Frank Zarb. But it was sporadic contact.

Smith: Let me ask you maybe an awkward question. Obviously there was a very intense fight between Reagan and Ford in ’76 and there was some speculation briefly that Ford might challenge Reagan in ’80. As someone who was in the Reagan administration at very high level positions, did you have any sense about the relationship that existed or did not exist? We’ve gotten conflicting reports as to whether there were some lingering hard feelings…whether Ford was kind of a non-person.

Carlucci: I can honestly say I never heard Ronald Reagan even speak of Jerry Ford.
When it looked like we were going to get into serious negotiations with the then Soviet Union, Howard Baker said to me, “Frank, you’d better prepare President Reagan.” And knowing Ronald Reagan absorbed the spoken word better than the written word, I asked him if I could bring some people in and he said, “Who are you thinking of?” And I said, “Well, how about Kissinger?” He said ‘no.’ “How about Brzezinski?” He said ‘yes.’ And it occurred to me, I said, “How about Richard Nixon?” He said, “By all means, bring him in first.” And we smuggled Richard Nixon into the White House.
I’ve got a picture of it downstairs. And he and Reagan and Howard Baker and I spent an hour together discussing the Soviet Union. Reagan felt a companionship with Nixon, but he wouldn’t have said, “Bring Ford in.” And it just wouldn’t have occurred to me to suggest it either. It just wasn’t that kind of relationship.

Smith: Yeah. How do you think President Ford should be remembered?

Carlucci: By a grateful nation for the courageous act he took in saving our country. Our country was in deep trouble and to have a man of his integrity and courage step up to a non-elected presidency and make the decisions he made is a blessing for all of us. I think he should be remembered with great respect and reverence.

Smith: That’s perfect. Can’t do better than that.

Smith: Thanks so much for doing this. We really appreciate it. Tell us a little bit about your background.

Ursomarso: I was an advance man for President Nixon. Two people I went to college with worked in the White House. One was Fred Fielding, who later became famous as the legal counsel to Reagan and Bush. And the other one was Sally Brinkerhoff, who I went to school with and she was working in the advance office. So, she said, “Why don’t you volunteer and help us?” So, I volunteered doing trips for Julie and Trisha and the president.

Smith: We were talking to one of your colleagues yesterday who volunteered the observation that Julie was the ‘good’ daughter.

Ursomarso: Julie was great.

Smith: People have always said Julie was the best campaigner in the family.

Ursomarso: Yes, in fact, I wish she had run for governor of Pennsylvania or some office, but she never wanted to do that, so she never did. Anyway, at that time, Red (Cavaney) was in the advance office and so I got to know Red. And then Richard Nixon resigned and President Ford came into office. I had one more trip that I was doing as a volunteer, but now it became a Jerry Ford trip.

Smith: You had not, for example, worked on any of the vice presidential trips?

Ursomarso: I did some, but not very many.

Smith: Okay.

Ursomarso: So, Don Rumsfeld became chief of staff at that point and I said to Don, “If you want me to, I’ll come in full-time.” And he said, “Yeah, that’d be great. Come in.” So, I joined full-time and then Red became the chief of advance. Of course, I was in there with Bob Goodwin and some other people.
Smith: Let me ask you a question, because it sounds like you’d be in a good position to comment on this. Clearly, one of the challenges that the new president faced was meshing a White House staff that was still overwhelmingly Nixon people with his own people from the Hill and others, like Rumsfeld, who were brought in from the outside.

Ursomarso: Sure.

Smith: How much strain was there between the old crowd, for lack of a better word, and the new comers?

Ursomarso: I would say there was considerable stress. And, I think it was caused in part by the fact that the Nixon people had been trained a certain way and operated in a certain culture. President Ford’s beliefs and his culture were different.

Smith: How so?

Ursomarso: Well, he did not believe that anyone should be impolite or heavy-handed, that anyone should do anything that was not proper, and he was very interested in being a more open president. He didn’t want to be protected in a cocoon. He wanted to be non-imperial. So, the old group was in one culture. I had not been a full-time Nixon person, so when I came in, I was a Jerry Ford person. So, I listened to him and I listened to Don and tried to get a sense of what the President wanted and listened to the President himself because he would tell you.

Smith: We’ve been told that, among other things, he made it very clear that he did not want local people inconvenienced or for lack of a better word, stomped on as sometimes can happen with Big Foot coming out of Washington.

Ursomarso: Well, sure. Absolutely. The problem was, though, that many of the Nixon people had the experience and the background, so when you looked for somebody new to replace a Nixon person, you might’ve come up with another Nixon person. And that was a problem. And there was quite a bit of tension between Bob Hartmann, the speechwriting operation—
Smith: We’ve talked to a number of people about Bob. Clearly, he was a polarizing figure. I’m wondering, to begin with, if there’s a very thin line between being protective and being possessive. He had always seen himself, understandably, as protective of Jerry Ford, sometimes protecting Jerry Ford from his own instincts…whether that shaded over into a kind of possessiveness that didn’t translate from the Hill to the White House.

Ursomarso: Well, you’ve summed it up exactly as I see it in my mind. You have the feeling that staff people for congressmen may not necessarily be presidential staff people. And Bob Hartmann wasn’t warm and fuzzy. He wasn’t grumpy, but he was just—

Smith: We’ve heard ‘gruff’.

Ursomarso: Gruff is a good word. I’ll give you one example. When we were on the road, we would have to be up at a certain time to be at the motorcade, let’s say, at 8 a.m. So, we’d get to the motorcade and everybody’s there including the President, but Hartmann is not. So, the President would say, “Go find him” and the motorcade would wait while I would go find him. And, of course, he might’ve overslept. But then I learned that I had to go before and get him up and make sure he was up and ready to go because it wasn’t fair to keep the President waiting. And then he said to me, “I appreciate that you’ve taken an interest in me.” And the President was happier because, you know, we could go. So, he was a friend of the President. They had a relationship which I think was good. He wasn’t afraid to speak to the President and tell him his mind, which I value. I think that’s a virtue.

Smith: And maybe that answers my next question because, as you know, it got to the point where Ford, in effect, had dueling speechwriting operations.

Ursomarso: Right.

Smith: Which, on the face of it, doesn’t make a lot of sense organizationally. It raises the question: what was it about that relationship that caused the president of the United States to, in effect, tolerate the situation? Can you be too nice to be a president?
Ursomarso: Well, the President was nice, but he was very strong-willed and very stubborn when he needed to be. I guess the best example I think you’ve spoken about was the speech when Nixon resigned, and whether to include the words “our long national nightmare has ended.” And Hartmann was the one who said to the President, “No, you have to put this in here because this isn’t more than reality and this is what you need to say.” So, he would stand there and speak to the President, tell him his mind, and hold his ground, which, as you know and I’ve seen and you probably have, when people go into the Oval Office of the president, they melt. I mean, they just turn into pabulum and they don’t present their views and won’t hold their ground, which can be a very difficult situation. But Hartmann wasn’t that way. Jack Marsh wasn’t that way. Of course, Don Rumsfeld, Dick Cheney. I have some pictures of Dick Cheney and the President going at it pretty hard over certain issues.

Smith: Talk about stubborn – we’re jumping out of sequence, but that’s the nature of the beast here – but the famous incident following the Polish gaffe and the efforts made by numerous people, including Cheney, over the better part of a week to get the President to back down.

Ursomarso: Correct.

Smith: And Cheney, among others, has told about all but being tossed out of the office.

Ursomarso: Oh, yeah, but he argued the case. But that is an example of the President’s stubbornness. In his mind, he knew what he thought he had said and he couldn’t connect up what was happening with the press and their interpretation. That period of time I remember distinctly. We wasted some days and we lost our momentum in the campaign as a result of that. When he came out of the debate and was getting into the car, I think Dick talked to him and, right at that point, he was indicating that we had a problem, but the President wasn’t focused on that the way he should’ve been.
Smith: And you wonder whether he was feeling good about getting through the thing. And then, of course, Kissinger pours kerosene on the fire by telling him what a brilliant job he did, playing the courtier.

Ursomarso: Right. I don’t know if you’ve interviewed the political consultant.

Smith: Stu Spencer?

Ursomarso: Stu Spencer.

Smith: We spent six hours with Stu Spencer.

Ursomarso: Well, Stu was a very astute political person and he quickly would get in. And if he’d listen to Stu, who was there with Dick – we were all there, Red was there – and hadn’t turned himself around, I think it would’ve had a more positive impact than that.

Smith: Do you remember where you were? Were you out there for the debate?

Ursomarso: Yes. I was the advance man for all the debates.

Smith: Did you know instantly when you heard it that you had a problem?

Ursomarso: Yeah, I was in the holding room where there was a television screen. We were there.

Smith: Was Brent Scowcroft part of that group?

Ursomarso: Yes.

Smith: Because Brent talks about how he knew instantly.

Ursomarso: Yeah, he knew. We knew when he got to the car, when he was going, an instant antenna had gone up.

Smith: If you go back and look at the tape, the amazing thing is that Max Frankel gave the President three chances to pull back.

Ursomarso: He did. To his credit.
Smith: Very generous.

Ursomarso: Pretty generous. But that then just reinforces, when the President was stubborn and he got his mind set, it was difficult to change his mind.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Ursomarso: Oh, yeah. Oh, yeah.

Smith: What would cause it?

Ursomarso: Well, there were two times that I saw it. During the campaign, he would stand on the back of the train and make a speech. It was the last speech of the day - it must’ve been about 7:30 or 8 o’clock at night, its dark, and there’s like 10 people at the back of the train listening - and he’s up there giving this speech. So, I went over to the steps and I pulled his cuff indicating to stop and he kicked me. I mean, you know, he was an old football player. You know he wasn’t fooling around. And he didn’t have any voice, he couldn’t talk anymore, nobody was there, it was dark, the press had finally gone, and he was still at it. So, that was one manifestation of his temper.

Smith: Was that late in the campaign?

Ursomarso: That was the last few days of the campaign.

Smith: Okay.

Ursomarso: The other thing he would do is he would bite on his pipe and you could see his jaw move. He wouldn’t necessarily say something, but his demeanor would change. He’d bite on the pipe and sit there and you knew he was steaming. And, oftentimes, that would happen when other people were present, not staff people, but guests or when we were in some meeting or something and so you had to figure out what was bothering him and try and find a route to a solution, if there was one.

Smith: What were the things that bothered him? We were talking to Mary Fisher. She remembered one day, for some reason they were leaving without the newspapers, the local papers, something as minor as that. But he was a newspaper addict.

Ursomarso: He was. Well, if he was tired, he could be not on an event keel. On the campaign trail, I would water down his drinks. I mean, I would make sure he didn’t get a strong drink so that he could make the speech that he had to make and sit through the dinner. And he would get mad.

Smith: He knew it’d been watered down?

Ursomarso: Yeah, he did. He’d say to me, “Get me a real drink.”

Smith: That’s interesting you say that. Is it fair to say everyone drank a lot more then?

Ursomarso: Oh, absolutely. Reporters, political people, everybody. They smoked and they drank. Now, Jerry Ford liked to play cards, so at Thunderbird, he would play golf and then they would go in the locker room and he would play cards with Leon Parma and that crowd. So, they played cards, they drank a little more, and they smoked.

Smith: What did he drink?

Ursomarso: He’d drink a martini. That was a good drink for him. Sometimes, he’d drink a gin and tonic if it was hot.

Smith: I know you were on the other end of it, but we talked to someone about Bob Dole. Hal Bruno was in the room with Bob Dole after the vice presidential debate and a call comes through. It’s the President and he’s had a couple pops, is how I’ll put it. His voice is just a little slurry and he’s telling Bob what a great job he did and so on. And Bob Dole thanked him and as soon as he hung up, he said, “I wonder what debate he watched.”

Ursomarso: I think the drinking was for relaxation. Now, I remember one time, Air Force One landed in San Diego and the door came open and I was standing at the bottom. It wasn’t a crowd scene. It was what we call the official off-stage. He comes down the ramp and his fly is open. And I walked up and I said, “Mr. President, how are you?” He said, “Oh, I’m fine.” And I said, “Your fly is open.” I knew what had happened. He’d been on the plane and, like you would do before you get off the plane, you go to the bathroom. Then, somebody probably distracted him and he got off. So, he would do funny things like that.

Smith: Did he thank you for it?

Ursomarso: Well, he kind of gave me, you know, the look.

Smith: Describe his sense of humor.

Ursomarso: Great. Just great. Loved to listen to a joke, tell a joke, and laugh. The other day, I said to Jack Ford, “You know, I miss your father’s laugh because he would just let loose.” His voice was a little higher pitched, as you know, and I could just hear him in all these different hotels and holding rooms and on the airplane. And he was a very easy laugh. He was enjoying himself. He enjoyed himself. He enjoyed people.

Smith: He liked people.

Ursomarso: He did. He did. We would set these crowd scenes up and we would have it set so maybe he was supposed to do this much and he would want to do the whole line, just like with the Rangerettes. He didn’t want to say ‘hi’ to one, he wanted to say ‘hi’ to them all.

Smith: Now that you’ve mentioned it, tell us the story about the Rangerettes. This was, I assume, at the time of the Texas primary?

Ursomarso: Yes, this was in Texas during the campaign. In Texas, there’s a town called Tyler and Tyler and an adjoining town, Kilgore, have Rangerettes, who are like cheerleaders but they’re dressed up in cowboy outfits with short skirts and cowboy hats. So, he was going to Tyler Junior College to give a speech - a pretty good speech, as I recall - and, after that, he went outside. I had the Rangerettes lined up in the sun and gave him a cowboy hat to wear, which he put right on. And he started going down the line and the first Rangerette kissed him. He kind of looks around and he went down the whole line and kissed, I would say, fifty Rangerettes and he had lipstick all over his face.

Smith: This was not in the schedule?

Ursomarso: No. And the girls were delighted. I mean, they loved it. It wasn’t him kissing them, they were kissing him. And he looked great, this big, tall guy and the girls looked great and he was walking around with them. So, then we go to the helicopter and he turns to Terry and he says, “Terry, I’ve got to do something. I’m in trouble.” We said, “Well, what?” He said, “Well, when I get back, Betty’s going to see that and she’s going to be mad.” So, we said, “Well, we’ll order up some flowers and when you go to the White House, you can give her some flowers and maybe she won’t be so mad.” He said, “Okay, I’ll do that.” But, he would get into it. We would create these events like the one with someone playing Abraham Lincoln for the train. He would love to do things like that. Loved children.

Smith: Stunts.

Ursomarso: Yeah. I have one picture when an elephant attacked him. There was a movie star named Connors.

Smith: Chuck Connors.

Ursomarso: Chuck Connors the rifleman.

Smith: Yes.

Ursomarso: So the picture is him, Connors, and an elephant. Well, the elephant trunk starts attacking the president and he’s beating back the elephant and laughing.

Smith: How appropriate considering what he was going through with the primary challenge.

Ursomarso: Yes. He would get into these things.
Smith: Let me ask you a question and I realize its pure conjecture. There’s still a debate over whether the Reagan challenge ironically wound up making the President a better candidate.

Ursomarso: I understand. Well, go back to New Hampshire. Reagan was a candidate in New Hampshire. Red sent me up to New Hampshire because we would do the events, but when we’d do pre-advances, we would do surveys. So, I went up to New Hampshire and went to two or three Reagan speeches and listened to them and tried to extract out what exactly was happening so I could come back and they could craft our counter measures or what we were going to do in New Hampshire. We worked on that pretty hard.

Smith: So, this would pass for opp research?

Ursomarso: Yeah, opposition research. This would be what you did in those days. You’d go out – I didn’t do anything bad or illegal, I just was sitting in the audience and I would listen to him make the speeches. And the President won New Hampshire.

Smith: It was very close.

Ursomarso: Yeah.

Smith: In retrospect, do you think that the White House was slow to realize, first of all, that Reagan was serious about running, and, secondly, how formidable a challenger he might be?

Ursomarso: I think, as a general statement, candidates are slow to understand the significance of their competitor’s strengths. We just saw that with Mike Castle and Christine O’Donnell. Now, the other piece you have is, because you’re president in the White House, you have a double insulating bar, so you’ve got double insulation. It’s like R-18 insulation and so that is a factor. To give you an idea of the isolation of a president, when he went to Helsinki - we had this forty nation conference - and we were standing there and I said, “Mr. President, do you want a mint?” And, at that time, there were like little plastic things that held mints and you had to flip the top. I gave it to him and he looked at it. And he had no idea how to open it because he had not been in the store, had not driven a car; he had no contact with everyday reality. So, you take that small incident and you move it up and now you have a situation where it’s difficult for a president to maintain contact. But he had a secret weapon; he had Betty Ford and he had young children.

Smith: Tell me about their influence.

Ursomarso: Well, they were people who were not staff or their friends, so to speak, on his side, who could speak as they wished. And they did. And, I take that to be something that was a definite asset.

Smith: Did you see examples of that? Mrs. Ford famously said, for example, in the 60 Minutes interview when Morley Safer said, creeping around the subject, “Do you ever tell him, ‘Honey, you weren’t very good today?’” She said, “Oh, all the time.”

Ursomarso: I think that the relationship they had was a good one. I heard her say things to him like you’re talking about. I heard her make suggestions on issues that were contrary to what you would think, but, as you know, there was a problem for a period of time in terms of her being overmedicated.

Smith: Was this something you were aware of at the time?

Ursomarso: Oh, yeah, absolutely. I have a picture there of his doctor - I don’t know if you’ve interviewed Dr. Lukash or did he pass?

Smith: He did.

Ursomarso: He was his physician and I think he took care of the President and Mrs. Ford.
I’m not a physician, but I know when a person is on the ball or not. And I think she had a period of time when there was too much medication in her.
The other thing would happen was, they, as a couple, wouldn’t always communicate essential information between each other. So, you had Mrs.
Ford who, in effect, had her own staff in the East Wing. We’re over there in the West Wing. And I made the assumption that things were occurring in terms of conversation which did not occur and then she would sometimes say, “What’s going on? What are we doing?” And I’d say, “Well, didn’t he tell you?” And she’d say, “No.”

Smith: Talking about opposites attracting. He was the most punctual of men and she was never on time for anything in her life. We’ve heard all sorts of wonderful stories in the family about how everyone worked around Mrs. Ford. There’s Mrs. Ford time and everyone else’s time.

Ursomarso: She was ready when she was ready.

Smith: Yeah.

Ursomarso: That’s kind of what it was.

Smith: Was it a kind of perfectionism?

Ursomarso: No. She was a dancer; she was interested in the arts. Those aren’t precision crafts in the sense of a businessman. She wasn’t used to a schedule in the sense that she had to be at a certain spot at a certain time. He was trained in the sense that business and politics train you to be that way. And I think many successful executives or politicians have the same problem because the wife just doesn’t understand. The other thing is that much of their social life was work. I mean, their time was taken up doing political events, doing White House events, big dinners. It sounds like it’s glamorous, and it is. It sounds like its glorious, but you’ve got to show and you just can’t say, “Well, I’m going to stay home tonight and read a book or be alone.”

Smith: Let me ask you in a broader sense your sense of what the mood generally was when she did the famous 60 Minutes interview. In this town, everyone always fights the last war. And particularly with the prospect of the challenge from the Right, there was an immediate, almost kneejerk reaction, “Oh, my God. What has she done?” But it didn’t take terribly long for some poll numbers and mail to come in that suggested that, “Maybe she’s on to something. Maybe she has a constituency out there that we were perhaps overlooking.” And, particularly for an administration that defined itself by the effort to be open, to be honest - she, in some ways, came to symbolize that trait more than anyone else.

Ursomarso: I think that’s right. When a person genuinely tells the truth about their beliefs, it’s apparent. It’s clear. So, in other words, this wasn’t a political maneuver, it wasn’t a subterfuge, it wasn’t a concocted thing. She was simply stating her opinion. And he respected her individuality and the fact that she stated her position, which was contrary to what a politician would’ve said. It became a good thing. And people see it.

Smith: Was there an initial reaction?

Ursomarso: There’s always people running around throwing their hands up and saying ‘Oh, my God. Why?’ You have to ‘Whoa. Time out. Let’s see what happens.’ But, I think his opinion was she was entitled to her opinion and she was entitled, in his mind, to say it.

Smith: And the same with his children?

Ursomarso: Well, the kids, sometimes he would try and beat them down a little bit, but as far as she was concerned, he wasn’t going to manage her.

Smith: We all think of the Fords as the most normal family in the White House, but you stop and think, here’s Jack, who’s got Bianca Jagger hanging around…

Ursomarso: That was David Kennerly. I don’t think it was Jack.

Smith: Well, okay. He was a virtual member of the family, right?

Ursomarso: Yeah, David. Yeah.

Smith: Yeah.

Ursomarso: Yeah. I mean, I was on Air Force One once and the phone rings. The steward comes back and says, “David, you’ve got a phone call.” And I said, “Who is it, David?” And he says, “Bianca Jagger.” I said, “What the hell is she doing calling Air Force One?” So, I wouldn’t give that to Jack. I’d give that to David.
Smith: But the kids, I mean, Mike was always off—

Ursomarso: Quiet.

Smith: Quiet and doing his thing.

Ursomarso: Yeah. Great.

Smith: And Susan was a teenager growing up in the White House.

Ursomarso: She was. Pete Sorem would tell this story. Pete Sorem has passed, but he was an advance man for Mrs. Ford. I’ll tell this story quickly. He had gone with Susan to a dance and his beeper goes off. He goes to the White House phone and picks it up and says, “Hello” and he said, “This is the President. Tell Susan to come home. It’s almost twelve o’clock.” He says, “Okay.” He puts the phone down and goes out to Susan and says, “Susan, your father called and he wants you to go home now.” And she said, “Well, I’m not ready.” She doesn’t go. So, here you have the most powerful figure in the world trying to get his daughter to come home from a dance and she says ‘no’. And that’s what I mean about the family bringing him down and making him stay grounded.

Smith: That’s a perfect segue because, in the eulogy, I talked about how most of us, as we get older, almost unthinkingly tend to get a little more conservative. Maybe it’s when we have something more to conserve, we get a little more conservative. And my sense with him was he always remained a fiscal conservative. I mean, a true blue, veto-wielding conservative. But on a lot of ‘social issues’ - part of it was the Party moved so far to the Right, but it wasn’t just that. I don’t think he just stayed where he was. I’ve often wondered whether it was the influence of Mrs. Ford, whether it was the influence of the kids, and/or two other things. One, because he was so involved with her in the work of the Betty Ford Center, he saw all of these good, decent, honorable people who happened to have a problem. And it was all about fixing their problem, not passing judgment on them for having a problem. And the final factor, I’ve often wondered, was the Reagan challenge. He talked often about the ‘hard Right.’ Whether that in some ways made it easier for him to move, for lack of a better word, a little bit to the Left. It wasn’t just abortion or the ERA. To this day, he’s the only president who signed a gay rights petition. I mean, he took positions that you did not expect, given his profile in the White House.

Ursomarso: Well, I have the back door into that, because I was Reagan’s first director of communications in 1981 and I had come through this period. And as I recall, in 1975, the unemployment rate was 9.1% and inflation was 11%. Today, it’s 9.5% and inflation is zero. Jerry Ford proposed the tax cut. Didn’t get exactly what he wanted, but he got the tax cut. So, the question is, was Jerry Ford a conservative? And, in my view, he was a moderate conservative.

Smith: Yeah.

Ursomarso: Ronald Reagan, on the other hand, articulated a more conservative position on certain core issues. So, how far were they separated? I don’t think they were as far apart as one would think.

Smith: Right.

Ursomarso: I think, as a result of how Jerry Ford came into the presidency unelected, and hadn’t had the benefit of a campaign to hone the issues, and Ronald Reagan who, on the other hand, had been campaigning for twenty years, had honed his issues down to a pretty narrow target. President Ford was trying to deal with all these other issues, you know, the gasoline, petroleum, inflation, and all the issues that were out there. He was not set at one ideology point. I credit him for having the ability to maneuver and to better understand the congressional force that was at his tail.

Smith: Plus, remember, on August 9th, 1974, ideology was the last of his concerns. It was all about restoring the basic trust of the American people in their government.

Ursomarso: Yes, of the constitutional government which we have. I believe that as a president is stronger – if you have a person like Ronald Reagan pushing you, if you have a Congress which is not all yours. I think Obama today is weaker in some respects than if he had one of the Houses controlled by the opposite party as Richard Nixon had. So, I think your point is correct. If you have a force which is pushing you and forcing you to define who you are with the voters and define your issues, that’s helpful. It isn’t helpful when you lose.

Smith: Exactly. One of the things that has come out of this project is that Ford wasn’t the kind of guy to actively nurse a grudge.

Ursomarso: No.

Smith: But, clearly, not very far below the surface, and you didn’t have to scratch very deep - there was a resentment about what he thought Reagan didn’t do for him in the fall campaign in ’76.

Ursomarso: Well, he said he would help and he really didn’t. He just laid back. Now, I don’t think that was a calculated maneuver. I think that Mrs. Reagan didn’t have the desire to push and so she held him back.

Smith: Stan Anderson, who ran the convention, told us the night of the acceptance speech that the President sent him up to the Reagan box to get the Reagans to come down. And, before he could finish the sentence, he heard her say, “Don’t do it, Ronnie.” I mean, clearly, there were bruised feelings at that point; I’m sure, on both sides.

Ursomarso: There always are. I mean, I remember having dinner with George Bush, the father, after he’d lost the election and he was just absolutely upset and agitated. And I said, “Gee whiz, can’t you just get past it?” He said, “No, I can’t get past it.” So, it is very deeply felt.

Smith: And, in fact, in the case of President Ford, there are a number of people who told us it took him a while to bounce back.

Ursomarso: It did.

Smith: Did you see that?

Ursomarso: Yes, because after he left office, I did a couple of trips and I remember one time going up to the room to get him and he had his jacket off and he was laying on the sofa in this room. He was just laying back. And I said, “Are you ready to go?” And he said, “Not really. I’m not ready to go.” And I said, “What’s the matter?” And he said, “Geez, I’m just kind of not feeling up to it.” And I said, “I can understand that because of what you’ve went through, but you’re a past president. You still have people who like you and they’re expecting to see you, so let’s go down.” And he said, “Yeah, yeah, you’re right. I shouldn’t be feeling sorry for myself.”

Smith: That’s something.

Ursomarso: He said that and he knew. I mean, he was intelligent. He knew he was going through a phase. I think, also, he went through phases - he felt his children’s issues and problems. He so cared for his children that when they were having things, it impacted him as a father.

Smith: It's fascinating you say that, because I’ve often wondered if there wasn’t some unspoken kind of guilt. He’d been away so much when they were growing up. Just the nature of the work. He wasn’t unlike a number of other executives in that generation.

Ursomarso: Well, I was that way. I left my kids and my wife and went out and did politics. There are people who do that. I don’t know if he regretted that. I mean, isn’t there this story – I wasn’t there when he was getting married – that he left his wedding reception to go give a speech? I think he did. No, it was his rehearsal dinner and he left to go give a speech. I think that’s correct. But I don’t think that he was regretful. One of the things that Red may tell you and I noticed was every week he wanted to do something. He wanted to go someplace. He had to have an event and I remember one time Red and I were talking with him and we said, “We don’t have anything on the schedule.” And he said, “Well, why not?” And he sort of gave Red a little bit of a thing and said, “No, I want events every week. I want to go.” So, in his mind, that was part of who he was as a politician and he had to go out and do those things. The concept of leaving your wife home to take the kids in my generation, that was okay.
Smith: Yeah.

Ursomarso: It wasn’t like today where the wife works. That’s what you did. Your wife stayed back there and handled it.

Smith: Sure. Before we move on, I want to nail one thing down. In asking whether Reagan made him a better candidate, specifically, someone who had never run outside of a safe district, imbued with the values and the style, if you will, of West Michigan, forced to become a better communicator. Did Reagan’s challenge force Ford to become a better speaker, to devote time and energy to things he hadn’t done in the past?

Ursomarso: Well, did you interview before he passed Bill Caruthers? Did you ever get to him?

Smith: No.

Ursomarso: Bill Caruthers was, for lack of a better word, what was called the president’s television advisor. It was Bill Caruthers and a man named Mark Goode. I think both have passed. And they were out of Hollywood. They had originally worked for Nixon and they were high-powered television people. I mean, they knew lighting and they knew this and they knew that. But they also knew how to present yourself. So, I believe that Bill and Mark worked with the President on some issues of clothing, some physical appearance issues.

Smith: Mrs. Ford said he was so proud of the fact that he had suits that were older than his kids.

Ursomarso: Yeah, he did. He had terrible sports coats that were just like pants and the things you used to wear. So, they worked with him. Now, you go back to this battle among the speechwriters - that was a battle not only on issues, but it was a battle on style, it was a battle on presentation. In the advance office, one of the things that we had to do is present him in the best light that we could. So, that meant did we have to rehearse a speech, did we have to rehearse for the debates, did we have to define the words a little better. We all worked on that to the extent we could, so that was part of what we did to make him look as good as he can. I believe he did grow. I believe he developed. He realized that he wasn’t a congressman anymore, that he wasn’t going to events with twenty-five people. I mean, we put thousands and thousands of people in and he knew he had to perform to a standard. So, I believe that I saw him grow.

Smith: That raises a larger question about the Ford presidency. There’s lots of ways of looking at it, but it seems one reasonable way is the trajectory of someone, not unlearning his congressional skills - keeping the best of those - because that’s who he was, but learning to be an executive.

Ursomarso: Right. See, he didn’t have that training. A congressman doesn’t have that because you’re not directing. Now, I will say that it’s fortunate that he had Don Rumsfeld, who was a very good executive. Dick Cheney was a very good executive. He had some people around him. Red was one. Terry

Smith: We’ve been told that Rumsfeld was his coach in many ways.

Ursomarso: He was. They had a relationship going back to when they were in the Congress together, which was a very good relationship because they had gone through some political wars. They understood each other. My relationship with Don Rumsfeld, I believe, has led me to conclude that he is an honorable man. People say, “Well, he only had himself.” I don’t believe that. When he was working for the President, he came in there and I believe he did his darnedest to make sure that the President looked and acted and made the decisions that he should have made in a timely way. So, I give him more respect than some of these commentators.

The same with Dick Cheney. One example would be, someone would come up to the President and say, “Can you come and visit?” or “Can I do something?” And he instinctively said ‘yes’ when he should’ve said ‘no,’ because he was trained. Oftentimes, Terry and I and Red would try to get in between him or keep people a little bit distant so they wouldn’t hit him because he would always say ‘yes’ and then we had to undo it. And then he stopped that after awhile. He grew. He realized that he couldn’t do that anymore. He didn’t have the time and there were other things he should be doing. So, he learned that. He learned how to give a better speech.

You’ve probably seen the speeches that were on the half of a page. They never typed the speech down the whole page. Terry would carry this book with the speech in it and there was only half. So, he learned to look up and not to read to the bottom of the page. He learned to look up. He learned not to have a drink before he was going to give a speech. You know, all those things, he did.

Smith: Presumably, one of the first lessons you learn, maybe painfully, is that every single word that comes out of a president’s mouth matters in a way that’s not true with a House Minority Leader.

Ursomarso: That’s right. That’s exactly right, because you have the press pool that's right at your throat and they’re there all the time.

Smith: But he got along with reporters.

Ursomarso: He did. He loved them! His instinct would be to go over and talk to them and we would have to say, “No, no, no, no. This is a campaign. We’re moving.” He would want to go and talk. In Palm Springs, we had some cocktail parties around the pool and we would invite all the press over. He’d be scheduled to be there for maybe forty minutes and he’d stay there. Walter Cronkite was there and all these reporters and he would just have a hell of a time. Enjoy himself and talk to everybody. That’s who he was. There was no ‘I’m better than you’ or any of that with them. The other thing he liked was, you know, he’d gone to the University of Michigan and Bo Schembechler was the coach and he liked to go to the locker room and liked to go see the rehearsals and then he’d talk to the players.

Smith: It’s funny. I never saw it, but we’ve talked to a number of people who did it became almost an annual event, usually close to the Ohio game. But he’d find a way to be back in Ann Arbor and invariably give a pep talk. And it was like a different person speaking. He was eloquent and persuasive - just a whole different level of discourse.

Ursomarso: Yeah, I think that because he had a higher-pitched voice, I think that was a factor because, when you listened to him, he was up higher than some of the other public figures. But, in terms of his persuasive ability to tell a story or to tell a joke, I think he was more than adequate, much more.

Smith: Did you see any of the incidents that bothered him (or didn’t bother him) - you know, the caricature that Chevy Chase produced?

Ursomarso: Well, I was the advance man for the Salzburg trip and I was standing right there at the bottom. He came all the way down the steps. There were three steps left and he fell on three bottom steps because, when he came, he came right at the military aide and me, and the military aide got him. He didn’t fall down the whole steps, but if you look at the news reels and you listen to the stories, it looks like he came out the door and fell down all the steps. Of course, you know what he said when we asked him what happened. He said, “Well, Jerry, didn’t you see it?” And he said, “Well, Betty pushed me.” That’s what he said. So, he had a sense of humor about it. In actuality, what happened was the heel came off his shoe, it separated from his shoe, and caused him to slip because it was raining.

Smith: Plus, he’s holding an umbrella.

Ursomarso: He’s holding an umbrella for her.

Smith: Over her.

Ursomarso: Correct. Which was what he was trying to do and he wasn’t balanced, but as the old football player, when he fell, he rolled with it. He didn’t stiffen up or anything. He wasn’t hurt.

Smith: There’s a wonderful sequel to that. There were some quick to blame the photographers. And the classic Ford response was, “Of course they took the picture. They would’ve lost their job if they hadn’t.”
Ursomarso: Yeah. So, his sense of humor was intact on the thing. No president that I’ve worked for watches where he walks. They all don’t look and they have a tendency to misstep. That’s why the president’s movements are choreographed down to the foot. And, if you go back to the library, you’ll see diagrams that are in the files there where we’ve diagramed every step that the president’s going to take and, in some cases, built ramps if we had to because they don’t look. Nixon was that way. Ford was that way. Reagan was that way. All the ones that I’ve been close to were that way.

Smith: When he got up, was he embarrassed?

Ursomarso: Well, you know, he’s there, but he had to make this speech and he got up and did it. It didn’t faze him. So, I don’t think that the criticism was correct. Now, the other side is, he then had other missteps that he took, but they were for lack of attention. He was thinking about something else and he would stumble or he would fall. In the case of the assassination attempt in Sacramento, if you watch the video, you’ll see we immediately began a run. I mean, a sprint.

Smith: Let’s walk through that. That morning, as I understand it, it was sort of an almost impromptu decision. It was a beautiful day.

Ursomarso: No, no. I was the advance man. It wasn’t impromptu. I had sent in to the advance office a chart just like I’m talking about which said he was going to walk through the park.

Smith: From the hotel?

Ursomarso: From the hotel. I’d sent it in for approval. What happened was, I said, “If it’s a nice day and if things are looking good, let’s go through the park. That takes us back to that desire to be a more open president and be with the people.” And, so, I sent the chart in for Red and Dick Cheney and everybody to approve it. And they didn’t come back and say, “Don’t do it.” So, that morning, when he was finished - I think we had a morning meeting - I said to the president, “Mr. President, do you want to go through the park or do you want to go in the car?” And he said, “No, hey, I’d like to walk.”
“That would be more fun.” And I said, “Well, there’s some people out there. Let me get with the Secret Service.” Larry Buendorf was the lead agent and they had put up some barrels and ropes, so we walked. It was my idea and it didn’t turn out as well. Anyway, he was enthusiastic for it and we did it.

Smith: Walk us through that scene. Were you part of that group?

Ursomarso: Well, we started to walk and we’re going through this park which is in front of the capitol. It’s like a grassy area.

Smith: He’s on his way to see Governor Brown?

Ursomarso: No, he’s on his way to make a speech before the legislature and see the governor, which were the couple of events that were going on. So, as we’re going to the park, Larry saw this woman out of the corner of his eye. She had a red hood on. I saw her because I was right beside him. And then she came up with a gun.

Smith: Did you ever see the gun?

Ursomarso: I saw the gun.

Smith: You did?

Ursomarso: I saw the gun. Yeah. And Larry quickly reached over to grab the gun and this piece of skin got between, I think, the hammer and where the bullet would be. But instantly the Secret Service yells “Gun!” As soon as they yell “Gun!” they almost picked the President up and everybody and we just ran. Well, he’s running faster than anybody, the President is. I mean, he’s gone and we’re going. Then we got away and we slowed down.

Smith: Did he know?

Ursomarso: He knew something was up. I don’t think he saw the gun. I don’t know. I don’t think he did, but he saw her.

Smith: He saw her?
Ursomarso: He saw her. Well, he had to see her because she was kind of goofy. She had this red thing on her head or this red dress and everything. She just stood out.

Smith: Do you know if they ever shook hands?

Ursomarso: Well, we were shaking hands. He never got to her.

Smith: Okay.

Ursomarso: He never quite got to her because we kind of jumped and ran. So, we ran into the capitol and we went to the holding room. In the holding room was Don Rumsfeld, me, - I think I have a couple pictures - Ron Nessen, and the President. And we said, “Gee whiz, that wasn’t very nice.” And Don said, “Mr. President, are you okay? Are you shaken?” And the President said, “No, I think I’m okay. Nothing happened to me. I’d just like to freshen up for a minute.” So, I think we gave him some water and let him wash his hands or maybe even go to the bathroom or something. I don’t know. And so I said, “Don, I’m sorry. I didn’t mean for that to happen.” He said, “No, don’t think about it. It wasn’t your fault. You were trying to do what we wanted to do.” And I said, “Well, I appreciate that.” And Larry even came back and stood post. He just recovered and I guess some other agents hauled her away. I saw him come back and standing post. I said, “Larry, are you okay?” He said, “Well, my hand’s all bloody.” He showed me his hand, it was bandaged. And then the President went in and gave his speech. He went through the thing.

Smith: And never mentioned what had happened.

Ursomarso: No, he went through all those events. Then we got on Air Force One. I have a picture where he and I are sitting at the table on Air Force One having a drink and he’s telling them his feelings on what happened and what he saw. And we’re discussing the day as it went and he was fine. He was like it was something that happened and, like in football, there was a play and it wasn’t a good play and he got up and went ‘What’s the next play?’

Smith: Presumably, he thanked Buendorf.
Ursomarso: He did. He did thank him. I mean, he knew that Larry had reached out and got the lady. He thanked everybody.

Smith: He always struck me - and it’s a hugely admirable trait in every profession but politics - as the least self-dramatizing of men. I mean, the theater of politics was not his métier. He was who he was and he wouldn’t pretend to be something else.

Ursomarso: Right. The way I think about it is there are big ego presidents. Lyndon Johnson was big ego. He overpromised. Obama’s big ego. The big ego presidents overpromise and under deliver. Jerry Ford under promised, in my opinion, and over delivered. Because he didn’t have that big ego to feed.

Smith: Then again, part of the modern presidency, call it public persuasion - there’s a theatrical element. Classic example: he clearly practiced and practiced the acceptance speech. He understood the theater of that. Do you think he got more comfortable with that aspect of the presidency, the public performance part of it?

Ursomarso: Yeah. I remember, the first State of the Union message that he delivered.

Smith: When he famously said, “the state of the union is not good.”

Ursomarso: Right.

Smith: Something no one will ever repeat.

Ursomarso: He understood completely the role of the president, what that speech meant, what the role of the congressional audience played, the national audience. He knew the difference between speaking to a local audience and a national audience. He understood it because he wouldn’t have said some of the things, I think, that he said in those speeches had he been talking to you or me or some other group. So, he clearly understood who he was speaking to. One of the initiatives that the presidents do and several have done and President Ford did is they try and go over the press and speak to the people. He understood that concept. He understood that if he had his message filtered through the press all the time, then he wasn’t getting through. So a lot of these events that we did, these crowd events, some foreign trips, we were “speaking over” and he understood that.

Smith: You mention foreign trips, so I have to ask you about the trip to Japan. Here’s history being made. Visiting our wartime enemy and meeting with the emperor and laying the groundwork for the first ever visit by a Japanese emperor to the United States. But, let’s face it; the only thing that people were interested in was the length of his pants.

Ursomarso: And that was an unfortunate mistake because, typically, the stewards deal with his clothing. He thought he had a suit of clothes which in reality he didn’t have. I mean, the clothing issue with President Ford is a whole subject.

Smith: Tell us about it.

Ursomarso: Well, he had sport coats and pants and shirts and a conglomeration of things that he wore. I think back in the 70s, weren’t we coming out of that disco phase with all those—?

Smith: Leisure suits.

Ursomarso: Leisure suits and everything else.

Smith: White belt, white buckles.

Ursomarso: Right, right. Now, I was on that trip to Japan. I went on that trip. I have some pictures there that I can show you. But he grew out of that; he finally got out of those clothes. Now, where those pants came from, I don’t quite understand how that could happen. But it happened.

Smith: Did anyone’s head roll? I mean, what was the consequence of that?

Ursomarso: No, I don’t think anybody’s head rolled. I mean, among us, it was funny in a sense. Didn’t seem to bother him as much as it should, but those kinds of things happen, I guess. I don’t know how. That would be Bob Barrett. You’d have to ask him because the military aide supervises the stewards. They’re military people. The people that run the White House mess are military. We’re civilian staff people, so that was in between our bailiwicks.
Smith: Are there other foreign trips that sort of stand out?

Ursomarso: Well, let’s see. We did Japan, which was a lot of fun in many respects. We did Helsinki, which was the forty nation event. That was a monster event because there were forty heads of state that had to arrive at one location. And I said, “You know, if one of these agents starts firing his gun, this is over,” because the agents were piled deep and security and heads of state and everything. I said, “This is chaos. We’re going to go somewhere else.” So we went underneath and came in down in the garage. I remember it wasn’t where you wanted to be with too many people with guns. He did well on that trip. In fact, that trip was where he toasted with Brezhnev and I got the glasses and sent them to the library. I kept those two glasses. Of course, that was Kissinger and the President on the whole issue.

Smith: And, remember, this is a classic example where he took a lot of heat at the time and, thirty years later, it’s seen in an entirely different light.

Ursomarso: He was right where he should’ve been. Now, he took that up because, I think, Nixon was SALT One. This was SALT Two coming in from a different phase, and they had some serious negotiations. We stayed in the ambassador’s residence and we used the dining room for the negotiations and I was able to hear what they were doing. And they did very well. The Russians were pushing him around.

Smith: He’d spent twenty-five years in the House Appropriations Committee, the Armed Services Committee, which apparently is the backdrop to the problem he had with Schlesinger. I mean, the chemistry was not—Ursomarso: Well, Schlesinger was a pure, unadulterated egomaniac. He didn’t deserve to be in the same room with the President. It’s a shame.

Smith: Yeah. Condescending?

Ursomarso: Yeah, he was condescending, he was surly, and he thought he was intellectually superior. All the things you can conjure up, he was just the wrong man in the wrong position. President Ford did not suffer fools gladly, if you want to put it that way.

Smith: Especially fools who thought they were smarter than he was.

Ursomarso: Yeah, and that was the other thing, because, you know, people say he wasn’t intelligent. He graduated from Yale Law School. He was as intelligent as anybody. Intelligence is made up of a different number of components. And President Ford could see through you. If you were not telling the truth and if you were not acting properly, or trying to throw your weight around, he didn’t like that. That wasn’t his style.

Smith: People talk about the Eagle Scout, and there’s almost a little bit of condescension in that. He persuaded me, for example, he was genuinely shocked - not Claude Reins in Casablanca shocked v genuinely shocked that Richard Nixon lied to him.

Ursomarso: Well, sure.

Smith: And I think he would be shocked anyone would lie to him.

Ursomarso: Well, sure. The nation was shocked.

Smith: It wasn’t in his vocabulary.

Ursomarso: Yeah. When you say he didn’t hold a grudge, I think that is correct. He did not hold a grudge and he did not believe that people would be devious and that people would lie and that people would do things which just were not proper.

Smith: That raises a different kind of question. I’ll give you a specific example. Here’s someone who spent twenty-five years in Washington, knows the city inside out, knows how things operate, and has certainly come up against any number of devious people. At his first press conference as president on August 28th, he sincerely believes that the press is going to want to talk about Cypress and Turkey and inflation and all of these things that he’s trying to deal with. In fact, the only thing they wanted to talk about was Richard Nixon and his tapes and his papers and his legal prospects. And I’ve often thought that press conference was the tipping point. I think there would’ve been a pardon, but I think Ford came out of that press conference angry, mostly at himself, because he didn’t handle it well. But I also think he came out angry that ‘Is this what I’m going to have to deal with?’ And I think it crystallized emotions that were already there. The pardon came ten days later. Is it naïve to believe what he believed or is it just the optimist in him?

Ursomarso: I don’t know. The only thing that I could say is, if you go back and look at the history of his family, his being adopted - I mean, he was a person who had confronted adversity, emotional adversity, several times. And he never turned sour. He didn’t get nasty. He didn’t get mean. He didn’t get upset with people. Personally, he might have disagreed with their position, but he was an upbeat, sunny person. His personality was sunny. He got strength from people. I remember when I would put him in the crowds and I’d go along the line with him, he would get stronger.

Smith: And that’s a mark of a true extrovert.

Ursomarso: Yeah.

Smith: The opposite of Richard Nixon.

Ursomarso: Correct. The opposite. He took strength and, as I say, he grew and became stronger as the controversies confronted him. And, the other thing was, he knew, being in the Congress, he’d never get 100%. He knew he wasn’t going to get a full loaf. He knew he could ask for it, but he knew he had to negotiate back to positions that were going to be less. That was the case with the tax cut bill because the Democrats put in provisions which he didn’t agree with and he either had to take the bill as a whole and eat their provision or veto it.

Smith: There was such a period of change going on with the Watergate Babies in ’74.
Carl Albert and Mike Mansfield and he had a handshake deal. It wasn’t easy to get to, but they got to it, about the pace of decontrolling natural gas prices, part of the energy policy. And they came back sort of shame-facedly a week later and told him they couldn’t sell the deal to their caucuses. That’s a new day in Congress. And the great irony, here’s a guy who was a child of the House, who always regarded that as his true home in Washington, who had spent two and a half years in many ways fending off congressional encroachments on the executive…

Ursomarso: Right. He began a period of change in the relationship between the president and the Congress which Nixon precipitated, because, now the imperial president was gone. Now the president had to be something more. Just because he was president didn’t mean he was going to get his way. Now, the problem in that story you tell is that President Ford was a handshake guy. If you shook hands and agreed, that was it. So, now, that whole culture of handshake, keeping your word, now is beginning to erode. And so he was transitioning out of that and, for him, I don’t think it was as easy as we would expect.

Smith: I only heard him twice speak disparagingly of anyone and the worst he could come up with was “He’s a bad man.” That was the worst epithet he could come up with. One was Gordon Liddy and one was John Dean, which is interesting in itself. Did you ever hear him speak—?

Ursomarso: I’m trying to think if I heard him. Under his breath, a couple of times, I heard him say “that son-of-a-bitch” but it wasn’t that directed necessarily at the person as what the person was asking him to do, if you follow me. Because there were people who would keep shooting at him and they wouldn’t quit and he would get mad and say, “Tell that God damn…” That kind of thing.

Smith: With Ike, Ann Whitman, his secretary, used to say, “Watch out. It’s a brown suit day.” You know, you stayed away from the President if it was a brown suit day. Whereas Penny Circle used to say it was a three “God damn it” day or a four “God damn it” day.

Ursomarso: Yeah, he’d get to that because people would just not give up. No, it wasn’t his style to vent and get to feeling very negative about people and verbalize it. He didn’t curse. If you listen to the Nixon tapes, Nixon cursed repeatedly, time and time again. Ford wasn’t that way. He would on the golf course - I remember when he hit the ball and hit the guy in the head and he cursed a little there. But his natural style of speaking was not that way. He just wasn’t that kind of person. You would think that, being a football player and the locker room deal, he would, but he wasn’t. He wasn’t. He was very careful. People around him did worse than he did and that would bother him sometimes.

Smith: Really?

Ursomarso: Yeah, he’d say, “Shut up, guys.” I heard him say, “Shut up. Be quiet.” He would get aggravated when you would have one group and then another group was talking over here in the corner. Of course, on the road, we had a lot of situations where there were small groups of people. It wasn’t like being in the White House. When you’re on the road, it’s different, because you’re out there. But, no, he was a sunny, bright guy.

Smith: He didn’t like gossip?

Ursomarso: No, he didn’t want to hear rumors.

Smith: And he didn’t like bickering.

Ursomarso: Didn’t like bickering. No. Did not like bickering. He liked to look at nice women. He would get a chuckle out of that and when we were on the road on the train - we had women who were flight attendants be the conductors on the train, you know, to keep everybody happy. And afterwards he would like to have his picture taken with all the girls. He loved that. Mrs. Ford didn’t like the fact he liked it.

Smith: Was that the famous Vickie Carr incident?

Ursomarso: Yeah, the Vickie Carr thing. When he looked at her too long. But he didn’t have any vices like we talked about with Jack Kennedy that I ever detected and I was in situations, seeing things that, if anything was going on, I think I would’ve known about it. The other thing I wanted to say - you were talking about his ethics. The CIA horrors, all those things that he stopped, I think was another indicator of the character of the man because he found out what was going on. He didn’t like a lot of it and he said, “No, it’s going to stop.” So, he would sign the findings and he would take great care in what people were doing. Unlike Ronald Reagan who had problems with Iran Contra and some other presidents. I don’t think Jerry Ford would’ve stood for that and I don’t think the staff around him would’ve stood for that.

Smith: It’s interesting that you mention that, because, of what became known as the Halloween Surprise, the big three shuffle where Schlesinger was eliminated and Bill Colby was as well. We’ve been told by people who were there, Colby went in like a gentleman. And the President offered him an ambassadorship and he said ‘no, thank you.’ But it was a very gentlemanly thing. That was not apparently carried over when the President and Schlesinger were together. One sensed that Colby was a little bit of a fall guy for the agency.

Ursomarso: Well, it’s very hard to tell because, even today, the direction that the president gives determines the amount of swag room that you have. And every director and every staff person has a certain amount of swag. You have to know your man and you have to know where you’re in bounds and where you’re out.

Smith: Sure. For example, that’s one area where you would imagine there really would be a discernable difference between the Nixon and Ford administrations.

Ursomarso: I don’t believe the Ford administration people, would’ve pushed the envelope as hard as Nixon did in certain cases. President Ford could give you maneuvering room, and he did give people maneuvering room. But in certain respects, you had to know when to stop.

Smith: Also, he was clearly comfortable surrounding himself with people who had, not only stellar IQs, but larger-than-life egos. And he put together one of the most impressive cabinets in memory.

Ursomarso: He did. One of the biggest egos was Henry Kissinger, of course. We were on a trip and he was unhappy and he said, “You’re fired.” I said, “No, Mr. Secretary, you can’t fire me.” He said, “Why not?” I said, “Because I work for the President. I don’t work for you.” So, you had people like that who had these big egos. What I believe President Ford did is he could listen to people. There’s a difference between talking and listening and I saw many meetings where he sat there and he listened and he really listened. He wasn’t thinking about something else or he wasn’t, you know, looking at his notes or waiting to get out of there. He would sit there and he could listen. Well, that’s kind of unique, particularly here in Washington. And he could go off and think.

I remember, we had time we called ‘staff time.’ Staff time was the President was not face-to-face with anybody. He was on his own and he could have some time. President Ford used it. He didn’t just, you know, constantly need people around him to flatter his ego. He could sit there. He could read things. Comprehend documents. I mean, sometimes I felt like taking the briefing books away from him because the guy would have a whole day and you’d be dead on your ass and I’m a young guy and I’m dead and he’s trying to read these books and get his homework done.

Smith: We’re all used to thinking of Bill Clinton as this kind of human tornado. But Ford had amazing energy. I mean, stamina and energy. They’re not necessarily the same thing.

Ursomarso: Well, he had the ability to make a comeback. In other words, he’d go along through one series of things and you sort of have a little lull, but then he could come back when everybody else was going down. I don’t know how he did that. He was in good physical shape.

Smith: He took care of himself.

Ursomarso: He took care of himself. He didn’t have any ailments like diabetes and wasn’t on any drugs, so he was more healthy, mentally and physically. I think that was to his advantage. He liked to play golf. I mean, he liked to be outside. He liked to breathe fresh air.

Smith: And probably being an optimist is good for your health in a lot of ways.
Ursomarso: Yeah, I think that’s part of it. Several times, when I’d give him options like the walk, he would always want to go outside as opposed to being inside. Always wanted to walk as opposed to not. And, so we did a lot of walking. In Helsinki one night, he came down and he said, “I’m going to take a walk.” And I said, “Fine, we’ll go take a walk.” So, we went out about 10:30 at night and we’re walking. The Secret Service is going along with the limo in the street and there are those steel poles that come up, they’re like parking barriers. We’re walking along and the limo doesn’t see the pole and rams into this pole, destroys the car and the President said, “What the hell happened?” I said, “The car ran into a pole.” He said, “Oh, okay, let’s keep walking.” So, we walked maybe five, ten blocks through Helsinki at night just because he felt like he wanted to walk. He would talk and tell stories.

Smith: I assume every president realizes they’re in a bubble and there are advantages to the bubble and there are disadvantages to the bubble. And there must be, at some visceral level, the need to get outside the bubble.

Ursomarso: Right. And there were times he could, but very few. Playing golf was one where he could get outside the bubble.

Smith: Was Camp David? I mean, it’s inside the bubble, but you—Ursomarso: It wasn’t an obsession with him. I don’t believe it was the way it was with some other presidents. He used it. Vail he loved. He loved to go there. We would go there when the snow was on the ground and when the snow wasn’t on the ground and he just loved it. I mean, he would just really relax. And he loved putting on his sweater and the winter stuff and being out there. Even when his heart was failing, he wanted to go back, as you know.

Smith: We were out there for a week, and I never did adjust to the altitude. And the thought of him at 90 swimming and going up to that swimming pool every day. You know, it got to the point where the agents were in the water with him. But it’s just phenomenal.

Ursomarso: Yeah, we did a trip to Jacksonville, Florida, where I think we met Sadat. I think it was Sadat. But, anyway, when we’d go on trips, we would try and put him in a house where there was a swimming pool. And I put him in a guy’s house, Luther Coggin’s house, and it had a big swimming pool. We went there and his family left. So, he’s out there swimming and he banged his head on the side of the pool. You know, he’s swimming his laps back and forth, but he wanted to swim. He wanted to be where he could get some exercise. The pool at Vail, he loved it. He loved to swim. It’s a shame they took the pool out at the White House. He didn’t have one.

Smith: Well, then they put the outside one in.

Ursomarso: Yeah, outside. It’s funny. One day, when I was working for Ronald Reagan, Charlton Heston visited and I came and I said, “Charlton, did you come to walk on the water?”

Smith: That first year, say, of the Reagan presidency, you hear stories about Ford people not getting calls returned, that sort of thing. Was there any kind of carryover?

Ursomarso: Well, no, what happens is the president designates one person on his staff to be the contact of former presidents.

Smith: Okay.

Ursomarso: In the case of Reagan, who do you think he designated? David Gergen.

Smith: Oh.

Ursomarso: Well, David Gergen had been a Ford person way back. There was a relationship, he’d been a speechwriter.

Smith: And Nixon, too.

Ursomarso: Yeah, and Nixon, too. So, I didn’t perceive that there really was a problem because David’s job was to keep the President informed of what was going on, talk to him, handle requests, make sure everything’s okay. So, to my knowledge, I don’t know that President Reagan and President Ford talked that much, but David was doing all the work. So, I would think that Ford was satisfied.
Smith: And then, of course, it was in the fall of ’81 with the Sadat assassination when they all came back to the White House.

Ursomarso: Yes. Well, Sadat and President Ford – and I did this stop, as I told you, to Salzburg – they got along famously. They genuinely liked each other.

Smith: Really?

Ursomarso: And they sat with their pipes. They were both pipe smokers and they talked and they talked and they smoked. They had a good time.

Smith: One of the most touching things in President Carter’s eulogy, he talked about when they were leaving Camp David. They were in the helicopter, I think he was with Sadat. And the one person they called was President Ford.

Ursomarso: Yeah. Now, Mrs. Sadat still lives here in Baltimore. I saw her a couple of years ago. They were great people, whatever you want to say about their views and situation, and Ford and Sadat got along fine. They had a great meeting there in Salzburg. I think one day Barrett took the President out to play golf in Salzburg. But the foreign leaders that I was able to observe with Ford, I don’t think he had problems with anybody.

Smith: Were you in the White House when the Queen was there?

Ursomarso: No, I don’t remember being there with the Queen.

Smith: Of course, the Bicentennial brought all sorts of folks.

Ursomarso: Well, yeah, we did the shifts and all that stuff for the Bicentennial. He got along with Brezhnev. I saw that.

Smith: Was he a little bit of a bully?

Ursomarso: Well, he would do things that were kind of interesting, like he’d run out in the driveway and stand in front of the car. You know, he was kind of trying to put on a show. Some of it was childish, in my opinion, not very statesman-like. But the Russians were like that. They were a little bit different. In Helsinki, he had to meet all these foreign heads of state and he did fine with all of them.

Smith: And the Pope then would’ve been Paul?

Ursomarso: The Pope was Paul and he went to visit the Pope and, I guess, Terry can tell you all the stories about that. But he went in to visit the pope, Scowcroft and Terry fell asleep on the bench outside the office. We’d been traveling quite a bit and they just passed out, both of them. I have a picture of them sleeping on the bench. I think they missed the Pope. Because, when you travel, you get a little tired with jet lag.

Smith: Of course, you did see him right after he left office.

Ursomarso: Yeah, I did. I did a couple of trips with him.

Smith: There was never any doubt that he was going out to Rancho Mirage. Before, of course, the plan was they were going to go back to Grand Rapids and so on.

Ursomarso: I never heard anything different than that.

Smith: Was Leonard Firestone, you think, a catalyst in that decision?

Ursomarso: Well, there were a couple of people out there. Leonard Firestone, I think, lived next door to them. There was another guy, Leon Parma, and there was Fred Wilson. Fred Wilson had a big house up on top of the hill up above Thunderbird Country Club. Ford stayed there a couple of times with him when we went out there. But, I think the driving force was Mrs. Ford, who wanted a drier climate, and I think she liked it more than anything else.

Smith: Yeah.

Ursomarso: I think that was part of it, as I understand. I never had a conversation with him that he was dying to go back to Michigan.

Smith: Well, I know when I was there, he was so good about coming back.
Ursomarso: Well, he did. He did and, in fact, there’s two pictures there of two events. One was in Traverse City, Michigan, where we had a parade and he was standing in the car with Senator Griffin, Mrs. Ford, and Mrs. Griffin. And they were going down the street on this parade route and he’s actually waving to people and calling them out by name. Unbelievable. Just absolutely unbelievable.

Smith: That’s the old congressman.

Ursomarso: And then he did that again. We went to a parade, I believe, Holland, Michigan. They have a parade where you walk in wooden shoes. They give everybody a pair of wooden shoes and he did the same thing. He called people out by name. I couldn’t believe it. I mean, not just one or two, but a lot of people. “Hi, Harry! How are you doing?” He would know all these people, which I thought was astounding.

Smith: Did you see him in his later years?

Ursomarso: We had a meeting every year in June which I would go to. But, as time went by, he became less, as you know, able to attend.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Ursomarso: The last time I saw him was when we had a meeting in Palm Springs and he got up and he said, “I’m Deep Throat.”

Smith: We made him practice.

Ursomarso: Yeah, you made him practice. That was the last time I saw him and then he was gone. Now, unfortunately, what happened with the funeral, Red and Terry and I and others were on the group planning the formal funeral. We planned the whole thing. There were some others involved. And then Red was getting married in Hawaii. Terry O’Donnell was to go to the wedding. I was the best man. Ford passed. Terry didn’t go to the wedding. I stayed with Red in Hawaii because I was his best man and I missed the funeral. I sent Thym Smith up to do the work. He was press advance man who now works for me. So, the last advance, I missed. The one I wanted to go to.
Smith: Were you surprised at how much public reaction there was at the time?

Ursomarso: I was surprised.

Smith: He’d been out of the public eye for a while.

Ursomarso: He’d been out of the public eye for a while. He had pretty much not been in the news. But there we go back to - what is America? America is normal people like Jerry Ford who have a feeling for their presidents and for their government and they can see a good person and they know a good person.

Smith: Another factor - I think there was a whole generation discovering him for the first time, seeing those grainy clips. They contrasted it with the ugliness of politics today, and he looked pretty good.

Ursomarso: Yeah, he does. He does stand up very well and I forget, I mean – at my age, I talk to people and they don’t know Reagan, they don’t know President Ford, they don’t know Nixon.

Smith: You mention Watergate and it’s a blank.

Ursomarso: It’s a blank. I believe that someone sent me a poll and it was a poll taken when President Ford first came in and I believe his approval rating was 70-some percent. And then they took a poll after the funeral and he was right back up. So, he had gone here and he’d gone down and then he came right back up.

Smith: Time was good to him. Contrast it with poor Lyndon Johnson who died the day before the Vietnam peace agreement was out. Ford lived long enough to know that on the pardon most people had come around to his way of thinking. And even those who didn’t respected him and the motives behind the action.

Ursomarso: Time was good. The only issue that sticks in my mind is that there were people who accused him of making a deal beforehand. And I don’t think that’s true. I don’t think he would do something like that.

Smith: There were also critics, people who thought he commercialized the ex-presidency by being on boards and so on. Of course, they didn’t know that, one, he didn’t have any money when he left office. And, two, he had to raise what must’ve seemed to him like a God awful amount of money to build the library and the museum.

Ursomarso: Right. And Ronald Reagan, who’s taken a million dollars per speech…I remember when the administration was coming to the end and Don Rumsfeld was Secretary of Defense. I went over to see him. I said, ‘Don, we’re done. We’re leaving.” He said, “Yeah, I think so” and he put his foot up on his desk and he had a hole in his shoe. I said, “What are you going to do now?” He said, “Well, I’m dead broke. I’ve got to find a way to make some money.” And I said to myself, “Here’s a guy who gave it everything he had, didn’t make any money, had a hole in his shoe. And Jerry Ford was the same way.” He gave it everything he had.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story someone told us. In the first 48 hours of his presidency, he said to someone apologetically, “Do you know when I get my first paycheck?” He had kids in school and he literally was living paycheck to paycheck.

Ursomarso: Yeah, I can believe. When we went to Vail, we were going out to where Breckenridge is and he said, “You ought to buy that over there.” He was talking about 500 acres that was for sale for nothing. I said, “Mr. President, I don’t have any money.” He said, “Well, I don’t have any money, either.” And then that real estate turned out to be worth, you know, hundreds of millions of dollars and turned into what is now Breckenridge. And he was looking at it.

Smith: He had an eye for business.

Ursomarso: He did. I being in the automobile business and he being from Michigan, we had something in common that we could talk about. He was very interested in real estate - whether it was a golf course or a piece of real estate, he would look.

Oh, I wanted to tell you one story about John Wayne. The President gave a speech at Pepperdine and John Wayne was on the podium with him. After the speech, John Wayne said to the President, “Can you give me a ride down the Pacific Coast Highway?” The President said, “Yes.” So, John Wayne and the president are in the car going down the Pacific Coast Highway towards L.A. Terry’s in the pilot car behind and I’m in the front police car and my radio comes up and Terry says, “We’re going to stop at the next gas station.” I said, “What?” He said, “We’re going to stop at the next gas station.” I said, “Why?” He said, “Well, John Wayne wants to get out.” I said, “Okay.” So, I pulled the motorcade over - this is like forty cars – into this gas station. John Wayne gets out and is standing at the gas pump and we pull away. I called Terry and I said, “Terry, what was that all about?” and he said, “He only lives a couple of blocks away. He wanted to get out and walk home.” You asked when was the last time I saw Jerry Ford - that’s the last time I saw John Wayne.

Smith: But he got along fine with celebrities like that?

Ursomarso: During the campaign, we had a lot of celebrities that came on board, as you know, and he was fine.

Smith: Pearl Bailey clearly had a unique role. What was the origin of that?

Ursomarso: She sang once at the White House, I think. Or somehow he got to know her.

Smith: We’re told that she and Mrs. Ford had a very close relationship.

Ursomarso: That may be the case. But we were picking up movie stars left and right. We were picking up Olympic athletes.

Smith: I’m sure there were jocks he must’ve been thrilled to meet.

Ursomarso: Jocks. We picked up players. And he would like them to ride in the car with him. Some presidents didn’t want anybody in the car, but Jerry Ford did. The famous one was that Fred Biebel who broke his fingers when the Ford’s limo was hit. Remember that?

Smith: No.
Ursomarso: They were in Connecticut and they were at a political event and some guy ran a stop sign and ran into the limo. Of course, they didn’t have their seatbelts on and Fred Beibel who was the state chairman got a broken finger in the thing. But he always would want people in the car with him.

Smith: Gregarious?

Ursomarso: Yeah, he would rather have somebody.

Smith: You can’t imagine Richard Nixon wanting to have company.

Ursomarso: No, he didn’t. He didn’t.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Ursomarso: Well, you have stated it better than I have. He saved the country that was in a constitutional crisis. He’s a patriot for that one thing. I was working for President Reagan the day he was shot and, as you know, chaos and all that. There was a time where there couldn’t be a constitutional crisis unless good people stepped forward and adhered to the constitution. And, in our history, that has happened and Jerry Ford knew what his job was, he stepped into it, he handled himself in a dignified and proper manner. I don’t know what more you could ask. And people, particularly, presidents are defined, not by many, many acts, but sometimes by only one.

Smith: That’s true.

Ursomarso: And the other part of it is that some presidents are identified by only one slogan or one line that exemplifies what their whole administration was about. The New Frontier or however you’re going to define it. So, Jerry Ford was defined by that, but there wasn’t a slogan other than Watergate which has a negative connotation. He got caught up in a bad wave in a backwater and he swam out.

Smith: What was it like to be around the White House when Saigon was falling?
Ursomarso: The White House is a funny place because great events are occurring and there is not a lot of commotion in many cases. There aren’t people running around. There aren’t people yelling.

Smith: It’s not like The West Wing.

Ursomarso: No. They aren’t screaming. The president has his office and then has the Situation Room where discussions can occur. But when people go into those meetings and they come out, they couldn’t talk about anything. So, the place where you get the impact, in my opinion, is outside at the events. Reagan at the Berlin wall. John Kennedy in Berlin.

Smith: On the speech Ford gave in Tulane where he basically said as far as the United States is concerned, the war is over?

Ursomarso: Yeah, you get the impact when the public reacts to the events or something occurs that brings it home to you. A demonstration. When Obama went to Paris and that big crowd showed up, that’s where you see that something’s happening here. What is going on? But, in the White House itself, other than David Kennerly running around taking pictures—

Smith: What does that tell you? Because Kennerly is a unique player in this story. Almost a surrogate son. A resident smartass. And someone who will absolutely give it to you with the bark off.

Ursomarso: Right. The President sent him to Saigon.

Smith: And isn’t that revealing?

Ursomarso: Yeah, that he wanted someone – well, David wanted to go, but the President let him and sent him on the trip. There are, in the White House what I call ‘countervailing forces.’ There are people within the White House who, in spite of whatever position they hold, play a different role. And so David was theoretically the White House photographer, but he wasn’t. He was more than that.

Smith: Yeah.
Ursomarso: Bob Barrett, for awhile, filled that role. There are people where there’s more there than you can see. Well, the only way you can see it is to be on the inside of the envelope and look at it. Otherwise, you have no idea what’s going on. Now, Ford, to his credit, allowed those people to excess. And he enjoyed them. I mean, some of the stuff that David Kennerly and Barrett said, you wouldn’t say to a president. But they did. And he allowed that to occur, which gets us back again to his character. He was a man of character. He was content. He didn’t have any ego to massage every day. He knew what he was. He knew what he wanted to do. And he was happy.

Smith: Yeah.

Ursomarso: The guy was happy. Just look at his desk, you see his pipes were lined up and his papers were there. He was loving it.

Smith: Were you around him at all at the time of Mrs. Ford’s breast cancer surgery?

Ursomarso: I was, but I was not as close then, before. That was a big thing for anybody.

Smith: People have often talked, understandably, about the example that she set and how many lives she may have saved. He also set an example, in effect, for how a husband should behave.

Ursomarso: Absolutely. And as I say, they say it’s the Betty Ford Center, but for all practical purposes, it’s both of their centers, because they worked on that together.

Smith: There are stories of their annual alumni weekend, and he could be found grilling hotdogs, the soldier in the ranks.

Ursomarso: Yeah, on the Fourth of July, we had fireworks on the White House lawn and he would have all the people in. I think he was more a family guy in his mind. Maybe in actuality, he didn’t do all the things, but I think he was. I loved the guy. He was just a great person to be around. He was a very nice, kind person.
Smith: David Broder said he was the least neurotic president of his lifetime. And then he said something really interesting. He said, “You know, Jerry Ford actually was the president who we say we want and we only realized after the fact that we were losing.”

Ursomarso: Yeah, see, he didn’t run. He didn’t have that burning ego and so he was different. I think he was a valuable person, not only for what we’re talking about, but also as a prelude to what happened later in terms of Ronald Reagan, in terms of the things that occurred. You can go back and look at Jerry Ford; he was trying to solve those same problems that we’re trying to solve today.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: Tell me about your naval service – how it began.

Weston: World War II started when I was in high school. I was a senior and wanted to join up and my dad says, “Show me a diploma first.” So in June I signed up; I was seventeen. Got in the Navy. At that time they weren’t shipping guys until they were eighteen overseas, so I went to school at Navy Pier, the aviation mechanics school. And then I went to gunnery school, that was in Hollywood, Florida, and then I went up to Willow Grove, outside of Philadelphia, then I went aboard ship on the Monterey in June of ’43 in Camden, New Jersey. I stayed the whole war on the Monterey. The Monterey had the honor of having the most nautical miles of any ship, any man of war, in the Pacific during World War II. So we had the honor of leading the fleet in for President Truman to honor the fleet coming back from the war.

Smith: Really?

Weston: Yeah.

Smith: Describe the Monterey. What kind of ship it was, what it did.

Weston: Okay. The Monterey started as a cruiser. There was nine of them designed as cruisers, and they decided they didn’t need cruisers, they needed carriers. So they redesigned them while they were being built. They never finished them as cruisers. It was really named the Dayton as a cruiser, and finished as the Monterey as a carrier. There were nine of them. Princeton class carriers they called them. So we had a cruiser hull; we were fast. We could go thirty-five, thirty-six miles per hour - thirty knots.

Smith: As an aircraft carrier, we were in many sea battles (12 battle stars).

Weston: While I was there I was a mechanic on planes; I was a carburetor specialist, worked on the planes as a mechanic. That’s why I didn’t have much contact with Jerry during the war, because he was ship’s company. He was navigator and athletic officer and a gunnery officer.

Smith: And what were those functions?

Weston: Well, he was on the bridge when he was navigation; when he led athletics or exercises, he was doing that. Otherwise, when we were in general quarters, he was due out at the gun mounts and aircraft guns. That was his function.

Smith: How large a crew?

Weston: Fifteen hundred men.

Smith: And what were conditions like on the ship?

Weston: Not too bad. I was a kid.

Smith: Was it an adventure?

Weston: For me, it was good. I mean, when you’ve seen a little action, you didn’t get scared until afterwards. You’d get the shakes when you figured what you went through.

Smith: Could you be prepared for what you were about to experience?

Weston: Not really. You never knew what was going to happen.

Smith: What were the dangers that you confronted?

Weston: Well submarines were the worst. And then at night the Bettys would come in with torpedoes and try to torpedo us.

Smith: Explain to a generation that doesn’t know: what were the Bettys?

Weston: Bettys were twin engine bombers, Japanese. They were a torpedo; they would come at dawn on the horizon and try to torpedo you. I saw about three ships get torpedoeed or dive bombed – you know – kamikazes. We traveled in a group, usually anywhere from one to four carriers, six or eight. Toward the end of the war we had sixteen carriers out there, man of war carriers.

Smith: And where were you in the Pacific?
Weston: Where was I? I’ve got a history here. I can’t tell you unless I read it to you. I was all over. The first, I think, battle we were in was the Marianas, when the Marines went in on Marianas Islands. I can’t remember – we were all over.

Smith: Were you part of the fleet at Leyte Gulf, when MacArthur returned?

Weston: Yeah. I was in the typhoon. Of course, Jerry was in that, too.

Smith: Tell us, was that the scariest?

Weston: The waves were so high, you just said your prayers. You have no idea of what the feeling is. You think you’re gone.

Smith: Did weathermen alert you to the fact that you were about to go this?

Weston: Halsey, the fool, took us into it. They wanted to really burn his butt, you know, but they didn’t.

Smith: Tell us about Halsey.

Weston: Well, I don’t know the man, but there are write ups about him. Nimitz saved his butt because he wanted to sink the Japanese fleet, and he was following them to get them. We went right into this typhoon. It was his fault.

Smith: Did anyone tell you that you were about to go into a typhoon?

Weston: No.

Smith: So it was a surprise?

Weston: You didn’t know what was going on. Your job was to work on planes.

Smith: So the weather was a surprise to you? This storm was a surprise?

Weston: Yeah.

Smith: And what time of day? Did it break during the day?

Weston: Well, it seemed to me it broke just before breakfast. Went down to eat breakfast and the tables – they had fold up tables and benches – they were sliding down the deck.
Smith: At what point did you realize – presumably you ran into rough patches all the time?

Weston: Then they would put us on general quarters. We had to report to our station for general quarters, which is “enemies in the area.” But there was also a warning for the storm. We went up there and we started tying down the planes with three-quarter inch steel cable. They broke loose and the gasoline from the tanks caught fire. We caught fire. I was in the hanger deck during the fire and explosion. I was lucky; I was behind a stack when there was a fire and explosion right there. But I helped push the planes over the side – that was the easiest way. We raised the curtain, I hankered up and we just shoved them over so they wouldn’t burn.

Smith: Really?

Weston: Some of them would be on fire while we were pushing them.

Smith: How many planes would you ordinarily carry?

Weston: We had about forty-five planes. I think between forty and forty-five. It wasn’t a big carrier. It was what they called medium class.

Smith: And a big carrier would carry?

Weston: Would carry sixty to eighty, ninety planes.

Smith: And ordinarily they would all be out on hangar deck?

Weston: On the hangar deck or the flight deck. They had them on the aft part of the flight deck to get ready for launching. The first ones would launch by catapult. And then after they had catapulted a bunch off they had enough room to take off and you’d taken weight off. We’d always head into the wind, get the most lift for the planes.

Smith: I’m intrigued. The storm went on, was it prolonged?

Weston: Two days.

Smith: Two days?
Weston: There was a write up in Readers Digest on it. I don’t know if you’ve ever read that.

Smith: I haven’t, but thank you.

Weston: I have a lot of papers for you to see.

Smith: Perfect, thank you. So this was a day and night and day…

Weston: And the next morning after the storm, the sea was like a mirror. You couldn’t believe it.

Smith: Is it worse at night?

Weston: You never know. At night you are lucky because you are in your bunk. We had bunks four high, and you can strap yourself in. You go to sleep you’re so darn tired.

Smith: Even while the ship is…?

Weston: Oh yeah. You get used to it.

Smith: Were most of the planes lost?

Weston: Yeah. The waves were so heavy they washed right over the flight deck. We had a chief petty officer that washed overboard. The next wave caught him and washed him back aboard.

Smith: You’re kidding? Really?

Weston: Yeah.

Smith: Did you lose people?

Weston: We lost five, those were on the hangar deck where I was. They got caught in the explosion or crushed; either caught fire or crushed.

Smith: By the planes exploding?

Weston: The gasoline fires from the tanks, with the gasoline. They broke loose, they were banging into each other. The gas started leaking out of the tanks and the scraping of the metal caught fire.
Smith: Did you, at that point, think it was maybe a little bit less of an adventure than you had bargained for? Or more of an adventure that you had bargained for?

Weston: Yes, you betcha.

Smith: And you almost lost Ford.

Weston: Right. They sent him down; he was on the forward part of the hangar deck. I actually never saw him down there, because it’s quite a long hangar deck. But they tell me that there is an article someplace that the captain sent him down to help, to see what he could do to get the good of the planes down there on the hangar deck.

Smith: Again, for people who have never been on the ship: hanger deck and flight deck. What’s the difference?

Weston: Well, the flight deck is where all the planes take off from and land on. The hangar deck is the next step down. They have elevators; they can bring them down and shove them back in and tie them down. And that’s where we work on them. Every time a pilot comes in, if there is anything wrong with the plane, he makes a memo and then that comes to our officers and that is handed down as a worksheet for us to do.

Smith: So the fires, or the explosions…

Weston: Were on the hangar deck.

Smith: On the hangar deck?

Weston: Yes. Because the plane broke loose down there and then they caught fire.

Smith: And you were in this small, congested area.

Weston: It’s not small, it’s as wide as the ship was.

Smith: And Ford was at the other end of the hangar deck?

Weston: They sent him down. He was actually on the bridge when the storm was going. He may have been navigator at the time, I don’t know. I didn’t associate with him much aboard ship because there are two separate divisions.
And also, he was an officer and I was an enlisted man. So therefore, you didn’t have much in common. They had their corridors and we had ours.

Smith: But now, his athletic skills came into play?

Weston: A lot of times, when we would be out of a bad zone, they would have what they called exercise up on the flight deck. And everybody wanted to go up and he’d be one of the leaders. Actually, he was assistant athletic instructor. You don’t go back far enough. Joe Stydahar – football player – Chicago Bears. Later became a head football coach for San Francisco ’49ers. He was our head athletic director. And Ford was his assistant.

Smith: Okay. And were these regularly scheduled?

Weston: No, whenever convenient, depending on the area we were in or if it was a danger zone or not, whatever you want to call it.

Smith: And what form did it take?

Weston: We had exercises, they had exercises, we had wrestling mats, they’d play basketball. On the elevators we’d hang baskets on and we’d play basketball. And Ford was a great basketball fan. He used to do officiating for – we had division teams aboard ship – and he would do the officiating for it.

Smith: Now tell me again – I’m trying to understand: the divisions, the divisional makeup on the ship.

Weston: I was in the V-2 division, which was plane maintenance. V-1 division was where they moved the planes around and then they had a gasoline division. That was all in the air department. Other than that, everything else was ship’s company. We had the – well, whatever you wanted – we had the catapult people, too. And we had the radio men, the hydraulic men, but they were all part of the air department. And it was kind of a little - between the ship’s company and the air department – there was always a little tension.

Smith: Okay. What is ship’s company?

Weston: Ship’s company is the people who run the ship.
Smith: Okay.

Weston: They are responsible for everything like food and maintenance and whatever.

Smith: Is it a little bit of a hierarchy?

Weston: Well, yeah. They didn’t like the air department because we were preferred. We were above board. Like when we were launching planes, I had to be up there in case the carburetor needed a little quick adjustment, or so. And I was on the flight deck. Some of them never seen daylight, you know, unless there were athletics.

Smith: Just day to day existence – what was the food like?

Weston: Not too bad. One time we didn’t meet our tanker to refuel and to get food. We didn’t get meat and all we had to eat for about a week was green beans and butter – all you wanted. We ran out of bread and couldn’t bake anything. So, to this day, I don’t care much about green beans.

Smith: I can understand. Did you put into ports?

Weston: Oh, sure. We came into Pearl Harbor several times. Tied up at Ford Island and I would go aboard, fly with the planes to Kaneohe Bay, it was a Marine base across from Ford Island, and I’d stay with the planes.

Smith: At Pearl Harbor, could you still see evidence of the Japanese attack, or had that all been cleaned up?

Weston: We never got there until ’43.

Smith: Did you ever visit the Philippines?

Weston: We were on islands – they’d give us four cans of beer and a ham sandwich and put us on some island with a bunch of coral on it. Actually, we never got to any villages or anything. Luzon or something like that – some outer islands, but never got to the main part of the Philippines.

Smith: In the South Pacific – did you ever get around Australia or New Zealand?
Weston: Never got on shore down in that area. We were not too much in the south. We mostly, what we did was send our planes in when the Marines would take over these islands back from the Japanese. Tarawa Atoll, and Macon and there’s several of them.

Smith: You were on Wake Island?

Weston: I was never at Wake. No. Wake was before my time, actually.

Smith: Okinawa?

Weston: Okinawa…

Smith: The battle was late in the war.

Weston: No, I don’t think so. That was another part of the war.

Smith: I would be fascinated to know how the Navy felt toward the Army, and particularly toward MacArthur?

Weston: Dugout Doug, we called him. Old Glory Hound, Dugout Doug – that’s what we called him. That’s the feeling we had.

Smith: And was that in part because he was a showman?

Weston: Yeah.

Smith: That’s interesting you say that, because when Stephen Ambrose visited here, he was working on his book on the Pacific war - which is now on HBO - he said he had talked to hundreds of veterans of the Pacific war and he had never met one who had anything good to say about General MacArthur.

Weston: Well, I can’t say he was a bad man or anything because I never met him as an individual, but that’s just the attitude we had.

Smith: Was some of that a rivalry between the Navy and the Army?

Weston: More Navy and Marines.

Smith: Really? How so?
Weston: Well, the Marines thought they were better men than the Navy men. You had to be a better person to get in the Marines than you could to get in the Navy. So they held themselves one notch above us. We had a Marine detachment aboard ship, about fifteen fellows. But they were in charge of protecting the captain of the ship.

Smith: Of course you didn’t know there was an atomic bomb in the works - did you anticipate taking part eventually in an invasion of Japan?

Weston: We sure did. We were worried about that.

Smith: Tell me about that.

Weston: Well, we didn’t know anything about the bomb until after it went off. All we always heard about was the hell they dug in on the islands. The Japanese – if they were doing that on the mainland - it would be a long war. And we all wanted to go home, naturally. So we were very happy when the war ended.

Smith: I was just thinking, sort of daily occurrences; how did you get mail?

Weston: Oh, well, that came when we had supply ships. They had to refuel us and we had to have oil for our diesel engines to make the ship go, we had to get gasoline for the planes to fly, and we had to get food. And we’d also get mail on those supply ships. Sometimes it would be a long time, three months or three weeks or six months before we got mail – depending on your supply line; dependent on people in the port, too. Sometimes we’d put in on some of these islands out there, and there would be a supply ship there. We’d get supplies that way.

Smith: So a letter from home was treasured?

Weston: Oh, yes, oh very much so.

Smith: Particularly, I suppose, if it was from a sweetheart?

Weston: Well, yeah. I had a couple of girlfriends I wrote to.

Smith: How aware were you of the rest of the war? How much information did you get about the bigger picture?
Weston: They would announce it on the PA system. Sometimes they would announce we’re headed into attacks the next day. We’d have to have our planes ready at dawn. They would be actually in the dark getting them wound up. They’d take off just before it got light for bombing. And they’d come back and land and refuel it and bomb more.

Smith: But in terms of a geopolitical war, what’s going on in Europe and what’s going on in the bigger picture?

Weston: Actually, we didn’t hear much.

Smith: Really? So you were pretty isolated?

Weston: Oh yeah, very much so, aboard ship. You only heard what they told you.

Smith: Were there people on board who didn’t want to be there?

Weston: Oh, yes, several of them would fake sickness and stuff like that. And some of them, nerves got to them.

Smith: Really?

Weston: Yeah. We had one fellow, he got this alopecia, lost all his hair and became bald because he couldn’t take it. I was very fortunate, I wasn’t smart enough to…I was young, I felt sorry for the draftees that came in. They were thirty, thirty-two, had families, children, and a wife, and they brought them out there.

Smith: What was discipline like on board?

Weston: Pretty good because most of the guys felt that they had to do their job to get the war over with. So it was pretty good. You had a few of them when we’d pull into Pearl that left the ship. They’d hear about other ships going back to the States and they’d go aboard and they deserted.

Smith: Really? There were deserters?

Weston: Yeah.

Smith: What punishments were meted out?

Weston: I have no idea, because…
Smith: You didn’t see any of your crewmates punished for infractions?

Weston: No, no punishment that I ever saw.

Smith: How long were you on the Monterrey?

Weston: About two and a half years.

Smith: To the end of the war?

Weston: Right to the end of the war. In fact, I was there when we came back after the war ended, the fifteenth of August, and we went into Tokyo Bay, and I saw the Missouri in the distance where they signed the thing. We pulled in, in the morning and left that afternoon for the Philippines. We picked up prisoners, we picked up people that were sick and took them back. We came back to New York via the Panama Canal.

Smith: So you were there when the bomb was dropped?

Weston: Oh, yes.

Smith: How did you find out about it?

Weston: They announced it over the PA system.

Smith: How did they describe it?

Weston: It was just mindboggling. You had no idea what an atomic bomb was. They told of what happened, how many people were dead, and it really kind of scared you in a way. Because what are you going to do?

Smith: What was the reaction?

Weston: The reaction was good because it hastened the end of the war. So the reaction was good.

Smith: And then of course, with the second bombing in Nagasaki…

Weston: That did the job, yeah.

Smith: And then came the news. Did someone say the war is over? The Japanese surrendered?
Weston: On the fifteenth, we launched planes and within an hour they had on the PA system that the war is over and we had to get the planes back.

Smith: Were you part of Task Force 58?

Weston: Yeah. I’m going to tell you some stories. We had Third Fleet, Fifth Fleet, and Seventh Fleet – are you familiar with that?

Smith: Yeah.

Weston: Task force – you know that’s all one fleet, don’t you?

Smith: Turkey shoot.

Weston: Yeah, it’s the same ships, depending on the admiral in charge.

Smith: Oh, really?

Weston: Nimitz was there, it was the Fifth Fleet, I think. When Halsey was there it was the Third Fleet. And then they had Kincaid and somebody else, too. And it depended on the admiral leading the fleet at the time. We didn’t have three fleets out there; we had one fleet with different admirals. I’m sure you guys know that.

Smith: No, I don’t. Was Nimitz admired by the men?

Weston: Yes. Nimitz was admired much more than Halsey. There were the old timers, the real – what you call the people that were in the Navy for…

Smith: Career. Career people.

Weston: Career – they liked Halsey because he was their kind of guy. But to the rest of the people he was a glory hound. He wanted to sink the Japanese fleet, that’s what took us into that typhoon. I’m sure you know that; you’ve heard that before.

Smith: The war is over; you say you came back through the Panama Canal?

Weston: Yeah, we went in to Tokyo Bay, picked up our Marines, which they had taken in for the occupation; we sat there the day of the signing, and immediately left for the Philippines. We picked up people that were sick or wounded and so forth; go to Pearl Harbor. From Pearl Harbor to Panama; and up to New York. And we led the fleet into New York City for Truman to review from a presidential yacht because we were the ship with the most nautical war miles of any ship during the Pacific war.

Smith: All drawn up in uniform for the review.

Weston: Oh, yeah. We had to line up on deck and wear whites. You’ve seen carriers where the guys are.

Smith: Where would Ford have been in something like that?

Weston: Well, he would be with the officers, too, but he wasn’t aboard anymore. He got off after the typhoon, you know.

Smith: Oh, okay.

Weston: Ford didn’t stay until the end of the war. After the typhoon, we pulled into Bremerton, Washington. See, we had four screws on our ship. You know what screws are? We lost three of them in the typhoon. So we had to come into Bremerton to dry dock to get repaired. And he got off the ship at that time, I think. I’m not sure. You fellows probably know that, when he got off the ship. I’m sure it was either there or in Pearl Harbor on our way back.

Smith: Okay.

Weston: The article I have says he went to Glenview, Illinois, that’s where he was stationed when the war ended. You have that probably.

Smith: No, that’s helpful. Did you have contact with him in later years?

Weston: Oh, sure, after the war. The contact I had with him was after I got out of college. I didn’t see him the first three or four years, after the war because he was in Girimich. But then he ran for Congress. We bought a trailer; we were in a trailer park at Holland, Michigan. I don’t know if you are familiar with a Coast Guard station that’s out there. His folks, either his brother or his folks, had a cabin in the hills behind the state park and we used to come over and I’d go right past the cabin to the beach from my trailer. And when he was (vacationing) there in the summertime, I’d run into him many times or I’d see him in a little store there. I used to pick up groceries on the way home. Then after I got my drug store, he used to stop in and say hello whenever he spoke at athletics banquets. He was a great politician to speak at athletic banquets or graduations when he was a congressman. He did a lot of that. And then ran into him up at Cadillac, Michigan a few times skiing. Lee Rotary – I was in Lee Rotary and he would speak at our Rotary meetings. He was a great one to do that.

Smith: Did he change over time?

Weston: No. Jerry was always Jerry. We were never close, but we knew each other. Whenever he’d see me, he’d say, “Hi, Frank.” After he got to be vice president, I never saw him again. Before that, many times.

Smith: How has this area changed since then?

Weston: How has it changed? The biggest change I’ve seen is the Dutch aren’t as Dutchy as they used to be. They are more open.

Smith: Now tell us, we’d love to know. How Dutch were the Dutch fifty years ago, and how did it manifest itself?

Weston: Well, they never went to the movies or danced. When TV came out, they didn’t go to TV. They didn’t trade with you if you didn’t have a Dutch name. They were very clannish. There is nothing wrong with the people; they are good people. They are clean people, they maintain good homes, but they just – within themselves – they had strong beliefs. Very Dutchy. This town was that way. Now they go to shows now, they watch TV and they dance.

Smith: Whether that’s progress or not, we’ll leave it to others to decide. Were you surprised when he died at the amount of reaction that there was?

Weston: Oh, yes, very much so. He was well respected, nationally and locally. He was one of the finest presidents we’ve ever had, I believe.

Smith: Did you ever meet Mrs. Ford?

Weston: No, never met Mrs. Ford. I met the boys one time in a barbershop in Holland, when they were pretty small.
Smith: Was he with them?
Weston: No, he had dropped them off and he was going to pick them up because I got to talking to them.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?
Weston: Very highly. I had a lot of respect for Jerry, knowing his background and everything.

Smith: There were a lot of people who were bothered – the image of him as a klutz – because, in fact, physically, he was a natural athlete.
Weston: Well, he was a stud when he was a kid.

Smith: Good basketball player?
Weston: He was good at most anything he did. He had a good body and he maintained it. He was a good athlete. Like I say, athlete because he was eleven years older than I am.

Smith: How did your experience on the Monterrey affect you?
Weston: Well, the Navy taught me one thing: I went out of high school into the Navy, and I didn’t have any other form of education, and they had these fellows who had one year of college – they made them ninety day wonders – and they were in charge of us. And we had to teach them what to do, if you know what I mean. So I made up mind when I got out of the service, I wanted to go to school and get an education because I thought it meant more to have that college. It would give you a break in life and I saw it there. So that was the biggest thing I learned about the Navy.

Smith: Do you keep in touch with your old shipmates?
Weston: Actually, I don’t have any of them left that are alive. I used to keep in touch with a few of them, yes. But they are all gone.

Smith: What do you think it means to be part of the Greatest Generation? How do you feel about that title?
Weston: Well, I think we are very fortunate to be that. I don’t think there’s going to be that much luck for the next generations to come. They are going to have a rougher time. My wife and I always say we lived during the good years.

Smith: Really? Now that included the Depression and the war?

Weston: Well, I remember the Depression. My dad worked on WPA – fifteen dollars a week and groceries. I can remember going with a car, going to the stores and getting groceries as a kid.

Smith: But you say you lived in the good times?

Weston: Well, I do, I think so. Hey, I was real lucky. I bought my first car when I was thirteen, going on fourteen, you could get a driver’s license. I drove to the police station with my dad, in my own car, to get my driver’s license on my fourteenth birthday. And I was working at gas stations; I worked at Gracewil Country Club and the Highlands out here caddying. I worked in drugstores, I set pins in the bowling alley, had a lot of good experience. You could buy a Ford Model A when I was a freshman in high school for $25.00.

Smith: Do you think, in fact, that the Depression and the war fostered a sense of community that maybe is missing today?

Weston: Oh, yeah, at the time relations got together and friends for picnics and stuff. You don’t have much of that anymore. It’s hard to get the family together because they are spread out so much.

Smith: We’re a more materialistic culture.

Weston: Oh, yes. I think television has spoiled the world.

Smith: Amen. That’s the perfect note on which to end. This was wonderful. Thank you so much.

Smith: OK. Maybe the easiest way to frame this, given the limited amount of time and unlimited amount of subject, is to ask you where you were on August 9, 1974 and where the country was in terms of energy, energy policy or lack thereof.

Zarb: The day the President was sworn in?

Smith: Yes.

Zarb: I was at OMB in the Old Executive Office Building. Paul O’Neill had an office right next to me. We were summoned to the White House that morning. President Nixon and his family appeared, teared up, and told us he was resigning. We watched, then Vice President Ford, walk him to the helicopter to leave for California. That afternoon we were back in the White House for the swearing in of the new President. So that day will be forever etched in my memory.

Smith: Did any of that, by then, come as a surprise to you?

Zarb: No, by then, it had not. But a month earlier, I remember Paul coming into my office with the Washington Post. Paul asked, “When is the man going to straighten this all out?” Hope lingered that he would say, ok here are the tapes, you see I didn’t do anything wrong. That was three or four weeks before the resignation, it was eerie because you could see it coming.

Smith: A death watch?

Zarb: Yes. People at the White House fence, rather than being festive tourists, would hang on to the fence and look in quietly. Yes you could feel it coming.

Smith: Had you had contact with Ford during his Vice Presidency?
Zarb: Yes. I was at Office of Management and Budget and he would come in from time to time with requests from some of his congressional colleagues to get a project passed. Sometimes they were pretty good, other times they were sheer pork. I remember telling him one time that he was a great Vice President but a lousy picker of pork, which he knew and he would laugh. He knew exactly how I was going to respond. So the relationship was really good-natured. I was so proud to be in the same room with him. My being in Washington to begin with was a complete accident so my being there with the Vice President – I was in awe.

Smith: How was it an accident?

Zarb: I was an Executive Vice President and Partner of the securities firm, C.B.W.L. in New York. We had done some acquisitions and I ran the back office; which got some publicity. I had only been to Washington once, and that was a one-day tour. So I knew nothing of politics. I got a call from a man who said “my name is Fred Malek and I work for the President of the United States”. My first reaction was this is a hoax and I told him I was going to hang up. He said “before you hang up let me give you this phone number and you call back”. Sure enough it was the White House switchboard.

President Nixon had decided to reorganize the Cabinet and he wanted someone who came out of the management world in each Cabinet agency. He ultimately recruited 4 people with my kind of background; I became Assistant Secretary of Labor for management. After a little more than a year, and before Nixon’s re-election campaign, my wife Pat and I looked at our finances and decided we couldn’t afford to stay in government. My firm had asked me to come back and run the Sales Division, so I planned on returning. Before I left, Fred Malek introduced me to the Attorney General, then John Mitchell, who asked me to stay and join him on the Committee to Re-Elect the President. It was a job that finally went to Jeb Magruder. Now I would like to say I saw all that Watergate stuff coming, but that’s not true at all, I was flattered, and if I could have afforded to do it, I probably would have. We went back to New York, but at the end of 1973 Malek called again. He said President Nixon was in trouble; they had lost a lot of people at OMB and needed someone to come back and get through the budget. Shortly after I went back to OMB the energy crisis hit. Nixon opened the Federal Energy Office when the oil embargo hit because shortages of oil supply were compounded by price controls, creating an economic crisis. They needed to have a federal energy office to allocate fuels. It was a nightmare. I was asked to continue my job at OMB and also head the new allocation office.
Letters of Delegation of Authority from Secretary of the Interior, Director of OMB, and the Secretary of the Treasury delegated all their authorities to enable me to do this job - which was my night job!

Smith: Where was John Sawhill?

Zarb: I’ll get to that. Nixon was getting closer to the end. The Federal Energy Administration is born. John Sawhill is appointed Federal Energy Administrator, I am back at OMB, and energy is in my portfolio. John Sawhill was a very able guy, also from OMB, someone I liked a lot, but he had a conflict with the President. The issue was gasoline taxes. The President’s orders were: no gasoline taxes. John took a public position supporting a gasoline tax, so the President asked him to step down.

Smith: [John] Sawhill favored this as a conservation measure?

Zarb: Yes, as a conservation measure, he [John] was an active environmentalist.
His motives were good. He did promote a gasoline tax publically once or twice and President Ford simply told John [Sawhill] that it was time to go

Smith: So it’s Ford, who in effect, has this policy disagreement with Sawhill?

Zarb: We should get into that because the President’s policy did encourage higher gasoline prices. Everything we did under his direction was to try to get oil and natural gas price controls removed and allow prices go up naturally.
Politically he knew it was a waste of time to propose taxes. Example: Al
Ullman, a democrat who was head of the House Ways and Means Committee, came to me one day and said he wanted to introduce a bill to raise gasoline taxes by 37 cents per gallon. I talked to the President [Ford] and explained that Ullman wanted our help. The President said “give him technical assistance and anything you can to do help, but don’t endorse the taxes”. The Bill came out of the sub-committee at 9 cents, came out of committee at 1 penny, and it was defeated on the floor. He knew that every politician was aware if they voted to increase gasoline taxes, chances are their opponent was going to use that against them in the next election.

Smith: That clearly is something that he, as a Congressman, he picked up and knew.

Zarb: The President wasn’t opposed to the concept of higher gasoline taxes, he knew if we could get prices up it would induce more energy production and less consumption. I was at OMB and had just run the Federal Energy Office during the peak of the oil embargo. There was a man out of the labor movement who was being seriously considered to replace him, but something came up and the candidate did not go to the Senate for consideration. The President asked me, “What are you doing?” to which I replied, “I’m going back to New York, he said “Oh no…you’re not”.

Smith: What do you think, because you saw him from a number of perspectives and with a number of responsibilities shared and you obviously began to form impressions of the man, what did the public not know about Gerald Ford and perhaps still doesn’t know about Ford?

Zarb: Two things. He had a very unique intellect, a mixture of smart and IQ; just the right balance, with an extraordinary level of integrity. I think people then, and probably now, can’t believe anyone in Washington in politics could have the integrity level of Gerald Ford. We knew it because we worked with him. He ran the administration with genuine integrity. There was very little divisiveness in his administration compared to what you see today. He gave me the ability to work with a Democratic Congress because they trusted him. He just displayed this uniqueness of a human being that the public never captured. Here was a man about to run for election in 18 months, fully aware that raising energy prices would negatively affect his campaign, but did it anyway. The hardest test in life is when you have to do the right thing while knowing it’s not in your personal best interest.

Smith: In some ways he seems like a fore runner of Reagan energy policies.

Zarb: No question about it. I learned so much from him. When we sent this energy package up it was very comprehensive; lots of nuclear power, a lot of drilling for oil and gas, and miles per gallon standards for automobiles. I walked in one day and said “Mr. President, we have managed to piss off both the Republicans and Democrats”. He had this special smile and he said “that means we have it just right”. It was that aspect of him that was so unique, a sitting President who put the country before his own personal ambition. I don’t think the country ever really understood that.

Smith: Do you think, of course we are such a television age and a President is often judged by his style and above all by his words and Ford wasn’t a television president. He wasn’t a glib or particularly eloquent president. Do you think people confused that with a lack of intelligence?

Zarb: Maybe. Presentation was part of it; substance was a larger part of it. He had so many negative things to deal with that he became vulnerable. The environmentalists went to war because they thought the democrats would do a better job of not disturbing the environment. The freshman class in the House was swept into office on the fumes of Watergate; they just wanted to stop whatever he wanted. The media was very unfriendly for a lot of reasons. Most of it had to do with the pardon. Surprisingly one of the important newspapers that supported our energy policy on its editorial page was the Washington Post. Ford understood that the energy policy would be a battle. He would tell me we’re going to get this up to the Hill and we’re going to fight like hell for it. He knew we wouldn’t get everything we wanted with full price deregulation, but we’d get a start. Ford’s view was when I am elected I’ll go back for the full plan and with the election behind me I’ll get it. So he was willing to accept the beginning of comprehensive energy policy and gradual price deregulation for the time being. But he told me “once I am elected they won’t dare turn us down” because the country was still afraid of what another oil stoppage would do to our economy. He had a political wisdom that went far beyond the rest of us.

Smith: That’s interesting because you also look at how things had changed, culture changed during that period. You mentioned Watergate babies in 1974 because there is a story about the gradual de-control of natural gas prices and that basically at one point he had a hand-shake deal with the democratic leadership in both Houses. I guess Mike Mansfield was still there and Carl Albert.

Zarb: We met in the Oval Office, the four of us, on that subject, and agreed on a two year phase-out of price controls.

Smith: And they reached an agreement and obviously nobody got everything they wanted. And then the story is a week later the Democratic leaders came back and said, in effect, we can’t sell it to our members.

Zarb: That’s exactly right. They said “we can’t deliver”. It was the freshman class in the House that was the problem; it gets back to the dynamic of politicians wanting to get reelected. Imagine that. Isn’t that shocking? They knew that if they voted for legislation which was going to increase the price of fuel, it would be bad politics. Never mind what was best for the country.

Smith: But that’s fascinating because it tells you, not only was the presidency, in effect, weakened by Watergate, but the “leadership positions” of the parties on the Hill were also undermined, at least to some degree, by this influx of Watergate produced congressmen.

Zarb: Yes. That is really true. It was the beginning of the end of a time when members of Congress could disagree but ultimately come together to do what the country needed.

Smith: Describe, package, for a 21st century audience, what the Ford plan for energy was.
Zarb: It started with the notion that we have a growing supply of oil coming from an unfriendly part of the world.

Smith: And unstable.

Zarb: Yes, Unstable. And the analysis that we had of the potential for mischief in the Straits of Hormuz, which are narrow shipping lanes that could be blocked and cut off 30% of the U.S. oil supply. The economic turmoil would be substantial. President Ford’s objective was to reduce the amount of imports by a significant amount over the short term and continue to reduce it until we could get it back to a safe level. The only two ways to bring down imports are to use less and produce more domestically. In the 1970’s we would have had to increase the nuclear power fleet considerably to do so. In his 1975 State of the Union message; Ford called for opening protected areas in the continental shelf to drill. His proposal to raise prices would have reduced consumption and supported new production.

Smith: For environmental reasons?

Zarb: Yes. He wanted to expand coal consumption at the same time forcing scrubber technology. He wasn’t insensitive to the notion that the environment had to be protected. But we were a country that was very vulnerable to serious, serious disruption. He supported research and development. He put lots of money into that, recognizing that new forms of energy were many years away. Even today “alternative” fuels represent probably 3-4% of the total consumption in the United States. Solar is coming along but it’s going to take a long, long time. Wind has promise, but relies on subsidies. His [Ford] vision was to remove price controls and experience the real price of oil in the marketplace, which would result in new investment, not only in conventional energy but alternate forms as well. Ford’s proposal mandated appliance labeling; requiring manufacturers of appliances to have energy efficiency on labels. Miles per gallon efficiency for automobiles were mandated.

Smith: That was the first wasn’t it?

Zarb: Yes. Detroit was not happy about that.
Smith: What kind of pressure could they bring?

Zarb: They caused their congressmen to oppose us. It was amazing to me. I sat in the Oval Office with the President and the heads of the three major car companies. He told them that we needed to get prices up and it would require a new kind of automobile efficiency. They were very polite, but essentially they concluded…this guy doesn’t know what he is talking about. Whatever we build the American people will buy. Of course the Japanese proceeded to eat their lunch. The President had a holistic view of what needed to be done. He also knew we weren’t going to get a lot of it before his election, but he set the stage for the rest to come after.

Smith: Did you ever notice or did he ever say anything that suggested an awareness, at least, of the irony that this man who had spent 25 years on Capitol Hill, who really by his own boast was a man of the House, should really wind up spending his presidency warding off a lot of the challenges both in domestic and foreign policy that came from the Congress. Was that inevitable given the weakened state of the presidency, post Nixon?

Zarb: Watergate was part of it and the Democrats smelled blood. On the other hand he had an asset in dealing with the congress, which few presidents had, his former colleagues on the Hill trusted him.

Here is an example. In early 1975 Henry Kissinger told the President that the Shah of Iran wanted to sell us oil at a discount to the OPEC price. Ford asked me to follow up. I went to Tehran to start a long negotiation with the Iranian Finance Minister.

The negotiations went on for months in secret and I became concerned that there could be a leak and the Congress would not be happy. I discussed with the President who told me to go see my Senate Oversight Chairman Scoop Jackson and my House Oversight Chairman John Dingell (both Democrats), and tell them what we are doing. I never did learn if Ford called them before my meetings, but Jackson said “sounds like it is worth pursuing”, and Dingell said “worth trying and if anyone in this House raises a question with you, tell them to come see me”. At the time Dingell and Jackson were two of the most powerful members of the Congress. They trusted Ford.

Ultimately negotiations with the Shah failed because we could not agree on an acceptable price. That led to an interesting moment in the Oval Office. The President asked me to explain to Henry Kissinger why we could not close an oil deal with Iran. I explained all of the numbers in detail including the fact that when the United States government buys anything from another government, it is required by law to use American shipping. That made it impossible to achieve a saving unless the Shah would lower the Iranian price more than they were willing. Henry was clearly not happy and called me a “Nit-picking Talmudic Scholar”. There is a book written by Andrew Scott Cooper titled “The Oil Kings” where this incident is covered in detail. Although Henry and I are good friends, he was very, very unhappy with me.

Henry was not alone. Consumer groups, environmental groups, and some oil producers all wanted my scalp, but I always knew that the President had my back.

Smith: Do you have any observations about the Ford-Kissinger relationship?

Zarb: It starts with my amazement that Nixon, with all his insecurities, would pick people like Henry Kissinger and George Schultz. These are men who are independent and accustomed to speaking their minds. Kissinger and Ford had a good professional relationship, and Ford relied on and trusted his judgment. The President was also aware that Henry would have strategic interests which often were not obvious. In the case of Iranian oil, Henry’s real objective was to get more money in the hands of the Shah so the Iranians could buy more weapons from us.

Smith: What kind of conservative was he [Ford]?

Zarb: Generally fiscal conservative for sure. He inherited a big stagflation problem so he was somewhat limited in what he could do to reform government spending. He was a sensible moderate on most issues.
Smith: Do you think Mrs. Ford was a factor too?

Zarb: I am sure she was. Where he came from, the kind of people he had with him. They were Republicans, but no flaming right-wingers in that crowd. Everyone was slightly right of center on most issues but not all. And, of course we had Vice President Rockefeller, a real moderate.

Smith: Which is still, as you know I have been working on this book for years and years, and with the passage of time and the benefits of hindsight you can see how everyone with the best of intentions wound up doing something that they probably shouldn’t have done. That if Ford had been more, in some ways secure, less concerned about reassuring, not so much domestic audiences, as foreign audiences, and he was also very conscious of Rockefeller’s capacity to bring good people with him. That was part of the equation. There were lots of reasons that you could in a non-political way justify picking Rockefeller. Rockefeller at the same time wasn’t totally honest with himself as to why he did it. He didn’t want to do it, he hadn’t wanted to be Vice President but at the same time he told someone who told him that he shouldn’t do it, at length, but you don’t understand this is my last shot. And when it all got down to the bedrock there was always that ambition there. But the other thing was...if people had just stepped back and thought, he was a Rockefeller, he had been governor of New York for fifteen years, he was the ueber-executive, that’s not a profile for a successful Vice President.

Zarb: No. And he had visions of his own that were not always consistent with the White House staff. He and I had disagreements but I liked and respected him.

Smith: Tell me. Talk about how energy policy in effect was crafted in your office. Clearly he [Rockefeller] was crafting something else. What was the timing of that and what was it?

Zarb: He never fought us on the stuff we were doing. But, he genuinely believed that the best way to solve this problem was to throw a lot of money at alternative fuels. Now, obviously, it’s hard to argue with the intent here, but he didn’t take into consideration, as we had to do when making the calculation, that we would be throwing money into new technologies and at the end of the day most of it would be wasted. The likelihood of producing energy that would amount to much over a ten year period would be very small. We needed to solve a big problem with reliable resources. The development of alternative energy was important but Nelson’s approach would have failed. To help give us some protection over the short term we initiated the National Petroleum Reserve.

Smith: And this was a Ford administration initiative?

Zarb: Yes that was. It was part of our 1975 legislation.

Smith: Was there opposition to that?

Zarb: Not really. The oil companies liked it because it boosted the price of oil.
Environmentalists didn’t complain much about the salt domes because it went into the states that welcomed the activity. There was probably some rumbling but nothing that amounted to anything. The national security concern put more emphasis on what we could get done in the next ten years than over the next 30 years. It was as simple as that. Alternative energy could not be a primary objective. Jimmy Carter went in a different direction and created the Synthetic Fuels Corporation. It was scandal ridden from the beginning; hundreds of millions of dollars were never recovered, and it was shut down.
What Nelson [Rockefeller] wanted to do was actually implemented by Carter and it failed.

Smith: Is it oversimplification, in a sense, government picking companies, I mean government trying to seed industries, or simply funding research? What was the idea of government’s role, I mean how would the money be spent?

Zarb: Well as you know, Obama has had a taste of that.

Smith: Yes. I was going to say…

Zarb: Nelson’s [Rockefeller] idea was to take X-hundreds of millions of dollars and dedicate them to solar power. And if I had a good solar power idea I could take it to the government, who would give me the money to implement it.
Now, there were two problems with that. One is solar power couldn’t be forced by money alone, it needed time and technology. It made its greatest strides from the space experience. The same with wind, which has been used in some areas pretty successfully. It’s still subsidized. The economics are getting better in some parts of the country where there is a lot of wind, so that it might eventually stand on its own but it’s a fraction, less than 2% of the total energy base. So his vision was good if you took it to the next 50 years and had smart people making the investments. The problem here is that bureaucrats are the worst people in the world to make those kinds of decisions. They have a chart and they have to check the boxes, once the boxes are checked you get the money and if you go bankrupt…well that’s the risk to begin with. That’s not sound investment strategy.

Smith: Rockefeller came up with something like the Energy Independence Authority, and it envisioned 100 billion dollars and it was really going to be funded by the same moral obligation bonding that had begun to spring leaks back in New York. And, there was clearly a debate within the administration about all of this. How did that unfold and was this seen as competition to what you were doing?

Zarb: Well no. He wanted to add this on. Alan Greenspan and I thought that it was a bad way to throw money at the energy problem so we opposed it. One day we had to make a decision because there was a deadline on the Hill. Rockefeller and I met in his office. He gave me his last pitch and I said, “I have a lot of respect for you Mr. Vice President but I just can’t support this”. When I told him why he picked up the phone and called the President in his residence, who was sick in bed, and said, “I can’t get through to Zarb, we have to come see you”. So there was poor President Ford in bed, looking tired, and Nelson makes his pitch and I make mine. The President said… “Alright Nelson, I’ll tell you what we’ll do, we will send up a request for 50 million dollars”, it was a bone…

Smith: Pilot program of sorts?
Zarb: Yes. Greenspan and I were opposed to that, as was White House Chief of Staff Don Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld had his connections to the Hill so that plan was dead before it even got near the Hill.

Smith: Bill Simon, in his memoir, and I actually remember hearing him tell the story before his death, remembered a cabinet meeting at which he, Simon, finally was sort of carried away by his passion on this subject and I think by his disdain for Rockefeller personally. And, he said, ‘Mr. President…words to the effect of…don’t let him do the country what he did to New York’ and subsequently they had this discussion specifically in which Simon reiterated his vehement opposition and I think he got a call from the President who said ‘Bill lay off Nelson’ and the way the President explained it is ‘you and I both know this is dead on arrival, once it goes to the Hill it’s not going anywhere but let Nelson, in effect, have a bone.’ Does that ring true?

Zarb: Yes. That’s essentially what happened.

Smith: Then of course Rockefeller was upset because the administration didn’t lobby for the idea.

Zarb: Actually if nothing else he was politically smart, so Nelson surely knew what was going on. So he sucked it up and went forward.

Smith: You have that the President quoted in the Daily News “New York Drop Dead” cost him the election.

Zarb: If we had lost New York City by a lesser amount we would have taken the State and won the election. That Daily News quote didn’t come from President Ford.

Smith: Where did it come from?

Zarb: It came from the coalition led by Bill Simon.

Smith: I have been told Bill Simon, Alan Greenspan, in particular, well in fact Bill Seidman told me this story that there was this back and forth and they literally were rewriting the speech, the Press Club speech, and he sighed, would rewrite it to get in either a very strident anti-New York tone or a much more moderate tone and Seidman thought the moderates had won out and he was wrong. The President went and gave the speech which lent itself to caricature, the famous Daily News headline. But subsequently, in effect, the President changed his mind. Or at least he changed his policy didn’t he?

Zarb: Well subsequently, sure. He knew that ultimately we weren’t going to let New York City go bankrupt. It’s a mystery to me as to why those words were put into his mouth. He was smarter than that.

Smith: Really? Hugh Carey once said to me that Jerry Ford has never gotten the credit that he deserved. In effect it was the tough love policy that forced New York finally to get serious.

Zarb: The credit came after the election. John Dingell told me that he was mistaken to oppose the President on price decontrol. He’s had all these years to reflect on that. And of course the Kennedy’s gave him an award and said they were wrong and that pardoning Nixon was the right thing to do. Those are real events and they add up to who the man was.

Smith: Do you think there was a Truman-esque streak in Ford?

Zarb: There was some of that. Some of it was amusing. I told you the story of when I told him we were pissing off both the Republicans and Democrats and he said “we have it just right”.

Smith: He had a sense of humor?

Zarb: Yes. One night Alan Greenspan and I were with him in the Oval Office. We were going to go on TV because he decided to put a tariff on imported crude oil to scare the Congress into doing something. He was going to go on TV to announce the Tariff; Alan and I were going to be there with him. He changed his shirt in the side office, next to the Oval Office. He went from regular cuffs to French cuffs and he had no cuff-links. So I looked at him and said…

Smith: You can’t go out looking like that…?
Zarb: He looked at me and he placed two big paper clips on the cuffs. Then he said “let’s go, we have more important things to do”. I’ve seen gold cuff links in the form of paper clips so he may have started the trend. Yes, he had a sense of humor. He had a sense of caring and sensitivity. We entertained at dinner the Egyptian President, Sadat…

Smith: Yes it must have been.

Zarb: In any case, yes Sadat I think. I sat at the table with Henry Kissinger and some of their people, high officials, because energy was a hot subject in the Middle East. At the end of the evening the President said to me “I’d like you to wait a few minutes, I’d like to talk to you.” He walked the President [Sadat] out and as he came back in, my wife walked over. He put his arm around her and he said “Pat did you have a good time tonight?” She said, “Now that you have asked Mr. President, let me tell you. Every time we have one of these dinners he sits with Henry Kissinger and the other high officials and I sit in the other room with a Congressman who eats with his fingers.” I have the photo of Ford looking at me like ‘what did I start’. In any case, the very next dinner, sitting next to the President of the United States, was my wife.

Smith: Really…isn’t that wonderful! Did you ever see his temper?

Zarb: The one time I saw it flare was when we told Kissinger that we would not do the Iranian oil deal. Henry, you will recall, cared about money in the hands of the Shah to buy guns and tanks from us. I wasn’t smart enough to understand how important that was to Henry. I think the President did. When Henry argued the point further, I saw the President, a little flare when he said “Henry, I’ve told you and told you, no discount - no deal”. It was kind of an edge. That’s when Henry called me a nit-picking Talmudic scholar. According to the “Oil Kings” book; after that meeting Henry went back to the State Department and told Chuck Robinson, his deputy, “I’m a better economist than Zarb and Greenspan and there’s not a full brain between them”. So there were tense moments. The Schlesinger matter, I wasn’t there but I’m told there was a stirring of anger. John Sawhill stirred some anger in him. I didn’t see that personally but I was told about it.

Smith: Do you think Schlesinger was just chemistry, personal chemistry?

Zarb: Yes.

Smith: One senses that what some would take as an academic sort of stance on the part of Schlesinger could come off as condescending and Gerald Ford knew more than maybe Schlesinger credited him with knowing.

Zarb: Schlesinger was a very able guy, very talented, but he had a natural style which some considered arrogant and that annoyed the President.

Smith: And I would think would be particularly annoying to someone like Ford who could probably put up with a lot but arrogance is probably not…

Zarb: Yes, because he practiced none of it at all. And also you know I had a special sense of loyalty to this guy. When the energy bill was up for signing, passed by the Congress, there was a huge lobby for a veto. The Left didn’t like what was in there, increased prices slightly and authorized some more domestic energy production. The Right didn’t like the fact that we didn’t get full price deregulation. And, the Secretary of Labor John Dunlop was trying to get Common Situs Picketing legislation signed. Both pieces of legislation had the same political dynamic; they were opposed by the extreme right and extreme left. The President talked to me and he said “I want you to recommend that I should sign the energy bill, but I am not going to comment, I want my options open for the next couple of weeks”, which was smart. I did it and took some heat from the Republican right. Secretary of Labor John Dunlop said if Ford does not sign the Common Situs Picketing Act he would resign. The President vetoed Common Situs Picketing, signed the Energy Bill, and John quit. So there was a lot of drama but never any animosity.

Smith: I know it’s totally outside your area but I am just trying to get a sense of the mood of those times when Saigon fell. What was it like around both the White House and official Washington?
Zarb: Beleaguered.

Smith: Yeah.

Zarb: Henry [Kissinger], Rummy [Rumsfeld], Cheney, they worked full time on the subject. Brett Scowcroft was trying to make sense out of what was going on. And then weeks later, except for the hostages, it became a relief. Strange feeling but you could feel it everywhere.

Smith: Plus remember there was also, there was a fight afterwards because Congress wanted to pull the plug on any kind of refugee resettlement and Ford thought that was outrageous, that we had a moral obligation and went to the country.

Zarb: We had a lot of people there who were friends of ours that were stuck there and that always troubled him.

The biggest burden he carried through his presidency and for years after was the criticism of his pardon of Nixon. He talked about it often. But when Ted Kennedy gave him an award and said that the pardon was the right thing to do, the burden was lifted.

Smith: Exactly. He said “You know for twenty years everywhere I go people ask the same questions, but once the Profiles In Courage award was presented to me”, he said, “they stopped asking”. It’s as if the Kennedy imprimatur had made it okay. But it’s a sense that he was haunted in some way by the pardon?

Zarb: No. He was sensitive enough to be uncomfortable with the fact that people held him responsible for an act they thought was inconsistent with American justice.

Smith: Yeah.

Zarb: That bothered him because he knew what he did was right, but he was troubled by views of a lot of people and also the lingering murmur that he did it as a deal ‘if you pardon me I’ll make you President’.

Smith: Right.
Zarb: So that troubled him. The Kennedy Award washed that away. I always liked Ted Kennedy, he was a guy who kept his word, we made a number of deals and I could depend on him.

Smith: But you know someone who takes a lot of heat but who played a vital role at a critical juncture was Bob Hartmann because it was Bob Hartmann who supplied all the suspicion of people’s motives that Gerald Ford lacked.

Zarb: Bob had bad/good days.

Smith: Yeah. But Ford put up with it.

Zarb: He adjusted to it. You may recall the botched draft of the 1975 State of the Union message. The President kept Rummy, Cheney, Greenspan and me there all night rewriting the message.

Smith: Yeah, and remember that’s the speech he famously began, the first and last President to have ever said this, to say “The state of the union is not good”.

Zarb: Well…that’s a time honored principle among CEO’s who take over a company that’s in crisis. Make sure that all the bad news is made public fast because you’ve got to build from that foundation of truth.

Smith: You know the criticism has been made, Rockefeller certainly made it but he was not alone, that the President was, in fact when I talked to Rumsfeld, I think if Rumsfeld would have had his druthers, they would have been quicker to move the Nixon people out and replace them with a distinctly Ford administration. Ford took a practical view that you have to run the government and that there were a lot of people…first of all there were a lot of people who shouldn’t be tarred by their association with the Nixon administration; a lot of very talented people who were doing their job perfectly well and who shouldn’t be punished because of their associations. It goes back to that quality you talked about earlier; Rumsfeld may be being more ruthless seeing the strategic value, the symbolic value of cleaning house.

Zarb: That’s a reasoned analysis. Not cleaning house was the right leadership decision. You need people who are best equipped to do what you want to get done. The two biggest fighters in the Cabinet were Simon and Kissinger. They took every opportunity to poke each other in the eye. That wasn’t done secretly. It was done up front and publicly, oftentimes with good humor.

Smith: Yeah. Was that just a function of their personalities?

Zarb: And ideology, and turf. Simon thought he should be also the Secretary of State, at least honorary, and Kissinger thought he ought to have some say-so about economic policy. It was always remarkable to me that Nixon brought such strong people into his government.

Smith: Yeah. I was going to ask you…how did that Cabinet function?

Zarb: First of all there was a minimum amount of interagency quarreling. Disagreements were handled openly and honestly.

When I was at OMB before I was appointed to the Energy job, Jim Fletcher, who was running NASA, had this big expenditure to build a thing called the Shuttle. I remember having a meeting with Jim saying you know you are building a truck but you’re not telling us what you are going to put in it. Where are you going to go with it? He said, “Well yeah”. So I said, “No money this time, come back with a plan”. Jim appealed to the President. He brought a sleek model of the Shuttle and before we started he said, “Mr. President I want to show you something, his aid uncovers an easel and under is a photo taken from space of President Ford’s Grand Rapids home. I thought to myself “Ah Shit!” It was over before it begins.

Smith: Pretty good!

Zarb: The President looked at him and said “I’ll tell you what we are going to do. We are going to give him his money”. “Jim I want you to have a full comprehensive plan to Zarb before year end”. He did. In retrospect it was the right answer. That’s the way the Cabinet functioned.

Smith: Yeah. That’s interesting.

Zarb: You can see how he governed. Nobody left that room feeling he was unfair.
Smith: Yeah, and of course he’s famously the last president who could brief on his own budget, he could get up and basically present the federal budget.

Zarb: Yes. Here is an example of how he used his people:

In early 1976 Pan Am Airlines was in financial trouble. The Shah of Iran indicated an interest in buying it. The President called an ad hoc meeting in the Cabinet Room; present in the room were Simon Burns (Federal Reserve Chair), Greenspan, Siedman, Cheney, and me. Ford told us about the Shah’s interest and explained that Pan Am had been the American Flag Ship for many years and raised the question of whether we should allow the sale. He then went around the room and asked each of us to give our views. It was a free-market crowd but the majority said the sale should not go forward. The President thanked us and he went off to make the decision. None of us were airline experts but he did not want airline advice and the sale was blocked.

Smith: You’d said he was a director of a couple of your companies. What kind of director was he? Because you know he took heat as a former President for “commercializing the office” and I think that was a combination of some of the directorships that he took and speaking fees and so on and so on. But, I would be interested in specifically the work he did. As a director, how involved was he and what he contributed?

Zarb: In 1993 I took over a company called A & A, a worldwide insurance and consulting company with 12,000 employees. It was in trouble and it had to be turned around and I asked him to come on the board. The previous board had done a terrible job. Some people told him [President Ford] that he didn’t really want to go on the board of a troubled corporation. I was told he responded, “Frank asked me to go on, I am going on”. He came and he was very attentive, very involved, very supportive, very thoughtful, and did his homework. We turned that company around and sold it. Everybody, including the shareholders were happy. Then I took over the NASD which is now FINRA, the largest self-regulator in the securities industry. It had gotten into a scandal and the SEC had effectively put it on probation, with a monitor in the place and deferred a prosecution agreement. The Chairman of the SEC, Arthur Levitt asked me if I would take it over. NASD also owned NASDAQ.
I asked the President once again to join the board. And again, although it was a very troubled company, he never gave it a second thought. We turned it around.

Smith: Really. What could he bring to those meetings?

Zarb: Intelligence, very good judgment, and absolute integrity. What we needed were people who have a lot of wisdom and experience, and could help make hard decisions. He never stopped asking questions, and helped me think through some very difficult issues.

Smith: Really?

Zarb: He also had a sense of loyalty, which I will never forget.

Smith: One overarching question about his presidency, because one way of looking at it, is as a man who obviously arrived, essentially never sought it, steeped in the ways of the legislature, who had to learn in effect to be an executive and a unique kind of executive, all the political and related demands that portend to the modern presidency. It is said that he particularly rued the outcome in 1976 because he felt he had just in effect mastered the job and then lost it.

Zarb: He had a plan. He had a plan for his four-year term in office.

Smith: What do you think he would have done if he had been re-elected?

Zarb: I know he would have achieved comprehensive energy legislation, finished the job he had started.

Smith: Yeah.

Zarb: He certainly had a keen interest in foreign policy and things to do he thought were unfinished, so it would have been a big part of his future. The economy was still not back in shape. Most of his Cabinet would have stayed with him.
He would not have had the normal turnover in Cabinet and staff.

Smith: Did you see an evolution in the man during his presidency?
Zarb: I didn’t know him prior to his being Vice-President so I can’t make that judgment.

Smith: Well, this larger question about…Do you agree with him that his presidency was all about mastering the job, this executive position for which he had never really prepared?

Zarb: He had a natural ability to lead and wisdom developed in the political world that gave him an almost automatic capability to switch from congressman to President. When you think of it, he was far better equipped to be president than most.

Smith: Yeah. With the one exception of the presentational aspects, you know particularly television. And one thing, remember, you can’t quantify, but it was in the Ford Presidency that something called Saturday Night Live went on the air for the first time and there is a post-Watergate, there’s a whole different way of looking at the President.

Zarb: Yes, you could say the same about Harry Truman.

Smith: Yes. Yes because it wasn’t on every Saturday night. As it is he had a 23% approval rating at one point, but you are right he didn’t face the same saturation exposure. He didn’t come into our homes 24/7 the way that a modern president does.

Zarb: Yes, I think that’s probably right. But, in the end it was the pardon and a hyper rightwing which defeated him.

Smith: You saw a lot of him after he left office?

Zarb: Yes. We became very good friends. In addition to the two Boards I mentioned earlier we were both on two other company boards. He asked the members of his former Cabinet to join the Gerald R. Ford Foundation Board. That group continues to stay close.

Smith: Do you remember where you were election night 1976?

Zarb: Election night 1976 I was home in McLean, Virginia with my family.
Smith: By that point did you think he was going to pull it out because obviously the campaign was all about catching up.

Zarb: He was getting there. In my heart of hearts, I thought it was a long shot.

Smith: Yeah.

Zarb: There was just too much going on in a short period of time.

Smith: Was the pardon still a factor?

Zarb: It was a factor but I think “New York City Drop Dead” was the biggest negative.

Smith: Well…the Reagan challenge…you know you can argue it both ways because the arguments made that one thing we know about modern incumbent presidents if they have a serious primary challenge it fatally weakens them for the Fall. On the other hand the arguments also been made that the Reagan challenge made Ford a better candidate.

Zarb: Maybe, but the Conservatives sat on their hands during the election which was a big problem. It was a particularly tense convention. Alan Greenspan and I went there together. We had no role to play except be there. The arch-conservatives were particularly angry. No way of measuring it, but switching teammates has a negative impact on how people see you and the sinister motives they ascribe to that switch.

Smith: Yeah. Why…this may be unanswerable. Why is Donald Rumsfeld, in the stories of the Ford Administration, such a polarizing figure? There are people who, fairly or not, just seem to trail after them, you know suspicions, you know conspiracies…

Zarb: The majority of Rummy’s life was in politics. He enjoyed Washington intrigue. I think if there was a straight way to do it and an intrigue way to do it, Rummy would pick the intrigue. It was a game he loved. He was a good Chief of Staff.
Smith: Dorothy Downton, the President’s personal secretary, told us that Rumsfeld tried to get her fired. Why?

Zarb: In those jobs… if you are gonna shoot; you better kill with the first bullet.

Smith: And it tells you a lot about Gerald Ford doesn’t it? Well. We are almost out of time. What haven’t you had a chance to say that you would like to say?

Zarb: Well. I think we’ve pretty much covered it.

Smith: I feel like we have covered a great deal of territory. What do you think in the 21st Century, if you were talking to Presidents or the general American public, what could people learn from Gerald Ford? What’s important for people to know about Gerald Ford?

Zarb: First of all of his sense of leadership was based on real character, it was based on trust. To lead you have to make decisions which are the right thing to do, even if they are not in your personal best interests. If you can’t do that you’re not going to be a good leader. You might be politically re-elected but you are not ever going to be seen as a good leader. Jerry Ford made decisions that were not in his personal best interest but he knew they were best for the country. People are so numb to politics and politicians, that they roll their eyes when you mention his integrity.

President Ford taught me a lot. The most important lesson: The only time doing the right thing is exceptional, is when you do it even when you know it hurts you personally.

Smith: That’s well put. Last thing, pure speculation, how important was Mrs. Ford?

Zarb: We loved her. She was a modern woman who showed the Ford decency, she spent the rest of her life helping others.

Smith: She obviously became a story of inspiration.

Zarb: Yes…and a role model.
Smith: You know…not long before he died he [President Ford] said, I think it was at a Betty Ford Center event, and I think he meant it, he said… “When the history books are written her contributions will be deemed larger than mine”.

Zarb: That’s true.

Smith: Thank you.
Smith: Thank you for letting us come to your home.

Welch: I’m very thrilled to be a part of this because we were really such good friends.

Smith: How did you first meet Mrs. Ford?

Welch: Peggy would know.

Peggy: It was in Alexandria when she came to shop at the store.

Welch: That’s right.

Smith: Tell us about your store in Alexandria.

Welch: Oh, yes! That’s the reason I can live here now. It was in an 18th century house, a large house for then. And it was called Frankie Welch of Virginia. Peggy, were you born there?

Peggy: No. I grew up there.

Welch: You grew up there. Tell us more.

Peggy: It was in a historic home, originally Duvall House, that George Washington had visited. Then it was sold to The Bank of Alexandria, the first chartered bank in Virginia. And the Fords also lived in Alexandria. Do you remember their home?

Welch: I do. A family residential neighborhood.

Smith: It’s on Crown View Terrace.

Peggy: When Gerald Ford became Vice President, they continued to live in their Alexandria home. You delivered clothes to her there many times. And during that period the driver would bring her to your shop.
Welch: Exactly.

Peggy: You have said that your friendship was important to Betty Ford, particularly while she was the Vice President’s wife, because she felt a little isolated?

Smith: When he was going up the ladder politically, he was out of town a lot and we know now that she paid a high price for that. I mean, she pretty much raised the kids herself, didn’t she?

Welch: Peggy knows because she knew their kids.

Peggy: But you also did express that it was hard with him traveling a lot. They had four children and you felt like when he became vice president that she got to see more of him. That she was more a part of, as a vice president’s wife. In the White House they did things together, although, she still needed a friend to talk to sometimes.

Smith: What did she have to talk about?

Welch: Well, she loved clothes and that’s how I came about. We were just good friends before that. She loved pretty things and she was very meticulous as the wife of the vice president and then president. She wanted to look her best and dress appropriately, and waited and listened to my advice. She trusted my opinion.

Smith: She’d been a model, hadn’t she, at one point?

Welch: Yes.

Smith: So, she could wear clothes.

Welch: Yes, she knew how to carry herself and she knew how to meet people and she was gracious and kind. A lovely person. And we had a lot of good times together. We were together every weekend, weren’t we?

Peggy: Not every weekend, but she would call you from the White House to bring clothes and just to visit – quite often in the beginning.
Welch: Yes. That’s true. It was an honor and fun to bring her clothes to the White House.

Peggy: And you helped Susan.

Welch: Exactly.

Smith: How did you help Susan?

Welch: Well, she was a teenager and Peggy was in her early twenties. Susan was a little bit younger, not much, than my daughter Peggy and Genie.

Smith: Was Susan uncomfortable being in the White House? I mean, none of them expected to be there.

Welch: I don’t think so. Susan was very likeable, loveable, part of everything.

Smith: But she also liked to wear blue jeans.

Welch: Well, that was part of the era. So did Peggy. So did Genie, my younger daughter.

Smith: Of course. Was it hard getting her into a more formal dress?

Welch: No.

Smith: When Mrs. Ford had her breast cancer, how did you find out about that?

Welch: She called me to tell me about it.

Peggy: Right, after my wedding. The same summer Mike and Gayle Ford were married.

Welch: Yes, exactly.

Smith: To tell you that it was happening?

Welch: Yes, exactly.
Smith: Was she afraid?

Welch: Well, sure, but she was a stoic type of woman. She was a very wonderful person.

Smith: She’d been through a lot, too, already, hadn’t she?

Welch: I guess.

Smith: Tell me about Mrs. Ford’s taste in clothes. Did you ever disagree about a dress or something? What was she naturally drawn to?

Welch: Well, she was very fashionable, very fashion-conscious, and we had a wonderful relationship through fashion and through friendship.

Peggy: I think this might jog your memory about her style.

Smith: That’s a good way of putting it. Tell me about Betty Ford’s style.

Welch: Well, she liked color. You can see here.

Smith: Were there colors that she liked more than others or were there colors that she couldn’t wear?

Welch: You know, she really was so cooperative with everything. She was that type of person. Peggy can tell us. Peggy has the memory.

Peggy: She dressed in a very tailored, fashionable way versus trendy.

Welch: Yes.

Peggy: You may want to expand on the tailored look that she had.

Smith: Describe for people that don’t know fashion what’s the tailored look versus the lacy and—Welch: It’s the non-fancy, not fussy look. The tailored look can go anywhere and is timeless and classic. She could go anywhere wearing the clothes we worked together to have for her.

Smith: She was easy to design for?

Welch: Oh, yes. In fact, she was just sort of agreeable and so in to everything. If she was supposed to do something, she did it.

Smith: She liked your scarves. Was that a trademark of yours?

Welch: Yes, it was my business, trademark and business. The first scarf I designed was the Cherokee alphabet and then I designed 4,000 others after that. I designed for many corporations and both political parties.

Smith: Oh, my gosh.

Welch: I was able to put Peggy and Genie, with the help of their father, through college.

Smith: Now, you knew Mrs. Ford before she was in the White House?

Welch: Yes, we were all friends in the neighborhood.

Peggy: In Alexandria.

Welch: And we went to the same church, Christ Church.

Smith: Were the Fords churchgoers?

Welch: Yes.

Smith: Did she talk to you about her concerns about moving into the White House?

Welch: Well, you know, we were so close. It was like sister to sister. We were just very close and we talked about so much.

Smith: Was she comfortable with the idea?
Welch: Oh, yes. Yes, she was.

Smith: Really?

Welch: She liked people and she liked being a part of everything. She did it very tastefully. She was just a very lovely, lovely person and very cooperative. If she was to be interviewed, she gave it her all.

Smith: Let me ask you. This is an awkward question, because you were so close. We all know now, and she’s written about it, in retrospect, she had some problems, even in the White House with the prescription drugs and alcohol, but beginning with the prescription drugs. Was that something you were aware of?

Welch: Not really. I didn’t see her take pills. I didn’t know that part because I guess to me she was just a well-balanced person.

Smith: And she has a sense of humor.

Welch: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. She laughed a lot, too. We did together.

Smith: Had you worked with Mrs. Nixon?

Welch: Yes, yes. I worked with, let’s see, how many First Ladies? Five?

Smith: Well, Mrs. Nixon is somebody who, even now, is not somebody well known. Was she shy?

Welch: She was warm to her friends. Let’s see, who else?

Smith: Lady Bird?

Welch: Lady Bird. I knew her very well.

Smith: Everyone loved Lady Bird. I mean, everyone probably thought being married to Lyndon Johnson must’ve been a saint.

Welch: Yes. And I visited Mrs. Johnson several times after she returned to Texas.
Smith: But Mrs. Nixon seemed to be more remote to the general public. Her friends, obviously, knew her in a way that the general public maybe never really got to know her.

Welch: That’s true, I’m sure. And I designed a scarf for Rosalyn Carter. We had a connection because we were both from Georgia.

Smith: Before Mrs. Ford became First Lady she never expressed fears, doubts, and concerns?

Welch: She liked being a part of everything. If she were here, she would enter into the conversation and be involved in what we’re talking about.

Smith: She liked people?

Welch: Oh, yes, very much so, very much so. She was reticent in some areas.

Smith: How so?

Welch: Do you remember, Peggy? I’m trying to think.

Peggy: She did talk at that stage of her life about her problems to you.

Smith: Sure, sure. Well, remember the famous 60 Minutes interview where she talked very candidly when they asked about “What would you do if Susan had an affair?” or “Do you think your children have tried marijuana?” or things that mothers all over America were having to deal with, but no one talked about it.

Welch: Yes, yes. She was willing to be honest and open about topics she felt she could add something to.

Smith: And, Mrs. Ford, in effect, probably made it possible for that conversation to take place in millions of homes.

Welch: Exactly.
Peggy: That was her humor, I think, coming out –

Welch: Exactly.

Peggy: - talking about Susan and teenagers.

Smith: Right. And she took a lot of heat for that. I mean, there were people who criticized her for her candor, but in the long run, I think it worked very much to her advantage. Likewise, tell us when Mrs. Ford had her breast cancer, because we gather that was not something that women talked about forty years ago. It was not a subject that was publicly discussed.

Welch: That’s true. Very true. But we knew.

Peggy: And you said she wanted to make that discussable like she did about other issues.

Welch: Yes, she did.

Peggy: That she wanted people not to be afraid to discuss it.

Welch: Yes. Yes, exactly.

Peggy: She had a five year life expectancy with breast cancer back then. And that was thirty-six years ago.

Welch: Yes. I’m so glad you’re here, Peggy. Peggy is my memory, also.

Peggy: And I will help to clarify that Mom has always held confidences well. So, I will say that she and Mrs. Ford had some discussions that Mom would choose not to share. That’s out of respect of Mrs. Ford’s decision. It would be her decision, not my mother’s.

Welch: Exactly.

Peggy: So, you only have shared with Genie and me lightly private conversations over the years. It is important to know that that’s a respect for Mrs. Ford.
And, you know, she did talk to you about being lonely sometimes. I think she was actually happy in the White House. But it happened so fast, she just did it.

Welch: Yeah, exactly. It was just done.

Smith: Plus she saw more of her husband. I mean he wasn’t traveling anymore. They were under the same roof. Remember the wonderful story? People actually wrote in to protest because the Fords shared the same bed. There were actually people who wrote the White House to protest the fact that they were that open about it. But that was just the way they were, I think.

Welch: Yes.

Smith: Did she enjoy being a First Lady?

Welch: Oh, I think so. She liked being ‘on.’ There was a good bit of excitement and overall she enjoyed very much being First Lady.

Smith: She had been on stage, hadn’t she, as a dancer?

Welch: Yes, exactly.

Smith: Did she enjoy the entertaining? The state dinners? All of that? It’s a job. It’s a real job.

Welch: She did. And she loved to dress for it and, of course, being her dresser, being the one she bought her clothes from, it was really wonderful to work with her because she was so with it in that she wanted to look well. It wasn’t hard for her.

Smith: And I assume he was very proud of her appearance and took an interest in her clothes.

Welch: Yes, I would say so. I wasn’t in their bedroom discussing that, but he did. I think he was very, very appreciative of her.
Smith: Let me ask you something, because she was famously tardy. Punctuality was not her thing. Is that because of the perfectionism? You said earlier that she didn’t leave the room until she was perfect.

Welch: Yes.

Smith: For as long as they were married, it had become almost a joke in the family. The President was always on time and Mrs. Ford was not always on time.

Welch: Okay, yes.

Smith: Do you think that in a way reflected her desire to be as nearly perfect before she went out in public as she could?

Welch: She liked looking well because she had been in fashion earlier. She knew fashion. She was very wonderful to work with because when I would dress her for something, she cooperated. You know, she didn’t conflict.

Smith: Did she wear much jewelry?

Welch: She wore pearls and that’s what every woman wore at that time. Not flashy like this, but she wore pearls. That was about it.

Smith: I wonder if he bought her jewelry as gifts.

Welch: I would say so, but I don’t know that.

Peggy: She didn’t wear much jewelry.

Smith: That’s what I mean.

Peggy: She was more tailored and understated.

Welch: Elegant and a very kind and sweet person.

Smith: Did you ever go to her with a problem? We’ve talked about her problems. If there was something bothering you, did you feel comfortable enough to confide?
Welch: I don’t remember.

Peggy: When Daddy died, she came to his funeral, didn’t she?

Welch: Yes.

Peggy: You talked about that because Mrs. Ford knew Daddy and she came out of respect for him and to show you her support and friendship.

Welch: We all appreciated that gesture.

Peggy: Did you talk to her about that? That it was hard losing a husband?

Welch: Yes. Yes, we were that close. We were very, very close. I would say that at that period of time, I was her closest friend. I just remember her smiling and being gracious and lovely and wearing nice clothes.

Smith: Yes. Was that good for your business? I mean, obviously, women knew that you were dressing her.

Welch: Well, I would say it was.

Smith: It couldn’t be bad for your business.

Welch: No. It was nice that she recognized it and she would tell people that she bought her clothes from me. And she emphasized ‘bought’ because some First Ladies had gifts given to them, but Betty Ford paid for her clothes.

Smith: She did? That’s interesting.

Welch: Exactly. Do you remember any stories about that, Peggy?

Peggy: No. At some point, I think he’ll want to ask about the First Ladies gown because I think that’s an interesting part of your relationship with Mrs. Ford.

Smith: The gown that’s in the Smithsonian. Every First Lady has a gown and she didn’t have an inauguration, so there’s not an inaugural gown.
Welch: She was asked to select a gown from the White House years for the First Ladies Hall. So she chose her favorite gown which was in fabric from China.

Smith: I think when they visited China, they were given fabric.

Welch: Yes, yes, yes.

Smith: And then you made it into her dress.

Welch: Yes, I designed the dress and our workrooms worked very closely with me to produce the dress.

Peggy: Talk about the fact how you chose the design of her dress of the Mandarin collar, that you thought it was Chinese inspired and appropriate for the fabric.

Welch: Oh, yes. Exactly. Do you have a picture of the dress?

Peggy: I was going to find it for you.

Welch: You’ll find it. It’s around. Is it over here, Peggy?

Peggy: It’s a lovely picture with a scrap of the fabric in it.

Smith: Oh, yeah.

Welch: And here’s the fabric, too, right here, the green fabric in that little vase.

Peggy: Yes. It happens to be right here.

Smith: And you said that was her favorite dress?

Welch: Yes, it was. It was just a beautiful, beautiful fabric that they brought back from China.

Smith: It’s almost the color of jade.

Welch: Yes, a little lighter. There’s more of this. Peggy has the picture.

Smith: Yes, it looks great.
Welch: You know, I had to get a lot of fabric to frame this, to make that, but it’s a wonderful picture, isn’t it.

Smith: Forgive me, as someone who knows almost nothing about the subject. How many times could she wear that dress?

Welch: You know, she was so practical – that’s a good word – she was a practical person. And she didn’t pay attention to what people thought about how many times she wore it.

Welch: Here she is with the dress and the head of the Smithsonian.

Smith: Forgive me for asking, but I’m curious…Gerald Ford didn’t have any money coming into the presidency. What would a dress like that cost?

Welch: This particular one with this fabric? This was brought back from China, so it was very special, so you really couldn’t buy this fabric.

Smith: Right.

Welch: But a dress made like this on a famous person cost lots of money.

Smith: Several thousand dollars?

Welch: It was a unique situation; I don’t remember.

Peggy: I don’t think you charged her more for the gown.

Welch: No, I didn’t.

Peggy: In this particular instance, I mean, I don’t think the cost of it really was a factor.

Smith: I’m just trying to get a sense of what Mrs. Ford’s clothes budget might have been.

Welch: She loved clothes and thank goodness she did. But she was practical and chose her wardrobe carefully.
Smith: And he sort of indulged her in terms of buying clothes?

Welch: I would say yes. I would say he was just so likeable, so going along with everything, in my opinion.

Peggy: She bought less expensive clothes. She didn’t look for expensive clothes. She was on a budget.

Welch: She was on a budget.

Peggy: Didn’t she talk to you about that, that she needed to ______?

Welch: Exactly. Exactly. And this dress was the dress she chose as her “inaugural dress” for the Smithsonian.

Smith: Did you do dresses for Susan as well?

Welch: She bought from our store along with other stores.

Peggy: Susan bought off the rack. Now, Betty Ford’s dresses were not very often designed. The dress in the Smithsonian was an exception. She bought off the rack. Susan got some prom dresses from you and you helped her with the Seventeen magazine spread, when Seventeen sent the trucks of clothes and a accessories for one of their issues.

Welch: That’s right. Thank you, Peggy.

Peggy: You had fun because you helped Susan pick the clothes for that.

Smith: Were there things that Mrs. Ford hated? I mean, were there things you knew not to bring?

Welch: You know, she was such a lovely person and I say that with all respect and confidence. She was just a pleasure to be around.

Smith: But, just in terms of her fashion sense, I mean, obviously you knew what she liked and what she didn’t like. There must have been things that she didn’t Peggy: This picture is a little more representative of her general style.

Welch: Yes, and she was so reverent to me and always wore a scarf.

Smith: Always wore a scarf. Okay.

Welch: She wore several of the scarves of mine. And I designed a special scarf for her.

Smith: Yes. Was that year round? Is that seasonal or is that year round?

Welch: Scarves are forever.

Peggy: She probably wore more solids than a lot of patterns, but she didn’t wear ruffles and didn’t wear a lot of florals and prints.

Welch: Yes, though the scarves as an accent were bright and prints.

Smith: When he ran for reelection, was she looking forward to living in the White House for another four years?

Welch: Yes. Yes. You know, she was very amenable, very part of the scene. She liked being part of it.

Smith: When President Ford pardoned Richard Nixon, was that something she talked about at all?

Welch: I don’t think so, no. That wasn’t part of her everyday—

Smith: One thing that might surprise people that I found out years later - for all that, she was accustomed to being part of the scene, she had stage fright when she had to give a speech.

Peggy: It’s not surprising. She was used to being in the background.

Welch: True.

Smith: Yeah. Did the kids enjoy the White House?
Welch: Oh, I think so. Don’t you think so, Peggy?

Smith: I mean, it must be such a radical shift in your daily existence. And it also must be tough not to be spoiled living in the White House.

Peggy: They all were very supportive of both of the parents. They were proud of their father and respectful of that position.

Smith: Did the Fords enjoy entertaining?

Welch: Yes, especially their close friends.

Smith: When she left, knowing they were leaving Washington, was it tough to say goodbye?

Welch: To her?

Smith: Yeah.

Welch: No, because we had a meeting after that in Grand Rapids. I flew in there to be with her.

Smith: The program of First Ladies.

Smith: Did you keep in touch after the White House years?

Welch: Yes, we did.

Peggy: Not like you did when she was there.

Welch: No, not the same as when they were there, but we were good friends. We knew we were friends. It wasn’t pretend.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw her?

Welch: She had on a green dress.

Smith: I mean, did you visit her out in California?
Welch: No. But I did write to her after President Ford died to let her know I remembered the thoughtfulness when my husband died and that I was thinking of her.

Smith: Do you miss her?

Welch: Yeah, but, you know, we did communicate. We talked in the early years. What else, Peggy?

Peggy: Well, wouldn’t you say some of her openness was because she really did care about her children? Discussing Susan, discussing the boys, that was a big part of her _________.

Smith: Motherhood was a big part of her—

Welch: It really was and she was so sincerely kind to her children and helpful without pushing.

Smith: It’s interesting. In some ways, she’s a traditionalist, but in other ways, she’s ahead of her time. She managed to be both a devoted mother and wife and kind of a feminist pioneer in some ways.

Welch: Yes, very true. She was a remarkable person.

Smith: She bridged that gulf. They were totally comfortable with each other.

Welch: Oh, they really were and I think he adored her and she him.

Smith: It was a real love match.

Smith: Yeah. What size was she?

Welch: Oh, she was very teeny. She was a size 6 or 8.

Smith: And, for people who know nothing about it, what does that mean? What’s the difference between a size 6 and a size—?

Welch: Well, I’m a 12/14 and she was a 6 or 8.
Smith: Now, did she work at that?

Welch: She was very conscious of being well-dressed and that was good for me, good for her, and good for fashion. She really made fashion statements.

Smith: Did she diet to keep that figure? Or was that just the way she was? She didn’t have to work at it like some people do?

Welch: No. She was just such a lovely person. Such a good friend.

Smith: How did your paths first cross with Ford?

Barnes: You know, I’d heard about him a great deal, obviously, the Republican leader in the House, but it was thanks to Jack Germond at The Evening Star newspaper. When Ford became vice president, I’d just moved to the national staff. I had covered transportation at The Star, which was actually a pretty good subject. We were building the subway, the Metro, and so on. But he wanted somebody to cover Ford full-time because there was such a great chance that Ford was going to become president.

Smith: Was there a real sense?

Barnes: Yeah, there was. So, in 1975, I started covering Ford a lot

Smith: ’74.

Barnes: No, I didn’t start covering Ford until ’75. He came in in ’74. No, this was before that. This wasn’t ’74, because Ford became president in ’74. This would’ve been ’73. And so I started covering it and that was the first time I’d had any encounter with Ford. Very likeable guy. I mean, he was so different from what we see now in presidents or in Washington. Ford, you know, had come to the House of Representatives at a time when the members of the House and Senate got along with reporters. There’s so much mingling up there in the pressrooms. The Senators and House members come by all the time and you sit in those cushy chairs that you could actually go to sleep in. So, when Ford got to the White House, unlike the people who’d been governor and had found the press to be adversarial in most of the states, he liked reporters, he got along with them. He was cheerful around them. And he was happy to meet with them. So, he’s the last guy who actually I thought had maybe even some friends in the press, but certainly was the last guy who had a cheerful attitude toward them.
Smith: I was involved with the group that planned the funeral, and it was no accident that a journalist spoke at the Cathedral. Originally it was to have been Hugh Sidey. And then, of course, when he passed away, Tom Brokaw. But it illuminates the point.

Barnes: Well, he was unique in that, I think. Certainly afterwards there’s been nobody like that.

Smith: Another thing - perhaps the other side of that coin; Ford has his first press conference on the 28th of August (1974). Here’s a guy that’s spent 25 years on Capitol Hill and he really believes in that climate that people are going to want to ask him about inflation and Turkey and Cypress and all of those things as opposed to Richard Nixon’s tapes, Richard Nixon’s papers, and a pardon. And he goes in and doesn’t do very well and afterward he’s angry with himself. And I’ve often thought that was the tipping point that led to the pardon ten days later.

Barnes: In what sense?

Smith: Well, because it dramatized for him that the fact people were obsessed with Nixon. How obsessed were they?

Barnes: Well, that was the right reaction on the part of Gerald Ford, for sure.

Smith: Was he naïve to believe anything else?

Barnes: Of course he was naïve, but if I thought about it, I’m sure I could come up with other ways that he was kind of naïve. I think he was naïve in one way that occurred to a lot of us at the time in his almost heroic view of Henry Kissinger and Kissinger’s ability to do just about anything. In American history, George Washington is regarded as the indispensible man. Well, for Jerry Ford, Henry Kissinger was the indispensible man. But that’s another story. You know, Washington, at least, and the press corps in Washington, was obsessed with Nixon and obsessed with Watergate. People have talked a lot about this. People could tell you exactly where they were in Washington or what time of night it was when they heard about the Saturday Night Massacre and when Elliot Richardson was fired. And so there was total obsession in Washington and, ‘What’s he going to do about Richard Nixon?’ I mean, that book was still open. So he shouldn’t have been surprised. I certainly wasn’t surprised as I recall. And he was a little naïve about that, maybe a lot naïve. And I’ve always thought he wound up doing exactly the right thing. I think history has come to the conclusion that he did do the right thing. It would’ve been wrong to have Nixon eating off a tin tray in some prison somewhere.

Smith: Could it also be argued that for all the people who say, “Well, it may have been a deciding factor in his loss in ‘76”…that if you had spent two years going through all of the trials, might it not have been even worse politically for him?

Barnes: Oh, it would’ve been worse for the country, it would’ve been worse for Gerald Ford, it would’ve been worse for all institutions in America except for journalism. It would’ve been great for journalism. The press would’ve loved it, all that extra time to pound Nixon and so on. You know, I never covered the White House until August 9th, 1974 and I was set up for that because Jack Germond assigned me to cover Ford as vice president. Well, of course, Ford was pretty accessible as president. As vice president, he was incredibly accessible, if you went on trips with him.

Smith: Tell us about the plane.

Barnes: Oh, the plane was great. He’d wander up and down the plane sometimes. He’s had maybe just a little bit more to drink than he should’ve and he’d be walking down and talking to people and reporters and he’d be spilling some. He was just such a genial guy who really wanted to like people. And if you want to like people, you’re going to find a way to like them. And he liked even the grumpy guys in the press. The guy that used to try to ask him tough questions on everything was Phil Jones of CBS. You probably interviewed him. But he’d ask Ford some question and Ford would say, “Oh, Phil!” and give it back. He was fun to be around. My view of Ford wasn’t that he was a great president, but he was a pretty good president. He was really kind of underrated and did some bold things, at least personnel wise, and in the pardon, that really amounted to something.

Smith: Is it safe to say that everyone drank more than today?

Barnes: Oh yeah. I don’t drink now, but I did then. And particularly at the press parties where somebody else was paying for it, then you drank a lot, yes. Drinking wise, it was a completely different world.

Smith: In Tom DeFrank’s book, he makes a big deal out of this kind of verbal slip of the tongue where Ford says there’s some appointment that Nixon had made and Ford didn’t approve of it. And he said something to the effect that, “Well, when I’m there,” and then he took it back. Did he ever say anything that you can recall that touched upon the likelihood of his becoming president?

Barnes: You know, we talked about this all the time. Tom DeFrank and I got to be friends and have been friends ever since then. Of course, he kept up with Ford after that. I didn’t and I’m not sure anybody else did either the way he did, so he knew Ford the best. We’d comment on the lengths that Ford would have to go to pretend like he wasn’t going to be president and that there was no chance of that. There would never be a hint of any criticism of Nixon. There would never be any talk that might create a gap and a conflict with the Nixon White House. Part of that was just pretending that he was just there to be vice president and there was nothing dramatic that was going to happen as a result of that. The reporters would try, you know. They want conflict and one of the hearty perennials in Washington is the great conflict between the vice president and the president. And sure enough everybody tried, I probably did, too, though I don’t remember that exactly.

Smith: It comes as no surprise there are people in the Nixon White House who bitched that he wasn’t defending the president - that he was getting out of town.
Barnes: You know, I heard that, but that was pretty trivial stuff to say that. On the other hand, I think it is generic. But, look, Ford went out of his way to not let any daylight exist between himself and the Nixon White House, whether he traveled around too much or didn’t. A presidential staff is never going to think that a vice president is touting the president enough; even when they don’t even get there. If you remember the 2000 campaign, John Edwards wasn’t saying enough wonderful things about John Kerry. If the job was to not create any conflict at all between the vice president and the president, he did a pretty darned good job of achieving that.

Smith: He clearly was walking a tightrope.

Barnes: Yeah, he was and he walked it pretty well, I have to say, to the great frustration of everybody in the press corps that traveled with him, including me.

Smith: How would you characterize his intelligence?

Barnes: You know, there are different kinds of intelligence. Ford was not a reader, he was not a book reader as most politicians aren’t. And the ones that have been book readers, the two I think of are Jimmy Carter and Gary Hart, things didn’t turn out very well for them. Hubert Humphrey was not a book reader. Most of them were not. And so he wasn’t. Actually the guy that read a lot of books in his past, not when he was president, was Ronald Reagan. He’d been a reader. So, there’s that. I would say this. At the end of the day, he was a lot smarter than he appeared. He wasn’t good at press conferences. The two presidents, maybe three, I think, that reporters have been most dazzled with are guys that can throw around a lot of details. You ask them about a subject and they give you six details about it. Obama’s pretty good at this, I think, though when you get to know those details, there’s not much there. Jimmy Carter was great at it. Richard Nixon was good at it. Ronald Reagan wasn’t very good at it. Actually, neither of the Bushs were particularly good at it. But reporters love it when you can really dazzle them with details. And Nixon was good at it. One of his speechwriters, I’ll think of his name in a minute, or advisors, that I ran into at Harvard when I had a Neiman fellowship a few years later, told me when he’d have some policy that he’d put out, they’d have a certain impressive number of points, bullet points, whether it be 45 of them or something just to impress reporters. “Look at that! This must really be a substantial policy!” And, of course, the press always fell for that stuff.

Smith: Remember, in ’75, he [Ford] introduced the federal budget. And at the press conference he stayed and he answered every question they threw at him. All those years in the Appropriations Committee gave him that kind of knowledge of the government.

Barnes: Yeah, I went to that press conference. He was pretty good at it. That’s true. But in an impromptu press conference, he was just not good at summoning that stuff. And, look, some people are. Bill Clinton was good at it. Jimmy Carter was actually pretty good at it. It’s no mark of your leadership at all, so far as I’m concerned, and probably at the time he thought differently.

Smith: Well, to the extent that the modern presidency is about communicating, as much as anything, persuasion whatever. Ford himself said, if he did one thing over, he would’ve spent a lot more time on communications. He understood that shortcoming. Didn’t he suffer in a sense from a cultural change? Saturday Night Live goes on the air in ’75 and irony becomes, sometimes, cruelty. Satire finds its way into the mainstream.

Barnes: And Chevy Chase made his name as a comic by imitating Ford as being a physical stumbler, which of course he really wasn’t, although there were a couple of incidents where he did - when he went down the stairs in Salzburg or Vienna or wherever it was on the trip.

Smith: He was holding an umbrella over Mrs. Ford and he had the football knee that went out. Anyway, he stumbles and of course everyone around him was trying to blame the photographers. And, classic Ford, he says, “Well, of course, they took the pictures. They would’ve lost their jobs if they hadn’t.”
Barnes: Well, yeah, no question about it. That’s what’s different about Ford. Can you imagine Ford blaming other people for things all the time the way others have done it? Obama seems to specialize in it. I mean, that’s just not his disposition. That was not his personality. He had a couple little WIN buttons which were harmless enough and that famous 4H speech in North Carolina that was such a disaster. Reporters thought Ford would do some ridiculous things, but they had a generally favorable attitude toward him, not that he was a great president, but that he was certainly adequate for the job and was a good guy to have in there after Nixon.

The other thing that I thought of before that I wanted to mention was that Ford brought in very good people. He was not afraid to have people who were more knowledgeable and smarter than he was. You think of Rumsfeld and Cheney. You think of the role that Jim Baker played in the campaign. I forget who discovered him, but what was he, an Assistant Secretary of Commerce or something like that. And pretty soon he’s the main man in the campaign. He brought in Stu Spencer. I mean, you can think about it. I think he overrated Henry Kissinger.

Smith: People like Ed Levi and Carla Hills. I mean, clearly first rate people.

Barnes: He did and he brought in a lot of them and was comfortable with them. People who he must’ve known at least in their fields were smarter than he was. I don’t think he’s gotten much credit for that. He starts out with Rumsfeld as his chief of staff and then goes to Cheney, which he didn’t have to do. The people he brought in, some people who’d obviously been with him in the House.

Smith: How much of the Ford presidency is a trajectory - of not necessarily unlearning congressional skills, but meshing the best of those with the very different skill set that an executive and particularly a president has to have?

Barnes: It was a little hard for him, but staff wise, he changed pretty quickly. Tom DeFrank always told me that Ford joked with him that after lunch, you couldn’t really deal with Hartmann. After lunch, he’d be a little tipsy. Ford realized that he needed better people once he got there.

Smith: Classic case. I mean, here’s Ford, who eventually has dueling speech operations.

Barnes: Oh, I remember that very well. And I remember it painfully because I’d written a piece. I mean, my first real chance was at journalism in covering Ford and then covering the Ford White House and so I’d gotten the speechwriting operation to –

You know, I did a tech talk on all that they were doing leading up to the speech. Was it the State of the Union in ’75?

Smith: Where he says the state of the union is not good.

Barnes: Right.

Smith: The last president to ever say that.

Barnes: Of course. And then my story came out the day of the speech or something. Then there was the Dave Gergen operation. It was a completely separate operation where the real speech was produced. So, for me, it was a huge embarrassment and I’m not sure at what point the nominal speech writing operation people found out about it, about the real operation.

Smith: It raises the question of can a president be too nice?

Barnes: Yeah, he didn’t have to have it. He could’ve said, “Hey, we’re going to give this to Gergen and his guys and they’ll do it.” In that case, he was too nice, but you know, it worked out all right. And that was a good speech, actually, the one he wanted. Again, Ford had some pretty good speeches. His speech at the convention in ’76 was a wonderful speech, even well-delivered. It’s hard to go off against Reagan because Reagan’s was very good, too.

Smith: We talked to Stan Anderson, who organized the convention. And as soon as the speech was done, Ford handed him the draft and said, “This is for you.”
He said, “I want you to go up and get Governor Reagan and bring him down on the platform.” Unplanned as far as Anderson knew. So, he couldn’t go down on the floor. Instead he went down into the bowels of the building, went up to the skybox where the Reagans were and he said, “Governor, President Ford would really like to have you join him…” and before he could finish the sentence… “Don’t do it, Ronnie!” from Nancy.

Barnes: Was that right?

Smith: That was immediately and profanely seconded by Lynn Nofziger and less profanely by Mike Deaver. But, Reagan, to his credit, said, “No, I think I’ll go.” And he went and the rest is history.

Barnes: Well, Reagan, I think, realized that that’s what you do. Unlike almost anybody in the political community except the folks that were in his room that night, he realized he had a future. The conventional wisdom among everybody in journalism other than myself, I’ll have to say, I’ve realized that all along, was that he’d run twice. Ronald Reagan always thought it was just once. He didn’t count ’68. And he was old and it was over for him and so on and so he realized that that was an opportunity. I always thought, though I’ve been told differently, that the speech that Reagan gave there was the speech he was going to give - sort of, parts of it - if he’d won the nomination. But it was a pretty dazzling speech, you know, coming out against nuclear weapons.

Smith: Two questions about that convention. We were talking the other day to Peter McPherson, who was Jim Baker’s deputy on the delegate count. And I asked him if the White House was slow to anticipate the Reagan challenge, or to take it seriously. And Pete says something really interesting. He said, “I always thought that what gave it oxygen were two things. One was the refusal to meet Solzhenitsyn and the other was the Common Situs Picketing act.” He thought those two really fed in during ’75.

Barnes: Well, they defeated Common Situs Picketing as I recall.
Smith: Yeah, I mean, he lost John Dunlop, his Secretary of Labor, over the issue, but they were both hot button issues.

Barnes: Well, I remember Solzhenitsyn better than I remember Common Situs Picketing as being a hot button issue. The truth is Reagan wanted to run. His time had come and he figured he was going to run.

Smith: How did he reconcile it with the 11th Commandment?

Barnes: I don’t know that he ever did. And certainly Ford ran tough commercials against him. I mean, remember ‘Governor Reagan couldn’t start a war, but President Reagan could’? They ran that one in California. It didn’t help much, but they ran a pretty tough campaign against him. Well, they were slow to realize that Reagan was going to run. They were slow to react when he actually started running, but they caught up awfully quickly. They really did. And did pretty well. Remember, you didn’t have primaries in as many states as you ultimately did. There were a lot of caucuses. I remember going up to North Dakota for their caucus. It was one that Reagan should’ve won, but the Ford people got there early. And I talked to some of them the night before and he wound up winning at least half the delegates, maybe more.

I mean, look, I’ve always thought, and I’ve covered all the presidential campaigns since then, that Ford ran an awfully good campaign in the primaries and in the fall campaign as well when everything was stacked against him. I mean, Reagan was vulnerable. A majority of delegates, a lot of them were pledged to Ford at the convention, but they preferred Reagan. So, to get them to go with Ford took a real effort and it was an awfully good campaign, I’ll have to say, in both campaigns. Among the best I’ve ever seen.

Smith: Stu Spencer tells a great story, and again, it’s so revealing of Ford because I guess Stu was going through a divorce and life wasn’t very good and he didn’t want to be in Washington, and it was the end of a long tough week and it was a Friday, and it was raining. Anyway, he found himself in the Oval Office along with the President and Dick Cheney, and he had all this polling data which showed that whenever Ford went out on the road and gave the speeches, his numbers would go down. So he’s trying to think of a euphemism to stop the President who loves to go out and campaign. And Ford’s not getting it or he’s pretending not to get it. So, Stu finally says, “Mr.
President, you’re a great President, but you’re a fucking lousy campaigner.”
Now, the sequel is what makes the story, because, the story then appeared in Germond and Witcomer’s book.

Barnes: I heard about it from Tom DeFrank who had better sources than I did, but maybe he got it on some basis that he couldn’t use on the campaign.

Smith: The way Stu tells it is that he was embarrassed, he was angry, and he called Cheney to chew him out for telling the story. Cheney lets him go on and on and on and eventually he rumbles down and he says, “Stu, there was another person in the room.” Ford told the story on himself, which is what’s really revealing. Can you imagine Lyndon Johnson taking that from anyone?

How bitter was that convention?

Barnes: How bitter was it?

Smith: Yeah. You think of the dueling First Lady entrances.

Barnes: I was not the main guy covering the convention and leading up to it,. You had Jack and Jules with The Star and others. I covered the Mississippi delegation. I went down to Mississippi a few times.

Smith: Tell us about Clarke Reed.

Barnes: Well, you know, Clarke Reed didn’t know what he wanted. I mean, Clarke Reed obviously preferred Reagan and wound up going with Ford. Remember who was the executive director of the Republican Party? A young man named Haley Barber, who was this young ED for the Republican Party there.
And, you know, it was so painful for Clarke Reed, who I’ve run into many, many times since.

Smith: We heard he basically went into a fetal position at one point.
Barnes: It was the toughest decision I think he’d ever made in his life and I think he preferred Reagan, but he couldn’t bring himself to go for Reagan against a sitting Republican president.

Smith: And did the Schweiker selection provide him with the rationale for not going with Reagan?

Barnes: Partly, but I think he was going to go with Ford anyway, myself. I talked to him a lot and that was used partly as a rationale. But he just couldn’t bring himself to go with Reagan. I think he ultimately regretted it, but he was ___________ and, you know, Ford had better people dealing with him, I think, than Reagan did, because Reagan should’ve gotten him and he would’ve brought a lot of people with him because there was a lot of sympathy for Reagan in that delegation. I mean, Mike Ratzer and other people there. Who was that guy’s name? Who was so ___________? I’ll tell you in a minute. I ran into him in Mississippi a few months ago. He’s written a book. I mean, it created permanent alienation between Clarke Reed and this guy. It was something like Sonny. He was some very successful business man who Clarke really alienated.

Smith: I’ve often wondered when people, in looking back, draw this mythical Reagan. And I often say, “Now, which Reagan are you talking about? Are you talking about the Reagan that was willing to put Richard Schweiker on his ticket in ’76 or Gerald Ford four years later? Are we talking about that Reagan?”

Barnes: Well, Reagan did pull the plug on it on 1980.

Smith: Was it a real thing, because some people think it was a head trip to send a signal to people that Reagan was open to moderates?

Barnes: I didn’t think so. I thought it was for real and I reported on it as such. By that time, I was with The Baltimore Sun and I did a huge, long tech talk on how it came about and then didn’t.

Smith: There are those who believe that it really originated with Greenspan and Kissinger who saw it as their entre back.

Barnes: Yeah, they did and they wouldn’t admit that at the time, but they certainly did. And so they figured Ford was a pretty good horse to run and it almost happened, you know, until they overreached. Things like he’d pick the defense secretary and he’d have foreign defense (?) was going to be part of the presidency. But it made for a great convention.

Smith: Yeah, but it also overlooks the fact that I don’t think Mrs. Ford would’ve stood for it.

Barnes: I don’t think she would’ve either. And some of the other Ford people realized that it was going and as I recall Jack Marsh did. And maybe I’m wrong about that, but I think some realized that thing was getting way out of hand. And some of the Reagan people did, but I know I reported it at the time and I had no reason to think otherwise. It was a real deal. It wasn’t just a gambit.

Smith: Imagine when conventions were spontaneous.

Barnes: Yeah, I know. Geez.

Smith: Let me ask you. Did Sears make a critical error? Spencer argues that as close as the race was and given the fact that emotionally there probably was a majority for Reagan, if you’re going to try to shake up the status quo, you pick a really intense, emotional issue. You don’t go with a rules change to force Ford to name his vice presidential candidate.

Barnes: In hindsight, you look back and I don’t know that it hurt Reagan. It certainly didn’t help him. I don’t think he got a single vote on that. You know, I mean, Ford had a hundred plus more votes and he had a hundred plus more votes on the rules vote and on the nomination, so it didn’t do him any good. I don’t think the Schweiker thing did him any good either.

Smith: Did they think that they could flip Drew Lewis?
Barnes: Well, that’s what it was aimed at. It was all aimed at Drew Lewis. I mean, I was told in no uncertain terms by, I forget who, at the campaign or the White House that that’s who it was aimed at and they really thought they could do it. Drew Lewis obviously became a Reaganite, was his transportation secretary. Very nice man, I always liked him. Like others, he wanted to be president himself and he probably needed to be elected governor of Pennsylvania first. Remember who he lost to? Milton Shapp. It was ’74 and Milton Shapp made a terrible governor. But, yeah, that’s what it was. Pennsylvania had a large delegation. They had to pry it open and it was fairly miserable. The ironic thing, of course, was Schweiker who’d been sort of a liberal Republican, after that, turned to veer off in a conservative direction. A friend of mine invited me to a group of a people that meet every three or four weeks in Arlington and I may be the youngest person in it, but it’s people like Andy Miller from Virginia and some Democrats, some Republicans, some businessmen, and Richard Schweiker’s in this. He’s still kicking.

Smith: Then there’s the interesting decision by the Ford campaign to basically concede the foreign policy plank, which could’ve been that emotional issue.

Barnes: That was smart on their part, because nobody remembered anything that happened after that. It had no effect on the campaign. It was a smart thing to do and there was really only one person for whom it was a kick in the ass and that, of course, was Kissinger.

Smith: You know the Tom Korologos story?

Barnes: No.

Smith: Well, Tom tells it better than me and he was there. But you can see him…Kissinger, of course, was ranting and raving and I think Rockefeller joined in. Kissinger was talking about resigning, not for the first time. And Korologos is there and he said, “Well, Henry, if you’re going to do it, do it fast because we need the votes.”
Barnes: That’s great. That’s when you really knew it was over, when they threw that out. Because that was the big Reagan difference. It was foreign policy. Hard to believe that now, but it really was. It wasn’t as big of a deal as the Solzhenitsyn thing was. I mean, Kissinger was a real flashpoint for conservatives back in those days because he was détente. I always thought that ultimately Reagan was right and Nixon and Kissinger were wrong. They favored détente, and when Kissinger was denied the “We’re Athens, they’re Sparta”—

Smith: It’s interesting, talking with Brent Scowcroft even today, it was actually a very subtle foreign policy. Because, on the one hand, as they explain it, we’re looking for any weaknesses we can find. We’re looking for any areas of cooperation that are mutually beneficial. But at the same time, we realize the Cubans were in Angola. And, how do you sell that in a primary campaign?

Barnes: It was very hard and he couldn’t sell it. It’s so much easier when you’re not accountable for any of this foreign policy that has to be nuanced to some extent. So Reagan had a field day. And it was stupid not to meet with Solzhenitsyn. I’ve talked to him a few times afterwards and Roger Stone used to arrange these dinners up at Nixon’s when he was at New Jersey. I’d never met Nixon before that, but Ford had been invited to a couple of them and he could’ve met Solzhenitsyn. I mean, Nixon’s belief was you don’t do anything that’s going to anger the Soviets. It’ll be counterproductive. The rhetoric only can be harmful to relations in getting anything out of them. And so the Solzhenitsyn thing was a part of that and I think that was a mistake on his part. And it was a political mistake for sure, but I thought it was a substantive mistake.

Smith: Did Nixon comment specifically on Ford’s refusal to meet Solzhenitsyn? That he thought it was diplomatically necessary for him to not meet with Solzhenitsyn or did he think it was a mistake for him not to?

Barnes: You know, I don’t remember exactly. It’s been a long time.
Smith: Did he talk about Ford at all? Because, remember the week of the New Hampshire primary, Nixon goes to China. The people at the Ford White House were a bit incensed. It’s still hard to nail down exactly what that relationship was.

Barnes: I guess I kind of forgot. As it turned out, Ford would’ve helped himself a lot.

Smith: Speculation: is there anything Ford could’ve done to prevent the Reagan challenge?

Barnes: Yeah, he could’ve offered him a job better than secretary of transportation. Reagan took that as an insult and it was. And this is where I never understood. You’ve talked to Stu Spencer. Why’d he gotten so down on Reagan? I mean, he had a lot to do and had been a critical figure in electing him in the first place, but I just remember talking to him and he would do that during that campaign. I always liked him. Stu Spencer’s a great guy, always fun to talk to, and a terrific guy. But, you know, he would just crap on Reagan like crazy. And I don’t know what happened that he felt so alienated from Reagan. There must have been some explanation for it.

Smith: Then again, it tells you a lot about Reagan that, later on, he was willing to overlook that.

Barnes: Yeah, and brought him in and the Spencer help. No question about it.

Smith: Can you explain to people today who find it incredible, a political climate that, when John Paul Stevens was nominated to the Supreme Court, nobody asked him about abortion.

Barnes: Really?

Smith: Yeah.

Barnes: I’ve forgotten that.

Smith: Isn’t that amazing?
Barnes: I remember that nomination. Ford just wanted somebody who could get confirmed. I mean, he wasn’t necessarily looking for a conservative. And John Paul Stevens, who, in my understanding, was always regarded as a self-absorbed Republican. He didn’t know him. Ed Levi knew him. And maybe Rumsfeld did, too. I’m not sure. But Ed Levi became attorney general and I’m sure Ford had never met him either, but I guess Rumsfeld knew him. And that’s how they finally got to Stevens.

Smith: Someone in the counsel’s office told us that Ford, just off the top of his head, said, “You know who’d make a great justice? Barbara Jordan.”

Barnes: I remember hearing that story.

Smith: But I guess that’s the House speaking, isn’t it?

Barnes: Sure. Oh yeah, what a likeable person she is, she’s so smart, and she’ll bring us all together. I have to say, in Texas once, I did what was supposed to be sort of a debate with Barbara Jordan. You know, you’re not going to debate Barbara Jordan the way you’d debate some liberal in the same line of work you are in. I said some of the things I wanted to say, but I was extremely respectful and of course so was she. She was a nice person. But that’s funny.

That was a real traumatic thing picking a Supreme Court Justice for them because they thought they were really behind the eight ball, but I talked to her a lot during that.

Have you ever talked to a guy named Russ Roark?

Smith: No.

Barnes: I don’t know if he was in the counsel’s office or what. I think Jack Marsh brought him in. He lived in Annapolis. He’s probably not alive any more, but he told me once and I used his quote and I didn’t name him in The Evening Star, “We’re trying to get somebody we can get confirmed. We don’t want a Charles Bronson,” or “We don’t want a this or that,” and he threw out all these names like that. The quote was so great, even other reporters accused me of making it up, which I hadn’t. Tom DeFrank knew it perfectly well because he used to talk to Russ Roark all the time, too. The guy would give you fantastic quotes like that. But it was purely defensive on their part, unlike Reagan’s picking a nomination.

Smith: Ford never interviewed Stevens, which I find astonishing. He read all of his decisions.

Barnes: I don’t think presidents interviewed them. Of course, now they do routinely and now they interview people they don’t pick.

Smith: A couple of quick things. Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that Rumsfeld did him in and that he deep-sixed George Bush at the same time. That it was all part of a larger effort to set himself up for at least the possibility of being vice president and eventually running for the presidency.

Barnes: I don’t know about the vice president part, but the other part is certainly true. I mean, he’d brought in what’s his name, Republican chairman from Georgia…

Smith: Bo Callaway.

Barnes: Yeah, Bo Callaway.

Smith: Bo Callaway was a Rumsfeld person.

Barnes: At least I thought he was then. Had Bo Callaway been in the House?

Smith: Yes.

Barnes: Yeah, so they must’ve known each other there. But Bo Callaway was not going to go out on his own and run a campaign against Rockefeller who was the sitting vice president without Rumsfeld staying behind it. And Rumsfeld always denied it, but he was certainly a conniver. George Bush, Sr. always blamed Rumsfeld for taking him out of the ’76 race because the White House appointment of Rumsfeld(?), as part of his confirmation process, to be the head of the CIA that he would not be a political figure in ’76. And Bush believed, because he personally told me this, that he thought Rumsfeld was responsible for it in order to take him out of the vice presidential picture.

Smith: On the other hand, Bush 41 later on said in retrospect it was the best thing that happened to him.

Barnes: It may have been, but I talked to him about this. He told me about this in, I think, '78, when he was starting to travel around the country with just one aide. I went out on a trip with him and that’s when I heard about it. So it was fresh. He really thought Rumsfeld had been the conspiratorial force behind that. Named him specifically. I forgot whether it was on the record or off the record, but, you know, it’s on the record now anyway.

Smith: I’ve been told that because when Rumsfeld wanted to run in ’80 he found, first of all, he’d alienated the Rockefellers and he’d alienated the Bush’s. I think he found fundraising a bit of a challenge.

Barnes: And at a later time, he was talking about running too. I forget when it was.

Smith: Maybe ’88.

Barnes: Yeah, maybe it was ’88, but he just got nowhere. You know, Rumsfeld is an extremely able guy and he’s a guy you would want in your administration, though there are questions that a lot of people have raised about him and the troop levels in Iraq. But Bush (Ford?) liked him. (Ford?) had known him as one of the rising young guys in the House and obviously thought a lot of him and made him secretary of defense. Some people thought that Rumsfeld made himself secretary of defense in that old Halloween Massacre, which was really a pretty big thing for a president to pull off. He hated Jim Schlesinger, who he thought was just completely condescending toward him, and fired him. And I think Ford would’ve kept him. Kissinger with both hats would give him his druthers but thought he couldn’t do it. And, I don’t know, maybe Bill Colby was just collateral damage, but I’m not sure why he had to be bounced.
Smith: It’s interesting because Ford offered Colby an ambassadorship or something and Ford said Colby was a total gentleman about the situation. Unlike Schlesinger, who apparently resisted and tried to argue the President out of it.

Barnes: More reason why Ford would want to get rid of him, because Ford really didn’t like him.

Smith: Which is unusual.

Barnes: Yeah, because Ford could get along with just about anybody, but not some professorial, condescending, I-know-better type.

Smith: Especially for someone who’d been on the Defense Appropriations Committee for 20 years. Didn’t Ford in a sense unknowingly, and again, maybe its part of the House mentality - create a problem with the vice presidency where he basically led Rockefeller to believe that “you’re going to be an assistant president for domestic policy?”

Barnes: It wasn’t just that, though. I mean, that’s another part of it and you’re probably right, but it was bad politically, because they really underestimated the rising conservative forces in the Republican Party. There was enough discontent with Ford himself eventually that Rockefeller wasn’t the guy to pick. Now, I think he probably picked him for the other reason, that Rockefeller was the most able guy, among other things, and probably was. But politically, it was never going to fly. I don’t think that if he hadn’t dumped Rockefeller, that Ford would’ve won the nomination. Reagan would’ve won. Rockefeller was too much of a liability among conservatives outside the East Coast or outside the Northeast, really.

Smith: He was really a good soldier. At one point when Reagan had taken a lead in delegates, Rockefeller turned over the New York and Pennsylvania delegations, which is what spelled the difference. But, behind the scenes it was different. Mac Mathias right after he was dumped offered consoling words and Rockefeller says, “Who wants to hang around with those shits anyway?”
Barnes: I remember going on a trip with Rockefeller when he was vice president and it was a meeting of Republican governors in Wichita or someplace like that. I think there were about twelve of them. But with Rockefeller, when you would travel with him, you had fancier credentials, you had everything. Everything was nice. Even though you were going on the government take, things were extremely well organized and you could tell it was a first class operation. Maybe Ford could’ve pulled it out with Rockefeller there, but I don’t think so.

Barnes: Not really. You know, I guess I didn’t cover him enough to know. Was he? I assume he probably was. You know, it’s hard when you’ve always been in charge.

Smith: And he’s a Rockefeller.

Barnes: Yeah, he’s a Rockefeller and the vice president can be a demeaning job because of the things you do.

Smith: People all forget that Rockefeller’s the guy coached by Dick Parsons, whose parliamentary rulings led to the change in the filibuster rule from two-thirds to 60 Senators.

Barnes: Really?

Smith: Yeah. Rockefeller was in the chair and it was dissatisfaction with that change that prompted Tower and Thurmond, among others, to go down to the White House and express real discontent with Rockefeller. And it’s a story that’s not well-known.

Barnes: Yeah, not to me. Now, which Dick Parsons is this?

Smith: Dick Parsons who ran Time Warner.

Barnes: Yeah, sure. The guy who’s still around, sure. I didn’t know he was a Rockefeller guy.

Smith: Were you at the Polish gaffe?
Barnes: Yeah, I was there.

Smith: There’s some debate over how immediately people recognized that this was a huge mistake.

Barnes: No, I didn’t recognize it. I mean, I was there in the room at the debate. You know, what happens is reporters will go back and other people and they’ll all start talking about it and at some point afterwards, Ford aides have sort of a press conference and talk about it. And I’m not sure whether it came up there. Did it? Anyway, by later in the night, it had become a gaffe after people started talking about it. But, was I struck by it instantly? No, because knowing Ford, I knew what he meant. See, that’s the thing. What he meant was, you know, in their hearts the Polish people, they’re not under the domination of the Soviets.

Smith: He’d been there.

Barnes: Sure. Where he could’ve said, “They may be dominated now in a military sense, but in their hearts, they’re an independent people who will never…” I knew what he meant.

Smith: But it took a week.

Barnes: Oh, I remember. I went on a trip with him afterwards and finally I think the motorcade stopped somewhere when he finally said, “Well, maybe I misspoke.” But to answer your question, it wasn’t obvious to me at the time and I don’t think it was to others. And, for some reason, I think at that press conference afterwards, that it might not even have come up, but by later that evening, it certainly did. It was probably an early debate because it was in San Francisco and so maybe it started early at six or something so it’d be on.

Smith: Part of the problem was, as soon as it was over, Kissinger gets on the phone and says, “Oh, you did wonderful, Mr. President.” Lathering.

Barnes: And so did everybody else at this press conference afterwards. I remember Mark Duvall saying, “The President was great on everything. He won every question and every issue” and so on. But I guess Ford didn’t think that he’d said anything. I mean, my interpretation of what he was trying to say was what I guess he thought he said.

Smith: And he was stubborn.

Barnes: He was very stubborn about it, so it became a big story for a number of days.

Smith: I meant to ask you earlier. There’s still a debate on this. Do you think on balance the Reagan challenge made Ford a better candidate, or did it undercut his fall chances?

Barnes: Both can be true. They’re not mutually exclusive. The answer is probably yes and yes. I really hadn’t thought of that, but Ford always blamed Reagan for undercutting him and then not doing much during the campaign to help him.

Smith: Is the latter a fair charge?

Barnes: Yeah, about Reagan not doing? Yeah, I think it’s a fair charge, because I think Reagan had promised to do more and he wound up not doing it and they had great plans for him to do things. They wanted to use him in the useful places in the South and as it turned out, of course, Ford only won Virginia and none of these other southern states. Of course, Carter was from the South. Anyway, they thought Reagan could’ve helped him there. They had specific plans for places for Reagan to go and then Reagan didn’t do it. And I think, look, serious challenges to a nomination fight hurt, just the way Kennedy hurt Carter, though Carter would’ve probably lost anyway. But obviously Kennedy hurt him. And I think Reagan hurt Ford, but did make him a better candidate. You know, coming out of the convention, Ford had a great well-run campaign with good ads.

Smith: “I’m feeling good about America.”

Barnes: “I’m feeling good…” Yeah, Tom DeFrank can still sing the whole song.
Smith: We talked to Doug Bailey.

Barnes: He had great media and Doug Bailey loved jingles, loved songs. Bailey and Deardorf. They really put together great ads for the campaign. I remember there was one that was particularly effective. You remember the man on the street ads?

Smith: It was interesting because the dynamic of the campaign was, if you keep the focus on Ford, we lose. The focus has got to be on Carter.

Barnes: They did a good job on that because people didn’t know what to make of Carter. And it turned out that he was a terrible president and I’ve always thought a terrible person, myself, a petty guy full of grudges and hatreds.

Smith: It did surprise me that he and Ford could become friends.

Barnes: But that tells you a lot more about Ford than it does about Carter. Because Ford wanted to be friends with him and he thought they were members of a unique club.

Smith: After the election, it took Ford a while to bounce back.

Barnes: It did.

Smith: And he would go around the White House privately and say, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.” Did you sense that he was really down?

Barnes: Yes, because Ford was such a resilient guy that he had never let things get to him. I was with him on that trip when it was not the fall of Saigon but when they really cut, no, I’m thinking of when Congress cut off the money.

Smith: For the refugee resettlement?

Barnes: No, when they cut off the money for the military aid to the South Vietnamese government, which was at the end. And Ford did fine on that and other things. But losing - you know - had he ever lost an election?

Smith: No.
Barnes: I guess he never had and especially to a peanut farmer, but it really did. You could tell the difference because he was a guy who was always up, was always cheerful. You could see the difference.

Smith: The fall of Saigon, what was the mood like around the White House?

Barnes: I remember what my mood was.

Smith: Was your sense one of humiliation?

Barnes: Well, it wasn’t exactly unexpected. You know, I really don’t remember. I remember, myself, it was when I started to become a conservative actually because I knew no good could come of that, particularly in the short run. I don’t remember there being a particularly gloomy mood around there. It wasn’t a big surprise. It wasn’t a big surprise when the funding was cut off for the South Vietnamese government. When in ’75 did Saigon fall?

Smith: April 28th, 29th.

Barnes: I think it was in the fall when the funds were cut off, which was a huge mistake, I think, to this day. But I don’t remember there being a cloud of gloom settling over the White House.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Barnes: As a guy who was up to being president, was the right guy for the time, handled the things he had to do well, the pardon of Nixon, the straightening out of the government. The hardest part was driving away the Nixon cloud over the White House and he did an awfully good job of doing that. The pardon was only a part of that. You know, just his personality and style and geniality and likeability and belief in the country and belief in the presidency and so on. The ability to get along with the press in a very happy, cheerful way. You know, I didn’t know anybody in the press corps who didn’t like him. You didn’t feel an adversarial relationship with Ford. I never thought an adversarial relationship was what we ought to have with presidents or political figures anyway. We can save that for Al Qaeda. He can be skeptical, but adversarial is something else. But all those wonderful traits he had were the right traits at the time, and then, although I can think of things he did that I didn’t agree with, I mean, look, there were some things that were Betty’s influence, forwarding ERA and abortion and those issues. Although ERA was a pretty big issue, abortion was a Supreme Court decision issued in January ’73, so there was no big pro-life movement then at all. It took years to build up. It was sort of a Catholic issue then because all the Protestants hadn’t joined. So, I have good feelings about the Ford presidency. He wasn’t a great president, unlike Reagan, who approaches that anyway? But, you know, he fit the bill and, you know, what would’ve Reagan had done? Would Reagan have pardoned Nixon if he’d been in there at that time? I don’t know. I’m not so sure. So, I have very good feelings about Ford. I don’t know. One of the main complaints about him as president are mainly that he wasn’t somebody else. You know.

Smith: A Jack Kennedy.

Barnes: Yeah.

Smith: He wasn’t charismatic.

Barnes: Yeah, all the things that were not particularly needed at that time anyway.

Smith: First of all, thank you.

Green: You’re welcome.

Smith: Tell us about you before your path crossed with Gerald Ford, and how that path happened to intersect with his.

Green: Well, I suppose our paths crossed relatively early on. I became pretty much a full-time resident of Vail engaged in the real estate development business in the late 1960s.

Smith: Describe Vail in the 60s.

Green: Well, Vail was a little village with unpaved streets, and in the spring water ran down in little streams right down the muddy streets. It was a very exciting place because it was brand new. You had to be half off your rocker to want to be here on any kind of a permanent basis because there were no services, there were no grocery stores, telephone services were interruptible, no television.

Smith: So you were pioneering.

Green: Yeah, we were out front.

Smith: And what was it about the place that made you see such potential? Geography?

Green: No, I’m not sure that I was here solely to realize the potential. I was here because I enjoyed being here. I was here because I found it exciting. I also found quite a bit of challenge here because, in the course of pioneering, there were lots of things to be done. Lots of infrastructure to be built, lots of housing to be constructed and my niche was real estate development. I came here as a real estate developer in the employ of a real estate developer, actually, and then branched out on my own and engaged in my own real estate activities beginning in the late 1960s. By the time that Vail was launching in the early 70s, I was pretty thoroughly engaged on my own for my own account for developing real estate projects.

Smith: This is a speculative question, but I’m just curious. In today’s environment or regulatory climate, could that happen again?

Green: Vail couldn’t happen at all in today’s regulatory climate. No, none of us would be here today. This wouldn’t happen.

Smith: Congressman Ford had a condominium?

Green: He did. I did not really know the Fords early on. Our paths didn’t substantially cross until after I had created a real estate development called Eagle Vail, which was halfway between Vail and Beaver Creek. I built a golf course there and it was through that golf activity that I came to meet and know President Ford.

Smith: Was he in office at the time or was this after he left the White House?

Green: He was in office at the time.

Smith: I imagine the President of the United States showing up is going to be a big deal.

Green: It was a big deal.

Smith: And somewhat disruptive.

Green: Especially for this little place, it was a big deal, yeah. But there was a fondness for Gerald Ford the man, the person. He was seen as one of us, if you will. Much the same with Betty. Those ____ we got to know.

Smith: And did that communicate itself more or less instantly, that personal quality, or was it something that built up over time?

Green: I think there were really two stages of it. One was that, if you hadn’t met or become familiar with the President, you’d heard that he was a pretty good fellow. And then on some occasion, we met and we seemed to hit it off like he did with so many other people, very much one-on-one, seeming to have known each other for years and then joined one’s company. It was a great time. And that was initially in the context of golf on a golf club that I had built. So, we were very honored, too, of course, to have the President come by and play golf. And we actually played on that little golf course called Eagle Vail. We played some kind of a little golf tournament and I can’t remember what the name of it was, but it became the precursor of the Gerald Ford Invitational. The following year, we wrapped it up and packaged it as the Jerry Ford Invitational and then we went on for another 20 years like that. I then went on to build other golf clubs around Vail and, of course, the President loved to play golf and we extended that relationship into those other golf courses and clubs. Through that association, through ____ that association in the desert in the wintertime and through the tournament, we came to know each other quite well.

Smith: What kind of golfer was he?

Green: A very good average golfer. Powerful. When he made the best swing he could make, he hit the ball a long way. He didn’t have the opportunity to play a lot of golf. He was a mid-teen handicap sort of player. Enjoyed the game very much.

Smith: To non-golfers, it’s a little bit like opera. You see passionate devotees but, not being part of it yourself, you don’t fully understand what it is that makes them passionate. What is it about golf that he, and others, found so enjoyable?

Green: Well, I think it’s several things. First of all, a golf swing is a very complicated maneuver. At the end of the day, the object of the swing is to have a golf club meet the ball on the right plane at the right speed and at the right angle, and having at the same time immediately before that, having the club head travel quite a distance around, behind and down. So it’s a complicated maneuver. When it’s executed properly, it gives you a sense of accomplishment. And when it’s executed improperly, it gives you a sense of wanting to do better, wanting to master it. You know you can master it because everyone hits good shots some of the time. And we all become convinced that we can do that all the time. So what captivates us is that progression from some of the time to all of the time.

Smith: Well put. We’ve heard from a number of people that the conversations on the course, whatever they were about, were not about business - that it is an opportunity to clear your head.

Green: Not necessarily. No, we would occasionally play golf and talk about business subjects or talk about politics, but it was in a light sort of way. It wasn’t a consuming sort of discussion. It wasn’t a negotiation. Maybe the expression of some opinions or the asking of a question or an observation about an occurrence or whatever.

Smith: He had a temper. Did you ever see it on the course?

Green: Not often, but you’d see it. It was very, very well controlled. I would say that, well, we played a lot of golf together. I couldn’t tell you how much golf we played together, but it was quite a bit and I would say that he honestly, truly, really lost his temper once in all that. Many times frustrated, many times angry, but under control.

Smith: And is it anger directed against yourself for missing something?

Green: Yeah, it’s an anger at one’s failure.

Smith: Never wrapped a club around a tree or anything like that?

Smith: What were his weaknesses as a golfer?

Green: He was not a great player. You’ve probably heard this before or read it.

Smith: It’s not the first time I’ve heard it.

Green: Yeah, it was sort of a known concerning the President’s golf that he was what we would kind of a yippee player. Yippee means the face of the golf club has a little bit of a wobble in it and it’s very hard to get back on the ball square, to get it lined. He worked very hard at that. He would get very frustrated sometimes missing a short putt, a foot and a half, two feet, and we’d give him a lot of putts, we all did.

Have you ever played?

Smith: No.

Green: If we had a real match going, even the President had to make a putt and every now _________ . Then he’d insist that he play and he’d miss it and he’d get very frustrated at that.

Smith: And he obviously had the opportunity to play with the pros.

Green: Oh, sure.

Smith: There was the semi-famous game with Jack Nicklaus and Bill Clinton in which I guess President Clinton chose to interpret the rules somewhat liberally.

Green: Yeah. They played at the country club at the Rockies that day. I was actually on the golf course when they did it.

Smith: Were you?

Green: Mhmm.

Smith: Were there golfers who were his friends? I mean, players with recognizable names?

Green: Professional players?

Smith: Professional players who were his friends.

Green: Yes, I would say so. Yeah, a number of courses with Jack Nicklaus over the years. Covered the Rockies would be a good example and we played a lot. I’ll never forget, one day I was walking along with Jack, we were designing a golf course at that time, and we were talking about the Jerry Ford Invitational golf tournament and I made some observation to the effect that it’s something that had a lot of promise as raising charitable funds for charitable purposes. And Jack made the comment that, “You know, this is going to last as long as the President lives and plays in it. When he ceases to play in the golf tournament, then it’s over because we’re all coming because of him. We’re not coming because we have any financial opportunity here” even though they did make a little money doing it. They came because of him.

Smith: Were you surprised when he decided at the end of 20 years to shut it down?

Green: No, I wasn’t. I think it was time. The golf professionals that had sort of started with us in the tournament had gotten past their prime. The newer guys didn’t really know the President and they didn’t know any of us very well. So, it was sort of a generational thing. It lasted for that 20 year span, if you will, of our generation and professional golfers of our generation. When that sort of came to an end and the President really ceased to be able to play what he would consider to be a worthy game, then I think he very correctly said, “You know, that’s enough. We’re done.”

Smith: I’ve wondered, because he was cognizant of getting older and he was a proud man in the best sense of the word. But he’d also seen, out in the desert, Bob Hope’s later years, and I’ve wondered sometimes whether he wasn’t influenced in a sense that, “That’s not something I want to repeat.”

Green: I think, when we actually came to an end of the Jerry Ford Invitational, he was still playing the Bob Hope with Hope. They were still playing golf. I think after that time, he was still playing and we still played some golf after that together.

Smith: How long did you play? How late?

Green: I would guess we last played golf together in the desert in the late 90s, I would say.

Smith: He still obviously enjoyed the game?

Green: Yeah, he liked to play, to get up a game, and every now and then, he’d ask Penny to call me and say, “Do you want to play some golf?” And it got to so all we did was nine holes. You know, in the last golf that we played together, it would’ve been nine holes. He wouldn’t want to go the whole eighteen.

Smith: How would you describe the roles that the Fords played in this community?
One senses that they were very active, very visible, in both the desert and here. And obviously there are institutions here with their names on it. How does that reflect their activities in the public or civic sphere?

Green: Well, I think that there are several planes on which they had an important influence. A very indirect influence was their simple presence here because the presence of that notable a person who decided to take up partial year residence in this little community in those days said something about who we were. That was very important. That had an impact on the restaurateurs who were doing business at night and how many people came into their establishments. It had impact on me as a real estate developer. People wanted to come to a place where the President went in the summertime. People wanted to play on the courses that I built because the President played them. So there was that indirect role.

On a direct basis, of course, he was a terrific enabler of money-raising in various forms. The Gerald Ford Invitational, one of them, other several ski races that were established under his aegis, if you will, that raised a lot of money locally. So, there was a pretty much continuous stream of fund-raising that went on and an improvement of this community as a direct result of his willingness to go beyond the indirect and directly to influence specific activities.

Smith: I remember hearing them talk about the chapel that was built here.

Green: That was mostly Firestone’s doing. I think they made a contribution to it. In fact, I’m pretty sure they did and I think it was pretty significant, but I think that was more Leonard’s project than theirs.

Smith: Tell us about Leonard Firestone because he was clearly very close to them and integral in the formation of the Betty Ford Center. I guess they were neighbors as well in both communities.
Green: Well, Leonard was a very good friend of mine and we were very close together. Again, initially, I got to know Leonard through President Ford. He’d bring Leonard along and we’d all play golf together. Later on, Leonard was very instrumental in getting me into the Betty Ford Center for a little 30-day stay. And after that we became very, very close friends. I was married at Leonard’s house in Carmel. We had all sorts of social engagements over the years. Became very good friends.

Smith: I’ve been told he was pretty self-effacing. It’s the Betty Ford Center, not the Leonard Firestone Center.

Green: Yeah. Leonard always thought there was only one way to get something done and that was the correct way and if his view of the correct way was different than Betty’s or somebody else’s, then that other way was wrong. He was always sure he was right. I don’t think he’d mind me saying that. And quite often, frankly, he was.

Smith: Had alcohol been a lifelong problem for him?

Green: It had been a problem for some number of years and I think he had to deal with it on several occasions through his lifetime.

Smith: When you were at the Betty Ford Center, did you see her there?

Green: Yeah. Of course, I knew her by then and she kind of dodged me, frankly.

Smith: Was it awkward?

Green: A little, yeah. There was a point, as I recall, when you’re being sort of indoctrinated there and you go to someplace and there she is. In those days, I don’t think she did that for a long time, but this was in the very first years of the Betty Ford Center. This was 25, 26, 27 years ago. And she saw me and, you know, she just kind of didn’t, and I didn’t want to be too familiar. But she was watching out for me.

Smith: She was very much hands-on with that center. It was never just a name.

Green: Very much so. Very much so.
Smith: And he was so proud of her. She got the Medal of Freedom before he did. She got several forms of recognition, and the story is told that the Center has an annual alumni day and you could see the former President cooking hot dogs.

Green: I’ve never attended those events, but I’m not surprised at all. He was very proud of it. And, of course, she did her own golf tournament and he would support that very actively.

Smith: And was that done in the desert?

Green: Uh-huh.

Smith: She never played, did she?

Green: No. But the ladies tour, female pros, would go through the desert and the Monday after the Dinah Shore Golf Tournament, they would do the Betty Ford Invitational. It was just like the Jerry Ford Invitational. The same kind of format except it was a one-day, go-for-it kind of thing. It was a lot of fun and I think it raised some significant money. Leonard’s view always was that we should not bother to go play golf. We should just give him the money and forget about it.

Smith: Let me ask you one thing. A classic sort of opposites attracting - obviously every successful marriage entails illogic in some ways. He was such a stickler for punctuality and she was the opposite. Did you ever see that?

Green: I don’t think I ever really was exposed to that. No. Can’t say that I was.

Smith: So, you obviously knew both of them years before her intervention which was in ’78.

Green: I knew both of them before that, but not well and, especially, not her well before that, more so coming into the early 80s, ’81, ‘82, ‘83, ’84. Around there.

Smith: I wouldn’t expect you would know the answer to this, but I’m curious. There had been some talk in ’79, early ’80, about him running again. I don’t think it was terribly serious, but they went through the motions of talking to people. The sense that we get is that one reason why it wasn’t terribly serious was because Mrs. Ford wouldn’t let it become terribly serious. This was just a year or so after her intervention and they had a good life. And, why go back even if you could?

Green: I don’t have any personal recollection of her role in that decision. I have no doubt that there was a role.

Smith: During those years his relationship with Jimmy Carter turned around and they became good friends. I’ve often thought one of the determining factors may have been that they both ran against Ronald Reagan. That’s something they had in common. Did he ever talk about his successors?

Green: He was pretty close-mouthed about that. He would talk a lot more about his team in the White House and how they functioned, but he really didn’t talk much about the opposition. He didn’t talk much about his predecessors or successors.

Smith: Didn’t talk about Nixon?

Green: No. I don’t think I ever heard him talk about Nixon.

Smith: Lots of politicians love to gossip. My sense was that he not only didn’t do it, but he would find a graceful way to change the subject when there were people who were doing it. I don’t mean political gossip, such as electoral speculation, I mean gossip gossip, their personal lives and the like.

Green: I think that’s probably pretty accurate.

Smith: Do you think he took secrets with him to the grave?

Green: I don’t know. I guess history will probably guess. Don’t know.

Smith: What did they enjoy? Obviously golf, but what did they do when they were here? Did they have close friends?
Green: They had a number of close friends. I would say that their friends were divided into maybe at least three different categories. One would be people who had been close to them in raising money, either for political purposes or for the Betty Ford Center or for other activities. There was another set that would’ve been the local community. And then there was the political set from the past. But, out of all those sets, there were lots of friends. And they were very, very kind and good about giving dinner parties and inviting very interesting people. Yeah, we had some wonderful nights up in that house.

Smith: I haven’t been up there. Describe the house.

Green: One of the things I remember is that his office was very small. I always wondered really how small it was. I mean, it was not big. It was a wonderful house for entertaining. It had a very nice living room with a great view and a large dining room just off the living room. It was very comfortable house. It was on multiple levels, which was not particularly good as one gets older and I don’t remember if it had an elevator in it or not. It probably did, but I don’t remember whether it did. Nice house.

Smith: And they could have the kids there.

Green: Plenty of room. Yeah. And, of course, Leonard and Dean were right next door.

Smith: Tell us about Dean because the name comes up frequently and it’s not a name known generally. We’ve had someone here today, actually, make the observation that they thought that he was a significant influence on President Ford.

Green: I think he had President Ford’s ear. Dean was a very intelligent man. He devoted a lot of energy during his life to raising money for political purposes for campaigns and did so for the Ford campaign as well. He knew a lot of people and he was the kind of person, I think, that you would describe as one that had good judgment. If you had an issue and were close and you wanted to have another view, you might ask Dean what he thought. That kind of guy. And just all around great fellow. Good guy. Dean was another very close friend of mine through President Ford, but we became very close friends over the years.

Smith: And I assume Mrs. Ford had her own sort of circle of friends?

Green: You know, I never really observed that much. She did, but I never saw it really in play very actively. I would see more of that in the desert, frankly, during the winters than I would here in Vail in the summertime. I didn’t really keep track of her very well, what she did during the day. I know that she would spend a fair amount of time with Shaika Gramschammer(?) and a circle of friends, but I don’t know how much time.

Smith: How many folks had this dual existence of the desert in the winter and Vail in the summer? Was it an accident?

Green: The crux of that seemed to be those of us that had a pretty active role in creating that golf tournament. It would’ve evolved out of the relationships we had of course with the Fords, but then there was Kaiser Morcus who had a place out in the desert, as well. In the earlier days, you know, we’d just go out there for long weekends and one thing or another and play some golf and have a good time and come back to Vail and spend our winters. It was only in the later years, coming into the mid-90s, I guess, and after that, that some of us actually lived out there part of the winter and had more active times. Bob Barrett was out there in the winter. Leonard was out there. And between Leonard and Barrett scheming to get up golf games and one thing or another, they’d call and say, “Why don’t you guys come out and we’ll have a golf outing of some kind?” and often the President would join in.

Smith: I don’t want to put this the wrong way. Had Leonard Firestone ever worked a job?

Green: I guess so. I never saw him do it, but yeah.

Smith: I know he had diplomatic appointments and all that, but I just didn’t know whether he had a career in the sense that you and I would define the term.
Green: I think in the sense that you and I would call a career, I think probably not. But I think at one time in his earlier life, he did have some kind of role with the company. I'm not sure exactly what that was.

Smith: Let me ask you something. I remember in my eulogy in Grand Rapids making reference to the fact that, for most of us, the stereotype is that we get a little more conservative as we get older, whether it's because we have more to conserve or because nostalgia takes hold or whatever. And with the Fords that didn't seem to be the case. He was always a fiscal conservative. He clearly was very traditional in his approach, vetoing bills as President, and some debate over just how generous or ungenerous a tipper he was on or off the golf course. But aside from economics, on social issues, for example, is it your sense the Republican party was just moving further and further to the Right and the Fords just stayed where they were and looked relatively more 'liberal.' Or did they in fact become more liberal? And was she an influence in that regard? I'm thinking, quite frankly, whether the experience of alcoholism and the compassion that they had for good people who had a weakness affected their broader view of things - whether it was abortion, or more recently gay rights, things where by the end of their lives they stood apart from the rest of the Republican Party?

Green: I think that they became separated intellectually from the party line. I think that as time passed in the 80s and in the early 90s, he became one of very independent judgment, unrelated to Republican Party policy.

Smith: Which is interesting because he'd spent a lifetime as a party man.

Green: But, you know, there's a point where you don't have to do that anymore. I think he was a great team guy. When he was on the team, he played the team's game, very much so. But I think when he was beyond that, that he very freely exercised independent judgment.

Smith: You also wonder how much her views affected his views. Then you figure that they had kids that were still relatively young, and then grandchildren.
That’s got to be a factor in terms of exposing them to different points of view than if they’d sat at the country club seven days a week.

Green: I don’t have any real useful knowledge about what her influence was on his views post-presidential periods. Don’t know.

Smith: How difficult was it for him to come to terms with aging?

Green: You know, I don’t think that he had a particularly difficult time with it. He seemed to me to be no different than everybody else. I mean, everybody has some level of acceptance to have to go through to get the fact that you’re getting older and you can’t quite function in certain ways. But I never noticed that he seemed to be particularly hung up about it.

Smith: He seemed to have really very good health until he was about 90. I think when the doctors said, “You’ve got to really cut back on your travel”, that was difficult for him because he obviously loved it. It’d been a significant part of his life. But it’s interesting that they insisted, against their doctors’ wishes, on coming up here those last couple summers when maybe the more prudent thing to do would’ve been to go somewhere without this altitude.

Green: It might have been more for her benefit, really, than his. I never got the sense that he was particularly uncomfortable being here. He may have been.

Smith: In terms of health, those last couple summers, you didn’t sense that he was having a particularly difficult time?

Green: Not sure that I do, but I never sensed it.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Green: Quite well. I called one day to see if he’d like to have lunch in the desert and we chatted about the possibility, I think, and put it off to another day. I think I said, “I’ll call back and we’ll talk about another period.” So I called a bit later and Penny said, “Actually, what he’d like to do is he’d like to take you to dinner.” We wound up going to dinner to his favorite restaurant out in the desert.
Smith: What was it? Do you remember?

Green: The restaurant? Jillian’s. He loved that place. And so we went out to dinner. This would’ve been in April.

Smith: Of that last year.

Green: Of that last year, yeah. And we went out to dinner and typically I recall that as it got along towards what you might think would be the end of the evening, he just kind of said, “That’s enough. Let’s go home.” I think he got tired.

Smith: But he was still mentally sharp?

Green: Yeah, yeah. Yeah, he was good.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of reaction when he passed? He was someone who had not been in the public eye nationally for quite some time. There seemed to be a very significant, very genuine kind of outpouring.

Green: No, I wasn’t surprised. He had a great following. I think he was the kind of man, the kind of leader, who was sufficiently ‘of the people that we all felt that we were part of what he was. You don’t get that feeling about a number of leaders.

Smith: No, that’s very well put. Plus, you know, in some ways, time was very good to him. You stop and think, poor Lyndon Johnson died a day before the Vietnam peace agreement was announced and President Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon, for example. The Profiles in Courage award - when he received it from the Kennedys, he said, “For 20 years, everywhere I go, people ask the same question. And since I got that award, they stopped asking.”

Green: I’ve never heard that. That’s good.

Smith: The imprimatur of the Kennedys.
Final thing, can you think of a story or observation or anything that might say something about Gerald Ford that people might find surprising? A quality or trait?

Green: That’s interesting. I can’t think of a single occasion where I could point to some activity that we engaged in where I could say that that was different than the substance of our total relationship.

Smith: We talked about him being a fiscal conservative. That’s the public word for it. The private word is frugal-to-tight. For example, on the golf course, he was not known for generous tips, to the point where it was kind of an inside joke among some of those who knew him.

Green: Well, yeah, it was conservative, but it wasn’t off-line. I can tell you one thing that would show you something of the nature there. A couple of years in a row, the President put his name on a ski race of some kind that was in Beaver Creek. The ski race had associated with it a Calcutta of some kind, which is a betting format where you could put down wagers on the teams that were racing and had the potential to win some significant money. And I put together a system of grading these teams such that I somehow wound up winning a significant amount of money. The beneficiary of this ski race was the Vail Hospital. The hospital was going broke at the time, out of money, out of cash, literally, on the verge of going under. And as I recall, in this Calcutta deal I won about $20,000. So we all got together for a big dinner and there were, I don’t know, several hundred people there. And Bob Barrett gets up to announce who won various things and I had told him in advance that I would just leave my winnings on the table and let it go to the benefit of the hospital. And so Barrett took advantage of that and announced that first. Then several other people who had won something in this deal, when it came to them, they said, “Oh, I’ll do the same thing.” And a couple of them were people that really could’ve used the money. And I think the President thought that they’d sort of had their arm twisted too hard and he was a little upset about that. It wound up raising $100,000 through the forgiveness of these winnings in this Calcutta thing. It was great for the hospital because it kind of saved the day for the hospital for awhile. But the President kind of frowned on it in the sense that he thought that some of those people that won some of that money really needed it themselves and were not the kind of people who should be making substantial contributions to hospitals. I mean, there was a line there, a fiscal line.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Green: Well, I think he should be remembered as unique in his presidency in the sense that he had to navigate an extremely difficult path, one for which there was no victory and a substantial probability of high criticism. He did it honorably and he did it in a way that the country accepted it. And I think very few people could’ve carried that off. That’s how I remember it.

Smith: Perfect. Thank you.

H. Meijer: What we were talking about is your recollection of when you were in Washington for a meeting, and Mom was with brother Doug and me at – what was it, Fourth of July or Memorial Day?

Meijer: I don’t know. I can’t tell you the holiday or what the occasion was, but if it was Cedar Springs, it would have been Red Flannel Days, but it wasn’t Cedar Springs, it was Standale. And I think President Ford was a friend of Howard Stanton, etc., etc. But he stopped or saw Lena on the curb and went up and talked to her. So he must have known who she was.

At that same time I was in Washington, trying to get the station that became WZZM. I was the president of that group, and I don’t think any of us deserved it, but we deserved it as much as anybody else. None of us did, we were just scrambling to get the license. I don’t know but maybe Lena told him, that I was in Washington, but he said, “Betty and Fred are in Washington and here I am in Grand Rapids with you.” Just that comment.

H. Meijer: Now, you mentioned Red Flannel Days, when would you first have met President Ford? Do you think it was Red Flannel Days in Cedar Springs?

Meijer: No, and I don’t know when I first met him. But he was very faithful in coming to the parade on Red Flannel Days. And he was a friend of Nina Babcock and Grace Hamilton, the two women who ran the paper up there. I think they were very staunch Republicans, and in their newspaper they were very supportive of Ford. They knew him better than I did.

H. Meijer: Well, you and Grandpa opened the first store in Grand Rapids the same year that President Ford went to Washington as a Congressman in 1948.
Meijer: Okay. I don’t remember that, but I believe you. I don’t know how we got acquainted, but he knew who I was and I knew who he was because we were never involved in politics.

H. Meijer: Did he come to Rotary at all?

Meijer: Not that I know of. But then – unless I’m hurrying too much – the library came into question. He didn’t get elected; Jimmy Carter beat him. But Ford, I think, was as honorable a man that could be, and I just never saw him do anything I didn’t think was very fine. And he got beat.

When Lyndon Johnson announced – this is another time. I don’t know if that’s later or before, but Lyndon Johnson said, “I’m not going to run for re-election,” he immediately put the arm on everybody and their uncle to do a job for – to contribute to his museum. Money, artifacts, everything. Lyndon was a pretty heavy salesperson. But Ford, when he was defeated, he would not do anything during his lame duck session, from November to January, or whatever it was, for the museum while he was still president.

Then after he was done with his presidency - somehow, I don’t know how I got involved - they wanted to build a Ford Library or Museum. We didn’t know about the library, it was all one building as far as we were concerned. But then later on Ford said, “I want my library in Ann Arbor, and I want the museum in Grand Rapids.” Or we could have had the museum in Ann Arbor with the library. But he wanted it in Grand Rapids. So I think it’s the only presidential library and museum that’s split – where it’s in two different cities.

H. Meijer: Yes.

Meijer: So, I’ll kind of think through the sequence. Now the Democrats are in office, and there were some Democratic bureaucracy who came up here to talk about the museum, and they suggested that President Ford wasn’t elected president, therefore, a building like the Red Junior College Gymnasium on Lyons Street would be all that he really should have. And of course that made us angry because he was playing it down and we liked President Ford. So I don’t think I went to Washington, I think I went to Florida, I went there twice for him. But I went down there and said, “President Ford, you haven’t wanted to raise money or these things during your time when you weren’t elected and you were out of office, but you’ve got to get some attention to this because these Democrats don’t care much for what you get. And if you want something decent, you’ve got to give us some support.” And from then on he did do that.

Another time – I’m skipping some time now – they were talking and talking and talking about where he wanted to be buried, but nobody wanted to ask him. I think it’s strange because I don’t think that’s an unfair question. And so we went to Florida. He was coming in off a golf course, and I suppose he knew we were coming. I said, “I’m here to ask you where you want to be buried. Do you want to be buried at Beaver Creek where you have a home? Do you want to be buried in Rancho Mirage?” or wherever that was.

H. Meijer: Palm Springs.

Meijer: Palm Springs? Yeah. “Do you want to be buried in Palm Springs, do you want to be buried in Washington? Do you want to be buried in Ann Arbor, where you went to the university? Or do you want to be buried in Grand Rapids?”

“Oh, in the museum in Grand Rapids, of course.” That was after we had it built. That was my whole conversation on that subject. It was easy to ask and got a quick answer.

H. Meijer: You were reminiscing with him once, or he was talking with you once, in a pretty unusually setting – in the men’s room. Was that about the election of 1976?

Meijer: They ran a trial balloon at some time for him to run for president when Reagan got it. And the people that were really pushing him to do it, I think kind of deserted him, because Reagan got the nomination, and I think he was either embarrassed or just plain angry and embarrassed. “Doggone it,” he says, “I’ve been doing all this speaking for the Republican Party and they haven’t paid me anything. From now on they are going to pay me. And I’m going to give it to the museum.” So it was just a little tidbit of history that he emotionally spoke about it. I just thought, well, I got to his emotions. I just found him an interesting man, and I was involved in the location of the museum. I realize there was a group of us. There was really four of us who were kind of the wheel horses for the Board of Directors for the Foundation.

H. Meijer: You and Jordan Shepherd.

Meijer: Jordan Shepherd became president, chairman, or whatever we called him.

H. Meijer: Or an executive committee, or however you did that.

Meijer: I think that’s what you would call it – whether it was officially that or not, but it became Jordan Shepherd, who was the head of the Foundation, on getting the building built and so forth. And there was Carl Morgenstern, Dave LeClaire, the photographer, and I – the four of us. And we met almost every week for a while to get the museum built. And then when we picked the site for it, I remember touring around. I had Mary Ann Keeler in the car, and there were several of us touring around at the same time. I was driving our car. We looked right behind where Source Club met the street to the airport there.

H. Meijer: Patterson and south of 28th Street.

Meijer: Patterson, south of 28th Street, west side of the street. There was a barn there for years. I think it’s gone now. That was one place. We offered to give them the corner at Knapp and East Beltline, the northeast corner where the little shopping center is going now, because we had it for a store and they wouldn’t give us zoning. So we were going to give that to the Ford Museum if they wanted it.

H. Meijer: Now, you were a little bit of an advocate for that site, weren’t you?

Meijer: I was an advocate for the Knapp site. However if they wanted to put it downtown; I liked that, too. But I had some stipulations. It had to have good access by car; and it had to have parking; and it had to have a green front yard, so it wasn’t just sitting in a sea of asphalt and sidewalks. If we had the property where the museum is now, except for the north side right where his grave starts, I’m not sure where the line was. We had the property where Days Inn and where the Van Andel museum is now. And the city had agreed to give us all that, because we had to have the property free, and because of my insistence, I think they gave it to us.
Then, when we had a bridge – I didn’t know how much parking we’d need, and from our store experience, I wanted plenty of parking. So we had the parking on the south side of Pearl Street, but I said, “Now, if some little kid there is eating lunch by the museum and some runs across the street to the car, it might be run over.” And I said, “We don’t want any fatalities because of the museum.” So that’s how we got the property on the south side from the city. Now we didn’t have any contract written, but it was ours for the Ford Museum. We went down to Joe Van Andel’s office because he was going to be a big sponsor of the public museum, and he practically gave us instructions. He was going to put that museum on the river and they wanted that property. No money if it remained at the old location.

H. Meijer: You’re talking south of Pearl Street now?

Meijer: South of Pearl Street from wherever Days Inn is – Days Inn and the public museum and ______________, took up the site. So Bob Sullivan property owned it north of the Ford Museum. I remember I was there with Dave LaClaire and Jordan Shepherd and Carl Morgenstern and I, and we were meeting with Bob Sullivan to buy it. And he wanted $2.6 million. They all agreed that’s too much, too much. I called him in a separate room, I said, “Listen, he’s not going to sell it for less, if I can read his mind at all. And either we get it or we don’t get it.” And we got instructions to get the property so we could give that back to the city, which we did. So I called the three in a private room and, whether the $2.6 million was too much or not, we just had to quit quibbling, just nail the deal down. And so I was surprised that Carl Morgenstern, who was a banker, agreed with me. He agreed with me on quite a few things that I would think a conservative banker wouldn’t agree to. But I respect him highly because he had the same vision that the rest of us did, and he was going to see it through.

So, we bought it for $2.6 million, and gave back to the city what they gave us. (South of Pearl St.) But they gave it to us. It wasn’t on paper, it wasn’t a contract. But in the meantime, during all this, some people that wanted it downtown at all costs got very excited, and really chewed me out. But I’m not going to mention names. I said, “Well, I want the same thing you do. But I want grass, I want access, I want parking room, and I like the setting. But we won’t get it unless we insist on it.” So, anyway, we were all friends. I can’t say I’m friends with Carl and Jordan now because they passed away.

H. Meijer: But you and Mary Ann Keeler are friends.

Meijer: Mary Ann Keeler is kind of an interesting character, and she thought I was opposing downtown. I said, “No, I’m not opposing downtown. I don’t want downtown regardless of what we get.” And so, we got an access, if you think about the location. From the east they have to go through town coming in from the Lansing side. But from the north you can get off there at Pearl Street, from the south you can get off at Pearl Street, and from the west you can get off at Pearl Street. So it’s right in the center there, and it’s a darn good location. Everybody was happy.

H. Meijer: Did you walk it with President Ford before the construction started?

Meijer: I don’t know whether we walked it or not, but he seemed to be perfectly happy with what we were doing, and then we were going to have a bridge made to go across Pearl Street before we bought the Sullivan property because I didn’t want some little kid to get killed going across the street. So President Ford heard about it and he wanted what I wanted, so I got my way.

H. Meijer: And that was to add the north side, the Sullivan parcel.

Meijer: No, before the bridge. I was talking about we wanted the bridge so you could walk across there from the south side of Pearl St.

H. Meijer: Okay.

Meijer: Who is the architect? Help me out.

H. Meijer: Marv Dewinter.

Meijer: Marv Dewinter – and the bridge over Pearl St. would have cost $160,000 – and he had a fountain in front of the Ford Museum designed. And it was supposed to cost something and it cost $160,000 more, I guess. So the county gave us a bridge – the money. So the county agreed to use that money for the fountain, so that’s how we paid $300 or some thousand for the fountain, I think about $350,000, I’m not sure. And we never got the bridge. It was a dandy bridge he had designed, but we went through all those arguments and we ended up all being friends on the committee and pleased that it worked out as well as it did.

H. Meijer: Now, you would have met President Ford, of course, a number of times when he was still in Congress. Did you ever get to his office in Washington?

Meijer: No, never was at his office. I really wasn’t that close to him while he was in Congress and when he was president. He never invited me to the White House. I went there when Nixon and Jimmy Carter – I think there were only a couple of times I’ve been there – two or three times.

H. Meijer: But of course, after he left the White House and you became involved in the Ford Museum, then you saw him pretty regularly.

Meijer: Yeah. I remember - I guess I’m always kind of the radical one - but two things: when we were building the museum – no, we were taking in money to build the museum, getting donations – in the meantime, Ann Arbor, U of M, moved ahead with their library, and we had to delay the Grand Rapids project because they dug up the museum for the library – they dug up the money for the library. I didn’t have any part in that, except that we were involved. But they knew how to get the money. Then they go up with the library next to Bentley, and I said, “Boy, oh boy, that was fast.”

Inflation was bounding – “as fast as we get the money, we’re losing out on the cost.” I suggested we start building it without the money. Oh – you can’t do that – we’ve got to stop, maybe. I said that I suggested we start building it and stop if we have to. We did that with a couple of stores, too. We did stop. One in Lansing and one in Battlecreek, I think. But I was surprised that Carl Morgenstern, the banker, would go along with that, but he did. And so we started building, and during that time is when, at the library - I guess we were at the Bentley then, having our meetings, Ford mentioned in the restroom about he was going to charge Republicans for speeches from now on and was going to give it to the library.
H. Meijer: Then you said – hadn’t he also expressed some bitterness with Ronald Reagan not campaigning for him?

Meijer: He expressed, I thought, bitterness, because the people that wanted him to come to his trial balloon, you might say, reception, talked him into having it and doing these things, I don’t think showed up for the reception. They went to Reagan instead, somehow. It probably wasn’t the same time, but he was bitter, as I recall. Very bitter. I don’t think there was a lot of love between him and Reagan, regardless of the public face they put on the Republican Party. I was surprised he’d say as much as he did.

H. Meijer: When you picture him in your mind, what stands out about him in your recollections?

Meijer: Well, I got to like him very much. That’s why we loaned him the eagle on a permanent loan in front of the museum. That’s why I bought the Berlin Wall at some point, a piece of it. Ask me the question again.

H. Meijer: When you picture him, or you imagine him, what stands out about him, about his voice, or his manner, or his appearance? What do you think about?

Meijer: Well, you think about political people, and you think about what’s going on now between McCain and Obama, and they are starting the dirt throwing era. But I really think that Ford was honorable beyond, way beyond the normal. He was one of the most honorable guys you could get. And I learned to respect him highly.

Then we got involved in the various other things. His bust, that’s in the Ford Museum, is a copy of the bust that’s in the Capitol, or wherever they have the vice presidents and so forth. But it didn’t start out that way. And I suggested Marshall Fredericks, [I] had a price from him, and I think he probably would have done a decent job. But they wanted a different sculptor, and so we got the bust. There’s a Greek man that was going to pay for the bust. I think it was around $25,000, but they didn’t like the bust. The artist made the real sculptor of it. And I said to him, “Well, take his $25,000 and put it in the bank and get the bust later,” we wanted the bust. No, they didn’t want to do that, I guess, as I remember. So we got another bust. That bust wasn’t any good. Finally, the third bust they took off a mold or whatever you call it from the ones that were in Washington, and that’s what’s there now. Then when they wanted to commission this bust they said, “But you haven’t got the money.” Well, get it. He’ll do it without the money. Of course I wanted to buy the bust in the first place. He said, “Oh, no, we’ll get it.” I guess they ordered it and then the Greek man wasn’t interested anymore. So I said, in the process, “Okay, well, order it. If the Greek man doesn’t come through” – I never knew his name – “then I’ll donate it.” Then, “Oh that won’t be necessary,” but they were disappointed that he didn’t come through. I donated the bust. So, basically I donated the bust and the piece of Berlin Wall and the eagle out in front and the medallion.

H. Meijer: We need to jump ahead a little bit because you also were involved in the Vietnam staircase on the American Embassy.

Meijer: Yes, but only to the extent that you, Hank and the Mark saw it there and thought that it’s going to be junked because the embassy in Vietnam was shot up.

H. Meijer: We saw it there, but then there was the debate about whether or not it was appropriate for the Ford Museum, and you had some different ideas than some of your fellow trustees.

Meijer: The trustees – I don’t know, were there twenty of them there?

H. Meijer: Bigger now, but probably there were twenty plus at the meeting.

Meijer: Whatever it was. And I’d already – I don’t know if I’d talked to Jerry Ford or whether Marty did, but we knew he’d wanted it, and so I thought after you were there that maybe we could get an agent of some kind to pay somebody $10,000 or something, and just ship it over to the United States. Then they said, the Democrats said, or the State Department said, “That’s government property. You can’t touch it.”

H. Meijer: This was during the Clinton administration now. Madeline Albright was Secretary of State.
Meijer: Madeline Albright, that’s right. Madeline Albright was Secretary of State, and so I knew that Ford wanted it so I brought it up at the Foundation meeting in Washington. Kissinger said, “We don’t want that…” – I think there was some profanity there – “so and so. It reminds us that we lost the war.” And I said to Kissinger, “I don’t think we lost the war. We won the Cold War, and this is just a battle on the way.” Of course, President Ford is sitting there laughing because I’m getting into a little argument with Kissinger. Those are the only words I ever had with Kissinger. And I knew President Ford was in my corner, so anyway, Ford called Madeline Albright and so she arranged that we could have the stairway. Actually, we didn’t really pay any money for it. I don’t know how it got here. The government must have taken care of the whole thing. It’s like several other things I’ve been involved in, we started them and they never cost us anything.

H. Meijer: What did President Ford say to Kissinger? Did he speak up at all in that meeting?

Meijer: I don’t think so. I think he just sat there and laughed, just smiled or whatever it was. You could tell he was in favor of getting the ladder over here. It was kind of a humorous episode. But I didn’t realize at the time, and I should know history better, but poor Kissinger, he had to get ________ with the Vietnam when they’d already beat us. And so when I knew all the facts, I kind of felt sorry for him because that was a tough job. We beat up on Vietnam and then we lost the war. How can we expect them to be very friendly.

H. Meijer: We might be out of questions here.

Smith: You might want to talk about Maury DeJonge. [Unintelligible] Peter, Marty, there were several points dealing with construction where things weren’t going right. And more than one person said that at each of those times, that one person would come in the room and say, “No, we’re going to do this!” and it was you. Can you talk about that?

H. Meijer: Some of the other people involved in the creation of the museum said that you were a voice of encouragement sometimes when people were down. Do you recall cheering on this project?
Vaguely, but I know I wasn’t on the Ford Foundation right at the beginning. Peter Secchia got me on there. And I do think I probably gave it more time, not compared to Marty Allen. I mean, he did a fine job. And I guess he wasn’t on that Foundation either. But I gave quite a lot of time, going to Florida and seeing Ford, and various other things. So many people are busy and I’ve been on boards where I haven’t done much. But anyway, once I got on – and they used to laugh at me – because they always knew where I was coming from - we had this money and they said Ford is conservative. Well, I wanted to invest it in stocks, at least 60-70%, and Ford would want this. The last time Ford was in a meeting with us, and I was expressing myself again, I said, “Well, Lena and I have all ours in stocks. If it goes down, it goes down. If it goes up, it goes up. But you sure don’t accumulate having it just strictly in interest and bonds.”

And I did this with the art museum, too. One lady who promised they would never lose money again – well, the only way you can be sure you don’t ever lose money is to put it as fixed income – and then when the market went up, they were complaining because their values weren’t going up. But anyway, I suggested that, and at one point Ford was in the meeting, in the Ford Museum, and I said, “President Ford, you’ve got a reputation of wanting to be very conservative, and I’ll tell you what we did, Lena and I.” And I said, “There’s no sign it’s prudent, but this is what I believe we ought to do. But it’s your call, it’s your museum.” And he said, “I agree with Fred.” And I think that’s when we went to 70% stocks. I remember that.

H. Meijer: Was there ever a time during the planning and construction of the museum, or in the early days when you thought it might not come about?

Meijer: Well, it was inflation under Jimmy Carter. As people get older, like Firestone, who died, and now President Ford has died, and so forth, if we couldn’t get their attention, and his former Cabinet, like – Kissinger wasn’t involved in this – but people like that. Brent Scowcroft, I’m trying to think – there were a lot of well-known names. I don’t know whether Cheney was on that or not. But I kind of think he was, I’m not sure. And the big meeting was in Washington, and when we had them in Grand Rapids there were not that many proportionately came. But, yeah, we were discouraged several times because the Democratic administration, the locals, not Madeline Albright, I never met her. But they say, well he wasn’t elected president and they were playing him down.

Then, of course, he was getting criticized for pardoning Nixon at some point. I know that one lady – my mother-in-law – voted Republican all the time, but she voted for Carter because he went to church a lot and he was a good man, and thought Ford was a crook – he pardoned Nixon. And you could easy come to that conclusion, I suppose. But he told me several times, he said, “It’s the only thing I could do. I had to pardon Nixon. Otherwise they would have indicted him. There would be lawsuits, there would be accusations, and I couldn’t get on with any business. And so I pardoned him. Unconditionally.” So he told me that, but he said that publicly many times.

H. Meijer: To the extent that that affected his popularity, did that affect the fundraising for the museum, too?

Meijer: I don’t know. I’m trying to think who was Secretary of Energy – he wanted to make a substantial donation to the museum, but he wanted it in his own name, and it’s still in his own name.

H. Meijer: Are you thinking of Secretary of the Treasury Bill Simon?

Meijer: That’s who I’m thinking of, yeah, Bill Simon. He was dealing with oil shortages, or whatever that was, back in that time. We went to see Bill Simon – I didn’t, but Jack Koetie did, and we tried to be sure we had fuel in our own company. But, yeah, I think one of the best things I did, or the most proper thing, is that we kept right building. And we didn’t stop. We would have stopped if we’d run out of money.

Then I was suspicious of U of M. I didn’t trust them one minute, because they had the money and they were building their library. I said, “They’re going to use the money and we will sit here with no museum.” I was wrong. I mean, there is nobody more honorable than our dealings with U of M. I can’t say enough good about them. But whatever money I think U of M promised Ford, a million dollars for supporting their campaign for a fund drive back then, U of M never gave us the money. They invested it for us and they did better than we did. And so we have a separate Simon fund, I think, and a separate U of M fund that they administer, and then we have the main fund. But U of M was very honorable and I should have known that, but I didn’t trust them at the time. It proved that I should have.

H. Meijer: You had a bit of business relationship with Frank McKay, and that’s a different discussion. But President Ford’s father was part of that reform group that was fighting Frank McKay back in the 40s.

Meijer: I didn’t really realize that, but I believe it. And so was Mrs. Judd or somebody from far _____________.

H. Meijer: Dorothy Judd and Dr. Ver Meulen.

Meijer: Oh, yes. Yeah, McKay owned our Standale store. We had dealings with him on that.

H. Meijer: I’m just trying to think – when you first met President Ford and before you got to know him well at all, back when he was a Congressman, would it have been at a parade or a community function of some kind?

Meijer: Well, at a parade you just really wave. I don’t know, really, when I met him. I don’t know. I met him later years, I think, his eightieth birthday in Washington, because I know Barbara Bush and President Bush were there, and the younger Bush was there. It was really a party of names. Kissinger and his wife were there – I can’t tell you who all. What was the question?

H. Meijer: I was just trying to think about when you had first met President Ford, back when he was a Congressman.

Meijer: I don’t know, I really don’t know.

H. Meijer: Because you would have voted for him for the first time in 1952, when you moved to Grand Rapids, probably.

Meijer: Probably. But I just had high respect for him that I don’t know how anybody could get to be President of the United States, being as honest and forthright as he was. And of course, he didn’t get elected, but I think he had high integrity.

H. Meijer: Now, you had some misgivings about the Vietnam War when he was still supporting President Nixon pretty strongly on that.

Meijer: Yeah, and Nixon was in office and the parade from Arlington to the Capitol with a dead soldier’s sign on your chest, I think, and here Nixon appointed me to be chairman of employing, not the handicapped…

H. Meijer: It was the Jobs Commission or something?

Meijer: Some kind of a jobs commission where people that didn’t have the education to hold a job, we were supposed to help them get a job or get an education. And so I was in Washington and had supper in the East Room. There was a big supper. I say I had supper with Nixon. And what I remember about the supper is they had mementoes you could take along, matches and little things. Somebody got mine before I got them. But that was in the White House. But I never was in the White House with President Ford.

H. Meijer: Did you ever have any conversations with Betty Ford?

Meijer: Not a whole lot, but I think she sensed that I was sympathetic, or in agreement with her stands on Planned Parenthood, on the right to have an abortion. I know that’s a touchy subject. I had a doctor talk to me here in town one time when I came out of a country club. He said, “Fred, I hear you aren’t supporting this or that. But you’d be surprised how many people are totally against abortion, until their daughter gets pregnant and then they say, ‘Doc, can’t you do this for us?’” He says, “We are at risk for our license.” And I think that was Dr Vandenberg. He’s passed away now, so he can’t defend himself in case I’ve said it wrong. But I had great admiration for Betty Ford. We were with them to a dinner I think Pete Secchia and that restaurant that went down on the southwest end. I guess it’s in Wyoming. And I was sitting next to Mrs. Ford and she had her addiction problems with alcohol and drugs, and she dropped her pocketbook on the floor, and so forth. And I think she did the same thing in Russia when she was there, before the family got together and really turned the heat on her, and said, “Mother, you can’t drink anymore and you can’t take these Valiums,” and so forth.

One thing I admire about Ford, from the day that they asked Betty to quit drinking, he never took another cocktail. Not one. No wine, no liquor, no beer, no nothing. If she was not going to have it, he wasn’t going to have it. That’s pretty honorable, I think.

Smith: One final question that Richard likes to ask. Tell us something, maybe personal, that may surprise people about Ford, who never knew him.

Meijer: I forgot to mention, he was here at the dedication of the garden.

H. Meijer: That’s right. We’ll get to Erik’s question, but he helped dedicate the garden. In fact, Erik was here that day, as well.

Meijer: And I think Betty Ford and I forget who, walked through. And I walked through with Mrs. Ford, I think, and behind us came Lady Bird Johnson, and I think Lena was with Lady Bird. She was impressed with how much Lady Bird knew about the plants and flowers. She was knowledgeable. But I think President Ford had been here twice when we asked him.

H. Meijer: If you encountered somebody who was flying in from another state or another country making their first visit to the Ford Museum, and they asked you what President Ford was like – and you get beyond the nice guy and the honest politician and that sort of thing, what would you tell them that they might not otherwise hear about him?

Meijer: Every time I proposed something, I supposed it was what I liked, but he’d agree with me. Whether it be on the money or on the building of the building and all that sort of thing. I do think I gave it a lot of attention, and he was very appreciative of the eagle in front and the garden that got built. I don’t know whether I was involved with that garden, I know that Hillary Snell – is it Hillary is a lady’s name or is that her husband?

H. Meijer: Husband – Connie Snell.
Meijer: Connie Snell. I think she’s the one that laid out that garden. I had this letter Bill showed me just now. I got a handwritten letter from Ford thanking us for furnishing the birthday cake for all the people that came through that day at the museum. And we supported them in many ways, in many minor ways, but I think he wrote me two personal handwritten notes thanking us for that and whatever it was. I don’t remember, besides the cake, what it was.

H. Meijer: Well, and a thank you for bringing the piece of the Berlin Wall to the Ford Museum.

Meijer: I think so. Did he in one of those letters?

H. Meijer: Yes.

Meijer: Okay, I can’t tell you. I gave it a lot of time and I don’t regret it. It was joy.

H. Meijer: Thank you.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. Let’s start at the beginning. How did your path cross that of Gerald Ford?

Raiman: Well, my first experience was when I was a student at Kalamazoo College. Sophomore year there was a career service quarter where we go off-campus for a career opportunity where we work—whether it’s in the medical field if you are in pre-med, or legal. I’d been in pre-med and switched to philosophy, so there were some real challenges in terms of a career service opportunity. There was an opportunity if you were interested in political philosophy, an opportunity to work as an intern in the House Minority Leader’s office. I applied for the position, and I was successful in gaining it. I went to Washington—it was in 1971 when I was nineteen years old—for three months, working as an intern in his office.

Smith: And how did you get it? What was the selection process?

Raiman: I believe it was my academic credentials. And I also was from Michigan. But a lot of the students from Kalamazoo College were from Michigan as well.

Smith: Did you interview with him for the job?

Raiman: No, I did not. I interviewed on campus with the individual in charge of the program.

Smith: Okay. And how many interns were there in the Minority Leader’s office?

Raiman: During a three-month period in spring—there was a guy who was there with me who was from Michigan State. I was very fortunate, as they were short one staff person and they asked me if I would take that position. So I did case work in the House Minority Leader’s office for my internship, and the other intern worked in the mailroom.
Smith: What was your first impression of Gerald Ford? Had you met him before?

Raiman: I don’t believe that I had met him before. When I came into the office I had the chance. He greeted us and talked with us initially as an introduction. I was very impressed, and I was very quiet, listening and thinking, “Oh, wow, this is a tremendous opportunity and I want to do the very best I can.” He was very busy as the House Minority Leader, and I was doing my job on the staff.

Smith: And how was the office organized? Who was in charge? How did things function? How did priorities get set, carried out?

Raiman: Well, there was Frank Meyer, his administrative assistant, with whom I worked. Mildred Leonard was his personal secretary. There was Anne Kamstra, who was the receptionist in the office, and there were a number of other people. It was funny because almost all of the individuals in the office who reported to him were older, single women. A number of them from the Christian Reformed religion in that area and were known by other offices on the Hill as the six nuns. It was kind of interesting when I blew in and worked there.

Smith: Now, presumably there was the Minority Leader’s office, but then there was the local office, the office for serving the Michigan district?

Raiman: No.

Smith: They were one and the same?

Raiman: He was unusual. He was a very frugal person, and he had one office. A combination of the House Minority Leader’s office, as well as his congressional office.

Smith: Tell us about his frugality.

Raiman: His frugality? I think it was legendary. It was reflected in how the office operated, being very careful about how you spent taxpayer dollars, which I thought was a very, very good and positive thing. It was reflected, too, in staff member salaries, though at that time I was getting paid – it was a paid internship - so that was wonderful.

Smith: And presumably answering mail was a religion?

Raiman: Yes, oh yes. I can comment on that because I did case work and was trying to help constituents solve their problems; that was a wonderful opportunity for me. I contacted the different agencies to solve visa problems or veterans problems and other issues. But we would also get mail from people who, you might say, was nut mail, for lack of a better word. Usually on yellow legal pads, written in green Magic Marker on every line.

Smith: With lots of exclamation marks?

Raiman: Yes. And he asked us to respond to all of those letters – to every single one from a constituent, and we did.

Smith: That’s interesting.

Smith: Did you see his temper?

Raiman: I heard it a couple of times although I didn’t see it. I was with him through a number of different jobs, and I certainly saw it a couple of times at the White House. But when I was working for him up on the Hill, a couple times he got ticked off about what on, on the floor of the House, or with certain individuals, and he would vent in his office. But it was not something you ever really saw. He was such a warm, friendly, caring person. He knew every person’s name. He knew about their family and their kids – the elevator operator, the guy who swept the hallways outside of the office, of staff members. And I remember thinking to myself - how can he remember all of this information? I was always impressed by that.

Smith: Did you ever resent on his behalf the whole Chevy Chase business, which was a euphemism for “this guy’s not bright enough to be president?” The stereotype that was created of a guy who was physically clumsy and not as intellectually adept as he ought to be.

Raiman: Yes, it angered me. It angered me for a number of reasons. One, Ford is the most athletic president that this country has ever had. He was a Big Ten football player, tremendously successful; he was a tremendous swimmer – he swam every day, and he was a great skier. I remember when I was working on his confirmation hearings for the vice presidency, after we were successful, he and the family were going to Vail to go skiing. The Secret Service had a very difficult time because they could not find a Secret Service agent who could keep up with him and protect him on the slopes. They had to send an alert out all over the country to try and find agents who could protect him, who could ski as well or better than he.

But it also angered me because he opened himself up the media. Previously, my understanding was, in the Nixon administration and I’m sure other administrations, they restricted media access – when you could shoot film or not. And Ford just opened it up. So when he tripped coming down the jetway – they’d shoot it and show the same piece again and again. And that angered me.

Smith: Tell me the mood when you arrived in ’71. Those were eventual days, even before Watergate – clearly Vietnam was still very much on the front burner. How did that find reflection in the office?

Raiman: I think that everyone, certainly on Capitol Hill, and all around Washington, was very concerned about Vietnam because of the mood in the country reflected in the media and all of the demonstrations. It was the time of the Black Panthers and the White Panthers, and Rainbow Peoples Party, as well as demonstrations led by the SDS and other groups. So there was a lot of concern about it.
Smith: And some of that, in fact, spilled over to Grand Rapids when you had some urban violence in Grand Rapids. I believe on at least one occasion, his office was taken over by protesters.

Raiman: I’m not familiar with that at all. I was in college at the time. When I came to Washington as an intern I’d already been demonstrating against the war in Vietnam back in Michigan, when I was in college. And when I came to town, it was an interesting juxtaposition because I was in a different role now - I was part of the government.

Smith: Establishment.

Raiman: Yes, Establishment, which I had been protesting against. So it was an interesting juxtaposition for me, providing me with a very good perspective of both sides. And he was always very fair and open.

Smith: How did you and he handle that?

Raiman: Well, we had an interesting experience when I was an intern. I was in Washington with a number of my friends during the big May Day and other demonstrations. There were hundreds of thousands of people in the street. I felt very strongly against the war in Vietnam and I was also protesting against Richard Nixon as president. I’ve got to make that clear.

I was going to engage in the demonstrations the coming weekend, but I felt it was my responsibility to make sure that he knew. I had to be upfront with him. I’m a good Midwestern girl – open and honest – I didn’t want to cause any problems, but I wanted him to know. I also was concerned that if something happened to me; that they would know. It was the Friday before the big demonstrations, and there was a lot of concern in the city because the numbers of protesters were legion and they were not prepared for it. He was in the office and I asked if I could talk with him for just a moment. We literally stood right in the middle of the open area in the office, and I said, “Mr. Ford, I just wanted to let you know that I plan on participating in the demonstrations against the war in Vietnam this weekend.”
Meanwhile, in my peripheral vision I see his entire staff freaking out behind him. And he’s just talking with me. I said, “I wanted you to know this. I’m not stupid, I don’t believe in violence. I just feel very strongly about this and I want to participate and wanted you to know. If I’m not here on Monday, it’s because something has happened to me and I wanted you to know that.” And he looked at me and he said, “Gail, you need to do what you feel strongly about. You need to participate in those things you feel strongly about.” And I said, “Thank you, very much, Mr. Ford.”

Smith: And that’s how you addressed him – Mr. Ford?

Raiman: Yes.

Smith: You wonder if any of his children…

Raiman: I don’t think they were out there. In some ways I always wondered if he had a better understanding or appreciation for that kind of thing because of his children. The whole staff was – oh my God, what is Gail doing? I was just protesting like everybody else. There were incidents because the SDS was there. I did get tear gassed on my way to work on Monday, in the work outfit and everything. It’s kind of ironic. But something I’ll always, always remember, is talking with him about this. I wasn’t sure how he was going to react, but I really wanted to be honest with him, and he gave me his support.

Smith: I’m sure he appreciated your candor. When Watergate first occurred, of course it was widely dismissed. How did it evolve into something larger? During the ’72 campaign, where were you?

Raiman: I was in college, and part of that time I was in school in Europe.

Smith: Okay. So when did you next work with Ford?

Raiman: I had completed my three-month internship and was asked if I would stay and continue working, which is a wonderful compliment. But I was interested in going back to Kalamazoo College and completing my college education, which I did. When I graduated from K, my plan was to get my PhD in philosophy and teach. But I needed a summer job to make some money and my mother said, “Gail, why don’t you call Ford’s district office and see if you can work there as a summer job?” To which I responded with a huge eye-roll—“Ohhhh, Mother.” But I did it, and the district office called the Washington office about me and it happened. That summer, which was the summer of 1973, I worked in his district office. As each person went on summer vacation, I did their job. And I saw him when he came back to the district, and I participated in some events.

Smith: It’s interesting because, for someone who had a safe seat, plus all the demands of the national job, one senses that he spent more time in the district than he had to.

Raiman: I wasn’t in a position to make that judgment, but he did come back often and there were dinners and events in town. He really wanted to meet and talk with his constituents. He was totally committed to his constituents. When he was in town, different groups would come in, different individuals, and he went out to different dinners and events. So he was there.

Smith: He really liked people.

Raiman: Yes, he did. He loved people, and he really did like getting out and meeting with folks and finding out what was on their minds. That was his job and he really relished that.

Smith: And he was seemingly comfortable with all kinds of people?

Raiman: Yes, from all walks of life. And I can attest to that because I was working in the office when everybody and anybody would come in and talk with him.

Smith: Really? Like?

Raiman: He was very comfortable with people from all walks of life, with different needs. A couple of people who I thought, “Holy cow, should we even be talking to this individual?” He didn’t spend tons of time with them, but he was always there and paid attention. He was always totally respectful and open and responsive.

Smith: I’ve always wondered what kind of support he had in the African-American community. Obviously, it tends to vote Democratic, but you wonder on the personal level, how’d he get along with people?

Raiman: He was such an open, warm person he just really liked everyone.

Smith: How pervasive was the Christian Reformed culture, for lack of a better word? Years ago it blanketed West Michigan, defined it. In some ways it’s almost amusing to modern sensibilities, and clearly it was something that he had to factor into his own political outlook. To people who didn’t know West Michigan, the West Michigan that produced Jerry Ford, what would you tell them?

Raiman: It was really, truly Midwestern. Very open, frank, and friendly. He was that way. I think a lot of us Midwesterners are that way. We are comfortable and not interested in trying to be important or something we’re not - just being there to serve. And he reflected that Midwestern sense.

Now, the Christian Reformed Church. What they brought into the culture was an increased religious conservatism: no drinking, no dancing, no this. And it was there as an influence, but I don’t see that it had a real impact on him. He was their representative and the local joke is: whenever there are three people in the Christian Reformed community they form their own church, which is more conservative than its predecessor. The Christian Reformed, the Dutch Reformed, it has different grades of conservatism. My step-mother was brought up Netherlands Reformed, so I’m familiar with this. But she broke away.

It was a backdrop at that time and it has changed dramatically over the years.

Smith: But certainly his fiscal conservatism would appeal…
Raiman: Tremendously. They were in sync.

Smith: So the vice presidential nomination – where were you when all that happened?

Raiman: Well, to backtrack, when I was working in his district office in Grand Rapids, he asked me if I would be interested in working for him in Washington in the House Minority Leader’s office. And I said thank you, but no. I’m going to grad school in philosophy and I’m going to teach. And he responded, “Well, Gail, really think about it, okay?” And he left and came back to the district a few weeks later and called me into his office and said, “Gail, I really think that you are much too smart to waste your time getting your PhD in philosophy, and then teaching the rest of your life. You need to come to Washington and work for me and go to law school at night.” I knew how hard he worked and I’m kind of a workaholic too.

Smith: He really was a workaholic, wasn’t he?

Raiman: Yes he was. He worked late as I did. So I was familiar with this. And my thought was, if I did that, I would never get to law school at night. So I told him no, thank you very much, but I’m not interested. And he went back to Washington again and a number of weeks later he came back and he called me into his office to talk about working for him again. I can’t believe this – I was twenty-one years old and I told the House Minority Leader that I would consider it if was a part-time position. I actually said that to him. Which I cannot believe to this day. Anyway, twenty-one and what did I know?

So he said, “Okay, let me check in Washington and I’ll get back to you.” I said thank you, and I didn’t expect anything to happen. So the next time he was in town he called me into his office and he told me he had great news for me. And so I thought he probably had a part-time position, and I was thinking holy cow, now I’m going to law school. So I met with him and he said, “I have a full-time position for you in my political division and you can start right now.” And I said, “I’m sorry Mr. Ford, I told you I really didn’t want to do that, and I’m going to go to grad school in philosophy. But thank you very much.”

So that was, I think, the fourth time he approached this topic with me, and I figured that would be the last time. My internship ended. When I got on the campus I stood there and had an epiphany. Why am I going to do this? My epiphany was totally disconnected with Ford or anything we’d said. I thought - if I’m going to be here for five years and study all this time, and I’m going to teach for the rest of my life – no, do I want to do that – no. I want to “make a difference”. I was there with my mother and my brother and I said, “I’m not even enrolling. Let’s turn around and go home.” They were very concerned because of my father, who was chief of staff and chief of surgery at Blodgett Medical Center. And as a surgeon, you could probably anticipate he was a perfectionist, and this action was an indication that I wasn’t perfect. A big surprise. But they were concerned because my father was going to be so angry.

So we went home, and boy, they were right. My father was absolutely livid. We got in this huge fight, and it was horrible. We weren’t speaking to each other, and there I am now, in Grand Rapids, Michigan, wondering, “Okay, here I am a philosophy major in Grand Rapids, Michigan in this really terrible economy, and what am I going to do?” And fortunately, for me, I was in the right place at the right time. I think it was four days later, Agnew resigned from the vice presidency, Nixon named Ford to be his vice president, and I got phone calls from Ford’s office saying, “Get to Washington as fast as you can.” I didn’t need to be asked again.

Three days later I was on an airplane, had three suitcases, and I flew to Washington, DC – National Airport – staff picked me up and took me and my suitcases over to the Minority Leader’s office. We had a separate office where we were going to work on the confirmation hearings for the vice presidency. They put my suitcases in the corner and said, “Here’s your desk, Gail.” And then introduced me to Bob Hartmann, who was his chief of staff, who was going to be heading the confirmation team. I’d be working with the attorneys on Ford’s confirmation hearings for the vice presidency before the House Judiciary and Senate Rules (committees).

Smith: Did that include Phil Buchen?

Raiman: In fact, I’m not sure – my biggest involvement was with Bill Kramer, former member of Congress, with the law firm, Kramer, Haber and Becker. Bill Kramer, Benton Becker, and a gentleman who is now my husband, Bob Hynes who had worked with Ford as Minority Counsel on the House Rules Committee. Bob left the year earlier to go to NBC and Ford contacted him and asked him to take a leave of absence and come back and work with the team on his confirmation hearings at that time.

Smith: Tell us about Bob Hartmann. Because he was clearly a pivotal figure in the Ford story.

Raiman: It is very funny, because when I was an intern in Ford’s office, I really did not see him because he was the Minority Sergeant at Arms of the House, and he had an office downstairs, along with his secretary. One day, though, I had to talk with him about some issue and I remember people in the office kind of twittering, like being a little nervous about calling him on the phone. And I was just an intern. I was like, “Holy cow.” I had no choice, so I called downstairs and he picked up the phone, “HARTMANN.” So I went, “RAIMAN.” And he answered my questions, and I was on my way.

When Ford was talking to me about working for him in Washington, he said, “Gail, you’ll be working with Bob Hartmann. Bob can be a little difficult at times, but he’s a good guy and you’ll enjoy working with him.” Well, that was kind of an understatement, as you probably know. It was amusing, when I look back on it. What I also didn’t know until quite some time later, is that Vice President-designate Ford told Bob Hartmann that I was going to work for him. He did not get to pick his own person.

Smith: Oh, really.
Raiman: Which I find kind of interesting. And I was shocked when I found out. That explained some things, certainly. So I arrived on the scene, just out of college. “Hello, here I am.” And very funny when we started – he was very particular about spelling his name correctly because Hartmann had two n’s and lots of people spelled it with only with one. And of course, when I first came on board I spelled it with one n, and that was one of my first experiences with him telling me I spelled his name wrong. He had put my name on some materials and he’d spelled my first name wrong. Gail is spelled G-A-I-L, but he was spelling it G-A-Y-L-E, and I mentioned to him very politely that he had spelled my name wrong as well. And he corrected it, that was fine and off we went.

He was an incredible mentor. I really looked to him and saw how he handled situations. He had been the Washington bureau chief for the LA Times for fifteen years. So through his working relationships with the news media, having been a member of the news media, I saw how he operated and dealt with politics which was tremendously insightful for me. It was a baptism by fire. When I arrived, it was the first time the Twenty-fifth Amendment was being put into practice. We were really going to be setting precedent with these hearings. The country was ripped apart by Watergate and the war in Vietnam. It was a siege mentality. And it was horrible. And I’m popped down right in the middle of it, fresh out of college. I’m answering phone calls from the Washington Post, from the networks, everything, wanting to know all about the hearings, the details and everything else. I was also trying to deal with people making false accusations, going to the media and having to disprove what these were. One of the things I was responsible for were Ford’s political contribution files, which were locked up in a very safe place. That was one of my responsibilities in terms of checking against accusations. And when I think back on it, Richard, I am just out of college and twenty-one years old, and I had this incredible responsibility.

Smith: What kinds of allegations were you having to refute?
Raiman: Oh, that some organization gave him money or not, or how much, or who gave it – things like that. Whether it was a foreign country – Korea or some big businessman or something like that. And I’ll tell you, I poured over those files backwards, forwards, every way for my job, and I continued to do that when I moved over to the White House with him later, working with the General Counsel’s office. The man was so clean, precise, everything was in its place and there was absolutely nothing that even had to be explained. It was all to the letter.

Smith: Remember Mr. Winter-Berger.

Raiman: Yes, I do.

Smith: What was his story?

Raiman: I kind of remember - because he had leaked this to the media and one of the things he said is he’d come to Ford’s office and spoken with two of the people who were upfront. Their memory is that they never saw him before in their lives. I’m trying to remember if he said he contributed some money or something – I can’t remember. But I checked everything and the whole thing proved totally false. There was something that involved Korea, as well. That was another issue where there was nothing there. But it was fascinating to me that these people would actually lie and put out all this misinformation to hurt an individual’s reputation when there was absolutely nothing there whatsoever.

So I had a baptism by fire in that position. I was dealing with the national news media in the middle of Ford’s confirmation hearings for the vice presidency, and the confirmation hearings in the middle of Watergate.

Smith: Let me get back to Hartmann because Ford’s loyalty to Hartmann was such that at the White House there were, in effect, two separate speechwriting operations. There was the official one which Hartmann was doing, and then there was the David Gergen, eventually Dick Cheney unofficial one. And it’s curious because of what it says about Ford. Clearly there were problems and he was prepared to accommodate them, in some ways, rather than making them accommodate him. And certainly there were any number of people who thought to themselves, why doesn’t he just get rid of people or whatever. One senses that he was aware of Hartmann’s shortcomings, but they were dwarfed by his contributions and his own sense of loyalty. Is that a fair description?

Raiman: Some of it is. My take, which might be a little different than yours because I was right there where the rubber meets the road through all of this, is that Bob Hartmann was tremendous. I mean, he had Ford’s back and he was someone who would tell him if something was wrong - this looks horrible, this should not happen, you cannot say this, you cannot do that.

Smith: He in some ways saved Ford from himself when Haig was pulling strings, trying to get a commitment on a pardon.

Raiman: Yes. Oh, in many different ways he was doing that. He was incredible. He really put himself at risk and in jeopardy through all different situations. I remember too, when Ford was vice president, I was in the secure area there. The Nixon people would send over speeches for Ford to give all the time and Hartmann would sit in his office and just rip them up. Of course, they hated him because he was not letting Ford be an apologist for Nixon. The pressure was so intense, and if you look back on the record, during that time period, you’ll find that Gerald Ford was very rarely in Washington.

Smith: Right.

Raiman: And the reason why was to get him out of town, so he could speak and do his own thing. And Hartmann was doing the speeches with a different focus, to keep him away from that mess.

Smith: Clearly, there were people in the Nixon White House – and this probably applies to every vice president – particularly under these circumstances, there were people in the Nixon White House who thought the vice president was insufficiently loyal or outspoken, or all of these things. Was there a tension that you sensed? And I’m not talking about the principles, but at the staff level.

Raiman: Well, definitely, because they – the Nixon people – really wanted Gerald Ford to be an apologist – that’s my view – for Richard Nixon. Now my view is colored because I really did not like Richard Nixon in any way, shape or form. And that happened when I was in college and I felt that way very strongly. I was certainly wasn’t announcing it to the world, given my position, but I saw this every day. And they were frustrated because Hartmann was the chief of staff, and he was the interceptor, and there were certainly attempts to go around him.

Smith: Which is interesting because it explains why long before August of ’74, for example, Al Haig would have reason to resent Bob Hartmann.

Raiman: Yes, oh yes. It was not pretty. And Hartmann was protecting Ford. And Ford was very open, warm, friendly, and a very trusting individual. The fact of the matter is, there are some individuals you cannot and should not trust.

Smith: So Hartmann was performing a function vital to Ford’s success, and in some ways taking a lot of the heat himself so that Ford didn’t have to.

Raiman: He took a tremendous amount of heat. He did. A lot of heat, a lot of flack in the media, particularly, as well. But Hartmann was pretty good at giving flack back through the media as well. He had a particular talent for that.

Smith: Pretty good leaker.

Raiman: That’s what I understand.

Smith: One of the great, overriding enigmas of that period – sure, he wasn’t vice president terribly long – but it’s an utterly unique vice presidency. And he was in a terribly awkward situation. And he was, by nature, a loyalist and all of that. But as you say, he was out of town a lot. So the question arises, he could never have a transition, for obvious reasons.
Raiman: That’s correct.

Smith: He couldn’t say or do anything that gave the slightest impression that he was even thinking about…

Raiman: I was talking to the news media, at least being an intermediary for these calls, because they were so high level at this point. You can’t even imagine. And the questions were, of course, coming up all the time because the media was anticipating what’s happening, with tapes and everything. The whole thing was blowing up. But with Hartmann in this role – one thing you have to remember, and I don’t know what the numbers are – I think Ford’s congressional staff was about fourteen people. But what you have to realize is those were the fourteen people who went over to be in the vice president’s staff. Now, can you imagine the vice president of the United States having a staff of fourteen people? Well, Hartmann hired a few more people, brought Jack Marsh on board in terms of congressional relations and a couple of other people – Jerry terHorst in terms of press secretary – things like that. It was also such a short period of time. You are exactly right about the transition. I remember all the time being so careful to make sure whatever we said or did could in no way be interpreted as desiring a transition –Ford was not interested in becoming president of the United States.

Smith: Hartmann liked a drink or two. After a couple of drinks, did that conversation ever take place? Did he talk about when you were all going to the White House?

Raiman: No. No, he did not. He was very quiet and again, I think it was his loyalty to Ford, and that was not something that I think he would ever have done. Very quiet, everything was kept between people. I was right there in the secure area with the Vice President and Hartmann, and was in the middle of this. Now, what they said to each other was in complete privacy, but there was no…

Smith: Did you ever hear him say anything – the Vice President – say anything that might be interpreted as anticipating a possible change?
Gail Raiman: I remember a situation, I don’t know who it was, who brought something like that up…and he totally and immediately discounted it. That was his response to that.

I have one interesting story – about Ford’s character, during the brief time in the vice president’s office. Of course, at that point they were starting to conduct Secret Service investigations of the staff. I was up for top secret clearance, and they were interviewing everybody under the sun about me – just like they do with everybody. And I went through the process, and I remember being in the office. Bob Hartmann had been in with the Vice President, came out, walked past my desk and said, “Gail, the FBI is not approving you to work here in Vice President Ford’s office.”

If somebody told me that now, I would really be upset. Then, I was very young, but I was also so intent, we were working so hard because of all the crises happening, that I just kind of went, “Okay.” And just kept working. I didn’t have time to sit and really think about it. I recognized there was a problem and what am I going to do? But I was so busy. And I remember going home that night and thinking, “There’s nothing I can really do about it. I wonder what that’s all about, and why wouldn’t they?” And all I could figure out was that protesting against the war in Vietnam, protesting against Richard Nixon were the reasons. There was nothing else really in my background that would have caused them concern, as far as what I saw.

I don’t know how many days it was or what happened because it’s a kind of a blur at this point, but a number of days later Bob Hartmann came over to me and says, “You’re going to continue to work here. The Vice President told the FBI that you were going to continue to work for him.”

Benton Becker told us a wonderful story that when Chief Justice Earl Warren died during that period, and Benton said, “It might be a nice gesture if you went up and paid your respects,” because Warren was lying in state at the Court. And of course, there was the Warren Commission in addition to everything else. And Ford was kind of thinking, well the White House probably wouldn’t like that very much. But he took it under advice. He clearly was going to think about it. And later in the day Benton discovered through other parties, that the Vice President had taken it upon himself to go up to the Supreme Court and to place a wreath at the casket and pay his respects. And sure enough, Nixon gave him hell.

Raiman: He’s this warm and gentle guy and you’d talk to him and he’d smile and he’d listen. He was a very strong individual. With me – think about this – he doesn’t know me very well; he got me to work for him. I came there, I worked very, very hard; he knew that I was very loyal, and the FBI is telling him they will not approve me. I don’t know what in heck they showed him, I don’t want to see my report, I’d probably get ticked off. He saw it all and they said she should not be working for you, and he told them he didn’t care what they had to say, I was going to. Period. Can you imagine how much that meant to me and how I felt?

Smith: Oh, sure.

Raiman: That was incredible.

Smith: Tell me about the workaholic, because Saturdays he was in the office. There are people who think he would have been in on Sunday if he could get people to work with him. And it was something that continued really to the end of his life.

Raiman: Well, I saw it just when I was an intern on the Hill for the first time, because I’d come in early – I’m an early bird. I’m a workaholic, too. So I was even a workaholic intern, and I’d come in early and I made coffee. When staff realized that I was there early when he was there, they asked me to give him cup of coffee. I hadn’t because I didn’t want to interrupt him. So I’d load up a cup of coffee, take it in, say, “Good morning, Mr. Ford,” and deliver it. Well, what was really funny is that – I’d been doing this for probably about a month – and one of the women from up in the front office talked with me and said, “Gail, if you are giving Mr. Ford coffee in the morning, you really need to use the very attractive bone china cups and saucers that are there. That’s what we give him his coffee in.” I hadn’t even thought about it. I’m giving him the old mugs that the rest of the staff uses and he never said peep to me. I don’t think he said peep to them. I think they probably wondered why he had the mugs on his desk. My whole point is, he was there early, and would work late. Now, I didn’t see it so much when I was an intern because I left fairly early.

While working on the confirmation hearings for the vice presidency, I left where I lived, which wasn’t that far away, at six in the morning. I was there at seven in the morning to begin work and I used to work until nine, at least, at night. That was during the confirmation hearings for the vice presidency, and that was seven days a week, and it had to be. And he was always there. It wasn’t as if we were working and he wasn’t. He was there sometimes longer than we were. So I didn’t think of it as a good or bad thing, I thought of it as here we are all together.

Smith: Was there ever any significant threat to his confirmation? One gets the sense that it was as smooth as the process could be. Of course, it was the first time.

Raiman: It was the first time and people were trying to sabotage it through the media. And there were members of Congress who wanted to do what they could to make sure it didn’t happen. I remember sitting in the hearings with Liz Holtzman, and if you go back and hear that…

Smith: Was it personal? Ideological? Some combination of the two?

Raiman: I don’t know. But I was so shocked at how mean spirited and personal it was. Father Drinan – here’s this Catholic priest, and of course he’s very liberal, but I was shocked. It was really disappointing for me to see. In preparing for the hearings, we uncovered everything. I remember us having Betty Ford’s dental bills. And we had binders with all this information that we prepared. I helped put the binders together and they were asking about Betty Ford’s dental bills. It was so shocking it was unbelievable.
Smith: The fact that she had been to a psychiatrist, was that in play?

Raiman: No. It really wasn’t. And he was so good in addressing everything. He had the information in his books, and he was very strong in making his statements.

Smith: Did you know at that point that she had a problem, however euphemistically defined?

Raiman: No. Not then. I think there was just a little bit of a buzz when I was in the White House.

Smith: But it was not something in the investigation, the vice presidential investigation – something that came up?

Raiman: No. No there wasn’t.

Smith: So he becomes vice president, then what’s your role?

Raiman: Well, we all, fourteen or so of us, have to clean up all the files and move, get everything together, and move over very quickly to our office in the Old Executive Office Building. It was a very bizarre situation. It had never been done before, there was no transition, it was here you are. And Bob Hartmann was his chief of staff trying to set up this operation, and Bob, with his personality, didn’t want anybody in conflict with him. He wanted to assert that he was, indeed, the boss. I certainly saw examples of that when I was there, having people come in to talk about positions and he was not as warm and welcoming as he could have been or should have been. But his primary focus was the success of Gerald Ford.

Smith: We’ve been told that he, like everyone who has ever held the office, to varying degrees, didn’t really like the vice presidency a whole lot. When you think of his openness and his temperament, and then shoehorn that into this unique circumstance – you really couldn’t say what was on your mind.

Raiman: And he was in a particularly difficult position. Let’s be frank about it. The war in Vietnam continued and every day new, terrible information was coming out about Nixon, learning that Nixon had lied about the tapes and lied about what he said. And Rosemary Woods – the missing excerpts. Every day it was a new revelation and the media were on a feeding frenzy. And it was every day. In our office where I was, there were sixteen telephone lines, and there were times when every single one of them would be ringing with reporters calling for this, that or the other thing.

Smith: It’s interesting, because one thing I associate with him is unflappability. I assume he maintained that, even under the pressure of that uniquely pressure-full time?

Raiman: Yes, he did. There were a couple of times, I’m sure, when he was frustrated - you could hear something coming from the office, and you’d kind of go whoa, because this was such a rare occurrence. I’m sure he was frustrated, and I’m sure because there were so many things going on with the Nixon people trying to keep him under control, or make him an apologist for Nixon, or say, “Hey, everything is just fine here.” If he remained in town, he would be forced more so to do that, and that’s why I mentioned getting him out of town was key to this. I’m sure he did not enjoy being away from his family, his wife and kids that much, but he was out there. And there were a couple of nice trips that combined some time away, which was good for him, as well. But it was such a difficult time, as you know. One of the most terrible times in this country’s history.

Smith: I only ever heard him speak disparagingly of two people. And the worst he could come up with was, “He’s a bad man.” And one of them was Gordon Liddy and the other was John Dean.

Raiman: I can understand that. I had a friend who worked for John Dean. And she tried her darnedest to not work for John Dean. According to her, he had her going to phone booths around town and being at certain phone booths at certain times, taking messages and bringing them back to the office.

Smith: Why?
Raiman: She didn’t know why. Once she was instructed to go to a movie theater and sit there for some message.

Smith: Really?

Raiman: Really, she could not deal with this. She worked in the Nixon White House. It just reinforced my feelings about that, I must tell you.

Smith: Was there a moment when it dawned on you that this was all going to end badly? That, in fact, the unthinkable is inevitable?

Raiman: With Nixon? To me it was not an “end badly.” I wasn’t sitting there cheering for Ford to be president of the United States, because I know he wasn’t interested in it. But my concern was that Nixon really did need to go, because I saw examples that increasingly showed that it was getting worse and worse. And he was getting worse and worse and more disjointed from what was actually going on. We were overwhelmed because of all the rumors. And I remember getting all kinds of calls about who was in Ford’s office - all of that kind of stuff, and what was going to happen.

I remember Ron Nessen, who was then with NBC news, was one of the calls I picked up. My feeling working with the news media was always been, I’m going to be a straight shooter. And I’m not going to say something that’s not true or lead them the wrong way. And I am pretty good at doing that, but I knew there were certain things that I could not say or was not going to say. And I remember Ron, with NBC News. I was sitting there, picking up call after call, and Ron – I cannot remember exactly what it was – but [he] really asked the question. And I was like, holy cow, now what am I going to do? And what I did was say - as I knew he’d been bicycling on the George Washington Parkway bike trail before, because we’d talked on trips. “Ron, have you done any bicycling on the George Washington Parkway bike trail lately?” Because, Richard, I thought, “What am I going to do?” And Ron goes, “Huh? What?” And he repeated it, and I think he understood that I couldn’t go anywhere, but I wasn’t going to say anything. It was all happening, and then it just exploded.

Smith: Woodward and Bernstein famously portrayed Nixon in the final stages of his presidency as a man, shall we say, not all together in control. Was that portrait of the president something that people were aware of at the time? Was there a sense that this presidency was coming unglued?

Raiman: It’s a very difficult question to answer, Richard, because you had the media who was feeding that, because they wanted to destroy Nixon. And you had other people who were trying to support him, and he was making it very difficult to do that. And then the rest of us were kind of sitting in the middle going, “Holy cow.” And my sense - and I did not see it because I was not in the White House, I didn’t see Nixon - but certainly my sense internally was that he was not in as great a mental shape as he should be. That was my impression. That’s not a fact, and I didn’t have anybody tell me that.

Smith: Understood.

Raiman: I was not aware of the drinking issue at all, but it just seemed he was not all with it. It was coming apart.

Smith: I understand that within the vice presidential office people were beyond discreet – self-disciplined, buttoned-up. Did Hartmann, for example, remind everyone of the need to be careful in what was said? Or was there that awareness of the constant danger that you were all in, just in terms of the natural kind of gossip that most people would indulge in.

Raiman: We really didn’t. I remember being asked about this numerous times. I was very conscious, and certainly everybody I knew at work there was. We didn’t talk about what we did outside the office. Period. When I met people, I didn’t tell them where I worked.

Smith: Really?
Raiman: Really. I made up stuff because I wasn’t going to tell people where I worked and put myself in a difficult position. I had a situation when I was at the White House, I was called in. My friend, who was head of the FBI at the White House, and I had breakfast together and he was asking me all kinds of questions about had I seen anything or talked with anybody unusual. I’d basically been working on the State of the Union Address 24/7 for the past three weeks. And I’m saying, “No, I don’t know what you are talking about.” And he kept asking me these questions. Finally I said, “George, what?” And he says, “Well, I’ve gotten a call and I’ve been asked to bring you over to the Old Executive Office Building for a meeting.” I said, “With whom?” He said, “I don’t know.” He’s the head of the FBI at the White House – “I don’t know”? And I said, “What’s it about?” “I don’t know.” He was really upset and I was searching in my mind about what could this be – and scared – “Oh, my. Did they see my boyfriend’s car out in front of my apartment at one in the morning?” It was kind of silly. I was really nervous, particularly because he was so nervous. So he made this appointment – this is hilarious – it was George Sanders, who is head of the FBI at the White House. He said, “Gail, I’m going to be at your office, on the first floor of the West Wing, at X time. I’m going to take you over to this office and leave you there to be interviewed for this meeting. I was told I could not be there. I was told I could not even wait for you there. I’m going to be waiting around the hall up where they cannot see me. So when you come out, walk down that hall and I will be there and we will walk back together.” Well, how about that? I’m like – what is this?

So George takes me over to an empty office in the Old Executive Office Building. I walked in, there is a woman at the desk, the receptionist or whatever. And then I’m taken into an inner room, there’s a desk and there’s a guy sitting across with a light and he starts asking me all kinds of questions about what have I noticed unusual, have I talked with anybody unusual, have I…? And I’m answering honestly. No, and I don’t know what you are talking about, and no.
And finally – the guy was turning more and more red – just exploded and said, “Don’t you know what in hell is going on around you?” And I said, “I guess not.” Which made him angry, too. And he said, “There is a Russian spy who has been tapping your telephone.” Well, that was quite a surprise to me. He said, “I can’t believe you don’t know what’s going on right under your nose where you live. He moved in right below you a number of weeks ago and he’s been tapping your phone.”

This evidently happened over Christmas or right after Christmas. Well, for those first three weeks in January, all I did was work on the State of the Union Address. So I’d be going in at seven in the morning and going home at nine, ten or eleven every night. Well, I’m not seeing anything, okay? I’d try to get some sleep before I’d go in the next day. I explained that to him. That didn’t particularly give him any pause, but evidently this happened and he was all alarmed and upset about it. And obviously they found out because they were tapping his phone, and found out he was tapping my phone. I was not concerned because I didn’t say anything, so I felt okay about that. In some ways I was relieved. So I was at least able to tell my friend at the FBI what happened.

This was obviously the CIA, who was not telling the FBI what was going on. I thought that was interesting during this whole time where we were trying to broach the whole topic of détente, which we were so focused on with Mr. Kissinger at the White House.

You also asked a question before that I wanted to address a little bit about the different speechwriting operations in the White House. It is kind of interesting. I have a little different take on Hartmann and his team doing the speechwriting. As you know, because you’ve talked with a lot of people, the President liked to have different views. He liked people to come in and make the case for different sides of the issues so he could hear both sides of the issue and then get the best. A kind of competitive approach. And I don’t think, in some ways, it’s the greatest for team building because you end up having people vying against each other. But with Hartmann and the team, I worked in that area like they did, I thought they were doing a very, very good job. But I think, in some cases, you have people who, politically wanted to take that over, or get their own view in. The State of the Union Addresses were bloodbaths. I’ve never seen anything like it. They were bloodbaths – just to get your sentence in, or this sentence out. So I look at it all somewhat in that way, in terms of having more of a competition. That’s perhaps a more friendly approach, but to be getting these drafts and different ideas so he would have the benefit of that.

Now how people operated in that system, I had problems with because I saw how up close and personal it was, which I did not like.

Smith: The President clearly was an Eagle Scout in every sense of the world, and chose to find the good in people. Which in some ways leaves you vulnerable.

Raiman: Yes it does.

Smith: And in some ways, Hartmann offset some of that, playing the role…

Raiman: Yes, he did. A very important role, because he really protected him in some ways, or brought him back, or prevented an opposing view very strongly to one that had perhaps more access to the President.

Smith: Which again, puts Hartmann’s role in a different perspective – a very useful perspective. It would also tell you something about Ford’s loyalty to Hartmann. I mean, recognizing the unique service that he provided. Were there people who tried to take advantage of that aspect of the President’s personality?

Raiman: I think so.

Smith: Yeah. It would be surprising if there weren’t.

Raiman: And it also frustrated Bob Hartmann. But you know, the White House is very, very political, and lots of times you’re not getting stabbed in the back, you're getting stabbed in the stomach. It's an incredible place to work, and you have to understand the level of stress and competition.

Smith: When did you find out he was going to be president?

Raiman: It was right before. Because then I was involved immediately. It was before it was public. It still hadn't been announced, but it was right before because I was helping putting together the list for the ceremony in the White House.

Smith: Okay. And were you at the Nixon farewell?

Raiman: No.

Smith: Because afterwards there was a reception, and you could see the Nixon people staying away rather than going. Which again, you certainly can understand, given the emotions of the time. But it gives rise to a larger question of how much difficulty was there meshing the Nixon people. Rumsfeld was very frank in saying he thought he should have cleared house across the board very early on. They should have been more ruthless. Again, classic Gerald Ford, he didn't want to tar all the Nixon people with guilt – most of them were innocent. Secondly, there were lots of very talented people. And third, he needed some degree of continuity. He needed to keep a government running. So all of those factors came into play, but it does raise a question: how much friction was there between the Nixon people and the incoming Ford people?

Raiman: When I came into the White House, the Nixon people who remained there in their offices – and it was interesting to me, Richard, in fact, I was frankly really disappointed – shocked and disappointed – because of where my office was I could see people going up and down and around the corner and talking. And I would see Ford people coming in and moving in their offices and I would see the Nixon people the Ford people to each other. That really angered me.

Smith: Wow.
Raiman: And I thought, well, who in hell are you? And I’m all for working together, but what happened was, there really wasn’t a lot of working together. They weren’t interested. They felt they were superior, they should be there, a wrong had been done. They were interested, I’m sure, in preserving themselves. But that was one of the biggest mistakes, I believe - that they did not really clean house. Because my view is they worked against Ford internally.

Smith: And that’s where you get this notion there’s “the Grand Rapids crowd,” which was the euphemism for the people on the Hill, the people around Ford who were deemed to be not quite up to the job.

Raiman: Yes. I was part of that crowd, just because I was a member of his staff coming in. But I don’t think that would have had anything to do with it. On reflection, they were really under siege because look at what happened to their boss. But it was mean spirited for the people coming in. That’s what I saw. When we first came over I saw them not helping, not cooperating, but trying to find ways to undermine what Ford was trying to accomplish for the country.

Smith: And where were you physically when you first moved into the White House?

Raiman: I was in what is now the Vice President’s office, and that is on the first floor of the West Wing. At my desk I could look down the hall and see the President’s office, the Oval Office. I had Rumsfeld and then Cheney in the office on the right, and down the hall, Kissinger’s office on the left. So we were in prime real estate.

Smith: Phil Buchen was?

Raiman: Upstairs. And the people in the Domestic Counsel and Government Relations were upstairs as well. It really was Kissinger, Hartmann, Rumsfeld and Cheney and Jack Marsh. And the Oval Office. Those were the guys on the first floor of the West Wing, and then other folks were upstairs and then more over in the Old Executive Office Building.
Smith: Was it different under Rumsfeld and Cheney?

Raiman: Yes.

Smith: How so?

Raiman: I think it was more in terms of their personality and outlook on life. Rumsfeld was going to do what he thought he should do, no matter – he did not take advice or even think about anybody else. Frankly, he was going to do X, Y, or Z. And just do it. And not, perhaps, in the kindest way. Though there are some things, of course, you can’t be kind about. But it really set a tone, and a very adversarial one in the West Wing and other places. Very much so.

Smith: Unnecessarily.

Raiman: Unnecessarily. There are times for it, as I said, and certainly support that. But this was unnecessary - his decision about what should be done or shouldn’t be done - and had a lot of people up in arms. He was not somebody who would listen to anybody’s concerns or other ideas. And when he left and Dick Cheney came in - Dick was schooled by Don – but there was not as much “in your face” behavior.

Smith: Did the pardon take you by surprise?

Raiman: A little bit. Because I knew how people would feel about it, certainly where I was coming from. My feeling was that it was the right decision to make for a number of reasons. One, I personally thought that Nixon was really having psychological problems. In addition to that, we’d get the President’s schedule every day. And every day there were hours scheduled for meetings with Nixon’s attorneys. And how can you run the country when you are spending all of your time dealing with legal questions about the tapes and everything else. And he was spending – instead of running the country in this terrible situation we were in – the first time this had happened with a president and the war and everything else, he was spending hours every day meeting with Nixon’s attorneys and other people affiliated with that. And that could not continue.

Smith: It’s interesting, because I’ve often wondered if the event that triggered this was his first press conference at the end of August, I think it was the 27th of August. Again, it’s that side of Ford – naïve is a pejorative – but he went into that press conference really believing that the press would want to talk about Cyprus and Greece, inflation, and all those things that he, as president, felt he should be dealing with. But the only thing they wanted to talk about was Nixon. And it didn’t go terribly well, and I think he left kind of angry – mostly at himself. And I’ve often wondered if that was, in some ways, the event. There was going to be a pardon at some point, but it dramatized to him the obsession that Washington had that was never going to go away until he pulled the plug. He was the one person who could make it go away.

Raiman: I don’t have personal knowledge of this, but as you know, Gerald Ford was not somebody polling the public to see what he should do, for God’s sake. His focus was what is the very best thing he could do for this country, and if they are going to toss him out because he’s doing something unpopular, so be it. “I’m going to do the best job I can”. So what I sensed was part of this, which you didn’t mention, was Nixon and where Nixon was in all of this – mentally, physically, and a recognition that – just get him out of there.

Smith: Do you know if Hartmann tried to talk him out of the pardon?

Raiman: No, I don’t know that. I wouldn’t think so.

Smith: What was it like once the news broke? It was a Sunday morning, early, and took the country by storm. I assume the phones were ringing off the hook. What was that like?

Raiman: Well, we were besieged, and there were a lot of angry people. Frankly, even angry reporters were coming at the story from a very skewed perspective. They were particularly interested in “How in hell can he do this?” and “The country is outraged,” and all of that versus, “Oh what are the reasons behind this?” If I got that question, it was unusual.

Smith: Well, the wound was still raw.

Raiman: It was very raw. Nixon, as you know, hated the media, and it was mutual, it really was. And I’ll tell you, seeing Ford with the media again and again, and you know some of the folks I worked with at the White House, whether it was Tom DeFrank of Newsweek, Phil Jones of CBS and others – Ford was open. He was honest and he told it like it was. And they would ask him the most horrible questions time and again, and there were frankly times I was so surprised, the man just answered them and they were, too. But he was so open and they had such tremendous respect for him, I think that helped. But you had to get over that huge hump, so they got to know him better. They’d ask him – always – about the Nixon pardon, and it was not something he’d planned on talking about, but he would talk to them about it. Rather than these days, as you know, you find a way to deflect it and move on to your other topic. But he respected the questions on behalf of the country.

Smith: How long were you there?

Raiman: I was there until I was blacklisted by the Carter people, which is right up to the end.

Smith: Was the fall of Saigon the worst period?

Raiman: I think so. We had the Mayaguez incident when I was there, and that was certainly very, very difficult. I think I was probably there until three in the morning when this was all happening. We were trying to get more and more information. But I think the fall of Saigon was the worst. It really was just devastating and affected Ford deeply. All of us deeply. It was tough.

Smith: What was the best time?

Raiman: What was the best time?
Smith: The Bicentennial must have had all sorts of highlights.

Raiman: It was fun. During the Bicentennial I was so busy, I can tell you about all of the speeches. I was so exhausted from the Bicentennial that I didn’t even want to go to the events. I’m serious, because I’d been helping and working on the speeches so much that it was again, 24/7. But it was very exciting because it was the country’s bicentennial and there were wonderful celebrations. I think that was great. For me it was just those personal moments where you have a sense of how fortunate you are to be in service of the country with this great man. They were more personal moments, which I think we each had, versus one big event.

Smith: Were people slow to take the Reagan challenge seriously? That he would, in fact, run and that he would turn out to be as formidable an opponent?

Raiman: I don’t know.

Smith: And a variation of that, a question, purely and speculative: Did Reagan make Ford a better candidate? Which is not the same thing as whether he complicated his chances of winning. But did the competition that Reagan forced make Ford, for example, a better speaker, a better campaigner over the long haul?

Raiman: I think he probably did because he had that competitiveness. But I also think, and feel strongly, that – it was amazing to me – Ronald Reagan refused to do anything beforehand to help Ford.

Smith: That really was a problem.

Raiman: And I was very surprised and disappointed, thinking, what kind of man was this? He refused to even give one speech and that was such a disappointment. And he split the RNC in half. Then after everything was said and done with the election, I remember when Reagan was running, Ford was calling him up and saying, “Hey, what can I do to help you?” Which tells you a great deal about the individual. I don’t think I would have it in my gut to do that.
Smith: Were you at the convention?

Raiman: Yes, I was in ’76.

Smith: That was pretty bitter, wasn’t it?

Raiman: Yes, it was tough. It was really kind of scary in some ways, because he had such opposition, there was so much internal…it was tough. It was difficult. In fact, that was my first convention that I had been to, so this was all a new thing for me.

Smith: Did you go out there still uncertain as to the ultimate outcome?

Raiman: Well, I always felt that Ford was going to win. When I got there, seeing some of Reagan’s supporters and the vehemence and everything, was a little scary to me, to be honest with you. I was like, “Holy cow.” The rhetoric and the extremism.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Vice President Rockefeller?

Raiman: Well, just being in the complex. He and Bob Hartmann were good friends, so he would call up periodically. What cracked me up is that I would pick up the phone, and answering the phone, and he says, “Hi, oh Gail, hi! This is Nelson.” And it took me a while to figure out this was the vice president of the United States, and he’s placing his own phone calls and identifying himself as Nelson. So he was a great guy, a very warm individual. I really, really enjoyed working with him in general.

Smith: Mrs. Ford thought at the time it was a mistake to dump him from the ticket. Were there other people who felt that way?

Raiman: Yes. There were.

Smith: You can understand the case.

Raiman: Yes. Because he was so liberal, and they thought they had to have a more conservative individual running.
Smith: But it’s hard to see it actually bought you a lot of delegates. The irony is that Rockefeller, being a good soldier, turned over New York and Pennsylvania, to give you the margin of victory in the end. He didn’t get it from the South, although Mississippi did come through.

Raiman: Yes.

Smith: Did you think at the end of the campaign that you’d win? You’d clearly caught up.

Raiman: I did. I was on the last trip, the campaign trip, which was to Grand Rapids, as a matter of fact. I went to Grand Rapids, with the President.

Smith: It was very emotional.

Raiman: It was very emotional and, of course, we were all just dead tired.

Smith: Had he lost his voice by then?

Raiman: Yes, he had, toward the end. He was an incredible campaigner. I was on the other trips with him, and he could take catnaps for fifteen minutes and wake up totally refreshed. I can’t. Here I am in my twenties, and after these trips he’s running around talking to everybody and it’s incredible – I am walking into walls.

Smith: It’s interesting you say. By all accounts, he had extraordinary stamina.

Raiman: Yes he did. And he could do his catnaps and just wake up totally refreshed. I’m sure there were other people who could do the same thing, but me and a whole host of other people – I was so much younger than he – but I couldn’t sleep, and it’s very stressful, and you’re traveling and you know how that is. You are jumping around meeting people, and you can’t relax a moment at all. It’s dangerous. But was incredible. Grand Rapids was so moving and emotional. I remember I really thought we were going to win. It was very close and I was hopeful and praying. It was devastating. I was so sad and I was so hurt.
I remember going into work the next day and going into Bob Hartmann’s office, and – I probably was crying. And Bob sat at his desk, he smiled at me, and looked at me and he said, “You know, Gail, the sun is going to shine tomorrow.” And it helped. Hartmann really did have an understanding of what happens in politics. Of course, if you are at the White House you are invited to all these parties and everything – and some people didn’t realize that it was because of the position they are in. They think everyone thinks they are wonderful. And there were a couple of individuals on the White House staff who really were enjoying the parties and all these wonderful invitations, and they stopped like that. And they were devastated. Hartmann was like, “Well, yeah, that’s the game. I got it.”

Smith: We’ve talked to a lot of people who said it took the President a while to bounce back. Did you see that at all?

Raiman: About what?

Smith: That it took the President a while to bounce back.

Raiman: Yes. It was a tough time.

Smith: But in some ways it was almost easier for her.

Raiman: Oh, I think so.

Smith: Because she was looking forward to their post-politics life, anyway.

Raiman: Yes.

Smith: This had all been a detour, and they were going out to California and start a new life.

Raiman: But he had been in that role, so he was always traveling, he was always on, he was making decisions for the country, and then, can you imagine, one day you are doing it and then you are not. That’s pretty tough. I think he handled it very well. He ran because he felt it was very important for the country, for him to be president and continue to bring the country back. So he was personally engaged in this.

Smith: Did you have any contact with the kids?

Raiman: I did when I was at the White House, periodically. With Liberty, the dog, kids would come through the White House. I didn’t do anything with them socially, but I knew them because they would be walking through. When I had Liberty in my office, I’d be talking to someone on the phone and I’d say, “Do you want to talk to Liberty?” They’d freak out. I’d have the dog snort in my phone. They loved it.

Smith: When Mrs. Ford did her famous 60 Minutes interview, the sense one has is that people always fight the last wars, and the immediate reaction was, “Oh my God, what has she done?” But fairly soon some counterintuitive polling data and other responses came in, that suggested, wait a second, maybe there is another side to this, and that she was actually an asset. First of all, for a presidency that defined itself by honesty, secondly, the culture was changing. It was waiting for someone like her.

Raiman: Well, believe me, she was on the cutting edge, out in front, as you know.

Smith: I’m sure it didn’t help you with the Reagan people, but they weren’t going to vote for Ford, anyway. She really sort of came into her own.

Raiman: Well, remember, she was supporting the Equal Rights Amendment, and so did he. That was so far out there, and it was so wonderful. Who was out there first? Well, they were. And what’s interesting to me in terms of that culture, because I’m their kids’ age and that whole generation, before the pill - “What would you do with Susan and birth control?” I’m going to remind you, even before that, they were interviewing her about the living arrangements in the White House and what they were going to do. And you know, the Nixons had separate bedrooms. I think they barely even talked to each other. And she says, “Well, Jerry and I, we’ll move our double bed in there,” and the country and media were aghast, and I didn’t understand – shouldn’t you be sleeping together if you’re married? It was like a shock, which I found, frankly, weird and funny. I mean, I just didn’t understand that.

Smith: It wasn’t Ozzie and Harriet.

Raiman: And she was very honest and he respected that and honored it and loved her, and what a wonderful symbol.

Smith: Did you have any contact with him afterwards?

Raiman: Yes, I saw him a couple of times, it was funny – well, certainly we had our White House reunions every year, so I’d see him periodically then and have a chance to talk. I saw him afterwards – there was some event like Tip O’Neill’s fiftieth anniversary, and Bob and I saw him there. My husband and I met working on his confirmation hearings for the vice presidency, so we really were brought together by Gerald Ford. And we teased him about it... At first he was like, “Oh…” And I said, “No, no, it’s a good thing.” We saw him periodically, had a chance to talk, when we’d be out at different places. We were in Hawaii once and he was out there playing golf and we were at the same resort. So we had a chance to chat.

And there was another situation where he was speaking somewhere in Virginia, and I heard about it and I thought – there was a woman who worked with me who just really loved Gerald Ford and had bought his book. So I called up, I think it was Pat Ford, who was the advance person, and said, “Hey, just wanted to let you know I’m planning on being there. If there is any opportunity where I could say hi, I have a book I’d like the President to sign for one of my friends. I’m not trying to horn in, but if there is any kind of opportunity.” So what happened – it was very funny – we were at the event and we were in the audience. I was told that it would be after the event, if there was an opportunity, when they would come and get me. So I was at the event with this woman in this big auditorium on a college campus, and I was sitting there and he was speaking, and he was going through the audience and he sees me, and he smiles and notes I’m there. It was really kind of cute and my friend says, “Well, he sees you, Gail.” And he kept looking at me and I’d smile at him. And so after it was over, we went in and had a chance to talk.
He was surprised to see me there and it was really wonderful.

Smith: Were you surprised, when he died, at the amount of public response that there was? He’d been out of the public eye for a while, and yet it seemed to build as the week went by. I think it was a time when the country really needed to feel good about itself, for one thing. And I think there was a whole generation that was being introduced to him.

Raiman: Yes.

Smith: And they were contrasting what they saw with the ugliness of contemporary politics.

Raiman: I think you are exactly right, but also, a couple of huge points were him receiving the Kennedy Prize. That was so huge and so important to me, and it was a real validation that the people who had been slamming him and being critical - it was recognition of, yes, you were right, we just didn’t get it at the time. And Bob Woodward, I was at an event which was very interesting at the National Press Club. Bob Woodward was talking about his conversations with President Ford, and what an incredible person he was, and how he had apologized to Ford by telling him he was entirely wrong in what he wrote and thought and said. Now, that wasn’t covered by the press in attendance, but I heard it and I wish I’d had my tape recorder. But, again, people who were really caught up in the moment, you couldn’t help but be in this country, and making judgments that weren’t necessarily thoughtful. I think over time, Richard, with more and more information coming out, and as you said, something other to posit against, it really had a very positive snowball effect. I thought it was wonderful. And so many people feel that way, and I think he’s gotten the recognition he’s due. I’d love to see him get even more, but I think now there is a real understanding and appreciation that he really saved the country.
Smith: Last question: how do you think he should be remembered?

Raiman: As an individual of the highest character, tremendous personal integrity, wonderful sense of humor, just really enjoyed people and lived his life to find the best way he could serve the country. He was a good friend and a stellar human being.

Smith: That’s perfect. Thank you.

Smith: Obviously, thank you for doing this.

Walters: Certainly.

Smith: Tell us a little bit about your life before you ever crossed paths with Gerald Ford.

Walters: Well, I was a person who grew up in the Washington area. My father knew Washington pretty well because he worked for the bus line in Washington. He was one of the original people who set up, was instrumental with, the tour industry in Washington by the buses because the people that owned the bus line got the idea that they could get children, school groups in. My father was one of the original bus drivers and had to learn about the history of Washington. And I had an uncle who actually sprayed the lawn for bugs back in the ‘50s. So the history of myself in the Washington area is, this is where I grew up. I had an intimate knowledge of some of the historical deals of Washington, because of my father’s involvement. But the only time I went to the White House was as a tourist, as most people do; never figuring that I’d be inside the gates in any form. After I graduated from college I was in the military, volunteered for the military, came out, became aware of the Secret Services expansion to take over the White House Police, and I applied.

Smith: When did that happen?

Walters: That was in 1970 – ’69, ’70.

Smith: Was it in anyway an outgrowth of the Kennedy assassination?

Walters: Actually, it was an outgrowth of some of the activities that were concerning the Secret Service and the Congress as it dealt with foreign missions. What they wanted to do, what the Congress did in fact, was pass a bill that put the Secret Service in charge of the foreign missions in Washington; also as an overseer of the uniform division, which was the old White House Police. And those two were being merged into a group called the Executive Protective Service. They were going from the old White House Police, which was probably not more than 150 men at that point, and they were going to have cars and be responsible for the foreign missions within Washington and just out in the suburbs where there were a few missions. So it was an outgrowth of the late ’69, early ‘70s.

Smith: Now, let me ask you, before that - the White House Police – were they limited to onsite?

Walters: Inside the gate.

Smith: They didn’t travel?

Walters: The original White House Police were responsible for the grounds and the facility that was the White House and the Executive Office Building.

Smith: Okay.

Walters: They literally were an organization created back in Lincoln’s administration. From the Metropolitan Police – a derivative of the Metropolitan Police - they became the White House Police Force. They had their own chief who was there and answered really to the chief of staff of the president as far as security for the building. And then they interacted with the Secret Service. In this 1969 law, it took that entity and made it the Executive Protective Service, which made it the uniform division of the Secret Service and combined it with the responsibility for protecting the foreign missions. Then, of course, since the bombing in Beirut and the Reagan administration that force around the White House was kind of expanded outside of the gate to include the sidewalks and the immediate vicinity of the White House. Some of the other responsibilities that are an integral part of the Secret Service – and most people think of the Secret Service with the agents walking around – but in the uniform division the people are at the gates and the uniforms are there and have been there, as I said, the original outgrowth of the White House Police. So I became a member of that force in August, 1970.
Smith: Now, that was an eventful time.

Walters: Tremendously eventful time.

Smith: With the Vietnam War protests that were taking place.

Walters: Yes.

Smith: And the general instability of the period.

Walters: Yes. A very difficult time for the White House Police because there were always people immediately in the vicinity of the fence, principally on Pennsylvania Avenue except where the press were. The press came and went through the northwest gate and that’s on Pennsylvania Avenue. So the protestors, a pretty savvy group, were there in Lafayette Park. Pennsylvania Avenue, of course, was open to the traffic at that time, so there was always concern among Police Park Service and the Secret Service about keeping Pennsylvania Avenue – that the protestors didn’t block the avenue.

Smith: I’d heard the Johnson girls – I guess it probably would be Lucy – from her bedroom she could hear the protestors shouting, “Hey, hey, LBJ, how many kids did you kill today?”

Walters: Oh, yeah. There were people at work right directly across the street from the White House who would beat a drum. That’s when that started in the Vietnam War era. And it continued on up to today from time to time, with people that are protesting against the war and the drum beat goes on – literally. And you can hear it, you definitely can hear it. I remember being told that President Nixon, at night, even though his bedroom was on the other side of the house, could hear it, because it was so clear.

So as I became a member of the White House, I actually ended up breaking my leg playing some football with Secret Service trainers, and couldn’t, when I graduated, go out and stand post on the North Portico of the White House on crutches in uniform. That wouldn’t work. So they put me inside in a place called the control center, which was a place that controlled all the cameras, the access requests – people wanting to come into the White House for appointments. All that was controlled, the alarms throughout the buildings, fire alarms and so forth.

Smith: You may or may not know, we’ve just about finished for the White House Historical Association a video-taped oral history with all the surviving social secretaries. Talked to a dozen and they all have wonderful stories to tell. There are some things, obviously, that are constant, but I’ll never forget, one of the second Mrs. Bush’s social secretaries talked about a day she was inside – this was post-9/11 – and a bus bringing a group of elderly women for a reception had somehow managed to dislodge the gate. So they were kind of going berserk about that.

Well, they went inside and I guess there was almost a fight going on in the ladies room over who was going to get their picture taken. She was trying to explain to them and no one was listening to her. And Mrs. Bush was coming down the stairs and her cell phone goes off, and it’s the gate. They had just arrested one of the elderly ladies from the bus who it turns out had two outstanding felonies on her record. That just struck me as surreal on so many levels. But I suspect maybe it’s all in a day’s work.

Walters: Well, I remember the incident, actually. Actually, what happened was the bus tried to get through the gate and it hit the gate cap post and turned it and broke a corner of it off. That had happened a couple of different times, a number of times with large trucks trying to make the turn to come in. One of the truck drivers at one point, got out and was very upset. The Secret Service was checking him out and they found a handgun that he carried because he was a long distance hauler. Of course, they arrested him because in the District of Columbia, you can’t have weapons. So those incidents occur. I’m very aware of them.

I got into this control center group because of the leg. As it turned out, I ended up being in there for five years. During the course of that five years I held different positions in that office, because as I said, we were responsible for all the people that entered the complex, no matter where they came in. We had to get the information on them, check them out, and say they were okay or not to come in. Alarms were throughout the buildings, fire alarms and everything.
So I became intimately involved in all those things that were that office’s responsibility. And in doing so, I became very familiar with the Usher’s office, with Rex Scouten, who was the chief usher, Nelson Pierce, who was his assistant at that time, and some of the other ushers that were in there. Well, as it turned out, two of the ushers, one of them passed away, another one, Stewart Stout, left, retired, and there was a position open in the Usher’s Office. Nelson Pierce called me on the telephone and said, “You know, we’ve gotten to know you; would you be interested in applying for this position?” Well, the opportunity to be involved with the family, as opposed to just the security aspect of the White House, was quite intriguing and obviously, I leapt at the opportunity. Luckily I had just finished college at night school with a business degree and Rex Scouten had just lost the accountant at the National Parks Service who was taking care of the accounts for the Executive Residence. The Executive Residence has its own budget – at least it did at the time. It wasn’t co-mingled with the rest of the Office of the President. And it was monitored by the National Park Service.

So I was in the right place, at the right time, applied for the position and Rex selected me for the position and I moved into the Usher’s Office on Leap Day, February 29, 1976. And that began my stay at the White House. Ten years later Rex retired and suggested me as his replacement to the President and Mrs. Reagan. So I was appointed the Chief Usher in ’86 and then retired in 2007.

Smith: Let me ask you, was there a sense during Watergate that you were under siege?

Walters: Oh, yes. Absolutely. Not only from the protestors, because at that time, having left the war, having kind of put that a little bit behind us because the President had the returning POWs – President Nixon had the returning POWs dinner out on the South Lawn and it just poured rain. Unbelievable. This wonderful, joyous occasion, it just absolutely poured rain. So that was kind of put on the backburner, still smoldering, obviously. There were still discussions going on in France with the size of the table probably still at that time. That was kind of put behind us, but then we got into this whole Watergate issue and I actually was tangentially involved a little bit in the presidential papers and documents because, well, I was still a police officer. I was one of six or seven police officers that were responsible for the keys to where the tapes were stored.

Smith: We’ve talked to a lot of folks and the name Fred Buzhardt keeps coming up.

Walters: Who is that?

Smith: Fred Buzhardt was the guy who listened to the tapes. He was originally, I think, from South Carolina; he had been Mel Laird’s counsel over at the Pentagon, and he was the guy on behalf of the President who listened to the tapes.

Walters: That may have been prior to my involvement, or concurrent. That name, for some reason, just doesn’t ring a bell. But when I was involved, the tapes, for all the craziness of the places that they could possibly be, were kept underneath the stairwell, across from the cafeteria in the Executive Office Building. There was a small closet there right underneath the stairs, and we had the keys. You had to go get the keys. What happened was, the courts and the legal teams that were involved would request to hear certain portions of certain tapes. And then we had to go in – we were given written instructions by the White House counsel as to which tapes - we would go in and get the particular number and dated tape; keep it in our possession, and take it up to where the Secret Service ________.

The technical security division had set up a tape player, and the counsels, both the White House counsel and the counsel for either the courts or the various plaintiffs, would sit and listen to the tapes that were placed in the tape play by the technician, who was the Secret Service officer. I would stand and watch this whole process and make sure that nothing went wrong, and at the conclusion of the playing of those tapes, the tape would be taken out of the player by the technician, handed to me, and I would take it back downstairs and put it in the appropriate place.

Smith: Do you remember the controversy, almost immediately following President Nixon’s departure? We talked to Benton Becker who was the guy that President Ford sent out to San Clemente to talk to President Nixon. And Becker has always been the one who claimed credit for preventing the shipment of tapes and papers. That they were, at one point, being loaded onto a truck, to leave the complex and his intervention at the highest levels supposedly prevented that. Does any of that ring a bell?

Walters: I know about some of that tangentially, but I wasn’t involved in it in any way. I know that also there was the one office which was called Presidential Papers, where everything went into a cage and we also had those six or seven officers. We had to once again receive the request from the courts and from White House counsel. And the lawyers could go into the cage, which we opened up, sit at a table, look at the documents, not make copies because they couldn’t take any copying machine or have the pieces copied initially, or they couldn’t make notes. All they could do was read them.

As the process went on later, it got to the point where they could go in and then we had to physically watch them – that they could take notes of what they read. Then later, we actually had a document reader – I shouldn’t say document reader – it was a Xerox machine, for want of a better name, that was brought into the room, and then we had certain pages that we could reproduce and give to them and let them take out. It was a very complicated process, as you well know, over a number of months that that went on. But, at that point, I became a sergeant in promotion process, went out of the direct connection with tapes and papers and everything and out of the control center into other duties for about five months before I shifted over to the Usher’s Office. So I kind of lost a little bit of contact with that. And, of course, that was during the time when President Ford took over.

Smith: What are your memories of August 8th and 9th of ’74?

Walters: Sadness, dread. Nobody knew exactly what was coming.

Smith: Can you describe the scene? There were people outside the gates…

Walters: At that point there were people outside the gates constantly. And I’m not talking about the normal. Twenty-four hours a day there are people outside the White House gates, walking around, taking pictures, there are flashes going off all the time and everything. But these were large, larger groups of people – anywhere from organized groups to people that would just spontaneously come at various times, depending on what the news cycle was at the time. But surrounding those particular days, I was still with the Secret Service, so there was a sense of dread. What’s happening next? Are people going to come to the gates? Are people going to try and climb over the fences? There was this whole sense of we don’t know what’s going to be occurring.

Smith: You’re clearly in uncharted waters, nothing like this has ever happened in American history.

Walters: Yes, and the word came down that the President was going to resign. He was in his Executive Office Building office, which he used as his working office as opposed to the Oval Office. The word came to us in the control center that the President didn’t want to see anybody. And we thought, okay. No, the President doesn’t want to see anybody. I thought that was quite bizarre, but it was coming from the West Wing; I’m not sure who the communication was put through by. But the police officer that was standing outside - there was a post whenever the President was in the Executive Office Building - who was standing outside on the porch which was down this long flight of steps from West Executive Avenue up to the steps - was told to stand like a squirrel on the opposite side of a tree as the President walked by, literally keep him on the opposite side, so that he didn’t see him when he went past. There was a little bit of a laugh there – that he didn’t, literally, want to be in the presence of people, because he didn’t want to cut through the West Wing.

He went up the steps across in front of the West Wing, and at that time the press weren’t allowed on the North grounds, so there wasn’t a press contingent there. In fact, we were told to seal the West Wing. When the word went out that that was supposed to occur, the police officer who was in that room went around and pulled the blinds shut and locked the door that the press had, normally where the old swimming pool was that went out onto the trades entrance there on the west side. Immediately, we got calls from the fire department because the press were calling and saying they were locked in a room that was unsafe for fire; the studio executives were calling and why is the press locked up? We just fended those off and the President eventually just walked across - it couldn’t have taken more than about fifteen minutes – and went over into the West Wing, bypassed the West Wing by walking down that trades entrance in front of the White House and went in through the ground floor by the doctor’s office and then his normal route upstairs by the elevator.

So there was this kind of bizarre goings on around the notification, and then of course, the President’s statement to the staff in the East Room. I remember that. My wife was actually in the room at that time. She used to work in the East Wing in the Visitor’s Office, that’s where we met. So she was in the room, and of course there was a great deal of sadness from the staff, and then the next day with the President’s departing via helicopter with his V sign.

Smith: One of the truly emotional recurring, almost set pieces, in White House history, is ordinarily on Inauguration Day when the departing family takes their private leave of the staff. I guess, for good reasons, there have never been cameras.

Walters: The White House photographer is there.

Smith: Okay. I’m told it can get pretty emotional.

Walters: It gets very emotional. It is the most emotional day in my life at the White House. I have obviously had the opportunity to do it a number of times with different presidents. For eight years you have lived with the family, growing up if there are children, like Chelsea, watched them grow. Had gotten to know other family members. That staff, the residence staff, is the only staff that’s behind the curtain that the Secret Service sets up around the presidency. They stand outside the doors, the residence staff is behind those doors in a personal, one on one relationship with the president and the first lady and their family and guests. So it is tremendously difficult.

Smith: Did the Nixons go through that on the morning of August 9th?
Walters: You’d have to ask Rex about that. I’m really not sure there was a formal gathering. I know that President Nixon and Mrs. Nixon talked to a lot of the staff members because they told me of their occurrences, but I don’t specifically remember a gathering the way we normally had on Inaugural morning. I had the opportunity, in fact, I don’t think anybody else did it, but I started it when I got there and as the chief usher, I took the flag that was flying over the White House on Inaugural morning, and I would take it down and save it for four or eight years. Then the flag, on the day the President was going to leave office - we made a case out of original, with some limited amount of timbers, the original White House wood in the carpenter’s shop. In fact, that’s some of the wood right there that my medallions are in of all the presidents I’ve served.

We took that wood and made a box, a case and presented the flag that flew over the White House on the day he took office and the flag that flew over the White House on the last morning that he was in office, and would present that to the president. And they didn’t expect it because very seldom that’s talked about, or if they knew about it, it’s forgotten. And it’s a very emotional time for them. It’s a beginning and an end. For the staff it’s a beginning and an end. But always for the staff, it’s this is the end, but it’s also the beginning within four hours, because a whole new staff is coming.

Smith: I’m taking it out of sequence, but I assume the first time you went through that ritual was with the Fords.

Smith: When the Fords left. What was that day like?

Walters: Rex Scouten was the chief usher, and he was very close to the Ford family. And I was one of the actors at that time, I was not a direct participant and I hadn’t been there as long, obviously, as the rest of the staff. I’d only been there a little over a year and a half. So I was kind of watching, and to be honest, I was probably more concerned about what was going to happen in the afternoon with the change of administration – seeing one family move out and another family moved in. So at that point, I was kind of monitoring what was going on as opposed as being directly involved. But President and Mrs. Ford were so wonderful. I mean, they were so down to earth and genuinely liked everybody that was around them. And of course, Susan, having been a young woman growing up there, matured there. It was parting with good friends - more than a formal exchange of pleasantries or something like that. And it was my first one so I was kind of standing in the back monitoring all this. And trying to get my hands around what was coming next.

Smith: Sure. Let’s go back. You, I guess, would have probably been still downstairs when the two assassination attempts took place. What do you remember of that?

Walters: Yes.

Smith: On the face of it, it’s the most unlikely – why would anyone take a shot at Jerry Ford?

Walters: And twice within a short period of time. It was unbelievable. First the association with Charley Manson, which just didn’t make any sense at all.

Smith: Nelson Rockefeller, who was probably never closer to becoming president than the day Squeaky Fromme…and the story is they were telling him what had happened, that she was a member of the Manson gang. And Rockefeller said, “What’s a Manson gang?” Tells you something about the isolating effects of wealth and power.

Walters: And then I really don’t think there was a whole lot with the Sarah Jane Moore – in this day and age, every hair on her head would have been examined. I don’t think it was at that time. It just happened, and to be honest with you, I don’t even remember her background as to what brought her to that point.

Smith: And both of them now released from jail.

Walters: Yeah. But from our standpoint back at the White House, because I was Secret Service with the uniform division, it was like, “Oh, my God!” What everybody had talked about was brought to the table, and luckily a misfire and a person who was standing next to the individual had an opportunity to deflect any motion, and the Secret Service took the appropriate actions. It was kind of a teaching point that was going on at that time, but there was also the pause that said, “Wow, that was close.”

Smith: Were there any changes instituted?

Walters: Absolutely. I was just going to get to that. That, to me, was a major change in the White House. Up to that point, when the President was fired on within a month or so, it was forty-five days, something like, the presidents would get up and start to do their daily thing in the morning. Late morning they would go to some local hotel and talk to a group and then motorcade back to the White House and that evening or that afternoon, they very likely would go out and do the same thing all over again. The Secret Service was questioning the exposure of the president out all the time, whether it be during the motorcade in transit with the fact that the approximate time of the president leaving the White House was known and the approximate time of getting to the venue would be known, as well as the return. So there was the exposure issue.

Very few of the hotels in Washington had underground facilities where they could get in, so the president was physically exposed as President Reagan was. So there was a great concern on behalf of the Secret Service. The White House staff, and this is speculation on my part, but I think it’s well-founded, was also concerned about the amount of time that this in transit took. So the combination of the two working together, there was a look at what could be done at the White House. How could the White House be changed into a venue where the president could go from his Oval Office to the White House, some hundred yards away, talk to a group that had been cleared, that was surely not going to expose the president to danger, speak to that group in a White House controlled environ, the amount of press that were there were controlled by the White House, not by another entity. The space was defined, so you could only have a certain number of people, and then the president could leave that room and go back and be in the office in what would have normally taken if he had gone out, an hour and a half or so, in twenty-five, thirty-five minutes. That freed up an awful lot of time that the staff could use for other things for the president to get involved in, so they were yeah, this looks good.
The Secret Service was happy about it because they controlled the environment. It also happened that coming into that next year – 1976, the Bicentennial, there were already a number of activities planned for the White House. So that was kind of a trial period. Could the White House handle both physically and according to the presidential desires for their guests, because now these people come to the White House, are guests of the president coming to their house, how would that be handled?

Smith: This is fascinating because this also obviously leads us into the whole Rose Garden strategy. I mean, whether intended or not, maybe one of the unintended consequences was that for political reasons, those around Ford thought he campaigned better from the Rose Garden than he did often out on the road.

Walters: Well, I think that was used as an excuse, certainly to keep the President there, as opposed to going on the road – the two assassination attempts. But from the Executive Residence point of view, it was really the moment at which, as far as I’m concerned, the moment at which I saw the White House go from strictly the president’s house, the home of the president, where social activities were held to a catering entity. The residence staff was called up then to become a catering – instead of the First Lady, as Mrs. Ford had, she’d invite the ladies groups in and they would have tea out on the South Grounds or in the East Gardens. The President would have small groups over. We’d have State Dinners, obviously. But there was an opportunity to have that social intimacy at the White House. And as far as I’m concerning, at that point that started to be lost.

Smith: That’s fascinating.

Walters: And then, of course, in the following administration, in the Carter administration, we had a huge expansion of that when President Carter was pushing the turnover of the Panama Canal. Community groups from around the country were brought in in small groups and there would be two or three states per visit and there would be briefings in the East Room, and we’d start early in the afternoon. Then there would be a sit down buffet dinner sometimes for the participants; question and answer with different defense department, commerce, all the different agencies. So that began a road of the White House transferring to, as well as the home of the president, became a catering operation, which expanded through the years.

Smith: And presumably the Reagan assassination attempt would have only accelerated that process.

Walters: Well, by that time it had gone to the point where it couldn’t go any larger. By that time we’d done tents in the South Grounds, and that had become kind of a regular fixture. We’d done 1976 with the heads of state coming from around the world. We put a tent over the Rose Garden and actually did, for the whole summer of ’76, three and sometimes four heads of state a month from May right straight through to September. And we had to put air conditioning in the tent. There’s a million stories about tents.

Smith: Let me come to that in a minute. Can we go back for a moment, because you mentioned about Mrs. Ford having friends in for tea. Clearly, to the extent that it is a family residence, presumably each family has rooms that they particular like. My sense is the Fords – and maybe everyone does sooner or later – but the Fords discovered the Solarium early on. Is there something about the Solarium that makes it special for all White House residents?

Walters: There are many things about the Solarium. The White House is a formal house. I mean, built that way and certainly for the first hundred years of the United States one of the largest houses, if not the largest house in the United States for the first hundred years of the country. The ceilings are high, the windows are large; therefore, huge draperies and massive furniture pieces and everything. The third floor, built in the Thirties - lower ceilings, more residential. President and Mrs. Ford had come from Alexandria, where they had a very nice home, but certainly in a more social context. They had friends over and everything. It’s hard to find that in the White House. To this day, it’s hard to find this in the White House.

Every family struggles. I’m sure Mrs. Obama is going through that right now.
Struggle as to how take those formal spaces and convert them into…every First Lady who has written a book talks about it – trying to make the White House a home. Well, the third floor is a series of smaller rooms, lower ceilings and at the apex of all that, up a ramp, is the Solarium – the Sun Room. Well, who isn’t drawn to a sun room? Glass on three sides, a relatively modest room in the White House, 22 feet by 18 feet, kind of an odd, octagon type shape; a door that went out on the promenade that’s around the third floor.

Smith: Ike used to grill steaks out there.

Walters: Absolutely. And President Reagan sat out there and recuperated. I had my greatest scare of my time in the Usher’s Office. We found out that right behind where President Reagan sat was a bee’s nest and we knew he was allergic to bees. But we didn’t know about it until after he’d already said. We had to hustle out there and take care of the bees quick. But the Solarium is a place that you can be drawn to easily. You can speak as we’re speaking here and be heard around the room. The families can gather people. The third floor usually is not a place where families have their children stay. They are usually down closer on the second floor. The third floor is, other than in the Carter administration – they had their two sons and their wives lived there, but whenever they have friends there that may exceed the capacity of the two guestrooms downstairs, the Lincoln and the Queen’s bedrooms, they are upstairs. Well, if they are going to gather with their guests, do they have the guests come down or do they go up to a place where they can be more comfortable. And the Solarium in all the years that I’ve had an opportunity to be there has had informal furniture in it as opposed to the antiques that are present on the second floor or the first floor, and to some case, the third floor. But it’s much more comfortable. It’s a place, the only place in the White House where I think you’d kick off your shoes and the ladies did frequently, and stick their feet up in the corners of the chair and sit on their legs.

Smith: It’s a real family room.

Walters: It is a family room and that’s why people are drawn to it. It’s got an incredible view looking south to the Washington Monument and the Jefferson Memorial and day or night, you see the planes coming in and out of the airport. All the presidents, I think, that have written about being at the White House talk about being able to watch the planes come in at National Airport, hearing the people down on the ellipse south of the White House playing softball and football. And saw that as a genuine connection to the American people, as opposed to the bubble they were in. And of course, that’s also true of the Truman Balcony, which President Truman was beaten up badly for putting in.
But all the families have enjoyed the Truman Balcony.

Smith: It’s funny because President Ford used to talk about being the lowliest member of the House Public Works Committee, and he was given a tour of the White House by Harry Truman. First president he ever met. Ford was always a fiscal conservative, but Truman persuaded him they needed the money, and of course, in later years, he was very glad that they put the balcony on the house. Because, I guess like every first family, they fell in love with it.

Walters: Well, President Ford was also involved in the restoration of the exterior of the White House before he moved in. Because, as vice president, he was in charge of – with the Senate committee – had responsibility for the stone that had been taken over the west front of the Capitol when the Capitol had been expanded. And that was the same stone that was quarried to build the White House. So when we made the initial request to start the stone restoration on the White House, we found out once we took the paint off that there were numerous stones that were damaged so badly they needed to be replaced. We got to the architect of the Capitol, and the committee that oversaw that included the vice president.

Obviously, I think before that, even when he was a representative, he had some involvement and they agreed to allow the White House to use that old stone which was kept at a National Park Service facility at Rock Creek Park.
And so we were able to go and use that old, originally quarried stone in the 1790s and brought it to the White House for the restoration of the White House. So President Ford was involved before he probably ever had any idea that he was going to be vice president or president.

Smith: What kind of interaction did you have or did you see that he had with the staff?
Walters: Very informal with the staff; wanted very quickly after he moved into the White House – he and Mrs. Ford both – to get the know the names of each and every butler, maid, the people that they came daily in contact with. And from time to time, obviously the maintenance people who they didn’t see every day, but occasionally. The President made it his personal responsibility to get their names and become familiar with what they did. He interacted with them the way you’d interact with anybody else coming to your house. If you needed a plumber, you got the plumber in and you’d talk with him – where are you from?

Smith: There is a story, and I’m sure there are variations on this, but it must have been one of the butlers who – I think it was a Saturday afternoon and the President was watching football, as was his want.

Walters: Probably Michigan State.

Smith: And he said, “Come on in and watch the game.” He [the butler] didn’t want to be ungracious, but he also had to be professional. But the President made it very clear that he wanted him to come in and watch the game.

Walters: That does not surprise me at all. He would enjoy involving people in conversation. I know the first time I was introduced directly to the President was by Rex Scouten after Rex had already offered me the job. It was the night of a State Dinner. In fact, it was a white tie dinner. I’d never had tails on before; this was my first occasion for that. Rex had me stand adjacent to the elevator to close at evening. Of course, Mrs. Ford being a previous dancer, had the evenings go a little longer than other First Ladies have, and danced.

Smith: That’s true?

Walters: Oh, very much so. We used to change the State Dining Room after the dinner. When the guests moved from the State Dining Room to the East Room, we would spend the next twenty-five, thirty minutes taking everything out of the State Dining Room. And I’m talking about everything, including the carpet, and put a small stage in and put a dance band in – in twenty-five minutes. And then, instead of dancing out in the foyer in a formal kind of context, people would literally come back in the Cabaret Room, which they had just eaten dinner in. A lot of people wanted to know – they didn’t realize that it had changed. They wanted to know, “How’d I get here?” because it was an entirely different room as far as they were concerned. But that would go late into the night and very early the next morning.

But I was standing adjacent to Rex Scouten, and I had been there since four o’clock the previous morning – and this was pushing two o’clock the next morning, and he introduced me to the President. The President came around the corner and he said, “Mr. President, I’d like to introduce you to the new usher, Gary Walters.” The President put his arm around me, said, “Well, welcome aboard. Where you from?” It was like he’d known me or wanted to get to know me immediately, and not just as somebody that he was going to come in contact with tangentially. And so we’re standing there having a conversation for about three or four minutes, and finally the President put his head around the corner and looked to see if Mrs. Ford was coming. As Mrs. Ford came around, he put his arm around her and said, “I want you to meet the new usher.” He introduced me to Mrs. Ford and she welcomed me and then they proceeded on the elevator and went upstairs.

Smith: Did they seem to be comfortable there? Because, obviously, they’d never expected to live there.

Walters: Yes. By this time and of course they’d been there a period when I came into the Usher’s Office. They’d been there for a while, so yes, they had become comfortable. I don’t know what it was like initially in the first days. I do know that he made the White House staff comfortable along with the police and everybody else that was involved. Because I think it was the week after he was in office, he threw a picnic on the South Grounds for all the Secret Service, for the White House staff who had stayed on transitioning from Nixon to Ford; for the Parks Service, for the groundskeepers, everybody. He came out and spoke to everybody and thanked everybody who was involved in the White House for the trying days that had come leading up to his becoming president, and for the week, or two weeks, or whatever it was, in the ensuing time. I mean he, at that point, made the staff comfortable. And as I said earlier, it is hard to find people that were any friendlier.
Smith: There are stories, of course, of them early on going over to talk to the telephone operators to thank them for what they did. There is a wonderful story – of course they lived in Alexandria for the first week.

Walters: Giving Mrs. Nixon time to get things cleared out.

Smith: Sure, exactly.

Walters: Rex is the one that knows all about that. I can tell you a great story about my first direct interaction with President Ford. When I went into the Usher’s Office there was usually a period of six weeks of orientation, learning what went on, how you interact with the different entities. Of course, I’d been there for a number of years so obviously I knew the Secret Service element, the security element – how to get people in and out and how to move people. But I had to learn the operation of the residence and how things go and how to protect the family’s privacy and who could come and who could go. So there’s a learning period.

Well, the Usher’s Office has the chief usher and three assistant ushers. Those three assistant ushers work on a rotating basis. One comes in early in the morning, is relieved at two o’clock in the afternoon and then stays there until after the family is finished with them for the night, and then a little longer just to close things out, in case there are any late messages or anything coming over. And then the third person has off.

I’d worked some of the rotating schedule, but we’re there. The President goes to Camp David, we’re still there sitting in the chair. So I went through the six week training period, and I was feeling pretty comfortable. So Rex, the chief usher at the time said, “Okay, this Sunday you will start on your own without having to be under a learning circumstance.” So I’m sitting there on a Sunday morning, the phone rang. I picked up the phone and answered, “Usher’s Office, Gary Walters, may I help you?” “Yeah, Gary, this is the President.” And he was reluctant to say the President. But he said, “This is the President.” I didn’t know whether to stand up or salute. I started to get up and my knees hit the desk, and I said, “Yes, sir, how can I help you?” And he said, “Well, I don’t have any hot water in my shower.”
Immediately things are flying through my mind – oh my God, the President of the United States has no hot water, and I’m thinking, is he going to get upset? I said, “Mr. President, although the plumbers aren’t here, our engineers are here twenty-four hours a day. I’ll be more than glad to come up at your convenience, if so, right now, and see if we can repair it and get the hot water.” “Nooooo, there’s no problem – I haven’t had any hot water for two weeks.” And I’m thinking to myself, “Oh my God, he hasn’t had any hot water for two weeks.” He said, “It hasn’t been a problem, I’ve just been going down the hall and using Mrs. Ford’s shower.” I said, “Well, Mr. President,” knowing what his schedule was, he was going out to church. I said, “Mr. President, if it’s alright with you, then when you go to church, I’ll have the fellows come up and see if we can fix it for you.” He said, “Don’t worry about it, it’s no big deal. If the plumbers are going to be back on tomorrow, just have them fix it.” I said, “Certainly, Mr. President, but I’ll see if we can’t get it fixed while you’re gone.” He said, “Fine, I’ll talk to you later, goodbye,” and he hung up the phone.

I think at that point perspiration was coming off my forehead and I call the engineers and say, “President has...” and the old sage down in the engineering shop, one of the fellows that was there, he said, “Don’t worry about it Mr. Walters. We can take care of it.” So the President and Mrs. Ford – I escorted them out and they got in the limousine and off they went to church. I knew they were going be gone probably fifty, fifty-five minutes. I went up with them immediately to the President’s shower. The old sage from the engineers office walks in and he reaches over and puts his hand next to the what they refer to as a mixing valve, where they twisted it from cold to hot. And he pounded on it with his fist. And he said, “That should fix it,” and sure enough, out comes the steaming hot water. I said, “Is this a trick that people are playing on me?” He said, “Well, from time to time with the hard water in Washington, there’s a spring in there and it builds up calcium and it won’t allow the valve to work all the way. So all you’ve got to do is loosen it up.” And I’m thinking, here the President has been for two weeks without hot water and all it took was a pounded fist on the valve mechanism and it straightened it out. But that was President Ford.
Smith: Can you imagine Lyndon Johnson waiting two weeks for his shower to be fixed?

Walters: No, oh jeez. Well, Rex Scouten tells a story about the water pressure wasn’t high enough. And there’s a wonderful story that the plumber and Rex tell about that. Rex wanted to check it out before the President had an opportunity to use it before he came back from Texas. He said he turned it on and it pinned him against the wall of the backside of the shower, it was so hard. He said, “I don’t know how anybody – you had to have leather skin to use the shower.” But President Johnson came back and evidently liked it. Thought it was the greatest thing because they put an extra water tank in and pressure hoses and all kinds of things.

Smith: In addition to the official training, I assume there’s a kind of unofficial, almost tutorial that takes place with regard to each family. These are things to keep an eye out for; these are their likes, dislikes. Is that so?

Walters: It was that training period that I was talking about. For the first couple of weeks I just was kind of the tail to Rex Scouten, the chief usher. I walked around and followed him and listened to everything. Went to all the meetings and just kind of took it all in. Then the next four weeks I’d sat with the duty usher, morning, evenings, weekends, and so it was an osmosis kind of procedure where you get involved. Then eventually I started answering the phone and they’d listen to the conversation and help me along. So the principle activity of the Usher’s Office is the first family. So that comes first; learning their likes, dislikes, wants, needs, anticipating those, if you can. Being there.

I made it my place, whenever the family was moving, any member of the family, and I knew they were going to be moving, I would be at the foot of the elevator when the elevator doors opened in case they wanted to express something to me. Most of the time just said, good morning, good afternoon, good evening and the conversation was at that point theirs to carry on, to stop, to continue on reading a book or whatever they were doing. So the most important responsibility of the Usher’s Office is the home of the president.
The catering operation, the food and beverage operation, the tours, the house open as a public museum, those are all secondary.

So learning the family’s activities and taking care of their needs so, hopefully, they don’t very often have to ask for things to be done. You can anticipate what needs to be done. In fact, after my story about the shower, I initiated a weekly thump on the mixing valves in all the showers in the residence as a maintenance activity. So trying to anticipate those activities, is first and foremost in the home of the president and his family and those personal guests as opposed to the official guests that come for activities. So that was not hard to learn, because it was the primary concern.

Smith: There’s a story, and of course you wouldn’t have been there at the time, but when they first moved in and I guess Mrs. Ford was walking through, the second floor hall, and ran into someone on the staff, custodial staff, I guess and said, “Good morning,” and there was no reply. And she went to Rex and said, “Do they not like us?” And he explained that it was just a different atmosphere under the Nixons. And I guess the word went out that this is a different tone.

Walters: At the start of a new administration, it’s tough on the staff. The staff is trying to provide for the family. They’re trying not to take the previous family’s wants and dislikes and transpose them on the new family that has just moved in or has been there for a short period of time. So they are reluctant to do anything that would give a discomfort. I mean, that staff – I talk about them as much as I can because they are spectacular people. And they are there as servants to the presidency and not the president. And they want there to be the least amount of disruption that they can cause to the family’s private life is where they want to be. President Nixon – the story that you told gives the impression that President Nixon didn’t want to interact with some of the staff.

Smith: No - and I’m glad to correct that.

Walters: And that’s not the case. He became intimately concerned about the families, the butlers, the staff and things. But the staff – it’s one of those “Don’t speak unless you’re spoken to,” and then you might want to be cautious about what.
And so I don’t know who that person would be, but it doesn’t surprise me that that would be the case. And it also doesn’t surprise me that Mrs. Ford would have that kind of reaction. That she would expect people to be as friendly as she was.

Smith: And I assume it’s also a different house when there are children around.

Walters: Always. Yeah. It brings a different dynamic to the house. Of course, it was hard to deal with Susan because she was not a young child. She was in high school when she came to the White House. The junior prom was held at the White House. And then the boys were in and out and they were obviously older than she and grown. So they weren’t really children from that aspect.

Smith: Steve tells a story about, obviously early on, when over dinner his folks asked, “What are you doing this evening,” and he said, “I just thought I’d turn in early.” Well, he didn’t exactly do that. He invited some friends over and they celebrated and the next morning, at breakfast or whatever, the discussion was, “Well, how was your evening?” And the President sort of pushed – I guess he’d already gotten the bill for Steve’s early evening. And with it the realization that first families pay for their own food.

Walters: First families pay for all of their food, dry cleaning, anything that’s personal, of their family and their personal guests. He wouldn’t have had the bill that quickly. What he would have had was an inventory of what would have been taken out of the storeroom, if there had been some beverage that may have been involved, and he probably asked the butlers in the morning. The President was known to get up and go out and want to do his own bagels in the morning. That was his thing. He was going to go out and put his toast or bagels on, and of course, the butlers - that was their job. So they were trying to get there before the President and trying to gauge when he might be coming in so that they could already have it ready for him and he didn’t have to worry about cutting the bagel and putting it in the toaster.

Smith: English muffins.

Walters: English muffins, that’s right. That’s what it was.
Smith: The English muffin story – the theory always was that he may very well have enjoyed getting up early and cooking his English muffins, but in any event, he was going to cook his English muffins because Mrs. Ford was not an early riser.

Walters: Well, it didn’t matter what time it was, that was his desire to go in the kitchen. And of course the butlers were of a want to have the President walk in the door and have the toaster pop the English muffins up and they’d pop them on the plate and give them to him, with his preferred coverage whether it be butter or apple butter, or whatever. And I think there has always been an interaction between the butlers and the first family. They are the crown jewel, if you will, of the residence staff because they interact so closely with the family.

Smith: Are most of them African-American?

Walters: Have been up until a few years ago when we had Alfredo Sands(?), who was from Spain originally, who came. And we’ve had a number of other butlers that have been from other parts of the world and have been American citizens, obviously. And it wasn’t until the George Herbert Walker Bush administration, that we integrated women as part-time butlers; not full-time butlers upstairs. That will happen at some point. And that was the tradition up until that point. A lot of the early ones, and you have to think about it – there were only six butlers at the White House that were full-time, and the maitre d.

A lot of them came into the White House when President Truman moved back into the White House in the ’48-’52 restoration. So in ’52 you brought these new people in that were relatively young, 52, 62, 72, 82, so that’s thirty years – that was a career. And most of the residence staff that comes stay there for less than a year or their whole career. And the majority stays for their whole career. So it was in that late ‘70s, early ‘80s that there was a changeover because the White House had been closed down for those years ’48 to ’52, so you count that out to ‘82, thirty years and some of the people who had been at the Blair House obviously had stayed on.
Smith: And presumably one of the qualities necessary to succeed in that job would be discretion.

Walters: Not one, the primary consideration is discretion. You have to pull the teeth of the butlers to get them to talk. Within the last six months, Gene Allen, one of the butlers who retired shortly after I became chief usher, because he’d finished his time, and just a wonderful man, they had a little story in the paper on him. And he won’t talk. He tells a few stories that are certainly not off color by any stretch of the imagination, are pretty straightforward about how the presidents would ask him about his family and everything. But there has, to my knowledge, and you could check this out, never been a tell-all story by any of the residence staff. And there are ninety-three people on the residence staff. And of that ninety-three, probably thirty-five had daily contact with the president, first lady, or their family.

Smith: Is that in part a reflection, not only on their professionalism, but of their pride?

Walters: Oh, absolutely. They carry the mantle of the presidency with them from the time they start working there until their death.

Smith: And it has nothing to do with politics?

Walters: Nope.

Smith: Totally non-partisan?

Walters: It is the pride in serving the presidency. Now a lot of those early butlers that were around the White House came from the Pullman group. When Pullman trains started to go away in the ‘30s and the ‘40s, some of them came to the White House. So they had service in their veins. And exhibited that through other people and taught other people what service was about. And that really stayed.

Smith: It’s fascinating to speculate on. I mean, during the period of the civil rights revolution. The kind of cross-currents that must have been going on in that house, and yet again, I’m not aware of anyone ever really describing it.
Walters: No. The residence staff is a family in and of itself. The people that work there, when they come to work each day, they don’t know how long they are going to be at work because the world situation, quite frequently, dictates. And there are a lot of long, extensive hours that that staff put in, in support of the president and the president’s activities. And they spend probably – not probably because I know they did, because I did – spent more time with that group of people than they did at home with their own families. And the camaraderie, it didn’t matter; old, young, black, white, Hispanic; it didn’t matter. There was a job to do in support of the president and the family and that just went forward and had to be done. And the pride was, yes, you are absolutely right. It was a very prideful thing that everybody carried with them.

Smith: Tell me about the Bicentennial, because that must have been an extraordinarily concentrated set of challenges and rewards.

Walters: Certainly, with all the heads of state coming. Of course, the Congress set up that the Capitol was going to be the shining light on the Bicentennial celebration. Well, that very quickly changed to the White House with the heads of state coming and the state dinners and the putting up of the tent to cover the Rose Garden. Extraordinary to have the Queen come.

Smith: Of course there are more stories about that dinner. The famous incident with the Marine band – and I was told after that, that the band never played without its musical agenda being carefully checked out.

Walters: You’ll have to talk to the social secretaries about that.

Smith: I think it’s safe to say, without spilling any beans, that that was one of the stories we heard.

Walters: Certainly that was just a ‘one of those things’ that seems so minor, and there are so many details that are being handled…

Smith: Did you know, when the band struck up…

Walters: Muskrat Love.

Smith: Muskrat Love and The Lady is a Tramp.
Walters: Yup. Captain and Tennille.

Smith: Remember what Maria Down said? Maria said that Susan picked the music.

Smith: Oh, I didn’t remember that.

Walters: Well, see, that was something obviously the social secretary did with the First Lady and other staff, whoever. But as soon as I heard it, I thought, “I know this is a hit song, but this just does not seem the right venue.” So there are incidents that occur like that, but there are so many details associated with that.

One of my most vivid memories of that period of time: Rex Scouten and Maria Downs, there was going to be this dinner and I don’t remember right now which head of state was coming. It was in the Rose Garden. And there was a tornado warning in Washington. Of course, we’re outside in a tent. A tornado. These things don’t appear to fit together very well.

So, I walked from the Usher’s Office, just inside the North Portico and I was going to the East Wing. I went down the steps, outside of the East Room, down the steps to the ground floor and went through the corridor because I was going to the East Wing. I had some activity that I was going to be dealing with in the East Wing, and it may have been with the social secretary’s office. And as I rounded the corner into what some people call the East Garden Room, which has a set of doors that open up into the East Garden Room, there was Rex Scouten, the chief usher, and Maria Downs, the social secretary, both with their backs to me having a very quiet conversation. And they had their hands up on the mullions of the window and they are just standing there silhouetted against the outside, and these unbelievable black clouds in the distance. And it was just one of those private moments of the chief usher and the social secretary commiserating about what should we say, not allow some of the people to attend a dinner and bring the dinner inside, which we weren’t prepared to do, or leave it go that this storm was going to pass by.

Of course it did, and we went ahead and had the dinner outside. But that’s one of those moments that have always stayed with me. It was a very poignant moment that encapsulated all the details, everything that these two people went through to make this one event proper for the United States, for the President, for the head of state that was coming to visit, and it was all going be possibly washed away by a simple storm.

Smith: There’s a story – Dick Cheney semi-confirmed it – but I don’t remember the original source. Of course, this was also at the peak of that pre-convention campaign. It has been said that it’s probably a good thing that Her Majesty didn’t see the guest list because a substantial portion of it were delegates and their spouses and their families. Let’s face it, one of the advantages of being an incumbent president is, you have some nice perks to offer to people. Was there a sense the campaign was interwoven with these events?

Walters: Luckily the chief usher and Usher’s Office doesn’t get involved in the guest list. It’s strictly the purview of the social secretary and her interaction with the staff. But it happens all the time, at least fifty percent of the guest list is people that have some kind of business involvement with the foreign country that’s being hosted, or some Congressional committee that’s involved. That’s part of what these events were for. Certainly they were a celebration of the United States and the visiting head of state from a certain country, but they are also business meetings. And they went a long way. Social affairs, yes; but also business affairs.

Smith: Had Emperor Hirohito’s visit taken place before you came on board?

Walters: I was there because that was a big luncheon in the East Room, where they did a big horseshoe table. I remember that very distinctly. I was there then. All the pomp and circumstance and all the gold that was used; we brought out gold from every place in the house to cover the table for that event. White table cloths.

Smith: The horseshoe – you associate the horseshoe with the Eisenhower era. Wasn’t it Mrs. Kennedy who broke it up into smaller tables?

Walters: Smaller tables – ten person tables, yeah.

Smith: Does the horseshoe come back from time to time?
Gary Walters   September 14, 2009

Walters: Yeah. Quite frequently. Because it lends itself – first of all, everybody is sitting at the same table. In the East Room it allowed us to get people on both sides of the table all the way around, and it gave a different formal atmosphere. It was a luncheon, not a dinner. So it gave a different atmosphere to that event. And being in the East Room, the largest room in the White House, it allowed us to get a lot more people at that table by putting it in that form.

Smith: Heads of state are almost swallowed up in the formality. There’s a human being inside this office who is trying to connect with other human beings I’m trying to get a sense of the humanizing events and personalities that are otherwise very stylized and in some ways remote.

Walters: Of course, the state dinner is the most formal event the United States has. The arrival ceremony is also the most formal military that the government has. So there’s a lot of effort that goes into those. I think from my seeing what each president and first lady do, it’s almost by rote. This is a formal event and you go from point A to point B and then you do this and then you go to point C. So the formality overtakes the formal and the social aspect of having this event; really overtakes the humanity that’s involved.

I think the one that probably did the best job of that that I saw initially was Mrs. Reagan. When she came into office, she wanted the state dinners to be an intimate affair, the lights were turned down lower, and she always invited personal friends. She changed that considerably. And of course the Fords were just absolutely inundated. They didn’t have a chance to – I mean, the Bicentennial year, like I said, we were doing three, four a month and sometimes multiple in a week of these formal events.

The President, of course, had had an opportunity earlier in the day to sit down one on one with the head of state, head of government, and have an informal or formal conversation and gotten to know them. But usually the First Lady hadn’t had that same opportunity. Sometimes they have a brief coffee, but there always were other people involved or something. The first few are tough, I think, on all the presidents and first ladies. But after that, then they have shown their form. And that’s where the social secretaries – I’m sure in your discussions with them – in trying to develop what that form is going to be.

Smith: Do you have in terms of your own experience any entertainers in that period that stand out in memory? We know, for example, that the Fords developed a very close friendship with Pearl Bailey, who became almost a member of the family.

Walters: I think that the notoriety and the availability of the kind of talent that the White House opens allows the families to make some acquaintances over and above what they may have had a opportunity before that - with President Ford, obviously having been in Congress and in the vice president for an opportunity. But the White House opens a little bit – the doors open a little wider and if they have an opportunity to sit down and directly interact with the entertainers, some of them can become quite close to them. And all of them try to pick entertainers that are of their style. I mean, if they like, or maybe if they don’t like, opera, you’re probably not going to see an opera star perform at the White House. So they are of that genre.

Smith: Did the Fords have distinct tastes that you can recall?

Walters: Not that I can recall, because, once again, at that point I wasn’t the chief usher, and I was still in my learning process. I know that Maria Downs was very close to Mrs. Ford and they were very close in choosing a lot of those. Maria has stayed a close friend through these years. I think she really captured Mrs. Ford’s desires and wants and dislikes.

Smith: Let me ask you something, it may be sensitive. Were you aware of her - however one describes it - difficulties, problems?

Walters: You mean with the alcohol and the pills?

Smith: Yeah, more I guess the pills.

Walters: Actually, this fits right in with the butlers. Obviously the butlers knew about it, because they were the ones providing the drinks, and whether they knew about – well, I think everybody pretty well knew about the difficulty she had with her back and the pain pills and everything; the combination of the two.
You never heard anything from any of those people. It was Mrs. Ford, after the family intervention, coming forward that everything broke on the scene. And you still didn’t hear any conversation from the residence staff – those people that knew the difficulties, because it’s so personal. And was I aware of it? Yes. Was I aware of the extent of it? No. But the butlers had to be and they didn’t tell me. I don’t think they told Rex Scouten, who was the chief usher at the time. That was what family did.

Smith: It also must be awkward - you get into a campaign, the result of which determines whether they will continue to inhabit the house. Partisanship aside, it must be at least something of an emotional rollercoaster. Rex told us a wonderful story about election night in ’76, where he was upstairs and it was two o’clock and it wasn’t over, but it wasn’t looking good. And the President decided, look, we’re not going to know for sure, I’m going to turn in. And he goes across the hall and Rex followed him and wanted to say something consoling without conceding. Anyway, to make a long story short, he says, “You know, Mr. President, you’ve spent your life in service to this country, in uniform in the war and all those years on Capitol Hill and during this incredibly difficult period these last couple of years. No one deserves to win more than you do. But you know, Mr. President, maybe it’s just time for you to take a well-earned vacation.” And Ford looked at him and said, “I don’t think so.”

Walters: I was working that night, and Rex came downstairs after that and he said, “It looks like it’s lost.” And of course, that was the first time that I had been there and I had this wave of emotion wash over me. The first president that I’d served was not going to be there much longer. And my first feeling, and I think it was universal for the staff, was, this good man should have had a term of his own, an elected term of his own. Because we all, universally, just liked the President and the First Lady and it would have been fitting for him to have an elected term and not an appointed term.

Smith: There have been a number of people who’ve suggested that it took him a little while to bounce back. That he wasn’t quite his normal self. Did you sense that in the immediate aftermath of the election?
Walters: It was a shock. He expected to win. I think the First Lady did, too. And there was a ‘is this real?’ kind of feeling that kind of permeated the two of them. I had an opportunity, obviously, to be with them one on one on different…but I never spoke about the political things because I hadn’t been there long enough to voice any kind of opinion or any comments at that point. But you could sense that. There was a sense of disappointment, and I could be wrong, but I think Mrs. Ford recovered quicker than the President did. She was ready to move on to the next phase of her life. Was Colorado where they were going? Was California where they were going? That came back very quickly with her. It took him a little longer. And the staff was also just very down. I think in the years that I was there, that was probably the time that I saw hurt in the eyes of the staff that the Fords weren’t going to be there. Certainly some of the other presidents that I served eight years, so we knew after the second election they were going to be leaving on a particular day. But there was real hurt that he didn’t have an opportunity to get elected.

Smith: Which testifies to the affection in which they were held.

Walters: Oh, absolutely. I think so, yeah. But that relationship is a very close one and some of the staff takes it more to heart than others. Once again, being the new guy on the block, my immediate thought was, “Oh my God, there’s going to be a new president in two and a half months and am I going to have a job? What is a transition all about?” We had, obviously with Rex’s guidance, started following those snippets that we could to get an idea of what the Carters were like from the summer when he was nominated, so that you have something in the back of your mind about the family members. We’d clip out articles from newspapers and magazines that said, “This is Jean Stapleton, the President’s sister, and this is Billy Carter and he lives here.” Those kinds of things we’d start collecting, just in case that person was going to be elected president. And that of course, stepped up once the election was over, in trying to collect information and you start making those transitions. It’s not an easy time – transition.

Smith: There’s a story in one of the memoirs, I guess, where I think he [President Ford] was actually a little worried about her. That he had made arrangements, I think Bob Hope was involved and other folks. Anyway they had gone out to dinner or some event, and came back into the residence and, unknown to her, he had brought a number of their friends together and it turned into a celebration.

Walters: I just don’t have any recollection of that. But it would make sense that he would do that because usually a lot of people forget about – an election happens in early November, and December is the busiest month at the White House because it’s the holiday season. And it starts immediately after Thanksgiving.

Smith: And she loved Christmas.

Walters: They had all the people in and then all the activity that was associated with it and the opportunity to share. Decorations – how the house was going to be decorated for Christmas. I think she would have liked to have had the opportunity to have another couple Christmases because the first year was kind of thrown on her. The second year there was some thought they would get into it, but then they weren’t there for the continuation of that. So the month of December is taken up - actually from Thanksgiving right to New Year’s Eve - is taken up with the holiday affairs. And then the family usually goes away between Christmas and New Year’s and then you come back and it’s January the third; and you’ve got seventeen days. So normally in that period the families usually have those major supporters, their friends, and they have them in for a kind of last activity at the White House. And President Ford had a number of those, as did Mrs. Ford with friends and family and supporters through the years. So I don’t have a specific recollection, but that doesn’t surprise me.

Smith: I assume like all families – well not all, some more than others, I guess – that they enjoyed Camp David.

Walters: Oh, I think everybody enjoyed Camp David.

Smith: Is it just because it’s a chance to get out of the bubble?
Walters: First and foremost, it’s not formal. Camp David can never be associated with formal. There are individual little cabins, they are rustic, back from the ‘30s and the work projects administration, when it was literally a work camp. And of course they’ve been updated through the years and everything. They are very nice, but the rooms are relatively small.

Smith: Homey.

Walters: Oh, absolutely. And they can get out and the people - they interact. The military are different than the White House staff, the residence staff are the little more formal. They are military who can become more comfortable more quickly in a less formal atmosphere. And the opportunity to be out and not have the Secret Service closed in around you and the facilities that are there. They have everything they could possibly want, and if it’s not there, they can have it brought in because it’s a big enough compound that they don’t have to worry about that. I know at the start of the Carter administration, there was some thought to give up Camp David as they did with the ship and various things.

Smith: Ironic in light of such later events.

Walters: And that is exactly where I was going. Rex Scouten, I know I did, I’m sure the other ushers did who interacted, said, “Mr. President, before you make that decision, go there. Experience it first.” And, of course, that’s his claim to glory. If there’s anything that’s outstanding it’s the Camp David Accords. And everything that went on. And to think back now, that they came within a very short period of time of closing Camp David as a presidential retreat and turning it back over as a military post. And eventually it obviously would have been abandoned, probably turned over to the Park Service as a Park Facility, maybe a historic site. But the fact is, that it is a glorious setting, and every president since President Carter certainly has used Camp David to some great advantage. But the Fords, I know, enjoyed it immensely. They were used to being outside.

Smith: Do you think he got a bum rap about being clumsy?
Walters: Oh! Goodness gracious! I’ve told everybody that I’ve ever had an opportunity to answer that question. He is probably the most athletic president that’s ever been at the White House. And the fact that he bumped his head or slipped and fell down the steps, I mean, who hasn’t done that? In fact, the problem was that he did it in front of the press. And the fact that he went out and swam, the swimming pool put in by the swimming pool institute and a bunch of friends that got together and put the outdoor swimming pool in and the fact that he went there daily and swam. And every president since then has enjoyed that pool immensely.

Smith: I was going to ask you.

Walters: Immensely.

Smith: It gets lots of use?

Walters: Absolutely. And I just always laugh when people say that. President Ford was always bumbling and stumbling – you’ve got to be kidding me.

Smith: There is a story which is so telling. In Vienna, first of all, it was raining and he had an umbrella and he had Mrs. Ford’s arm. And he slipped and fell and they got the picture. Of course, all the people around him were railing against the photographers. Ford says, “Well, of course they took the picture. If they hadn’t they would have lost their jobs.”

Walters: But the fact that he was getting out of the helicopter and bumped his head. He was a tall man. He forgot to duck, give him a break.

Smith: A couple of things and we’ll let you go. Obviously you saw him on a number of occasions, but I’m thinking of two in particular. One of which was the 200th Anniversary of the first occupant of the White House, you had all the former presidents and first ladies there that night and I had the privilege of writing his remarks for that event. What do you remember about that?

Walters: You’re talking about the dinner?

Smith: Yeah, the dinner for the 200th Anniversary.
Walters: Well, the first thing I think about – and this is really off the subject – but that was the first night we were going to have the Clinton china. Mrs. Clinton, late in the administration had decided to get a full set of china. And that night she was hoping – and that was in December, December 3rd or something, sometime early in December –

Smith: And right at the peak of the whole dispute over the 2000 election…

Walters: And they hadn’t decided yet who the new president was going to be. And so all we got was enough base plates and service plates for the head table where the presidents and the first ladies were seated. I was invited to that dinner as a guest. First time I’d ever been invited as a guest because I was always working. Of course my mind was going, “What’s going on, how is this going?” because I wasn’t in charge. I wasn’t used to not being in charge at these major dinners. It was going fine and President Ford got up with those wonderful remarks and talked about the staff and the relationship and tears came to my eyes.

I was sitting next to Hugh Sidey’s wife, and she looked at me and she said, “That hit home.” I said, “It did.” It really did because it spoke to the relationship that over a period of time, a relatively short period of time, that President Ford and Mrs. Ford developed with the staff. And so that’s my memories of that occasion.

Smith: And then I assume you are probably working when the Bushes very generously – had his 90th birthday party at the White House. In 2006 they had a birthday party for him.

Walters: Yes, absolutely. In fact, I have the photograph in the other room of all of them there assembled. In fact, can I take a second? [leaves to retrieve photo]

Smith: Now, what event was this?

Walters: This was his birthday party – I’m pretty sure it was. No, that wasn’t, I take that back. That’s not the one. Wasn’t that the opening of the Library? That’s what that was. The Nixon Library, I take that back. And they all gathered in front of the Oval Office desk and the picture taking, when I became aware of it, I contacted each one of the first ladies and said, “There are a number of people who served all these presidents. Would you consider if I got the names of those individuals, and said there would be a limited number, having yourself and the president sign these and return them to the staff?” And they did and there are only twenty-two of those in existence. I was thinking about the other day – this was in the State Dining Room, when they were gathered for his birthday. They gathered in the State Dining Room and I have that photograph. Those gatherings mean so much to those of us that had an opportunity to span the different administrations.

Smith: There obviously were still people on the staff from the Ford years.

Walters: Yes, there were.

Smith: Did they have an opportunity to interact?

Walters: Interact with them? In fact, I gathered those people together. Whenever we had – while I was the chief usher – whenever we had a former president come back, I had those staff members who served that president come and stand in the hallway outside of the diplomatic reception room, so that when they arrived, they’d walk down the hallway and see these faces that they were familiar with. They appreciated it. I had a lot of them respond immediately and later in calls or letters to indicate how much that meant to them – to have those kinds of remembrances that went through. And it was a dwindling number through the years, obviously. But to have the opportunity because there is that special relationship between the residence staff and the families, to have them see people who they were familiar with and possibly, if they were going to go upstairs and have a drink with the president or beverage, to have their favorite drink without them asking for it. Little things like that made the years at the White House come back to mind.

Smith: And then the most poignant gathering of all – again, I don’t know whether it had been done before for other presidents – but on the morning of the Washington funeral. The President had decreed he didn’t want a caisson through the streets of Washington, and so when they went from the Capitol up to the cathedral, they made a point of going by the White House. And the staff was gathered outside, which was very poignant.

Walters: Yeah, at that point I was up at the cathedral, standing in line to get in with everybody else. Julie Nixon Eisenhower was in line behind me, about thirty or forty people, and I turned around and saw her and she saw me, so we went and said hello. I left my wife standing there and I went to the front of the line and I grabbed one of the people by the cuff of the neck and I said, “Julie Nixon Eisenhower is standing back here in this line. Somebody come get her.” So they went by and got her and took her. But there was Julie, standing in line with everybody else. And that’s the kind of relationship that I think a lot of the families, and a lot of American people, don’t see. They see this imperial presidency and these families that are kind of put up on a pedestal, but they don’t see themselves that way. I didn’t work for any president that saw them or their families that saw themselves that way. They were put in a position for a period of time, and after that they were Americans.

Smith: A lot of people don’t realize about the ongoing relationships that exist between the families. I remember when the President had that minor stroke in Philadelphia. Within twenty minutes I got two calls, one was from Julie and one was from Tricia. And Mrs. Johnson remained very close to the Fords for as long as they were around.

Walters: In the years that I was at the White House and the families I had an opportunity to serve, Mrs. Johnson was held in such reverence by the other first ladies. It was truly amazing the way they talked about Mrs. Johnson. And when she was invited, which each one of the first ladies did, to come to the White House, everything needed to be perfect when Mrs. Johnson came. It was really wonderful to see.

Smith: And that extraordinary scene, the day Mrs. Ford went to the hospital. The day before they entertained the Johnsons at the groundbreaking for the LBJ Grove. And they had the Johnsons to tea and showed them around the family quarters. There were photos and you could see Mrs. Ford’s bag is packed, sitting at the bottom of the bed, all ready to go to the hospital. And nothing was ever said.
Walters: But that goes to show that the White House is the home, as opposed to the official entity that most people – most people say, “Today the White House said…” And I tell people, the White House doesn’t have a mouth, first of all, and usually what they are talking about, they are not talking about the residence, they are talking about the West Wing, the political aspect of the White House. I said, “You have to remember that the West Wing is still an appendage to the original building.”

Smith: How do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered? I guess I should say, how will you remember him and how do you think he should be remembered?

Walters: Well, I remember him, as I said earlier, just as a wonderful person to be around in any circumstance. Just a wonderful, warm individual. I think history placed him in a position that he excelled. He was thrown into a circumstance that no other president had ever been thrown into. And certainly also the vice presidency under the circumstances he became vice president. From a congressman to a vice president and then the presidency, through all those iterations he kept himself whole. He kept his family whole. And he never lost his dignity. It’s the one thing that President Ford means to me, he always held his head up, and he had right to, because of the way he acted when thrown into that historical perspective. And the way he was – I hate to use the word treated – but I can’t think of another one right now that’s proper. He is certainly seen as a transition figure of exceptional ability by historians, but at the time he wasn’t. He was ridiculed by some and as you said, some of the things that were in the bumbling and stumbling – you just couldn’t have been further from the truth. I was glad to see him get the tribute and the heartfelt depth of the tribute that he got when he passed away.

Smith: I was wearing two hats that week. I was with ABC the first half of the week and then with the family the second half and I can tell you, media people were astonished at the extent of the response and it seemed to build as the week went on. And the number of young people in the lines and people who weren’t alive during the Ford presidency. And I think part of it was they were being introduced to him for the first time. A lot of young people were seeing these clips and contrasting it with the kind of ugliness of our politics today, and it looked pretty good. The fact that poor LBJ who died the day before the Vietnam peace agreement was announced, Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his thinking on the pardon.

Walters: I think you’re right, yes. He never lost that fantastic smile. He always had that wonderful smile that he carried with him regardless of the circumstances. It’s funny, when he was coming out of the theater when he was shot at and the Secret Service were pushing him into car, the shot from across the street, it’s like he’s got this look on his face, What is going on? The concept hadn’t reached there that all this activity was because of him.

Smith: You could debate whether he was naïve or just kind of the Eagle Scout, but he literally went to his grave thinking he didn’t have enemies.

Walters: I don’t doubt that in the least.

Smith: Time was good to Gerald Ford.

Walters: It was. And what I liked about it, as you said, that it occurred during his lifespan. It didn’t wait until he was passed on.

Smith: The Profiles in Courage Award – he said afterwards, “For twenty years, everywhere I go people ask the same question. They don’t ask anymore.” It was if the imprimatur of the Kennedys dissolved this. And again, people never saw it, but there was that relationship between the Kennedys and Ford, of course, because they’d been in Congress together. And then he was on the Warren Commission. There was a relationship that people didn’t know about. And in the later years it was very touching.

Walters: That’s a small fraternity. There is none smaller. And the weight – I don’t think people really are cognizant of the weight of the world that is placed on our president’s heads since the Second World War. I mean, we’re the preeminent country in the world and they carry that on their shoulders all the time. I think earlier you were talking about George Bush and the fact that he was kind of somewhat relieved – I think the weight – and I saw him change – the weight of having the safety of the American people on his shoulders was so great that it blocked out all else.
Smith: Interesting.

Walters: And I watched him change pre and post 9/11. I had opportunities to talk with he and his father, certainly a wartime president also, and the weight of our American troops on their shoulders was just incomprehensible. I saw it, talked to them about it.

Smith: I had an extraordinary experience – it was Charlie Gibson’s idea – but the President picked up on it. On January 19th, the last event on his schedule. It was never released to the media, it was for the oral histories of both libraries. I spent ninety minutes in the White House foyer interviewing the two Presidents Bush; off the record and therefore a little more candid than it might have been otherwise. It was fascinating. But I know exactly what you are saying.

Walters: It’s interesting that you talk about that in the Grand Foyer. On Inaugural Day, for 43, I was standing in the Grand Foyer, the family had come in after the parade and had gone into the State Dining Room and the President was standing pretty much by himself in the foyer. I walked out to him and I said, “Sir, is there something I can help you with?” And he said, “I’m waiting for the President.” And I looked at him and I said, “Sir, you are the President.” And he said, “No, I mean 41.” Now, up to that point I hadn’t heard that, and I don’t know whether that’s the derivation, or whether it started with the family earlier than that or not. But that’s when, obviously after that, I heard 41 or 43 all the time to distinguish between the two men.

Smith: A perfect note on which to end.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. Before you were president, there was a long-running relationship here. I heard President Ford talk with real admiration about your grandfather. And then, of course, when your dad went into Congress in ’66 – which, by the way, was a brilliant campaign. The best political slogan I’ve ever heard was ‘Labels are for cans’. A lot of people might dust that off today. Anyway, clearly Ford saw him as a comer. Your folks were in China and your dad was brought back to the CIA. And there was a perception - not that the president was responsible - but because of the political climate at the time, that he was being deep-sixed in terms of his own political future.

The reason I ask is because Nelson Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that all that was Don Rumsfeld’s doing. Did it make it awkward when you decided to bring Rumsfeld into the cabinet?

Bush: Very interesting question. It made it awkward for some of the people who liked to gossip about that. Actually, it didn’t make it awkward for them; it gave them gist for the gossip. But, no, I made my decision on what I thought was best for my administration, not based upon some kind of history between Dad and Rumsfeld. I’ve never really known whether that was true - that being that Don Rumsfeld engineered the situation where George Bush, in order to get confirmed as the CIA, had to renounce his basic right as a citizen, which is that he would not seek the vice presidency. I don’t know if that’s true or not. It didn’t really enter into my mind.

I ended up with relationships with people that had poor relationships with my dad, like [John] Connally, for example. I got to know Connally in a different light. They may have bent over backwards to be nice to the son after having had animosity with the father. I don’t know. But I picked Don Rumsfeld because I thought he’d help transform the military. That was the primary focus of what I wanted my defense secretary to do. I thought we needed a military that was different from the Cold War structure and Rumsfeld had written about that and would be good at it. But, no, it didn’t prove awkward. It may have for Dad, but he wouldn’t have told me and he never reflected any awkwardness. And, generally, my mother can’t contain herself and would’ve expressed herself openly had there been a problem.

Smith: Let me go back. You, of course, ran for Congress in ’78.

Bush: I did.

Smith: But before that, didn’t you work in the Ford campaign in ’76?

Bush: I did. What had happened was I had gotten out of Harvard Business School in ’75 and went to Midland, Texas, where I was raised, to stake my claim. You know, all business was revved up after the oil embargo and I scratched an entrepreneurial itch. I got out there and Jimmy Allison, who is the publisher of the Midland Reporter Telegram and the campaign manager of my dad’s ’66 campaign, the campaign manager of Ed Gurney’s ’68 campaign and the campaign manager of Winton Blunt’s ’72 campaign for Senator of Alabama, had taken over the newspaper from his dad. I think it was John Tower who asked him to help him in this state, so he asked, “Would you mind running West Texas for us?”

Smith: Now, was this the fall campaign or the primary?

Bush: No, it was the primary.

Smith: Oh, that was tough.

Bush: Yeah. See, I was a volunteer. I was in the oil business. And it was clear to them from the beginning that Ford had no chance in West Texas. I mean, Ronald Reagan was, you know, riding a wave out there. I can remember helping set up an event in Lubbock, Texas for Gerald Ford and he came out there and there were a handful of people that came to see him. We got zero delegates. As a matter of fact, Gerald Ford got zero delegates statewide in the state of Texas.

Smith: Right. And there’s the famous incident where, was it the tamale…?
Bush: He ate the husk on the tamale down there in San Antonio. That didn’t help either but - tamale or no tamale - Ronald Reagan had created a political tsunami and just crushed President Ford in Texas.

Smith: Was that part of a Republican Party that, even then, was in the throes of change?

Bush: Yeah, absolutely. So, I had run for Congress in ’78 and I got beat by Ken Hance, who’s a conservative Democrat. All those conservative Democrats who had forever voted for the Democratic Party switched to Reagan in ’80 and forever since, that district has been solid Republican. So, basically, what Ronald Reagan did was that he had the charisma and the ability to take people that were inclined to be Republicans and convert them to the Republican Party.

Smith: He infamously staged a comeback in the primaries in North Carolina with the issue of the Panama Canal treaties. Was that something that really resonated down here?

Bush: Absolutely. President Ford made a tough decision and it irritated a lot of people. Occasionally a hot button issue will arise that triggers a protectionist or nativist impulse and this was clearly one. We’re witnessing the same thing now with the immigration debate and it was first manifested during my presidency on Dubai ports, which was a case of Port Management Company from a foreign country that was good at what they did, and yet the renewal of a contract triggered this populist uprising and it became a sovereignty issue.

Smith: I assume in today’s media climate, it’s a lot easier to push that hot button and get it out there than it was back then.

Bush: It is much easier because of the blogs and the 24-hour news cycles. On the other hand, the Panama Canal Treaty was really hot and I remember John Tower supported President Ford on the vote and was vilified. Plus, his support of Gerald Ford over Ronald Reagan really made it difficult for him.

Smith: I’ll tell you a Connally story from that year. At the time of Connally’s indictment, the milk fund or whatever that he was indicted for, he went up to the White House to see the President about something. And aides told Ford, “You can’t do this. You can’t talk to him because he’s being indicted.” And Ford, being Ford said, “Look, in our country, you’re innocent until proven guilty. Of course I’ll see him.” So, he saw him. Fine.

So, later on, in the Texas primary, the Ford people approach Connally who was staying neutral. Later still, he sees himself as a running mate for Ford and comes to the White House. Dave Kennerly tells this story. Kennerly said to him, “God, if I was President to the United States, I wouldn’t see that bastard after what he did.” And Ford said, “Well, it’s a good thing you’re not president.” So, it all leads to Kansas City and the vice presidency is up in the air. Connally wants to come to see the President for another visit and Ford agrees to see him. Kennerly says, “God, I hope you’re not considering that s-o-b” and Ford looks at him and says, “Do you think I’ve forgotten what he didn’t do in Texas?” Behind the genial exterior was a tough guy.

Bush: Absolutely. Look, I didn’t know President Ford very well. I was of a different generation, but when I was with him, one, I was impressed by his stature. The big guy. Secondly, I was impressed by his gentle nature. There was no kind of bully to Gerald Ford, but you could tell beneath the veneer of kind of a friendly fellow that there was an inner strength and that impressed me.

Smith: Did he campaign for you in ’78?

Bush: Nobody did in ’78. It’s interesting. The ’78 primary was a pretty tough primary, because I was accused of being shipped by the Rockefellers to buy up all the farmland. This was during the American Agricultural Movement. There was big time unrest in the agricultural sector and a lot of the district is farming. Ronald Reagan actually endorsed my opponent in the ’78 primary and a lot of people speculated it might’ve been that some of his political advisors were saying that this is a chance to wound Bush, Sr. At any rate, Reagan called me the day after the primary and congratulated me and asked if I wanted his help. I had made the determination that I was going to seek nobody’s outside help, my dad’s, Reagan’s, or Ford’s because I wanted to show people I could stand on my own two feet. So, no, he never campaigned because he wasn’t asked.

Smith: Was that campaign a valuable experience?

Bush: Oh, it was great. Really good for a lot of reasons. One, it taught me that you can run and lose and life goes on. Secondly, it enabled me to understand what it means to get defined, how you have to define yourself as opposed to get defined by an opponent. I got “out-country'd” in a country district and I vowed that that would never happen again. And, thirdly, it really helped cement my marriage, because Laura and I had just gotten married. We got married in November of ’77, so we spent our real first year of marriage in politics and it gave her a glimpse of politics and it gave me a glimpse of a fabulous woman on the campaign trail.

Smith: She took to it naturally?

Bush: Yes, she’s good. One reason why is she has zero political ambitions for me or herself, for that matter, so she was a very natural campaigner. People took to her more quickly than they took to me out in West Texas. I still had a little Ivy League veneer on. She was born and raised in Midland and the fact that she was reluctant to be on the campaign trail appealed to a lot of people, particularly women who could relate.

Smith: Sure. In ’80, you go to Detroit.

Bush: Yeah.

Smith: And there’s this crazy, still murky, never fully explained effort that some people literally think to this day was kind of a feint, almost a head trip by the Reagan people to send out the message that, “We’re moderate. We’re willing to reach out to the moderates.” A number of people have told us it was really a Kissinger and Greenspan effort to get back in the game, that they were using Ford. It never would’ve happened, partly because Mrs. Ford, I don’t think, ever would’ve gone along with it. But stories have been written that suggest your dad was basically on the verge of leaving town, that he thought that this was a done deal.
Bush: Well, I wasn’t there. Interestingly enough, I got notified about President Reagan’s selection of my dad in a restaurant in New York. So, we hustled over the next morning to Detroit from New York. So, I wasn’t there. I think the report that he pretty well considered himself out of the mix was true. You know, I can’t imagine a worse set up than a co-presidency. And there is no doubt in my mind that, when it all came down to it, that President Reagan would not have allowed that to happen. It was a figment of somebody’s bad imagination.

Smith: The phrase was Walter Cronkite’s.

Bush: Really?

Smith: Yeah.

Bush: But, splitting duties… I mean, the president assigns duties. The president doesn’t split duties. You can imagine a White House in which there had been a predetermined assignation of duties. Then, immediately, you’d have two camps in the White House. There needs to be one camp and that’s a camp that is loyal to the country and willing to work for a president, including a vice presidential staff that is obviously loyal to the vice president, but that also understands who makes the decisions and that’s the president. Period.

Smith: In 2000, the day of your acceptance speech, there were people who were in that room who have marveled: here you are, a few hours away from the biggest speech of your life and, first of all, that you’re thoughtful enough to go over to the hospital to see Ford. They’ve talked about how you went in there very relaxed, very jovial, with no sign of pressure in terms of what was going on. What do you remember of that visit? How did you learn about his illness?

Bush: I would guess that Karl Rove said, “The President is ill and I think you ought to go over there.” Secondly, by the time you’re getting ready to give a speech, at least the way I do things, I had gone over that speech innumerable times and the truth of the matter is you want your mind off of the speech or off of the event. It’s like debate day. You don’t want to be sitting around kind of thinking about what the question is going to be and grinding through the potential answers in your mind. You want to get your mind off the subject. You’ve worked, you’ve prepared, you’re ready to go, and so going to the hospital to see President Ford was therapeutic in some ways. It kind of got your mind off yourself. I can’t remember all the details of the event, but somehow I remember the big guy was in his pajamas. Laura went with me, if I recall correctly, so I’m glad we went. It was a small gesture.

Smith: Well, it really meant a lot to him. It really was a tonic.

Bush: It was a tonic for me, too. When you think of somebody else, it tends to cause a person not to be so self-absorbed that you fret and agonize.

Smith: Well, and he’d been through that. His acceptance speech was probably the most important speech he ever gave.

Bush: The interesting thing about an acceptance speech at a convention is that it’s your second most visible moment. The first is when you pick your vice presidential running mate because it speaks volumes about the process. It’s really your first presidential decision and it begins to describe to the American people who you are and what kind of president you’d be. The second is your convention speech because it’s the first time most people actually see you speaking to them as to what your priorities would be and what your hopes are for the country.

Smith: Let me ask you, because that segues very neatly into the selection of Dick Cheney. One of the things that’s fascinating about the whole trajectory of history – and you’d know a whole lot better than I would – are all these people who say, “What’s happened to Dick Cheney?” I’ve often thought one of the things that happened to Dick Cheney was his experience. The irony is that Ford spent twenty-five years on Capitol Hill, and the moment he became president, he found himself in the position of defending executive prerogatives against the Watergate Babies, that whole generation of people who wanted to chip away at the presidency. They’d already passed the War Powers Act. And Cheney went through that at a young and very impressionable age. Then obviously he had the experience in Congress himself. But, I wonder if he didn’t bring with him to your presidency this very keen sensitivity about the vulnerability of the presidency, the fact that presidential powers are under constant assault.

Bush: Sure, they are. And the great thing about our country is that you’re always arguing on the margin. Checks and balances exist, and the question is to what extent does the legislative body or the courts get to check the presidency and balance the presidency? And the president, of course, has to deal with the circumstances of the times. In my case, I needed to exert presidential authority within the Constitution; that is, my authority is under Article II as the Commander-in-Chief. In my case, I also got bolstered by congressional resolution as well.

You know, I’ve heard all that stuff about Dick Cheney and “What happened to Dick Cheney?” “Dick Cheney has changed.” Dick Cheney did not change from the moment I asked him to be vice president to the day we left office. Dick Cheney was an experienced, solid advisor who did not panic when times got tough and who did not express displeasure behind the president’s back. The presidential nominee must do two things when you pick a vice president. One, assure the American people that if the worst happens your nominee can be president. Dick Cheney passed that test. He had the experience necessary to be president. And, secondly, the president picks a vice president to shore up his own weaknesses. I was a governor from Texas. I had visited Washington. I never had had Washington experience. Dick Cheney had been secretary of defense, chief of staff, and a member of the United States Congress. He had excelled in all three positions and there’s no doubt in my mind he was a great pick.

The problem is, during the presidency, I made some very controversial decisions. I authorized within the law the ability for our intelligence services to use enhanced interrogations techniques to get information from cold-blooded killers to protect our country. Dick Cheney supported that decision and rather than blame the president, a lot of the chattering class would rather blame the vice president. I thought that criticism of Dick Cheney was very unfair.
Smith: Is it helpful to have a vice president who clearly does not have presidential aspirations of his own?

Bush: It’s an interesting question. I think so; at least in my case it was, because I had a controversial presidency. I made a lot of very difficult decisions and, had my vice president been positioning himself or herself for a run for the presidency, some of the decisions would’ve been undermined by the leakage that would’ve come out of the vice president’s office. I think of the surge, for example. One of the problems with the president in making a tough decision like sending more troops in when everybody wanted you to pull out is you need as much unanimity in the government as possible in order to make the idea saleable. In this case, had there been any dissent, the Congress would’ve exploited it and made it much harder for me to get the appropriations bills through. This would’ve been in ’06. Right about in ’06, somebody as a vice president would have been beginning to position and that would’ve been a hard position for somebody running for president to have assumed at the time. It made it a lot easier in many ways to have a vice president who wasn’t seeking the presidency.

Smith: Do you think he had this particular sensitivity to the inherent hostility of Congress toward the Executive? I mean, was he any more or less sensitive to that than you think?

Bush: I don’t think so. I think Dick, one, was very respectful of Congress. He loved the institution of the House and he would often talk about his experiences as a congressman. No, I think, like myself, he reacted to the horror of 9/11. We were charged with the task of protecting the homeland in a very uncertain environment. We were getting daily intelligence reports that talked about all kinds of attacks. It is hard for people to remember what that period after 9/11 was like, but it was a period of a lot of anguish and a lot of doubt and uncertainty. And then it was followed by a period of finger pointing. You did not connect the dots. You must connect the dots. We started connecting the dots and then all of a sudden the dialogue became “Why are you connecting the dots?”
I never felt like Dick’s advice was excessive and I always felt it was important. But every time I made a decision - and he’d disagree with a lot of the decisions I made, well, not a lot, but a fair number – he would say, “Yes, sir, Mr. President.” His classic line was “That’s why you get paid the big bucks.” I mean, for example, when I agreed with Secretary Rumsfeld that I needed new eyes on the ground in Iraq and decided that Bob Gates would become the secretary of defense, I informed Vice President Cheney and he disagreed with the decision [to accept Rumsfeld’s resignation] and I fully understood. But, he also understood it was my call to make and he knew I thought long and hard about it.

Smith: It’s a speculative question, but was that affected, do you think, by his long-standing relationship with Don Rumsfeld?

Bush: No question. No question. He and Don Rumsfeld are close friends and he also thought he was doing a fine job, but, you know, it’s the president’s decision to make and Dick knew that. He could express himself very plainly and I appreciated that. And, also, one of the things that a president needs is there to be some creative tension. In other words, you don’t want everybody sitting around the table and saying, “Oh, okay, let’s go tell the boys”, “Looking beautiful today.” What you want is somebody saying “This is what I think” and somebody else saying, “This is what I think” and have them hash it out and Dick Cheney was good at that, but he did it in a way that wasn’t personal or full of animus. Of course, I was never in a lot of those meetings. I mean, occasionally, there would be flare ups in my presence. I was told, of course, by my national security advisor, for example, when there is a tension in a National Security meeting - what went on. And, you know, people would take strong positions and that’s what a president wants. And Dick was good at that.

Smith: It’s interesting. That was very much how Ford liked it and Ford was very different from Nixon in that regard. You can’t imagine Nixon inviting people in and having it out, whether it was the budget or whatever. I mean, that was very much the approach that he took. At the time of 9/11, I know that the former presidents were at the Cathedral. Did people reach out through them?
Bush: I think that, if I recall correctly, prior to going into Iraq, Condi and Hadley, if I'm not mistaken, touched base with the former presidents. I’m not sure. I know they touched base with Bill Clinton.

Smith: We’ll follow up on that. Hadley, I think, was a very junior official in the Ford White House.

Bush: Right. He was. I think so. I think they did. You know, it’s interesting. I was often asked “Did you consult with former presidents?” and the answer is “No”. I generally called a former president when I had a request. I called my dad and Bill Clinton to ask them to help on the tsunami, but most former presidents know that the current president has got much better information than they ever would and, therefore, their advice would be superficial at best.

Smith: One thing I think, didn’t King Hussein die on your watch?

Bush: No.

Smith: No. Who was it? Was it the King of Morocco?

Bush: No, no. Pope John Paul died. That was the biggest state funeral we went to.

Smith: Anyway, I know that President Ford who, at that point, was really getting on in years, I know he went at the request of the president to walk in King Hussein’s procession.

Bush: That would’ve been Clinton.

Smith: Okay.

Bush: I did call my dad, of course, but it was really to comfort him. The roles got completely reversed during my presidency. When he was president, I agonized about what was said about him or how he was characterized. When I was president, he agonized about what was said about me and how I was characterized. He would comfort me when he was a president. I comforted him when I was the president. So I spent as much time calling him and saying, “Don’t worry about it. I’m doing fine.”

Smith: And did your mother just get mad?
Bush: Yes - actually, she tuned it out. She handled it the right way, which is you don’t pay attention to it at all. She did what Dad should’ve done.

Smith: You and Mrs. Bush did something very gracious and I’m not sure it had been done before. You had a 90th birthday party for President Ford.

Bush: Yes, we did.

Smith: How did that come about?

Bush: Well, we just thought about it. I can’t remember, I wonder if Dick, I don’t remember the genesis. It might’ve been that Dick said, “You know, this is Gerald Ford’s 90th birthday,” and Laura grabbed on to it and said, “Let’s have a party for him.” It could’ve been. I just can’t remember who suggested it. It might’ve been that Laura read about it and said, “Let’s do it.” But, anyway, it was a really wonderful occasion. I had not known the Ford family very well and we really had a wonderful time with the President and Mrs. Ford and the children. It was a neat deal. I had him into the Oval Office and we had the grand dinner there and I’m glad we did it. It was really special.

Smith: He cherished the memory. There’s a wonderful story – a classic Betty Ford. After her portrait was hung in the White House, maybe a year or so later, she had some cosmetic surgery done and people asked her why and she said because she wanted to look like her picture.

Bush: She’s a classy woman.

Smith: She had a tough road to hoe.

Bush: In the spotlight. That’s the problem with public life is it’s public and if you’ve got any frailties or any issues you’ve got to deal with, it’ll be highlighted. Mrs. Ford did the country a great service by dealing with her addictions and has left a legacy of people being willing to confront life’s realities.

Smith: And, even before that, the breast cancer. Thirty years ago, no one talked about it and it was a deadly silence.
Bush: That’s right. She was great and did a great service. The first spouse can either seize the moment and really make a difference in people’s lives or kind of go “Why me?” Mrs. Ford did that and Laura did that, too.

Smith: I’ll never forget, because I’ve seen the letters when the Fords moved into the White House. Of course, they never expected to live there. They never wanted to live there, although, once they got there, they decided they’d like to stay. But, she mentions - typically candid Mrs. Ford - mentions somewhere that they shared the same bed. And concerned Americans wrote to protest that fact. Do you ever get over the extent to which your family, your “private life” is public property?

Bush: I probably was the person best prepared to understand the realities of an incoming president. The huge sacrifice is that you’ve lost your anonymity forever. And I knew that. So, having said that, the honor of representing the country, the thrill of being the president, being in a position to be able to make history, far exceeds the inconveniences of the loss of anonymity.

Smith: Susan was a teenager who had to adapt to Secret Service agents. Was that a challenge for your girls?

Bush: Well, you know, they were getting ready to go to college and it was a huge challenge for them and it was a great relief for me. The Secret Service are really good and they gave our girls space. But, no question, somebody who contemplates running for president and happens to be a father or mother, has got to weigh what that means on their children. In our case, our little girls were apoplectic about me running and (they) emerged after the process as young, professional, contributing women. We’re very proud of them.

Smith: A couple of things and we’ll let you go. I think the last picture of President Ford that was published coincided with your visit out there, which was around Easter, 2006. The family was very grateful - it was the best medicine. But it’s interesting that that’s the last picture, because they were also very sensitive. I mean, he was a proud man. You know, would never appear anywhere in a wheelchair. And that was going to be the last picture that people saw. Was that visit arranged spur of the moment?
Bush: I can’t remember how it was arranged, but the truth of the matter is it made sense for me to go by there. I was in the region. I think that’s the trip where I did a political event and went out to one of the Marine Corp bases, Twenty nine Palms. Went to church out there with the troops. Rode my mountain bike, as I recall. Maybe did something for Mary Bono. But it was important that I go call on the former President. I was in his neighborhood and it was easy to do and I’m glad I did it.

Smith: Were you aware that his health was at that point failing?

Bush: Yeah, of course I was. But I didn’t see a failing man. When I was with him, he was in command. I mean, obviously he was older, but he wasn’t bed ridden, he wasn’t in a wheelchair, and he wanted to walk out on his front steps and have his picture. I thought that was great.

Smith: Do you remember what you talked about - and what you didn’t talk about?

Bush: I was surprised when I read that President Ford disagreed with my decision to liberate Iraq. And one reason I was surprised was because he never brought it up. On the other hand, when I really thought about it, I wasn’t that surprised because a lot of people didn’t agree with my decision and I can understand that. It was a very difficult decision to make and it’s hard for people to make the connection between protecting the country and dealing with a sworn enemy of the United States who everybody thought had weapons of mass destruction.

Smith: My recollection, and it’s vague, was much narrower. It wasn’t that he opposed the policy. And he certainly rallied around 9/11 and ‘Whatever the President needs to do, he knows a lot more than I know’ and all of that. I think he felt uncomfortable with the argument about weapons of mass destruction, to the extent that that was the stated rationale.

Bush: Yeah, well, he felt uncomfortable about it, particularly after we didn’t find any. I felt uncomfortable about it, too, but when you’re the president and everybody’s saying he’s got weapons of mass destruction and you give him a chance to show the world that he didn’t have weapons of mass destruction - and, once again, he defied the United Nations and the demands of the free world - the president has got to make a decision. I felt like I had made a credible case to Saddam Hussein that we’re going to take him out militarily unless he honored his obligations, and couldn’t imagine him thinking I was bluffing.

And, therefore, when he chose to kick the inspectors out and not show the weapons, I concluded, as did a lot of other people, that he was hiding something. Obviously, it was a huge disappointment that we did not find the weapons that everybody thought he had, but at the time you make the decision, we didn’t know that. There’s a lot of people who said, “Well, I wish he hadn’t made the case on weapons of mass destruction,” but that’s because now they’re able to look backwards.

Smith: Sure. And I think you said as far as you know, he never voiced criticism to the vice president or Rumsfeld.

Bush: I never heard that. As I recall, both Dick Cheney and I were surprised, but it’s understandable. There were a lot of people voicing their doubts about the policy and particularly after we didn’t find the weapons of mass destruction. The fundamental question is whether or not the democracy in Iraq will hold and when it does, and I think it will, what effect that will have in a part of the region that produced nineteen kids that came and killed over 3,000 citizens on our soil.

Smith: What do you remember from the funeral? Of course you spoke at the Cathedral.

Bush: I remember a family that was grateful to have had a father or husband like Gerald Ford. It seemed like to me that the funeral honored his decency. The family was, of course sad, but appreciative that they had been associated with that guy they loved. That’s what I remember. I don’t remember unspeakable sadness. I remember a celebration of life.

Smith: They were astonished at the number of people who turned out. You know, the Reagan funeral was the perfect send off for Ronald Reagan and we tried to make the Ford funeral as personal and evocative and more Truman-esque than Reagan-esque in some ways.
Bush: Right. That’s interesting. I guess I’d better start thinking about my own one of these days.

Smith: I was going to say. Has anybody asked you the question yet?

Bush: The colonel of whatever he is, the colonel of death or the colonel of doom, hasn’t been over yet. You know, it’s interesting.

Smith: That Rose Garden, you know, at the library is awfully impressive.

Bush: Could be there. Right now, I’m planning on being planted at the Texas State Cemetery in Austin.

Smith: Really?

Bush: Yeah.

Smith: That’s interesting. For whatever its worth, Richard Nixon was going to be buried in a cemetery in Whittier with his parents and I remember we had this discussion. Have you been to the Hoover site in West Branch?

Bush: No.

Smith: It’s got the Library, it’s got the birth place, and then 450 yards away on this gentle hill are the gravesites. Hoover gave one instruction. Nothing could ever be planted or built that would interfere with the view back to his little two-room cottage because he wanted people to realize that, in America, the condition of your birth was no limit to where you could go.

Bush: That’s very interesting.

Smith: The whole story is there. So, they decided at the Nixon to do the same.

Bush: Interesting. Well, mother and dad are to be buried there at College Station at his library. We may end up buried here [in Dallas]. See, I need to see the thing first.

Smith: Yeah, it’s an attraction.
Bush: A little candle lit in the corner, you know. I have no idea. I’m probably not interested, not 'probably,' I’m not interested in the big caisson, the big parade, and all that stuff.

Smith: Yeah. How do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered?

Bush: Well, as a decent public servant. In other words, he brought civility to the process. He could be tough if he needed to, but he never did it in a mean-spirited kind of petty way. That he was a true public servant in the sense that he served for the right reasons. Look, one of the great presidential decisions in my judgment was the pardoning of Richard Nixon. And the reason I say ‘great,’ maybe there’s another adjective, but it was a big decision because he set aside his own personal popularity. Presidents are often confronted with advisors who say “If you do this, you will be unpopular.” A president must weigh decisions and ask the question “Is it the right thing to do?” “Is it good for America, not good for me personally?” President Ford made a decision to pardon Richard Nixon which many argued cost him the presidency, kind of the ultimate presidential sacrifice. And that is a great example for future presidents.

Smith: I was going to ask you: Do you look over your shoulder? I mean, are you aware, not only of the history of that house, but of the decisions that have been made there, and draw parallels or even inspirations?

Bush: Absolutely. Absolutely. I mean, I love history. I was a history major. More importantly, I read a lot of history while I was president and, no question, at least I gained a lot of inspiration and I learned a lot about the presidency. I mean, I think of Harry Truman’s decision to fight the communists in Korea. His decision to reorganize the Defense Department. His decision to set up a National Security Council. His decision on the Truman Doctrine. All those policies put him in bad stead with the public. On the other hand, he made my job easier. I think about Lincoln and his generals. I think about Ford and his pardon. No doubt that, if a president spends time analyzing other presidencies and presidential decisions you can learn a lot. I found it to be fascinating to be making history and reading history at the same time.
Smith: Perfect. That’s great.

Bush: Good!

Smith: It seems to me you’re in a virtually unique position in a lot of ways. One of the themes that we’ve been exploring in all of this is the challenge that Ford confronted being thrust into the presidency with no transition - couldn’t even acknowledge the possibility. And, among other things, having to mesh, for lack of a better word, an existing White House staff with this “to be determined” group of outsiders. Let me give you a metaphor. We’ve been told by a number of folks who were there that on the morning of August 9th, after the swearing in, there was a receiving line and a reception. And pretty universally, you could see the Nixon people just kind of peel off.

Warren: I was one of those.

Smith: Which would be perfectly understandable.

Warren: I was standing there with Al and I said I didn’t want to go in. First, I loved Gerald Ford, but I didn’t want to go in. I was feeling so down and so beaten. I said to Al, “You know, I’ve had my picture taken with the President Ford.” And he said, “So have I.” So, I left. I don’t know whether he did, but I did. My wife was there and I was going to see her back to the car and I did. And I go back to my office and I’m told that Gerald Ford wants me to stay on. I mean, it was so unexpected.

Smith: Really?

Warren: Yeah. So unexpected and such a nice thing. There was a David Broder column that I recommend to you – it was within a week or ten days of the resignation - where he said, “There are a few people in the Nixon administration that Gerald Ford could use and would be good and should not be tarred with any other brush.” And I was among those as was Bill Timmons, Ken Cole, there were six or seven and you know he talked to Ford. I think he talked to Ford, because Ford had asked those folks to stay. What David was doing was telling certain people in Mr. Ford’s camp who were angry at the Nixon folks ‘lay off these guys.’ And they did. It was wonderful.

Smith: Let’s back up. Tell us how you got to where you were in August of 1974.

Warren: Well, I was city editor of the San Diego Union Tribune. I was directing the political coverage, so I’d seen them at the convention in ’60 and then I saw them when they came through in ’62 running for governor – Haldeman, Ziegler, and a few others. So, the problem was Herb Klein. What to do with Herb. Herb did not want to be press secretary again. He was the vice president’s press secretary. He’d risen above that. So, he devised this director of communications office, which they accepted and they quickly then named Ron press secretary. But they looked at the staff. They said, “There’s no one on this staff that has any experience in the news business. Someone told them that, they didn’t recognize it themselves. So, Bob started casting out a rather large net and he called a mutual friend in Los Angeles, Cliff’ Miller. Do you know Cliff?

Smith: I know the name.

Warren: He was very useful to Haldeman in many ways. He called him and he was very calm. He was very knowledgeable and had been of great use to Bob over the years. So, Bob called Cliff and said, “We need somebody fast.” This was in December. “We need somebody with news experience who will fit in” with everything that connotes. Cliff understood and he said, “How about Jerry Warren?” Cliff and I were pretty close. So, he thought about it and Ziegler called me and asked me if I can come to the Pierre. This was the week before Christmas. Ron wanted me there the next day. So, I said, “Sure, I’ll come and talk.” I talked to my boss and they said, “Go ahead.” I went out there and Ron told me - and now that Herb’s gone, I can talk about this. I wouldn’t have done it if Herb were still alive. Ron and I were having lunch at the Pierre (we had to wait two hours and I was starving), and he said, “This is what the job is” and he described it. “If you take it, will you be loyal to me or to Herb Klein?” I said, “Well, if you hire me, I’m loyal to you.”
Smith: This was Ziegler?

Warren: Yeah. “I report to you. You hire me, Herb doesn’t.” Herb had said, “I’m not going to take anybody from the Union Tribune because the bosses were worried that he would take three or four or five people. There were some that, I think, he wanted to take. So, Ziegler said, “Fine.” And we talked about a lot of things, background, how I’d come up to (by that time it was) Assistant Managing Editor at the Union. And he says, “Okay, you’re hired. I’m going to go announce it this afternoon.” I said, “No, you can’t do that. I have to talk to my wife. I have to talk to my bosses.” He says, “Well, get on the phone because I’m going to announce it this afternoon.” So, I did.

Smith: Did that give you pause at all about ‘Boy, what have I got myself into?’

Warren: It did, but it also said – and it sounds very self-centered – it also said ‘This guy needs help and there needs to be some moderation of some (columnists) in that office.’ And I tried to do that. So, I called all of the pertinent people. My wife and I had a house in La Jolla; we’d just bought a house, an old famous house in San Diego from an estate sale, so we have these two houses. So I said, “Phenie, you’re going to have to sell two houses and pack up and be out here whenever you can be.” So, I went back, said my goodbyes to the paper, packed up, and reported on the 22nd of January. They asked me to come to the inaugural event and I said, “No, I wasn’t on the campaign. That wouldn’t be right.” So, I stayed away from that and went in the next day. And that’s how it happened.

Smith: Was Klein frustrated in his position?

Warren: He never showed that. I think he was. As it developed and as it went on, he generated his activity himself and he was not a part of the 7:00 meeting folks. I think he undoubtedly resented that.

Smith: You wonder about the old Nixon hands. Rex Scouten said something fascinating. Rex, who was the soul of discretion, appropriately given the positions that he’s held, but when he was a Secret Service agent in the 50s, he traveled extensively with the vice president and became a virtual member of the family. The family actually had a room for him in California. I mean, they became that close. But he said something fascinating and he implied more than he expressed. He said the Nixon he knew in the 50s was very different than the Nixon he knew in the White House. He said more than once - a wonderful non sequitur - on an airplane, Nixon would start pounding his fists against the armrests and say, “I’m not tough enough. I’ve got to make myself tougher.”

Warren: That is the secret. If you read his books, that comes through. This guy wasn’t tough enough. That guy was tough enough. And it is amazing, because I have tried to research his feelings about me and I think I have it crystallized and I’m not sure I want to talk about it on the camera, but that’s an essential part of it. Rex, bless his heart, before the Fords moved in and after the Nixons left, I asked Rex if I could have a tour of the family quarters. He said, “Sure.” So, we spent two or three hours and he’s telling stories. It was just wonderful. I really liked him a lot.

Smith: And he clearly felt very close to them.

Warren: He was very loyal. He was.

Smith: I’m jumping around here, but there’s so much to cover. I’ve always felt that Mrs. Nixon didn’t get the recognition she deserved. Was she shy? It’s interesting, because when I asked Susan Porter-Rose that yesterday - not to answer my own question - but the word we finally settled on instead of shy was ‘self-effacing.’ Which is different.

Warren: That’s a good word.

Smith: But, what I didn’t really get answered was – and, of course, Susan wasn’t around then, but it has been written that the early years in politics was one thing, but that ’52 was a searing experience. And she came out of that with a much different attitude about the ugliness of politics that never left her.

Warren: Well, I don’t know whether the library has the transcript of Richard Nixon’s private farewell to the staff after the public funeral for Pat.
Smith: I was there.

Warren: You were there.

Smith: Yeah.

Warren: Well, he almost told us that she didn’t want him to run in ’60 or in ’68. And she stayed with him and she was loyal and he almost said – I felt this – that he never showed that he had relied on her so much. He never acknowledged publicly her importance to him and, therefore, to the White House.

Smith: Of course, a number of people commented on the fact that, on the morning of August 9th in the farewell, he talked about his mother and his father, but he never talked about Pat.

Warren: No, he didn’t.

Smith: And I think his explanation was that he couldn’t have gotten through that. Who knows?

Warren: Who knows? Because of my personal experience, I feel that he understood, after the hospital experience with the phlebitis, he understood that there were people that he hadn’t really talked to, didn’t know anything about. I went to see him and it was right after the Face the Nation experience. My friend, George Herman, chose Gene Rishan of UPI, Bob Pierpoint, and one other, whose name might come to me later. I get all made up and I’m sitting there and the lights are on and the cameras on and Pierpoint has the first question. He said, “Jerry, did Richard Nixon break the law?” I said to myself, “Wow. What am I going to do? If I say ‘no’, this interview is going to just dissolve into screams and if I say ‘yes’, then I further isolate myself from the Nixon folks.’ But I said, “Yes, but he has suffered for it. He’s been penalized for it and I think the books are complete and even on this,” words to that effect.

And so, when I went to see President Nixon the first time at Casa Pacifica, Jack Brennan met me and I said, “Jack, does he know about the Face the Nation interview?” He says, “Yeah, I told him.” And I said, “Well, what did he say?” And Jack said, “Well, he thought about it and thought about it and then he said, ‘What the hell else could he say?’ which just broke the dam of remorse and all that.

Smith: I’ve often said the most remarkable thing about the Nixon presidency, given his self description as an introvert in an extrovert’s profession, was not how it ended, but that it happened at all.

Warren: If you think about it, on those lines, he overcame so much that would’ve destroyed a lesser man and became president of the United States. And he went into the presidency prepared. David Ignatius said something about our current president right after his election in a column. He said, “He has spent his whole life becoming. Now he has to be.” Well, I think both Nixon and Ford went in fully formed. They didn’t have to grow in the job. In Nixon’s case, he knew what he wanted to do, not just in foreign policy, but in domestic policy. He had some very bright people writing books like Nixon on the Issues. So, strategically, he was ready. Mr. Ford was not, but he knew what his job was as president and that was to knit the country back together again.

Smith: Do you have a theory as to what Nixon’s demons were?

Warren: I do. It’s really far-fetched and not accepted by my friends from the Nixon camp. I wrote a piece on it after the Nixon death. Remember, he got back from the service and he was changed as all people are after a war experience and he wanted to run for Congress, but he wanted to prepare himself and he got a scholarship offered to Harvard. His mother said, “Richard, you can’t do that. I have to take your brother to Arizona because he has TB.” Arizona was the only cure in those days. Go to the desert. “If you leave, that leaves your father alone, practically.” See, Ed was so young at that time. So, Richard thought about it and accepted that logic and bowed to his mother’s wishes and went to Whittier and that changed everything. I believe in my heart that some of his anger and paranoia against the establishment – foreign policy establishment, the Eastern theocracy – I believe that would’ve all changed had he studied at Harvard.
Smith: Because he was a closet intellectual, wasn’t he?

Warren: Oh, he was brilliant!

Smith: I mean, much more than Kennedy.

Warren: He was brilliant.

Smith: Yeah.

Warren: No question about it. No question about it. And I think, when you have the opportunity to go and then you’re stymied, you begin to say, ‘Well, they’re not so good. West coast is fine. I’m doing well here. And then I’m going to Duke Law School. That’s fine. That’s recognized.’ And so, he built up this belief in him that he doesn’t have to come out of the Ivy League. So, I think that’s what he took in to the White House and I think that’s what festered during the war, especially when the college presidents caved in so many cases. They came down to see the President, but they saw Kissinger instead, the Ivy League presence (Kissinger taught at Harvard). And Kissinger, I shouldn’t speak for him, but I heard him say they are cowards and words to that effect. So that fed into it. And then I don’t think the President’s paranoia would’ve grown to the extent it did if that hadn’t happened, because I think, if he accepted the academic situation for what it is - a group of brilliant people who think differently than I do on some issues, but can be helpful and are important to the country – he could’ve toned down Henry’s anxiety the after Pentagon Papers. Pentagon’s papers did not smear him or Kissinger. It turned out to be very valuable, as a matter of fact, to academia, certainly. But they were so worried that more leaks would happen. And that is what gave us the plumbers.

Smith: You know, he was so greatly detached in his analysis of externals. And he obviously wrote with considerable self-knowledge things like Six Crises and the like. Do you think he understood the paranoia? Did he acknowledge it or ever try to trace its roots?
Warren: No. No, I think he went to his grave believing we did what we had to do, which is understandable. I started to say earlier that, after his experience in the hospital and after the resignation, he began reaching out and trying to repair the relationship with staff members. I went in to see him on that first visit and we chatted for an hour. His foot was up on the desk and he wanted to know about my family and my kids. Then he said, “You know, we never had a chance to talk in the White House.” I know he was doing that with Pat, too, because their relationship was really cemented even more when they were at Casa Pacifica. She loved it there. So, I think he recognized that separation from the personal side of, not only his staff, but his wife.

Smith: Do you remember how you found out about the Watergate break-in?

Warren: We were in Key Biscayne and there was just a little piece in the Post, which we got flown to us wherever we were, along with the Times and the Sun and other papers of note. There was a little piece in the Post about the break-in. It was Larry O’Brien’s office, so the natural question to us was, does the White House know about this? Is there any Republican effort here? And that’s when Ziegler said that it was a two-bit break-in or burglary or something. And we didn’t worry about it until we got back, until it started to snowball. Once the snowball started to roll down that mountain, it got bigger and bigger and bigger.

Smith: One of the surreal things about it, looking back, is how long it went on. I mean, can you imagine in today’s media climate anything like that lasting two years?

Warren: No. No. The bloggers and all of the talk radio and talk shows, right and left, would’ve gathered together and would’ve forced actions a lot quicker, I think. They would’ve fired up Congress and they wouldn’t have been so reasonable, actually.

Smith: We asked Pat Buchanan that question and he said, “Oh, I didn’t read about it. I got a telephone call and as soon as I heard, I knew we were involved.” I said, “Really?” Obviously he didn’t say who, but he said, “We were getting mimeographed copies of materials out of Muskies’ headquarters on a routine basis.”

Warren: And, you know, a few people knew about the plumbers and their gathering in what’s now called the Old EOB. One or two people knew that there was some crazy people down there, not the [staff] leadership. The leadership was wonderful.

Smith: Was Colson fingered?

Warren: No.

Smith: No.

Warren: I don’t think he was.

Smith: Interesting. Were you surprised to learn about the tapes?

Warren: Yes. Yes, I was and I was not too disturbed when I heard about the tapes. I thought ‘Why not tape these things for history? It’s a very good idea.’ But, I learned that the impact on the personal side of Richard Nixon was going to be very damaging in one way or another. I didn’t know how it was going to end.

Smith: I remember President Ford being genuinely shocked, not Casablanca shocked, genuinely shocked at two things. One, that Nixon lied to him, and, two, and I think in this regard you cannot exaggerate the broader cultural impact, was the language on the tapes. How do you quantify the political impact, not of legal/illega actions, but of public shock at that language in the Oval Office?

Warren: Well, you can’t, actually. It’s clear that the language bothered him. I remember something Henry said at the funeral, that Gerald Ford had small town values and that’s so true. I mean, they’re the same values that he had in Michigan, they just were there. He was who he was.

Smith: Let me ask you. This goes right to what you were doing. I’ve always thought the first press conference of the Ford presidency – I think it’s the 27th or 28th of August and Ford, who’s been in town for twenty-five years, knows the press corps, but he goes in there having convinced himself that they’re going to want to talk about Cypress and the Middle East and inflation. And, of course, that’s not what they wanted to talk about. And I’ve always believed – I mean, I think the pardon would’ve come anyway – but if you’re looking for a tipping point, Ford came out of that press conference unhappy with himself and the situation. And I think maybe it brought home to him in a way that nothing else had ‘it’s going to be like this.’

Warren: I’ve not heard that formulation, but I certainly agree with it. I think he was shocked at the animosity underlying the questions, some bitterness.

Smith: I assume he was prepared. I mean, was there preparation for that press conference?

Warren: At that point, I was not active in preparing him for anything. I was first there just to be help terHorst and talk to Jerry before the briefings and help him come up with positions after we had been told what the president thought. So, I did that for awhile and then I went on vacation and Jerry resigned and the pardon came just as I got back from vacation. Then, I was moved into Klein’s office and I was the Director of Communications without portfolio, which was fine. Then I began to do the press conference preparation, but not at first.

Smith: Maybe you could help us. Of course, terHorst is gone, but a number of people have suggested that there was more to his decision than just moral outrage. That that was genuine, certainly not faked, but that he had also, in the course of a month, concluded that this job was not for him, that it was overwhelming. And this afforded an opportunity to walk away.

Warren: Yeah. Well, see, he was a newspaper columnist and they have different schedules than the reporters who have to be at the White House all day. So, he didn’t have that pace, that rhythm. I know the job was tiring. I saw him fall asleep in the barber chair, which is understandable. He wasn’t prepared for that. But there’s one other thing. He was lied to, not by the president, but by someone close to the president. And those things entered into it as well. I think he wanted out and this was the portal. But, as you say, that pardon was the occasion.
Smith: It’s interesting, because Ford’s explanation after the fact, which is revealing, is that he couldn’t tell terHorst in advance, at least he didn’t feel he could. And he couldn’t lie to terHorst. So, they were both in some ways impossible positions.

Warren: I wish some of the top staff had understood that position and had been able to say to Jerry, “Look, this is a very delicate situation. Off the record, you must know that whatever is said from the White House can be damaging, so you’re walking on eggs and I suggest you just say, ‘I really don’t know anything about that’ and let it go at that.” But Jerry didn’t want to do that.

Smith: Mel Laird is a man of a thousand schemes and as many leaks. Bob Dole had a great line. He said, “Mel Laird’s a guy who puts poison up the river a mile upstream and then runs into town to rescue everybody.”

Warren: That’s wonderful.

Smith: We had a great session with Mel. He loved Ford, but he’s angry with him. Mel Laird believed that he could bring a bipartisan delegation from the Hill down to the Oval Office at the right time and they would, in effect, petition the president to do this. Now, here’s my problem. Again, putting yourself in the supercharged atmosphere at that moment—

Warren: Is this after the resignation?

Smith: This is after the resignation, but before the pardon. Wouldn’t any trial balloon have been shot down before it cleared the trees?

Warren: He couldn’t do that and Ford knew that, I’m sure. There’s no way he could do that. It had to come as a complete surprise. You couldn’t prepare the American people for that. They had to be shocked, then they had to think about it and Ford had to give them some things to think about. And he did.

Smith: And take the heat in the process.

Warren: And take the heat. That’s right.
Smith: Haig told us something interesting. We saw Al Haig not long before he died.
To be honest with you, there are people who are emphatic and blustery and there are people who are on the verge of senility and it’s sometimes hard to tell the difference.

Warren: That’s right.

Smith: But Haig was emphatic. First of all, it’s very clear that Al Haig and Bob Hartmann were put on this planet to annoy each other to death.

Warren: Oh, yeah. Oh, yeah.

Smith: That was part of it. But he insisted that he never listened to the tapes. And it’s interesting. Everything keeps coming back to Fred Buzhardt. Buzhardt had been Laird’s counsel at the Pentagon. A month after Laird comes back reluctantly to the Nixon White House, Buzhardt tells him, “Be careful what you say because I’ve been listening to the tapes and the president’s in this up to his neck” which then put Laird in a very difficult position.

Warren: Fascinating.

Smith: Then, we talked to Haig and he said, “No, I didn’t listen to the tapes. Fred Buzhardt gave me some very good advice, which was, ‘Never be alone with a tape.’” And I assume this is post-eighteen and a half minute gap and that sort of thing, I always assumed that Haig had listened to the smoking gun tape.

Warren: I believe him when he says he didn’t because I saw his reaction.

Smith: We’ll never know, I don’t think, exactly what Haig and Ford and Hartmann and all these people were thinking. I’ve come to the conclusion that it’s what wasn’t said that’s the real story. That politicians have a non-verbal language.

Warren: Oh, yes.

Smith: Although Ford was slow on the uptake, I think, when he first met with Haig. At least that’s the impression left by the Hartmann intervention, and then Bryce Harlow and those folks—
Warren: I can’t add to that, but I can certainly argue with it from a sense standpoint. I think you’re on to something with that theory. I remember after Ron said to the staff that the President was going to go on the air that night and resign, after a day of back and forth and back and forth, I went by Steve Bull’s office. And there was the Vice President sitting in there. I don’t know why I did it, but I went in there and said, “How are you, Mr. Vice President?” He said, “I’m fine.” He said, “You’re looking fit.” And I said, “So are you, Mr. Vice President.” And that was it. I knew what he was going to be told and he did, too. He had to have felt it.

Smith: Can you imagine putting yourself in Ford’s shoes during that almost year when – talk about being on a tightrope – I mean, clearly your job is to defend the president, but at some point, as this evolves, defending the president reaches the point where it may undercut your own integrity and certainly complicate your life, if in fact you succeed to the presidency. But you can never acknowledge the possibility. I’m trying to get a sense of what the attitude was in the Nixon White House, and particularly among the hardcore defenders towards the job the vice president was doing. He was out of town an awful lot. There’s always going to be resentment of the vice president, whoever it is, not being sufficiently loyal.

Warren: The staff.

Smith: At the staff level.

Warren: Lay it on the staff.

Smith: Well, was there a consensus at all?

Warren: I never heard it discussed in the press office by Ron or anyone else. And, you know, I wasn’t in those meetings with Ron and Haldeman before Haldeman resigned, so I don’t know what went on in there. I do know that there was a resentment with the staff. I mean, Hartmann did not just have Al Haig. There were a number of people who shook their heads, and there were others that came with Ford who were not equipped. You know, you said something much earlier in this interview about the old Nixon hands. Well, there were old Ford hands, too. And, on both sides, they didn’t fit in that White House in those circumstances. They weren’t equipped and something had to be done and ultimately was.

Smith: I assume in Hartmann’s case, there’s a very thin line between protective and possessive. Bob probably incorporated both.

Warren: Well, that’s right. And I think on the Nixon side, I think Rose Mary had the same feeling, that balance. But Hartmann seemed to put it in a personal way, too.

Smith: It wasn’t just Haig.

Warren: No, it was Buchanan, it was Ziegler, and it was all of those people who were noticed and visible. All of the suspects were Deep Throat. But, you know, Mr. Ford probably felt the same way I did. I don’t know what’s going on. I have a terrible feeling about it. I have a sense of doom. But my job is to represent the President. And, so, at that time, considering the integrity aspect, I made the decision. Well, it was when Ron could no longer brief, they put me in the job without the title. I made a decision, I’m going to approach this as a personal problem for Richard Nixon and not as a problem for the office of the White House or the Constitution or anything else. This is his personal problem and he is the only one who can speak for himself.

Smith: We did a long and fascinating interview with Jerry Jones. And a couple things popped out. I’d be interested in your comment. One was when the Court came down with it’s unanimous decision on the tapes. The initial reaction in San Clemente – and I assume he meant Ziegler, and whether Ziegler was anticipating his boss or, in effect, speaking for his boss is not clear – but the initial question was: can we defy the Court?

Warren: Yeah. Those bastards. Yeah, that’s what was said. And Sinclair was there. When it got into the Supreme Court, James St. Clair came into the White House counsel’s office and was, I thought, kind of a moderating person. And when it got into the Supreme Court, we were out in San Clemente—
I’ve got to tell a story that’s off the subject, sadly. He’s [St. Clair] briefing and then I brief after him and, in the back - I’m in the Surf & Sand Hotel - the cigarette in the cigarette holder and a beer and a cap on is Hunter Thompson. He had a photographer with him. The photographer was – I’ll think of her name. She was the most famous photographer in America for awhile. He put his hand up and he said, “Forget about the God damn tapes. I want to know about the clot.” And he was onto something. He was onto the sense that Richard Nixon was near death, because the clot could go up to the heart and he could die. I said, “Well, we’ve said everything we want to say on that.” And he persisted. Of course, when the President went into the hospital in Long Beach, I got a call from the Philippines and it was Hunter Thompson and he said, “I told you so!” And then he called me when he got fired from Rolling Stone and he called me for money and I didn’t help him, but that’s beside the point.

Smith: Was there a bunker mentality at that point?

Warren: Bunker mentality with the Congress, less so with the Supreme Court. I think then the mood began to change a little bit. One way or another, this is it.

Smith: Was there a sense that the tapes were the whole game at that point?

Warren: In some minds, yes, and certainly mine. I had never heard any of the tapes. I’d seen some of those transcripts, of course, the redacted transcripts. One of my jobs was to read proof on all the transcripts. When the President made a speech, the transcript would come to us and it was old mimeographed stuff in those days. And I would read proof and then the court reporters would change it if it needed changing. So, many times, I had to listen to the conversation to see who was speaking because they often put the wrong name on it. So, I found that I was sort of an expert on Dean’s voice, Haldeman’s voice, and Ehrlichman’s voice. So, Ron sent me to the EOB in a locked room and someone gave me the June 23rd tape and I listened to it while I read proof of the transcript and I almost died. It was like a sledgehammer blow in the stomach. And I think to a certain extent, that’s the reaction that Al had as well. Now, we’ll never know whether he’d seen it before or not. He certainly was in a position to. But I tend to think he hadn’t. There was a point when each of us in those positions had to say, “Do I want to stay here or not?” before the smoking gun when there was still some question. And each of us, I think, came to the conclusion that, “No, I signed on to be loyal to the Constitution and this man represents that, so as long as he’s there, I’ve got to do my job.” I think Buchanan had the same sense and some of the others who were speechwriters and writing speeches defending the President. So, it was very depressing time toward the end. Very depressing.

Smith: The night of the resignation speech, he famously wanted no one around. Did you see him at all that day or the next morning in the East Room?

Warren: I did not see him that day. (I was in the East Room for his farewell speech.)

Smith: We talked to people who were in the meetings (both representatives of the House and Senate). Well, Bill Timmons, who set up that meeting with the loyalists. And it was obviously a very emotional one for everyone involved.

Warren: There is a picture in the archives of those folks coming out of the West Wing and it’s taken from up above and you see the sea of reporters and photographers, hundreds of them, and I’m in there. Ron says, “You take them out and you introduce them.” So, I did. I was walking next to John Rhodes, Barry, Timmons, and - who was that attorney? My memory fails ______. And I introduced them and it was just so awkward because the one thing that Ziegler had said was, “You cannot mention the word ‘resignation.’ You cannot do that.” And they said they didn’t do it. So it wasn’t mentioned, but everyone around got that sense. And there were just hundreds of reporters and technicians and photographers there. There were hundreds of people outside the fence that’d been there for a day or so, ever since the Supreme Court decision. And that night was the same thing (The night of the resignation speech).

It was an eerie feeling. I was in my office and somebody that I didn’t know came into my office to watch on my three little Sony television sets. She was in there and she was a rather attractive woman. I didn’t know who she was.
And somebody stopped outside and took a picture through the window and it was an AP guy. I saw him later on and I said, “I’d really prefer that picture not run because I don’t know who that woman is. I don’t know how I’d explain it to my wife, for one thing.” And they understood, so they didn’t put it out on the wire. But, after having the blow of listening to this thing and putting out the transcript and watching the reaction and, in the meetings at the press office where the girls were so emotional and some were crying, I started to cry in my little office. Saul Pett came in and he was going to do the overall feature for AP. He’s (was) a brilliant writer, and he talked to me a while in a consoling way. He mentioned that in his long, long piece that he wrote, which was pretty good. But it was happening to us individually at the same time.

Smith: And the next morning in the East Room must’ve been excruciating.

Warren: Oh, it was. I controlled myself in there, but I was so empathetic with him. I knew how difficult it was. He put glasses on in public [for the first time]. He was near tears.

Smith: And he must have been just physically exhausted as well.

Warren: Oh, of course. I know he had been up quite late the night before the speech. That’s the night he met with Kissinger, I think, late at night. Yeah, I don’t think he slept much.

Smith: I don’t want to get bogged down in all this, but there’s certainly been a debate over the final days and the portrait of him that has passed into history is that someone out of control, drinking to excess and all of that.

Warren: I don’t buy the last part. Richard Nixon could not drink to excess. He couldn’t hold it.

Smith: One drink was excess.

Warren: One and a half of those martinis were enough. Then he became jovial. And now, of course, in this experience, I don’t think he was drinking at all because he had some serious thinking to do. He very well may have talked to portraits. I’ve talked to some portraits in the White House, you know. What would you do? Have you ever seen anything like this? And I don’t think I was crazy. I was depressed, but I don’t think I was crazy.

I don’t remember when it was, but we went to Pocantico Hills and I was there to help set up the thing and we chose the gym. There was a building that was entirely devoted to recreation for children.

Smith: The Playhouse.

Warren: The Playhouse, exactly.

Smith: $500,000 structure.

Warren: The squash courts, tennis courts, basketball courts. So, we chose one of those as the thing and I saw where they lived and what gave them the entitlement feeling that a couple of them had. Laurence didn’t have that, I don’t think. Laurence was different and really good. But that was an amazing house. My visual memory of Nelson Rockefeller is wherever he was, he was smiling and he brought warmth into the room and he would look at you and recognize you and say, “Hiya, fella!” And then he’d go someplace else and say, “Hiya, fella!” Whether man or woman, it’d be, “Hiya, fella!” He was the only politician I’ve ever known that didn’t try to remember names. Unbelievable.

Smith: When he was chosen as vice president, it’s easy in retrospect to say this just never was going to work - this is a very odd choice given the dynamics even then of the Party. The only thing that makes sense is what Ford said. That Ford was secure enough in himself to pick someone who had more of everything, and that Rockefeller filled in the gaps. He had a reputation for surrounding himself with talented people. He had a global network. And in some corners at least, his selection would be very reassuring.

Warren: Well, I thought it would be. I thought it was a good choice, because I thought it would reassure the moderate Left of the Party and maybe bring them together. Ford could maybe do that because he was a pacifier for his people and when he spoke to publishers, I could just see them warming to him. He wanted to bring people together. He knew the country was divided and he couldn’t do anything about the political divide except to be polite as he always was and to meet with them. But he thought he could bring the Party together.

Smith: It’s interesting. For someone who I always said was the least self-dramatizing of men - to the point where I really think it hurt him politically - those first few days he understood that symbolism was substance. To bring in the Congressional Black Caucus and George Meany and ERA supporters; I mean, people who had not been in the White House.

Warren: No, I thought that was brilliant because he really had the sense of healing the wounds and sewing up the seam.

Smith: Can a president be too nice?

Warren: Yeah. He could allow his staff to do some pretty stupid things. That’s where he’s too nice. He was a lot like Eisenhower except in one way. When they took crazy ideas to Eisenhower and told him, “You have to do this” – Andy Goodpastor told this at the Chief of Staff thing I helped put together in San Diego, he said, “People would rush in and say, ‘You’ve got to sign this right now!’ And Eisenhower would say, ‘Boys,’ because they were all men, ‘let’s don’t be in a hurry to make our mistakes.’” And that’s what Gerald Ford needed when someone brought up the WIN button.

Smith: Which I think came out of the speechwriting operation.

Warren: I did, too. Oh, yeah, absolutely. And, you know, Seidman, for all his brilliance might have thought it was a good idea, but I’ll never know whose idea it was. And then, the other thing that I think he was a victim in was that whole segment around the Polish democracy issue. We knew what he was saying. You know what he was saying. He was saying the Poles in their hearts are not under the thumb of the Soviet Union, they are free in their hearts.

Smith: And, of course, he’d been there. And Romania.
Warren: And you go there and you see the crowds and they love America and he’s America to them and they sing to him. And he hears stories about the churches. The Communist Party could not close the churches in the old town of Warsaw. Couldn’t do it. So, that’s what he was thinking.

Smith: But the stubbornness with which he refused to back off.

Warren: And the slowness of his staff, Henry in particular, to tell him the damage that can be done. It reminded me of a Nixon thing. Nixon spoke to a law enforcement group in Denver at the time that Manson and his team were in jail and going through the courts and they were not found guilty yet. But Nixon said, “Manson’s guilty.” And, of course, that’s the banner headline. But he was standing next to John Mitchell and Ziegler and they could have caught him as he left and said, “You’ve got to change that because that’s up to the courts.” And then Nixon could’ve come back and done it, but, no, they were afraid to do that for some reason. So, we had to fight that battle as Nessen had to fight the Polish battle for some time.

Smith: Is it fair to say, at least broadly speaking, that one way of looking at the Ford trajectory is as someone who is thrust into this office, very much a man of the Hill, who has to not necessarily unlearn that skill set, but has to learn a whole new skill set. Has to learn, first of all, what it means to be an executive and, secondly, what it means to be the president. He said the great frustration in ’76 was that he felt he’d just mastered the job when he lost it. Again, I’m not looking for compliments here, but would you buy the argument that, over those two plus years he learned to be president?

Warren: I do. I think he felt that his work across the aisle as Minority Leader and his friendship with the people on the Hill would carry through and he found quickly that it didn’t. There’s a story that I heard him tell – you may have heard it, too – about a prominent senator who I will not name coming to see Gerald Ford at Ford’s request. I don’t remember what the issue was, but it was a foreign policy issue, defense issue. And Ford really worked on it. He said, “This is really good for the country and you’re key here. You really have to go for this” And the guy said, “Okay, Mr. President. I’ll do that.”
And he gets in his car and he goes up to the Hill, he gets out in front of his office building and the photographers are there. And he told the reporters, well, the __________, “I can’t support that bill.” And Mr. Ford called him and he [the Senator] said, “You know, I just didn’t have the strength to do that.”

It was very disappointing to him [Mr. Ford], because he had learned on the Hill that your word is your bond and he had grown up with that. That’s one of the small town values that he grew up with. If you say you’re going to do it, you do it, no matter how it cost you. And he did. And he lived that. So, that was a great disappointment to him. As president, he did not have the influence over leaders in the House and Senate that he did when he was in Congress. And I think that was a great shock to him.

Smith: Of course, you have the Watergate Babies in ’74. I think the issue was decontrol of natural gas prices, and he had been duking it out over energy policy. At length, he got a handshake deal with Mansfield and Albert and they came back a week later and said, “I’m sorry. We can’t sell this to our membership.”

Warren: I’m sure that’s true.

Smith: Which, again, tells you, on top of everything else that he inherited, now he’s in this period when multiple rugs are being pulled out from under him.

Warren: Yeah, exactly. He learned that he had to speak to a different audience to move the country. He couldn’t speak to the leadership in that way anymore. And I think the WIN button was a part of the prior Hill-type mentality. That’s something the Republicans would do. They would show for the cameras a WIN button and he didn’t sense at that time that that wouldn’t work in the White House and it wouldn’t work with the American people. So, he had to learn how to use the power that goes with that office in a way to affect the American people.

Smith: It has been said by more than one whatever one thinks of Rumsfeld, that Rumsfeld in many ways was a very skillful tutor.
Warren: I think he did a brilliant job as chief of staff. Brilliant. He handled some of the personalities and he wasn’t a tough guy. He was firm with these folks, but he did it and he got the job done and he took over. He closed the door to the Oval Office.

Smith: The spokes of the wheel came off.

Warren: The spokes of the wheel came off. That’s right. And the man I replaced as director of communications was one of the last to go and it was rather difficult, but Rumsfeld did it. I think he was a brilliant chief of staff for Gerald Ford. He told a story at this chiefs of staff event that we put together at the University of California in San Diego. He was in the room with Gerald Ford when the – what was the name of the ship?

Smith: Mayaguez.

Warren: The Mayaguez event. And he said the President of the United States was talking directly to the skipper of the Mayaguez. Now, that had never been done before and I’m sure it hasn’t been done since, but that was a brave thing to do. And I know Rumsfeld had a hand in that to set up that communications link and it was good.

Smith: In the immediate aftermath of the pardon, it has been suggested that there were people on the Hill who were publicly outraged and condemning the president’s action, but who sent back channel messages to the effect that, you know, “You got us off the hook” or “Thanks for doing it.”

Warren: I would believe that. I don’t know that to be true, but I would believe that.

Smith: And then he goes out to California, right before the election, and everyone says, “Whatever you do, don’t visit Nixon.” And he visits Nixon.

Warren: Of course, he did. He was moved by something inside that had very little to do with the political machinations. That’s where the small town values come in.
Smith: The other side of that coin...we talked to Benton Becker. Ford was vice president when Earl Warren died. And Benton, who was politically to the left of Ford, had said, “You know, Mr. Vice President, it might be a nice gesture for you to go up to the Court and pay your respects.” And Ford thought for a minute and said, “Well, I don’t think the White House would be very happy.” And that’s where it was left. Becker learns later on, independently, that Ford had in fact gone up to the Court, placed a wreath in front of the casket. And sure enough, Nixon said some snide thing to him afterward.

Warren: I’m sure he was ticked off.

Smith: But Earl Warren, of course, had been chairman of the Warren Commission. So there was a personal connection there.

Warren: There was a connection. You know, speaking of the ’76 campaign and all, I think he was on to something with the economy. Ford was onto something with energy, and this was stuff that originated in the Nixon domestic council.

Smith: Deregulation.

Warren: Yes. And, so, a rather striking idea he was leaning toward was a gasoline tax, I think. Of course, that went by the wayside when Ronald Reagan rode out of the Right and challenged him.

Smith: Were they slow to take seriously a) the prospect of Reagan actually running and b) just how formidable an opponent Reagan might be.

Warren: I don’t know. I was away by that time. But I sensed they were. Somebody asked Jimmy Carter recently, “You’re very friendly with Gerald Ford. How did that come about?” And Carter said, “Well, we were both beaten by Ronald Reagan.”

Smith: I’ve often thought that that was a factor.

Warren: Oh, it was. No question.

Smith: And that they both resented the fact.
Warren: They resented the fact that he would not campaign, wouldn’t do anything. And then sort of was in the opposition. Had he campaigned for Gerald Ford, he’d be president. We would not have had Carter. We’d have had some solutions to the energy situation that we would still be feeling, I think. It’s just too bad.

Smith: Did you ever see Ford’s temper?

Warren: No.

Smith: The fall of Saigon, what was the mood like in and around the White House? Because, apparently, Kissinger was still trying to go down with all flags flying and get Congress to appropriate funds and all that.

Warren: The general feeling throughout my level in the White House – and, by that time, I was going to the seven o’clock meetings – was it was a Congress’s fault. That had Congress given the money that was necessary, that would not have happened. We were winning although people thought we were not. And Congress pulled the rug out. So, there was great bitterness at that point. They felt the dignity of the country had been tarnished because of Congress messing around in foreign policy too deeply. I mean, they had a role, they have to recognize that role.

Smith: At one point, he’s out in California, the timing could not have been worse. He was playing golf. Obviously the collapse was several weeks in the making. But it was becoming clear that Vietnam was collapsing. There’s that bizarre chase across the tarmac with Helen Thomas and others in full pursuit with microphones stuck in the president’s face. And he just didn’t want to address what was going on.

Warren: No, and he didn’t want to talk to the press anyway. His orders always were to keep the press away. Remember the famous incident in New Orleans when he pushed Ziegler?

Smith: Now, that’s Nixon we’re talking about.

Warren: Oh, the Ford chase.
Smith: Yes, during April of ’75 when Vietnam was collapsing and there was this seriocomic run across the tarmac, with pictures of Helen Thomas and others in full pursuit. I mean, it was unpresidential.

Warren: It was, but he didn’t know what else to do, I would guess. I wasn’t on that flight. But I would guess that he, you know ‘What do I do now? I’m not in a weak position, but I’m going to talk to some people before I can talk to the press.’

Smith: Is that a metaphor in some ways for the first few months of his presidency?

Warren: No, because he was so strong on certain things. He knew what he had to do to bring the country together, take care of the Nixon situation, and take the heat for that. But, in other things, he - in what we’re talking about earlier - the movement of the country toward his position, he was still learning that. And I personally think at that time, he also blamed the Congress and he’d been part of it.

Smith: Two quick things around that. This is so typical of Ford – if you’d just taken office under the circumstances he had and if you decided you wanted to undertake an amnesty program for Vietnam draft dodgers, you wouldn’t get in a plane and fly to the VFW convention to announce it. You know, you’d put out a press release on Friday afternoon when you were up in Camp David. But he did that. And I’ve always believed that that and the pardon should be seen as pieces of the same puzzle.

Warren: I do, too. I think he felt on the amnesty thing that he had to go to people who would be opposed and that he had to tell them why it was good for the country. And he had to go with his hat on, or whatever it was, and be one of them and tell them why. I always thought that was very strong. Very strong.

Smith: Jack Marsh told us a great story, which again illustrates the difference between the press then and now. The day before they went to Chicago, he walks into the Oval Office and said, “Mr. President, we’ve got some bad news.” He’d gotten a lot of bad news, so, “What now?” It turned out Steve had not registered for the draft on his eighteenth birthday. And he said Ford looked like he was gobsmacked. He just put his head in his hands. Well, before the day was over, they got General Hershey or whoever, they got it taken care of and the press never found out. But, can you imagine in today’s media climate – talk about overshadowing the real story.

Warren: I have thought often about how the situation would’ve been so much worse with today’s media climate and environment.

Smith: And then, after the fall of Saigon, when he got angry, remember when Congress wanted to pull the plug on money for resettling the refugees? Maybe that’s when he begins to learn about the power and the advocacy of the job. Because he put together this crazy quilt coalition and went to the country and basically shamed the Congress into restoring funds and bringing out about 100,000 in the first wave. I thought it was very moving when he died, the pieces in the press about the people who’d been part of that exodus, and who looked at him as their rescuer.

Warren: That’s interesting. You know, that really makes sense. His inclination was not to avoid the press. His inclination was to talk to them, show them he understood. As you know, he made very good friends in the press corps. Very good friends.

Smith: And unusual people. I was surprised that John Osborne was kind of an admirer. That’s surprising on the surface.

Warren: It is. Dick Growald was one of his favorites. Dick was a UPI reporter famed for his gustatorial achievements. And he got into a couple of jobs that he didn’t like, press handler for a big corporation. And then he went up to Sacramento. He was hired by my organization to run the paper we were trying to start in Sacramento. Well, he hated that. So, he called me and he called Pete Kaye and he said, “Get me out of this. I can’t do this.” So, we brought him down and gave him a job of putting some understanding in our coverage of the North County, which was our target circulation area. And it was clear that he wasn’t the old Dick Growald. He was failing, but he had it, he had it.
But he did crazy things. But Gerald Ford checked with him from time to time and before he died, he was leaving, he was going to live in New England with his brother so his brother could take care of him. And we had a little party for him, a going away party, and Gerald Ford came over from Palm Springs. And he really showed his warmth and his understanding of the press and the guys that come to the dinner every year know that, they feel that.

Smith: When did you leave?

Warren: I left in August of ’75.

Smith: Before the assassination attempts.

Warren: I didn’t want to go through another campaign and I had this job offer that I couldn’t turn down. And I went with his blessing and good feelings. Had a nice chat and the obligatory walk along the colonnade between the West Wing and the house. How many pictures were taken with presidents walking on that?

Smith: By that time, did he seem comfortable there?

Warren: Yes, he did. And he was jovial. There’s one anecdote that I love. He had a meeting of the top economic people, political people, and legislative people. The issue was going off the gold standard. A big issue. So, there was one man who should’ve been speaking up who was quiet. And so the President finally said, “Mr. Ash, what do you think about this?” And Mr. Ash [Roy Ash, director of the Office of Management and Budget] said, “Mr. President, I have to recuse myself from this conversation. I own the biggest gold mine in North America.” And Gerald Ford laughed. He thought that was wonderful.

Smith: He had a sense of humor.

Warren: Yeah, he did.

Smith: Did you have much contact with Mrs. Ford?

Warren: More than I thought I was going to.
Smith: For example, at the time of the breast cancer surgery, that must’ve posed a unique kind of challenge.

Warren: Well, it did. When Nessen said, “She’s going to come over to the press corps and talk about this.” I said, “Well, we’d better think about that.” Nessen said, “It’s too late. She’s coming.” And, boy, did she make a name for herself in that press conference that she possibly hadn’t had before. She’d gone through the conquering of alcohol and openness about that and pills and now she’s talking about something that most women don’t want anybody to know about. And it was very moving and it really moved the press corps. I thought that was one of the bravest things I’d ever seen a First Lady do. She had grit and determination.

Smith: Were you aware of what euphemistically was referred to as her ‘problem’ while you were in the White House? Was that something that people talked about?

Warren: Early on, I was. It was a problem that certain people were concerned about would become known and how would we handle it. And she handled it. Bless her heart.

Smith: But, of course, that was after they left. I mean, did it cause problems?

Warren: No.

Smith: No.

Warren: No, because she was very careful, very careful. Talk about First Ladies being careful - I rode the helicopter once with President and Mrs. Nixon to the airport from some event in the country. I got up early and Pat was in there with curtains drawn, smoking. And there were some in the press who suspected this, but no one wrote about her smoking and I think there were some that might’ve suspected the alcohol problem, but they so admired Mrs. Ford. And rightly so.

Smith: And the kids? Were they around much? Susan was, of course.
Warren: Susan was around a lot and I talked to her some. I got to know Jack who ended up in San Diego. A story about Susan that I love: Clem Conger, who was the procurer of historic artifacts for the White House—

Smith: And something of a landmark in his own right.

Warren: Yeah. Mr. _____. She [Susan] wanted a brass bed, a four poster brass bed and he couldn’t find one. He finally tracked one down in some woman’s house in Iowa and he went out there and he talked her into donating that to the White House. So, Susan got her bed. That story came from Rex Scouten and from Clem Conger.

Smith: You obviously had contact with him after he was out of office.

Warren: I did.

Smith: In ’80, that crazy momentary flirtation with the vice presidency—

Warren: Oh, that was so disappointing. It really was. It was so uncharacteristic and he hurt his reputation. It wasn’t in a lasting way, but momentarily.

Smith: It’s funny, people forget it was Cronkite who used the phrase ‘co-presidency’ and Ford, being Ford, just kind of politely—Warren: He wouldn’t refute Walter.

Smith: Bill Timmons, being the guy who was in the middle of this, was literally typing up the agreement. And he said, “I will go to my grave knowing there was no co-presidency.” I’ve often wondered if there was an element in Ford - maybe it’s a little bit the Eagle Scout, the seeing the good in everyone - but almost an element of passivity.

Warren: No, I don’t think it was passive. I think it stems from something that the minister said at Gerald Ford’s funeral, that Gerald Ford lived his life by the two great commandments and by the great commission to love thy neighbor. The commandments are love God and love your neighbor as yourself. And the commission is to go out and love your neighbor. And I think Ford lived by that. I think the minister was absolutely right and he tended to give the other person the benefit of the doubt, and not to embarrass or refute them.

Smith: That’s interesting. I only heard him speak disparagingly about two people and the worst he could come up with was “He’s a bad man.”

Warren: That’s very bad.

Smith: Yeah. One was John Dean and the other was Gordon Liddy.

Warren: Well, that fits.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of reaction when he died?

Warren: Yes, I was.

Smith: Because he’d been out of the public eye for quite awhile.

Warren: I was so pleased, but I was surprised. I loved being at that funeral. I was honored to be there and I loved what Brokaw said. I loved what Henry said. It was good. And, you know, I was sitting next to some people who remembered and every one of them said, “He deserves this. We may not have thought of it earlier, but he deserves this.” And he does.

Smith: Time was good to Gerald Ford. He lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his viewpoint on the pardon.

Warren: Yeah, that’s right.

Smith: And then, of course, the crowning event was the Profiles in Courage award from the Kennedys. He said, “For twenty years, everywhere I go, people ask the same question.” He said, “Since that event, they don’t ask the question anymore.”

Warren: No, that’s right. That was the seal of approval. Well, he did grow in retirement. I’m not going to say he mellowed because he was always mellow, I think. But he grew in tolerance of other people and he grew in appreciation for what other people did. The trip over to [say farewell to] Growald was an example of that. He didn’t have to do that, but he wanted to pay respects. He knew Growald was dying.

Smith: I’d love to explore that a bit. In the eulogy that I did in Grand Rapids, I pointed out the fact that most of us tend to get a little more conservative with age. In his case, I don’t think it was simply that he stayed where he was while the Party went off to the Right. I’ve always wondered how much Mrs. Ford was a factor in that. You wonder how much having kids and then grandchildren sort of keeping you in touch was a factor. But it’s not just abortion. To this day, he’s the only president who signed a petition for gay rights.

Warren: You know, I think you’re on to something with Betty’s influence, because when Betty built that wonderful recovery center in Palm Desert, that brought them into the recovery world and this fits in the recovery world. Forget politics. Do the right thing. Take the indicated step. And I think that rubbed off on Gerald Ford. I know it did on me.

Smith: You saw all these people in his circle, people of accomplishment, who had this problem. It was seen as a problem rather than a moral failing.

Warren: It was a disease. Clearly. And Betty knew that and Gerald Ford knew that, but there are some principles of recovery which really fit Gerald Ford’s template. I know I moved politically after I got back to San Diego. I moved more than my publisher wanted me to move. Certainly more than my Nixon friends wanted me to move. And they think I’m a flaming liberal now. I’m not, but you’re right. The Party left me, but I also was moving at the same time. And I think Gerald Ford was, too.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Warren: Oh, when was it? No, I don’t. I don’t. The last time I talked to him was the event for Dick Growald in San Diego. I had seen him at various events, mainly funerals, you know, while he was still alive. And we just sort of said ‘hello’.
Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Warren: I think he should be remembered, not as a self-effacing man, but as a selfless man. As a man who put integrity before self. And I think integrity was a very strong issue for Gerald Ford. He saw the breakdown in his predecessor’s problem and he wanted to show the country that there is another way to govern and that he could do it. And he did it. He had a few blips, but he did it primarily. He will be remembered as a healer and as a man who didn’t have a chance to show us everything he had. He didn’t do something like Nixon or Clinton, certainly, but he was denied the chance to really show us who he was. And I think people will remember that.

Smith: He said it took him awhile to bounce back from his loss in 76. People who were there told us that for days, maybe weeks, he went around saying, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Warren: Yeah, well, most of us couldn’t believe that. But, you know, he could’ve done things that were safe and appealed to the majority of his Party and perhaps survived. He could’ve handled the Polish thing differently and that would’ve helped. But he still would’ve done the pardon.

Smith: And that brings me to the final thing. The debate has gone on, obviously, for thirty-five years about the political consequences of pardoning Richard Nixon. Imagine the country during those two and a half years if he hadn’t pardoned Richard Nixon. [Not!]

Warren: I have imagined that and he certainly did. The country’s business would not have been conducted. Certainly wasn’t conducted before the pardon. As you pointed out, he went to Congress with all these substantive issues to talk about, to the press, and they didn’t want to talk about it. It’s similar to my experience that last six months of the Nixon administration. I would go to all the meetings. I would be prepared on everything that was happening and all the major issues. And I would hand out a sheet of paper that told about a major issue and they [the reporters] didn’t care. They didn’t care. That’s the way it would’ve been, and he couldn’t have done anything except try to answer for his predecessor. Look at how the G.W. Bush situation has affected American politics today. Some Democrats are still running against George Bush. And they would be running against Richard Nixon and they would lump Gerald Ford in with Richard Nixon and they would’ve missed the opportunity to see a great man [GRF] with great values in the presidency.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: Let me just throw one out from left field. Tell us something surprising about Gerald Ford, something that people who think they know him might be surprised to learn. Character traits, or anything.

VanderTill: A couple of things come to mind immediately - his forgiving nature. It’s not easy to make stupid mistakes, I’ve done a few and I know that on one or two occasions, I really did stupid things. I got caught up in the heat of the moment and he forgave me for that. He didn’t come right and say, “Gordon, I’ll forgive you for that.” But we just passed it right by.

Smith: How did you know you were forgiven?

VanderTill: Everything just went on as it had been. He didn’t make me do penance or anything like that. But I realized what I had done was really stupid. You know when you really screw up, and I did. I thought this is a real man who forgives me like that. I always had a great deal of respect for Mr. Ford – or Jerry. But when he forgave me for my transgression, I knew what a man he really was. Some people would beat the tar out of you if you screwed up like I had done.

Smith: Particularly powerful people in a position of authority.

VanderTill: Right. And he was an ordinary human being. And I loved him for that.

Smith: When did you first meet?

VanderTill: That’s a question that I don’t think I have any idea – except that I know we came to talk at one time at a meeting in Grand Rapids for the Republican conference. It was going to be a meeting, I think, in one of the areas that was open for Republican people who met for whatever was going on at the state conference. I knew that I had talked to Frank Meyer and he said, “Now, Gordon, Mr. Ford wants to talk with you, about maybe he wants you to come to work for him.” I said, “That’s really interesting.” Since I just had my degree from the U of M, a master’s degree, I said, “Yes, I’d be glad to talk to him. How are we going to arrange this?” So I went to talk with him. I’d known who Jerry Ford was for a long time. I had no idea how much money – where, how, whatever – a whole bunch of things. And so we had a chance to sit down and talk. So that was my first real opportunity to sit down and kick some ideas around with him.

Smith: And what was your background that led you to that encounter?

VanderTill: My encounter that led to that, I think, was when I was a student at Calvin College. That year, every year, there would be an award available to a senior level student for what Jerry Ford called the Ford Workshop in Politics, a little twist on the words. It was kind of fun. I was looking for work because I was married and didn’t know what I was going to do next, etc. So I talked to my instructor in political science, Joe Westra, and I said, “What’s this thing about a Ford Workshop in Politics? What’s this thing about?” He said, “Boy, that’s a lucky thing if you could get that.” I said, “Well, what’s that?” He said, “Well, it’s really very simple. You have to be approved by the president of the college and I have to recommend you to the president of the college. Then if they approve it, it goes to Mr. Ford and then he makes a decision yes or no. Yes, you’d be okay and then you’d come to Washington, D.C. and then you’d work there and you get paid for two months. I’d been working in the grocery store for years. How wonderful, what a gift! It was like a gift from God.

Smith: Was that your first trip to DC?

VanderTill: That was not my first trip to DC, but it was my first working job. And I had been to DC as a kid. My parents were patriotic people; we had gone to Washington, DC on a trip out to the East Coast and we had stopped out there. I don’t remember all the details of that, it’s been several decades. And so I talked to my wife and I said that I might have a chance to get paid in this. We decided I would talk to Mr. Ford during the state political conference, and then we’ll talk about whatever. And so we talked. Mr. Ford said, “Well, you know, you’re going to have to get to Washington on your own, and after that you’ll have to find a place to lodge for a while.
If the president of the school recommends you, then you will be the summer student.” President Spoelhof, who just passed away about ten days ago, was the president of the college and recommended me. A great man, by the way. So that got done and fortunately for me, the previous summer school I had met a fellow by the name of Bos, B-O-S was his last name. Ronald Bos and his wife Myrna, and they were from the suburban Maryland area, he was a teacher and we had sort of been friendly, like for lunch, or we’d have coffee together. And Ron had said to me one time, “You know, sometime you ought to come see us in Washington.” He knew I was interested in political science and one thing and another. So I called him up and said, “Guess what, Ron? I’m going to Washington.” And I got to stay with the family for a couple of weeks.

Smith: When was this?

VanderTill: Oh, this would have been about 1966, approximately.

Smith: Was he House Minority Leader by that point?

VanderTill: I believe Ford was, yes.

Smith: What did you see of him that summer?

VanderTill: Well, I saw him when I walked in and said, “Hi, I’m Gordon VanderTill.” We shook hands. He said, “Now, Frank is going to give you some idea on things he wants to have done.” Frank Meyer.

Smith: Was he the AA?

VanderTill: AA? Yes, Frank was the AA, and so we talked and sat down. He showed me where I would have a desk, H230. I’ll never forget those offices. Beautiful spot, looks out over the mall.

Smith: Now, is this in the Capitol building, itself?

Smith: Because it was the Minority Leader’s office you were in? You weren’t in a constituent office, his Michigan office.
VanderTill: No, I was right across the hall from the House Foreign Affairs office, and there were a few other students out there from – I don’t think they were from Calvin – but there were other students who had come and applied to be summer students. There was a gang of boys and girls, so to speak, and we were busy writing letters to individuals who had written to the Congressman.

Smith: Now, I take it answering the mail was a religious duty. It was a top priority.

VanderTill: Frank Meyer had quite a presence, yes. He was an incredible man.

Smith: Tell us about him.

VanderTill: He was about your size, as I mentioned when you came in. He was originally from the Grand Haven area, had taught at, I think, the Christian school system there. One of the things I found out from Frank as I had gotten to know him a little bit; he told me a little story about what happened when he had finally been offered a chance, an opportunity, to become Ford’s AA in Washington. Frank said, “Yes, it was really something to hear about. Some of the little old ladies from the church were there after the services in the morning, and they were talking about you, Frank.” “Oh,” said Frank, “is that so?” He was very humble, by the way. He said, “Oh, I hope they said something good.” Well, we chucked. And then one of the little Dutch ladies said, “You know, I heard that Frank Meyer now is going to go work for Congressman Ford in Washington, DC. Can’t you imagine such an outlandish, astounding event?” “Oh, yes,” said the woman, “I’ve known Frank a long time. He was such a fine Christian man.” And Frank just burst out laughing about these comments about him, not that he didn’t take Christianity seriously, because he did. But he thought, what a connection, he used to be such a fine, Christian man and now he’s in government. And, in fact, that was sort of the way the Dutch people used to be.

Smith: That’s interesting. We’ll do a detour because part of this is trying to get a sense of the political culture that produced Gerald Ford. Clearly it’s a culture that is largely gone, or certainly transformed. We’re trying to get a sense of just how pervasive the Dutch influence was in this area; how it manifested itself politically and otherwise.
VanderTill: Well, I really can’t speak for all of them, but the people were always interested in politics and government, it seemed like. But it’s nothing that you should ever make into any kind of career, whatsoever. And you probably shouldn’t go to Washington, DC, to the wicked city. To live there? Probably not even a Christian Reformed Church there.

Smith: We’ve been told about backsliders who on a Saturday night, would go out and buy the Sunday paper. They wouldn’t read it until Monday.

VanderTill: Oh, they’d buy it on Saturday. Bob Vander Laan and I would go out to Seymour Square Saturday evening. Yes. Actually, a little before that, but late in the day, so they wouldn’t have to buy the Sunday paper. Of course, Bob was a state senator then and he was sort of a godfather to me as far as getting me involved in government and politics and one thing and another.

Smith: Presumably their conservatism was financial.

VanderTill: Oh yes.

Smith: And that dovetailed neatly – Ford was always a fiscal conservative.

VanderTill: True.

Smith: He did fit in very neatly with that prevailing culture?

VanderTill: I would say so, that he would; it was a good fit.

Smith: Because I wonder, over time, and as his horizons broadened, and as he became more and more of a national figure, you have sense of him – well, look, he came home from the war and took on this entrenched moss-back, who was the quintessence of isolationism.

VanderTill: He was a Christian Reform moss-back, Sherman St. Reformed Church.

Smith: And, indeed, it has been convincingly argued that the reason he didn’t marry Mrs. Ford before the primary was because of the political ramifications of marrying a divorcee.
VanderTill: She was probably a dancer and a cover girl and all those other things. By the same token, I think you have to look at Jerry’s parents; Jerry Ford, Sr. and, of course, Jerry’s real mom. And I think that was a moderating influence.

Smith: How so? That’s interesting.

VanderTill: Well, you know, Senior and Jerry’s mom were very tight. And they loved each other very much. If the divorce was a bad thing, then there are all kinds of things that are bad. And the fact that they lived the way that they did, as well as they did, and the way that they worked together and worked out their marriage and the other children, and the respect that was shown to Jerry and the other brothers, and the way Dad treated them all the same, was a moderating influence against the big prohibition against divorce.

Smith: When you stop to think, after all, his mother had gotten a divorce.

VanderTill: Well, because she was treated very poorly.

Smith: Did he ever talk about that?

VanderTill: No. I have read about it, but only very limited, and it’s a very personal thing. I have also been through divorce a couple of times. It’s a difficultly in the Dutch Reformed area. Probably not so much today as we do presently.

Smith: One senses that he may have very well gotten his interest in politics from his dad. Wasn’t his father politically active?

VanderTill: Yes. I think he was the chairman of the local party.

Smith: And wasn’t he anti-Frank McKay? Wasn’t that part of the dynamic?

VanderTill: Frank who?

Smith: Tell us about Frank McKay. He has a building named after him in Grand Rapids.

VanderTill: Yes. I read a book one time, quite by accident, at the U of M and it was about Frank D. McKay. He was referred to as “The Boss” and he was probably a little bit like in the case of Harry Truman. Very similar boss control situation there. And Frank McKay was thought of as “The Boss.” He was in charge of the politics and the real irony of the whole thing was that when Ford, Jr., or Junie as they used to call him – I never called him Junie – the decision that he was going to run for Congress against the Hollander…

Smith: Bartel Jonkman.

VanderTill: Bartel J-O-N-K-M-A-N. Well, when Ford decided to run against Bartel, I suspect that it may have been a little bit against Gerald R Ford, Sr.’s wishes, what his son was doing. As a matter of respect to Gerald Ford, Sr., Jerry Ford used to on all his official statements, letters and responses, signed as Gerald R. Ford, Jr., out of respect to his parents, and to his dad especially. After his father passed away he dropped using the Jr.

Smith: Were they close?

VanderTill: Senior and junior? Yes, I would say so, although I did not look at that in great depth on that, but, to me, yes. And the other - Jerry’s real father who came to visit at a diner in the South High area where Jerry was working as a bus boy-diner. We’ve all heard some instances. Jerry, Jr. never had much respect for or time for the other man – Jerry’s father – natural born father, I guess would be the right way to say it. There was a major dismissal of that whole thing. It seems as though the man came to see his son, to make sure his son was doing okay. And then that was it. That was about the way it went. And Gerald, Senior and Gerald, Junior seemed to have a very close relationship.

Smith: What do you think he got from his mother? I’ll preface that by the famous story where she literally died in a church pew on a Sunday morning. And when they went back to her place, they found her calendar, her datebook, filled for the next month, or something like that.

VanderTill: I’m not aware of that, no. But I’m not sure I totally understand your question.

Smith: Well, there are people who see his drive and ambition, and they saw that in his mother.

VanderTill: Yes. That one thing is apparent if you go back to any of the Ford papers, and all the papers that were kept, and if you look back to the days when Ford had sufficient staff to run the operation when he was Minority Leader, he had George Willis, I think, was the man who took care of all the papers and kept the scrapbooks. It was very important to Gerald R. Came right off his mother’s page. And that was done, as far as I know, forever on the Ford staff. It was a trait that Jerry always kept. It was not a matter of ego; it was a matter of record.

Smith: That’s interesting.

VanderTill: I was surprised initially when I worked as a summer intern, to encounter this. I said, “How come he’s doing that?” Well, it makes sense. If somebody is going to quote you better have it written down.

Smith: We all know he wanted to be Speaker of the House.

VanderTill: Yes.

Smith: How burning a desire was that? And how frustrating was it to fall short? Is it why he went on the road all those nights and made all those speeches and ate all those rubber chicken dinners? Was it all because he wanted to be Speaker?

VanderTill: I was on a Ford campaign trip with him one time, and we went out west.

Smith: Was he still in the House?

VanderTill: He was in the House. Trying to build members, looking for a way to continue to build the majority. He was not looking to become Speaker, persae, but to make sure that the Republican perspective was going to have some clearance. I think that was always in his mind about being Speaker. God bless us, we could have had Nancy Pelosi instead. Oh, my.

Smith: What was the trip like? What was he like on the road? Was he different at all on the road from back in the office?

VanderTill: No. He was an ordinary guy. Wonderful man. We were on a private airplane from Grand Rapids. We left on a Sunday morning; we were on our way to Montana, as I recall. I don’t remember the numbers, they had one term and they were looking to get back in again. The plane had no plumbing facilities inside and I had way too much coffee that morning to get on the plane. When we got off the plane I thought I was going to bust right open. That was an incredible trip. We were also in New Mexico on that trip and a couple of other states out there in the west.

Smith: You learn a lot about people when you travel with them.

VanderTill: Especially if you don’t have a commode.

Smith: What did you learn about Jerry Ford?

VanderTill: I have been able to expand the level of knowledge which I have used several times over in dealing with the people who thought Jerry Ford was clumsy and fell down the steps of the Air Force One. And I said, “Listen, now I have traveled with this man and I can tell you he’s going to be carrying a briefcase. In his briefcase you’ll find a pipe or two, there will be some tobacco in there, and a package of Clorets gum. Clorets gum. Well, you know, Mr. Ford liked to have a little drink. He would have maybe a little bit of – I don’t remember what his favorite was anymore. But he’d have a little snifter. And he’d have some smoke on the pipe. And I said, if you watch that film on what happened when Ford fell down those steps coming out of Air Force One, he didn’t have any problem that he was clumsy. He said, “What do you mean?” I said, “Well, the reason was that he stumbled was that he’d had a little snifter. He wanted to have a little whiskey and he didn’t want it on his breath because he didn’t want to offend people with it on his breath. And he knew that if he smoked his pipe that would make his breath smell also. And he got down to the bottom step and that was it, the one he missed.” And I had a chance to try that with several people. He was not clumsy. He was very solid. Fact is, we played football. The campaign of 1970, I think – still had a pretty good arm, in fact.

Smith: And that was the presidential campaign.

VanderTill: No, this was at South Field and we did some video cassette work with young people talking about Vietnam.

Smith: ’72 maybe?

VanderTill: May have been ’70, yes. Ford was still very good, very adroit. Very athletic and in good shape.
Smith: Was he good with young people?

VanderTill: Yes, very much. We had one guy we didn’t like a whole bunch. He name was Maki. I don’t know if you are acquainted with that. Are you acquainted with that story?

Smith: No.

VanderTill: Oh, my gosh. This was when we were at 425 Cherry, which was where the Ford office was. And we had a few rabble-rousers in town, young people who were anti-Vietnam, anti-war, anti-anti-anti, etc.

Smith: And presumably anti-Ford?

VanderTill: Yes. We were working in the Grand Rapids office and Ford was there and Trix Tikenberg was there. Do you remember Trix? No you don’t remember Trix. She was one of our secretaries. She should be mentioned. One week before Jerry was there, we got a call from the police department. Said you're going to have a little bit of a dustup over there at 425 Cherry. They want to come and talk to you about what’s going to happen. Rabble-rousers are going to cause you trouble. So we talked about it, how we are going to do this, they're going to send this big man in the room, in the waiting area. And this big plainclothes cop. We had somebody there, just to make sure everything was going okay.

We made arrangements for when the police were going to be there. Fact is, I don’t remember the name of the detail officer, but I remember that he was a Hollander, a big Hollander guy, and we had a bunch of these rabble-rousers come in and talk at us and just splitting up nonsense. I don’t recall that Ford was actually in there at the time, but there were other ordinary citizens like the rest of us who were there. They wanted to listen. They heard these kids talking about Vietnam and when at five o’clock the big bull decided that it was time to close the door. “How late do you stay open there, Mr. VanderTill?” “Well, usually about five o’clock we close.” “Okay, we’ll close the door.”
They pushed the rest of these kids out the door at 425 Cherry. I didn’t think much of it and we locked the door and left. The next day when I came in, huge stones had been thrown through this plate glass window. What in the world is going on here? So we called the landlord and called the police department, and we had some conversations with the landlord. He came in and he said, “You’re probably going to have to find another place to get you an office here.” And I said, “Excuse me, are you going to kick us out of the Congressman’s office here? You going to give this chief Republican from the U.S. Congress – you’re going to ask him to leave your offices here?” So I tried to do a shame job on him, and it worked. He decided to let us stay there.

Smith: What did Ford think of all this?

VanderTill: Ford wasn’t in on it.

Smith: But you must have kept him informed or he must have known that there had been violence committed against his office.

VanderTill: I can’t remember how that happened. I may have talked to Frank, I don’t know.

Smith: It’s clear that there was a period of turmoil. Do you know if he was having arguments within his own family about Vietnam?

VanderTill: Probably, I don’t know. I don’t know how that came out with the staff, how it worked out or whatever.

Smith: Now, you mentioned Frank again. Was he in DC?

VanderTill: I don’t recall that he was, but I don’t know.

Smith: What was your role at this point in the office? What was your function?

VanderTill: Well, we were there to listen to these people come in and rant and rave at us.

Smith: So you were a member of the staff.

VanderTill: I was the staff director.
Smith: How had you gone from that internship, that summer job, to become a fulltime staffer?

VanderTill: We didn’t make that jump, did we? No. We could do that. After that summer internship I got back to Calvin and I had spent some time with people at the state government level set up by Bob Vander Laan. He was a friend of mine for a long time, and a state senator. I said, “What are we going to do next?” He said, “Well, Gordon, are you going to law school or what are you going to do?” And I wasn’t sure about this or that or whatever, and decided that I would talk to some people. And so I had more people who had greater fidelity to what really happens to their lives. Are they working for government service, are they working for politicians, are they doing this and that or whatever?

I talked with Jack, whose last name is long gone, who was George Romney’s legal counsel. I spent some time talking with him, he said, “What is it you want to do, VanderTill? You want to go to law school, or what are you going to do?” And I said, “Well…” Yakked with him a little bit back and forth, and then I said, “Well, I’m really interested in government and politics and I think that what I should do is go into law school and that would be a good way for me to go this way.” He said, “Well, do you want to be a lawyer?” And I said, “Oh, I don’t know. Maybe.” And he said, “Well, if you want to be a lawyer, that’s why you should go to law school. And if you don’t want to go to law school, then you shouldn’t go to law school.”

So we sort of filtered that one out. This other fellow - who was the head of the Department of Commerce in Michigan at the time, his name was Dion – and I had time to sit with him and talk. It turned out that he had been a student at the U of M also and there was an alternative that I could possibly use by getting a master’s degree in public administration. A MPA degree. They thought it would be a good idea, and I decided to do that. So that’s how I got into doing that kind of work. At that point – this is a long story – it’s a lifetime.

Well, at any rate, I was very much involved in looking for employment; I was married. I decided that one place that I was really interested in was the Central Intelligence Agency. CIA. We had a letter from the CIA that indicated that they had known of my history in the Army Security Agency and they were interested in people like me. And so I was rather intrigued by that notion. How things might have turned differently, you know? I ended up going to Washington, DC. I also was interested in the National Security Agency, NSA in Fort Meade. I had spoken with them in Washington. On my own I went down and interviewed with them. I decided I didn’t like the cut of their jib, so to speak, and what they were hiring mostly were Georgia Tech graduates involved in their master’s degree programs in math and things of that nature. I decided I didn’t want that NSA thing.

I then ended up spending time with CIA people. In fact, of all things in the world, the CIA had a office in Ann Arbor, Michigan in an office building. This is when everybody hated the CIA, it was crazy. I had talked with them and I’d gotten okay, buy me a ticket or whatever. So I went to CIA to interview with them there, also. I found the interior look of me and how they were looking at themselves and how I was watching how they were doing whatever they were doing and I found it very intriguing. Their approach to more secretive was CIA than it was with NSA (?). They said you go get yourself a ticket and fly on down to Washington. Such and such a hotel and they’ll pick you up in the morning on this bus at such and such a place. It was all very vague. They said, “Keep good records and we’ll pay you back for whatever it costs.” So I said, “Okay, I’ll just write it down.”

I went through several days of interrogation by CIA. Now if anybody were to listen to this, they’d probably say, no, that’s not the way he did it. That’s just not how it happened, that sounds like a big story he made up. I didn’t. So they said to do this and do this, and then you’ve got to go over to this office over here and you’ve got to make up a story for whoever you are going to tell about who you are working for if we offer you a job. I said, “What are you talking about?” They said, “Well, you’re not going to tell anybody you’ve just gone to work for the CIA.”

Smith: Need a cover.
VanderTill: So, I was going to be a DAC in the Department of the Army (?), and we made up all kinds of stories, then this woman gave me a list of money that I had spent on this trip to DC. And how much did I spend, and where did I go and what did I do, etc., etc., Then I went in this wire cage about the size of this dining area, and unlocked the door and in I went. There was this woman sitting there with buckets of money. (How your government works.) And she said, “Well, I see that came out to $145. Here you are, Mr. VanderTill, thank you very much. Have a good trip home. Bye.” It’s like, Joni doesn’t probably believe any of this, but it’s all true. It was an incredible experience, just incredible. I didn’t take the job as it turned out. I ended up going to the U of M and applying to the public administration program.

Smith: Today it would probably be at the Ford school.

VanderTill: Well, now, yes. We’ll get to that irony in a minute. This was – I’ve gotten it written down someplace, I can’t remember, but it’s the advanced degree and whatever for everybody who wanted to get a degree in public administration. That’s the course that I followed – for those who wanted to be city managers. I used to call it How to be a City Manger in Six Easy Lessons. A little bit of daring about that.

Smith: So from municipal government to Gerald Ford and U of M, how did that transpire?

VanderTill: Well, I was at the U of M; I was one of a small number of people who were competing for a fellowship. And I won one of those. I guess a fellow turned out to be a good friend of mine. Then I was working there as a fellow to the Michigan Municipal League. John Honeywell was the man who was in charge, my boss at that time. I was doing the wage and salary summary. Went out to all the members of the Municipal League so that they knew how much money and what the benefits can have for their people, etc. So I did that. Where did I go from there? This is a painful process, you know?

Smith: Did Ford run into you or ask you, in effect, to come back? Because obviously he remembered you from your days – the summer job.

VanderTill: Yes. I’m not sure on that. I’m trying to think how that finally came out to be.
Smith: And what was the job that you took with him when you first went to work fulltime? Were you in Grand Rapids or were you in Washington?

VanderTill: I was in Grand Rapids.

Smith: In the constituent office?

VanderTill: Well, I was not, no, when I took the job. I had finished my master’s degree and I don’t remember exactly how – oh I know. After my master’s degree I was working Constituent Services for Bob Vander Laan, in the state’s senate. And I got involved with Emil Lockwood also, who was the senate Republican leader. I had one day off from work because I was ill, and when I came in the next day, I talked to Bob Vander Laan. He said, “Now, Vander Laan, Gordon, tomorrow when Emil Lockwood is going to be here, he’s going to want to talk to you for a while about something.” I thought that was interesting. “Well, I think he has a job he wants you to do.” I thought, “Really.” He said, “Don’t say no just because of me.” Whatever. Vanderlin and I were good friends and go back for many campaigns and whatever.

So I ended up talking to Emil Lockwood and he said, “The Nixon people have just asked me to be the head of the Nixon Committee for Michigan.” I think that was 1968. “So, we’re going to want you to run the office, and we’re going to work on this and do this and this.” I had never run a statewide campaign of anything. So that’s how that started. We got involved in a whole host of issues and it was a very difficult campaign. We were there before – in fact, as I can relate back to the recent Republican campaign we just had here. We had no money. We couldn’t raise any money. We didn’t have any material to pass out to people. It was just a mess. In fact, I have a report that I wrote based on how they screwed up the campaign. Not because I was so wise, but because they didn’t do it the right way. The President campaigned. Had no chance for this last one. Part of the problem is you can’t run a good campaign with no money. After the campaign was over, after Nixon was chosen as the candidate, as the Republican candidate for the year, I was looking at the Plum Book. You know what the Plum Book is?

Smith: No.
VanderTill: I wanted to maybe get a job working for the federal government for the Republican candidate, the Nixon people and company. Well, I didn’t know what rascals they were, but we found that out. One of the people that I had met along life’s way was another Ford. His name was Tom. I had worked with Tom in his last campaign for re-election to the state House.

Smith: Was he close to his brother?

VanderTill: I thought so, yes. I would say so.

Smith: Were they similar in their political outlooks?

VanderTill: Pretty much, yes. They were pretty much on the same view, so to speak. Tom was a decent guy. Had a good time. Oh, the way we campaigned those days – what a change now. We had a sound car. Tom’s campaign was, in the primary, against a mayor of Kenwood. What’s his name, Joan? Tom? No? Pete. Pete Lambert. Good man. Tom beat him. So anyway, I’m working in Lansing and at that time I spent some time talking to Tom. I said, “You know, I worked on this Nixon campaign. I put all this time in. I’ve got this Plum Book and I’d like to have a job someplace.” Tom says, “Oh, yes. That seems reasonable. A good idea.” I said, “Maybe some night when you talk to Jerry on the phone you could talk to him about it.” Tom got back to me and he said, “I talked to Jerry and he said, ‘Good one. Good idea.’” That was like “Oh wow.” I didn’t know I had the cojones to do that, but anyway, I did. After that I didn’t get any offers that were worth a nickel. And what did I do at that time for working? I think I may have worked for Vander Laan, but I’m not sure at that point what I was doing. What else did I do, Joan? Anything? We miss anything?

Smith: But I’m still trying to get you to Ford.

VanderTill: Oh to Ford. Well, I think Ford probably said something to the rascals who were running the campaign, but it was certainly nothing much. So, how did I end up with Ford’s staff? I went back to work on Vander Laan’s staff and I got a call from Frank Meyer again. I picked up the phone and it was Frank Meyer, and he said, “Hey, Gordon, how are you doing? What’s happening? What are you doing now? Are you doing anything?” Then Frank said, “Gordon, Mr. Ford and I have been thinking that maybe we should have somebody fulltime in Grand Rapids. Sort of working that office for him.” And that’s how that came about.

Smith: Okay. Now, did you stay in Grand Rapids, or did you go to DC to work?

VanderTill: No, I was living in Lansing, when when I went to DC, sort of a covering talking to, and discussing what’s going to happen here. So Frank says, “We want you to go over and see the Veterans Administration. Then you can go over here and over there and talk to those people.” Frank was setting up other appointments for me to meet people and talk about what goes on, etc., etc.

Smith: Was that in anticipation of your going to work in DC?

VanderTill: No, in Grand Rapids.

Smith: I want to understand, you ran the office in Grand Rapids. Did you ever work in DC? In the DC office?

VanderTill: Other than that summer internship. That was it.

Smith: Let me ask you, because here’s a man who is politically secure, doesn’t have to worry about getting re-elected; but apparently much more than, say, his counterpart today, made a point of still coming home.

VanderTill: Right. He did, indeed.

Smith: Tell us about that. Why did he do it and what did he do when he was here?

VanderTill: Well, some people thought that Ford was getting big britches and there was just enough nattering away about that and he didn’t want that to happen. He didn’t want people to think that. So he wanted to have somebody local here. Jerry and I talked about it. He said, “We’ve got to make sure that we have somebody here who can keep us attuned to what’s going on, what do they hear about, what’s going on in politics? Do you need somebody to do this?” and whatever. So I think it was not so much that he was fearful, but he wanted to make sure that he was covering the scene, so to speak.

Smith: Did he ever have a primary challenge?
VanderTill: I don’t remember that he did.

Smith: And was he ever seriously challenged in November?

VanderTill: Yes, well that was Jean McKee.

Smith: And who was she? Why did she pose a serious challenge?

VanderTill: Well, because she had a lot of money from the unions. That was one. Plus she had at least one or two people who could do things about politics. Jim Riekse. He was pretty good.

Smith: And he took that challenge seriously?

VanderTill: Ford did, yes. In fact, at that point I would not let him not take it seriously. Not because I was so wise, but because what I decided to do was to convince him and others that we needed to have a better campaigning operation. One of them was Jack Stiles. Yes, you heard that name. Yes.

Smith: Tell us, because he seems to be at the local level in some ways as important, and polarizing a figure as Bob Hartmann was in the Washington office.

VanderTill: Very much, yes.

Smith: Parallel?

VanderTill: Yes, like that.

Smith: But what does it tell you about Ford, that he was comfortable with these people who were controversial?

VanderTill: The word is smart. You know who your enemy is or where and what he or she is doing and is up to it. Now, having said that, Hartmann was not an enemy of Ford, nor was Jack Stiles. They were buddies from the Navy, for crying out loud. And it was a wonderful combination, those two. They were something else. If you had a buddy and you wanted to go and raise hell at night, let’s go out and get drunk or whatever – well, they didn’t do that, but that kind of thing.
Smith: It has been said that one of the things that Stiles and Hartmann also shared was a thirst.

VanderTill: Thirst for power or what?

Smith: Well, I’ll let you fill in the blank. A more basic thirst.

VanderTill: Yes, I know what you mean.

Smith: I’ll jump ahead here. Nelson Rockefeller as vice president became somewhat paranoid about a number of things, including Don Rumsfeld. He didn’t age well, put it that way. He had convinced himself that there were people around President Ford who did not want to see him re-elected. That there were, in fact, people around President Ford who, for lack of a better word, I’ll say, delayed a re-election campaign beyond a logical starting point. And he had even convinced himself that Jack Stiles’ death may not have been an accident. That’s how far he had gone.

VanderTill: Jack Stiles died by himself. Now that road that he drove off there where his house was, he could have driven that with a snout full of booze forever and never missed a turn. I think somebody drove Jack Stiles off the road. He hadn’t been out drinking and missed the curve. That’s not the way it happened.

Smith: I want to understand this. I realize you are theorizing here. Was Nelson Rockefeller totally paranoid to believe that Stiles’ death may not have been an accident? When you say someone else drove him, was that an accident?

VanderTill: Who is the guy that was killed in Washington on the – Secret Service guy – along the Potomac? Come on, Joan, you know. Everybody theorized that something happened to him.

Smith: In the Clinton administration?

VanderTill: Yes.

Smith: Oh yes, you’re talking about the guy from Little Rock, the counsel who committed suicide up wherever it was. [Vince Foster]
VanderTill: Yes. I’ve been through those places. I don’t think that the governor of New York would have done that to get rid of Jack Stiles. Or if he had thought that it was necessary to do, he would have been more careful.

Smith: No, he thought that someone else had been responsible for Stiles’ death. And he connected this with the fact that the Ford campaign was so late in getting off the ground and that somehow there was a connection between Stiles’ untimely death and the delay of the campaign. That’s where he was coming from. How important was Jack Stiles to Gerald Ford’s political operation?

VanderTill: Ford had a lot of confidence in Stiles’ ability to think through ways of doing things.

Smith: Did Stiles have a title?

VanderTill: Stiles?

Smith: Yes.

VanderTill: Sort of. Chief Schmuck or whatever. I don’t know.

Smith: Crony?

VanderTill: Crony – that would be one. Jack never had a moment where if he thought it was important for him to go talk to Ford, he’d go in there and say, “Hey, I’ve got to talk to you.”

Smith: Okay. And that sounds like Bob Hartmann as well. In Grand Rapids, were you aware of how polarizing a figure Hartmann was down in Washington?

Smith: Because he was in your neighborhood, in effect.

VanderTill: Yes. I kind of enjoyed Jack. He and I teamed up on a couple of things.

Smith: Watergate comes along.

VanderTill: Oh, God.

Smith: And at some point Ford must have discussed it with the staff.
VanderTill: I would think he must have, yes.

Smith: Do you recall? You are part of the staff.

VanderTill: Oh, no. I never talked about Watergate.

Smith: Never talked to him about Watergate?

VanderTill: No.

Smith: Never discussed Nixon’s potential involvement or its implications for the party, or for Gerald Ford?

VanderTill: No. I don’t recall that – ever.

Smith: Well, when Spiro Agnew resigned, were you surprised by what happened next?

VanderTill: Yes. I could tell you one thing especially about it. The real impact on Ford and on me was that I was moving from Grand Rapids to Washington. Mr. Ford and I talked about what I would be doing for work in Washington. Ford said, “Well, I hate to tell you this, but you’re going to have to pay your own relocation money.” I said, “Jeez, boss. I know what the housing market is in Washington. What are you expecting?” He said, “Well, I know it’s not a friendly thing to happen, but the vice president’s budget is shot. There ain’t no money. Can’t do it.”

Smith: When I said he was a fiscal conservative, that’s a euphemism for tight.

VanderTill: Yes. No, I didn’t see it that way. He was always generous to us or other people. So he was not that way.

Smith: Were your salaries, for example, comparable to your peers?

VanderTill: Yes, I think so. Pretty good. A lot better than being a Kroger store clerk.

Smith: So you went to work for him as vice president? In DC?

VanderTill: No. I wanted to, but I ended up working for the Federal Energy Administration. Which was a new idea from Nixon.
Smith: Did you ever work for Ford again? During his presidency?

VanderTill: I don’t think I did. No.

Smith: So you would have left him basically while he was vice president – before he became president?

VanderTill: If I’d had the opportunity, probably yes.

Smith: You said you went to work for the Federal Energy…

VanderTill: Administration.

Smith: And that was while he was vice president?

VanderTill: Yes. He had some people around who helped me get a job.

Smith: A lot of folks believed, when he became vice president, that it was only a question of time before Nixon was forced out of office. Did you sense anything about him at that point? That he anticipated that? He was in a very awkward position as vice president. In effect, called upon to defend the president, but at the same time not to go so far in defending the president as to sacrifice his own integrity or usefulness if he ever became president. Did he ever talk about the situation?

VanderTill: I did not have the opportunity to discuss that with him. No. I’m sure that there would have been many who would have been interested in discussing that, but I didn’t feel that I should do that.

Smith: What were his strengths as a boss?

VanderTill: I think I mentioned earlier that he was willing to allow a screw up…

Smith: Once, as long you learn from the…

VanderTill: I learned.

Smith: What were his weaknesses? Because there is this school of thought that says good old Jerry never thought anyone ever had an ulterior motive and therefore, could be naïve about people.
VanderTill: I never really thought of him as being naïve. I don’t know of anybody who tried to pull anything out from under him.

Smith: Does the name Robert N. Winterberger ring a bell?

Smith: Tell us about Robert N. Winterberger.

VanderTill: Did I show you the book downstairs?

Smith: I saw the book, but we’ve heard about – there’s someone who tried to take advantage. Who was Robert N. Winterberger?

VanderTill: He was a lobbyist of some sort. I bought that book a long time ago and I pulled it out for this meeting.

Smith: And did he exaggerate his relationship?

VanderTill: Oh, by all means. Sure. I was not one to do that with Ford, where I would make myself to be of far greater importance to Gerald Ford than whatever else I could be. In fact, I think I had other people that I encountered along the way of life in Washington who thought I might have had more importance than what I ever would have thought. I think I’m sort of a humble person. I don’t think that I am self-seeking. My journey has been good. I believe that I’ve conducted myself properly.

Smith: Did you see his temper?

VanderTill: Not very often. I have heard of it.

Smith: What have you heard?

VanderTill: Don’t piss off the old man. But that’s all. I don’t really. I have not seen him really, where he would be storming angry.

Smith: Ever hear him curse?

VanderTill: No – well, once in a while maybe. Not much.

Smith: What about his sense of humor?
VanderTill: Yes, I think he’s got one.

Smith: How would you describe it? He wasn’t a storyteller.

VanderTill: Well, occasionally. But the world is much less, it is, with him being gone. He was a wonderful man. I would say that no matter what. I just never had any bad feelings about Gerald R. One time I made this wise remark about another media person. But that passed by.

Smith: You made a remark, and did he respond to what you said?

VanderTill: No.

Smith: You said you made a remark about a media person. Did he respond?

VanderTill: Like, “Well, you know you really shouldn’t do that.” It was that kind of a back hand, like you really shouldn’t do those kinds of things, or whatever.

Smith: He sounds almost fatherly. Would that be an appropriate word to apply?

VanderTill: I’m not sure what you just said. What word?

Smith: Fatherly.

VanderTill: Fatherly, yes. Perhaps. I think he may have thought of me somewhat that way.

Smith: Did you know Mrs. Ford at all?

VanderTill: No.

Smith: She wasn’t in the office?

VanderTill: No, no regard for her. We took her around one weekend in the car for some reason. Had to go here or wherever. I know he loved her a bunch. I never shared his affection.

Smith: Why was that?

VanderTill: It’s one of those constants in elected officials and their spouses. It’s the difference between them and a staff person, for example, and the spouse. I think that’s part of it. It’s sort of addressed in textbooks, along the lines of why elected officials and spouses don’t usually get along all that well together.

Smith: I can understand not wanting to offend the spouse, being concerned about that. But was there a reason for you to feel that way?

VanderTill: No. I didn’t have an uneasy enough feeling, but I just didn’t like her. I felt like she felt she was a little bit too good.

Smith: Okay. Did you sense any unhappiness on her part? We now know, obviously, that it was kind of a rocky road in some ways. And, of course, he was away a lot. She really was left with the kids. All of that.

VanderTill: Well, that’s like asking me how Joni and I get along, what do you think?

Smith: Yes.

VanderTill: I just never really much cared for Betty.

Smith: But you also said you didn’t have a lot of contact with her.

VanderTill: No, I did not. But I felt that she was kind of uppity.

Smith: Do you think any of that is traceable to her background with the arts, the dancing, and the cultural background that she came out of?

VanderTill: Yes. As opposed to taking Steve to ride a motorcycle. There’s a real difference there. I still recall that with Steve.

Smith: Did you have much contact with him in later years?

VanderTill: No, did not. Didn’t have any reason to.

Smith: Did your paths cross at all?

VanderTill: No, not once I was gone.

Smith: Okay.

VanderTill: I don’t know if I’ve ever seen him since. He wouldn’t know me if he fell over me. I didn’t really have much to do with the kids. Susan, I guess, she was kind of cut out of her mother’s box, I think.
Smith: Is it exaggerated the amount of time that he was, in fact, out on the road? Once he became a Republican leader, we sense that he was constantly traveling.

VanderTill: He was, yes.

Smith: That’s accurate?

VanderTill: Yes. I would say so. Pretty much.

Smith: And yet he still found time to get back here?

VanderTill: Yes.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

VanderTill: I never much cared for Bob Hartmann.

Smith: What was it about Hartmann that made him so controversial? Because you are by no means the first person to indicate that. Was he possessive of Ford?

VanderTill: Well, Ford took Hartmann to come with him. And I think Ford probably listened too much to Hartmann. I don’t know. I just didn’t like the cut of his jib, you know? He was just too much. One of the things was Ford was coming back to Cedar Springs, I think as vice president.

Smith: Yes, he’d just been nominated. And the day after his nomination he came back to the Red Flannel Days.

VanderTill: Well, that night I had my phone – just a single line phone – it had all kinds of messages. Every person in the media wanted to talk to Jerry Ford. Wanted to see him – when was he going to be here? When is he going to do this? Blah blah blah. I had a friend at Cedar Springs, at a little college up there, and I said, “You’ve been trying to get us to come with Mr. Ford to take a look at your college. And I’m wondering about whether that chapel that you had there, whether that would make a good place for a press conference?” No hesitation. Yes, of course. I had friends like that, that’s part of what my job was. And so I said, “Can you set it up with microphones…” and we had set up a sequence for credentialing media. We started working that morning; when I got up it was early and I had other staff and we were busy putting that together.

And then I got a call from Hartmann. “We’re going to have a press conference at the airport.” I said, “Can’t do that. Sorry, we’re set up at the college. It’s all set. We’re going to do it. Scotty got it all set up, got people coming in, going to credential the media, da da da.” He was like, “What do you mean? You didn’t ask me if it was okay.” “Sorry, I’m running this operation out here.” But it pissed me off big time. We pulled it off really well. And I never really got over our run over on that one. I never gave up a damn _________.

Smith: Big crowd at Cedar Springs?

VanderTill: Oh yes! There were pictures. I was walking down the main street with Gerald Ford and there were other people there. That might have been it, too. Maybe Hartmann wasn’t there, or whatever. Someplace we have pictures around, I don’t know where.

Smith: There are people who look at Hartmann and think that there is an element of jealousy that was built in. That he could protect Jerry Ford from himself. And that no one else had the same abilities.

VanderTill: I had done all kinds of crap like that for a long time – before Bob Hartmann even knew how to spell Bob. Is he still alive, by the way?

Smith: No, he died about a year ago.

VanderTill: Did he? Whatever. One of the really wonderful, fun things we had happen, had to do with Spiro T. – and Gerald R. Ford. What had happened for several months, apparently from what I could figure out, every time Ford would see Spiro, he would say, “When you coming back down to my town now? We’re going to have you here, you can come speak.” And it’s like, “Yes, I’m going to do that, Gerald.” And finally, one day, everything clicked together. Yes, we’re going to have Spiro T. back. Well, this is the middle of bad stuff going on with Spiro.

I got a call, probably from Frank, I don’t remember, but “Now, we’re going to have the Vice President here, he’s coming to talk at Calvin College.” “What?
You’re going to what?” Oh, those kids didn’t want to hear him. And somehow – not me, I didn’t arrange it, I knew better. But somebody else arranged it that that’s where it was going to be. And I got the word that “you’re going to deal with, volunteer with the advance people, Gordon.”

“Where we going?”

“Calvin College.” Yes right. Being a good soldier I did my salute and said okay and I met with them at the Pantlind Hotel, and we start getting all kinds of crap. They keep throwing out, “How come we’re going to meet at Calvin College for the President and Vice President and Mr. Ford?” and blah, blah, blah, and I said, “Well, that’s because Mr. Ford says that’s where he wants it to be.” Their advance people are grumbling. That’s the way it is. That’s what Gerald R. Ford says, that’s where it’s going to be. “Oh, we can’t do that.” That was like pouring gasoline on the fire. I agreed with them.

Smith: Did Agnew show up in the end?

VanderTill: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: At Calvin?

VanderTill: Bet your butt. So, anyway, we’re down there, see, and they went in this hotel room and they said, “Let me use that phone. We’ll get hold of Mr. Ford and you can hear him say it himself.” Called from outside to Crown View Drive. I hated myself for that. I said, “Hi, this is Congressman Ford’s office calling and the people are here from the Vice President’s staff and they want to talk to Mr. Ford about this….” Well, I mean, this advance guy must have crapped his drawers. He said, “…..where are we going?” And they settled it. Ford said, “It’s going to be at Calvin College and that’s that.” And those other people were so angry, as angry could be because I got them snookered. So, I said, “Well, I work for Gerald R. Ford. I don’t work for these clowns.” I never forgot this as long as I’ve lived.

Smith: That’s a perfect note on which to end.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this. It’s hard to know where to begin. Tell me about your dad and his place in this story.

Ford: Well, my dad, Jim Ford, is the youngest of the four brothers and obviously, I’m the youngest of his four children. Dad was always Uncle Jerry’s little brother and you could tell that.

Smith: How much age difference was there?

Ford: Fifteen years. And there’s actually fifteen years, ironically, between my oldest sibling and me. In that thirty year gap there is part of the reason why a lot of people think that Uncle Jerry is actually Grandpa Jerry to me. And so it’s led to some interesting situations over the years. But Dad being the little brother, I just remember – well, frankly all three of the brothers treating Dad differently because he was the little brother. But Dad was an optometrist here in Grand Rapids, and I’m now an optometrist here in Grand Rapids – took over his practice. So it’s been a lot of fun being centered here in Grand Rapids, and being part of that legacy, my dad’s legacy, but also Uncle Jerry’s legacy, frankly.

Smith: Now, just for the record: there’s your dad, and then the President and then the two other brothers?

Ford: Tom and Dick.

Smith: Was it Tom who went into politics?

Ford: Yes.

Smith: Served in the legislature?
Ford: Yes. He was a state legislator and after that was a lobbyist for several years. But Dad never had any interest in politics, never went anywhere near it. In fact, he stayed as far away as he could.

Smith: It struck me at first as odd, and then I came to understand it when we talked to Dick. He said this may seem strange, but we never talked politics. He figured everyone else wants to talk to him about that, so he didn’t. And so there were things that you would assume went on between those brothers that never did. Was that the same way with the rest of the family?

Ford: I would say yes. I don’t remember my dad ever having any conversations, at least with me in the room, about politics with Uncle Jerry. Now, there were many conversations in our household about politics between my dad and I and the family and so forth, but I don’t ever remember a conversation. The one exception to that rule would be when we visited Palm Springs when I was still very young. He was probably a year or maybe two out of office at the time.

Smith: And your age is?

Ford: I am now forty-five. At that time I was probably – I must have been thirteen, fourteen years old. I remember having a conversation. We were having dinner at the house in Palm Springs and I remember Uncle Jerry making a comment that struck me as unusual at the time - essentially saying that we’re going to have a problem in this country some day, if it ever becomes the Republicans against the Democrats. Which struck me as unusual at the time; thinking, well, that’s what it is now. Why would he make such a statement?

Now, realizing really what he was saying was: if that’s all it’s about – the Republicans against the Democrats – and now seeing where we are in the country and seeing how things are playing out, that comment rings truer and truer every year. And it’s interesting that you asked that question. The one time I can think about any political discussion was that very issue, and that stuck with me. I couldn’t tell you anything else that we talked about that night at that dinner. But that comment just stuck with me – I think in my fourteen year old mind, thinking, boy, I think the old guy’s lost it because that’s the way it is now.
Smith: You wouldn’t have known your grandparents?

Smith: Where on Fulton Street is it?

Ford: Fulton and College. It’s a great old colonial structure that is still there to this day. But that is where her apartment was before she passed away. I remember going to that apartment. Now, I was probably four or five years old when she passed away, so it is one of those very scant memories. That’s the only memory I have of Grandma or Grandpa Ford.

Smith: Did your dad talk about his folks?

Ford: Oh, yeah, quite a bit.

Smith: What was passed on to you about them?

Ford: They were hard workers. I remember there was a lot of discussion about the fact that they worked hard. I remember conversations much later about what Grandma Ford endured in leaving her first husband and coming to Grand Rapids and all that. But that was something that was shared with me way later in life.

Smith: Just because it was such a sensitive subject?

Ford: Oh, I think so. But yet it was a story that I think my dad felt had to be passed on from the perspective that it was a daring move at the time, and showed a lot of guts and a lot of chutzpa to be able to do that at that time in life. Again, just the way things were then, you just didn’t do that, and that took a lot of courage on her part. I think he wanted to share that with me as part of the family legacy. But also, just some of the things that Grandpa Ford endured through the Depression, some of the things that he went through to be able to make it work for the family and so forth.
Smith: My understanding has always been that at some point in the Depression they lost their house, or they moved from one house to a much more modest residence.

Ford: Yeah, that’s what I remember. The story that was passed down to me was they left a bigger house where everybody had their own room and so forth, and moved to a smaller house where everybody was kind jammed in and so forth. I don’t remember a story about losing the house, but having to downsize.

Smith: Do you know in what neighborhoods those were?

Ford: I wish I could tell you. To put all those pieces of the puzzle together and that would be a little more challenging for me.

Smith: Your dad was old enough to remember the Depression?

Ford: I would say probably not. I think probably those scant memories, and I’m sure stories were told to him. But I would say probably not. I don’t remember him conveying any other than second hand, third hand stories.

Smith: Are there qualities that you think of when you think of, the four brothers, that define the Fords?

Ford: I would say all of them were incredible gentlemen in every way, shape and form. Honest, just great gentlemen. Didn’t speak ill of anyone. I don’t remember my dad ever saying a bad word about anybody – even people that had done things wrong to him or that had really wronged somebody, he would still always try to find “the good” in them. And I think that’s the same with Uncle Dick, same with Uncle Tom, and certainly the same with Uncle Jerry. I just don’t remember them ever having an ill word about anybody. In fact, there was, obviously, some ill-will between Uncle Jerry and Ronald Reagan following the election. I remember my dad saying to me, specifically, “That’s something we don’t want to talk about. That’s a problem between Uncle Jerry and Ronald Reagan and we’re just not going to talk about that. That’s just not a story that we are going to share. We’re not going to run around and tell everybody that Uncle Jerry and Ronald Reagan don’t see eye to eye. We’re just not going to talk about that.” And at the time I was thinking, well, we don’t want to talk about it because it would be politically damaging or whatever. Now I realize we don’t talk about it because we don’t talk ill things about anybody. That was just their way of handling everything.

Smith: That raises an interesting point. Did you have in any way, at any point, a sense of being restricted? Along with the honor, recognition, in some quarters, notoriety – was there a downside at all to being a Ford, to being the President’s nephew?

Ford: Well, in answer to your question, yes, there were things that I felt restricted about. There were things that I knew that I couldn’t talk about. There were things that were told to me that would be told to me under the premise that we don’t need to share this with everybody, but here’s what’s going on or here’s what’s happening and so forth.

Smith: Would that include Mrs. Ford’s condition before or at the time of the intervention?

Ford: At the time, yes. Not before. In fact, I didn’t know anything about it, quite honestly before - or whether or not my brothers and sisters did, or anything. I couldn’t tell you. But I can tell you, at the time of everything going on and so forth, and it was hey, here’s what’s going on, but we don’t need to talk about that. But it wasn’t anything where I felt restricted. I didn’t feel that way; I just knew there was some stuff we just weren’t going to talk about and that’s all there was to it; and that we weren’t going to make anything public and that’s it.

Now, my mother was fond of using this notoriety, if you will, as a little bit of a crutch against me growing up. The idea that, “Alright, buddy, if you get caught doing something wrong it’s going to be all over the front page of the press. The press is going to love the idea that Jerry Ford’s nephew was caught drunk driving, or that Jerry Ford’s nephew was caught doing this or that. So watch yourself because…” And I will tell you that when I found myself in situations where I shouldn’t be, where every high school kid ends up at a party someplace where people are drinking and so forth, I got out of there.
And I didn’t get out of there for many other reasons than I knew that, okay, my mother would be really upset if…

Smith: Does that give you a particular sympathy with your cousins?

Ford: I think so. But I am also very fond of telling people when they ask me questions in the office, I’m seeing patients every day and invariably questions come up about Uncle Jerry and what was it like, and so forth. I love telling people that we were close enough to it to get all the benefits of it, without being so close to get any of the downside. We didn’t have to worry about Secret Service. We didn’t have to worry about people recognizing us on the street. We didn’t have to worry about any of that. Nobody, still to this day, really gives a rip who we are. The only time I ever had any attention, in Grand Rapids, anyway, was when Uncle Jerry passed away. Then some people recognized who I was and so forth, and did some TV interviews and whatnot. But other than that, I’ve been able to live in Grand Rapids and be away from all the nonsense that comes with that.

Smith: In his later years, post-White House, did you ever have a chance to see what he put up with, like the autograph seekers?

Ford: To a more limited extent, because the times we were with him were either in Palm Springs or in Vail or here in Grand Rapids. And I think those three places people kept their distance and understood. But I think, even then, I remember just walking through downtown Vail to go to dinner one night, and it was just all of us as a family, just walking through the streets of Vail, and yet having people stop and paying attention and so forth. And as a fifteen or sixteen year old kid, I thought that was pretty cool. As I got older, I started to realize that this would be bad news to have to deal with this every day.

Smith: Did they seem comfortable with it, acclimated to it? Did they ignore it?

Ford: I would say acclimated is probably a good word for it. I don’t know that they would ignore it. I think they were keenly aware that there were always people around and people stopping. And even in that stroll through the streets of Vail, people would reach out their hand and say hello. What I really appreciated about both Uncle Jerry and Aunt Betty was the fact that they didn’t ignore anything. Now, they may be engaged in conversation, as you and I are now, and they may not see somebody’s hand reach out, or whatever, but they wouldn’t ignore it. They would pay attention; they would nod; there was some recognition of everyone that was around. Which is what I think made him so endearing to everyone in the country, much less here in Grand Rapids – he went that extra mile to really make people feel like they were special. And I still hear that to this day – people will come in the office and they say, “Boy, when your uncle was a congressman, I wrote him a letter about this issue or that issue and boy was it nice for him to write me a letter back, or call me on the phone, or whatever.” It was just phenomenal.

We had a wonderful meeting - Uncle Jerry and I had a meeting – it was to my memory the only time Uncle Jerry and I ever sat down together alone, out in Palm Springs, the March before he passed away. I was in Palm Springs and I just stopped by the residence, and we sat down and we had a nice 45 minute conversation, and one of the questions that I asked him was: if I were ever to go into politics, not that I have any interest in that whatsoever, but recognizing that he was getting into his later years and so forth – I wanted to ask a question that I just wanted to hear the answer from him to me. And so I asked him what was the secret to your success in politics? And his comment to me was: “I made everyone else’s problems my problems,” which I thought - what a wonderful statement of a consummate servant. Not a politician, but a consummate servant, would be someone that made somebody else’s problems their problems. What a wonderfully profound statement from a man who has lived that his whole life.

Smith: It’s very interesting you say that. It’s also very shrewd. One of the things that keeps coming up in these conversations is this notion of him as a nice guy who healed the country. It sometimes carries connotations of there wasn’t much more there. To say he was without guile can be a euphemism for he wasn’t particularly sophisticated, or whatever. But you don’t get where he got without having political skills or calculating advantage. And out of it emerges the sense that there were times in his career when he put that image to use. People thinking, oh, good old Jerry Ford – maybe underestimating him – and that’s actually to your advantage, to be underestimated as Ronald Reagan showed over and over again. And it’s fascinating that at the end of his life, he would describe what he did as making other people’s problems his own.

Ford: Yeah. Well, as I think back on the interactions that I had with him over all those years, I genuinely believe that he really took those things to heart. It made a difference for him in how he lived and how he walked his life.

Smith: Did you have a sense that that might be your last visit with him?

Ford: I absolutely did. Yeah. We met in his private office and I remember walking out of the office and I just sensed that this is probably the last time I’ll see him. And I had had interactions with him before, but there was just something about that time – I could see that physically he was failing.

Smith: Was he using a cane at that point?

Ford: A walker. In fact, it was a little bit interesting how the whole thing came together, because it was actually shortly after Reagan had passed away that I thought that I have to make a special point of going out and seeing Uncle Jerry, because he was not traveling, really, anymore at that point. And I thought if I’m going to see him, I’m going to have to go there. He’s not going to come here because we’d always seen him when he was here in Grand Rapids. He’d make a point of at least saying hello or meeting here or wherever and some interaction. But knowing that he wasn’t doing that anymore – we weren’t going out to Vail for the golf tournament anymore and so forth – I knew I was going to have to make a special point of doing that. So I called Penny Circle and said, “Next time I’m in California…” She said, “Fine and great, drop by.” Well, it was two years, or whatever, later that I finally found myself in California able to sit down and have that conversation.
But interestingly, Penny was less receptive of the idea as that two years went by, and I called and said, “Hey, I’m coming out.” And she said, “Greg, there’s some things you need to understand, your Uncle Jerry…”

Smith: She was very protective.

Ford: Oh, absolutely! To the point where, when I got there, she said, “Well, we’re not sure how this is going to work today, but we’ll do our best.” And I thought, boy – then I started to think, well, okay this might be even more than I was prepared for. I was ready for a ninety-two year old man, aging and whatnot, even though he was the ageless wonder. But she made a point of taking me through his private office before he was even in there and showing me all the things; do you remember this, and do you remember that, and do you remember seeing these things, and so forth, which was great. Then she sort of escorted me out of the office and they brought him in. Then I came in and he was already sitting at his desk. I just thought that was kind of interesting that they didn’t really even want to have me see him walk into the room. But his walker was there next to his desk and so forth, so I knew how he had gotten there. But it was the first time in all the years that I knew him that he looked frail and he looked like he was aging.

Smith: Had he lost weight?

Ford: He had. He was very thin and his color wasn’t terribly good. You get a sense, and I definitely had the sense that that would probably be the last time that I saw him. But, what a great conversation we had. Like I say, I think it was the only time that I remember being in the room with him all by ourselves and just talking about whatever. The thing I remember most – and I was commenting earlier about Grand Rapids, how much I loved Grand Rapids, I couldn’t get him off the subject of Grand Rapids. No matter what train we went on, he wanted to come back to Grand Rapids. He wanted to talk about Grand Rapids and how are things in Grand Rapids? He was talking about old friends and wanting to know about the DeVos family and any number of different things that always brought us back to Grand Rapids. So finally I thought, I’m just going to indulge and we’ll just go down the path of Grand Rapids.

So I started asking questions about his memories of Grand Rapids and so forth. He shared some wonderful stories about Aunt Betty and Uncle Jerry meeting for the first time, and the first dates, and some of these things and where they were, and all this. He is describing these locations to me and I’m thinking boy, that’s kind of a cruddy part of town now. But that was real special for me to be able to hear that. And then I went down the path of “tell me more about my dad when he was a little kid.” He was a fifteen years old when Dad was born and I thought, well, he’s going to add some insights onto my dad that would be interesting and fun to listen to, and so we got into some of that conversation.

That forty-five minutes went by real quickly. But I could tell he was fatiguing, I could tell that he was ready. I also could tell, for the first time, he was making some mental errors that I had to help him through. At one point, in fact, when I asked the question about politics, he said, “Well, someday maybe you’ll follow in your dad’s footsteps.” And I said, “Dad didn’t want anything to do with politics,” and he said, “Oh, that’s right. That was Uncle Tom.” So, it’s a little slip and I’m a nephew, and I’m seen three times a year and that was the extent of it, so I didn’t expect him to put all the pieces of the puzzle together. But at the same time, he would have never made that mistake five years earlier. So it was apparent to me. And as our conversation went on, there were more of those types of things, so I could tell he was getting fatigued, he was getting tired and it was time to call it quits.

Smith: I often thought - he loved travel; he loved rubber chicken; he loved the whole routine. And I think when the doctors basically said, “You can’t,” that was a kind of death. Because it just restricted him.

Ford: Well, even when he was here for my dad’s funeral in January of 2001, he told me that he wasn’t allowed to travel without one of the family, according to Aunt Betty. Because Cousin Jack was here for Dad’s funeral, as well. And I made a comment that it was nice that Jack could come along and he said, “Well, Jack had to come, otherwise I couldn’t come, because Aunt Betty has made it very clear that I can’t travel without somebody in the family.”

Smith: Even with Secret Service?

Ford: Oh, no. He could not travel without somebody in the family with him. So I sensed even at that point that, okay, we’re ratcheting down away from being able to travel like he wanted to. And then it was shortly after that there was simply no travel.
Smith: But they did the ninetieth birthday event here. It was the last time he came back to Grand Rapids. You mentioned before that he came at the time of your dad’s death, getting together down here. Describe that. Had your dad been ill for a long period?

Ford: Yeah, he had Parkinson’s disease, or a form of Parkinson’s disease called Lewy Body Syndrome and it forced him into retirement earlier than he wanted to retire, or I wanted him to retire. The greatest five years of my life was being able to practice with my dad. But the plan was it was going to be ten years or more that we were going to practice together. Well, we had to call it quits early and so he had been ill and he had been going downhill and so forth.

I will tell you, too, that during those times where he was in a nursing home in his later years, he would get very excited when Uncle Jerry would be on the phone or Uncle Jerry would be in town and he knew Uncle Jerry was going to come to visit and so forth. There was a different air that Dad had when he knew that his older brother was going to come for a visit. And that was really touching for us. So at the time of his death, and we certainly told the family that we’d like to have everybody get together if we could, Uncle Jerry was very kind to offer this office as an opportunity for my siblings and our families to be able to meet here. I expressed to him that really what I wanted to do was have a time where we could just talk about Dad’s life and what Uncle Jerry remembered about Dad and so forth - just a nice opportunity to be able to do that. And as we came down and met for a better part of an hour, I think, here and had some great conversation. It wasn’t all about Dad. There were some other things we talked about and wanted to know how Aunt Betty was doing and so forth. But it was neat for our kids to be able to interact with Uncle Jerry. That was kind of a cool thing as part of that, even though it was obviously a sad time for us in losing Dad.

Smith: How old were your kids at that point?

Ford: Well, my youngest was only one at the time, so it would have been a one year old, an eight year old and a ten year old. They were pretty small. My next closest sibling is ten years older than I am, so his kids were all fairly older and my older sisters had older kids. But it was great to have that interaction with Uncle Jerry for them and to my knowledge, it was the last time we were together with him other than the ninetieth birthday party, where it was kind of an “Hi, Uncle Jerry, how you doing? – See ya later.” But it was really just a cool time for us to just be with Uncle Jerry in this environment without anybody else here. They had arranged through the museum to have a photographer here and we took some great pictures that my kids cherish as their one picture with Uncle Jerry. So they get a kick out of that and showing their friends and so forth.

The frightening thing for me is how many of my kid’s friends – who is Jerry Ford? Which from Grand Rapids, Michigan is a little disturbing to know that. It’s true. In fact, I had a conversation with a lady not that long ago – I’ve got a picture in one of my exam rooms in my office of my brother and I on the White House lawn. She’s been a patient of mine for ten years. And she said, “I’ve always wanted to ask how did you get this picture on the White House lawn?” And I said, “Well, my uncle was the President.” And she said, “The president of what?” I said, “The President of the United States.” And she said, “Oh, no kidding. Now, who would that have been?” I thought, for crying out loud. So it’s that kind of stuff that I’m amazed at, but, you know that’s the way history is.

Smith: Short memory. Were you at the White House during his presidency?

Ford: Yeah.

Smith: What do you remember about that?

Ford: It feels like it was yesterday, it really does. I was at an impressionable time - I think I was nine, ten and eleven during that time. And if I’m remembering right, I think we had three trips to the White House, but on only one of the three trips did we actually stay at the White House. It was a long weekend trip, as I remember, and we went on a Thursday and we stayed through Sunday night. My brother and I made it a quest that we wanted to see every one of the rooms of the White House – 133 rooms, or whatever it is. I think we saw all but two, and the two that we didn’t see, there were Marines standing outside the door saying, “No, you’re not going in here.” And me as a nine year old and my brother as a nineteen year old, we weren’t going to argue, obviously. But just unbelievable impressions in my mind of what was there and the history; some of the things that we saw obviously, all the areas where the public tours are.

We had the opportunity actually when Uncle Jerry was sworn in as vice president, we were there at the White House and President Nixon had given us the honor of a tour of the White House at that time. But we only went into the public areas, the same public areas that everyone else went into. And I remember, as a very young kid, thinking boy this was really neat – just simply from the standpoint that we could be in places outside the ropes from where the public tours were, I thought that was pretty cool as a seven or eight year old. But then going back and actually living there for three days and being able to have the run of the house – you could go wherever you wanted to go, do whatever you wanted to do – was just super spectacular.

To be in the Oval Office and just see what went on from day to day, the Rose Garden. I can remember very distinctly my brother and I on our little tour on our own, we ran into a storage area on the third floor, as I remember, and we went in. We were just kind of looking around. What do you put in storage at the White House? And it was a lot of Uncle Jerry and Aunt Betty’s stuff like you’d find in anybody’s attic. And one of the things we found was a set of golf clubs that had Uncle Jerry’s name on the back of the irons. So we scurried down to the Oval Office to ask him questions about this set of golf clubs. He said, “Well those are clubs that Jackie Gleason had given me. In fact, why don’t we hit some golf balls? Go get your mom and dad and let’s go out on the South Lawn and we’ll hit some golf balls.” So we went down and I remember the Secret Service scurrying around, the Marines scurrying around while we went out with this golf bag, and we’re hitting golf balls on the White House lawn and there are a few people down at the fence watching and so forth. And I thought that was just the coolest thing, that here we are with the President of the United States hitting golf balls as you would if you were at any uncle’s house.
But I think that was what was so endearing about Uncle Jerry to me – the fact that here was the 38th President of the United States being Uncle Jerry to us. Not being the 38th President, just being like he would do if he was a barber down the road, and his nephews came to visit, he’d be doing the same thing. But it was all sorts of little things like that – sitting in the family quarters, I had my feet up on a little cocktail table in front of me and my mother about had a heart attack because she had looked at the inscription on the table and it was something to do with Abraham Lincoln. She about had a heart attack. This little snot-nosed eleven year old kid had his feet up on this table.

Another one of my favorite stories that I still tell to this day was Uncle Jerry and Uncle Dick and Dad were going to go play golf one morning. And we all met for breakfast in the family quarters and my dad had on, as would be the case back in the ‘70s, these loud, obnoxious golf pants. Very loud, very obnoxious. And so after breakfast we were just sitting around chatting before they headed off to play golf. Aunt Betty was sitting there and we were just having a nice conversation, and the conversation went away from her and she just stood up and went into the other room and she came back in and sat down. She had a pair of sunglasses on. Nobody really said anything until finally my mother said, “Betty, what are you doing with sunglasses on?” And she said, “I cannot stand to be in the same room with your husband’s pants for another minute without my sunglasses on.”

But that was the kind of sense of humor that I remember both of Aunt Betty and Uncle Jerry would have - that kind of quiet sense of humor. She would have sat there for an hour before somebody noticed, just to save the punch line. Again, a ten, eleven year old kid, but I remember it like it was yesterday. We had the opportunity during that trip to go to the Lincoln Memorial, to go to the Washington Monument and do some of these things and we were escorted around. Again, as a ten, eleven year old kid, that was great – jump in the back of a limo and have them ferry us in and stopping the line so we could go in these places. It was great to have that little taste of celebrity, if you will. That was great fun.

Smith: Did he have the pool by then? He had a pool built outside the Oval Office.
Ford: Yes, he did. I’m trying to remember – I don’t think we ever had the opportunity to do anything in the pool. I remember seeing the pool, being around the pool, but I don’t remember – and I think it was because that particular trip it was early springtime. It was probably this time of the year, in fact. I can remember the trees being very green and lush and so forth and the cherry blossoms, so it was probably early spring. I don’t think we had the opportunity to use the pool.

Smith: I’m wondering if your dad or his brothers, or anyone else in the family, for that matter, talked about the pardon or the consequences. Locally, whether there was – we were talking to Warner Veit this morning and the paper was critical. I assume like anywhere else there was criticism. But I’m wondering whether it was something you ever experienced directly or talked about.

Ford: Well, yeah, there was discussion. Again, not directly with Uncle Jerry, but I remember a lot of discussions in our household about it, especially at the time. And I remember it for the first time I’d heard the words ‘political suicide’ in my house. And obviously it made me take notice of the fact, not really understanding exactly what was going on other than the fact that he had pardoned President Nixon, and that that would potentially be political suicide, and I wanted to understand more about what does that mean. But yet it was not made clear that that was it. It was just that it potentially could be political suicide.

Now, moving forward, after he lost the election and so forth, of course that was a big topic of conversation; what would have happened had he not pardoned Nixon and where would he be and so forth. Always the conversation would turn back to – well, it wouldn’t have mattered if he won the election then, because the overall mood in the country would have been so bad and there would have been so much other trouble to worry about – losing our face, if you will, around the world, with the fact that our former president would have been on trial and all the rest that goes along with it. So it was always quickly brought back to the idea that, political suicide or not, it was the right thing to do for the country. Which was a theme that was repeated for many years.
Yet, I can remember sitting here, on this land, when we dedicated the museum in 1981 or whenever it was and I remember protestors chanting the fact that if you pardon a crook, you get a museum. And I took tremendous offense to that and I thought, this man did not pardon a crook. Now you could say that, but you’re forgetting what he did for the country, and that was terribly offensive for me. But it was probably the first and only time to my memory that I remember just feeling my blood kind of boil a little bit – now wait a minute.

Smith: It’s interesting. He said everywhere he went for twenty years after leaving office people always asked the same questions. But once the Kennedys gave him the Profiles in Courage award, the questions stopped. Almost as if having the imprimatur of the Kennedys… and in many ways he was lucky. Poor Lyndon Johnson died the day before the Vietnam peace agreement was announced. And your uncle lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his thinking on the pardon.

Ford: And that was huge for me and I think my siblings, was the fact that he did live long enough to see that; and quite honestly, that my dad lived long enough to see that. Because we all knew that it was the right things to do. We were very confident in that decision, there was never – none of us ever felt like that was a silly thing to do. We all had great confidence that it was the right thing to do. But we were waiting for the rest of the country to say the same thing. To say, “Wow, that was really the right thing to do.” And I agree with you. The Profiles in Courage – I remember physically watching that and thinking to myself, I think this will do it. I think this will be the thing that will finally lay it out to rest. And how happy I was that Uncle Jerry was alive to see that and that my dad was around and what a great thing that we could put that to bed and know that he’s getting the just rewards for a hard fought decision.

Smith: In the ’76 campaign, of course, he ended it here. He came back and they had the unveiling of the mural out at the airport. Do you have memories of that?

Ford: Oh, absolutely. In fact, I’ve got a picture in my office now, a picture of the four brothers on that day with Air Force One in the background and Uncle Jerry with his Michigan tie. There were actually little state of Michigans all over the tie. But I remember everything about the campaign, about the convention. It’s very vivid to me and remember even Dad campaigning a little bit, which I thought was just hysterical because, again, he was so adverse to anything like that. For him to be jumping on a plane and going someplace to campaign and so forth.

I remember at one point in the campaign, I think it was Walter Mondale had made a comment – he was introducing Jimmy Carter and he made the comment – he mistakenly said, “I want to introduce the next President of the United States, Jimmy Ford.” Well, my dad’s name being Jim, he’s watching the evening news and he sees this slip up on the news and he says, “For fun, I’m going to write Walter Mondale a letter.” So he did, he wrote a letter to Mondale which said, “Thank you, but I’m not interested. I think my brother will do a better job.” And he got a return letter – I wish I had that letter. I remember seeing it and I have no idea where it went, but it was just a great letter.

Smith: Mondale is a delightful man. I had an occasion two years ago to interview him at some length, and just a delightful guy. And in many ways a throw back, much like your uncle. Election night - was it a traumatic experience?

Ford: It was a traumatic thing for me the next morning. The night of, I went to bed early enough, as a kid I went to bed early enough that it looked like there was still a chance. There was a lot of excitement around our house the last three weeks of the election, knowing full well that Uncle Jerry was making a big push and he was gaining a lot of ground really fast, and everybody in the press was talking about the fact that he was gaining ground fast and boy this thing could really flip around and watch out. So we were very excited about the potential. And even when I went to bed that night, I don’t remember what time it was, but I remember thinking there was still a pretty good chance that we could pull this thing off.

But I remember getting up the next morning and my mother was still in her bed, but watching television. I walked in and she was watching the Today Show, or whatever it was, and I said, “Well, how’d it go?” And she said, “We didn’t do it.” That was a little devastating for me, I think from a couple perspectives. One is, I just thought that he was going to win and that’s all there was to it, and voilà! But number two was, does this mean I can’t go back to the White House? Because I want to go back and play golf on the lawn. So there was that disappointment as an eleven year old, as well. But I remember the family being disappointed, disheartened, but at the same time, hey, this is the way the cookie crumbles sometimes and we have to move on.

Smith: Was there criticism – I guess this would be more directed at your dad and his brothers level – of the Ford’s decision to go to California rather than come back to Grand Rapids?

Ford: I don’t know that there was criticism, necessarily. I had always been of the opinion, and through both Mom and Dad saying that that was the better place for Aunt Betty.

Smith: You weren’t surprised?

Ford: Oh no. For me, again at that point in life, I had never known Uncle Jerry to really live in Grand Rapids, so, for him not to live in Grand Rapids now was not a shocking surprise to me. So I certainly didn’t expect him necessarily to come back to Grand Rapids. But I will also tell you, and brought out, in fact, by your comments, at the funeral – the fact that Grand Rapids was his home, even though he was in California, and the last conversation I had with him – it was very obvious that Grand Rapids was home. And that just was so neat for me to have that from him – with me living in Grand Rapids and being here in Grand Rapids and my roots are here in Grand Rapids and I don’t have any intention of leaving Grand Rapids. That was really fun for me to see. And I didn’t sit down and say, “Talk to me about Grand Rapids.” He wasn’t going to leave out anything about Grand Rapids. Once he knew that I was living in Grand Rapids, he was going down that path and that path only. So that’s very heartening for me to have had that opportunity.

Smith: It’s interesting, too, because one gets a sense he very much wanted this facility to be here. Fred Meijer had land on the outskirts of town. But once the decision was made it was to be in Grand Rapids, he wanted it to be downtown, and in many ways, it turned out to be the catalyst for everything that has followed.
Ford: I don’t think there’s any question. Well, I remember my dad coming back from a meeting about the location for the museum and being somewhat disheartened by the fact that they had chosen this location, because at the time it was a bit of a dump down in there. It was like, why there? They know more than I know. But as I’m sitting here today, as I think back at what it was like back then at that dedication in 1981, there wasn’t anything downtown. Why’d you come downtown? You wouldn’t come downtown. The farthest you’d come downtown was to the public museum which was on the outskirts of downtown. That’s as far downtown as you’d come, unless you worked downtown. It’s a whole different city.

Yes, Uncle Jerry was a big part of that equation, but it’s the people in Grand Rapids – just the philanthropy that happens here in Grand Rapids is unbelievable. And what a great example for my generation and for the generation after me to be able to see what’s going on and now seeing the DeVos children that are starting to pick up the reins, the same as their parents did. And the Van Andels and multiple families that have picked up that role. Grand Rapids is great and that’s why I love Grand Rapids and I love coming back to Grand Rapids. No matter where I go, it’s always great peace to come back to Grand Rapids.

Smith: Tell us about Aunt Betty.

Ford: Well, the sense of humor, obviously number one. But just a great, gentle, wonderful soul, so giving. I remember having conversations with her on the phone where I would, for whatever reason, be calling the house or calling the office or whatever to talk about this, that, or the other thing, and every once in a while she’d answer the phone, which I thought was always funny. I’d always expect staff or somebody to answer the phone; she’d answer the phone. And she would take extra time to ask me about what’s happening in your life? Where are you in school? What’s happening with you now? And that was really cool as a kid, but even as I aged and I started having children and so forth, she was always very interested in what I was doing.

I don’t know her that well – she’s kind of my distant aunt by location, if nothing else. I saw her as I saw Uncle Jerry; not very often, and had fewer conversations with her over the years than I did with Uncle Jerry. That sense of humor – my mom had a great sense of humor, my Aunt Janet, Uncle Tom’s wife had a great sense of humor, Aunt Ellen’s got a great sense of humor, so the four wives of these four boys were trouble together.

I remember, in fact, my parents had gone to Camp David for Thanksgiving one year, and I can remember my mom talking to me on the phone from Camp David, saying, “We should have brought an extra suitcase because there’s a lot of stuff here I’d like to bring home with us,” and Aunt Ellen and I are doing this and Aunt Betty is behind us, she’s wants us to take stuff. And so I just got the biggest kick out of the fact that these four were up there causing trouble at Camp David. But her sense of humor and her gentleness are the two things that I really am most fond of. But also incredible strength.

Smith: She looks so frail and there she is – she’s ninety-one.

Ford: When she’s going to do something, she just flat does it. It’s a great legacy for me, personally, but for the entire family to be able to look at somebody that, again, looks frail. Doesn’t look like somebody who is going to hike up her boots and go a hundred miles an hour. She did for all those years, and by all accounts, all things considered, is still fighting the good fight. And so that’s a lot of fun.

Smith: A couple of things. Was there a pattern or routine after the President left office, of the frequency of his visits back to Grand Rapids? When he was here, what would he do involving the family?

Ford: It was real varied, to be honest with you. There would be a year where he would be back here five and six times in a year. And there would be another year where he’s back one time. But for the most part, I think he did a pretty good job of wanting to make sure that he at least made contact with the brothers while he was here. Maybe not the extended family, but I remember specifically my dad having to cut out of the office early because he was going to have Uncle Jerry over for dinner and they were going to have dinner together or whatever was going to happen. So I think he did a pretty good job with that, but at the same time, it was a little disappointing, I think, for a lot of us in the fact that when anybody knew that Uncle Jerry was coming to town, their whole agenda got packed full so that those times for us - which is part of the reason why that meeting that we had in 2001 here in the office was so neat for us - because it really was that opportunity that we had not had too many times before, where we could just relax and be at ease with him. Often times, it was like I said before, we’d be, “Hi, Uncle Jerry. Hi, how are you. How are things? Good. Okay, see you later,” and he’s being rushed off to the next thing and the next thing. There were several trips and there were several opportunities to get together; maybe not for a long time, but even if there was a little bit of interaction, it was nice. Where we saw and interacted with Uncle Jerry the most was in Vail, part of the Jerry Ford Golf Invitational that he had in Vail every year.

Smith: By all accounts, they were beloved in Vail. They were more than celebrities, they were really seen as contributing members of the community - almost mascots.

Ford: Oh, I would concur wholeheartedly. In anything that I ever saw up there, I would absolutely tell you that that’s exactly what I saw.

Smith: Tell me about their house in Vail, because I’ve never been.

Ford: It was a fantastic place; set into the side of the mountain. But not overstated in any way, shape or form. As you would expect from them, it was not overstated, but very comfortable, very warm. A couple parts of the house that I remember the most: one was a smaller room with a smaller ceiling line that was specifically for the grandchildren. It was just basically a mini room that if you went in as an adult, you’d have to hunch down a little bit to get into this room. But all the dimensions were small. It had smaller furniture in it, and I think it was a room, if I remember right, maybe over the garage or something like that. But it was a room that was for the grandchildren.

But the rest of the house, they had a wonderful family room/living room area that looked out over the mountains and I can remember sitting in that room with celebrities and just having conversations the way you and I are having a conversation now. Sitting there with Dinah Shore and any number of different celebrities, Flip Wilson, Sammy Davis, Jr., Bob Hope. When I think of those times now, it’s quite surreal, but yet just having a very pleasant, just normal conversation – “How’s life?” – not getting into politics and not getting into celebrity, just very relaxed.

But the whole house was set up that way. They had a wonderful deck out in front of the house and Leonard Firestone lived next door. And I remember one of those surreal moments for me was when we went over for breakfast one morning during the golf tournament, and we’d finished breakfast and we were all heading out and Uncle Jerry was going to go get ready to play and as we’re out in the street, getting into our cars, here stands Uncle Jerry on his front deck and he’s motioning to Leonard Firestone, “Morning, Leonard,” – “Morning, Jerry.” Just the way you would with your neighbor.

Smith: Leonard Firestone is a very important part of this story, isn’t he?

Ford: Absolutely.

Smith: He and Mrs. Ford really created the Betty Ford Center together.

Ford: And, again, very few interactions with him, but the interactions that I had with him – an incredible human being. Somebody – like we talked about Aunt Betty – this is what I think I’m going to do and I’m just going to do it, and there is nothing that is going to get in my way. Whatever I’ve got to do to get this done…Just a phenomenal human being. But that whole surreal approach of – here’s two next door neighbors that – oh, one happens to be an unbelievable businessman and the other one happens to be the 38th President of the United States – wow, isn’t that something? But yet they were just buddies, just hanging out the way anyone would with their buddies.

Smith: You mentioned sports a couple of times – did the family resent the caricature that some had created in the media about the klutz?

Ford: You know, I hate to use the word resent, I think resent is too strong a word.

Smith: Take issue with?
Ford: Yeah, I would say take issue with, but also, I think all of us found it relatively humorous that this man, who really was an impeccable athlete, and was actually not a klutz at all – in fact, if there was a klutz of the four brothers, it was my father. My father was ten times the klutz that Jerry Ford was, but yet, the media grabbed onto that and they just would not let it go. And I think we took exception to it, but at the same time, I think we took it with a sense of humor, and the fact that we knew better.

Smith: I wonder whether he, deep down, resented it.

Ford: Oh, I suspect, as any athlete would. When you are an athlete and somebody’s kind of poking fun at your athleticism, I’m sure that would bother you a little bit. Not being much of an athlete myself, I don’t know that feeling.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction at the time of his death?

Ford: Yes and no. I’ll tell you what shocked me was, we got together with the family over here at the hotel. And we were down in the lobby getting ready to come over here to the museum, and I looked out the window in the lobby and I saw all these people lined up in a line. And I looked at my wife and I said, “What’s going on downtown? Why are all these people lined up?” And she said, “Well, you bonehead.” I said, “But the museum is over there.” It wasn’t until we got in the cars – they ferried us over here – we got in the cars and we drove out and the line went all the way around the hotel and all the way in front of the convention center and all the way down the road and all the way over here – that I went, “Wow, this is a big deal.” Was I expecting a great reaction? Certainly. I mean, living in Grand Rapids my whole life and being part of the action here, I knew full well that there was going to be a big outpouring at that time. But it did surprise me just how much the people came out – and to stand in line for four and five hours to walk past the casket? Still to this day… I get emotional just thinking about it. It was just amazing to see that. So, yeah.

Smith: Was that the emotional highlight of those few days?

Ford: Yes – other than the plane. And I think that was the culmination of everything for us. That week there had obviously been a lot of emotion and anytime…when Uncle Jerry passed away, of course, we’re all thinking about my dad and it hadn’t been that long since we lost my dad at the time. So there is a lot of emotion, but at the same time, we’re going a hundred miles an hour, we’re going from this thing to that thing and so forth and so on. And now it’s the end, and those planes fly over and I was just…just weeping.

Smith: And the sun was setting. You couldn’t have designed…

Ford: It was unbelievably surreal. The weather in Grand Rapids at that time – are you kidding me? In January to have that weather in Grand Rapids, Michigan? It was phenomenal.

Smith: Perfect note on which to end.

Smith: Tell us about how your paths crossed with Gerald Ford’s.

Willard: Early in 1975, I sent in an application to be a summer intern at the White House. And low and behold, I got a telephone call late one night and then received a big packet of materials saying I had a position. So in April or May, 1975, I came to Washington to work that summer as an intern at the White House.

Smith: And what prompted that? I mean, did you know people? Did you have sponsors? How did you go from where you were to being part of the program?

Willard: No. I didn’t have sponsors. I was a political science and history major and always had an interest in government. I’m not certain how I came to learn about the possibility of a summer internship at the White House, but that was the only Washington internship I sought. And, fortunately, I got it.

Smith: And you were where?

Willard: Started in the press office.

Smith: I’m sorry, home was…?

Willard: Oh, home was Pittsfield, Illinois, a small town in west-central Illinois, about seventy miles west of Springfield. It was at the end of my junior year in college. I’d been studying at Oxford University and the London School of Economics that preceding year and was getting ready to finish up my undergraduate degree at Westminster College in Fulton, Missouri. I was notified that spring of 1975 that I’d be an intern at the White House.

Smith: Tell me about your experience as an intern.

Willard: As you’ll recall - you and I were fellow interns, Richard - it was a wonderful summer, especially in my case for a small-town boy from the Midwest. It was a very heady experience.
Smith: Was that your first time in D.C.?

Willard: Second time. The first time had been shortly before I arrived. I’d met Warren Rustand, who at the time was the President’s Appointments Secretary. So, Warren had me come over to the White House, which was during my first visit to Washington. Then I came back shortly after that and started the summer with our intern group.

The work was terrific. There may have been some among us that didn’t do quite as much work – perhaps. But I started in the News Summary Office with John Hoornstra. It’s hard to believe in this day of Google Alerts and Politico columns that back then we needed to gather and summarize the prior day’s news. We prepared a news summary every morning.

I then moved over to Bill Baroody’s Office of Public Liaison. The office’s White House Conferences conducted around the country were terrific.

Smith: And that was an innovation of that office. It was an innovation before Ford’s presidency.

Willard: Brand new, and there were several different components within the public liaison office. And one of the components was what was called the White House Conferences Office. Every six to eight weeks, there would be a day-long conference with Cabinet and agency heads, culminating in the afternoon with an appearance by President Ford. He would give remarks for ten to twelve minutes, and then he would take Q & A from the floor for the better part of an hour. It was a wonderful institution. I don’t know if it’s been replicated since.

Smith: And who would be attending?

Willard: Community leaders, business leaders from the local host city or region. Bill Baroody, Jeff Eaves, and John Shlaes oversaw the White House Conference operation. The attendees were a very wide cross-section of community or regional leaders, including labor and business leaders. The conferences didn’t have a political tone. They had much more of a policy tone.
Smith: The criticism has been made over the years that the administration from the top down was slow to accept the possibility of a Reagan challenge, and perhaps simultaneously, to take seriously how formidable a candidate Ronald Reagan might be. What’s your take on that?

Jim Baker told us a wonderful story, maybe unintentionally revealing. At the height of the campaign leading up to the Texas primary, Reagan is obviously in this for the long haul. It was right at the time when Kissinger decided he was going to Africa. Baker, who agreed with the policy, questioned the politics of the timing and, still worse, the fact that not only was Kissinger going on a trip that could theoretically be postponed until after the Texas primary, but that he was going to further promote this trip in advance through a White House press conference and so on.

Baker was griping about this and was finally told, “Look, if you feel that strongly about it, make an appointment to see the President.” And he did. He went in the Oval Office and Ford was there with his pipe undisturbed, seemingly, by this latest tempest in the teapot. Baker is trying to convey the likely cost of this in political terms. And Ford responds, “Well, Jim, I really appreciate your viewpoint. Glad you came by, but I’m sure the enlightened Republicans of Texas will understand what we’re trying to do.” And Baker said, “Mr. President, you don’t understand, on this issue, there aren’t any enlightened Republicans in Texas.”

And that’s a long way of introducing this subject, I’m trying to get a sense of how much of this was inexperience - the fact he’d never been through tough campaigns before. And how much of it was just a disinclination to have his presidency consumed by politics so soon, and right after a presidency that had been destroyed by politics?

Willard: I’ll try to break that down into pieces. Let me say first, I wasn’t a senior Oval Office or campaign advisor, as were Cheney and Baker and those folks.

Smith: Sure.
Willard: On the first part of your question about the Reagan challenge, my recollection is that in the summer of ’75 and into the fall, I don’t remember it being significantly, if at all, on the radar screen. I’m sure it was out there, but I don’t remember it being anywhere as a front and center topic. And then, obviously, the crescendo began in late ’75 and into ’76.

In terms of why he reacted as he did, I guess I would - given my personal perspective and now looking back, because I came to know him much more after we left Washington – it was almost visceral with him that he was not going to allow those political considerations to control his presidential decisions - much as there was a part of his being, that competitive part of his being that would want to. The visceral part to him was manifest; “Nope, I’m not going to take the politically expedient route. I’m going to rely on Henry and Brent’s policy judgments. The other advisers’ political judgments and advice are spot on; But I’m going to implement the other policy.” And, with the display of that familiar crooked left index finger of his, that was the end of the discussion. But, again, that perspective is one that’s not contemporaneous with those discussions at the time, but knowing him more closely afterwards and looking back now.

Smith: You know, there’re all sorts of ways at looking at his presidency. One, it seems to me, is to follow the trajectory of someone who, while not unlearning the unique set of skills that made him so successful on the Hill, had to learn a whole different set of skills as an executive and, above all, as a communicator and public advocate. And he was always very frank about it. In fact, he said, “If I had to do it over again, I would’ve spent more time on being educated on communications.” He grew into the office; allegedly, one of the things he said at the time of his loss [to Jimmy Carter] was that it really hurt because he thought he’d just mastered the place when he lost it. I’m wondering if part of that mastery was his relationship with Kissinger. The one thing he said the night Nixon resigned - when he [Ford] came out of the house in Alexandria - was to reassure the country that Henry’s not going anywhere. And yet, a year later, he had decided - nothing against Kissinger - but no one person should have both hats. Clearly, he had developed a degree of confidence himself where he was perfectly comfortable around Kissinger with his somewhat mercurial, occasionally volcanic temperament. He had no difficulty working with someone as temperamental as Kissinger. And there were others, but intellectually, he had long since found his footing.

Willard: Part of it was he was a wonderful listener. Listening carefully came naturally to him.

Smith: Do you know where it came from?

Willard: You can draw a straight line from a little boy growing up in Grand Rapids, through his years in the House and then his presidency. I’m not certain where it originated, but listening was easy for him. Combine that with the core decency he showed to everyone with whom he dealt, whether it was a senior Cabinet secretary, such as Secretary Kissinger, or someone on the domestic residence staff, he would listen. He would always listen and engage and connect.

Smith: Which also, by the way, was a great skill for a congressman.

Willard: Phenomenally important.

Smith: Whether on the campaign trail, in a committee room, or climbing the ladder towards the Speakership.

Willard: To be sure. But from the standpoint of the presidency, he came to the office with an advantage – perhaps more so than some of his predecessors – of being able to listen to disparate advice. He quickly moved into the role and became quite comfortable in the presidential power - the component Article II power of “the decider.” That he had these disparate advisors, and whether it was his original - the ill-fated bicycle wheel management structure - or otherwise, he came to be very comfortable with the role of decider.

Even he would’ve admitted that it was that third leg – the communicator skills needed in the Oval Office – which was much different than the skills needed to communicate to the constituents of the 5th District in Western Michigan. He evolved into that role. Whether he evolved too late or not enough, we’ll leave that to others to decide.
Smith: Did the Reagan challenge ultimately make him a better candidate?

Willard: Absolutely; both in his communications and speech-making, and in the process of presidential campaigning. He learned, early in the general presidential campaign, the difference between that level of campaigning and his primary fight with Reagan. Whether it was folks like Red Cavaney and Terry O’Donnell advising him, educating him, on what is involved in a presidential campaign, eventually, as the saying goes, he got it. Of course, there were exceptions. One in particular we still chuckle about. He decided on the last day of the 1976 Republican Convention that he and Senator Dole just had to go to Russell, Kansas and have a big campaign kick off - the next day! Dick Cheney and Red called Richard Wennekamp, Andy Stern, and me into the White House staff office at the hotel and sheepishly told us that, per a direct order of the President, we had to do the impossible for three advance guys – get ourselves out to Russell, organize a huge rally, make sure there were thousands of excited attendees on hand - and do it all in 24 hours. We somehow managed to pull it off – just amazing. On their arrival the next day, the President and Dole were ecstatic, and Dick and Red were beaming with “you have got to be kidding me” looks. We all still laugh about it. It was one of the biggest and best events of the entire campaign. He came to understand the extraordinary demands of the campaign on himself and his staff, particularly on Red and our advance office group.

Smith: Is that balance offset by the cost of the Reagan challenge? I mean, on balance, if Reagan had not run, would Ford have come as close?

Willard: Would he have carried Texas in the general election? Would he have carried New York? Perhaps. My personal feeling has always been because the margin with Carter was so narrow; I’ve always attributed it to the pardon. Take a snapshot of the body politic in November of 1976 and then pull out the pardon from that equation. Admittedly, what the country would have been like had it just been through a Nixon prosecution is a difficult assumption. But if you assume out the pardon from a 1976 scenario, it would have had a much larger impact on the outcome than the Reagan challenge.

Smith: So, after the intern summer, did you stay on? Did you come back?
Willard: Came back after I finished college. During the summer, I’d made friends with folks in the Advance Office through the Office of Public Liaison. They began to ask me to go out and do advance work for the President that fall. I finished my degree and joined the White House staff full-time in the Advance Office. I continued in the Advance Office in 1976 through January 20, 1977 as a White House Staff Assistant. Then on Inauguration Day, Bob Barrett and I, and Joy Chiles and Annie Grier left with the Fords and moved to California. I spent 1977 in Rancho Mirage and Vail with them. After that I got a law degree and then began a career as an attorney.

Smith: And was there any doubt after the election that that’s where they were going to wind up? Had they given thought to that?

Willard: No. I think it was made very quickly. I remember having a conversation with him, right after I’d been asked to move to California, in Dorothy Downton’s office. She had an office just off the Oval Office, across from the pantry. One of my responsibilities during the transition was transporting all the Fords’ personal property from the White House Residence out to Palm Springs. So I was in working with Dorothy one day, and President Ford came in. Now that you ask the question, I remember thinking at the time, “Gosh, I wonder if they had thought, maybe back when he was in Congress and had decided not to run again, were they going to retire to Western Michigan or Palm Springs?” I have a clear sense that very early after the election Palm Springs was it.

Smith: What was his mood? We’ve heard from a number of people that it took him awhile to bounce back.

Willard: Yes. I’ll give you a snapshot from Election Night that’s a great illustration. During the campaign, I spent several weeks with Steve Ford. He decided to tour the western states in a Winnebago and asked his dad to assign me to help.

We’d campaign in his Winnebago for several days, and then we’d split off and campaign elsewhere, including with his dad. The campaign developed increasing enthusiasm - almost confidence - as the gap with Governor Carter shrank. Election Night captured all the mood swings of the entire campaign.
Steve and I arrived at Washington National Airport the afternoon of Election Day after our last flight of the campaign. We proceeded with his Secret Service detail to the White House, where we were met at the Diplomatic Entrance by Susan Ford. The three of us visited for awhile, and then around 5:00, Susan and Steve went upstairs to the Residence. I called a friend for a ride and planned to watch the election returns that night with some of my fellow White House staff members.

A little after 5:00, as I was waiting to leave, the President walked into the main hallway and went into Dr. Lukash’s office. When he came out of the doctor’s office, he walked over to where I was standing. His voice was a mess; he could only manage a hoarse whisper. He joked that his timing to end the campaign was right on the mark since his voice “didn’t have another speech, much less a full campaign day in it.” I told him Steve was already upstairs, and we were glad to be home. He said, “That was a huge job you had with that campaign of his. I want you to know how much I appreciate what you did.” I told him I thoroughly enjoyed it, and joked that Steve still hadn’t succeeded in making a cowboy out of me. The President chuckled and whispered, “You get home and get some rest. We’ve got a busy month ahead.” I said, “Thank you, Mr. President. Let’s bring home a winner tonight!” He gave me a slap on the back and headed off.

At about 8:45 p.m., I was with some fellow White House staff members and received a phone call from a White House operator. She immediately put the call through to the Residence, and Steve came on the line. He said that he and the First Family were watching the election returns with some friends and wanted to know if I would come over and join them.

I arrived at the Usher’s Office at 9:15, and Rex Scouten took me up to the second floor of the Residence. Present were the President and First Family, Joe Garigiola and his family, Senator and Mrs. Dole, Leon Parma, Bob Barrett, Dick Cheney, David Kennerly, and Kevin Kennedy, along with some other friends of President and Mrs. Ford. Many of those friends left shortly after I arrived. During the evening, additional White House staff members and other guests would come upstairs. Dick Cheney and David Kennerly were in and out several times. Periodically, Ron Nessen would update voting results. A Newsweek photographer came up at one point to take photographs of the family. The family and guests milled about among three rooms on the second floor - - the family room off the President and First Lady’s bedroom, the President’s exercise room, and the main center hall. Each room had a large television set tuned to one of the networks.

Governor Carter had taken a large early lead in the South and was well ahead in the electoral vote. Nevertheless, the President and First Family were in good spirits. While waiting for the next round of returns, we all recounted funny stories from our many campaign travels. In general, at this point in the evening, the mood was anxious, but hopeful. We moved from room to room trying to keep up with the latest results from each of the three networks. The President, Steve, Kevin, Leon Parma and I spent a lot of time watching the returns in the main hall.

We used my copy of a Time magazine electoral map all night for comparisons between Time’s state by state predictions and the networks’ projections. The President constantly asked us for comparisons between the magazine’s predictions and the networks’ calls. Then, several returns from western states began to come in solidly for the President, and spirits in the room rose. By 11:00 p.m., real optimism seemed to be developing.

At one point, a loud cheer went up from down the hall in the exercise room, and the President joked, “We’re watching the wrong channel!” Joe Garigiola was the evening’s cheerleader, shouting “Go Big Blue” as the President’s states was marked in blue on the networks’ electoral maps. Garigiola clapped his hands and said, “Don’t worry, Prez, they got four in the top of the first, but we’re going to pull it out!!” Periodically, the President would step into an adjacent room to speak on the phone with Dick Cheney. Pearl Bailey arrived and added further bounce to the evening. She and Mrs. Ford watched the returns with the group in the exercise room for quite awhile.
As midnight passed, the optimism continued to grow, although Senator Dole observed quietly, “We just aren’t going to be able to pull it off.” Given what seemed to be the positive trends, I was puzzled at his comment. Everyone kept an eye on New York’s returns, which at that point had the President in a slight lead. Soon, though, Carter drew even in New York, and the mood became much more tense. A little after 1:00 a.m., New York was declared for Carter.

Although the President continued to be positive (“We’re still in this thing!”), concern was apparent on his face. The returns from Pennsylvania and Texas looked unfavorable, and we figured he needed to carry at least one of those states to have a shot at winning the Electoral College vote.

Around 1:40 a.m., the President said he wanted to call John Connally to get a report on Texas. When he returned to his chair after the call, he whispered to Steve and me that the report from Connally was not optimistic. Senator Jacob Javits came upstairs and met with the President privately for a few minutes across the hallway.

At 2:05 a.m., Carter was declared the winner in Texas. Garagiola sighed, “I just can’t believe this. I can’t believe it.” The President looked at the screen with Texas now in red and said, “That one hurts; that one really hurts.” North Dakota then came in for the President, and spirits brightened a little. A few minutes later, the President turned to us, punched his left fist into his right hand, and said, “It’s still a helluva ballgame!” He remarked how disappointed he was at the loss in Missouri and the additional defeat there of incumbent Republican Governor Kit Bond.

By 2:40 a.m., the race appeared to be moving to razor thin. The talk turned to a specific Electoral College scenario -- if the President could carry both Hawaii and Ohio, he still could win. Carter had a 4,000 vote lead in Hawaii at the time, but many votes were still out. The President passed the Time magazine electoral map back to me and shook his head, “Louisiana, Missouri and Delaware ... Ugh!”
Shortly after 3:00 a.m., Dick Cheney and Bob Teeter came upstairs and went into the dining room with the President. A few minutes later, the President walked over and asked Steve and me to gather the group into the west living room. The President stood at the west end of the room; Steve was on his left, and I was on his right. As the rest of the group gathered, everyone seemed prepared for bad news. The President must have sensed the same thing because he quickly smiled and said, “No, this isn’t a concession speech. I think Bob Teeter has some interesting information for us.” Teeter explained that the returns in Hawaii were not complete in that votes cast before noon were counted first, after which the afternoon ballots were counted. He also indicated that the President’s chances in Wisconsin still looked good, even though the networks had already projected it for Carter. The President then said it would be morning before any definitive results would be in, so he was “going to bed for awhile.” He said goodnight to everyone. Before going to bed, he talked briefly on the phone with Dick Cheney. At the same time, the few remaining guests started leaving. By 3:25 a.m., most of them had left.

Those of us who remained - Mrs. Ford, Mike, his wife Gayle, Steve, Susan, Pearl Bailey, Kevin Kennedy, and I – went into the large main hall and continued to watch the returns on NBC.

At around 3:30-3:40 a.m., John Chancellor announced that Jimmy Carter would be the 39th President of the United States.

Silence. No one said a word. There were no tears, no signs of disappointment - just several minutes of complete silence amidst the television chatter of the NBC correspondents. Finally, Mrs. Ford looked over and said, “Do we dare wake him?” Mike Ford and I both replied in unison, “No; let him sleep.” Soon Jimmy Carter appeared on television, and Mrs. Ford smiled at the television screen and chuckled, “Governor, you have no idea what you’re in for in here.”

The mood was mixed. The group was obviously very disappointed. But as everyone began to talk about the past two-plus years and about the campaign, there was an undercurrent in their comments of pride mixed with a sense of relief.

It’s one of those moments -- what do you say at a moment like this? -- here’s the First Lady, whose husband has just lost the election - good gracious! So, there was not much said for several minutes, and then Mrs. Ford chuckled and said, “You know, I had the funniest thing happen to me during a campaign trip I made in October.” And Susan laughed and said, “Well, Mom, I had a similar thing happen to me!” Soon, it was this cacophony of everyone telling stories of funny things along the campaign trail.

We all sat around for nearly an hour reminiscing and, yes, laughing loudly at hilarious campaign stories. At some point, Mrs. Ford changed into her nightgown and robe and rejoined us. She had all of us in hysterics as she told more of her own funny campaign stories.

Finally at 4:30 a.m., we decided to call it a night. Steve and I walked Pearl Bailey down to her car on the South Lawn and returned to the Second Floor where we managed to roust Susan, who’d fallen asleep on the floor. Kevin had gone on up to the third floor. Mrs. Ford was standing in the archway between the west living room and the main hall, and Mike, Gayle, Steve, and Susan walked over to say goodnight to her. I moved to the side of the room near the elevator. As the children returned towards the elevator, Mrs. Ford looked over, and I nodded, “Good night, Mrs. Ford.”

I must have appeared as disappointed as I felt. Mrs. Ford walked over to where I was standing. I shook my head, “I’m so sorry; I just don’t know what to say. I really thought he was going to pull it out.” She took hold of my hands - quite firmly - and replied, “Now listen! We’re going to leave here in January with no regrets and many wonderful memories. And remember, when we leave, we’ll have our heads up with lots of pride.” She gave me a hug and said, “Thank you for all your hard work.” I managed only a feeble whisper, amidst several tears, “It was an honor, Mrs. Ford.” She turned and walked to the bedroom. I went up to the third floor with the family where a bed had been prepared for me in the Solarium.

I understand the next morning Bob Barrett told President Ford the results. And when I saw the President upstairs in the Residence that morning, he’d obviously been told, and he was really, really disappointed. Not morose, but, yes, it hurt. It hurt.

Smith: One senses, given his competitive nature, that some of his disenchantment was directed at himself. A couple of people told us that, for awhile after that, he would mutter, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Willard: I never heard that, but he may have internalized it more. I was always struck by how gracious he was to the staff and the campaign folks over at the President Ford Committee. You never had a scintilla of, “Well, if the campaign would’ve been run a little better” or “If we’d have done this a little better.” I don’t know, but it may have been because he was internalizing it as much as anything.

Smith: Tell me about Mrs. Ford back then.

Willard: In the White House period, particularly during the campaign, she was a rock. Just very, very firm in terms of her campaign activities. Occasionally, I’d go out on trips with her. Pete Sorum was the person in our White House Advance Office who was assigned to Mrs. Ford. But occasionally, one or two of us would go out with her on a trip. She always was gracious – inestimably gracious. But strong. Very strong. Whether it was dealing with the staff, dealing with her schedule, or dealing with events, she knew what she wanted to do, and we did it.

Smith: Did you see any evidence of a “problem,” however defined?

Willard: During the White House?

Smith: Yeah.
Willard: No. No. Never. But that changed once we were in California. Soon after we arrived out there, I realized something was wrong – there’s a “problem”. But in the White House, from the Spring of ’75 to January of ’77, I can’t recall a single instance where I said, “That’s odd”; never sensed that at all.

Smith: And, talk about opposites attracting… He was the most self-disciplined of people.

Willard: You think!

Smith: And punctuality is not a quality I automatically associate - for all of her wonderful qualities - that was left out of the mix. And I’m wondering whether it’s not a form of perfectionism. You know, she wanted to look her absolute best wherever she was going to be, but there’s also a surprising amount of stage fright. She’s not comfortable giving speeches. She gets butterflies before going on, which may very well be the mark of a true pro. Or maybe she’s just late. Maybe it’s something as simple as that.

Willard: Or a combination. She was a perfectionist in so, so many things. A lot of that goes back to her dance and the precision of dance. And she carried that over into her public persona in particular. So, when she would do an event, she wanted it to be spot on – perfect. I remember when she filled in for the President on a trip to Iowa, to Des Moines, back in 1976, at the last minute. I think it was during the crisis in Lebanon, and he just couldn’t come. So Mrs. Ford came in his place. I remember it was so important to her when she arrived that everything be perfect and that she not fail to do what needed to be done and should be done. So, if you carry that back to your example about speaking, that’s not her forte – public address, public speaking – my sense was not so much that she didn’t like it (because she did it well), but it didn’t come naturally to her. You combine that with her real drive to perfection, and it was tough. It was tough for her.

Smith: Of course, there is also this school of thought that here’s a woman, who, after all, had been a performer in her early days, had been on stage, was not unfamiliar with audiences, and who found, once she got over the initial shock, that she rather enjoyed life in the White House; enjoyed the platform that it afforded her. In many ways, people thought she blossomed as First Lady. Not least of all, probably because she also saw more of her husband, who was physically there. Did he feel guilty at all about those years when, like a lot of men of his generation, he was climbing the ladder and a lot of the burdens, particularly of child-rearing, fell to her?

Willard: Yes. Did he feel guilty? Yes. After we left the White House, I’d travel with him always, and we’d usually sit up late at night talking. He never would say, “Gosh, I sure feel guilty being gone all those years.” But he would talk about those years, especially after he became Minority Leader, and the travel demands. And he would talk about how long he was gone. But it was in the context of the family, not in the context of, “Well, I was a loyal trooper for the Party.” It was in the context of, “Yeah, two hundred plus days a year back in those days I was away from Betty and the kids.” I don’t think one can come to any conclusion other than he regretted it and that, he felt – pick your descriptive phrase – guilt…felt badly…whatever.

Smith: Did he try to make up for it?

Willard: In later years, perhaps. I don’t know that you ever can make up for it. But I think in later years, he spent a lot more time certainly with the children, and then with the grandkids. The joy that those grandkids brought to him and Mrs. Ford - - and to Mrs. Ford still today. So, I don’t know that it was somehow attempting to make up for it, but he clearly wanted to make sure and experience and share in the joy of those relationships in his later years.

Smith: One senses that the transition was easier for her. I mean, she had houses to think about, a lot of domestic concerns. They were going to a place that presumably would be good for her health. You know, it’s a whole new life. She probably thought she was getting her husband back. She hadn’t run for office, you know.
Willard: That was one element. I also think that, during the Election Day to Inauguration Day period, there was a fair amount of - not necessarily trepidation on her part - but, “Wow, what are we getting into?” Yes, she’d see her husband a lot more, but they didn’t have a large cadre of close friends in Rancho Mirage. They had acquaintances, but not close friends. Certainly not, for example, the Lilian Fisher type of relationship or even some of the other close friends of Mrs. Ford’s. We’d talk with Mrs. Ford during that period in the White House and ask - “Should these things go to the Laguna Nigel warehouse?” “Or to Deware house,” the home they were going to rent in Thunderbird Heights. “Or should this go to a government storage facility”, until they built their new house? And I recall a fair amount of comments from her along the lines, “My, my, this is going to be quite a change.” But I don’t think she feared it or ever thought “Maybe we’re doing the wrong thing; maybe we should just go back to Grand Rapids.” Never heard any of that.

Smith: They were starting over, in some ways.

Willard: Oh, absolutely. This was the end of twenty-eight years when Alexandria and the White House were home. And then suddenly they were going, not back to Western Michigan, but to a rented home in Thunderbird Heights in Rancho Mirage, California.

Smith: Was she surprised to find that he was away as much as he was after they got out there?

Willard: Oh my, yes! I remember those early weeks. Bob Barrett and I, and the two secretaries, Joy Chiles and Annie Grier - now Annie Willard. And Lee Simmons came out with us. We were subsequently joined by Dorothy Downton and Carolyn Poremka.

Smith: And where was your office initially?

Willard: The office of the former President of the United States was a “magnificent” kitchenette bungalow on the Thunderbird Country Club grounds with two bedrooms and sort of living room-kitchenette - that was it! So Bob Barrett and I had one room and Annie and Joy had the other. And we dispensed the former president’s business in this little kitchenette on the Thunderbird Country Club grounds – pretty funny, looking back at it now. And he and Mrs. Ford rented a home from Emily Deware up on the hill just on the other side of Highway 111. After a few weeks, we rented a home on Sand Dune Road, the Priest house, which is about three doors up from where the current office is on Sand Dune Road, and the Priest House then became his and our office.

Smith: Was that Ivy Baker Priest?

Willard: It was Pat Priest and her sister – I forget her sister’s name. But Pat was the blonde straight actress on the _Munsters_. So we converted her house into an office, and the President had an office there.

I remember those early weeks, commenting to Bob and Annie and Joy, how lonely it was for the Fords. Just so lonely. There were telephones and all, but it was so lonely from a personal standpoint for them. They just didn’t have a lot of close friends there in the desert. They had people who would come down, particularly Leon Parma – a long-time very close friend. But Leon lived in La Jolla, near San Diego. In those early days, I remember thinking how lonely this was for them.

When we first left the White House, we didn’t leave on Inauguration Day directly for Rancho Mirage. Instead, we flew on Air Force One to Monterrey, California, and he played in the Bing Crosby Pro-Am Golf Tournament. He was there for three or four days, and then came down to Rancho Mirage. By then their things from the White House had arrived. So at least there was some sense of home, albeit in a strange house.

The first few weeks he didn’t travel that much. We maybe did a few trips, but not a lot. We took a trip in February to New York and saw _A Chorus Line_. It was probably within a month of the Inauguration. And I remember walking into the Shubert Theater with them. The start of the show had been delayed for them, and it was just pandemonium when our group walked in. Standing ovation for them – loud cheers! And I remember the look on the Fords’ faces at that moment, and then later that night when we got back to the UN Plaza Hotel. What an impact that reception had on them.

Erik: Did the theater announce them?

Willard: Yes. Before we arrived, the theater said they were delaying the start of the show because of special guests. It was pretty apparent in the theater – front and center there were four seats and three seats behind them that were unfilled. We arrived and were seated - President and Mrs. Ford and Annie Grier and I, and then three Secret Service agents behind us. We went backstage afterwards, and Mrs. Ford was just ebullient.

Shortly after that trip, he began to travel.

Smith: They enjoyed the show?

Willard: Oh, they enjoyed the show! Just thoroughly enjoyed the show.

Smith: Among those who knew them well, it is an article of faith that she had a somewhat more ribald sense of humor than he did. And things would often have to be explained to him…

Willard: There’s a song in A Chorus Line – I remember it now as vividly as when we were sitting there that evening, when you hear the character sing, “Tits and Ass.” I remember looking immediately to my left. Mrs. Ford was sitting next to me, and then the President and then Annie on his other side. And Mrs. Ford laughed heartily at the lyrics. And then the President, after a pause, laughed very hard. It was quite a moment. Both thoroughly enjoyed themselves, including when we went backstage afterwards.

Shortly after that he started traveling again -- a lot.

Smith: He needed that, didn’t he?

Willard: He did. I can’t explain it. But shortly after that trip to New York he cranked up the travel. We went to New Haven, Connecticut and spent – gosh, we were probably out there three or four days. He stayed in a Yale residence college. I forget the name of the college, but we stayed right there in the residence hall. And he took meals with the undergrads, and he gave lectures. And, of course, we went to his alma mater – the law school. He gave a couple of lectures. And he absolutely thrived on that. And then he went and played in a golf tournament. And then he gave a speech on the War Powers Act at the University of Kentucky. There was a whole panoply of events, and he clearly thrived on it.

Smith: He took heat for “commercializing” the ex-presidency. And I’m wondering – without dismissing it altogether – there is some element of context because you never got any awareness of all the charity work he was doing, or the campus visits that he was making, or even the suggestion that he could be doing constructive work on boards. Somehow the fact that you would go on a board was deemed inappropriate. He turned down a whole lot more offers than he accepted.

Willard: Right.

Smith: Was he sensitive about that?

Willard: I don’t think so at the time; the criticism began to come later. That first year, I don’t think he received that much criticism.

Part of the difficulty was that there wasn’t exactly a template on how to be a former president. If you go back a few presidents at the time – Nixon, Johnson, Eisenhower – they lived relatively private, quiet lives. President Ford was sixty-three years old, very active, swam several miles a day. So here was this very active, engaged former president. What should he do? What should he not do? How should he comport himself? That first year he signed the agreement with NBC to do some specials. He signed the contract to do his autobiography. But that first year there were not as many of the corporate speaking engagements as there were in the late ‘70s, early ‘80s. In those subsequent years, he got a fair amount of criticism. But, ironically, as you point out, as he moved into that period, the amount of charity work he was doing just exploded.
Smith: A lot of people also don’t stop to realize – one of the things that maybe bonded him and Jimmy Carter – was that each of them were shocked to realize, after losing an election, that they were expected to raise millions of dollars to build a library.

Willard: Right. And, in his case, the library/museum arrangement was bifurcated. When we left the White House, he had already donated his papers to the University of Michigan. He’d signed the deed in late December of ’76, officially deeding his papers to the library in Ann Arbor.

Right before Mrs. Ford’s hospitalization – in April of ’77 – we went to Grand Rapids – I think for Easter. And while there we met with Dick, Jim, and Tom Ford and some community leaders looking at sites for a possible presidential museum. And I remember going down to the riverfront, pretty close to where the museum is today. It was really desolate. There were old warehouses, nothing like the spectacular riverfront today. And the question quickly came up – would the Michigan legislature help with some of the costs? I remember the President fund-raising with Benno Schmidt who was engaged by the President to help him raise the millions of additional dollars that it was going to take. But there was a very clear sense at the time that the President was going to have to raise a lot of money because he was going to have two facilities – a library and a museum, each in a separate city.

Smith: And that was long before anyone really thought about the need for an endowment.

Willard: Never thought about it. And again – this was a few months after we had left Washington. And it was just a sense on his part of – well, we need to raise a lot of money to build these buildings - period. I don’t think the ‘e’ word, endowment – was discussed. I don’t remember it ever being discussed. But that Easter visit to Grand Rapids was the first time I recall their having the sense that there was going to be a bifurcation of the library and museum and the cost of that. At the time, I think it was simply, “Okay, fine: library Ann Arbor; museum Grand Rapids.” No one ever took a step back and said, “Well, gosh, none of the other libraries does it this way.” And, of course, none has done it since or probably ever will.

Smith: And even more, no one ever took a step back and says, “This is great now. Twenty years from now will this work?”

Willard: There was discussion in the early to mid-2000s. I remember having lunch with him in 2004 or 2005, there at his home in Rancho Mirage. And towards the end of lunch, he said, “I need to ask your advice on something.” And he had Penny bring over a correspondence file. There was correspondence from folks in Michigan about the prospect of moving the library from Ann Arbor to Grand Rapids and the costs attendant to that and to join the two. And that never went anywhere.

Smith: Did he have an opinion?

Willard: During that conversation, I gave him my initial reaction – which was – that’s a lot of money because you’d have to build a whole new facility. At the time I also said, “And I don’t think…unless the university is a part of the facility in Grand Rapids…I can’t fathom that the university would ever agree to participate in that.” He was, at that point, (hearkening back to the earlier part of this oral history conversation), he was in the listening mode. In subsequent conversations with him, he made it pretty clear to me that he did not support merging the two. We didn’t go into all his reasons. He may have sent a letter at some point towards the end of his life saying – “I don’t think this is a good idea – at least for now.”

Smith: Were you surprised by the intervention?

Willard: Yes. Shocked. Just shocked. That April ’77 trip to which I referred, I knew then – we all knew at that point – something was wrong – very wrong. It’s so remarkable to look back with benefit of hindsight and say, “For goodness sakes, why couldn’t we realize that?” And my wife, Annie, spent hours and hours with Mrs. Ford in California and traveled with her. And Annie was as surprised as I was at the diagnosis.

Smith: Really?

Willard: Yes.

Smith: I guess I should be more explicit. The intervention is a response to a situation. The situation, presumably, must have been obvious enough, chronic enough, acute enough, to warrant the intervention.

Willard: Right, but what I mean is sitting here, in 2011, and looking back to 1977 and then the intervention was in ’78, looking back at ’77, how ignorant we, as a society, were about alcoholism and chemical dependency.

We flew back to Rancho Mirage from that April of ’77 trip to Grand Rapids I mentioned. We were on a military aircraft and stopped in Oklahoma City to refuel. I’d gone up front during the flight and noticed Mrs. Ford’s hands while she was sitting with the President. She was clasping her hands very hard like this [indicating one hand firmly clenched over the other hand]. We arrived in California, and I remember being shocked when she unclasped her hands. She had a huge bruised welt right here [where her hands were clasped].

That evening President Ford called me and said with a very concerned tone, “Can you come down to the house?” I lived up in Palm Springs, so I rushed down to Rancho Mirage. Mrs. Ford was there, obviously in a lot of pain. And she said, “I can’t live like this anymore; the pain - I can’t.” We talked about it. She said, “I know the risks. I want to reconsider the possibility of surgery.”

So I contacted Dr. Lukash, who had been the White House physician, and he made arrangements. And within the next day or so, she went over to Eisenhower Medical Center and had a myelogram. I don’t know if they still do it today, with the new MRIs and CTs. But they injected dye into her spine and took x-rays or CTs. Late that afternoon after the myelogram, it was pretty apparent that something wasn’t right. She was not well. And the doctor said, “Well, we’re going to admit her. She is having a reaction to the myelogram. And that happens in about 5% of the cases.”

At that moment, I wasn’t particularly worried. But by the evening her condition became very critical. I stayed that entire week in the hospital suite with her – never left; slept each night in the anteroom in her suite.

The President came over the first evening, and we talked to the doctors. They were reassuring, but there were some things not quite right. Well, it got worse. And the second day and the third day and the fourth day. And she was very, very ill. We went downstairs to radiology one evening, and they did scans of her brain, fearing that maybe her breast cancer had metastasized. Again, as we think back, her breast cancer was in the Fall of 1974; so this was less than three years since her cancer diagnosis. There was a fear that maybe what she was experiencing was related to the cancer. Fortunately, it wasn’t. She remained hospitalized for a couple of days and then went home. And she was in a really difficult strait for two or three weeks after that. And no one at the time – none of the physicians – no one made a diagnosis other than a very serious adverse reaction to the myelogram. The consensus of the medical folks was that she simply had had this bad reaction to the myelogram.

Looking back today, with the benefit of thirty-plus years of hindsight, she was going through withdrawal. Nobody realized it. No one ever connected the dots. None of the physicians did, none of the family did, and none of us who were around them did. Not one single person said, “Maybe there’s something more going on here.”

Smith: Including her?

Willard: Including her. So then fast forward the following year when Susan and the President and the family intervened and she went to Long Beach. I remember when it came out, the headline “Betty Ford admitted for alcoholism.” I remember calling Susan and Steve in shock. I said, “Alcoholism? How can that be? I’ve traveled with your mother. I shared hotel suites with her; we’d stay up telling funny stories and gossiping. I never saw her slamming down drinks.”
But, again, the understanding of that disease in 1977, 1978 and today - ironically, I think it’s fair to say, Betty Ford is the reason the knowledge base today is what it is, as distinguished from what it was in 1977-78.

Smith: Is it also possible that she was, I suppose like lots of people, perhaps especially from that era - kind of a quiet, almost a lonely drinker. You stop and think, she left Washington for this new life; the kids were really grown up by then so they were out; and he turned out to be on the road as much as before. She didn’t have a cadre of friends. And just the combination of loneliness, and maybe disappointment – it was a particularly vulnerable environment.

Willard: But those who were around her during the day, including Joy and Annie and Bob, I don’t recall there was ever a sense of “gosh, Mrs. Ford’s really…” And the countless times I would be around her at all hours, literally, I cannot remember any time during the day that Mrs. Ford had a drink during the day - never. She had her pain medicine. But my understanding of alcoholism in those days and my sort of mental image – at the time – of alcoholism was this bottle in the brown paper bag.

Well, now we know differently.

Smith: Do you think the kids, and particularly Susan, were maybe more attuned to what was going on than he was? Let me put it another way. Do you think there was some denial at work that wasn’t the case with the kids?

Willard: Maybe. And the reason I hedge is that after her hospitalization in April, 1977, there was a sense among all of us, even the President, that she was struggling. It would manifest itself to us in different ways. We were very aware of it, but didn’t know what “it” was. There was the Bolshoi television appearance.

Smith: Which is painful to watch.

Willard: It’s just remarkable, looking back, that no one ever connected the dots. I think much of it (and that’s why I hedge my answer a little bit) was not so much denial on his part, but that he and the rest of us had a growing sense that something was wrong – really wrong. He was also distracted with his huge travel commitments. He’d say, “Well, Greg, we’ve got to focus on this upcoming eight day trip, and Betty doesn’t want to go (or can’t join up with us.”) But the undercurrent – the reason she didn’t want to go, or couldn’t – he and I both knew it was more than her back pain.

Smith: Yes. Was travel an issue? Was she welcomed to travel?

Willard: Yes. She was always welcomed; she just wouldn’t go with us. There was a trip in May that had been scheduled for quite awhile. Lady Bird Johnson had invited them to the ranch for three days. And Mrs. Ford couldn’t go, just wasn’t up to it. So the President and I went. Lee Simmons also went.

Smith: There’s a real friendship there, wasn’t there? Between Lady Bird and the Fords?

Willard: It was wonderful. Mrs. Ford wasn’t along, but it was a remarkable trip. Both President Ford and Mrs. Johnson, particularly Mrs. Johnson, had a wonderful time. I was just a staff person, but she included me in everything. I remember one morning she brought in a number of the ranch hands, and we sat around the living room and had coffee. And then after they left, Lady Bird would talk with President Ford about every topic imaginable. I remember early one afternoon she came upstairs and knocked on his door. We had just finished lunch. He and I had adjacent rooms there at the house. She knocked, “Mr. President? I’m going to go out for a walk and wanted to know if you and Mr. Willard would like to join me.” He said, “I’d love that.” And so the three of us soon headed outside.

We walked down the gravel road in front of the house, trailed by the Secret Service agents - hers and his. Mrs. Johnson and President Ford chatted about all manner of things. She loved explaining to us all about the wildflowers and history of the countryside. And then all of a sudden, we turned towards the river and walked to President Johnson’s grave. Mrs. Johnson and President Ford stood there and reminisced for quite awhile about President Johnson. That trip to the ranch was a wonderful visit for him. There clearly was a special relationship between the Fords and Johnsons. And it continued with their kids. Susan stays in close touch with Lynda and Luci. It’s a wonderful friendship.

Smith: I remember at the time of the Philadelphia convention in 2000, where he had that mild stroke. I’ll never forget, within twenty minutes of the news breaking I got two calls. The first was from Julie and the second was from Tricia. And one sensed that that relationship existed. Can you talk about Nixon? One senses the pardon had to have altered that relationship in a permanent way.

Willard: It did. When we first got out to Rancho Mirage in 1977, ironically, we were only about ninety-five miles from San Clemente. They corresponded briefly; they weren’t regular correspondents. But I do know they corresponded. I don’t think they spoke by phone.

Interestingly, in March, the Fords went to Vail for a three or four day weekend, and I stayed back in California. Annie Grier [now Willard], one of the secretaries in the Rancho Mirage office, had worked for President Nixon on his White House staff. So she decided to go up that weekend to visit her friends Diane Sawyer and Frank Gannon, with whom she’d worked in the Nixon White House. When Annie got up there, she called and said, “Why don’t you come on up and visit?” So I did. And that was the first time I’d met Nixon. It was during his David Frost interviews.

I met with Nixon twice on that visit. The first was a casual conversation the first day, and then the next visit was a longer discussion with him. On Saturday, Jack Brennan, Nixon’s chief of staff called and said, “Greg, why don’t you and Annie come over and have coffee with the President.” We drove over to the office and visited President Nixon for quite awhile. President Nixon, of course, asked me what I currently was doing. I told him of my position as President Ford’s personal aide. It was interesting; at no point during the conversation did he say, “How are President and Mrs. Ford?” or “How are Jerry and Betty?” or, even as I’m leaving, “Please give my best to Jerry and Betty.” Nothing. And when I subsequently told President Ford that I’d been to San Clemente and visited with President Nixon, I didn’t get from President Ford, “Tell me how the President is doing”; or “how’s he doing.” Nothing.

President Ford and I subsequently watched the first Frost-Nixon interview on television at Trammel Crow’s house. After the broadcast, we immediately went upstairs; he was very upset by what he’d watched – very troubled.

But I certainly didn’t have any sense at all that there was animus between Ford and Nixon - none. But, at least on President Ford’s part in 1977, I think there was this sense of, “What would be appropriate?” At his core, he didn’t want to do or say anything to make Nixon feel uncomfortable. And so it was a challenging relationship. I don’t know how it evolved in the ‘80s, and until Nixon died. But in those early days it was awkward for President Ford.

The same with Spiro Agnew. Agnew lived right across from where our office was on Sand Dune Road. Agnew’s home was in an area called The Springs. It was a development in Palm Springs. I know a couple of times the President and I would be playing golf, and look over and there would be Agnew in the next fairway. Neither Agnew nor President Ford turned their carts to go speak to one another. They had to know of one another’s presence, fifty feet away – you can’t not know, particularly seeing President Ford with six or eight Secret Service agents around him. I don’t recall, in that early period, them ever coming into contact in social settings out there either.

Smith: I only heard him speak disparagingly of two people and the worst he could come up with was, “He’s a bad man.” One was John Dean, and one was Gordon Liddy. One senses that from a very early age, he almost trained himself – perhaps his mother had something to do with this – perhaps the Eagle Scout – but consciously made an effort to imagine the best of people.

Willard: Always. Almost to a fault, sometimes. He’d see the best in people, which led to an exchange such as – “Well, Mr. President, there’s this aspect going on here. There’s a story here, sir, that’s not very pretty.” He’d reply along the lines, “Well, I know, but he’s such a good guy, and he’s done so many good things.” The reply - “I understand, Mr. President, but…” – was tough for him to accept.
Smith: I saw it with Mrs. Reagan in a different sense that I think clearly redefined her role. He [Ronald Reagan] didn’t have a Haldeman. And she had pretty good antenna and pretty good judgment. And I’m wondering if there was any of that dynamic with the Fords.

Willard: A little bit. When you would sit down with Mrs. Ford – and you may remember this from your experiences – she’d bluntly say, “Well, tell me what’s going on.” She wanted it all – the good, the bad and the ugly, including some gossip. And not in a mean way, like “I’m going to go rat this person out.” But she enjoyed knowing what’s going on. He, not so much, though. He’d kind of go down that path, “Well, Mr. President, I want to let you know about this. It doesn’t directly affect you, but…” Well, more likely than not, you’d be cut off. “Okay, we don’t need to talk about that.” But Mrs. Ford was – in my experience in those early years – was much more proactive in terms of making sure he was told. She’d say, “Jerry, now you need to think about this!”

Smith: Protecting him from himself.

Willard: I don’t remember in those early years her filling that role.

Smith: Did he see himself as a prospective candidate for 1980? I know later on there was an effort to lure him into the race, but I’m wondering - in part the context in which some of these decisions commercial, were made - whether he really saw his political career as over.

Willard: Break it down. That first year, I can say almost unequivocally, no. He did not see himself as a candidate. I remember we were going to be in Houston that spring of ’77. We were putting together the schedule, and he mentioned to me, “We need to leave several hours in the morning wide open,” which was unusual. I said, “Sure, Mr. President,” and blocked it out. I told the Secret Service that we were going to be unscheduled that whole time. And what subsequently happened that morning was, President Ford and I had a meeting in the hotel with George H. W. Bush and Jim Baker. The discussion was about George H. W. Bush running in 1980. And then about an hour later John Connally comes in. I didn’t sit in on that meeting. But President Ford and I talked about it later, and he gave a download of the discussion.

I don’t recall any suggestions on President Ford’s part that, “Well, I’m going to have these conversations, but in the back of my mind, I might run myself.” I really think, at least in that first year, that he was done with politics, consistent with the conversations he had with Mrs. Ford in 1972 - 1973 when he realized that he wasn’t going to be Speaker.

Whether that changed leading up to the 1980 Detroit GOP convention with the Reagan-Ford ticket chatter - perhaps. Bob Barrett would’ve had those conversations at the time and will have the best insights. But I never thought he’d ever run again – never.

In that first year after the White House, there were zero discussions, including leading up to and following his meetings with Bush and Connally, of him ever running again. He, of course, didn’t make any commitments to either. But had he been contemplating re-entering, he would likely have said, “Well, this is what I discussed with George and Jim and with Connally, but we need to keep in mind what I may do.” Never a whiff of that. He was done.

Smith: Did he hold a grudge against Reagan? And I don’t mean in a burning sense, because he’s not the sort of person who lived in the past. But you wondered. One sensed that if you scratched the surface deep enough, you would find lingering resentments, not so much of the original challenge, but the lack of campaigning in the fall.

Willard: Right. I would use a different word than grudge. And I’d bifurcate it from a personal standpoint. There was no animus from a personal standpoint. From a political standpoint, from the party perspective, I heard him discuss, on more than one occasion, his sense that although then-Governor Reagan campaigned in 1976, the number of times he uttered the phrase, “Jerry Ford” or “President Ford” was pretty limited. And I think, not a grudge, he didn’t begrudge that, but….

Smith: But he’s keeping score.
Willard: He remembered. And he was disappointed. But fast forward to 1980, and the two of them having some brief discussion about a Reagan-Ford ticket. But, as I said earlier, I never thought he’d do it, especially considering Mrs. Ford.

Smith: Were you surprised when the friendship with Carter developed? One senses that all the other members of the former presidents club, who found it hard to imagine being friends with Jimmy Carter, found it particularly puzzling.

Willard: Yes and no.

Yes, in that I remember how disappointed he was that he lost. I could see his disappointment in our last days in the White House. I could see it on his face. I could hear it in his voice, and Governor Carter was responsible for that. It never ever popped into my mind that they somehow would someday have a close relationship.

No, in that when you think about Gerald Ford and the core components of his being and his goodness – you always have to talk about his goodness – it doesn’t surprise me at all that they made a link. That the similarities that the two have, whether it’s Dorothy Ford or Lillian Carter, three sons and then a daughter, both in the Navy, both not from large means. A lot of commonality that one would not at first blush ascribe to political adversaries.

Smith: And a pair of strong wives.

Willard: A pair of strong wives, in their own ways.

Smith: That friendship, by the way, extended to the wives.

Willard: Oh, to be sure. I remember in some of the more private moments during President Ford’s state funeral, particularly in Grand Rapids and on the Air Force One flight from Washington to Michigan, the emotional impact on Mrs. Carter was significant and very apparent.

Smith: I will never forget. It’s odd, when you are standing there, trying to get through [a eulogy], and the Fords are right in front of you, and you’re trying to do your best, and you’re in a kind of a fog – the thing I will always remember is at one point looking over and seeing Rosalynn Carter weeping. And I thought, who would have imagined thirty years ago that this is how the story ends? It’s just so improbable.

Willard: And a similar moment occurred during planning for the funeral. I was visiting President and Mrs. Ford at their Beaver Creek home. I’d go out to Beaver Creek and Rancho Mirage and do a series of detailed planning meetings, new table-top scenarios, and on site walk-throughs with MDW and Secret Service. Sometimes, we’d also work on her plan. Then, we’d sit down and go over new recommendations on the State Funeral plans. On this particular visit, he and I were talking about the final ceremony at Andrews Air Force Base and the last flight to Grand Rapids on Air Force One. All of a sudden he became very somber. And he began to tear up. He looked over and said, “Greg, it would mean a great deal to me if you would make certain that Jimmy and Rosalynn are on that last flight with Betty and the children.”

And in my mind, that moment and his visible emotion sum up their extraordinary friendship. We were discussing taking his remains home to Grand Rapids for the last time, and he had one request: he wanted me to be sure that Jimmy and Rosalynn Carter were on that flight.

Smith: And the scene I’ll never forget, once we were on the flight, President Carter walking up and down the aisle with the youngest Ford great-grandchild.

Willard: With Joy Berlanga.

Smith: It was just an astonishing image.

Willard: And Joy, she couldn’t have been six months old at the time, with him up and down the left side of Air Force One.

Smith: By all accounts, the Carters were astonished at the crowds, at the outpouring that they saw when they got to Grand Rapids.
Willard: We all were. People have asked a similar question about that relationship, was it genuine and all – and there are so many similar examples one can point to. And I’m sure Penny Circle over the years had dozens of similar examples of just how deep and broad that friendship was – among the four of them – not just President Carter and President Ford, but among all four of them. And, it culminated with President Carter breaking down at the end of his eulogy. That’s as heartfelt as it gets.

Smith: Were the Fords comfortable talking about their funeral planning? Or did they become more comfortable over time? How was it initially introduced?

Willard: May, 1977 was the first meeting President Ford and I had regarding his State Funeral Plan. A civilian from the Military District of Washington came out to Rancho Mirage. We met in the conference room with the President. I remember thinking at the time, “This may be the oddest meeting I’ve ever participated in. The President is 63, walks eighteen holes of golf and swims each day – why are we talking about his funeral?” We went ahead and developed some very basic ideas and a funeral plan template. That template evolved by about 1986 (Penny and Bob Barrett may know better) into a simple seven page outline that was then put on the shelf. I understand in the 1990s you were able to move it forward; your memo about a funeral plan was terrific.

I became re-involved in 2003 when Steve Ford asked me to breakfast in Washington. It was after the President’s 2000 stroke, and he was still doing pretty well. At that point, the whole funeral plan was still a 12-page outline comprised mostly of lists of which military units would be assigned to what ceremony; pretty sparse. Steve said, “We really need to get serious about this while Dad is still in ok health.” And so - from 2003 to the President’s death on December 26, 2006 - I became very involved in planning the funeral and then oversaw its conduct. It turned out to be an enormous undertaking - pretty much full-time for those three years; hundreds of meetings around the country, 33,000 e-mails, thousands of documents, 23 separate invitation lists, security checklists, contracts, conference calls and meetings with Mike Wagner and MDW, Secret Service, White House staff, Blair House, law enforcement, National Guard, U.S. House and Senate, clergy, hundreds of annotated diagrams and seating charts, all the printed materials and tributes, meetings and teleconferences with the Fords and the family, and, of course, planning and overseeing the very private arrangements for his Remains upon Demise. The final plan was 587 pages. Our entire funeral file has more than 2 terabytes of data.

In the early stages of the planning, President Ford would occasionally push back. I don’t know whether emotionally he didn’t want to talk about it, or, more likely, it was his way of saying, “I want to make sure there’s not too much pomp.”

Early on I said to him at a group planning meeting in Rancho Mirage, “Mr. President, two things are going to happen when you die. The sun is going to rise in the east the next morning, and the American people are going to pay tribute to your service to the Nation. Now you may not like the second of those, but it’s going to happen. You can contribute, you can give your thoughts, you can participate in the planning, or, instead, you can choose not to do so. But it is going to happen, whether you want it to or not - period.” He paused and smiled, “Well, I guess when you put it that way…” Over the course of our three years preparing his funeral plan, it wasn’t so much a reluctance, as an uncomfortableness sometimes, with what otherwise would be the pomp of a state funeral. A significant consideration was also the effect he knew his death would have on Mrs. Ford, the children and the grandchildren.

Smith: Was there an inherent – for lack of a better word – tension between marrying those two strains? One of the things that I think came to define that week in a way that had more of an emotional impact than the sheer pomp would have, was the extent to which it felt like a family funeral.

Willard: Well, I’m glad to hear you say that because that’s exactly what our hope was with the entire funeral plan.

Smith: Really?
Absolutely. I insisted that the family be the focus. One of the earliest meetings I had was with the military and Secret Service in Washington - huge meeting. I explained the two stages we were going to utilize to develop the funeral plan: in the first stage we would develop a plan for Mrs. Ford and the family; then, the second stage would incorporate all the military traditions and protocol. I pointedly said that the plan’s three priorities would be: family, family, and family -- in that order! I described it this way: what we’re going to do is first prepare a funeral plan for what Mrs. Ford and the children and the grandchildren will need to say goodbye. Once we’ve defined that, once we’ve developed that – and not before – we will then overlay all of the traditions, the rituals, the protocol. But it will always be, at the core, about Mrs. Ford and the children saying goodbye to her husband and their dad.

You’re right; there could have been a tension. But I can count on one hand the times when there actually was. And every single time an issue like that would come up, Mike Wagner and I resolved it; no problems - none. I’ll give you an example – planning the repose at St. Margaret’s Church. The Remains were to be brought there the first time – when “the casket goes public” is the phrase they use. Mike and I spent hours and hours planning every detail of that first repose. Upon arrival at St. Margaret’s, there first would be private time, a private prayer service with just Mrs. Ford and the family. Military tradition said that four military personnel must stand vigil at the corners of the casket. But that meant Mrs. Ford and the children would be looking at the casket through or around uniforms. I said, “That’s not going to work. Family, family, family.” By this point in the funeral planning, Mike, whose title is Chief of State Funeral Planning at the Military District of Washington, had become the lead MDW coordinator for us. In this instance, Mike studied the military protocols and concluded: if the Officer In Charge stood alone at the head of President Ford’s casket during the family time, that would be sufficient to sustain the military “vigil.” The other military personnel could leave. So we did it that way. The family’s needs were met, and protocol and military traditions were also observed. With Mike, we were always able to resolve the most difficult and sensitive matters in the funeral plans. He’s extraordinary.
Sure, there’s a possibility of tension between family emotions and needs, and protocol and tradition for a state funeral. But Mike and I, with MDW General Guy Swan’s steadfast support, always found solutions – always. A real tribute to Mike and General Swan – two remarkable men, just remarkable.

Smith: And I recall vividly, his expressed desire not to have a caisson.

Willard: Yes. And ironic because what came out of that desire was an alternative - and very touching - part of the funeral. He didn’t want a horse-drawn caisson, so his casket was to be borne by a hearse from Andrews Air Force Base to the Capitol. So, we developed a new idea for him to consider: have the hearse come over Memorial Bridge, around the Lincoln Memorial, up Seventeenth Street, and then pause at the World War II Memorial in a moment of mutual tribute to President Ford and his World War II comrades.

I remember sitting in the den with him late one morning at the house in Rancho Mirage. He was in the blue chair there in the den. We were going over my latest updates and recommendations on the plan, and I began to describe the Word War II pause recommendation to him. In his last visit to Washington in 2004 after a Foundation dinner when Dick Cheney and Don Rumsfeld had received the Foundation’s medal in Statuary Hall, the Secret Service had driven him in his limo into the World War II Memorial, and he spent some time there. He was very moved by it. He was so proud of his Navy service. So when I talked to him about the recommendation for a ceremonial pause at the Memorial – not just as an alternative to the horse-drawn caisson, but as part of telling the story of Gerald Ford to the American people - he became very emotional. “I can’t tell you how much that would mean to me.”

The phrase I used to describe our planning was “Thematic Mosaic” – a series of tributes (a mosaic) that would comprise his overall state funeral. I explained it: “We’ll have eight days of tributes. There will be this piece of his life represented here, and this piece there, and that piece there. And at the end of the eight days, I want the Ford grandchildren to be able to step back and look at that eight day mosaic and say, ‘That was my grandpa.’” Whether it was the World War II Memorial pause, having the casket borne up the House of Representative steps and later out the Senate steps, lying in repose outside both chambers, or the individuals he selected as eulogists and pallbearers – all of those were part of telling the story of Gerald Ford in the context of a state funeral mosaic.

Smith: Any surprises that week?

Willard: A couple in particular. One was during the first Arrival Ceremony at the Capitol. We had twenty honorary pallbearers in DC, many of whom were older and several of whom had heart conditions. We didn’t dare risk having them climb up the forty-eight steep steps behind the casket. So, during the planning, we said that the Honorary Pallbearers would be at the foot of the stairs. The casket would be borne up the steps, and the pallbearers would then be brought under and taken up the elevator. The plan was that as the casket passed by Mrs. Ford and her official military escort, General Guy Swan, at the top of the steps, the two of them would move in behind the casket, and then the children and grandchildren would follow them in. And then I was to move in behind the family, and we’d proceed inside the Capitol.

So that night it all unfolded just as planned, or so I thought! The casket passed by, the family followed, and, just as I started to lean forward to follow, I looked left, and there was Alan Greenspan! For a moment I thought, “Oh, dear God, Alan is lost; he’s supposed to be going in the elevator under the stairs with the Honorary Pallbearers!” I leaned a little further forward, and there were Brent Scowcroft, Henry Kissinger, Dick Cheney - all of the Honorary Pallbearers walking together up the steps! Vice President Cheney came up beside me and said with a twinkle in his eye, “Didn’t expect to see us, did you, Greg?” I smiled, “No, Mr. Vice President; I sure didn’t.” He replied softly, “We wanted to walk him in.”

That was a surprise, and a wonderful surprise. The other, well, several others – the first, we talked about the crowds, especially in Alexandria.
Smith: On that day that we went up to the Cathedral, I was wearing my ABC hat, so I did not get to be in the motorcade, but I was told by a number of people, including colleagues at ABC, that although you had dispensed with the formal procession, a surprising number of people had turned out just to say goodbye.

Willard: Remarkable crowds. Another memorable moment occurred later that same afternoon. It actually began Saturday while we were enroute from California to Washington on Air Force One. As we lifted off from the Palm Springs Airport, I suddenly realized that thirty years ago almost to the day I’d come to California with him on Air Force One, and now I was accompanying him on Air Force One back to Washington -- for the last time. That realization hit me like a bolt. I lost it; very difficult moment. I quickly got back to work finalizing plans for the ceremonies that evening in DC. A short while later, I casually said to Major Mark Thompson, President Bush’s military aide, “Would you check our flight path from Andrews to Grand Rapids next week? And if we’re going to be anywhere near Ann Arbor, if you could just let me know, I’ll point it out to Mrs. Ford.” That’s all I said. The following Tuesday afternoon, after the service at National Cathedral, we boarded Air Force One at Andrews and took off for Michigan. We weren’t even to altitude when Major Thompson came back and said, “Mr. Willard, in about an hour we’re going to go into a steep dive.” I replied, “Major, there are lots of things I’d like to be told on Air Force One – that’s not one of them!” He smiled and then told me what Colonel Mark Tillman, the presidential pilot, had arranged. So, over southeast Detroit we started going down, as you will remember. We told Mrs. Ford and the family and the other passengers what was about to happen. We leveled out over Willow Run, Michigan at 800 feet altitude. The aircraft went full flaps down, doing barely 190 knots. Air Force One then flew directly over the University of Michigan football stadium and then gracefully toggled its wings from side to side to say goodbye. It was a moment I’ll never forget.

There were many wonderful moments that perhaps you could call a surprise: the reactions of the crowds when the children and the grandchildren went over – either to the lying in state in the Rotunda, or to the public repose in California and Michigan – and the effects that had on the thousands of people with whom the family interacted - what a wonderful part of the eight days that was.

Another wonderful moment involved Mrs. Ford. Most people don’t know that she was very sick that week. Very sick; horrible bronchial infection. And it became a real question whether she was going to be able to make it to all the services and ceremonies. Tradition is that Air Force One is provided to move the remains to the final resting place. Then, a different, smaller military aircraft returns the widow home. So, we were scheduled to return from Grand Rapids to Rancho Mirage in a C-32 aircraft. On Monday afternoon, January 1, we were at Blair House, and Mrs. Ford was receiving the ambassadors from the countries he visited as President. Randy Bumgardner, Manager of Blair House, came in and said I had a call on a Blair House phone from Joe Hagin, President Bush’s Deputy Chief of Staff. Randy is an extraordinary person who made certain everything at Blair House was perfect for Mrs. Ford – and it was. Joe said, “Greg, I’m on a speakerphone on Air Force One with President Bush and General Tubb in the President’s office.” General Tubb was the President’s physician who’d been attending Mrs. Ford in Washington. And Joe said, “The President and General Tubb think Mrs. Ford would be much more comfortable going back to California on Air Force One. If it’s okay with her, we’re going to have this aircraft take her home to California.” Now, President Bush didn’t have to do that. It wasn’t a surprise as much as another of his many wonderful and compassionate kindnesses that week.

A very funny moment occurred later that afternoon at Blair House. All of the former Presidents, First Ladies, and First Family members came to Blair House to pay their respects to Mrs. Ford. Randy Bumgardner had set up a lovely table with a condolence book for all of them to sign. Many of them took their time and wrote notes. At one point, Hillary Clinton was seated writing her note in the book. President Carter was standing behind her patiently waiting to sign the book. Happy Rockefeller suddenly walked by and saw him waiting his turn. She turned to him and said crisply, “Well, you better get ready – you’re next.” President Carter froze! From the shocked expression on his face it was apparent he thought Mrs. Rockefeller was somehow prophesying that his State Funeral was next – and not that he was merely next in the condolence book line. David Kennerly and I were nearby and doubled over laughing.

There was another humorous moment at Blair House. President Bush ’43 and Laura came over to pay their respects. I took them up to the second floor library – just the two of them – to meet with Mrs. Ford. Sometime later, his father, President Bush ’41 and Barbara and the Ford children came in. There’s a great photograph of the two Presidents on the left sofa and Barbara Bush sitting in a wing chair with Laura Bush sitting perched on the arm of the chair. I remember chuckling to one of the Ford children, “There are six billion people on the planet, and we’re looking in that chair at the only one who can make the First Lady of the United States sit on the arm of a chair!” Barbara Bush with her daughter-in-law – the First Lady - sitting contentedly on the arm.

Smith: That walk down the Cathedral aisle must have been…

Willard: It was tough. Mike Wagner and I had developed five scenarios for Mrs. Ford to get her to her seat. She made the final decision. The scenarios ranged from: I would assist her in a wheelchair all the way down a side aisle to the front of the Cathedral and then President Bush would meet us and escort her around the front pew to her seat; or I’d take her in a wheelchair to the cross-aisle, and then he’d seat her; or she’d walk the entire way with President Bush. And so the moment came. Everyone else was seated. It was time for her to be seated. President Bush and I were with her in the Cathedral Narthex. The three of us paused, and I said, “Mrs. Ford, whatever you would like to do in terms of getting to your seat, you and I went over the options last night.” She got that resolute Betty Ford look and said firmly, “Greg, I can do this!” and turned, “Mr. President, if you please.” She took his arm, the ushers opened the main Cathedral doors, and the two of them made that long walk. I was shadowing down the right aisle. She went the whole way - no problem. Amazing.
Smith: Bess Abel, Mrs. Johnson’s great aide and friend, told me later, “You know, it sounds like she still has dancer’s legs.” It took another woman to notice.

Willard: Indeed. And, given how ill she was that day, it took enormous courage.

Smith: Well, there was a whole generation who were discovering him for the first time through these old clips and they were comparing and contrasting that with the ugliness of current politics. And he looked awfully good.

Willard: Very good. The funeral, and its thematic mosaic, let Americans young and old consider him in a broader historical context. Mrs. Ford and the family were able to say their final goodbyes, and exactly as we’d planned - state funeral protocol and traditions were carried out completely. Peggy Noonan later wrote, “[President] Ford’s was the most human of presidential funerals.

Maybe because the Fords wanted so little done, so insisted on modesty, all that was done was genuine, and sincere, and -- perfect.”

And so it was; a finer description of his funeral there will never be.
Smith: Do you remember your last visit with him?

Willard: I do; 2006. I was in Rancho Mirage for several days working on the funeral plan and a number of personal legal matters I was handling for President and Mrs. Ford.

The last morning I walked over to the house around ten. The President’s health was declining, but he wasn’t yet bedridden. Mrs. Ford was at the dining room table. I told her goodbye, and asked if the President was around. She said he’d gone back to take a nap, so I asked her to tell him goodbye for me. All of a sudden we heard the click of his cane. He came around the corner with a bathrobe on and smiled, “Where are you going!?!?” I reminded him, “Well, Mr. President, my flight leaves at 12:30.” He said, “Oh, just put some swimming trunks on and come into the pool. The damn doctors told me I can’t swim, but that doesn’t mean I can’t walk!” We both laughed. It turns out he’d started getting in the pool and walking around just to get some exercise. He thanked me for all the work on the funeral plan, tousled the side of my head, and said, “Well, hurry back!” I gave him a hug and said goodbye.

That was the last time I saw him.

The last time we spoke was early November, 2006. By then, his health had declined significantly; very frail. I had an evening conference call with Mrs. Ford and the family about my meetings at the Pentagon earlier that day with the Navy and Secretary Rumsfeld’s staff to plan the January, 2007 Naming Ceremony for the CVN–78 aircraft carrier as the USS Gerald R. Ford. President Ford had previously been told about the decision on the carrier’s name. During the conference call, he suddenly came on the line. He was so excited to hear about the Naming Ceremony plans and Susan’s duties as Ship’s Sponsor. At the end of the call, he thanked me, asked to give his best to Annie, and then said, “Come visit, Greg.” I replied, “Good night, Mr. President. I’ll see you soon.”

That was the last time I spoke to him. He died the next month.
Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Willard: I hope he’s remembered for the person he was. People talk a lot about his character and all those component elements of his being. I think he’s best remembered by that core goodness – “good-ness” – because it permeated everything he did. Whether it was in relationships with friends and colleagues, his presidency, vice presidency, his service in Congress, Navy, Yale Law School, University of Michigan, and then all the way back to growing up in Grand Rapids, there was always a core goodness. And the phrase, “He was a good man,” almost sounds trite. But it’s not trite as to him; it’s very real. When one remembers Gerald Ford in that context - that he was a good man - and then examines what that meant over the course of his 93 years, that’s a wonderful, wonderful legacy.

If that “good-ness” of Gerald Ford can be remembered, and if its manifestations in his public life can be honored and hopefully emulated, we will have known – and been honored – by a life well-lived.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. We really do appreciate it. Tell me how your path crossed with the Fords.

Gen. Swan: At the time of the President’s death, I was serving as the U.S. Army Military District of Washington commander here in D.C. And part of the responsibilities in that position are to help coordinate the military aspects of a state funeral. And this has been one of the traditional roles for that command.

In addition to doing all of the planning, there is a personal role that goes with that position, and that is to serve as the personal escort for the widow of the past president. My predecessor had done that for the Reagan family and then I had that privilege with the Ford family. So planning had been ongoing for the state funeral for many years, as it is for all the surviving presidents. But my personal relationship with the family actually began on the 26th of December, the day that the President passed away, when I received the call that he had died. And the indications were fairly quick. I mean, the family had been together, as I understand, for Christmas Day. The notification and the failing health, was pretty quick, so we had to respond pretty quickly.

Smith: Let me back up, maybe rephrase the question. What career path culminates in this position?

Gen. Swan: I was a traditional armor tank officer and had grown up in various troop units in the United States and Germany and Korea. Spent time in the Gulf War, and had, prior to that position, here at the Military District of Washington, I’d served three years as the Chief of Congressional Affairs, of all things, for the Army. So I’d had a lot of recent experience here in the Washington area, with Capitol Hill, with the senior leaders in the Army and the Department of Defense. So it seemed like a good fit when the Chief of Staff of the Army appointed me to that position. And I felt well prepared to do that job, which is a wide ranging job, from Homeland Security issues in the Washington area to some of the ceremonial activities.

Smith: I wonder whether 9/11 had an impact at all on this job?

Gen. Swan: It has. In fact, the position now is dual command - as an Army command in the Washington area, but also serves the broader U. S. Northern Command now, which has overall Homeland defense responsibilities that headquarters out in Colorado. So the Washington command is a subordinate, and in that capacity is a lot of coordination with local, state, and federal authorities in the Washington area for security, disaster response, and so forth. In fact, the officer that’s in that position today is heavily involved in today’s State of the Union Address and the security apparatus for that.

Smith: So now, the President passed away on the evening of the 26th. Were you in D.C. at that point?

Gen. Swan: I was in D.C. at that time, just happened to be here and received word. And because the planning for the President’s state funeral is so well-rehearsed, there’s almost a battle drill that immediately goes into effect. In my case, my aide decamps and I gathered our uniforms and our personal effects and literally, within hours, we were at Andrews Air Force Base, getting on an aircraft to fly to Palm Springs. That was literally within eight to twelve hours after he passed away.

Smith: And I assume the proximity to New Year’s affected the plan to some degree.

Gen. Swan: To some degree.

Smith: An extra day at the Capitol?

Gen. Swan: That’s right. And we realized that we would have to make timing adjustments. Of course around the holidays, a lot of the senior officials and former administration officials were literally spread out all over the country. I think President Carter was actually out of the country at the time. So we knew that that was going to be a challenge, gathering all the individuals that wanted to be part of that event. So not just New Year’s, but the Christmas holiday and the other holidays kind of generated some rapid adjustments to the plan.

Smith: You met the family for the first time when?

Gen. Swan: Interestingly, we flew into Palm Springs airport, went over to the Ford residence there in Palm Springs, and literally, the first event or the first activity was a very small, one-on-one session – myself and Mrs. Ford – in their living room. It was almost an introductory kind of session. She obviously knew who I was from Greg Willard’s many discussions with her and the President; but we’d never met. I actually tried to avoid – it’s interesting, Richard – I tried to avoid being too involved in the planning because there was always the perception that if General Swan or my predecessor was near the family, there was some indication that something was wrong with the President - that I may be some indicator. We were very conscious of that. So I met her, literally, one-on-one. One of her sons, Steve was there, and the three of us just talked. It was an informal session with me conveying to her, obviously, my condolences, and what might be occurring over the next seven to ten days - to just kind of frame for her what would be occurring. She’d been very involved in the extensive funeral planning with Greg Willard and the President for several years. But on that first visit I thought it was useful to describe - here’s the sequence of things that will occur here, Washington, and then Grand Rapids. It was very cordial.

Smith: Pretty daunting. When Harry Truman signed off on his plans, he famously said, “It looks like it’s going to be quite a show, too bad I won’t be around to see it.” And in the event, because of Mrs. Truman’s advanced age, they dropped the Washington portion. And in many ways, I think it turned out to be more affecting because it was limited to Independence. Mrs. Truman, at that point, was younger than Mrs. Ford was. She was being asked to take on quite a physical challenge.
Gen. Swan: She was. And I think – there was never any hesitation on her part or the sons or Susan – to deviate, or significant deviations, from the original plan. They knew full well what their husband and their father meant to the country. And I felt that sense of obligation on their part. It was quite an interesting – just aura – around the whole family. That there was this typical Midwestern family dealing with the loss of a loved one, yet fully aware that they had some public role that they had to play. And felt that it was quite well balanced. They were very well balanced in doing all of that. So I felt gratified that they were confident that the plan that had been put together was one that they were comfortable with.

Smith: I was wearing two hats that week – I was with ABC the first part of the week and then with the family the second part. And my sense was, journalists in particular were surprised at how much reaction there was, and how it seemed to build as the week went by.

Gen. Swan: I noticed that, too.

Smith: Were you surprised?

Gen. Swan: Clearly, it’s a shock to the nation that a former president has passed away. But I think we were still operating somewhat in the shadow of President Reagan’s state funeral. And that had been such a monumental event, that it took longer for, as you said, for the nation to grasp that another president had passed away. The family wasn’t overly concerned by any of that, nor was I. We had a job to do. But I don’t think it really hit most Americans or even ourselves, or even the family, until he was brought back to Washington. And then it started to gain some momentum, as you said.

Smith: For example, I’ve been told that they were really surprised and very moved by the crowds on a Saturday night on the streets in Alexandria.

Gen. Swan: They were. As all the presidents do, they had some very specific things they wanted to accomplish, and a story to tell about their father, their husband, our president. And one of those things was to go back to their home where they had lived in Alexandria when he was serving in Congress. So the circuitous route that we took from Andrews Air Force Base to downtown Washington took us through Alexandria and the outpouring – I think all of the family members were amazed. Here we are during the holiday period, how many people actually came out on the streets of Alexandria and elsewhere in Washington, I think it was very gratifying for them that their husband had not been forgotten and had been appreciated - more than maybe most Americans realized.

Smith: And the irony for someone who was adamant in not wanting a formal caisson, but I’m told that the morning of the cathedral service, when they drove from the Capitol past the White House and up to the cathedral, that there were still large numbers of people out on the streets.

Gen. Swan: There were. And back to the evening when we drove in. We drove in the evening, so we actually drove through Alexandria at night – part of that route, you know, took us past the World War II Memorial. And he was very adamant that, like most World War II veterans, that was a great accomplishment, to get that monument built. And that was a tip of the hat to fellow World War II veterans that took us past there. And that was moving because there were a lot of senior citizens, so to speak, that were there right between the Washington Monument and the World War II Memorial. A lot of World War II veterans. It was interesting, and I’ll mention it later, the demographics of the audiences that participated in this was quite interesting as we went through Alexandria, their hometown for many years, World War II veterans, Grand Rapids Boy Scouts. I mean, more Boy Scouts than I’ve ever seen. It was just really interesting looking at the demographics of the crowds. Just fascinating.

I think you mentioned going up to the cathedral there were still a lot of people out. The city had prepared very well, too. And we worked a lot with the city officials and the police in the city. They had done a fabulous job in preparing the city for that event. And just like everyone else, they have to react on relatively short notice to make all that happen.

Smith: How was she holding up? Because we knew later on, she wasn’t altogether healthy that week.

Gen. Swan: When I got there to Palm Springs I noticed that she was a little congested, and I was told later that she had had some form of bronchitis and had not been feeling well. And frankly, I thought that might cause us some challenges. So things like wheelchairs and being prepared for whatever she could deal with became part of our planning. But a very, very strong woman and extremely impressive in her resilience – let me say resilience - during the week. Because there were ups and downs, and when she was in the public eye, she was very much aware of that and as others, I’m sure, have told you, she was very intent on doing her husband proud. But those periods when she was just with the family or not on stage, so to speak, she took a break and paced herself. I was proud to see her pace herself, because she knew that this was going to be a lengthy process and she was going to have to find strength during certain periods and then try to rebuild the strength as she went on. I was quite proud of how she handled herself through that. And it certainly lightened the load on the rest of us who were very concerned about her. So just a fascinating woman and a very strong woman.

Smith: Was there anything about her that surprised you? This was your first exposure to her.

Gen. Swan: She was extremely gracious. She could have been somewhat hostile to someone like me, or even distant, because when a person in my capacity arrived on the scene, it meant that her husband had passed and so I was a little concerned that that might stand between us. Because I think part of my responsibility was to build an appropriate relationship with her immediately that would take us both through this process and make it as easy on her as it could be. Not that her focus should be on me, but I wanted to be there in a capacity that made sense for her. And I was surprised at how well received I was by Mrs. Ford. That did surprise me.
Smith: The family that week, when they were off stage, was there a lot of reminiscing going on?

Gen. Swan: There was when we got to Palm Springs. As you know, Greg Willard was President and Mrs. Ford’s personal representative for the entire state funeral. Greg had worked very closely with our team for several years as the principal family agent for planning and then overseeing the conduct every detail of it. My first morning in Palm Springs, after that one-on-one session I had with Mrs. Ford, Greg gathered the family – gathered the whole family together - and took all of us through the sequence of events - this is what’s going to occur over the next several days. Some had been privy to the plan and some of the distant relatives had not. It was fascinating because there were babies in there, there were older people, there were men and women. There were about thirty in the small conference room at the residence with him. And there was an intense focus on what they were being told by Greg. They wanted to know what would occur, what would their role be? And as soon as they all understood that, there was a lot of laughing and a lot of reminiscing and it was a family reunion atmosphere. I was glad to see that because it could have been just a dark day. But they would not allow that to happen. They really wanted to focus on the bright things they remembered about the President.

Smith: One of the remarkable sights I’ve ever seen and I’ll never forget it - on Air Force One, flying back to Grand Rapids, President Carter hoisting on his shoulder the Fords’ newest grandchild, or great grandchild, I guess, walking up and down the aisle of Air Force One. And again, who would have thought thirty years ago that that’s how the story ends?

Gen. Swan: That’s right. And there were many moments like that where the family really, I think, took advantage of being together. I think what I was experiencing was a great deal of gratification, gratitude to their parents that they had been part of such a wonderful family. A number of them had been together for the Christmas holidays, so they had been together. But this was a celebration, not only of the President’s life, but of this wonderful family. And they made the most of it under the circumstances.
Smith: And I think that a theme from the beginning that in some ways set this apart from other grander, if you will, presidential funerals - the emphasis upon family. I don’t want to pry, but I had heard – I knew that the Johnson girls after this said we’ve got to get serious about Mother’s plans and so on. And I was told that the Carters took a fresh look at their own plans in light of what they’d been through. And I understand that they were particularly impressed with the lines in Grand Rapids, two miles long at one point. On a January night, that’s impressive.

Gen. Swan: And you saw it, Richard, when the President was lying in state in the Capitol, the lines grew overnight. He was there for two days. And the thing that struck me there, as well as in Grand Rapids, was that the children of the President, all four children, took turns – I mean, it still brings tears to my eyes that they were out thanking people for coming to see their father. I couldn’t believe it. You know, Americans will come see their president, but they took this far more personally, like – why would you come and see my father – we’re so grateful that you would come and see our father. And they took turns throughout the entire time in the Capitol to walk the lines, talk with family members, and it was really something to behold. Other presidential families – I can’t speak for them – it might have been odd. But that was the nature of the Ford family. They were very grateful for the outpouring. And the same thing occurred in Grand Rapids, as I mentioned. Boy Scouts and his great association with the Boy Scouts of America and his own service as a Boy Scout, it was incredible. Scouts came from all over the Midwest and, as you said, miles and miles of streets lined from the airport to the library. And then the lines – it was somewhat disappointing, somewhat sad that the line had to be closed at certain times because there were people still wanting to pay their respects. But that was what he meant to that part of the country.

Smith: And the weather was glorious.

Gen. Swan: It was.

Smith: I mean, for January.
Gen. Swan: It was cold, but it was beautiful weather, it really was.

Smith: I assume, maybe one of the unintended consequences of the holiday, that extra day maybe, in DC, gave her a little more chance to rest…she was at Blair House.

Gen. Swan: She was.

Smith: And I know there were a lot of visits, some ceremonial and some more personal.

Gen. Swan: She took a lot of visitors, and, again, that was to her credit.

Smith: Former presidents came by.

Gen. Swan: That’s right.

Smith: And I think the Nixon girls and the Johnson girls.

Gen. Swan: They did. A number of his Cabinet and others had come by. And so she never turned anyone away. She was very, very intent on allowing those leaders to come and pay their respects. So she exhibited a lot of strength throughout all of this, and again, it was a remarkable thing to be part of. There were times when I was a bit concerned about her, but she surprised me with her strength.

Smith: She looked so frail, but there is coiled steel there.

Gen. Swan: There is. And an example was in the National Cathedral. We were scrambling ahead of time to make sure we had a wheelchair ready for her to make the long walk.

Smith: That is a long walk.

Gen. Swan: It’s a long walk, and she walked with President Bush. Even President Bush asked her, “Would you like to use the wheelchair?” She absolutely refused, and made that walk. And then again the walk in Grand Rapids as well. But she was intent on walking the distance there.
Smith: We were told that the following week when she got home, someone commented upon this and she said, “I just did what my husband would have wanted me to.”

Gen. Swan: Well, let me tell you this, if I can get through this part. The day of the interment, at the library, we came from the hotel and arrived at the library and a wheelchair was positioned for her. And even her children - “Mother, is everything okay?” and “We have the wheelchair here.” And it was the darnedest thing, and it is the one thing I will remember about the entire event. She told me that she had walked along that river, along the Grand River there many times in that exact spot with President Ford throughout their lives. And she wanted to make one more walk with him to the final resting place. I mean, when I relate this to people I can’t believe I get emotional about this, but we were all so concerned about her health, and she was more concerned about their relationship and doing the right thing. And the last thing she said, and if she sees this I hope she’ll pardon me for saying this, but she said,

“This is the last time I’ll make this walk.”

She knew this was a quintessential moment in her life and she absolutely had to do this. It was a lengthy walk, as you recall, it was probably well over a football field length, and it was cold and she did have to hold and we did steady her. But she said, “I have to make this walk because I won’t be making it again.” That was so very touching. These things, you know, I really, at that point, felt like almost like part of their family. Not just me, but other Americans, too, who watched this were very moved by that final interment ceremony.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that because I’ll never forget, reading Peggy Noonan, who said she didn’t understand it herself, she wasn’t particularly a Ford Republican, but she found herself sobbing as she watched. And she was talking to a friend who had the same reaction. I think it was that family. It was a family.

Gen. Swan: It was. It was an amazing experience, and their sons and their daughter were, throughout the week, were coaching their children, the President’s grandchildren and great grandchildren, about what this all meant. They were very – not just that their grandfather or great grandfather as a former president – but their grandfather and what this was all about. Almost as if you need to remember what is happening here as you go on with your lives. So a great sense of family as the week went on. Much different than other state funerals. But that moment, that struck me when she said, “My husband and I have made this walk many times, and I won’t be making this walk again.” I almost lost it right there. We had a job to do and that was what our focus was, was to make sure that the entire ceremony, from start to finish, was respectful of a great leader and something that our nation could be proud of. And that was our objective. And I’m very pleased that it came off the way it did.

Smith: Did you see interaction between her and the Carters?

Gen. Swan: It was an interesting dynamic, as you mentioned. Arch rivals, political rivals, but in 2006 and into 2007, what I gathered from that – and there were many remarks about this in the press – that in this year in where there is much discussion about civility in Washington, there was a moment there during the state funeral for the President that we had come back to the civility that they recalled. Even when they are arch rivals, even when the President was in Congress, there was a time when party leaders would socialize. I heard that numerous times from a lot of former Cabinet officials and former Congressional leaders who were there - that they missed that. That camaraderie, that collegiality. And I think having President Carter there reminded them of those days.

Smith: I wonder if that, in some way, didn’t contribute to this building emotion as the week went by. We were in some ways mourning an era and a culture that we were burying, as well as a man.

Gen. Swan: I think so. Part of the Greatest Generation, with President Ford, there was some of that, the political environment that I mentioned that they were part of. There was kind of a reminiscence there of days gone by, and maybe we could recapture some of the collegiality and bipartisanship. And I think President Carter was somewhat aware of that, and others were, too. That this is a bit of a lesson to all of us about how things could be, ought to be, might me in our political dynamic.

Smith: Plus, the country had come around on the pardon.

Smith: The Profiles in Courage Award was the imprimatur. He said for twenty years, everywhere I go, people ask the same questions. And after the award, they don’t ask the questions anymore.

Gen. Swan: They don’t. And it was interesting. I think, sadly, it took his passing for people to re-look at the Ford presidency and what it meant. As brief as it was, the tumultuous time after Watergate, coming out of Vietnam. I actually graduated from West Point in 1976. He was my president when I was graduating, and that time was appropriate for a man like Jerry Ford. We needed him at that time. We didn’t realize it at the time. And now, as we look, back, he was the right man in the right place at the right time.

Smith: Last question. Do you think, without getting into any specifics, that Ford’s funeral, how it unfolded and the impact that it had, may influence future planning?

Gen. Swan: I think from a technical standpoint, yes. But each state funeral is very much a family affair with a real intent to tell a story about that individual. And as you saw, there were idiosyncrasies to President Ford’s funeral that were very personally meaningful to the Ford family. A lot of emphasis on the Congress during the funeral, that you might not see in another presidential state funeral. That was an example. The piece in Alexandria, and at the World War II Memorial. There was a well-designed theme behind the planning – “thematic mosaic” is how Greg Willard described it. How do we at MDW, along with the family, tell the story the family would like to have told about their loved one, and a former president. But from a technical standpoint, we learned a lot. Just like any military operation, we did various after action reviews and have most definitely applied that to the other state funeral plans that are underway as well.

Smith: In your current position, if a former president were to pass away tomorrow, would you be repeating your role?

Gen. Swan: No, there is an officer in that position now who will play that role. And my contribution to him might just be some words of advice, if he asks. I did ask my predecessor about his experiences with the Reagan family, which were very helpful. And if the current commander asks for that help, I’d certainly do that.

Smith: I can’t thank you enough. It’s been great.

Gen. Swan: Thank you, Richard. This was a great privilege, one of the high points of my career, and I have to absolutely thank the Ford family for their hospitality in all of this. They could have really treated me far differently. But that’s not the nature of that family. They are a very welcoming family, and even under the circumstances, they almost welcomed me as part of their family and I do try to carry on a relationship with them as they see fit. But we keep in touch, and I know that there will be a time when they may ask me to come back, when Mrs. Ford’s time comes. I don’t look forward to that. It’s almost like she’s my own mother now, in some ways, if I could be so presumptuous about that. But she is just a wonderful lady.

Smith: Well, you’ve certainly bonded. You’ve been through a uniquely personal, very intense…

Gen. Swan: Let me close with one thing.

We came back to – we were at Grand Rapids after the interment and everything had been completed, and we went back to the airport at Grand Rapids. And Mrs. Ford was flying with the family on Air Force One back to Palm Springs. I was departing at that point from Grand Rapids; everything was complete. My aide de camp and I were ready to jump in the vehicle and go catch out flight out of Grand Rapids. Suddenly, some Secret Service guys ran up to us and said, “You can’t go yet! She wants to see you.” So we went up into Air Force One, into the President’s compartment. And Mrs. Ford spent an amazing several minutes, quietly thanking me for what we’d done for her and her family; totally unnecessary on her part. It was a remarkable moment and an act of kindness I’ll never forget.

We parted as friends. It was such a gracious and moving gesture that she would even think to do that. I’m forever grateful to her for her graciousness and her hospitality under such an extraordinarily trying time in her life. It was an amazing experience.

Smith:   Thank you.

Smith: Do you remember when your path first crossed with Gerald Ford?

Bruno: I first encountered President Ford when he was a congressman from Michigan. He was rising in the ranks of the Republican Party and he was always accessible to everybody, but especially to reporters. It wasn’t a vanity thing; he wasn’t seeking them out; but if a reporter wanted to talk to him he sat down and he talked with them. He was always very open, and he was a defender of the Republican Party line at the time, whatever it might have been. But we were accustomed to dealing with people like that.

Smith: Did that degree of openness sort of set him aside? Was he unusually accessible?

Bruno: You got a sense that he actually enjoyed the press; that he enjoyed the back and forth that went on, and he understood exactly what we were supposed to do. I think a lot of that came from his friendship with Pete Lisagor. Pete Lisagor was a brilliant journalist for the Chicago Daily News, and he became very close to Ford. Ford later told me that he often listened to Lisagor for advice and so on. His favorite expression was - and he borrowed this from Pete, “The role of the media is to walk down the middle of the street and break windows on both sides.” There were many times I heard Jerry Ford say that to an audience. He just didn’t fight with us.

Smith: It’s interesting, when we were planning the funeral, he insisted on having a journalist as a eulogist. Originally it was going to be Huge Sidey, and then he passed away so Tom Brokaw performed that function. But it was clearly to send a message.

Bruno: That was very important, yeah. When he became president he still had that same attitude toward the media. One of my favorite stories and experiences was I was with Newsweek and we were trying to get a one on one interview with President Ford. It came through that we could have it, but we would have make it a three on one, there was Tommy DeFrank, who was covering the White House, and Pete Goldman who was writing it, and me, as the chief political correspondent. So we went to the White House on our appointed day and we were ushered into the Oval Office, not to some outside place, and there was a round table there in front. We all sat down with the President and the President pulled out his pipe, and his tobacco pouch and loaded up. I was a pipe smoker then and he asked me would I like some? I said, “Yes, I would.
Thank you.” And I took his tobacco and we lit up and – I mean, he was the last president you could do that with. But he was perfectly at ease.

Smith: He seemed comfortable in the surroundings?

Bruno: Yeah, he was very comfortable with us. Then we got toward the end and I asked the real nasty questions and he kind of winced, and he said, “I knew you were going to ask that.”

Smith: Do you remember what they might have been about?

Bruno: I forget now. But he expected it and he understood completely.

Smith: Clearly that attitude differed from his predecessor.

Bruno: Yeah, absolutely. The worst thing that could happen to a journalist back then was to be on Richard Nixon’s good list; and guys were fighting to get onto the bad list.

Smith: Do you have a theory to explain Richard Nixon?

Bruno: Yes, [but] I don’t know if it explains. I got somewhat close to him in the ‘60s because I was covering his comeback. There weren’t very many of us covering it. Many times it was just Mr. Nixon, myself and Pat Buchanan as his aide in traveling around the country – long trips. I would sit with him on the plane and the only ground rules were, when we talked about other Republicans, he could not be quoted.

He had an amazing knowledge of politics in every region in the country. He was landing one time in Minot, North Dakota. Nixon had been given a card by Rosemary, his secretary, as to who was going to be there greeting him at the airport. And as he went down he was ticking off what each one’s interest was that he knew, and he knew all the power plays that were going on in that state. He just had a terrific sense of it.

Now, he misjudged the media. He had no understanding, really. It was appalling to see how little he and the people around him understood about the way things worked. The only one who understood was Herb Klein. For the most part they didn’t, and Nixon said to me one time - I was going to leave him because my job then was going to be news editor and somebody else was coming on to cover him, several were coming on. And I told him the same ground rules and we’ll always come to you with a story that we’re going run if it’s negative and give you a chance to respond. And he said, “Don’t reporters write what their editors tell them to write?” And I said, “Not at a certain level, Mr. Nixon.” And I explained to him that if the editors tried to tell us what he had to write, the guys would quit, and had quit when somebody tried that. He couldn’t accept that because he thought that it was all done the way some of his friends did it in California, in San Diego.

Smith: The old LA Times?

Bruno: Yeah, the old LA Times, that they dictated what a reporter was going to report.
But he had no grasp of that. He never was truly at ease with the media.

Smith: But was he at ease with people, generally?

Bruno: I was just going to say that he wasn’t at ease very much with anyone. He always felt there was a plot around him. And sometimes he was right.

Smith: Did you see the obsession with the Kennedys?

Bruno: Yes, very much so, and with Lyndon Johnson, too.

Smith: Really? How so?

Bruno: I think he was scared of Lyndon Johnson, as many people were. And I think he felt that Lyndon Johnson was unpredictable. Whereas, Kennedy was pretty predictable.
Smith: The Nixon people believed that their campaign plane in ’68 was bugged by the Johnson White House.

Bruno: I don’t know that – I hadn’t heard that.

Smith: To go back, you talked about Ford when he was rising in the House. We’ve all heard the Johnson jokes and the slurs on his intelligence and all of that – what were the qualities that allowed Ford to rise in the House?

Bruno: Ford, from the beginning, became a man of the House. He was proud to be there and his ambitions ended there. Here was a guy who had gone through the University of Michigan and Yale Law School, I mean, great institutions, great education, and he was very smart. We can talk about that later, but there was a great disservice done to him by his own staff, at any rate. And he was a good guy; he just was a nice guy and he made friends. He understood what other members had at stake. They would come to him with things as he rose step by step, and was sympathetic to what they faced because he, as a congressman, faced the same things, the same type of things. The people who get you elected expect to have access and things like that. It’s not a sin, there’s nothing wrong with it as long as it’s open. And the other thing with Jerry Ford, he was a very open person, and he was comfortable about himself. I’ve heard that said many times, and I think it’s true. He was.

Smith: In a way, by contrast, you wouldn’t say that of Richard Nixon?

Bruno: No. I wouldn’t say it about many people who would posture. But Jerry Ford never did any posturing. You asked a question, he gave the answer as best he could, and many times it was party line, but that’s what you expected anyhow. He was not a rebel.

Smith: And yet, it’s interesting because he went into politics as an insurgent, in effect, taking on this moss-backed isolationist. And then he was persuaded, at least to be rebel enough to take on Charlie Halleck.

Bruno: Yes.

Smith: Did you know Halleck?
Bruno: Yes, but not well.

Smith: Was that a generational thing more than anything else? Because post-Goldwater, clearly, there was a sense that we’ve got to do something. But races like that, what are they hinging on?

Bruno: The post-Goldwater era, that was really an upheaval in the Republican Party and the state chairs played a vital role in that. When their support dissolved with Nixon early into Watergate, and by the time it got to impeachment, you couldn’t find a state chairman anywhere, hardly whose…

Smith: That’s interesting because I don’t think I’ve ever heard the role of the party organization in the field referred to as a factor in Nixon’s survival.

Bruno: Yeah, there was a meeting – one day we discovered that all of the state chairmen from the Midwest were nowhere to be found. We found them at the O’Hare Inn, in Chicago. They had a room that they had rented for a secret meeting. This is where they decided that Ray Bliss was going to be the head of the state chairs now. Ray Bliss was heartbroken over what had happened and what Nixon had done because he had been a loyalist. But now he was going to do what was best for the party, and that’s exactly what they did. And what was – Dean Birch was out…

Smith: That’s right.

Bruno: And Ray Bliss was right in without any movement; once around the table. And it was all the Midwestern state chairs. Well, that was the heart and soul of the Republican Party at that time.

Smith: You’ve just put your finger on something. People talk about how different Congress is forty years later; think how different the Republican Party is forty years later. I mean, Gerald Ford was at the epicenter of the Republican Party in the mid 1960s – it really was a Midwestern party.

Bruno: And Jerry Ford was very much a Midwesterner. We don’t have a distinctive accent like Southerners do, or even a culture that way. Yet the Midwest has a character of its own and it’s to work hard, keep quiet…
Smith: He used to say, growing up, his parents, there were three rules: work hard, tell the truth, and come to dinner on time. Not a sophisticated philosophy, but it got him through life. I also wonder though, if then at least, Midwesterners didn’t take a little bit of a hit. I’ve often thought that as someone who came from the Northeast, but who spent a lot of time in the Midwest, that there’s a kind of cultural bias, almost a snobbery; a notion that because Midwesterners talk slow, they think slow. I wonder whether some of those quips about his intelligence were grounded in that style, that kind of stolid speaking style.

Bruno: Well, that whole thing – we can talk about that. First of all, Jerry Ford was probably the most graceful athlete who ever occupied the Oval Office. I mean, here’s a guy who was a varsity football player for the University of Michigan and a skier and an athletic man. The myth began that he was a clumsy ox, and it was done as a gag, on Saturday Night Live and Chevy Chase – and instead of ignoring it, which they should have, the White House people, some of them, had fun with it.

Smith: Ron Nessen went on the show.

Bruno: Ron Nessen went on the show and that was a bad thing. That never should have happened. President Ford tripped coming down a ramp from a plane, and so what? Lots of people trip coming down a ramp, it’s understandable. But it’s the President of United States, so it has to be reported. But then they go on and on with it. And then there was the golf ball. What was it? It hit Spiro Agnew or something like that? I don’t know.

Smith: It’s the follow up that’s so revealing, because, of course, the people around him, they all sort of got upset and targeted the photographers. And Ford’s response was, “Of course, they took the picture. They would have lost their job if they didn’t.” - which gets back to your earlier point about him understanding the job of the press.

Bruno: Yeah, he really did. And then after he was president, we started skiing together out at Vail and Beaver Creek. They had these races, the Ford Cup, and each team was made up of a newsperson or some celebrity, and then an Olympic skier for the coach and a former great of skiing. The first year my team won the championship, but I had to race President Ford in the very first heat of the very first race. We each had a handicap, but his was higher than mine so he got out of the gate two seconds ahead of me. I was ready to go and two seconds went by and my gate didn’t open. So it was a few more seconds and finally my gate opened and Ford was way down the course and he beat me in that heat, and I was furious. Because everybody was kind of pretending to be laid back, that this isn’t all that important, it’s just good fun. But once he got into there, into the gates, everybody’s juices started flowing, including the Olympic skiers.

And there were cameras, TV is covering it, printed press is covering, everybody is there, and I have to race against the President. So, somebody comes up and shoves a mic in my face and says, “Well, did you let him win in order to get an interview?” I said, “What? Are you crazy?” I said, “I didn’t want to get beat.” Everybody is laughing. So we won the championship and at the dinner someone got up and said, “I noticed one thing. People with foreign accents ski faster.” Then he said, “And when you race the President of the United States, the President always wins.” But he had great fun with that.

Smith: He was good company?

Bruno: Oh, yeah, and he was a pretty good skier, but he had gotten older and his knees were troubling him. But he was a respectable skier and graceful. So I felt they did a great disservice because the perception set in all around the country that Jerry Ford was a clumsy oaf. And it wasn’t true and I think that cost him something.

Smith: Let me go back. Do you remember where you were when you first heard about “Watergate?”

Bruno: Yeah. It was during the primaries and I was in California covering McGovern. McGovern was making a huge sweep up and down California. It’s in Los Angeles, they had stopped there overnight and I was filing a story. That was when I first heard about a break in at the Watergate Hotel; and I paid absolutely no attention to it.
Smith: One of the people we talked to was Jerry Jones, who at that point was reorganizing the personnel office for Haldeman. And, among other things, he told us that early in ’73, this is well before the Wall Street Journal story broke about Agnew; several months – Haldeman was still there. He got a call one day from Haldeman who wanted to know how many jobs reported directly to the Vice President. He [Jones] figured about fifty. He [Haldeman] said, “Fine. I want undated letters of resignation from everyone.” Which raises two possibilities: one, that they had some inkling from sources in Maryland that there was an investigation underway; or two, that Agnew had done something and Nixon blew off the handle and said…Is either one possible or plausible?

Bruno: Agnew first surfaced before the first term nomination.

Smith: He’d been a Rockefeller supporter.

Bruno: Yes, and he was on his way to meet Rockefeller in New York, and Rockefeller had brushed him off or something.

Smith: Well, remember – Rockefeller was going to announce – it was the end of March – and he didn’t tell Agnew that day he was not running.

Bruno: That’s it – yeah.

Smith: And Agnew, who had invited the local press corps in, was humiliated because his friend and candidate hadn’t bothered to tell him.

Bruno: That’s right, that’s what happened. And then he was coming up to New York and he called John Mitchell and told John Mitchell he was ready to endorse Nixon. At that time Agnew was held out as sort of the great White Hope because he had handled rioting in a reserved and sensible way. He had become kind of a darling of the Nixon campaign. I was meeting Mitchell for lunch and he was late for lunch, and he said, “Well, you won’t guess who called me.” I said, “Who?” and he said, “Spiro Agnew, he wants to announce for Nixon.” Because he was so aggravated with Nelson Rockefeller leaving him holding the bag, which was not unusual.

Smith: Really?
Bruno: Yeah, he had done things like that with several people around the country. Anyhow, that’s how that came about.

Smith: By the way, at that point where they – people forget they only won that nomination by twenty-five votes on the first ballot.

Bruno: But they had it wired.

Smith: My question is: if Reagan – because I was fourteen years old, I was on the floor of that convention during the Rockefeller demonstration – and I remember being pissed because Reagan wasn’t holding his end of the bargain up. Now – people have said Strom Thurman saved their bacon in the South, New Jersey, critically, they broke open and got a significant number of votes, did that twenty-five vote margin understate their strength?

Bruno: Yes, because they had more votes than that, and when they knew they had the magic number plus, they let others go to do what they had to do. They understood that some had local considerations and so on. I think one of the examples was Mississippi, where ….

Smith: Clarke Reed.

Bruno: Yes, I remember it very well.

Smith: Clarke Reed is a legendary figure.

Bruno: Clarke Reed disappeared from sight when all hell was breaking loose. And somebody at Newsweek was climbing up my back that, “We’ve got to find him. We’ve got to find him.” And other people from the Mississippi delegation were missing, Pickering and Haley Barber, who I spoke with several times a day.

Smith: Really?

Bruno: And the Newsweek delegate count, which I was running, was the only one that showed that Reagan was beat. That he couldn’t get the delegates.

Smith: This was ’76?

Bruno: Yeah.
Smith: Because the story that we’ve been told is that Reed, who is a kind of slippery character to begin with, used – that may be a pejorative – but when Reagan announced Schweiker as his vice presidential choice, Reed was off the reservation.

Bruno: He didn’t like that. But Reed was off because he felt that Reagan would be a loser. I think that was the most driving thing with Clarke. And Clarke was a guy who was always trying to bring the factions together in Mississippi, which wasn’t easy. Clarke was a good guy; I liked him very much. He didn’t tell me everything, but he never told me a lie. Clarke was concerned that the way the roll call would go, that Mississippi would be the state that would bring Reagan down, and that Mississippi would break unit rule. They had had unit rule. Thirty delegates and whoever had the most got all of them. Well, they were going to break it down so that each delegate was only half a vote so they could bring in more people for the reserves. And that the delegation would split and Reagan would get something, but not enough. His big question was what did our delegate count show? And in that thing, you were picking off delegates one at a time, that’s how minute it got. There was a guy in South Carolina in the real estate business that had never been treated like that in his life. He gets a call, “Come up to the White House and see President Ford.” And they bring him up and he goes in and has a Coke with President Ford.

Smith: We’ve been told, for example, the dinner for Queen Elizabeth was stuffed full of uncommitted Republican delegates and their families.

Bruno: Probably was.

Smith: That they used the Bicentennial events.

Bruno: It probably was; I didn’t know that. Anyhow, he knew what Mississippi was going to do. Then just before the convention, Clarke disappeared because he didn’t want to have to answer questions. He was at a motel outside of Jackson, I think, somewhere down in Mississippi. And then they came to Kansas City and there was one morning everybody was going berserk trying to find the leaders of the Mississippi delegation, Clarke Reed, Billy Pickering, and so on. They were in my room.

Smith: Were you hiding them, sheltering them?

Bruno: Yes, and how I was. I told __________, and I had a little junior suite with a bar and everything. “Pour yourself and just stay here and work. Use the phone, do anything you want.” There was a colleague at Newsweek who hated me and was trying to say that we were being scooped and so on, and I had filed the story on what Mississippi was going to do, what they were going to try to do. And he said, “Nobody else has anything like that.” And I said, “Well, that’s the way it is, you know.”

When we got to the roll call, our delegate count was off maybe by one or two when we got to Texas. And I came up and Kay Graham was sitting in the box with the Newsweek brass and she and I had promised we were going to have a shoving story when we got to Kansas City in which we would stick it up the ass of everybody else. And she thought that was great, because they were very worried – the Washington Post delegate count was different from ours.

Smith: Really?

Bruno: Yeah. We were the only one that showed the weakness. And that’s because we knew these people. They talked to us.

Smith: And they were leveling with you.

Bruno: Oh yeah.

Smith: Let me ask you, Stu Spencer said something very interesting. He thought Sears made a huge strategic blunder when they decided to put all their chips on that procedural issue regarding forcing Ford to name his vice president, as opposed to an emotional issue like foreign policy. And so then of course, the debate took place within the Ford camp: do we let, in effect, the Reagan, too, have the platform, or do we fight it? Tom Korologos is the original source for this, but other people have confirmed it. Kissinger was going to resign; he was going make it a personal test and so forth and so on. And Tom said, “Well, Henry, if you’re going to do it, do it now because we need the votes.” And the decision was made - I think Spencer was part of this - let them have the plank and the platform, because what you don’t want to do at this point you don’t want to introduce the uncertainty of this highly emotional debate over détente, etc., etc. And that Sears had, in effect, shot his wad with the procedural vote the night before. Does that make sense to you?

Bruno: Yeah, John, who I knew well, was a good guy…

Smith: Is he still around, by the way?

Bruno: I don’t know. I’m not still around.

Smith: Because he has been quoted in recent years as saying, and you can tell me much better than whether this is bull, that his candidate, rather than Schweiker, he would have gotten Nelson Rockefeller. That’s what he says.

Bruno: No he wouldn’t. No, I don’t think that would have happened. The Reagan people couldn’t stomach that. But John really spoofed me one day. We had this __________ breakfast in the morning, eight o’clock in the morning, which is barbaric. At any rate, it went on through the day and everybody is chasing delegates and I get home late and pour myself a couple of scotches and sit out in back, trying to simmer down, and I get a phone call from John saying that we’ve been friends a long time and he’d hate to see Newsweek go off the deep end with our delegate count because he had all these hidden delegates that nobody knew about. And I had just enough scotch to take him seriously and I did. I said, “Well, John, I appreciate the call. Let me think this thing through.” I went out there and I walked around the garden and shook my head and all of a sudden I realized that he didn’t have anything, he was spoofing me. And I later found out the next day that he had called a number of guys and told them the same story. And so that’s when I knew that we were onto the right thing, that our delegate count was going in the right direction. They didn’t have the strength.

Smith: Was the Ford White House too slow to awake, first of all, to the likelihood of a Reagan challenge, and secondly, to the strength that Reagan would bring to that?
Bruno: They vastly underrated Reagan and what he could do and what his appeal was. And they had him down. He was beaten until North Carolina, until the North Carolina primary when he came back, and they allowed that to happen because they should have won it and they didn’t. Or they should have made a stronger showing; I forget now exactly what it was. But that was where Reagan was down and he got up.

Smith: It was the Panama Canal.

Bruno: He was down for the count going into North Carolina and they let him get up and that was the biggest mistake they made.

Smith: There is an argument; I guess you can go both ways, that the Reagan challenge paradoxically, made Ford a better candidate.

Bruno: I don’t know about that. I asked him one time - when we were skiing, we never would talk about politics because it would be like taking advantage of a friendship – but occasionally it crept up. And he said to me one time that if he hadn’t had to fight Reagan in the primaries all the way to the convention, he could have had a stronger campaign. He felt that that whole primary fight weakened his campaign. Did it make him a better campaigner? I’m not sure about that, I don’t know. But he believed that his campaign was weakened because he had to fight Reagan all the way.

Smith: Do you think he held a grudge?

Bruno: Jerry Ford wasn’t the kind of person that held a grudge in politics, but I think, yes, I think there was some bitterness there. And Reagan didn’t do all he could have done or should have done in the general election campaign. And I think that President Ford, his attitude, I think, was well that’s not the way I play the game.

Smith: Let me go back. Were you surprised by Ford’s selection to be vice president?

Bruno: Yeah, I was, because he was such a middle of the road guy. And maybe that’s the reason why it was a good selection because he was that. I remember when Nixon first got elected for the first term and they were hanging out at their headquarters with a hotel in New York.
Smith: The Pierre.

Bruno: Yeah, and I went over there to see John Mitchell and Mitchell said a curious thing to me, he said, “Well, when we get to Washington, there’s a lot of people who are going to have to learn what it means to have a Republican president in the White House.” And I said, “Who do you mean?” He said, “Jerry Ford, Everett Dirksen.” In other words, the leaders of the Republican Party. I thought, “Holy Mackerel.”

Smith: That’s fascinating because that raises a whole – Ford was very loathe to criticizing other people, but you could tell that his feelings, particularly towards Haldeman and Erlichman, were less than warm.

Bruno: Yeah, I never heard him criticize anyone, but I know that that was true.

Smith: And apparently, the irony is the one time apparently Erlichman deigned to go up to Capitol Hill he actually fell asleep in the meeting, which is eloquent in its own way. There was a story, and I think it’s true, that shortly after Ford was confirmed as vice president, Nixon had Rockefeller in the Oval Office and he said something to the effect of, “Can you imagine Jerry Ford sitting in that chair?” Now, he might have been flattering Nelson, he might have been who knows what else. But that suggests a personal attitude toward his vice president. Did you ever sense that? That the Nixon people regarded Ford…

Bruno: That is true, that some of the Nixon people that I encountered underestimated Jerry Ford, and they underestimated some of the people around Jerry Ford, too.

Smith: He was put in an almost impossible position as vice president, and to maintain his own integrity he got out of town.

Bruno: I was going to say, yeah, that one of the tip offs that the end was coming – up until that point, it was a month or so – Jerry Ford was a supporter of Nixon and would not say or do anything that in any way would hurt the President. Then he realized that Watergate was true, and that Nixon had played a lead role in the cover up. And he knew then what was going to happen and that’s when he got out of town. He didn’t want to be around when the shots were fired, which was smart.

Smith: Did he, if not then, then later, talk with you about his….

Bruno: No, we never talked about it.

Smith: Did he ever talk about his relationship with Nixon?

Bruno: No.

Smith: Can you remember a time – it had to have been unthinkable, at some point, that a President of the United States would be driven from office?

Bruno: It was. It was one of those stories that come along every so often in which you are working on and you say, “Am I really covering this? Is this really happening?” When Kennedy was assassinated you had that feeling, “Has this really happened?” And the same thing was true with Nixon facing impeachment. Is this really true? Is the President of the United States going to be forced out of office? And you had to cross a certain threshold in order to believe it.

You asked me when I first heard of Watergate, and [I said] it didn’t mean anything to me; but then we went through the election and after the election I was asked to form, join a task force to work on Watergate. So I had to get filled in pretty fast on what it was. I asked the reporters who had been covering it and who were going to continue covering it, “Tell me about this. What’s here?” They would tell me things and I would say, “Oh, no, they can’t be that dumb. They couldn’t have done things like that” - the Nixon people. They said, “No, that’s what we’ve got.”

Then one day, with the story breaking, I phoned around the country to various Republican leaders, and to even some at the White House. Then I talked to somebody at the White House who was in a real power position, and their interpretation of what had happened was pure fantasy. I realized for the first time that they didn’t understand what was happening and that they were going to go down the drain because of it. And once you cross that threshold, where you could believe what you were hearing, you knew that he was finished.
Smith: Do you think John Mitchell took secrets with him to the grave?

Bruno: Oh, yes. Absolutely.

Smith: Do you have a theory about what Mitchell’s role in all of this was?

Bruno: Well, he became the fall guy, and talked to me all the time because he was afraid that Haldeman and Erlichman were setting him up to be the bad guy. He didn’t like the idea of going to prison and he didn’t trust what he called “those characters in the Casablanca.” When Mitchell referred to somebody as a character, that meant that they were really a bad person.

Smith: Was that in reference to Haldeman and Erlichman?

Bruno: Yes - the characters in the Casablanca. We would talk several times a week and he was pretty forthright with me, and he was trying to protect himself.

Smith: Was his relationship with the President deteriorating?

Bruno: I don’t think so. I think even when he was out, he and the President and Bebe were a trio, and that there was a lot of money involved. We never could prove this, but they had bank accounts, where was it – in Aruba? I’m trying to remember – in Tricia Nixon’s name.

Smith: Really?

Bruno: Yeah. But we never could do anything with it. We tiptoed around the edge of it, but we never had enough to really go solid. But I think there was a lot of money involved with those three. Haldeman and Erlichman were almost peasants compared to them. Yeah, I think Mitchell kept – and Mitchell was pretty forthright with me about a lot of things, but the one thing that he kept insisting on was that Nixon was not part of the cover up. And, of course, that was a lie. And he knew it.

Smith: The break in itself – do you have a theory as to who ordered the break in?

Bruno: Yeah. I think it was Colson and Liddy.

Smith: But now, whose permission would they have had to get?
Bruno: Colson didn’t get anybody’s permission for anything.

Smith: Was he a rogue?

Bruno: He was a loose cannon and unwise in the ways of Washington. He knew full speed ahead.

Smith: Well there is this school of thought that one of Haldeman’s most important functions was to take the President’s more off-the-wall pronouncements and let them simmer, that hopefully they go away or whatever. And that Colson or Liddy or someone, someday heard one of these and saluted and went off and did it. Do you think Nixon had any knowledge of the break in?

Bruno: Yes, I do. I think so.

Smith: And was it because of the Democratic National Committee chairman…anyway, but the Democratic National Committee chairman, was he the target of the break in?

Bruno: I think he was a target, but they had a kick going like military intelligence. They just wanted to know everything that was going on with anybody who was an opponent to them, or that they perceived as an opponent. And they would just gather information as much as they could and kept a nice little file on everybody. They had a Cold War mentality - let’s put it that way - that they applied to politics.

Smith: Well put. Did you and Mitchell ever discuss that? Did you ever discuss with Mitchell who was responsible for the break in?

Bruno: I tried to, but he always slipped away from me and kept talking about those characters, and I think he meant Colson.

Smith: Okay.

Bruno: But at the point that he came to me, there was no love lost between him and Haldeman and Erlichman.

Smith: Watergate is so slippery. Just sitting here listening to you talk about it, it seems even larger and more sinister in retrospect than it did at the time.
Bruno: Yes, it was. John Mitchell was one tough guy; he didn’t have an ounce of back-away in him. He tried to protect himself, of course, but then when he realized he had to go, he was going to go his way with some sense of dignity.
And where he was going to go to prison; he had nothing but contempt for people who were crying about it.

Smith: People like Magruder?

Bruno: Yeah.

Smith: The only two people I ever heard Gerald Ford disparage – and the worst he could say was, “He’s a bad man,” – one was Gordon Liddy and the other was John Dean.

Bruno: That would be right because John Dean did something that to Jerry Ford was unacceptable, which was to betray your boss. That would be my guess.

Smith: To save his own skin?

Bruno: Yeah, betraying somebody else. That’s something that I would guess that Ford could not tolerate.

Smith: For people who weren’t around then, what was the mood like in those last days? You had the smoking gun tape…

Bruno: It was like the fall of the Alamo, I guess.

Smith: By the way, Jerry Jones told us when the Supreme Court ruled that Nixon had to turn over the tapes - you may very know this - the initial response from San Clemente was, can we defy the court? Ron Zeigler was the President’s messenger and that was the initial question back to Washington. And I assume Haig, among others, made it clear that that was not an option. But that’s really the beginning of the end, isn’t it - the unanimous Court decision?

Bruno: Oh, yes, sure it is. And also I would say the Saturday Night Massacre because of the impact it had on public opinion. That’s where Nixon began to lose his core. Shortly after that I was in California giving a speech for Newsweek to airline and oil executives. These were really the business people who had always been staunch Nixon supporters. But I had to give a speech that was telling them things I presume they did not want to hear. And I did. Then we got to the question period, and we went around the room. All of these presidents and CEOs were all standing up to denounce Nixon and I think to myself, “Holy Mackerel, the big business community in California is running away now.”

So as soon as the meeting was over, I ran into the men’s room, pulled out my notebook and started to write down everything I had heard. And then I called New York and got hold of the business editor, Clem ____________, and I said, “Clem, there’s a story out here about business deserting Nixon and let’s get on to it.” And so we did, and the next week we wrote the story and it was right on the money and it was happening everywhere in the country; the business support was falling away. That was a pretty crucial thing.

Smith: That last week, can you describe what that was like? I assume it was unlike anything you’d ever experienced.

Bruno: Again, we resorted to the delegate count mode and we started counting Congress – how they would vote. Mitchell had told me that the White House had done the same thing. This was probably three weeks before. He said, “Those characters have finally learned how to count. All they’ve got to do is iron out the Jerry Ford deal and Nixon will resign.”

Smith: Really?

Bruno: And reported this with not saying who was telling me this, but I’ve never revealed that I was talking to Mitchell. That was one of the ground rules. And nobody wanted to believe me. But I said, “This is the end, he’s going to be out.”

Smith: Of course that opens the whole door to the controversy over the pardon, and I’ve often wondered whether we’ve not made a mistake all these years, understandably, in trying to track down who said what to whom at what time. And that the real story of the pardon is in what was not said. In the way that people communicate without communicating.

Bruno: I know exactly what you mean.
Smith: That Haig, from his perspective, could very well have reached the reluctant conclusion that in the interests of the country, Nixon had to go. And that his job was to make it happen with as much dignity as possible, and everything flows out of that. People don’t have to have sinister motives or – I don’t know – what’s your take? But the fact that Mitchell would say to you at that point, “The Jerry Ford deal,” that can only mean that someone, at least…who would Mitchell be talking to?

Smith: Yeah.

Bruno: I had forgotten the story. He looked at my files, my Watergate files, and sure enough, there was the thing I had filed, the story I had sent on Mitchell’s view on what was going to happen next. I guess this was about three weeks before Nixon resigned and Ford was off somewhere hiding out, which was a smart thing to do. I couldn’t convince – no, I’ll put it this way – from about February onward of that year, it was like seeing a play or a movie which you had read the book on what was happening and everything was falling into place and that’s when I began to realize that Nixon really was through – that he could not come back from this. And that everything was turning against him. It was hard to think that way because this hadn’t happened in our lifetimes.

Smith: Plus, it’s an eventful period in the country’s history, quite apart from the scandal.

Bruno: Oh sure. With everything that’s going internationally and again, you had to cross certain thresholds in order to cope with Watergate - the first one being that they could be as dumb as they were. And that’s when I remembered the words of Menken, who was a brilliant writer; a terrible human being, but he wrote once, “Never underestimate the stupidity of men in high public office.”

Smith: It’s interesting, we talked to Haig, and the same weekend we talked to Mel Laird, and it is interesting how many roads led back to Fred Buzhardt. Fred Buzhardt had been Laird’s counsel at the Pentagon. A month after Laird came back to the Nixon White House to try to salvage things, he got a call from Buzhardt who basically warned him, because he, Buzhardt, had been listening to the tapes. And in effect, signaled to Laird to be careful what you say because Nixon is into it up to his neck. Haig told us, to my surprise – I always assumed that Haig had listened to the smoking gun tape – he claimed he never did. He said, “Fred Buzhardt gave me some very good advice, which was ‘Don’t ever be alone in a room with a tape’,” which presumably is a reference back to the eighteen and a half minutes. Do you have a theory about the eighteen and a half minutes?

Bruno: Yeah. When we learned about the tapes, I came home late one night and one of my sons was up studying – he’d had a tough football practice. Anyhow, I told him, “You won’t believe what’s going on here,” and I started to tell him. And he just said, ‘Well, they’ll burn the tapes.” I thought to myself, “You know, he’s probably right,” they will destroy the tapes. No matter how incriminating that act may be, they could not allow anybody to hear what was on it, and I didn’t know what was on the tapes. But whatever it was, they couldn’t allow it to become public. And they did exactly that. I said, “They deliberately destroyed the part that was the most incriminating.”

Smith: They, being Rosemary Woods, the President?

Bruno: Rosemary Woods would do anything that the President told her to do. And I’m sure that somebody around him at the top level told her what to do. She never took orders from anybody else. Rosemary was a power in her own right and she was close to Pat Nixon. She had Pat Nixon’s support in everything. Pat Nixon was a truly remarkable woman, and a very fine person.

Smith: Tell us about that because I’ve always thought she’s never gotten her due.

Bruno: That’s right.

Smith: That she was very private and the whole notion of ‘Plastic Pat’ is so far from the reality.

Bruno: She was badly hurt going back to the Eisenhower years when she felt that Nixon was not appreciated and was treated badly, and she with him.
wasn’t much of a social climber or anything like that. She just wanted to do what was right. She learned what was right and she did things that were correct, and she was very considerate of other people. We were flying to some little town – Iron Mountain, or something like that. Anyhow, the photographer took a lot of pictures and sent them to me. I sent them to her and the next thing I get is a copy of a note she wrote to the photographer thanking him for sending the pictures. She was that kind of a person.

And then on Christmas time, Meg and I were invited to Nixon’s New York apartment and we were the only outsiders, the rest were all relatives and campaign people. It was my first meeting with Haldeman. I could see him looking, “What’s this person doing here, this insect?” And I could actually sense hatred on his part toward me – and I didn’t even know him. But he knew I was the Newsweek political person. When we left and Mrs. Nixon was so gracious, as always, and when we left I said to Meg, “Well, how’d you feel?” And she said, “Out of place.” That was true.

The next day Mitchell asked me would I be interested in being Nixon’s press secretary? And I said, “Oh, no, not for me. I’ve got boys to raise,” and so on. But the truth was, I never could get – as much as I had learned to respect Nixon – I could not see myself lasting five weeks in that spot. They actually wanted Mike Wallace and Mike Wallace had turned them down twice. And they were going to ask him a third time, and then if he did, I might be considered for it. I said, “Well, just don’t let it get off the ground, I don’t want any part of this.”

Smith: When Jerry terHorst quit and cited the pardon, there are those who believe without disputing that story, that it wasn’t the whole story – that terHorst, perhaps not surprisingly, found the job to be overwhelming.

Bruno: Oh, I don’t think so, not Jerry. Not only that – I’ve never told anybody about this – when terHorst quit, Anne Armstrong and George Bush wanted me to be Ford’s press secretary. And, again, they said they’d offered it to Nessen and he had turned them down once, and they were going to offer it a second time, and if he didn’t take it then, would I be interested in doing it? Well, by now it was several years later, plus it was Jerry Ford instead of Richard Nixon, and I said, “Yeah, I’d like to do it.” And so they said, “Well, what unique qualifications do you bring to this?” And I said, “Well, I can ski with him.” But anyhow, obviously they took Nessen.

Smith: Was that a mistake, in retrospect?

Bruno: It’s hard for me to say, because I wanted the job, too, at that point.

Smith: Okay, fair enough. But a television guy who was in the eyes of many, perhaps a bit of a show-off.

Bruno: I think it was a mistake because he was more interested in the limelight for himself than with Ford. And when he went along on Saturday Night Live with Chevy Chase and everything. I thought that that was totally, totally, improper and somebody at the White House should have grabbed him by the throat and said, “No, you can’t do that.”

Smith: Were you surprised by the pardon?

Bruno: No, not at all. I didn’t have any information, except what Mitchell had told me a few weeks before, that they had to carve some kind of a deal with Ford to protect Nixon.

Smith: By the way, just to get that on the record, the fact that Mitchell held that view, and indeed, quite possibly that the President held that view, does not lead to the assumption that Ford, at that point, held that view or that there had been any discussions with Ford.

Bruno: Yeah, I think that’s possible; I think that’s very possible, because by now all of the aides were taking over and they were talking to each other from one camp to the other. But it seemed to me as a reporter that there had to be a pardon; they could not bring the President of the United States up in a normal trial – that the country had gotten to the point now where they just wanted this thing to be over with. And Ford’s mistake, in my opinion, was that they put out the wrong signals, that there would be no pardon.

Smith: Now, that brings us to a real flashpoint. Ford has his first press conference, it’s the 28th of August. And there is this quality about Ford that – and I’d obviously like to hear your reaction – for someone who had been in Washington for twenty-five years, he could be naïve. He believed that the Washington press corps at the end of August, 1974 would want to talk about Greece and Cyprus and inflation and all those things that he was trying to get his arms around. He was told in advance that they were all going to want to talk about Nixon. That press conference, which he by his own admission did not handle well, and which he left feeling angry, mostly at himself, I always believed was the tipping point that led to the final pardon.

Bruno: I do remember it now. But I think when Jerry Ford realized that Watergate was going to bring down Nixon and that the pardon was going to be the number one thing on his plate, I think that far back they realized that they would have to pardon him.

Smith: Really?

Bruno: And that they gave off misleading signals and in the case of Jerry terHorst, Jerry was sent out there and he had to lie to the press. He didn’t know it was a lie and Jerry got angry and did what any self-respecting newsman would do, and said enough, I’m not going to do this sort of thing. I told them when they asked me, “Could you go along with a policy you didn’t believe in?” I said, “Oh, sure. That doesn’t bother me, but don’t ever send me out there to lie. Because I would do the same thing that Jerry did. Excuse me, I’ve got to go because…”

Smith: You were not surprised when the pardon came.

Bruno: I wasn’t surprised because, well I was surprised in the sense that he had mislead everybody. I found that hard to believe at the time. And of course within a few weeks he did what was inevitable. When you look back at it, how could there not be a pardon?

Smith: Mel Laird, who of course has a scheme for everything.

Bruno: Mel’s a terrific guy.

Smith: Oh yeah, and a great friend of Ford’s. He was angry because he had a plan. He thought he was going to bring a bipartisan delegation of Congress to the White House to ask Ford to pardon Nixon. The problem with that is, every time you war game the decision, and the notion thirty-five years later that somehow you could have prepared the country for this, given the mood at the time - wouldn’t the first trial balloon be shot down before it ever cleared the trees?

Bruno: I think so. And what made the pardon so right was that it happened fast. It could have even happened faster maybe. But the country, I think, was tired of Watergate and the whole thing. Nixon was out, now let’s go on. But if you were going to have a trial or whatever you want to call it, it would have dragged on and on and on.

Smith: I don’t know what you were hearing, but we’ve been told that Ford was being told through the backdoor from the courts, I guess from Judge Sirica, that it could be two years before Nixon would be in a Washington courtroom, assuming it was decided that he could get a fair trial.

Bruno: It makes sense.

Smith: Yeah. And that that was a factor – Ford’s trying to master this job that he had never wanted – and the thought of spending the next two years talking about Richard Nixon…

Bruno: Very smart. They had to get Nixon out of the picture, off stage.

Smith: The fall of Saigon – how bleak was that?

Bruno: It was terrible. I think many people by that time had been prepared for nothing but bad news out of Vietnam. And for many people the fall of Saigon, I think, was kind of a relief. Now we’re getting out, finally, and really getting out – maybe not gracefully, but getting out. And I think by that time all people cared about was getting out.

Smith: Laird is convinced, or he’s convinced himself, much as he loves Ford, he blames Ford for not getting Congress to pony up additional money when South Vietnam was on the verge of collapsing. Is there anything an American president could have said at that point that would have persuaded Congress to fork over more money to prop up the South Vietnamese?
Bruno: I can’t think of anything, other than we never lost a war.

Smith: Yeah.

Bruno: And unfortunately we did. No, I think by that time, if I recall correctly, public opinion had turned against the whole thing. And now you were having college boys and suburban boys being drafted. Up to a certain point, Vietnam had been a poor man’s war, and the only people going there were the gas pumpers and so on; people with less education and means.

Smith: Talk about change of public opinion - what really angered Ford was, once Saigon fell Congress wanted to cut off any funds, for example, for resettling refugees. Basically, they wanted to pull the plug and walk away. And he put together this kind of crazy quilt coalition with George Meany and the American Jewish Congress and others. That was leadership.

Bruno: Yeah. And it was in some respects, it was the Navy way.

Smith: How so?

Bruno: You get a board of officers of high rank to sit down and work out the solution to a problem. The Army did the same thing. But the Navy had it almost institutionalized, that the way they would handle these things is a board of captains and admirals…

Smith: It’s interesting you say that, because I wonder how Ford’s naval service might have affected…

Bruno: I think it affected him quite bit. The same as World War II and Korea affected all of us, that it was turning points in our careers and in our thinking. When I came out of the Army I had changed my mind about almost everything, it seems. My experience had been enlightening, and I’m sure the same thing was true of millions of other guys.

Smith: When Rockefeller was selected to be vice president, we know that George Bush was another candidate and have reason to believe that Don Rumsfeld’s name was also in the mix. Does that ring a bell with you?

Bruno: Yes.
Smith: Is it safe to say that the Rumsfeld-Rockefeller rivalry was baked into the cake? Was it unavoidable?

Bruno: Yes, it was unavoidable, but I don’t think it meant that much. I think Rockefeller could crush Rumsfeld, and Rumsfeld at that time, was a very attractive guy. And it’s funny; both of our careers took place at the same time. We came back from the service in Chicago and I was starting out as a police reporter, and he was starting out as the business guy and he made his first run for Congress and I guess he got beat. And then the second time around he won it. But he was a terrific guy, and I liked him very much. He was also very much at ease with us and seemed to understand. I don’t know if that carried over.

Smith: It’s interesting, he said to us, and other people have confirmed, his advice to Ford was: clean house early. Which raises a large question, can you be too nice to be president?

Bruno: Yeah, you can be too nice to be president if you don’t take action where action is needed. I think that was one of George Bush, the first’s problem. George Bush is basically a nice guy, a good human being. I always said he did in real life what Ronald Reagan did in movies. It probably wasn’t fair. He’s a really good guy. Yeah, you can be too nice. You get burned a few times and then you learn you can’t be too nice.

Smith: Of all the challenges confronting Ford, one was to try to take this White House, which, let’s face it, was 98% Nixon people, and make it work for him. And obviously a lot of Nixon people were integrated into the new administration, but there also had to have been some real stresses.

Bruno: I don’t know because I wasn’t covering it from the inside. Cannon, Jim Cannon would be a good source for that.

Smith: Was Rockefeller unhappy from the beginning?

Bruno: Oh, I think so, very much so. He wanted to be president and his party would never let him be president. And I think he was actually very bitter about that. He concealed it – kind of thinly at times, like when he gave ______ the finger.
Yeah, I think Rockefeller wanted it, it was clear that he couldn’t get it and didn’t understand why he couldn’t get it. That was the most difficult thing. Because wherever you went with Rockefeller around the country, when he left New York and the East, the enthusiasm wasn’t there. The only thing that got him through was he gave a lot of money away. He never had that Republican Party support.

Smith: Were you at the Cow Palace in 1964?
Bruno: Yes, I was.

Smith: Remember the night they tried to boo him off the stage?
Bruno: I remember it very well. Yeah.

Smith: A lot of people think it’s his finest hour.
Bruno: I was with Bill Miller, my favorite candidate of all time. He was the congressman from upstate New York. And I discovered to my horror about six o’clock that night that I hadn’t assigned anybody to cover Bill Miller, who was going to be the vice presidential choice. So I said, well, I can’t get hold of anybody, so I’d better go up there and cover him myself. I go up to the penthouse or whatever it was on top of the Hilton, and there’s a couple of guys at the bar having a drink and so I said I was from \textit{Newsweek} and they said, “Have a drink.” So I had a drink with them and just then on TV is Goldwater, the nominee saying that Miller was his choice for VP, and then out of the adjoining bedroom comes Miller and doesn’t see me. And Miller is standing there watching this and he says, “Now, we’re going to get the shit kicked out of us, but it’s going to help my (bleeping) law practice.”

Smith: Well, he was probably right on both counts.
Bruno: I said, “Relax, I’m not going to sandbag the guy.” And then we became friendly from then on.

Smith: When Rockefeller was dumped, he must have been very…
Bruno: Oh, his pride, I think. I think he really was angry.
Smith: Did you see him around that time at all?

Bruno: No, I didn’t cover him. I think Jim was covering him.

Smith: No, he was still in the White House because Jim was at the White House.

Bruno: That’s right. I don’t remember then who was covering.

Smith: At the Kansas City convention, the selection of Dole, did that come as a surprise?

Bruno: Yes. I thought Howard Baker had a better chance and I didn’t think that Dole had the delegates, but Dole did.

Smith: The theory is, at that point the polls were so bad that the base was in trouble. And if you’re not carrying Nebraska, the Dole selection was, in part, about shoring up the base. Does that make sense?

Bruno: Yeah, I think so. And Howard Baker couldn’t take it because he was concerned about his wife, and that was a huge, huge, concern. I was told that he said, “Don’t let it get off the ground. I don’t want it. I can’t take it.”

Smith: Yeah.

Bruno: And so that’s when they turned to Dole.

Smith: Over the years it’s been said that Anne Armstrong’s name was at least on a list. Does that ring a bell at all?

Bruno: Yes. She was on a list but we never felt that it was serious. We felt that it was just a listing, and nothing more than that.

Smith: By the way, did you ever have much contact with Mrs. Ford?

Bruno: No, unfortunately. I wish I had. We knew each other and said hello, but I never really…I had with Steve and with Jack.

Smith: Now Jack was a bit of a hell raiser.

Bruno: He was then. And Steve did pretty good, too.

Smith: But that stuff never got in the press.
Bruno: No, they didn’t care. We were racing one year and it was the usual BS again, “You don’t have to take this seriously,” but everybody did. Jack Ford was one heat in front of me and he took off and blew right out of his bindings. Oh, what a terrible fall. His ski came up, down he goes, down this ramp that accelerates you and it was a miracle, we all thought, that he wasn’t killed. A year or two later, I’m skiing in the race, and I’m on the team with Steve and we’re standing up there at the starting place and kibitzing back and forth, and I said, “Boy, that was terrible that time when Jack blew out of his bindings,” and Steve smiled and said, “Yeah, wasn’t that awful.” And all of a sudden I realized that Steve had rigged the bindings so that they would blow off. It was always fun being around the Ford boys.

Smith: When Mrs. Ford had her cancer surgery, again, it’s hard for people today who take it for granted, but in those days people didn’t talk about breast cancer.

Bruno: That’s right. Betty Ford was a real dynamo. I didn’t know her, but from what I understand, she was a tough person who had – I think Congress had prepared the Fords for what lay ahead, as much as it can be prepared for, the presidency. But they were people of Washington; they were not making war on Washington. And now we’ve had a string of candidates and presidents who were elected on the premise that they are going to pull down Washington. Well, that’s crazy.

Smith: The night of the debate – because Ford clearly was catching up.

Bruno: Yes.

Smith: He won the campaign. I mean, if you stop and think where he was in the beginning and where it was at the end, but of course, the Polish gaffe came along. Did you know immediately that it was…

Bruno: I was so wrong on that. That was one of the biggest mistakes I’ve ever made as a journalist. And the reason for it was, in San Francisco, our old fiddle player from our bluegrass band had lined up a bunch of local musicians to go to this bar after the debate and Hank Truitt, who was on the panel, would play the banjo and I would play the guitar, and we’d have a great night of playing at playing bluegrass music together. And I was really anxious to get there. So anyhow, before I could go, I’ve got to do a taping with NBC and they asked me about Ford’s gaffe on Poland. I said, “Oh, I don’t think that that’s much of a problem. Everybody knew what he meant to say,” because I knew what he meant to say. And of course, that was about the most stupid reply I could have given.

The next morning the phone rings and it’s my father in Florida saying, “How can you be so dumb?” And then my sister calls me. I’m trying to make a plane out of San Francisco, and my sister calls me and she says that my hatred for Jimmy Carter is showing. So I fly back to Washington and I come into the bureau and it’s silent. Nobody says good job or anything like that. So then I get a call from Robert Strauss and Bob says, “Bruno, you’re really one goofy son of a bitch.” I said, “Hey, Strauss, I don’t need you to tell me that. My father and my sister have already done it.”

I get home, and the boys come in from football practice and we’re having dinner and one of them says, “So and so said his father thinks you’re an asshole.” And I said, “Well, boys, lots of guys have got fathers who go to a party and dance around with a lampshade over their head, and do something stupid. But I do it in front of millions of people.” And my big son says, “Yeah, Dad, you’re the biggest asshole we’ve ever known.” So anyhow, that’s my side of Eastern Europe.

Smith: That’s interesting because Ford was stubborn. Ford let a week go by when he could have reversed the damage. Did you ever see that side of him – the stubbornness? Or did you ever see his temper?

Bruno: No, I never saw his temper. I saw him set his jaw to prevent losing his temper, but I never saw him lose it. No. Yeah, I mean, he held out on that.

Smith: And the momentum just absolutely came to a halt.

Bruno: It was really a serious blow. Even though, if you read the whole thing, later on, he cleared things up pretty good. But by that time, the damage is done.

Smith: And it’s really almost the birth of the sound bite culture.
And Max Frankel gave him three different chances to change it right then and there, and he didn’t take it.

I’ll tell you a funny one, though. It was about a week later that we had the vice presidential debate with Mondale and Dole, and it was the first time that there had ever been one and I was on the panel. We had worked out ahead of time what our questions were going to be together and planned who would go first, second, third, so there would be continuity to the debate, rather than just scattered all over the place. We all agreed that we would not ask follow up questions unless it was absolutely necessary, and we would signal behind the table like that. There was Marilyn Burger, Wally Mears, myself and a fourth person, I forget now.

Anyhow, that’s when Bob Dole came out with Democrat Wars, which was really bad, and Dole, you could tell that Dole did not want to be there. He didn’t like the idea of the debate, or anything about it. But he was being the good soldier, he had to be there. So afterwards Dole and I were alone in his dressing room and there’s a call from Ford, and it’s on an amplified phone and Ford has probably had a few martinis; his words are slurry, “Great job, Bob. You really did a great job.” So, right we knew the martinis had set in.

By the way, is it safe to say in those days, everyone drank a lot more?

Yeah, and how. Jack Germond said, “When we pulled into a hotel, the first thing we looked for was the bar. Nowadays, they look for the health club.”

Anyhow, Ford said, “Good job, good job, Bob.” And Dole says, “Thank you, Mr. President.” And the conversation ends and Dole turns to me and says, “I wonder what he was watching.” Dole was just a great guy, a delight. They kicked me off the press bus because we had too much fun. In those days we didn’t report what went on.

By Election Day the polls had shown basically it was pretty much a dead heat. Did you think that Ford had closed the gap?

Yeah, I did. And also, I’d learned by then that what the polls show in mid to late October, early November, is that you have a closing in every presidential race, and it’s reality setting in. Now people are really dead serious about how they are going to vote, so the polls that are taken in the last week or so are the ones that really count because it’s the next thing to the election itself. Yeah, I didn’t know who was going to win at that point, but I just had a feeling that Ford had made up a lot of ground, but not enough.

Smith: There is a school of thought that says the pardon was in the end a bridge too far, I’ve always thought, you may not remember, but in the weekend before the election there were some economic numbers that were released that suggested - Greenspan called it a pause in the economic recovery - but they were not good numbers. And I’ve often wondered whether Ford had caught up, but then people at the very end were asking themselves, “Okay, do I want four more years of this, or am I willing to take a chance on something different?”

Bruno: Well, I never thought that the economic numbers really registered with most people; that what registers with people is their own security. Do I have a job? Do I keep my job? Do I have my medical insurance? And so on. Those are the things that people care about when they judge the economy. What the GNP is or anything like that, it goes over our heads, for the most part. So I don’t think that that set of economic numbers really was all that decisive. I think that the Jerry Ford as a goofball, as a clumsy oaf, had really done a lot of damage.

Smith: I know exactly what you mean. He said, and it’s really poignant, that what hurt so much was he felt that he had just mastered the job when he lost it. And you wonder what a full Ford term with the legitimacy of an election would have been.

Bruno: I think it would have been pretty good. I think it could have been pretty good. I think the country could have very easily, once they got to really know him, fallen in love with Jerry Ford.

Smith: I’ve often thought there’s a Trumanesque – kind of a plainspoken, unflashy, Midwest authenticity about the guy.

Bruno: I think that’s true. Truman and Ford would have gotten along good together.

Smith: Bess Truman voted for Ford in ’76. She told them.
Two quick things at the end: one, were you surprised by the extent of the public reaction when he died? Because this is someone who had been out of the public eye for quite a while. I was with ABC for part of that week, and then I was with the family, and it seemed to surprise some journalists to see it build as the week went on. That I think in part people were contrasting what they were seeing in the old clips with the state of politics today.

Bruno: I think those of us who were old enough to have covered Ford were not surprised by the outpouring. I think the younger generation that’s really coming in now, were very surprised - who was this guy? Unfortunately, many of the younger reporters have not done their homework and they are not very well versed on things that they should know as reporters, and they just didn’t understand. They had no frame of reference for Jerry Ford, so they were surprised.

Smith: Well, plus – let’s face it, Ronald Reagan owned the Republican Party at that point.

Bruno: That’s true. But those of us who had covered, I don’t know of anyone who didn’t have respect for Ford.

Smith: Speaking of Reagan, in 1980 did that whole crazy vice presidential thing – was that serious? At any point was that real?

Bruno: I remember that so well. I was sitting in the room ready to go with Barbara Walters and I forget who else was there and my sources told me that that was not going to happen - that it could not happen – that the Republican Party did not want it to happen. And the Reagan people with a few exceptions, did not want it to happen. Oh, George Will was the other person. And my sources said it wasn’t going to happen, it couldn’t happen, it never was real. Cliff White told me that, a very good guy. Cliff told them that couldn’t happen, that wasn’t going to happen. He was involved. And so, no, I didn’t think it could happen, either because I couldn’t find anybody who wanted it to happen. How it got started, I’ve never known.

Smith: There is a wonderful story – you mentioned Barbara Walters – she literally was outside Walter Cronkite’s anchor booth, banging on the door, because Cronkite had Ford, and she wanted either to join the interview or make off with him.

Bruno: That’s Barbara. She’s fierce.

Smith: How do you think Ford should be remembered?

Bruno: Ford should be remembered as the man who led us out of Watergate. Unfortunately, the promised land only lasted a short time for him. Most of us couldn’t even get into it. But I think he led the country out of Watergate. That was the most important thing. And that’s the way he should be remembered.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Bruno: Yeah, about five or six years ago, when he came in for the luncheon to present the awards.

Smith: Right. The Press Club.

Bruno: Yeah. That was the last time I saw him and talked to him – only briefly.

Smith: Isn’t that revealing, that his Foundation would have a press award. What does that tell you?

Bruno: It’s unheard of. Only they could do it. It’s a great tribute to him and to his mentor, Pete Lisagor I don’t think people realize what an influence Pete had and how he used it properly. There’s a terrific guy.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this.

Meijer: My pleasure.

Smith: Two areas I really want to focus on: some of your own contacts with the President, of course, but also, you are a real scholar of the period and culture that produced him. Tell us about Western Michigan and what defined it, made it distinct politically, culturally, fifty years ago.

Meijer: I have to step back and say, as I think about it, it’s almost difficult to disentangle President Ford from Grand Rapids. I mean, you drive in on the highway and you see the G.R. Ford Freeway. Well, G.R., Grand Rapids, for someone of my generation, growing up in the Fifties and Sixties, he was a continuous presence and almost a definer of what Grand Rapids felt like. Earnest, plainspoken; I almost want to say bland in the sense of not a colorful personality, not exciting around the edges. Solid and so reliable that I feel like I’m defining an ideal childhood and how much President Ford was both a product of that same environment and part of that ideal childhood. He was an ever present figure at every little parade and Red Flannel parade in Cedar Springs, and from my own perspective as a kid whose father had business around the community. I was often a little kid at the Red Flannel parade, or the Fourth of July at Michigan Ave parade, or whatever it might have been. I think for a lot of people, he also represented the federal government to Grand Rapids. This is an area that maybe because of President Ford’s particular approach, is not filled with government pork. There is very little federal presence here in terms of bases or facilities of any kind.

Smith: By the way, isn’t it ironic that the most visible example should be the Calder sculpture? Which seems so out of character with the Gerald Ford that you’ve described, and that I know to be true.
Meijer: It’s perfect. And the Calder – what is Calder Plaza – is officially Vandenberg Plaza because it had been planned with a monument in his honor that was displaced. I think it might have been a fountain, but it is Vandenberg Center to this day. But it’s been totally supplanted by this wonderful piece of contemporary art, which of course, came in part because of the good offices of President Ford.

Smith: Actually that’s a perfect way to set this all up. It also suggests – he was a guy with a basically safe seat – and yet, as you say, he was here as much as he was, even as he was rising in influence, clout, whatever you want to call it in Washington. Because by the mid-Fifties, for example, he had been drafted by the Old Bulls to be on this CIA oversight effort – oversight of all the intelligence agencies, which is revealing in and of itself.

Meijer: Indeed.

Smith: Tells you something about what the establishment thought about this promising young guy. What does it tell you about him that he was here as much as he was, when he didn’t have to be?

Meijer: And this in an age when congressmen were still raising their families in Washington. So it wasn’t the jet back to the district every weekend pattern, except for him, in many cases, it must have been. Because it felt like he was a ubiquitous presence. Now, maybe that was simply because of his longevity, because there is no sense of perpetual campaign. There was just a sense of Jerry being there; being around; being a willing participant in every Rotary Club event and civic function that came our way.

Smith: Do you remember when you first met him, or really were aware of his presence?

Meijer: No, because I was always aware of his presence. For some of us, and Richard, I think you may have had a similar experience, my great year of great political awakening was 1966, and that was the year of Romney, Scranton, Percy, that great wave of moderately progressive Republicans. Jerry pre-dated that and wasn’t a part of, wasn’t identified with that. He was so stolid as a representative that you didn’t see him as part of any great wave. So it was sort of – when did he displace Halleck?

Smith: ‘65.

Meijer: Okay, so in a sense he was a precursor - or he was seen by others as part of that wave. But I don’t have a first memory because I can say I was probably five or six in the late Fifties and saw him at a parade greeting my parents. I probably went with my dad to a Rotary luncheon or something and saw him over those years.

Smith: Let me back up because I’d love to paint in the background. We have been talking to a number of people and have some wonderful stories, sort of laugh out loud stories in some cases, about the influence of the Dutch Reformed or the culture - political and otherwise. But it was interesting, because Werner yesterday took pains to distinguish between their influence and that of, for example, many in the religious right today. Which is a valuable insight. But in their case, it was more a kind of insular, almost cocooned, culture within a culture. Which did not translate into anti-Catholicism, for example.

Meijer: Nor did it translate into being a part of the governing class of the community. Jerry was part of that mainstream Protestant tradition dating from before the waves of Dutch immigration came in. And the Dutch immigrants tended, at least originally, to be more blue collar, and even as they were upwardly mobile, they remained quite insular. And so they would support a good, sound Republican, but they weren’t further right to be chafing under good moderate Republican rule, nor were they influential in the party. This was what Jerry with his Episcopal membership was – and East Grand Rapids is not filled with Dutch surnames in the way that other parts of the Southside of Grand Rapids are.

Smith: That’s interesting because it does fly in the face of the outside notion of West Michigan as monolithic; even in Ford’s coalition, it was a coalition, which tells you something about his appeal, and also about his ability to juggle. Who was Frank McKay?
Meijer: Frank McKay—the easy description being Republican Kingmaker. He was for a while state treasurer, controlled many Republicans in the state legislature to the point that people wanting state contracts knew to talk to Frank. He was the fixer, either taking a fee or a bribe from whoever he could. When my dad and grandfather built one of their first stores in Grand Rapids, and they had a handful of supermarkets and were financially rather shaky, somebody told them to talk to Frank McKay and he could get them a loan from one of the local banks. And they did, and he got them a loan. Years later the banker said, “Well, if you’d just come to us directly, we’d have given you the loan.” But they were small town people who didn’t know whether that would work, and so Frank ended up for his Bal Harbor resort in Florida coming in and loading up on steaks every year before he went south, as his fee for arranging financing for that store. And many people thought he owned part of the company. But Frank McKay was the ugly face of party politics in the region and in the state.

Smith: So his influence extended beyond Grand Rapids?

Meijer: Oh, very much throughout the state of Michigan. Yes. He was a statewide figure in the party.

Smith: Was there an ideological component to it, or was it simply a boss who delivered services and extracted his price?

Meijer: Classical boss. Yes.

Smith: And Vandenberg was a foe? Or where did Vandenberg fit in?

Meijer: Vandenberg went so quickly from the newspaper, where he somewhat pre-dated McKay’s greatest years of influence, to Washington when McKay was wielding his greatest influence in the Thirties and Forties, that Vandenberg never had a lot of contact with him. So it was probably an uneasy relationship, but they weren’t relying on each other.

Smith: Did Vandenberg distance himself, in a sense, from Republican Party politics in the state?
Meijer: Yes. His own precinct failed to vote for him in 1934 and he’d had very little contact with the state party after he went to Washington. He did cursory stuff at the gubernatorial level, but had never as an elected official been intimately involved in state politics.

Smith: What was his appeal to the electorate, given what we think we know in retrospect about him, in terms of personality and approach? Particularly given what seems to be a kind of transformation that occurred?

Meijer: Like Ford, he was scrupulously honest so there was never any question on the integrity side. This is a guy who liked to drink, but he went outside the three mile limit during Prohibition to do it. He was a terribly hard worker, very diligent, and so even though he had some small claim to fame as a bit of a blowhard orator in his later years, he did his homework, and early on, when between his appointment and his first election, just a matter of a few months, introduced legislation calling for reapportionment based on the 1920 census. There had been no reapportionment since 1910. It had been held up in Congress because the South didn’t want to give up seats; they would be losing to the industrial Midwest and to the West. Michigan stood to gain seats, and Vandenberg really pushed for that. When Hoover came in, in tandem with Vandenberg’s first election, California interests were very, very much interested in that as well. And Vandenberg pushed through reapportionment, gaining Michigan additional congressional seats. Well, that won him support throughout the state.

He, I think, saved and built up Selfridge Field over in Detroit. He did some Detroit area high profile things that played well there. And, at a time when there was, at least in some quarters in the Midwest, some concern about the pace of change in the New Deal and the federal government’s accelerating accumulation of power, Vandenberg picked his battles wisely and picked high profile ones to oppose. Went along with the New Deal when it made sense, and really finessed that with the voters back here. At the same time that he was responsible for the creation of FDIC, which, even though Roosevelt laid great claim to his own thereafter, was indisputably a cornerstone of the economic recovery and of the salvation of the banking system. So he was hanging on through the New Deal years, and then as the Republicans were so decimated in – he was elected in ’28, so in subsequent elections when the majority slipped into minority and then into tiny minority in ’32, ’34, Vandenberg survived in ’34.

Smith: Was that his toughest race? ’34?

Meijer: Yes, it was his toughest race and he was the only Republican senator from an industrial state who was returned that year. He and Alf Landon were the two Republicans who most visibly bucked the trend that wiped out senators and governors around the country. And so his profile within the party, just in terms of the sheer numbers, quickly went forward. Locally he’d been the newspaper editor for twenty years and had that kind of intimate relationship with the town that comes from being in that role for that length of time. And so he had been sort of booster and honest mirror of the community for a long time. So people felt - even if he as a personality could be a little aloof and a little prickly - he was such a known quantity that people here were comfortable with him. He did things – the national park at Isle Royal - did things early in his tenure on a statewide basis that quickly won him support as a credible figure. And the Democrats in Michigan – it also had been a historically Republican state before the New Deal. And so when the Democrats couldn’t get Frank Murphy to come back and run against him, they didn’t have anybody else real strong.

Smith: When did he first see himself as presidential material?

Meijer: As with so many political egos, I’m sure much earlier than any of us would be aware. But there is first public awareness of him as a dark horse in 1936. So he is re-elected in ’34, and simply by virtue of that re-election, he’s one of the few people standing.

Smith: Was he seen as a potential running mate with Landon?

Meijer: Landon wanted him. He was Landon’s first choice and he evaded that. And so Landon picked Knox after that. Yes, he was seen as the preferred running mate for Landon.
Smith: What relationship – personal and/or political – existed between Vandenberg and whatever tradition he represents, and Gerald Ford?

Meijer: You would know more about this than I do, but it’s a wonderful image to think of Ford being in that gallery in Philadelphia in 1940, cheering for Wendell Willkie. And this is the case where I think Ford had grown up with a general respect for Vandenberg. I don’t have any evidence of teenage years interaction when Ford was coming of age and still living in Grand Rapids.

Smith: His dad - had he been politically active? Was there a time you can trace his involvement in local Republican politics?

Meijer: President Ford?

Smith: Or his father.

Meijer: His father, of course, had been part of that front with Dr. Ver Meulen and other people fighting the Frank McKay machine. But this is, of course, after Vandenberg is in Washington. So, if I recall from the Vandenberg materials, there may be a Gerald Ford, Sr. letter or two of just friendly, general supporter constituent correspondence, but not a close tie. And Vandenberg would have gone to Washington when President Ford was sixteen years old, I believe, and so there would have been – there was no contact prior to that that I’m aware of. And so then President Ford was gone from Grand Rapids most of the years after that.

Smith: Sure.

Meijer: So you’ve got the great image of, in 1939, prior to the outbreak of World War II, Vandenberg was viewed as one of the leading contenders and he was sort of the, maybe the leading contender in the eyes of much of the Republican establishment and of contemporary journalists – talking about reporters. He was kind of every editor’s choice, partly because he was one of them. He’d been an editor for so long, he was one of the founders of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. So that was his world and they were very comfortable with him, so he was sort of the…

Smith: Inside choice.
Meijer: Yes, today we always say the inside the beltway choice, which, of course, nurtured his aspirations far beyond what might have been realistic outside the beltway. He was an inside the beltway choice, but he was also one of the leading isolationist figures of the time. So he’s gaining his profile to a considerable degree because he is leading the fight against the repeal of the arms embargo. That position becomes discredited after the Nazis invade Poland in September of 1939, and so Vandenberg still has a very high profile but his whole…

Smith: Too high a profile in this case?

Meijer: Exactly. He’s too much identified with that movement. So then he goes into the Wisconsin primary and Dewey beats him. Dewey is much better organized. And you’re going to remember this stuff better than I am, if I can _________ ’40 and ’44. Dewey beats him; so he goes into the convention with the Michigan delegation pledged to him and a few others, but with a small chunk of votes. And then, of course, we all know that Wendell Willkie totally overran everybody and probably would have liked Vandenberg as his running mate. There is the story that Vandenberg tells of Willkie wanting to talk to him about a place on the ticket. Vandenberg says, “Well, I’ll flip you for it.” And of course, Willkie had other designs. But Ford there, identifying with the bold reformist, charismatic Willkie, rather than with Vandenberg.

Smith: Even though Ford himself, at this point, belongs to America First at Yale.

Meijer: Well, and of course, that’s that whole America First Yale thing. America First has got to be one of the most misunderstood organizations in its origins, with Sargent Shriver and Kingman Brewster. I mean, the founder of it, Robert Stewart, did you ever interview him?

Smith: Yeah. Once.

Meijer: I did, too. And none of these guys were anti-Semitic flame throwers. They were students opposed to the war.

Smith: Idealists, presumably having learned the lessons of the first war.
Meijer: Which weighed so heavily and played itself out in so many ways for all these folks. So, how do you reconcile Ford between America First and We Want Willkie?

Smith: I don’t. I don’t know enough, except that Ford becomes representative of a party that is in its gut and its heart and maybe its head, more inclined to America First, but is literally swept off its feet by this phenomenon. This Obama-like phenomenon.

Meijer: To what extent was Eisenhower Willkie-Lite?

Smith: And you project what you want to believe. And early on Willkie was pretty malleable. You could define Willkie as pretty much whatever you wanted him to be.

Meijer: And he was running a little bit to the right of Roosevelt. He was going along with Roosevelt in terms of aid to the Allies.

Smith: But also, if you’re a young Republican who has suffered through – you’ve crossed the desert of the last eight years, Hoover represents something, and Landon was futility personified, and then all of a sudden…again, I don’t mean to keep coming back, but I mean there is this Obama-like – that’s the parallel, in some ways.

Meijer: He’s one of these generational figures. Teddy Roosevelt clearly was.

Smith: Transcends, reinvents, is a whole new face, and you invest your emotions even more than your hopes. And who knows? I would have loved to have been sitting next to Ford in the galleries.

Meijer: He was a grad student, he was in his mid-twenties.

Smith: Of course.

Meijer: But what is interesting for Ford is, he would have seen Vandenberg as this sort of exemplar of his hometown ideals, but someone who, projected onto a national or international stage, was tired stuff. And philosophically suspect in terms of isolationism.
Smith: Un-electable for all of those reasons.

Meijer: Yeah.

Smith: Someone made a very convincing case. He said how Ford said to him, I think, during and after the presidency, how he never felt he got credit for being the rebel that he was. And you know, if you strip away the stereotype - and it's Charlie Halleck, Charlie Hoeven before that, obviously the ’48 campaign, and maybe going back to ’40. Maybe this was all part of young Jerry Ford. And let’s face it, the old cliché about a good mind having the capacity to entertain opposing viewpoints - America First as an organization of young idealists - then maybe it’s not such a reach to look at Wendell Willkie who personifies youthful idealism and logic be damned.

Meijer: And wasn’t going to get us into the war quite as aggressively, perhaps, as Roosevelt was.

Smith: The older I get, the more I’m convinced that the single biggest factor in politics is not ideological, but generational. And this illustrates it to a T. What Wendell Willkie is, is a modernizer. And to someone in Jerry Ford’s position at Yale, modernizing the Republican Party, however you define that in policy terms, would have been awfully appealing.

Meijer: Absolutely.

Smith: And presumably Arthur Vandenberg would not have been the man to do that. Estimable as he was.

Meijer: Vandenberg’s later ability, like you say, to balance those conflicting positions, is what won him his admiration. He was more colorful than Jerry Ford in his early Senate career than Jerry might have been in his House career, but represented some of that same Midwestern stuff. Like Jerry, both were having to work toward leadership positions with what was at that time, both wings of their party. And that centrism from a historical perspective is too easily boring and stereotyped. But it means that they were both working awfully hard to get along with the Tafts over here, and in Vandenberg’s time, with Borah and Norris, and in Jerry Ford’s time, I don’t who would be comparable – Goodell or the Eastern folks. And at the same time, Taft and that family.

Smith: Remember the old cliché about Americans being philosophically conservative and operationally liberal. You can almost say that Ford, at least at one point in his career, is philosophically something of a liberal and operationally much more of a regular.

Meijer: Yes. But was he philosophically a rebel?

Smith: Well, instinctively, maybe. Certainly the kid shouting “We Want Willkie!” The veteran taking on Jonkman; and even the sort of established figure taking on the establishment in ’62 and ’64, ’63 and ’65. We’ve been told by a very good source that he was approached in ’58 when Halleck took on Joe Martin. He was approached then about running, and he said he didn’t want to do it. He was biding his time.

Meijer: Thinking about parallels again, talking about Vandenberg’s ego. No question. Loved to be flattered; but he really didn’t hunger for the presidency in any way, shape or form. It was just like, hey, why not be? But the other part of it – I’m not going to knock myself out in Vermont and New Hampshire.

Smith: It’s the equivalent of Mondale saying I don’t want to spend the next two years in Holiday Inns.

Meijer: Exactly. President Ford always said what he really aspired to was to be Speaker of the House. Vandenberg, I would think, his comfortable thing would have been President pro tempore of the Senate, which he finally was in ’46. But it was a senatorial ego.

Smith: Which is the easiest to caricature.

Meijer: Oh, exactly. But it is - we have to remind ourselves - different than that sort of vaulting ambition that says, “I’m going to be president.” And neither Ford nor Vandenberg had that. Ford must have had an ego, but it was better checked than most politicians.
Smith: Lee Hamilton said something very interesting when we talked to him. He talked about Ford as being very ambitious, but smart enough to keep it under wraps, which is unusual in Washington.

Meijer: Yeah.

Smith: And we’ve been cautioned – the notion of Ford as guileless doesn’t mean he was without ambition or calculation.

Meijer: Yeah.

Smith: You don’t get where he got with…

Meijer: You don’t challenge Bart Jonkman. It partly was ideological and partly was the modernizing impulse; but you also have an ambition of a young guy on the go.

Smith: Knowing what you know about the culture of West Michigan at that time, does it make sense to you there is this notion that the President delayed formally proposing to Mrs. Ford, and certainly delayed the marriage, until after the primary, without telling her why. And it has been suggested that in this political culture divorce was verboten. And it could very well have been a political negative for this upstart candidate who is taking on an entrenched incumbent, to further saddle himself with the reputation of marrying a divorced woman.

Meijer: I think it is totally plausible. Obviously, it’s pure speculation, but when you are a first time candidate, you are running on your vita. In his case, you’ve got a war record, but you’re not running on any kind of job experience, and so what you’ve got is resume.

Smith: And character.

Meijer: Right. But more broadly speaking, and to have that as a key piece of your biography, if you could wait until after the primary, seems like that makes sense.

Smith: What does it tell you about Ford that he took on Jonkman in ’48; and did Vandenberg involve himself in any way in that race?
Meijer: As I understand it from President Ford, Ford went to Vandenberg and said, “I want to challenge Bart Jonkman. Will you endorse me or will you support me?” And, as I’m understanding it, again from President Ford, Vandenberg said, “I will quietly support you.” Jonkman was a long time incumbent and a fairly near neighbor of Vandenberg’s. He lived right down the block or around the corner. And so Vandenberg was not going to openly support Ford to challenge his incumbency, even though Jonkman had been the classic Taftite isolationist who was a pain in the neck to Vandenberg, as Vandenberg had evolved so far. So Ford felt like, “I’ve got Vandenberg’s support,” but it wasn’t publicized during the campaign. It was the kind of thing Ford would have been able to share with other people, but not an open letter in the Herald or to the press.

Smith: It's a little unusual for an incumbent senator to, in effect, oppose someone of his own party. Was that consistent with Vandenberg’s prior conduct?

Meijer: I’m not aware of any parallels with it. But at that point, in ’48, Vandenberg is absolutely at the peak of his popularity and influence. In the eyes of the country and in his own eyes, he would have risen so far beyond what he would have seen Jonkman’s very naïve, outmoded, world view, that he would be all for seeing him replaced by a bright young guy who seemed to look at the world the same way he did, whose father had been not a close friend, but a supporter. Yeah, this is just what you would like. In fact, President Ford was saying, when he arrived in Washington in late fall of ’48 for the first time?

Smith: Or January of ’49.

Meijer: January of ’49. Vandenberg’s birthday is in March then, so March of ’49. Arthur and Hazel invited Jerry and Betty to dinner. I think they had dinner at the Shoreham. It happened to be Vandenberg’s birthday and Ford was very touched by that. He mentioned that a couple of times and that it was a kind of warm social embrace. It was just the four of them and it happened to be the Senator’s birthday, and that meant a lot to President Ford. So clearly Vandenberg was very sympathetic, quietly encouraging in ’48. He’s also so involved internationally that he's not here at all. But very welcoming when Ford gets to Washington.
Smith: And we also get a sense that Jonkman had made the mistake of losing touch with the district – physically of not being back here as often.

Meijer: I haven’t paid attention to that. I don’t know what Jonkman’s style was. You could hang on as a Republican in a safe district for a long time, but he was out of touch with the temper of the times, and certainly would have looked as behind the times as Vandenberg did in 1940 when war broke out.

Smith: You were talking to President Ford about Vandenberg; I can imagine the nice things that he would say about Vandenberg. Did he identify any weaknesses at all?

Meijer: I couldn’t get it out of him, and perhaps because it’s not in President Ford’s character to say that. I came away from the interview wishing for those – you realize as an interviewer – what did I fail to ask? - because I couldn’t elicit that from President Ford. What he started out saying, because I was prompting him a little bit about Vandenberg’s intellectual stature and how he was viewed, and President Ford said, “Well, you know he was a very bright guy. He’d been editor of the newspaper.” As though that title bestowed on Vandenberg an intellectual stature that was unassailable. But that was the way he looked at it. And again, that’s probably coming from youthful impressions. Then you really don’t have any contact until ’48. Richard Rovere wrote a story where Vandenberg was the leading candidate for president of the world – give this as inside the beltway stuff – because when Truman was in his nadir and Vandenberg had so brilliantly, apparently, pushed partisanship aside – that’s when Ford is re-entering Vandenberg’s world, in a sense – when they are coming together in Washington and you’ve got the freshmen and your hometown senator is America’s senator at that point.

Smith: A legendary figure. Yeah, exactly. Let me see, because I’m trying to get the chronology straight here. In ’48 when Ford runs, he goes to see McKay early on. So McKay is still a power.

Meijer: What does McKay say?

Smith: Oh, there’s a story where McKay keeps him waiting for four hours.
Meijer: Oh my God.

Smith: And then brushes him off. And then later on there was the incident with the hut, that was put within sight of McKay’s office, or whatever it was, and he wanted it removed and they refused to remove it. But if McKay is still a power, if not the power, locally, this effort in which Gerald Ford, Sr. was involved to clean up Republican politics by getting rid of Frank McKay - you wonder if there is a parallel here. McKay is not going to give Gerald Ford, Jr. the time of day because his father is…

Meijer: Oh, sure. Right.

Smith: McKay’s days were numbered at that point?

Meijer: My guess, and I haven’t studied a lot of Michigan politics in the Forties and Fifties, my guess would be that McKay’s world of influence had really shrunken, so he was probably still an important figure locally. He was an important figure in the party. He was key to Willkie’s nomination. Have you read Charlie Peters’ book, Five Days in Philadelphia?

Smith: No, I’m embarrassed to say. I’ve heard it’s wonderful.

Meijer: Delightful book. Charlie Peters talks about McKay - one of Willkie’s attributes as this reformist, not a modernist candidate and non-political guy, he didn’t come in with any IOUs. And he wasn’t going to compromise himself. Well, it was all very appealing, except that he made an exception in Frank McKay’s case and told him that McKay could have a say in all Michigan judgeships – federal appointments in Michigan. And so with that, at a crucial time, the delegation that had been holding out for Vandenberg, but it was apparent that Vandenberg wasn’t going to have a chance, McKay swung the Michigan delegation, so in 1940 he clearly had a lot of power there, to Willkie, and I don’t know how many ballots that was into the fight – that was a pivotal moment.

I have a letter that I shared with Peters (because we interviewed him for the documentary) that he was glad to see, from Willkie to McKay, inviting McKay down to Rushville, Indiana to meet with him when he came back. A lot of it could have just been political platitude, but in Peters’ eyes this reflected a special relationship.

Smith: That’s fascinating.

Meijer: It’s safe to say McKay was totally not ideological in that respect.

Smith: You grew up and obviously had contact with Ford; and your dad is obviously pivotal in creating this institution. Were those basically after Ford left office?

Meijer: Yes. President Ford went to Congress in 1948. My dad was never terribly active politically, and my folks didn’t move to Grand Rapids until 1951. So, they saw him in a ceremonial way, but really not up close until my dad became involved with the committee for this museum. And then he can tell stories, which I don’t think he told, of being in the men’s room next to President Ford and President Ford, on two different occasions, one where President Ford is talking about “I’m going to spend my next few years working on the library and museum. That’s going to be my chief activity.”

Smith: Raising the money.

Meijer: “I’m embracing that as my job.” And then the other one was complaining about, “had Reagan gone to Cincinnati in 1976.” That we’ve all heard, but a difference. I don’t know how realistic that was, but he certainly was hot about that.

Smith: He wasn’t one to hold grudges. I think one of the problems with the DeFrank book, which in many ways is wonderful, is because of editorial decisions it leaves an impression that this was something he dwelt on.

Meijer: It wasn’t in his temperament to look at things that way.

Smith: If you asked him, and he felt comfortable around you, he’d say that. He obviously felt very comfortable around your dad. But it wasn’t something that defined his days. But your dad - it’s sort of legendary, he offered a site on the outskirts of town for this place. We know there were a number of people who thought it was questionable to put it here at the time. Has this been at least a catalyst in the subsequent transformation of downtown?
Meijer: I think it’s been a catalyst. I wish I could say – I don’t want to over play it – it’s certainly been a factor. And I think to locate here had to overcome some of the resistance of people like my dad, who grew up in a suburbanization of America mentality, where we need big parking lots. And he didn’t want to see an institution of this stature constrained because people couldn’t get at it.

Smith: That’s why we have big parking lots.

Meijer: Right. Exactly.

Smith: Certainly when he came to town you’d see him. Did he change over time? Or did your view of him change over time?

Meijer: I didn’t perceive it. I’m remembering my first sort of major involvement with the museum was I chaired or co-chaired the World War II exhibit. I don’t know if you remember that. Was that before you got here?

Smith: It was before my time, but I remember the exhibit well. It was a blockbuster show.

Meijer: And I remember being there with President Ford when we opened it, and again, I get this confused with stories I’ve read or heard from you and family and friends. But he would wear that same overcoat, raincoat, all the time. You’ve heard this, too.

Smith: No, no.

Meijer: I don’t know who was telling me that Betty would complain about that raincoat – maybe it was one of the kids. And he just wouldn’t change it. But I had the privilege of walking through the exhibit with him, and we were looking at a model of the Monterrey, and he was so self-effacing in talking about his experiences. And he would say, “Yeah, yeah. I was on that deck and we had to be pretty careful because it got pretty rough out there.” But how much of that is humility and how much is sort of lack of narrative intent or skill…

Smith: I always say he was the least self-dramatizing of political figures.
Meijer: Yeah. But you could see in him a warmth of recollection, but you didn’t get an expression of that.

Smith: That’s well put; an important distinction. And it’s funny because he did say on more than one occasion that if he had it to do over again, he would have spent much more time mastering communications. He was well aware of that deficiency. But, of course, in one on one campaigning, he was superb.

Meijer: Later, that would have been one of those un-modern things that he was lacking compared to the next generation of politicians.

Smith: Yeah.

Meijer: He must have sensed that in Kennedy as a contemporary.

Smith: But without the slightest trace of envy. Opposites attract – two more dissimilar people, it’s hard to imagine. But by all accounts, I don’t want to overstate it, but they had a relaxed, casual friendship.

Meijer: But wouldn’t Jerry have been – he may have been of Grand Rapids’ middle class, but he was also very much at ease with the east coast Yale establishment in a way that Nixon, obviously wasn’t - if you think of the three of them.

Smith: That’s a very interesting observation.

Meijer: He wouldn’t have been insecure.

Smith: Right. And the other thing is, I don’t think it is possible to overstate the bonding experience of the war. I’m curious, for him, having gone through the Vandenberg transformation, to believe that “this time we’re going to do whatever it takes not to repeat the past.”

Meijer: And as you talk about that, the people in Vandenberg’s generation had the scars and the experience of World War I to react to, and they chose different ways of reacting to that. But there was no bonding experience. World War I didn’t touch that many Americans as soldiers, so you didn’t have them coming out of the trenches saying, “How do we do this?” You had them in all different backgrounds. And so the Ford-Kennedy-Nixon generation would not have been...they were just coming of age after the war. They weren’t in positions of influence. So somehow the Truman generation had to struggle to form a consensus that already existed for the next generation, but that also came more naturally to the next generation. I don’t know how you separate those strands.

Smith: It’s safe to say that Gerald Ford was a true fiscal conservative.

Meijer: Well, certainly that veto pen was a brilliant thing.

Smith: Your dad was pivotal in adopting a somewhat more imaginative investment strategy for the organization.

Meijer: Yes, that’s right.

Smith: And I do wonder, Ford as a child of the Depression was wedded to this “we invest in bonds almost exclusively.”

Meijer: But so was my dad, but he was accustomed to take certain risks. And that’s where at some point, President Ford - in much the same way that someone is an editor, or somebody is that or that – “Well, somebody is successful in business,” so I guess I could do that. But again, just not insisting on your own way.

Smith: I found it fascinating that as he got older, he didn’t become more conservative. On the contrary, he became in many ways more open, more tolerant, more accepting. Part of it, I think, was that the party just moved so far to the right. I wonder how much of it was Mrs. Ford’s influence. Am I imagining things? When he was in office he was seen as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. And then, of course, came Reagan, and conservatism itself was redefined, and the social issues became the litmus test. I wonder if there is a kind of Midwest conservative: stolid, figures of integrity, who looked upon abortion or a sexual preference – those weren’t political issues. Those were things you didn’t talk about. For a long time he didn’t talk about the broken family he came from.

Meijer: Right, and probably postponed the marriage, or engagement.
Smith: But he actually learned to be more comfortable with those things late in life, which is intriguing. And, of course, he had teenage children – all of these factors.

Meijer: And he’d been in Washington for a long time, for good or ill, but typically that would move you to the center, I would think. Now how much – and this is very far afield – but how much is that the same journey of mainstream Protestantism? That in your childhood, things would not have been talked about and would not have happened; whether it’s Episcopal, or Congregational or Methodist, or whatever it might be – these were generally forces of conservatism, if they were forces of anything in the teens or Twenties, and they would be viewed as very progressive today.

Smith: That’s interesting. But he could get very outspoken about his concerns about what the right wing was doing to the party. And how much of that was residual resentment of Reagan.

Meijer: But he upset Halleck by appealing to the east coast country club Republicans with whom some of us have great sympathy. That he’d been there all along, and how much of his perceived conservatism was trying to play to the party, versus playing to Grand Rapids or reflecting Grand Rapids? I don’t think that that’s an automatic characteristic of his background.

Smith: What all this would suggest is that he’s a more complex figure, both publicly and I think personally. I think he was a very private person. There’s a sense that he may very well have taken any number of things with him to the grave.

Meijer: But superficially, talking about his thrift, to some extent, and to the extent as you are keenly aware that the Foundation and the legacy is sort of a family business, it was very interesting - if you were working on the statue for the Rotunda, and we were looking at competing proposals - Steve shared with us that one of them was much more expensive than the other – a higher profile artist, even though we really didn’t like his proposal better – we’re delighted with the course we chose. But Steve said, “Dad would never go along with that.” Like, don’t even think about taking it, it costs twice as much as the other candidates. I don’t imagine there are other presidential museums exercising that particular judgment.

Smith: I always found it fascinating that the Foundation, when they decided to redo the museum, did a fundraising campaign in secret. It was never public.

Meijer: It hasn’t figured out how to engage the community. And that’s a fundamental need of the institution and how to serve the Grand Rapids/Washington/Ann Arbor axis. That’s been a real trip.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Meijer: I believe it was at the last Ford Foundation dinner that he attended. And that was the occasion where he was a little bit slurred in his speech, and hearing about it the next day from whoever I spoke with, about how bad he felt about that. Much worse than the reality was.

Smith: He said, “That’s the last speech I’m giving.”

Meijer: There’s a sense of finality about that. Yeah. And already coming from California made it a much more arduous prospect than if you had chosen to stay in Washington or someplace close by. But knowing that the return was a difficult journey, anyway, and if I’m not able to return and function as I think I need to – that had to be hard for him.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction at the time of his death?

Meijer: Yes, in the sense of taking a narrow Grand Rapids view, you don’t understand how hungry the country and the world are to pay tribute to someone who represents something that we took for granted. And that made it more precious.

Smith: First of all, Mr. Bosscher, thank you for doing this. Tell me, what was the 30-30 Club?

Bosscher: I was a student manager and 29 football players of the South High team of 1930. We were state champs. We played in a snow storm on Thanksgiving, ten inches of snow and the kids at the school, for two days, they shoveled that whole field and it ended up in a 0-0 tie. But Frank Cook was declared ineligible because he had signed a baseball, professional, so they had to forfeit everything.

The 30-30 Club, we met every Thanksgiving, every Thanksgiving morning at nine o’clock for 75 years. Every five years, we had our families with us. We did that until there was just Jim Trimpe in Grand Rapids. We met for two years. Leon Joslin is out in Seattle.

Smith: Was one of those meetings at the White House?

Bosscher: Yes. I was president of the 30-30 Club for years and Jerry Ford was my vice president and the vice president of the United States. I said, “You know, the vice president has charge of the next meeting, you’d better invite us.” So, he goes back to Washington and he sent out invitations from the vice president’s office. Next week he’s president. He withdrew all the original invitations and sent out invitations from the White House. So we had a bunch of invitations. And then we had luncheon there, and had a tour of the White House in small groups - going to see parts of the White House that we’ve never seen.

That afternoon, he took off for some out of town business, but then we had a tour of different companies around, the US Mint, we spent the weekend there.

Smith: I know this was a long time ago, but tell me, what was Jerry Ford like when you knew him as a player, as a kid?
Bosscher: He was a leader, he was a natural born leader. He was in football, basketball, and track. He did field events and played regular in varsity basketball, but then a leader in football. He was all-state center. He goes on to Michigan, he played the freshman game they had there, he made the all-freshman team. The next year he followed Chuck Bernard, an all-American center from Michigan, he followed him. He played for three years or two years really regularly.

Smith: You say he was a leader. How did that manifest itself? How do you define leadership?

Bosscher: I would say he didn’t have any enemies. He was friends with anybody. I mean, he’d come to town, I’d say to some friend of mine, “Do you want to go out and meet Jerry Ford?” “Are you going to see him?” “If I get close to him, we’ll meet him.” One time we were out at the airport and only could get about five feet from the fence and I says, “Jerry, I’d like to have you meet ‘so and so’.” He reaches way over that fence and shook hands with the guy and that guy said, “I wouldn’t have believed it.” He had friends all over. And I suppose that’s just the way he was in the White House. They said he wasn’t a very good president, but it’s coming out now, he was pretty good. It’ll finally show up.

Smith: Did he have a temper?

Bosscher: I wouldn’t say he had a temper, no. No, he never got mad, but he was a good leader, he could get guys to play hard. He was just a good leader. In fact, I first met him when I was about in the 6th grade. We used to play down in Madison Park. Now that new Madison Park is Ford, named after him, they’ve torn the old one down. And we used to play a little ice skating there and play softball, a little pass-and-tap. Then he went to South, we were in senior’s session 203, he was in A-1 and I was in 7-2, but we were in the same session room. So, I followed him all the way through high school, just tailed behind him. (laughs)

Smith: What’s the difference between South and Central?
Bosscher: Well, in Central, that’s my opinion, they’re of the old school, the old people on the hill, people more sophisticated. South took in Burton Heights all the way over to Eastern and Franklin. I was just inside. Where I lived on Thomas I could’ve gone to Central. In fact, one girl went to Central, a boy went to Christian High, another one went to Tech, and I went to South. I had two brothers that I followed. In fact, all five of us children graduated from South.

Smith: It’s interesting, because it has been said, that one of the reasons specifically that he went to South was because it was a much more diverse student body.

Bosscher: When he lived on Union, he was in the South district. So he got started in athletics, and they moved out to East Grand Rapids, but he got an old Ford and he drove back and forth to school. So he stayed at South then. I’d say for two or three years, he was living out in East Grand Rapids.

Smith: How diverse was the student body at South? I mean, did you have different ethnic groups? Different economic groups? Blacks? How varied?

Bosscher: I would say South was a mixture. We had them from Lafayette, Sheldon, Franklin, a lot of Italians - a lot of those went to Catholic Central, but a lot of them went to South, and to the south end, Burton Heights, and over near where I lived. So it was quite a variety of classes. Two hundred and thirty, two hundred a class, a high school class.

Smith: Was he sort of a big man on campus?

Bosscher: Yeah, but he wore it well. He wore it well. In fact, a friend of mine said, “You should see the love letters he used to write to my sister.” This was before the first girlfriend he had. Ford used to sit and park in front of her house on Grande Ville Avenue. (laughs)

Smith: (laughs) We want to know more. I was going to say, did he have girlfriends?

Bosscher: Oh, he played the field. He played the field.

Smith: And who was the young lady in question to whom he wrote these…?

Bosscher: The first one? You really want to know? (laughs)
Smith: Sure!

Bosscher: Hondorp, was her name. I graduated with her sister, Gertrude. Mary Hondorp.

Smith: And what did she look like?

Bosscher: She was a lot different than his wife now. She was a little shorty, the one he’s married to now. In fact, this is her second marriage. She was married to a Warren first, but then she got rid of the Warren name and used her original name. They were married in Grace Episcopal Church.

Smith: Were there other girlfriends after?

Bosscher: Oh, I suppose he had a lot of them.

Smith: He was popular with the girls?

Bosscher: Yeah, but I would say Mary Hahndorp (?) was the closest one. That’s where his car used to park on Grande Ville. (laughs)

Smith: What did a kid, or a teenager, do in Grand Rapids in the 1920’s or ‘30’s?
What did you do for fun in Grand Rapids? I mean, you weren’t in school all the time. Did you work?

Bosscher: I was very active in the YMCA. Before I went out to Fisher Body, I was the boy’s physical director at the YMCA. There was just two of us, me and the instructor and we had all the boys classes. But the YMCA didn’t pay much and I went back to school for the last half year just to do something. I took machine shop from a fellow named Paul Structer(?). He later went down to Davis Tech, and he was in a men’s class, and then he went to General Motors and was in personnel there. Then he was the first personnel director at Fisher Body. I heard that a big, heavyset man was personnel director. I said, “I bet that’s Paul Structer(?).” So I went out to see him, we chatted. He used to take me – he didn’t have any kids – he used to take me to these father and son deals he belonged to and I was his son. Paul Structer(?), he says, “What kind of job would you like?” I said, “I’m only interested in tool die apprenticeship.” I was the fifth employee out there and the first apprentice class. I was assistant safety director for a couple of years, and the war broke out and everybody had to run a machine, so I had to go back to the tool room. You couldn’t get off work 7 days a week.

Smith: Was it unusual then for high school students to go on to college?

Bosscher: In high school, Bill Schuiling and he were running for class president. Bill Schuiling beat him out. Later on, Ford’s in the White House and Bill Schuiling’s the vice president at a big bank right down the street.

Smith: Tell us about Bill Schuiling.

Bosscher: Bill Schuiling? He was all brains. He was a very good student, not active in any extracurricular activities, where Ford was always busy in athletics.

Smith: Was it brain versus brawn?

Bosscher: Well, a little bit of both, but you couldn’t tell it between them they way they reacted to each other. Ford didn’t have any enemies, unless he bawled someone out for not working hard enough playing football.

Smith: He was a hard worker?

Bosscher: Oh, you betcha.

Smith: Did he get that from his family?

Bosscher: No, he was the adopted son of Ford, I forget what his first name was, but his mother just died just a few years ago. She lived in town here.

Smith: What was she like?

Bosscher: She was very nice. Very nice. But he didn’t have any brothers or sisters except the two half-brothers.

Smith: But they were pretty close.

Bosscher: Yeah, very close. He just had two boys and every 5 years, we’d have the families for Thanksgiving breakfast. We met about eleven o’clock and he came one year with his two older boys before he had the third and fourth. We always heard from him. He called us every Thanksgiving and he’d stay on that phone until everyone who wanted to talk to him got a chance to talk. In fact, one year, when I was out in Porter Hills Rehab, I had fallen down the stairs here, and I was out there for about five weeks - no, five days. This time I was out there six weeks. But, while we were at Porter Hills, Burgess Wisner was there, he was our secretary treasurer and I was president. So we’d been out at Porter Hills on Thanksgiving. And I says to some of the people that were there, I says, “If you want to speak to Ford, to be introduced to Ford, you come on while we’re having breakfast.” I went over when the phone’s ringing. “Hello, this is Jerry calling.” He talked to anybody that wanted to spend some time with him.

Smith: I want to go back to this campaign, this first campaign that he ran for president and lost. Do you remember what grade that was?

Bosscher: Well, when he ran for [Congress], the 30-30 Club got together and met at his home and all got signatures to run against Barney Jonkman. Now, Barney Jonkman was an old timer. I said, “You’ll never beat Barney Jonkman,” but he beat him the first year.

Smith: Why was Jonkman so popular?

Bosscher: I don’t know why he was so popular. I knew him real well, and his family, we went to the same church.

Smith: What was he like?

Bosscher: Altogether different, altogether different. I mean, Ford could make friends with anybody. Jonkman was a little bit hard to reach, but he kept winning and winning until Ford ran against him and Ford beat him. Now, that’s unusual for a first time running for federal office. He got in.

Smith: I assume Jonkman was surprised. He expected to beat this…

Bosscher: Just like now, they’re saying Ford didn’t have a very good record as a president, but things are coming out now, that he made some moves that weren’t popular at the time, but they’re coming out now. That’s the way he did, silently he did good things.
Smith: Did he campaign in high school? You said he ran for president in your class.

Bosscher: He ran for president, but Bill Schuiling beat him out.

Smith: Did he campaign? How do you run for president in high school?

Bosscher: You get some teams – people that are in favor of Schuiling, people that in favor of Ford and they bicker back and forth and finally, they have an election. Bill Schuiling beat him out.

Smith: Was it a popularity contest? What did you debate?

Bosscher: It wasn’t a popularity contest because Ford would’ve won that, but Schuiling was a little more of a student and they wanted him for a president. But later on, he gets up in Washington as a vice president. Ford’s in the White House.

Smith: Were they friends? Did they stay in touch?

Bosscher: I don’t know any who didn’t like Ford. I mean, athletes at other schools always spoke highly of Ford. He always played fairly and he was just a great guy. I mean, he being the only son for a while, then when Ford married… He never carried, that I can remember, his mother’s name. If he did, I forget what it was.

Smith: Leslie King was his birth name, then of course he took Gerald Ford’s.

Bosscher: He was very young when she married Jerry Ford from the paint company.

Smith: Do you remember the paint company?

Bosscher: Oh yeah.

Smith: How many people worked there?

Bosscher: Well, he was never connected with the paint company, Ford wasn’t.

Smith: Just his father?

Bosscher: Yeah, his father. His stepfather.

Smith: As far as you could tell, they were very close?
Bosscher: Yeah. And his stepfather died before his mother died. His mother died just a couple years ago.

Smith: What was his stepfather like?

Bosscher: I never really met her, really. She always kept to herself. I met her when they were living out in East Grand Rapids. They were married then and that’s where all the other children were born in East Grand Rapids.

Smith: And, obviously, Grand Rapids has changed a lot since you were students together. What was the community like back then. Very Dutch?

Bosscher: Well, I think growing up it was probably known as a Dutch town because there were so many Christian Reformist schools and churches. In fact, I was brought up in Baxter Christian School until about the sixth grade. Things were getting tough, my folks couldn’t afford tuition anymore, so then I went to South. Went to South in 7-2.

Smith: We know there were a lot of churches, were there a lot of movie theaters?

Bosscher: Oh yeah, more so than they are now. There was one in Lafayette, one in Burt Heights, one in Madison Square, there were two other smaller ones in Westside, down in the North End. But there were about five smaller theaters and they were very, very active. Ten cents. And I was so short, I was ten cents until I was about 15. I was soaking wet about 90 pounds when I graduated from high school. Went to Fort Sharon(?) and played in the band. I was a drummer in the band and they went through to get some uniforms. First of all, I had size 4 shoes, pants you couldn’t get them small enough, so they hung over the rolled parts, collar was about this (gestures a loose collar), so I sent home for some smaller clothing. Fort Sharon, for about two years, I was there. I was the smallest corporal in the CMPC and they had a competition in rifle shooting. And they had the smallest one from each company from the men. And I won that, but when I’d sit in the sitting position, they had to have folks sit behind me. (mimics rifle kick back and laughs)
Smith: Now, were you in Grand Rapids during the Depression? What was life like in this time? How bad was it?

Bosscher: I can remember the Depression years. I don’t know how my mother and father really survived it. It’s back in it now.

Smith: What was it like?

Bosscher: They didn’t even have welfare that they have now. But my mother always had food on the table.

Smith: How’d they manage with so many people out of work?

Bosscher: My father was a salesman. He worked at Hayes Barney(?) for awhile. He was never really unemployed for very long, in fact he dug those ditches for the original Holtzman Field(?), put in the drainage ditches for the outfield when that was built and that was done by city workers.

Smith: Now, President Ford was an Eagle Scout. Were you ever a Boy Scout?

Bosscher: No, I was always active in the Y. I would start going to Y camp when I was ten years old. In fact, I got my first membership on the Christmas tree when I was ten years old. I was standing marksman. And I’ve been a continuous member now for 83 years. I was honored a couple of years ago in one of the Y meetings as the longest living member; not the oldest, there are guys there that are older than me, but the longest living member.

Smith: Did you know the president’s brothers, the other members of his family?

Bosscher: Oh, yeah, there was…I think he only had one or two brothers?

Smith: Weren’t there three? Yeah, Tom, Jim and Dick.

Bosscher: Yeah, but they all went to East Grand Rapids.

Smith: Was it a close family?

Bosscher: Oh yeah, he always was, as far as the family went. And he was always close to his mother.

Smith: Really?
Bosscher: Yeah.

Smith: Did you know her?

Bosscher: I met her a few times. She lived in those apartments on Foam(?) Street in college.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw President Ford or heard from him?

Bosscher: Yeah, let’s see. It was one of his visits in Grand Rapids. I saw him just one other time he came to Grand Rapids in one form or another, not maybe to speak to him personally.

Smith: Why do you think the 30-30 Club stayed together so long?

Bosscher: I know there was the state championship. Some of the fellows just joined the last two or three weeks. I know Jim Trimpe joined the team in the last two or three weeks, ‘cause he was quite a track star, fast. And his track coach never wanted him to go out to football and Gettings was always after the track coach to release Trimpe so he could put him in. So he only played, I think, the last 5 or 6 games he was with the South varsity.

Smith: Who was your coach?

Bosscher: Cliff Gettings.

Smith: What was he like?

Bosscher: Really good leader. He was the only coach we had and he got on those guys. We practiced out at Garfield Park, and if you came late for practice, he’d start them running around the swimming pool and then he’d forget about them. (laughs) They’d run around that pool until it was time to go back into Grand Rapids.

Smith: Do you know if Ford was ever late for practice?

Bosscher: If you ever saw Ford, loaded as much as that old Ford he had. Everybody could get out to ride from Garfield Park to Grand Rapids. That was a long walk from about Burton Street to Hall Street.
Smith: How could he afford to have even an old Ford?

Bosscher: I don’t know. He got that Ford as soon as he moved out to East Grand Rapids. And he drove that back and forth to work and to school. He worked all the time. He worked at old Bill Skougi’s hamburger place across from the school. He worked there for lunch hours.

Smith: And that’s where he met his father.

Bosscher: Yeah, that’s where his father showed up one day. And he met him, but he said, “I don’t want to see you again.” Told his father, “We’ve met and I don’t want to see you again,” because his father abandoned him and when Ford was kind of making a name for himself, his father shows up. So he says, “We’ve met and I never want to see you again.” I never knew about his original name.

Smith: And Bill Skougi’s, it was a hamburger place? And it was across the street from the school.

Bosscher: Yeah, across the street from the school. Served a lot of hamburgers and ice cream sandwiches. In fact, all the athletes that worked there worked there over the lunch hour.

Smith: Did you know that he wanted to go on to college? That he wanted to go to the University of Michigan?

Bosscher: Yeah, in fact, after he got out of the varsity and enlisted, another fellow and I hitchhiked down to Ann Arbor, hopped over the fence to get in. People were going over one fence, the police were over at another. We were going over the fence over here. Sat down and we saw him play against Illinois. That was the first year he was playing, because Chuck Bernard was the All-American center.

Smith: Was center the only position he ever played?

Bosscher: Yeah, played basketball and he did field events and track – shot put, discus. Now, Leon Joslin, he continued in his athletics, he’s got a world record in senior Olympics.
Smith: What do you have to do to be a good center? What particular qualities does it call for?

Bosscher: He has to be likeable, well fed(?), and don’t have any enemies.

Smith: Did you go to the funeral?

Bosscher: Oh yes. In fact, it was quite an honor. Leon Joslin came from Seattle for the funeral. He said his daughter picked him up, she lived out on the coast, she picked him up and he flew in time for the funeral. We had front row seats. And when all those dignitaries were coming in, they came in, shook hands with us. We met the governor of Michigan, the vice president of the United States and all the representatives, anybody that came, they came across and shook hands with us.

Smith: Do you remember back to when you were sitting there? What did you think about Jerry Ford?

Bosscher: Well, he was just a great guy. We met, we used to play in Madison Park, had a lot of friends down there. That was when he was at Madison School and then went out to South High in the 7th grade. He wasn’t an all “A” student, but always got good grades.

Smith: Were there teachers that he had or you had that were particularly important? Can you think of any school teachers that were especially… I mean, you mentioned the coach.

Bosscher: He probably had Ed Levally(?) and probably had …

Smith: His favorite subjects were history. He took Latin and he didn’t care for it.

Bosscher: I don’t think he took Latin. He probably took French or Spanish like I did. (laughs) You really had to like languages if you took Latin, could speak Latin. What could you do with it? Interpret? But if you could speak some French “oui oui”. (laughs)

Smith: Were there any other mentors, anybody who really had some influence on him? Besides his parents who had influence on him, were there other people you could think of, people in the community or people around the school, that he sort of looked up to or hung around with? You know, other influences.

Bosscher: He wasn’t a top student, top level. But he always had passing grades. You never had to worry about him being eligible for athletics.

Smith: Is there something about Grand Rapids in those days that you miss? Is there something that’s gone from the town you grew up in?

Bosscher: Oh, I don’t know. All through high school, I delivered railroad timetables. There’s a printer down at the Pantlind Hotel, he’d put out these – they’re a loose leaf affair – they’re train schedules - the front would always have the month on it. So with that route, it took me all over town. It’d take me about three or four days after school. I’d get out, I’d get out of school the last two periods. I never had any classes the last two periods all through high school. And I kept that until I finally gave it up. There were a lot of offices, different offices, I couldn’t even figure out why they had those things.

Smith: The Pantlind Hotel was a pretty fancy place, wasn’t it?

Bosscher: Yeah.

Smith: Was that the big hotel in town?

Bosscher: Yeah, I used to go in the back door down through the path and the print shop was way in the front. I could’ve gone through the front down the stairs, but they wouldn’t let me. I was just a commoner. (laughs) I had to go through the back door. (laughs) I always rode a bike until one day my bike was stolen from the Y. I think the first time I had to go down Pantlind Road, I did it on roller skates and I went to the police department and said, “Do you have any bikes that are still workable?” Well, they gave me one and I kept it a couple months and I was going to take it down to Shorty Slater(?) and have it fixed up a little bit and he said, “Hey kid, I just got your bike in. The kid that stole my bike tried to sell it to Shorty Slater, but Shorty knew my bike, so I got my old bike back again.

Smith: One last thing, besides teammates or maybe teammates, who were Jerry Ford’s friends? Did he have a best friend?
Bosscher: I don’t know of any particular fellows unless they were teammates of the football squad’s top men, Art Brown, Stuey Schiltzer(?), Al Elliot(?), Dale Heismann(?).

Smith: They all sort of hang around together?

Bosscher: Not necessarily hung around together. None of them lived near him. He lived on Union until they moved out to East Grand Rapids. I lived just a block from him on Thomas.

Smith: Were you ever in their house on Union Street?

Bosscher: Yeah, it was your ordinary big house. In fact, the fellow that took it over remodeled it a little bit. Didn’t change the looks of it. Got a black and white photo of the home of Jerry Ford.

Smith: Thank you, thank you. Is there anything else you want to add?

Other: Mr. Bosscher, I did want to ask you, when you knew Jerry Ford in high school, did you ever have a sense or the classmates around him have a sense that this guy is really going to go places?

Bosscher: I was a year behind him. So I was never in the same sessions as him as we’re growing up. We had the first session when we started there, but after that I was always in the session behind him. I can’t say I know of anybody that didn’t like Jerry Ford. Or that he had any enemies. There were maybe some guys that he beat up on the football field.

Smith: Did you ever think he’d be president?

Bosscher: No, I mean, I didn’t think he’d ever run. But he was congressman for years and he didn’t introduce too many things, and it comes out now that he was quite active, but he must’ve been well enough to be Nixon’s successor. To jump from congressman to president, it was quite a jump for him, too. They say, “Well, he wasn’t a good president.” But it comes out now, he did a lot of good things.

Smith: Takes awhile sometimes.
Bosscher: And it’s just too bad that he didn’t live a bit longer to enjoy some of the things they’re giving him credit for now. He was in good health until he died.
Smith: First of all, tell us the difference between Vail and Beaver Creek.

Frampton: Well, they’re both part of the Vail Valley, but they’re separate communities. Vail was here first. It really started in the early 60s. Beaver Creek didn’t start until 1980 or ’81. So, they’re two distinct communities although they’re only four or five miles apart.

Smith: Could either one of them happen in today’s regulatory/environmental economic climate?

Frampton: The answer is probably not. And, in fact, around 1980 or ’81, I’m not sure exactly, Sports Illustrated had a wonderful article on Beaver Creek. It was a major article and the title of the article was “The Last Great Resort” and that was ’80 or ’81.

Smith: And is that in the tradition of, say, Sun Valley?

Frampton: What it basically said is that there really aren’t very many places left in the United States to build a project like Beaver Creek. That the environmental rules and regulations basically made it extremely difficult and, to some degree, the money was too significant to get anybody to do it; but it was more the environmental issues - that there were just not any places left. And if you really look at it, there hasn’t been a new resort built in the United States in a mountain community since Beaver Creek was built in the early ’80s.

Smith: Is it fair to say that this is an outgrowth of Vail?

Frampton: That’s a pretty good description, yeah.

Smith: How did you first meet the Fords?

Frampton: That’s a great story. I became president of Vail Associates, which is a public company, in 1982. Vail ran the Vail Ski Mountain, which was a very profitable business, and was involved in building Beaver Creek, but they had gotten in financial trouble, probably because this business culture or this company was skiers. Also, in 1981, ’82, the recession was difficult. So, the company had gotten in trouble financially and I was hired to be president of the company and this was unusual for somebody to come from the south and who had only skied a few times.

Smith: What had you done before?

Frampton: Well, I’d been in the resort real estate business in Hilton Head, primarily, and other places. They needed somebody to come in who had an understanding of real estate development because of Beaver Creek. They also wanted somebody who understood operations, and I did. But it was golf and tennis as compared to skiing, so I wasn’t hired for my skiing abilities. I became president at a young age; I think I was 38 in 1982. And one of the first things you had to do is go meet President Ford, who was actually moving into his house near Beaver Creek. He was originally living at his condo in Vail and he decided to move down here along with Dean Keaton, who was a good personal friend, and Leonard Firestone, who’d been ambassador to, I think, Switzerland, if I’m not mistaken.

So I’d been here literally two or three or four days and I got this call from President Ford just out of the blue. It’s a big deal, I mean, a former president calling me. I took the line and he introduced himself and he said he wanted me to come down to his house because some of the landscaping in the street that was not on his lot, didn’t look very good. And I said ‘sure’, so I got in my car and went down to Beaver Creek. He and Betty were there. I’d been on the job two or three days at the time and he walks out. There was a median in the street and it looked pretty scruffy.

Smith: Of course, it was brand new, wasn’t it?

Frampton: The house was brand new. Well, the street had just been built, but it was a big median and it had not been landscaped very well. It didn’t look very good and he didn’t like it. And so, he said, “We’ve got to get this fixed.” And he had said that he talked to somebody that worked for us who ran landscaping and this particular guy had said they were finished, that they weren’t planning on doing anything else. And I said, “President Ford, we’ll have the landscape guys over there tomorrow and it’ll look good the next day.” And so, I called somebody, I don’t remember who, and literally the next morning, we had these cute little girls out there planting the flowers and it looked gorgeous. And because I did it in one day, I think it started a pretty good friendship with President Ford and Betty. I mean, like all of the rest of us, they wanted the street to look nice, which was special. So, that was my first meeting.

Smith: Were there things about them that surprised you?

Frampton: That he was just a comfortable person. That was what was nice about him and Betty both. And I always remember about three or four weeks later, they asked us to dinner, which was a big deal. Of course, Susan, my wife, was terrified as you would expect - former president. We went to dinner and there were four other couples and he just couldn’t have been nicer. He asked her meaningful questions about our family and our kids and why we were here. And when he asked them, it wasn’t perfunctory. It was like he really had an interest, and that was nice and comfortable.

I have to tell you one little cute story about that dinner because this was a big deal. By the way, Leonard Firestone was there and three or four other couples. We got there and the dinner was early, like 6:30, and we had a drink on the porch and then we went in and had this nice dinner. It was at a round table and it was very nice. We all ate and we’d been there, I don’t know, an hour and a half or two hours and we’re still talking and I could sense that this could last for another two hours. President Ford just stood up and said, “This has been a terrific evening. I appreciate all of you coming.” And we all got up and left because President Ford did not like to stay up late. But he handled it with great care and at 8:30 we were home.

Smith: Tell us about Dean Keaton because that name keeps coming up Frampton: They were obviously close friends and they got to know each other, I think, in California, if I’m not mistaken. When President Ford built his house here, Leonard Firestone built his on one side and Dean Keaton built his on the other side. In the early years, Dean spent a lot of time here, but as he got a little older, he didn’t spend as much time. But they just were friends, is how I would describe it. They weren’t in business to my knowledge. They may have had some business connections, but it was a kind of personal friendship and Dean was a nice guy. He was chairman of the AT&T Golf Tournament. He may have actually been the chairmen of it when it was the Clambake with Sinatra and all those guys, but he was in that California crowd. He was a nice person.

Smith: Now, you were very significantly involved in the Vail Foundation.

Frampton: Yeah.

Smith: Which built, among other things, the Amphitheater?

Frampton: Yes, the Foundation has done a lot of things. We built the Ford Amphitheater, raised money for that. We actually built it once and then we tore it down and built it again.

Smith: Really?

Frampton: Yeah.

Smith: Do you remember roughly what it cost?

Frampton: Well, the rebuild was about twelve or thirteen million dollars which would probably be about 30 or 40 million today. And, of course, the Foundation was involved in building the Vicar Center here in Beaver Creek, which Ford was involved in, and we ran all the ski racing, et cetera. And, you know, they asked President Ford to go on the Foundation board and he was on that board from 1982 until he passed away. We had two board meetings a year, big board meetings. I don’t believe he missed a single board meeting and, if he did, I don’t remember it. We would always get him the book a week before time and he’d read it. He always asked some good questions. And the other great thing about President Ford is that we started on time. We’d started at 8 o’clock and we didn’t start 8:01 because he always got there perfectly about 10 or fifteen minutes until. He wanted to start on time and that was the trick we learned. But he was a good board member, is the point I’m making. It was not some perfunctory thing. He was engaged. He read the book. He had questions and he was very thoughtful of our board for a long period of time.

Smith: Let me ask you - it may be an awkward question. Was he a generous board member? I mean, because I’ve seen his name on some things.

Frampton: Well, he always made his annual contributions, he and Betty, to the Ford Amphitheater and they were generous financially. We certainly had a lot of donors that gave a lot more money, but he always gave money. Every single year, he made contributions in different amounts, but he was particularly generous in just that he worked. I mean, I can’t tell you how many times, we’d call him up and say, “President Ford, we need you to call so and so,” and he’d make those calls or he’d meet those people for coffee. And that’s really what you’re looking for in a board member.

Smith: The reason I ask is because he was a fiscal conservative in the traditional sense. As president, he had not been reluctant to veto bill after bill after bill, probably the last president to ever hold the line on spending. And there is some dispute over how generous a tipper he may have been.

Frampton: That’s probably Luke and Liz saying that.

Smith: No, I think, at the restaurant, they say it was 20% which, frankly, comes as a surprise based upon what we’ve heard of on the golf course.

Frampton: No, I don’t know that. I do remember one time we were thinking in the Foundation of starting an endowment and President Ford said he didn’t like the idea of an endowment at our organization. He said he thought if we had to go out and raise the money every year, it would keep us on our toes better and we would be more customer service oriented. So we really never raised an endowment. And I think, in our particular case, it was right though there are other cases where you need to do it. If you go back to how they were involved - I know on numerous occasions he’d go to the public schools and also went to Vail Mountain School where our kids were. I say ‘numerous’, he did it once every year or so, but I remember him going in and talking to the kids at Vail Mountain School and explaining the fundamentals of the three branches of government and the checks and balances and so forth. So, I think it was pretty nice that a former president living here would make an effort to do something like that. There were a lot of instances with that kind of involvement.

Smith: We’ve heard that they were, as in the desert, not only very visible, but actively involved in a lot of civic activities.

Frampton: And they worked and they actually did some things. And I guess he always kind of enjoyed Vail. People didn’t follow him too much. I mean, they respected him, but he could be a little bit of himself.

Smith: It has also been suggested that they were significant in helping to establish this as a summer resort place.

Hampton: Oh, there’s no question. I mean, I wasn’t here during those early years when he was here, but you can’t even begin to measure the impact he had on Vail and helping to create Vail. I mean, if you go back to the Ford Golf Tournament, it was phenomenal for the 20 years that went on and all the people that came here as part of that. I mean, it was truly phenomenal.

Smith: And when you were developing Beaver Creek, was he there at all? Their house was already there. Did you have conversations about what this area was going to look like?

Frampton: Well, we did, although the people who had planned it actually before I came here had done a really good job on the master plan and had communicated it effectively through some models and so forth. So, there was an outline that was quite good. It was a really good master plan. So, if you were buying early, you knew what the hope and the vision was for Beaver Creek. On the other hand, very little of it was here, so what you didn’t know was if it would be implemented.

Smith: Sure. It was an abstraction.

Frampton: It was an abstraction. That’s exactly right.

Smith: If you look out here today, is there anything that significantly departs from or adds to that original plan?
Frampton: Well, I think the thing he was so helpful on was the idea of the Vicar Center. Actually our company came up with the idea, as a part of the real estate development, to build a performing arts center here in the middle of the village, to activate the village, make it more lively, and certainly more diversified. But it was expensive. I forget what it cost, but it was fifteen million dollars which would be 40 or 50 million dollars today. And so we, as a developer, couldn’t afford to do all of that. We made our contribution, but we had to get private funding to do that and President Ford was incredibly influential in the raising of that fifteen million dollars. I mean, he made phone call after phone call and got behind it and stood up in public meetings, probably not unlike he did for some of the wonderful things he worked for out in the desert. But we raised that fifteen million dollars and it’s an incredible facility. I don’t know if you’ve seen it, but it’s absolutely wonderful.

Smith: Is it one large hall?

Frampton: It seats about 500 people, it’s under the ice rink, it’s phenomenal. We’ll have about 100 events every year, phenomenal artists that go there. It’s really added to the fabric of the Vail community and one of the things I know President Ford made a speech on one time. I remember the speech was how to develop an arts program where the children of the Vail Valley could have an opportunity to experience the arts center. What we did is we started an outreach program with the public schools and when we’d have an artist here, who’s maybe playing at night and we’re paying him money, we’ll often go to those artists and say, “Would you be willing to put on for ‘free’ a concert for kids during the day that afternoon?” and so forth. And, last year, we had about 6,000 children go to some event at the Velar Center. To be able to get that many kids incredible exposure to art, dance, music, theater, drama, etcetera, was pretty cool. So, there’s no question that that was something the Fords were very supportive.

Smith: And what is the population of the Vail Valley?

Frampton: The range is 40,000 living here full time. Obviously in the middle of the ski season, it goes up.
Smith: By the time you came out here, was he still skiing?

Frampton: He was still skiing. He skied a pretty good while. I can’t remember exactly how much longer, but, no, he skied in the ski season and he was good.

Smith: Did he ever say anything conversationally about the caricature - the whole Chevy Chase business?

Frampton: No, I don’t say that we ever in essence talked about that. But, you know, two observations. I mean, one, it was true, he was clumsy. He was obviously a great athlete, but he was clumsy. I mean, I probably played golf with him ten times, or 15 times, and he was a pretty good golfer, but he couldn’t get out of a sand trap. And a sand trap requires a little finesse. It’s different than hitting the ball. He’s the worst player I’ve ever seen out in the sand trap. He just could not get out. So, there was a little bit of truth to that. He was a good athlete. As you know, he swam every day at least once and sometimes twice. He obviously was a great football player at Michigan and whatever, but he was not a finesse athlete.

Smith: That’s well put. Later on, I think Mrs. Ford mastered the computer pretty early.

Frampton: Oh, he’d been terrible at it.

Smith: He could read his email, but he couldn’t respond to it.

Frampton: Oh, absolutely not. And I think another thing, sports-wise, I always got a kick out of - he was always such a Michigan sports fan. So throughout the fall when he was here - because he used to stay here through November, nothing else happened on Saturday - on Saturday afternoon, President Ford got in front of the TV to watch the Michigan Wolverines and that was a given.

Smith: And you didn’t interrupt.

Frampton: You did not interrupt, though I was lucky. I got to watch one game with him; it was one Saturday, with four of five people. It was fun.

Smith: Did he get very involved?
Frampton: Oh, yeah, he was. Absolutely. He was a fan. He could tell you all the players and the coaches and so forth, which is nice.

Smith: And I take it that they had a number of friends in the area.

Frampton: Oh, yeah, particularly some of the people that were here early, people like the Meijer’s and Pepi and Sheika and the Slifer’s and the Kelton’s. There was a whole group of people. And when you’re here early in a resort - and that would be earlier than I was here, although we got it to some degree - there’s kind of a pioneer spirit, you’re kind of all in it together.

Smith: And you had your vision vindicated over time.

Frampton: No question.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Frampton: No, but I saw Betty’s one time. We were laughing about it last night when I was talking about this interview. We have something here we call the Porsche Tea Dance and it’s held during the ski races every year. So, about 4 or 5 o’clock in the afternoon, they have this tea dance and they have, you know, coffee and tea and that kind of stuff. Well, Betty loved to dance and President Ford’s like me, he’d just as soon be shot as dance. And they were playing some song, I don’t remember what it was right now - it was a band, it was like Frank Sinatra or something - and they were sitting at the table with three or four couples and ourselves. She wanted to dance and he didn’t want to and I thought she was going to kill him right there on the spot. And she finally reached over and grabbed his arm and absolutely physically yanked him out on the dance floor. Anyway, I did see Betty mad.

Smith: You talked about his punctuality. It was a religion, punctuality, and she’s quite the opposite. Did you ever observe that?

Frampton: I’m not sure. I don’t think so.

Smith: What about his sense of humor? You told me he wasn’t a joke teller.

Frampton: I think being in that kind of position, you just have to, by nature, be a little more serious.
Smith: Did you talk politics? Contemporary events?

Frampton: We did talk politics a little bit. Not at great length. In my own particular case, I’m a moderate Democrat, but in many respects, if the Ford of the Republican Party were in power today, I’d probably be aligned much more closely with Ford and his beliefs. I mean, he was a fiscal conservative, absolutely, but on the other hand, he didn’t take it to the extreme that some groups take it today. I mean, he was pro-choice, as we know.

Smith: In my eulogy in Grand Rapids, I made reference to the fact that most of us get more conservative as we get older. Fiscally, he certainly remained a traditional, budget-balancing conservative. But when it came to a lot of social issues…you wonder whether it was partly that the party had just moved so far to the right, or whether maybe she had some impact or the children or what it was. And then I wonder, having gone through the intervention with her and the compassion that all of that entailed, whether that was a factor. I’m thinking of abortion rights or gay rights, things that you don’t associate with the conservative Republican.

Frampton: Oh, very much so. I think that’s right. And I can remember him lamenting the days when there was more collaboration and you didn’t have the poison in the air. I can remember him making a few comments about him and Tip O’Neill. That they would strongly disagree on the issues, but they would sit down, they wouldn’t personalize it, and they would look for common solutions. And I thought that was good. And he wasn’t, in my opinion, so anti-government everything. I mean, I do believe I’m right that, in his presidency, he put in the gas mileage EPA rule. I’m not sure if it was the EPA. So, he recognized that there was a role for government. In certain circumstances, it needed to be temporary or it needed to be modified because he was conservative, but he wasn’t extreme. And he also recognized that we all kind of need to work together here. I can remember him saying this - we would be more successful if government and business and people worked together in collaborative partnerships.

Smith: That says something about how the relationship with Jimmy Carter evolved. Again, if you’d done an interview with him in 1977, you’d get a very different portrait of that relationship than if you talked to him twenty years later. I’ve often wondered if one of the things that brought them together is that they both ran against Ronald Reagan.

Frampton: Could be. But Ford was somebody who wanted to get things done. He was action oriented. I mean, clearly he was a Republican, but he also just wanted to do good things for the country, where politicians, in my opinion, today are just so paranoid in preserving their own party that they lose any sense of doing some smart balancing.

Smith: I’ve also wondered whether part of the fiscal conservatism was a by-product of the Depression.

Frampton: Of course. He’s the same age as my parents. Absolutely. My mother still saves the Christmas wrappings from one year to the next as I’m sure President Ford would, too.

Smith: How do you think he handled aging?

Frampton: I think he handled it great. I don’t know about that last couple of years because we didn’t see him then, but up until then. How old was he when he passed?

Smith: He was 93.

Frampton: Then certainly through 90, he was terrific because he was coming back here. I played golf with him, which I thought was wonderful. I’m going to guess he was 89 or 90 and he wanted to play. He called and we played four or five holes. He wanted to play so bad and one of the security guys stood behind him so he could stand up. It was just unbelievable. He couldn’t stand up, yet with the assistance of this guy, we played like four or five holes. And, by the way, he was not embarrassed by that at age 89 or 90. I mean, he was glad to be out there.

Smith: We’re told he was very competitive.
Frampton: Oh, yeah. He wanted to do it. And, of course, the other thing is that he always was on top of everything. I mean, you could talk about almost any political subject. And that was really before the internet if you think about it.

Smith: Great newspaper reader.

Frampton: Oh, yeah. And he would talk every week, I know, to a lot of people whether it be former presidents or colleagues, et cetera. He was engaged.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Frampton: You know, I’m not sure that I do. No. I don’t think I do. A good man.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Frampton: That’s a wonderful question. I just think as a giver, somebody who gave a heck of a lot more than he took, whether it be with family or work or business or government or whatever. He was a giver.

Smith: That’s interesting because, you know, there was criticism of him for ‘commercializing’ the ex-presidency, which really boiled down to the fact that he went on boards. You’ve already mentioned your board in particular. Our understanding is that he took the same attitude toward all the boards that he was associated with. I mean, he was never window dressing.

Frampton: Wouldn’t everyone want to make some money for his family or his kids? Let’s not begrudge that. I mean, he made some. He certainly didn’t get rich, super rich, but he was good. But he wasn’t preoccupied with that. I mean, we were a volunteer board and he’d go talk to the kids at the school. He may have been on the American Express board for a long time and I remember he was on the Travelers’ board. But all that time, he was leading a balanced life.

Smith: And that’s what didn’t get covered.

Frampton: Right.

Smith: The campuses he visited. The charity work that he did.

Frampton: Exactly.
Smith: And, again, he and Jimmy Carter, one of the things that brought them together was the fact that both had to raise the money to build their presidential libraries. For him, that was something like fifteen million dollars, which doesn’t seem like much now, but to him it was pretty daunting at the time.

Frampton: A staggering amount of money.

Smith: Absolutely. For someone who had never spent much on a congressional campaign, he really had nothing to compare it with.

Frampton: Right. Interesting.

Smith: She had a lot of friends.

Frampton: Oh, yeah, I think one of the great things she did was the Alpine Gardens here.

Smith: We went yesterday. Very Impressive. What were the origins of that?

Frampton: You know, I’m not sure I quite know to be honest.

Smith: Did it start before you arrived?

Frampton: No, I just don’t know how it began. A wonderful lady I knew, Helen Fitch, and Betty were close friends and, a landscape architect, Marty Jones -I don’t know whose idea it was at first - but they were all there very early. She loved flowers. Flowers that are housed here are always gorgeous in the summertime. She used to go out there on Saturdays and pull weeds.

Smith: Really?

Frampton: Right, in addition to doing some fundraisers. But she worked like everybody else.

Smith: That’s great.

Frampton: Yeah, that was very nice.

Smith: And I take it there were people here, some of them have said as much to us, who had occasion to avail themselves of the Betty Ford Center.

Frampton: Oh, yeah, absolutely, throughout the community.
I’ll tell you another cute story about the Ford’s, a fun one. He had called one time and said he wanted to go play golf in Steamboat which is an hour away. And he said, “I’ve been playing golf a lot in Vail and I’ve heard Steamboat’s a really pretty place. I’d like to go there and play golf.” So we set up a trip with four couples. We got a bus and the idea is we would leave here in the morning at 8 o’clock or whatever, go over there and the spouses would go into downtown Steamboat and shop and have lunch for a couple of hours while the four guys would play golf, and then get back together and come back. He said he wanted to go and who he wanted to go and I called the other two couples. We were all set up. Sadly, I got the flu the day before, so what I’m now telling you is secondhand. I’m crushed that I didn’t get to go, but I’m pretty sure it’s true.

That night was the night of Desert Storm, the night before the golf trip. Of course, it was the first war that was really ever covered live by CNN and everybody was glued to their TV sets. But the next morning the group headed to Steamboat on the bus, a very simple old bus, and they got to a little town between here and there called Yampa. I mean, Yampa is a crossroads - if fifty or a hundred people live in Yampa, I’m surprised - and there’s one bar downtown. They get to Yampa on the way to golf and the bus breaks down. They have a couple of Secret Service guys there, too.

So, the four couples walk into this very grungy bar at 8 or 9 o’clock in the morning and it’s really grungy and there are one or two guys in there. They walk into the bar and there’s nobody there, but there’s a TV going on and it’s CNN covering the Gulf War. There’s a bartender there, of course. So, they all sit down and they get coffee or food or whatever and, of course, the bartender immediately comes over to start asking President Ford all these questions about the Gulf War, I mean, ‘Should we?’, ‘Should we not?’, this, that, and the other. Of course, this bartender had been up all night long and he knew a lot and was just absolutely right. Well, they had to bring another bus which would take about an hour and, from what I understand, about the time the other bus got there, there were about fifty people that had come to the restaurant because word had spread throughout the community that a former president was in there and he was answering questions about the Gulf War. Anyway, I don’t know if you want that on tape, but it’s a great little story.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of reaction when he passed away? He’d been out of the public eye awhile, but it was really significant and it seemed to build as the week went on.

Frampton: Well, I think we were all surprised in some respects and then we weren’t surprised. If you took time to think about it, it was amazing how many people from here went to the service out in Palm Springs and then we went to the National Cathedral and it was an outpouring. I think maybe if you think back about it, it was a little bit of nostalgia and that politics has gotten so darned ugly now and so unpleasant. I just really hate it. If Ford represented anything, it would be a little bit more civility. Maybe people longed for that a little bit.

Smith: I think there’s a lot of truth in that and I think there’s a whole generation that were being introduced to him for the first time, they were watching these old film clips, and comparing it with the ugliness of contemporary politics. And it was right at the time the country needed to feel good about itself.

Frampton: Yeah, no question. That’s a good point.

Smith: What’s the future of this place?

Frampton: Well, I think, Vail will continue to do great. A lot of the reason why is because of the good foundation work Ford and others did here. It’s pretty much built out now, but as long as we have great skiing and 80 degree weather and no humidity, we’ll do fine.

Smith: You have a lot of elements going for you.

Frampton: Exactly.

Smith: Obviously, I’d love to talk to you about August of 1974, but, did you have any contact with Congressman Ford before he became vice president?

Thomas: No, not really. Only to the extent that he would come to the White House in the Nixon era, and would brief us on meetings - brief us to let us know what had happened. Yes, from that aspect, yes. But I really didn’t know him.

Smith: Were you surprised when he was nominated to be vice president, or was it really, as we understand it, that basically Congress said, this is the one guy who we’ll confirm?

Thomas: I can’t remember whether I was surprised, but I understood that he would be part of the club, and that I think that he would do the right thing for them.

Smith: What was different about Congress in those days? Because we hear about this bipartisanship and the civility, and yet that wasn’t exactly an era of good feeling – in the 60s and 70s.

Thomas: Well, I think everybody liked President Ford, or Congressman Ford, or whatever. They liked him. They didn’t feel that he was venal as some of the others later became. And as much as he fought for his own party, he still wasn’t mean spirited, so I think that everyone liked him, Jerry. You really did have a feeling that he was not so partisan and vindictive.

Smith: Was it a different culture on Capitol Hill in those days? Let me give you one example: in those days you had two parties that each had a liberal wing and conservative wing.

Thomas: That’s true.

Smith: Which meant, presumably, that you had to – even within your own caucus – you had to have some experience in dealing with people with whom you were ideologically in disagreement. Which was good preparation.
Thomas: I think there was much more of a sense of politics as the art of compromise. You definitely had that feeling that, except for maybe the southerners on the issues of civil rights and so forth, who were really off the deep end - Bill Bole(?), and so forth. But I think definitely you had the sense of… Bipartisanship was carried to the hilt later on with Reagan and so forth. I mean, that bipartisanship-partisanship.

Smith: When did you first decide that Richard Nixon was going to have to resign?

Thomas: In October, ’73. My office was sending me with Henry Kissinger for the next flare up in the Middle East, and Kissinger was going there as a mediator. And even though he denied he had any role or any plan, of course he did. We went to Israel, we went to Saudi Arabia, and so forth, and Kissinger in his usual candid, credible way, told us no, he had no plan or anything. When we left Israel all the Israel radio had the whole plan laid out, so, it caught up with him.

But it was a great opportunity to cover a story and go to the Middle East, but I told all my friends I couldn’t say no to my boss to take a trip like that. But I said, I want to be here, because Nixon is going to have to resign. I wasn’t so intuitive it was all laid out really. So I really didn’t want to go, and then I thought: well, Kissinger has to accept the resignation under our…at least I’ll be part of act. And the first thing, I got on the plane with Kissinger and I said, “Is Nixon going to resign?” He said, “What? What are you saying?” in his lovely accent. You could never mistake this man. But anyway, so I definitely had the feeling that he was finished.

Smith: It’s funny, your timing is perfect because, of course, it was in October when Agnew resigned, and then came the Saturday Night Massacre. And this trip was after the Saturday Night Massacre.

Thomas: That’s right.

Smith: What are your memories of the Saturday Night Massacre? Did it feel like a Constitutional crisis was enveloping the country?
Thomas: Yes, it did. And it was a Saturday night and everybody was off to different banquets and so forth, and it struck the whole town. It was shocking. I think you have to call it trauma. It was a political, traumatic moment. Might be also moments of courage when you had people standing up against it.

Smith: Maybe you could take a minute – for people who didn’t live through Watergate, for whom it’s just in a textbook, and they don’t know what it was all about – can you encapsulate what the offense was or offenses that go by the name of Watergate?

Thomas: Well, I think you had great moments of courage in terms of Cox turning down business, and then, of course, Nixon had his friends who were willing to take over the Justice Department, but you definitely felt an emptiness, a tragedy. All of these things, because it wasn’t us. These things don’t happen in America. I really think that it showed how bereft Nixon was, and how he was on the ropes.

Smith: And how did he look at that time? How did he conduct himself?

Thomas: He began to look like dead man walking. You could tell that he was very, very upset and I was with him when he had gone to the hospital. We were covering him there, and then when he came back in the Rose Garden. He had a real flare up of, what did he say…

Smith: Wasn’t he in the hospital when the tapes were revealed? Remember, one of his trips to the hospital…

Thomas: That’s when he realized that…

Smith: That the taping system was revealed.

Thomas: But when he came back to the Rose Garden, he said something very classic, that he wasn’t going to wallow in Watergate and so forth. But we knew how upset he was and the whole family, and he said this to reporters and the cameramen, because those were the only ones in the Rose Garden. I think everyone knew that it was almost over by this time.

Smith: And could you see that with the family’s behavior at the time?
Thomas: Yes.

Smith: Did Mrs. Nixon ever say anything to indicate that she, for example, understood the seriousness of the situation.

Thomas: You could see that she knew a lot in terms of the pain of the whole thing, and resented it, of course. But also she showed that she loved her husband. We asked her questions that probably no other First Lady would answer, because she really stuck by her husband. It must have been very painful because we didn’t let up on her at all. And I’ll always regret that I didn’t write her a note or something to say how much I admired her. She was a real human being, a great human being, and not a Plastic Pat, as they tried to send her off. I was in a dilemma of saying, well if I write a personal note to her, as a reporter, it might compromise me. But I should have done it, and I’ll regret it all my life, because she was so nice. She was a wonderful lady.

Smith: We did an interview with Lucy Winchester, her social secretary, and discovered she had a marvelous sense of humor. And occasionally a ribald sense of humor. Lucy told the story about – they’d just come back from their first trip to Europe – and someone on Haldeman’s staff, thinking it was the height of sophistication, had picked up in Paris an inflatable female doll – a sex toy – and brought it back. Lucy found out about it and thought it would be a riot to inflate it. She told Mrs. Nixon, who thought it would be equally funny, and it turned out the President had invited the DAR over to the White House that day – upstairs to see…so Mrs. Nixon and Lucy Winchester are walking down the west hall, walking hand in hand with this blown up doll, deciding where to put it. And they finally put it in the Queen’s Bedroom. Which again, is not what you’d thought of as Pat Nixon in public.

Thomas: No, she’s very bright, but she also had learned in the years of politics that the quieter you are, the better off you are.

Smith: Do you think she disliked the political life?

Thomas: She disliked the pain that she went through in 1960, and then she didn’t want him to run again. She played a very low-key part in ’68. She was along, but that’s it. Because in 1960 they ran her as Pat for First Lady, and the rejection, or his failure to win, she felt that very personally. So she was rejected. So that was very hard for her. And after that she went into a real solitude – almost seemed to reject everything. But I ran into her once during that in between interregnum and it was in New York City and she was taking her two daughters, young daughters to a museum on a bus. She seemed to be having the time of her life – free at last from all those things. That’s why I think she really enjoyed New York and she enjoyed the freedom from…and he runs again.

Smith: Did you have a sense of what the relationship was between Nixon and Ford. Because there are all these stories that clearly indicate that Ford wasn’t his first choice for vice president. And there are stories to the effect that he regarded Ford as his insurance policy against being impeached - that they would never go ahead and get rid of him because it would mean Jerry Ford…which was a real misreading of Congress. But, does that dovetail with what your sense was of the relationship?

Thomas: I think that the Fords were never invited to the family private quarters which was shocking. I’m sorry – the Fords were never invited to the Nixon – so you didn’t feel any closeness at all. Empathy, maybe, for everybody’s suffering, but not close.

Smith: And Ford was on a tightrope. He was in this very awkward position where, on the one hand he had to be defending the president; and on the other, he couldn’t defend him to the point of losing his own credibility. Because, no one wanted to admit it, but, let’s face it, he could find himself…

Thomas: Well, he was on the road promoting Nixon, and yet at the same time getting the truth – that it wasn’t going to hold. That Nixon was going to have to go, he was getting that word assuredly. So I think he was in a dilemma.

Smith: You think he knew before the first of August, and I don’t mean the specific of the tapes or anything like that, but the historical account has always been, Haig called him at the beginning of August, told him about the smoking gun. They realized they were never going to live in the vice president’s house and all that. All of which I think is true, but do you think that someone with his political experience and instincts and contacts, do you think that’s when he really first thought he might be president? Or he might have surmised earlier?

Thomas: I think he knew. He knew enough politics to know whether you can survive the storm or not. I think he definitely knew that Nixon couldn’t hold on. I’m sure.

Smith: For people who weren’t around, those last days in the Nixon presidency, what was the mood like in the White House and in this city?

Thomas: It was darkness at noon. It was inevitable. As inexorable as a Greek tragedy. Nothing he could do could put Humpty-Dumpty back together again. He was holding different – his people, the PR people, were doing the best they could in every way. They were having sessions with reporters and so forth.

Smith: Really? Was he, himself, available?

Thomas: Not in that respect.

Smith: What was the message they were trying to communicate to you? That it was business as usual and he was going to just keep on being president?

Thomas: That’s what his message was. He was not going to…President Clinton was asked outright whether he was going to resign when this Monica Lewinski thing came up, but no one asked Nixon that. But it was there like a dark cloud. It was, as I say, it was like going to a Greek tragedy and you know that everything was going to be doomed at the end.

Smith: For example: the tape, the smoking gun tape. Did that take the press by surprise? Was there any advance notice – any leaks, any reporting that indicated that there was, in fact, in these tapes something that might terminate the Nixon presidency?

Thomas: Well, you began to get the idea that something was terribly wrong. Nothing parsed. And the Post, by this time, had eighteen reporters on the story. So did the New York Times. It was relentless. Every day you picked up another paper and steps that showed that there was no way out. It was closing in on him.
Smith: And the night that he resigned. Do you remember when you heard that he was actually going to go? During the day, or did you know before? It was a Thursday night that he made the speech to the country, Thursday night, the 8th of August.

Thomas: I was on some sort of program in Virginia and I was rushing back for the speech. I came in through another gateway, not the usual northwest gate, but the back of the White House. I was running and I ran into President Nixon, who had come across from his office in the EOB, and he looked pretty haggard. I said, “Good luck, Mr. President.” By this time I knew it was fatal. And he said to me, “If you’ve ever prayed before, pray for me.” And then I went into the press office and then he claimed that everything was in the transcript and so forth, and it was doomsday the night before we knew.

Smith: So then you have a new president. Take us through that rollercoaster. On the morning of the 9th, when first you have Nixon’s farewell, and then two hours later you have, in the same room, you reboot the country. Were you in the White House for the Nixon farewell?

Thomas: Yes. And I was in the East Room for both things. “Our long national nightmare…”

Smith: Describe those.

Thomas: I thought that it was so poignant with Nixon delivering his swansong and his wife standing next to him, and the girls, tears coming down their faces when he…and he didn’t even mention Pat. Everybody noticed that. He talked about his sacred mother and so forth. So, I didn’t fault him for that because how can think of everything, and there she is with you.

Smith: He said afterwards that he couldn’t have gotten through it if he had mentioned Pat.

Thomas: I believe that. I think that’s true. And then, of course, he quoted Teddy Roosevelt, “Pick yourself up, dust yourself off…” and a lot of presidents have quoted that, too, including this one. Dusting yourself off. But the whole front row of the staffers were crying. It was tremendous in history.
Smith: Did you think: there has never been a day before like this in American history, and hopefully there will never another?

Thomas: That’s right. The same thing. And, of course, there had never been a day like Kennedy’s assassination, and LBJ being sworn in on Air Force One. So these things do happen, and you’ve got to be ready for the big shock.

Smith: The mood, I assume, was very different a couple of hours later? Obviously, it still must have been very somber, the mood in the East Room when…

Thomas: I didn’t see any jubilation or anything. But solemnity and very somber in the sense that you felt very sorry for the Nixons waving goodbye and so forth. Really realizing what they must be feeling, and then the Fords saw them to the South Lawn. I don’t think you had any great sense of exuberation.

Smith: Mrs. Ford said it was the worst day of her life, afterwards. I think on multiple levels, because they were friends, they’d been friends, but also because I don’t think…

Thomas: Ford always looked like he was going to cry. He had that kind of face that…

Smith: And, also, I don’t think she wanted to move into the White House. I don’t think she wanted to be First Lady.

Thomas: No. We went to pick them up the next day at his home and he was doing his own English muffins, and toasting it. It was the one colorful piece we had on him - makes his own breakfast.

Smith: I think anyone knowing Mrs. Ford - he’d probably been making his own breakfast for years. I don’t think he did it for your benefit.

Thomas: It was the same routine. That’s right. Everyone liked President Ford, the man. Not just a nice guy, but a regular guy. And he wasn’t the new guy on the block. We had seen him so much, and we knew him. He was Jerry to most people.

Smith: Was there a different atmosphere in the press room after that – just in terms of the relationship with the…
Thomas: Yes. We thought a big cloud had been lifted because it was darkness at noon for six months. It was sad when he left us all in – he didn’t, but whatever or whoever saw to it, so that he could take his last walk around the grounds. We were locked in the press room. We couldn’t come, we couldn’t go, we were detained, we thought there was another coupe de tat or something.

Smith: Was that on the morning of the 9th - the morning of the departure?

Thomas: No, I’m not sure.

Smith: Tell me about Jerry terHorst. Who was he?

Thomas: He was the greatest press secretary the White House has ever known, in my White House.

Smith: For not very long though, was it?

Thomas: He was honest and he had the highest integrity when he left because there are certain things, certain press secretaries, when they leave their jobs, they go right to kiss and tell books. But their moment of greatness is not at a time when it should be which is, you can’t, you’re not going to do this. You’re not going to say this. You’re not going to tolerate something that goes against your sense of honesty and integrity. I always say in my speeches that Jerry terHorst was the best. He lasted one day almost – just a few days.

Smith: What made him the best?

Thomas: Because he resigned when his own integrity had been really assaulted, he felt. A couple of reporters, one for the Miami News, and I think the New York Times, had come to him on Friday and told him that they understood that President Ford had sent an emissary to San Clemente to pardon, to issue a pardon for President Nixon. Well, Jerry went to Phil Buchen, who was counsel, and Buchen denied it, and I guess he was told to keep it totally secret. Anyway, so Jerry came out and told the reporters, “Nothing to it.” Didn’t say preposterous as they always used to say, but something to that.

And then, I guess, the next day, it was Saturday and he was told the whole thing and told the truth, and he decided to resign. But he felt, personally, that he had lied to reporters and that just absolutely went against the grain. But he stayed in office until that Sunday, but he quit by the end of the day. And I remember that Sunday, I was wire service so you’re always on the body watch, and President Ford decided to go to church – St. John’s across Lafayette Park at eight o’clock mass or service. So we usually go into the church when he’s in, but this time we didn’t and we were waiting outside and President Ford came out of the church and I said, “Mr. President, what are you doing for the rest of the day?” Because we wanted to go home and sleep. And he said, “Well, I’m going to have an announcement pretty soon.” So the AP man and I raced across Lafayette Park and went toward the press room in the White House and told, I can’t even remember saying it, but I was told that I told my office that President Nixon was going to resign.

Smith: Was going to be pardoned?

Thomas: Was going to be pardoned, yeah, I’m sorry. There was something in Ford’s voice and whatever. And I said, “It’s not official or anything else, but I’m saying this.” So, sure enough, in an hour or so, around ten o’clock I think it was, we went into the Oval Office as a pool of reporters and President Ford announced the pardon. Full and complete and whatever the wording was, pardon of Nixon. Well, you know we ran out of the press office, but he didn’t have TV on. They just brought in the still photographers, which was – I don’t blame them in that respect. Of course a lot of America would have been sleeping at that time. But anyway, it was…

Smith: And what was the reaction?

Thomas: My reaction?

Smith: And those around you. Yours and the country’s.

Thomas: I wasn’t too shocked.

Smith: Did the timing surprise you?

Thomas: Yes, the timing did, because I thought one month – because it indicated a deal. I mean, you definitely had this feeling that Nixon was given a pass. And I’m sure he was and we weren’t aware, but I was positive that the family had been calling – the Nixon family had been calling President Ford. And Nixon was also very, very worried. We understood that he was maybe having to go to district jail or something, and it was a horrifying thought. So, I think that a lot in the country didn’t agree with the pardon at all. It isn’t that they wanted revenge, it’s just that I think they felt that an ordinary, so-called, criminal would have gotten less.

Smith: What do you say to the argument that, say Ford hadn’t pardoned Nixon, and – well, you had to have been there because he talked about the first press conference. I think it was the 28th of August – it was right at the end of August, and he went in there, I think maybe naively, because he could be naïve sometimes. Didn’t he have this, almost sense of, innocence about him.

Thomas: You always felt he was innocent of everything. And you always felt that his staff were the ones that were more diabolical.

Smith: But he went into this press conference believing that people would want to talk about inflation and the economy and the Middle East, and that’s not what you wanted to talk about, was it?

Thomas: No.

Smith: What did you want to talk about?

Thomas: And he didn’t want to tell the truth, that he felt sorry for Nixon. I think that was it.

Smith: His recollection of that press conference was that it was taken up with questions about Richard Nixon. Nixon’s papers, and Nixon’s…

Thomas: Absolutely. We were totally dominated by it. I asked him whether he was going to go the judicial route, or whether he was going to pardon him. And I got this very fuzzy answer.

Smith: He left that press conference angry. And I think it was anger partly at the press corps for obsessing about Nixon, and maybe a little bit of anger directed at himself for naively believing that it wouldn’t be about Nixon.

Thomas: That it wouldn’t be, yeah.
Smith: But, that said. If he hadn’t pardoned Nixon, the other side of the coin is, that preoccupation would have continued. The country’s obsession with Nixon and supposedly Jaworski was telling him that it could be up to two years before a trial began, assuming you could get a fair trial in the District of Columbia, etc., etc.

In retrospect, do you think the pardon was necessary? Lots of people, obviously changed their mind from their initial reaction. What would have been the consequences of not pardoning Nixon, of letting the legal process play itself out?

Thomas: I think it would have hung over the White House, no question about it. And I didn’t agree with the pardon at the time, but time is a great healer. I think everybody softens their attitude in terms of, was it right or was it wrong? Life goes on and you pass on. I thought that he moved too fast and he left a question mark in the minds of most of the public that the fix was in. That there was a deal, which he had to deny often, early and often.

Smith: You know when he said when the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles in Courage Award, he said, after – he’d been answering that question for twenty-five years. He said, “No one asked the question anymore.” Because it was the Kennedy’s, in effect, putting the seal of approval on what he had done. It just transformed the atmosphere.

Thomas: We never got the whole truth. The American people never get the truth. Every commission that has investigated, like the Kennedy assassination, everything else – the people involved in these commissions, they go a certain point, they learn a certain truth and they refuse to make it public. Certainly on 9/11, I mean there are so many questions. The president was warned, almost to the moment, in the sense of who’s going to do 9/11 and he didn’t act on anything. And everything else. And Oswald.

Smith: Did you ever talk with Ford about the Warren Commission?

Thomas: No, and I wish I had. I wish I had because I think that nobody wanted to step up to the plate. Because I think maybe they think they are saving the country
– I don’t think that. I think, to leave all these question marks in history, especially when they come close to the truth and they step away…

Smith: What would be an alternative theory that you think at least is plausible? Do you think the Cuban connection, or the Mafia connection, or some combination of the two?

Thomas: Either of those, but they should have laid it on the line. I think that history is painful, but I think that we should not be denied. Because that’s always my question: “why?”

Smith: So you think that we, even now, don’t have the full story of what happened leading up to the Kennedy assassination?

Thomas: I don’t think we have the full story at all. I think Oswald did it, but I think there were forces…for example: Ruby. Why would Ruby be tipped off that Oswald was going to come through the police library in Dallas, the exact timing, have a loaded gun, sandwiches for the police – bribing them with a sandwich – and shoot him. They say the alleged excuse was he felt sorry for Jackie. Give me a break! He was in custody, going in for his first major interrogation. No, doesn’t parse. Not that anything makes sense.

Smith: Speaking of assassination attempts, of course there were two on President Ford. Were you present for either of those? The two assassination attempts on Ford in California?

Thomas: I was there on one.

Smith: The first one was in Sacramento, at the state capital.

Thomas: I wasn’t in Sacramento.

Smith: And then in San Francisco.

Thomas: Yeah, San Francisco. That was shocking. I thought nobody would want to assassinate President Ford. He’s a nice guy, he hadn’t hurt anybody. No, it was a shock. These were real aberrations – it’s like Hinkley – just out of the blue, for no reason that makes sense. No logic. It wasn’t revenge or anything that you could really…
Smith: Was there a different mood? When the Nixons left the White House, was there just a different mood around the place?

Thomas: Oh, yes, definitely. A big sigh of relief because we had been living with this day to day and there was a lot of obvious suffering.

Smith: Was it more open, or relaxing, relatively speaking? How was it different? Ford was clearly someone comfortable with himself, so there wasn’t this melodrama surrounding.

Thomas: Yeah, we were more comfortable with Ford, obviously. Nixon was not a people person, except if he was addressing a crowd of three thousand. But one on one he was, “Do you like my shoes?” “Do you like my cufflinks?” Anything for no small talk.

Smith: Or very small talk.

Thomas: It seemed so awkward. I think he was very reserved, very shy in a way.

Smith: Remember, he famously described himself as an introvert in an extrovert’s profession.

Thomas: Is that right?

Smith: Which suggests self-knowledge.

Thomas: That’s right. No, he had those moments when you were never quite sure…

Smith: And tell me about Mrs. Ford. Did you know she had a problem when she was in the White House?

Thomas: No, I didn’t know of any problem on drugs or alcohol or anything. I thought she was fabulous. Honest.

Smith: Tell me about her.

Thomas: Well, it’s a question of what can you say after you say you’re sorry? She was not afraid of the truth and I think she believed that if you told the truth, people would certainly accept it, and not pre-judge or judge. She called them as she saw them. I loved her for that aspect. You asked her a question, she gave you the answer. It was fabulous.

Smith: But controversial in some quarters.

Thomas: She wasn’t afraid to say she had been divorced, or seeing a psychiatrist, it was just normal life. And yet, for every other First Lady, it was…

A couple of reporters and I were at a tea with Mrs. Nixon and they were passing around sherry, and we saw Mrs. Nixon reach for the sherry, and then pull back. We said, “Take it, we won’t write about it.” It was one of those – in those days women – it was different. Betty Ford wasn’t afraid of anything. Or at least you had this impression. She was so straight and honest. Ask her a question, she gave you an answer.

Smith: Of course, the famous Sixty Minutes interview got her in all sorts of hot water.

Thomas: I wouldn’t be a bit surprised.

Smith: What if Susan had an affair, talked about marijuana. Now, in the White House, I assume, I’ve been told, that all the political staff sort of gasped. That they saw her at that point as a real political detriment, and it was only later, to their astonishment, that the polls came in and discovered that, except for some conservative Republicans who were probably going to vote for Reagan, anyway, that she was an asset.

Thomas: Very candid. But, I think Ford told her, “You lost me 150,000 votes.”

Smith: But it didn’t shut her up, did it?

Thomas: She gave an honest answer, I wouldn’t be a bit surprised what she said.

Smith: Did you see much of her while they were in the White House – did she have much contact with the press?

Thomas: We did. We were allowed to cover things and she was always very kind.

Smith: Did she seem happy to you?
Thomas: Yes. Not jumping up and down, but I think she definitely felt at home and nothing went to her head. She took us all in stride. I’m relating to how she dealt with the press.

Smith: And the kids?

Thomas: They were normal. They were teenage, and I’m sure they gave their family some moments – parents, I mean.

Smith: Vietnam and the fall of Saigon. You are in the middle of that story. Tell me about the mood. First of all, there apparently was a real raging debate going on in the Oval Office about how frank we should be in acknowledging that this is the end. What is your recollection of the days surrounding it?

Thomas: My recollection is being at Andrews Air Force Base – there’s a big picture of that. We were running after Ford, and he didn’t want to say. So we were trying to get a quote from him on the fall of Saigon and so forth. I said, “Why is he running away. Why doesn’t he just stand here and say, “Yes, it’s all over. Hurray.”

Smith: I’ve seen the film, there’s a smile on his face. It is sort of almost a cat and mouse.

Thomas: Yeah, that’s true, but also, I think that America doesn’t lose anything. And that was not a big victory, it was a total defeat and it left a lot of bad feelings, I think. It had Reagan and everyone calling it a noble cause every five minutes. I said, what noble cause? It certainly was not a noble cause and we were defeated. So the Vietnam syndrome of trying to get rid of…so I thought that President Ford felt that it was not a great honor for the country.

Smith: He said it was the most humiliating experience of his life – to be in the Oval Office and watch.

Thomas: He’d been in the Navy and so forth, and I think you have a different sense about what you fight for.

Smith: What was his historical role? Was it to clean up the messes left by his predecessors?
Thomas: I think there was a lot in the past that you had to get rid of, and there was no formula for doing it. How he faced this, what do you? How do you tell the American people it’s over, but it’s not a big raving victory. So I think there were touchy moments. No question. And on the resignation, the pardon, the same thing. He couldn’t say, “I felt sorry President Nixon.” You can’t say that.

Smith: Plus, let’s face it, he had a rough economy. It was turning around by the time he left and I think one of the things he always regretted was, obviously, and one regret they don’t get a second term.

Thomas: He had a lot of touchy moments, he really did.

Smith: Do you think the pardon, in the end, is what cost him the re-election? Or the economy?

Thomas: I think the pardon hurt him a lot. Because, as I say, people thought – I don’t know, I can’t speak, I shouldn’t say people thought – but I do say that a lot of people thought that a deal was made. And that rubs you the wrong way, even if it was a sympathetic move. Things were not going well. I think that President Ford made a big mistake when he said he was going to do the same thing that Nixon had done in terms of the domestic policy and everything else. And people said, “What is this?”

Smith: Of course, eventually, he got himself a cabinet of his own with some very good people. A lot of people look at that cabinet, once it was remade, and they say, if nothing else, here’s a guy who is secure enough in himself to surround himself with some high power egos and intellects.

Thomas: That’s true. But I don’t think people really knew him. He didn’t have time enough, and he should have had Jerry terHorst and not some of the successors. I don’t think they understood him, but Jerry did. And he would have helped him help everybody. He’d been a newsman twenty-nine years for Michigan and Washington, and so would have known how to handle things. I think that constant Ford falling…
Smith: The story that no one ever knew. When he fell down those steps in Vienna, in the rain, he was holding the umbrella for Mrs. Ford and he slipped and everything, and falls. And the people around him, the sycophants, were all berating the press and the photographers for taking the picture. And he said, “Of course they took the picture. If they hadn’t they would have lost their job.”

Thomas: That shows you how honest a man he is. Very good.

Smith: I don’t think Lyndon Johnson would have said that.

Thomas: No.

Smith: You saw him after he left office. You saw him on a number of occasions. I know you were out at a conference that we did out in Ann Arbor.

Thomas: Yes, he was very nice. We were like old friends, then. In fact, I saw him at the convention before he collapsed and he gave me a big hug and he seemed in good spirits and seemed to be fine.

Smith: He actually liked reporters.

Thomas: Because he teased them a lot, too. I think he did like reporters. Because we liked him – he knew that. There was a feedback there. You couldn’t dislike President Ford.

Smith: It is no accident there was a journalist among the eulogists at the cathedral. It was originally going to be Hugh Sidey and then he died. So it was Tom Brokaw.

Thomas: Oh, that’s how it happened.

Smith: Yeah. Were you surprised at all by the reaction – that there was as much reaction when he died. You’d see these streets lined with a lot of young people who weren’t even alive when he was in the White House.

Thomas: I think there was definitely a sense of loss because he behaved – he didn’t overstep the line in any way and he was very respectful, and I remember once calling him about President Bush, because I was very unhappy with the moves that he was making.

Smith: Bush ’43? The current President Bush?

Thomas: Bush ’43, yes. Especially the curbing of civil rights and torture, secret prisons. Well, I called President Ford, but it wasn’t on that subject, except that I got into it. And he got very angry with me because he knew I was trying to lead him down the garden path, you know. He felt very personally angry that I would even touch on such subjects and try to diminish him in the eyes of President Bush. So our encounter was not very happy, but I thought I would be very remiss if I didn’t question him on these moves – the things that were happening to the country.

Smith: Do you think it was difficult for him having Rumsfeld and Cheney and O’Neill – his people?

Thomas: They were his people, but he loved them. He really thought they were stalwart and just very good. Cheney had his respect and so forth. I think that they were different then. It’s unbelievable. Cheney, very, very quiet. He’d move around – you never had any sense about him at all until he became a Congressman and voted against Head Start six times. I thought, “Who is this man? I can’t believe it.” And then of course, when he went into the White House, he was really diabolical. Operated behind the scenes. He was right hand in glove with the neo-conservatives on all things.

Smith: And Gerald Ford was no neo-conservative.

Thomas: No, not at all. And he certainly was a man you could deal with in a bipartisan way and many things. I think he put the country first.

Smith: That’s the perfect note on which to end.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this. Mrs. Ford’s been told and is very appreciative of your willingness to talk to us.

Haller: A great lady. A great lady.

Smith: Why is she a great lady?

Haller: Because she respected everybody. For instance, for me, she let me do my thing. She knew I was a professional and as a matter of fact she is the only First Lady actually who gave me several recipes like the one for the rib roast the way she wanted it done. Things like that. And beef stew with walnuts. That I had to do, and that was her recipe. She was a great lady. I mean, I never hear her make any complaints. She might have made some suggestions about food, but that’s it. The President, he was great. I mean, he had a great appetite.

Smith: Did he?

Haller: He'd swim every evening and he kept trim. He’d go outside and swim every night. He was a great guy. So were the kids. Michael, I didn’t see him too often. I think he is a minister. And then there was Jack and then there was Steve. They were great people. One time, when they were there about a year, Jack told me, “Chef, you know, I’m here and I’ve never had a bad meal.” I said, “You’re never going to get one. It’s not happening.” I mean, I was at peace with these people.

Smith: That’s interesting you say that, because of all the families that have lived in the White House, they’re the ones who never expected, never aspired to live there. Did that make them in some ways different?

Haller: Oh, absolutely. They didn’t have the pressure like other presidents had because a lot of presidents, when they have the election or before the election
Smith: Let me go back a little bit. Tell us a little bit about yourself before the Fords entered your life. You obviously had been at the White House for some time.

Haller: Yeah, twenty-one years.

Smith: Twenty-one years. And how did that begin?

Haller: I emigrated from Switzerland. After World War II, the United States, the prestige they had in Europe was unbelievable. I mean, they got rid of Hitler. I was in the Swiss Army and didn’t have to fight, fortunately. And then made an apprenticeship and I spent another six years in Switzerland to perfect my skills, all in 5-star hotels. And then, in Bern, the capital of Switzerland, a hotel owner gave me a chance to go to Canada. I wanted to go to Canada and then the United States. So I went to Montreal and worked there for three years at the Ritz Carlton Hotel and then I came to the United States. And then I worked in some fine hotels like the Hotel Hampshire House in Central Park South and then again Park Avenue at the Sheraton East Hotel that was also a 5-star hotel. But at the Hotel Hampshire House, there were people like John Wayne, Bob Hope, and Lucille Ball. They all had apartments there. So that was a great job for a so-called Executive Chef.

Then I went over to Park Avenue, a bigger job. That was in the 60’s, and I worked there for four years. And then I got a phone call. I had made myself a name in New York about being a good chef, so I got a phone call from Mrs. Johnson saying that they’re looking for a chef and asking me if I’d be interested in the job. I said I would be because I thought the prestige and, hey, it’s the tops. So January 1st or something like that, I went to Washington. I was interviewed by Mrs. Johnson. Very, very nice lady. I spent there at least an hour and she told me to please the president is not easy and I said I’d find that out later. And then there were ladies in the background, you know, sitting there and looking at me and probably after they were talking, “What do you think about him?”

Smith: Did she talk about their preferences in food?
Haller: Yes, she did talk about food and she wanted to know if I’d be flexible. Not only French cuisine. Whatever they wanted, that’s what they’re going to get.

Smith: Including barbecue?

Haller: Well, at that time, they used to have a Barbecue King, they called him. They brought him from Texas and he, the Barbecue King, I saw was excellent, absolutely excellent. Barbecued small ribs and he did absolutely a fine job, so I didn’t have to do that. On top of it, President Johnson had the battle of the bulge and doctors told him he has to go on a diet. He had to watch his diet. That’s what it was.

But one time, one evening, we had dinner and it was roast beef on a Sunday night and I had so-called pole beans from Florida and I saw there were too many strings on there, but I served them anyway. I couldn’t do anything else. So, the butler came out and served the dinner and he said, “The President wants to see you.” So I went in and I said, “This doesn’t sound good.” And he had the strings of the beans in his hand and he gave them to me and he said, “I give you the strings because I don’t have time to take them off next time.” I put them in my pocket. And the First Lady and Lucy were there and they were raving about the dinner. It was just before the wedding, before Lucy got married, so they didn’t want the chef to leave without telling them. I wouldn’t do things like that. I mean, the President was right, but he was very polite, he called me “Mr. Haller.” He could’ve called me something else, you know.

Smith: He loved tapioca pudding, right?

Haller: You had to have it ready all the time. There was a guy that used to be a Navy chef. He was the breakfast and lunch cook and he always made the tapioca pudding because he knew how to do it right. We always had that. Absolutely. If he wanted tapioca pudding and there wasn’t any tapioca pudding, he really would so-called raise hell, but it never happened. Never happened.

Smith: Now you had another wedding, of course, in the Nixon White House.
Haller: I had Lucy and then Linda. Two weddings. And then there was Patricia. That was during the Nixons, yeah, had another wedding. By the third one, I knew what I was doing. Always, every time, 600 people. And they used to call them hors d'oeuvre, in other words, like a meal from a buffet. And Johnson, for instance, I saw him inspect the buffet before the dinner. I said, “Wow, I hope everything is alright.” But I saw that he already started to eat before everybody came in so I knew everything was okay.

Smith: I’ve often thought that Mrs. Nixon hasn’t gotten in some ways, the recognition or the credit or the appreciation that maybe she deserves.

Haller: Yeah, she worked in the background.

Smith: Was she shy?

Haller: She was shy. No question about it. That’s the word that just came out when you asked me. She was shy. She was. A few times she wrote out some menus for me of what they would like. She was very nice also. Every Monday, I sent the menu up to the First Lady for the whole week. And, believe me, when they had guests, then we had the first course, the main course, salad, and dessert. When they didn’t have guests, we would serve a main course and salad and nothing else. No dessert. And that was for four different [presidents]. Even for President Ford. I started always out with the first course and they said cut it out. They didn’t want it. They went on TV every day, you know.

Smith: Let me ask you. Before he became President of course, he was Vice President. Did you have any interaction with him before he was President?

Haller: No, none at all.

Smith: Okay. How difficult were those last months of the Nixon presidency?

Haller: We could feel it. It seemed when you work at the White House, you get attached to the First Family and the First Family gets attached to the people who work for them. And we could see that the President was under stress and the whole family. But he used to come into the kitchen and talk to me about food. So now I have to tell you about his last morning at the White House.
By law, the old president has to be out by 12 o'clock, noon. And the new president comes in after that. With President Nixon, 7:30 I was upstairs in the kitchen and was ready to make breakfast for him and there he was in pajamas and bare feet talking to the butler in the kitchen. And when he saw me, he walked over to me, by this time I was at the stove, he shook hands with me and he said, “Chef, I have eaten all over the world, but your food is the best.” I remember that like it happened yesterday. So that was quite something I thought because he was leaving and all that stress, and I thought, he says that to the chef, and I thought that’s pretty cool. I said that was great.

Smith: Were you in the East Room when he said his goodbye that last day?

Haller: I was in the East Room, yes.

Smith: That must’ve been very emotional.

Haller: Yes. And then we saw him leave the White House and go in the helicopter. We saw him when the helicopter was talking off to the Air Force airport, and then it was for the last time and he went to California to San Clemente. And that was it. And then the Fords came in and they fit in pretty good.

Smith: Let me ask you something. Mrs. Ford wrote in her memoir that once they moved into the house, actually it was about a week before they moved into the house, but once they moved in, she was walking down the second floor hallway and saw staff and said ‘Good morning’ and no one responded.

Haller: Nobody knew her.

Smith: And she went to the usher and said, “Is there something? Do they not like us?” And he explained, “No one thought that at all. It was different with the Nixons who were a little more formal, maybe, so the word went out, “Feel free to converse with the First Family.” Was there that note of informality, I guess, is what I’m after?

Haller: If the President came into the kitchen, all I said was, “Good evening, Mr. President.” That’s it. I didn’t say, “Oh, Mr. President. How was dinner last night?” Nothing like that. They see so many people, they’re sick of seeing so many people. You have to understand that. And when he was downstairs in the corridor walking, when he came, I disappeared. I mean, he knew I was working there. That’s what it was. They were afraid to talk to her.

Smith: Now, they got over that.

Haller: They got over that, sure.

Smith: Was that because of how the Fords were?

Haller: Yes, yes, absolutely.

Smith: How were things different?

Haller: Well, listen, every family is different. Every family is different, you know. And it’s like what I said, he didn’t have to run for president and he came in and the congress elected him, which was a great honor. And I thought that was a great selection. I thought that he deserved it and that he did an excellent job. I was surprised that he didn’t make it for a full term of four years. I was really surprised about that.

Smith: Early on, Mrs. Ford talked to you about food.

Haller: Yes, in my book, in the kitchen, she talks to me about food. And sometimes she came downstairs in the ground floor kitchen. In the White House, they had three kitchens. The second floor kitchen is for the First Family. My kitchen at home is bigger. The ground floor kitchen is for banquets and then there is a kitchen for a sous below the ground floor. That’s for the staff, the White House staff, which I had to take care of, too. Talking about the White House staff only I mean the staff in the residence which was about 85 people.

Smith: Now, it must’ve been that second floor kitchen, that small kitchen, the famous photo of him making his English muffins.

Haller: Oh, yeah, that’s the only time he made the muffin, you know, at the White House.

Smith: Oh, really?

Haller: I remember, I even told the guy sometimes working upstairs making dinner, he was a sous chef, he made the dinner upstairs. I mean, I couldn’t be there for 16 hours a day. I told him, “Hans, tomorrow, don’t stay there for dinner because everybody is to be out of the kitchen.” And he didn’t like that. He said, “Why?” I said, “Because the President’s going to go making his English muffins.”
Henry Haller   March 31, 2010

Smith: Was that for the benefit of the press?

Haller: Yes, absolutely.

Smith: But as far as you know it’s the only time he did it?

Haller: It’s the only time.

Smith: Because I always thought it was because Mrs. Ford was not a morning person and I thought it was as easy for him to make his own breakfast as to wait for her.

Haller: I’m sure that he probably did, but at the White House, the butlers wouldn’t like that.

Smith: Tell us. What is the function of the various staff?

Haller: The butler does serving. They’re serving things and on state dinners. They also, I tell you, which was wonderful - they make sandwiches. I was not a sandwich guy. They always did on the first floor - they made sandwiches when they had parties. The butlers did that. And then they also took care of the silver and all the dishes. That was very important. If somebody broke a dish, fortunately for me, it never happened. It never happened that I cracked something. But then they wanted to make sure that they’re going to tell them. Just don’t put it in the garbage can. Now, think, this is in the inventory and take one plate off, you know. I mean, that can happen. Really, there’s one incident when a very good guy, a window cleaner, he had to clean the windows on the outside. He was physically fit, I tell you. And he’s hanging there, you know, he’d hook himself up and clean the windows outside the White House. When he was finished, he started again down at the bottom. You know, I don’t know how many windows, 40 windows? And then also the chandeliers, he had to clean. And in the East Room, they had a chandelier and he had to turn it and clean it and turn it and turn it and turn and all of a sudden, bang, the chandelier came down and it crashed on the floor because he undid it in the ceiling, but that was never in the press.

Smith: Let me ask you, I’m sure it was that second floor dining room where Mrs. Kennedy had that gorgeous French wallpaper with scenes of the revolution – and Mrs. Ford had it covered over.

Haller: The family dining room? Okay, that was possible, because downstairs there are pictures in the so-called Diplomatic Room.

Smith: Yes. I think that’s the same, but this was military scenes.

Haller: The military scenes.

Smith: Yes, military scenes. And the story was, someone asked Mrs. Ford why she had it covered over and she said she recognized it was beautiful and historic but it wasn’t pleasant looking at scenes of battle while she was eating.

Haller: That’s absolutely her prerogative if she wants to do that.

Smith: Did she make changes? Either physically to the White House, or were there things that changed because she wanted them to?

Haller: Not much. They went along with what the staff was doing. I mean, the staff is very good. They know what they’re doing. Absolutely.

Smith: I’m told he’s very friendly anyway and that for some members of the staff, it took a little bit of getting used to. Specifically, I’ve been told a story about one of the butlers. It was a weekend and the President was watching football and he insisted he come in and join him and watch the game. I think the butler didn’t quite know how to respond.

Haller: Oh yeah, absolutely, he could do that. No question about it because if it was on a Sunday, he was alone there maybe, and he wanted to watch football. Some guys, they like somebody with you when they watch football. And I believe that he definitely would do that.

Smith: And I’m told with other butlers, he would talk sports. I mean, it was a relationship of equals.
Haller: Yes, absolutely. And one night, the butler’s telling me afterwards, they asked him because Jack is not here for dinner. Then the President was laughing, and said, “Yeah, maybe he doesn’t like the food.” You know he was talking with him. “Maybe he doesn’t like the food.” “Well, he’s not here, don’t worry about it.” And Jack was probably somewhere else eating pizza.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story about Steve when they first moved in. He told his parents he was going to turn in early. In fact, I guess he’d invited some friends over and they had food from the kitchen. The next morning at breakfast, the President asked how his evening was and before Steve could answer, he pushed forward the bill - because the First Family pays for their own food.

Haller: They pay for their own food, yes.

Smith: So that’s how he knew Steve was actually partying the night before rather than having turned in as he said he was going to. Did the kids have friends in?

Haller: Yes.

Smith: Much?

Haller: Not very much, I don’t think. I wouldn’t recall that they had a lot of friends in. The only thing I know is that they came into the kitchen and they’d make their own sandwiches sometimes. And Steve for instance, I think he never went to college. When he was 16, he bought a Jeep and he had a Secret Service man with him and he worked on a range. He worked for a farmer. And then, afterwards, somehow he got very successful as an actor. Did you see the series there? I don’t remember the name anymore, but that was running about for ten years. So, he did very well there.

Smith: Now, Susan, famously, had her prom in the East Room of the White House, her senior prom. Do you remember that?

Haller: Oh yes, I remember that.

Smith: Did you have to cook for that?
Haller: Oh yes. And Susan is a very nice person also. Terrific. All the way terrific. And then if you go to 1976, it was the biggest year for me as a chef at the White House because it was the Bicentennial, the 200 year celebration of the United States. They built a tent in the Rose Garden for 250 people. 250 people! You know, I mean, the kitchen is small at the White House, the ground floor kitchen and it’s not much bigger than this here. So I asked the chief usher, which is a stupid name – chief usher. I mean, he’s the administrator of the White House. I said, “What are you building here?” He said, “Don’t you know? There’s going to be state dinners in there.” I said, “Wow, 250 people.” And then on top of it, the fiscal year changed. They cut the money again in the spring, in May, that’s when they get you your allowance for the year. Now here they changed and wanted it to go to October, so we had to go for six months with the same money than what we had for one year, we had to go a year and a half. That was no good for me because I needed extra people working for me. And so I really worked hard.

Alright, 250 people. And so the main course we’d served right from the kitchen out there into the Rose Garden. 250. The first person who came was the Queen of England; served lobster as the first course. Cold lobster. You see, you want a cold dish for a first course because you can work on it ahead of time. That dish was ready. I don’t know how I did it, 25 lobsters, four pounds each. That was just for decoration on a platter. We had like French service. People didn’t have plate service. Now they have plate service, which I’m completely against. I can tell you why.

Smith: Yeah, why?

Haller: Because you have to cook much too early for that and you have to put it in the warmer and by the time the guests get it, it’s warmed up. Especially with a small kitchen like that. 250 people in the White House using our plates takes a lot of space. You know, ten plates or platter. With the platter, you can also beautifully decorate it. You can do it very nice. And when I used to have first course, at first it’s always a cold first course. Then when the first course went out, I start to cut the meat. Only then. With the plates, you have to cut it earlier.
Smith: Are you told in advance whether by Mrs. Ford or whoever, “The Queen likes this food”, “She doesn’t like this food.” What kind of input do you have?

Haller: For the foreign guests, the State Department always sent me a notice of what the foreign guests liked and did not like. So we work around it. That’s the way it was.

Smith: And would Mrs. Ford be involved in that process?

Haller: Making the menu? That’s where she comes in. She never changed a menu for me. Never. Fantastic. I mean, that was great for me, so I was relaxed. When she ever talked to me, she was wonderful.

Smith: Did you see her sense of humor?

Haller: Oh, yes, and so did he.

So the State Dinner, first there was the Queen of England. I have to tell you if you’re interested in the food. A big platter, and for the lobster, we had a 50 gallon steamer. You had to put that live lobster on a wooden board and tie it up so it was like this. Because when you cook a lobster, the tail comes in, you know, I mean. So I cooked the 25 lobsters. I mean, when you’re thinking back, it’s absolutely nuts. And then that was about two days before we served it.

Then the next day, we already started to take, and then the lobster had to have the medallions for the lobster on top. See, and then I had vegetables around the lobster. And then one pound lobsters for each person, a pound of lobster, but it was shelled, no more shell. And the guests, they helped themselves. That’s they way it was. They helped themselves to the food. Then for the main course, we had medallion veal with wild rice. And if wild rice is made right, it’s delicious, you know, with nuts and the walnuts, or maybe almonds, and with a very good sherry wine. And then for a vegetable, green beans with peeled cherry tomatoes. That gives it a little color. For the cheese course, port salut cheese. Port salut is excellent French cheese. And endive and water cress salad. For dessert, a raspberry mousse, a big mousse, and baked cookies. I think you would’ve enjoyed that dinner. That was the very first state dinner and for the Queen of England.

Smith: And I assume she enjoyed it?

Haller: Oh, yes, yes. And then Giscard D’Estaing from France came, so I gave him a real French menu telling him that we also know how to cook French. And then Chancellor Schmidt of Germany came. They all came. Usually I had maybe one or two state dinners a month. Here I had three and four state dinners a week. A week! And then the Prime Minister of Australia, Prime Minister of New Zealand. All the kings from Europe, the King of Sweden, the King of Belgium, King Juan Carlos of Spain, and on and on, they came for dinner.

Smith: Were you at any point introduced?

Haller: No.

Smith: Never?

Haller: No, never. No, because it wouldn’t be fair for the other guys. You know, I mean, you’d have to introduce everybody. Just don’t introduce the chef. I’m glad they didn’t. I was in the background, you see. And I mean, I got my accolades directly from the President and the First Lady.

Smith: What would they say to you?

Haller: They’d call up and say, “Chef, the dinner was absolutely marvelous last night.” That’s the way it went, you see. Going back in history here, during Nixon, Mrs. Eisenhower, they gave her a dinner because it was her birthday. And do you know what the grandson, he married—

Smith: David.

Haller: David married Julie. And fortunately, they had their marriage in New York in the Plaza Hotel before the one at the White House. So, I lost my thought. What did I say before?

Smith: The dinner for Mamie Eisenhower.
Haller: Oh, the dinner for Mrs. Eisenhower. So I had soufflé for dessert. Grand Marnier Soufflé. And it just happened to be a working breakfast for me. So I took her phone call for what she wanted for breakfast. And then she said, “Chef, how did the soufflé stay up? It didn’t fall in!” And I said, “Experience, Madame. Experience, that’s what it is. It is experience when you have to put it in the oven. The recipe I’ve done so many times. Experience. That’s what it is.” So the butler came out and he said to me, “You know, Mrs. Eisenhower said, ‘The chef here in the kitchen doesn’t want to tell me how he did the soufflé.’”

Smith: She was trying to get your recipe?

Did you ever have a disaster or were you threatened with disaster?

Haller: It just doesn’t happen. It cannot happen. You cannot embarrass the First Family. Maybe every time the most critical guy was me for a dinner. But the guests would not know that. But a disaster? No. It just can’t happen.

Smith: What are the things you worry about? When you say you’re critical, what are the things you think about?

Haller: A soufflé could be critical. I mean, that has to come out of the oven and then a very hot heater so the temperature stays the same in the heater from the oven so it doesn’t fall. And then the dinner is on the first floor. You had to bring the heating unit into the elevator and bring it to the first floor and then put it on platters and serve it and that soufflé stayed up. You know, I mean, things like that, we tried sometimes. That’s why I tried to have a first course and made always very nice decorations and I work ahead at that because if you work ahead of time then I can concentrate on the main course. You know, that’s the experience that comes in.

Smith: How large a staff did you have?

Haller: A staff of seven or eight people and then there were three kitchens. There was a kitchen for the staff, in which I had two people; one in the morning and one at night. And I’m talking staff, only the White House. The other staff, the President’s staff, they had their own cafeteria in the West Wing run by the Navy. The Navy chefs were cooking for them. Simple, but good. No problem there. And then the ground floor kitchen and then the kitchen on the second floor.

Smith: When President Ford announced the pardon of Richard Nixon that was a hugely controversial thing.

Haller: Yes.

Smith: Does that penetrate the White House itself? I mean, can you sense the mood of the place or if it’s a crisis atmosphere? The fall of Saigon, obviously, six months later was an incredibly difficult period.

Haller: It was unbelievably quiet about there. We never spoke politics.

Smith: Really?

Haller: No, no, no. You didn’t speak politics. We just didn’t do that. And you didn’t ask why or whatever. Those moods, you know, like when Nixon had to leave, we were kind of stunned, but nobody expressed his opinion. You didn’t do that. That’s how it was there.

Smith: You’re an escape from all of that in some ways. I mean, you provide a normal environment.

Haller: A normal environment to the last day. That was our job.

Smith: But could you see the impact of outside events on the First Family? You know, at the end of the Vietnam War, President Ford said that was the worst day of his presidency. Could you sense the impact on them just as human beings?

Haller: When the President from the office came over for dinner, he left it over in his office. That’s the way it was. That’s the way presidents did it.

Smith: This may be awkward, but you obviously had a lot of interaction with Mrs. Ford. We know later on because she’s written about it, she had some problems. Did you see that then?
Haller: Never saw it. The only thing I saw was they would eat dinner very late at night. About 9:30. Not all the time, but most of the time. And that was kind of hard on us and there was a cocktail served before. If you’re hungry and you don’t have cocktails, you want to eat at 6 o’clock or 7 o’clock, not at 9:30 at night. And that’s all I can say.

Smith: That’s fine.

Why does every First Family seem to love the solarium? They all seem to gravitate towards that room?

Haller: Which one? Which room?

Smith: The solarium up on the third floor.

Haller: Oh.

Smith: Is it because it’s informal.

Haller: Absolutely, yes.

Smith: You know, there are pictures of Ike up on the balcony grilling steaks up there. I don’t know if any other presidents did that.

Haller: No. No. You know they had the kitchen up there, too. You know, we had lunch, never dinner, in the solarium and if I had a soufflé, I made it up in Ike’s kitchen, which still had an old stove in there.

Smith: Really? Because he was a cook himself.

Haller: Yeah, he liked to cook. Yeah. That’s what they told me, the porters.

Smith: Do they tell stories? Because obviously some of them have been there a very long time.

Haller: The butlers?

Smith: Yeah.

Haller: They’re very, very discreet. There are some stories that I wouldn’t repeat, but they know what they’re doing. And if they said something to me, then it was just me, all alone in the kitchen. There was nobody else. From one to the other, they’d say it because they knew I’d keep my mouth shut. That’s the way it was.

Smith: Do you remember there were two assassination attempts on President Ford about three weeks apart out in California? Did that shake things up at all?

Haller: No. No. Nothing at all.

I was going to say something which I could come back to it. Well, one time, when I’m done, I took pictures when all the pine trees are all lit up. I was in uniform, you know. I went outside to take some pictures at night. And all of a sudden, I hear footsteps. Six policemen come running and they didn’t know who it was and they said, “You’re going to get shot if you do that again.” And I have thousands of slides and I still have to work on them and look at them again. And the White House photographers gave me the film for free, meaning that they got the film for free from Kodak.

Smith: Really? Now, there’s someone, David Kennerly, who was almost a member of the family.

Haller: Yes, and I know him. I know him.

Smith: He was a character?

Haller: He was a character. He was a terrific character. Terrific! Terrific.

Smith: You may or may not remember this, when we were talking to the social secretaries, one of the things they all ran into was sooner or later someone at a state dinner would try to switch nametags, would try to fool around with the seating arrangement at the President’s table. Does any of that ring a bell?

Haller: That didn’t trickle down to me. I was not involved.

Smith: And I assume 45 years ago that people smoked a lot more than they do now.

Haller: 45 years ago, they had cigarettes on the banquet tables. Absolutely ridiculous. That comes from the south, you know, the Senators from the south. You have to have cigarettes there. That was terrible. And then, talking about smoking, the Navy chef smoked in my kitchen. I said nothing so he did it and he smoked upstairs with Johnson’s friend there. I’ve forgotten his name.

Smith: Jack Valenti.

Haller: Yeah, he used to bring him cigars to the Navy chef! He smoked! He smoked!
And then the pastry chef would smoke. And then the head butler, the maitre de, John Fickland, was always with a cigarette in his mouth. Nobody said anything. The usher in his office smoked. And I think Rex Scouten smoked in the beginning a little bit and then he cut it out. And this guy, John Fickland, because of cigarettes, he died. I mean, he got cancer or something.
I mean, he died rather young, you know. That is absolutely amazing.

Smith: And I know when we’ve talked to people like Letitia Baldrige, people like Bess Abel, going back to the 60s—

Haller: Bess Abel I know well.

Smith: They would be the first to say the culture was different in terms of drinking.
People just drank more.

Haller: Oh, yeah. Yeah, absolutely. No question about it.

Smith: Did it affect entertaining at the White House or what you served?

Haller: No, no, no. You wanted to serve good food and plenty of it if there was drinking. I mean, the biggest party always was the press. The press, the food and the free drinks, they go for that.

Smith: To the outsider the Christmas season is magical, but it must be an enormous amount of work.

Haller: Yeah, every day parties. Besides the party that all came as part of the months of July and August during 1976, Christmastime is unbelievable. Lots of work. Yeah, there is a tremendous amount of work.

Smith: And I’m told Mrs. Ford loved Christmas.

Haller: She loved Christmas. Yeah, they seemed to all love it. Yeah, well, we went over it. We made it. And that was it. Thousands of people coming, mostly cookies, but still you have to make them and people think making cookies, eh it’s very easy, but you’ve got to make cookies and you have to have a big cabinet and have cookies in there.

Smith: I’ve been told that President Johnson on occasion, not frequently, but it was not unheard of for him to show up with a lot more people to a meal than perhaps you expected.

Haller: I never knew how many he had for dinner, especially on the weekend. At 5 o’clock Sunday night, they started calling people up to come over for dinner and who would say no? You might have 12 or 13 people. It was kind of wasteful because you always had to be ready for a lot more for dinner.

Smith: And did the Fords do anything like that?

Haller: No, no, never, but the Johnsons did.

Smith: And were they at Camp David most weekends?

Haller: Who?

Smith: The Fords?

Haller: Oh, yes, they did. They’d go up to Camp David. Everybody likes to get away from the White House.

Smith: Now, does that give you the weekend off if they’re in Camp David?

Haller: Yes. Yes, that was nice. But then there is always some like the one daughter of Nixon, Patricia, they begged her to go to Camp David and she didn’t want to go. Then I had to go in and just cook for her. That happened. That’s the way it is.

Smith: Tell me if you remember the foods the Fords particularly liked.

Haller: They liked red cabbage with pork chops. Did you ever eat red cabbage?

Smith: No.

Haller: Probably not. With my mother, I learned a lot. We had a big garden and actually my grandmother was French. My mother learned her cooking from her mother, my grandmother. And we had a big garden, so I used to go and fetch the vegetable from my mother and see how she cooked it. So that’s how it started that I really loved cooking. And that’s the way it was.

Smith: The Ford had dogs, right?

Haller: Yeah. It always happened like this. There was always somebody on the groundskeepers’ staff who selected himself to do the dogs. And, hey, Rex Scouten didn’t object. “Do you want to do the dogs? Go ahead. Do the dogs.” I had the other job. So that was no problem like that. We also sometimes had cats. You know, during the Carters, we had cats. You never asked me about the Carters. They were nice people. Sometimes he’d come into the kitchen and he’d say, “Chef, very good supper.” They wanted to live like the average American, you know. They were very frugal. Very frugal. But one time his brother was coming. Billy with his Billy Beer, you know? And I said, “Mr. Carter would you like some lunch?” He says, “No, I’m on a liquid diet.” That’s exactly what he said. I said, “Well, that’s easy for me.”

Haller: The Fourth of July, I remember absolutely very well. The Truman balcony has a beautiful view of the Washington Monument. A beautiful view there, you know. And they had the buffet dinner out on the Truman balcony and they had guests invited. And if I would write something about that day and evening, I would say that’s when everything stopped in Washington. And the next day it never was in the newspaper. Nothing. I had to wait until at least 11:00 or 11:30 until I could go home because all the streets were completely blocked. People standing on the roof of their cars and watching the fireworks. I mean, that’s when the city stood still. This was absolutely amazing. That was a fantastic Fourth of July evening.

The Fords had a good time with their guests and on the Truman balcony. So around 11:00 o’clock, the traffic started to move a little bit and then I was able to go home. That was fantastic.

Smith: You said you were surprised when he was not elected. Do you remember? Were you there on election night?
Haller: Oh, yeah, I was there and one of the members of the White House working there in the office knew the Fords and she came in the kitchen during the election when the results started to come out and she said to me, “President Ford is not going to make it.” That’s what she told me. But there was quiet and no big deal.

Smith: There are some people who thought it took him a little bit of time to kind of bounce back from that. Did you notice any chance?

Haller: No, nothing. Nothing.

Smith: No.

Haller: No, no. Like I said, they definitely left the work at the office if possible. But, naturally, it’s 24 hours a day, you know. I mean, a president never has a vacation. If he was going to Hawaii or whatever, it was not a vacation. They always have something to do. But they’ve got to get them away some time. Give them a break, you know.

Smith: That brings up something. Chevy Chase and Saturday Night Live and the comics made fun of him, but he actually was a very good athlete, wasn’t he?

Haller: Oh, yes. Yes. Swim every day. Very good. He would swim outside.

Smith: Even in winter?

Haller: Oh, yeah, summer or winter, he would go outside, but that type of water was heated, too. Before, they had a pool inside for Roosevelt. And then the President made it bigger for the press because they used to call it the dog house. And then some people wrote letters, “What dog house costs $500,000?”

Smith: Did you work with the social secretary?

Haller: Very much. Very much. Some were nice. Some were not so nice.

Smith: Now, we know Maria Downs is a friend, so you must have worked with Maria during the Ford period.

Haller: She came later. There were two secretaries.
Smith: That’s right.

Haller: Do you know the first one?

Smith: Nancy Ruwe.

Haller: We called her the Screwy Ruwe. I mean, you’d better shut that out.

Smith: I’m not surprised.

Haller: Oh, please. Because she was! I hope I don’t get in trouble by saying that.

Smith: No.

Haller: But Screwy Ruwe and she used to have a green dress on and we called her the Green Lizard. And she asked me once, “How many social secretaries have you went through?” Like I was responsible that day for their release. I mean, Screwy Ruwe, I’m telling you. One time, she wanted to serve soup at the end of a dinner or something or other because it was in a Wednesday paper in the Washington Post, serving soup on the end.

Smith: Do you have to, in the back of your mind, keep the press in mind? Because I’m sure the press is always looking for something.

Haller: Yeah, the press, I had to learn to keep my mouth shut. I mean, you had to watch it.

Smith: There was the famous incident when the Queen was there and the Marine band struck up The Lady Is a Tramp.

Haller: Meaning she was a tramp?

Smith: Yes, and they were dancing. The Fords and Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip and unknown to anyone the Marine band played The Lady Is a Tramp. That was not a very good idea. Diplomacy in the United States is not always working out. The Lady Is a Tramp. It’s ridiculous. You know what I mean?

Haller: I’ve been working for years on a biography of Nelson Rockefeller. You must have had some contact during the Ford years when he was vice president. Did you have any contact?
Haller: Terrific guy. Terrific guy. Would say, “How are you, Chef?” Things like that. Talking like everybody else. He wanted to be like everybody else. I mean, middle class. You know what I mean? He was a great guy. Absolutely.

Smith: Of course, they were the first couple to live in the vice president’s house. Did you have anything to do with that or was that normally separate?

Haller: Nothing to do with that. Nothing. The Navy took care of that.

Smith: That’s right.

I know the social secretaries get together from time to time, but were there ever meetings of the chefs?

Haller: Yes, there are 25,000 members of the Culinary Federation of Chefs. And then we have the Club of Chefs’d’Chef. It’s French. The French started that for the Chefs of Heads of State. And there is a French company that makes this jacket. This is a French jacket. And I’m an honorary member to that and we went all over the world for free, I did. I even was in Morocco in Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, France several times, Belgium, and in Hong Kong. We had a great time. When they came to Switzerland, that was boring, but the food, you know, that was fine. Everything was great. So, this lady, I’m not saying anything against her and absolutely she’s got to be pretty smart. I talked to her, but talking about size, I was impressed how tall she is. The chef there is a Philippine. If she’s five feet, that’s it. I mean, as a chef, she has some tall guys working for her. I mean, it looked funny. It looked funny.

Smith: A couple of things and we’ll let you go.

Do you remember at the end of the Ford presidency, I assume there comes a time, whether it’s on inauguration day or whatever, when the staff is lined up and there’s a goodbye - formal or informal? How is that handled?

Haller: It was very informal. It’s always different. Every president has different things.

Smith: Really?
Haller: Yeah. It was informal. The President came into the kitchen and said, “Do you know I’m going to leave in a couple of days? It was nice. Thanks very much for what you did for us. We enjoyed it here.” And she was talking like that the same way.

Smith: Are people sad to see them go?

Haller: Oh, I was. I don’t ask. That’s another thing. You don’t ask another guy, “Are you sad?” because you don’t talk about it.

Smith: And obviously within a few hours, there’s another family that you’re serving.

Haller: Yeah, yeah. That’s how it goes. It’s amazing. But they need a lot of help from the staff. And then later on they start to get to know what they like.

Smith: After the Fords left the White House did you have any contact in the later years? Did your paths ever cross?

Haller: They always sent me Christmas cards and I sent them, but not really. No. Well, I sent them a book signed that’s probably there in the library.

Smith: What did you think when he passed away?

Haller: I thought that I felt bad in part. I mean, he was great. A great man. A great man. Absolutely.

Smith: Why do you say that?

Haller: Well, because he treated everybody like he liked to be treated. Like he liked to be treated, he treated everybody like that. And they respected your work, what you did, to a high degree. Absolutely. So did she, Mrs. Ford.

Smith: Did she enjoy being First Lady?

Haller: I think so. I think so, because of the way she acted and the way she presented herself and everything. I believe so. I believe very much.

Smith: For people who don’t know, who think it’s just all glamour - there’s a lot of work that goes into being First Lady, isn’t there?
Haller: There is a lot of work, but they have people, high-class people working for them, very efficient people working for them.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Haller: He should be remembered as the president in a very, very serious time when President Nixon had to leave the White House which was a historic moment, it never happened before, I understand. He took over and he held the country together. He knew his way with the Congress and I think that they were happy to help him even to run the White House. It was very, very important for the country. He did a very, very good job.

Smith: And, finally, how do you think she should be remembered?

Haller: Well, she should be remembered - there’s always a good woman in the back and that’s the way she handled herself. She has so much respect for everybody who worked for her. She was very thankful. Very thankful. And absolutely a terrific lady and when I call her a lady, I mean a lady in the way a lady should behave. One time we were downstairs in the tent, there’s a picture, I think, in the book, I was talking to her and it was just a pleasure to talk to her. And she used to give me some more spiritual help to get things done.

Smith: How so?

Haller: Well, because the way she was talking to me and when you get praised, it helps a lot. It’s even better than money. Money is not everything. And that helped a lot because Rex Scouten - today thinking back, he should’ve paid me more. But when I go to Switzerland, I always say, “Listen guys, I don’t make much money, but I live very good.” That’s it.

Smith: One last thing that just occurs to me. Of course, she had her breast cancer surgery just after they moved in to the White House and in those days people didn’t talk about breast cancer. I mean, that was an enormous change that she brought about. Did that change anything in the White House? And when she came back did it take awhile?
Haller: It changed in the country and she talked about things that happened every day...that was great help for people who had breast cancer or were going to have breast cancer.

Smith: And there’s that wonderful picture. I think she was still in the hospital and Susan filled in one night - the first time she’d ever worn white gloves - but there was a reception or something at the White House, maybe it was a diplomatic reception, but Susan filled in for her mother and there’s this wonderful picture. The President, I think, is in white tie and it was a state dinner and Susan is elegantly dressed and she probably would’ve preferred blue jeans.

Haller: Her mother was sick.

Smith: Yes, her mother was sick and she was filling in for her.

Were they very close, the family?

Haller: Yes, very close. You never heard them slamming doors or anything. French doors.

Smith: That’s very revealing and a perfect note on which to end. Thank you.

Smith: You obviously had contact with Congressman Ford before he became vice president.

Kissinger: Yes.

Smith: What was that like? Was it before the Nixon presidency?

Kissinger: It was well before the Nixon presidency. It was well before I was Henry Kissinger. It was when I was a professor at Harvard and I ran a seminar called the Defense Policy Seminar, to which we invited people with practical experience. We invited Jerry Ford to meet with that seminar and tell them about the legislative process with respect to defense. Then afterwards Ford kept in contact with me, occasionally calling me when there was some issue. Neither of us ever thought we’d end up in the White House, much less together. We had a warm relationship before then.

Smith: When you look back was there a moment, whether it was the smoking gun tape or the Supreme Court decision or whatever, that you, in your own heart, thought spelled the end of the Nixon presidency and the transfer of power?

Kissinger: I have to say two separate things about that. The power was sort of flowing away. That was noticeable for months. But you sort of got used to that and you thought that this might go on for the rest of the term. It wasn’t obvious to me that there would be a specific climax.

The first time that it became clear to me that there probably would be a change was when this tape became available. I think I learned of that tape, I guess, on Saturday or Sunday. If I remember correctly, it was released on a Monday. Diane Sawyer, who was with the press office at the time, called to alert me that this was going to come out. I remember she even said, “This is going to go on forever. This is just going to be another one of those things.” But then once it came out, I thought this would lead to a climax. As it happened, Ford called me on that Monday as part of my regular briefings of the vice president; I didn’t refer to the tape and he didn’t refer to the tape. I did not really think I was being disingenuous, but I didn’t think it was my role as a presidential assistant to…

Smith: Is it possible that everyone was avoiding the most unpleasant of subjects?

Kissinger: Ford?

Smith: Yeah, knowing that events…

Kissinger: No, it was the tactful thing to do. What was I going to say? I was already secretary of state. I was both secretary of state and security advisor. Anyway, it was the tactful thing to do. Then the next day there was a Cabinet meeting at which there was sort of a rebellion of the Cabinet members. They were saying they needed the full disclosures. And Ford – it’s all described in my memoirs – Ford was very tactful. He just spoke of consequences of what needed to be done, but there was no talk of resignation by anybody at that meeting.

It’s unprecedented that at a Cabinet meeting Cabinet members speak against the president. Ford didn’t speak against the president; he just laid out what would happen in the pursuit of the issues that were before us – not the Watergate issues, but the business issues. And from then on it accelerated. Then Ford called me, I think on Thursday morning, that he wanted to see me. By that time it was clear that Nixon would resign. He called me, I guess it was either Wednesday or Thursday, and he asked me for the meeting. You can look it up in my memoirs and the phone records.

Smith: It is interesting that yours is the only name, of course, that he mentioned the night after the president made his resignation speech.

Kissinger: Exactly that.

Smith: When he went out and met with the press outside his home in Alexandria.

Kissinger: I’m not rational about Ford, both my wife and I love him.
Smith: Let’s back up just a bit because you, obviously, did spend a lot of time with him while he was vice president.

Kissinger: Yes, I briefed him at regular intervals, every two weeks.

Smith: Tell us about your impressions about his intelligence.

Kissinger: Look, his intelligence was high. He was not, at first, very articulate. He didn’t really become articulate until after he had left the presidency. But his intelligence was very high. His analytic ability was very high. His manners were very unassuming and he wouldn’t pound the table and say “I have three points on this…”

He would sort of listen to people and distill their thoughts. He was a very good judge of people. He treated them in an open and trusting manner. If you ever lost his confidence, then you were in trouble. If you ever did something that he considered immoral or unreliable…But he handled disagreements – you never had to worry that if you disagreed with him that it would be taken as a personal event.

Smith: One thing and then we’ll move on. He writes in his own memoirs that he was upset to see a story – I think it was in Newsweek – that indicated that President Nixon – I believe that he had Nelson Rockefeller in for a visit – and in the course of that conversation, according to Newsweek, had said to Rockefeller, “Can you imagine Jerry Ford sitting in this chair?”

Now, the reason I raise that is, because we know that John Connally was Nixon’s first choice for the vice presidency. I’m trying to get a sense of what Nixon, and to some degree, the immediate folks around Nixon, thought about the vice president.

Kissinger: Well, I don’t know what the people around Nixon thought. I know what I thought. I thought very highly of him. I never thought of him as a president because he wasn’t on a career path that would lead to the presidency. But I had heard Nixon say the same thing. But he might have said that about 99.9% of the universe. He might have said it about Nelson Rockefeller. He wouldn’t say it about John Connally.
Smith: What was it about Connally?

Kissinger: Nixon had the subconscious hope that when Congress looked at any of the likely alternatives, they would conclude that it was too dangerous - and it was dangerous - to make a change of presidency in middle of a whole series of crisis, and in the middle of the Cold War. But he did make these observations and he turned out to be wrong.

Smith: That raises a large question. We’ve talked to a number of folks who were there on the 8th and the 9th, and particularly for the swearing in on the 9th of August. Afterwards, I guess there was a receiving line, and then there was a reception in the state dining room, and several people have had the same observation that – and it’s not surprising – that you could see the Nixon people peel off. I raise that in the larger sense of, how much of a challenge was it for the new president to integrate, to be fair to, to weed out – how much of an issue was that in terms of fashioning his administration with his own stamp? Was there passive resistance?

Kissinger: Once the presidency had moved, changed, there was not scope for passive resistance. You can’t resist the president in the White House. There was the practical problem of people, in the midst of doing certain things, how they were going to turn over, and secondly, at what speed Ford would replace them. The only part of it that I knew was that quite a few of them called me up and asked me to intercede with Ford on their behalf. I took the position that I couldn’t do that - that I would stay out of domestic affairs.

In my part of the White House activities Ford left it up to me what staff I had. He made no attempt to change any of my staff members. We kept going just as before. He took on, in the first few days, the problem: how do you make a transition for foreign leaders - that we still have authority in Washington? He took on a staggering load.

We arranged meetings with the ambassadors of each region. So we had the Africa ambassadors, the European ambassadors, the Asian ambassadors - there were five or six groups. Each of them took about an hour because Ford had to say something, and we sort of outlined for him what the themes were that we were pursuing, but he wasn’t reading a script. So he would meet with these ambassadors, talk for maybe twenty minutes, and then give them a chance to ask questions for another half hour. But you just add this together, that’s six hours right there. Then he saw one-on-one the ambassadors of Russia - of the Soviet Union, of China, I think England, some of the key NATO allies. You have to look up whom he saw.

Smith: Sure.

Kissinger: We have a list. And you add all of this together, that’s a staggering load and he did it with calm, equanimity, he never made a false step. Vietnam – he saw the ambassador. Then we sent out a bunch of letters around the world. Now, again, the staff work was done in my office but Ford was heavily involved. All I’m saying is take the first three dates then, on the second day he was in office, the Cyprus crisis blew up.

Smith: Plus you also had the Glomar Explorer affair that day.

Kissinger: Yeah. But that was interesting, you can’t say it was a fun part of the presidency, but it was something we had done.

Smith: Did he know about its existence?

Kissinger: No. I knew about it, I sort of knew they were doing it. I wasn’t following it. But he handled the transition with calm, dignity, and authority.

Smith: He also had to pick a vice president.

Kissinger: Yeah, that came, not in the first week.

Smith: Did you talk with Governor Rockefeller during that period?

Kissinger: No.

Smith: No.

Kissinger: I talked to the president. I was so close to Rockefeller that everybody knew that I was for Rockefeller. If you go through my phone calls you’ll find that a number of people called me up and wanted me to support them, and I always said, “I can’t do it because I’m basically for Rockefeller.” So then they said, well if he doesn’t get it…But I was not involved. Ford did talk to me about it, peripherally, [he] wanted advice. But I was not a factor in the Rockefeller nomination. Ford got to that by himself.

Smith: Also, he says it was during that first month, he was inclined to announce that he would not seek a full term in ’76. And he says you were the one…

Kissinger: Now, that I did discuss with him.

Smith: Yes, he said you were the one who, in effect, talked him out of it.

Kissinger: I told him he must not do that. That he’d become a lame duck immediately and that then everything would be geared to his succession. And he accepted that view.

Smith: Was it difficult integrating the Capitol Hill crowd, the Grand Rapids crowd, the Nixon crowd, his old Congressional buddies?

Kissinger: I’m not a good judge because I saw him every morning for half an hour to an hour, whether we had business or not. He and I took the view that it cannot be that there is no business between the president and the secretary of state. So if we didn’t have a crisis, we talked strategy. So, yes, the Capitol Hill crowd, as you’d expect, the Ford people coming in fresh, wanted to make a mark for their president and to show distinctions, and it would show up in occasional press leaks. But those were incidents; they were not major elements because I had the great confidence that Ford would never do anything behind my back. So whatever criticism we had I’d hear from him.

Smith: Did he criticize? Was there criticism from time to time?

Kissinger: It didn’t happen that way because he and I had such a warm, personal relationship that sometimes he didn’t agree, but it never got to a confrontational issue. I sometimes modified my position, it could have happened, but I don’t even remember a clear case where I said, “Let’s do this,” and he’d say flatly, “No.” On the other hand, he was a strong leader. I’m not a good judge here, I could mention incidents and some of them mentioned in their memoirs where they think they scored great victories. But it didn’t affect any real thing.
Smith: Let me ask you about – because it’s so emblematic of a Ford presidency that to this day is not terribly well known. For example, there are people, certainly on the right, who remember Alexander Solzhenitsyn not visiting with the president. I suspect they probably don’t remember his asking, I believe Ambassador Dobrynin about the Lithuanian seaman…

Kissinger: First of all, let me first talk about that Lithuanian. There was an outrageous incident where the Coast Guard had turned over a defecting Soviet sailor to the Soviets. So, at the first meeting with Dobrynin, without any advice from me - I was sitting there, the secretary of state - Ford said he would appreciate it if the sailor were released. He was a Soviet citizen and Lithuania was part of the Soviet Union at that point, he was a Soviet citizen. He had defected. We didn’t have a leg to stand on, except for humanitarian considerations. That was a typical Ford move. No advice from me. I was stunned when I heard him say it. But it worked.

Then Solzhenitsyn, and let me make a general comment on the Soviet relations. Solzhenitsyn came about, actually, I was on vacation when the decision was made originally. I think Senator Helms wanted to arrange for a Solzhenitsyn meeting with the president. There was never an issue about a meeting. He agreed from the beginning that he would see him. But what he didn’t want was a media circus about seeing him. And so Solzhenitsyn and Helms had agreed that he would come in, maybe take one picture, a White House photographer picture that you can then release.

That would have been no issue. But Ford did not want a media circus about it. He was negotiating with the Soviets at that time about an arms control agreement. It became hugely controversial as a sort of a symbolic issue. The fact, however, is that all the numbers that Ford was putting forward were exactly the numbers that Reagan adopted, and that all the attacks that the right wing made on the SALT agreements when they got into office, they implemented it and didn’t try to change it.

So, here is an unelected president coming in at the end of a crisis, in the aftermath of a Middle East war, while the situation is highly unsettled, and it’s the right wing people who were never to be heard from when the going was tough. Suddenly started into a policy of confronting the Soviet Union and picking issues like Jewish emigration, in which Nixon had already achieved an emigration rate of forty thousand, from seven hundred to forty thousand. And after the Jackson people got into the game, the immigration when down to around fifteen thousand and never came back.

Smith: I think the number the president cites in his memoir - Dobrynin indicated that as long as there was nothing in writing - that they would be prepared to go as high as fifty-five thousand.

Kissinger: Exactly right. Except they could not commit themselves to a number. They might wind up in a position where they would have to expel people to meet numbers. But the Jackson people didn’t want an agreement, they wanted the issue. Ford and Gromyko met, and Gromyko said the number could be fifty-five thousand. So then the Jackson people came up yes, but they have to be distributed evenly around the Soviet Union, or maybe they had to come mostly from Moscow. They put certain conditions, but made it clear that they did not want an agreement and they announced – we told Jackson, we know this, and this is going to happen. Why don’t you watch and see whether it happens.

So he stepped out from being told by Ford what would happen and announced it as his success. Then, of course, it blew up again. Not only as his success - but Ford didn’t care who got the success, got the credit - but they announced it as proving that if you put real pressure on the Soviet Union they yield.

Smith: To an outside observer, it seemed as though there were real crosscurrents in U.S./Soviet relations during this period. Because on the one hand, you’re building the policies of détente, and yet, at the same time, there are proxy wars going on, particularly in Africa.

Kissinger: But that was the nature of the relationship. We had used détente to reduce the Soviet influence in the Middle East originally. We were going to do the same thing in Africa. We were going to tell the Soviets, if you value this relationship, the right wingers wanted a direct confrontation with the Soviet Union, and then when we did that, they passed whatever that amendment was the Tunney amendment that prevented any real effort in Angola. If you look at the actions of Ford, he was tough as nails on the ____________ issue. He wanted to be tough on the Angola issue, but the Congress cut off the support for him.

He wanted to do the honorable thing in Vietnam, which was to not cut off aid to a dying patient, it was more of a symbolic and moral issue. He and I knew very well, at that point, after two years of Congressional cutoffs, where aid went down from two and a half billion to seven hundred million dollars of aid, and the South Vietnamese had to ration their artillery when they got under attack because they were running out of supplies. We knew what the end would be. But it seemed important to Ford, and with full support from me, that the United States not stab a dying ally in the back. So Ford thought it was important to keep going up to the Hill and ask for aid, and even if that aid would never be delivered so that we would not end something in which thousands of Americans had been killed by turning on the people that we’d been supporting.

Smith: We talked to Mel Laird a few weeks ago. Laird loves Ford, but in some ways has never forgiven him. Laird still thinks that you could have gotten the seven hundred million dollars out of Congress, and it’s hard to point to what more could have been done. But he believes that a president who really…

Kissinger: What is he talking about?

Smith: He’s talking about the seven hundred twenty-two million dollar request for…

Kissinger: And why wouldn’t we get it? How did he blame Ford for that?

Smith: As far as I can tell, he didn’t try hard enough; he didn’t employ all the power of the presidency.

Kissinger: That’s absolute, total nonsense. I went through that. Laird is as much responsible for the mess at the end because he acquiesced when he was advisor to Nixon in the Watergate period. He helped draft a compromise that cutoff military action in Cambodia. But I don’t want to get into that sort of thing. The issue wasn’t seven hundred million, the issue was they had cut aid from two and a half billion to seven hundred million. And Stennis had told us we might get three hundred million in the supplementary appropriation. And that then came before the Congress and the Congress was reluctant. Now it is ture that the only two leaders who would defend the position were Ford and me. We couldn’t get the other Cabinet members to go up to the Congress.
They’d find ways of weaseling out of it. So, if Laird thinks there was a way to get them to go up there, he knows something I did not, but the Congress was determined. There was no way to get more money.

Smith: And isn’t the best evidence of that, or at least evidence of that, the fact that as soon as Saigon fell, they wanted to pull the plug on any money for resettling Vietnamese refugees.

Kissinger: Absolutely. They were determined, and it was a serious situation. During the ending period of the Vietnam war I suffered from the illusion that if we could get a decent settlement, an honorable settlement, the right wing would be satisfied with having met our honor and the left wing would be satisfied with peace. And so you’d have a united country. But the opponents of the Vietnam war did not want success. They were afraid that if you could say they succeeded, that we would do it again.

Smith: They had a vested interest in failure.

Kissinger: They justified their attitude by saying they wanted to save lives. But on that basis, you’d have to quit any war because you can always save lives immediately by not fighting. You pay the lives later. It happened in Vietnam very quickly with the boat people and with the murders in Cambodia.

Smith: I take it Ford was genuinely angered by that initial Congressional…

Kissinger: Ford was heroic. He could easily have said, as some of his Michigan advisors said, “This isn’t my war,” but he basically took the position that this is America, this is not a person. Four presidents have been involved here.

Smith: What was it like in the Oval Office in those last hours?

Kissinger: Well, you should read the phone conversations with Ford when I tell him it’s now. We have to pull the plug because the airport is coming under artillery.
The whole debate, say, in the last two months of Vietnam, the only debate was, do we pull the plug right away, or do we keep it going for as long as we possibly can to evacuate as many people as we possibly can? There was no doubt how it would end once the North Vietnamese could put all their army into the South, and we had no right to use any countermeasures. The South Vietnamese army was running out of ammunition and also made some strategic mistakes. But Ford, and I’m going to say I, and of course, Scowcroft and people like that, we thought we had a duty to as many Vietnamese and even Cambodians to get out, so the real debate in the country was, we kept testifying for aid so that Saigon’s morale wouldn’t crumble.

Ford had some decisions which _______________ recognized. There were two thousand Americans left in Saigon and we could have taken them out fast, but we took them out in very slow increments, so that we had an excuse for being there with our military establishment - to take out Vietnamese. And we managed to save close to two hundred thousand. I think a hundred and fifty thousand plus Vietnamese. It was a great achievement of Ford’s. Now what was the atmosphere? It was very calm, but I called him, I think it was a Monday night, but I forget, it was at night and said, “Tan Son Nhut airport is under attack and we now have to evacuate by helicopter and we can’t take anymore out.” There were about five thousand people at the airport. Ford said, “Okay.” And then he started crumbling and it took about two or three phone conversations which you can incorporate into this on the record, in which you see he’s giving the order, he knows he’s got to do it.

Then he says, “Can’t we do something for these five thousand people that are lining the airfield there?” But he was always calm in crisis. The way it worked was, with all respect, the Pentagon wanted to make sure that if anything went wrong, they’d stick the White House with it. So they meticulously tracked every helicopter with us so that they could say they had an order to get out. And then every hour or so, I’d give Ford a report. I didn’t report every single helicopter to him. It was a sad period, but we weren’t there wringing out hands because we had this evacuation to do.

Smith: He wasn’t despondent?
Kissinger: He was never despondent. When you’re in real trouble, despondency doesn’t help you. But, anyway, that wasn’t his nature.

Smith: The relationship with Secretary Schlesinger – was it just bad chemistry or was it more substantive than that?

Kissinger: No, actually, I think if you’d given Schlesinger truth serum, he would have agreed with Ford and me. But, I think the relationship with Schlesinger is best summed the following way: I once said to Ford, “It’s a pity that you have to keep adjudicating disputes between Schlesinger and me.” He said, “Henry, you have to understand the following: Schlesinger’s fight is not with you, it’s with me,” he said, “He thinks I’m a dummy, and he thinks I have to be run by somebody, and he thinks you’re running me. And this won’t stop until either I make him believe he’s running me, or I fire him.” And that’s what happened.

Smith: Which was a very shrewd reading.

Kissinger: Very shrewd, and it takes a strong man to say, “He thinks I’m a dummy.” But it sort of grated on Ford that Schlesinger would come into the job with his high IQ rapping and putting a leg over…you probably picked that up elsewhere, too.

Smith: Yeah. That’s interesting.

Quickly, let me ask about Vladivostok. We were talking to Donald Rumsfeld who, I would say sort of dropped this, that we came close to bargaining away the cruise missile. As part of the SALT, as part of the ongoing SALT talks. How would you characterize the cruise and its…

Kissinger: The cruise missiles were put into the budget by Nixon. The Pentagon had wanted to cut them out for budgetary reasons, and we had put it in. You know, Rumsfeld is a smart guy, but he thought his political future was tied to not getting the SALT agreement because the right wing would never forgive him for having the SALT agreement. So he developed incredible ingenuity in coming up with things that backfired. The cruise missile, nobody wanted to bargain away the cruise missiles, because we had wanted them in the budget to begin with. There probably was some technical point, they probably had some _______________, but that wasn’t the issue. We wanted to be sure of cruise missiles. When you get into the legalistic fine points of SALT agreements, you could always find something. Of course, you have to give something up, but we never thought we were giving…it was never an issue to give up cruise missiles.

Smith: The Helsinki Accords—which of course are a classic example of how history rewrites contemporary judgment - I take it there was some dispute between some, at least at the Pentagon, and yourself.

Kissinger: Well, the right wing view was that we were recognizing the borders of the Soviet Union, which is technically what we didn’t do. There was a clause in the agreement that said, “Borders can be changed only by negotiation,” which meant that borders could be changed. There was nobody who was advocating starting a war with the Soviet Union. At that time the conviction was that the Soviet Union had much superior conventional strength, and you never hear that argument anymore. Because the agreement that was made in Helsinki was the precise pages(?), which made it possible to undermine Soviet rule in Eastern Europe.

Smith: Was there, though, this ongoing tension between the Pentagon and yourself? I don’t mean on the personal level. I mean in terms of issues and the approach to…

Kissinger: Look, you have a lot of retroactive heroes. There was some mumbling going on, but I say that there is no tension until somebody says something. You find me at any point in which Rumsfeld actually objected to something Ford was going to do. Rumsfeld’s skill was to screw up the bureaucratic process in such a way that no substantive discussions could take place. He didn’t have the right people for the meeting, he didn’t have the papers, so he achieved what he wanted – to drag it into the primary season. And then Ford decided that he couldn’t fight a detailed battle on these issues. One, he was conducting a primary campaign. If there hadn’t been a primary campaign, it was very easy to come to an agreement. At that point we had the back of it broken, and it became the basis of what later emerged. Have you talked to Scowcroft about this?
Smith: Not yet. He’s on the list.

Kissinger: Well, talk to Scowcroft, he can give you chapter and verse.

Smith: Quickly, speaking of the ’76 primary campaign: the question came up, of course, just on the eve of the Texas primary, of whether you would go to Africa.

Kissinger: Well, it didn’t come up that way, but the way Ford and I worked, I could tell him what I needed to do. Sometimes he might have a different – I can’t think of when he had a different view – but never did he say, this is politically not good for me, on any issue. Nobody will ever have me around for my domestic political judgment. But before I went to Africa, I said, “Now, you know, Mr. President, when I get to Zambia, I will make a recommendation for majority rule in Rhodesia. That’s a big change and you have to tell me whether this interferes with your primary season. I don’t know that.” And Ford said, “We conduct foreign policy of the United States, we don’t do it for primary campaign reasons.” And so I made my speech a week before the Texas primary, it was a disaster.

Smith: Politically?

Kissinger: Well, it helped lead to a huge defeat for Ford in Texas. But, again, like so many things Ford did, it turned out to be what happened.

Smith: And at the convention, we talked to Stu Spencer, among others, who said this thing, obviously, was very close, and the one thing that Stu and those folks didn’t want was to give the Reagan people an emotional issue.

Kissinger: Yeah, it was a political mistake. We had to do something because there were thirty-five thousand Cubans in Angola and we didn’t want the Communists to dominate all these independents’ movements. Could we have waited three weeks? Probably.

Smith: His point was, when you got to the convention and the platform, the Reagan people had this very hard line platform, which implicitly repudiated, at least parts of the Ford foreign policy. And there was a very heated discussion over this. The politician’s position was, give it to them. Because if you give them an emotional issue, they just might stampede the convention. It’s said you opposed that on principle…

Kissinger: I was not involved in the convention discussions. I didn’t come to the convention until everything was already done at the end. As a matter of principle, as secretary of state, I took the position, “I can only tell you what I believe to be in the American national interest. I can’t tell you what political assessments you have to make.” I didn’t like the platform. That’s absolutely true. But I didn’t really fight. They knew I didn’t like it, but I don’t think you will find, other than their knowing I was not thrilled by it, I didn’t do much about it.

Smith: You’d become an issue, was that awkward? Did the president ever discuss it with you? I think at one point you even offered to resign.

Kissinger: But that was different. I offered, when he changed Schlesinger, and changed Colby, I said to him, “If you want to make it a clean sweep of these things, and bring in new people for all the key posts, I’ve written a letter of resignation in draft form. Tell me whether I should complete it.” And he wouldn’t hear of it. But that was…

Smith: And that was also the time when the vice president was dropped, in effect.

Kissinger: That was a big mistake.

Smith: Did the vice president talk to you at that point?

Kissinger: One of the great things of Nelson Rockefeller – I was as close a friend as he had – that in all the time it’s the one decision of Ford’s that I found inexplicable, and which was wrong. And Ford himself, said that all the rest of his life. But never did I hear Rockefeller complain. I describe it as he had an unbelievable sense of public service and he went through that whole year, which had to be humiliating for him, that last year, never saying to me privately, “This is hard for me.” Never. Nor did he say, “Look at Ford, he brought me in. I went through a humiliating confirmation procedure and a year later he fires me.” Never said that. It was one of the noble things of Nelson Rockefeller.
Smith: Did you know about the pardon before it was issued? Did you participate in any…?

Kissinger: This will have to be the last thing. I did not participate directly in the discussion with him about it. I had one conversation with him about it because I had had a lunch with one who had been legislative aide to Eisenhower.

Smith: Bryce Harlow.

Kissinger: Bryce Harlow. One of the great…

Smith: The Wise Man

Kissinger: The Wise Man. We had lunch and he told me and I agreed, that Nixon would never make it through a trial. That he would have some sort of a breakdown, that he could not stand that humiliation. So, as a result of that lunch, afterwards I told Ford that I’d had that lunch, that Bryce was of that view and that I wanted him to know that I was of that view, too. And that I thought the spectacle of putting the president of the United States before a criminal court was something that the country should not have to face. He asked one or two questions, and then the next time I heard from him was the night before he announced the pardon. But not to ask my opinion; but to tell me what he was going to do.

Smith: One last quick thing and I’ll let you go. You said at the beginning that you weren’t objective, you were not rational about Ford, what did you love about him?

Kissinger: He was a normal American. He did not have the obsessiveness of those who spend three years on the campaign trail. He thought that his job was to do the best job possible. He didn’t care so much about the public opinion polls of every move. He thought his duty was to serve his country, to bring the country together. He was always calm and he was extremely polite to his subordinates. He had a terrific sense of humor. He had a great family life, and when you talked to Ford, what you saw is what you got.

So you could absolutely count, and you’d seen everything there was to see when you dealt with him. But he also had great courage. But he never bragged about any of these qualities. If he were here he would be embarrassed to have me talk like this about him. But when you think to his funeral, there was such genuine emotion, and even among the public. When we drove with the casket from the airport into town on a Saturday night – it wasn’t announced – there were people on the street. I think back to my association with Ford as the high point of my governmental life.

Smith: Penny Circle has said that of all the people around the president, she’ll never forget [that] you, in many ways, showed the most continuing personal concern when he had that mild stroke in Philadelphia. You said to her, “Call any time of the day or night…”

Kissinger: We loved him. I said we – my wife and I. One of my sadnesses is, he wanted me to come out and see him one more time, and I didn’t realize how close to the end he was. So we set a time, maybe a little further ahead than we should have. I had to go out anyway, on its own, I wasn’t going to charge a plane, I think January 15th, something like that, to see him. And I just missed him. But we talked on the phone, as Penny will tell you. Often – at least once a month. But more often when something came up, he’d call me Or I would call him, and we were on the board of American Express together.

Smith: And he was an active board member. He wasn’t just a name on the…

Kissinger: Oh yes. He came to the meetings.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. How did your paths first cross with Gerald Ford?

Goldfield: I was a first year law student at Suffolk University Law School up in Boston.

Smith: I know it well.

Goldfield: And one of my professors had some relationships in the White House and mentioned that there was a program known as the White House Summer Internship and asked if anyone was interested. I walked up and responded, and that professor became a good friend. So I applied to the White House for the internship. I had worked Republican politics in Connecticut and California. I’d been a Coro Foundation Fellow out in California and did some work with a number of the senior lieutenants around then Governor Ronald Reagan and I thought it’d be a great opportunity to visit Washington. I had been a very short-term intern for Senator Weicker in Connecticut way back when, so I didn’t know any one person that could get me into the White House. This was at a time when Nixon was basically transitioning out.

Smith: So this was the summer of ’74?

Goldfield: This started in, I believe, late ’74—

Smith: Nixon leaves, of course, in August of ’74.

Goldfield: Right. It might’ve been the summer of ’74 that I started.

Smith: I mean, was Nixon still—?

Goldfield: No, he had left, but his people were still there. Pam Powell was still there running Youth Affairs in the fall, I believe, of ’74.

Smith: Can I ask you about one of the things that intrigues us and, maybe as an outsider, you had a unique perspective on?
Goldfield: Sure.

Smith: Clearly one of the challenges that Ford faced, with no transition, was meshing the existing staff - Nixon people, whom he didn’t want to tar unfairly with Watergate - his own people from the Hill - and then such others as, over time, came in there. Did you sense tensions?

Goldfield: I didn’t sense any tensions. What I was going to say was that I didn’t know any one person well enough that could get me heard as a potential candidate as a White House summer intern. So I basically contacted everyone I knew in Republican politics and finally I got a call from Pam Powell’s office saying, “We’ve accepted you on one condition.” I said, “What’s that?” They said, “That we don’t get another call or letter on your behalf because it’s taking up too much time.”

But, to answer your question, I didn’t know President Ford well, but I saw him in action quite a bit and was in an atmosphere where you could get a good sense of the man and see him quite frequently. But I was only a White House summer intern. I think that he was, above all else, a very fair person. He had a very good heart, a very good intellect, and was unbelievably fair-minded as an individual. So, I don’t think that he was about to toss somebody over the side because they had worked for President Nixon who then had to resign. So, you saw a number of key individuals remain in various offices, including political offices, during the transition and during President Ford’s tenure. And I think that’s testament to his fairness. If somebody was talented and loyal, he was not going to throw them over the side.

Smith: Did you have any contact at all with Bob Hartmann? Clearly, Hartmann was an important and, in some ways, polarizing figure.

Goldfield: Right. I had very little contact with Hartmann. I started off in the White House Summer Internship and then was asked to stay on the permanent White House Counsel’s staff with Phil Buchen and his team. So, I transferred and was fortunate to get into Georgetown Law and graduated from Georgetown Law.
But as part of the process, every week the White House Summer Interns – some of whom are still my closest friends – would interview people. I remember one session with Don Rumsfeld, who was then chief of staff, I believe. He came in and we sat around on couches and all had a discussion with Rumsfeld and he then opened it up to questions after he spoke for a few minutes. My parents happened to be visiting from Connecticut so he was gracious enough to allow them to sit in on the session. I had just read a Newsweek article and I said, “Mr. Rumsfeld, Newsweek just portrayed you as ‘a Haldeman who smiles.’ Do you have any reaction to that?” I think I saw my parents both shrink down as low as they could in the chair. Rumsfeld gave a very quick ‘excuse me’ response and then came back to the question. But, it was a time where we were able to spend some time with these senior assistants.

Clearly, the most time I spent with members of the senior staff was with Phil Buchen who was, again, one of the most fair-minded, stable, thoughtful, great judgment individuals and the right guy for the time. I mean, we’d gone through such pain and agony and angst as a country over Watergate and over Vietnam, and to have someone with the relationship and trust that President Ford placed in Phil Buchen and to have the judgment that Phil Buchen had, the good common sense, and the strong legal capabilities - I was really honored to be able to participate in the White House Counsel’s Office. And it was a good predicate; I served in President Reagan’s White House Counsel’s Office, not so much because I was the best law student in America and chosen for that, but, as I describe it, having had a couple years with President Ford in the White House Counsel’s Office, I knew where the fire extinguishers were. And I think a lot of the White House Counsel’s Office is understanding what to use to put out what kind of fires. And I was fortunate to be given that opportunity.

Our assignments in White House Counsel’s Office as law clerks ranged from who can use the Seal of the President in responding to sixth grade classes to spending time on what to do about the Watergate tapes to spending time on War Powers when there was an incident between North Korea and South Korea over the chopping down of a tree, as I recall. So, it was just a really wonderful opportunity to have sort of a seat in the room to see some of these things going on.

Smith: Let me back up a bit. This may not be fair, but did you see things, or could you understand why Newsweek would characterize Rumsfeld in that fashion? He’s a tough guy.

Goldfield: Very tough guy, very smart man. Tough, but not tough just to be tough. I thought, when he had Dick Cheney, who I have huge respect for as a solid, loyal American with the fortitude to do what he thinks right, irrespective of the “politics” of a decision. I’ve seen Rumsfeld since the Ford years but only on a few occasions. I think he’s a tough-minded, bright fellow. I may disagree at times with his positions on policy, but I think he always did what he thought was correct. Maybe sometimes it wasn’t the right policy to engage, but I respected him as usually trying to do the, in my view, right thing. And I think you can tell a lot about a person by who he has next to him and to have Dick Cheney next to him said a lot to me about Rumsfeld.

Smith: Some of the people we’ve spoken with, beginning with Dorothy Downton, the President’s personal secretary have suggested that there was a difference of sorts in terms of how each ran the White House. And they were not being particularly critical or praiseworthy of one or the other, but just suggested that it was a somewhat more relaxed atmosphere under Cheney.

Goldfield: Than under Rumsfeld?

Smith: Than under Rumsfeld.

Goldfield: I don’t know the answer to that. I think each had their own styles. Dick Cheney can be extremely – how should I put it – tough is the wrong word. He has a clear focus and I think he is strong in his beliefs and put politics aside if it’s the right thing to do. And I think that carried with Mr. Cheney right through to his being Vice President more recently. I think that President Ford was a fairly relaxed sort of fellow. He was not a hard-nosed, take out the hatchet or hammer kind of fellow. And I think he had - even as a Republican leader on Capitol Hill – tremendous respect from the other side of the aisle and I think he used that currency wisely. You know, he had a tough time with the legacy of Vietnam, with the economy, and was really challenged with Russia which was a major challenge at the time. It was not an easy time, but I think he was exactly the right person to give America back its feeling of trust in their President.

Smith: One way of looking at the Ford presidency sees a trajectory of someone who came into office with a congressional mindset...who some would say ‘grew,’ some would say ‘evolved’…the story of the Ford presidency is about, without losing the skills that he had polished on the Hill, learning the difference between a congressional and an executive mindset. In other words, learning to be President.

Goldfield: Well, I think he learned quickly and I think he often got frustrated, in my recollection, with his congressional colleagues, particularly when it came to foreign policy. You know, I think he said something to the effect ‘We can’t have 535 chief executives when it comes to foreign policy.’ So, I think he evolved very quickly because, once you assume the mantle of President, your role becomes very clear and the decisions you have to make are right in front of you. You often don’t have the luxury of prolonged debates over months or years because decisions have to be made that affect our national security, our foreign policy. I think he evolved and understood quickly that there should be a separation of powers and that the President as chief executive and Commander-in-Chief ought to have the ability to act and enact in a decisive manner. And yet he remembered his congressional days and I think he had some sensitivity to what was happening in the Congress. But it still had to be frustrating in light of ‘You can’t have 535 commanders-in-chief.’

Smith: But there is irony that this man, by his own proud admission a child of the House, a product of Congress, should find himself, in many ways defending executive branch prerogatives against assault from Capitol Hill.

Goldfield: It’s ironic, but I think also, as I said, he learned very quickly that the decisions you have to make as commander-in-chief don’t give you the luxury of being able to convince a majority of 435 members of the merits of your position. We’ve got soldiers whose lives are on the line. We’ve got national security interests that are threatened on a daily basis. So you’ve got to step into a role where you’ve got to make decisions that you believe protect on national security and foreign policy interests, and worry about the politics later.

Smith: Which brings us to the War Powers Act. I’ve been told that every President since its passage has, to varying degrees, at least in private, insisted that it was of dubious constitutionality. But none of them have wanted to try that argument in the courts. So, you have this sort of grudging acquiescence.

Goldfield: Well, it’s basically, I think, a delicate balance where you’ve got significant tensions at play. As I said, I think that Congress, in terms of its constitutional role, versus the Executive Office of the President and its constitutional role…there will be dramatic tensions. And I think they really get joined when it comes to something as serious as war and peace or the War Powers Act. Again, I think the President, as Commander-in-Chief, has to be able to act without having to go through a long, drawn out congressional debate as to whether he has the authority to do this or that. The President derives tremendous authority, not just from the Constitution, or legal interpretations over time by the Executive Branch of War Powers Act, but by a number of the emergency powers the President derives from such as the International Emergency Powers Act. And I think that everybody understands how critical it is for the President to be able to act decisively and in timeframes that are sometimes less than what others from the Congress might think are reasonable in order to protect our national security. After the fact many, I would guess, might debate whether it was a decisive act within the President’s Constitutional prerogatives or a declaration of war. And, you know, that tension is probably a healthy tension - that there is that debate. But I don’t think that debate should forestall the President being able to exercise his authority to protect the nation when it needs to be protected.

Smith: I imagine a classic case in the Ford years would be the Mayaguez incident, where clearly it was in a fog to begin with, with things developing almost minute-by-minute. Just in an operational sense, it would be difficult to keep people informed.

Goldfield: It is, and how to inform the Congress, when to inform the Congress, and where’s the line, is going to be the subject of countless speeches, articles, and criticisms by both sides. Again, I fall back on the constitutionally derived prerogatives of the President, on the side of the Executive, when it comes to much of this. Because, when you’re there, you realize that there isn’t the luxury of time. You’ve got to act. You’ve got to respond. American soldiers’ lives are often on the line and our security is on the line. That’s not to say that someone should act precipitously or without the facts, but I’m not sure that you can ask for permission in each and every case. I think that the Counsel’s Office has made pretty clear where they believe the line is in terms of what triggers the Congress’ role under the War Powers Act.

Smith: Presumably, Ford had an advantage – a credibility built up over many, many years of interacting with his colleagues on the Hill - that he brought to that kind of situation which you can’t really quantify. That said, however, clearly things were changing and the ’74 election did produce a bumper crop of, at the very least, skeptics, profound skeptics, who did not have that personal relationship with Ford. Was there a tension there?

Goldfield: I wasn’t at a level to really understand or see that tension play out firsthand, but, you know, people were rightfully skeptical of presidential decision-making as a result of the Watergate episode. So, I think, again, the healthiest thing for our country is open debate. I think debate gives us the opportunity to air all sides of an issue and hopefully the decision maker is smarter and reaches a better decision as a result. I think that the skeptics were rightfully interested in what’s happening, what the information is that’s causing the President to put troops on alert or the like, and why aren’t we better informed about that. And I think, again, it goes to a balance, there ought to be strong consultation where there can be such - but, again, we can’t take one incident and then tie the President’s hands with respect to his ability to act in a reasonable fashion in the face of a threat or danger to our national security. So that tension, I think, will always exist and I’m not so sure that’s not a healthy tension.

Smith: Well, there’s a reason they call it healthy skepticism. But when healthy skepticism shades over into cynicism or a kind of reflexive distrust of the executive – and, certainly, there were pockets of that as a result of not only Watergate, but Vietnam as well—

Goldfield: As I said, with the legacy of Vietnam, of Watergate, etc., we were in very troubled waters. The skeptics are right to be skeptical, but that skepticism, I don’t think, should detract from the powers enumerated to the President as Commander-in-Chief to protect our security.

Smith: What was the mood around the place – and I realize you weren’t in the Oval Office – but just generally around the White House in April of ’75 as it became clear that Vietnam was falling?

Goldfield: Well, you couldn’t not be affected, especially by everything that you saw on the television every night about what was happening in Vietnam. There was a very serious mood. But, again, I think I’d be exaggerating or overreaching to say that I was there as a firsthand observer in the Cabinet Room or Roosevelt Room or Situation Room. I wasn’t.

Smith: Were you in the Counsel’s Office at that point?

Goldfield: I was in Counsel’s Office starting in June of ’75, as I recall.

Smith: Yeah.

Goldfield: But I was able to see just how tense a situation it can be. I remember getting a call to come in because - and I’m trying to stretch my memory a bit - a couple of our soldiers had been shot at or killed when they were cutting down a tree that was blocking the view of North Korea at the time, I believe.

Smith: Right.

Goldfield: So, seeing how tense that was gave me, I think, a real bird’s eye view into how tense situations can be. And, certainly, with the fall of Vietnam and what the President and his Cabinet and National Security staff had to deal with, you could feel the tenseness. But, again, I wasn’t a participant in the Security Council debate.

Smith: One of the criticisms that has been made over the years, particularly of the early months of the Ford presidency, was that wasn’t up to Presidential standards. Now, clearly, that’s a broad brush when you consider people like Bill Seidman, who went on to very distinguished careers, and Buchen as well. Part of it was the congressional staff. It was less Grand Rapids per se, but there was a sense that there were some people who rose to the occasion and others who—

Goldfield: Well, some of them rose to the occasion and went on to be members of Congress themselves. But what I think the Grand Rapids team brought was some sound judgment, a sense of self-confidence without being arrogant at all, there was no arrogance, very smart individuals. Whether it was Bill Seidman - who was a very good friend - or Phil Buchen or others, I think what the country wanted, President Ford brought them, which was ‘You can trust us. We have good judgment. We’re solid. We’re honest.’ It was a time that trust was sorely needed because of Watergate and because of the skepticism surrounding Watergate and Vietnam. So, I think there could not have been a better person for that job at that time than President Ford. There was never any arrogance about that man and he took his role seriously and I think he clearly understood how the Congress worked. And, as I said, he had friends on both sides of the aisle and I think he used that currency when he had to, although, you couldn’t use it each and every time, nor did they cash it all the time in terms of Congress’ response.

Smith: If you talk to someone who didn’t know who Phil Buchen was, describe him, what he did, and what his role was.

Goldfield: I’d say that Phil Buchen was as much a “counselor” to the President as he was Counsel to the President. He understood his role was to protect the Office of the President from a counsel’s standpoint, from the perspective of protecting the legal authorities and protecting the President and the White House staff in terms of understanding where the red lines were in terms of the law and making sure that everything operated at the White House and within the Cabinet agencies according to both the letter and spirit of the law.

But, I think Phil’s true strength was the fact that he had such a close relationship to the President from their days as law partners. Phil had tremendous judgment. Again, there was no need for him to have any great limelight and he would always give the President his honest assessment of a situation as counselor. And, I think, because of who Phil was as an individual, the President wanted him as a member of the Cabinet. As I recall, Phil was one of the few counsels who also had the rank of Cabinet member and I think that was critical, not just for the internal deliberations that occurred, but also for people’s perception, that here you have the President’s top legal advisor sitting at the cabinet table to ensure that some of the misguided transgressions of the past - there would be no countenance of that in this presidency.

Smith: When you came into that office, did he explain the governing principles of this office or this administration? How were you initiated to the Ford-Buchen view of things?

Goldfield: As a White House summer intern, we got a snapshot on a weekly basis, if not more frequently, of senior White House staff and mid-level White House staff, what they were working on, how the place operated, what the priorities were, et cetera. And, if you spent time reading as much as you could about what was happening at the White House in terms of internal memos or the daily press briefings, you got pretty smart pretty quickly on what the issues of the day were and where the President stood on some of these issues. But, you also got the sense from your weekly interviews with the likes of Don Rumsfeld, as I mentioned, or Hartmann or others, as to how they viewed the priorities and the process. And that was very, very instructive. I think I was - I don’t know - 24 or so years old at the time and a law student. But it was very instructive as to how the White House operates and that it’s a place that’s filled with human beings with their strengths and with their weaknesses and one got to see that it’s not always perfection in terms of either the process or the substance because it is human beings that are the players.

Smith: The Justice Department had been at the heart of a lot of the problems. One senses that, for example, in choosing Ed Levi as Attorney General or John Paul Stevens for the Court, that the President (presumably Phil Buchen) were very cognizant of the need to clean up the situation.
Goldfield: I think these appointments were a reflection of President Ford and his own character. Phil Buchen knew how to qualify and quantify that reflection of the President’s own character and desires. So, whether it was Ed Levi or Stevens – and I think - was Scalia the head of Office of Legal Counsel at the time?

Smith: May have been.

Goldfield: I may be mixing up my presidencies. But there was always—

Smith: He was at the Justice Department.

Goldfield: Right. I think during the Ford tenure, he was the head of the Office of Legal Counsel, but it was a very compatible and healthy process between White House Counsel’s Office and the Justice Department. And, again, I’ll use the word trust. While we didn’t always have to agree, that debate produced a better product. There was never a sense that Justice was telling us what we wanted to hear as opposed to what their view of the particular issue or their response to the particular question should be from their standpoint. And so that’s why, I think, the judgment, the character, the self-confidence, but not arrogance of many of the senior White House staff really served the President well. Because it wasn’t telling the Justice Department ‘You will do this.’ It was respecting their own independence and intellect. Again, lawyers often disagree, but it was disagreeing without being disagreeable and allowing the debate to occur.

Smith: It was explicit that Ed Levi and the Justice Department were to be non-political. For example, he had nothing to do with the campaign in ’76. Did that extend back to the Counsel’s Office as well? To be as non-political as you could be?

Goldfield: I never considered our office to be partisan. That was true under Phil Buchen and President Ford and it was true under Fred Fielding and President Reagan because, once you allow yourself to be more partisan than providing unfettered advice based upon the law, I don’t think you serve the President’s interest. That doesn’t mean we weren’t political ourselves, but they weren’t asking us for a political opinion. There’s a political office at the White House. We had to review everything that went into the President’s office or that came out from a legal standpoint. Was it based on sound legal principles and sound legal reasoning? Under what authorities was the President being asked to take some action? Was he acting within those bounds? Now, we’re all human beings, so I’m sure our own political desires crept in at times, but by no means were they the overriding or the centerpiece of anything that we did in either counsel’s office. The President got fair, unfettered advice. The senior White House staff got fair, unfettered advice, whether they liked the particular advice or not.

Smith: Is it fair to describe the Counsel’s Office as the President’s in-house lawyer, in-house law firm? Describe the Counsel’s Office.

Goldfield: Counsel’s Office had to deal with such a huge range of issues. While the issues all in some way touched upon Presidential authority, many of them were pretty far removed from the most serious issues of the day. So, he had a group of mostly very smart, very seasoned lawyers, again, who understood what their role was and I think, at least as far as the two counsel’s office I was fortunate to be members of, we never tried to stretch our role into something that it wasn’t. So, it was a pretty good group of smart lawyers that came from various backgrounds. We’d sit in staff meetings and there’d be a healthy discussion of the issues, free and healthy discussion of the issues.

Smith: And Buchen would preside over that?

Goldfield: Well, I’m trying to remember. I’m not sure that I can recall back that far as to those staff meetings, but he had people like Bill Castleman and Rod Hills and Barry Roth and Ken Lazarus and Bobby Kilburg, for the most part, really top-notch lawyers who didn’t have an axe to grind or personal agenda.

Smith: We’ve interviewed Bobby. Had there been a woman in the Counsel’s Office before her?

Goldfield: I don’t know. I don’t recall. She is terrifically bright. She was a fabulous lawyer and, again, one of those individuals who was not afraid of speaking truth to power and that’s what you need in Counsel’s Office. It doesn’t mean that you have to be nasty in how you speak truth to power, but you need to be able, as a lawyer in that office, given the issues that sometimes you have to deal with, to be able to speak truth to power and she clearly was one of those and was respected for that.

Smith: And, clearly, Buchen welcomed that.

Goldfield: Welcomed that. Phil did not shy away from whatever the advice was that needed to be given. He never shied away because it may not be the most politically expedient answer. Never shied away from that. And that, I think, was the value of his tenure and, in my view, the value of Fred Fielding’s tenure.

Smith: Did Buchen ever talk about the pardon?

Goldfield: I don’t recall ever having a conversation with him about the pardon. But, again, it was so long ago that we may have had soft discussions. But I don’t think I did.

Smith: Did he ever tell Ford stories? They’d been friends for so many years. Did he ever talk about his old friend?

Goldfield: No. He may have done that with some of his peers. Don’t forget, I was a law clerk. I was not one of the lawyers for the President and when I wasn’t in Counsel’s Office working, I was going to law school. So, I wasn’t privy to too many of those conversations. But there was healthy camaraderie in the office and a tremendous amount of respect for both Phil Buchen and the President. So, I’m sure that there were occasions when Phil talked to Bobby or the like and there was a story or two, but it was a wonderful family at the time in Counsel’s Office and I think that was real important to the spirit that pervaded the office in the White House. President Ford had such respect from everybody that was there and deservedly so. And, as I said, some of my best friends today are people that I met in that White House at the time.

Smith: Ed Levi’s a pretty impressive figure, isn’t he?

Goldfield: He was very impressive. Again, I saw a lot of what came out of the Levi Justice Department, but I’d had very limited exposure to the man himself as a lowlv^law clerk in that office.
Smith: And John Paul Stevens may be one of the last justices to be chosen on the grounds of sheer legal talent as opposed to an ideological or philosophical bent. Clearly, the President was persuaded that Stevens was a moderate or moderate conservative. Stevens himself always insisted that he was and that he remained the same. There are those who claim that Ford – because, of course, you had this running narrative that Presidents are surprised by the people they put on the Court – and so there’s a desire to put Ford in that. The fact of the matter is that he was extraordinarily proud of that selection.

Goldfield: Because of the character of the person. I think that’s what mattered a lot to President Ford. And, again, I didn’t know the President very well. I got to know his son Jack a bit and stayed in touch with his son Jack for awhile. We’d hung out together as some of the younger White House staff members would.

Smith: Did Jack introduce you to any of his celebrity friends? Bianca Jagger, for instance?

Goldfield: I stayed pretty low-key, but Jack was a friend and Rod Spackman, another White House summer intern who’d been one of Jack’s closest friends. So we hung out together. But, going back to your question about Justice Stevens, I think it goes back to the character of the individual. What I think the President cared most about was - you’d assume that the person would meet the standard of legal excellence - but then what’s the character of the person? My guess is that meant a lot. I remember getting a call from Phil Buchen saying, “You’ve got to take a letter up to the Supreme Court and you’ve got to leave right now. Call us every five minutes when you’re in the White House car.” Well, it turned out that was the letter in response to the resignation of Justice Douglas. I didn’t know it at the time.

Smith: Of course, there had been a history.

Goldfield: Right, but I didn’t know at the time. That’s what I was carrying up there or carrying back, but I knew something was up when the car pulled back into the White House and all the cameras are flashing all over the place. That was sort of my little snippet of history.
Smith: You delivered it to Justice Douglas’ chambers?

Goldfield: Yeah.

Smith: His secretary?

Goldfield: I don’t remember at the time because I didn’t know what I was delivering, you know. Was it an invitation to a White House dinner?

Smith: So you didn’t know it was a response to his resignation.

Goldfield: No.

Smith: Okay.

Goldfield: Which, you know, showed that I wasn’t really part of the senior decision-making process. But I didn’t realize what it was at the time. On the way back in the car, I think somebody told me what I was involved in, but not when I was taking the letter up, as I recall. But it was a great opportunity to work in a White House to see it from the inside out. Again, it’s filled with human beings, most of whom are tremendously capable, tremendously trustworthy, and hugely loyal, not just to the President, but to the office in which they serve. I got to see a lot of really great people work and I think sacrifice lots of family time for their country.

Smith: I realize you were insulated from politics, but there’s no more political place in the White House, than particularly in an election year. Looking back and knowing what you know now, was there a sense that the White House was slow to take the Reagan challenge seriously? To accept that Reagan would in fact run, or realize just how formidable a challenge Reagan might pose?

Goldfield: Well, a few of the people that helped me get to the Ford White House were Mike Dever, Ed Meese, and others. They’d helped me a bit because I knew them when I was a Coro Foundation Fellow and I had helped run a campaign for one of then Governor Reagan’s cabinet members, Brian van Kamp, who was running for Secretary of State. Also, Craig Fuller, who was, and is today, one of my closest friends in life, was a Coro Foundation Fellow with me, ran the Youth Programs for Governor Reagan, I think, so I got to spend a lot of time with the Reagan folks. So, from my perspective, serving in the Ford White House and being very loyal to President Ford, I understood full well how creative and smart and politically astute those folks were. At the same time, Stu Spencer was running the Ford campaign. His daughter Karen was a White House summer intern and today is still one of my good friends, as is Stu. But Stu Spencer is as good as it gets in terms of Presidential politics or politics at large.

So, I think they realized how formidable Governor Reagan was, but they also realized the power of the bully pulpit of the presidency. And, you know, I think the American public saw in President Ford somebody they could trust. Now, why didn’t we win the election against Jimmy Carter? I’m not sure of that. I just think that with the legacy from Watergate and the legacy from Vietnam, people wanted a change from that. But President Ford came pretty darned close to winning that election. As I recall, in Ohio or Hawaii, I forget what it was, it wasn’t that much of a difference. They were very close. If those states had come in for Ford, there could’ve been a different outcome. We were all very disappointed, crushed that the man who we believed in so much didn’t get the final nod from the American public.

Smith: Afterwards, he said to intimates, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.” And there is a suggestion it took him awhile to bounce back.

Goldfield: Well, it has to because, when you’re spending so much time running for that office and in that position at the time, you put your heart and your soul into that race. He was a competitive guy in that respect, as one would hope he would be, and I think he gave it a tremendous fight. Again, we were all disappointed knowing the man from the inside that he didn’t win that election. But he’s not somebody, my guess, that ever held many grudges. He had enough self-confidence without being arrogant that he could move on with his life and do so with his head up high. And he had self-deprecating humor. I mean, we hung out with Kennerly, too, at times, and Ford made fun of himself and he wasn’t afraid to engage in that self-deprecating humor which is part of the man and part of the character why he was so well liked up on Capitol Hill.
Smith: Did you resent, on his behalf, the Saturday Night Live, caricature – which was kind of a metaphor for whether this guy’s up to the job?

Goldfield: In each and every one of his important actions, I think, he left the public feeling better off than before and they realized the character they had in the man. So, I think that the public caricatures of President Ford not being able to chew gum and walk - you know, the fellow was a hell of an athlete and he went to pretty well-respected academic institutions and law schools, so I think he probably sat there and laughed when he saw it rather than resented it and threw something at the TV. He was very comfortable in his own skin and that came across to everybody who came in touch with him, very comfortable in his own skin. And, as I say, I had nothing but tremendous respect for the President and Mrs. Ford and the family. I think we were lucky to have him at the time to fill what was a huge gap at the time of trust.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Mrs. Ford?

Goldfield: Very, very limited contact with Mrs. Ford. Maybe in passing. As I said, I had much more contact having a beer or two or three with Jack, you know, because we were the same age and hung out.

Smith: Where would you hang out?

Goldfield: Oh, we’d be at a friend of ours at a summer place near Annapolis. We’d just go there and hang out and do things that kids in their twenties do, drink a beer or two and enjoy themselves. We all worked pretty hard and so, you know, it was all good-natured fun. Other than some beers, I didn’t see anything other than that going on. Maybe too many beers at times, but what twenty-year old hasn’t had a couple beers more than he or she should’ve?

Smith: How do you think Gerald Ford should be remembered?

Goldfield: As the right man for the mission and the mission was to fill the gap. There was a huge gap. There was very little trust, very little respect for the office of the President. And, what we needed was somebody to rebuild that bridge, to fill that gap, so the public could once again have trust in their chief executive and commander-in-chief and those around him. And I think his legacy will be that he put us back on track, that he then filled that gap because he was a man of such strong and good character. And I think he really left a legacy that will be long remembered as people pay tribute to his character and how important that character was to help heal the wounds of Watergate and, to some extent, Vietnam.

Smith: So character counts.

Goldfield: And that’s what I said. When he made appointments, character counts.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. How did your path cross with Gerald Ford?

Eck: Well, before he was vice president was he Minority Leader?

Smith: He had been Minority Leader, right.

Eck: He’d been Minority Leader when he came. We didn’t have a hospital then, we just had a little clinic. At that time, the closest he could get into Vail was Grand Junction and they helicoptered him up to where Home Depot is now, which was the Bill Nottingham ranch. In fact, he got to be friendly with them to a certain level and went down to the house for dinner. And, I guess, even Bill with his cowboy boots and Neva, his wife, ended up in the Oval Office as his guest at some time. So, you can see how personable he was in interacting with the common folk around.

But in the first place, I was working with the Ski Patrol. I’d been a Vietnam veteran and my first year here was ’71. And the Ski Patrol guys, seeing Vail growing and instead of treating just broken legs out on the hill, they were treating heart attacks and medical problems. So, I got to work with them and actually took two winters off to Ski Patrol full-time. But when his medical team came out there, they were intending take over and take care of Ford. You know, he was vice president and especially when he became president. So, we found these fellows who were basically Navy medics to follow him around. I think Lukash was in the position at the time, Bill Lukash. He worked things out with me as far as what to do around the little clinic.

Now, it’s easier because we have a full bred hospital. But we had put together a cardiac program. This is before EMTs and paramedics were even invented. No one else had done it to my knowledge in the world. We had old defibrillators and cardiac drugs on the mountain. And we put together this rather sophisticated kit - actually, it started with an old suitcase - but we actually ended up with a pack because we were outdoor folks, mountaineering. The Ski Patrol had to be able to take it down efficiently and know how to work things in the snow. Because, in the snow, you’re not like in a warm operating room or emergency room, which most doctors, and frankly, a lot of the medics who came with him were used to. In fact, several came out of Washington and they had goulashes on and arctics and they had their gloves pinned to their shirt. And they were going to take over.

Well, we decided, as the Ski Patrol guys, not to interfere, but we would help them. But we also knew just watching them walk around that they were foreigners to snow. So, I remember, one of the medics got to be very well-known to everyone. We used to call him Ten Bubble because of some of the partying - drank ten bubbles before we could get on with the rest of the evening. And this is part of the background stuff that went on which no one else knows about.

Smith: Is that one reason why there were agents who particularly liked to come out to Vail?

Eck: Yes. Yes, they all got involved. I mean, actually, they still have homes here today and people in the community especially. Our head of the Ski Patrol director at the time was Paul Postwhite. And he and Larry Buendorf are best of buddies. In fact, Buendorf was at one of my weddings, just attending because he had his own place here for a couple of years. But we all got to know each other. Anyway, they were impressed with this pack that we had put together, the cardiac pack, which now is almost standard. And they modified everything they had in the White House as well as what traveled with him in the medical emergency pack based on what we had. They would call periodically and ask ‘What are you doing out there?’ and ‘What’s going on?’ And we found at least through Ford, and I understand the next couple of presidents, because we had still the same contingent of what we used to call Sneaky Pete’s rather than the Secret Service. That was our little game with them. They would call and interact. We would tell them where to go and what the new equipment was and what we were doing.
But, I can’t remember his name, old Ten Bubble, but we got him out there on a snow mobile and we were going to show him a typical setting if something bad might happen. And the first thing he did when he stepped off the snowmobile was step and posthole down to his waist and he was helpless. He had just his galoshes around. All of a sudden, he looked around and said, “You guys take over. We’re getting out of this. We’ll just be back and help you.” So, from then on, the Ski Patrol got engaged, and actually before every time they came out, they used our protocols and our medications which followed him around. Now, what we had established in ’72, ’73, and ’74 is used everywhere. I think other people not necessarily copied us, but that is just what evolved as the emergency medical system got more sophisticated.

So, anyway, I had a connection there. They knew who I was and involved. When he became president, he was good friends with the Gramshammers. There was some medical issue there and they wanted someone involved, so Sheika Gramshammer actually sent them to me and we got along very well. I’m a small town kid from northeastern Pennsylvania, the Pocono Mountains. He’s from Grand Rapids and had an amazing rapport with the whole family. So it was privilege to be involved with that.

Smith: Was it, in the abstract, at all intimidating?

Eck: The first day I was going to meet him. I was there and knew he was coming in, and I was a little intimidated personally. The moment he got in, he just started talking like myself. I mean, I didn’t grow up in a big city. I went to a small town high school, a small college. I did go to medical school. So, our vocabularies were somewhat similar. I mean, you could tell. So, there was a bond. And after the first time, he agreed to call me Jack. He wanted me to call him Jerry. I said, “Out of respect, it’s President Ford” this is a different deal. And Betty was Betty and I was Jack and we got to know the kids. Of course, the kids came out then and they were younger and they interacted with other ski instructors and Ski Patrol people. In fact, some of them had some parties back at the White House, which I guess I’ll leave to some other historian. So they got to be part of the community, too.

Smith: At that point, Beaver Creek didn’t exist, as I understand.
Eck: That’s right. It did not.

Smith: And Vail was smaller and less elaborate than it is today?

Eck: Yes, the core of Vail, you see, was just about what it is where there’s the main street. Where the big parking structure is there in town, actually, when they first came, Lions Head parking structure wasn’t there, but the later periods it was. But there were actually in Vail three little hotels, The Night Latch, Poor Richards, and Short Swing. Of course, the Fords didn’t stay there, but then there was a gravel parking lot. And you came across the Covered Bridge, it was still there, and those core buildings you see in those streets were there. And Mill Creek, where they stayed at the Bass residence, and they got to be good friends with Fitzhugh and Ilene Scott who were next door neighbors and they shared a swimming pool between them. Both Fitz and he liked to swim.

So I got involved with the Scotts, who were patients of mine, too, and there’s another story out there that goes with the Scotts that we can come back to. So, they actually shared pools and through social events, I would come over when the Fitzhughs and Scotts were entertaining. Actually, he was the first architect here in Vail. He was the guy that put the curve in the street. If you notice, when you go across from where The Left Bank restaurant is and you go by Pepi’s and you go by Gramshammer’s, it’s a curve put there on purpose. Fitzhugh always wanted it so you didn’t know quite what was around the corner and entice you to walk out and of course you have the spectacular Grand Traverse on the Gore Range come into view, he put in there. Anyway, that part was interesting. And they had the old gondola there which was parallel to the New Vista Bahn, which is the high speed lift now. And another chair lift and that was it. Another gondola was put in Lion’s Head which had a bad accident in ’76 or ’77 and they had to modify that but then everything expanded west.

Smith: At that point, the President was very much an active skier.

Eck: An active skier, yes. And, in fact, when he skied, Pepe Gramshammer was always there. He was his instructor and our ambassador.

Smith: Pretty good instructor.
Eck: He was a great instructor, the world’s best. And they had a contingent of Ski Patrol guys. And everyone had their own nicknames and they had their own nicknames on the crew. Chupa Nelson and George Cisneros were always assigned the Fords when they came out. Of course, they knew all the Secret Service, so everybody interacted and interplayed and it actually worked very well.

Smith: Sounds like it was pretty relaxed.

Eck: It was really relaxed and it was a lot of fun. I mean, people were serious. The Secret Service had a big telescope which they’d mounted on top of one hotel, so they would see in above the hill while the rest of us were working. And I remember one day, the Ski Patrol, which was very, very proud of their perfectionism and how well they took care of people. The Secret Service got a jab in because at the end of the day when you would ski, everyone would come down and we would have to go over the whole mountain and we did what we’d call a sweep. So it was sweep time and you’re looking for people that are hurt or injured. Every once in awhile, somebody would hide in the trees because they’d want to ski by themselves and you couldn’t find them. But that was a real ritual. Now, it’s easier because we still do it but we use radios. Then we only had one or two radios on the mountain. So you had to wave off to each other visually when you’d clear a slope. Well, apparently, somebody was missed and one of the Sneaky Pete’s up there was looking at the telescope and found them and called the Ski Patrol guys and gave us a hell of a ribbing. So, yeah, the jousting occurred a lot. It was wonderful.

Smith: So, at that point, was there basically one ski area?

Eck: Yeah, it was really Vail. Beaver Creek didn’t come on – they started doing things there in ’74 or ’75, but until it really came online, it was ’76, ’77, ’78.

Smith: Was there ever in fact any kind of security scare that you were aware of?

Eck: If there was, I’m not aware, but I’ve forgotten. I think there was one time someone was concerned something would happen, but it got to be a comedy of mistakes and errors. I can’t remember. But nothing ever serious happened. I think the thing that they recognized, though he didn’t verbalize it until years later. They were comfortable here, because, again, if you’ve got a national figure or even John Elway and you walked into Vail unannounced, there’d always be a crowd. Here no one ever bugged them. They let them go. I’m sure people would turn their heads and look or point, but they really mixed in.

Smith: Which I think they would’ve appreciated all the more because, even when he went back to Grand Rapids, I think the bane of his existence were autograph seekers, particularly, commercial. And he got to the point where he recognized them and that was hard to shake. But my sense is that here that was not a concern.

Eck: It really wasn’t. And I’ve got to hand it to him because he and I had conversations as he retired and he had more time, and especially as he got a little older, he would reminisce and we would sit in the office one-on-one and talk beyond immediate issues. And I guess he used me for sort of venting and sometimes not venting, but one thing he kept bringing up, he said, “You know, there was a responsibility to being president. People come and they interact.” But he didn’t mind it around here that interaction, because he knew it was friendly and they’d been involved in the community. And if they asked for signatures, he said, “You know, that’s part of it. They respected it. I don’t mind signing some.” But the bane, like you said, was the commercial guys. If it was some kid or someone else, he said, “That’s my responsibility. They go to me and this is it and I expect that.” So I thought there a very, I hate to say it, mature way to look at it.

Smith: It’s a very interesting recognition - that a former president has a kind of unique responsibility; it doesn’t end when you leave office. How would you characterize his skiing?

Eck: I would say he was advanced intermediate. When you only ski once a year or a couple times a year, no matter who, that’s good. He was stable and he was strong. Was he pretty? No. But he was comfortable. I mean, if you looked at him and not being like high Ski Patrol level or instructor, you would say he’s got a way to go, but if you were someone else, you would probably say he’s a good recreational skier. And he was safe and he was strong. Now, I used to hear the rumors about winging balls on the golf courses. Frankly, I’m a hacker and I wouldn’t want anybody out there. I would nail them right away. There he was a world class athlete. Was he All-American? I can’t remember what level.

Smith: Yeah.

Eck: More athletic than some of the pundits there who used to tick me off.

Smith: That raises a question whether in any of those conversations - the whole Chevy Chase caricature - Did it bother him?

Eck: If it did, he didn’t express it. He’d say “Oh, damn it,” and he’d go on. He wouldn’t sit and dwell on anything. To me he had a nice perspective on it.

Smith: What did bother him?

Eck: You know, from my perspective, not an awful lot. It’s really interesting and I’ll come back to your question of what I think. I used to sit here and think, “Here I am. Who else in the world would have the privilege? I’m one-on-one with the guy who held the most power in the world and he respects me for what I know. I respect him for what he knows. And it’s just two guys hanging out.” I mean, there wasn’t any intimidation.

Smith: In fact, a relationship of equals.

Eck: Yeah, and I never thought of it that way, but once I got comfortable with him. Until after he passed away. I said, “I just can’t believe that in my own life that I had the privilege of doing that.” But back to the one thing that would bother him. He would say some things that annoyed him and it really wasn’t the public, but it was either some other political thing. And he wouldn’t say it adversely, he would just shake his head. “Well, I’m not going there.”

Smith: From a very early age, I think, probably from his folks, he was taught to seek the good in everyone. He made a very conscious effort to do that. The only two people I ever heard him speak disparagingly of - and the worst epithet he could come up with was “He’s a bad man” - one was Gordon Liddy and one was John Dean.
Eck: I actually never heard him comment on those two. He would say, “Things happen in life which, at the time, seemed awful and annoyed me, and now I look in perspective it really doesn’t matter.” Not that he was dismissive, obviously, whatever made an impact on him, but it was good.

Smith: Did he talk about Nixon?

Eck: No. I never asked. I know some doctors can be in people’s faces and I had some nice mentors, myself. And my position, as seeing a patient, was not to get into ‘What’s wrong with this? What happened?’ but rather ask open questions and let them take the time and talk. My philosophy was the patient really knows what’s going on and they know how to talk to you about it, and if you ask the right questions, they’re going to give you the diagnosis. You don’t even really need labs, you just guide them. My relationship was more open, so actually, he did most of the talking, almost what you’re doing with me here as a diagnostician. That was my style and maybe that’s what he liked. I don’t know.

Smith: He clearly took care of himself all his life. I assume there are good patients and not-so good patients. I assume he was a good patient.

Eck: An unbelievably good patient. Most patients never follow the prescribed medications, they do their own thing, and they’ll apologize for it sometimes, but that didn’t bother me. Again, openly, I would say, “That’s all the best I can do. I’ll be glad to help you in every way you want to and if this doesn’t work, how do you want it to work and I’ll try to make it work for you.” And I would use that same openness with him. So, I didn’t treat him very differently in my diagnostic style than with anyone else. I just wasn’t an in-the-face doc, I think.

Smith: Did you ever see the temper?

Eck: Yeah, occasionally.

Smith: How would that manifest itself? Was it on the golf course? On the ski lift?

Eck: I mean, I’d see it there in the office as “Damn that guy,” but I never saw it out there in the community. I purposefully stayed away from the limelight. I had opportunities where I could be seen and I could see some people around town who wanted to be seen. But I’d say, “You know, I’m a physician. I’m out of it until he wants me there.” I just stayed out of it.

Smith: We’ve been told that the temper it was like a summer thunderstorm. It would erupt and then it would disappear. It was almost a cathartic kind of experience.

Eck: I never really saw that. You know, the most amazing time in my life was actually the last time I saw him. And I don’t think I’m breaching anything right here.

Smith: There were clearly a number of folks who didn’t want them to come up here those last couple summers.

Eck: Oh, a lot of people didn’t. And I said, “It’s up to you” because I got the calls.

Smith: You did.

Eck: Yeah. And I set things up. I said, “Whatever level he can come and function, I have no guarantees that he’ll survive here, but I’ll make it work for him whatever. If he needs the oxygen or needs the care.” And he had good folks with him. But near the last year or two when he was here, I got our cardiologist engaged with helping out, Larry Gaul. Larry is an interesting character. When he came here, he was a college drop-out in the ‘70s. Worked as a waiter in the Red Lion. Long story short, went back to school and finished it and went on and became a cardiologist at the Hershey Medical Center where he did his training, which is internationally known. He returned here because he was a ski instructor at one time.

But when he [GRF] was having difficulty standing up, he’d get light-headed and fall, I was part of the background on that. We got down to the end and I don’t know how much of this they reveal, so I’m going to be careful what I say, but we sat down there and we knew that the heart was failing, the heart valve was gone, I’d seen the echocardiograms.

Smith: Congestive heart failure?
Eck: Yeah, congestive heart failure. He had a bad valve. And that whatever we needed to do, would do one or two things. The most we could say, you’d have two years left. Or the other option was surgery but he might die in surgery immediately.

Smith: Was that the Mayo Clinic option?

Eck: Yeah. And, this is where I learned the character of the man. That’s what impressed me, I’ll never forget in my life. So the setting was discussed that we would send him to Mayo. The Fords had a connection there and, fortunately, our cardiologist Larry Gaul knew the cardiologist up there, Buzz Miller, and they talked about it. And the other option is, if you do nothing, you probably have six months to whatever quality time he could spend with the grandkids. So, a decision is, do we go to Mayo and get an operation right now? Or do we sit back and know you’re going to have an okay struggle like you’re doing, but still function - he could still look out the window and see the kids come by - and be gone in six months, no more than a year or two? Or just head out to the desert? What do you want to do?

So, the setting was, he was confined to a wheelchair. Myself and Larry Gaul went up to the house in Beaver Creek and there was Vaden and Susan and Betty and Larry Gaul and myself and they rolled him in and we just sat there in a circle. No one from the Secret Service, they were all gone. No one was in the room. There might have been someone else, one of the nurses or caretaker. I can’t remember now. So I sort of set the stage of what we’ve got, what he was dealing with. Because this is when he wanted to go back and do that last, remember he was back in Washington at one of the Medal presentations when he had a tough time and he had to sit down.

Smith: Yeah, that was the last meeting of the Ford Foundation in D.C.

Eck: Right. And we set him up with special drinks to use, you know, Propel, which was a fluid he took all the time. We told him to stand up and wait awhile before he moved. He finally started mentally, not able to get it because he wasn’t getting enough blood pressure. So intellectually, I saw it, so I knew it was happening on TV. So, anyway, we set the setting and then Larry Gaul actually then went into the details of all those options which I just outlaid. If he went to Mayo right now. He might need a bypass surgery and might need the valve. If it was successful you might have a maybe okay two years. You might die right there and miss it.

Smith:
I don’t mean to interrupt, but I was talking with Penny through all of that. I remember her telling me that the people at the Mayo were very confident that they had these procedures and everything else and they wouldn’t have advised it if they didn’t believe there was a good chance of succeeding.

Eck:
Right, because he still was fit. As fit as he could be. You know, someone else maybe we would have discouraged it, but with him, the same thing, we let him have the option. But how this rolls out is what impressed; I’m going to tell you next. So, I’ve gone through those details and Larry laid it out and he asked everyone in our circle for their opinions. We had a big coffee table here and there’s sofas all around and all two, four, five, six of us were sitting there. So, he was in a wheelchair and he would rock back and forth, you know, he was a little fuzzy at times, but he started talking about some things.
He was clear-minded and he listened to the options that Dr. Gall laid out.
And he looks up after sitting there for five or six minutes, I mean, it seemed like it was just silence, he says, “Vaden, what do you think I should do?” So, of course, this caught Vaden by surprise, so Vaden went on with what he thought. I’m not going to reveal what they talked about. And he said, “Susan, what do you think?” I think one of the sons was there. I can’t remember, but it wasn’t Jack. I think Mike was there. He said, “Mike, what do you think?”,” “Betty, what do you think?”, “Larry, what do you think?”,” “Jack, what do you think?” So we all tried to be supportive, informative, but tried to take the heat off it.

It didn’t matter to us, it was his decision. And he stopped and he sat there for five minutes, ten minutes, fifteen minutes, and said nothing. We all just stared straight ahead. And then I saw him rise up like this and I thought God, he looks like an athlete. I mean, you could see determination. He says, “Let’s go to Mayo.” And I’m still getting chills just talking about it. Just like that.
Within an hour, the jet is on its way here. Everybody is scattered. They’re doing their thing. Larry and I got things taken care of on this side. And they had him out the door. And a couple hours after he left, I got a call from the Vail ER and that’s when Betty had her clots and Susan was going to be with her. So, I got her transferred immediately to Denver because I wanted her to see a cardiovascular surgeon. I’m not going to go into her medical file. The vascular surgeon stabilized Betty then flew her to Mayo to care for her so she could join President Ford at Mayo.

And, of course, once things didn’t work out, I mean, he got the bypass surgery, but obviously he couldn’t tolerate the medicines which he needed to support the heart, (it kept failing) so they sent him home to the desert. And that was September, October, and of course he was gone the day after Christmas.

Smith: But the issue was that basically, as you say, he couldn’t tolerate the medicines.

Eck: Right. If the medicines could have sustained him until his heart could’ve regathered its strength and its rhythm, I think he would’ve gone another two years. I really do. But the medicines kept dropping his which he couldn’t tolerate. But the point of the story is not the facts of medicine, but it was the way he came to his decision. And I was talking to the head of the secret sorrow contingent at the time, a tall fellow, he comes back every year. I see him at the concerts. He has a Polish name. Wonderful guy, he was the lead Secret Agent at the time. And I related, I said, “I can’t believe it. I just saw this going around and asking everyone’s input and sitting and then coming to his own conclusion.” He said, “You know, that’s exactly the way he ran everything at the White House and how made his major decisions.” I said, “Bingo.”

But I saw a part of his life that no one else except the inner circle saw. And the impact it had on me, the chill I got, to see how he made the decision, you can still see he had that competitive edge. That’s why I said he rose up. It was like ‘I’m going to block that guy. That guy’s not going to get by me.’ He was willing to put it out there, take the risk, and go for it. The rest is history. Anyway, I had to tell the story.
Smith: It’s a great story. One of the agents who we’ve interview, a guy named Todd Matanick, had a wonderful story. The last time that he left the Eisenhower Medical Center, maybe a couple of months before he passed away. But he gets out of the hospital and in the van with the Secret Service and they said, “We’ll go home now.” He said, “No, I want to go to In-and-Out Burger.” And they drive to In-and-Out Burger. He gets out of the van, he walks into In-and-Out burger, and stands in line. I mean, this guy had just got out of the hospital and he had to have his hamburger.

Eck: Did he have his butterscotch ice cream?

Smith: I thought it was always butter pecan.

Eck: Butter pecan.

Smith: You mentioned the butter pecan ice cream. Whenever I was around him anyway, he seemed to be an incredibly disciplined guy.

Eck: He really was.

Smith: In a lot of ways, including his diet. That seemed to be the one indulgence.

Eck: He swam diligently every day, even at the end when he could only do a half a lap or one lap. Of course, he had one of the Secret Service there in the pool. But, I mean, he was with it. He had it and he was focused. He was incredible. Also the personality of both he and Betty is, when he had more time there and he would start having more illnesses - I had a very busy practice - unannounced, they would come into the office and they would see me because I would always want to defer to him. He’d say, “Jack, I know you’re busy. I’ve got a book. I’m going to sit and read. When you get a chance to get to me, I’m here.” And sometimes Betty would come.

One day I will never forget. She’s in there and she’s sick. This is a different day from that day. She said, “Jack my agent out there is sicker than I am. Go take a look at her first.” I said, “Really?” She said, “Yeah, go see what she looks like.” So, I’m walking out in the hallway and of course there’s this woman agent and she’s obvious because she’s got the thing in her ear and the wires all connected and said, “Betty said she wants me to look at you first because she says you’re worse than she is.” And she just rolls her eyes. It was cute. But that’s the way they were. They were respectful of everyone else and everyone’s time. At least at that point in their lives.

Smith: A conversation I remember having with Penny over a fairly extended period of time; I think it got to the point where it was difficult for the staff. And I think it was difficult in some ways for the Secret Service because they’re not to provide medical treatment. That’s not their job.

Eck: They’re not medical people. They told him that many times. They were at risk. They didn’t want the liability, but they were it. They were the caretakers.

Smith: Exactly. And you don’t have to live in the White House - there’s got to be a threshold that’s very difficult to cross when you acknowledge to yourself that you need help first of all. Secondly, my sense was that Mrs. Ford was very reluctant to have caretakers. I mean, she wanted to take care of her husband.

Eck: Absolutely. The affection between them was incredible. I mean, it’s easy to say and somewhat trite to talk about them like two teenagers or whatever, but they cared and respected. But you could see it any time he was making a speech around town. He would say, “Betty and I,” it would always be “Betty and I.” In fact, from that, I picked that up. I sometimes give talks and speeches and I use my wife, and I thought, if he can do that, I care about my wife enough to do the same thing. So I copied it.

Smith: You’re right. It was a great love affair. It was also in some ways a classic of opposites attracting. The most obvious discrepancy - I mean, he was religiously punctual and that was not her bag. And he clearly had adapted himself to her schedule rather than the other way around. Did you see that at all?

Eck: Yeah, I did. I could see that. I can’t give you for instances, but I’d just been involved with social functions so many times that I could tell there was interesting things happening, that he was adjusting all the time. I really didn’t have as much access to him - I kept myself from it as far as personal access - when he was president. I just respected everyone else and I was here if he needed me. My access came a little more when he came back here and he was retired. Things became a little more casual. He would call the house. He had the number. It was interesting that he felt comfortable. For instance, just to show you how neat it is. I missed his 90th birthday or whichever one they had here. They had a champagne party and they had Dom Perignon. My own parents were failing. My dad had just passed away. My mom was 94. So I was going back and forth.

So, whatever that party, I couldn’t make. My wife made it. She was there. And they had talked, he got to know her and Betty got to know our family. So, that story aside, a couple months later, I had a sister who was visiting in town, she was in Denver, and I had a caretaker who was one of the…actually he was a good skier himself, but he drove backhoes. But I have a little five acre property and a barn and he sort of lived there, gave him a free place to stay and he was glad and he actually helped me out. So, one day, I didn’t know it was going on, I was gone. I was in the hospital seeing a patient. And my sister comes up to the house and this caretaker’s name was Butch. And here’s President Ford and Betty getting out of the limo, coming up with a couple of bottles of champagne and caught them both by surprise. But because I couldn’t make it, they wanted me to have it. Well, they didn’t have a clue I wasn’t here.

The mix up was, the Secret Service came up like they usually do, it’s going to be a little of a surprise, but where I live up this valley, you couldn’t get cell phone service at the time. So they came in, I found out later from another neighbor, they checked the place out and said, “Well, Jack’s not here. He’s probably at the hospital.” So they couldn’t get the communication. Meanwhile, the entourage drives in and assumes everything is clear and sees my sister and Butch out there. So they left the champagne and were very cordial. I still have those bottles set aside today. I couldn’t be there, but the fact that they personally would come out. They didn’t send an emissary or what could have been a major – and then they sent me a note. They always sent notes saying “I heard your dad’s not doing well”, “Your mom’s not doing well.” That was just so thoughtful. They didn’t need to do that.
Smith: And clearly they were not just visible, but in a very hands-on way, were actively involved in the community.

Eck: Absolutely they were. We actually tried in the mid-80s to get another Betty Ford Hospital here and use her name. And Betty was really a treat. People like Fred Green and Ed Rainey, you probably know they’re good friends with them.

Smith: We’ve talked to Fred.

Eck: Okay, and he was helping us set up from this side. He was quite a business man and he had other people that he knew from out there, because they went back and forth to the desert. And Leonard Firestone and some other folks that were their friends were going to maybe help support getting this here. So, myself and Doris Kirchner who’s actually now the CEO of our hospital, was actually, here as a COO of our hospital. At that time (she later went with Mike Shannon when he was president of Vail and then moved to the desert and started his KSL businesses). She became his HR person. Actually, she just retired and came back here. We needed a CEO and eventually she stepped up. But she and I were working from this side with Fred going back and forth with Betty. So, Doris and I flew out there one day and Betty looked at everything, we met John Schwarzlose and the whole crew out there. And every one of us said, “Yeah, we need to have this in Vail. We could use it. We had a clientele who could afford something like this.” It almost seemed like a go.

And then Betty called apologetically about two weeks later and didn’t talk to me personally but she talked to Doris. She said, “You know, I really want this going. It makes sense. It would go, but I just can’t.” And Doris said, “Well, anything we can do to help?” She says, “No, I know myself. If you’d known us when you’re here visiting that day, I was up cleaning the tables and I was up putting things aside and if it has my name on it, I get too over involved and I have to make sure it’s okay if it carries my name. And she said, “That takes an awful lot of time and I know if it was Vail I’m going to do the same thing in Vail.” “And, I think,” she said, “that would just wear me down.” So that was the reason she backed out. But isn’t that classic?
Smith: It is classic, because I knew the issue existed of in effect franchising the name.

Eck: And we wanted to be the pilot group because everything was in place. We had the same players that went back and forth.

Smith: Again, if this is uncomfortable, you don’t have to go there, but prior to the intervention that took place in ’78 out there, did you sense a problem?

Eck: No, I really didn’t. I wasn’t involved with them in that inner social circuit that they worked here. Again, I was in the background, even though I took care of all these same people they were with. I kept out so I didn’t see it. I didn’t have that contact. And I can’t say I was surprised, not because of her specifically, but that whole group of folks that are high-end, I mean, they do a lot of partying at a different level and that’s not to be critical or judgmental.

Smith: Two things. One, you look at the political culture 40 years ago. People just drank a lot more than they do now.

Eck: Oh, it was very different than now.

Smith: And, secondly, I found it fascinating, when we went out to the desert to talk to people, that it was a particular problem with the elderly. That there were people who had retired out there, been very successful, very accomplished, and indeed often there was almost a connection between the more accomplished, the more successful, but that it was a problem that particularly afflicted people in their ‘retirement years’.

Eck: Well, even if people would have a tendency, at least in their working years, they wouldn’t be at home or in a place they could do it except in the evenings or maybe an occasional cocktail at lunch if they did it. I mean, the worker bees wouldn’t be allowed to do that, but they could discreetly do it because it was a business meeting. But once they had the freedom, there’s vacant time out there. I mean, I can see why it would happen inadvertently - not that it was necessarily need - it’s just tradition.

Smith: Sense of humor? People who know her well know that she has a somewhat more ribald sense of humor than he did.
Eck: Yes, she does. I love that picture that came out after she left the White House where she’s on the table. That black and white photo. I said, you know that’s classic.

Smith: Free spirit.

Eck: Free spirit, yeah. He had a gentle sense of humor. He liked a ribald joke. He told me some jokes occasionally and we would share it. The first time I heard one, I thought “Geez, I don’t know if it’s protocol.” But even patients I got to know after awhile because it’s unique in an area like this - my patients were more like friends than patients. I didn’t have to look in the chart to see who’s walked in the door next. You’re part of a community. So, he would share some of his jokes with me. But again, I just stay out of that because of our professional relationship.

Smith: In my eulogy, I mentioned the fact that most of us, as we get older, tend to become a little more conservative. Partly nostalgia for what was and also we have more to conserve. And that didn’t seem to be the case with them. Some of it was the Republican Party moved further and further to the right on a lot of issues, particularly social issues. And I’ve often wondered, because, by the end of his life, they were sort of marooned within the party. A woman’s right to choose was an obvious issue, but there were others, too. Gay rights. Issues that you wouldn’t normally associate with a “conservative Republican” president. And I’m wondering how much of that was her influence on him. How much of it was just a kind of innate compassion that perhaps was intensified by the experience of the intervention and everything that followed? How much of it was maybe picked up from the surroundings out here? A little more libertarian, a little more liberal socially?

Eck: You know, he and I never talked much politics. Again, it was bantering, the social things about Vail. He always asked me questions about what’s happening in Vail. The only time something ‘political’ came up was when Clinton was in the White House. Remember, because of inflation, the stock market, the world looked very rosy. And Clinton took the fact and he turned it around and we have a big surplus and we still had a trillion dollar debt, but it was on the books. And he was reading the newspaper and shaking it around and said, “What do you think of all this, Jack?” which is the first time he asked me something like that. I said, “Well, you know, the economy, frankly, at times, it sucks. And he’s taking credit for a lot of this positive stuff.” And he said, “It’s interesting, I was made to look good and bad in the economy. Carter didn’t look good.” He talked about Reagan and his economics and turning around and, all of a sudden, Clinton came in and things look really rosy. Of course, that was before the 2000 crash. And he said, “You know, we’d like to take credit for when it’s good, but frankly, all you need to do is have Greenspan in your financial team. And we all looked at it that way.” In other words, the implication was, it didn’t matter what anybody did. The fact that Greenspan was there was the reason it did, even though the presidents take credit.

Smith: Do you think he was cautious about discussing politics with people? That he sort of held back a little bit from expressing opinions or raising subjects that might lend themselves—

Eck: Again, I wasn’t that involved in what he discussed with the President, because I was his doctor. We kept that distance. But he would occasionally come in. A lot of the old guard in town here had a Friday luncheon group called the No Name Luncheon Group and he would come over periodically and he was pretty open especially around people like Fred Green and Keith Brown and Bill Hanlon, you know, folks that he knew. And he was as wide open then as anybody could be. Within ourselves, ours was casual, it was social, it was light, it was personable on both sides, but I really didn’t get into politics with him. I’ve taken care of other presidents and vice presidents and ambassadors and foreign folks; I mean, they just kept referring me up not because I’m unique, I just happened to be in Vail where they came. But I saw a lot of these people and, first of all, I found out they’re like everybody else. And, frankly, they had the same gastrointestinal problems every other traveler has. Even though they looked very distinguished in front of these panels all over the world, they had diarrhea or constipation or anything or insomnia because of the jet lag. They’re human like everybody else. I got to know them there. So, nothing really transpired that much that could answer your question.
Smith: The altitude really wasn’t a problem until near the end?

Eck: Yeah, I mean, over the years, I got to see some of the - particularly when he was here - some of the press folks, I remember Helen Thomas and some of the other folks here would have problems with the altitude. Some I didn’t see, some my colleagues would see, but it did impact even some of the Secret Service, in fact, because they would be so macho, they didn’t want to leave. A couple of the guys, there were some problems with certain blacks or Mediterranean people have that their blood cells actually change. Sickel cell trait, for instance, when they’re at altitude and some of them were having trouble and wouldn’t leave and finally you just have to get them out because they were so mission-oriented to be here that they didn’t want to be a failure.

But the Fords never had that until near the end. But, again, they were in their 90s and they had a multiple set of problems and they would come in out of town frequently. If they would come and stay, you have to go through the acclimatization that’s probably what you’re feeling for three or four days and then all of a sudden you’re okay. But leave town for a day and then come back – in and out – that’s tough. That’s really unique.

Smith: And obviously she loved this place as much as he did.

Eck: Oh, absolutely. She really did. And I know from talking to other people, she would be checking in with her Vail friends, many of them - Margie Burdick, who is in a nursing home, particularly - in Grand Junction. You’ve probably heard that name. Sheika and Donna Meyer. The whole cast of characters.

Smith: But they had a lot of friends here.

Eck: They had a lot of friends here and it wasn’t just friends that were their friends because of who they were, but they were friends who were there before they were in the White House. Even at the time when he was just starting to get outside of being just a country lawyer and into the ranks of politics. So, the friendships went way back there. It wasn’t just because they were special people because you and I have seen people who search out someone because of the person, they want to rub elbows. These were just down-home friends that they would’ve had if they were back in Grand Rapids or Alexander or wherever they were.

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the extent of public reaction when he passed away? He’d been out of the public eye for awhile.

Eck: Yeah. You know, as I told you from how he made the decision to go to Mayo, I mean, that had still been in my mind. When he died, I had family for Christmas in town. I was invited to the private funeral in California and initially declined. However, the family and friends made sure that I was on a jet, my wife and I, to go out to the private funeral. We didn’t want to go back to Washington. I’m not into the big stuff. But that’s where I learned more because there was a couple hundred of us there and we viewed the casket and then we had a huge line which (I don’t know if you were there), wound around the church waiting to see Betty who was sitting up in the high stool with Susan holding her up. But just her conversations as we all stood in line, most of us knew each other, showed the impact of the guy and how history treated his decision to pardon Nixon much better than he was looked at early on.

And I think that’s a testimony to the man himself. First, of his courage to do it, because he knew it was going to sink him. He absolutely knew that. He had told me that on one occasion. He said, “I know this was going to get me, but we just had to get through it.” And when I was in Vietnam, I was one of the country’s killers when I came home. I came up here to Vail to get away for a year because I was 101st Airborne Division and saw a bunch of combat up there, even though I wasn’t in most of the danger. A couple of times it was because I was a flight surgeon for a helicopter outfit. I wasn’t in a hospital, so I knew what it was like to be on that side.

I was over there when Kent State happened. We didn’t hear about it until a couple months later when the Stars and Stripes, which was managed news, frankly, came in and we didn’t have cell phones. I called home once for my grandmother’s 80th birthday, but I had to take a line on a phone by a telephone pole and try to get through, which was hard. So, we didn’t have it, but I just felt isolated. And when I came back here, I didn’t want people to know I’d been there. So, we had a bond. He and I talked about the feelings about that a couple of times. He wondered what it was like. I said, “You know, I’ve got to tell you from me, personally, I felt ostracized internally. People like me as a person, but I didn’t share that inside stuff. I didn’t want people to know.” I said, “You know, whatever you did there,” and this is back in the 70s, I tell him, “I respect that. We had to get through that stuff.” I was just tired of the race riots and the country being torn asunder, being in the midst of the action in ‘Nam, being in the midst of the action.

I actually went back after my first year in Vail and started an orthopedic residency in Philadelphia. I left after four months because they were having their race riots that year. The Temple Medical School, they had cops surrounding the whole school, protecting. I mean, this was in ’72, ’73, ’74. Just before I came that second time, which was when I interacted with him, I had to get out of there. Even though I had gone to medical school and knew my way around an urban area, it was terrifying. I said, “I just couldn’t handle that after the ‘Nam experience.” So, I said, “from my experience, you had to nail it.” And he just sort of shook his head at the time. Didn’t say thanks for supporting, but it registered.

And then to stand in that line, I told my wife later, and listen to what people said, then to reflect back, he knew he did the right thing. He knew he was going to be getting it. I know it was bitter, because I think it got tight there between he and Carter near the end, but it was tight as far as when he knew he was going to lose. But the fact that I think he still felt an element of chance that he’d make it. I said, “That had to be just destructive.” I never really went into that because I wanted to keep our relationship personal as a doctor. I don’t know if I answered your question.

Smith: He said the most humiliating day of his presidency was to see the United States, after all of that blood and treasure and sacrifice, in effect, being kicked out of Southeast Asia.

Eck: Yeah, but on the other hand, I don’t know if I ever impacted him the way I used my personal experience to say I was relieved he did it. And maybe it didn’t matter, but if you think of the other people who happened by coincidence to be in the riots or be involved in it, he saved us. We knew it. But no one else knew that until later.

Smith: And then the coda, in some ways his finest hour. Because the moment the helicopters took off, Congress wanted to pull the plug and forget that we’d ever been there. And he was adamant that we had a moral obligation to bring out as many of these refugees as we could. And, basically, he shamed Congress into living up to the original financial commitment.

Eck: He did.

Smith: One of the really moving things periods of my life at the museum, we managed to get the staircase that was on top of the U.S. Embassy that people went up to get in the helicopter. And not just American personnel, but thousands of Vietnamese. And Henry Kissinger said, “Why would you want to remind people of that?” And Ford, very interestingly, said, “First of all, Henry, it’s part of our history, we shouldn’t forget it.” But, secondly, Ford saw that staircase, not as a symbol of military defeat, but as a symbol of the desire for freedom. Which takes a certain imagination that I don’t think people always attributed to him.

Eck: And I didn’t know this story until you just told me.

Smith: And so, not only did we get it, but he then came back to Grand Rapids and we invited the Vietnamese community of West Michigan, which is quite large, and there must have been 500 people and it was obviously a very bittersweet occasion. But who else would wish to be publically associated with the low point of their presidency? He came back from California and did the event and it was just overwhelming because some of those people who were there, went up to him and said, “I was one of the people who went up that staircase.”

Eck: My gosh.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Eck: I think he should be remembered as a good guy, thoughtful, very humanistic. He was not a pushover. You could see the attributes of a good athlete play out in the decisions that he made and, frankly, I think he saved us from ourselves by making that big decision too which cost him the election.

Smith: It is hard to know where to begin because there is so much to your story. But let me ask you, first of all, to describe for us, who are accustomed to a very different political climate, what Congress was like in 1963, and for the rest of that decade, when you were a member from Virginia – a Democrat.

Marsh: A Democrat, yeah. Well, of course the overriding event to occur in the early sixties, of course, was the assassination of President Kennedy in November ’63. Interestingly, that was my freshman class. Rumsfeld and I were classmates in Congress, and a lot of other players that we know. But the assassination of President Kennedy was a force that impacted very much on that Congressional class. And that class remained very, very close. I think a lot of that related to the assassination because of the very turbulent event. But the Congress probably was beginning to develop into the more stronger divisions, but it had not, at the time. It was more collegial.

True, there were political battles that had to be fought. I think President Ford was a tremendous example of that – what most people don’t realize about President Ford were the strong ties he had on the Hill that went across the aisle. I’ll give you an example. Ford and I kind of looked at, accessed things the same way. We kind of reacted philosophically. Our views on issues were the same and when he became President, among the tasks I had was oversight of the legislative process. I did the intelligence reform, chaired that for him. The fact that we served together on the Hill, there was a means of communication that was kind of like Sioux Indians who could talk to each other, you know. He never had anywhere near Republican majority. For him to be successful, he had to work across the aisle. It was very natural for him. He said, “Look, in working these issues, why don’t you talk to Andy Biemiller.” Andy Biemiller was a congressman who had been elected in 1944, was defeated and came back in Ford’s class. Andy Biemiller had served another term and became the chief vice president for Congressional liaison for the AFLCIO. He had been a member of the Socialist party and was as liberal as you could get. But Ford said, “Jack, go talk to Andy Biemiller and tell him I said I wanted you to talk to him about seeing if the AFLCIO can help us on stuff on this Hill.” So I did, I went to see Andy and, strangely, we had an agreement, it was an understanding. They would help us on the Hill on issues that related to national security, but they had their own agenda, and we knew what their agenda was – it may relate to minimum wage or right to work, or something. They didn’t expect our help then, and they knew we were going to oppose it. What we would do, we would team together – the staff of the AFLCIO, their legislative staff – worked with our people on both the House and the Senate side. If there was an issue, and I saw this happen, where on the Senate side there would be a labor issue that we were opposing, it wouldn’t be labor necessarily, but an issue they were supporting and we were opposing. On the House side it would be a national security issue that we were both supporting – we’d be working both doors, but on one side we’d be working against them, and on the other side we’d be working together.

That came out of Ford’s association. People also, I don’t think, had picked up on the fact that when Ford was debating as what to do with the pardon issue, and I had been involved in that. I was aware of it. There was this tremendous hire and cry that he not testify on the Hill, demand that he testify there, but resist _______________. Ford said to me one day, we were talking about something they had written to get sent up to the Hill, and I said, “You can’t sign that.” He said, “I know I can’t.” Because it stated that there had been no contacts or conversations. He said, “Jack, how well do you know Carl Albert? You know him?” I said, “Of course I know him,” because I’d been on the Democratic side. It’s strange to me – not strange – but I’d admired him. He said, “Go up there and talk to Carl. Tell Carl anything he wants to know and tell him I need his advice, or what he thinks would be best for me to do.”

So I made a summary of this and took it all up there to Carl and sat there and talked with him. Of course, he had recommended to Nixon that Ford be the Vice President. He said, “Jack, tell him, come on up here. It’s not going to be
The greatest thing for this country is the honesty and the integrity, which is his reputation – that’s what we need.” And he said, “You know, the best thing that can happen to this country is the success of Jerry Ford as President of the United States.” I went by to see Mike Mansfield. Mike was a very taciturn individual. He always smoked a pipe, and he was walking around and we were talking in the Senate corridor. Mike turned around and looked at me, took his pipe out and said, “Jack, tell him not to make a habit of it.” (laugh) He starts puffing on his pipe and away we go. But I saw that time and time again. The arrangements for that hearing which were carefully structured – that is a very dangerous thing for a seated President to do - people would look at that - Peter W Rodino, who was chair of the House Judiciary Committee, he was Ford’s classmate in ’48. They came to Congress together. Rodino pointed that out to me. Of course, I knew it. Rodino, Dick Bolling, Wilbur Mills, these giants on the Democratic side, were admirers and had great respect for Ford.

Smith: Where did that bipartisan consensus come from? Why was it at such variance with some of the LBJ-inspired play-football-without-a-helmet, and all that sort of thing? There seemed to be a dichotomy between what insiders, who really paid attention to the House, in particular, what they thought they knew about Ford, and some of the outsiders, if you will, who even then called into question, among other things, his intellectual capacity.

Marsh: That was terribly wrong because, as you and I both know, he had a good mind, a very, very good mind. Something about Ford’s background I’ve never seen pointed out, and most people are not aware of it - Ford had more congressional service than any person who has ever served as President of the United States. People like Lyndon Johnson didn’t – Johnson had a year less than Ford. Johnson had House experience, that’s certainly true, but Ford – first it was his personality – his very nature. He was just a good-hearted, hail and hardy individual. Also, I think that World War II had an impact. At this time two-thirds of the Congress were still veterans. They had shared mutual experiences. Ford had a magnificent combat record in the Navy in World War II. And I think there was some of that camaraderie that was like you had after the American Civil War, between the Union and the Confederate veterans, and there was this mutual respect because they were veterans. I think also a factor was the fact that Ford’s first office was the Congress, House of Representatives. He had not come up, he was not the child of a political system – hadn’t been a councilman, touching the local chairs in order to move into positions of responsibility. So he did not have a real partisan background. You have to remember, he was even for Wendell Willkie back there in the early forties.

Smith: How different was it – people are always trying to figure out why our politics are so polarized and often ugly today. One theory I have that I’d like to bounce off of you is, forty years ago each party had a left wing and a right wing. Now clearly, one party was more liberal than the other. One party was more conservative than the other. But if you were a Republican, you had to at least take into consideration the northeast - the Rockefeller Republicans, some urban Republicans, and a number from the Midwest who were certainly internationalists and some were moderate to liberal. In other words, the party was more diverse. That is true of Democrats as well. Obviously there was a southern wing, which is largely gone today. It seems as if the people who insisted that it would be logical to have a truly liberal party and a truly conservative party, have gotten their wish at considerable cost.

Marsh: I think you’re right. And I was surprised that Mike Kirwin from Ohio, who was one of the old barons of the Appropriations Committee, more of a labor type candidate and a real fine man, made exactly the same point you did. I’m dealing with a man then who was close to 70 when I was a member, and he would observe to other Democrats, like in the Democratic caucus, that the southern Democrats are very important. They kept this party going when things didn’t look good back in the 1920s, and he felt that was a strength having the southern areas. But you had to put up with them sometimes, which he didn’t like, but he felt it strongly. I think you are exactly right because you’d better be careful what you wish for, you might get it.

Smith: Did Ford get along with everyone in the House? There must have been some people that didn’t care for him or cotton to his style-
Marsh: I think there is an interesting thing, Ford got more respect as President from Democrats than he did from Republicans. I observed it. The Republicans couldn’t bring themselves – they had trouble realizing that Ford was President of the United States. To them, he was Jerry, the Minority Leader that you go and send all kind of terrible tasks like to make a speech at McGakey’s field for the campaign, you know. They leaned on him, all the time. His challenging Charley Halleck – there were scars. Les Arends didn’t like the Republican whip. Les Arends was not close to Ford. I think there were some who were jealous of, more people in the Republican Party, more jealous or resentful of his achievement as President, than in the Democratic. He had a series of dinners down there at the White House because Ford knew he needed to reach out, and he liked these guys and he did it by party. Had a White House dinner for the Democrats and same thing for Republicans, and some of the Republicans got to throwing rolls around. But you rarely ever heard any of the Democrats call him anything but Mr. President. That was not true of Republicans – there were some Republicans who called him Jerry. It didn’t bother President Ford, but it was a difference you could discern. Others commented on it, people like Max Friedersdorf who was doing congressional work. You could notice the difference in attitude between the two parties toward the man.

Smith: What were his strengths as a Minority Leader? His strengths as Republican leader in the House?

Marsh: I’ll tell you something that I think that people did not realize. Ford worked hard, but in that hard work, he studied hard. I would tell people in the White House – don’t ever give him a sheet of paper if you don’t think he’s going to read it. Lengthy things. Boy, those things would come back with marks on them when he went through it. He had a mastery of issues. Ford’s greatest strength was the one that would make a great president, but which was never realized - his knowledge of the process of governing, which rose largely out of his knowledge of the budget and appropriations process. He was a master of the appropriations process. Ford knew the budget better than any person in the White House, save for a few experts. I’ve seen him have Paul and me and others really moving fast to keep up with him.
In fact, we used to get concerned. He’d stand there working on the budgets and all, and of course you know the story of the scheduling of time is a big problem in the White House. But he knew the budget process and is the only president since Harry Truman to brief his budget to the press. Now that’s a high risk operation, if you don’t know it. So he knew the issues that were coming up, he would listen and compensate for conflicting views. And it was that ability to reconcile differences that were a tremendous strength. He was a heck of a good guy - he and Mike Mansfield. People don’t realize how close he and Mike Mansfield were.

I’ll tell you a story about Mansfield that caused me to really admire him. For example, Wilbur Mills, who took a terrible rap because he became ill. When he had those episodes, they were the result of an illness. The illness was alcoholism. But when he was in his prime, there was no better person. I can remember Ford saying to me, “Jack, go up and get Wilbur to tell you how he thinks this bill is going to come out.” And I’d go up there and get Wilbur in the cloak room. Wilbur would say, “On that particular…he’ll win this, but he’s not going to win this one, and this one is kind of up in the air.” So we’d know where to put our time and priorities. Invariably Wilbur was right, but he wanted Ford to succeed. It was an interesting thing. Those guys were all rooting for him. I told you about Mike and the Majority Leader of the Senate. I think his desk set that he had was a gift of Mike Mansfield. Mike gave that to him when he became President.

When Ford went to Helsinki and they called. Would I come up to the Hill and meet with them? Of course, I did. Mike carried the conversation, was in the lead. Hugh Scott was obviously supporting. Mike said, “Jack, I think you ought to call the President and tell him to pull down this Turkish aid bill.” He said, “It is very controversial, we may not win it. I don’t think that he should have to suffer a legislative defeat while he is engaged in an international conference.” That was, say, Wednesday. We had beaten Mike on Monday on the other issue of Diego Garcia, which Mike was very strongly opposed to and we had beaten Mike, and we beat him pretty soundly on that. So I went down to the basement of the Senate Office Building, and I called Helsinki. Ford was actually in the conference and I got hold of Dick. I told Dick what Mike had said and he went in and talked to him. Ford sent back, “No, I want to go forward with it.” So I went back down to the White House and I got a call in about an hour, and it was from Mike again. On his behalf, it was Hugh Scott, and wanted me to come back up there. I had outlined to Cheney what the problem was, and I when I got back there this time, Mike had now ten or fifteen other Senators, the power of the Senate, they were all sitting in there.
He explained again why he felt we ought to pull that bill down. Of course, he was very nice, but he was very firm.

There was a consensus there in that room that was supportive of him so he said, “Well, Jack, what I want you to do this time - I know you got in touch with him - I want you to make a memo and tell the President what my views are, what our views are.” So I did, I did that very thing. I went back down to the White House and got Max Friedersdorf, because I knew Ford was going to want a nose count, a vote count. So I got Max in there and we figured out a very good memo, I thought, and I knew that he would want to know what vote count was. It was something like 45-45 with ten undecided, so we were going to be gone, depending on how the five would break. I felt that they would break our way and I put in the thing, I recommended to President Ford, to go forward with it. I thought we would be able to win it.

I went back up and saw Mike personally, told him that President Ford had gone over the memo and all and to go forward. You know what he did? He walked out of that office very businesslike, he walked on the Senate floor and he did the kickoff speech in support of Ford’s bill. And we did win it by a couple of votes, but Mike subordinated anything that was partisan, or what he thought was. He genuinely liked Ford. I think that was one of the greatest things he brought to the Hill, that spirit of outreach. He and Tip O’Neill were close friends – really close. I remember I saw the Washington Post one day and Tip had a speech he had made out in Boston, and just lambasted Ford’s policies. It was awful, it was scalding and I walked in there and I said, “You see this Post edition?” He had and he was laughing about it. He said, “Get Tip on the phone,” then he said, “I’ll get him.”
He picked up the phone and he called Tip up and he said, “Tip, I read this speech, I see all these things you said about me up there in Boston. You know what I’m going to do? I’m going to come up to Boston and tell them what a lousy Congressman they got.” And then the two of them got the hurrahs. But that was a healthy thing to look at it that way. Ford knew Armed Services, too. If you look at his appropriations experience, took him onto the sub-committee of appropriations for the Department of Defense, and at that time the intelligence program was kind of reviewed by a little handful of people, six or seven members of the House and Senate, and Ford was one of those. A lot of these issues that came up with intelligence, he had already dealt with them.

Smith: I take it is true that in the House there are work horses and show horses and that your reputation precedes you. People take you seriously if you take the work seriously.

Marsh: Members of the Senate who might someday watch this would be very upset, but the appropriations process, which originates in the House, which flows from the original power to raise taxes, comes from the House. The appropriations process, by tradition, begins in the House. The House members on the Appropriations Committee cannot be on another committee. They have to be on the Appropriations Committee. They can be on two sub-committees of the Appropriations. The Appropriations Committee is known for thorough examinations and hard work. Ford had the work ethic. He was very disciplined. He could compartmentalize things. Now we work, now we play. He had mastered that. Appropriation members do the hard work on the bill, and actually the appropriation bills are reviewed by the Senate, but the work has already been done in the House. He knew the budget and he knew the appropriations process - he and Hale Boggs, the Democratic whip. He and Hale were close friends. It was a very, very close friendship.

Smith: I had read, in fact, that on more than one occasion they would debate at the National Press Club, and it was their custom to drive down there together and to decide on the way what topic they would debate that day. They would have their debate, then afterwards they would go together and have lunch.
Marsh: I had not heard that, but I’m sure that is correct. It sounds like Ford Smith: You were a Democratic congressman from Virginia through 1970 – is that right?

Marsh: I was elected in ’62 and I did not seek re-election. There was a revolt in the Democratic Party in Virginia and they required candidates for office to sign an oath that they would support the national ticket, which I refused to do. Harry Byrd refused to sign it also. A number of the members of the state legislature – I was not putting up with that.

Smith: Now you had a pivotal conversation with then-Congressman Ford right about the time of the Watergate break in. Didn’t you?

Marsh: Yeah. He was the Minority Leader, of course. What had happened, I had an office there at that building, what was called CREEP, Committee to Re-Elect the President. Terrible acronym for a presidential campaign. It was 1701 Connecticut Avenue, you can see the White House. I was up on the top floor, the Campaign to Re-Elect was down on the fourth floor, and Mrs. Mitchell used to spend a lot of time coming out there to the dismay of their campaign. So an effort was made - let’s find a way to take care of Martha - so they came up on my floor and they rented office space there – on my floor. You know, when you just open up a new office, you don’t have a phone, you don’t have a fax, so you come in and you borrow your neighbor’s office to use their phone and all.

So I learned the person who was in charge of this was McCord, who was the head of the security, who was also the head of the break in group. When I picked up the Washington Post after it happened and I looked and there’s his picture, the fellow who’s been coming in my office. So I figured it had to know something about it.

It happened that I already had a meeting with President Ford that morning, that Monday morning, and he asked me about it. I told him what I just told you. I said, I think the White House was bound to be involved, I’m not saying Nixon is, but I think somebody very high up has got to know about this. He went down the street that day to a leaders meeting and Ford challenged Mitchell about involvement of anybody from the White House. Mitchell didn’t shoot straight with him – didn’t tell him the truth. But it alerted President Ford.

Smith: He really did expect everyone to be truthful with him, didn’t he?

Marsh: Yeah.

Smith: Is that naive? It says a lot about his character. Is it something that a president can afford?

Marsh: Bob Hartmann and I talked – Bob knew President Ford well, and Bob and I talked about this. There was a naïveté there that was very real and very wholesome, but if taken too far, could be very, very difficult. It can cause you problems. At times Ford would use the naïveté – he was very skillful with it at times.

Smith: How so?

Marsh: By acting with a certain naïveté he would disarm people. I found that a lot of times, when we thought he was being naïve, he wasn’t being naïve at all. He had learned to use it, but it probably related more to his assessment of other people and who he got around him.

Smith: In all the years I knew him, I only heard him speak really despairingly of two folks. I’m sure there were others, but one was Gordon Liddy and one was John Dean. The worst thing he said was, the worst term he could come up with was, “He’s a bad man.” That was the harshest epitaph that he used.

You joined the vice president’s staff in January of 1974. I believe as Assistant for the National Security?

Marsh: National Security advisor. See I was the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative Affairs, and had been named to them not quite a year before. President Ford was very much aware that I had that post. What happened, when he was named a candidate for the vice presidency - every vice president is given an assignment. Well, Cheney has reformed it and put power in the vice presidency, which is a good thing. I’m all for that. Lyndon Johnson was in charge of space – that’s what Kennedy gave to Lyndon Johnson - the space program. Nixon very wisely assessed that he, Nixon, was going to have a problem and that problem was going to affect his legislation on the Hill. So he gave Ford farm aid and national security legislation, he really kind of just turned his legislative program over to Ford. He knew that Ford knew that stuff. Ford needed somebody on his staff that could do that and whether Bob Hartmann recommended, I don’t think Bob did. Of course he really didn’t know me at the time, but Ford knew who I was, and I was the Assistant Secretary for Defense, and Nixon had specifically asked that I be put in that spot. So Ford got me over to do that and to do national security.

Smith: When you went, at the beginning of 1974, did you think Nixon could survive?

Marsh: I went over there I think in February. I thought there was a strong possibility that he would not, because in a way, I had learned more of this Watergate business and the plumber’s thing because of this other thing that was fed to me and there was somebody on the NATSF staff that told me about the plumbers. I was kind of taken aback that that operation was over there.

Smith: You obviously had some discussions with him during that period before the Nixon resignation. He was walking a tightrope. I assume he was in a terribly awkward position.

Marsh: This is where I think Bob Hartmann has never received his real credit. It was funny, we had an understanding Ford, Hartmann, and myself. We would never discuss the status of the Watergate proceedings because all three of us felt that if we started doing it, invariably it would get out and be leaked and that would be the worst position Ford could be in. By us taking that position, every member of the Vice President’s staff was put on notice, “This is off limits. You’re not to talk about it because Ford doesn’t talk about it.” Now Bob and I would because what Bob did – he could be a pretty crusty guy – Bob handled his public appearances. What Bob tried to do: one, he wrote his speeches, but he tried to keep Ford out of Washington about as much as he could, and it was obvious what he was doing. Bob handled the press – he was always in between Ford and the press. There is a fraternity in the press corps, too.
Smith: Ford had proved he could relate – in his personal relations with the press.

Marsh: Yeah, very good. Bob recognized that you couldn’t get Ford too close to Nixon, yet you couldn’t get him too far from Nixon. I always felt that Bob was the person that struck the happy balance.

Smith: Why was Bob Hartmann a controversial figure? What was it about Hartmann that made him a bit of a lightning rod?

Marsh: That’s a good question. You had to learn to know Bob, and we became very, very close friends, and I admired him a great deal. But he was not as concerned about relationships and personal relationships – he was just a rough guy to deal with at times, if he wanted to be. He was one of these fellows that if you got beneath the surface, it was great. But with the President of the United States, you have so many contacts, you don’t get below the surface very much with anybody.

Smith: What was Ford looking for in the people around him – what kind of qualities do you think, both on Capitol Hill and later in the White House – what personal, as well as professional, qualities?

Marsh: I think for people – a lot of people around him, particularly staff people around him – there was what I would call an old shoe quality to Ford. You don’t get people that are really flashy, too flashy, I mean stunningly attractive. He was more old shoe, those were the immediate staff. I think Ford had a magnetism about him. I don’t think – I know he did. A magnetism that, as a man, he just had it. It was a persona. Like Washington – although Washington maintained a very strict dignity. Ford was more relaxed, but it was a magnetism that glowed. Jerry Ford, a superb athlete. That caused a lot of people to move into the Ford orbit. Ford, among those people, would select out those who he had special desire or need. Rumsfeld was an example of that. Don, when he hit Washington, came in with a little bit of fanfare. He was a young Congressman 29 or 30 years old and Mr. Sparky – a lot of personality.

Don was really the person who introduced me to Ford. But Ford drew that type of people. Then out of that array or herd, you might say, he would pick the cattle or horses that he wanted. Mel Laird was one of those that he was close to. A congressman from California, just a whole array, and those were the people who were with him when he defeated Charlie Halleck.

Smith: There was a rap, particularly during the early presidency, that the staff was still not only too Congressional, but too Grand Rapids. That was thrown around as a euphemism for not quite ready for prime time.

Marsh: Yeah, I think that attitude was – the Ford White House was very Congressionally oriented. The people in it, you had Rogers Morton, Tom Kleppe, Don Rumsfeld - any number of them. I can’t even recall them all, and in addition to those, it was just layered with staff members who had been on the Hill, on both the House and the Senate. They were very good, but that was true, and they charged them based on spokes of the wheel.

Smith: Was that congressional? Is that evidence of a congressional mindset?

Marsh: Yes, because here as a member of Congress he could not, nor could I or others, you can’t expect your constituents to go through a staff process. If a member of Congress is out there and somebody who has got a veteran’s pension claim or something, you can’t say to him, “Well, that’s handled by Sue McCarthy.” You take it. The Congressman takes it. But then gives it to Sue. Everything in a Congressman’s district, everything comes to him. He parcels it out inside his office whichever way he wants based on whoever can handle it. But with the White House you’ve got have some pretty stern staffing rules to do it. You pay a price for everything, but you also have benefits. And having a congressionally-oriented White House, I think is a good thing because you reduce the possibilities of rupture and friction between the Legislative and Executive branches, which today has become extremely difficult.

End of tape one.

Tape two begins

Smith: Let me ask you, and I realize this is somewhat speculative, unless, of course, Ford never discussed it with you. During his vice-presidency a lot has been written and a lot has been speculated about – about the relationship between Ford and Nixon. Whether Nixon felt that Ford was defending him with as much vigor – and yet Ford was in a clearly awkward position. Tom DeFrank, I don’t know if you’ve read the DeFrank book or not, Tom made a great deal out of a single slip of the tongue that Ford made. In a private conversation with DeFrank, in which, as Tom interprets it at least, Ford acknowledged that this was going to end with Nixon’s resignation. At least that’s how Tom chose to interpret this particular incident. He then made Tom swear on a stack of bibles never to reveal that conversation.

But it does raise the interesting point – with Ford being somebody who had been around on the Hill as long as he had, being a shrewd vote counter - it’s one thing to want to believe that the President is telling you the truth, but he couldn’t have been so naïve as to rule out the distinct possibility that Nixon would be forced out of office. Did you get a sense of how that developed over those months what was your relationship with the White House?

Marsh: Mine was pretty good because I had been Assistant Secretary of Defense. Al Haig and I were close, personal friends. Al and I lived in the same neighborhood. I knew him when he was a Lieutenant Colonel. I happened to pull a National Guard tour, and I served my National Guard duty for a month in Vietnam and ended up with Al’s unit, in a fox hole. So I had a very good relationship. Al would talk with me frequently about things. I didn’t go over there except if I had to, but Al enjoyed a good relationship with Ford – a very good one. Ford was one of Al’s strongest proponents to be Secretary of State. And wrote letters on his behalf to Reagan to do it.

But the executive roadway I knew between the White House and the old EOB is just about as wide as the Potomac River instead of a street. It is distant in the best of times and the Watergate period was not the best of times. And it was kind of dangerous. You want to stay out of these things because you didn’t know who was involved and what would eventually happen. Ford maintained a good relationship with Nixon. He never talked about Nixon – never heard him indicate anything in terms of moving into the presidency until the last two or three weeks. There was some appointment that Nixon made which Ford disagreed with and he made a comment to me at the time, “If I was President I would have picked this fella over there.”

Ford was very disciplined, very carefully controlled. I think Nixon probably viewed Ford as a second string on the Michigan football team. Nixon viewed himself, I think, as President, significantly superior to Ford based on experience. Nixon came to Congress in ’46, Ford came in ’48, and Nixon helped him along and stuff. It was more of a seniority relationship between the two men. Ford was scrupulous about observing that etiquette, or respect between the two men, the two offices. The day that Ford learned that he was going to be President, he had been called and told – I think Al called him, Al Haig – that Nixon was probably going to want to talk to him about some of his plans. Nothing definite, clearly indicating that the decision would be discussed about stepping down. Ford had gone over to the Blair House. I had gone with him, made the award of the Medal of Honor posthumously to seven families arising out of Vietnam. When he came back he knew he was going to be getting the call. He was remarkable about maintaining his cool in light of that. The call came and they said, could you come, the President wanted to see him. They were there for about an hour and fifteen minutes, and they came back and he said, “Nixon is going to resign. He wants to resign as of noon tomorrow.”

I had a funny feeling - it was a funny feeling to realize that the guy across from you can be President tomorrow. If it’s a ballot box you don’t know until they count the ballots, but to be told that somebody you’re talking with is going to be President. Bob Hartmann said, who do you want swearing you in? I remember that was the first thing that was raised. Al had given him somewhat of a heads up that it was moving towards resignation several days before. Ford was slated to go out to the new vice president’s quarters, which is another story. That was his initiative, and that was his cronies on the Hill, Carl Albert and those guys all put that together for him.

Smith: The vice president’s residence?

Marsh: Yeah.
Smith: Really? What is the story?

Marsh: Well, I used to accuse Ford of living on Jolly Trolley Lane in Alexandria, and when he saw he was going to be vice president, he thought the vice president ought to have quarters - he and Tip O’Neill and Carl Albert on the Hill and Bob Michael. Bob Michael and those guys all together introduced a bill. Well, it is the only piece of legislation that I ever saw that was written and introduced and got passed that was so bad that it wouldn’t work and you had to go do it again. (laugh) So I had to go back up there. We worked the bill back through. Ford apparently had told them that, “If we get that house now, it won’t be any expense.” You can imagine, I think he really believed it. This is a long story, but you asked for it. Clem Conger was in the White House.

Smith: He was the curator of the White House.

Marsh: Yes, and he knew how to spend money, too. So we get this house all put together really fast, get the bill passed.

Smith: This had been the residence of…

Marsh: The Navy - didn’t want it to happen…

Smith: The Naval Commandant?

Marsh: The Chief of Naval Operations. And they were opposed to it. But we got the bill through. Ford said to me that we can’t let this cost any money. Well, it happens that once you make it the Office of the Vice President of the United States, you immediately have security concerns that you don’t have with the Chief of Naval Operations. So they put together a book for me, a great big Sears and Roebuck catalog, and I sat down with him and I said, “Now, they are suggesting that you go about this in three different stages.” He’s very conscious of the cost – he said, “What’s the first stage?” The first stage are the requirements of the Secret Service. You have to have them.

He said, “How much is that?” I said, “That’s going to be $33,000.” (Demonstrates how Ford frowned) Then I said, “Now I’ll go to the second phase – that’s painting and drapes and stuff like that.” He said, “What’s that?” I said, “I think it’s $150-200,000.” By now he’s really having gas pains. So I said, “Now there is a third stage.” He said, “What’s the third stage? How much is that?” I said, “That’s $450,000.” He took the book and he closed it up and said, “No, we can’t do this. Jack, you go tell Betty.” (laugh) So I went up Jolly Trolley Lane with the wish book under my arm and explained to Mrs. Ford that we couldn’t do that.

Smith: How did she take the news?

Marsh: Well, I really didn’t know her that well. She was a good trooper about it, but she was clearly disappointed. They got back into it and they did agree to increase the expenses on it. But the reason I remember so well – President Ford was supposed to go over to the house the afternoon that Al Haig came over and said, “Look, I think there is a chance that the President is going to resign.” Ford never showed that in anyway. He went on over to the house and talked about the drapes and all that kind of business. And to have in the back of your mind that possibility that you are going to be President of the United States by the end of the week – that’s pretty-

Smith: Actually, I can top that because that night they had dinner at Betty Beal’s and nothing was said. Needless to say, it is a pretty impressive acting job.

Marsh: It was. Ford’s schedule – he didn’t have anything to do with this – his first schedule that afternoon for that block of time was Rog Morton, who was Secretary of the Interior, but it wasn’t Rog Morton, it ended up being Al Haig.

Smith: Vast amounts have been written, but walk us through those days when the possibility of a pardon was first introduced – because you were clearly at the center of all that – and cautioning the vice president. Was that an instance where he initially was perhaps overly trusting?

Marsh: Probably. Yes. I think that’s a good observation. Al came over during the Rog Morton block of time, but it was not for Rog Morton – it was for Al. Al discussed – and I was not present in that – nor was Bob Hartmann present – but Al discussed generally and gave strong indications that we would going to have to make some changes. Nixon was going to probably resign and this sort of thing. That was the nature of the conversation. It was not firm that he was going to, but it looked like it was definitely moving that way. I think Al may have used the term “You need to prepare yourself.” I think what Al was doing was, “you shouldn’t be blindsided by this suddenly coming up,” which it made sense.

I saw it when he went in the office. He talked to the President and I had to see the Vice President about just going up to the house. And so when Al came out I went in the office. Ford looked thunderstruck. I had never seen him that way. It was like someone had told him his house had burned down. He recovered from that – he wasn’t un-composed, babbling or anything like that – I think it was the enormity of the developing situation – suddenly the sum of it – it’s here and it’s going to probably happen. He was contemplating that when I went in there, but he was – it was kind of like he was stunned. He went on over to the house and then, before he left he talked to Hartmann, and Bob came down hard over against it. Really quick. Bob said, “I want you to talk to Jack,” and Ford said, “I can’t do it right now because I’m going over here to this house. I’ll do it in the morning.” Bob insisted that he do that and President Ford did talk to me.

Smith: That night or the next day?

Marsh: The next morning. Of course, actually he was running late to go over to the house.

Smith: Now, I assume this is one of those frequent instances where Hartmann more than compensated for Ford’s lack of suspicion – or guile – whatever you want to call it. Where Ford saw the best in everyone, you probably do need to have someone around you who can imagine the worst. Or at least see an agenda where maybe Ford didn’t see it.

Marsh: Actually, the way you described it is very, very accurate. He saw the dangers that Ford didn’t. Bob was very outspoken with his views. Bob did not tell me what it was, but he told me that there was a matter come up that he wanted Ford to talk to me and Ford had promised to. And the next morning Bob prodded him again and he got me in and he laid it out. I’ve thought about it many a time, naturally something like that you don’t forget it. That situation could be portrayed in a way that you will do this country a favor and you will be doing the right thing for the republic to pardon the President in order to get him out. I think if you ever get Al here, and this is conjecture on my part, Al and Fred Buzhardt. Fred Buzhardt had a key role, he’s deceased. I think he did.

Smith: He was Nixon’s legal counsel?

Marsh: He was legal counsel and I also had legal counsel. But Buzhardt had come over from Defense. Buzhardt and Haig were at West Point together. I don’t know if they were classmates – for some reason I think maybe Buzhardt was maybe a year ahead of Al. He wasn’t present, it was just Al. A lawyer could make a very, very strong case either way. Either to pardon or not to pardon – to get him out. I think that Al and Fred and a couple of others were having real problems of trying to – they were concerned for the country and it would be best to get Nixon out, but how do you that. It would be two ways, either get him out by inducement or get him out by resignation. So when people talk about Ford being too naïve in that presentation - I know – I’m positive that Ford did not give absolute assurances, but he may have been – Al Haig may have assumed that he had made more headway than he really did. Bob knocked it down and Ford presented to me the next day. I knocked it down. I just – very plain that – nice conversation, but my view was that he ought not to do that.

Smith: And then he called Haig? Was that the sequence - to just kind of go on the record?

Marsh: There was a little bit of time, a couple of hours maybe had elapsed. When I got hold of Bob, I told Bob I thought we were going to have to get a third party in. In a way, Hartmann and I were too close to it. Get somebody who might be objective – and that was Bryce Harlow. We talked about it and Ford agreed to that. So we brought Bryce in. And then after the conversation with Bryce he called.

Smith: Bryce Harlow was the quintessential wise man, wasn’t he?

Marsh: Yeah. I think he was a person of great integrity and his methods and personality were very good as a moderator.
Smith: The eighth of August, and the ninth of August, the Nixon resignation and the Ford swearing in – what are your memories from those days?

Marsh: Well, I remember I was up almost all night long. I think President Nixon had mentioned that, or suggested, he was very amenable about it – I think he suggested to Ford that it would be a private ceremony, be sworn in in the Oval Office. And Bob said, “No, you’re the President of the United States, you are going to have it where you want to have it, and you ought to have it in the East Room.” And Ford agreed. It was my job, then to get 216 people, the right 216 there, and we worked in the office almost all night long. Of course, we got John McCormick there and I knew John McCormick had an aid named Johnny somebody who lived in this area, and I said, “Go get Johnny,” because Mr. McCormick will want Johnny to be with him. So they found Johnny jogging and they picked him up and got him down. But Ford thought a lot of McCormick and McCormick thought a lot of Ford.

And so what we did, I tried to structure a protocol and the protocol was first his family, and then secondly very, very close friends – like Phil Buchen and others – and there were members of the King family who were invited and attended, who were his half brothers or sisters. We had the Congressional class that was elected in 1948, all those who were fellow Congressmen – they were there, and of course the House leadership. So you couldn’t complain about the protocol – it was fine.

Smith: There is a wonderful scene – it is so Ford – but the first day they actually started moving into the Oval Office – he walks up to the door and there’s a Marine standing there saluting, and holding the door open. He walks over and he said, “Hi, I’m Jerry Ford and I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?” (laugh) Now, can you imagine anyone else reacting in that way? In some ways that is very congressional. Or maybe that’s just west Michigan.

Marsh: Well, that’s Jerry Ford, the Congressman. That is the kind of thing a Congressman might do, but the kind of thing a Jerry Ford Congressman would do. He never took himself seriously, in my view.
Smith: If he ever was inclined to do so, Betty was on hand probably to make sure that he didn’t.

Marsh: That’s true. The other thing that I keep referring to it as Jolly Trolley Lane out there, I kidded him about that, too. But I lived over in Raleigh in the same kind of circumstance. What’s interesting about Ford ascending to the presidency is that the Nixons, in effect, had not moved out. They had gone, but all their personal things, furniture and all that, had to be moved. He couldn’t live in the White House and they lived out there in Jolly Trolley Lane and so the White House was out there in Alexandria, but what the Secret Service had to do - because Ford was very insistent that none of these people be inconvenienced, and they were delighted to be the neighbor of the President - they cordoned off the whole block. Everybody had passes. These people that lived in there, they were given a pass – they were part of the White House and they could come and go – but the whole area was cordoned off and you’d see this White House Presidential train coming down the parkway and swing on down across the bridge over into – it was a different experience.

Smith: I’ve been told that his first order was to get all the listening devices out of wherever they were supposedly there were so many, I guess several days later someone found one still in the wall in the Oval Office.

Marsh: I think so. I knew that was happening, but I don’t know who was doing it. I assume that Bob Hartmann, I’m sure, was overseeing it.

Smith: I assume that Ford was genuinely mortified at the thought of a president taping people with their knowledge.

Marsh: Yeah, he felt that totally improper. But Johnson had been doing that and there is some indication, I’m not sure of this, but whether or not Kennedy had done it.

Smith: It was a long tradition, if you will, going back to Roosevelt.

Marsh: Yeah.
Smith: Who were his heroes among Presidents? We know he put up Truman’s portrait, which surprised some people at the time. I guess Ike was up there and Lincoln. Did he have much sense of history?

Marsh: I think it would have been helpful if he had more sense of history. Of course, I’m from Virginia and you are from Massachusetts, and you’re beat over the head all of the time because you’re looking at the past and thinking about the past. Ford didn’t do that – his thinking was very logical – very compartmental.

If you had a proposal that we will call the letter D, that’s what you want, that’s your goal. If you got this project, this will be your policy, it’s over here at “D,” well, you go see him, and you’re at “A.” He’s going to ask you, how do you get from B to C to D. He was a very, very practical thinking man. He was realistic, feet on the ground. But, I think history enables you to perceive - I wish Ford could have had a greater sense of history. He used to kid me about it. I had introduced the bill for the Bicentennial of the American Revolution in 1963 when I went to Congress. So when the Bicentennial came up, it was my task to do Bicentennial efforts for the President, not the general Bicentennial for the country – but the dedication of the Smithsonian Air and Space Museum, for instance. They cut the tape of that through a signal sent from Mars.

The Queen’s visit – he was very excited about the Queen’s visit. He looked forward to her. The Ambassador asked me to come up and visit with him. The Ambassador said the Queen will come, she wants to come, but we’re not just sure when is the best time to come. Can you get some ideas out of the President for when the Queen should come? So I told him I would. I went to see President Ford and I said, “When do you want her to come?” He was elated, he said, “Oh, have her come on the Fourth of July!” I called up the Brits and I said I don’t know that you’d want to do it on that date, right on that date or not, but I said, “He wants her to come on the Fourth of July.” I think he nearly fainted, but she came around the tenth or so and it was a wonderful visit.
Smith: But, we learned later on that a disproportionate number of guests at the dinner were uncommitted Republican delegates and their families.

Marsh: Is that right?

Smith: Yeah. Of course, it was a month before the convention and it was going right down to the wire.

Marsh: Yeah, I know things like that will be done by senior campaign people – they aren’t going to ask a soul – they just go ahead and do it.

Smith: I believe you took part in the preparations for that first press conference toward the end of August, 1974 and a lot of people when they write about the pardon, they leave that out. My sense was that, in his own mind, that was, at least, a triggering event. That he may very well, at that point, have been favorably inclined, but that he left that press conference genuinely surprised at what he thought was the continuing preoccupation of the Washington press corps with all things Nixon.

Marsh: He was right about that. I’ve thought about the pardon thing, and often felt maybe we should have done some things, or things that we could have done that would have made this better or go down differently. It is correct, you had a situation where Ford’s got a presidency, just after the oil embargo, the economic crisis was starting, the Vietnam war was going on - and then Mrs. Ford was coming down with this terrible cancer situation. The things that this man had on him, I don’t think anybody has ever looked at that. He is very serious about government and you try to bring up some issue of government and the press corps were preoccupied with the pardon – it just enraged him. I was sitting in the Oval Office when he came in after that press conference. I think what we should have done, this is the benefit of hindsight, I think what we should have done is that we should have – he should have begun to lay a predicate. You know, there is an argument, there is a concern about the Nixon pardon – to remove the suddenness of the announcement-

Smith: I once spent three hours with him in a Grand Rapids hotel room. And like most people, I thought, there must have been a more adroit way of doing it. And you know, I went away pretty much dissuaded that, given the poisonous political atmosphere of that time, the first trial balloon would have been shot down before it ever cleared the trees. I don’t know how – you are absolutely right – legally, intellectually, but given the inflamed emotions and the very fact that that press conference was so dominated by questions about Richard Nixon, if he had said, or caused people to believe, that he was giving serious consideration to a pardon, that’s all anyone would have discussed, and probably, with a lot of hostility. I’d love to hear a strategy for softening the impact of the pardon.

Marsh: I just think that if he had kept bringing it up in several different press conferences, and get the American Bar involved in it, it would be different. But that was not Ford’s way, but, boy, it throws a thunderclap when it came.

Smith: How much of that first month was, in fact, influenced by, if not preoccupied with, Nixon? That first month was defined, maybe as a better way of putting it, by uncertainties over Nixon’s fate?

Marsh: Quite a bit. There were things that were incidental to it which are not apparent, which were troublesome. The President, when he left Washington shortly before noon, Air Force One was no longer Air Force One when it flew over Missouri. But when he left Andrews Air Force Base it was Air Force One and Nixon took eighty-five or so staff people with him. Very, very large number. One of the tasks that I had, or my office had, was the transition of Nixon, which there were a lot of difficulties because the animosity was so great on the Hill that senior members of the Congress, over on the Senate side, wanted to stop and deprive him of his pension. I had to talk to the President. You couldn’t do that, shouldn’t do that. But nevertheless, that was the kind of poisonous problems we were –

Smith: You said that was something you discussed with President Ford?

Marsh: Yeah. I told the Senator, I just listened to him what he wanted to do, but there were all types of punitive things that they wanted to do to him. That passed, but getting that Nixon transition group down was a big task, and I’ll tell you who did it. It was a fellow named Russ Rourke, who is since deceased. Russ was my deputy and he deserves credit for that. Dealing with Nixon and trying to get things for him he needed from Congress and all, was not an easy task. It permeated the White House.

Smith: In retrospect, was it naïve to believe that it would go away overnight simply because Nixon had gone away?

Marsh: No, it would be naïve to think it was going to go away and it did not because the question came up about removing things from the White House, tapes, and all, and Fred Buzhardt. It was a constant, constant irritation.

Smith: Were you present in the Oval Office or elsewhere when there were discussions of pardon.

Marsh: No, in fact, it’s interesting, and nobody knows, all we really know is what happened over on the Ford side – the vice president’s side. I told you that when President Ford talked to me about the pardon, he had a sheet of legal paper – it was yellow like this – and he pulled it out of his pocket for me to read. You’ve probably heard this, on one of these was a very, very accurate summary of the law of pardon, under the Constitution – and the American Constitution does permit a pardon for crimes before prosecution. It is very clear. So it was an indication with that piece of paper that that was being given to Ford to assure him that one, he had the authority. The second piece of paper –

Smith: Was this early in the presidency?

Marsh: This was when Haig came over there.

Smith: When he was still vice president.

Marsh: He was vice president. And the second sheet of paper was a form, all in handwriting, where all you had to do was take the sheet of paper and type it up and you had a pardon. All you had to do was sign it. He showed me the papers. I recognized the handwriting. The handwriting was Fred Buzhardt, because Fred Buzhardt had been a general counsel in the Department of Defense, I was the assistant secretary and we’d been having to work the Hill on a number of issues involving the windup of the Vietnam war. So I immediately recognized it. I don’t think Al Haig knew that much about what a pardon was or anything else. I think Fred Buzhardt – there was his handwriting on these two sheets of paper. It wasn’t Al’s, I know that. I know it was Fred’s.

Smith: And presumably Buzhardt would not have done that entirely on his own, without some inspiration from his client.

Marsh: You would think. It was an instance of a ploy that a lawyer would probably make to a client, maybe we can take this route. I don’t know that that’s the case, but I do know there were two pieces of paper, and I know that one of them was a form for a pardon.

Smith: Did you know the pardon was coming – we jump ahead to September, the first week of September – how many people were in the loop?

Marsh: When he talked about the pardon that he was going to announce, the pardon, as I recall, was announced on Sunday.

Smith: Yeah, Sunday, September 8th.

Marsh: I think we had the meeting either on Friday or Saturday and there was Phil Buchen, myself, Bob Hartmann, and Al Haig were in there.

Smith: Now, did he announce this as a fete accompli, or was it a discussion?

Marsh: Yes, he indicated that he was going to pardon him. Bob and I both, separately and independently, went at him to raise it again.

Smith: Following this meeting?

Marsh: Following the meeting. Bob talked to him – see we did not do it in that environment.

Smith: Because of Haig’s presence?

Marsh: I just felt I could do more with him if I talked to him one on one. Then President Ford used to eat in a little dinette off the Oval Office. He would eat in there. My concerns were the association of the pardon and the earlier conversations – it would have been far better if the word “pardon” had never been mentioned to Ford, because that would have been the logical course of action, anyway, and he would have done that. But you don’t have to inspire it with him – he knows who thinks like that. I went in, he was eating his lunch, and my concerns there were the charge of a deal linking the two events. I told him, I said, “Look, you’ll probably want to throw me right out of here, and you may, and I may make you mad.” He said, “Jack, I know right where you’re coming from, but there was no deal.” I said, “I didn’t think there was one, but I wanted to bring it up.”

Smith: Over the years there has been talk – he gave, not varying versions, but he gave weight to differing factors. For example, it has appeared in print that Julie Nixon Eisenhower had either directly to him, or through third parties, communicated real concerns about her father’s health – physical and mental. That somehow that was a factor – for lack of a better word, the humanitarian element. Was that something that was discussed to your knowledge, or was it in the background at all?

Marsh: I know that Ford had concerns about Nixon – you know it was questionable that Nixon was going to survive there for a short time. Ford did express concerns about that, and probably, maybe it was a factor. I don’t know.

Smith: The other thing in that first month, that tends to get swept under the rug, but I’ve always thought it part of a larger strategy of national reconciliation, for lack of a better word. And that, of course, was the VFW appearance and the amnesty program. How did that come about – because on the face of it, it is a curious, defining moment.

Marsh: I think this shows a side of Jerry Ford that he’s not quite as conservative as people think. He has a great empathy for people in certain situations and I think he genuinely wanted to try and be helpful, sort of remaking of the country or reconciling of the county to the Vietnam war. And I think that he felt that there were a lot of people out there that should have served and didn’t, and avoided the draft. But that didn’t bother him. But it happened. Of course, he got into problems with the VFW, I guess you know that, for having done that.
Smith: More remarkable in some ways than the actual program, is the venue in which he chose to announce it. Not many presidents would walk into that buzz saw.

Marsh: I know (laugh). A very interesting thing that happened on that – he came in there, the speech was on a Monday in Chicago or St. Louis, I think. He came in there Friday and the speech had been written and Hartmann knew this. Bob and I were the only two that knew. Ford showed me the speech to read. It was just a regular speech about the VFW and strong national defense and all that. And then he pulled out two separate pages, which nobody in the White House knew were in the speech which Bob had written, and those were the amnesty pages. He inserted them into the speech and gave it. (laugh) The people in the White House didn’t know he was going to do that. That really caused him a lot of reaction, but I happen to agree with you. His desire to do that before the VFW was clearly planned and very deliberate, because it was a veterans’ organization, he knew the executive director, who was a fellow named Cooper Holt. Cooper Holt really became enraged and we had to work for a whole year to get Cooper back into the net. He really got upset.

Smith: One last thing, and that is those first few weeks, part of it was the spokes of the wheel, but also, let’s face it – you had a White House that was still overwhelmingly populated with Nixon holdovers. There were very few Ford people. How much of a problem was that? The cultural shift, if you will?

Marsh: This was something that was recognized and it was discussed. I think part of President Ford’s rationale on that, and it is typical Ford, he had a lot of good people on that White House staff that had absolutely nothing to do with Watergate and they were victimized by it. But the Nixon brush at that time was a broad stroked one and everybody got tarred. So I think – and I’m not sure if Ford and I talked about this or not, I think we may have – it was deliberate – he wanted to let these people exit the White House in a gradual attritioned way, without a summary end of their service. Because by serving with President Ford from September to January, if you went out in the Washington environment and market – you had experience in the Ford administration. It makes you much more marketable, whereas you don’t raise suspicions. If you stayed there with Jerry Ford, you must be okay. You weren’t involved in Watergate. That was a part of his planning on that.

Smith: I assume General Haig presented a particular challenge.

Marsh: Yeah. But his was a little different. We have to go back up to the pardon hearings on the Hill. The pardon hearings which Ford attended, as I said, the full chair of the committee was Peter Rodino, his classmate. The sub-committee, there was a sub-committee hearing – it was not a full committee. The sub-committee chair was Bill Hungate, who was my classmate in Congress. That thing directed that the Ford pardon was broader than Ford. People overlooked this. It involved Buzhardt, it involved Haig as witnesses. When they got ready and the end of the year came, Hungate made a motion to dismiss, to discharge the committee without calling Haig and Buzhardt. And it only carried about one vote and that was Hungate’s vote. Hungate shut the hearing down. But Stennis, the United States Senator had sent word that he, in fact, wanted Haig given an assignment out of the country. He did not want him to be Chief of Staff of the Army because he felt he would be a continuing lightning rod. So Stennis, in effect, said NATO. That created a problem with Goodpaster. Goodpaster was a wonderful man and Al went to that assignment and did quite well, but Stennis wanted him in Europe, not in the United States. Not that Stennis was against Al, but recognizing the problem that he would cause, in his view-

Smith: You were one of the people who urged President Ford to go up to the Hill. Obviously there were a number of people who thought it was a bad idea, an unprecedented idea. But I believe you were one of the people who supported him.

Marsh: Bob Hartmann was not opposed to it. When the letter came in from Hungate, I took the letter to him and I showed it to him and of course we had to go through the ritual of having it staffed out – and the poor people writing it didn’t know about these meetings and all. Ford knew that I was not opposed to it – he knew that I supported his going to the Hill – and Bob did. Understandably, most of our staff didn’t, but I thought it was a good idea. When they put all the staffing papers together and they had prepared an answer which, if sent to the Hill would not have been correct. He looked at it and he said, “Jack, there ain’t but one way to do this. Go up there and lay it out.” And that’s when he said to me, “Go see Carl,” because he wasn’t going to go up to the Hill unless Carl blessed it.

Smith: That’s a perfect note in which to end this conversation. Obviously, we would want to schedule another one.

Marsh: And it’s my view and I’ve come to more think of it as, I try not to think of it in terms of the Ford presidency, as it was an interregnum. [Neither Reagan was a significant gap between historical events.] You have the Cromwellian period in English history, then after you have the English Bill of Rights. And I think with the Ford presidency, it was an interregnum. When you look at it as being an interregnum, then you can appreciate the full greatness of his leadership and as a president. If you look at him as a president, you’re comparing him to people who have gone through the election process, which he didn’t. He came into this through the 25th Amendment. He skipped the campaign trail and he really went from the office of vice president into the presidency.

So, I think if you look at it as being an interregnum, then you see him having to deal with these forces that were very evident at that period in time. One, the Vietnam War had not ended. But, Richard, people also forget that the Cold War was still an intensive struggle. One where the Soviets were making a big push. So, we had the Vietnam situation, I guess we had the Arab oil embargo, we had the economy situation. We had the problems involving the anti-war protestors, which were raising Cain. You then had also the things that relate to changes in the Congress. But even before that, and I was in the Congress in the 60s, there was already beginning to develop in the Congress a push back as far as the Executive Branch was concerned. That was evidenced in the Freedom of Information Act and the Privacy Act and many, many others.

Smith: War Powers.

Marsh: Yes, and the War Powers. And, you know, I handled the War Powers for Ford with Congress. And so did Vern Newsom(?). But he did not feel it was constitutional. I think he’s right, it is not constitutional. We know that now.
Smith: Was a decision made not to test that theory because your political capital was so depleted?

Marsh: I think the decision on that, and I can recall the discussion on that, there was so much on his platter. Why take on something else? So develop a system that you realize the statute was out there, but you are not bound by it, which was the position that he took. We tracked the statute. That was our admitting that we had to track it, and we took a position that we don’t have to do this, but we’re going to do it anyway. And a decision was made not to test it in the courts at the time.

Smith: Where did you apply it - for example, the Mayaguez incident?

Marsh: No, the first application of it came with the evacuation of Vietnam after the fall of Saigon. When the president, and I remember it well, he dispatched, as I recall, the 7th Fleet to the Vietnam borders to help and assist in the evacuation and other things. But it could be considered a very war-like act, because there was a question as to what would be the Chinese’s reaction to that.

The first instance pointed to the flaws in the statute that would play in from then on. The first question was, if you look at the War Powers Act as written, it says “the Congress.” Is that 435 or 535? Is it the armed services only? Is it the appropriations? Is it the leadership? You couldn’t identify them. So we came up with our own definition of what “the Congress” would be. They’d be some 20, 22 people, equally divided, House and Senate, jurisdictional committees. Highly classified, that was highly classified. Not because we didn’t want our people to know about it, but because if we identified them publicly, then those individuals could be tapped for surveillance and to find out what was being discussed by the president.

So the efforts involved in the 7th Fleet were the first instance where we used it. We used it about six times as I recall, maybe seven; the Mayaguez, the Phnom Penh, the Cambodian situation. We had two evacuations, as I recall, or three, of Lebanon of U.S. citizens. And every one of those situations, except the last one, and that was done deliberately. The last thing on Lebanon, they did not file a report on that because we wanted to show that we did not accept the statute.

Smith: What was the reaction?

Marsh: They didn’t notice it. They didn’t catch it. Incidentally, George Bush, the first President George Bush, was our ambassador or representative in China. And it happened that, when the evacuation [took place], the Speaker of the House, Carl Albert, and the Minority Leader were both in China with George Bush. He had designated an ad-hoc Speaker, John ________ in California, but we had members in Europe, we had members in Spain, we had some in different parts of the country here. It was a nightmare to try and reach those people even though there was a diligent effort made to do that.

What happens, Richard, with the War Powers Act, the media gets inside your decision cycle. What I mean by that is, before we would advise these 20 or 21 people, Brent Scowcroft and the General Counsel’s office and representatives of state and others would draft up a very short summary of what the incident was. That was then read verbatim by one of our legislative people and then they would record our member’s response and those summaries were then filed. And they were given to the president, too, but he was in California, so it ended up with all these members thrown around the globe and President Ford’s in California. It showed how the Act simply did not work. But he tracked the statute. I remember it well.

Smith: You mentioned Vietnam. Let’s kind of focus on April of ’75, because as we said earlier, we heard from Mel Laird recently who obviously loved the president, but was and is quite critical in his comments about what he perceives as a failure of leadership across the board. And I don’t think I’m putting words in his mouth when he suggests that a President of the United States, even under those circumstances, could go to Congress and get whatever the sum was to sustain the South Vietnamese government and prevent what happened. What’s your response to that?

Marsh: The Vietnamese collapse - efforts were made to try and get some financial assistance to the Vietnamese. That failed. You could not get a bill through.
You could not get support for a regime that people were complaining about back then in support of the war. There was so much resistance to that. The Vietnam thing poisoned the Nixon administration, it poisoned the Johnson administration, would’ve poisoned the Kennedy administration for a lot of different reasons. One of those was the draft and the terrible unfairness of the draft. But you could not sell if you tried to do things to the effect that it was a futile thing.

Smith: But a full court press was made, a serious effort was made to—

Marsh: I think what occurred is that, before you do it, you try to find out where your support or where your help is. There was none. Vietnam was that goat. The administration was, and I know Henry felt bad about that because of the Paris Peace Accords.

Smith: See, that raises a key issue here, because one senses within the administration, at the end, a tension between those who, for lack of a better word, I use Bob Hartmann and the people who produced, for example, the Tulane speech - where the president in effect publicly proclaims the war is over. And Secretary Kissinger, who it has been widely written, would not have delivered that speech, would have taken a different approach. I may be grossly over simplifying, but were there those tensions at that point within the administration. How would you describe the breakdown?

Marsh: There weren’t those kinds of tensions. I never saw any strains or stresses between Ford-Kissinger, even on those issues. My suspicion of Henry is when President Ford made a decision, Henry would acquiesce on it. Now, he may not have necessarily agreed that that was the right approach, but on Vietnam, Ford fully sensed where the public was. He also, in support of the war, would’ve continued to support it, but he was a political realist. Richard, you had going all these things that started involving the CIA, the Church Committee, the Pike Committee. You had the fallout of the things that involved the war in Dey Brinkin(?). We have to keep in mind, this was the first instance in American history that I can recall where the integrity of the President and the Oval Office was attacked and undermined.
And so you had a weakened presidency. And then you had the intelligence community which came under attack both in the House and the Senate, in the House by the Pike Committee and in the Senate by the Church Committee. And those things went on for months and months and months and it really changed dramatically the dimensions of the intelligence community. It also would lead ultimately to the establishment of an intelligence community in the House and the Senate. Not in Ford’s administration, that happened under President Carter, but all this undermining and all, and this unrest.

Smith: Let me ask you about that because you raise a fascinating point. I’ve read that, I think it was early in ’75, that Seymour Hersh ran this lengthy piece spilling a lot of beans, the family jewels, whatever you want to call it.

Smith: And the President read the piece. Was that, in fact, news to him at that point, what was in that article? Because out of that grew this multi-front investigatory effort.

Marsh: It would spawn, in effect, several different efforts. The first and most immediate was the Rockefeller Commission, which was an examination of wrong-doing and improper actions by the intelligence community and assassinations.

Smith: Which was widely and cynically perceived as an attempt by the White House at damage control at, in effect, having an investigation, but our investigation.

Marsh: I think that’s probably a fair statement because it put you in a burden. You can’t be President of the United States and have these kinds of revelations that had certain kinds of substance of truth in them and ignore them. You’ve got to do something about it. What happened then, you would then have the Ninze(?) Committee in the House which then collapsed of its own weight through dissent and strife inside the committee, which led to the Pike Committee. But in the meantime, the Church Committee had gotten up and had started to run on the Senate side.
Another thing that aided and abetted this attack on the Ford administration were the elections of 1974. In the ’74 elections, the Republicans lost 40-some seats. It was really almost a veto-proof House. I think it was one fourth or 288 to 141 or something like that, to 144. On the Senate side, you lost 5 Senate seats. But, the House group that came in, the House freshmen, were loaded for bear.

Smith: The Watergate Babies, so-called.

Marsh: Right, and they were going to correct the Watergate situation, they were going to reform Congress. They did change the selection of committee members in the House from the Ways and Means Committee over to another _________. They changed the seniority system. That was a very, very rebellious sort of casualty. And I think, I’ve always been of the view, well, I know for sure, they had gotten together before they were sworn in to discuss what they were going to do. And they found that they had a balance of power and they imposed their efforts on it. But now, with those _______ majorities in the House and Senate, it was extremely hard to defend an administration position on the intelligence increase. You couldn’t do it in some instances and they were just killing us with these subpoenas for materials from the Department of State and the CIA.

Smith: A couple things: One, was Ford in fact shocked by what he read in the Seymour Hersh story?

Marsh: One must remember, and we overlook the fact that, Ford as a House member had jurisdictional committee assignments that took him into the areas of intelligence. He had a far better grasp on the American intelligence program than people realize. That probably kind of hardened him. I’m confident that he was really taken aback by what was revealed and that’s evidence, I think, Richard, by the efforts that he took in his administration. President Ford reformed the American intelligence community.

Smith: How?

Marsh: Well, he had a group in the White House and the group was called the ICG, Intelligence Coordinating Group. That was Phil Buchen, Brent Scowcroft, who represented Henry who was representative for the Defense. Bill Colby of the CIA and Levi, who played a role for which he has never received the credit he should have received. He was a great anchor to that. It was a coordinating group, I chaired the coordinating group.

Smith: That’s fascinating - that the Attorney General would be part of that effort.

Marsh: And he was a voice of, Levi was one of these people who could listen to these things and summarize it in two or three sentences and he’s right at the heart of it. He was very quiet, but he was very thorough. And, out of that, came an effort for which he’s never been recognized. He adapted the Attorney General’s guidelines that related to the FBI and it would flow out of that particular thing.

An interesting thing, and I was uncertain how to deal with but I finally dealt with it by accepting it, was Bill Colby brought his own lawyer to those hearings. Rogovin, Mitch Rogovin. And Mitch sat in and eventually Mitch became a very valuable ally, he was very helpful. At first, you wondered whether or not he was going to be adversarial from the standpoint of trying to protect Bill Colby. But I would say that he became a more attractive member because he got so upset at the Pike Committee that he was driven to our side.

Smith: And how did the Executive Order on assassinations come about?

Marsh: It came out of the Rockefeller Commission. _____ the first of its kind. People think its law, it is not law. The Assassinations Prohibition is an Executive Order of the United States. It’s from Ford, Ford put that together. I suspect that Rockefeller probably recommended he do that.

Smith: I gather from what you say, you dismiss those who dismiss the Rockefeller Commission as in any way a white wash. Whatever the original political motivation was, it produced change.

Marsh: Well, the efforts of the Rockefeller group were subsumed in these other White House groups, the Intelligence Coordinating Group. It did provide a number of factions. It raised a lot of things, some of which could be clarified, some probably which could not. But the elements of the Rockefeller Commission were pursued by the Church Committee.

Smith: Was the president at all in an awkward position, in effect, defending Colby and the CIA while simultaneously undertaking an independent investigation of the Agency? What was the dynamic? There would seem to be something of a conflict.

Marsh: This is a view. I knew Colby. I knew Colby well. A magnificent World War II record in the resistance. A great record in Vietnam. I am of the view that he was so enmeshed in, and part of, the Vietnam strategies and policies and programs, that he should never have been the Director of the CIA because he was being called to witness on the Hill and he was put in a terrible situation. I mean, after all, if you’ve got a Director who’s coming to your meetings and he’s bringing his own lawyer, you feel you’re putting the person in potential jeopardy there. And people forget that when Ford and Colby parted ways, Ford offered him the ambassadorship to NATO. I’ve discussed that with Bill Colby. I was with President Ford when Colby was released and also Jim Schlesinger. I sat in on that.

Smith: How long had that been in the works?

Marsh: President Ford got there Friday and told me what he had decided to do. It was very apparent that he had made a decision on what he was going to do.

Smith: And this is jumping ahead, but over the years, this has also been enmeshed, the whole dumping of Rockefeller. There were those who see the long arm of Don Rumsfeld in this shuffle. And the President said, in effect, even then, “No, this was my doing.”

Marsh: That’s true. He told me on Friday what he had decided to do with those shifts. To my knowledge, Vice President Rockefeller was never mentioned in that. Ford was not comfortable with Jim Schlesinger. I had to work for Jim, I’d been his Assistant Secretary of Defense. But President Ford was not comfortable with him. When that shift came about, he told me on Friday, and I could tell that he was telling me in a way, “Jack, this is what I’ve decided to do. I’m informing you. I’m not asking you for your advice.”
Smith: Was it just about chemistry with Schlesinger?

Marsh: I think that’s all it was and I think probably if Schlesinger had more frequent access to the Oval Office that might not have happened. But if you look, there’s a great disparity between his access to the President.

Smith: Over the years it’s been portrayed as the President feeling somewhat resentful of what he took to be a condescending attitude on Schlesinger’s part and that the chemistry just never worked.

Marsh: I think your description is probably accurate. Jim to some degree in my view misjudged Ford, particularly as to his abilities and latent abilities. We both know Ford had these enormous abilities and many of them, he didn’t care if we could see them, we didn’t know that they were there. Ford told me what was going to happen on Friday. On Saturday night, I’m home and Don Rumsfeld calls me and said, “Jack, maybe you ought to come down here. Nobody’s sitting in on the meeting with either Schlesinger or Colby and I think probably somebody ought to sit in.”

Smith: Now, that raises a question. Why not Rumsfeld himself?

Marsh: Well, I guess, he was Chief of Staff, he didn’t want to be involved in it.

Smith: Of course, to be fair to Rumsfeld, he in some ways was a party of interest.

Marsh: At first, he wanted me to do it. He wanted me to call Jim Schlesinger to get him to come to the meeting, which I told him I would do. Then he called and said, “I think you ought to sit in.” And then the next instruction was, “I think you ought to go with Cheney and go down and sit in the meeting with Sadat,” because Cheney was going to be new and Don was sort of an old hand with him and I said I’d do it. I went down there and I sat in on those meetings that they had and it was real polite. Ford offered Jim the Chairman of the Board of Economic Advisors, as I recall. I don’t think he ever mentioned that Ford had offered him something, but he did. And I was there for Colby and he did the same thing with Colby on NATO.

Smith: How did Ford broach this unpleasant subject? It’s never easy to fire someone.
Marsh: No, it’s not easy. He was rather direct. It was a very courteous conversation. It was not an extensive one. And Jim, I think, was probably pretty surprised by it and, of course, wanted to put forth his own views about his service, but Ford was adamant. It was very apparent he was adamant that he was not going to change his mind and, “I made it. You can have the Economic Advisors, but this is my decision. We’re going to have another Secretary of Defense.” I don’t know whether he told him who it was going to be or not.

Smith: And, of course, it turned out to be Rumsfeld.

Marsh: Yeah.

Smith: Now, obviously this is a supposition, again, over the years, there’s something about Don Rumsfeld, I guess, generally it’s this view on the part of some people that he’s sort of behind the scenes pulling all these wires. And this was a great Machiavellian. Look, he got rid of Klutsky(?), he got a cabinet slot, he got this guy to replace him as Chief of Staff, he got Rockefeller out of the picture therefore opening the way in theory in ’76.

Marsh: Another factor is George Bush.

Smith: Bush is deep-sixed over in the CIA.

Marsh: As I recall, I believe he sent Elliott Richardson to the Court of St. James or to Commerce. There were several cabinet vacancies and George’s appeal, the appeal to George Bush was, “Look, the President wants you to come back to assume the post at CIA.” So, what happens? Stennis and others representing the Hill view, they take the position, “We don’t want to do anything that might be politicizing that and George Bush is a natural candidate to be vice president.” I don’t know whether he said that directly. So then, George had to write out a letter. He was kind of putting himself in political purgatory. I had to give the letter to Bush to get it signed and he was not happy about signing that letter, and I don’t blame him. But that condition was placed on him by the Senate and I don’t know if Senator Stennis was the spokesman, but he was representative of the people - they just didn’t want to start political trends in the CIA.
Smith: What would you say to those who think that Rumsfeld played an instrumental role in orchestrating this?

Marsh: Richard, I have to say I honestly don’t know because, one, I was very close to Rumsfeld, I was close to Cheney, and I was close to President Ford, and I hadn’t picked anything up about that. When I got down to Florida at the house there, I got on the phone and called. See, Don and I were congressional classmates. We were both elected to the 88th Congress and our offices were one or two doors from each other. It was a long, old relationship and I could talk to him very frankly. And I called him up about taking the job of Secretary of Defense and he was reluctant. We got Cheney on the phone and Dick and I both really leaned on him to take that job. He had never indicated to me - he certainly, it appeared, was concerned about the very dimension you mentioned being somewhat later becoming apparent or about a question being raised about. He had never indicated it to me, and when I was in Florida, I called him and I was surprised by how stern or adamant he was that he would not take the post.

Smith: But you finally convinced him.

Marsh: I know I said to him, “The President really needs you. This is something you’ve got to do.”

Smith: But you must have been aware of the friction between Rumsfeld and Rockefeller.

Marsh: Yeah, and I’ve never understood that because it seemed to me that that was a natural political ally.

Smith: Let me spin this, because Rockefeller, who I think exaggerated - almost with a little bit of paranoia - that said, he comes to the administration having been told, and I’d be interested in your opinion as to whether this was true or not. But having been led to believe he would be the domestic equivalent to Henry Kissinger. That, you know, the Domestic Council was his. This was a policy-making branch of the administration and all this. And I think he convinced himself that it was going to be different from other vice presidents.
Paradoxically, I talked to someone who was close to it who tried to talk him out of it at that point and went through all these reasons. And Rockefeller, after about 15 minutes, said, “Bill, everything you say is true, but you have to realize this is my last chance.” And I think when you strip everything away, you come to the fact that Rockefeller saw this as, in fact, his last shot at the presidency, which seems a little bizarre in retrospect and which may help to explain, in some measure, the extreme sensitivity that he had toward a potential rival [Don Rumsfeld]. Remember, Rumsfeld’s name had been on the short list of people considered for the vice presidency. There was no shortage of people in town who were talking about Rumsfeld as a potential running mate, et cetera.

And then you have this structural problem where Rockefeller comes into the White House believing he’s almost a deputy President for domestic policy. And Rumsfeld comes into the White House to perform the function of the Chief of Staff. And it’s an administration that decides pretty early on there aren’t going to be new domestic programs. We’re not going to launch a lot of new initiatives until we get a handle on the economy, until we bring spending under control. So, in other words, at the personal level, the relationship between the President and the vice president was a warm one, but ideologically, philosophically, Rockefeller had to have known that he was coming into a climate less conducive to the kind of government than he was used to in New York state. In many ways, Don Rumsfeld became the face of that. Does that make sense?

Marsh:

I think that is the argument that is frequently made. To me, of significance, and I’m sure you probably interviewed, is the Jim Cannon presence. Jim Cannon was the front guy for Rockefeller during the whole pre-confirmation process. And Rockefeller had a very bright and able guy, Bob Douglas, a lawyer who’d been a general counsel I think for the state of New York. Douglas and Cannon came in here. I dealt with them because I had certain responsibilities to President Ford in reference to the Rockefeller confirmation. I had developed such a close relationship with Cannon and Douglas, and particularly Cannon, that when Rockefeller’s confirmed and Cannon came in for the Domestic Council, I figured that was the ambassador or emissary of Nelson Rockefeller and would be his window. And I guess you’ve talked to Jim many times. Has he ever discussed that?

Smith: Well, it became very awkward for him because the vice president’s man had exactly that role, but over time the head of the Domestic Council worked for the president and Jim was put in a terribly awkward position.

Marsh: Yeah, he had a deputy that worked in there with him, able guy, Jim Cavanaugh. I learned to know the vice president much better than I had and we became pretty good friends.

Smith: As you got to know him better, was there anything that surprised you?

Marsh: Richard, the first thing that surprised me about Nelson Rockefeller was how an individual of his stature and family reputation could adapt himself to the subordinate position that he had. I was impressed by that.

Smith: How did that evidence itself?

Marsh: He made it very, very clear that Ford was boss. He would, in effect, say that. And in decisions that were made it was a case where he saluted and you knew sometimes he didn’t go with the decision, but anything that Ford wanted him to do, he did. And he did it in a way where it was obvious that Ford was the leader and he wasn’t. And that impressed me with him as an individual of his qualities. He clearly saw a role that he had been placed in and he was going to perform that role and perform it well. The only little, slight alteration, and maybe you know this, he made it plain he was not going to stay in the vice president’s house and he lived in his home in Foxhall Road. I think he refurbished the vice president’s house, but I don’t ever think he spent a night in there. That was sort of a little evidence of independence. But he was a very, very able man. And he met and talked with people. He brought with him down here Dick Parsons and you know Dick.

Smith: We were talking about the filibuster rule in the Senate which had been two-thirds to invoke cloture, 67. And it changed.

Marsh: Right, it changed to 60 votes and the author of that was the vice president, who, of course, is the president of the Senate. Vice President Rockefeller made that recommendation before he did it to President Ford. President Ford was aware of it. I don’t know if President Ford was necessarily enthused about it, but he went along with it. Assisting the vice president was a fellow named Dick Parsons, young attorney. Dick had a bush cut.

Smith: An afro.
Marsh: What’s it called?
Smith: An afro.
Marsh: Yeah, he had an afro. A heck of a nice guy. The story that I heard, Senator Thurmond had some question about this and he went to the vice president and the vice president said, “Well, my lawyer says this,” and “My lawyer says that,” and that came up again and Strom Thurmond wanted to see him and said, “Well, let me see your lawyer.” And when Strom Thurmond saw Dick Parsons there with the great big afro and all I think it really gave him pause. But that was a product of Nelson Rockefeller, the change in those filibuster rules. I’ve never seen anybody refer to it.

Smith: And my understanding of the background of that was the renewal of the Voting Rights Act. That this is what precipitated the debate. That was the background and the discussion that Rockefeller had with Parsons, Rockefeller had Parsons sitting in the gallery signaling him what to do. I mean, he made a chart. Of course, Nelson loved charts because he was dyslexic. He made this great big chart showing all of his options as the Senate’s presiding officer. If this happens, you do this. It’s almost like they were giving hand signals. Nelson had prepped, but he had Parsons up in the balcony in effect as a back-up. It was in the context of the civil rights movement, and legislation to which the Rockefellers had always been dedicated. And it came back to haunt him because it wasn’t just Thurmond, but I believe Senator Tower and a number of other who made their unhappiness with the vice president known to the White House.

Marsh: They may have, but President Ford stood by him on that and it went through. I think it went through because there wasn’t much build up before to do it, there wasn’t much press discussion. Suddenly, it happened. And that was Vice President Rockefeller that did that. It’s not generally known that he did, but he did.

Smith: When you stop to think, imagine in today’s political climate, when you need 60 votes to get anything done, imagine if you needed 67 votes to get anything done.

Marsh: Yeah, you couldn’t get it. The current environment, you wouldn’t be able to do that.

Smith: I’d like to hear your take on whether Rockefeller was jumped or was pushed, or was there something in between?

Marsh: That I don’t know. I know that Ford has since lamented at the Rockefeller dinner in New York, that it was one of the worst decisions he made. I think he used the term “cowardly”, I’m not certain. Ford regretted that decision later on. I think there were forces that were at work in the campaign that caused Rockefeller to say, “I just don’t want to be involved in this.” I think he reached a level of what he was willing to put up with.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that because the President also said, and in some ways, it was a very shrewd observation on his part, if you step back from the actual decision, who said what to whom, the President concluded that Nelson wasn’t happy as a vice president and that a second term would only be worse. That he would lack a certain fulfillment - which suggested he [Ford] was more observant than people give him credit.

Marsh: That was a point I wanted to make. What you said is true. It indicates a quality of President Ford that others didn’t know, his great skills in reading people but not indicating that he’s read them. I’ve seen it many, many times.

Smith: And, for a while, that would include people like Bill Colby and Jim Schlesinger.

Marsh: Yeah. Yeah, because what happens inevitably, Richard, is that what you have with that capability is the risk of being underestimated. And Ford’s career as President was underestimated as to what he did. I point out to people and I had mentioned this to you before, President Ford had more service as a member of the United States Congress than any person who had ever been President of the United States and that shaped his attitudes about things.
Ford’s great strength never came out, never came out. One, he understood the workings of the federal government. The other president who did was Lyndon Johnson. Both of them had different methods of evidence of that, but what Ford had that Johnson didn’t have, Ford knew and understood the budget and the appropriations process of the United States Congress. That is a wonderful, wonderful ability, but it is a tough quality to sell on the campaign trail.

Smith: Yes. Let me ask you. Was the administration, and the President in particular, including those around him, pretty slow to perceive how serious the Reagan challenge could be? Talking about, not in ’76, but in ’75, was there a temptation to believe that at the end Reagan wouldn’t run, after all? There was the 11th Commandment with which he was associated. Or a tendency to underestimate how formidable an opponent he might be?

Marsh: The two men were very, maybe they were too much alike, but Ford reached out to Reagan when he appointed the Assassination Committee and he asked Reagan to serve on that committee and he declined. He didn’t do it. And that, to me, was a first signal.

Smith: That was the Rockefeller Commission?

Marsh: Yeah. And if you go back and look at the records, I think you’ll find that Reagan turned it down which indicated to me he wanted to be his own man.
He didn’t want a relationship with Ford.

Smith: Did you have discussions leading up to the campaign about Reagan?

Marsh: No, I was not involved in the political campaign process. That was handled by different people in the White House, the chief’s office and Cheney. But I didn’t get into the political campaign and maybe it was because I’d served in the House as a Democrat. I wasn’t that involved in the political process.

Smith: The whole controversy over New York City and Marsh: Drop Dead?

Smith: Exactly. What are your memories of that? Clearly there was an intense debate going on. I’ve talked to Bill Seidman at length about this and he was someone aligned with Rockefeller. One senses that Bill Simon and Alan Greenspan took a very different viewpoint and that there was a bit of a tug of war going - almost for the soul of the President. What do you recall?

Marsh: I don’t recall but I was aware of it or some of the discussions in the Oval Office in reference to it. But as you pointed out, Bill Seidman was carrying that. I think it was one of those things that your liaison, meaning your liaison with the community and community leaders, probably broke down. I think that probably could have been avoided by better communication between _______. As I recall, Hugh Carey, I think. Was he mayor at the time?

Smith: Carey was governor at that point and Abe Beame was mayor.

Marsh: Carey had been a member of the House and I think as they seemed to reach a resolution, they didn’t really communicate. There was not enough communication between the people. Let me mention something to you, Richard, that was pure Ford and was his idea. But after the ’74 elections we saw that the Democratic majorities, the House was going to be almost veto-proof, better than two-to-one against us. That was very, very high numbers in the 60s, members in the Senate. So we had this program, you may recall, we had this program, No New Spending except for defense and energy were the two areas that were exempt from it. Ford discussed with me his plan for handling legislation and what he called a veto strategy. It was his strategy and it was a very well conceived strategy.

So what President Ford did was, one, abandon the traditional southern Democrat-Republican alliances except for where it’s helpful to use them. And then go with an interest where allied with the interest are constituencies that are Democrat that ________, for example, agriculture, that he vetoed and sustained that veto with New York Democrats. What happened was he used his Republicans as a base and then he used what he called Floating Coalitions, those were his words, Floating Coalitions. If, after the ’74 elections, the Democrats were fully in control, they became very assertive. The issue was energy, the big issue was energy. You can’t build energy alliances along political lines, they’re geographical. People want low prices for heat, you know, Republicans and Democrats in the Northeast and they want half prices in the Sunbelt and the oil regions. So what Ford would do, and I would know what the coalitions were, we would _____ those coalitions. If you were to look at the vetoes, he vetoed probably more than any other president had vetoed. And this is an area today where presidents are not following his example. It was very carefully constructed.

At the sub-committee level, you introduce a bill and remember the liaison team would tell the subcommittee chairman, “I don’t know where the administration’s going to be, but that’s not something they’d want.” If that goes on and goes to the next stage, there’s a clear warning. If you bring that bill out of committee, you’re going to be in trouble. You vote on it in committee and then the whole barrage comes on to defeat the bill and Ford had clearly told them that will be vetoed, at every stage that it would be vetoed. They would pass it and he vetoed it. And you know, he sustained those vetoes, I think, all but five.

But it was with this Floating Coalition, we got more Democrats than we did Republicans to sustain his veto. I called him up and reminded him what had happened and of course he laughed, but that Floating Coalition and the veto strategy, when I hear these presidents today talk about it, they’re not developing the veto strategy sufficiently. You’ve got to communicate it before you do it, what would happen. He was saying his differences with the bill, send it back, and the Congress would amend it and take out the adjunctive provisions and then he would sign it. The housing bill, as I recall, was exactly what happened.

Smith: It’s interesting because Hugh Carey told me years earlier, he said, “You know, Jerry Ford’s never gotten the credit that he deserved for helping to save New York because,” he said, “it was his tough love approach that actually forced the city to make some very difficult politically unpalatable decisions and budget cuts that would not have taken place otherwise.

Marsh: I think you had made reference to this sometime before about Hugh Carey. I’m going back a couple of years ago on the New York thing.
Smith: Were you at the convention in Kansas City?

Marsh: Yeah, I was in the suite there with the president and I remember he would want somebody to listen to his speech, but he had a habit where he was in the other room so he wouldn’t have this situation where he was trying to make this speech to one person. And I listened to it and I rode with him to the convention that night.

Smith: All the people still debate what signals were given, whether they were misunderstood about asking Reagan to be on the ticket. My understanding is that they were both explicit that the condition for the Ford-Reagan meeting, set by the Reagan camp, was, “Don’t ask him to be on the ticket.”

Marsh: Yeah, I think that’s right.

Smith: And there were those later on who said, “Well, only if he’d asked Reagan to be on the ticket with him, who knows.” But also, I gathered at that point that there was no love lost between the two camps.

Marsh: I think that’s correct and that would be evidenced four years later in Detroit where Ford was there. Reagan came in and President Reagan brought a peace pipe, an Indian peace pipe up.

Smith: Now, were you there?

Marsh: Uh-huh. I was involved in the negotiations through it.

Smith: We heard Bob Barrett tell a fascinating sort of theory. I think I’m putting this accurately, he’s not asserting this, but he’s raising this as a possibility - that all of this was in some ways a head fake on the part of the Reagan campaign to send an unmistakable signal to the country that, “Hey, I’m more moderate than you think I am. I’m willing to make this very significant gesture toward the middle of my party” but that it was never seriously pursued.

Marsh: It was seriously pursued and the negotiations were two major meetings. I was involved in those, Bob Barrett, Alan Greenspan, and Henry Kissinger.

Smith: How did this come about? You presumably went to Detroit without any expectations that this would go on.
Marsh: Oh, I had no idea that that would come up. I think, Richard, the presidential candidates in assessing the campaign in the front end are so concerned of assuring victory that they would reach further than they would normally to another party. This is true of Nixon. He was awfully concerned in ’72 that he was going to be defeated in an election that he won handily. But these concerns that he wanted to get Connally and everyone in there with him, but I think that the Reagan camp on the eve of this nomination felt that there’s one way to sew this up. If we had Jerry Ford on the ticket, Reagan’s going to be elected. I mean, it was a hard-nosed political decision.

Smith: Now, remember, four years earlier, they’d picked Dick Schweiker for his running mate. So, I mean, it wasn’t the first time that they’d thrown the long ball when it came to a running mate.

Marsh: When we went in there, Ford raised the ante by indicating if he was going to be vice president, he wanted Henry to be there, Alan Greenspan, I think.

Smith: How did this all unfold? Who, first of all told you about this? Was it President Ford who said, “I’ve heard from the Reagan people”? Or how did that come about?

Marsh: No, he didn’t communicate it at all to my knowledge with the Reagan people. He kept the visit earlier in the afternoon with the peace pipe. But we went over there - it was simply to talk about it. Ed Meese was there on the other side. Ed came in to the second iteration, but then when we went back with these suggestions that President Ford had, I think it just shocked the whole Reagan camp. I think they wanted to ________ advanced rigor mortis. Then Walter Cronkite got it on the news and they came back. There was still a measure of real interest there.

One of the things that hurt was the convention got out of control and it was run ahead of us. I had said that night, “I think this has reached a stage where the principles have got to get together by themselves and work it out,” because it was that close. It was very close. I think Ford would’ve fallen off some of his points and I’m pretty sure President Reagan would’ve acquiesced to something if Ford would. My thought was if we could adjourn and then sleep on this one night and then get the two men in the next morning by themselves, we probably would get it worked out. But what happened, the convention, Helms got up and nominated somebody and it got out of control. We couldn’t control the convention. It was going too fast for us.

Smith: And of course the media were feeding the fire.

Marsh: Yeah. And I went back there later that evening and talked with Ford. The room was very, very dark and he was sitting there in the semi-darkness and he said, “What do you think?” And I said, “I think you’d better pull the plug on it.” And he said, “I do, too.” He said, “That’s what I felt all along, so I’m going to do it.” So, that was it. That was just the two of us. His heart wasn’t in it, I don’t think.

Smith: What about Mrs. Ford?

Marsh: Oh, I don’t think she wanted anything to do with it. I can certainly understand. Although, she would’ve gone along with it if that’s what he wanted to do, I’m sure she would’ve gone along with it. But, it was one of those things as it began to unfold and be developed, and of course that’s the beauty I guess of the means of conversation. He was able to see it in a perspective that what was best to do that politically it was not best to do it. Two, personally, it was best not to do it. Now, I’m putting words in there as well, but that was my assessment.

Smith: And he never looked back after that.

Marsh: No. And he campaigned for President Reagan. I was with him on the campaign trail. He campaigned for President Reagan for a week, almost a week.

Smith: Let me ask you. Of course, you played a distinguished role in the Reagan presidency. There is a sense that there weren’t a lot of folks in the Reagan White House who would return Gerald Ford’s phone calls. And I’m not talking about the top; I’m talking about below the top.

Marsh: I never heard that.
Smith: You never did.

Marsh: I never heard that. I don’t know what the relationship was after he left the presidency. You know, Richard, Ford also has never gotten credit for the Helsinki Accords and there’s a strong view by a lot of foreign affairs experts in political science that it was the Helsinki Accords that would lead to the fall of the Berlin Wall.

Smith: It is interesting. If you go back and look at the clips, there were criticizers at the time, not only on the right, they were criticized by Jimmy Carter who subsequently hailed him as, in fact, a milestone on the road to the end of the Cold War.

Marsh: But Ford, in my view, has never got the credit for a lot of things. That’s the reason I refer to him as the interregnum.

Smith: The interregnum. It’s an interesting concept. I’ve often thought, sort of counter intuitively, that it’s a mistake to see the Ford presidency as a coda, just sort of the end of the Nixon presidency, but that it is in many ways a period that breaks with that past and is more about foreshadowing things to come, the classic example being economic deregulation or energy policy. You’re right, you have this odd dynamic. In the one hand, you’re pursuing détente, at least in terms of arms control, but at the same time, you’re fighting proxy wars in Africa and elsewhere with the Soviet Union. It’s a point where the word ‘détente’ became a political embarrassment.

Marsh: That’s true.

Smith: I mean, how did he handle the transition, if you will, from Nixonian détente to this kind of hybrid policy toward the Soviets?

Marsh: He was very frank with the Soviets as you know in the situation of the raising of the Russian submarine which occurred just as he was about to be President. We had to stop it from being raised. You see, that exercise had gone on for quite some time. There was no Soviet surveillance of it. Two or three days before he became president or a week before he became president, a Soviet submarine surveillance trawler ended up on the scene. They were bringing it up and we had to stop it. That was a highly sensitive operation.

Smith: That was the Howard Hughes ship, the Glomar Explorer.

Marsh: Yeah. But you’re talking about the bridge about how Ford would move into other things. He began a program of amnesty which was very, very controversial.

Smith: You told us and we want to get it on the camera if you don’t mind because you had that funny story, funny now, but probably not funny at the time, of going in to the President the day before he was to go in to the VFW.

Marsh: Well, and he’d put the amnesty references which were one and half or two pages. The speech had been prepared and there was nothing about amnesty in it. _____________ to the VFW, of all places to go, it was probably the only good one. But then what he did, he had Bob Hartmann write a page and a half that would outline the amnesty program - he sandwiched that into his speech. That part never got staffed up. Nobody knew that he was going to say that. And he did. That really, really caused us a furor.

Smith: And there’s a story involving Steve. You told a story about going into town the day before he went to Chicago that Steve had not registered for the draft.

Marsh: No, that was not unusual because when the draft was abandoned, a lot of the young men said, “The draft’s abandoned. You’re okay.” What happened, we had this stand-by statute that a youngster, 18-years old, didn’t know was there and that said he had to go register. And the oversight or neglect to that was not unusual to have done.

Smith: But it didn’t come as welcome news to the president.

Marsh: No, because it was the day before he was going to make this speech in Chicago.

Smith: Did you have much contact with the family?

Marsh: No, not too much. I saw Susan more because she was more there at home. So, I saw Susan. And I knew the other boys. Steve was the same age as my oldest son and both of them were seniors in high schools in the area. My son was a senior in Arlington.

Smith: You must have been around them the time that Mrs. Ford had her cancer.

Marsh: I was. I went with him.

Smith: Went with him to the hospital?

Marsh: Yeah.

Smith: What was that like?

Marsh: Well, the first thing, we flew in the helicopter when we should’ve gone by car. Fog had set in, completely obliterating everything.

Smith: This was Bethesda Naval Hospital?

Marsh: Yeah. So we had some trouble getting out there just because the weather was bad, but we got there. Of course, he was with Mrs. Ford himself.

Smith: Now, was this after the surgery, before the surgery?

Marsh: After. We came back by car and the thing I associate with the trip is that he had the Economic Summit they were having at the Hilton Hotel, and he went to that event. It was one of those situations where your heart goes out to somebody who’s having that kind of a problem and also Mrs. Ford who’s having a terrible problem. And here he is confronted with an Economic Summit of all these people to discuss the economic situation. Richard, it was at the Hilton. I’ve always been somewhat defensive on his policy called WIN, Whip Inflation Now. It’s my recollection that that summit recommended those types of actions, but what happened, as we later realized we were going into a recession, what you needed was an opposite thing where you need a tax reduction.

Smith: You knew you were whipsawed in terms of economic policy.

Marsh: Yeah, but I felt that the policies he was trying to produce all along were consistent with what was recommended.
Smith: That trip out and coming back from Bethesda, was he emotional?

Marsh: Oh, no. No, he was not. He was somber, very somber. And I think he was very relieved, one, that the operation was over and, two, that the operation was a success, but regretful that Mrs. Ford had to suffer like that. But he was very, very much in command of his faculties, but somber. And we just rode along. I didn’t have to say much and he didn’t want me to say much. It was one of those situations.

Smith: It’s hard for people today to realize what a groundbreaking thing that was for them to go public with that news. We take it for granted today, but 35 years ago it was not a subject that people discussed.

Marsh: That’s right, they didn’t. That was back in ’74 and people were reticent to discuss something that really was a national problem, the cancer and having that operation, and I think Mrs. Ford made a landmark decision to do that.

Smith: Let me ask you because there was the famous 60 Minutes interview and some of the other things she did that defined her as a model of candor, openness in many ways. At the time, clearly there were people that thought that you were paying a political price for her frank opinions. What was your sense of this?

Marsh: I think what you’ve said - in the White House that view did prevail. As I mentioned, I didn’t get into the political things, but I think you accurately describe what was the view in the White House. After all, you’re coming up on an election and your base, your solid Republican base, those were the ones you were concerned with. I think some of that rectified itself in the way that she handled it and all. She said something on 60 Minutes, I think, if that had happened shortly before the election, [but] it happened with about 14 months to go.

Smith: But I think people in the White House were surprised that the country had changed, in reaction to Vietnam and Watergate - people found candor refreshing. Clearly some of the Republican base did not, but a lot of other people did. And she became in some ways a heroine to a lot of folks in the way Harry Truman is admired today for his frankness.
Incidentally, next month would mark the end, not next month, in May, we mark the end of the Berlin air lift anniversary. People forget as to the day 60 years ago that air lift was going on. And I tell you, those kinds of things impact a president and his decision making and people who look on the Ford thing, they don’t think about the Cold War going on. The Cold War was going on. It was a tough, tough war.

I want to clean up that part because after talking to Mel Laird, you know, Mel has this idea of how, if only Ford had waited until he came back to town…because he had this plan to bring a bipartisan delegation with both Houses down to the White House to appeal to the President to issue a pardon. And I don’t want to prejudice your answer, but to me that seems something that might work in theory 35 years later, but it’s hard to imagine given the incredibly charged political climate of the time, that any advance telegraphing of this thing would have touched off a political uproar. It’s hard to imagine how you could do it in a way that wouldn’t be shot down as a trial balloon.

Richard, you’re right. I have naturally over the years thought many, many times about the pardon and how we could have done it differently that would have brought a different answer. I’m not sure you could’ve gotten that many congressmen together to come down because the anger that existed in the Congress toward President Nixon - probably a lot of it was unwarranted, but it was there and they were angry. I recall there was a significant effort, it didn’t go because calmer heads would prevail, to revoke his pensions. I know that happened because a member of the United States Senate of his party told me that they ought to do that. He told me personally. And that was a very widespread view. It was the view that Nixon should be penalized and punished.

That resigning wasn’t enough.

Right. In fact, they felt that he should not have been pardoned. Of course, people don’t realize that the pardon power that the President of the United States has gives you the authority to pardon pre-indictment and so the authorities where there for him.
Smith: But then the other criticism was made, “Okay, I can buy into the pardon if you had got more out of Nixon.” The fact is we never got. I don’t know if you’ve seen Frost/Nixon, but the whole thing is based upon this notion that David Frost was going to get Nixon to trial and he never got him to court. And the worst thing about the pardon was that it absolved Nixon from confessing, from coming clean, from providing some sort of emotional catharsis to the public.

Marsh: One of the tasks that my office had in the White House was to run the transition for Nixon after he got out in San Clemente. And when he left Andrews Air Force Base, he had Air Force One and I think there were 50, 60, maybe 80 people who were to be staff members and all. The Congress went after him and they used the pocketbook. And what they did was they, in effect, reduced his transition authorization by agreeing to fund only 7 or 8 people. So there was all kinds of animus.

What I think might have helped, the pardon decision I don’t think would ever have been popular, but as a question of law, I think if President Ford could have had at least two or three preceding press conferences where each time he could have said, “I do have a task force in the American bar and there is a view that…” where he creates with the press an attitude that he is giving it some theory. And then after the third or fourth public venting of that in the press group, go ahead and do it. What caught him I think was the suddenness of the event.

Smith: And that press conference was typical. That August 27th or 28th press conference where Nixon predominated, that was a turning point.

Marsh: And that was Ford’s reason for doing it and he’s correct, you could not, at the time up until the pardon, you couldn’t get anything done in the White House on domestic and foreign relations. Everything was consumed by the pardon. Everything.

Smith: Do you think it might have been different - of course, Nixon almost died that fall.

Marsh: I think Ford went out to see him.
Smith: Politically, it was right before the ’74 election, worst possible time. But that’s Jerry Ford. Do you think a pardon would’ve been any more palatable at that point if it had been in effect linked overtly to Nixon’s health? Would there have been any more sympathy at that point?

Marsh: The elements you’re describing really did occur after he’d gotten out and gotten settled and after the pardon, too. I think you’re probably right. Yes, I think it has merit. I think that’s probably right.

Smith: My understanding is that there were at least informal discussions with the special prosecutor’s office. One factor that’s been cited over the years was Jaworski, or the people around Jaworski, were indicating that it might be a very long time indeed before Nixon could get a fair trial in D.C. That no one really knew how long. I mean it’s one thing to say we should let the legal process run its course. That’s fine if you know when that’s going to be, but if its two years, to pick a number out of thin air—

Marsh: Or even six months.

Smith: That changes the equation.

Marsh: I think the problem that the legal people had, Buchen’s office and others, is that you didn’t want to see a criminal trial start with Nixon in the dock. And you had to get ahead, see, what would have happened is you had to get a grand jury indictment before it had been referred for any action. So there was some discussion, and I know that Ford wanted to get ahead of that, he didn’t know how he would handle it.

Smith: Haig told us that far from pushing the pardon idea, at least as he constructs events now, he was simply putting Fred Buzhardt, it was Fred Buzhardt on his own that sort of put together this option list. And Haig—

Marsh: And Haig was the messenger. Yeah, I don’t know what Al has said about it in your interviews, but.

Smith: He indicated that it was a neutral role, that he wasn’t there as Nixon’s agent, he wasn’t there advocating a particular course, that he was in fact the messenger of Fred Buzhardt’s.
Marsh: There for Fred Buzhardt, who was probably the one who discussed this with Nixon.

Smith: You know, he told us Buzhardt told him because Buzhardt had been his counsel over at the Pentagon when he was secretary.

Marsh: Who was this? Laird?

Smith: Yeah. He said Buzhardt came to Laird a month after. Remember, Laird came back in to the White House for a while during Watergate. And Fred Buzhardt came to him within a month of his appointment and said, “I want you to be careful. I’ve been listening to these tapes and the President is involved.” And that was the first confirmation that Laird had. He was in this impossible position there, in fact, defending the President while being confided in by the President’s own lawyer. I asked Haig if he’d listened to the tapes, particularly the smoking gun tape. He said, “It all goes back to Buzhardt. Fred Buzhardt gave me some very wise counsel. He said, ‘Whatever you do, don’t be alone in a room with a tape.’”

Marsh: You know, your series of interviews developing indicate that there’s a role that Fred Buzhardt played in all this that is not generally known, because you’ve heard it from me, you’ve heard it from Laird, and you’ve heard it from Haig. The three of us aren’t the ones putting all this together.

Smith: Were you surprised when you heard about the existence of the White House taping system?

Marsh: No, not too. Of course, Lyndon Johnson put it in there. I wouldn’t necessarily approve of it, but I would not be surprised if there were some because in the nature of the presidency, your conversations might be taped.

Smith: One last thing on or off the record, because obviously it’s delicate. Haig also claimed that he was perfectly willing to stay on. That apparently the president, he thought, wanted him to stay on. And that he went to the president and denounced members of his staff for personal misconduct in the White House that allegedly had been passed on to him by Secret Service. And the President’s response was, “Well, Al, you’ll have to let me handle this.”
And then Haig said, “Well, you’ve given me an answer as to whether you want me to stay on.” Now, there clearly was friction between Haig and some of the people who came in.

Marsh: Hartmann.

Smith: Yeah.

Marsh: That was very, very heated. Al would get very strong in his views about that. The thing about Al leaving was, of course, you knew he went to NATO and Rumsfeld came in behind Haig. And I think I told you before, his assignment to NATO was not President Ford’s doing. It was the request of the Senate Armed Services Committee and namely, Stennis, conveyed it. They liked Al, had a great respect for him, but they did not want him to be in the Pentagon as chief of staff there or other four star, not that he couldn’t do it. And I think I mentioned this to you before, Richard. The congressional action, the subcommittee headed by Hungate of Judiciary was directed to, not just President Ford, there were several other people, Buzhardt and Haig. And they were to be the next witnesses in line on the Hill and I’m sure it’s the Senate view that that was kind of evidence of their own point that he would be better in Europe. So Hungate who was subcommittee chairman at the end of the year in December, he closed the hearing and the vote was three to three, but Hungate had the committee chairmanship, he had the vote and he voted with the Republicans to close the hearings now, which was a very, very healthy development because otherwise they had Buzhardt and Haig and who else up there on the Hill to testify.

Smith: Is there one last thing either that we haven’t asked or something that sums up the Ford presidency, something about the Ford presidency that people need to know beyond what we’ve discussed?

Marsh: I think we pretty well covered it. I think Ford, people were misled. He’s a far more intelligent man and he used that, at times, to indicate not what he knew, but what he wanted you to think he didn’t know. But to me it’s a remarkable thing of the strength of the system he came into the vice presidency and the presidency. And I think that he got so much help from people that people today don’t realize he got from, the Speaker of the House, Mike Mansfield, to Tip O’Neill, who were very, very interested in his success. That shows, I think, the best part of our system.

Smith: One thing before I forget, on the election of ’76, where you at the White House?

Marsh: Mhmm.

Smith: Do you remember the mood of that night? I mean, when you were going into that you basically had closed the gap. When you were going to into that, did you have a feeling as to how it would go, the Carter-Ford race, election night, ’76?

Marsh: I wasn’t down there with him that night. I was down there with him the next morning. And you may recall Mrs. Ford spoke for him because Ford completely lost his voice.

Smith: What was the mood like at that point?

Marsh: It was pretty grim. It was sad, certainly there was a sadness there, but it was a grim time.

Smith: Did it take him awhile to bounce back from that?

Marsh: Yeah, it took, I’d say, a week. You know, Richard, people don’t give Ford credit for a lot of things. For instance, on the transition, I was asked to run the transition to the Carter people. Ford has his own views on that, too. I remember it very well. He got the senior staff in, and this is only a day or two after the election, and he tells the senior staff that the continuity of our government was a very, very important thing and the success of the Carter transition was very important, and that he expected everyone to contribute to that successful transition. He didn’t want anyone to put in any tricks, roadblocks, which, very much like Ford, we wanted to do every bit of good to make it a success because it was necessary for the country. He made that statement and then he said, “Please understand, though, the policy until the day of the inauguration will be made by the Ford administration and I’ll make the decisions and our government, in effect, will be run by the Ford administration up until that day.”

He was wanting to lay the ground rules of behavior in saying they apply the rules of whose responsibility it was to run the government. I can’t tell you, to have the president make that kind of a statement, particularly if you’re trying to run the transition, is so important. And I would say, in fairness to Mr. Bush, he issued a very good transition plan, which was good. But Ford personally got the staff together and told them that. Of course, that goes to the decency of the man.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: First question. Was the Ford White House slow to wake up to the Reagan threat, both that Reagan might in fact run and that he would be as formidable an opponent as he was?

Baker: Well, I don’t think they were slow. Then, of course, I was not in the Ford White House. I was Undersecretary of Commerce.

Smith: Who was Secretary at that point?

Baker: When I went up there, it was Rodgers Morton who ended up being Chairman of the President Ford Committee. After President Ford asked him to go over and chair the committee, he appointed Elliott Richardson as Secretary of Commerce. So, I worked under both Morton and Richardson, but for almost three or four months, I was the acting Secretary of Commerce, the interregnum between the time that Rog left and Elliott came in.

Smith: As you imagine, there’s been a lot of overlap with Nixon and Watergate in this project and a number of people who have characterized Elliott Richardson - and some of those, surprisingly to me, have emphasized his presidential ambitions.

Baker: I wrote in my book, Richard, that Elliott was a Boston Brahmin and he was very cerebral. So cerebral to the point that sometimes his writings were so esoteric, you couldn’t really understand them. And I have the fondest regard and affection for Elliott, but he was a politician, too. And he enjoyed running for office, he enjoyed campaigning. He was a bit formal.

Smith: Nelson Rockefeller, as vice president, said to someone, “Elliott Richardson’s so stuffy that when he’s in the room, you can’t breathe.”

Baker: Well, that’s the impression he gave to people, but I think if Elliott liked you, he would not come across as being stuffy. But, to people he didn’t know well, or that he might have thought less of, he probably did.
Smith: Do you think he saw himself as a president?

Baker: Oh, sure. I think he was very much of the view that he could’ve done it. I don’t think that he was very realistic in thinking that, given the make-up of the Republican Party at that time and the imperative of getting the nomination before you run for president.

Smith: Rogers Morton took some heat for the performance of the campaign. Was that unfair?

Baker: Yes, I think largely unfair. A lot of it resulted from an unfortunate photograph that was published, if I’m not mistaken, on the front page of the Washington Times where they’d asked him some question about the campaign and he said, “Look, I didn’t come over here to be the captain of the Titanic” or something like that.

Smith: “To rearrange—“

Baker: “To rearrange the deckchairs on the Titanic.” And, in the background, there were liquor bottles because we would celebrate each primary after it was over, so we’d celebrate the ones we could and commiserate on the ones we couldn’t. But Rog ran a good campaign in my view. I mean, he really did. Those stories, I think, is one reason they opted to make me Chairman of the President Ford Committee. I mean, that was one of the reasons, but the real reason, I think, is Rogers was sick with cancer. He had prostate cancer and he had it pretty severely.

Smith: Did Ronald Reagan’s challenge ultimately make Gerald Ford a better candidate? Which is not the same as saying whether it helped him or hurt him in November.

Baker: I think you could argue that it might have, yes. It might have. It certainly meant that he had to spend more time campaigning. And, you know, a lot of people have written that Ronald Reagan was a master when the red light came on the camera and that Jerry Ford would freeze up when the red light came on the camera. And it wasn’t that Jerry Ford would freeze up, in my opinion, it was simply that he was thinking about what he was going to say. But there was always a short pause between the question and the answer. And it gave the appearance that maybe he wasn’t entirely sure. If you read my book, you saw where I quoted Stu Spencer in there as being very straight with everybody - and at one point he said something to the effect that, “Just because you’re no fucking good, Mr. President,” or something like that. And the beauty about Jerry Ford, who was just a marvelous human being, a wonderful person, is he would laugh at that and say, “Well, that may be right, but I’m getting better.” But he became a damn good candidate, I think. I thought he was an extraordinarily good candidate. Look where he came from in the general election, twenty-five points behind in August and dead even on election day. Lost by only 10,000 votes out of 81 million votes that were cast.
You’d turn 10,000 votes around in Ohio and Hawaii and Ford would’ve been elected.

Smith: Does that fit into the larger trajectory? Ford supposedly said that what really hurt was losing the job just when felt he’d mastered it. And one way of looking at Ford’s two and a half years is as someone who came into the office, to which he’d never aspired, who had a congressional mindset, congressional skill set, and who had to learn – not unlearn those talents, but learn executive talents, learn communications, learn what it means to be president. Did he grow into that job?

Baker: Absolutely. I think that’s absolutely correct. He had never had any real executive experience. I can’t remember when he was first elected.

Smith: ’48.

Baker: ’48. So, he’d been a legislator for many, many years, which is one reason he was such a good consensus politician, I think. But he had to learn executive skills and he did so and did so very, very well.

Smith: When did you come on to the PFC?

Baker: I came to Washington in August of ’75. Rog Morton, when he was moved from Interior – which he didn’t want to do – to Commerce, he wanted his own deputy. And I’m sure that George Bush, who at the time was in Beijing as our representative there, suggested my name and so did some other people down there in Texas who’d been helpful in Republican politics. And I interviewed with Rog and he decided I was the person he wanted. Don Rumsfeld was the White House Chief of Staff at the time. They were concerned about the Reagan challenge. They certainly were concerned about it in May or June of ’75. And Ford had only been there less than a year at that point. Rummy wanted to appoint Bill Banowski who had been the president of Pepperdine University and was national committeeman from California – a close Reagan associate – with the idea that that might...you know. But they also offered Reagan, if you know your history, they also offered him a job as Secretary of Commerce and one other position in the cabinet, which he turned down.

Smith: I think it was Secretary of Transportation.

Baker: Well, it may be. I don’t know the answer.

Smith: Something improbable.

Baker: Anyway, I came in August of ’75, became Undersecretary of Commerce and it was in late April and I went on a campaign trip to Texas. I was one of the few Texans in the administration. And I went on the campaign trip to Texas with President Ford and on the way back, he asked me to go over to the PFC, the President Ford Committee, to become the delegate hunter in the nomination fight with Ronald Reagan. And that was because his delegate hunter had been killed in an automobile accident.

Smith: Jack Stiles.

Baker: Jack Stiles.

Smith: Nelson Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that Don Rumsfeld did him in and that he also deep-sixed George Bush to the CIA. But also, Rocky didn’t age well. He had convinced himself that Jack Stile’s death was not accidental.

Baker: Oh really?
Smith: Yeah, literally. He thought Bill Colby was a Soviet agent. I mean, he had this kind of paranoia.

Baker: Well, what would he think would be the motive in getting rid of Stiles? He was just a personal friend of the president.

Smith: Exactly. But he’d convinced himself that there were people around the president who didn’t want to see him reelected. I’ll leave it at that. It’s pretty far-fetched.

Baker: I find that bizarre.

Smith: Yeah. But, April is a critical moment because they’d won New Hampshire and they’d won Florida. They seemed to be on a roll, but its pre-North Carolina and Texas.

Baker: Just barely pre-North Carolina.

Smith: Okay.

Baker: If it was pre-. I’m not sure whether it was pre-North Carolina. North Carolina is where the Reagan campaign dug themselves back into the race, actually. And then you had Missouri and Texas and I remember shortly after being sent over to the PFC, I went to Missouri with the president and we lost all but three delegates and they were governor and some of the others. Then we went to Texas and we lost 100 to nothing, including John Tower, the only Republican who’d been elected state-wide in Texas since Reconstruction. And they wouldn’t let him be a delegate, wouldn’t let him have a seat. I mean, it was a blood bath.

Smith: Was there resentment because John Connally withheld his endorsement in that contest? I think he harbored some vice presidential aspirations; at least that’s what we’ve been told.

Baker: I don’t know the answer to that. I don’t remember. When we had Connally, as a Texan, I was sort of put in charge of him and, if I’d been Chairman of the PFC, I wouldn’t have been doing that. This was probably when I was the Deputy Chairman for Delegate Operations. But I don’t know the answer to that. I can’t remember. That was thirty years ago.

Smith: As Chief Delegate Hunter, what could you offer people besides intellectual arguments about the president? We’ve been told, for example, that the dinner for Queen Elizabeth was full of uncommitted Republican delegates.

Baker: It wasn’t full, I may be mistaken, but I believe I took an uncommitted delegate to dinner. We would take uncommitted delegates to White House dinners. I remember we gave some uncommitted delegates tickets to the ships…

Smith: Oh, the tall ships?

Baker: The tall ships. Well, with the anniversary—

Smith: With the Bicentennial. Fourth of July.

Baker: Bicentennial. Yeah, that’s right. But we were very careful. Extraordinarily careful. You’ve got to remember that we were running this campaign in the immediate aftermath of Watergate, where we’d been wiped out and we had an overwhelmingly Democratic Congress that was prepared to investigate anything and everything that happened. And, man, we crossed the Ts and dotted the Is. I kept a log, a memo, of every solicitation that came to us from an uncommitted delegate or prospective delegate that was improper. These delegates would say, “Well, look, I’ll vote for Ford, but I want to be on the Federal Communications Commission” or “I want to be on the Federal Trade Commission.” We would enter all that just to make a record - just to show that we wouldn’t entertain that.

Smith: We heard about a family – I want to say from New York, not Manhattan, but from the Bronx or Queens or something – supposedly some woman who kept going back and forth and was finally called and asked, “What would it take to nail you down?” And she wanted to bring her family into the Oval Office to meet the president. I guess it was a pretty scruffy looking group.

Baker: That’s perfectly permissible.
Smith: Oh, sure.

Baker: I mean legal. Totally legal. Had we been met with a request like that, we would’ve tried to arrange it. On the other hand, if she’d wanted an appointment for something for herself or somebody in her family or something that is inappropriate, we would write it down so we had a record.

Smith: Were you surprised by anything in the course of that, just in terms of what people expected, what they wanted?

Baker: Well, I think we had a fairly substantial number of requests that were inappropriate and that’s why we kept that log and kept a record of it. But it was a fascinating experience for this reason: It was the last really contested convention in the history of either of the two major parties. ’76 in Kansas City was the last time it went to the floor. The nomination, that is. The last time a presidential nomination went to the floor of a convention. And we didn’t know, we weren’t sure, from day to day whether we would win or not. I’ve written about this, as you know, and I’ve said that I never could understand why the Reaganites, instead of doing – what was it? About naming your vice president in advance and they named Schweiker.

Smith: An unemotional, bloodless procedural issue.

Baker: Yeah, it was a technical, procedural thing. Why didn’t they come with a platform that said, “Fire Kissinger”? That would’ve really grabbed a hold of some of these people.

Smith: You’d think they’d try to have it both ways. I mean, you very shrewdly gave way on the foreign policy plank.

Baker: The 14-C, wasn’t it?

Smith: It’s interesting because Stu Spencer agrees with you. He thought Sears made a fundamental mistake in putting so many eggs in the basket of a procedural issue. As opposed to going after the emotional issue of foreign policy.

Baker: That’s correct.

Smith: Now, he got the foreign policy plank because, in effect, you rolled over.
Baker: We would not let that become an issue because we were fearful, and I think rightly so, that we would lose enough delegates. It was a pretty close contest, as you know.

Smith: Right.

Baker: I think we only won by 100+, maybe 105 or so delegates out of 3,000 on the floor.

Smith: And Tom Korologos tells the story that Kissinger was more than slightly miffed and wanted to put up a fight and I don’t think grasped—

Baker: And so did Rocky.

Smith: And Rocky, yeah. And Kissinger in one of his patented threats to resign and Tom says, “If you’re going to quit, Henry, do it now. We need the votes.”

Baker: Who said that?

Smith: Tom Korologos.

Baker: Korologos. “If you’re going to quit, do it now.”

Smith: You can see Korologos saying that.

Baker: Yeah. “Henry, if you’re going to quit, do it now.”

Smith: Yeah.

Baker: Well, you know the flap I got in, too, by announcing Kissinger’s retirement from the Ford administration. If you read my book, the second one I wrote, not the one about being Secretary of State. But I wrote a book – you’d enjoy it because it’s a political book – Work Hard, Study, and Keep Out of Politics, which was my grandfather’s mantra. So I entitled the book that. But, in that, I write about having been sent to Oklahoma as a lowly Undersecretary of Commerce to raise some money during the primary. And I got to the home of a banker down there and it’s a nice, quiet little group of check writers around the pool and I’m told there’s no press in attendance. So, I gave my little pitch and then take questions. And one of the questions was, “Will Henry Kissinger be in the second Ford administration?” I said, “I can’t conceive of that happening.” Well, it turns out there was a stringer for the Daily Oklahoman, the college paper there, and he wrote this stuff.

By the time I got back to Washington, it was on the wires. And I went to a ceremony in the Rose Garden and on the way out, Nell Yates, the president’s secretary, came by to see me and said, “Before you go back to Commerce, stop off and see Mr. Cheney in the Chief of Staff’s office.” I went in there and Dick’s sitting there and said, “I understand you announced Henry’s resignation.” I said, “What are you talking about?” He said, “Well, that’s what the press is saying.” I said, “Oh, that couldn’t be. There must be some mistake.” He said, “Look, don’t worry about it. Just go back and make it right with Henry.” So, I went back to Commerce, called the Secretary of State, who was a more than imposing figure in that administration, and groveled my apologies, which he was reluctant to accept. He’d never met me before. Three or four days later, I went to an event over at the State Department, I go through the line, and I introduce myself to him. He says, “Oh, you’re the guy that announced my retirement.” A lot of interesting memories from those times.

Smith: We talked to Peter McPherson. Interesting. He said his recollection of what really fueled the Reagan challenge in the months leading up to its formal announcement – one was the refusal to meet Solzhenitsyn, and the other was the common situs picketing legislation.

Baker: Peter was my Deputy. He's a man of great talent and he was President of Michigan State. He was head of AID. I have great respect for Peter, but the common situs picketing issue would’ve operated the other way. That’s really where I think I first became noticed by the Ford White House because I was the acting Secretary of Commerce when all that came up and I argued in the Economic Policy Board that President Ford should veto that bill. And there were a lot of people arguing that he should sign it, including John Dunlop, the Secretary of Labor - because Ford had indicated when it was first introduced that he would be inclined to sign it. Dunlop resigned, but I really made a big stink and the Economic Policy Board sent a memo to the White House saying, if you do this, you’re really going to make it awfully hard to get the nomination over a Reagan challenge. And he vetoed it and Dunlop quit. So, how can Peter say common situs picketing?

Smith: He may have thought leading up to the veto...

Baker: Well, having supported it initially, not saying from the very start, we can’t live with this.

Smith: And the sense that it was an administration initiative.

Baker: Well, that may be. Common situs picketing would’ve been anathema to any conservative.

Smith: Explain the issue briefly. Why is it such a hot button?

Baker: It was illegal then for a labor union to go on a site when they have a grievance with one employer and picket that site and then have their picketing apply to all the other unions at the workplace. In other words, if one union had a dispute at a site, this legislation would’ve made it legal for them all to strike. I think that’s what it is.

Smith: So, you can certainly understand why it would be out there.

Baker: Anyway, I do remember that it was just an anathema and here I was, a conservative Republican from Texas and the debate on this in the Economic Policy Board was scary to me because I thought, “Boy, if we do this…” This was very much anti-Right-to-Work and so forth and so on.

Smith: Yeah. Did you have much contact with Bob Hartmann?

Baker: I did not have much, no.

Smith: Generally, how bitter was that convention in ’76?

Baker: I think it was very, very bitter.

Smith: Remember the dueling entrances by the candidates’ wives?

Baker: Well, you look at what I just told you about the Texas delegation. They wouldn’t let the sitting senator – the only Republican ever elected statewide in Texas since Reconstruction – wouldn’t let him go as a delegate. It was a tough deal.

Smith: And presumably that spilled over into the vice presidential selection process. I mean, all these years later, there are still people who will tell you differing versions of what Reagan did or did not impart. The overwhelming evidence we have is that the Reagan camp, beginning with the candidate himself made it crystal clear that he did not want to be asked to be on the ticket; indeed, made that a condition of their getting together subsequently.

Baker: Well, the Reagan camp did, but you really must get this book, because I write about it in one chapter of this book in detail. Here I am, the White House Chief of Staff for Ronald Reagan and I’m sitting in the Oval Office – just the two of us – and I said, “You know, Mr. President, if President Ford had asked you to run with him and you’d agreed, you would probably never have been president.” And he said, “Well, Jim, that may be so, but if he’d asked me, I would’ve felt duty bound to run.” I’ve got this all. You’ll find that fascinating. But, what I think, and he certainly wasn’t lying to me. He didn’t do that. That’s not the way Ronald Reagan was. But I know that his campaign came and said, “We will have the unity meeting provided you don’t ask the Governor to be a vice president.” Well, that’s all Ford needed. He didn’t want to ask him to be vice president. He didn’t want to ask him and Reagan didn’t want to be asked.

Smith: Well, then, let me jump ahead, because there’s this bizarre sequel in 1980. Again, people are still debating over whether it was ever real. There are some people who think it was kind of a show on the part of the Reagan people.

Baker: No, I think it was real.

Smith: You think it was real?

Baker: I think it was real and I was not a Reagan person then. I was a George H. W. Bush person. And, interesting, I’d been President Ford’s campaign chairman in ’76. Before I signed on with George Bush in ’88, we went to see President Ford. I went to see him to say, “Mr. President, is this going to be okay with you?” And George went to tell him he was going to run to show him the courtesy as the former president. So, we called on him out there in California. Interestingly enough, I flew into the convention from Omaha, Nebraska, where I’d been at a board meeting for Dick Herman’s company. Dick Herman was a national committeeman from Nebraska. Close friend of both George Bush and Jerry Ford. And I flew from Omaha in Jerry Ford’s plane because he happened to be there and they were talking about all this stuff on the way in. But I know from a fact from talking to the Reagan people that I worked with that it was very real. But it would never have worked, Richard. I mean, again, I wrote in the book, I said to President Reagan, “Mr. President, how would we have addressed President Ford? Would we have addressed him as ‘Mr. President/Vice President’ or ‘Mr. Vice President/President?’”

Smith: Yeah.

Baker: It never would’ve worked and they both came to that conclusion after awhile. I think one of the conditions he put down was he wanted also to be White House Chief of Staff and Vice President and maybe there was another one. I can’t remember.

Smith: Actually, he got that idea from Nelson Rockefeller, who toyed with the idea in ’76 of going back on the ticket, but only if he could be Chief of Staff because he had decided that that was the role that a vice president could constructively play.

Baker: But he couldn’t have gone back on the ticket because President Ford had asked him to step down.

Smith: Right.

Baker: Isn’t that your understanding?

Smith: It is, yeah.

Baker: And you want to know what I think? I want to tell you something I think. I think that was a terrible mistake as it turned out. The campaign was so close that I think if he had kept Rockefeller on, I think he still would’ve gotten the nomination.
Smith: You do?

Baker: I do. And I think we would’ve won the election. And I think if he’d had Reagan on there, we clearly would’ve won the election.

Smith: Presumably, the Schweiker pick was designed to bring Drew Lewis and the Pennsylvania delegation to Reagan.

Baker: That’s correct.

Smith: Was that a hope? Was it based on something more than just a hope? Did they have reason to believe?

Baker: You’d have to ask John Sears that. I don’t know whether they had more than reasonable hope, but there was never any question, from our standpoint. I mean, Drew said, “I’ve committed. I’ve been here. I’m going to be here.” And he was. So, it not only didn’t work, I think it sort of backfired on him a little bit.

Smith: Well, it took some of the purity out of it. I mean, it made it easier for people like Clark Reed, I imagine, in the end to go with Ford.

Baker: Probably did. Reed and perhaps some others, some of the uncommitted.

Smith: After the convention, the acceptance speech which everyone agrees was probably the best speech Ford ever gave and his challenge to Carter to debate - did that begin the process of at least shifting the dynamics of that race? Taking the offensive?

Baker: Well, if you’re asking me if I think that was a successful campaign strategy, I do. I think he had to do something to shake it up. As I told you, when I took over as Chairman of the President Ford Committee, we were 25 points behind. That was in August. It was there at that session in Vail where I think he threw the challenge out. Here’s a sitting and incumbent president saying, “I want to challenge…”

Smith: I’ll never forget hearing Mark Shields, who was not a Republican partisan, talk about what a great campaign Ford ran and in particular how good the media was. You had Bailey-Deardorff?
Baker: Bailey - Deardorff did a great job.

Smith: And probably the last jingle that people remember...“I’m feeling good about America.” The man on the street interviews. I mean, the whole package.

Baker: The whole thing was good and how about the Joe & Jerry Show? With Joe Garagiola.

Smith: Yeah, where did that come from?

Baker: Well, they hit it off.

Smith: Just chemistry?

Baker: Well, yeah. They were cutting one spot if I’m not mistaken and they hit it off so well and it was so entertaining, they decided, “We’d better do more of these.” And they were very successful.

Smith: And Pearl Bailey was also in there. I remember the election eve broadcast was from Air Force One and you had Joe Garagiola and Pearl Bailey. Interesting mix.

Baker: And President Ford couldn’t speak. His voice had gone.

Smith: At the end - we talk about Ohio. He went back to Grand Rapids and had a very sentimental homecoming. Might he have gone to Ohio instead? Was there a debate at the end of the campaign about where to send him?

Baker: I don’t recall there being any debate at that time, but let me tell you something. Nobody ever worked any harder than he did in that campaign. And, as I say, on the last day, he couldn’t speak. I don’t recall an argument about whether we should stop off in Ohio on the way home to Michigan.

Smith: Yeah, basically.

Baker: I don’t recall that.

Smith: The moment you heard the Polish gaffe, did you know that you had a problem?
Baker: Yeah, we did. And, again, I write about this in detail in my book. Henry called the president after the debate and said, “Mr. President, you did a wonderful job. Marvelous. Really terrific.” And so it was really hard to get the president to go out there and say, “Yeah, this was a mistake” or say, “I misspoke and here’s what I meant by that.” That’s what we were trying to get him to do and it was hard. Kissinger’s going to take a trip to Africa. Kissinger was the bete noire of the conservatives. And before going to Africa, they wanted him to come into the White House – this was just before Texas, so I was still at Commerce – they wanted him to come into the press room and brief about his trip at the White House.

And I called Dick on the phone and I said, “Dick, you’re not really going to do this, are you, just in advance of the Texas primary?” He said, “Look, I’ve tried to turn the old man around on this and I broke my pick. Now, if you want to come over here and try, you’re welcome to.” I said, “I do.” So, I came over there and I think by that time he’d already asked me to become the delegate hunter, so I had a little more leverage than just the Deputy Secretary at Commerce. So, I went in, Dick and I, and we sat there. I remember saying, “Mr. President, this would be very detrimental in the southern states and particularly in Texas. Why don’t you just let him go do the trip? Why do you have to have a big, splashy press conference beforehand?” And the president’s sitting there going puff, puff – you know, he always puffed on that pipe – he said, “Well, Jim, Henry’s doing a remarkable job and I think he ought to tell the American people about it.” And he said, “And, anyway, the thinking Republicans in Texas will understand.” I said, “Mr. President, there are no thinking Republicans in Texas on this issue.”

Smith: We’ve established he was stubborn. Did you ever see his temper?

Baker: Who? President Ford?

Smith: Yeah.

Baker: Not too much. You know, I saw Reagan’s because I was his Chief of Staff for four years and two weeks and he had one, too. You didn’t see it often, but you could see it. I don’t recall ever seeing Ford just really lash out at someone.

Smith: At the end of the campaign, did you think you’d caught up? Did you think you really had a good chance to win?

Baker: We knew the Gallup was even going into Election Day. And then we knew we started getting the exit polls and they didn’t look real good. We went over to share them with the president at 4:30, 5:00 o’clock in the Oval Office. I remember going over with Teeter and maybe Stu, Teeter and Stu and I and maybe Dick. And the president didn’t seem to be too upset about that. He said, “Well, those are just exit polls.” But we were very hopeful because the Gallup was even and then we got the bad news of the exit polls, but we still lost so very narrowly. I remember thinking to myself at 3:00 o’clock in the morning, the morning after Election Day, “This is the most bizarre thing in the world. Seven years ago, I was a Democratic lawyer in Houston, Texas, and now I have run a campaign or been chairman of campaign for an incumbent Republican president in the closest presidential election of my lifetime.” Well, guess what? If you remember what happened in Florida in 2000, you know it wasn’t the closest presidential election of my lifetime. But it was very bizarre because he came from so far back.

Smith: Did Texas hurt especially? I mean, was he counting on Texas?

Baker: Not after—

Smith: Not after the primary?

Baker: Well, Texas was a big passel of electoral votes.

Smith: I think we’ve been told that Connally assured him as late as Election Day that it was in the bag.

Baker: I think Connally was very confident that we would carry it and we didn’t. But, I mean, had we done it, we’d win. You know, it almost would’ve done it in the Electoral College. It would’ve flipped Ohio and Hawaii.

Smith: Did you see him later that night? Were you at the White House?
Baker: No, I was at the election headquarters downtown and I had to do the press stuff down there. As I say, it wasn’t until 3:00 o’clock in the morning. I was in communication with the White House, but I wasn’t over there.

Smith: Did it take him awhile to bounce back? We’ve heard that.

Baker: You know, I’m not the best one to answer that because when the campaign was over, I only saw him two or three times after that while he was still president.

Smith: He went around and told some people, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.”

Baker: Then they became fairly good friends.

Smith: They did. I’ve sometimes wondered if one of the things that brought them together was the fact that they’d both run against Ronald Reagan.

Baker: That’s true. That is. Absolutely. And they both in effect lost to Ronald Reagan, although President Ford didn’t lose to him, but that challenge damn well hurt us. I mean, you can make the argument that he became a better campaigner and I think he did, but the challenge hurt.

Smith: Next to last thing and maybe it’s awkward, but there’s no shortage of people who say that if Governor Reagan had done more in the fall campaign in places like Mississippi and maybe Ohio that it could’ve spelled the difference. What’s your take?

Baker: You know, I’ve lead or helped lead five presidential campaigns and every damn one of them you can go back and find this or this or this or any number of things that would’ve made a difference. You can argue that if Governor Reagan had been more active, it might’ve helped, rather than just being supportive of the cause and the effort. Who’s to say? But that was probably as bitter a primary as either party has experienced in many, many moons. So, it’s pretty hard to say. As you say, sensitive for me because I love both of them, I was privileged to work for both of them and privileged to work for George 41, as well. And, you know, I tell people I’m the luckiest guy in the world because I got to work directly for three wonderful men, wonderful characters, and beautiful human beings. All three of them. And then got to serve another one as a private citizen in various capacities.

Smith: In the Reagan White House were there lingering resentments toward Ford? I don’t mean at the top.

Baker: No. In our White House?

Smith: Yeah.

Baker: No. Now, I’m not aware that he felt that way. I really am not. And I never heard it from anybody.

Smith: Certainly in terms of President Reagan himself.

Baker: No, no, no, no. You know, President Reagan is completely without guile. I mean, in fact, some people would take advantage of him. He believes the best about people. But I never noticed any animus toward President Ford in the Reagan White House.

Baker: Well, he came to the Baker Institute, at the groundbreaking ceremony we had for my institute at Rice University. Showed up there with George H. W. and we had Carter and Reagan by television. So, President Ford was there. I used to call him every time I’d go out to California in the desert and go by and see him. But that was the only way I saw him.

Smith: Did he express concern about the direction the Republican Party was going?

Baker: Yes. He had the view that the party was moving too far, too fast to the Right.

Smith: Particularly on social issues?

Baker: Yeah, I don’t know that he said particularly on social issues, but generally speaking. But, you know, I didn’t have that many conversations with him after he left office where we would talk about that. We’d talk about other things, but we didn’t talk about that.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of reaction when he passed away? Because, you know, he’d been out of the public eye for awhile. And it almost grew as the week went along.
Baker: You know something? He was the right man for the country at the time and he restored our pride and confidence in ourselves and he made the hard decisions. He would veto bills that were bad policy and, as you say, he pardoned Nixon and, boy, didn’t we see that every day in the campaign. It cropped up every day.

Smith: Do you think it was a significant factor contributing to his defeat?

Baker: Absolutely a significant factor. Huge. But people loved him and that’s what you saw with the accolades that poured in after he passed away. And I’m still on the Board of the Ford Foundation and I interface every now and then with Jack and Susan and Steve. Betty, of course, is frail right now, but still pretty good upstairs.

Smith: Last thing: how do you think he should be remembered?

Baker: Well, I think, as I said, I think he was the right man for America at a very, very difficult time in our history. I don’t know many people who could’ve come in and done it with the class that he did it. And, you know, people could disagree with Jerry Ford, but nobody could dislike him. He had a wonderful ability, he was a consensus politician. He could reach across the aisle. That’d come from his years of legislative experience up there, many of which were as Minority Leader. But I think that I’d answer by simply saying he was just a beautiful human being and I think that people now recognize that and they recognize he was the right person at a very difficult time for America. That was a terribly difficult time.

Smith: People tend to forget. I mean, we’re always in the crisis of the moment, but imagine someone coming in with so many problems and without the legitimacy of an election.

Baker: Of an election, that's right.

Smith: Without a transition period.

Baker: That’s right. No transition. And not elected. The only unelected president, probably, we’ll ever have.
Smith: And presumably that made it all the more important for him to win that ’76 race.

Baker: That’s right. Yeah. And to come so close from so far back. Really close. Those kinds of defeats sometimes hurt more than the wipeout losses.

Smith: Last thing and then I promise we’ll let you go. Tell us about his intelligence.

Baker: I think President Ford was extraordinarily intelligent. I’ve already said that he didn’t come across that way on television because I think he would always stop and think about his answer. The question would come and there would be a pause. But he was a Phi Beta Kappa, right? Am I wrong about that? I think I’m right about that.

Smith: I think you’re right.

Baker: And, you’re bound to have a fair amount of intelligence if you graduate Phi Beta Kappa from the University of Michigan.

Smith: And the last president to introduce his own budget. Remember? To brief his own budget in front of the press.

Baker: That’s correct.

Smith: Because he knew every line on that budget.

Baker: He knew that stuff. Well, he knew that from his years of serving in the legislature, but he knew the intricacies of government from the legislative standpoint, not as much from the executive. But since the Congress are the ones that deal with the budget, the Congress appropriates and so forth, he knew that backwards and forwards. Well, what do you think would’ve been different if he had won?

Smith: I think there’d be a Truman-esque aura around Ford. Ford and Truman had a lot of similar qualities. They were plain-spoken. They weren’t flashy - Midwestern, straight shooter - and I think that would’ve made more of an imprint on the country, obviously, given another four years and the legitimacy of an election. In terms of specific policies, who knows? I mean, presumably the Panama Canal Treaty would’ve gone forward. It’d been put off because of the Reagan challenge.

Baker: Yeah, but politically it would’ve been a cataclysmic event. You would not have had pictures of Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush or George W. Bush in the White House. I mean, it would’ve been totally different.

Smith: But you might also not have had pictures of American hostage in Tehran.

Baker: That’s right. There would’ve been a lot of substantive things as well. I’m just talking about on the politics side.

Smith: Yeah, you’re right.

Baker: If he had won that election, he could’ve then run for another term and then Ronald Reagan might not have been president. George Bush would not have been vice president and then president. And then George W. would not have…

Smith: That’s a perfect note on which to end. Thank you.

Smith: First of all, what does it bring back to be in this room?

Greenbaum: A lot of wonderful memories. But interesting enough, most of the experiences that I had with President Ford were outside of the official surroundings, so to speak. We shared many dinners together.

You haven’t asked me, but I’ll volunteer it anyway, how we first happened to meet the Fords. My wife and I started going to Vail, Colorado many, many years ago. Specifically about 1968, and we stayed at a place called the Lodge at Vail. So after several years there we said, “Well, it would be a great place to buy a condo.” So I bought the condo and as we were going up with the realtor, I said, “Who lives down the hall there?” And they said, well, so and so lives there and so and so lives there. I said, “Who lives at the end of the hall?” He said, “A congressman.” I said, “What’s his name?” They said, “Ford.” I said, “Never heard of him. What state?” And they proceeded to tell me and so forth. Anyway, we never met him at that point.

It was a couple of years later when he became vice president, that we did meet him. We had a cocktail party for him and had a wonderful evening. One thing led to another and our relationship blossomed because they followed us wherever we went. I’m just being facetious, obviously. First we were in Colorado, then we moved from Vail over to Beaver Creek, where we bought a place and the Fords bought a place over in Beaver Creek. We moved here from Louisiana, here being Rancho Mirage, in 1976. Well, that was the same year that the Fords moved here. One thing led to another and our constant contact with one another kind of evolved into a real friendship. So much so that initially, when I met Betty, I was serving on the board of the Eisenhower Medical Center here in Rancho Mirage.

I finally left the Eisenhower Medical Center where I had chaired several events for the Betty Ford Center, and Betty asked me to go on her board, where I still serve today, very proudly, and very proud of the work we do. But, going back in time, that was the beginning of the relationship.

Smith: In those early days, when you were just sort of getting to know them, did anything about them surprise you?

Greenbaum: Yes. The fact that, here I was, talking to the former president of the United States, and former first lady, and I didn’t realize it. So much so, I’ll give you one good for instance. One of the discussions we had - oh we’d already known them several years, and had broken bread with them several times, and my wife, who just tells it like it is (she is very special to me, and she’s very special anyway) - but the four of us were having dinner one night and something came up about the Warren Commission. Well, my wife is from Louisiana, so she had very, very strong feelings about what took place and so forth, and she did not hold back at all with President Ford. And I’m kicking her under the table, and she’s looking at me and I says, “Honey, he was head of the Warren Commission.” And she keeps at it. Well, anyway, I ended up getting a letter and book from President Ford about the Warren Commission, where he stood by his findings of what the Commission finally resolved. But that was, I think, the most telling thing about him, and both of them.

You never realized you were in the presence of greatness because they were the personification, and Betty still is, of just being regular folks. We used to go out for dinner, the four of us and just have a casual dinner, and again, it was the same feeling. One of the nicest things about all the years that we shared experiences was, about once every couple of weeks or so, I would invite President Ford over to our country club here in Rancho Mirage for lunch with the guys. And he was one of the guys. Without exception, everybody who joined us during those lunches would come over to me later and say, “You know, I can’t believe he’s such a nice person. Not just a nice person, but a normal person.” And, unfortunately, that position is not shared by some of our other previous presidents, but we won’t go there.

Smith: Did he talk about his days in the White House?
Greenbaum: Yes. And I’m sure you have all the nitty-gritty – well, let me mention this. We discussed his coming into office as far as the pardon of Nixon and so forth. And he stood by it for many, many years, as he did until his death, that he did the right thing. But it really came home when President Clinton was going through all of his trials and tribulations those last couple of years when they tried to impeach him, etc., and he told us, he says, “You know, I’m going to say the same thing I said when I forgave Nixon. We need to forgive Clinton. Sure he was wrong in what he did, but we need to get on and remember what’s good for the country.” And to me that was very, very telling. It really was.

Smith: He took some heat for that.

Greenbaum: Oh, absolutely. I think it probably cost him the election. He said that he felt that it did cost him the election, and he said when it happened, he said, “This will probably cost me the election, if I do this. But I’ve got to do what’s right for the country.” And he lived his whole life like that. Just a very stand up type guy.

Smith: Tell me about when you first met Mrs. Ford. Now was this before the Betty Ford Center had opened?

Greenbaum: Well, yes, actually it was.

Smith: Let me ask, it may be a delicate question but she’s written about it. Were you aware of her problem at that point?

Greenbaum: Yes. I’m going to tread lightly on those – yes, I was. I knew Betty had a problem because I had been with her, and I realized that something was wrong, I wasn’t quite sure what, and then I found out later exactly what the situation was.

Smith: Tell me about the genesis of the Betty Ford Center, because, clearly it was much more than her just putting her name on this place. I mean – let me back up because I’ve been told that she saved Leonard Firestone’s life.

Greenbaum: Exactly. Well, I know you talked to some of my friends that are very involved with the Center, and also familiar with her past, and I’m sure they filled you in on all the blanks on that. Yes, she felt the need, as she said, between Leonard and Betty, they realized there was a need to help other people. By taking their feelings and going the next step, they hired John Schwarzlose, who has been with the Center since its inception. He’s still president and CEO of the Center, and between the two of them, they built it into what it is today.
I would give equal credit to both of them, or I’d say, all three of them.
Leonard, Betty and John Schwarzlose.

Smith: Tell me about Leonard Firestone, because in some ways he’s maybe the unsung hero in this story. Most people don’t know the name or certainly wouldn’t necessarily associate him with…

Greenbaum: Well, in the early years, I really was never that close to Leonard. I was with him on social occasions, but I never had occasion to really go one on one with him too often. I just heard a lot of wonderful things about him. He was a very caring individual.

Smith: For her, this was like – I use the analogy of Kathryn Graham, almost – in middle life suddenly being thrust into a situation where you’re responsible for a very large operation.

Greenbaum: She was and is a gutsy person, okay? I’ve watched her. She has all the humility that anybody could possibly have. She’s very modest in her own way. At times I think she really forgets the power that she really has. And I say power, the power of her presence. I’ve been around her and I watch her with our patients at the Center, and these people hold her in awe. Last year we had our twenty-fifth anniversary here for the Betty Ford Center, and Robin Williams came and entertained, and I must tell you, Robin Williams referred to Betty as Teresa.

Smith: Mother Teresa?

Greenbaum: Mother Teresa – thank you. I knew something was wrong there. And she got a big kick out of it. But it was true. We had, I think, 1,700 people there that night. And everybody, without exception, just being in the presence of Betty Ford was being in the presence of greatness. It was electrifying.
Smith: Had Robin Williams been a patient?

Greenbaum: No, not at the Center, but if he were I couldn’t tell you. But he is in recovery, and he was remarkable because he did something that I don’t think he’s ever done before. He had relapsed and he was in the second round of recovery, and he exposed himself. And that’s tough to do. By exposing himself, I mean, he let it all hang out, as only he can do, and it was just a fascinating, wonderful, special evening. It really was.

Smith: What is it – do you have theory, or does she have a theory – putting aside the emphasis on celebrity, what it is about creative, driven, sort of type A, whatever cliché you want to use - or is it something about them that seems to make them particularly vulnerable?

Greenbaum: You probably would be a better judge of that than I would. I really can’t put my finger on any one thing in particular. And I’ve been around other people of great reputation and what have you, and what makes them different from other people – I wish there was one common thing, but there isn’t. Everybody has their own little thing.

Smith: I mean, presumably there are physical components involved, and there are psychological components involved. That’s grossly oversimplified. Maybe there is obviously no one element that explains addiction.

Greenbaum: I can’t really tell you what sets one person apart from another, other than the fact that something shines, something radiates, and both Betty and President Ford have this, or had it.

Smith: Do you think for a while the public thought that most of the patients at Betty Ford’s were celebrities?

Greenbaum: Oh, very definitely. We still have that problem. That’s the good news and the bad news. The bad news is a lot of people think, well, I can’t afford to go there because it’s strictly for celebrities. And it’s really not. Less than one percent of our patients represent that particular type clientele. The vast majority of them are just from everyday walks of life. The good news is, because of that exclusivity, it gives us a little shine that other institutions would like to have. They say, well, gee, I’d like to be a place where they have all these famous people.

Smith: It’s interesting, I assume you were part of the discussion, when folks in other cities have approached Mrs. Ford about, in effect, franchising.

Greenbaum: Oh, yeah. Actually, I can go a step further. There are bars all over the world that are the Betty Ford bar, or what have you, and we have to spend a lot of money protecting our name. But Betty, and rightfully so, is very protective of what we do. And bigger isn’t necessarily better. We know that. As a result of this feeling, we’ve maintained a relatively small number of beds on campus. We have a hundred beds on campus, and we have around fifty-eight off-campus, here in this community, though. We’ve been very, very protective of the name, but what we’re trying to do now, we’ve started something called the Betty Ford Institute, and what we’re doing there is trying to take the things that we know and teach these things to other people.

We have a children’s program that is second to none, and by children’s program – these are children of parents who are going through or have gone through treatment, and we want to make sure those children don’t feel responsible for what their parents have done. We’ll hopefully be able to teach other people. We have a program called SIMS, Summer Institute for Medical Students, whereby we take X number of medical students and teach them about alcoholism. Because, unfortunately, and I don’t want to digress, but basically, too large a percentage of the population don’t recognize the fact that being addicted is a disease.

Smith: She probably, as much if not more than anyone, has managed to remove much of the stigma.

Greenbaum: Oh, absolutely. I have a number of personal friends of mine that are almost, I won’t say that they are proud to admit they are alcoholics, but they’ve come out of the closet now. Much to the benefit of everybody else, because, as a result they’ve encouraged other people to participate in recovery.

Smith: Do you think she fully realizes what her impact has been?
Greenbaum: Yes and no. Sometimes I know she does, and other times I don’t think she realizes the magnitude of it. We are second to none – I say ‘we’ – the Betty Ford Center is second to none anywhere in the world. It’s just an awesome thing. It really is. I don’t know if you’ve been – have you been on the campus?

Smith: I have been there in the past.

Greenbaum: And so I think you realize what I’m talking about. It’s like being on a college campus. But the education is a hell of a lot more important than anything you get out of college.

Smith: I remember being told stories when I visited that it was not unusual - whatever time of day or sometimes night - there might be a patient coming in, a woman of a certain age, didn’t want to be there, very resistant, who had parallels with what Mrs. Ford’s story had been. And they’d call her at home and she’d go down there and sit on a bed and hold the woman’s hand and walk her through her own story.

Greenbaum: That’s right. And I’ve got to digress just briefly because, to me, one of the most telling things that I remember about the Fords and their humility and how wonderful they really are, was a number of years ago an individual showed up at their home about six o’clock in the evening, rang the bell, or went through Secret Service, and they said, so and so was out here, and you’d probably know the name if I’d mention it, but I’d rather not. And he said, “I’m here for dinner.” It was the wrong night, even the wrong week. Well, Betty and President Ford, to their credit said, “Come on in, have a drink,” and this individual had no idea that he’d shown up on the wrong night. Now, I don’t think my wife, as wonderful as she is, I don’t think she could carry it off like that. But it gives you a pretty good indicator of the kind of people they are.

Smith: As a businesswoman, she had to be – I’m told she was pretty hands-on.

Greenbaum: Absolutely. To her credit. And what was good about it, or is good about it, is the fact that Betty has always had the capacity to get involved and to express herself, but she had the wherewithal to know when to back off, and to listen to other people around her. That’s a real art, because too many of us, and I know I’m guilty at times, I’m very big on my ideas, and I’m a little slow sometimes, to listen to other people’s ideas.

Smith: Did you sense, over the years, a growing confidence on her part? She was doing a lot of things that she had never done before.

Greenbaum: Yes. It was almost trial and error at times. But she didn’t make many errors, to her credit. She really didn’t.

Smith: And she obviously was a significant fundraiser.

Greenbaum: Absolutely. Listen, we miss her right now. She’s still around, thank God, and I hope she’ll be around for a long time, but she’s not as active as she used to be. And as a result, we’ve had to go out and do it on our own. We still have the benefit of having her name, which is a very big asset for us.

Smith: Did you raise an endowment, or are you working on an endowment?

Greenbaum: No, we have an endowment, like every other institution. It’s not as big as it was, thanks to our economy right now, but we’re going to get it back.

Smith: The joke used to be, between the Fords, that the President had, for fundraising, east of the Mississippi, and Mrs. Ford had west of the Mississippi.

Greenbaum: I remember that.

Smith: I think they occasionally poached.

Greenbaum: Every now and then.

Smith: Tell me about your friendship with the president.

Greenbaum: I’ve been blessed knowing a lot of people throughout my life who made a difference to me. And I would have to put President Ford at the top of the list, and not because he was a former president of the United States, but because of his human qualities. We would go out and play golf, and I remember one time we had a caddy, a nice young man, and we got through and I said, “Let me take care of the tip.” I pulled out, I forget what, maybe forty or fifty dollars, and he said, “No, you’ve got to give him more than that.” I said, “President Ford, this is very appropriate.” He says, “No, these young men, they work hard…and if we’re in a position to help them, we need to do it.” And so I ended up giving him a hundred dollars. But, really, that was the type of thing that he would do and he taught me things like that. I figure if he can be humble given his background and history, I sure as heck can practice a little of that myself.

Smith: Now the other side, he was very accessible to people.

Greenbaum: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: But I know one of the two things that annoyed him, sometimes, were autograph seekers.

Greenbaum: Yeah, but he was good. He handled it well. Because these people would come up in the middle of dinner, unfortunately too often, and ask for his signature, or wanted to say hello. Or they would come over to Betty, and say, “I’ve been through the Center,” and this that and the other. And they were very gracious about it. I never heard them make any derogatory comment about that at all. I knew it would drive me crazy. It really would. Although I would say the vast majority of times, people were very respectful of him – at least here in the desert.

Smith: They were very visible around here, weren’t they?

Greenbaum: Oh, extremely.

Smith: Very involved with a number of causes and activities.

Greenbaum: Oh, yeah. I’m smiling right now because I’m thinking of something. A number of years ago, President Ford was going through a lot of illness and so forth. He had just been released at one particular day from Eisenhower Medical Center, and he was picked up by the Secret Service, and they started bringing him home and he said, “No, we’re not going home right away.” They looked at him and said, “Why?” He said, because he loved hamburgers, and particularly from In and Out Burger. He says, “We’re going to go to In and Out Burger.” So, lo and behold, they drove him about five miles from here and took him to In and Out Burger. He got out of the car, and he proceeded to stand in line at In and Out Burger. Now it was very crowded. Obviously, everybody let him through. But the idea that he wanted to go to In and Out Burger, and he was going to stand in line to get his hamburger, it was very telling.

Smith: Especially coming from the hospital.

Greenbaum: Oh, yeah. I mean, he had a little, a few eccentricities. One of them, he loved to buy lottery tickets. I think it was either once a week, or once every two weeks, he’d always go out and buy a couple of lottery tickets. As far as I know, he never hit it big, but he bought his tickets. He loved it.

Smith: That’s wonderful.

Greenbaum: And he loved his golf. And he loved his football, he loved his University of Michigan.

Smith: And I’m told that to sit with him and watch a game was unlike most such exercises. I mean, he was very focused on the game.

Greenbaum: Absolutely.

Smith: He had a sense of humor.

Greenbaum: Yes. He had to. Anybody that didn’t have a sense of humor in that position, they are in trouble. He loved a good joke, he loved to play golf, he loved to laugh about his golf game. And he was just a good sport.

Smith: As you know, from childhood on, and with considerable success, but he had a lifelong effort to control his temper.

Greenbaum: You see, I never saw – I did see his temper a couple of times. And I’m not going to go into that. But he’s human.

Smith: Well, no, but that’s exactly what I mean. I don’t mean it critically, but, would you see it on the golf course?

Greenbaum: No, not too much on the golf course, no. He was smart enough to realize that you don’t get mad on the golf course, it doesn’t do any good.
Smith: What were some of the things that they were involved in? Tell me about the season here…when a lot of charitable events are scheduled almost back to back. And they must have been visible.

Greenbaum: They supported everything and anything that they were asked to do, just about. It was really wonderful. Bob Hope did the same thing. They were invited to all the events and wherever they could, they went. Not because they really wanted to go out and be part of the scene, per se, but they felt an obligation and they lived up to it. They were a vital, vital part of this community, as they were in Colorado where they lived. And to this day, people still talk about them. I have friends of mine that come up to me, oh, fairly regularly, or, I say friends, people that I know, but I don’t know them intimately, and they come up and they say, “I remember when you brought President Ford and Mrs. Ford over here and how wonderful they were and how warm they were and how meaningful it was to us.” I hear that all the time.

Smith: Maybe that explains in part those 57,000 people who overnight went through St. Margaret’s to pay their respects.

Greenbaum: Absolutely.

Smith: That’s a lot of folks.

Greenbaum: It sure is. And I was privileged to go to Washington, D.C. for the services there, and obviously, it was a different kind of service, but it was very meaningful.

Smith: We’ve heard from a couple of folks, I think you were with him the day over at the country club, maybe it was his last golf game, I’m not sure. It was a hot day and he was having some problems.

Greenbaum: Yeah, I don’t think that was the last time he played golf. I played with him that last year when he was playing golf. And it was difficult for him. There was a time he would never let me do what I did. But this time he hit the ball in a trap a number of times – sand traps or bunkers – and I would take the ball out and gently put it over here. And he never said one thing or another, he just went ahead and hit the ball. But prior to that he never would let me do something like that. He just had a good time. People had a good time being with him. He was a fun person.

Smith: What is it about golf – what is it about that game that is almost obsessive?

Greenbaum: You’re not a golfer.

Smith: I’m not a golfer.

Greenbaum: To me it’s not obsessive. To me – I have three very important criteria for golf and I think President Ford probably felt the same way. One, is to be out there with people you enjoy being with, and that’s what it’s all about to me.

Smith: It’s social.

Greenbaum: Yeah. There are a handful of people in this world that make a living playing golf, I’m not one of them, and obviously President Ford was not. Number two is the fact of being out there in good weather, and number three is the golf. The golf being the most incidental of all of them.

Smith: One person suggested it’s a game where basically – it sort of cleans out your head. You have to focus on the ball.

Greenbaum: I’m not that serious about the game. I haven’t gotten to that point and my game reflects it.

Smith: Tell me about his relationship with Bob Hope.

Greenbaum: They had a great deal of love and respect for one another. They really did. Bob would come up to Vail, well, let me back up. President Ford started the Gerald R. Ford Invitational Golf Tournament in Vail many years ago. And because of his relationship with Bob, Bob Hope would come up and entertain, etc., and the relationship just kind of grew from there. It was something to behold. You could tell that they really loved each other, and enjoyed each other’s company. I know you’ve had a couple of people here who were as very, very close to Bob Hope as they were to President Ford, so I’m sure they’ve probably given you a lot more detail than I ever could.
Smith: If you were trying to explain him to people who never knew him, or back up – the public, stereotype, cliché, nice guy, but questions raised about his IQ and sophistication. I don’t know how you’d want to describe that – there is a certain amount of snobbery involved. We were sitting here last night with Lorraine, the cook, who had an extraordinary story of her own to tell. I asked if she was surprised by the reaction to his death that was so overwhelming, and she said, “No, I just thought finally he got his due. And I thought, for years, I’ve known all of this about President Ford, particularly his character and his integrity, and better late than never.”

Greenbaum: Well, you know better than I how fickle the public is, okay? And I think this is probably the best example of it when you see the fact that after his passing, that people all of a sudden, it was like the windows had opened, or the sky started lighting up. “Oh, he was really a great person. He wasn’t guilty of this, he didn’t do that.” And it’s disappointing. I guess that’s human nature, unfortunately. Because it really did – he got all the credit he deserved afterwards.

Smith: Time was good to him, in that he lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon, for example. The Profiles in Courage Award at the Kennedy Library was a real turning point. I happened to be with him that day and I think it was one of the great days of his life. But if someone who never knew him said, “Tell me about Gerald Ford,” particularly something that might surprise people, how would you answer that? What’s important for people, particularly younger people to know about him?

Greenbaum: That’s a great question, but it’s a difficult one to sum up. That you don’t have to be born from a wealthy family. You don’t have to have a lot of things that people think you have to have to become great – whether you’re president or head of a corporation, or what have you. We see it every day, and he was at the right place, at the right time, thank God, because what he did, I don’t think anybody could have done a better job than what he did. As far as some people questioning his intelligence, he was bright, he was extremely bright. He was as bright as anybody I’ve ever met. He had a grace about him, a graciousness that most people don’t have. I would challenge the vast majority of people I’ve ever met in my life that they could have the success that he achieved and be as humble as he was. And that’s what a lot of it’s about. That’s what makes him special. The greatness but the humility that went with it. I envy him for that, I really do.

Smith: Did he ever talk about the war?

Greenbaum: Oh, he talked about his experiences on the aircraft carrier, when it was going through a terrible storm and he nearly got washed overboard. He loved to tell that story. He took great, great pride and joy in telling about it. Other than that, he really didn’t get into it too much. There are a couple of things, though, that he was just trying to reminisce that he shared with me. A couple of stories I prefer not to tell. I don’t know, there was nothing in particular that I can think of at this point, as far as the war is concerned.

Smith: It is interesting, because when we were planning the funeral, with their input, there were two revealing things. The one thing that he was adamant about was, he didn’t want a caisson through the streets of Washington. And I heard the story from a good source. Someone who obviously didn’t know him at the military district in Washington tried to, for lack of a better word, shame the president into accepting this. And he used words to the effect of, “Well now, Mr. President, you wouldn’t want people to think that you were a second rate president?” Well, needless to say, that argument didn’t carry much water. He was lucky he got out of that room with his head.

Greenbaum: It was difficult to intimidate him. I saw several instances where people would try to put him in a corner and he wasn’t about to go there. He had very strong feelings about where he had been, what he had done, and he wasn’t about to change his mind on them. I said, the Warren Commission being one of them. To the day that he passed away he said, “I stand by what I indicated at the hearings.”

Smith: Were you surprised at all by the public reaction at the time of his death?

Greenbaum: No, not really. I would have been surprised otherwise.
Smith: Because, I know from within the media bubble, I can tell you – there are a lot of folks in the media who were surprised.

Greenbaum: Well, they should have been because they were part of the guilty parties, which is not unusual in this day and age.

Smith: You miss him?

Greenbaum: Yes. Very much. I think of him very, very often, and I savor the times that I’m with Betty now, because we talk about him as though he is still here, and I feel that he is.

Smith: It’s rough for her, isn’t it?

Greenbaum: Yes. They really had a real, real love for one another – a real caring. I feel that way about my own wife, but I know most people don’t have that deep feeling for one another. And Betty and President Ford respected one another and that goes a long way.

Smith: We’ve heard from a number of people who have said that as long as he could travel, he loved to travel. But the day didn’t begin and it didn’t end without a call from him to her.

Greenbaum: That’s right. And of course, you know all about his love for swimming. He had a pool built at their home in Colorado and it would be snowing outside, but he’d get in that pool religiously. He did it here, and that’s when I knew he was in trouble because the last – I forget how many months – he didn’t go swimming – and that was important to him.

Smith: He was a very self-disciplined guy, wasn’t he?

Greenbaum: Yeah, it was something we could all learn from.

Smith: Any other stories?

Greenbaum: No, not really.

Smith: Well, I can’t thank you enough.

Greenbaum: I thank you for the opportunity.
Smith: This is great and the In and Out story is priceless.

Smith: Obviously, the bulk of what we are going to talk about is Mrs. Ford, but being in this room must produce its own memories. What’s it like to be back here? John?

Schwarzlose: It’s an incredible room to be in, and the first memory that comes to my mind is the role that President Ford played behind the scenes of the Betty Ford Center. He was very careful to be not out in front, but behind the scenes. And so often, when we sent out a quarterly financial statement, Mrs. Ford would take it to President Ford and say, “Honey, look this over.” And then within an hour I would get a call, “John, can you just stop over for a minute?” And because the Center is so close I’d come over and he’d ask some questions and we would talk and then I’d leave. Then I knew that he would fill Mrs. Ford in. But he always played this role like that, and so when you were called to this room it was always a special thing.

Smith: And I’m told that there were events – for example, I guess you have an alumni reunion every year – and he could be seen cooking hot dogs – that sort of hands-on involvement.

Schwarzlose: Memorial Day we have a cookout for all the patients and all the staff, and he and Mrs. Ford every year came, and shook hands with every patient, every member of the staff. His reputation was handing out soft drinks, Mrs. Ford was giving the hamburger and hot dog buns, and she made sure that he was over there and it was just really something how it happened.

Smith: Tell me, Dr. West, how did the Betty Ford Center come to be the Betty Ford Center?

West: Well, it came to be as a result of – first of all the need in the minds of Betty Ford and Leonard Firestone – that there should be a place to treat one of the most common diseases there are in the United States. It’s an addictive disease.
And so both Betty and Leonard Firestone were very much involved. Their concerns were for the people who suffered from this because they were knowledgeable themselves about the disorder, which is called addictive disease. So they talked about it. Both of them were on the board of directors of Eisenhower Hospital, and they got people interested in this idea, and from there generated a move to put together a program to treat addicted people, both alcohol and drug addiction. I’m not sure how they decided to pick a part of the property that Bob Hope gave to Eisenhower to do this, but they picked a corner eventually of the campus to build the buildings that eventually became the Betty Ford Center.

Smith: So it was always seen as, in effect, an adjunct to the Eisenhower Medical Center.

West: It was called the Betty Ford Center at Eisenhower. And I came out here from Chicago having retired as a surgeon in 1981, although I’d been vacationing out here before that. And there was a program going on at Eisenhower Hospital for addicted people. It was called an outpatient program and I was asked to be part of that by Joe Cruz, who was also interested in the genesis of Betty Ford Center. And I remember him coming to me, he was building at Eisenhower things that a physician would do in a program like this: give lectures, do examinations, and so forth, and so on. And she was in another part of the same floor of that hospital building with people who were talking about drapes and furniture and all that kind of stuff, so I knew something was on the way by the time I even got out here.

Schwarzlose: You know, another interesting part of that, even before the Center opened, that both President and Mrs. Ford were involved in. Jim, when the decision was made to build a treatment center, people said, “Well, Mrs. Ford, you’ll put your name on it?” And she said, “Absolutely not.” Her point of view was, as a fairly recent recovering alcoholic woman who had gone public about that herself, to put her name on it was putting too much pressure on her. She said, “What if I take a drink? Alcoholics and addicts can relapse.” But President Ford, more than anyone else, Leonard Firestone in a more minor way, convinced her that putting her name on the treatment center would be like a beacon. It would say, “Here’s a special place of help.” But that was not an easy decision.

Smith: It’s into the language now. It’s part of the lexicon.

Schwarzlose: Absolutely.

West: It turned out to be a fortuitous move, although entered into by Betty with doubts and concerns about all the things that would go on with having a place named after you. It turned out to be the greatest thing as far as this is concerned.

Smith: Let me ask you, because it’s one thing to decide to create a center – explain for the layman – there obviously must be a wealth of different approaches to treating these problems. How did you decide to design the curriculum, if you will, for the Center.

West: Well, the curriculum has been designed by - a curriculum that works - has been designed since about 1935 by a couple of fellows, Bill Wilson and a fellow by the name of Dr. Bob Smith, I believe his name is. They designed a program from the Oxford Group from which both of them were members, that had twelve steps in it.

Smith: Now popularly known as Alcohol Anonymous?

West: They eventually called it Alcohol Anonymous. At first it was just a program, it didn’t have a name on it. But eventually they called it Alcohol Anonymous about two or three years after it got going, in about 1936 or ’37. So that program had already been functioning 35 or 40 years before Betty and Leonard got involved in the business of making a program. It was a program that had been tried and found to work. So Betty founded the program on the basis of the Twelve Steps of Alcoholic Anonymous, which includes the treatment for addiction.

Schwarzlose: The program, medically, psychologically, spiritually - those Twelve Steps - forms the core of the program. And what’s interesting, all these years later, and over 90,000 patients later, that still forms the core of our program. Where a lot of places who treat alcoholics and addicts have kind on gone on to newfangled ideas and things – we have stuck to the core from the very beginning. Dr. West and I were somewhere and someone said, “Boy, the Betty Ford Center is sure old-fashioned.” And Dr. West and I smiled at them and said, “Yes, we are.” We took it as a great compliment. If you have a system that works, that reaches people, why change?

Smith: And what was her involvement in this period of definition, if you will, of exploration, of deciding what you were going to be and how it was going to be administered? How involved was she in all of that? It must have been a process of self-education.

West: Well, Betty Ford went through a treatment program herself at the Navy Hospital under a Dr. Joe Purch(?), where the basis of the treatment was Alcoholics Anonymous. So when she graduated from that program and came here, she joined all the rest of the members of Alcoholics Anonymous in this community and developed friendships with all of them in her activity in this program. So when she and Leonard and the rest of people that were involved in shaping this program – the Betty Ford Center – it started out they already had this program that they knew worked. It’s as though someone would come to me as a surgeon and say, “You know, I learned a new way to take out an appendix.” Well, there’s only one way to take out an appendix, and not only that, it’s the only way to treat this disease.

There was an article I read in the New York Times just yesterday about some place in the southern part of California – it’s a very expensive place where many movie stars go – although some movie stars come to the Betty Ford Center. And the person who was talking about this with the interviewer said, “It’s very fancy, we have all kinds of different amenities to please the patient, but the people who persist in sobriety, without any relapses, are those people who stick to the Twelve Steps of Alcoholics Anonymous.” So all treatment centers that work have that one basis of recovery.

Schwarzlose: What Betty and Leonard did, as Dr. West was describing, they traveled around and said what place has taken that Twelve Steps core and made it work? And they ended up feeling like a well-known place named Hazelton in Minnesota had probably done the best job of incorporating that in their treatment. So they reached out to Hazelton. That’s how people like myself and others ended up coming here because smartly, Mrs. Ford said, “We don’t have to reinvent the wheel here. We need to take what works and then make it work here.” With one caveat – Hazelton and other centers at that time often had two or three men to every one woman. And Mrs. Ford, much like she turned the world around with breast cancer, said, “I am not going to have a male-oriented treatment center that women have to fit in to.”

And so today, all these years later, fifty percent of our patients have been women, is probably the part Mrs. Ford is as proud of as anything else. And I tell people all over the world, it’s totally because of her. There is no other reason why this has been such a drawing card for women to seek help.

Smith: Is it harder for women than for men to initially seek help?

Schwarzlose: Well, I think it’s harder from a couple of perspectives. Earlier we used to say the stigma for a woman alcoholic was worse. Mrs. Ford would often in her talks refer to the fact that many people connected an alcoholic woman as a loose woman, or a woman with lower morals. And Mrs. Ford did her best to break that stigma down, but that was a very real thing. But today, it’s interesting that it’s still harder for a woman, because with all the progress that we’ve made in our society, we still find it harder for a woman to leave for thirty days or more. It’s almost like that old scenario of the husband leaving and saying, “Well, I’ll miss you and the kids. See you.” And the woman is leaving and the husband says, “Who’s going to watch the kids?” So we think we’ve made a lot of progress, I think we see examples all the time that we still have a ways to go. But Mrs. Ford made such an effort to break those barriers down, and that’s why that fifty percent ratio is such a tribute to her.

Smith: It is interesting because for a while people equated the Betty Ford Center with celebrities. And I assume that gave a mis-impression of what you are all about. Clearly, you had some celebrities, but they were distinctively in the minority.

Schwarzlose: In our number of patients over the years, well-known patients don’t even make point one of one percent, but it’s interesting that in the early days, when we had some well-known people go through, I think Dr. West and I and Mrs. Ford all felt that it had some positives to it, too. It was almost like if so and so can go, then I can go. It’s interesting why we don’t get as many celebrities today is because we treat everyone as a VIP. So there aren’t special privileges for anyone over anyone else.

Smith: And is that not universally the case?

Schwarzlose: No. In some places they cater to the celebrity, and that’s fine if that’s what they want to do. That is not a hard decision for us because the model for us is Mrs. Ford. When she went to treatment at Long Beach Naval Hospital, she was treated like everyone else.

Smith: How difficult was that for her initially? Is there a period of resistance that’s almost universal?

Schwarzlose: Well, Richard, her four children and her husband did an intervention on her. That was a very difficult day. And her feeling, which is typical of people going through that, was anger. How could my own children and my husband turn on my like that? And what you hope is that through tough love that that anger turns to a realization of how hard that was for them to do that. And that’s what happened with Mrs. Ford, too. She agreed to go to treatment. It was a very difficult thing to go. She and President Ford chose to make an announcement about it because of the incredible positives that came from the breast cancer announcement. Again, hoping that it would help a lot of people.

Smith: Is shame something that you have to overcome first?

West: Yes, shame is part of the multiple syndromes of chemical dependency or addiction. And one of the things about going into treatment is the development of what you would call a surrender to the idea that you have an illness that requires this kind of hospitalization or treatment, even outpatient treatment. That comes relatively slowly, but it usually occurs in about the first week or so. Once a person is in a community of other recovering people, they talk with each other and eventually reach the common idea that we’re here because we weren’t able to not do what we were doing. Meaning, being actively addicted. So it’s a very essential part of the treatment. After that the rest of the Twelve Steps kick in, in the way of changing a person to be different than they were when they were addicted. But that involves every type of discipline in behaviors like selfishness, fear, dishonesty, and resentment are dealt with in the treatment program – which changes the person. Because they aren’t that way during their addiction. Usually they’ve got all kinds of psychological difficulties.

Smith: Has there been a difference, shall we say a stigma, for lack of a better word, attached to alcohol dependency as opposed to drug addiction?

West: Yes, there is. Originally, the Betty Ford Center dealt primarily with people who were addicted to alcohol because it became known as a center for the treatment of alcoholism. But as time went on and as populations changed somewhat, drug addiction became more common, but it was not thought of as a place where you’d go to the Betty Ford Center for treatment. And eventually, over time, more young people and some older people came in who were addicted to those agents like cocaine, opium, and other mood altering substances. Since addictions all work in the same circuit of the brain, all of them, the Betty Ford Center came to be known as a place that treated both alcoholism and drug addiction.

Smith: Have you had well-known alumni who have maintained ties with the Center, or come back from time to time? Becoming, in fact, ambassadors for the place?

Schwarzlose: We do, however, most of the alumni who serve in that kind of role are not well-known. They are just active in their communities and just reach out as ambassadors and things. One of the interesting things about once you begin to get well, it’s hard to be in some kind of celebrity status like you were before.
A good example of that is, at the Center Mrs. Ford is not Mrs. Ford. Mrs. Ford is Betty. And more to patients, even, than to staff. Staff, still out of respect, will say Mrs. But to patients - that’s Betty. And it is said with incredible respect, but the familiar first name, and Mrs. Ford loves that. That’s like: you have the same disease I have. It gets it down to the bare essentials. It says so much about Mrs. Ford.
Smith: Tell me about her involvement, direct involvement, both administrative, for lack of a better word, in policy, but also very much one-on-one patient interaction. How did that evolve?

Schwarzlose: Well, it did evolve. But because her name’s on the place, Jim and I saw her so involved. Before we opened our doors we did a shakedown cruise and divided the staff into half, and have each spend three days in treatment because we wanted to check everything from the showers to the facilities. And Mrs. Ford went through, too. She wanted to be very much a part of that. It was a new thing for her. Her image was, this will probably be a Southern California facility with all the population out here. She really didn’t realize the impact she would have. The morning we opened, October 4, 1982, a Monday morning, she went on Good Morning America with David Hartman, and the world knew that Mrs. Ford had opened this center. But in the early days it was growing experience for her.

I remember, we’d been open about three or four months and Mrs. Ford and Mr. Firestone came in my office and they said, “John,” and they seemed quite anxious, quite concerned. They said, “John, how are the patients doing?” And I looked at these two incredible people and I said, “I don’t have the slightest idea.” And I think they were ready to slap me or slug me, and I said, “Because, if we all hired the right professional staff, the right nurses and counselors and physicians, then we know the patients are doing fine.” It sounds like I was a smart alec, but it was a great lesson for both of them that, as board members, as founders, they couldn’t go in and treat. What they could do is provide the environment, the place, where healing can take place. You didn’t have to with them about lessons like that twice. They really got it, didn’t they, Jim? They understood. They would often have Dr. West and I over just to talk about how things were going. They loved to hear about it. But I don’t think you and I could cite an example where they interfered with treatment, I really don’t think…

West: No, the system worked and they were involved in the way it developed in picking the people who were involved in the development, too. There is one other thing I want to mention, too. Throughout the history, early history and later history of the Betty Ford Center, every now and then, some woman would have a particular problem that really affected her adversely with weeping and isolation and so forth. The counselors would call John to get Betty to come over to talk to these people. So she always had a little coterie of specially meeting people who only she could help by talking with them. They would be so impressed. But not only that, but that she would talk the language of recovery to them, and it was so helpful which is such a plus for this treatment center.

Schwarzlose: And she would do it day or night. She would come about every other week to have lunch in the patient cafeteria. She’d sit right in the middle of the room. Every four weeks she would lecture to the patients formally. And in all those years of doing it, every time it was her turn to lecture, she would come in and she looked scared to death. I said, “Mrs. Ford, the patients just want to see you. They don’t care even what you say.” “Oh, but what I say is very important.” We have a place called the Serenity Room at the Center, so every time before she gave a talk to the patients, she’d go into the Serenity Room and just experience the quiet and the serene feeling. She took it so seriously. But she loved those special roles that she had.

Smith: Did she tell her story? Is that how you connect with people initially?

Schwarzlose: Well, she told her story – not only how she got into treatment – but even more importantly, what’s happened since treatment. And all the good and the bad, and what’s worked for her. Those were always closed – just the patients and Mrs. Ford, so she could be very, very open with them.

West: There are other things, too. She talked with all the people, mostly women, from a history of experience that she had. And no matter what the problem is, with most addicted people, the problems will come in clusters and they are very similar to each other. So she would have been through all the kinds of things she would talk to these people about. And that’s the thing that locked them in from the standpoint of being empathic of what she was talking about. They just knew that this lady was experienced in what they were going through.
Schwarzlose: Absolutely. And that was her real love. Now, in addition to that, she was chairman and founder, so she also took that administrative side. How do you run the board of directors, and what’s the right thing to do? She was wanting to do it the right way. One of the interesting things that became kind of a habitual thing over the years is, at least two afternoons a week, she would call me about 3:30-3:45, “John, I’ve got a few things I’d like to go over with you. Can you come over to the house?” So, before I’d get in my car and run over to the house, I’d call my wife because I had a young family at the time, and say, “I won’t be home for dinner.” I knew that.

I’d go to the house and bring all the papers, and she wanted to go over everything. She wanted to do this the right way, go over everything. Well then, invariably, about ten minutes after five, in the room would come President Ford, walking over from his office. I would jump up and say, “Hello, Mr. President,” and he’d say, “Oh, John, don’t get up. I know you two are working, I don’t want to bother you. I’m just going to watch the local news over here.” So he’d go over and sit in his chair and turn the news on. Usually Mrs. Ford would say, “Honey, turn that down a little bit, would you?” Well, within five minutes, Mrs. Ford and I would be talking about something, and he would turn in his chair, “Now honey, are you sure about that?” And Mrs. Ford would go, “Now, Jerry, you’re watching the news.”

And no one would believe it, but it was like a sitcom. For me, it was so funny and so loving to watch the two of them. And sometimes he would just turn his chair around and work with us. Sometimes he’d stay and watch the news. But the fact that she had this Center that was helping so many people, made him so proud. He would talk about it all the time.

Smith: They laughed about this later, but you know, she received the Medal of Freedom long before he did. And there were a number of those instances…my sense was he was just delighted for her to get the recognition.

Schwarzlose: He was. He actually shared with me, and I know he did with others that. He said, “Yes, I know that I was President of the United States and the way that I became president was a quirk of history. But, long-term, Betty’s impact, historically, will be greater because of breast cancer and because of addiction, and how many people she ______.” And he felt that – that was not just saying something. He really felt that.

Smith: In terms of how ordinary people live their lives, very few presidents have an impact that she’s had. Simply by being herself, she made it a lot easier for people to be themselves.

West: I think one of the important things about the success of the Betty Ford Center was the relationship between the CEO – that’s John – and Betty, as the chairman of the board. They had an understanding that almost acted as though, without words, they could get ideas across to each other. Because that had to happen, and many of the times that that occurred in a hospital for people who suffered from a disorder. It’s really a brain disease, involving alcohol, cocaine, opium addiction and so forth, because those kinds of people are under such stress while they are in the program. However, Betty had a kind of aura that imposed a sense of peace to all the buildings. So one of the things that people would say as the weeks went on, they would say, this is a place of peace. And that was so important to them.

Schwarzlose: And, as you say, the campus was so important to Mrs. Ford. She would say to us, “Okay, now these four buildings here are twenty years old now. And they are used by patients 365 days a year. So what do we want them to look like to the six new patients coming in today? Twenty years old? Or a place of welcome and a place of ….” And so, she always made sure that part of our budget was renovating – new carpeting, new chairs, making the place filled with love, because she knew, as Jim said, the environment was so important.

West: Very important.

Schwarzlose: She was insistent that the treatment be gender specific, which was unheard of at the time. So the groups, the halls are divided into men and women’s halls. And she insisted on that. She would go out and speak. One of the things that says a lot about Mrs. Ford, she’d go to Dallas, she’d go to Denver, she’d go to Atlanta. When she’d go those places, she’d talk a little bit about her story, a little bit about the disease, she would not promote Betty Ford Center at all. And people always said to her and to me, everywhere you go, you’re telling people it’s okay to ask for help. Not at Betty Ford Center – anywhere. And they always felt that – that she was like the spokesperson for recovery, for people getting well.

But there are so many funny things that happened. After a while, people would say to her, if she allowed questions and answers, they would say, “Well, Mrs. Ford, why didn’t you go to the Betty Ford Center?” And Betty always would just smile until it hit them that if she hadn’t gotten well there wouldn’t have been a Betty Ford Center. There are just stories like that. Mrs. Ford has a personality that - I always say to people - you have no idea how real she is. She and I’d be walking around campus and she’d say to me, “John, I hope people understand that I didn’t do this. God is who made this a special (?) and made this happen, and he used me as an instrument. But I didn’t do this.” And listening to her, I wanted the world to hear that because it was so real.

Smith: Their faith was very strong, wasn’t it?

Schwarzlose: Absolutely.

Smith: It wasn’t at all transparent because of the religious traditions in which they were each raised. One sensed that it was a defining part of character.

Schwarzlose: Well, it was, and it is interesting, Richard, that in her recovery, because getting well spiritually is so much a part of the recovery from addictive disease, she and President Ford both seemed to grow spiritually. It wasn’t about how often they went to formal church, which they did. But it was about the way they were growing spiritually, and together. It showed in so much – you and I were both there when they both got the Congressional Medal of Honor, and I’ll never forget that talk when President Ford was appealing to the Republicans and Democrats that unless we learn to get along – and he told stories about fighting all day long with Tip O’Neill then going out to dinner together. Why isn’t that happening anymore? Anybody who was at that talk – for me – I’ve never forgotten it. That was a very spiritual talk from my point of view, of reaching out to people.
When Mrs. Ford and I went on Larry King, four different times Larry King asked Mrs. Ford to come out and talk about addiction. She said, “I won’t do it________________________.” So they sent me there and I would tease all the way as we would drive to the studio. And she would say, “Now, I want you to take all the hard questions.” And I said, “Mrs. Ford, they are not going to ask me any questions. They are going to be asking you questions.” She said, “Well, I’m going to figure out a way to get them over to you as quick as I can.” So what would happen; [when] she was asked a hard question, she’d kick me. The very first time we were on Larry King, she kicked me so hard on one of the questions her shoe came off, and there was a bang. When we went to break Larry King said, “What was that noise?” And she told him the story. That’s Betty. That’s Betty up on the table in the White House dancing – that’s Betty.

West: Betty was really a soft kind of a person. Very gentle, very kind, soft spoken, but basically a firm person, too. She also had ways of expressing that firmness and this was with everybody in society because she has a lot of friends around, and everybody knows her as a kind of soft person. But, on some issues, including addiction and her Center and so forth, and so on, she can be very firm. Not harsh, but she had ideas that are unswervable about the way that Center should be run and is.

Smith: Give us some examples, if you can think of one.

West: Well, she had a lady she was sponsoring, and I know that that lady would be expected to go to more meetings than she’d been going to, to stay well. But I know that Betty – I wasn’t at this occasion - but I know that she spoke firmly to her. Because that was the important thing. Other people’s sobriety was number one in her goals, in this particular life for her. And it will be part of the legend of her – that she was the perfect example of a person, her home treatment worked, but that also comes with all the benefits of a successful recovering person.

Schwarzlose: Another example of the firmness that you speak to; as you remember, the day we opened the Center, we also started our family program. And people criticized Mrs. Ford for that. They said, “Well, get your treatment thing going first, and then you can deal with families.” She knew, from her own experience with the Ford family, you have to get everyone involved. And so we started from day one, and that’s been one of the things that stands us apart from a lot of other places. And then about twelve years ago, led by Mrs. Ford, we started dealing with children, and we’re still one of the few places in the world with children from seven to twelve years of age, who are living with addiction every day of their life through usually their mother or their father or older brother or sister – and it wasn’t about her being a pioneer, or starting something new – she knew you had to get every member of that family involved. And that’s where I think a good example where you describe as firm, that she knew what was right and she stuck with it.

Smith: Tell me about the finances of the Center. She presumably was a significant fundraiser. Was it a founding goal to make this place as accessible to as many people as possible?

Schwarzlose: Mrs. Ford wanted this to be place that anyone could pick up the phone and seek out. One of her favorite expressions to me is, “John, I want to make sure our charges to the patients are low enough that a schoolteacher in Nashville, Tennessee could come in for treatment.” Why she picked that? But she did. So she would push and push to keep our charges as low as we possibly could. As a non-profit, obviously we didn’t have to have a profit or any return, because that wasn’t about being a non-profit. She insisted that ten to fifteen percent of our patients at all times were getting scholarship help, where they paid a little bit and then the scholarship funds paid all the rest. I described it as “Mission Driven.” She was driven to make sure our mission to reach out to as many people as possible was successful. Now what that took was a lot of successful fundraising, led by her.

When we opened our doors - the first four buildings she and Mr. Firestone had to raise six and a half million dollars to build those first four buildings. They went out to friends, corporations, foundations, and raised the money.

Smith: It probably was harder to raise then, than maybe it would have been ten years later.
Schwarzlose: Oh, yeah, it was. And Betty admitted that that wasn’t something she had done a lot of before. And so she’d always say, “Leonard took me under his wing and taught me how to raise money.” One of their funny stories was they had gone to Las Vegas to see Frank Sinatra perform on someone’s jet. It’s a short trip from Palm Springs to Las Vegas, and there was probably twelve people on the plane, and this was right as they were beginning to raise money. And Mrs. Ford on the way back, on the plane said she had this captive group, said, “I’d love to have this group be the first donors to our treatment center.” And people said – well, what do you say to Mrs. Ford – but they looked around and they said, “What do we have to write pledges on?” Well, the only thing they could find was cocktail napkins. So people, and we still have some of those early napkins – people wrote their pledge on the back of a cocktail napkin. It still counted.

She became less and less bashful about asking people for help. In reality, the main givers have been people and families who’ve been touched themselves. And they are the ones who want to give something back in most cases.

Smith: As an administrator, I suppose she’s not in the position of having to hire and fire. What kind of oversight, for lack of a better word, does she provide? How hands-on?

Schwarzlose: Her hands-on as a chairman was always more, I think in many cases, because her name was on the place. With her grandchildren being out of town, and even more so in the years when President Ford was traveling as a former president, this was her main focus. But interestingly enough, we had over thirty offers to start other Betty Ford Centers. People would say, come to Denver, we’ll give you the money, we’ll build it, you come and put your name on it. And she said no so fast to those, she said, “I’m not going to franchise this. This is not about franchising.” Some of her wisdom – this is something that she did to Dr. West and I since we were there at the beginning, and I use this as an example of – people talk about executive practices, and best practices – of what this woman did. We’d been open about three years and she came to Dr. West and I and said, “I need a commitment from you two.” And I said, “You mean to stay at the Center?” She said, “No, to me.”
Now, think back all these years. How smart of her. So, when someone would come and say, we’d like you to come here and we’ll double your salary – it wasn’t even a question, because it wasn’t about leaving the Betty Ford Center, it was about leaving Mrs. Ford. And I thought about that so much over the years – the wisdom of her to think that way. But that’s how she did. When there were issues, when there were problems, I would come and talk to her about it. She wasn’t the kind to just right there say, “Well, here’s what I think we ought to do.” She’d think about it a while and maybe a day later or two days, I’d get a call, “John, I thought about this option or this option.” Well thought out.

Smith: There are some parallels. I’m thinking of Katherine Graham’s story. Someone who, because of family tragedy was sort of pitched, fairly late in life, into becoming an executive, and the rest, as they say, is history. She really created a whole new life. Talk to me about the succession. It’s obviously one thing to create an institution, and I think in some ways it’s even harder to institutionalize it - to make certain that after you’re gone, it’s going to maintain the standards that you want. When did that begin to be a concern?

Schwarzlose: Well, it’s interesting that the first thing she did in 1993 was establish a chairman’s council, which was a national advisory council. She always kept her board to about ten or eleven people – very small. The first person she put on that advisory council was President Ford. And she really loved it that it gave him an official role. And as he would introduce himself at every chairman’s council meeting, he would say, “I’m a former president, she’s the current one.” And people would laugh. But the two, President and Mrs. Ford, and I’m so fortunate that I’m the one they would share this with – “it would be our dream that a member of our family would want to carry on this dream.” Susan was asked to go on the board of directors. I’m pretty sure no other promises, but would you serve on the board? It meets six to eight times a year, Susan said yes immediately. She later then was asked to chair the finance committee. And then finally in 2003-2004, Betty began to talk to Susan about, at some point, “I’m going to want to step aside, I will stay on the board, but I’d like you to be the chairman. I would love if my own daughter is my successor.” And so, in late 2004, Mrs. Ford brought it up to the board. The board was excited, was enthusiastic, especially since Betty wasn’t retiring, but had Susan be the chair. And Susan, to her credit, from the very beginning, said, “I have one purpose, to keep my mom’s dream alive.”

Susan would do things like, at the 25th anniversary, she stood up in front of 1,800 people and said, “There is only one chairman of the Betty Ford Center, and that’s my mom.” And I give her a lot of credit to say that. But she really wants to keep this alive for her mom, and Susan and I are already beginning to discuss who in the next generation of the Ford family might have an interest in this. Which would now obviously be Mrs. Ford’s grandchildren. If there is no one with an interest, we’ll have to go in a different direction, but that would be the first choice, I think.

Smith: That’s interesting, because that obviously is a story of continuity. All things evolve and change. How does Mrs. Ford handle that side of things? Change? Within continuity.

Schwarzlose: Well, she handled it incredibly, partly because what Susan did was put her arm out and join, saying, “Let’s do this together, Mom.” The two ladies, again in their wisdom, at every meeting, put me between them. And so I’d have bruises on both sides.

Smith: Was she still kicking you?

Schwarzlose: They kind of have fun with that. Up to the time of President’s Ford’s death, they were like that – just arms together. His death has changed that. I’m still on the phone with Mrs. Ford several times a week. She wants to know what is going on, but it’s not the same.

Smith: Is she still grieving?

Schwarzlose: Yes. And so what I do as one person in this is, when we’re together I tell these stories about him coming over at five o’clock and about things he would do for the Center. As you know so well as a historian, those stories are what keeps it alive. But she is still grieving.
Smith: On a personal level – to people who never knew Betty Ford, except they’ve heard the name, or seen the grainy clips of old footage – what should people know about Mrs. Ford?

West: I would say that Mrs. Ford – I always called her Betty, because that’s the way we talked with each other at the Center – Betty will always be an elegant, gracious lady who relates to anybody that talks with her. [She] is very direct, very honest, very sincere, and she emanates a kind of a love to most of the people that come in there as patients. That’s what I would say about Betty.

Schwarzlose: And I think that’s very well said. The only thing I would add to it is, President Ford would often say to people, “It was never my goal to be president. I wanted to be Speaker of the House, if there was a goal.” In many ways, Betty would say the same thing: I never intended to become the face and voice of recovery. It was something I never set out to do. I am a recovering alcoholic and addict, I have the disease. I’ve been able to make a difference in people’s lives, again as an instrument, and I’m very glad I’ve been able to make a difference like that. But it wasn’t like something she set out to do. We talk about them being from the Midwest. Dr. West and I are from the Midwest, we see that in both of them. They are not complicated people, but they are very sincere.

Smith: Perfect. Thank you so much.

Schwarzlose: Thank you, it was a pleasure to talk about them.

Smith: How does it feel to be in this room?

Hart: I’ve always loved to come in here. When you come in here, I miss him because whenever I came in here, generally he asked me to come in. And I think it’s a very special room. I’m glad we still have it here. We’re not ready to let it go.

Smith: We’re hoping, down the road obviously, to recreate it at the museum in Grand Rapids.

Hart: And maybe even use some of these pieces.

Smith: Yeah.

Hart: Won’t that be nice? Yeah.

Smith: When did your paths first cross?

Hart: I worked for a vascular surgeon for twenty years and then I went to the McCallum Theater to be the CEO and the production department artistic – director’s executive secretary. So I was there and President Ford was on the board – board of trustees – and so I had known him and met him before, and then I saw him frequently when I was at the theater.

Smith: Let me just back up – why would he have been on the theater board?

Hart: When the McCallum Theater first opened here, he was very instrumental, along with the McCallum family, which is the Parma’s – Mrs. Parma is a McCallum. And Bett Simon, Carol Props, a whole group of people – Bob Hope and his wife, Delores – they all got together and decided that there needed to be a performing arts center here in the valley. So they had the Fords come along and they all raised monies and they started a theater. So President Ford was on the board of trustees for many years. I think he may have come off for a while and then came back on. And he enjoyed coming.

Smith: Really? So he was an active trustee?

Hart: He was active and he would always call me or say, “I’d like to have this,” and, “Jan, when can I come?” So, I set up – it was kind of in a U shape – and I sat up near the very front of the table and he always sat right across from me so he could get my eye, or I could make sure he had what he needed. He was always very gracious, very nice. So what happened was, I had found out that they were looking for someone, had spoken with Penny, and I said, no, I had a job. I was used to being in jobs for a long period of time, and it just kind of happened that I ended up coming for an interview with Penny. I had a hard time coming over here, because it was hard for me to extricate myself. But, one day I just picked up my purse and walked out and no one said anything. And then I came back over and met with Mrs. Ford, and then we had a board meeting at the theater and President Ford, before we got started – no one knew – and, boy, he just spoke right up. He stood up and wanted to let everybody know that I was coming over to work in his office and I was going to work with Mrs. Ford and he went on and on. He was just really wonderful about it, but I was in shock. And then the whole room was abuzz, and that was an interesting meeting for me.

Smith: Did you interview with both the Fords?

Hart: Actually, President Ford had spoken to me before at the theater. When I came back over to interview with Mrs. Ford, she met me at the door, and I interviewed with her just strictly by myself. President Ford had already said it would be wonderful to have me.

Smith: How was the job described to you?

Hart: That I would be Mrs. Ford’s personal assistant. That I would travel with them. That I would take care of all of her correspondence and I would attend functions. I would stay and get them ready, or her ready – whatever the case may be.
Smith: And get her there on time?

Hart: And always get her there – that was something that I really tried hard to do because that was something that was brought to my attention. I said, “Well, I can do that.” There were a few times that I wasn’t successful, but the majority of time… and then the rest I think you just had to learn on the job. I don’t think that when you initially take this job, you ever could really be told what you’d be doing, how much time it would take, where you’d be going, the people that you’d get to meet, the planes you’d get to fly on.

Smith: And you started when?

Hart: I started in ’02, in December of 2002.

Smith: They were still active?

Hart: They were actually pretty active, yes. Mrs. Ford still spoke. She spoke both at the Center every month and attended everything there. She went places and then she spoke, and she was quite active then. I think that that probably lasted for two years and then she started scaling back a little bit. Since Susan was on the board over at the Betty Ford Center, it was easy to start to transition, and there were some things that Mrs. Ford felt that Susan could do and that she didn’t need to do. Then this last year – a year and a half, really – I think, since President Ford’s passing, she’s decided that she really doesn’t have to do those things. She told me she’s retired, so when I ask her, she says, “I don’t have to do that anymore, Jan. I’m retired, did you forget?”

Smith: How much of that is grieving?

Hart: Mrs. Ford is still grieving. You know how they always say you can be lonely in a crowd? I think she still feels that way. She has staff, she certainly has us all around, but it’s not the same. So it’s nice to be able to just sit with her and let her talk and she can tell you how she really feels and you understand. I lost my father this year and I realize how difficult it is, in any circumstance, but to be married to someone so special for so long, and have such a wonderful bond, some people never get over it. She does pretty well, but she’s still grieving.
Smith: Was the first anniversary particularly difficult?

Hart: I think for her it was. As we got ready for the Christmas holiday, you know there is a lot going on. I found that I tried to do more to make it easier – whether it was getting the tree up, or helping decide on purchases, or whatever it was that she needed. It just made it simpler because she wanted everything to be the same, but she just didn’t have it in her to do it herself. And this year, we’re moving right along. Christmas season is upon us. It’s similar, and she keeps reminding me that it’s getting close. And I say, yes. And she often wonders why she’s still here. And I say, “Well, God has a purpose for you. It’s His time, not ours.” And we’re thankful that she’s still here. I certainly am. I feel very blessed to be in this job and I know that I’m here and I took it for a reason, and I’m thankful for that. I remind myself of that often.

Smith: One senses that their faith was very important to the Fords.

Hart: It was.

Smith: It wasn’t perhaps as publicly known or flaunted as some, but it was a very important part of their lives.

Hart: It was, I know, for both of them, Mrs. Ford especially. She spoke about that often, especially when she gave her talks over at the Betty Ford Center, or wherever she went. She always mentioned that because I think that was a real turning point for her to turn her, what they called, their higher power. But they loved their church and President Ford was very religious in that way. And it meant a lot to them. They went to St. Margaret’s here, and they went as often as they could or were able, or when they weren’t traveling. They considered that church their home church. It still means a lot to her.

Smith: I remember being amazed at the numbers – there were 57,000 people who went through – overnight – out at St. Margaret’s.

Hart: That was really fascinating to see the outpouring of love. That’s one thing that I didn’t realize. You know, when you’re in this job sometimes you are in a bit of a bubble and once you get over that whole excitement and awe about where you’re working, you’re working. When you ever mention Mrs. Ford’s name, people love her – love her. Speak so highly of her, always want to know how she’s doing, or doesn’t she just look beautiful? But people who got in line and took those buses up to the church, it was amazing to me because they’ve really touched everyone in some way in this valley - just like they did up in Vail. From the common person all the way up.

Smith: They were very visible.

Hart: And it showed. Very visible. They would go out. Mrs. Ford used to love to just sometimes stop by Long’s Drugstore and shop for birthday cards, and the people’s response, and she enjoyed that. They were, in some ways, very regular people on occasion.

Smith: They had favorite restaurants.

Hart: They always loved to go to Jillian’s, and many of their friends did. Jillian’s had special tables for them and they would do special little cards for the table and have flowers for them. But they loved several restaurants and they enjoyed going out with their friends. Very much so.

Smith: We were both extraordinarily moved yesterday by Lorraine’s testament to her experience with the Fords.

Hart: Isn’t she dear?

Smith: Which was just remarkable.

Hart: It was a perfect time and match, I think, with Lorraine. And President Ford loved her. So did Mrs. Ford, but he really looked out for her and took care of her. And I think that Lorraine reciprocated that – it meant a lot to her. Whenever I have questions, or if I needed someone to fill in as chef, I could always call Lorraine, and either get suggestions or say, “Please, please, could you come?” one night and she would be willing to.

Smith: Tell me about Mrs. Ford’s sense of humor.

Hart: Oh, she does have a sense of humor. What wit! Sometimes she surprises me. She just comes up with things and I look at her in awe, and we just laugh. She loves that and I think President Ford loved that, too. She really has that witty side, and she still does. She still does. She is fun to be with. I bet she was always great fun. Always up for it. I think that she still is. And she is very intuitive, she really does know what’s going on, all the time. Every now and then, she’ll say something that will catch us by surprise. I like that because it makes me realize she is there – she is still herself.

Smith: We heard stories earlier about how they were big movie buffs.

Hart: That would always be funny – she’d go, “Jan, I think that we’ll get some movies.” And I’ll say, “Would you like me to run over and pick some out, or what would you like to go see?” And she would just get in the car with the agents and they would go to Blockbuster and she’d walk in and pick out a few, and they’d come back home and they’d watch them. Always watched movies. Sometimes Mrs. Annenberg gives her movies – sends them over. And Mrs. Ford will watch those and send them back. It’s a nice evening. They used to spend the evening eating in the study, and then they might watch a movie together. She still does that.

Smith: And the kids – spent probably more time around her towards the end?

Hart: Definitely. For President Ford?

Smith: Yes.

Hart: Yes. Definitely, yeah. They always wanted to come out and visit. You never quite know, but you know that you’re getting near the end, and they were all very good. Susan had been here for quite a while. They would come and go. And then all the boys were here and she happened to leave and then she came back. Mrs. Ford loves it when the kids come around, she really enjoys it. And they enjoy one another. The kids play with one another, they throw barbs and they really have a wonderful relationship and it’s kind of fun to see.

Smith: And as grandparents – what were they like as grandparents?

Hart: They love their grandkids. They were fortunate they spent so much time with them. I look back at some of the pictures and the stories that they tell, or Mrs. Ford shared – all of those years in Beaver Creek – at the house and skiing and all their little matching pajamas, and all coming down, and they had wonderful memories. They were very fortunate that way. And all the grandkids were there, and they had special little beds that they slept in and it was just really ideal. The kids still come to see her. She had grandkids come for Thanksgiving, and more coming this coming week, and they are constantly in and out. I think that that is really great for her – her family. Very family oriented.

Smith: She always loved clothes.

Hart: Well, I would say she still does.

Smith: It helps that she can wear them well.

Hart: That’s right.

Smith: Not everyone can.

Hart: Isn’t that the truth? There is one thing about Mrs. Ford, she always looks good, but when she gets dressed up to go out, she just hits that door and she’s on, and she looks fabulous. She does. She still does. She just doesn’t get dressed in ball gowns.

Smith: What was a typical day, if there is such a thing around here, for you?

Hart: Now?

Smith: Well, no, say when they were more active. What was it like?

Hart: Well, you’d come in in the morning and you’d do schedules for the week or month, and Mrs. Ford might have many things on the schedule and you’d stop in to see her first thing. You’d go over everything for the day, find out if there is anything that she needed of you, and she could do like four things in a day. Very busy. And then she always tried to be home - she and President Ford always like to have lunch together. So they would come home and have lunch together, and then we’d start again in the afternoon. Often times they’d have something in the evening then, so I would stay and get her ready. Every now and then President Ford would drag me in and say, “What do I wear?” or “What tie should I wear?” And I’d say, “Why don’t we go ask your wife? Better she make that decision for you.”

Smith: Now there are stories - he very rarely threw away anything. And there are stories on occasions of him showing up in a particularly memorable suit, and her saying, “You’re not going to wear that.”

Hart: There were those times. There were times that he insisted, and that’s just the way it was going to be. And he would always be ready before she did. So he would go out and sit in the study and wait for her. And other times she’d say, “No, you have to change.” And then he would. I think he would do just about anything for her. But she would say, “No, that’s not it. That’s not it.” But, you know, it was really fun having those times and those moments where it was just them getting ready to go, or we’re all getting ready to go and they would leave in the motorcade, and I’d drive behind. Very special, close, times that people don’t often get a chance to be part of.

I remember the time we went to Bob Hope’s funeral, and we were staying in a hotel, and everything was over for the day and I’d stopped back by, and he said, “Come back in your pajamas, we’re getting in ours and we’re going to sit and play some cards and have some ice cream. I expect you back in ten minutes.” And that was great fun because they were wonderful together and they could make you feel very much at ease at those times.

Smith: You mentioned Bob Hope’s name. It has come up more than once this week. Seeing his last years and how he was, well…exhibited, in some ways…

Hart: Yes, exactly.

Smith: Must have been a sobering experience – for anyone. And I wonder whether…

Hart: I think sometimes, too, Mrs. Ford would look at that and always think, this is something that I don’t want, or I would hope that wouldn’t happen. But they were so close for so long, and Mrs. Hope right now is 99, and they still converse and send each other gifts. Everyone is aging. Mrs. Ford goes, “My, everyone – we’re all getting older.” And I said, “That’s what happens.” But we were fortunate with President Ford in that that never took place. Mrs. Ford was always very careful, I think, with that.

Smith: I sensed that they both enjoyed, and almost actively pursued having younger people around them.

Hart: They did. I think that they had a lot to share and they enjoyed being around all types of people, all the time. It was just part of their life, but they did like to have younger people around. I just think of them up in Beaver Creek. They would get together with friends and laugh and just have the best time. It was wonderful to see – that was wonderful to see because that’s something - that everyone’s family is so different. My parents certainly never were in that kind of ________, but they were much quieter. This was great fun to see because there was always something to go do, or something to get dressed for, or had people over for drinks or hors d’oeuvres, or let’s meet before we do this. There were so many places that they went, that they enjoyed doing.

Smith: Did they have favorite television programs?

Hart: Mrs. Ford loves Dancing with the Stars, and they used to watch that. They watched a lot of things. They watched A&E, the Discovery Channel, they would watch old movies – the History Channel. He, especially, enjoyed those things and so they always did that. Would watch nightly news – every night, 5:30, they’d watch the news. And movies, they always enjoyed that as well.

Smith: And at least once a year they’d go to New York and do theater.

Hart: They did. Mrs. Ford – she loved that. That was really fun for her because New York is an exciting place to be. They haven’t done that, though – they didn’t do that, I should say, for probably a good six-seven years or so.

Smith: I remember hearing that they’d seen The Producers.

Hart: Yes.

Smith: That may have been the last trip they took to New York.

Hart: Yes. And they loved going to the McCallum. They would go there for a variety of events – there was the 9/11, a lot of things, and the Fords were involved, or were guests of honor, or honorary chairs. But they loved to go to shows there and meet up with all of their friends in the Founders level, and go for dinner there. Afterwards, when they had certain shows or Broadways or singers, they always did that. And Mrs. Ford still supports that.

Smith: Did you go up to Vail?

Hart: I did. I was lucky enough to go up there in Beaver Creek, and I would stay probably about five or six minutes from the residence so I’d always be close.

Smith: And they obviously loved the place.

Hart: They did. That was a special house. It had space for everything. I loved that house. It was fun to be there. I’d never really been there before. I’d been to Vail and driven through or stayed, but it was a real delight to have the opportunity to be there. I didn’t stay the entire summer, I would go up for weeks – like six weeks at a time and come back home for a week or two and then I would go back up. It was relaxed, and it was nice having the office just downstairs in the residence and I could pop up and down all the time.

Smith: Penny and I had joked that the office was referred to as the Black Hole of Calcutta.

Hart: It was. That was the tiniest little spot and cell phones wouldn’t work in there, and everything was very close. It was one, two, three, as far as desks go. Agents had about this much space in front of us. But there is something fun about that when you look back at it because it was the summer, and what’s not to like about summer up in Vail? So, we were very fortunate to be able to tag along with that.

Smith: What was a typical day like up there? I heard that he actually would go and get the mail.

Hart: He would. He would come down, or he would drive down the hill, and go to the post office, because they had post office boxes there, and Mrs. Ford would go outside. It was nice because they could just be themselves. And they knew almost everyone, of course, in the cul-de-sac, so many of them were friends. It was very relaxed. It was enjoyable. You could just go up and President Ford would always be there. You could see him in his office as you came up the steps, and he would say hello, or ask you to come in. Or they would be sitting in the living room or having breakfast or tea. And they were very approachable then. It was a lovely, lovely place.

Smith: But he worked in the office.

Hart: He worked in the office. He’d go in there for the day, and he’d sit in there and read with that big bay window behind him, and he enjoyed it. He always wanted to come to the office and that was one nice thing he was always able to do, even here. He could always walk over and sit at the desk, whether he had a lot to do at the end or not. But it was nice to have him here. Felt normal.

Smith: And it probably felt abnormal when he stopped coming over.

Hart: Yeah. Even Mrs. Ford, she doesn’t come over as often, and I miss that. So I try to tell her everything that goes on. And she knows that I’ll do that, so it just keeps her abreast of what goes on over here since she’s not over here as much. But she knows it’s here and I think that sometimes that’s all she needs – is to know that, if she wants to, the office is here, and it’s the same. And she likes that – she likes knowing that.

Smith: Do you remember the events surrounding his 90th birthday? There was the tribute at the White House.

Hart: Yes. We stayed at the Willard – that was a very big thing. And it was exciting – it was an exciting time. I remember he was very excited about it, too. And all the kids were there and everyone looked so wonderful, and going to the White House was always a special treat. They treated us all well, and I say that because, I’m just Mrs. Ford’s personal assistant, and they still were so kind to me and I really appreciated that. I remember the cake that had these little chocolate coins of President Ford with his face and they brushed them with gold. So I wrapped mine up and put it in my handbag, and I still have that in my freezer. He was thrilled with everything. He felt really wonderful, I think, and it was an exciting evening for him, and everything working up to that. So, it was a special time.
Smith: He had the big event in Grand Rapids.

Hart: Yes.

Smith: Which I think was the last time he was back in Grand Rapids.

Hart: That’s right. Yes.

Smith: In one sense, it was right about that time that he really had to cut back on the travel.

Hart: He started to cut back more. Yeah. Like Mrs. Ford always said to me, “There’s a time when you know you don’t have to do everything anymore.” And I think she is right. It’s just knowing when that time is for you. But, for him, I think that he did start to slow down and, just like Mrs. Ford says, it’s okay to be retired.

Smith: In one sense, he never really wanted to retire.

Hart: No, and he didn’t. By coming to work and always being active or going into the conference room, he’d come back after lunch and walk by and go, “Is there anything to sign?” And they’d go in to see if there was anything that he needed to do. And it was the sameness of the day that he had done for so many years, and that meant a lot to him because that’s who he was. It’s that work ethic, you know. So many holidays, and that’s it. Because when you come to work, that’s what you came for.

Smith: Well, we heard about the working Saturday.

Hart: Yes.

Smith: And then when we pointed out to him that the next day might be a holiday, he would say, “I didn’t vote for it.”

Hart: That’s true. We gave up one holiday, and we took it as the day after Thanksgiving instead, so that we could have two days in a row. But President Ford would have worked every day, I think, if he had his own way.

Smith: Did he talk about his early days? Did he reminisce much?
Hart: I think that, if I was with the Fords, or if we were traveling, or afterwards when we got to our destination, sometimes he would do that. Or he would mention certain things, “Well, you know what, Jan? We did this back when, and do you know who this is in that photo?” He was always really good about that because I didn’t know all of that. Then he and Mrs. Ford would then begin to chat. And that was really fun because I just felt like I was a fly on the wall.

Smith: The other side of that coin is, I only heard him disparage two people. And the worst that he could think to say about someone was, “He was a bad man.” That the worst. And one was Gordon Liddy.

Hart: Yes.

Smith: And the other was John Dean.

Hart: I heard that, too.

Smith: Did you hear any others?

Hart: No, I don’t think that I can think of anyone, really. Not to me, anyway.

Smith: And, of course he became really good friends with President Carter.

Hart: He did. They really did have a nice relationship from what I could tell. They were on Air Force One. They flew with us at the time of President Ford’s demise, and they were just wonderful, warm people. And Mrs. Ford always spoke highly of him and said how much President Ford and President Carter forged a wonderful relationship. And, of course, Rosalyn did with Mrs. Ford. In fact, they just had the parity bill pass and that was long in coming for mental health, and insurance rights, etc. So, they’ve worked long and hard on some things, and it’s nice to see them all work together.

Smith: I wasn’t aware of it at the time, because when you are doing something like that you’re in a fog, but I read afterwards, at the funeral in Grand Rapids, when I was doing the eulogy that Mrs. Carter was weeping in the pew.

Hart: Yeah.
Smith: Who would have imagined, thirty years earlier that that’s how the story would end.

Hart: And Mrs. Ford always said to me, “Times have changed in the political arena some. Before you could be on differing sides all day long, but you always socialized together, and you put that aside, and you were just gentlemen and ladies.” She says that has changed maybe a little bit and that was very true, I think, with the relationship with the Carters. Things change. Thank goodness time does change and soften. President Ford always said he had a great relationship with President Carter.

Smith: When did he stop coming into the office? Was it a matter of months?

Hart: Yes, I think that that’s really about it. He would come over sometimes and he would sit there. He might come over and take a little short afternoon nap here, or watch sports on TV. And if Mrs. Ford was away, it was just really nice. To him this was just like a room in his home, and it was a space where he loved to be. And it was easy because the sidewalks that connect the two, and it was just so close. We always loved to see him come over.

Smith: And one sensed, from the conversations that took place, that Mrs. Ford was reluctant for a long time to have outside help.

Hart: You know, there is something in your mind that you think, oh, you mean I actually should consider this? I think anyone might be that way. But that was tough because it meant the beginning of a change. And I know that even after President Ford passed away, we were concerned about her being by herself in that big home. It’s not a good time to be by yourself when you’ve just lost your husband and your children finally have to go home. She didn’t need it, she didn’t necessarily want it, but she finally realized when the kids said, but Mom, we want someone here with you. And it makes perfect sense. You can have Secret Service around you and you can have staff you can call night and day, but if no one is actually in the home, you wouldn’t know if anything happened. So she slowly got used to that idea and found out it wasn’t so bad, but that was an adjustment.

Smith: Well, and the Secret Service – they are not caregivers.
Hart: No, they are here for protection. I think that sometimes other people might forget that. That is just strictly their role. And so our role is very different with her and she has household staff, of course, and she has nurses there now. It’s nice. It’s different people to speak to during the day. And then I’m in and out constantly during the day. I see her when she gets up and at the breakfast table, and she’ll call me over. I’m there at lunch and go and visit with her before I leave. Sometimes I don’t get home until really late. But it’s an important time and I think it is important for her to know that we’re here. And I love it when she talks. She talks to all her friends or calls, sometimes has them over, because that’s important, too. You have to remember who she is and respect that, and realize that we are just staff.

Smith: So she’s not a recluse?

Hart: No. No, she’s not. She’ll have friends over for lunch. If she goes out and gets her hair done, she might come back and place a lot of calls and just chat with all of her friends. But she speaks to friends every week. All the time. I think it’s easy to become, not necessarily a recluse, but to say, I feel comfortable here. When we were away for the summer, it’s really nice to stay with her for those three month’s time and it’s hard to let go of that when I come back. But we have really great times together. It’s nice to just to sit and talk and go over stories and remembrances, and have her speak to friends, or see friends when she’s there. It is just a different time, now, for her.

Smith: Does she talk a lot about him?

Hart: She does. And I think that that’s important, too. I think some people are very careful and other people bring it up all the time. I think that there is always timing, there’s a time and a place, and when they want to talk, I think that they should. And I think it’s good to talk about him, too. I have very fond memories of him. He was always so kind to me and very sweet. Mrs. Ford was in the hospital one time, I remember, up in Beaver Creek. She was getting tests and they decided to keep her overnight. He said, “Well, okay. Do you want to drive back with me?” And I said, “I have my car, sir.” So I drove back and he called me and said, “Well, I’d like you to have dinner with me.” I said, “I’d be happy to.” So the chef would make dinner and those were very unusual, very sweet times, I thought. Some I’ll never, ever forget. And for that I am eternally grateful, because I never would have imagined that I’d be doing this.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Hart: Yes. I left – my family is Scandinavian and they always celebrate on the 24th, on Christmas Eve – so I generally would drive up on Christmas Eve with the family to see them. And I stopped by and said goodbye, and he’d always hold my hand real tight, always wanted me to assure him that I would take care of Mrs. Ford, and I wouldn’t leave. And I promised him I wouldn’t.

Smith: Was he in the study?

Hart: Yes.

Smith: I thought he was in a hospital bed, but it was in the study.

Hart: Yes, that’s right. Because it was out where everyone was, and there was light and he could look out at the golf course, he could watch TV, they could sit and eat dinner together, so it was very nice. It kept him in the middle of things. And so, whenever I was there, which was often during the day, I always stopped by, or he always called me, and I went over. He would look at me and we’d chat, or he’d hold my hand and I would promise and he would close his eyes. So the last time I saw him was on the 24th. I said, “Merry Christmas,” and that I would hope to see him when I returned and I would be back on the 27th or the 28th. So I got the call on the 26th.

Smith: But he was conscious when you chatted.

Hart: Yes. We didn’t chat a lot, but he looked at me and squeezed my hand and then closed his eyes. Yeah.

Smith: Were you surprised by the overwhelming response?

Hart: Oh – the letters that we got afterwards – I think it took over a year for me to just get through everything – all the thank you letters, and all of the details that came in after the fact. It was astounding. We still receive mail for Mrs. Ford, or I should say, Mrs. Ford does. We still receive mail for President Ford – which astounds me. When it comes from Boy Scouts or from military asking for commendations and things and I have to break the news to them that Mrs. Ford doesn’t do that, President Ford is no longer here. But the outpouring came from everywhere. One of the most touching things for me was in Grand Rapids, driving in from the airport and having the streets and the freeways lined with people - from toddlers and little schools – all the way.
I just never witnessed that before, never will again, and never imagined that two people could be loved so much. That was very touching. The Parmas were in the car with me and it was interesting because Mr. Parma looked at me and he said, “Jan, you need to start waving,” and I said, “Oh, sir, they don’t know who I am.” And he said, “Oh, but you don’t understand. They came out for this. The least you can do is just wave to them and acknowledge them being there. They’re not certain who is in the motorcade. They just know you are.” And it’s something I’ve never thought of before. That was just…

Smith: Was she touched by the response?

Hart: Oh, she was. She was just flabbergasted, I think. She would say, “Well, you know, we’re from here. This is home.” But when you would go by the museum - just the people across the bridge, and up and down the river, it was just…

Smith: But even in D.C., I was working for ABC the first part of the week, and as I said, in the media, they were astonished at the reaction, and how it seemed to build as the week went on.

Hart: It did.

Smith: And I think a lot of it was, there was a whole generation that wasn’t even alive when he was in the White House. And they were being introduced to him for the first time and they were comparing with the status quo and he looked awfully good. And one of the things that struck me in D.C. – first of all, remember, from the very outset of the funeral planning, he was adamant about one thing: there was not going to be a caisson through the streets of Washington.
Hart: Yes, that's right.

Smith: Adamant. And yet, I had to be up at the cathedral that morning for ABC, so I wasn’t in the procession – but I was told there were people lining the streets all through Washington on your way up to the cathedral, as if there had been a caisson.

Hart: And they were, yes. I think that we had that everywhere. We even had that here in the desert, but Washington was fantastic, too. It was different because it was Washington, but you saw people everywhere. They would be in parking structures, you could see them at the windows of their offices, all up and down. I’ll never forget going up to the Rotunda and seeing the winding roads of just streams of people.

Smith: Over New Year’s weekend.

Hart: Yeah. Waiting to go. And you remember how cold it was. It was cold. They didn’t care.

Smith: And remember, outside the White House? The staff?

Hart: Yes. That was special. I don’t care who you are, that had to touch you because it just gave you goose bumps. Every part of that is ingrained in my mind. We all saw different parts of it because we were in different timing of the whole, but it was something spectacular for the entire nation. I think it meant a great deal to everyone. President Ford, even to this day, you hear so much about his integrity. I was just at an event at the McCallum for their 21st anniversary, and they had Dianna Ross the other night, and I was speaking to the doctor that I worked for for twenty years and he still had his Republican pin on, and I said, “Well, aren’t you ever going to take that off?” and he goes, “No!” But they all still talk about him, and about how special he was. I think that’s a true testament to his character and to who the Fords really are.

Smith: Well, and – just a couple of things and we’ll let you go – but I’ll never forget – we’d been told at ABC, right from St. Margaret’s, don’t be surprised if you see Mrs. Ford in a wheelchair. And of course, we didn’t. And then, at the end, she got out of the wheelchair, walked all the way down – that’s a long walk.
They had asked her after she got back here, why she did that. And almost matter of factly, she said, “Because that’s what my husband would have wanted.”

Hart: That’s right. That’s what he would expect of me. And whenever we’d talk about that, or what would you like to do, or how would you like to go? She goes, “No, Jan, I’m walking.” Whether it was from the museum out to burial site, it didn’t matter what the weather was like, or anything. She is such a lady that way, and she didn’t do it to put on the show, but she knew that this was what she expected of herself, and she did it. She did it.

Smith: And she wasn’t well at that point, was she?

Hart: She wasn’t. She wasn’t feeling that terrific then, but she decided that she would put all of that behind her and she’d get back to that later. She had something with her lungs.

Smith: I understand she is vulnerable to respiratory complaints, isn’t she? Lots of people are.

Hart: She is. That’s her Achilles heel. But she said, no, this is a different time. It’s almost as if it wasn’t about her then, it was about her dear husband, and she certainly lived up to anyone’s standards, I think, during that whole time. She did a fabulous job. I was really, not that I should be proud of her for that, but I was just really touched and very proud of the way she managed herself through that, and everything that she did because I didn’t think she would be able to do it. But she did. She surprised me.

Smith: And I’m sure that was commented on in the letters that came in afterwards.

Hart: Yes. She got everything from baby blankets that people made and sent, to enormous quilts where they went online and would get pictures of the Fords throughout their lifetime, and they would photocopy them and they would put them on paper, and then they would put them onto the fabric. And children in schools, it’s truly remarkable what people sent to her. And a lot of that we’ve sent on now to the library and the museum. Some things she still has here. She received prayer shawls, people were just really generous – and they still send her things. Very generous, very generous minded people. People, I think, in the United States are very proud of who we are, and where we’ve come from and what we have and I think that presidents, past and present, and their families, are cherished. And it’s nice to see that.

Smith: What would you tell someone who never met him – what should they know about Gerald Ford?

Hart: I thought that he was – at first, when I was just a little afraid of him – but he was always so kind and considerate, and he never looked down on you. But he was fun to be around, for me, in my job. And I just think that he was a true gentleman. He would always say hello, he would always say thank you for anything that you would do, or really appreciate your extra efforts or your staying longer. He was always very generous that way to thank you or congratulate you, or just to make you feel comfortable. That certainly was lovely for me. He was a wonderful man.

Smith: Thank you, that was great.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this.

Before your paths crossed with Gerald Ford - you’d been in the Nixon White House.

Jones: I was.

Smith: And before that, what was your background?

Jones: My background is, I was brought up in a small town out in West Texas. My dad was a rancher out there and his parents were ranchers and my mother’s parents were ranchers. My mother had a fortuitous experience in her life - her mother was determined that she would be an educated person. So she and her sister would trade off, working, teaching school out there, and send the other one to college. They went through two years at the University of Texas and then two years with their degrees at the University of Chicago. Then they both went on for Master’s degrees. My mother missed hers by a few hours, her sister got hers. And so it was always, “You’ve got to be an educated person.”

So, I wanted to be a football player (West Texas generates them). I got injured first game my junior year in high school. I decided I’d better get smart because I’m not going to be able to go play football at the University of Texas. I happened to know of, through fortuitous circumstances, a school named Phillips Exeter Academy and I wrote them a letter and said, “Hey, I’d like to come to your school.” I was diversity at that time, coming from a little town in Texas. I took their test and didn’t do very well, but they said, “Come to summer school.” I did. They said, “Hey, you did well enough to stay. We want you to go back a year.” I said, “No, let me try.” So I went from a junior in this little small high school to a senior at Exeter and made it. By the skin of my teeth, I made it.
Back then, most of the people went to three schools from Exeter. Ninety-four of us went to Harvard, 45 or so to Yale, 25-30 to Princeton. Seventy-five, eighty percent of the class, three schools. So, I went to Harvard, loved it. It just so happened that the head of the department of government was from my little home town. Maybe the only other guy that ever escaped from the magnetic field.

Smith: What was his name?

Jones: His name was V.O. Key. V.O. wrote one of the classic textbooks of government called Parties, Politics and Pressure Groups.

Smith: What year did you graduate from Harvard?

Smith: So you were there with Mr. Pusey.

Jones: Yes, Mr. Pusey.

Smith: And they still called them the “Silent Fifties.” On the cusp of the anything but silent Sixties.

Jones: And then went to Harvard Business School. Graduated in 1964. Went to New York City, worked for McKinsey & Company, which was a major - not worldwide in that time, it was sort of in its golden age - major consulting firm. It was basically a Ph.D. in business. I left there, bought a little company out near Chicago in McHenry, Illinois. Then the Nixon downturn hit me, leverage buy-outs were no longer possible. I was in sort of the early leading edge of how you did that. Then a friend of mine who I had gone to business school with and who I’d got a job at McKinsey - I’d been there since summer, they had three summer associates and I was one of them - I recommended a number of people in that class. His name was Fred Malek. Fred’s here. Anyway, Fred landed in the White House. He came in with Bob Finch over at HEW. And then Haldeman liked him, brought him over to the White House and Fred asked me to come down for six months to help him reorganize the White House personnel office.
So, I came down and worked on getting that office straight, it’d been the victim of a power struggle between John Mitchell, who had had the personnel operation and was overseeing it, and Haldeman, who took it over from the Attorney General. And as I went along there, I really enjoyed it. Mitchell landed at the campaign and wanted someone to audit the field operations in the campaign and what better than a McKinsey guy to set up a system to make sure the campaign was operating well and effectively in the 50 states. So I went over there and I’d been there about a month and Mitchell was gone. The break-in occurred. Mitchell was gone. The campaign was in turmoil and I was given the job essentially of organizing and running a 50 state campaign, the campaign in the 50 states, which I did. We had a marvelous experience. McGovern was an unfortunate candidate for the other side and we won 49 states.

Smith: Let me just back up a bit because, during the campaign, how much internal concern was there about Watergate?

Jones: My side of the campaign was totally clean. Malek was there. He had the voter blocks, Farmers for Nixon, Veterans for Nixon in the field operation and I was the deputy to Fred running the campaign in the 50 states. Magruder’s group organized that break-in. We thought some funny business had probably happened, but were totally untouched. Didn’t think much about it. Yeah, well, “Mitchell and Magruder…” Never thought, never thought that it would have gone into the White House.

Smith: When you see what has become, what we’ll call accepted history, say the Woodward-Bernstein version of events - is there anything with which you take particular exception? Is there an alternate history?

Jones: Let me answer your first question before you ask that one. We knew that there was a guy named Fred LaRue, there was a guy named Bob Mardian, there were Magruder –

Smith: Were they Mitchell people?
Jones: All of those were Mitchell people. We knew they were involved, particularly LaRue and Magruder. Magruder was a weak, sort of too ambitious fellow, not much character. So we knew that those fellows were into skullduggery.

The other thing that everyone asks why in the world would you want to do that? The DNC is not effective, it’s not important. And so it was sort of a “Stupid” - “Probably Magruder currying favor” - “Let’s don’t worry about it. Let’s go win this campaign.” So, at the time, there was not a lot of fuss about it. It was fairly clear that some of these fellows probably did that. There’s no question, you know, the head of security was caught.

So, later, there is some serious question about John Dean’s role and whether or not he was instructed to do these things and whether or not he was the intermediary, as he claims, between Nixon and Haldeman and Mitchell, and so on. There’s been a book about his interest in this and I talked to the guy years ago, years ago now. You know, I guess I come down to the thought that - Magruder once told me his opinion of what happened and he said that the reason they broke in was that Nixon was concerned that – who was the chairman?

Smith: Larry O’Brien.

Jones: Larry O’Brien, who worked for Howard Hughes, knew something of Nixon’s brother’s transactions with Hughes and was worried those… And apparently Nixon’s mother got some money, too, if you remember, maybe $100,000 to pay off a mortgage or something. I’ve forgotten all of the details of it, but there was something there. I guess I’ve come to the thought that probably Nixon did it, probably instructed it done.

Smith: How will we ever know that? Is it possible there’s something on a tape somewhere, or something that was erased on a tape somewhere?

Jones: Well, you may or may not know, I was, after the gap was found, the custodian of the tapes.

Smith: Really?
Jones: Yeah, and I think the tapes have been looked at pretty carefully. My guess is there’s nothing on the tapes. Although the only chance, I think, is that the people who might know - Chuck Colson, Jeb Magruder, Dwight Chapin, Larry Higby, who was special assistant to Haldeman - the people who might have known, Fred Fielding, would toward the end of their lives talk about it. That’s the only chance, in my view. Now, Haldeman had a diary published and so on, but we don’t really have a lot of light on it at this point.

Smith: When you say you were custodian of the tapes, was there at any time to your knowledge any consideration given at the top to destroying those tapes?

Jones: No. I will tell you an interesting story and this begins the Ford administration. Fred Buzhardt, as you know, was formerly general counsel here, was still a Strom Thurmond guy, was the President’s -- Nixon’s - chief attorney on the tape matters. I mean, there were other attorneys, but Fred was the most trusted attorney and did all. The tapes could only be listened to by four people, Nixon himself, Rose Mary, Al Haig, and Fred Buzhardt. I don’t ever recall Al listening to one. The president rarely did. He asked that they be delivered to Steve Bull, who was his personal assistant. Rose Mary Woods and Fred Buzhardt were my two major customers.

I had a book that had every tape listed on spreadsheets with dates and a receipting system. If Buzhardt wanted a tape and he would call, actually Haig would call and say, “The president has given permission for Fred to listen to the blank tape.” And so I would take it to Fred and he would sign a receipt for it, you know, “On this day, I have received…” And then, when he was through with it or at the end of the day, I would go get it, sign a receipt that I received it in order to have a chain-of-custody. Then I would enter initials and time in and time out on the spreadsheets so I could see at a glance who had heard what tape when.

The interesting thing was, when President Ford came into office, there was sort of a scurrying about. Nixon called and wanted his tapes and President Ford agreed to give them to him, apparently, or someone did. I think Phil Buchen did. Perhaps President Ford, I’m not quite sure. Anyway, Buzhardt then calls me, I think two days, maybe three, after President Ford was sworn in and said, “Jerry, pack up the tapes, the military fellows who were flying daily flights out to San Clemente will take the tapes out and some of the papers this afternoon. So, please get them boxed up and ready to go.”

I had a vault, only key, EPS officer outside, two alarms, the only combination and then five combination safes, fireproof, again, only combinations were with me. So I went in there, hot, hot, hot. It was in August, oh God, it was hot in the basement of the EOB under a stairwell. And I packed the tapes up and then Buzhardt appears knocking on the door. No one ever entered the vault except for me. So Fred comes in and he says, “Jerry, we can’t do this.
We’ll all go to jail. Unpack them.” And so we were within probably 45 minutes of loading all of those boxes full of tapes on a dolly, into a military van, delivered to Andrews, and flown to San Clemente.

Smith: Do you know what sequence of events transpired in between those conversations that you had?

Jones: Yes, I do. Phil Buchen, either he himself changed his mind or he got someone else to change their mind and counterman the order. And I do not know whether it was Buchen to Ford, “Mr. President, we shouldn’t do this”, or whether it was the president having second thoughts, or whether Buchen on his own said ‘no.’ Now, I don’t believe Phil would have said ‘no’ on his own.

Section Not Released

Smith: Where were you in the last, in the final days? I mean, where were you in the White House?

Jones: Okay, I’ll tell you. After the campaign in 1972, I came back to the White House personnel office again, which is the office that recommends to the president who he might consider to appoint to the presidentially-appointed, confirmed by the Senate positions, as well as screening all the other non-career positions for political and other type, legal and FBI vetting. I went back there. President Nixon decided we had a number of “spent volcanoes” in his terminology. We were charged, a group of us who had been there in the past, with sorting through whose resignation should be accepted. As I recall, at the end of the day, beginning of January, there were of the 500, as I remember, excluding US attorneys and ambassadorial appointees, there were 555 PAS positions then. By about the 10th of January, 355 of those slots were open.

Smith: Really?

Jones: Yeah. Some of the people were resigning and others were asked - their resignations were accepted. But a small team of us, about six or seven people, worked through all of the personnel and the PASs and recommended to the president whose letters he should accept.

Smith: I have to ask you, what kind of factors were weighed? I mean, was ideology…?

Jones: Capability and whether they cooperated with the Nixon agenda. And we had a lot of people that did not cooperate with the Nixon agenda, who basically did their own thing and Nixon was really upset about that. So he had a chance to get them and he got them. So, we did that.

Smith: Did that include members of the cabinet?

Jones: Well, you know a lot of people would debate about these things, but Mel Laird left as did others. So, we did that. Then, oh about the 10th, 15th Malek went to be deputy director of OMB under Ash, and Haldeman called and said, “You’re the guy to run the White House liaison office. You’re it.” So I became the special assistant to President Nixon running the White House personnel office. Haig then comes in a little later. Haig and I get along beautifully. I filled, I think when I left there, ten of those 355 positions were open. You always have a float(?) of open positions. We’d done them, we filled them in the middle of the Watergate. In the middle of it and we, I think, we did a great job. Let me say that.

Haig then called me about, oh, I can’t really remember, early 1974. “Come over and see me.” Went over and [he] said, “You finished the job in the personnel office. I want you now to become staff secretary. And there’s a job, by the way, an extra assignment. You will be the custodian of the tapes.” So, I took them over then.
Smith: Did you have a sense, did he have a sense, was there any kind of collective sense at that point – if you’re talking about the beginning of ’74, you’ve got - Agnew’s gone, Ford’s been confirmed –

Jones: Oh, the Agnew thing was really interesting. I got a call from Camp David from Haldeman. “Jerry?”, “Yes, sir”, “Do you know how many positions the vice president has?” “Well, he has a number and I have a book right here on my desk. Let me look here. Ah, about two pages of positions, about 50, I’d guess.” He said, “Would you send a list up tonight to Camp David by helicopter?” “Yes, sir, I will.” Next day, he calls me, he says, “Prepare letters of resignation for the vice president for all positions except the vice presidency, please.” “Yes, sir.”

Smith: Let me get the timing of this right.

Jones: This is before it broke. It was before it broke. In January ’73 or even earlier in December ’72.

Smith: Okay, because Haldeman left. I mean, they left, what, in the late spring of ’73?

Jones: Yeah, so this was early. This was before anyone knew that Agnew was on the chopping block and they cleared him out. So I had to do that. It was very interesting. And so, you know, “What’s up folks?” Very interesting. Anyway, so, I did that.

Smith: Wow – I obviously didn’t know that. No one else did. So, by early ’74, is there anything such as a collective mood or prognosis around Haig in terms of the future?

Jones: It daily got worse. Every day it was worse. The drip, drip, drip of the Felt leaks, the Saturday Night Massacre –

Smith: Did you suspect, did people suspect –

Jones: Yeah, it looked as though it was coming out of the FBI. We didn’t know from whom, but it looked as though it was the interview notes from the FBI investigation. That’s what we thought at the time.
Smith: And why would someone in the FBI have had – what was the motive?

Jones: Well, who knows what motives are but clearly somebody was sticking it to Nixon for their own reasons, whatever they might have been. In Felt’s case it was ‘duty, God, and country,’ I’m sure, but then because he’d been passed over.

Smith: It’s a little more complicated than it seems.

Jones: Yeah. So, the answer is that we were embattled. There was no question about it. Nobody knew how it was going to turn out, however. And, I will tell you my personal view, and I think most of my colleagues’ view. Very few people left the White House, only Shultz left the cabinet, very few people bailed on Nixon. And the reason for it was, there were two reasons. The first one was, and I remember it vividly - my thought here - Nixon would not be so damned stupid as to have done this. It just can’t possibly be true. He is much more clever than this. And the other one was, is that Al Haig was a commanding presence. What a wonderful man. He’s an American hero in my opinion. He held that government together. And he negotiated the deal with Jaworski. And he negotiated the deal with a somewhat to, perhaps, majorly incapacitated president. And he kept the train on the tracks. Al Haig, if he never did another thing in the history of the United States, he is absolutely a hero and should have been recognized as the hero he was. He hasn’t been, but tour de force, absolutely amazing thing. And he kept the cabinet together, he kept the government together, he kept the White House together and he kept Nixon together. It was amazing.

Smith: You talked about every day getting worse and at the same time obviously no one knew how it was going to wind up. At the same time, knowing the tapes were this sort of unknown commodity that presumably at any point something might surface that would lead to exactly what happened –

Jones: Nixon could not possibly have been so stupid as to do this. Cannot possibly. He knew the recording system was there, for God sakes.

Smith: Were you surprised when you first heard of the existence of the recording system?
Jones: Uhm, no. I was not surprised. What did surprise me was the extent of which it was a part. As it turns out, Roosevelt had a crawl space in the Oval Office and he had a secretary crawl in the crawl space and take shorthand notes at the air conditioning vent near the desk. So it had been going on a long time, a long time. But the thing that was strange was the extent to which it was done.

Smith: Is there a story or anything that illustrates, again for people who weren’t around then, the mood as it evolved during that sort of surreal summer? Or is it a sense that you just sort of went along and then you went over the cliff?

Jones: We were going along and there was a critical date. We did one thing, we published a big book of recordings, expletives deleted. And I had to publish that book.

Smith: Looking back, the expletives, the language, had as much impact on ordinary Americans as anything in particular that was said.

Jones: It’s about like Blago.

Smith: Yeah, it’s one thing to think about it in the abstract and it’s another to hear it.

Jones: What happened was, was we were on essentially a flat line. The critical decision was: Will executive privilege hold? Can Sirica make the president turn the tapes over or not? And so we were tracking along through that lawsuit, a lot of leaks and so on, but the presidency was operating, decisions were being made, things were being done…

Smith: And you assumed you had at least enough votes in the Senate to win a trial.

Jones: Right. At that time, it looked as though Nixon could survive if he could win the executive privilege argument. Well, the decision came down. The tapes had to be given up and that’s when it became a difficult thing. And I will tell you exactly how it happened, I remember it vividly. The decision was made. Nixon was in San Clemente. The decision was not what we expected it to be. I think most of us thought we would win that case. I certainly did. I think he should’ve won it, frankly, but he didn’t. And the case then, I was called by Ken Clawson who was the director of communications who was in San
Jerry Jones

Clemente, and he said, “Jerry, you think it is possible that the president could stiff the Supreme Court in this decision?”

So that was, then, he’d clearly been told to sound out the people in Washington about what was going on. And Bill Timmons, I was in Timmons’ office when that call came to me, Timmons was counting noses in the Senate and we were leaking votes and I just told Clawson, “If the president does that, he’s done. It’s over. It is totally over. He cannot do it. He must deliver the tapes.” So, I was told to pull the tapes together, but before that, that same afternoon, Haig said, “The president wants Fred to listen to the June 23rd Oval Office tape. Would you please go get it and give it to Fred?” So I took it over to Fred and Fred usually kept the tapes to the end of the day and I’d gather them all up. That day, he called me back in, oh, 30-40 minutes, 45, met me at the door of his office, handed me the tape and he said, “Jerry, it’s all over.” My guess is, I probably knew that even before Haig did and before the president. Interestingly enough, that tape had only been listened to twice before, both times by Nixon. That latest one in May. So he knew. He knew.

Smith: At that point, now, does Haig listen to the tape?

Jones: No, Buzhardt listened. Then I had to gather them up, I’d forgotten how many of them there were, 20? 25? I gave them to a guy named, uh, I’ve forgotten his name [Jim St. Claire], one of the attorneys who took them up to Sirica.

Smith: Okay, so Haig, as far as you know, never listened to the June 23rd tape.

Jones: [shakes head] Buzhardt.

Smith: Okay. What was your sense of the relationship between, for lack of a better word, the Nixon people and the Ford people at this delicate juncture? Was there resentment that Ford was out on the road, not in town defending his boss?

Jones: People weren’t paying much attention to that. I mean, I wasn’t. There were some discussions and some leaks about Ford getting ready to take over the presidency if he had to and so on. Maybe other people were paying attention to it, but, you know, we had some pretty good incoming fire and that was not a major topic, frankly, not a major topic.

Smith: That makes perfect sense. It has been suggested through the years - everyone knows that Ford wasn’t his first choice - but that he [Nixon] looked upon Ford as his insurance against impeachment.

Jones: Well, I’ve heard that and it could’ve been his thinking, but it was terribly wrong because the Congress would have far preferred to have Ford there than a damaged Nixon, I think. So, if that was his calculation, it was incorrect.

Smith: What was Haig’s role in navigating these incredible rapids? I mean, just in terms of steering Nixon, I mean, at some point Haig had to have come to the conclusion that, for the good of the country, there had to be this outcome.

Jones: Well, the conclusion was inescapable. The headcount slipped away.

Smith: Did that happen immediately once the court decision or the…?

Jones: Once the court decision was made, I believe Timmons that day, and you should talk to Bill, I believe his headcount was death to Nixon. I mean, it was done, I believe that day.

Smith: And was that because the court made this ruling and…because people didn’t know yet what was in the tapes, or if Nixon defied the court?

Jones: No, you know, I just think finally there was the tipping point and it went. But you need to talk to Bill on how those headcounts went because I’m not sure, but it seems to me that day we were under water or it was very close.

Smith: Do you remember when the actual “smoking gun” was revealed, do you remember your –

Jones: Done. It was done. Everybody knew it was done. From the time of the decision to the time of the resignation was only four or five days, wasn’t it? It was a very short period of time. Frankly, I’ve forgotten, but it seems to me the decision was early August and Nixon was out by, what, the 9th? What was the date?
Smith: I think the decision was a little earlier than that. I think it was a little earlier.

Jones: Could’ve been.

Smith: But clearly the death throes were –

Jones: It was a very short time period, I mean, just a blink.

Smith: What was Haig doing during that interim?

Jones: Haig was negotiating with Jaworski, he was negotiating with Ford, he was negotiating with Nixon, he was keeping the Cabinet intact, he was...you name it.

Smith: Over the years countless times, the whole idea of whether there was “a deal” comes back to what Haig said to Ford. And was Haig speaking for Nixon? Can you unravel any of that?

Jones: I can’t. I have no visibility into it at all, nor do I think very many people do.

Smith: Would Haig have been, is he a free agent in this? Or is Richard Nixon his client?

Jones: My guess is, you know, I think Haig had a very complex view of what he was trying to do and he was trying to save the president, if he could. If he couldn’t save him, he was trying to save the country. He was not trying to disserve President Ford and it required balancing a lot of interests here and I think he did his damnedest to do that. And when he finally realized that Nixon could no longer be saved, I think he then tried to put together the deal that would allow Nixon to get out of there, Ford to get in there, without unbelievable constitutional debacle. Now, whether he – my guess is he took some liberty with positions in order to get both sides to agree. That would be my guess. But I have no idea, that’s totally un - nobody knows but the guys that were there. And as far as I know, Haig’s never talked about it very much.

Smith: He has been, I think it’s safe to say, made out to be the heavy by some - that he was sort of pulling strings to do Nixon’s dirty work and taking advantage of Ford’s naïveté. Without knowing what was said, I assume you think that’s a mischaracterization.
Jones: I do. I do. Here’s what I sort of think, and this is total speculation.

Smith: Understood.

Jones: The issue of, one of the things that got Nixon to step down, was that if he was impeached, he would lose his pension. And so, if he resigned, he would keep his pension. That was one part of the deal. Then there was the question of would there be a trial post-resignation and would he be sent to jail. And he was sitting there caught on that one. “Well, God, don’t want to do that.” So, if I were guessing, what Haig says is, “Hey, there’s a deal here if you’ll pardon him, he’ll leave now so we don’t have to go through all this.” Now, whether Vice President Ford said ‘yes’ or ‘no’, whether Haig said it in those terms or not, my guess is he lead Nixon to believe that Ford would save him. And whether Ford actually said he would do it or whether Haig read from their conversation that he would do it, I think Nixon thought so. Then we began to get the phone calls from San Clemente after Nixon was there and President Ford was in the office about, “Where in the hell’s my pardon?”

Smith: Really?

Jones: Yeah. He talked to several, a lot of phone calls, particularly to Haig. Yeah, there were. There were. The man was distressed and frantic.

Smith: So he clearly believed there was a deal.

Jones: If he didn’t think, he at least was strongly recommending that if you don’t do this it’s going to absolutely rip everything. You’ve got to do it. From my view, Haig called me up to his office one day, staff secretary’s [office] is down in the basement, and said, “Jerry, what do you think about a pardon?” And I said, “Well, Al, the fact is that we’re not able to do the country’s business with this boiling. All of these decisions that we’ve held over for months as we’ve gone through this have to be made. The president’s being pounded to death on the whole Nixon thing, it’s distracting. We’re not getting the country’s business done. I don’t see how, without a pardon, without getting this off the agenda, the president is going to get to be president.”
My recommendation was absolutely pardon. Do it now. The staff secretary sends anywhere from ten to twenty decision memos up to the president every afternoon. And he’s got to go through them and decide and send them back to you by in the morning, usually. They almost always came back by in the morning. Heavy, heavy extracurricular, you don’t see that, but from sometime in the late afternoon to sometime by 7:00 the next morning, a lot of heavy decisions have to be made. I didn’t see how President Ford could operate the presidency under the kind of fire that he was getting over the Nixon thing. I told Haig, “I don’t see how he can do it.”

Smith: Were you ever in a conversation about the pardon or just a general - the issues that you raise - in which Ford was present?

Jones: No. Absolutely not. Haig asked me my opinion, asked me what I thought. And I told him, point blank, this is what I think.

Smith: Well, it’s interesting, because he asked you your opinion. Did you have a sense at that point that Haig thought this was a done deal or was he asking you, I won’t say ‘going through the motions’, but –

Jones: I had the sense that President Ford asked him to find out what people thought.

Smith: Okay.

Jones: I thought, why else would he have done that? He could’ve on his own gone down there and said, “Mr. President, this is what your staff thinks.” And Haig, I think, trusted me as sort of a political seer person. I just don’t know what he did. I don’t know who all he talked to. I know he talked to me. I don’t know who else he talked to.

Smith: Was there any sense, and again this is after the fact - the argument makes perfect sense that we’re paralyzed and we’re not governing and we don’t see how we’re going to be able to –

Jones: Well, the other problem was, you could see it was going to get worse, it wasn’t going to get better. And so, here we go, show trials for Nixon, Ford’s trying to run the presidency and we’re having show trials.
Smith: And supposedly Jaworski was saying it might be a couple of years before there was a trial.

Jones: And the other thing is, now, the president said that he didn’t intend to run. My view was that he had to run. And I from the early, early on, wanted him to run. And you’ll hear later if we have time, I worked very hard on that. I became his scheduler and sort of news manager head later. Cheney asked me to flip with a guy named Jim Connor who then became staff secretary and I took Connor’s job. Basically ran an image management effort.

Smith: The Rose Garden Campaign?

Jones: That was part of it. I mean, it was a long, involved series of things that we did, but it was the most interesting thing I did at the White House, frankly.

Smith: Let me back up one moment because I want to ask you something. I’ll never forget, when we were talking to Stu Spencer, no, it wasn’t Stu Spencer. Leon Parma told this story: on the morning of the 9th, when he was at the last minute kind of pushed in the East Room with some folks from Capitol Hill and the ceremony took place. He said, obviously, it was somber, there’s no mood of celebration. But when it was over, there was a receiving line and they invited folks down, I think to the state dining room, for a reception. And he said, “You could watch the Ford people who were sort of outnumbered at that point, but people from the Hill, friends and that sort of thing, they all headed down there. And the Nixon people all sort of peeled away and went off to do their own thing.” Now, that may be an exaggeration, it’s a very understandable emotional reaction at that point, but it does raise this large question about the problems posed by integrating a Nixon staff with this interloper.

Jones: Well, it depends on your viewpoint. I had a different viewpoint from that. One thing is true, is a number of the Nixon people should have gone and would go.

Smith: Voluntarily or…?
Jones: Well, some went voluntarily. Some didn’t. But I had an unusual relationship with President Ford, I don’t know why I did. He trusted me for some reason or another. And I remember before he became president saying, “Sir, anything I can do to help you, I want to.”

Section Not Released

Now, one of the things that happened is, early on, Haig went in to President Ford and said, “You’ve got to keep Jones. He’s the only guy that knows how the White House works,” the decision-making process and so on and so forth. President Ford called me up there, Haig was there, and he said, “Jerry, I want you to stay as staff secretary for me.” I said, “Yes, sir. I will.” That was within a day or two or three – fairly quickly. Now, on the thing about the Nixon people peeling off, I didn’t go to the swearing in. I had an assignment from Haig and the assignment was, “Jerry, the Ford transition group wants to implement a decision making process here called ‘spokes of the wheel’ and I want you to write, for the president, a paper on how the chief of staff works and why it works and why a ‘spokes of the wheel’ system will not work.” I stayed up all that night and delivered to Haig the next morning to take in to President Ford a paper on how it worked and why and why you had to do it that way.

Smith: Was the “spokes of the wheel” a congressional mindset?

Jones: Yes, oh yeah. Yeah. That ground’s been plowed pretty well, but the thought was: here Haldeman and Erlichman and Kissinger kept everybody out and the president didn’t know what he had to know. What we need to do is open up the presidency. But it can’t work that way. I mean, it’s a disaster when you do it that way because you have to be able to ensure that everybody has seen the decision and had commented on it and the president knows what they think. He can decide against these. He can decide knowing what the down sides are, but he’s got to know. And what happens when people jump in there, it makes an easy decision, it looks easy. Then suddenly you find, “Oh, my God, we didn’t know this” - “We didn’t know that” - “We didn’t know that.” And unless you have a staff system that ensures you know those hidden things, you get killed and you begin to make mistakes and you can’t ever, ever get out of the hole.

Smith: Did they learn the hard way?

Jones: Well, the Whip Inflation Now was the great example of that. That never got staffed. It wasn’t looked at.

Smith: Did it come out of the speechwriting operation?

Jones: Yeah, it did. Hartman VFR direct to Ford. Nobody ever saw the speech.

Smith: Really?

Jones: Yeah.

Smith: Wow.

Jones: In the meantime, I briefed Cheney, seems to me, right after Ford became president. And then Rumsfeld came over from NATO. Briefed them at length – Cheney several hours, Rumsfeld at least two – on the staff system, how the decision-making process in the White House worked, why you did it that way, why it was so important to do it that way, and so on. Rumsfeld stopped me in the hall on his way back to NATO and said, “Don’t let them change a thing until I get back.”

Smith: Did he know in advance he was going to have the role that he had?

Jones: He did. I think after those briefings and after his own discussions with others, [he] went to President Ford and said, “I won’t take this unless you keep this chief of staff system in place.” I think you’ll hear from himself if that’s what he said. I believe that’s what he said. I think he’s even told me that’s what he said. I’m sure he’s told me that’s what he said. It had to be. And President Ford said, “Don, can we ease into this? I agree with you, but can we ease into this?” Because it was basically overturning his entire transition team, Seidman and Marsh, Hartmann, Buchen, that whole group got overturned.

Smith: It’s funny you mention that, because to give you another example of where a man’s personal characteristics defined, not always necessarily for the better, his presidency. When Rockefeller comes up with the Energy Independence Corporation…he comes up with this hundred billion dollar plan and it’s going to be funded by moral obligation bonds just like New York State. And, needless to say, it was not well received, and Bill Simon in particular, was outspoken, but I think everyone really was. The story I’ve been told, by more than one source, was that there was a Cabinet discussion of this and it was very clear that it didn’t have a lot of support. The president indicated that he would go along with it, and of course, as soon as the meeting is over, Simon comes up to him and says, “You can’t be serious” and renews all the arguments. And the president says, “Bill, you and I both know Congress will never pass this, but I’m not going to embarrass Nelson.”

Jones: I don’t know that. Let me tell you what I do know.

Smith: Yeah.

Jones: After that, several of us, Cheney, Greenspan and me – there could’ve been another one or two – worried about Rockefeller’s programmatic initiatives.
[We] got the president to say, “There will be no new programs,” which undercut Nelson. That was the killer for him. I mean, we worked hard on that and Greenspan lead the charge, but Cheney and others of us supported in helping him, and the president had the courage to make that decision, to make it public.

Smith: Now, that decision may be philosophically and economically consistent with the needs of the time. The way you phrase it sounds though like at least some of the useful ancillary fallout –

Jones: No, it was absolutely designed to stop Rockefeller. Absolutely, it was designed to. And the president had incredible courage to make that decision.
Now, it was also required, but he was a conservative on budget matters.

Smith: In talking about Rockefeller’s reaction when he learned of this, my understanding was that he was thrown for a loop because, where he came from, you get elected by your programs.

Jones: You buy the governorship every time.
Smith: You come up with new ideas, bigger programs, newer programs –

Jones: Larger buildings, Twin Towers –

Smith: That’s how you win in New York.

Jones: Right.

Smith: Which also suggests a certain parochialism in Rockefeller that I think –

Jones: He was a vote-buying, liberal Republican.

Smith: Did Ford lead Rockefeller to believe that he would be in the domestic sphere like Kissinger was in the foreign sphere?

Jones: Yes, I think when they started that was the intention. And then Nelson started coming in with all this stuff that the president couldn’t live with for a lot of reasons, some philosophic, some were practical reasons. So people began to look askance, and then really askance, and then, “Hey, we can’t do this.” And poor Jim Cannon, oh my God, caught in the middle. And he –

Smith: He’s at the domestic council.

Jones: Running domestic council where all these programs were coming from.

Smith: Which Rockefeller thought would be his vehicle for implementing these ideas.

Jones: Right. And so Rockefeller got upset with Jim. “You’re not serving me, you’re serving Ford!” “Yes!” Jim says, “Richard Parsons said, ‘You guys better look and see who’s signing that paycheck.” He said that Parsons told him that, which is fascinating. Anyway, it began to be a real problem and the reaction was that we have to stop this and so the anti-bodies began to stop Rockefeller.

Smith: Nobody wants to blame the president, so you blame the people around them – so Rockefeller, it’s no news to you, went to his grave convinced that Don Rumsfeld did him in.
Jones: Yes, he did. And I told Rumsfeld that in a conversation I had with him a couple of months ago about his book. He said, “I didn’t do that! I absolutely didn’t do that. All I did was to ensure the president had the full story.”

Smith: Okay, but given the fact that there were also some political aspirations –

Jones: He didn’t smile when he said that, but he denied it vehemently because I said, “One of the things that I thought you did that was one of the most important things you did for the country was to get Vice President Rockefeller off the ticket.” And Don denied it vehemently and denied that he tried to do him in at all. And that Nelson had misunderstood.

Smith: Whatever the truth is there, it does seem that Rockefeller was, at the very least, maybe blinded by ambition or just naïve. For someone who’d been around Washington, and who’d been in those bureaucratic fights for years…there is also a theory that, at that point in his life, he was not the same man he had been ten years before.

Jones: It was a strange thing. He’d been governor too long, didn’t know how to be a vice president or staffer, didn’t talk to people, didn’t come sell them. These things just came full blown. And, you know, you can’t do that. There are a lot of interests.

Smith: And, remember also, every weekend, he’d go up to Pocantico, so he was a commuting vice president.

Jones: Right, so he just didn’t do the homework to get his viewpoints sold, if they could have been sold. He just didn’t do the homework. He put all that stuff out without proper conversation.

Smith: When Ford had that conversation with him or conversations, at the very beginning, all of which led Rockefeller to believe he was going to be a kind of domestic czar - here’s this notion that Ford came into the White House with a congressional mindset and that it took him a long time to, in some ways, grow out of that. I mean, it strikes me as that’s the kind of thing a congressman would say to someone.
Jones: Sure. No, I think there’s no question. President Ford was not ready in terms of having had the executive experience to be president. What I believe is true is that he became and I’ll explain to you why, he became a superb executive over time. He figured out how to do it. And one of the things I think is true, is, I think Don Rumsfeld helped him a lot on how you work through being president. I think Don was coach. You know, he and the president had a long background together. And Don, in fact, had been the guy that had engineered his elevation into the minority leader’s position. It was Don, it wasn’t Laird, it was Rumsfeld. They had a very trusting relationship. The president trusted him and I think Don was a really good coach. I would call him a coach. Now, Ford may not have seen him as a coach, but I think they had a lot of, “Here’s how you have to think about this” - “Here’s how you have to…”

Smith: How did you see that process unfolding?

Jones: Well, you couldn’t see it very well because Rumsfeld is extremely tight lipped. But what you began to see, is you began to see Ford emerging as an executive. Let me tell you, this is really terribly important. There are two things that are important here. First thing, back on the personnel matter: there were, in the domestic council, some really very bright guys - as there were in the National Security Council.

Smith: Holdovers?

Jones: Now, before the decisions were made about them, there were some others that were not so important. The Colson staff wasn’t so important, but the domestic policy staff was terribly important as was the national security staff. And one of the things that I felt was that we didn’t have time to reeducate a domestic council staff. And I’ve all but forgotten how I did this, but one of the things I did was, I got Cannon to keep the best domestic council guys and he kept them, a lot of them. And the domestic council functioned quite well under Cannon for President Ford. Now, the reason for that was that –

Smith: What was its function?

Jones: Well, what it does is, we want a program on ‘x’ health. Well, what should the program look like? What are the options? How should we do this? How much does it cost? What do we include? All of that domestic council staffer on health did working with the relevant cabinet people. And so they would pull a position together. You know, “Here is a plan for the program. Here are the options. Here are the pieces to it,” and so on and so forth. And then it would go forward to the staff secretary who would staff it. The staffing process is you send it to the natural enemies of the idea and get their ideas, get their views. And so then you include those in the paper, “Mr. President, the recommended option is option 2C. You need to know that if this is chosen, these people react this way. These people support it.”

So he has this and he looks at it and decides, but the key is we didn’t have time. If Ford was going to run for the presidency, we did not have time to reconstitute a staff that was good enough to do this programmatic work that is the basis for being able to run for president. So I got him to keep Jim Cavanaugh, who was one of them, but there were a number of guys that we kept who were just excellent. And they did a super job and were very loyal to Ford and became quite close to him. Paul O’Neill at the OMB. There were a number of these people who stayed and they became the backbone of the policy apparatus of the Ford presidency.

The only one that leaked off was to Seidman, the economic front. But Simon was there and so Bill, frankly, was more powerful, Bill Simon than Bill Seidman, in terms of heft on policy matter issues, in my view. That’s how I saw it working. But the rest of the apparatus was, Cannon kept Cavanaugh as his deputy, as I recall. You know a number of those people in critical positions were kept and it was critical to the program work of the Ford presidency. Now the thing that you began to see in his decision making, it’s very interesting. As staff secretary, I would send ten to twenty blue folders up, those are decision folders. Sometimes a red folder which is a “You’ve got to look at this now, sir.” And he would do an interesting thing. There were two aspects of his decision making that made him, frankly, a far better presidential executive than Nixon was. First thing is that he would read one of these memos and he would say, “I disagree with the option you’re recommending. I don’t think this will work. If we want this to pass, this is not going to work.”
And so I’d get a note back, “Call the guys together, we need to talk about this. Schedule as fast as you can.” So he would call them together and would say, “This will not work. They will not pass it, so if we want something like this, we’re going to have to do it this way.” And they would talk about it and reform it and then go with it. Now that was very creative problem solving from the chief executive’s viewpoint. He knew the Congress, he knew what would work, he knew how you had to present it, he knew what could be done and not done and he would say, “This won’t work. Call them in. Let’s talk. We’ve got to rework this.”

Smith: So at least in that aspect, that flies in the face of conventional wisdom that he was too congressional.

Jones: No, no, no, no. This is as he began to really get on top of the job. And he knew what he knew and he knew what would work and he knew it better than anybody else in the White House, anybody else, and he used his executive capability to shape the programmatic work that we did. It was brilliant.

The other thing that he did is that he knew, because he sat on those budget committees, that budgets were what drove everything else in the executive branch. He spent unbelievable amounts of time on the budget. The OMB would have a budget meeting with the cabinet secretary, then OMB would review the cabinet secretaries and their views of that agency’s budget. And then the president would make decisions about what he thought, just with OMB’s ____. And then the cabinet secretary would have the opportunity to come appeal the decisions he didn’t like in front of the president with OMB there. So he would, for each department, through probably three or four different meetings on their budgets. He knew them better than the cabinet officers most of the time. And he would make the decisions on the budget of the United States that we were recommending. I don’t necessarily mean that the Congress did. But he knew the budget process so well that he could do that. As far as I know, he’s the only president that has ever spent that kind of time on the budget because he knew that it drove the world, drove the programs. They were the key decisions. He would, because he’d been in the Congress, but he was also making the decisions on what he wanted to do and not do.

Smith: Unfortunately, that doesn’t communicate itself to the general public as “presidential leadership.” I mean, that term has been so theatricalized.

Jones: But the way you run the executive branch is you control the budget. You control the programs and you form them to what can be done with them if you agree that they should be done. And he did three things. He kept the people. He was willing to keep the people that were needed. And he did. He was willing to intervene in the decision making process and change it and discuss it. Nixon would never call a meeting to discuss a decision, ever. He would initial an option and go on. Now, he and Kissinger did the foreign policy stuff that way, but only the two of them. But Ford would have the whole room full, have everybody there. “Let’s talk about this.” And there was great loyalty. There wasn’t leaking, there wasn’t anything. The third thing he did was he controlled the budgets. He made the decisions. He approved the recommendations, or disapproved. He turned out to be a superb executive president, far better than Nixon was.

Smith: Fascinating because it perfectly captures the notion that this was someone who after a rocky start grew into the office.

Jones: He did. There’s no question that that’s true.

Smith: But again, that other whole side, the performance art aspect of the presidency was never his shtick. He probably, out of all of our presidents, has got to be, him and Eisenhower, the least self-dramatizing.

[Break]

Jones: You were just about to talk about image.

Smith: Yeah, because there is the whole administrative side of the job, which we talked about, and how he grew into it. The whole, for lack of a better word, theatrical side of the job, is something one senses he was never comfortable with.
Jones: Well, he loved to go on the road. He loved to be out there. He really did. And he was a hail fellow well met. He loved people and he liked to be with people and he liked to talk to people. So it wasn’t that he was a recluse like Nixon was. I mean, Nixon had to force himself to do those things. Got very good at it, but he had to work at it. President Ford was really a wonderfully nice man and really liked his fellow citizens. It’s just that he had no sort of ability to project a charisma. He had a very flat voice. Not an exciting, kind of gripping guy. Although I’ll tell you, I had to worry about that a lot, that was my job after Cheney asked me to take over the – frankly, it was a message management job.

We pulled together, had a 10:30 meeting every morning, sometimes in addition to that a 4:30 meeting in the afternoon. It was a pretty incredible group of people. It was me, as chairman, then we had Dave Gergen, director of communications. We had Bud McFarlane from the NSC. We had Paul O’Neill from the OMB. We had Jim Cavanaugh from domestic policy. We had Larry Speakes in who was the deputy press secretary. Sometimes Nessen came. We had the press secretary for the First Lady, a woman named Susan Porter. Terry O’Donnell, who was the president’s personal aide. Red Cavaney who was the chief advance guy and Bill Nicholson who was the scheduler. I think that’s about it. We met at least once a day, sometimes twice a day. And our job was –

Smith: This was during the campaign?

Jones: No, this was before the campaign. It began sometime in 1975. And our job was to think about what the president – I’ll use the shorthand – what he should do, where he should go, who he should see, what he should say when he got there. That’s what we were trying to think through. And our goal was very simple. We wanted – and this was before the day of the 24/7 news cycle – we wanted to be the lead story in the three major papers every morning, with our picture and our story, and we wanted to be the lead political story on the three major news channels every night with our picture and our story.

That was what our objective was. The president has to be covered, and if you have the president’s schedule and can decide what he’s going to do, who he’s going to talk to, what he’s going to say, where he’s going to be, what it looks like, you can control that to an amazing degree. And that’s what this group did – tried to do. And, by the way, we were hugely successful. It usually was our story, our picture, our message. Now, it doesn’t mean that there weren’t counters to that and critics to that and so on, but at least when the president was covered, we could do that, because you can do several things. First of all, you can pick the venue, you can limit the exposure – one event a day – so they have to use that one if they’re going to cover him at all, and you can also be sure that it’s an attractive story. And so that’s what this group did.

Smith: Was there on-going tension with the speechwriting operation?

Section Not Released

Jones: Now, what happened was, there was a guy in the White House who was maybe the wisest man in Washington named Bryce Harlow. Bryce came to town to be George Marshall’s speechwriter. Anyway, Bryce was in the White House and I went to him and I said, “Bryce, I think even though the president said he is not going to run for office, we have to get in position to be able to run and I think he’s going to have to run. I don’t think you step out of the presidency and have any chance to maintain the presence. So he’s going to have to run. He may not know it yet but he’s going to have to. And this is what we’re thinking: I’m thinking he should go in 1975 to all the key states several times so that people know who he is, so that there is a ‘Yeah, we know who President Ford is.’”

So we put a program together in the scheduling group to get the president in to the key states, California, New York. We had a big board of all the states with pins in it, color coordinated, colored by months, by the cities we went to and we were trying to cover what we believed to be the key states in an election and the key cities and with multiple trips. And I went to Bryce and I said, “This is what we’re thinking about doing. What do you think?” He said, “Jerry, this is complex, so let me think about it a day or two.” He called me back, he said, “I don’t think you should do that.” But I was smarter than Bryce and I did it anyway.
Smith: Did you have a sense of what the relationship was between Harlow and Ford?

Jones: I think the president thought that Harlow and Laird were two great, great counselor guys that had seen so much that they just had some great wisdom. Between the two, Harlow was far and away the best. He didn’t have the ego, Laird unfortunately did.

Smith: Harlow presumably didn’t leak like Laird, who was the original leaker.

Jones: Oh, the worst. And so, anyway, we were going along fine, but two things happened. The first thing was, on all of the trips the president would bump his head on the helicopter and we couldn’t fix it. We simply couldn’t get him to think about it and he would hit his head almost every time. And so then it suddenly was that he was a Bozo the Clown problem. And then the other problem was, we got him shot at twice. And so the criticism, “What in the hell is he doing in San Francisco and Sacramento? Why in the world is he out there?” Well, we were trying to get the state preconditioned, but after twice, it was… So it backfired.

Smith: Let me ask you, because by that time it’s September of ’75, the criticism has been made over the years that the White House was very slow to take seriously the possibility of a Reagan challenge. To what extent was that, in fact, hanging over your heads, and was it a fair criticism?

Jones: There were a couple of these things. Panama Canal was one of them. There were several. And this scheduling group could see it coming. Now, I do remember and you have it in the library out there: Bill Gulley was out in San Clemente. Do you know who Gulley was?

Smith: Was it –

Jones: The gunnery sergeant who wound up running the military assistance office.

Smith: Okay.

Jones: And he came back and he said, “President Nixon wants you to send this in to Mr. Ford,” and he told me what Nixon had said: “Reagan is a lightweight.
You don’t have to worry about him.” And I wrote that, “Gulley reports this from Nixon”.

Smith: What was the message? That Reagan…

Jones: …was a lightweight and he didn’t have to worry about him. So I sent it in there. Now, I don’t know what Ford thought, but here’s Nixon sending in, coaching. But our guys were terribly worried about this and that was one of the reasons that no new spending thing came. That we were trying to do a lot of defense against Reagan. We could see it. And Kissinger was pushing him towards détente; Reagan was on the other side. There were several of these things. So, I think the President was being pulled. I think the Kissingers of the world were pulling him in one direction. We were trying to offset that and we weren’t able to, but it wasn’t for lack of recognition. It was pretty clear to us that it was going to be a real tough go.

Smith: You know, it’s interesting – and this is purely speculative – but that’s a fascinating message from Nixon, because we talked to Stu Spencer at length when we were out in California and the other side of that coin is that Stu – of course, remember Nixon went to China right at the height of the New Hampshire primary campaign - Stu said Nixon knew exactly what he was doing. Stu at least interpreted it as almost thumbing his nose at Ford. That it was almost a hostile act.

Jones: I don’t think so. No, Nixon was sending back general messages. I know that you’ll find that memo out there somewhere.

Smith: Supportive or at least…?

Jones: No, telling him what he thought. There may have been others. But I don’t think so. Nixon didn’t like Reagan. None of the Nixon people liked Reagan. They would come to me. There was a guy named Waller. I’ll think of his last name in a minute. Great guy. His dad had been the chairman of, I think, Union Oil Company. Waller Taylor. Waller was a close in intimate of Nixon’s. Nixon joined his law firm after he lost the governor’s race in ’62. He would come in with just the most hilarious, nasty stories about how stupid Reagan was. And the whole Nixon crowd thought that. They all, all, did not want Reagan to be president. Strongest Ford supporters and so on. I think they would have veered away if Nixon were thinking the other way. I just don’t think that was true.

Smith: This whole thing may have answered my question because of what you said, what you sensed the private relationship between Ford and Nixon was during this period. I mean, clearly there was no public relationship.

Jones: It got terrifically strained over that pardon thing, but once that was done and Nixon began to come back – you know, he wrote several pretty good books, I mean, more than pretty good, they were excellent. I never felt that there was rancor there, ever.

Smith: What was the difference in style management, whatever, political acuity say, between a Rumsfeld as chief of staff and a Cheney? Because clearly Ford valued both of them greatly.

Jones: Let me tell you one of the things that I think is a great story on this message management group. We were sitting in this meeting one morning, I’ll never forget it. We’d been working on ‘How do we fix this?’, ‘How do we fix this?’ We were working on fixing it, working on fixing it, weren’t getting it done. And the press was all over us about his hitting his head on the helicopter every day. Every day. And his flatness on the stump played into it, he sounded like Joe Palooka. “Played too much football without a helmet”, “Can’t chew gum and walk”, you know. All that stuff.

Dave Gergen was down at the end of the conference table apparently reading Time and he said, I think this was the spring of 1976 about now, “We should let the president brief the budget.” We talked about it. “Hell, yes.” He knows it better than anybody in the executive branch including O’Neill and Lynn. And so we put him out there over at the state department auditorium, a two hour briefing on the United States budget. And he turned to Jim Lynn to help him answer one question out of dozens. I don’t know how many. A hundred. He absolutely blew the socks off the national press and what they came back saying was, a guy that knows the budget that well, in that detail, with that sense of how it went together is no klutz and we can’t continue this. It finished that story. And he did. I don’t know if you have a video of that, but he was a tour de force on the budget. I don’t think that a president’s ever briefed the budget before or since. And it was brilliantly done and he knew it. He absolutely knew it. And the press guys had to back off. We beat them.

Smith: I know exactly what you’re saying, but it didn’t translate into the increasingly theatrical nature of presidential campaigning.

Jones: No, he didn’t have it. He didn’t have that instinct. He simply didn’t have it. And so, what happened is we were sending him out on the campaign trail, Bob Teeter was our pollster for the campaign, and we would do campaign events. And we could see his numbers drop, his approval ratings. So Teeter would come over to me and say, “This is really puzzling. We think we’re making progress, we’re sending him out there and his numbers drop. We’d do better to keep him in.” And so I talked about this with that group, we said, “Well, let’s see what happens.” And so we started the Rose Garden strategy: we’d do an event a day, our event, our picture, our message, in the Rose Garden, in the Oval Office, in the Roosevelt Room, in the Cabinet room, even in town somewhere, but usually in the White House. And when I briefed the president in Vail after the convention, after that terrible convention that we barely won, about the campaign strategy, we were 33 points behind. We lost by half a point [sic].

The night he made that error in the debate in San Francisco, Gallup had a poll that they were going to release the next day that showed us even. Even. He pulled the poll, he didn’t release it. When he re-polled, we were minus seven. We slipped seven on the base strength of that debacle, that question, and we came back to within a half a point. Ten thousand votes, which in Ohio and Hawaii and we would’ve won the Electoral College.

Smith: Did you know that night that you had a problem?

Jones: Absolutely. The minute he said it, I got Cheney on the phone. Cheney was in the holding room out there, and I said, “Dick you’ve got to change this, you’ve got to fix it.” He said, “I know, Jerry, I know, I know. You’re not telling me anything. We’ll fix it right after this is over.” Well, the president refused to fix it. He let it linger for four or five days and it just killed us.

Smith: It was that stubbornness again?

Jones: It was the stubbornness. In spite of the pardon, in spite of the recession, in spite of not being a great campaigner, all of that, we still would’ve won it if he’d have fixed that. You can make a mistake in a debate. But, if he had been willing to fix it that night, “Hey guys, I didn’t mean that they weren’t dominated. They obviously are, the Red Army’s there. I meant, in spirit, they’re not dominated.”

Smith: If you actually go back and read what he said, he’s on the cusp of it. He talked about the countries…If he’d simply said, “I know, folks. I’ve been to Poland, I saw the look in their faces.” He could’ve hit it out of the park.

Jones: But he missed it and then he wouldn’t change it because he thought he was right. And he meant spiritually dominated. And he was right.

Smith: Again, Stu Spencer, he said a part of the problem was that he heard that Kissinger had said, “You were brilliant, Mr. President. You were wonderful, Mr. President.” I mean, just sort of playing the courtier.

Jones: Here was the deal. The issue in the campaign in the end came down to this: did we know Jimmy Carter enough to trust him as president and is Jerry Ford smart enough to be president? And that mis-answer flew into the face on that one. And if he’d corrected it, if he hadn’t made it, we would’ve won in spite of the pardon, in spite of the recession, in spite of his not being a very good campaigner, and in spite of the close convention. I mean, that was a close call.

Smith: Going in to that convention, were you confident that you had it?

Jones: No. I thought we had it, but I wasn’t confident we had it. We should’ve had it. We thought we had it. The numbers said we had it, but it was close and, you know, close can go away.
Smith: The other side of the Rose Garden strategy, was exploiting to the fullest whatever the incumbency could give you. It was the Bicentennial year and the queen was coming and I’m told there was an astonishing number of Republican convention delegates and their spouses who attended that dinner.

Jones: Damn right. We used everything we could. Yeah, we did. What shame is it?

Smith: What kinds of things did you have that you could use?

Jones: Oh, tickets at the Kennedy Center, rides on Air Force One, I mean, a lot of things, visits to the Oval Office. I used to tour people through there. I was one of the tour guides. My office was just down the hall, right on the other side of the Roosevelt Room, on the inside office is where I operated the scheduling.

Smith: We’d been told by several people - it’s sort of symbolic - this all came down, in many ways, to Clarke Reed and the Mississippi delegation. Reed was famous for being bought and then not staying bought, for being very slippery in terms of his allegiance.

Jones: I got to know Clarke pretty well. He was always pal-sy wal-sy, buddy buddy. Always thought he was on our side. How did it turn out? As I remember, he came our way.

Smith: In the end, he brought Mississippi with him.

Jones: Yeah, that’s what I thought. And I always thought Clarke was going to do that. Now, my guess is he was trying to keep the wrath of God from falling on him from the conservative side, but I always thought Clarke was with us.

Jones: Well, that and what wound up happening was that we wrote the campaign strategy in the White House. We had the president and we ran the schedule. Now, [Bo] Callaway made a run at me to run all the scheduling and he lost. So we controlled the key asset in this campaign.

Smith: And that would’ve been a decision made at the presidential level, who controlled the scheduling?
Jones: Yeah, and Cheney, of course, had an interest there, too, because all of this stuff goes through the chief of staff. Now, he trusted us and let us do what we recommended, by and large, but it was controlled by the White House and we wrote the campaign strategy. What the campaign did is two things, well, more than two things. It did the polling. It also said the issues we should concentrate on coming out of the polling and coming out of our state operations and it did the registration and got out the vote and all the delegate stuff and so on. And they did the advertising, but that was…

Smith: …which is very highly regarded.

Jones: …was highly regarded. They were simply hired. They paid the bills on the advertising and we all cooperated on that one. Bailey and Deardorff did a great job on that. And they shop all those over in the White House and we comment on the stuff and so on, so it was sort of a joint thing, but it was the fact that the campaign hired those two guys – it was their creativity, it wasn’t the campaign. And so what Spencer wound up doing was doing the delegate stuff. He and Jim Baker doing the delegate stuff and doing the campaign nuts and bolts.

Smith: He said something fascinating, he says the Reagan people really miscalculated when it came – one thing Spencer feared was that they would find a hot button issue with the platform. Not a process issue, but something that everyone could get around, you know, Panama Canal or something. And that’s why basically Spencer said to the president [re-détente], “Let it happen. Just give in. Kissinger won’t be happy about it, but that’s how we win or that’s how we keep from losing.” Is that your recollection?

Jones: I don’t particularly remember that battle, but it was clear that we couldn’t resist some of those things. I mean, Reagan cleaned our clock from North Carolina on.

Smith: He had the hearts of a lot of delegates, didn’t he?

Jones: Yeah, I think he did. I think he did. Here was my case, always my case to all of these people, “Look, you cannot change a sitting president and win. You simply can’t. Reagan has to wait. But you cannot change a sitting president and have a prayer of winning.” And I think that won the day. I think Clarke Reed realized that you couldn’t. And I think that’s true. I don’t think Reagan could’ve won.

Smith: Did you have a sense of the Ford-Reagan relationship?

Jones: No. I will tell you, we were really pissed at Reagan and I think the president was, too. What in the hell is he doing running in a primary against a sitting president with the trouble we’re in here. What is he doing? This is selfish. This is egotistical. This is narcissistic. What is he doing? That’s what we all thought. I mean, it was clear to us that you can’t change a sitting president in the primary operation and then win. Maybe we were wrong. That’s what we thought pretty strongly.

Smith: And the whole thing in Kansas City about offering Reagan the vice presidency or not offering Reagan the vice presidency which is still argued to this day over what –

Jones: Well, Cheney and the guys can talk to you about that. My understanding of it from afar, I was not in the meeting, my understanding was that Reagan refused to consider it and that Ford acceded to that. And that was that.

Smith: The selection of Dole – was Anne Armstrong, for example, at any point seriously considered with idea that “We’re so far behind, we’ve got to – “

Jones: No, it turned on this. What our problem was was that President Ford, as I recall, had vetoed an ag bill and you’ve got to win in the ag states to win. And so, Ford had real weakness in the agricultural settings in mid-America and we were looking for candidates that would help us here because, if we didn’t have our base, we couldn’t possibly win. And so the two guys that looked like they could best help us there were Dole and Howard Baker. And when you looked at them, Dole helped more than Baker. That’s why he was picked. Anne, as far as I know, it was nice to talk about it, but she was never in the mix, because she wasn’t the Midwest, she wasn’t the corn states, the wheat states and so on. She wouldn’t help us there.
Smith: Were you delighted when Reagan announced Schweiker? Was that seen as something that backfired immediately or was it, in fact, a potential act of genius? Apparently, they thought they could flip Drew Lewis.

Jones: I think we saw it more as desperation, that he had to throw the long ball. And it didn’t work out.

Smith: Did you think at the end that you’d caught up?

Jones: I thought the morning of the election we had a 50/50 chance of winning it. The exit polls began to show that we were slipping and not winning Ohio. And, actually, we came closer in Ohio than we thought in the exit polls.

Smith: That night, where were you?

Jones: I was in the White House.

Smith: What was the mood?

Jones: Disappointment. Not shock because it was close and we were catching, catching, catching. But huge disappointment. The president was just terribly disappointed. I think he really thought he’d pulled it out and he was crushed. Took him awhile to get over it and he was a little bit angry at us.

Smith: How so?

Jones: Well, I had him out in Lubbock the next year and he was a little cross with me. He came to George Mahon’s retirement from the Congress out there. He was nice, but he was still a little edgy towards me. And we’d been great buddies, so he got over it, but he was really ticked that we didn’t win that thing. And he really trusted us that we were going to pull it out.

Smith: Did you have that much contact with Mrs. Ford?

Jones: Almost none. Frankly, she was ill in several ways.

Smith: Was that known in the White House?
Jones: It was not known. Rumsfeld knew it. I knew there was something terribly wrong. I happened to overhear a couple of conversations and they were not good. I didn’t know what it was.

Smith: In the later years, did you have much contact with him?

Jones: Some earlier, but no, not really. He was always very nice to me when I saw him, very cordial. He remembered me well, I think. Certainly I did, he was a great guy to work for. I think he had a hugely successful presidency. I judge it more on ‘Can he really do the job?’ Yeah, you’re right about the showmanship stuff, but he really ran the presidency beautifully. That was a tour de force. He did a great job. By the way, I was strongly in support, as you know, of the Nixon pardon. I think that was essential and he did it and he still almost won the damn thing.

Smith: You were telling me about Rumsfeld telling him about the ship.
