Jones: Well, what Don said was that the president was just so incredibly glad to see him that he just sort of came up out of himself and they had a really great visit.

Smith: That was about a month before he died.

Jones: Yeah, it was. He was very ill, but “Is that Rummy?” he said.

Smith: I can hear it.

This was great. I cannot thank you enough.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. You have a unique role as Gerald Ford’s biographer, but also as someone who worked very closely with him in the White House. And someone who covered his contemporaries in American politics during the period of his rise to national prominence.

What surprised you the most in the course of all your research?

Cannon: I think what surprised me, and in the course of my research, the degree to which Ford reflected on what he was doing, and what he was thinking at the time. I’ll give you one example. He was in his nineties the last time I went out to see him. I guess that was when we had our trustees meeting in California. I had asked to see him for a few hours with photographs I had of the highlights of his administration. I thought, I’ll ask him to help me do the captions for these photographs.

I showed him the first one and it was a photograph taken not by Kennerly, but by the White House photographer, whoever it was. It shows Ford sitting in the ante room of the president’s office. The photograph is shot down the hall looking at him in profile, and Ford is sitting there by himself. Nobody else in the office – just sitting there quietly, waiting to see President Nixon to find out what Nixon was going to do – resign or fight on. I showed him this photograph and he had instant recall of everything he was thinking at that point about the Watergate, about how Nixon had lied to him, about how much sympathy he had for Nixon and his family – all this going through his mind and what a foolhardy thing this was to have done.

He’s thinking all of this through, and what really surprised me was his total recall just from looking at that photograph of what he had been thinking at that momentous point, just before he went in. And his thoughts are interrupted by, I’ve forgotten his name now, saying, “Mr. Vice President, the President will see you now.” So he goes in and gets the word, finally. And then I went through the other photographs with him, and what surprised me was how much he recalled from those photographs.

As you know, Richard, he made available to me the total of his conversations with Trevor Armbrister for his own “autobiography,” the extent of his thoughts - which he used very little of in his own book - but the extent of his thoughts about what was going on at the time. I finished not long ago, the section on his meeting with Brezhnev at Vladivostok. And what was fascinating was his detailed description of what he was like. He goes down the stairs and he sees that Brezhnev is kidding around with reporters and so on, and he looks at him and looks at his size first, realizes he is big, he’s bulky, he’s got big shoulders, he said he would have made a perfect offensive tackle. And he knows he’s going to like him.

So they start out talking sports. Ford’s briefed, of course, and says, “I understand you played soccer,” and Brezhnev says, “You played football,” and so they talked back and forth for a few minutes. But what was really interesting, and this is just one case, of Ford’s observations and recall about the people he met. This is one thing I am going to try to use in the book.

Smith: There is this notion on the coasts that Midwesterners talk slow, so therefore they must think slow – and I’m wondering, because he wasn’t a great communicator, in the formal sense of the office, do you think he got a bum rap on his intelligence, generally?

Cannon: Yeah, I think he got a bum rap. He was a far smarter man than people understood. He was far more interested in policy and the way things worked than, I think, any president we’ve ever had. He’s famous for having briefed on the budget in ’76, but that was not accidental. He had been in Congress twenty-five years, much of that on the Appropriations Committee, and he knew how every one of those programs had been formulated, who had supported it, why it was there, and whether it was Lyndon Johnson or somebody else who had initiated it. So he knew the detail. As for his intellect, I don’t think many young people in their early twenties could have coached full time at Yale and at the same time carried a full load in the Yale law school, which was one tough school, I’m told. And he graduated in the top third of his class. He fooled people, really. He was much smarter.

Smith: It is interesting that you say that, because…

Cannon: I think that sometimes it was deliberate.

Smith: Okay, you took the words right out of my mouth. It has been suggested to us by one or two people that he used that reputation, that sometimes he would play the innocent, when, in fact, there were things going on that you didn’t know were going on.

Cannon: This was early in life that he had this impression of kind of a slow, a dull person. He was then, I guess, in his early twenties when he met Phyllis Brown. This stunning, attractive, intelligent woman that was the first major girlfriend of his life. She was very smart, a very good observer, and she told me she thought it was, in many cases, deliberate on his part when he sat and listened. But she said he knew everything that was going on. He remembered everything that was said, and when you talked to him about it later he could summarize it better than anybody else in the room.

So, I think he was grossly underrated for the quality of his mind. I became impressed, too, when he came to one meeting of Rockefeller’s Commission on Critical Choices. And because I’ve worked with the House, the governor designated me to be his aide for that meeting, and I was fascinated. He had come briefed, he knew what was going on, he asked good questions, and he told me later how much he had learned from it in the two hour session with all these experts talking about foreign policy, economic policy, and so on. He absorbed things much better, I think, than anybody.

Smith: One way of saying it is, he absorbed things better than he articulated them.

Cannon: Yeah.

Smith: Post-JFK, the country became so accustomed to and demanding of, perhaps, a kind of style and verbal facility. Television, obviously, drew upon that.
Cannon: Ford was dull by comparison. He appeared before the cameras with Everett Dirksen. Well, Everett Dirksen was a major performer up there, and all Jerry Ford could do was kind of stand by and admire his performance.

Smith: He played straight man.

Cannon: Well, he wasn’t even a good straight man. He was just there, and he looked dull. Of course, Johnson’s criticism – in Washington you can survive almost anything except humor - and Johnson’s criticism, which cleaned up was: he couldn’t walk and chew gum at the same time, was a devastating thing. Johnson said, “Well he played too much without his helmet,” and so on. He thought he was a stumble bum. Well, here was the best athlete we ever had being [criticized] by Johnson who couldn’t get out of a chair, athletically.

But anyway, I thought Ford was vastly underrated as a man and as a leader. But the people who knew him were the members of the House and Senate. And that, of course, is why he got to be president in the first place. They knew how good he was. They knew how honest he was, how trustworthy he was, how much of a leader he was. And how he was the perfect fit for the job at that time. Because Mansfield and Albert both knew, they told me later, Nixon was gone. And when we had to choose the next president…they said to Nixon, “This is the man you can get confirmed.” And once they told Nixon that, Nixon had no choice.

Smith: How much did the criticism hurt? Particularly the implications that either he intellectually wasn’t up to the job, or that he was, to use your words, a stumblebum.

Cannon: I think it hurt him with the press, and the press is the entity that portrays the image of the person. I think it hurt him badly with the press. Saturday Night Live, for example, the appearance of his stumbling. When he fell down the stairs in Austria, Phil Jones CBS said, “Well, we figured if he can’t walk down the stairs, he can’t run the country.” It hurt, no question about it.

Smith: How much personally, do you think it hurt Ford?

Cannon: I don’t think it bothered him very much.
Smith: Really?

Cannon: I think he was so assured, I think he was so aware of who he was, so comfortable with who he was, that it didn’t bother him. Hartmann told me that sometimes he would say, “Well, look, you’ve got to strike back at Johnson.” And Ford said, “No, it’s not worth the effort. It doesn’t bother me that much.” And I don’t really think it did. This was a man who knew that if you’re in politics, you’re going to get criticized, and it didn’t bother him very much. He was secure in his seat, secure as a person, secure as a human being. I never met anybody more comfortable with who he was.

Smith: That’s interesting. Let me ask you, I was going through some boxes of material for my book, and I came upon Rockefeller’s interview with Hugh Morrow about the Ford presidency, and I understand more and more why Oscar Reubhausen thought that those interviews should never see the light of day because it was not Rockefeller at his best, at the very end.

Cannon: Right.

Smith: He thought that Don Rumsfeld was blackmailing the president. Which tells you more about his frame of mind at that point. I suppose no one ever wants to blame the president.

Cannon: The fact is, and this, I guess it is heresy and disloyal to Rockefeller to say this, but Rumsfeld was right. Rumsfeld was right. Ford, when he first called Rockefeller, and this is a couple of weeks, two or three weeks after he’s in office, and asked him to be vice president, and Ford, having disliked the job intensely – and we’ll talk about it a little later – but having disliked it, knew Rockefeller, knew he was a man of action and experience and so forth, wanted to tell him that he wouldn’t just have to go to funerals and so forth.

So he told him, on the phone, in that first conversation, I’ll put you in charge of domestic policy. And then it took Rockefeller four months, a little over four months, to get confirmed. Once he was confirmed, Rockefeller and Ann Whitman and Bob Douglas and I came down on a rainy Saturday morning just before Christmas in December, ’74 and then Ford told Rockefeller what assignments he would give him, and he ticked them off, whatever they were.
One of them was, he would put him in charge of domestic policy, and Rumsfeld was at that meeting, and Jack Marsh and a couple of others, probably Hartmann.

We didn’t know exactly what the domestic council did, but we knew it was involved, obviously, in domestic policy. So, going back to New York we talked about that and Douglas and I agreed that if pushed to govern this, if you’re in charge of domestic policy, you must have your man in charge of the domestic council. So that in turn came around to whether it was going to be me. Well, Rumsfeld resisted this adamantly. He wanted to have his own guy and he didn’t want this dude, so the internal battle went on for better than, I guess, a month. Maybe a little longer. And finally Ford sided with Rockefeller and said, “We’ll have your man in charge of the domestic council.”

Well, Rockefeller’s first instruction to me was to get rid of everybody there. Well, I went in and I thought, well, I had no idea what this domestic council did, and I kept one guy which Rockefeller was opposed to. He said, “You should have got rid of everybody.” But he also said, “The first thing you have to do is get the best staff in the White House and I’m going to help you do that,” and he gave me a great gift of Dick Dunham to be my deputy, who had been director of budget in New York and was a very smart and able executive. And Art Quern who had been a program associate – what we called them in New York – a superior man. And Dick Parsons was to be my lawyer.

So with those three I had the nucleus of a really wonderful staff. We had a good start. Dunham, I gave him the responsibility to build the staff and he did. We had a really superior staff. Not generally really well known, but the budget for the domestic council is about fifty people. About half of them are senior associates, MBAs, lawyers, economists, and so on, and the rest secretarial. So we had good staff and we had our own budget. I asked the president if he wanted me to clear the appointments with him or the personnel office, and he said, “No, those are yours. You and Nelson do it your way. Whatever you want to do is fine with me.” So we had the freedom to do that.

We were also – this group was under the Hatch Act, except for Dunham and me – they couldn’t do any political work. This had been put through by somebody on the Hill, thinking that Nixon would use all these people for his campaign. So we had this great staff and we had a good start, but we realized Rockefeller had thought he would be in charge of initiating a lot of new domestic policies. Well, I guess three or four weeks into the job, I got a call one Sunday night from Jim Lynn saying there had been a meeting at the White House…

Smith: Now, he’s head of OMB?

Cannon: Yes. Jim Lynn was the head of OMB, the senior staff had been there except for me. They had decided, and Ford had approved it, there would be no new initiatives that year. So that meant we didn’t have anything to initiate. We could not initiate anything. Well, I was so concerned about this because I knew Rockefeller would want to have initiatives and we were planning to have initiatives, that I called up the military officer and said, “What time is his plane going up to get him on Monday morning?” I don’t know – it was two or three o’clock in the morning. So I got on that plane and went up and met him at Westchester, and he looked at me and said, “It must be something going on or you wouldn’t be here.” I told him what had happened, and [he] just kind of shook his head and he said, “Well, it doesn’t give us any room to do anything.” I said, “Well, do you think it would be wise, at this point, for us to just get out of the job?” He said, “No, I think you ought to stay there and keep me abreast of what’s going on.” So, we decided to do that.

But the fact is, that we did initiate a few things. Parsons in particular initiated the first government-wide examination of what everyone was doing in battling illegal drugs. Nobody had ever pulled it together before, but I think it was some twenty agencies that were involved in this. And Parsons, on his own, with our approval – and Rockefeller and the president’s approval – set out to do this. It took two or three months and we had a really good summary. Parsons presented the findings to the Cabinet and so forth and we sent something to the Hill, but nothing ever happened on it. So fairly early on Rockefeller became very unhappy with the limited scope of what we were doing. And I think he just kind of opted out of it. I would try to keep him informed and he would just nod his head and not be very interested in it.
Smith: Someone told us, I wish I could tell you right now, I don’t think it was Rumsfeld, but someone told us the reason that they took that initiative and informed you that that decision had been made grew directly out of the first meetings that the president had had with the vice president, their weekly lunches where Nelson had the habit of coming in bubbling over with ideas and costly new programs. And it was a tactic, in effect, to kind of put the vice president in a box.

Cannon: I didn’t know that. But that’s perfectly reasonable. And that would be why I was not invited to attend the meeting on Sunday night, because they were going to do it and then tell me, as I said. Jim Lynn was designated to tell me this has been done. At any rate, about the time I got in there was when Ford was really beginning to learn how to run the White House. Rumsfeld had been there in September or October. He had come in and taken charge, and he was really managing the White House. And Rumsfeld, in my opinion, did a remarkable job of coaching Ford in how to run a White House.

Ford had always been responsive to good coaching, from the time he was a Boy Scout and a high school football player and so on. And Rumsfeld really in effect, became his coach. Rumsfeld then and now is a hell of a good organizer. Whatever else you may say of him, he knows organization.

Smith: Why is he such a polarizing figure, seen as Machiavellian and always with an agenda, and maybe an agenda behind the agenda.

Cannon: I suspect he is Machiavellian. But he rarely leaves any fingerprints. Why is he? Because he’s powerful, he is good, he is effective, and he rubs a lot of people the wrong way.

Smith: Dorothy Dowton tells us he tried to get her fired.

Cannon: I didn’t know that.

Smith: He had a candidate of his own to replace her as the president’s personal secretary.

Cannon: Well, as I say, he had his own guy and he wanted to work – but I will say that once I showed Rumsfeld I could do this stuff, I could manage these issues, I could get it done, instead of kind of easing up, he poured more and more on me. And he would schedule me to do something I hate to do which is talk before the Cabinet. We’d go out on the boat and he’d have me make a presentation on something or other, and I don’t like to do that, and I’m not very good at it. But I think he realized that.

As a matter of fact, the first meeting after I became appointed to domestic council, at a senior staff meeting at eight o’clock, you go around the room and kind of show and tell. I had not gone in well prepared, very frankly. And so when it got to be my turn, I stumbled and hesitated and really did a very poor performance. And Rumsfeld - I’m sitting two or three down the table from him - turned on me and really excoriated me and said, “I thought Nelson Rockefeller was supposed to bring good staff people in here and you’re not briefed,” and you’re not that and so forth, and really laid me out in front of the whole full senior staff. The meeting broke up and I sat there in kind of a daze. Jim Lynn walked around the table and came over and whispered in my ear, “Welcome to the NFL.”

Smith: It must have put you in a very awkward position, though.

Cannon: It did.

Smith: Because of divided loyalties, in some ways.

Cannon: And I suspected it was deliberate – the first issue that I had to deal with was whether there should be a science adviser to the president. And it turns out that President Ford had asked Rockefeller to make a recommendation on this. So Rockefeller, being Rockefeller, assembled Edward Teller and ten other Nobel Prize winners, or whatever, and they had a session or two, and then Rockefeller made a recommendation, which he gave to the president. The president gives it to Rumsfeld and Rumsfeld gives it to me. And I take a look at this and I see what it is, and I say, “Okay, the first thing I’ve got to do, is go over and tell the vice president that I’ve been given this to staff out, to get everybody’s opinion on it.”

So I took it over to him, and said, “Governor, this is what’s happened here, and before I take any step further you should know that I’ve been assigned to do this.” And he took a look at it and shook his head and said, “Well, if he didn’t want me to make a recommendation, if he didn’t want to listen to what I wanted to recommend, why did he ask me to do it?” And I said, “Governor, all I can do is staff this out.” He said, “Well, go ahead,” and so on.

Smith:  The rejoinder to that is: he wanted him to make a recommendation, he valued his recommendation, but he wasn’t the only voice that he was going to listen to.

Cannon:  But he didn’t know this. He didn’t understand this. I’ve talked at length with Parsons and Mary Kresky and others about this. He had been the one who, for fifteen years as governor, was the one who made the judgments. He didn’t make the recommendation, he made the final judgment. He listened to the recommendations and made the decision. And he just couldn’t get accustomed to the fact that he was no longer the guy who made the decisions.

Smith:  That makes sense; that makes perfect sense.

Cannon:  I think it’s as simple as that.

Smith:  Over the years people sort of obsessed about whether he was pushed; the manner in which he was disinvited from the ticket. And it overlooks something really interesting. It may have been a rationalization on Ford’s part, or it may just have been this quality of thinking and observing at a deeper level than most people gave him credit for. But I remember finding in all my research, some interview in which Ford said something really very intuitive.
He stepped back and looked at the bigger picture. He said, “You know, I don’t think Nelson would have been happy being vice president for another four years.” And then he sort of explained why he thought he was unhappy in the role. It isn’t simply a question of asking him to run again - again, there may have been elements of rationalization involved.

Cannon:  I think the politics was the operative element there. And let me just add one thing about this first assignment, the science adviser to the president. I thought, well, this is my first thing to do for the president, and I said go down there and ask him how he likes papers done. What he would like to know and so forth. Well, this was a very instructive thing to me. I went down to see him and I said, “Mr. President, how would you like your papers written?” He said, “Well, I don’t want any fancy writing. Just good, clear English, simple and keep it fairly brief.”

He said, “But I want to know what everyone thinks about him. I want everybody’s opinion to be included with this brief summary paper that you provide, which will be what the issue is, what the background is, who’s for what and so on. That’s for a summary paper. But give me everybody’s opinion, I want to know everybody’s opinion.” He said, “Now, on this issue,” he said, “I want you to do two things. I want you to get in touch with every science adviser to every president and ask him what he thought he accomplished for the president and the country. And secondly, I want you to find some outside observer who is qualified to tell me what he thought each one advised.” He said, “I really would like to know that – what each one accomplished for the president and the country.”

So I did that and it was a very, very interesting experience because here at the White House you can get anyone on the phone. Jerome Wiesner, Kennedy’s science adviser said, “Well, I don’t think I really did much science advising, because every time I showed the president, he’d say, ‘Now, tell me again, how does a radio work? How does it get from over there to over here so I hear it? How does it work?’” I talked to Nixon’s, he said, “Well, after I took a stand against Vietnam I never saw him again.”

So I talked to all of these guys, Vannar, Bush, and everybody else gave me a good rundown on what he had done. We gave that to the president and he had a meeting so that everybody could voice their opinion, and then he went back in the office and he called me in and said, “Now, Jim, I’m going to sign this. I want to do this, but I think we should have Congress authorize the science adviser to the president because they will pay more attention to this if they have passed the bill, so let’s do that.”

That was very interesting to me - the way his mind worked, what he wanted to know, and what his decision was. He told me once that he liked to write it down – what his decision was – because he’d found long ago that when you have a meeting with people, everybody hears what they want to hear, if you don’t tell them otherwise. So he said, “I write it down, I write these decisions down, and you’re to tell them you’re to read exactly what their decision is and then tell them to carry it out.”

Smith: How difficult was it to integrate the Nixon people with the Ford people. How much of an issue was that early on? Was it a continuing…?

Cannon: It didn’t bother us. We got rid of them fairly quickly and I just told them. “Look,” Dunham and I said, “we’re making some changes,” and so forth. But we kept two or three on. Todd Hullin, but I think two or three we realized that they had done such a good job, even after we told them your time is up, but stay here while we find a replacement, they’d done such a good job that we said, “Dick, why don’t we just keep them on?” He said, “Well, if you don’t have any problem in turning around, why not?” So we did it. But we really had an outstanding staff, and so those two or three people that had been Nixon people presented no problem whatsoever because they were our people very quickly.

Smith: How about the broader White House culture? Did you sense divisions or frictions between the old crowd, if you will, and…

Cannon: By the time I got there they were pretty much gone.

Smith: Really?

Cannon: Because I didn’t become a domestic council guy until I think it was February of ’75. So by that time Rumsfeld had eased and pushed them out. There were very few people still there. We had maybe two or three. One was a troublesome guy, he’d been a Nixon advance man, and I let him go. But he managed to get a job somewhere else in the White House. But I didn’t have anything else to do with him. Friction in the domestic council staff? I didn’t have any. Most of these guys were professional. When Haig left he asked Rockefeller to take care of a senior secretary he had, Pat McKee. Rockefeller said, “See if you like her,” and so on.

So I did and she was older than the younger people I’d had around. Pat McKee. She had an astonishing record. I don’t know if this is relevant, but I’ll just tell you this, anyway. Here’s this senior secretary, a private secretary who’s trustworthy. She had worked in the Veterans Administration, I think, and Johnson told Marvin Watson, “I want ten secretaries in here who are good looking, who can take dictation, who can type and don’t mind working late. They won’t be afraid to go home if they have to work late.” So she was one on trial. He liked her and she stayed there.

Now she was so trusted that she was entrusted to type Johnson’s speech when he said, “I’m not going to run again.” She stayed on with Nixon, she typed Agnew’s statement of resignation, she typed Nixon’s statement of resignation, and when Ford issued the pardon, she was so trustworthy that she typed the pardon statement and the pardon itself. She had been there through that many administrations. How many secretaries would have that opportunity today?

Smith: That’s amazing. In retrospect, should Ford have thought of someone else for vice president?

Cannon: Yes. Rockefeller should have taken Ronan’s advice and not done it, and turned it down. He could have done it, but the circumstances – the anguish over Watergate and so forth was such and the uncertainty with this new guy coming in was such that he could not honestly, given his sense of duty to the country, Rockefeller could not turn it down. He called me - I was up at our little farm in New York - and said, “Look, Jim, I’m going to do this. I’m doing it for Gerald Ford and the country.” It was different, and in his testimony for confirmation, they asked him, the Senate committee asked him, “Why did you change your mind?” He said, “Well, I’m older. Yes, I turned it down in ’60 and ’68, but I feel that now the circumstance is such that if I can help this president in this situation, I have no choice but to do it.”

Ford would have been better off to pick somebody else, as it turned out. But it was useful for that first few months and setting the standards and establishing the standards by which he would chose his administration because there was no question but that was a popular thing for him to have done in terms of the country. It was widely, widely applauded, and I think it was the right thing for Ford at that moment, but not the right thing six months later.
Smith: Right. Replacing the Nixon Cabinet and bringing in his own people is interesting. Rumsfeld told us that his advice to the president was that you should make changes early.

Cannon: That’s right. No question, immediate.

Smith: He put it in the context of, again, unlike what Rockefeller believed, Rumsfeld claims that he was reluctant to go to the Pentagon. That in terms of policy, he was probably more sympathetic to Schlesinger’s viewpoint, more – for lack of a better word – hawkish viewpoint, so that Ford wouldn’t be getting a new viewpoint, persae. And he put it in the context of urging Ford to make wholesale changes early. He thought when he did it, it was a mistake.

Cannon: That’s right. I think he’s right. Rumsfeld accepted the fact – by the time he got there, the afternoon after Ford had been confirmed, got there from Europe, Ford had already told Haig to stay and told the Cabinet to stay. And so Rumsfeld didn’t like that but he said, “Well, I have no choice but to accept it. The president has made this decision, he’s the president.” But when he came back in September, I think it was late September or October, to be chief of staff when he was formally made chief of staff, he persuaded Ford this must be done now. And Ford said that Rumsfeld had given him a timetable. These are going this date, this date, this date – right to the end of the year. And they carried it out.

Smith: Haig, in our discussion, was vehement in his insistence that he went to the president and told him he had to get rid of Hartmann and went on all of these alleged personal failings that Haig claimed the Secret Service had told him about. And he said, “Mr. President, I’ve seen another president fail because he wouldn’t get rid of people who were not serving him well.” And Ford’s response was, “Al, you have to let me handle this myself.” To which Haig said he then responded, “Well, then I have your answer to my question; you don’t want me to stay on.”

Cannon: I think that is more explicit than it happened, according to Ford, anyway. I talked to him about it a lot. It was a Saturday morning, day after he had taken the oath of office. Haig is waiting for him at eight o’clock in the morning with a big piece of paper which we can’t find, unfortunately. It was ten to twelve pages that Jerry Jones had written on how the White House is run. And Haig had told Jones to write this paper because we’ll have to educate Ford on how to run this place. The degree of arrogance in Haig is, I guess, not astonishing, but it’s there. But at any rate, he gave Ford this paper and said, “This is how you run the White House, and if you want me to stay on I have to have all rights of hiring and firing everybody, and the first one to go will be Hartmann.”

And Ford, taken aback, still thinks he needs Haig for the time being – he was really taken aback, he was astonished, he told me, that Haig would show this effrontery. So he just simply said, “Well, I’ll be the one to handle Bob Hartmann myself.” By Ford’s account, Haig said, “Well, think it over and I’ll take a few days off.” And he came back in a few days. But Ford said, “At that moment,” told me, “at that moment, I knew he had to go as soon as I could get things organized around here.”

Smith: Why was Hartmann such a polarizing figure?

Cannon: Hartmann in the House had been chief of staff, which really doesn’t amount to much in the Minority Leader’s office. I know because I was chief of staff in the Minority Leader’s office in the Senate. Doesn’t amount to much, really. There is no real responsibility – you’ve got a few people to work with and so on and you try to hire good people. So Hartmann had been nominally chief of staff and senior adviser to Ford in the House and so forth.

So when Ford became vice president, Hartmann assumed he would continue in that role, and in fact, he thought he did. But very soon Ford realized Hartmann couldn’t organize a two car funeral, so he brought Bill Seidman in to organize the vice president’s office, which Bill effectively did. Hartmann wrote the speeches that Ford delivered around the country. Hartmann was a good speechwriter, not a great speechwriter, but a good speechwriter on several occasions. He knew what words Ford could pronounce, and would have difficulty with and he was very conscious of that. He wrote well in that way. When he got to the White House, Hartmann assumed he would be chief of staff over there, too. He clearly thought he was chief of staff; he never told himself otherwise. It just wasn’t going to work over there and it was chaos as Rumsfeld and Cheney found when they came in to take over.

Hartmann is an interesting guy, but he’s a reporter, he’s a newspaper man. He’s not an executive, he’s a newspaper man. And he also has a kind of a bristly pride in himself and thought these guys are out to get me and so forth. Well, they were out to get him out of the way, get him over to what he did best, which is write speeches.

Smith: Was it safe to say he was both protective and possessive?

Cannon: No, I don’t think he was possessive of Ford. I think he was just vanity himself. He couldn’t stand not being promoted when the boss was promoted was what it amounted to. I think that was it, it was vanity more than anything else.

Smith: One last Rockefeller thing – he told Ford that Hartmann was the best political mind he had at the White House.

Cannon: Well, I agree he probably was.

Smith: Really?

Cannon: He was very astute in terms of the press and Ford was – how best to say it? – less astute in terms of the press than any other president we’ve ever had. He simply did not understand how the press worked.

Smith: That’s funny, because on a personal level…

Cannon: On a personal note - he had this great little cadre of people who rode with him on the vice presidential plane. He was loyal to them, they were loyal to him. Personally they liked him, they kidded him, but they didn’t write very good stories about him on the road. He could not translate that personal friendship into good publications, into good writing about what he was doing.

Smith: What didn’t he understand about the press?

Cannon: He didn’t understand how it worked. Well, a good example is the fact that when he’s having his first press conference and Hartmann and the others, Hartmann in particular, is trying to say, well, now they’re going to ask about Nixon, the papers, etc., and so forth. And he listened for a few minutes and said, “Well, I’m not going to say anything about that.” And he kept persisting: well, how are you going to answer this and so forth? And he [Ford] said, “Look, the press is not going to ask me about Nixon. They’re going to want to know what my plans are to change the Cabinet; what my policies are going to be; what my foreign policy will be; what I’m going to do about Russia. Those are the questions they are going to ask. They aren’t going to ask me about Nixon. So I don’t want to hear any more questions about that.”

Now that is a good example of how he just was – there was just a density to his understanding about the press. He had never had a good press in the House. I talked to several reporters who covered the House when he was Minority Leader, and they said, “Well, if you wanted any news you went to Mel Laird. All you got from Ford was a kind of platitudes and no news.” He didn’t know how to make news.

Smith: You know probably more than anyone else - my sense is that Ford, I don’t know how to put it – that that news conference on the 28th of August is a turning point on the road to the pardon.

Cannon: Oh, there is no question about that. It is the turning point of that. No question about it.

Smith: He came away shocked.

Cannon: He was shocked. I talked to him at great length. I’ve talked to him more about the pardon than I think probably anybody else. He said, “I came back to the office and I said, ‘Goddamn it, I’m not going put up with this! They’re going to ask me about this and this and this.’” And then he read the transcript. Buchen brought in the transcript – you know they do it very quickly – and he read it and he got even madder. He realized how really bad he had been.

Smith: Mad at himself?

Cannon: Yeah, angry, furious with himself that he had screwed it up so royally, which he had done.
Smith: But is that the frame of mind in which you want to be making the most important decision of your presidency?

Cannon: This is a man who responds to something that happens, in my opinion. He was never, never, so far as I can tell or read, a person of his own initiative, except in his first campaign for the House. It was his initiative to challenge the incumbent and run for that office. But in the House you would never see, at least I could never find, a single initiative. There is no bill with his name on it, there’s no record of him giving a new idea on the floor. It’s a response. It’s in response on Douglas, Justice Douglas, for example. It is in response to what he felt was an unseemly article in a paper that somebody had showed him. He is a responder, not an initiator.

And so I think that it was a response to his own mistake that provoked this pardon. And the realization that something had to be done to get it off his plate. I have no doubt that he felt, not only that he had to get it off his plate, but the country has got to stop bothering about this. And the only way to do this is to sweep it off the table. I had the impression and Hartmann had the same impression, that this is the linebacker. This is the linebacker, just going in and charging against the interference, trying to wipe it out and getting it to the runner.

Smith: I was listening to Benton Becker yesterday, [talk about] the conversation in the Oval Office before the pardon, in which Hartmann points out, quite accurately, that this would be political disaster for the mid-term elections.

Cannon: Well, the four of them were in there when Ford told them. He said, “Now, if you have any ideas different, come in and tell me. I might change my mind.” So three of the four came in and said, “You sure you want to do this?” Buchen, Marsh, Hartmann – each one of them. And Marsh, most significantly, comes in and says, “Now, I don’t want to make you mad, Mr. President, but if you pardon him this is going to inevitably be connected to the incident of August.” Marsh was very careful to say this. And Ford interrupted him. He said, “Jack, I know exactly what you’re talking about. I’ve thought it through. They are not connected, not in any way. I’m going to go ahead with it.” And Marsh said, “I knew at that moment that there was no connection in his mind about it.”

Smith: By the way, is Al Haig blowing smoke when he presents himself as an almost passive transmitter of Fred Buzhardt’s…

Cannon: Bull*.

Smith: …initiative?

Cannon: I am convinced in my mind that Haig was the prime advocate in that meeting because, when four people were in there, Buchen comes in first. Ford summons the four of them, but Buchen comes in and Haig is already there talking to Ford and Buchen has the impression they’ve been talking about the pardon.

Smith: This was in August?

Cannon: This is a few days after the press conference.

Smith: Oh, September.

Cannon: This is the meeting at which Ford tells the four, “I am thinking about pardon.”
But Buchen goes in and Haig is already there and somehow he has the impression, he can’t be explicit about it, but he has the impression they are already talking about the pardon.

Smith: Go back a month – the famous August 1st, or whatever when Haig, in effect, informs the vice president that there was a smoking gun tape. Can you kind of walk us through that sequence of events because it is the heart of the case of was there a deal?

Cannon: Well, it is. Haig comes over, and let me see, Nixon calls Haig in early and by Haig’s account and Nixon’s account, Nixon says, “I think I’m going to have to resign,” and that is what he said. “Tell Ford, but just warn him that he must get ready. Don’t tell him anymore.” So he goes over there. This is on the record. And then Haig goes over, but Hartmann is there and Haig won’t talk much. And so Ford goes to the Hill and Haig calls him up and says, “I want to meet, I must meet you alone.” Hartmann objects, but Ford says, “Don’t worry, Bob. I’ll brief you on what happens.”

So they meet alone, maybe three o’clock or whatever it is. I’ve got it down in my notes somewhere. And Haig then is more explicit. By this time he says, “I have seen the tape that means he must resign. So he probably can’t hold onto the office.” He didn’t say must resign. But here are the options that are being discussed in the White House. And so he goes through: Nixon could pardon himself, he could do this, he could step back temporarily, under the Twenty-fifth Amendment he could do this, but the sixth option is that he could resign and Ford would pardon him. Now, this is characterized as six options, I think, after the fact, before Ford testifies, six options. And Haig gives Ford two pieces of paper. This is what was really significant to me. One is handwritten on a yellow legal pad, the explanation of a president’s power to pardon, and the other is a draft of a pardon statement. All you’ve got to do is fill in the name, hand it to a typist, and you’ve got a pardon.

So he hands these two things to Ford. Ford puts them in his pocket and Haig leaves and he tells Hartmann, “I swear you to secrecy on this,” and so forth, “but this is what he proposed.” Hartmann is outraged. He says, “For God’s sake. In effect, you let him do that?” And Ford said, “Well, I didn’t give him any answer. I just told I’d think about it.” And Hartmann said, “That’s probably the worst thing you could have done. Outrageous…you’ve got to do something about this. You talk to Marsh if you don’t believe me,” and Ford says, “Well, I’ll have to talk to him later,” because he was going out to the vice president’s residence with Betty and so forth. And he thought it would be cause for many questions if he didn’t go. So, he doesn’t talk to Marsh until the next morning. But Marsh asks to see the piece of paper. He looks at it and it’s handwritten. He recognizes the handwriting, it’s the lawyer…

Smith: Buzhardt.

Cannon: Fred Buzhardt, that’s right. Marsh had served over at the Pentagon with Fred Buzhardt and had a high regard for him as a lawyer and recognized the handwriting as Fred Buzhardt’s. So what Marsh figured out is probably exactly what happened. Nixon says, “I can’t talk to Haig about this, I have to be in denial on this,” so he tells Buzhardt to draft it, to propose this, and Buzhardt gives it to Haig. I ask Haig why do you do this, he said, “I had no choice, I was told to.” Well, the only person who could tell him to do that was Nixon or Buzhardt for Nixon.

So late that night, this is what was really dangerous, Ford talks to Betty about it and says, “I’m going to tell them to do whatever they want to do.” And he calls Haig and tells him this. And this so shocked Hartmann and Marsh, they say, “Well, what was discussed?” Well, Ford can’t remember exactly. He said, “Well, not much, he didn’t say much.” But they call at one or two o’clock in the morning, they realize it’s going to be recorded and there’s a record of it somewhere and it’s going to be subject to subpoena at some point and so on. So they are terrified.

But Marsh can’t persuade him either it’s a bad thing to have done. And Ford – this is the best clue in my mind to Ford’s thinking – it is very complex for him, he’s conflicted. He doesn’t want to be president, but he is ready to do so if necessary. He doesn’t want to see Nixon forced out of office, but he realizes that it may be inevitable. He knows that Nixon can no longer govern and it would be best if he leaves office, but he has sworn to himself that he is not going to do one single thing to put him out of office. At the same time he thinks it would be in the national interest if Nixon would go. And so he is really ready to sacrifice his own life’s career if it means getting Nixon out of office instead of going through the process of six weeks to three months, if they impeach and convict.

So he has all of this and he explained this to me in some detail when I was talking to him in California. That he had all of this going through his mind, the national interest may be to get him out of office. And his personal interest is diminished. His personal interest is not “Man, I want to be president.” His personal interest is what is the best thing for the country? So all this going through his mind and that’s why he’s not convinced that he should turn this down out of hand.

But then they get Harlow in and fortunately Hartmann made notes on what was said and it’s in his book. Harlow was very eloquent about how he can’t do this. And Ford believes Harlow and he hasn’t believed Hartmann, hasn’t believed Marsh, but he believes Harlow.

Smith: What was it about Harlow that made him so credible?

Cannon: Because he had served so many presidents, so well, and was so highly respected. He was a wise, wise man whose judgment was impeccable. And so, Ford had the greatest respect for him, as did so many other people, going back to, I guess, Eisenhower. So he thought, well, this is a man I believe and if he tells that it’s going to tank my presidency – he’s telling right. So, what can I do?

They write out what he is to say, and so he calls up Haig and says, “Whatever we discussed is personal and not to be used in any way, etc.” They wrote it out and I have it in the book. And Haig says, “I figured the staff got to him and he turned him down.” But I believe profoundly that Haig was finally the key person in getting Nixon out - he promising, “I’ll get you your papers, documents and tapes, and I’ll see that you’ll never go to jail.” And I think with that promise, Nixon agreed to resign.

Smith: Let me just nail down one thing in this timeline because the call that night before – the late night call to Haig, after he talked to Mrs. Ford - does one have a sense of what she may have said to him, or what her role was? Would she have been a reinforcing effect of the Hartmann…

Cannon: Betty? She read the papers. Betty read the two documents.

Smith: She did?

Cannon: She did. In fact, that’s in Armbrister’s report. That’s how I knew about it. And she read the papers and said, “Jerry, you can’t do this.” So they talked back and forth, and he explains what’s in the best interest of the country and so forth. They talked a couple of hours. And it’s an indirect conversation. At the end of that, she says what she always says - as she always does, “Jerry, I’ll back you up, whatever you do. I’ll support you in whatever you do.” And she did, of course. I think Betty was opposed, but listened to his reasoning. Ford would never let me talk to Betty about it.
Smith: Really?

Cannon: Really.

Smith: What does that tell you?

Cannon: If I said I wanted to talk to Betty for a few minutes, he would sit in and be very alert to whatever I was saying. He wouldn’t let me talk to her.

Smith: How do you interpret that?

Cannon: He didn’t want me to talk to her. He didn’t want me ask her a question because she was frank and forthright and might spill something. Ford didn’t want to talk to me about the pardon at first. But I said, “Mr. President, you’re never going to have a more friendly examination of what really happened. No more friendly account of what happened. And it would be best for you to just get it all out there and so forth. Well, he said, “I don’t want to talk about it.” And I said, “Well, tell me what you did with the two papers.” He realized I knew more than he thought. He said, “I destroyed them. I didn’t want them around.” And then he realized I knew more than…and I told him I talked to Haig, and Hartmann and Marsh and so forth. So then he opened up about it.

Smith: Is it logical to assume, given what we know about Mrs. Ford’s reaction on reading those papers, and the fact that it was after that conversation that he called Haig back, that it would have been to, if not put brakes absolutely on Haig’s initiative, at least to try to correct any misimpression that might have been left?

Cannon: No, I don’t think the late-night call was to correct it at all. I think it was ambivalent. I think it was continued ambivalence, in my opinion. Because he said, “Well, I can’t remember exactly what we said.”

Smith: Is it possible that he didn’t want to remember what he said?

Cannon: I think it’s probably true. He realized it had been a mistake when Hartmann and Marsh said, “My God, what did you talk about?” “Not much (mumbling).” I think he was very conscious of the fact that he shouldn’t have made the call and probably – my guess is – that it was ambivalence all the way through and Haig would continue to think, well he didn’t say no.

Smith: That raises a large question because the popular view, restated so many times at the time of the funeral, was this was a man without guile.

Cannon: That’s right.

Smith: Guile is a pejorative, but shrewdness? The fact that – for example – in this conversation, if for whatever reason, he didn’t really want to be fully forthcoming, is that guile?

Cannon: No, I think it is embarrassment that he did it. I don’t think it’s guile. I don’t think he would hesitate to tell Hartmann and Marsh what had happened if he thought it was significant. But I think he felt, well, we just talked a little bit.
We didn’t… And probably they did talk about nothing. Haig said nothing has changed and Ford thought, well, he’s still thinking it over, whatever he said.
We have no decision yet, or whatever he said, but the net of it would be that Haig would say, he hasn’t said no. He hadn’t said no the previous afternoon, and he hadn’t said no in the early hours, and not until the following Friday afternoon did he call him up and say no. I don’t think it was guile, I think it was uncertainty about what he had done, and should do.

Smith: Yeah. Makes sense. Would he on balance, on hindsight, would he have been served better as president had he had a little bit more guile?

Cannon: Yes.

Smith: I mean, the Boy Scout influence which made him the perfect person for this period.

Cannon: Right, but to get the job, to replace Nixon.

Smith: In some ways is a detriment.

Cannon: Yeah. Well, there was an extraordinary naïveté about Ford. In so many ways it just didn’t register to him that people would take advantage of him.

Smith: Is that the price you pay for believing that I don’t have any enemies?
Cannon: I think it is simply a factor of his being. In high school he told me he decided on this when he was fifteen or sixteen years old, he decided that there was something good in everybody. And he would look for the good in everybody. And he accepted that there were bad people, dishonest people and so forth. Some of them were up in the House of Representatives. But he didn’t dwell on them. He thought, well, I’m looking for the good in people. I think there was a goodness about him that became naiveté.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that. Most pols love gossip, and I always sensed – political gossip is one thing – but I always sensed that he was almost put off by it. That he would find a way to change the subject. It wouldn’t be in your face, but he was not a gossip.

Cannon: He was not a gossip. He would not talk bad about people. He did not believe bad about people. He thought, let’s look at the good side of things. The one thing that struck me about Ford that you haven’t mentioned, and I think this was a reflection of his strenuous daily schedule, was his use of time. He was absolutely adamant about not wasting any time. I know once or twice I was delayed for a few minutes. He was really angry for being late and would not have his time wasted.

Smith: And yet he had a wife who was famously late.

Cannon: That he had to put up with. But with subordinates – no. He absolutely would not tolerate any waste of his time. You know, some people would try to Bull* in the office or so forth, he’d just wave it off – “No, let’s finish this.”

Smith: Very disciplined man.

Cannon: Very disciplined. Extremely well disciplined. And conscious of what he was doing. He told me once, for example, that if he was trying to deliberate on something at a meeting, he would deliberately take his pipe out and put some tobacco in it and light it. Because he said, “I used that time for thinking about what I wanted to say and how I should say it and so forth.” So he was of a very much more deliberate nature than you think of him.
Smith: Do you think he grew into the office?

Cannon: Oh, yes. Frankly, he grew tremendously under Rumsfeld’s coaching. Because Rumsfeld said, “You’ve got to delegate, you’ve got to do this. You can’t do everything yourself. You’ve got to change the people.” And so he gave him a schedule to change the people. You’ve got to do this – you’ve got to do this. And he did. And Ford changed.

By the time I got there, which was February, he had mastered the job, there’s no question about it. I was generally aware of the confusion because I spent a fair amount of time in the White House during the Rockefeller confirmation which lasted until December. And spent a lot of time with Jack Marsh, who was in charge of that. There was a lot of confusion and helter skelter in the ’74 White House, but not in ’75. It was working, it was functioning.

Smith: Before I forget, was Rockefeller under any pressure from members of his family during the confirmation period?

Cannon: Evidently not. I just finished a rewriting of that, Richard, and evidently not. But there was an astonishing series – it was almost all about money – not about issues – a little bit here and there about his belief in this and NATO and about what he would do about this or that. But ninety percent of the confirmation in the Senate and House was how much money he had.

Smith: Someone referred to it in one of our interviews as “financial voyeurism”.

Cannon: Oh, yeah. Exactly. Everybody wanted to know just how much money the guy had.

Smith: You may know the story – I may have told you the story. Tom Korologos told me the morning in the Oval Office, when the announcement was made, he introduced himself to the governor and what his role –

Cannon: Korologos – I’ve got that in the book.

Smith: …where Rockefeller is concerned that…

Cannon: I may not be as rich as they think I am. And he was right. They kept padding his assets. In effect, they made him list, for example – he started out at $133 million. That was a conservative estimate, which did not include the art, which he had pledged to museums. So they made him include that, and update these things, so that doubled just about. Then they made him include the value of the trust that John D. had set up for him - $116 million, but he had no control over that. And, in fact, from time to time, when he needed some money out of it - he got a good income from it – but from time to time he would have to go to, I think it was William McChesney Martin and beg for a couple of million bucks out of the trust because he had to pay for this or that or whatever.

But they finally got it up to two hundred and something million dollars, but that was excessively padded. And then in the House they demanded – the House I think really wanted to stop him – two-thirds of that House Judiciary Committee was rabid liberal, I mean way far left. They wanted a detailed account of how much every member of the family, every asset, and every investment and so forth. Well, I think there were 84 members in the family, the cousins and all and so forth. And Rockefeller said, “I can’t do that.” “Why not?” He said it would destroy the family. So he said, “Part of the reason is that my brothers and I have given different amounts to our children. It will come out and it will provoke all kind of resentment and lasting bitterness among the family. I can’t do that.”

Smith: Did he ever consider withdrawing?

Cannon: Yes, at that point. And he said, “Well, I’ll have to withdraw over that.” And Bob Douglas said, “Well, governor, this extreme invasion of privacy is a valid enough reason to withdraw, if you want to do that.” And he thought it over and said, “No, Bob. I’m going to fight it out.” And Bob Douglas managed with an artful bit of political work to persuade Rodino that he would send Richardson Dilworth down to give him an aggregate of what all 84 members had, but not person by person. And they did, and all that showed that they didn’t have any control. This was a myth. Rockefeller kept saying, “This is a myth.” They had less than one percent of ownership, the total family did, less than one percent in any corporation except Chase Bank, and that was about 1.3 percent.
Smith: Was Shirley Chisholm helpful?

Cannon: Well, she was. As a matter of fact, I’ve got the transcript of her talk. She made a really quite memorable speech about this. He was opposed by blacks, Jews, a lot of other people, and she took the floor and stood up there and faced a Jewish group and said, “Where were you when Nelson Rockefeller was persuading the government to send Golda Meir some airplanes?” And she took blacks and said, “Where were you when the Rockefellers were founding black colleges,” and so forth. It was really a good speech written by an odd little guy named Thad Garrett.

Smith: Who later worked for Rockefeller?

Cannon: A month or so later after that, I got a call from Shirley one day and she said, “Why haven’t you hired Thad?” I said, “I didn’t know we were supposed to.” She said, “That was part of the deal.” I said, “He’s on the staff.”

Smith: Well, there’s an urban legend that the deal included more than that. She supposedly had some estate in Jamaica. They referred to it as the Black Berchtesgaden.

Cannon: I didn’t know that.

Smith: Supposedly Rockefeller paid her…

Cannon: Well, I doubt that. Shirley, I knew her fairly well, I knew all the House members fairly well because I was sort of Rockefeller’s personal ambassador. We had a New York office, but I was a personal ambassador. And after ’70 and the reapportionment, we lost one seat upstate and one seat in the city. So I had to negotiate with all thirty-four, I think it was, for their district. So, I was the most popular guy in the New York delegation while we were reapportioning because everybody wanted to protect his seat.

Smith: And of course, Charlie Rangel tells the story about Rockefeller, in effect, drawing the districts to his specifications.
Cannon: Yeah, he did. He drew the districts so Charlie Rangel wouldn’t lose Mead Esposito. He was the Brooklyn leader then, and we gave him what he wanted for his district. I think he had six Congressmen in Brooklyn at that time.

Smith: And as I recall, you would liked to have gotten rid of Otis Pike, but the geography just wouldn’t work.

Cannon: We couldn’t. He was out at the tip end of Long Island. There is no way you could change the geography to rule him out.

Smith: Was the White House naive and/or unprepared for the Reagan challenge?

Cannon: Yes.

Smith: Did they wait too long?

Cannon: Both. They waited too long. In fact, in May, I think it was in May of ’75, by then I’d been there a couple of months and I couldn’t see anything happening. And I told Rumsfeld one day, “Look, we’ve got to get going here. We can’t let this drift like this.” And Rumsfeld said, “Well, I’m not going to be the manager.” So I said, “I want to go see the president and tell him you’ve got to get going.” He said, “You go right ahead. You can see the president and tell him this.” So I did. I talked to the president and I said, “Mr. President, we ought to really get started on this campaign.” And he said, and this is a rough quote, “Well, Jim, I figured this: that if the party wants to nominate me, if it feels I’ve done a good job, they’ll nominate me. And if the country feels I’ve done a good job, they’ll elect me.” He said, “That’s the way I’ve always done it in my district, and that’s the way I plan to do it now.” I said, “Mr. President, it doesn’t work that way. You’ve got to go out and get these delegates,” and so on.

But I didn’t budge him at all. It was only a few months later that Stu Spencer, I think, came in and said, “Hell, he’s running. Reagan’s not talking about running, he’s running.” And finally we got off the dime and got to work on it. But it was mid-summer, I think, of ’75 before we got started at all. And then it didn’t start well. Bo Calloway was a nice guy, but probably – Rumsfeld says Ford picked Bo. I guess he’s right, I don’t know. But Ford liked Bo and thought he had been a good Congressman and so on. And was a Southerner, and maybe could get some delegates out of the South. Ford was absolutely, totally, innocent about how to run a national campaign. It had never happened, and curiously, although he had traveled all over the country for House members, he had no concept of how to win a presidential nomination. It had to be taught him, basically, by Stu Spencer.

Smith: On balance, do you buy the argument that Reagan made him a better candidate?

Cannon: No. Well I think he gave us a lot of practice. No question about that. But the fact is, that what Reagan did was convince that conservative sub group of the Republican Party that they should wait for him and not support Ford. And they didn’t. And there is no question about it, I think the pardon was…Stu told me once that a poll showed that seven percent of the Republicans were not going to vote for him because of the pardon. You lose seven percent of your base and you’re in trouble. You’re not going to make it.

Smith: In retrospect, has too much been made of the Polish gaffe?

Cannon: No. I think that was a critical thing because he was going upward and that just turned it back down. It was a stupid mistake.

Smith: And he was stubborn.

Cannon: About two days of stubbornness – and Ford could be stubborn. He really could be stubborn. Not often, but when he was stubborn, I mean, he was really stubborn. This was something, apparently, out of his childhood.

Smith: In the Reagan White House, when you had that situation occur, you could go to Nancy Reagan and she would try. Did anyone ever think of trying to enlist Mrs. Ford to convince him?

Cannon: I don’t think so. My impression was that she was always supportive of him. And she was the conscience to him. Not that he didn’t have a strong conscience himself, but when he would waiver to get something done, she would correct it. She was a very strong element of conscience in his decisions. But in the end she always supported him.
Smith: Tell me, when the famous Sixty Minutes interview occurred, were people appalled in the White House? In the immediate aftermath of that?

Cannon: I’m not sure, I wasn’t there yet.

Smith: Well, it was in ’75…

Cannon: Early ’75, I think. I think it was about January of ’75. I’m not sure, but anyway, I don’t recall being there at that time.

Smith: Was there tension? Were there people who saw her as a political loose cannon?

Cannon: No, I think people saw her as a tremendous political asset because of her candor, her frankness. And people just liked her. They often like the First Lady better than they like the president. But he was certainly true in his case. She had a lot of verve and spirit. She was kind of a free spirit, and everybody liked that about her. She had also been a good mother, raising four good children. I never thought she was anything but a major asset to him.

Smith: Was there an awareness that she had a problem?

Cannon: Yes. Internally there was. I know, because Maria Downs – have you talked to her?

Smith: I talk to her next week.

Cannon: Okay, good. Maria Downs used to invite us to all the dinners, the White House dinners, and Cherie, my wife, asked, “Why do we get invited?” And she said, “Well, two reasons. One, you don’t ask, and the other is, that it’s always good to have you around to organize a table or two in case we have a problem with Mrs. Ford.” Because sometimes she would come into the dinners looking – I don’t know if she was or not – but looking kind of zonked and out of it. But she liked being in the White House, very much, because she saw him more than she’d ever seen him before.

Smith: Do you think he felt guilt about the earlier years when he was away as much as he was?
Cannon: I never saw any evidence of it. I never saw any evidence of it whatsoever. He had set out in his first term, I believe, to be Speaker. It is what he wanted to be and he aimed for that. Not with all deliberation, but when an opportunity would come. He didn’t initiate any of his races for leadership. They all came to him, people came to him and said, we think you can beat Charlie Halleck.

Smith: When you stop to think about it, it actually explains what he said to you about his attitude, well if the country wants to re-elect.

Cannon: Yeah, that’s right.

Smith: There is an element of passivity here.

Cannon: That’s right. Personal passivity.

Smith: He would not, on his own, have written the OpEd piece calling for rebuke (of Clinton; here confused with second Ford Op-Ed on affirmative action).

Cannon: No, but that was a wonderful thing to have done. And it provoked me to go see Lee Bolinger, and Lee told me what the problem was, and gave me the idea of an amicus brief that, by all accounts…

Smith: Which we now know Sandra Day O’Connor referred to.

Cannon: Exactly.

Smith: It’s on affirmative action.

Cannon: That’s right, exactly. I initiated the brief, and I started trying to get it organized, but then a guy at the Army, a former Army counsel, took it over and got all these generals and so forth. He really made it happen, but I just kind of got it started.

Smith: But that also suggested Ford, more than many politicians, in some ways, was dependent on a staff.

Cannon: No question. He was dependent on ideas. Have you talked to Mel?

Smith: Yeah.
Cannon: Well, Mel was the one who kept pushing him. “Come out with some ideas, come out with some ideas.” But Ford, when he would try to have an alternative to a Democratic program in the House, he didn’t initiate it, he had somebody else do it. It was, in many respects, a passive thing.

You asked about the Polish question. I have no doubt in my mind that the real reason President Ford was not a more effective president and the reason he didn’t elected president, was because he was not a good performer. The White House has become such a stage. It is the number one stage in the whole world. And half of the president’s job is performing. Half of it may be managing, but the more visible half is performing. He just was not a very good performer.

Cannon: And it’s funny, the first month, all he had to be was not Richard Nixon.

Smith: That’s right. Exactly.

Cannon: And the very qualities that were perfect for a month. The press in its infatuation with irrelevant detail, made much of him cooking his own muffin and whatever the hell it was. It was insignificant, but that boosted him way up here because he was a man of the people, or whatever he was. And he was very popular…

Smith: And the truth was, probably Mrs. Ford didn’t want to get up and make his breakfast.

Cannon: That’s right. She was probably sleeping late. But he simply was not very good on television. He’d never been very good on television. Look at him in the House, and Mel Laird saying, “Get out there and do this, Jerry.” Or being shadowed by Everett Dirksen, or whatever it was. He had never been very good on television. He did learn how to campaign. My firm belief, Richard, is that this guy turned out to be a hell of a manager. He really managed the White House better than almost any other president we can think of, but he simply couldn’t portray the idea of a first citizen on television. He just couldn’t do it.

Smith: That’s why I say, going back certainly to Kennedy, the popular view of what a president does had been transformed. And Ford, in another era, might have been seen as a much more successful president. In his last years, we’ll wrap up with this, in his later years they’d go to the convention, and they were part of this diminishing band. This guy who was the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge, came to be seen as…

Cannon: Right, that’s right. He was the real conservative. He was the acting conservative. Reagan and others are talking conservatives; Ford was a really acting conservative.

Smith: It is expressed, among other things through his vetoes.

Cannon: Yeah.

Smith: He was fiscally conservative. He was tight.

Cannon: Oh, yeah. He was stingy, he was tight, he was careful with his money and with everybody else’s money. We would sit in these budget sessions when they’d do their appeals and O’Neill and Lynn and the OMB guy, and I was in there as a kind of a foil so that they didn’t carry all the verbiage and so forth. Because every now and then they’d say, well we ought to cut this, that and so forth. And I’d say, “Well, Mr. President, that art budget item is very close to Betty Ford. I think you ought to think again about that.” He’d say, “You’re right,” and so on. But anyway, people would come in with appeals and they’d start to appeal and he would know more about it than they would, and in about five minutes they’d say, “Well, Mr. President, I understand. You’re right, we’ll take the cut.” But he was just one hell of a manager. With Rumsfeld’s coaching to show him how to delegate and so on, he was a splendid manager. Probably the best manager of any presidency since maybe Truman or somebody. Truman was a good manager.

Smith: I think he’s the only president to sign his name to a petition supporting gay rights. That represented change. He wouldn’t do that in the White House.

Cannon: That’s right.

Smith: How did he change? And was it exacerbated by the fact that the party was moving far to the right?
Cannon: No, I think the changes I observed were really changes that occurred as much because of Mrs. Ford as anything else. The changes that I recognized he made were influenced by Betty Ford, in my opinion. He simply was adamant about not doing anything, not making presidential decisions that would improve his chances to be elected. In fact, he was almost stubborn about that – that he would do it out of defiance. “Well, you tell me it’s going to help me politically, but I’m not going to do it.” He did not want to hear any of that.

Smith: But in their retirement years - I don’t want to just throw a label on it and say he became more liberal – but certainly his views seemed to have broadened.

Cannon: I think he moderated a lot of his views. Now that you mention it, I think he became more broadly minded in terms of understanding the world beyond the House, beyond the Congress. I think that was a tremendous change in his life.

Smith: He was still learning.

Cannon: Yeah. In the House he was a House man. He really looked at it like you do in the House and the Senate. You’re in a little world up there and you see that little world. But once he got out, I thought he expanded his knowledge and his beliefs.

Smith: Do you think his kids had any role in that?

Cannon: Yes, I think they did here and there. Yes, I do. I think they did. I think specifically they had a lot to do with his granting, not what he called amnesty, but conditional amnesty, earned amnesty, I believe he called it. I think they had, Michael and Jack, had roles in that because neither one of them was subject to Vietnam or had been drafted for Vietnam, but they had a lot of friends who were.

Smith: Did he ever tell you how he’d like to be remembered? Did he think about that?

Cannon: Yes. And I have it written down somewhere, but I can’t quote it exactly. But as a man who had served his country in a time of crisis with the best of his ability. Words to that effect – that’s about it.
What were his last words, do you know? Did you ever ask Betty or anybody?

Smith: No, and it’s all very sort of – I don’t know why there is such a veil thrown over a perfectly natural process. They were deeply resentful when he would go to the hospital and somebody in the hospital would tip off the press. He was deeply resentful. People would try to suggest this interest is understandable, and he would come back, stubbornly, I’m not president anymore. I’m a private citizen. I’m entitled to my privacy. That sort of thing. I suspect it had to have been very difficult for someone of his pride, meticulous in his appearance and everything else, to die by inches in public. And he’d seen Bob Hope, which had to have been a cautionary – he didn’t want to use a cane. There were all the indignities of growing old – he found distasteful.

Cannon: He was devoted to Betty, and they’d had a wonderful long marriage. But he still had a great respect for his early romance in Phyllis Brown. In my first set of interviews with him, I guess in mid-interview one day, he said, “You ought to go see Phyllis, she’s right up here in Las Vegas,” or whatever it was. And so I said, “Well, alright. I’ll go tomorrow and I’ll come back, if that’s alright.” He said, “Sure, go up and see her. I’d like to know what you think of her.” I called her. Penny gave me her number. I called her and said I wanted to come up and see her.

I flew up there and took a taxi out to her condo and thought how in the hell am I going to break the ice here. So the taxi had stopped in front of a florist shop. I said, “Wait here.” I went in and got her a dozen red roses and brought them back. When she opened the door, I handed her the roses, and said, “President Ford sent you these.” She said, “Oh, no. He never sent me a flower in all his life. But come on in.”

And we had a wonderful conversation. Her memory was not detailed enough for me to reconstruct it. But the summary of it was that they had met and taken an instant liking to each other. Had fallen deeply in love and they had the most wonderful time for two or three or four years. They went skiing together; they went to play tennis; they went sailing; they did everything. She was a brilliant woman. She made her living as one of these experts in bridge playing – whatever you call them. She’d had three husbands and a son by one of them.

Smith: You know, at the end she wanted to come see him.

Cannon: Oh, yeah. And did come to see him.

Smith: And was turned away.

Cannon: And turned away, I know. I think that is unfortunate because – but anyway. She was not bitter about it, but she had the greatest regard for him and affection, and she said, “I would have been lucky if I could have married him, but it wouldn’t have worked out because I was just too much of a flirt.” And he understood this. He perceived very early that she liked too many boyfriends and this was not going to work if he was going to be in political life. It was going to be very awkward for him if he had a wife who wandered around and so on. So he prudently decided that was not for him.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: First of all, tell me about the 30-30 Club.

Trimpe: Well, what would you like to know about it?

Smith: What is it? How did it come about?

Trimpe: How it came about was that we played on Thanksgiving in 1930. Then we won the championship and then we decided that because it was on Thanksgiving, we always played on the Thanksgiving day, we always said, “Let’s do something.” Then we said, “Let’s meet every Thanksgiving” and that’s how it got started.

Smith: Who did you play?

Trimpe: Union High School.

Smith: Okay. And you were playing for South High?

Trimpe: South High.

Smith: South High, I’m told, was different from the other schools. What was special about South High?

Trimpe: They were just a down-to-earth outfit. Do you know what I mean? You just wanted to go to school there because everything was top tradition and it was a good place to be.

Smith: And was it a very diverse student body? The old story was Central High was a little bit upper crust.

Trimpe: No, no we were down-to-earth. I know Central, yes. They were kind of the elite at that time. And that’s where Ford’s wife went, she went to Central.

Smith: Was Jerry Ford down-to-earth?
Trimpe: Oh man, he was an organizer and I knew sometime, some place, he’d be famous for something because he could get you going, especially if you was in a huddle or something, he could get you going.

Smith: How?

Trimpe: All he had to do – and he’d do it in a nice way – he’d say, “We’re not doing too good. You gotta do this and this.” He organized you right away. He was the center, he was the center of the team.

Smith: I take it he showed leadership qualities?

Trimpe: Oh, even in those days he did, yes. He took the bull by the horns. I just liked the guy from the day one. I still like him.

Smith: Did you know his mother and father?

Trimpe: No.

Smith: What about his brothers? Did you know his brothers?

Trimpe: No, didn’t know his brothers either. All I knew was Jerry.

Smith: What was he like off the field? He loved sports…

Trimpe: Off the field, he was just like he was when we were playing. He was a down-to-earth guy, that’s all I got to say.

Smith: Worker? Hard worker?

Trimpe: Oh, yeah. And he didn’t have too much when he first started. He used to wash dishes in the eating place across the street from South High School just to get the money so he could keep going to school. He wasn’t a rich man.

Smith: That’s, I think, where he met his father, wasn’t it? Remember the story about his birth father who one day walked in?

Smith: Tell me about Grand Rapids then - in the 1920’s. What did you do as a school kid? What’d you do for fun? Did you go to movies? Did you go fishing? What did you do in Grand Rapids that you and the other guys, like a Jerry Ford, would do?

Trimpe: I lived on what they called the Black Hills. That was in the southern, south part of Grand Rapids. And it was during the Depression, I graduated in ’32 and it was ’31 and ’30 that was the Depression. But there wasn’t one kid that had to ask his parents for money. We always was out doing things. Even if you had to pick up junk. We never had to worry. My dad wasn’t poor, but he was an engineer on the railroad, and he made pretty good money, but that didn’t bother me any because I just figured I had to make it for myself anyway, regardless.

Smith: What was the Depression like here?

Trimpe: When it gets right down to it, you didn’t really feel there was a Depression. We had enough money because my dad could take care of us, but we always played with kids that needed the money and you knew what they felt like too. They felt a lot different than what I did.

Smith: Where there other guys who were friends of Jerry Ford? Can you think of other classmates or teammates that were friends?

Trimpe: The only time that I knew Jerry was when I went to South High School and that’s when I got familiar with him.

Smith: Were there particular teachers there who really stood out, maybe a football coach or other influences on you at South High?

Trimpe: They had a good bunch of teachers and you wanted to go to school there because you liked the people. That’s the way the whole school was. You just wanted to be part of it.

Smith: Did he know then that he wanted to go to college?

Trimpe: I don’t know whether he did or not. I don’t know whether he did.

Smith: Tell me about the championship game.
Trimpe: That was something else. It snowed and there was probably 6 to 8 inches of snow on the field. So now they had to go down there and shovel some of it where the markers went, so they put salt down there to melt the snow so you knew where the yard lines were. And we couldn’t wear cleats because they’d get all clogged up, so we called Goble & Brown [Goble & Brown was a sporting goods store in Grand Rapids] and they sent sneakers or gym shoes. They didn’t have cleats on them, they just had rubber soles. And that’s how you got around.

Smith: Is that the famous 0-0 game? Was that the game that ended 0-0?

Trimpe: Yes. I don’t think we got down past the, maybe the 30 yard line, and from there on, there wasn’t a footprint. And, I tell you, we almost made it. There was a guy named Louie Cooley that was on the team and he caught a pass and he was running and he slipped and fell and he would’ve made a touchdown. I’m sure he would. But, hey, that’s past tense. That’s just one of those things.

Smith: Who was your quarterback?

Trimpe: The quarterback then was Alan Elliott and he was a good one.

Smith: If the game ended 0-0, how did you win?

Trimpe: They had a fellow on the team of Union and he had signed up to play professional. And that took care of that. Actually, the game was forfeited because of that. He’d signed up already and he never should’ve done that. His name was Frank Cook. A big guy, too.

Smith: I take it they don’t have a 30-30 Club, the Union side?

Trimpe: No, but we invited them a couple of times to be with us on Thanksgiving and they came, too. It was nice.

Smith: Was there a long rivalry between South and Union?

Trimpe: There always was. That was the team you had to beat. You didn’t care about any of the rest of them, but you had to beat Union because they had a good team. They were in good shape.
Smith: How many games would you play in a season? 6? 7? 8? 9?

Trimpe: I don’t know exactly, I’d say about 7 or 8 because you played Central and Christian and Ottawa Hills and…

Smith: What other sports did Ford play?

Trimpe: I don’t recall. I went out for track, but I don’t remember him doing anything else. But he might have.

Smith: You kept in touch with him over the years?

Trimpe: Oh yeah. Yeah. I’ve got a picture out there. I tell you, every Thanksgiving we always arranged it so he knew where we were and he could call us if he couldn’t make it. He had a family and every Thanksgiving, it would be like us, you wanted to be with your family. So you can’t blame the guy for not wanting to come clear from California over here just to be with us. But he always called. I got a picture out there when the Grand Rapids Press came down there and they got a picture of me talking to Ford.

Smith: Once you went to the White House, didn’t you?

Trimpe: Oh, that was something else. I think that was one of the best things in my life was when he invited us to the White House. That was something else. He took us all around and if he didn’t take us, he always had somebody and they showed us everything there was around there in Washington. We were only there a short time, only there two days, but it was nice.

Smith: Did you have Thanksgiving dinner at the White House?

Trimpe: Breakfast. Actually, it was like a brunch, they had the breakfast and lunch all in one.

Smith: And was Mrs. Ford there, too?

Trimpe: Oh, yes. Oh yes, yes.

Smith: We picked up today, talking to one of your teammates, word about a girlfriend that we didn’t know existed of Jerry’s. Mary was her first name? Does that ring a bell at all?
Trimpe: I don’t recall that.

Smith: Do you remember his car? He drove an old Ford?

Trimpe: Oh yeah.

Smith: Tell us.

Trimpe: An old Ford. I don’t know where he got it but it was an antique, even at that time. He always drove us to school in that old Ford.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him or talked to him?

Trimpe: I can’t remember exactly, but the last time I contacted him was when I wrote him a letter and asked him if it would be okay if we dismantled the 30-30 Club because there was only just a few of us left. And I said, “I wanted to get your opinion on it” because I didn’t want to say we were going get rid of it without going – I sent one to Joslin, he’s out in Seattle – I wanted to find out from him. He wrote me back. You’ve got a copy of that letter, haven’t you?

Other: Yes, we have.

Trimpe: And it’s signed by him, too.

Smith: And what did it say?

Trimpe: It said he thought it was a good idea because good things have to come to an end sometimes. So that was the 75th that we quit it, but that picture that I’ve got out there was from 1970.

Smith: Did you attend his funeral?

Trimpe: Oh man, yes. Yes, yes, yes. I got an invitation and the whole works. But, boy, you talk about security, we had to park at another church’s lot and then we were bussed over. The reason why we were bussed over was because they had to check you legally so that you could go and be at the church that he was at. They were scrutinizing you, I’ll tell you. The biggest thing was your driver’s license because it had your picture on it. And every time you did something, you had to get that out and show it to them.
Smith: What do you remember about him most? How would you sum him up?

Trimpe: He was always congenial. He was always glad to see his friends. Always.
Of course he had a lot of them, but he was a very nice guy.

Smith: Did he have any enemies?

Trimpe: I don’t know. I never heard of anybody that didn’t like him. Of course, I didn’t know everybody, either.

Other: Were you in the same class as Jerry Ford?

Trimpe: No, he graduated in ’31 and I graduated in ’32. I always said he must’ve been a little bit smarter than me. But that makes a lot of difference when you start school to when you graduate. I think that’s what threw it off.

Smith: Tell us about that restaurant where he worked across the street from the school. What was that? Was that just a hamburger place?

Trimpe: Yeah. A lot of the kids that was at South High School would go over there for lunch. Of course they had a cafeteria in the school, too, but they liked to get away from the school and get over there.

Other: Did you eat lunch there?

Trimpe: I ate there a few times, but a lot of the kids were poor and I would eat with them. When we’d bring our lunch, then we’d swap a sandwich or something.
I might have a dill pickle in there or something that they liked, I’d give them a dill pickle.

Smith: Did you ever see him working at the restaurant?

Trimpe: Oh, yeah, sure. He was always busy. He was a busy guy. He was always busy. That was something else with him because he was always busy.

Other: Jerry Ford was in Boy Scouts. Were you in Boys Scouts as well?

Trimpe: Yes, I was too. I only got to first class, though.

Other: Was it the same troop that he was in?
Trimpe: No, no, no. I was in the south and he was in another section of town. My wife was with the Cub Scouts, she had a little troop of those.

Other: A den leader?

Trimpe: Yeah.

Smith: What’s the biggest change in Grand Rapids in all those years when you think back? Obviously, the town looks different, but beyond just the way it looks, what’s the biggest thing that’s different about Grand Rapids?

Trimpe: It just got bigger. Let’s put it that way. A lot of things fell by the wayside. A lot of the things that you did, you didn’t do them anymore.

Smith: Was it very Dutch?

Trimpe: Quite a lot them, but there was a lot of Polish people, too. Quite a few.

Smith: Including at South?

Trimpe: The whole west side was where the Polish were and then the south part of town was where the Holland people were. I lived where the Holland people were. Of course, where I lived, a lot of the men that was there, they worked for the Pere Marquette Railroads. The reason why they were there was because it was easy to get to from where it was. You could walk from the Black Hills and get down there and get your trip to go out.

Smith: At South High, were there any black kids?

Trimpe: I can only remember two of them and one was Siki McGee, and of course he played football with us. And the other one, I used to see him around once in awhile. But we didn’t think anything of it, they were just like you. There was nothing to say that they’re dark. That didn’t mean anything. You just said, “Hey, he’s dark. I’m white. What’s the difference? Nothing!”

Other: What about the make up of the football team, the different characters that played the different positions, do any of them stand out along side Jerry Ford?

Trimpe: We had some good people in there, but he was a – I don’t know how you’d put it – he was always an organizer. You kind of looked up to him. He was the captain anyways, but that didn’t mean anything. We had quarterbacks that were, I don’t say they were as good as he was, but I always thought they would be.

Other: Was he voted the captain of the team by the players?

Trimpe: Oh yeah, we voted him in. He was a pretty good sized guy, too. And, of course, he was center and that’s quite an important part of being on the football team because you had a lot of stuff to do to keep the guys from coming in on the other side once you centered the ball.

Smith: Tell us about your coach. Who was your coach?

Trimpe: All the coaches that we ever had – he was Gettings, his name was Gettings – he was a young guy, he wasn’t much older than what we were. When he graduated from college, he was a young guy. I liked him in a way, but in a way I thought he couldn’t stand to lose. Or if we did lose or things were getting bad, then he’d want you to get in there and do some tackling and all that kind of stuff. One of the guys busted his collar bone just going in and hitting the other guy that hard. In a way, he was an organizer, too. Coach Gettings, he was a good man.

I had “Pop” Churm, he was the track coach. I want to tell you how I got to play football. I was running out for track and I’d done the 100, the 220 and the broad jump and the relay. Gettings was always after me down the hall because they wanted somebody in the backfield that could run and I was a pretty good runner. Anyway, I said to “Pop” Churm, “I think I’m going out for football” and he said, “You’d better think it over twice because if you get in there and bust a leg or something, you know what’s happened to your track, don’t you? Pssh, it’s gone. You can’t run the 100 and the 220 anymore.”

I finally gave in in my junior year and I finally went out for football. I only played two years. But you got a guy here that says, “Don’t go over” and the other guy that says, “I want ya.” So anyway, that’s how that happened. That’s how I got to play. The funny part of it was, when I got to play and I went out there for the first time, they’d already started to play already, er, just to practice. So I came out there and I had a new pair of pants and a new jacket and everything and now I’m walking in there like that and, here, right out of the clear sky, you walk in there with all them duds on and these guys are in the old torn up ones and they’d think, “What the heck has he got? How come he’s getting all that junk?” I said, “I don’t know. That’s what they handed to me, so I took it.” That’s it.

Smith: That’s good! That’s exactly what we were looking for.

(to other) Anything else?

Other: In high school, did you help Jerry run for class president?

Trimpe: Oh sure, we was all for that, you know. Got to get him in there.

Smith: And he lost by two votes.

Trimpe: I know it. And the guy that done it, he was a smart cookie. Not that Jerry wasn’t, but he was an all ‘A’ student.

Other: Did anyone from the 30-30 Club help him campaign for congress?

Trimpe: I don’t remember exactly, but I used to see him all the time downtown there. And when you’d see him, he was going like a house on fire from one place to another. There wasn’t no grass growing under his feet. You knew he really knew he wanted to get there.

Smith: I get the picture. Thank you, thank you.

Smith: Thank you for doing this.

Sweeney: Oh, I’m flattered to do it, though I don’t know if I have anything to say. To be candid with you, I don’t really know if I do.

Smith: What does it feel like to be back in this office?

Sweeney: Well, it’s changed, for one thing. But, yes, I was in this office when it was under construction and there was no furniture and there was no carpeting. It was built for President Ford and he has used it, but virtually not at all.

Smith: Did you have an expectation at that point in terms of what kind of use it might get?

Sweeney: No. I think everyone figured there had to be an office for him, but I think it was understood that he had his connections in Vail and Rancho Mirage and Washington and that he would never come back to Grand Rapids as a resident, and that this would not get an awful lot of use. But he was so revered that whatever anybody could do for him, they did do, friend or foe. And that’s what this office really represents.

Smith: Well put. Was there local resentment when it was revealed at the end of his presidency that he wouldn’t be coming back to Grand Rapids?

Sweeney: I never noticed it. I never heard about it. When he was defeated by Carter, by that time, I had already worked with him for probably almost a year. There was obviously the contingency that if he was not reelected or even if he was, that provision had to be made for his library and museum. And so, thought was going into it at that time. And again, the story is - I’m sure you’ve already heard about it - a fairly small group of local citizens put together something called the Gerald R. Ford Commemorative Committee. I don’t mean to demean the contribution of other people, but there were probably five or six people that really did the job and I can mention who they were.
Smith: Sure.

Sweeney: Carl Morgenstern, who was the former chairman of the board and the CEO of Old Kent Bank; Jordan Shepherd, a builder and contractor primarily for high-end housing; David LaClaire who was a local portrait photographer; Dick Ford, of course, President Ford’s brother; Fred Meijer of the Meijer food and department store chain; Harold Davidson, the managing partner at the Grand Rapids office of Ernst and Young; and myself. That was really the group that did this.

Smith: At that point, had a decision been made regarding Ann Arbor? Was this in any way a reaction to that? What did you know about the library?

Sweeney: At that point, I think that was a decision President Ford made himself, because he had two allegiances: clearly one to Ann Arbor, but clearly one to Grand Rapids. And I think it was a very creative decision. I don’t know whether somebody else planted the idea or whether that came from him whole cloth. I can’t tell you, Richard.

Smith: But isn’t that what a congressman would do?

Sweeney: Right. Exactly. Tip O’Neill would do that. Exactly. By the way, when do these things you’re doing get released?

Smith: Certainly nothing before 2013 and you can put any restrictions on it you want in part or in whole. We’re much more interested in having a candid conversation.

Sweeney: Fine, I will give you candid information. And these are not things that came to me in my position as an attorney, so there’s no attorney-client privilege involved and, even if there were, I really regard this interview process as part of my relationship with both the Commemorative Committee and the Foundation. There have been attempts since to try to integrate the library and museum at this location and I think you are aware of those because I think some of them were attempted, not necessarily under your auspices, but at the time when you were in charge of the library and museum. That has never gone anywhere and is not going to happen. The University of Michigan is certainly not going to release its authority over the library. But there have been attempts by local individuals to try to see whether that could be arranged.

Smith: Do you know if any of those were discussed with him? I mean, was any of this during his lifetime?

Sweeney: Yes, it was discussed with him and it’s not something that he encouraged. It’s very interesting because one of the letters that went to him following my redrafting was a letter that went to the University of Michigan. I don’t know if it was ever sent to the U of M. I think it was. I don’t think Mary Sue Coleman was yet president, so it was probably under Lee Bollinger’s time as president of U of M. But President Ford did not encourage the effort. He didn’t say, “Don’t do it.” Again, the congressman, the facilitator, the great compromiser. But I don’t think he was at all enthused about the prospect. That is my view of it, particularly with the Ford School of Public Policy now being part of the Ann Arbor campus and with his affiliation with the library. But there were serious thoughts and I don’t think those thoughts will ever go away from certain individuals here.

But, here’s the little story I started to tell you. My law firm, when President Ford was defeated for reelection, I remember attending a partners meeting. I don’t think I was a partner yet, I actually started working with President Ford when I was still a fairly junior associate and it was something that came to me, not to the firm. But I remember the firm saying, “Well, let’s invite President Ford to become a partner.” And, of course, he very, very gracefully declined. I probably, at that point, knew President Ford and had a closer affiliation with him than anybody in the firm did, but, again, being a very junior attorney at that stage, I wasn’t even consulted on the matter. So that’s a little tidbit. And, of course, President Ford never did resume practicing law. He hadn’t practiced law for 50 years.

Smith: How did your paths first cross?

Sweeney: You know, I was thinking about that on the way here, because I knew that question would come up. I know the first time I met President Ford was when he came to Grand Rapids around Easter in 1976. Part of it was in connection with the library and museum, which we were just starting to really get formally organized. And it was probably just a friendly visit. But he stayed at Dr. Bob Brown’s house. Dr. Brown is a member of the Commemorative Committee’s board of trustees and was a good friend to President Ford with a home in East Grand Rapids. That’s where I first met President Ford. In terms of how we crossed paths, because of my professional involvement as an attorney with the Commemorative Committee and what has followed, I’m not 100% certain why, other than I did do an awful lot of work with non-profit organizations, even at that stage of my practice.

I represented the Grand Rapids Arts Council, for example, and there were a number of others and, over the years, I’ve probably represented or been a trustee of 25 local charities of different types. So I think I got into it that way because they needed an attorney who had some experience with non-profits. They really needed to get a tax exemption, we needed to be incorporated, and it was really very much a grassroots effort. I wouldn’t call it unprofessional, but we never had anybody that was paid staff throughout the entire process. I don’t know that anyone other than our contractors ever asked for reimbursement of personal expenses during the entire process of constructing the museum and funding part of the construction of the library and the exhibits and so on.

It was a very interesting experience and really quite unique for somebody in my position. At one point, I was spending at least a day per week and often two days per week exclusively on this process. But it was very gratifying, very rewarding and I grew in my admiration for President Ford throughout the entire process.

Smith: Was it through the contacts you had with him or learning more about him?

Sweeney: A little bit of each. I mean, he was totally unpretentious. He didn’t stand on a lot of ceremony. Plus you already knew his record. I’ve heard you and others deliver speeches about his character and integrity and never a hint of scandal or duplicity. And that just became more and more evident as we were putting together the exhibits and getting into the history of his congressional and presidential years and time in the Navy and so on. You could not help but admire him at whatever distance you were involved with him. And I can’t say that I had a real close involvement with him. I don’t want to suggest that. I probably met with him during the development and construction period half a dozen times maybe.

Smith: How worried was he? Oddly enough, one of the things that brought him and Jimmy Carter together was their joint realization that they had to raise the money to build their presidential libraries.

Sweeney: Correct.

Smith: And, for someone who was accustomed to running, not unopposed, but essentially in a safe district, not spending a lot of money in congressional campaigns, one senses that it was a pretty daunting task, now you’re a former president and the first thing you have to do is raise, whatever, $9 million for this building and whatever over in Ann Arbor.

Sweeney: Right.

Smith: Was that something that weighed heavily on him?

Sweeney: I’m sure it did. He did participate in the fundraising. Carl Morgenstern very much was the prime mover of the fundraising effort. But President Ford did participate, particularly with people that he’d had long relationships. And there were some foreign governments that contributed significant amounts of money. He always was frugal. I don’t even know whether he wanted this office. I think that he really did not want an awful lot of money put into furnishings and that sort of thing. But he was very active in the whole planning for the museum project. Very involved. We didn’t really do much of anything without consulting with him in some fashion, not always face-to-face, but sending blueprints and materials to him. He really ended up making the decision on the architectural firm and on the fundamental design of the museum. We made a recommendation and it was certainly something that he accepted, but he had the ultimate approval. The statue out in front of the astronaut, he had ultimate approval on that.
Smith: Is it true that he didn’t want a statue of himself?

Sweeney: Yes. I don’t know whether it’s still in this building, but there is the most gosh awful statue of President Ford. I don’t know what I would compare it with, but it looked like something that maybe Andy Warhol and Picasso together would do. I wouldn’t say Andy Warhol, but Picasso’s in there. Anyway, it’s a grotesque thing and I think that that was something that encouraged him even further to "Just don’t bother."

Smith: Parenthetically, one of the great ironies of a congressman who wasn’t noted for bringing home a lot of bacon to the district - the most obvious example where he really did involve himself in significant federal funding is the Calder sculpture which doesn’t fit into the image we have of Gerald Ford. It may have been Dick Ford who, when there was discussion, made clear he [President Ford] didn’t want a statue of himself [outside the Ford Museum] - the spaceman reflected his interests. And he said, “Whatever it is, make it representational art.”

Sweeney: Yes. I’m sure that that spaceman statue, if you examine it closely, you can see the texture of the fabric. Boy, that was a project. I will never forget that. The sculpture was basically a fee plus expenses and he, Judd Nelson, would send his expense reports in - just a pile of receipts - and many times we had to tell him, “Stocking your liquor cabinet is not something that’s included in the expenses of doing this sculpture.” But he was good at what he did. He was.

Smith: Were there alternates considered to the spaceman?

Sweeney: Yes. Well, there were alternates considered to that and there was a lot of pressure from some local artists to have a keynote type sculpture and I personally received some pressure on that account. I don’t know whether her name has been mentioned or whether you’ve interviewed her, but Mary Ann Keeler was involved. It is a Judson Nelson sculpture. I must give Judson credit for that. She was involved in that end of what we did. She was very much enamored of artistic types and she would be their advocate to make sure that we actually paid more than they asked and make sure that we didn’t question any of their expenses. She and Judson Nelson came up with his ultimate appointment.

Smith: Was she involved in the Calder sculpture?

Sweeney: Not terribly. That’s Nancy Mulnix. I was involved years later. Nancy came to me, and I didn’t know her at the time. Calder actually preceded my arrival in Grand Rapids, but we did do a follow-up on that. There was a Calder celebration and it must have been the 25th anniversary of its installation and we had the head of the National Endowment for the Arts here, Jane Alexander. But Nancy Mulnix was the prime mover in that. Very possibly, Mary Ann Keeler was involved somehow, but that really was a one-woman show. As a young woman, she pulled that off and deserves credit to this day.

Smith: Very impressive.

Sweeney: Yes, it is.

Smith: There must have been some local head scratching.

Sweeney: There was. And so was the painting on the roof of the county building, which was a Calder that he scratched out on an envelope and that ended up being modeled on the roof. Our law firm paid for it since we had the best view of it. We paid for it for years and, every two or three years, the county would want it refurbished.

You mentioned Jimmy Carter. I go back further with Jimmy Carter than I do with Ford and I got to watch that evolving relationship between them in a very interesting fashion. I met President Carter on at least two or three occasions. They would do joint appearances at Ann Arbor or elsewhere. My law school was Emory University in Atlanta, which of course is where the Carter Center is today. I was actually asked to get involved in the Carter Library-Museum. I never did, I figured one is enough. But since they knew I had experience here, I was asked to at least lend a helping hand with some documentation or something, but it didn’t prove to be necessary. They obviously did a great job down there themselves.

Smith: I want to come back to that because that obviously is very important.
Let’s talk about the site itself because I guess it’s well known that Fred Meijer offered a site on the outskirts of town.

Sweeney: Yes, he offered a site up on Bradford, which is actually outside the city limits in the Grand Rapids Township. He felt it would be appropriate because Fred had the image of people coming here in droves. You know, families would come in their campers and busses would come up and we needed a large place for the parking. The parking was always just a huge issue. And, by the way, you’re bringing up parking lot nightmares for me and, I think, in your time here, you probably remember some of my conversations about it. That issue here at the museum site is just being finally resolved, by the way, with an affidavit that I’ll be filing in the records of the Kent County Registrar of Deeds within the next week.

Smith: In what way? Because you did end up with a lot of parking.

Sweeney: Far more than we needed, but we would’ve had even more because we started out with the site where the Grand Rapids Public Museum and Days Inn is located as part of the Ford Museum site. We had that property tied up through the city and we part swapped, part purchased it. We had a big controversy about a walkway from over the other side of Pearl to here so people wouldn’t get killed trying to get to the museum from their parking. Well, we didn’t have to go through with the walkway, obviously, because we’re on one contiguous site.

But the property north of us was owned by a local furniture dealer, Robert Sullivan and some of his associates. He was big in local sports. He owned the local semi-pro baseball team, the Sullivans. We ended up giving up our rights to the property south of Pearl and we ended up getting the property north, which is the north parking lot. It cost us a good deal of money; probably, to be honest with you, more than it was worth. In fact, I’m certain of it. But it was just a matter of getting the job done. I remember Fred Meijer was doing some of the direct negotiation, and Bob Sullivan played really tough. He played hardball.

Smith: What is the status of the north parking lot today?
Sweeney: I will tell you and I’m going to try to keep this as brief as possible. The Commemorative Committee - the predecessor to the Foundation - endowed the Foundation with what money we had left over. We gave to the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Foundation and that became their initial endowment. The only property that we really had an immediate right to was the north parking lot, because the city wanted to make a big presentation at the time of the dedication. They wanted to be the ones that would turn over this property and the footprint of the museum to the GSA, the General Services Administration. At that time, the National Archives and the Presidential Library System were part of the General Services Administration. So we said, “Okay, fine. You go ahead and you give to the GSA.”

As far as the north parking lot goes, rather than go through a series of transfers, we were going to have the owners of that property, meaning Bob Sullivan and his associates, transfer the property directly to the GSA. I ended up drafting the deeds that those owners used to give the property to the GSA along with some other documentation that had to be filed. I offered to the GSA to record the documents so we have a clear record title. Instead, they wanted to hire a title company here to oversee the process for them and I ended up sending the deeds to that title company. Those deeds have never since seen the light of day. I know what happened to them. The title company sent them to the GSA and the GSA put them in a drawer somewhere. The GSA insisted on looking at them before they were actually recorded. So, at that point, and I remember it and I’ve got correspondence and phone records where I told the GSA, “Why don’t you get this thing recorded and get it done? I’m finished. I’m done with the Commemorative Committee. I’m not going to work on this anymore.”

It sat in limbo for many years until the Foundation felt this is a valuable piece of property. We can have that parking lot. I think you were involved at that stage. And, Richard, you are probably less patient with lawyers than anybody that I know because, frankly, you’re part of the problem and I’ll tell you why you’re part of the problem. I came up with a trust agreement between the Foundation and the archivist about how we were going to get that parking lot. We were going to make some money off it and we had some freedom to use it. The Archives were happy with it. They were going to do it. But it required an act of Congress to transfer the property to the Foundation.

Smith: Can I interrupt? I want to ask you, because it’s all coming back to me, but because of the fact that the documentation had been sent to GSA and never recorded, did you ever lose ownership of it?

Sweeney: We never had ownership. The owners were still Bob Sullivan and his associates, as far as the record title was concerned. Now, I recorded a memorandum of our land contract which showed that we were purchasing it. I recorded the transfer of our land contract interest to the GSA. But the GSA just sat on the whole thing. And so, we had to get Vern Ehlers involved to transfer this property. And, of course, I already knew the title was not clear, but Vern Ehlers insisted on the Right of Reverter and, if you remember, the property had been appraised with a value of one dollar. The Foundation hired an appraiser to tell us after the act of Congress that, by giving this property to the Foundation with Vern Ehler’s Right of Reverter, it is, as a marketable instrument, worthless. As a possible use, as long as we don’t change the use, we can continue to use it as a parking lot. If we do anything else with it, we have to get the permission of the Archives and so on. But, I know the GSA had the documents because I’ve talked to their lawyer in Chicago 20-25 years ago, whenever it was, and I don’t think they ever sent them to the Archives in Washington when the Presidential Library System was spun off. I think they may have, but I doubt it.

So they’re sitting in a file in Chicago. But my affidavit will clear the title because we have an act of Congress transferring the property to the Foundation and, frankly, an act of Congress is even better than my affidavit. So, we’re in business. If anybody is interested, they should look a the file for the museum’s north parking lot at the Ken County Register of Deeds. The affidavit gives the full story.

Smith: But it must be used as a parking lot.
Sweeney: Yes, basically. It’s the most aggravating set of issues I’ve ever dealt with in my over 35 years of legal practice. Frustrating. It’s just frustrating. And you were part of my frustration, just so you know that. I remember.

Smith: And my motives were pure. I wanted to get access.

Sweeney: And you wanted a one page agreement and I said, “It's not going to work that way, Richard.”

Smith: I knew that intellectually.

Sweeney: Okay. But, anyway, that’s the state of it. Whatever happens.

Smith: Was there real debate about choosing this site?

Sweeney: Oh, yes, absolutely. Because, again, Fred Meijer wanted the site out on Bradford, but this was so logical in so many ways. There was a lot of controversy, though.

Smith: And what was on the site at the time?

Sweeney: At the time, the city owned part of the property and there were some abandoned buildings that the city had already condemned. The most controversial part of the entire acquisition was something called the Little Red Schoolhouse which was owned by Monarch Machinery, the Jackaboise family. That was where, apparently, and I’m not sure if this part is true, but I think it’s true, that it is where they actually started Monarch Machinery, in this little red barn. And the city was condemning it by means of eminent domain for a public purpose so it would become part of the site. I’ll never forget. I was in my partner John Logee’s office. John was mayor of Grand Rapids for quite a few years, I don’t know how many. But I was there the afternoon or whatever time of day it was when the Little Red Schoolhouse burned down. And Susie Logee, the mayor’s wife, was in the office with me and she virtually accused the Commemorative Committee and me in particular, of burning down the Little Red Schoolhouse so we could get the property for our museum. But there was nothing terribly useful here other than, where the north parking lot is, there were several storefronts.
Smith: We’ve been told that there were some people who saw it as inadequate. It really required an active imagination to envision what it might be. Was there in fact, in addition to Fred’s offer, concern that “Why do you want to put this facility here?”

Sweeney: Sure, from a commercial level, it’s not the highest and best use. I mean, you can do other things commercially with it. But again, the Public Museum is not the most economic use of that property either. Obviously, it’s become an attraction for the rest of downtown and I think on a net basis, it was a very appropriate decision, even on an economic basis. But, yes, there were people that thought, first of all, that we were really being piggish to insist on all this parking place, which, again, the museum does not need. We understand that. But this was something that probably Fred Meijer and Dick Ford were most adamant about. “We are going to have parking space.” And so we got it.

Smith: The other thing that is hard to imagine today, but if you go back 30-40 years, there was on the part of many people a real reluctance to come downtown.

Sweeney: Yes, that’s true.

Smith: And presumably, this was before the city had rediscovered the river. Launching a renaissance.

Sweeney: Yes, that’s true.

Smith: Which leads to the question of, and again I don’t want to overstate it, but how much of a catalyst was this institution in terms of what has transpired since?

Sweeney: I don’t want to overstate it either, but I think it certainly was a major catalyst. I think that it made possible the public museum across the road. Otherwise, I don’t know where it would’ve been other than its old location, which was really hopeless from an expansion point of view and a facility point of view. I think it’s been a lure to Grand Valley, another public institution, to locate where it has. And that renaissance, to use your term is continuing. I think it was a major influence. I really do.

Smith: I mean, for example, the impetus for the hotel and everything.
Sweeney: Absolutely, because the dedication of the museum occurred in conjunction of the dedication of the revised Amway, the old – now I’m even forgetting what it was.

Smith: The Pantlind.

Sweeney: The Pantlind. Exactly. That occurred simultaneously. That was the same period of time.

Smith: And was a burial site always part of the package?

Sweeney: Yes. Well, I shouldn’t say that, but certainly by the time we broke ground, it was envisioned in that location.

Smith: We’ll be talking to Marvin Dewinter tomorrow, but – and I guess there’s always controversy about this sort of thing - was there controversy about the design of the building?

Sweeney: Sure. We had a number of architectural firms submit designs. What goes with that, particularly in the local community, is you do get controversy and you do get pressure. But Marv came up with what was clearly the most creative and, from my standpoint and I think the other members of the committee, the most attractive alternative. He was very persuasive in our meetings with him and he stuck by his original plan to a very large extent. There was very little that anyone could do to move him off of his design. We were coordinating that with a group that you’re probably familiar with, Staples and Charles, who was the design firm for the exhibits. So, we had to coordinate all that together. But Marv did a very good job for us. He really did. And I have to mention the contractor, too, Owen Ames Kimball, an outstanding contractor. They happen to have been my client, but that had nothing to do with their selection as the contractor. But we did have outside people, outside of Grand Rapids, try to bid on some of these major parts, but we stuck with our choices and we felt we made the right decision.

Smith: It’s a very interesting building. It’s unconventional in some ways without being avant garde.
Sweeney: Oh, yes, that was all conscious on Marv’s part. You can verify that tomorrow. President Ford endorsed it without a lot of concern. I remember Marv brought his model in and it was not a terribly fancy model of the building. My recollection is that he used a mirror or something that was on the model to show the river. But that was certainly a major part of the consideration. Right out in front here, Ah-Nab-Awen Park, I believe it's called, was a sacred site to the Indians. So that all had to be preserved as part of the construction process. And the city did retain title to that park by the riverfront.

Smith: Were there obvious question raised about the design? Having been through this process several times, it’s always struck me as in some ways. You’ve got a local group with enormous enthusiasm and commitment, willing to do whatever it takes, but without the kind of necessary experience. I mean, you don’t build a presidential library all the time.

Sweeney: True.

Smith: And they’re unique institutions that have unique requirements and museums and so on and so on. And finding the right mix of professional experience with the grass roots enthusiasm and commitment—

Sweeney: First of all, Jordan Shepherd was a builder. Jordan Shepherd was the chairman of the Gerald R. Ford Commemorative Committee. He knew construction. He knew design. There were a hundred times - more than that - two hundred times, where Jordan contributed something that none of the rest of us would have considered. For example, when we were going to be putting the asphalt on the parking lots, he insisted that every bit of foundation or surface that had been there before, either be removed or pulverized, so there would not be a water table that could damage the asphalt. I mean, that’s just one example. The discussions about the elevator, the discussions about the windows, this is not necessarily the best use of space, I suppose a circle or square does better than this triangle kind of construction. You can look at that corner there, you have a plant there, but it’s really not the best use of space, but everybody, I think, was quite enthusiastic about the fundamental design. I really do.
Smith: I guess what I was trying to say is that it’s a dramatic building without being over the top.

Sweeney: You’re absolutely right. And I think that Marv took into account the concern about, you know, we’re basically still a conservative community and most of the people on our Commemorative Committee were business people and fairly conservative themselves. So, I think he pushed the envelope, but he didn’t rip it open.

Smith: Well put. I imagine there had to be concerns about cost. Did they reach the point where there were any significant modifications made during the design process?

Sweeney: On cost factors?

Smith: For example, NARA wishes, in retrospect, that they hadn’t put the fountain in. In fact, I think it’s almost an unwritten rule now that presidential libraries don’t have water features.

Sweeney: Really? I didn’t know that. Yeah, that was expensive, but we were prepared to spend more. I mean, the walkway would’ve cost a small fortune. You know, let me put it this way. Yes, there were concerns about finishes and so on, but I don’t believe that we ever compromised the fundamental structure or the design concepts. We got the conceptual design, which normally is one of the earlier parts of an architectural and construction contract, and I was responsible for that contract with Marv Dewinter and also with Evan Ames Kimball. I can remember we did have an issue about change orders, but they were relatively few given the size of the project. And again, as you said, we didn’t have the staff. Nobody was getting paid for our end of it. We did have, and he was very helpful, Will Jones, who I think he might’ve been with the U.S. Information Agency before he went to the Archives. He was the Archives point person on this project. He became the first Executive Director of the Museum and Library, so he had an institutional orientation that was also very helpful to us. But, no, I think we took the design and we did it the right way without major compromise.

Smith: The design of the gravesite, was that kind of always—Sweeney: I don’t know how much Marv Dewinter had to do with that. I can’t remember that detail. Dave LeClaire, being a photographer and involved in the arts also, was involved in the discussions about the architecture, too, and had a good sense of it. He really did.

Smith: Now, President Ford was clearly a fiscal conservative.

Sweeney: Yes.

Smith: I think it’s safe to say that none of you or him at that point envisioned an endowment, for example, growing to what it is today.

Sweeney: I think that’s true and I think that at that point in time, I can’t say we had a lot of confidence in the National Archives to continue to support this place. It was a turnkey operation, as you know. We had to turn it over to GSA without them making a major contribution themselves. We did have some money. I can’t remember how much we had. I’m guessing it was in the hundreds of thousands rather than the millions that we had left over, but when you look at what’s happening with museums today, I read that George W. Bush is looking to raise $500 million. I mean, that’s several orders of magnitude beyond what we were looking at and a lot of our contributions were relatively modest. They really were. We worked hard.

Smith: The concept of a museum that, in addition to the permanent exhibit, would have programs and temporary exhibits. Was that not factored in at the outset, or was it imagined but on a more modest scale?

Sweeney: I think it was envisioned primarily by Staples and Charles, the design people, and also Will Jones. We did have this very large first floor space that has been given to the temporary type exhibit in addition to the core exhibit. So, I would say, yes, it was contemplated.

Smith: How did President Ford’s fiscal conservatism manifest itself?

Sweeney: We didn’t spend that much money. We really didn’t. I think he was very pleased with how things went. He did not want a cathedral to Gerald R. Ford built. That was not what he was looking for. In fact, I can remember when we came up with our statement of purpose for the IRS application for tax exemption and the articles of incorporation and things like that, I think he was a little embarrassed about some of the language - that we were memorializing the life and times of Gerald R. Ford. He was interested in it from a historic perspective. And, I’ll tell you, one of the things that he insisted on, and sometimes with the opposition of Betty, was that he wanted the truth. He did not want this to be some sort of paean to him and it wasn’t. He wanted the helicopter exhibit from when they had to take the people from Saigon, the very last hold outs when we lost the war in Vietnam. He wanted things like that shown. He did not want to sugarcoat the Nixon resignation. And so, this museum - and I’ve been to many others, even some of the really old, old ones that aren’t really museums, you know, James K. Polk, Rutherford B. Hayes, Calvin Coolidge - this one is reality and, again, you deserve part of the credit for that.

Smith: I know what you mean in that it reflects his character and his view of history.

Sweeney: Yes, absolutely.

Smith: Did he change over time?

Sweeney: Yes. He changed over time in the sense that he did get a lot older but he never became less gracious. I did notice in his last, I would say, 18 months or two years, there was a noticeable loss of vitality and mental acuity. I remember, and I think you might have been Executive Director at the time, that his last appearance before the Washington Press Club did not include a question and answer period. He was under stress, but he was a very elderly man. He was still very fit, but he had some health issues. Those are the changes. But other than that, no. He was unpretentious as president. He was unpretentious as a former president.

Smith: One thing that struck me as curious, and I actually made reference to it in the eulogy, traditionally and stereotypically, we tend to become more conservative as we get older. I found that he, in some ways, defied that. Maybe part of that was that the party went so far to the Right, but, you know, he was very open and tolerant. I’ve often wondered how much was Betty’s influence upon him.
Joe Sweeney  May 10, 2010

Sweeney: Could be.

Smith: In that sense, he seemed a somewhat different figure from what he’d been in the White House.

Sweeney: Yeah, he may have done a John Paul Stevens on us to some degree, because that was his appointment. I should mention one thing about fiscal conservatism that you’ll find interesting and you may already know it. But I remember when there was the big run up of stocks during the high tech bubble and all of these funds were just making multiple returns of two digits, 20%, and so on. Well, of course, we had a fairly conservative investment portfolio. And, of all people, he and Fred Meijer said, “Let’s forget about these fixed income things. Let’s go into equities.” Far beyond what I as an attorney representing a non-profit would say was prudent. And, of course, we got burned pretty badly when the bubble burst. Now, that’s all been restored. We’ve diversified quite a bit, but President Ford went along with that. He was happy to go ahead and jump into the swimming pool with everybody else. And that’s contrary to what a fiscal conservative would normally do. But he endorsed that decision.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction at the time of his death?

Sweeney: Yes, a little bit. It was a real outpouring. It was incredible. Yeah, I was. The visitations, the funeral procession from the church to here and to the church. Yes, very much so. I think it was much more profound here locally than it was nationally. That was my impression. I could be wrong. But he really touched an awful lot of people in this community and in West Michigan. He really did.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Sweeney: By your eulogy. I’m not patronizing you; I mean that very sincerely. I think it was a remarkable document, a remarkable piece of literature. I think he should be remembered, first of all, as a good human being who had compassion. He was far more intelligent than people ever gave him credit for. He had wisdom, great character. Plus, one heck of a politician. He may not have been a politician of the stripe of Lyndon Johnson or Joe Cannon or Huey Long, as you mentioned earlier, but he got things done. We could use some Jerry Fords today.

Smith: I’ve often wondered about the notion that he was without guile, because it should not mean that he was without calculation or ambition. And I’ve often wondered if he rather shrewdly put to use his reputation as ‘good old Jerry Ford’ and was underestimated.

Sweeney: I’m certain, Richard. I’m certain. I mean, Yale Law School, University of Michigan. He was no dummy. I think he was very shrewd. There were a lot of issues that came up involving individuals where a decision had to be made, you know, ‘Is this the right way to approach this person for money?’ or ‘Is the right way to handle this controversy?’ He had great common sense and great instincts and we ran into a lot of those. I couldn’t recite them all for you. I guess I mentioned a couple.

Smith: I remember one. It showed a vulnerability that you did not often see. At one point, he had asked Walter Annenberg for something, a fairly significant gift, but certainly within Walter Annenberg’s means. Annenberg turned him down and Ford was very burned by that. There was something very personal about that and he said, “I’m never going to do that again.” I mean, it was an unpleasant experience.

Sweeney: I don’t think he liked to solicit money. I don’t know that very many people do. I mean, Bob Hooker does. Peter Secchia does. You know, those two guys. But I don’t think President Ford was ever terribly comfortable and I also think that when he did solicitations, like from Mr. Max Fischer, for example, I think they understood his discomfort and I think it was very difficult to say no to him because they did know how difficult it was. So there was some compassion there and that probably served to his advantage, too, although that was not calculating. I think it was difficult for him. I do. Bob Hope turned us down, speaking of that, with all of his millions. I mean, Bob Hope, he gave us maybe a little bit, but probably what the little old ladies in church gave us, but he was a good friend of President Ford. I don’t know that President Ford ever directly asked him for money. Including all of the Foundation years. But Bob Hope held onto it.
Smith: My theory was he believed he would take it with him.

Sweeney: I think you’re right. Yes.

Smith: It’s interesting that you made reference to the last speech he did in Washington. Because he was very dissatisfied with himself and said the next day, “That’s the last speech I’m giving.” And I think part of that he had seen Bob Hope’s very public decline.

Sweeney: Yes. I think you’re right.

Smith: I think it was a cautionary lesson. It got to the point where Delores was dragging him out. It was painful in the circle to see.

Sweeney: It was.

Smith: You’d have to be pretty insensitive to have that not make an impression.

Sweeney: Yes, and they were close. President Ford never embarrassed himself. Nobody felt embarrassed for him. Yes, that last presentation was a difficult one for him, but I think that, again, given his age and everything else. There were some things that he did contemporaneously that were taped for television or other purposes, where he still showed real intelligence and mental acuity.

Smith: And to the end he remained very proud of this place.

Sweeney: Yes he did.

Smith: For all that he was modest about it, pride co-existed with the modesty.

Sweeney: Yes.

Smith: Perfect. Thank you.

Smith: How did your paths first cross with Gerald Ford?

Baab: My first contact with President Ford began in June of 1988, which I think would have been just prior to his 75th birthday. And the occasion was the annual meeting for the Board of Trustees of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Foundation, and it was the start for me – I was en route to nearly twenty years of service as the treasurer of the Foundation. So that’s how I got my start.

Smith: Presumably you are uniquely qualified to testify to the fact to whatever else changed, Gerald Ford remained very much a fiscal conservative.

Baab: Oh, that’s true. When I took over as the treasurer I had the background of my predecessor telling me that sitting in on all the meetings of investments for the Foundation, it was very much bonds. He didn’t want to get into stocks, very risky. There was a very high percentage of bonds versus stocks when the Foundation first started. So he was conservative in his investments, but he was also conservative in his spending. For years we have operated with a spending policy that says we will not spend beyond these parameters, and from time to time those perimeters get changed. But President Ford was always very much involved with setting those perimeters and always wanted to hear that we are living within the limits that we had previously set up as a board.

Smith: Do you think maybe being a child of the Depression had something to do with shaping his fiscal outlook?

Baab: I wouldn’t be surprised. I think if I had lived through it, it would have shaped me. I’ve heard stories from fathers and fathers-in-law of what it was like. And just hearing that secondhand, I think it would be very much an influence.
Smith: And I think it is also safe to say that notwithstanding that attitude, or maybe reflecting that, no one really then had an idea of having an endowment. It started off with a very modest endowment.

Baab: It was very modest. It was under five million dollars. It might have been a million or something. It really wasn’t much at all. I don’t think the start of the Foundation, from what I understand, was ever conceived in terms of what it is today. I think it was a learning process.

Smith: Was he part of that learning process?

Baab: Oh, yes. President Ford – my contact, as I said earlier, started at age 75, but I will tell you that all my contacts with him in public meetings, whether it’s the Foundation, Board of Trustees, or the Investment Committee, or one on one conversations dealing with my treasurer’s reports, I always found him to be very much…

Smith: Was he open to new ideas? Within these core convictions that he had, did his attitude evolve in terms of, for example, what the Foundation would do, what it would need.

Baab: The point I was going to make is that even though over that span of time, he had those core convictions. What impressed me the most was how alert he stayed. That’s the point I was going to make - that you can have these core convictions, and they led him. He had his values, he had his core convictions, but the point that surprised me is that I met him at age 75, and he was bright, sharp, well into his eighties.

Smith: Inquisitive.

Baab: Yes.

Smith: I remember sitting at a table and you put a column of figures in front of him, and it’s as if the years peeled away and he was back on the House Appropriations Committee. A column of numbers jumped off the page.

Baab: We would go over the treasurer’s reports with questions. Invariably, he had good questions. I was surprised at the depth of those questions. There are people who probably have keener minds with financial backgrounds, maybe than he did, but I was also surprised when I’d give him a report that he would get right to the heart of the questions that I thought needed to be asked. He didn’t have wasteful questions; they were very thoughtful; showed a very strong command of the material.

Smith: He also did his homework.

Baab: He did his homework.

Smith: I don’t know what prompted it, maybe it was with you, but he was asking about Morningstar. He was sort of trying to get some comparative opinions about investment opportunities and mutual funds and so forth and so on. And one sensed that he was very comfortable talking about money.

Baab: Oh, yes.

Smith: I suppose he’d been doing it for most of his professional life.

Baab: Yeah. I think the fact, what you said earlier, the work on the Appropriations bills and the federal budget, he was comfortable with numbers. He didn’t have a fear of asking a dumb question. Some people might have that fear, especially when they are in a room of experts, maybe so-called experts. They might be reluctant, they might not understand something, but they don’t want to ask it for fear that they might look dumb or don’t understand it. He never had that fear. He was very confident.

Smith: That goes to the notion of someone totally comfortable in their own skin. How did he change over the fifteen years?

Baab: Fifteen or eighteen years that I worked with him? Interestingly, I found him to be the same at the end of that period as I did at the beginning. And I know that there are few people at his advanced age that could have a command of what he did. I was so impressed with that. It wasn’t just the financial part. You would appreciate this: when we went to the annual board of trustees meeting, typically in Washington, we would begin before the executive committee and full board meeting later in the afternoon, we’d start with a luncheon at the National Press Club. And we’d present the Foundation’s Journalism prizes to some very deserving recipients. That would be done.

Then President Ford would be asked to make some brief comments, and then he would open the lectern and just say, “Okay, questions. What questions would you like to ask?” And I was always impressed that he could handle those questions, not only at age 75, but when he was 85 and 87, 88, he had not lost the ability to keep up with current events. He was able to handle the questions regardless of sensitivity. I was impressed that – I can’t recall ever, Richard – a time when he refused to answer a question. Either because he didn’t know the material, wasn’t current on it, or for some other reasons – too sensitive to talk about. He didn’t duck a question. He typically would hear the question, pause a couple seconds just to gather his thoughts, and he’d come out with the answer. And I can remember when he did that how I would sit there and listen to some of those questions and certainly I didn’t have his perspective of what all he had been through, but he impressed the daylights out of me that, here he was, that elderly in his life and still able to talk about any subject the press brought up.

Smith: It’s curious you say that because one of the things he really worked at, and I think prided himself on, was keeping abreast of current events. You’d get on a plane and everyone knew you didn’t bother him until he’d read all of his newspapers. And all of his newspapers, and there were several that he read every day. That was part of this self-education, maybe keeping young, but keeping current, at least.

Baab: I had the privilege with my wife to attend a dinner at his home one evening.

Smith: In Rancho Mirage?

Baab: Yes, Rancho Mirage. And I know that’s not unique to me, many others have done that, but we sat there, the six of us – two couples plus the Fords, and just talked about world events. Talked about what’s going on. No matter what remote part of the world, he was on top of it. And you could tell as he related things that he was in touch with the leaders of these countries. Yet, it wasn’t just, “I read this in the newspaper.” But he had ongoing contact with people who he had met and people would call him to bounce things off of him. They considered him a source. I thought that was really insightful.

Smith: That’s interesting. Did you ever see him at a football game?

Baab: No, did not do that.

Smith: Or watching a football game?

Baab: No, I never had that privilege; I would liked to have done that. One of the things that first made us hit it off with each other was when he found out I was a University of Michigan grad. I’ve got the rings and the M watches and all that stuff. And that was always something, no matter what we were talking about; we always had that to talk about. It was something he had great joy and pleasure in talking about.

Smith: That’s interesting. And I felt that found expression in splitting this facility – the fact that he had dual obligations, in a sense. This was home and that was a second home.

Baab: Yeah. He loved to come back and go to football games when he could. And he loved to watch it on TV and talk to the people.

Smith: We had a great conversation with Lloyd Carr the other day, in which he described the pep talks that he would give every year – often before the Ohio game, if he could arrange it.

This place – tell me a little bit more, sort of institutionally – how you would describe the evolution, both of the Foundation and its mission over the twenty years that you were involved. How did he, first of all, set the tone or define the mission?

Baab: He wanted the museum and the library both to be something that was living. He didn’t want it to be a monument to himself. That was not said for effect. That was [said] in small groups. He would just make it clear, “I don’t want that. I want this to be of education to the people who will come to see it.” And anytime we talked about doing something, that was a key thing guiding him in his decision making. Will this edify the presidency and will it edify democracy and the presidency and what all goes on in this country? A great love for the country, doing what’s right for the country – he wanted all of that to come through, not what he, as an individual, did to make it great. He obviously has a great legacy of things he helped to make. But there was no personal aggrandizement, if I can say that.

Smith: Although you weren’t probably part of the process then, maybe a little distance is even more valuable – Fred offered land outside of downtown and the decision, I think, made with the President’s strong involvement was to put it downtown. And it was almost a leap of faith at the time to put it here. Is it a catalyst for what’s happened since?

Baab: Was it a part of it? Oh, absolutely. How many cities in America can claim to have a presidential museum? That’s very distinctive. There are fewer of those, I’m sure, that there are professional sports teams which so many organizations like to point to – well, this city has this professional sports team – how does that compare to what this country is all about? I know it’s a popular thing, but Grand Rapids isn’t large enough to support a professional sports team. But to have a presidential museum, I think is something very unique, very special. Something you can be proud of when you come to Grand Rapids, and to Ann Arbor for the university to have that presidential library.

Smith: Those who knew him knew he spent a lifetime, mostly successfully, controlling a temper. Did you ever see his temper?

Baab: In all candor, I have heard about his temper, but in all honesty, I never saw it once. Sometimes there would be a situation in a meeting and I would say, “Oh I wonder if this will be the tip of iceberg. I’ll start to see it here.” I never saw it. Doesn’t mean it wasn’t there, based on what other people tell me. But I cannot say that I ever saw it firsthand.

Smith: I assume you must have been in the meeting, part of the discussion - because I know there was some disagreement - over the idea of bringing the staircase from the embassy here.

Baab: Yes. I was not involved in that meeting. I’d be happy to share that with you, but no, I was not a part of that.
Smith: Okay. Did you see his sense of humor?

Baab: Oh, yes, I did. In fact, I thought I saw probably a greater sense of humor from him say, even at the National Press Club deliveries because, he was not a sitting president anymore and more relaxed about it. Probably don’t have to be as concerned that tomorrow’s headlines in the Washington paper and New York Times is going to say, “President Ford said the following.” Not as high a profile. So he could laugh, I thought, easier probably than when he was president. He could relax more. I always found he was willing to poke fun at himself; a lot of people can’t do that. That, to me, always elevates people when they can poke fun at themselves.

Smith: Did you hear him talk about Ronald Reagan or Jimmy Carter or any of his contemporaries?

Baab: No. I can’t say. I know a lot of what’s been written, but I never heard him say, if there was a discussion brought up for instance when we had the re-dedication here of the museum. At the exhibits we had President Carter here for that, and other dignitaries. I only remember positive comments from him. And I suspect some of that – probably you know this better than I do – I suspect that after you get out of office, things look different. You put them more in perspective and appreciate maybe why an adversary did what he or she did.

Smith: And my sense is that he was a very positive person, generally. One thing I noticed whenever I was around him - most pols love to gossip - he didn’t gossip. In fact, it was interesting, I noticed a couple of times when people were doing that, he would subtly change the topic of conversation. He wasn’t speculating about other people or their motives or their misfortunes. It wasn’t part of him.

Baab: I never saw that part of him.

Smith: What does it say that year after year after year that people would come as they do and volunteer their services as they did? What is it about the man himself and what he inspired?
Baab: Well, I can tell you personally, it was a sense of great pride to be asked to be treasurer, and I told him that, “I assure you that I will do all I can as treasurer of the museum and the library. I won’t ever cause you to be embarrassed. I want you do to take comfort in the knowledge that we will make sure that we’re doing the right things, we won’t be hiding things, it will all be out in the open and there will be no ______________.” And he appreciated that. That’s what’s I’m about and I didn’t say it to make him pleased, I just wanted him to understand where I was coming from – that I was going to be a protective watch dog to be sure nothing was happening that would put him in a bad light and his legacy. And he was appreciative of that. And the reason I said that and felt that was, I knew people regarded him as a figure of high integrity. That word might even be considered overused by some people. We’ve heard the integrity a bazillion times – but it fits. And to not use it, you’d have to create a new word, because it’s really what’s he was about.

Smith: And I’ve often thought, in some ways, as a kind of decency is almost used as a condescending term.

Baab: Yeah.

Smith: As if it was sort of a substitute for sophistication.

Baab: If you weren’t up here on some - I don’t know if it would be an intellectual level, or what someone might be considering a high thing - to admire, decency doesn’t seem to rate up there as high with people. And it should.

Smith: Right. What is it about Grand Rapids, do you think, that defined him, or that he took with him wherever he went? What is it about this community that’s distinguishing?

Baab: I think the community reinforces the hard work ethic, which he had. You didn’t get to places of accomplishment by doing things half heartedly, cheating your way to get there, finding ways to achieve what you want without just doing it through hard work. I think the community reflects that and he came out of that type of an environment.
Smith: One of the meetings in the later years, I think, maybe was the next to last, or maybe it was the last one, I’m not sure – was held out in Rancho Mirage. The annual meeting was actually out there to accommodate them – or was it in Vail?

Baab: That was before me, I think.

Smith: No, this was toward the very end.

Baab: Okay.

Smith: It may have been the last one, where Mrs. Ford received the Ford prize and he announced, tongue in cheek, that he was Deep Throat. This was when all the revelations were coming.

Baab: In Rancho Mirage – oh I thought you were talking about Colorado.

Smith: Yeah. Do you remember that?

Baab: Oh, yes. That I remember.

Smith: And when he got up and announced that he was Deep Throat, did it take people a moment to realize it was a joke?

Baab: I recognized right away that it was humor. That was a great meeting.

Smith: What about that night stands out in your memory? Did you have a sense that it might be the last?

Baab: Yeah, there was that possibility. I can’t remember what the presentation was, but there was a presentation near the end of the meeting and it involved President Ford. And I thought that physically he might be winding down to a point where it could be. I started to sense that. As high accolades as I gave earlier to his tremendous memory and all, in the last year or two I finally started to see this happen. But you’re right, the Rancho Mirage meeting – there was an indication that there could be.

Smith: Were you here for his 90th birthday?

Baab: Yes.
Smith: What was that like? The whole community sort of took part?

Baab: Yes.

Smith: It was a big event.

Baab: Yes. All the things to do with President Ford here, even his funeral, everything – I think people have been surprised at the turnout that a lot of people who didn’t know him, know about him, and it wasn’t just a bunch of old cronies that knew him that turned out. There were people with no known previous connection with him that turned out for him.

Smith: That’s interesting. Were you surprised by the outpouring at the time of his death? Not only here, but nationwide – in terms of the media coverage and the response that it seemed to generate?

Baab: Yeah, I was probably proportionately even more surprised here because we’re smaller. And I figure that in a place like Washington, it’s the thing to do. You do that sort of thing and people turn out because it’s the thing to do. Whereas here people didn’t turn out because it was the thing to do, it was an expression of real appreciation and love for the man. So much was written. People who were interviewed for comments about him; of what he had done for them personally. Personal stories about what he’d done. And you’d say, man, that guy’s too busy, how did he find time to do all of that? I know when my own father died there was an obituary in the paper – no big deal. But I got a letter, not a sympathy card, but I got a wonderful letter from President Ford expressing his sympathy on what had happened, and it was in own words, it wasn’t Hallmark giving him the words. He had his own words of what he wanted to say about that and how important fathers are.

Smith: And he would have a unique perspective.

Baab: Yes, he would.

Smith: Good and bad.

Baab: Good and bad. The first two years weren’t so good, but he had great perspective after that.
Smith: Did you hear him talk about his early days or family situation?

Baab: No, I didn’t hear him do that. But that kind of thing he did for me, I know he did for other people. I got many letters from him over the years, thanking me for things I had done that I just felt like I had done in the course of my duty, so to speak. But he was a grateful man, very grateful.

Smith: Was that meeting out in Rancho Mirage, was that the last time you saw him?

Baab: I don’t believe so. I’m fuzzy as to when it was, but I don’t think that was. I’d have to check on it.

Smith: In terms of discussing investment policy or finances generally, how many people were involved. Was this the executive committee debating the policy?

Baab: We had some of the very well-known names of Grand Rapids sitting in there on the investment committee giving advice. These are some of the real pillars of the community here, and they were giving advice when we were pushing to move into greater investment in stocks as opposed to bonds, and President Ford was resistant to that. It took some of these stalwarts in the community to give their own experiences from their own foundations to say well, here, we’ve done this and here’s what our results have been.

Smith: And was Fred Meijer the chief proponent, at least initially of taking a more…

Baab: Aggressive stance in that investment policy, yes. Yes, he was.

Smith: And the President was persuaded? Or reluctantly persuaded?

Baab: Never to the point of as high a percentage as what these gentlemen and ladies would have liked. They would have liked more. One of the things about President Ford that always impressed me was that he was a good listener. At least when I was around him, he listened well. And so he would listen to these people, but he wasn’t a pushover, not a pushover at all. He listened, digested it, but in the end he didn’t go as far as they wanted to go, to his credit. It could have been easy for him to say, “Well, you are all into this more than I am with your corporations.” He still went by his own personal feelings.
Yeah, he was a good listener. I think you can see that when you see what he surrounded himself with in the Cabinet and the White House staff. If you look at what happened to those people after his administration disbanded and what those people went on to do, you have to be a good listener to put people in who’ve got minds of their own, who want to do things - to be able to put them into those positions of responsibility and not be threatened.

Smith: No, it’s a good point. Did you have any contact, or more than passing contact, with Mrs. Ford?

Baab: Not nearly as much. But my contact with her, whether it was sitting with her at a luncheon table or dinner table, whether it was a public event dinner table or at her home, she was extremely gracious; very down to earth. Those people didn’t have a bone in their body that pushed their own aggrandizement. They were very humble.

Smith: She has a sense of humor.

Baab: Yes.

Smith: Which I think could needle him at times, and he enjoyed being needled. It was that kind of comfortable back and forth. How do you think he should be remembered?

Baab: A great leader, confident in who he was, willing to do what was right for the country, far above anything that had an impact on him. The presidential pardon of Nixon speaks volumes – I can’t say anymore that would add to that as an indication of doing what was right for the country. That’s where his motivation would lie, and I don’t think he was concerned about his legacy and what people would say that would make him rank number one in people’s polls of the all-time greatest presidents. I think it was motivated by “When it’s done, did I do my best to be sure this country was taken care of the way it should, given what all was going on?” I think that was his motivation.

Smith: Anything else come to mind?

Baab: A very memorable time. September 11, 2001 is a date in history that all Americans will remember. They know it’s one of those few dates that people remember where they were, what they were doing. Tragic events unfolded that day and it was meaningful to me because of the reasons that everyone else had. I was no less surprised than everybody else at the shock of what happened. But it’s meaningful to me in another way because on September 11, 2001, I had a meeting scheduled with President Ford to talk about the financial statements of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Foundation. And we had our set up time. This was not unusual, we did this from time to time as it time pertaining to things financial.

Smith: Was that in Vail?

Baab: No, it was going to be a telephone conversation. It was a telephone conversation and so as the events of that day unfolded in that morning and we all became aware of just what an incredible event this was that was unfolding here, I started thinking, “My meeting to discuss the financial statements of the Foundation pales in comparison to what’s going on.” And I started thinking, “Surely he isn’t expecting me to call at our previously arranged time.” And so I thought, well, I’ll just run it by somebody else. So I called Marty Allen, the chairman of the Foundation and long time friend of President Ford, as you know, and I said, “Marty, here’s what I’m thinking,” and he listened to me and he says, “Yeah, John, I see where you are coming from. You’re probably right. If you don’t call him he won’t be surprised, he might be relieved.” And so I let it go.

At the time the telephone conversation was to take place and I didn’t appear, the phone rang shortly thereafter from Penny Circle, from President Ford’s office, asking, “Why didn’t you get on the phone? President Ford is wondering what happened?” And I said, “Oh, surely his plate was full.” She says, “Yeah, that’s true, but I think he wants to talk to you.” I said, “Even now?” “Yes.” So I was put through to President Ford and I apologized. I said, “I figured you would be inundated by the media for your reaction to the events of the day.” And he says, “Oh, John, you are absolutely right. The phone has been ringing off the hook. Reporters are at the door, the cameramen, they all are here.”
But then he added, “John, life goes on. Life should not come to a paralyzing standstill because of terrorists. That’s exactly what they wanted to happen.”
And he says, “I will not give in to them and that sort of thinking. We carry on our lives. We don’t stop paralyzed.” And then he added, shortly thereafter, something to the effect that “Sadly, John, I firmly believe this is not the end of this. Getting through this event, figuring it all out, sorting it, punishing the guilty parties, we are going to face terrorism like this for a long time.” And that was his parting comment on that subject. And then he said, “Let’s get on with the business at hand,” and we proceeded to go into the usual discussion of the financial statements. But I was impressed, surprised, that he felt compelled to not let that stop him from doing what he was going to do that day.

Smith: That’s a great story.

Baab: Another thing that pointed out President Ford’s concern for people and showing his appreciation, a very appreciative man - when I retired from my professional career, my firm held a retirement dinner to honor the occasion.
And at the end of the festivities that evening, I was just extremely surprised that a video started showing and it was President Ford making some very kind remarks about his appreciation for what all I had done for the Foundation as the treasurer and serving on the executive committee. And I was just blown away that he would do that. It was very humbling to think that he took that kind of time. But I later found out that he just didn’t do like somebody came to his home; he drove down to a recording studio and he did this video and it wasn’t to his liking. They did it, I think, three times in order to get it right.
And that was important to him to do what was right.

Smith: That’s interesting, do you remember roughly when that would have been?

Baab: ’98.

Smith: Time was good to him. Poor Lyndon Johnson died the day before the Vietnam Peace Agreement was announced. President Ford lived long enough to see people come around on the pardon, and the Profiles in Courage Award.
Baab: The Profiles in Courage Award was a tremendous tribute to him. I’m sure he felt tremendously relieved that history had already started to come around and see him in the light that he had hoped he’d been seen in. Although he was a modest guy, he sort of felt like the record needs to be straight as to why we did this.

Smith: And the imprimatur of the Kennedy’s lent it a kind of legitimacy. He said, “For twenty years, everywhere I go, people have asked the same questions.” After he got that award, he said, “They don’t the questions anymore.”

Baab: Once Ted Kennedy said what he had to say – end of subject.

Smith: Yeah. It’s amazing. Well, thank you again.

Carlson: Over the years, I’ve had the opportunity and the privilege to work with some of the most fascinating and dynamic people in the world. And without a doubt, the person who has impressed me most in all those years was Gerald R. Ford. He was a wonderful, gracious, humble, warm human being. I feel so fortunate to be a small, small part of the Ford administration; a guy like me to be associating with a president, especially Gerald Ford. I had the opportunity to get to know him, of course, on a public basis in meetings and so forth, but I felt very fortunate that I got to know him also, you might say, behind the scenes. I can go into a few of those things.

Smith: Sure.

Carlson: It was really special. But, first of all, every day, we would meet with the President about 10 o’clock every morning; Dick Cheney, Ron Nessen, the press secretary, and we would update the President on what issues were coming up that day. I would get to the White House about 6:15 in the morning and Helen Thomas would arrive about 6:30. Others would come in around 7:00 or so and I would mingle through the pressroom and talk to people and sit down and chat and have coffee.

Smith: So, let’s establish, you were on the press staff.

Carlson: I was deputy press secretary.

Smith: Deputy press secretary working under Nessen.

Carlson: Right. And so I would try to get a feel of what their hot button was that day, what was of interest to them, what kind of questions they were to be asking at the press briefing and so forth. So we met with the President at 10 o’clock. He would’ve already had his NSC briefing, his National Security briefing, but we’d just mention to him, “Today we’re going to announce this,” “We’re going to mention this,” and so forth. Once in awhile, we’d ask him for guidance, but usually we’d be advising him about what was going on in the press that day. And the enjoyable times when that briefing would take 20, 30 minutes or so, and then we’d get ready to leave. Then oftentimes, we might chat about football, a Monday night football game, the University of Michigan, informally, and that was always, always a joy.

But the way I really got to know the President was probably through tennis. President Ford was a great athlete. I think some people know that; most do not. But he was great and he loved to play tennis. I was kind of the intermediary for outside people to play tennis. Within the White House, Roger Porter was, without a doubt, the greatest tennis player, super tennis player and was quite often his partner if it wasn’t Bill Seidman. But I would do things, play tennis, whenever he would call. I’d get a call like on a Saturday morning from the usher or somebody saying, “Could you meet the President for tennis this afternoon?” Of course, we’d drop anything to play tennis with the President. But I would get things like, George H. W. Bush would call me from Beijing, China, and he would say, “I’m going to be back in DC in about ten days. Can you get a match for us with the President?” And, of course, President Ford always loved to play tennis, especially with George Bush.

Smith: Really? Was there a chemistry there?

Carlson: Yeah, real chemistry. But one time I remember so well, Roger Porter was the President’s partner. George Bush was my partner and Bush hit a volley at the net, missed the President’s ear by an inch. Hard, you know, you don’t play that hard against the President. Bush did. And a little while later in the same match, he hit an overhead smash. Creamed the President in the leg. We stopped for a second and President Ford said, “George, your tennis game is improving. Did you do anything in Beijing besides play tennis?” And it was great. So he had a great camaraderie. Jimmy Baker was at Commerce in those days. He would come over. He’d call and he’d say, “Can you get us on the courts this week with the President?” That was always fun. Different things like the Swedish Ambassador to the United States, Willy Wachtmeister, great guy, loved to play tennis. These guys would just give anything to come over and play on the courts with the President; some congressmen and so forth.

So I became that intermediary to help the outside get in. Of course, if the President didn’t want to play with somebody, he would say no, but I don’t think that ever happened. He’d always say, “I’d love to.” He was always so gracious and so warm on these things. We’d go to Vail, Colorado and play tennis in the bubble, in the snow, 20 degrees.

I remember one time, this guy walked up to the courts. We were playing and I saw this guy walk up and I said first of all, “How could this guy even get in here?” Secret Service was all around. We’re changing sides and the guy walked up and introduced himself. He said, “My name is Howard Head. Mr. President, I’ve always admired you…” and so forth. We chatted for a couple of seconds and he said, “I want you to see my latest racket and I want to give this to you as a gift.” And, of course, you know he developed the Prince racket, the oversized racket. That was back in 1975. He also gave me one and I laughed at it to myself. I mean, this big fat racket with a short handle. Of course, that became the way of the future.

Howard had developed the Head skis, the metal skis, the first ones, so he was way ahead of his time. I became friends with him. I met people, so many different people, great people, over the years through the President. I remember playing tennis with Don Rumsfeld and the President in Palm Springs, 95, 99 degree weather. Rumsfeld would come out and play in a wetsuit and President Ford said, “Is that healthy? Is that safe?” And Rummy would say, “I’ve only got 45 minutes. I’ve got to get a good workout in.” And so, those were fun times.

But I would also do things like, when we were in Vail, Colorado, either Ron Nessen or I, quite often I, because I got up so early, would go over and brief the President at 6:30 in the morning where he was staying at the Bass House in Vail and update him on what was going on with the press, the overnight stories. He would always have his National Security briefing, but this was on domestic matters, political issues and so forth. We’re sitting at this kitchen table; Mrs. Ford would come down in her bathrobe, have coffee, sit at the table, and it was just very informal, so relaxed, it was just wonderful.

Then, the President would say, “Betty, where do you want to go tonight for dinner?” And it might be Pepi’s, for example. And so he’d say, “John, Pepi’s it is.” So I’d go back and advise Dick Cheney and the Secret Service, etc.
They’d make arrangements that night, 8 o’clock at Pepi’s, and we’d organize it so the President was in the corner. They’d never block off the restaurant, but he’d be in the corner with about 8 people and then we’d have a buffer of staff tables. I had about six or eight dear friends, half of them had condos in Vail, and others would always come to Vail when we were there, because they enjoyed it so much, seeing the press and the Brokaw’s and Cronkite’s and stuff. And so I’d make reservations for them to be another buffer at the restaurant that night. The Secret Service really appreciated that because they knew, we knew who everybody was in that area of the restaurant. So I really got kind of an inside look at the Fords in those days.

Smith: They loved Vail, didn’t they?

Carlson: Oh, wonderful. And President Ford was such a fabulous skier. I’d get done with him at 7:15, and at 7:30, he’d be off to the slopes. He would tell me who he wanted to ski with the next few days and we’d have it planned. One time, the Olympic ski team was there training. He went and skied with them. The guys told me and they weren’t kidding, I mean privately, they never saw a fellow at age 60 plus be such a strong skier, such a great athlete. And so, different people would ski with him and we’d set it up. It was really great times.

Smith: And I also take it that they were beloved in Vail. That people in Vail really held them in the highest regard.

Carlson: Absolutely, the same thing in Palm Springs. They just were revered wherever they went and still are to this day, of course. Just to give you a couple things on how gracious the President was to me. Walter Cronkite joined our campaign. We were on like a 13-day campaign swing in 1976 and Cronkite said he had wanted to interview the President. He was the evening news. He was God in those days. He went to Dick Cheney and Cheney says, “Talk to Nessen and Carlson.” Well, I guess he talked to Ron Nessen and Ron said, “No, I don’t think so.” Cronkite came to me and said, “I just want to have a voiceover with the President. Just show me sitting with the President talking and I can show it on the evening news.” Barbara Walters had just become the anchorwoman on the ABC evening news. And he said, “The ratings are tough right now. Just let me do that. Just one camera, voiceover.” I talked to Ron Nessen and Cheney and I said, “What have we got to lose?” Cheney’s such a great guy, he said, “It’s up to you guys.” Nessen said, “I don’t favor it, but if you want to do it, Carlson, go ahead.”

So I talked to Cronkite, I said, “Okay, just a couple minutes, chit chat, voiceover, and so forth”. He said, “Absolutely.” I advised the President, “Cronkite’s going to be coming here in about 15 minutes. No questions, just chat about the weather. No voice, no sound.” We walked in with the camera man. The sound man stayed outside. We walked in chitchatted for about 10, 15, 20 seconds, then Cronkite says, “Mr. President, you wouldn’t mind if I asked a couple of questions on the record, would you?” And the cameraman pulled out the mike. And I was really, really upset. President Ford said, “John, don’t worry about it. It’s okay.” And I said, “That’s not the deal, Walter. That isn’t what we agreed to.” He said, “John, I just..” And President Ford said, “John, don’t worry about it.” Cronkite asked a couple of questions. They were mundane questions, the President did a wonderful job. We got outside. I was really upset with Cronkite.

The next day or the next opportunity I had to talk to the President, I said, “I’m so sorry that happened.” He said, “John, it was fine. Don’t worry.” He made me feel good. It was wonderful. And another thing after he left office, I’ll never forget this; I had just moved to Houston, Texas. This is like a year later. We’re buying airlines, acquiring airlines. The President was coming to town to give a major speech and they were having a private reception for him at the Petroleum Club which is the elite of Houston. All the big CEO’s were going to be there, about 20 or 30, before the big speech. And somehow I got invited to it and I’d just arrived in Houston. And so, the reception was like at 6 o’clock before the 6:30 major reception. I walked in this room – beautiful -, you know, kind of in awe and there was the President talking to 15 or 20 top CEO’s, most from Houston and I kind of stood there because I didn’t know if I should go to the bar, should I walk up to the group, or whatever. President Ford saw me across the room. He waved, he said, “John, come here.” He walked halfway across the room, left the group, put his arm around me, brought me back to the group and introduced me, “You all know John Carlson, my valued staff member.”

What a great way for me to get introduced to Houston. It was fabulous and I felt, I mean, I could never buy that kind of introduction to Houston and it was so warm and they thought I was really important there in Houston then. It was truly wonderful. Another thing I did that I felt so very fortunate, they have an event called VANG, the Vietnamese-American National Gala. Every two years or so, they have this black tie event, six-seven hundred people. At each gala, they name the outstanding honorary Vietnamese-American. A couple of years ago, it was Gerald R. Ford. Mrs. Ford was going to go and accept the award and Susan called me like a week beforehand and she said, “My mother doesn’t feel like making the trip. She’s kind of frail. Would you go receive the award for my dad for my mother?” I said, “I’d be honored to do it.”

I got up there that night. They asked me to say a few words after I accepted the award for President Ford. There’s at least six or seven hundred people, the mayor, several congressmen, and all these Vietnamese and I talked about the fact how President Ford took office and shortly thereafter, we had the fall of Saigon and against many of his advisors and many in Congress, he immediately signed an Executive Order allowing about 200,000 refugees, Vietnamese refugees, to enter the United States. A lot of people said, “No, it’s going to cause a bad precedent” and all this. And he said, “They’re our allies.” And I was telling this to the audience. He said, “They were our allies and we’re going to stick up for them now.”

I went with President Ford and Mrs. Ford, as I told the audience that night, up to San Francisco and Pan Am had, they called it ‘Operation Baby Lift’, bringing back hundreds and hundreds of orphaned babies from Vietnam.
They went up the ramp, Mrs. Ford and the President carried off the first babies, the first orphans from Vietnam. No press, no coverage, nothing. It was just wonderful. And I said, “President Ford, with no publicity, he did this because he felt he needed to do it, he wanted to do it.” The audience was crying, sobbing. I mentioned how a few months later, we went to Fort Chaffee, Arkansas to walk through and give support to the Vietnamese refugee camp there. We walked through these tents. There are doctors and lawyers and educators in these tents, living there. It was an unbelievable experience.

Smith: What was the reaction to the Fords?

Carlson: Oh, unbelievable. First of all, to have a President come down there, but having a President who just allowed them all in the United States rather than having them be subject to imprisonment or murdered, you know, slaughtered in Vietnam. Hundreds, literally hundreds of people came up to me that night after that ceremony and the older people said, “We knew about President Ford,” and “Thank you so much.” The younger people didn’t know quite these things. They’d heard President Ford was a great guy, but they didn’t understand all this. One fellow came up to me, we’re all crying. I mean, this is unbelievable. His name was Dat Nguyen, big good-looking guy. And I said, "You look like a football player." And the guy with him said, “He was an all-American at Texas A&M. He’d played with the Dallas Cowboys, wide-receiver for 7 years, and now he’s coaching the Dallas Cowboys.” And Dat Nguyen and I talked. And he said, “I was born at Fort Chaffee, Arkansas in 1975 when you toured the camp.” And he says, “I don’t remember from the stories I’ve been told whether I was born before that or after that, so you saw my mother with either me in her arms or me in her belly.” And we talked about all these things. Unbelievable, unbelievable.

Smith: You know, in 2000 he came back to Grand Rapids. We had gotten the staircase from the top of the embassy in Saigon and there’d been a real controversy over it. Kissinger said, “Oh, my God, why would you want to do that? Why would you want to remind people of that horrible humiliation?” And Ford, who had a lot more vision than I think he was often credited with suggested, “First of all, Henry, it is part of history. We can’t forget it.” But secondly, he looked at that staircase and he saw it, not as a symbol of military defeat, but as a symbol of the desire for freedom - every bit as much as that piece of the Berlin wall sitting out in front of the museum. And he came back to Grand Rapids and dedicated that. We had a large Vietnamese-American community in West Michigan and there were probably three or four hundred people there. It was bittersweet, but it was also very poignant. I don’t know of another President who would’ve done that, called attention, in effect, to what was really the low point of his presidency, although immediately followed by one of the moral high points. Because, as you say, everyone wanted to pull the plug and he was adamant that that would be another surrender.

Carlson: Maybe just two other things to mention. We had a press briefing every day at 11 o’clock, 11:30, and one of the last things to do after the press briefing was to get away from the press. I’d go work out every day and would run or lift weights or work in the gym and so forth. My code name then got to be in the White House - we all had radio names - was “Weightlifter”. So, one day Rumsfeld and Cheney mentioned to me that the President’s Council on Physical Fitness and Sports was kind of concerned and upset. They didn’t have anybody they could really talk to on a regular basis in the White House, they needed somebody to be their liaison. So Rummy and Dick said, “Carlson, you like this stuff. Why don’t you just add this to your duties and talk to them.” So I got involved in that. They really hadn’t had much interaction with the White House.

From that point on, any time I would ask the President to make a statement, to sign something, “If you’re going give a speech, talk about the high obesity in the United States in the kids,” kids getting better nutrition, getting away from the television, exercise, all this. He did everything anytime we asked him. I’d be playing tennis with him and we’d be finishing and he’d say, “How’s the Council doing? Do they need anything from me?” It was wonderful. He was great.
One last point I’d love to mention; I guess it was 1975, on the budget. I’ll never forget this. The budget was 1,000 pages long or whatever it is. I had to put together a fact sheet of about ten or fifteen pages for the press corps. I literally worked on it for weeks and then the night before the briefing the next day, I worked all night, literally, with Jim Lynn and Paul O’Neill, the director and deputy director of OMB, to make sure all the facts were right and all this kind of stuff. The next day was the briefing and the person who did the briefing on the budget was President Ford. Everyone, the press corps, and the OMB said they’d never seen a President ever know a budget, not just superficially, but line items in each department. He could go into depth on these things. And I really felt kind of bad because the press corps would say to me, “Unbelievable what the President did,” but they didn’t write it. You know, because no President could ever, had ever, I’m sure even until today, doesn’t know the inner workings of the budget as President Ford did back in those days.

Smith: Is that, do you think, a product of his years on the Appropriations Committee?

Carlson: Absolutely. I think he knew the budget before he even got to the White House. He knew the process. But anyway, he was a phenomenal person and for me to be part of that time, it was unbelievable.

Smith: Let me back up a little bit. You’d been in the Nixon White House?

Carlson: Yes.

Smith: How did that come about?

Carlson: Well, I know you don’t have time for all this.

Smith: No, we’ve got plenty!

Carlson: I ran a U.S. Senate campaign in Washington State and I was written up in the Wall Street Journal in part of a large article, some little squib “the youngest campaign manager of one of the best organized campaigns in the United States, 24-years old,” or something “was John Carlson in Washington State.” Haldeman, Erlichman, or somebody there saw that. And when the Nixon team came to Washington State for 18 hours when he was running for

Of course, Erlichman was from Seattle, so I did a couple things that surprised him. First of all, we had a little welcoming ceremony at Boeing Field when they arrived. When they got downtown to the Olympic Hotel, fabulous, I had thousands of people there going crazy when Nixon came in. I had suggested to Erlichman that once the President arrives, go out, walk around the block, and get some fresh air. Of course, as you know, when the President moves, he’s got a press pool. Well, Nixon came out. They did exactly what I asked them to do. Went around the corner and when they went around the corner, there was a bus stop with about six or eight people there. They went crazy for Nixon. “Let me have a picture with you,” “Kiss my baby,” “Please run, we need you,” and all this. I’d said go in this café. They went into the café and people went crazy for him.

They were all my staff, all my campaign people I had planted along the way. Nobody knew that. So when they got back after the campaign stop in Seattle, they said, “When we win White House, you’ve got to come back and join us.” I said, “Sure. Sure.” Of course, they won and then they offered me jobs over the years and they didn’t sound right. And, first of all, I said, “Who would ever want to work in government and who would want to work in Washington, D.C.? I’m a businessman.” But what happened was, pretty much exactly as I’m saying it now.

In 1971, I guess it was, George Schultz was giving a speech someplace in Indonesia. He’d been gone for a week from Washington, D.C. He said something along the lines that “Richard Nixon will never impose wage and price controls.” An hour later in Washington, D.C., they announce the imposition of wage and price controls. They called me and said, “We need someone to sit in our 7:30 senior staff meeting every morning and then go out and call the Cabinet officers and tell them what the theme is for the day, what the issue is for the day. We want to get a common thread through every Cabinet officer. If it’s a transportation bill, the Defense Department should know that, the health guy that, education should know that. Everyone should know what’s going on that day” and so forth. I said, “That sounds pretty interesting.” So I came back and that was my first job in the Nixon White House.

Smith: When Watergate happened - let’s define it as the ‘break-in’ - what were you doing at that point?

Carlson: I was assistant press secretary.

Smith: You were?

Carlson: Uh huh.

Smith: Working for Ziegler?

Carlson: Exactly.

Smith: What was Ziegler like?

Carlson: Pretty pompous, pretty arrogant. But he had a tough, tough job. It’s the toughest job there is. But it wasn’t easy.

Smith: When did the bunker mentality set in? Or had it already existed?

Carlson: I think it was there.

Smith: Yeah.

Carlson: And I think, you know, even Ron Ziegler didn’t see the President on a regular basis there at some point, and it was not easy. Very difficult times.

Smith: Was there a time when you began to think this might in fact end? Well, you had Agnew’s resignation. Did that come as a shock?

Carlson: Absolutely. I had no idea that he was taking money and doing all this stuff from his Maryland days. That was a shocker. I guess the real shocker was when Haldeman and Erlichman resigned. That seemed like the beginning of the end and you knew something really serious was happening. One night, I was told to go down and meet two distinguished guests who were coming in secretly through the south entrance of the West Wing, not through the main entrance. It was Hugh Scott and Howard Baker, and they were coming in privately to see the President in the residence to tell him that they could not hold impeachment off. I had no idea why I was bringing them, but I heard it later, I was told, that’s the message that they brought to the President. Of course, I’d go to Key Biscayne with the President. I’d go to San Clemente with the President and they got to be more tense with the press every trip.

Smith: Richard Nixon once famously said of himself that he was an introvert in an extrovert’s profession. Rex Scouten told us, because Rex had been in the Secret Service and he had been the sole Secret Service agent with then Vice President Nixon, became very close to the Nixon family and thought the world of Nixon. Rex is very circumspect, but he felt that the Nixon he knew then was different from the Nixon in the White House. But he said something extraordinary. He said they’d be on a plane; just the two of them, and out of nowhere, Nixon would sort of pound his fist on the arm rest and say, “You know, I’m not tough enough. I’ve just got to make myself tougher,” which is a remarkable thing when you stop to think about it. I suspect people will be trying to analyze Nixon for as long as –

Carlson: Well, he was a brilliant guy. I would go to state dinners, not as an invited guest always, usually not as an invited guest, but I would go to ‘take care of the press.’ They would come in and do certain things, so I would go and would always want to be there when Nixon would give the toast. For example, the Shah of Iran, he would go on, Nixon, for 15-20 minutes, the background of Iran and Persia and that part of the world and the Pahlavi family and all this stuff without one single note. And the press would be so impressed. And I would see Nixon - for example, we would have little parties in San Clemente and he would sit there and point and he says, “That room up there is where I met with Brezhnev and we’d meet all day and try and negotiate something and make no headway. At 11 o’clock at night, Manola” or the –

Smith: The valet?

Carlson: “The valet would come and knock on my door at 11 o’clock at night and say, ‘Mr. Brezhnev wants to chat if it’s okay with you.’” And Nixon said, “We accomplished more at midnight than we would all day.” And stuff like that was just tremendous.

Smith: Did you ever see him genuinely relaxed?

Carlson: I didn’t really get that close to Nixon. I would go down and I’d see him in San Clemente and I’d see him in Key Biscayne. So, I would see him with Bebe Rebozo, Bob Abplanalp. I’d see him in those situations, but I wasn’t close enough to interact with him.

Smith: When Ford becomes vice president, he’s obviously in a very difficult situation. He’s walking a tightrope, and one way he does it is to get out of town a lot. And there are people who have told us that there were, not surprisingly, Nixon loyalists in the White House who found some fault with the Vice President for not being sufficiently outspoken in his defense of the President. Did that tension exist that you were aware of?

Carlson: I never saw that. I always thought from day one that President Ford, and Vice President Ford was wonderful. And, of course, it’s interesting, if you go back to the first Nixon administration, when Nixon won in ’72, he asked for everyone’s resignation. Do you remember that? And 90 percent of the people were basically let go. And supposedly ten or fifteen percent were on the must-keep list. Ten or fifteen percent “We’ll find you jobs out in the administration, some place out in departments.” Everyone else was let go. And the guys who were all let go were saying, “I could’ve stayed if I wanted to, but…”

Well, I was on the must-keep list, but I was going to leave. I didn’t want to make a career out of Washington; I wasn’t going to stay. But I said, “If I don’t stay, if I leave and say I could’ve stayed, no one will believe it. No one will believe it.” And so I stayed. When President Ford came in, I was going to leave. Almost everyone left. And President Ford asked me to stay. Dick Cheney and Rumsfeld and I felt honored to stay, but I wanted to leave. I thought it would be better if I left, but I said, “No one would believe me if I said I could’ve stayed.” So I stayed another two and a half years, and it was wonderful; the greatest thing ever.
Smith: That leaves a couple things. We’ve been told on the morning of the 9th, following the East Room, the Nixon farewell. There was the [Ford] swearing in and a receiving line and a reception. A couple of people made the observation, and again, quite understandably, that, as they put it, you could see the Nixon people sort of peel away before joining the receiving line. Was that your sense?

Carlson: I don’t recall that.

Smith: That’s a stand-in for the larger question of how did this new President mesh? Rumsfeld has said that he was very explicit to the President that you should clean house early; indeed he was critical of Ford for drawing it out as long as he did. There were others who indicated that Ford wanted to be absolutely fair to the vast majority of Nixon people who had nothing to do with Watergate and he didn’t want to tar them with the broad brush of wrongdoing.

Carlson: That’s certainly how I would feel. I mean, first of all, for him to take over and all of a sudden have to put together a whole new staff is pretty difficult. And I was deputy press secretary. Ron Nessen, Jerry terHorst came in.

Smith: Yes. Tell us about Jerry terHorst.

Carlson: Jerry terHorst came right out of the press corps, of course. And I think it was very difficult for Jerry to all of a sudden be on the inside and having to hold back information from his colleagues. He got a lot of static from the press for joining the opposition, you might say. But I will say on the record that he didn’t like the job and at 7 or 8 o’clock at night would be sitting in his office and he’d be having scotch. It wasn’t good for him and he was under a lot of pressure and he used the pardon as the excuse to resign and it worked out best for everybody.

Smith: That’s interesting. You’re not the first to make that observation. There was sort of a Boy Scout quality that the President had. But here’s someone who’s been in Washington 25 years. The first press conference was on August 28th, which turned out to be a real pivotal moment in the Ford presidency. He goes into that press conference believing that people are going to want to talk about inflation and Cypress and Greece and Turkey and all those things that he’s trying to deal with. And, of course, the only thing they wanted to talk about was Nixon and his papers and his tapes and his legal prospects. How do you explain that?

Carlson: Well, the press really disliked Nixon and I think all of a sudden to have a Boy Scout come in and they had all this venom still pent up from Nixon, and then, of course, August 28th, he hadn’t pardoned Nixon yet, had he?

Smith: No.

Carlson: It was like a week or two weeks before the pardon.

Smith: That’s right. And my sense is that this press conference was a catalyst.

Carlson: Beautifully put, because the feeling inside was that if we didn’t get rid of this Nixon situation and the ongoing impeachment, or the ongoing problems, that it would be around his neck forever. I remember so well, Ford was a fabulous person, and you remember, President Nixon had left office and he had phlebitis, was it? He was out in a hospital in Los Angeles. We were coming to Los Angeles. Ford told me, told us, some of the key guys that were meeting, he says, “It’s time for me to go see President Nixon.” And they said, “Oh, no. You can’t do that.” I think I was one of the leaders: “Can’t do that. Can’t do that. Bad image. The press will get all over that.” Everybody was against it. He said, “I cannot be in Los Angeles and not see President Nixon,” and went and saw him. It was great. I really, really admired President Ford for so many things, and that was one of them. He said, “I don’t care what the image is, I’m going to do it.”

Smith: Did the pardon come as a surprise to you?

Carlson: Yes. I knew about it about two, three days in advance. We were writing it and doing all this stuff, but it was a real shocker for me. But in hindsight, of course, even a couple of weeks later, it seemed like the best thing to do. And even the press soon afterwards said that.

Smith: What was the immediate press reaction?

Carlson: Ford’s dead. Don’t even run for re-election; there was collusion before he took office – that was the big thing. The reason he got the vice presidency was that he would take care of Nixon if necessary. I don’t believe – I can’t say I’m certain – but I don’t believe there was ever any plan or anything like that ahead of time.

Smith: And then, of course, the fact that he would go up to the Hill and testify, which had never been done.

When Mrs. Ford had her breast cancer surgery - that also was unprecedented – the degree of openness. How did you find out about that?

Carlson: Well, I certainly really wasn’t close to the family, but I was closer than most, and so I started hearing some of this stuff ahead of time. But everything she did, like in drugs, I would see Mrs. Ford at 6:30, 7:00 in the morning, I’d see her at midnight in Vail and Palm Springs. Christmas Eve, New Year’s Eve we’d spend with the President at the Annenberg estate. All those things and I never, ever knew she had a problem. But I think she has done so much for women in coming out for drugs and breast cancer and everything.

Smith: Can you talk about their relationship?

Carlson: Oh, it was wonderful. I don’t think you’d ever find a closer couple ever, ever. And he’d even say in the White House, there was a thing certain of us had; whenever the President would move, certain people in the White House would have a bell on their phone. At 7:00 at night, it’d be twenty degrees out, the bell would ring on your phone, I’d pick it up and say, “The President is en route from the residence to the pool (swimming pool).” Two minutes later, ping, “The President’s in the pool.” And once in a while we’d need to talk to the President, we’d run down to the pool and say, “Mr. President, you just need to sign off on this.” It worked out perfectly because he’d get his bathrobe on and he’d be swimming laps in the pool, and snow on the sides. But he would say, “I gotta go, Betty’s waiting for me and she’s got everything…” just like a regular couple. Betty’s waiting for me, got dinner, got to get back, and so forth.

Smith: The not so secret fact was that he was a stickler for punctuality, and he married a woman who was not. Classic case of opposites attracting. And yet he seemed to accept it pretty well.

Carlson: Yeah. One of the interesting times I had with the President was really completely informal. President Ford was invited up to spend a weekend in Pocantico Hills, Vice President Rockefeller’s estate. I became a Socialist after going up there. President Ford took three guys with him; Dick Cheney, Red Cavaney, and me. Remember Joe Canzari Wonderful guy. We arrived at Pocantico Hills and Joe Canzari took care of us, and this is off the track, isn’t it?

Smith: No, no. As I said, I’ve been working for nine years on a biography of Nelson Rockefeller.

Carlson: I can tell you some inside stuff if you want.

Smith: I’d love to hear it.

Carlson: But we arrive and Joe Canzari said, “What do you want to do tomorrow morning? Do you want to have breakfast and what time?” and all this. And he said, “I want to give you a tour of the estate.” I said, “I’d like to work out before anything else.” And he said, “Okay, we have an indoor pool, we’ve got an outdoor pool. Got a tennis court, got a golf range, got a bowling alley,” it was unbelievable. And then he showed us around the estate. It was unbelievable. He talked about how John D. Rockefeller had moved the railroad tracks fifty miles or something, and almost no family should have that much. He earned it, I guess. Of course, he earned it. But what an experience. Things like that - of course a guy like me would never, ever be going to Pocantico Hills if it wasn’t for President Ford. But it was an unbelievable weekend.

Smith: Did the White House wait too long to take the Reagan challenge seriously?
Carlson: Boy, that’s a good question. It certainly hurt the President and I tell people that I’m certainly not anti-Reagan, but I’m not pro-Reagan either because we begged Ronald Reagan to go to Texas and campaign for us in 1976. If we had won Texas, we’d have won the election. But that didn’t happen. And every time we asked – they didn’t say no – they just kept postponing it. But you are probably right, that’s a good way to put it that we did not take the Reagan challenge seriously soon enough.

Smith: Now, there is a school of thought that Reagan, in a perverse way, made Ford a better candidate in that Ford had never run for anything outside of his congressional district. And that thanks to people like Don [Penny] and others, he became a much better public speaker, etc. etc. On balance, s a question of opinion, was the Reagan challenge hurtful?

Carlson: I think it was. I think having negativity in your own party on and on every day for months, as we got in the primaries, it didn’t help. And I knew a lot of the guys in the Reagan campaign, on the Reagan team, and we talk about those days at this time. But again, Reagan was looking to ’80. He was setting himself up – if he didn’t make it in ’76, he’d be the guy in ’80. And of course it worked out that way. If Ford had won in ’76, Reagan probably quite likely would not have been president in 1980. Ford’s vice president might have been, perhaps. Who knows?

Smith: Tell me about Ron [Nessen]. We talked with Ron at some length. Ron maybe has mellowed a little bit. He’s pretty thoughtful about owning up to some of his mistakes. We’ve been told by a couple of people that following terHorst’s resignation, Bonnie Angelo was approached about the job.

Carlson: Hmm. I didn’t know that.

Smith: Which would have made her the first woman press secretary, but she had family commitments and so on. But it raises a question of whether a TV guy, at that point in his career, is necessarily the ideal candidate to take on that position. What did Nessen bring to the job; and what were the challenges that he faced?
Carlson: First of all, Ron was pretty close to Gerald Ford. He had got to know him, covering him as Vice President, and so that’s important. Also Ron is a very, very bright guy; a very quick study; he’s really good. We all had code names in the White House. Mine was Weightlifter. You didn’t want to have to memorize who was what, so you had something to relate to. His nickname was, if you remember, because of press briefings you get worked up like I’m getting worked now…he got worked up and his code name was Sunburn, because his face would get flushed and so forth. But you are absolutely right. Taking a member of the press and putting them in there is difficult because the other press members resent it. Phil Jones is a very good friend. I see him twice a year. And of course, they were tremendous rivals. And Phil Jones wanted that job.

Smith: Did he?

Carlson: Yeah.

Smith: There was a sense, particularly with the Saturday Night Live business…

Carlson: I was just going to say that…

Smith: That maybe there was a little too much ego for a press secretary. That a press secretary needs to be self-effacing in ways; perhaps at that stage in his career, Ron found that difficult.

Carlson: I remember right after Saturday Night Live, Chevy Chase and all that, we were sitting in the Oval Office. The first thing in our daily briefing the President said was, “Ron, I watched Saturday Night Live. I just don’t understand that type of humor.” And the President was hurt by it. Another thing, I don’t know if it hurt the President, I doubt it: but we were in motorcades a few weeks after Saturday Night Live. You’d have the motorcycle cops and you’d have Secret Service, and you’d have the President’s car, and then you’d have press and so forth. And we were in an open van, I was with Nessen a couple of times, there would be people along the roads. The President would come by and they would applaud; we’re going real slow; and then Nessen would come by and people would go crazy for Nessen. They’d just seen him on Saturday Night Live and it was remarkable. I didn’t have any idea that people even watched that show that much. And I don’t think Ford even knew that kind of stuff. But I know he was not happy with Ron Nessen portraying him as a bumbling, stumbling guy.

Smith: With Nessen being on the show himself.

Carlson: Exactly.

Smith: You can look at the Ford presidency in a number of ways. One obvious trajectory is a guy who spends twenty-five years of his life on Capitol Hill, is really a man of the House, who has to learn to be an executive. In some ways outgrow some of the habits that he brought to the job. You want to keep the best of what you have, obviously, but at the same time learn to be a communicator in a way that you don’t have to be on Capitol Hill. Did you see that?

Carlson: That’s a great point. There’s a big difference between being a legislator and an administrator. But Rumsfeld was super. Rumsfeld came in to run the staff. And you might say Rohm Emanuel one of these days is a liaison with Capitol Hill, because he came from there. Well, Ford could talk to anybody, anytime, anywhere. So you might say Rumsfeld ran the staff day to day initially, before he went to the Defense Department, and did a great job, as did Dick Cheney. President Ford, as you say, had no administrative experience ever, probably, in his life. But he was great. I think he was able to motivate and lead just by example. He was superb.

Smith: Al Haig and Bob Hartmann may have been put on this planet to really piss each other off. Did you sense that at all?

Carlson: I saw it. Of course Bob Hartmann was a friend of the President’s forever. And I was sitting in the Oval Office one day with Bob Hartmann in our meeting, and we’re sitting there and Bob says to the President, “Information about me is being leaked. Negative information about me is being leaked. And the guy who is leaking it is sitting right here,” pointing at Nessen. And they kind of started screaming at each other. It’s the first time, the only time, I ever heard the President raise his voice. He said, “Bob, not here, not now.” And he [Bob] kept going, and the President said, “Stop it Bob, stop it.” And so it was interesting times.

Smith: But it says something about his loyalty to a guy who, to be sure, had written some very important speeches for him, but who also brought an awful lot of baggage and never quite adapted to his role in the White House as opposed to what it had been on the Hill. To the point where there were two separate speech groups that were functioning; one in the open and the other to some degree at least, sub rosa.

Carlson: Well, Bob Hartmann, I thought, knew the President inside and out. And he knew what he thought; he knew how to write for him. But sometime you need to get to a different level and you need more of a national scope. But Bob was very, very close to the President and he knew everything about his thinking.

Smith: One senses that that was a very bitter – by that point – bitter rivalry.

Carlson: With Reagan, you mean?

Smith: Yeah, the Reagan-Ford thing. Going into the convention, what was your sense?

Carlson: I think we felt pretty certain we had the nomination, but there was still that small percentage of uncertainty. I actually was playing tennis with Jimmy Baker on top of the Hyatt Hotel, or whatever hotel it was. One hundred degree weather, I think it was. He pulled an Achilles tendon and it really slowed him down. But those were tense times and I don’t even, still to this day, when they went to talk with Reagan one night, John Sears and his guys about being involved in the presidency, vice president and all that, I still don’t know the accurate story on that. And I talked to the guys who were in those meetings and I still don’t know it. Jim Cavanaugh was part of that and of course, Dick Cheney. I’d like to know the inside story some day.

Smith: When you had this whole switch, when Schlesinger was fired and Rumsfeld took his place and the vice president was dumped, and George H.W. Bush was in effect, deep-sixed at the CIA. Nelson Rockefeller went to his grave believing that Don Rumsfeld was responsible. Now, it is also true Rockefeller could get paranoid toward the end. He saw enemies and he believed that Don Rumsfeld was his biggest enemy and that Cheney was Rumsfeld’s extension. The President always maintained that, no it was his idea to do all of this. Did you have a sense that there was a problem in the Ford-Schlesinger relationship?

Carlson: Oh, there was. I forget his name now – Joe – he was his spokesperson. Joe Layton, you ever heard that name?

Smith: Yeah.

Carlson: We were getting ready to announce some major decision, pulling troops out of Lebanon, and I was called back from a tennis tournament on a Sunday or something and I came in and Rockefeller, Kissinger, and President Ford were in the Oval Office. They asked me for some things and they said we’re going announce at nine o’clock tonight we’re pulling troops out of Lebanon. By the time we announce it, they will be three-fourths out. But just be prepared, like at seven o’clock, you want to advise the press that at eight o’clock they are going to have a press conference and so forth. So I started putting everything in the works – everything was secret until a certain point – and then you’d advise the press, have the press conference and so forth.

About a half an hour before we announced this, Joe Layton announced it at the Defense Department. And it was a positive thing because we were getting people out of harm’s way and all this. It was a very positive thing. We were really upset that the Defense Department, Joe Layton, had announced it before the President announced it. And I said to Joe Layton, who is a pro in Washington, he was there forever, I said, “The President announces the good news, you announce the bad news. And you don’t ever do that again.” I don’t know if you can call it a rivalry, but Schlesinger, who I don’t know at all, brilliant guy, he would sit there with his pipe and he’d be thinking and he probably thought he was smarter than President Ford.

Smith: And everyone else in the room.
Carlson: And everyone else. And Joe Layton, of course, worked for him, and so there was that feeling there wasn’t real teamwork going on. That was one example that I experienced.

Smith: And then there is the vague, I don’t pretend to understand it, but at the time when Saigon was falling, there was apparently some real friction regarding the evacuation and how it was proceeding. Was it the low point of those two and a half years?

Carlson: Yeah, it had to be. Of course, President Ford inherited Vietnam, as Richard Nixon inherited Vietnam. But you keep trying to wind it down honorably and it wasn’t easy. Of course Kissinger was a hero in those days, wasn’t he? He was God and so forth.

Smith: And yet one has a sense that he wanted to go down with all flags flying and blaming Congress to the end for not funding the war. One of the things that I’d love to know the answer to is to what degree Ford agreed with Kissinger, that Congress should come up with another $750 million, or whether knowing the Hill as well as he did, saw it as a futile gesture, although a gesture worth making. Then there was the famous speech at Tulane where, apparently Kissinger had one draft and Hartmann had another that he handed the President on the plane, which basically said the war is over as far as this country is concerned. Was there a sense of that kind of debate going on within the White House?

Carlson: I did not experience that, really. I’m sure there were all kinds of things going behind the scenes that weren’t quite so open. The only time the President ever barked at me, was, and I’ll never forget this. It was in the last days of the administration before he’s leaving office, and I forget if it was the New York Times, said they would like to have an obit interview with the President. And Nessen said, “Carlson, you ask the President, I’m not going to ask.” So we got done with the regular briefing and we’re getting ready to walk out and I said, “Mr. President, it’s customary for major newspapers and so forth to do interviews that are held until you die. And the New York Times would like to make a formal request, and I’m making this request for them, to do this.” And he said, “John, I’m not ready to die. Tell that to the New York Times.” And, of course, Tom DeFrank then did his thing for several years, right?

Smith: This may be unfair, but I would be interested in your sense of the book, because there are people who believe that Ford was, in some ways, exploited. There are other people who believe that Ford knew exactly what he was doing. Do you have a sense?

Carlson: Are you talking about Tom DeFrank’s book?

Smith: Yeah. He clearly had great faith in Tom, a great trust in Tom.

Carlson: I thought it was pretty darn good. I thought Tom did a great job and I didn’t know that was going on. I saw Tom all the time and I didn’t realize he was having those conversations every few months with the President. No, I thought it was a pretty good book, and I don’t think President Ford would have done anything he didn’t want to do.

Smith: Did you have much contact with the kids?

Carlson: Not a lot, no. One of the nice things, when President Ford died, I got a call from the family and they said, “You’re going to get an invitation to go back to Washington, D.C. for the big funeral at the National Cathedral. But if you’d like, we’d like to have you come over and be part of the smaller ceremonies here for a couple of days in Palm Springs. So my wife and I went over to Palm Springs and it was wonderful. It really was so much more intimate.

Smith: Were you surprised by the public outpouring?

Carlson: Oh, it was just wonderful, just fabulous, wasn’t it? I honestly think Gerald Ford was one of the finest human beings you could ever be around, and he never got the credit. One of my biggest disappointments in life is that we didn’t do a better job against Jimmy Carter in the 1976 campaign. The question is, “How could we lose to that guy?” It’s just so, so sad. But of course with the Nixon pardon, the economy, Vietnam, it was very, very difficult.
Smith: And who would have predicted, at that point, that years later they would become good friends. Which tells you something about Ford, in particular.

Carlson: Ford, he could become friends, he was so easy to get along with and so gracious.

Smith: You were over at St. Margaret’s and the public was coming in droves.

Carlson: Yeah. They lined up until midnight, didn’t they? And of course, Jack Ford and the family took turns in greeting the people as they came through. But they had a private one for us, I think, first, which was really, really nice. But it was just overwhelming.

Smith: Did you see him much after he left office?

Carlson: Not a lot, no. I’d come over to Palm Springs once in a while. Of course, we’d see him once a year at the June functions. I’d see him at business things, and of course I lived in Houston, different business things he’d be at. I don’t even know how he remembered our names unless somebody briefed him ahead of time, which probably could be. But he was fabulous, he was wonderful.

Smith: Where were you on election night ’76?

Carlson: With the President.

Smith: You were at the White House?

Carlson: I was in Grand Rapids.

Smith: That’s where he almost broke down with the mural at the airport, talking about his parents.

Carlson: I just was shocked that we lost that election. But looking back now I can see all the negative factors that figured into it.

Smith: Did you think you’d caught up?

Carlson: Yeah.

Smith: You did?
Carlson: Yeah, and I think that maybe, and of course you don’t know this stuff, if we’d had another week we would have won.

Smith: Sure.

Carlson: But, who knows? It was a tough campaign.

Smith: We’ve been told it took him a while to bounce back.

Carlson: I don’t know.

Smith: The day after, he’d lost his voice, Mrs. Ford read the statement; but we were also told he was telling people that he would help them out with jobs – he was thinking of their welfare, their future. Typical?

Carlson: Typical. I think it would have been so nice for the President to have his own four-year term; to be elected to his own four-year term, I think it would have given us all more confidence and given him more confidence and then see what he could do in four years. Of course, now he is known as the only un-elected president, which isn’t really fair because he took over in very, very difficult times. I lived with the Cronkite’s and the Brokaw’s, and those guys privately said so many great things, would sit in Palm Springs and chat at night. But they didn’t convey that in their newscasts and so forth.

Smith: How do you think Ford should be remembered?

Carlson: Well, I think people should realize he took over at a very, very difficult time. He assumed the presidency during the most difficult time, maybe, in our country. And he restored honesty and integrity to the presidency and he did it in a very humble way. I just don’t think enough people really got to know him those two and a half years. There is so much controversy from the Nixon pardon that carried over; then we started the campaign; then Reagan was challenging him. It was never easy during those times.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this. This is clearly a very different institution from the one that you came to in 1955. For people who can’t imagine what it was like then, when you were a freshman - your Dad had been in before you - and Gerald Ford was probably here for his fourth or fifth term - can you give us an overview of what this place was like in the mid-’50s and how it differed from the modern Congress?

Dingell: If you’ve got a lot of time, I can do that. The problem there is that the differences are very large, but they’re very subtle. And they’re related not only to substantive differences and political differences, but they’re related very frankly to something else, and that was the times and the forces and the sociological events that drove this place as they drive it in every Congress.
We were a post-war Congress at that time and the concerns that people had were how we were going to get over the war. We were not yet out of it. We were just beginning to get our peace time economy going because we converted the entire economy to a war footing.

Having said that, this was kind of one of the cusps that we passed in history where the Congress goes through a significant change. Congress was undergoing a significant change because of the situation of the world; the United States had become a world leader. We were important, but not necessarily a leading force in the world before the war. That change was going on. So, the Congress at that particular time would come in in January and would adjourn sometime very close to the first of July or there about. We hadn’t yet evolved the national budget in the sense that we have it today, although we did have one. And the Congress didn’t have a conventional budget. That was set up in sort of a hit or miss fashion by any administration that happened to be running the place. And the Congress was a more reactive body.
You have heard, I’m sure, almost everyone who talks about that time will tell you that that Congress was essentially a body that didn’t involve itself in all the issues that it does now. It wasn’t that kind of partisan entity that it is today. And, of course, we didn’t have television either in the nation or on the floor, although television was beginning to come in.

Smith: Was it more of a village?

Dingell: Well, Washington before the war was called “the little town in the woods,” and before the war - actually until the late 30s - the Congress would essentially leave town as soon as it got hot. They air-conditioned the place, so the Congress which had previously been here from about the 20th of March until the about the first of June, and then would come back for a special session in October if that was necessary, no longer did that. And the result was that the Congress had moved to essentially a six month session, although it came to the point where the Congress would meet for longer and longer periods. During the war, they would start on the first of January or the third of January, whatever the date might happen to be, and they would adjourn the Congress on the last day of December. And they often set the clock back so they made sure that the Congress wasn’t intruding into the affairs of the following Congress. And the body was smaller. We had two less states than we have now, although the size of the body was the same. Districts were much smaller.

Smith: Staffs were much smaller.

Dingell: Staff was much smaller. I had a staff of four. I had one roundtrip ticket home to Michigan, so I had to be pretty careful about how I traveled. I had no long distance telephone account. I had four typewriters. If I got more, I had to buy them myself out of my own pocket. And a member of Congress wasn’t particularly well paid in those days. And we had relatively small committees. The Commerce Committee was 29 at that time. Today, it’s much larger than that. We’ve got subcommittees of 29 members.

Smith: Presumably you do much more oversight today than you did then.
Dingell: Well, we do and we don’t. I learned oversight from my dear friend John Moss and a fellow by the name of Bob Lischman and others who understood how oversight was done. I’m not sure before that people really understood oversight, although there are people like Kefauver. And, of course, there was the great oversight that was done on the Depression to find out what were the causes of that. And then, of course, there were the perversions that you saw in McCarthy and the way he conducted his business. The oversight really sort of hit its flower in terms of high quality good work, when Harris became the chairman of our committee and a fellow by the name of Sam Rayburn decided he was going to have oversight to find out how the Eisenhower administration was subverting and suborning the regulatory process which he was the fundamental author of, if you remember.

But Congress has always had oversight. We haven’t necessarily done it well, but at this particular time we’re doing it sort of well. But oversight is something that you do with real focus on whether the law is being properly implemented, people are being properly served, and public monies are being properly spent. And it’s not really something that should be political and, unhappily, under both parties of late, it’s become quite political and it is opposed to something that’s more bottom-dwelling on seeing to it that the Congress is an ancient function. And this goes back to about 1699 when there was a British parliamentary committee that caused a collapse of the government over peace negotiations between Britain and France, which essentially sold out Britain’s Dutch allies.

Smith: We’ve heard from a number of people that one of the really significant differences between then and now is that members then tended to bring their families with them to Washington.

Dingell: That’s true, we did. And I’d bring them down and my dad did the same thing. In January, we’d load the whole tribe into the car and we’d usually rent a trailer. Come on down here and we’d stay here until the Congress would adjourn and would try to guess when that would be. It’d usually be around the first of August or something like that and then we’d go home.
Smith: And the suggestion is that the wives played a significant role in fostering relationships, social relationships across the aisle. That there was much more social interaction with people than is the case today.

Dingell: That’s true. And that was a very important thing. And it was particularly important because the wives lent a civilizing and valuable impact on the way the Congress worked. They moderated the more extreme behavior of the members and saw to it that friendships existed across the aisles. Kids on both sides of the aisle would date each other and we’d have marriages where people would get married across the aisle, kids of members on different sides. And it tended to make for a warmer, friendlier place. Members did things together and they would travel together and, of course, then you’d travel on boats and things like that as opposed to traveling on jet aircraft where you’re programmed for every second and you really don’t get to know anybody. It’s just sort of a rat race.

Smith: There are stories from the ’60s when Gerald Ford was Minority Leader and Hale Boggs was his Democratic counterpart. They would debate at the National Press Club and they would drive down together and decide on the way what they were going to debate that day. They would have their debate. And then they’d adjourn and have a drink and their lunch. It was a very civil, very friendly sort of relationship.

Dingell: Well, a few things about it. One, it was a different time. Two, they were different kinds of people. And, three, the pressures were a lot different on them. But that was more of a common thing that occurred here where members did become friends. They played golf together and at the House gym which was a wonderful institution, still is, but we had a game we called paddle ball. That was a rough, rough game and it lead to tremendous friendships over the years. Sam Rayburn took the gym crowd on one day and they just beat the socks off of him. And Sam said he’s never going to take that crowd on again. And Sam was a potent, powerful leader, if you will recall. And there were other things that went on.
Smith: Do you think there’s misplaced nostalgia for that period? I mean, are there things about that period that you are just as glad to see gone? Are there things that are clearly better about Congress today?

Dingell: Well, I have nostalgia for those days sometimes. That was part of my formative years, so I probably see it differently than the newer members. Most newer members don’t understand what happened or why or how the parties worked, and so there’s a sense of loss of the old way. There were faults in the way the Congress functioned then and there are faults now. And so the changes that benefit on some level, created this new array of faults to replace the previously existing set of faults. And, of course, it’s all in the eye of the beholder anyway.

Smith: You came here at the end of ’55, succeeding your dad. Gerald Ford had already been here—

Dingell: About eight years.

Smith: Okay. How did your paths cross and what was his reputation at that point?

Dingell: Well, I’d known Jerry when he was a young member. I worked from time to time on the Hill in different small jobs and so I kind of got to know him that way. And I got to know him through Dad. Jerry was very much focused on his district and on internal Republican politics. So, I got to know him, not real well, but we became close friends in the state societies. Those were quite important. And people belonged to the state societies and, of course, Jerry and I did and our wives did. And his wife and my first wife were kind of movers and shakers in the town and used to work to make things happen. So, we would get to know each other that way. Got to know our kids. And Jerry was a very good friend.

I remember one time, Betty had a baby rather late in their marriage and I remember we were feeling pretty good that night, so I spent the evening congratulating and telling him how great it was. And Jerry got this kind of sour look on his face because I think he thought that he was going to finally have a little bit of freedom to enjoy his wife and his business. And then, of course, the same thing happened to me at a later time, so I felt the __(?)__
was sort of settling up my misdoings.

Smith: Did you like Betty?

Dingell: She’s a fine woman. And we still have a small correspondence between us. And she is not only a pleasant and nice person outward, but she’s a very decent, fine human being, which is much more important.

Smith: How tough was it for political wives?

Dingell: It’s always hard. The family always takes the beating for the members. If you look, you’ll see the tremendous number of divorces that exist here, the numbers of kids that get in trouble, and the family troubles that members have because of the pressures of the job. And I’ve seen it from both sides. I am the son of a congressman and I’ve raised kids and so I’ve seen both sides. I’ve seen the adverse impact on the family for the kids and I’ve seen the pressures that create that situation. It’s a very substantial thing. It’s no better or worse than it was at a different time from an earlier time, it just is a little different. And I can tell you that at one point, we had about 19 members in the Michigan delegation, but we had almost a majority of the members from Michigan that had divorces going on. And it wasn’t because they were playing around or anything, it was just the abnormal pressures that center on the family and makes it very, very hard for husbands and wives to maintain a sort of normal family life in this particular job.

Smith: Let me ask you. In the early ‘60s, there comes the Goldwater disaster for Republicans.

Dingell: In ’64.

Smith: In ’64, yeah. And Ford takes on Charlie Halleck. Now, earlier, of course, Charlie Halleck had taken on Joe Martin, so you had a little bit of a turnaround.

Dingell: That happens fairly regularly over there. If you remember, Halleck took on Martin, Ford took on Halleck, and then nobody took on Jerry. But, if you will recall, the successors in that had troubles and, as I remember it, there was a terrible attack on Michael by Gingrich. And then Gingrich had his own troubles, as you will remember. And the Republicans do this much more than do the Democrats. And I won’t comment on that because I don’t know whether it’s personal ambitions or whether it’s traditions of the party to try to get rid of what they view as being ineffective leaders.

Smith: That raises a big question, because the older I get the more I think that generational factors are as important as ideological or other factors. I mean, in the late ‘50s, you had a sense that Joe Martin had become ineffectual and Halleck, who certainly wasn’t a Young Turk, but nevertheless took him on in part because—

Dingell: Well, he had losses. The Republicans didn’t take the Congress twice. Joe was an old-fashioned guy. A very nice guy, very much liked by everybody on both sides of the aisle. He had a terrible problem with the English language. We used to call him Mr. Malaprop after the character in the book. And, you’ll remember, he would always misspeak in pretty awful ways. One time, Charlie Halleck was bringing the Prime Minister of Indonesia in to address the Congress when Joe Martin was the Speaker. And Martin recognized the two of them, he says, “The Chair recognizes now the distinguished gentleman from Indonesia and the Prime Minister of Indiana.” And those were just mistakes that you can’t make too many of.

Smith: Then comes Watergate and Agnew’s resignation. And the story is that Gerald Ford became vice president in large measure because Democrats in Congress lead by Carl Albert and Mike Mansfield made it clear to President Nixon that Ford was the only candidate who would be easily confirmed.

Dingell: Well, that didn’t come as a great surprise to anybody. That was quite frankly common thought around. As a matter of fact, it was a consensus that there would be nobody else, because, if you’ll remember, times were very poisonous then. And Nixon had alienated everybody. The Republicans were angry with him because they had to defend him under intolerable circumstances.

Smith: Were they angry at the White House?
Dingell: Yeah, because they put on them an intolerable burden. There’s an old saying by Napoleon. At one time, his Minister of the Interior and the Foreign Minister quarreled about whether they’d accept this particular thing that Napoleon said was a crime and both of them claimed credit for having given this particular response, but they said, “It was worse than a crime, sire. It was a blunder.” And that was what Nixon had done in a rather appalling way apart from the criminal aspects of it. Of course, Ford then got himself in huge trouble over the pardon, which very truthfully seems now in the cold light of history the right judgment.

Smith: What was your reaction at the time?

Dingell: I was outraged. But then I knew Nixon, I knew him back to the first race he’d run and he was one of the dirtiest fighters in American political history. Although, in the cold light of history, he looks like a lot better president than some that have served since he was there.

Smith: And then Ford, of course, came up and did something no president has done before or since, he came up and testified here on the Hill about the pardon.

Dingell: He didn’t have much choice. Ford entered into the presidency of a country very much divided and angry. And Ford, to his vast credit, came up with a series of steps which abated a huge amount of the overwhelming hatred and anger that was burning in the country at that particular time.

Smith: Did that include the first step toward amnesty for Vietnam draft dodgers?

Dingell: That was one of many. Remember, the country was divided over Vietnam. We still had some of the lingering results of McCarthy and there was, of course, all that Nixon had done with wire taps and enemies lists and using the IRS to spy on Americans and Watergate itself and the lies and the things that he had done and said about Democrats over the years. So, Ford had to abate all this and that’s one of the reasons he pardoned Nixon is because he just didn’t want to have to run around the country explaining why Nixon was being tried or not tried and thought he’d get rid of that with one swipe of the presidential pen.
Smith: One way of looking at the Ford presidential trajectory is he spent two and a half years, not necessarily unlearning what he knew as a congressman, but learning how to be an executive, which one senses is a different set of skills.

Dingell: Well, he didn’t unlearn anything and what you learn up here is always useful, wherever the hell you happen to be. But, having said that, he did have to learn a whole new set of skills and Jerry, you’ll remember had never had any real executive experience. But there are some things about Jerry Ford that need to be said. First of all, one, he was a very decent man. Two, he understood government and he wanted it to work. Three, he understood people. Four, he had friendships that he could call on to help him to govern even across the aisle. As a matter of fact, he probably had as many friends on this side of the aisle as he did on the Republican side, and probably a few less enemies.

He also understood that he couldn’t govern if he carried with him all the burdens that had been created before him by McCarthy and Nixon and the others. And, so he went on to abate that - in that he was tremendously successful. And I will tell you this, Jerry had he had just a little more time to campaign, he probably would’ve been elected, not reelected. Because you remember he was the only unelected vice president and the only unelected President. But he frankly ran out of time. There was a very interesting thing, he not only had trouble with the Democrats, but we worked with him. I’d go down to the White House and work with him. I was chairman on the Energy Subcommittee and handled most of the energy policy.

The people down there, and I won’t tell you their names, but would constantly come by and talk to Frank Zarb, who is my beloved friend, and tell us about the latest things that the right wing had done to Ford in terms of the battle for the nomination for the presidency. And, very frankly, there’s good reason to think that they in fact sandbagged Jerry Ford to get rid of him and have a clear shot at the nomination next time.

Smith: One quick thing, because after ’74, you’ve got the Watergate Babies who come in the House. Clearly that’s a turning point in the history of the institution. A lot of the energy debate was over the decontrol of natural gas.
But there also was over control of a lot of things. And you must remember that that came about in good part because Henry Royce and I and a number of others pushed through legislation allowing the President to impose price controls if the economy began to overheat and inflation became a problem. If you remember, they had the WIN buttons and all the Whip Inflation Now. And so, there was that which was going on and Nixon used the authorities which we gave him over energy and the authorities we gave him over price controls, put them together and created the Federal Energy Administration which he had headed by my dear friend Frank Zarb.

At one point, the story goes that Ford had a handshake deal with the Democratic congressional leadership, including the Speaker and Senator Mansfield, on a schedule of decontrol. And they came back a week later and said, “We can’t sell it to our members.” Does that ring a bell at all?

No, it doesn’t. But I would tell you that Albert strongly favored decontrol. I think Mansfield did, too, although Mansfield didn’t talk that much about those things. Albert didn’t either, but you could read Albert a little more easily.

Jerry Ford said to people the thing that frustrated him so much about ’76 - in some ways it goes back to what you just said - is he felt he had just mastered the job when he lost it.

He may have. You never master that damned job. It’s the most hideously cruel complicated difficult task in the whole political lexicon.

Do you remember the last time you saw him?

I think up in Ann Arbor one time when he was up there for a speech at the Jerry Ford School.

Did you ever see his temper?

I never saw Jerry get angry. He may have, but I never saw it. We all get angry, but we show it in different ways. He never showed it to me.

Did he have a sense of humor?
Dingell: Sort of. He wasn’t a real funny guy and he didn’t have a great sense of humor. I want to make it clear I happen to like Jerry Ford a great deal, then and now. Now, of course, he’s dead, but there are good memories of him and no great criticisms of him.

Smith: Final thing. How do you think he should be remembered?

Dingell: Very well. Decent man. Strong President. He was able to work with the Democrats and the Republicans. He could work more effectively with Democrats because we had a different and more wholesome attitude about that than did his own people. He had some who’d work with him very well, but he always had those crazy far right friends that curse the Republicans so terribly. And they would always go out to knife him in the most underhanded ways, because winning was more important to them than the public interest. That remains the case today.

Smith: Last thing. Last because it is important. When Saigon fell at the end of the Vietnam War in the spring of 1975, I’m sure there was a desire on the part of a lot of people to put it the rear view mirror, to consign it to the history books. And the President got very angry because money that had been appropriated for the resettlement of refugees was at least temporarily taken off the table. And he put together this crazy coalition and got Congress to restore money and they brought out about 120,000 Vietnamese refugees.

Dingell: I don’t remember how and I never did any study of that particular interest, so I can’t give you an intelligent comment.

Smith: The War Powers Act?

Dingell: War Powers Act did not do that. War Powers Act was passed to curb Nixon’s excesses and see to it that that was part of a long term fight between the President and the Congress, the Republicans and Democrats on either side. And the idea was to see to it that the President was responsive to the wishes of Congress and it’s a battle that goes on now. You saw it over Korea, you saw it over events prior to World War II, you’ve seen it over Vietnam, and, to a limited degree at least, you’ve seen it over Afghanistan and Iraq.
Smith: Would you like to see restored the constitutional requirement that Congress declare war before we fight one?

Dingell: It’s still there. The trouble is, you have a built-in conflict in the Constitution itself. President is Commander-in-Chief. The Congress has the power of the purse. The Congress has the power to declare war. The president can commit troops and don’t think that the president, this president or any president, has not committed troops around the world in different places. And this goes back - I think if you and I were to sit down - you’d find that Washington didn’t, but I think you would find that Jefferson did and I think you would find that there were all kinds of commitments of American troops in different places as to carry out the American policy without the approval of Congress.

Sometimes there’s discretion with Congress, sometimes there’s not. Truman committed us to Korea and a lot of other presidents have done this. We were constantly in Mexico. Wilson did it, if you’ll remember. I don’t think Teddy Roosevelt did, but that wasn’t because he wouldn’t have done it, it just was because he never had time or a chance. So, it was a regular practice in global diplomacy in Mexico and South America - a regular practice of the American administration. If you look at the westward expansion of the United States it was largely accomplished by the president using arms, particularly against Mexico. But we came close to having a war over the Canadian border, particularly 54-40 and the Washington-Oregon territory.

Dingell: You’re welcome.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this.

Engler: Well, thank you, I’m happy to sit down.

Smith: I want to talk a little about you and your entry into the big ring, if you will. You were a leading member of this whole generation of Republican governors, conservative Republican governors, who nevertheless were seen as creative in their conservatism, as problem solvers. I don’t know whether pragmatists is a misnomer or a pejorative, but in any event I would have thought that would have been very, very much Gerald Ford’s style; very reflective of his approach as well. Tell us about your life before it crossed paths with President Ford.

Engler: My first meeting with Gerald Ford that I can recall, where I actually had a chance to sit and talk with him, was when Elford [Al] Cederberg, one of his colleagues from the Congress, brought him to Mt. Pleasant, Michigan to speak to a little Lincoln Day dinner for Isabella County. It always struck me, the humility of the leader of the Republicans of the United States House of Representatives out on the road. And, of course, it was only later – I was a rookie state representative, it may have been my first or second term, so I’m in my early twenties in office – and I’m meeting this leader of the Republicans, who’s been in Congress a long time. I was born in ’48; so roughly at the time I was born, he goes there.

Years later we meet and he’s good friends with our congressman who has been there a long time as well. Then I learned how many days he spent on the road and traveled, then – even in the ‘70s it wasn’t as easy as it is today – and he’d been doing this for many years before then. What dedication and what sort of attention to detail. It gave him almost an encyclopedic knowledge of the country. But he was interested in Michigan because we were in Michigan – I was in the Michigan legislature.
Over the years, it was that sort of thread. I wasn’t in his congressional district, although I had Montcalm County, which is down in Greenville, kind of in his backyard. And so that sort of started, I guess, an awareness and a recognition of who Congressman Gerald Ford was. Then, of course later on, I became familiar and acquainted and friends with many of his friends, who had been longtime supporters. So I felt like even though we weren’t, on a personal level, chumming around, that I was friends with a lot of his friends, and I knew a fair amount about him.

Smith: Of course the flip side of that extraordinary dedication, as you say, to his job and to the party nationally, was that it left Mrs. Ford at home with the kids.

Engler: Yeah, so it was a challenge, yeah.

Smith: Political wives have never had it easy.

Engler: No, although, it’s remarkable. Back then, I think - something that has been lost today - is they moved to Washington. I mean, the story was the family picked up, it was not considered a problem back home. You were elected to go serve in Washington in the Congress, so you and your family went down there to this new job site. And you weren’t expected, then, back home every weekend; you weren’t expected at every function. You were expected to stay in touch. You were certainly expected, as they did when there were recesses and they were sort of reliable, you could count on this period of time being done.

The Congress didn’t try to stay in session throughout the entire summer. So you could, at the end of the school year, and at the end of the congressional session, go home for the summer, be there, be with your constituents. Go to the county fair in a rural district, do other things that you had to do to stay in touch, and you came back.

One of the things that much has been written and said about is the fact that because you were living here, wives became friends with other wives. Members became friends with other members, regardless of party. They knew each other at a level which developed the kind of trust and the ability to rely on somebody’s word. And you didn’t have to have it in writing. It didn’t have to be some ironclad guarantee. If somebody said, “I can do that. I can support that,” you could, in fact, count on that being done.

Smith: It’s interesting, and a number of people have said that that is certainly a major contributing factor to the mood in this town, the lack of trust, the lack of knowledge, I suppose, that the two parties have toward each other. Alan Greenspan said one of the factors is the jet plane. And by that he meant members of the West Coast could get home a lot easier than otherwise, and they were, accordingly, less likely to bring their families to town. President Ford used to say it was much better when the staffs were smaller.

Engler: That’s right.

Smith: And when you didn’t have to spend all your time raising money.

Engler: I completely agree with that. The money raising has become an obsession because the campaigns are so expensive, and at least until a recent Supreme Court ruling, there were certainly lots of efforts to limit how you raised money. In effect, making it harder, making your dependency on outside individuals, or in some cases, outside groups, much greater. And that, I think, then leads to a problem of people’s independence and ability to approach issues.

So there is no question that that’s all changed. We sort of have to play the hands we’re dealt, it’s hard to go back and unscramble all of this. But I do think we actually are coming a bit full circle. Now you’re seeing some of the Internet fundraising giving candidates an ability with an appeal to reach a broad audience. The problem with it is that sometimes that appeal has to be so simplistic and so blunt that there is no nuance or subtlety. I think one of President Ford’s great strengths, and something that I identified when I became governor, was the fact - and this was certainly well after he’d been president - but he spent all those years, he’d been on the Appropriations Committee, he knew the Defense budgets inside and out, he knew about social spending. He knew really an awful lot. And of course, that remarkable moment when he, as president, actually presented his own budget.

Smith: It will never happen again, will it?
Engler: It will never happen again. And not because somebody maybe wouldn’t be smart enough, but they would not have put in twenty years of service to learn all that. And it does take learning. One of the real crippling things of term limits around the country, frankly, is that in these state legislative bodies we are not letting people build the kind of knowledge base that’s really important. And actually it’s harder today because the complexity of all these programs is so much greater. So, at a time when it’s harder to learn, you’ve now got less time to do it.

Smith: Kind of a misplaced populism?

Engler: Well, I understood the frustration because in the early nineties when that really came to a boil and much of the term limit movement started, they were all shooting at Congress. Because for forty years, the majority never changed. President Ford, nor anyone else, had realized their dream of being a Speaker in the House. There was one party rule. And so the frustration, all into Washington, ended up impacting state legislatures all over the country. And as a result, you have the unfair situation in the State of Michigan House of Representatives where the term of service is only six years. There are very few people coming in off the streets in six years who - maybe could master the school aid formula if they worked consistently - but they are not going to know about Medicaid, they won’t know about the prison system, or the highway system.

Smith: Remember, at that time you also had the Ross Perot movement, which was a real uprising, trying to get the political system to focus on the deficit. And it’s interesting, two years ago the National Governors Association for their centennial meeting, asked me to moderate a session. There must have been forty-five or fifty current and former governors. And, in essence, I asked them “What’s the one thing you would change?” Everywhere a hand went up and it was all term limits, for all of these reasons. Makes perfect sense.

Engler: Both Governor Blanchard and I were there and each addressed that very issue. We both said term limits because we both had seen it in Michigan. It really is the case. The other thing I think when I look at Gerald Ford and his preparation for the presidency – think of what he knew when he was thrust into that office compared to today. I mean, Senator Obama’s career would be but a brief moment in the long preparation that President Ford had. And you could argue, President Bush had six years as governor. That’s an important difference I would argue, because you actually are in charge. Even in the state - some people say, “The governor is weak in Texas, it’s constitutionally weak.” Well, you’re still viewed by the people of Texas as the person in charge. So you’ve got administrative decisions.

Smith: You still have to work with the legislature.

Engler: Exactly. So that’s a different thing than being - let’s lay back for a few years and then we’ll be in this executive branch.

Smith: It’s interesting because we start with Ford, when he became president. And we certainly saw it with Bob Dole. Subsequently we’ve seen it with other people. We’ve asked Walter Mondale about this. What is it about the congressional function, including great success on Capitol Hill, that almost disqualifies [presidential] candidates? Obama is obviously an exception. But he never intended to stay in the Senate. John Kennedy, fifty years ago, couldn’t wait to get out of the Senate. What is it about the legislative function – is it the lingo that people speak? Is it the fact that you’re dealing with a constituency of a handful of people, often behind doors, as opposed to the more theatrical aspects of presidential persuasion? What do you think are the elements? Because you’re right, in terms of the qualifications that say, Ford brought, the knowledge of government was unparalleled. But it was unbalanced by, for lack of a better word, the theater – or the self-dramatization.

Engler: Well, and today all of that has been of higher value, that’s all perhaps off the chart. We certainly in our history have had presidents who, when you look back at the old tapes – and that’s all relatively recent, but even some of them, the others, just the pictures - it was a totally different thing. I think in modern times, though, it is simply that there are so many barnacles attached to being there. You actually have to vote on things when you’re in the House and the Senate. You have a record and you can’t make it up unless you’ve only been there but a brief blink of an eye. And then you kind of slough it all off. If you look at President Obama’s United States Senate career, there were really about 150 days. That’s about all when you look at how many days he was actually there, in session.

Smith: But apparently he was there long enough to know he didn’t want to stay there.

Engler: Well, yes, and he had an opportunity to leave and he was a senator. He was still – if you are there a day, you are a senator. And so he could say, “Of course, I’m a senator, I’m well-prepared.” I think that looking ahead – you saw it was an odd election. A senator could win only because both parties had nominated senators the last time. So, a senator was going to win. Put a senator against a governor and we’ll see in the future. But I’m intrigued about how politics works, of course, having spent thirty some years in elective office – won ten straight elections. And I’m not, perhaps, the likeliest candidate to be winning elections, but I always felt that once somebody can get there, their record and their performance then becomes sort of the measuring stick. And that probably, then, does trump.

Maybe that becomes a part of image, but it also does, I think, trump a lot of other things. And I think for President Obama it’s way too early to look at 2012. But when we get there, whether he had a lot of experience or not, coming to the presidency, it won’t matter at all – he’s got a four-year record as president and that will be the issue and where he would hope to go if he had a second four years.

Smith: I remember saying right at the time of the inauguration, when understandably the nation’s sense of pride was greatest, I remember comparing him to JFK in ’60. The day before he took the oath of office, John F. Kennedy was best known as the first Catholic to be president. But I guarantee you the day after he takes the oath of office, that won’t be the defining element. And I think the same thing with Obama, although there are elements in the press that want to keep defining him that way – I suppose because it’s an easy story, an obvious story.
Engler: I think there is also sort of an ideological aspect to this, because if I can define myself in a way that focuses on my uniqueness, maybe I can separate it from my record in performance.

Smith: Interesting.

Engler: And therefore, who would want to be part of spoiling the great history story that we’re playing out here? I always thought in the case of President Kennedy, and again, I was in high school at that time, so was not nearly as familiar. But it would have been a very different election in ’64 if he were running for re-election, given some of the setbacks he encountered in those early years. The tragedy of his assassination and then the rise of Lyndon Johnson, changed the complete dynamic of the campaign.

Smith: You talk about John McCain, who in many ways, found himself in an identical position to Bob Dole in ’96, i.e., being nominated by a party that was frankly, less than enthusiastic about the choice. And in some ways, I would say, between ’88 and ’96 – and Dole will say now that he shouldn’t have run in ’96, that ’88 was his year, and so on – and I thought in ’96 he seemed less authentic.

I always said, “The great thing you have is this kind of unpolished, Trumanesque, plainspoken quality. It’s pure Midwest. People may or may not agree with you, but they think you are telling them what you think is the truth.” And one sensed in ’96, anticipating McCain in 2008, you had a candidate that felt uncomfortable with what the situation required. That he was chasing the caboose as the Republican Party moved ever farther to the right, particularly on social issues. And you could trace that all the way back to ’76.

In effect, that’s almost where this begins, with the Ford/Reagan challenge. Ford thought he was - and he was - the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. And he could never understand why people thought he wasn’t conservative enough. But it was a different kind of conservatism, wasn’t it?
Engler: It was, and it was also inside/outside even then, I think. Because here is the consummate insider. And so how could he have possibly have retained his authenticity if he’s been part of this problem for so long – discounting completely all of those years he was a voice, not in the wilderness, perhaps, but certainly in a party in the wilderness in the House of Representatives? They were in the minority all of that time.

Smith: Plus, remember, he is the insurgent who knocked off Charlie Halleck.

Engler: Absolutely.

Smith: And, of course, in ’48 he was the Young Turk who took on Bartel Jonkman over the issue of isolationism.

Engler: There is no question. I mean, it’s just the history up close. That’s why I think we’ll always need our historians because you do need to have the passage of time to be able to look back and put this in perspective. And that absolutely was lost. Of course, you had the other – do we need to say the word – Watergate, was swirling around and that obliterated so much else that we never had a chance. I was actually on the ballot in those years in ’72 and 4 and 6, so, the ’74 election was one of the roughest elections anybody running as a Republican ever endured.

I always felt, it was interesting, that this was a unique election in a couple of respects. It said a lot about the Republican Party. Because the Republican Party was so angry at itself that it punished lots of Republicans and it didn’t do it directly, but they did it out of disgust. They just stayed home. And we never would see that kind of reaction to other transgressions – let’s call them -should they happen out there. So you had, in other parts of the country, in gubernatorial or even congressional elections, kind of amazing misdeeds that were reported, but seemingly of no consequence to the electorate when they went to vote. But Watergate was such a searing experience for the nation; the first president ever to resign, and then the pardon.

Smith: I want to come back to that in a minute because it’s a huge topic, but let me just bounce an idea off of you. It goes back to what we’ve been talking about; Ford’s origins as an insurgent and his subsequent identification as an insider who paid a price for that. The older I get the more I believe that the single biggest factor over time in politics, even more than ideology, is generational change. That it’s almost like an escalator, and you’ve got your time, and then before you know it, you’re past your sell date. And ideology factors into that, cultural factors factor into that - what do you think about that in terms of the element of generational change?

Engler: Well, I think there’s a lot to that, although it is important to say it as you’re saying it. It is generational, but it may not have to do with the generation of the candidate. Reagan - the older candidate became, in effect, the younger candidate because this is the leader of the sagebrush rebellion who rides in from the West. And this is very new, this is small government or minimalist government, in tenor. Now in fact, not so at all.

Smith: At least eluded once he got to Washington.

Engler: Sure, and a great practitioner. I think Gerald Ford was as much a practitioner of politics being the art of the possible as Ronald Reagan. But Reagan, being fresh, it was assumed that the deal he cut was a good deal. Ford, being the insider, it was assumed that the deal was an inside deal, that the fix was in.

Smith: And let’s face it, for all the people who were pining for Ronald Reagan, first of all, there’s only one Ronald Reagan. Ronald Reagan is not coming back to save you. Secondly, there are some selective memories. People, particularly the Tea Party crowd, sort of identify with Reagan and suggest that Reagan would be one of them. It’s part of Reagan’s genius that he, in effect, posthumously, can be seen from that wide a range of conservatives as one of them. But this was a guy who put Richard Schweiker on his ticket in ’76 because he wanted to win. This was a guy who apparently was willing to put Gerald Ford on his ticket because he wanted to appear moderate enough to…

Engler: I just started the Craig Shirley book – I don’t want to get off track, but it is a fascinating book.

No, but I think that’s right, I think that people would not – there was the public Reagan – this marvelous communicator – who, I think, did a very good job of always explaining where he thought the end zone was. But at the same time, out on the field, he was running an offense that said, “Look, keep the ball, we’ve got to keep making first downs. We’re headed toward the end zone.” And I think that was a gift, a just flat-out genius that he had, that he understood that. I think that is very hard for many of us, and certainly myself included, to really be clear enough directionally. “What’s the goal at the end?” Even if you’ve got a good, confident sense about where you are and where you are trying to go and how much you’ve done.

Smith: It’s almost as if he communicated perfectionist ends, but he had a pragmatic means to get as close to there as he could. And as he said, “If I can get 80%, I’ll call it a victory.”

Engler: That’s right. That’s exactly right. And I’ll go back and start working tomorrow on the remaining 20. And you believed that he would, even if tomorrow there were other priorities which meant that that pursuit of the 20 had to be held in abeyance for a period of time while I move these other balls down the field. And I’ll say this: he had also a very broad vision of what that field looked like; whether that was an international or domestic policy.

Smith: And was that a result of the fact that he’d been at this now – I mean, it was a movement. He had a loyal following which he developed over all those years, out on the road for GE. I can remember him New Year’s Day, always hosting the Tournament of Roses Parade. He had come into our living rooms for a generation. We felt we knew this guy, we liked him. We were comfortable with him. You can’t put a price on that in terms of political appeal.

Engler: And remember, it was so much easier back then because - what were there – three major networks? If you were going to turn it on, your odds of finding him were much greater. Somebody could be dominant today on one of 1500 channels or something and that doesn’t mean there is very much dominance. So you end up – I was just reading a Walter Cronkite obituary and it was talking about how many homes he was in in the nightly newscast. And today, you can lead and you aren’t in nearly 25% of the homes that Cronkite had with a much smaller nation back then.
Plus, Cronkite himself used to talk about the day news changed. It was in ’77 when Elvis died, and CBS did not lead with Elvis’ death as the lead story that night. I think everyone else did. If you want to know the day when we began to succumb to a kind of celebrity journalism…Cronkite prided himself – he said people used to criticize him for being “Washington-centric.” And if you go back and look at those old news clips, two-thirds of the news that Cronkite [reported] was from committee hearing rooms on Capitol Hill. That was his definition of the news. Now look how far we’ve gotten away from that.

Absolutely. And we don’t even do the minor league training anymore. Because when I went in 1971 to the state capital in Lansing, of the three major Detroit stations, two of them had permanent bureaus; the third one had a crew that was mostly assigned there, had some other duties; and all major papers had reporters that were there. Today, there is virtually nobody covering the state capital anymore. And so you don’t get, in the states, that kind of political coverage to understand even how then it all might rise up and what that coverage is about. So the information about the political process and decisions that are being made almost doesn’t exist.

Again, it’s counterintuitive. Remember, it’s a very painful argument if you follow it to its logical extension. Sixty years ago we were famously told by Murrow of television’s possibilities. Television was going to transform our culture, it was going to bring us together, this instrument can illuminate, it can elucidate, it can elevate the public discourse. Well, we all know what happened to that.

Subsequently, we were told the Internet was going to do all of those things, and then some. It seems to me you can make a strong case that, at the very least, people have access today to more information than before, which does not mean they are any better informed as voters than our parents or grandparents were. And, in fact, the increasing fragmentation of the audience poses a challenge even to the bully pulpit. Because the president can get up and can give a great speech, and before it’s over, people are Twittering, and the blogs are doing real time analysis, if you want to call it that. In many ways, the traditional, persuasive role that Harry Truman identified as the core function of the president is much harder.

Engler: In fact, I heard it suggested that the technology is now there. You could literally, instead of trying to respond to a State of the Union Address in a kind of traditional way, you literally could take a clip from the State of the Union as it is delivered – a clip aside, do a fact check, and then have a response that was an integration of video clips and sort of a factual rebuttal on certain points. Tonight this was said, these are the facts. And it is kind of interesting, it is so instantaneous, and so there is no time to reflect on both what was said, or the compulsion to do a response, even. Is it even necessary on the spot? So it’s not really a response because you have to write it ahead of time, so it’s an alternate viewpoint, but is that even…? I wonder about that whole process.

Smith: And remember, poor Eric Sevareid used to be criticized for offering instant analysis. Well, now you’ve got thirty million people who are offering instant analysis.

Engler: That’s right.

Smith: There’s no doubt that in a sense we have democratized the process, but I think with unforeseen consequences.

Engler: Even the founding fathers with the idea of a House of Representatives and another chamber that’s the Senate - one institutionally restricted to move a little slower, one that may be more responsive to the mob, to the crowd.

Smith: You bet. And remember Washington’s wonderful analogy – because Jefferson wasn’t there and from a distance he thought this reeked of the House of Lords. Washington used the analogy of a cup of hot tea, and you pour it in the saucer to cool it. And the House is the cup of hot tea, and the Senate is the saucer.

Engler: Exactly. And so that’s all at risk in one sense. How does the public or the policymakers, when it’s all instantaneous – the last thing I think we want is to sort of move to a system where everybody has got their finger on a button casting their vote.

Smith: A plebiscitary democracy.
Engler: And to me it’s a little bit that way. Even the act of voting - there are those who would like to – I think it’s pretty fundamental to a citizen performing his or her duty in society to actually once a year, or once every two or four years, cast a vote, actually have to think about it, either obtain a ballot or go to a polling place. But if that becomes, in some future date, everybody sitting in their home inundated with emails or video clips and people pushing buttons…

Smith: But the symbol of this is those horrible focus groups on cable TV where they…

Engler: With the dials…

Smith: Oh, and you watch the line and you think to yourself - because I used to be a speechwriter - that’s exactly what we intended. And they craft it to appeal to that process. What does it do to thoughtful, let alone nuanced, policymaking?

Engler: And I would say, what does it do to the ability to actually have a compromise, which takes into consideration that there are in fact, different interests? There is great antipathy toward people who lobby today, ignoring the fact that anybody who is on the PTA and goes and meets with the school board – they are lobbying. It’s just at a different level. People lobby all the time. They lobby to get a road paved in front of their house, or repairs made. But they see that differently than say their state capital, or their nation’s capital. But in reality, the policymakers there do have a bewildering array sometimes of interests. And there is a need to balance those off. But at the end of the day, there comes a point where you’ve got to stop balancing it off and make a decision. I worry greatly that we’ve got a country today where we can’t ever make a decision on a big issue.

Smith: Shelby Foote, a Civil War historian, used to say, “The fact of the matter is, the Americans have a genius for compromise.” It may be our greatest talent, it’s how we got the Constitution, it’s how we devised the nation. To be sure there are some compromises that turned out badly and had to be corrected later on. But, in effect, we were a pragmatic people. And most certainly that’s not the trend. The trend of political discourse, if you want to dignify it as such, is enormously influenced by the media. The Internet which allows people anonymity to engage in character assassination, and certainly not raise the level of discourse. Consensus is a dirty word. But it’s the only way a country this large and diverse works.

Engler: That’s right and I don’t ever confuse the idea that consensus means unanimity, and I think that sometimes also gets to be a bit of a problem because it may be 60/40 this way this time. The next time it’s maybe 55/45 the other way. You don’t know, but it is the same process that I suspect that most families go through, and certainly families with children. There’s a lot of give and take and compromise that goes on. And it’s true in virtually every institution, especially why not in government where you are trying to represent literally everybody? There has to be, I think, give and take.

Smith: First of all, public policy is left out of the mix. The 24/7 news cycle demands a new storyline every day, and there are white hats and there are black hats, and there is very little in between. And it’s all played as entertainment. The old horserace aspect has been superseded by this 24 hours a day. John Eisenhower once said something to me about his dad. He said, “Moderates don’t have cults.” And he was putting it in the context, if not so much of ideology, but style, as opposed to the Kennedys, for example. Now, moderate may even be a loaded term, but substitute pragmatist or problem solvers, or consensus seekers; understanding that a consensus doesn’t mean surrendering, at least in principle, but respecting other people’s principles and finding common ground. And that’s what we say we want, but that’s not necessarily what we’re rewarding, and it’s certainly not what the media is celebrating.

Engler: But I think that’s why, to bring it right to today, why President Obama is in some difficulty. Because he claimed throughout the campaign that’s what he was, was somebody who would bring people together. He was going to do things differently, and then you see the spectacle of how they put sixty votes together, sixty only Democrat votes in the Senate to pass the healthcare bill, and how you literally acquire the last votes.

Smith: It is ugly. But is it, I assume, and I’m not speaking for them, their comeback would be, “Well, we couldn’t get any Republicans to seriously consider it.”
Engler: Because it was too hard. Well, yes, it is hard. But as even, I think, Olympia Snow made this point, who would be one I think, who would be willing and has certainly said in the past, she’s willing to work on some of these issues. Most of the major social changes that have been made – I think back to welfare reform that I was deeply involved with in the mid-90s – we ended up with significant bipartisan support, even though there were deep divisions at the beginning and even at the end, remembering that when President Clinton finally signed the third bill after two vetoes, even then he had people resigning from his administration in protest. But its center held on that and it was an accomplishment that was significant and I look at the last part of the twentieth century, and there is no bigger single social change that was probably positive and overdue than that one.

So you end up, I believe, with a process that can work, but people have to be committed to making it work. And in this case, today it’s different on healthcare than it was on welfare reform. Now, what made welfare reform different is you did have a Republican legislature, because the Congress had changed after the ’94 elections, and you had a Democrat president. So it was absolutely clear you had to work together. Today with one party in charge of everything, there are too many voices saying, “Well, hell, we don’t have to work together. We can do it ourselves. Maybe.” But as it turned out now, they couldn’t.

Smith: Let me go back to ’74. Were you in the legislature?

Engler: Yes, I was elected in ’70 for the first time.

Smith: And you almost coincided with Watergate?

Engler: Right.

Smith: And people forget, but of course in early ’74 Ford’s old congressional seat was lost to a Democrat. He had just become vice president. Nixon was still in the White House, and apparently Ford had tried to raise the subject with the president, who was not eager to hear it raised. How bad was it to be a Republican in Michigan at that point?
Engler: It was not bad to be a Republican, but all the Republicans knew they were in a very bad environment. Because the thing about Watergate - it was so personal to President Nixon. It wasn’t very rational to blame – I mean, the Republicans in Michigan didn’t have anything to do with Watergate. In fact, we were behind the guy with the white hat – President Ford became vice president. But Michigan was a tough, tough environment then because two things happened: President Nixon’s last judicial appointment, I believe, was the appointment of Congressman Jim Harvey to the Federal Bench, and then his seat was the first seat lost in Michigan’s when in the next special election Bob Traxler was elected to Congress.

Then President Ford was nominated as vice president, and when he becomes vice president, then that fall, his seat is lost and the loser of that seat – a lot of people said, “Well, the Harvey seat – gee, he ran his longtime aide.” It was a congressional aide, I think, that…

Smith: An insider.

Engler: Very much an insider running against a pretty popular, long term state legislator. But then it flips when you go to the Ford seat. Vanderveen is a complete outsider, Bob Vanderlaan was the Republican leader of the Michigan senate. The fellow who had managed my campaign was Dick Posthumus, both in 1970 and then helped me again in 1972. So Dick and I had worked together. He was a couple years behind me at Michigan State. Dick then, by that time, had become the youth chairman because the other thing that was happening, which certainly backfired for ‘74’s elections. President Nixon in ’72 – that was the first election in which eighteen year olds could vote. Because of the age of majority, he was pushing that to burnish his credentials with the younger voters. And of course, that coincided with the Nixon plan to end the Vietnam war and all that kind of thing that was going on.

And most of us in ’72 said the president had all this money, which now as it turned out everybody learned how it all came to pass, but all of this money was spent trying to run up the margin for the President and at the expense of Senate seats, of state parties, in some cases gubernatorial elections. So there was complete fraying. I would say, of the relationships already with the Nixon team, the Nixon White House and everybody else. I can only imagine this, I’ve never actually read, but I’ll bet the private, if they stayed private or - House leaders like President Ford would have been appalled at this money being spent on the presidential election when it was clear they were going to win the election. Nobody cared if they won fifty states or if they won forty-three states, what they did care about? If you’ve got this extra money let’s help these House candidates.

Smith: Right, and of course, he wanted to be Speaker of the House

Engler: Absolutely.

Smith: He thought, this is my best chance, my last chance.

Engler: And it was. And so all of that – you go to ’74 and we lose these two specials, Dick Posthumus is going to run for Bob Vanderlaan’s seat. He was in that – that was his home area. And so he was already starting. Of course, Vanderlaan, would go to Congress. In fact, in the Vanderlaan office there were staffers looking for their places in Washington. They were a little bit, probably, like Martha Copley in Massachusetts this time. And I saw one comparison, Michael Barone, very astute on these things, talked about impactful elections and he said the Vanderlaan election in ’74 and the Brown election this year, as two that really – when you think about one election sending a shot across the bow, or maybe a shot into the bow. Those were, each in their own circumstances, that powerful.

So Dick was spending all his time out there and he came back shaking his head, saying, “I think Vanderlaan is going to lose.” And we’re saying, “How can that be? This seat is so solid. This seat is so Republican. It’s Vice President Ford’s seat.” He said, no. And so we started looking at local…and we actually – nobody thought this was going to happen. You didn’t have ten people, I think. And Democrats at the national level put a lot of people in it. It became a little bit like Brown at the end. It was, “Oh, my gosh.”

Smith: It’s a wave election.
Engler: Yeah. And then it wasn’t even close, as I recall, or not that close.

Smith: It must have, among other things, embarrassed the Vice President.

Engler: Yeah, I would think so.

Smith: Did you see him at all during his vice presidency? We found out subsequently, not only because of the unique circumstances – the tightrope that he was forced to walk. But apparently he really, really disliked the job. He just really disliked the vice presidency.

Engler: Yeah, and that wouldn’t be something where I’d have ever heard that because, again, he was so loyal and so circumspect, so institutionally correct. He would not have…so I didn’t know that. I did see him. By this time I’m still there, but I’m still pretty junior, so I’m dependent on the invitations from other friends.

Smith: Was there a statewide race in Michigan in ’74?

Engler: In ’74 there was a governor’s race. And it was Governor Milliken who ran. It was his second election. He had a rematch against Sander Levin and probably a good thing. It was a tighter election than he’d had.

Smith: But he hung on?

Engler: My closest general election was that year, too. We lost a lot of seats. We came back and we got pretty well wiped out in the Michigan House of Representatives.

Smith: Really? Were economic factors involved as well?

Engler: Not so much. I mean, we’d had a recession in the early ’70s, but we were more on the mend. President Ford, one thing that he did, he vetoed a lot of bills. I mean, he really showed that you could manage the federal budget. He was doing some important things. He had a superb team around him, too. I always say if you think back of the people who worked for him and then went on to do other substantial things, you can’t find a Cabinet collection that’s as formidable as that team that Gerald Ford eventually had.
Smith: But it also says something about him that he was comfortable enough in his own skin to surround himself with people whose egos or IQs might be greater than his. He had a Henry Kissinger and a Bill Simon, just for starters, or the pick of Nelson Rockefeller as vice president. That tells you something about the guy himself.

Engler: He was completely confident. I think, again, he benefited immeasurably from being underestimated a lot.

Smith: There are people who have suggested that he actually was shrewd enough that he made it work for him. That he knew he was being underestimated, and that he could, in fact, make it work.

Engler: Yeah.

Smith: That famous incident of getting up and doing the federal budget. Unfortunately, that’s not the sort of thing that’s translated to the general electorate. But when you stop and think about it, it’s pretty impressive.

Engler: And it was not lost on the Hill, I think. How empowering that would be for your budget director when somebody is trying to spend money in an area that it shouldn’t be spent in, to say, “Look, I can’t do this deal. You know full well the President understands. He knows.”

Smith: What was the reaction to the pardon in your neck of the woods? First of all, did it come as a surprise, the timing of it?

Engler: The pardon? We were loyal, so we supported President Ford and I think most people had the sort of reaction that it’s tough, and politically it’s really tough, but it is the right thing to do. We’ve got to move on as a country. And certainly, he’s had lots of after-the-fact vindication. I don’t know if they would have been as kind to him if he’d been able to win the election. It’s almost like since he lost…

Smith: That’s interesting. That’s a very shrewd observation. He was lucky because he lived thirty years after leaving office. Poor Lyndon Johnson died the day before the Vietnam Peace Agreement was announced. But Ford said, “For twenty years, everywhere I go, people asked the same question.” But when the Kennedys gave him the Profiles in Courage Award, he said, “They don’t ask the question anymore.” It’s as if the imprimatur of the Kennedys wiped it out.

Engler: Amazing, but – yeah.

Smith: Were you at the ’76 convention?

Engler: No, I did not go there, did not go to Kansas City.

Smith: Are you glad?

Engler: Well, in hindsight, maybe. I must say, the people from Michigan are absolutely the worst people to ask about the ’76 convention, because there never was any question; everybody was on board with Gerald Ford. Everybody assumed he was the president, he would be re-nominated. Never even thought it was that close.

Smith: But you’d had a primary, remember at one point which was very hotly contested?

Engler: Very hotly contested. And just almost a shock that it turned out that Reagan walked away with a number of delegates out of Michigan. And this had implications oddly enough for 1980 and the Reagan term. That’s a different story, I think. But in ’80 people in Michigan were still, I would say, sulking over the Ford loss in ’76, and the irritation that this primary had likely cost the election. So none of the people really stepped up to be Reagan leaders. Kind of going all over the map you had Howard Baker as an option, you had George Bush as an option, and Reagan as a default option. And so he had these people from ’76. If you’re in ’76 and you are in Michigan and you are not supporting Gerald Ford, you’re probably not in the mainstream of the party. Now, I had some good friends who were, but they had a rebellious part of their spirit – they were sage brushers if you will.

Smith: Now, that’s interesting. Even though that year the convention is in Detroit.

Engler: Absolutely. We all forfeited a chance to be in the front ranks here of the Reagan movement.
Smith: The flip side of that, thirty years later, and stop me if you know all this, but it’s amazing how memories take on a life of their own. After the President died there was an effort launched to put a statue of him in Statuary Hall from Michigan.

Engler: Right.

Smith: And most people thought that was a good idea. Now, it meant, among other things, moving out Zachariah Chandler. I think the Detroit Historical Society or something wanted the statue and the [Ford] Foundation would pay for moving the statue. There was really no opposition, perse, but in the state Senate there were a couple of Republican senators who, it turned out, had been Reagan supporters back in the 70s, who just kind of prevented this from happening. And they weren’t quite smoked out in the open, but behind the scenes, they were…I guess the governor was willing to go along, but not to take the lead, surprisingly.

So anyway, what happened was amazing. A wonderful story. The House was fine with this, and it came back and it was the end of the session, and there was a sort of politics of delay underway and there was an African-American senator from Detroit, who got up on the floor of the Senate, obviously a Democrat – and said, “Let me tell you something about what kind of man Gerald Ford was.” His grandfather had been Willis Ward, who was the football teammate and good friend, and of course, Ford had always told the story about, and so forth and so on. And this guy went on.

Engler: He was a longtime __________________ in Detroit.

Smith: And what Ford had learned about race relations. Georgia Tech wouldn’t play Michigan. They would not play a team with a black man on it. And it was a wrenching experience for Ford and he and Willis Ward became closer than ever about all of this. And it was the only game the team won that year. The only game the Wolverines won that year was against Georgia Tech. So anyway, Ward had absented himself from the game rather than forfeit it for that reason. And Ford had talked this over with his father because he didn’t want to play; he was in solidarity with his friend Willis Ward. Anyway, it was a remarkable story. And Ford wrote about it at one point.

But then this guy got up on the floor of the Senate and told this story, on his own, unprompted, from the Democratic side of the aisle; at that point literally kind of shamed these guys into silence and it went through. Gerald Ford did not care about monuments to himself, but I’ll tell you that if there is anything he would appreciate, it would be – because that was home.

Engler: Absolutely. No, I had not heard that because I just assumed that they would take care of that and it was one of those things that nobody ever called me and said, “You need to help on this.” I’m sure Peter [Secchia] and others back in Michigan were working on that. But I think that is a wonderful story, and I think that’s also why there is something to be said for these long careers, as I think rare as they are going to be in the future. I think it’s just not going to be the case. In fact, I think that’s probably not very good.

Smith: What kind of associations and contacts did you have? You were elected governor for the first time in?

Engler: 1990.

Smith: ’90. Did you talk with him?

Engler: I did. He actually campaigned for me. So he made some appearances for me, and I talked to him. He was, I think, very proud of the fact that I’d been able to win. One of the things that we did also, I guess prior to me getting elected, but I was involved, and we got Bob Griffin elected to the State Supreme Court, and that was always a good relationship. There was always kind of an odd relationship because in Michigan you had kind of a Milliken part of the party, which was kept small and quite insular, and then you had the Ford/Griffin – I mean, more of a – I think they were always more willing.

Smith: Was Milliken an inheritance from Romney, or was it separate from Romney?

Engler: He inherited, really. When Romney left, Milliken became governor, and then had two years before he had to seek election in his own right. And that was the ’70 election and he beat Sander Leven in that one and then he won three elections in the ‘70s, like I won three elections in the 90s, just twenty years later, actually, all the way across the board. But I only served twelve years; Milliken’s the longest serving governor at fourteen years. But he always was surrounded by people who said, “Well, they did mention you in the ticket-splitter books, and Michigan was a ticket-splitter state,” all kinds of that stuff was out there. So they never felt that you could win, in effect, if voters were going to vote for Milliken, then they were probably going to also vote for a Democrat to balance that off.

Smith: Is some of that attributable to the, in those days, relatively greater strength of organized labor?

Engler: Sure. And I think also just a sort of a view. Politics is a tough game. I mean, it’s not easy. And I think then polling was becoming much more of a factor that everybody used.

Smith: It’s more of a science than a.r.t.

Engler: And so I think there was a lot of maybe reading things into things that, whether they were so or not, you thought they were so because that’s what this poll might have said. When I look back on that era, I just think the one that we feel very bad about is ’78 when Griffin said he was going to retire. And then the Milliken campaign team, really the governor himself, worked on him to come back into the race. And this was at a point when Congressman Phil Ruppe was already announced for that seat and it ends up Griffin had a very poor attendance record in ’78, because he was leaving, missed a bunch of votes. Carl Levin the city councilman of Detroit was running and probably Ruppe would have beaten Levin, but Levin beats Griffin because he’s clearly lost interest. He doesn’t even show up. It was an ignominious way for Bob to have to go out given all the many contributions he’d had, and the relationship with Gerald Ford, and the importance – I mean, Bob Griffin was the Whip in the Senate. He was a key guy.

Smith: One senses, and I don’t know him, but one senses on the campaign trail a more diffident figure. He wasn’t a natural in some ways.

Engler: That’s right.
Smith: He was better in office, maybe, than he was as a campaigner.

Engler: Oh, I think that’s right. I think a lot of us are probably that way, but I think there’s no question – and, of course, they hadn’t prepared because they were late starting. But this fell into the storyline ticket that way, we always felt that Ruppe would be fresh. Milliken would be the older candidate. In ’78 if you put Griffin and Milliken back together again, if they are going to vote for one and not the other, we’re going to get that vote. And then Milliken was running against the Democratic leader of the Senate, a good Irish-Catholic.

Smith: Sitting here listening to you talk - the gift that politicians have for taking apart this process – not only the language, but the way they eviscerate all of this, I assume the conversations with Gerald Ford must have been like that. You hear the famous stories about Nixon, who could tell you everything – everything, the history of everything. Politicians who really marinate themselves in this stuff…

Engler: By ’78 though, I was busy myself because I had challenged a longtime sitting member of the Senate in a primary because I had decided after eight years in the House it was either up or out. I wasn’t going to stay in a minority. So I had a primary which then made Traverse City - Bob Griffin’s home and Bill Milliken’s home - my constituency, as well. And I didn’t have Governor Milliken’s support in that primary, needless to say.

Smith: Was that seen as a conservative, moderate divide? Were you seen as the…

Engler: Yeah, I suppose. It was more of a…

Smith: Or was some of it generational?

Engler: I thought it was generational, for sure, because I’m thirty years old, with eight years in the House, running against a senator who is the number two ranking Republican in the Senate, but clearly beyond, I think, the shelf life in that body. The Michigan Senate, the Republicans in those days, had felt a real acute case of minority mentality, and you had a lot of other issues going on about alcohol problems and there were just some sad stories over there. And they had been there a long time, pretty ossified.
Smith: The subject comes up a lot in these interviews that there was just a different culture, thirty, forty, fifty years ago. That among other things, people drank a lot more.

Engler: A lot more.

Smith: It tended to be covered up, but it was just intrinsic to the political culture.

Engler: Well, it was. I mean you used to have - it was almost legendary in a couple of cases - but the Michigan legislature used to have a Monday night session where they’d work. People would come back at Lansing for a Monday night session, and Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday - and they would go back on Thursday night. But the Monday night session usually was the session that followed dinner somewhere. And that dinner often had a lot of liquid element to it. And so you got some pretty colorful speeches that night and sometimes those sessions would run on into the evening.

That actually was one of the changes after I became the leader. We kind of concluded we didn’t need the Monday night. We probably, in our own way, also contributed to the – there were just too many issues arising out of that. In fact, we actually changed to Tuesday morning. So we said, “Let’s do the morning sessions that will get people here.” If you did the committee meetings, they wouldn’t come until the session in the afternoon, so we flipped that. We’d meet in the morning and then have committees in the afternoon and it sort of worked. I’m way off of ’78 and Griffin and even Ford, but to get back to those guys, I think that in ’78, Milliken wins his third term then, the third election. Griffin loses, but President Ford, of course, he’s out of office.

But during this whole period and for a while there – and I know once he leaves office, he’s doing some boards, he’s doing some other things, because, in fact, he doesn’t have any money from all these years in public service, but public income as well.

So I think he kind of went through, I would say, almost a quiet period in there. But then as he began to come back. And of course, in ’80 you had the flurry at the convention, in one sense what that did do, it always struck me as a sort of restart of the public life of Gerald Ford. Because he was raised up and a lot of good things got said about him, and from there he clearly was the elder statesman - going to be. And then when President Reagan was elected, he is the former president and we pay homage and he begins to take on this life which he then led until the end, I think. So I always was intrigued by, and it does go to a point you made earlier that people who have been around this game a long time, there is always a level of interest. What’s so and so doing? What’s this person up to? What’s happening over there? What does this mean? And it’s almost a shorthand.

Smith: He retained that, I assume.

Engler: Yeah, he did. He was very curious about things and wanting to know this or that. And of course, I was a bit involved during my legislative days with some of the Ford Museum because there were some state appropriations in that. We had a few other things that we worked on. And then as I became a leader in the legislature, was sort of directly involved in some of those kinds of things that surrounded the way in which we recognized the life and the times of Gerald Ford.

Smith: He took a lot of heat for going on some boards and doing some of the commercial things that he did. One thing that a lot of people never stopped to consider was that he had to raise all that money to build the library and the museum. And to him - I mean, today it’s nothing - but whatever – nine million dollars he had to raise. Plus he was a real fiscal conservative.

Engler: He was, indeed.

Smith: He’s probably the last president who was willing to spend whatever political capital he had through those vetoes in an effort to bludgeon the budget into some sort of…

Engler: And he knew how to put the pressure back onto the Congress. I think he was sophisticated in the way he did that. Of course, the other thing that maybe in response to his vetoes, I wouldn’t say that gave rise, I would think more later it just was the sharper political divisions. But now you’re stuck with these omnibus acts. Gerald Ford had a lot of vetoes because he got a lot of different appropriation bills. Today you don’t get that. You get the whole thing late, in one 1,200 page bill. And so, that really removes a lot of flexibility for the president. He can’t say, “You’ve done obscene things here in the agriculture department, I’m going to turn that bill down,” because that’s just one of all the departments. The only one you can really break out is defense.

Smith: I don’t want to point a finger at anyone, because I think history will regard Ronald Reagan very highly. And in fact, if you put yourself in Reagan’s shoes you can understand exactly where he was coming from when he said, basically, I want a balanced budget, I want to win the Cold War, and I want to rebuild the nation’s defenses. Again, if I can get two out of three, I’ll settle for them and allow a temporary increase in spending, which they could have argued away because if there was a peace dividend, you could imagine taking care of it.

But twenty-five years later it’s become accepted among conservatives that deficits don’t matter. Now, you have a party trying to redefine itself as a party of fiscal responsibility. The Cold War is over, we won it so we no longer have the Soviet Union to define us as conservatives. If we cede the issue of fiscal responsibility, then what’s left? Social issues.

Engler: Yeah, not exactly happy hunting ground for Republican candidates in the past.
Although I do think there are a couple of things. First of all, I think Reagan’s approach - one of the fundamental legs of the platform on which he stood, was economic growth, and the importance of that for prosperity and jobs. And I do think that that emphasis on competitiveness was a very powerful, very important, antidote to the sort of malaise of the Carter years. So, there’s no doubt in my mind that that kind of emphasis, then, built the kind of economy, and whether that is measured through increasing innovation and deployment of technology, our ability to compete our exporting. Not nearly as far as we need to go, but we became more globalized and I think the world economy required that American companies step up or somebody else was going to do that. And that would be, I think, sort of an irretrievable loss for the competitiveness of major American companies.

So all of that, I think, created a situation which later on – and Reagan is doing it with Democratic Congresses, for the most part. He had the Senate for a while, but he did not have the House. And so, when the 90’s and the ’94 election changes and you get a Republican House, even the slightest bit the fiscal restraint, coupled with now a stronger economic engine, balances budgets. We get to the point. So I would say, in examining the Reagan legacy, that the economic strength, the seeds of which were sown then, and harvested a bit later, led us to a balanced budget. Now where we go off track clearly is when we get to the end of the Clinton years, and I would think Clinton’s tax increases - I think there was a real debate about did they contribute to balancing the budget, or did they at the same time, sort of weaken our economic strength prospectively. That stuff all has longer tails than get acknowledged.

Smith: And they could have done both.

Engler: And I think there is a good case that they did do both. Because I think in the short term, immediately, you get some more revenue, but I think it’s at a price of future growth.

Smith: Right. Interesting.

Engler: And then, layer on that now suddenly 2001, 9/11 happens and we’ve got a global war on terrorism. And it turns out to be, because of the actual wars, both in Afghanistan and then Iraq, you end up with all these costs and that’s not paid for, and then we start down this path. So we end up in the situation where I do think that the country now has to be much more focused on the entitlement burden that we’ve voted. And President Ford did not add to that. I would say, arguably, the Reagan administration did not. I thought we made steps on welfare reform in the Clinton years to pull it back a little bit more. You’d have to say that the drug/Medicaid expansion did add, but then the response to the near fatal financial collapse blew it up beyond all reasonableness. And now we’ve got to go back and that goes to our earlier discussion. We’re so upside down the way we make policy today, it’s hard to see a path forward.

Smith: During your governorship, did you see him from time to time?
Engler: President Ford? Yes, I did. The last time I saw him was maybe— I don’t know how many months before he passed— Peter Secchia and I were out in California. That was on Peter’s board of directors— Universal Forest Products. He had a board meeting out there, so Peter and I went over. It was a few miles over to go and see the President. And I followed through Secchia.

Smith: How was he when you saw him?

Engler: He was pretty good. He’d had some health issues, but that day he was getting ready— there was a Michigan basketball game coming on. It was in the winter. And he was in pretty good spirits.

Smith: There is a story: this goes to his fiscal conservatism, because he was going on about all these football games he did watch and everything else. He had this ESPN cable, or whatever. Someone who knew him well was disbelieving. Couldn’t believe…

Engler: He wouldn’t put Direct TV in or something?

Smith: That he would spend the money. Someone gave it to him.

Engler: Oh my gosh.

Smith: Now, that’s a conservative.

Engler: I don’t know if Lee was there that day, but it was just— he had this level of support that was just terrific. He was just a grand man.

Smith: Now the last time he came back to Grand Rapids was for his ninetieth birthday.

Engler: Right. That was when we went to the old house, I think. We did all that stuff.

Smith: You saw him that day?

Engler: Yeah.

Smith: And how did he seem?
Engler:  Great. I mean, one always wonders – I think Michelle and I were both there – you kind of wonder if he is wondering if this is the last time I’m coming back here? Or the next time I’m coming back.

Smith:  But a big crowd turned out. It must have been heartwarming.

Engler:  Big crowd, affectionate crowd. It was warm – he really liked it. He had a durable group of friends, too. Some of these old timers had lasted as long as he did. So I always admired that about him. One thing that – this is a very little bit of a memory – but after he becomes vice president, what’s his first trip? To come back and do that Red Flannel Days parade because he promised he would be there for that parade. Now he’s not the congressman anymore, he’s vice president of the United States. He still comes back. And that speaks so many volumes about that honor and duty ethic that was part of every fiber of who he was. “I told them I’d do that and so I’m going to do that, by golly.”

Smith:  Two quick things and I’ll let you go. One is, like him, you had experienced, obviously under different circumstances, but you had the experience of going from a fairly lengthy legislative career, in effect, to learning to be an executive. What’s the learning curve?

Engler:  I had a little intermediate step to help me out because I had seven years as the Majority Leader in the state senate. So I was actually running a pretty large operation there. And I used to joke all the time, as a Senate leader then, I had more staff hiring responsibilities and was able to assemble what I called a government in waiting. We always argued that we were a little bit more like a Parliamentary system -that we had a shadow Cabinet. And I was able to bring a lot of people from my Senate to the governor’s office. And so, it was really wonderful.

But, like President Ford, I was able to bring a lot of people from my Senate staff to the executive office. And I had a whole host of people, my lawyer, for all those years in the Senate and then say twelve years as my lawyer in the governor’s office. She was spectacular. We had legislative relations people. We had department directors. My first budget director and treasurer were people that had been part of the Senate staff. So that was all part of that preparation. But I think that there is nothing that really prepares you for being in that executive’s job until you are there. Because, I mean, the day you take that oath, then suddenly what’s happening in a prison somewhere is your concern. Is there a natural disaster that happens? I think of Frank Keating. He hadn’t been governor very many weeks and that Oklahoma City bomber incident hit and transformed how people viewed him, how he approached his whole job. And that can happen to anyone. President Bush with 2001.

Smith: Last thing. How do you think Ford should be remembered?

Engler: Well, I think he should be remembered, almost just the way he is being remembered; as a very honorable man, a rock of integrity, a person with an encyclopedic knowledge of government, and somebody who, in two and a half years had a profound impact. And I’m one who doesn’t believe that the short tenure of his presidency should be allowed to diminish the contributions that he made. And I am not talking to you about some of the foreign policy stuff as much as I am what he tried to do domestically, and the generation of leadership that he, in effect, launched, and the impact of all of those people.

I mean, if we look at the Ford legacies, post the Ford presidency, it’s pretty impressive the profound effect that he’s had on the American political process and on American governance. So I think he was clearly a transitional figure and it was a brief presidency, but I think an important presidency. And even though it was our first and only unelected president, we really had somebody there who made a significant contribution to American politics. And I do think that certainly having to take office and to help the country come back and steady itself after the first resignation of a sitting president, he’ll be forever owed a debt of gratitude by the American people.

Smith: They saw that, of course, he was a passionate football fan, passionate Michigan fan. I never saw it, but I’ve talked to people who did - many years he’d find a way to be back in Ann Arbor just before The Game and he would go down and give a pep talk to the football team. And all of a sudden, it was the Gerald Ford you never heard. He was eloquent and forceful and passionate and he connected emotionally with every one of those kids.
Engler: Michigan doesn’t have a tape of any of those talks anywhere in their archives?

Smith: I don’t think so?

Engler: God, that’d be great. Wouldn’t it be wonderful? I do know he was a great fan of Bo Schembechler’s [former U of M football coach] and Bo Schembechler reciprocated, __________ and he was a Michigan man. And I’d love – one of the great jokes of all time when Peter Secchia got a band to play the Michigan State fight song to welcome him onto a platform. He’s expecting the Michigan fight song, Hail to the Victors, and here comes the Michigan State fight song. It was very funny and they were forever doing those kinds of things. He was just a good, good man.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for coming up here and doing this.

Fifer: You’re welcome.

Smith: Tell me, first of all, how you got into the Navy and how you got on to the Monterey?

Fifer: Well, I was just out of high school.

Smith: And that was where?

Fifer: In South Bend, Indiana. Of course it was in ’43, so we’d already been at war from ’41-’42. Boy, I wanted to get in so bad.

Smith: Really? Describe for a generation that maybe has trouble understanding that. Why did you want to get in so bad?

Fifer: Pearl Harbor just really hit hard. Those kind of things just get to me. But I also could hardly wait to get out – when it was all over. So I went to Great Lakes, I think it was for three months. Then they shipped us in a troop train to California, and then took a troop ship to New Caledonia, which is kind of due east of Australia.

Smith: Today I think it’s probably Indonesia.

Fifer: Yeah, a pretty big island. I think the French owned it. We were there for a while, then they put us out on another troop ship and took us to the New Hebrides. One day here comes these ships. They had a big, real nice bay area there. And here come all these ships in there. The Monterey was one of them.

Smith: Now, let me stop you for a second because – were you under age when you joined?

Fifer: No, I was seventeen.
Smith: They took seventeen year olds?

Fifer: Yeah. Well, I don’t know. My parents signed, let’s put it that way.

Smith: Okay. Was this a bit of an adventure, initially – to see the world?

Fifer: Oh my goodness, it is a big ocean I tell you. I can’t get over it. It is huge. Even when you look at a map and you see these little dots, islands all over the place. But the Bunker Hill was in there and the Monterrey and I forget some of the other ships that were in there. And of course, everything was alphabetical – so it was you, you, you…And I don’t know how many fellows - they put us on the Monterrey - but there were seven of us – all of our last names began with a F. And they put us all in the same division, which was the air division, flight deck.

Smith: Now, did you have any knowledge that you were going to be put on a ship?

Fifer: You didn’t know it because on all the islands they had Navy guys. It was amazing how everything had to be shipped clear across that ocean – from food to ammunition – everything – guys. It’s a wonder we won the thing. But I think the enemy just spread themselves too far, I think.

Smith: Long supply lines.

Fifer: So then when you are in the air division, of course, they had warnings right away when you launched planes, you had to find the landing gear and sit there. They told everybody to take off and you pulled a chock(?). And then the wings had to be on the fighters. You released a lever and then the wings would slide out and then two or three guys would have to get on each wing and pull it up until they locked. When they landed they had to do the same thing the other way – they had to push it up until it locked.

Smith: I assume you were in this division – what other divisions made up the crew? What other functions?

Fifer: The gunnery division, it was just everything – your supplies, the quartermasters. A good friend of mine was a paymaster, and I had a good friend who was down in the engine room. Of course, they’d come up and visit guys. I think most of the guys were from the East that were aboard the Monterrey at that time.

Smith: Was there a hierarchy? And I don’t mean in the formal sense, obviously, the Navy has a hierarchy. But was there an informal hierarchy? If you were in the engine room, was that less desirable than X?

Fifer: No, I don’t think so.

Smith: There weren’t functions, particular functions, that you would much prefer to do as opposed to something else.

Fifer: No, I don’t think so. I really don’t. Well, anyway, you did what they told you.

Smith: Well, of course. And did you do that function through the end of the war, or were people trained to do different things?

Fifer: You had to work as a mess cook for three months, if you were a Seaman’s 2nd Class or 1st Class. And then you’d go back in your division again after that. Then I got into the arresting gear group – which is the wires and the barriers that catch the planes when they come in. You started out as a chase and hooks. A guy from each side would have to run out and unhook it from the wire and I did that until the end of the war, actually.

Smith: Is there danger associated with that?

Fifer: Oh, yeah. You’re out there, before the plane even stops, you are on your way out there. All you do is watch that hook and if it catches one, you know he’s going to stop. So you are on your way out there. You had to wear real heavy gloves because of the wires. They were all chopped up and greasy. And you had to grab the hook and break it loose from the wire and then turn around and run because that props – he’s gunning it to go forward and you had to watch the props.

Smith: Did anyone ever not watch it? Did you ever lose anyone to an accident?

Fifer: One guy walked into one. Young guy, real young guy. It was towards the end of the war and he’d just come aboard, I think. We lost a guy that way. Like in the morning, when you first start up, all them props going and you’re sitting there on the wheel waiting to pull – and when you’ve got to grab the thing, you get out of the way for the next one. It was a dangerous place to be, that flight deck.

Smith: Let’s see – there’s a flight deck and then there’s a hangar deck?

Fifer: Hangar deck, yeah.

Smith: And the hangar deck would be what? The deck storage?

Fifer: Yeah, and when they worked on the planes. In the bulkheads they had everything – wings and torpedoes and everything strapped up to the bulkheads. Whatever they’d think they would need to fix up a plane if something happened.

Smith: Now, did you have contact with Ford on the ship?

Fifer: No. I knew who he was, but no, I’d never talked to him.

Smith: You knew who he was.

Fifer: Well, from athletics, mostly.

Smith: Tell me about that.

Fifer: We’d get in a port and I’d go over to the elevator and hang a couple of baskets and they had teams. Of course, it was square, it wasn’t much of a basketball court. But that was fun to watch. You were up on the flight deck looking down on them all the time. And then when we had our – in Pearl we had a boxing tournament and he was a judge.

Smith: Really?

Fifer: A good friend of mine, a guy I graduated from high school with, come aboard. He was in the Marine division. They were a squad, maybe twenty guys, I don’t know anything about the Marines, but he won the heavyweight championship. Lt. Ford was a judge. But other than that, there were fifteen, sixteen hundred guys on that thing and you just didn’t see many people there that you didn’t work with.
Smith: Who was the captain?

Fifer: Well, let’s see. The first captain – was it Hunt? I think his name was Hunt. Then he got transferred and I think he took over Pensacola Naval Air Station. Then Captain Ingersoll and then there was one other, but I can’t think of his name right now.

Smith: You mentioned being a mess cook. How was the food?

Fifer: Not bad compared to the Army or whatever.

Smith: Are you saying the Navy ate better than the Army?

Fifer: Oh, I’m sure we did. Like on a holiday, we’d have the whole turkey and everything. I’d always give my oysters away to somebody. I didn’t eat them things.

Smith: How did it feel – you said yourself that Pearl Harbor was such a motivating factor – how did it feel to be sailing into Pearl Harbor?

Fifer: The first thing – you could see a lot of the damage even when we went. And it was the same thing when we sailed into Tokyo Bay. The damage – it’s all around – it was just all burned and rusted. And that was just a day or two after they surrendered that we sailed in there.

Smith: I want to get to that in a minute. The typhoon.

Fifer: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Tell me about anything you remember about the typhoon.

Fifer: Well, of course, we all heard the explosion when it happened.

Smith: Did you know you were about to experience this? I mean, were there weather forecasts that warned you in advance?

Fifer: Not that I know of.

Smith: Okay, it took you by surprise?

Fifer: That ship was so top heavy.
Smith: What made it top heavy?

Fifer: Well, it was built on a cruiser hull, which is narrow, and then the flight deck. Then your gun mounts and everything hanging over. It just rolled something awful.

Smith: Was that a problem, generically, with the ship?

Fifer: I think so, yeah. I’m pretty sure. I think they admitted that. And even the destroyers they lost in the typhoon, they admitted that they took the old destroyers and put all that radar equipment way up on the boat, and it made them top heavy. So I think they lost three destroyers in that.

Smith: Did it come upon you suddenly, or did it just kind of build and build?

Fifer: I think it just kind of built up. Of course, we heard the explosion.

Smith: Now, what was that?

Fifer: Our quarters were in what was called the poop deck – it was aft – and it was right underneath the flight deck. In other words, our overhead was the flight deck. Most compartments were down below water level, but we were up above. There was one hatch in that one bulkhead in the forward wall of the compartment. And if you opened that hatch, the elevator pit was right there for the aft elevator. So that was never opened, believe me. But we ditched it and someone else was doing all the work, we didn’t do anything. You had to almost hang on to everything. You couldn’t sleep or anything. Some guys would get in their bunk, but you couldn’t stay in the darn thing. It was that bad. So actually, we didn’t realize how much was going on until you read about it in books and things like that. I think when I read where Lt. Ford -the captain told him to take some men and go in there and put that dog gone fire out - he did it.

Smith: And what caused the fire?

Fifer: Well, the planes were sliding back and forth and there was some fuel in them, I guess. This was on the hangar deck. The flight deck, they were just sliding off three or four at a time. We had them wired down, but the wires weren’t very big wires.

Smith: So you lost planes to the storm?

Fifer: Oh, yeah. I think we lost eighteen planes, or something like that, out of twenty-five. There might have been more than twenty-five with some of the extras down in the hangar deck. I don’t know how many were down there. But that’s where they’d take them when they worked on them, if there was something that took a while – instead of up on the flight deck where it was dark a lot of times. I read where Admiral Halsey, well, he had a job to do, too, because we were supposed to fly cover for General MacArthur to raid Mindanao, one of the Philippine Islands. And we couldn’t get out of that darn typhoon. I read where he left us, or was going to leave us, because we were dead in the water, I guess. All the water went down below and the engines all flooded out. We didn’t even know this.

Smith: Really?

Fifer: But I really give President Ford credit for saving my life. I think he did, I think he saved our lives by getting that fire out with those guys he took in there. And then the guys in the engine room got an engine going and we were able to maneuver then because you couldn’t even put your bow into all those waves in the wind.

Smith: Were the waves the worst you’d ever seen?

Fifer: Oh, my. I looked out once and there was one of the larger carriers – it was pretty close to us – because everything was grey to look out there. It was just shadowlike. I don’t know how close we came to it or whether they would capsize or something. That’s how bad it was.

Smith: There were waves up over the flight deck?

Fifer: In fact, somebody said the gun turrets were dipping water when it went the one way. Of course I didn’t see any of that, but somebody said that.
Smith: Now the fire – I’m trying to understand the sequence here – the fire was on the hangar deck.

Fifer: The hangar deck.

Smith: But when President Ford talked about almost going overboard, was he up on the flight deck or the hanger deck.

Fifer: No, he was on the flight deck. I think he came out and I don’t know if he was going to climb up into island, or if he was going to come down out of island, to the flight deck, and then I don’t where he was going to go. But I guess he slid all the way across the flight deck and there was about a half inch steel plate, and it was about this high above the flight deck and the catwalks, or gun turrets. That stopped him, I think they said – the paper or the books I read. His feet hit that thing.

Smith: His feet?

Fifer: Yeah. But he must have got back to the other side again to get into the island or wherever he was going.

Smith: To people who don’t know, what is the island?

Fifer: The superstructure. The bridge.

Smith: We’ve been told the typhoon lasted two days.

Fifer: Yeah, I think it probably did, a day and a half.

Smith: Probably seemed longer.

Fifer: Yeah. Oh, God. You just couldn’t do anything. You couldn’t stand up hardly. And I don’t know how he got those guys in there on that hangar deck. That hangar deck was a steel deck and all that water and oil and gas – I don’t know how he ever did it. I still think he saved our lives.

Smith: There are people who have voiced some criticism of Admiral Halsey for driving you into the storm. People have said Nimitz wouldn’t have done it.
Fifer: They didn’t know much about weather in those days, like they do today either.

Smith: What was your opinion of General MacArthur?

Fifer: Well, I always like the guy pretty well. But then I read things about how him and Nimitz were always trying to do something ahead of the other guy. What did I read – where Nimitz was coming in, he wanted to be in Tokyo first; but MacArthur flew in and beat him. It was those kinds of things. I didn’t care for them kind of things.

Smith: The enlisted man, you hear of the “Dugout Doug” references, that sort of thing. You were in Tokyo Bay you said, at the end of the war?

Fifer: Yeah, just for a couple of days, I think.

Smith: Before that, of course, you didn’t know about the bomb.

Fifer: No.

Smith: Were you all dreading the prospect of an invasion of Japan?

Fifer: Yeah. I think a lot of us were that way. Because Iwo Jima, they lost so many guys and Okinawa - 40-50,000 guys. And then we spent – what did they say? I think 57 days without even seeing land out there. And we were ready to launch planes that one morning when they cancelled it and told us about the bomb.

Smith: That’s extraordinary. I want to get that story. I’m curious, how much did you on board ship know about the rest of the war? I don’t mean in Europe, I just mean in the Pacific. For example, you mentioned Okinawa – did you know at the time of the battle what was going on? How did you get information about the rest of the war? Was it simply what your superiors told you?

Fifer: Yeah. We had a newspaper aboard ship. It wasn’t much, but it would tell some of the things about the war. Of course, we missed Iwo Jima because we had to go back after the typhoon. But we got back out there of Okinawa and, boy, that’s when all the kamikaze started.
Smith: Tell me about that. Did you have kamikazes hit your ship?

Fifer: Oh, no. We never got hit.

Smith: Did you see any other ships hit?

Fifer: I didn’t ever see any get hit by kamikazes, but we went in and we hit Formosa, which is Taiwan now. That’s way in there. That’s further west than Japan. So that was quite an experience. But in those days, all through the war, they always come out at night after us. They never come out during the day and it was always torpedo bombers. So we were trying to get out, after a couple of raids then you turn and try to get out, get further away from Formosa at the time. But they sent a lot of planes out after us that night and I saw the Houston get hit. It was pretty close to us. It took a torpedo and, boy, you could just see the fire coming out of the stacks. The very next night I saw the Canberra get hit the same way, another cruiser. Now I don’t know – Canberra is a city in Australia, but I don’t know if it was an Australian ship or one of our own. I don’t know.

Smith: Did they go down?

Fifer: No. Neither one went down. They towed Houston all the way back to Hawaii, I guess, or Pearl.

Smith: Wow.

Fifer: But I’ve got pictures of her that I cut out of magazines and boy, she was only that far out of the water in some places.

Smith: It’s hard to imagine anything more terrifying than in the middle of the night, out of nowhere, a torpedo. Was that the worst you could imagine?

Fifer: At night, you’re not doing what you’re supposed to be doing. You’ve got a far off station that you’re supposed to be at.

Smith: During the hours of darkness, when you’re lying awake, do you imagine what could be out there?
Fifer: Oh, yeah. You think about it. You can’t help but think about it. Oh, I know what I was going to say. The Chaplin would get on the speaker system and he would be telling you what was going on, if you were down – not on a flight deck. And that’s scary – “there goes a torpedo – it just went forward – I’ll let you know…” Crazy stuff like that. I think I liked it better if I was up on a flight deck and I could see what was going on.

Smith: Of course.

Fifer: I did see at Okinawa, I’m sure this plane was coming in. At night they would come in real low, but in the daytime, like at Okinawa, those kids, those kamikazes, they were just kids I guess, they’d come in from real high. And I stood there and I watched this thing coming and it was getting bigger and all of a sudden it seemed like it just stopped in mid-air and the wings just – one wing went that way and one went that way. He must have caught a five incher in the gut. He just went straight down. But I was just standing there watching him, and then I decided I’d better run. I’d just started to run when I saw him get hit. But I never saw a kamikaze plane hit another ship. I’ve got some pictures that one guy sent me that he said he got from ship’s photographer. And they show some ships getting real close to getting hit that must have been around us and he was taking these pictures.

Smith: So now we know - obviously, you didn’t at the time - we were in the closing months of the war. Do you remember when you heard about VE Day – the end of the war in Europe?

Fifer: Oh yeah.

Smith: Obviously that was a milestone, but did it make you think that you were closer to getting home?

Fifer: Yeah. We all said, let’s get this over with. They had broadcasts over the PA system when something like would happen – like the atomic bomb – they let us know about that.

Smith: After the death of FDR…when President Roosevelt died?

Fifer: Yeah, got that, too.
Smith: You don’t know about the bomb and you’re anticipating a likely invasion of the home islands, Okinawa squared. How did you learn about the bomb?

Fifer: Over the PA system. They let us know what happened when they canceled the raid, when we were going to launch planes.

Smith: Did they explain what an atomic bomb was?

Fifer: No, they didn’t. They just said it was something big. We had no idea what it was like. We weren’t too far from there.

Smith: That’s right. But, of course, it took two bombs to end the war.

Fifer: They had to save face.

Smith: And the Emperor. So after the second bomb, the war is over. How did that feel?

Fifer: Boy. Right away the guys are saying, “How do we get out?” That’s what everybody was wondering, how to get out. So right away they came out and told us how. We had to have 40 some points or something like that. But you got points for being married or having kids, or you’d get more points for being overseas, things like that. Your age made a lot of difference. So I didn’t get out until March of ’46.

Smith: Really?

Fifer: Yeah.

Smith: So you were in Tokyo Bay after the signing?

Fifer: No, before.

Smith: Before the signing?

Fifer: And we sent our Marine squad, they went ashore and I think they took some volunteers out of the Navy that wanted to go ashore. I didn’t volunteer.

Smith: You didn’t?
Fifer: No. I didn’t know anything about guns. And maybe two or three weeks they were ashore and then they all came back and had these souvenirs that they picked up and they took them all away from them.

Smith: Was there concern that they would encounter résistance from diehard Japanese?

Fifer: Yeah, I thought they would. And I think they did find a lot of caves and things like they did in Iwo Jima and Okinawa.

Smith: You could see Tokyo? You could see the devastation?

Fifer: Oh, yeah, in the Bay there – ships that were docked and sunk and everything was just tore up something awful. And that wasn’t from the atomic bomb, either. But they finally got it over with.

Smith: And from Tokyo Bay where did you go? You said you weren’t out until the spring of ’46.

Fifer: We took a cruise. I think we stopped in Okinawa, and we stopped in Pearl and then Panama, and then New York. And it took about a month, I think, something like that if I remember right.

Smith: New York look pretty good?

Fifer: Oh, I’d never seen it before and we led the fleet in because we had more time out there than anybody in the other ships, even the Enterprise. And, of course, they had the fireboats out there with the hoses and all that. And they made a flag – I don’t know if you’d call it a flag – it was only half red and half white and it must have been about two or three blocks long – that they flew when we came in. We all got a foot of it.

Smith: So now, did you stay in New York for several days?

Fifer: Oh, yeah. We were there for quite a while. And President Truman – we all lined up in the Hudson there and he came by and reviewed the fleet. They took us to Brooklyn Navy Yard and then they sent us home. That’s the first time I’d been home since boot camp. So it was a long time. Then I went back, then they sent me home again and that was it. I had to report to Indianapolis for another assignment and I thought I’d just get enough points to get out. So they sent me to Norfolk and I had nothing to do there but stand a watch once in a while. Finally, New Year’s Eve a guy said, “We’re sending you to a ship down in Florida that’s the USS Solomon, and it’s qualifying new pilots, and they arrested your man down there. So I got sent down there. New Year’s Eve they put me on a train and sent me down there. So that was January 1 and in March they sent me to Toledo and I got out.

Smith: And breathed a sigh of relief?

Fifer: Oh, yeah. It was good, like I said, I could hardly wait to get out. And you lose all – you’re eighteen, nineteen, twenty years old.

Smith: You never thought about making it a career?

Fifer: No. They offered me $3,000 and they’d send me to school for three months, or something like that – or maybe a month – and I turned it down.

Smith: Do you have any idea how many Monterrey survivors there are?

Fifer: No. I got elected treasurer about three or four years ago, I think. We were down in Charleston. I think we were having a reunion and the guy who was the treasurer passed away and his wife was doing all the work. So they wanted to make her treasurer, but they couldn’t because she wasn’t a Navy person, so they said they wanted to know if I would take the treasurer’s job but she’d do all the work. All I had to do was sign checks. So I did. But then the next year they made her an honorary shipmate and she is our treasurer now. But she had a list, or her husband did, of about 140 that were paying dues.

Smith: Now would that cover not only World War II, but Korea?

Fifer: Yeah.

Smith: We’ll get this on the record: the Monterrey had a second life during the Korean War.

Fifer: But she didn’t see any action. In fact, they stripped all her guns off. She didn’t have any guns or anything. She just operated in the Gulf of Mexico. That’s what I did when they sent me down to Florida. We’d go out for two or three days and come back. But we’d go out in that Bermuda Triangle area – I wasn’t crazy about that.

Smith: What ever happened to the Monterey? What was her final fate?

Fifer: I think they just scrapped her, finally, after the Korean War. The cabinet was CBL, ___ class and I think they loaned her to Spain or Portugal for quite a while and then they gave her back and I think she was down in Louisiana some place. But I think she is gone now, too.

Smith: How frequently do you have reunions?

Fifer: Every year.

Smith: You do?

Fifer: Yeah. First we were having it every two years, and then we started to run out of guys and I think like she had 140 that were paying dues. But they were both World War II and Korea. And we had one San Antonio trip we made and we had three busloads of people and that was in ’95. But it started to dwindle. And when I brought the guys here last year, we only had four guys from each war. And of course they brought their wives, some of them.

Smith: Did President Ford ever attend a reunion?

Fifer: Somebody said he did one time in – I don’t know if it was in Norfolk or someplace like that. But I wasn’t going then because I was married and had all those kids.

Smith: Did you ever have any contact with him afterwards?

Fifer: No. I asked Rose, her name was Rose, our treasurer, she lived in Texas, Sinton, Texas, and the President paid $100. We paid $5 and his secretary sent in $100 every year. But of course when he died, then she quit. When I heard about this new ship, I said to her, “How could we find out about this?” So she says, “Well, I’ve got his number down in California. I’ll call his secretary.” Well, she called and she started talking to this gal and somebody cut in. And I think it was the FBI or somebody and said, “Where did you get this number?” And she explained to him what it was, so she got to talk to this gal. Because we wanted to find out about this new ship. I think she said it would be about 2013 or something like that before it was…but, boy, I’d love to be there for that christening. That would be wonderful.

Smith: I guess the final and most obvious question: how did your wartime experiences affect your life?

Fifer: I don’t think it had too much effect.

Smith: Really?

Fifer: No. Like I said, I went back to work that I hated – that job. I was a salesperson at a pay department at Sears. I couldn’t get along with those customers and then I went to school for a year. When you get out of school you have to start at the bottom, but I had some good jobs, worked for some nice guys all those years. I still have breakfast with them now and then, some of them.

Smith: Do you find the war memories don’t come back until later in life? Is it the older you get, that those experiences sort of mean more?

Fifer: Most of the time it’s when I’m in bed, before I fall asleep. That’s when I think about the old days a lot.

Smith: Well, that was certainly very much the case with President Ford, too.

Fifer: Really?

Smith: Yeah.

Fifer: Long time ago, though. That was the war to end all wars.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this. Tell us a little bit about your life before you came into the Ford orbit. I sense that you had a lot of contact with him before his presidency.

Knebel: Well, I came to know President Ford when he was Minority Leader. I was minority counsel of the House Ag Committee and that was starting in January of ’69 with Nixon I. He was doing a lot of fundraising for Republicans and out and about every weekend; and Bob Hartmann, who was his chief of staff and major domo, was needing a lot of support for his speechwriting that he was doing. So I became something of a supplier of fact, fiction, and fantasy, and through the next few years as I was elevated to counsel of the committee, I came to know the Minority Leader very well.

Smith: What was he like?

Knebel: I think it’s almost overused, but in this case, it’s a very pertinent description. He was a decent human being. He was very fair, he would listen. He always had time to say hello. I used to run into him out at Burning Tree occasionally and he never failed to stop and ask about the family. He was a genuine guy. It was an honor and delight to work with him and for him. And as time went on I was moved downtown to become general counsel to the Department of Agriculture. Upon the resignation of President Nixon he hosted a thing the next day at the White House where every presidential appointee came through the line. I had a picture made with the President – it’s right there on the wall – he stopped and talked to me for probably five minutes – to the point that the Marines were in total consternation because everything was getting backed up. But in any event, it was a very memorable day.

I left the government about six months later and six months after that the undersecretary of Agriculture had a heart attack and he retired. Earl Butz went over and asked President Ford if he could bring me back as undersecretary.
President Ford said, “Well, I’d like to be part of that,” and he himself made the phone call to my wife and said, “I know Jack’s only been back in practice for six months, but I want you to work on him to come back to be undersecretary.” And so I did and went through the confirmation process and of course, that was in December of ’74, and then we went for two years as undersecretary.

Then when the President saw that he had a problem arising because of the Butz joke that was attributed to him, I was out doing a speech in Marysville, Ohio at the Grange Hall in the middle of the campaign of ’76. I never shall forget this lady come up saying, “Some guy here from Washington named Knebel? Phone call.” I had to go back through the crowd and on the phone is Jim Cannon who says, “The President wants to talk to you.” The President got on; he said, “Jack, Earl is resigning in fifteen minutes and I’m asking you to become the secretary.” He said, “Give me fifteen minutes because I want to deliver my comments about Earl in the Rose Garden.” So I said, “Fine, Mr. President, I’ll do the best I can.” He says, “You’re going to be fine.”

So I went back and I gave the speech which was a campaign speech for John Ashbrook, and we got out afterwards. The theme was that Butz has just taken a little break from the campaign, he’ll be back. I gave that same speech and we came out ten minutes later, we get in the car and a state trooper’s taking us to the next stop and it comes over the news that President Ford had accepted Earl’s resignation and Ashbrook says to me, “You should have been in theater because I would have never known he was gone.” I said, “Well, the President said do it. I do it.” I just had that kind of regard for him and he’s been very, very good to us, and through the years we’ve had a lot of fine times.

Smith: Let me go back to your days in the House. People all contrast then and now. Gerald Ford was part of that - clearly a Republican partisan, someone who wanted very much to be Speaker of the House.

Knebel: That’s an extraordinary point. I was appointed to West Point by Page Belcher, who was the ranking Republican in Agriculture. And back – this is before Watergate days – when the chief counsel of Agriculture from Texas – this is a Democrat – went on to be a judge on the Texas Supreme Court. Bob Pogue, the chairman, also a Democrat, obviously, asked me to be chief counsel. He said there is no politics in Agriculture, and there really, truly wasn’t. Carl Albert was the Speaker and they treated me as if there was just nothing there. It was wonderful. The rancor came in later with Watergate, which _________, there had been, it’s not even a gradual deterioration, but it’s just no longer the same institution. I can’t imagine serving a Democratic committee as its general counsel in this day and age. So that in itself was unique.

When I went downtown to be general counsel of the department and ultimately to become secretary, Tom Foley was chairman of the House Ag Committee and Speaker. He proposed legislation to change my position as undersecretary to deputy secretary so that we have the same status as they do at State Department, when we’re under international negotiations. So the House is a totally different institution.

Back then when Ford was Minority Leader you had McCormick, and then you had Tip O’Neill, as the Speaker. There was no rancor. In fact, I was probably one of the last people to have lunch with Tip O’Neill before he died. After he retired he went up to Boston. It was just a different situation then. The people with whom you dealt, it was much like an old law practice. You shook hands, you did a deal. It wasn’t any more of this gotcha stuff. You didn’t have the Speaker calling people Nazis because they criticize a presidential program. It was just a different day.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that. There’s an amazing turning point during the Ford presidency. The topic was energy policy and the decontrol, gradual, less gradual, decontrol of natural gas prices. And the President, favoring of a more market-oriented solution, the Democrats in Congress wanting to delay that as much as possible. Anyway, he finally reached a handshake deal with Speaker Albert, Mike Mansfield. They came back a week later, sheepishly, saying the deal was off. They couldn’t sell it to their members. And that was post ’74 with the Watergate babies.

Knebel: Right. You had the beginning of the new Congress at that point. And I always took the position that President Ford’s election was lost not to Carter, but because of the pardon. And the body-politic had to cleanse itself of the last vestige of Watergate. Whether history will prove us right or wrong on that point, I don’t know. But I do know for sure that the water was poisoned. He was absolutely right in saying that we’ve got to get past this nightmare. We were shocked. I can never forget that Sunday morning coming home from church when he came on and made the speech. But you know what? Had we not done it, we could have really had some serious problems. And if you remember the backdrop, too, was not all that great. The other thing about his presidency, which I was very proud of, particularly in retrospect, is the fact that he wasn’t afraid to veto things. He used the veto pen very effectively, and he kept fiscal discipline.

Smith: He was a real fiscal conservative.

Knebel: He knew exactly what he was about. And that came, I think, from his years on the Hill. I never will forget he and Ev Dirksen, those millions or those billions add up to real dollars after a while. And he took that to heart, and he, for that reason I think, will go up several notches as a viable and a wonderful president.

Smith: It has been suggested that in some ways - and this is often the case - his great strengths in some ways mirrored a weakness. For example, I only heard him speak disparagingly of two people. One was John Dean and one was Gordon Liddy. And the worst he could say was, “He’s a bad man.” That’s as bad as it got. He was genuinely shocked by the thought that Richard Nixon lied to him. Like many others, he was genuinely shocked when he heard the language on the tapes. There was sort of an Eagle Scout quality about Ford.

The first press conference, the one that I think was pivotal in bringing the pardon about when it happened. Late in August of ’74 he has a press conference in the East Room and he goes in believing – in retrospect somewhat naively – that people would talk about Cyprus and Greece and Turkey and inflation and everything except what they all wanted to talk about, which was Richard Nixon.

Knebel: Right.
Smith: Now, it’s a very fine line because on the one hand, it’s that very decency – I’m not using Eagle Scout in any way as a pejorative, it’s all of those qualities that made him, in some ways, the perfect person to lance the boil. But at the same time, was he not suspicious enough, I guess is what I’m saying, for a modern president?

Knebel: Well, that’s an interesting thought. I can tell you that up until a week before Nixon’s resignation, he was scheduled to go to Hawaii to speak to the American Bar Association. And Bill Castleman, as counsel in the vice president’s office, had invited several of us to go along; I as general counsel of Agriculture because I was to be president-elect of the Federal Bar Association. So we got a call the night before Nixon resigned to say the trip is off, but don’t unpack. In other words, don’t say anything about you’re not going.

But I just think that he’s one of those people who had abiding faith in the people he was working with. A lot of us believed, up until the very end, I know I had a difficulty with Butz because the general counsel of the department has a Constitutional responsibility to explain the infirmity of a president – the Twenty-sixth Amendment – and we’d had discussions and we were all to go into to see our Cabinet officers. And I can tell you that I got tossed out of Butz’s office three times in the morning before he finally agreed to hear the Constitutional situation of possible disability of President Nixon. This was within a few days of the resignation.

If there was a broad sweeping indictment, believe me, a lot of people would have been caught up in this same disbelief. A lot of people believed what they wanted to believe. You’ve got to remember that at this point in time you didn’t have the Howard Baker question, “What did he know and when did he know it?” But rather you had really partisan political stuff coming out; the tapes had been discovered, there was a lot of pieces that didn’t really fit completely together. Certainly there was a lot of smoke and I think people kind of put as much stock in it as they wanted to. And naïve? Well, perhaps, in retrospect. But we’re all 20/20 historians.
Smith: Compared to the alternative, in a town full of cynicism, maybe a little eagerness to believe the best of people is not a bad trait.

Knebel: And I think that was an inherent trait of President Ford. He gave everybody the benefit of the doubt. He used to have a very, very good outlook on those types of things. I can remember a few things on the House floor when they’d pull legislation and at the last minute when they’d scheduled a bill and they’d gotten votes and they’d gotten the rules through the Rules Committee and Carl Albert played the game somewhat differently. Carl being an Oklahoman, I could go over and talk to him and we always got the stuff done for Agriculture because it was meaningful to him and his constituency. So I didn’t have that problem, but a lot of the other type of legislation did.

Smith: Explain what you meant pulling the thing on the floor, what are you referring to?

Knebel: Well, in terms of debate, that’s the key of what a Minority Leader does. He’s got to decide who he wants to use in the debate and for what purposes. This is the strategy of the House, the well of the House is something – again, I think, it’s been gravely distorted under the last few years.

Smith: It was not only a different House, but it was clearly a different Republican Party. The center of gravity was the Midwest. Obviously, you had some Southerners whose numbers were growing, but probably more moderate to liberal Northeasterners.

Knebel: Well, it’s interesting, you are absolutely right. The Democratic members from the House, both the House and Senate, were really our best Republicans, in many regards, from a legislative strategy standpoint. And I never shall forget when Bob Pogue called me over and said, “Jack, I want you to be chief counsel. There’s no politics in Agriculture. We just have to keep the big city boys’ food stamps in check until we get the farm bill done.” And it was just that simple.

Smith: Was that the trade off?

Knebel: Absolutely.
Smith: I mean, you got urban votes through food stamps?

Knebel: Absolutely. That’s how it worked.

Smith: And presumably, less ideological. Clearly a case could always be made and was made by some, in terms of significantly reducing the role of the federal government, whether it’s price supports or whatever. But one senses that that really wasn’t a significant possibility. That there was a consensus about the role of the federal government.

Knebel: In 1970 we were getting ready to rewrite the Ag Act of ’70, which was a price support bill, and I shall never forget a delegation of Southern members with peanut farmer interests came in and talked to Secretary Butz and said, “Just give us one more time around.” You’ve still got the peanut program going today. But the one thing we did in ’70 and ’74 was to change that legislation so that if it was clearing the market, there were no subsidies paid. And I had the unique distinction in 1976 of sending my annual report to the President, which is required by law, being the only report filed since the first New Deal that had not paid any price supports that year. And that was because of the prosperity and the country had come back in ’76; and as we said, the barns and the fences were painted and the market was going great. We were selling grain to Russia.

Smith: Yet the rationale always extended for his selection of Bob Dole for the vice presidency was he had this real problem in the farm belt.

Knebel: Well, go back to Kansas City and that selection. There were three finalists in that vice presidential selection. And I shall never forget Bryce Harlow was in the room. We were all upstairs in the Crown Center Hotel, with the President. And Bryce Harlow said his poll showed that Ann Armstrong from Texas, the country wasn’t ready for a vice president, female. Howard Baker from Tennessee didn’t help the agriculture side as much as Dole did. And that decision was made.

Smith: Now, this was one of the meetings that went on in terms of choosing a running mate?
Knebel: After the nomination.

Smith: After the nomination?

Knebel: That’s right, that night. There were several of us and we were told that the President just wanted to spend some time with, I think it was Bryce and Bob Hartmann, and I don’t know if Dick Cheney was in that or not. He probably well could have been. But we all left. There was kind of a reception. The other sidebar negotiation that was going on at the time was, of course, Reagan, would he, wouldn’t he, no, yes?

Smith: Something which is still being debated.

Knebel: Yes, it is. And my wife was at the convention and she was very good friends with John Sears’ wife, and Sears, of course, was Reagan’s campaign manager. The two girls got together and got Mrs. Reagan and Mrs. Ford to a luncheon, which is as close as anything ever happened.

Smith: During the convention?

Knebel: During the convention.

Smith: Really?

Knebel: Yeah.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Knebel: You’d have to get her to tell you. She probably wouldn’t say too much. But it did happen.

Smith: Perfectly civil?

Knebel: Oh, absolutely. Very much so.

Smith: One thing on the House, because there are stories that – again, going back to what you said – Ford and Hale Boggs would have debates at the Press Club; they would drive down together and decide what they were going to debate that day; then get up and have their debate; and then go have a drink and have lunch and go back to work. You can’t imagine that happening today.
Knebel: Well, back then Tommy was working for the Joint Economic Committee, I was working for the Ag Committee, and we used to have lunch as often as not. The same type of thing. The first time you went to the Hill and you went to work on a committee, you usually got a call from somebody like Jim Eastland to come over and have a sit down at five o’clock. And the only question was, “Do you want ice or not?” And that was how it was. I’ll never forget when I first became general counsel downtown, I got a call from Eastland’s staff, Sam Thompson. He said, “The Senator would sure like to see you again and congratulate you on your appointment.” I said, “Yeah?” He said, “Five o’clock in his hideaway.” I said, “Okay.” We go up and sit down and he said, “Now, Jack, you know, Sunflower County, Mississippi has been declared a disaster area for the last thirteen years and so has number one (?) disaster declaration comes right in early January.” And I said, “I’m well aware of that Senator.” He said, “You’re not going to break a record, are you?” I said, “I’ll have to look at it, but we’ll certainly look at it closely.” And that’s how it was. Allen Ellender had his eightieth birthday, Lady Bird Johnson was up in his office and broke up a conference on the food stamp bill and Ellender had a great big pot of jambalaya and the staff ladled it out and Lady Bird…and it was a big thing. But Lyndon would show up occasionally. It was just a different era.

Smith: What changed it?

Knebel: Boy, if I knew that I’d be a handicapper. Even in retrospect it was a gradual erosion. I attribute most to post-Watergate election. Lack of trust. Breakdown. It’s just hard to say.

Smith: Well, let me throw out a couple of possibilities because you are absolutely right. I think that the Vietnam War and Watergate rubbed a lot of things raw. It certainly planted seeds of distrust toward government, generally. But then the media culture is an enormous factor. With the rise of cable TV, and the internet, both of which have many positive values, but both of which also can be used to exacerbate conflict because conflict sells, it sells dog food and it moves the radio dial. Whatever you think of the health care plan, for example, it’s a classic example of the media whipping up a controversy and then exploiting it for ratings. Plus the gerrymandering of House districts. I mean, let’s face it, if you look at the number of truly competitive districts today…

Knebel: A handful.

Smith: Compared to forty years ago.

Knebel: It used to be twenty-five percent right?

Smith: Yeah, which means basically, you win a primary, which means you play to your base, which means the middle of the road. Hell, there are political consultants who deny the existence of a middle of the road. I talked to President Ford about this – forty years ago the prevailing political culture was, you went there, you fought for your principles, you went at it, hammer and tongs until six o’clock, but at the end of the day, people expected you to get something done. And the political incentives were there to write legislation; to find a consensus.

Knebel: Well, you know something that has always struck me? A personal example: when I was on the Ag Committee, there were fourteen people on the staff, four minority, ten majority. I was recently invited back there. There’s a hundred and sixteen or a hundred and twenty on the staff now. We wrote more legislation then than they do now. The members were more involved; they knew more. I have never been so shocked as to hear the likes of Henry Waxman saying, “I haven’t read that 1,000 page bill.”

Before, we used to have tutorials every week for the Ag analysts on the staffs, for the AAs and for the members. I can never forget, Tony ________, Pat Roberts. Tony worked for Bernie Sisk, Pat worked for Bob Dole, or Keith Sebelius in the House and then after Bob went to the Senate, Keith came to the House. They used to come every Friday afternoon and we would explain, section by section, each bill, what was amended, what had happened in committee that week, so that they would know, and they were better able to better represent their members. And the members had more interest.

Tom Foley used to sit on the corner of my desk when he was chairman of the committee, and he wanted to know everything in there. And he did. A great legislator. But I don’t think that’s there today. Maybe there is too much money, maybe it costs too much to get elected and they get in and their first deal is - I know Butz got in trouble for it one time, he said, “The first thing a senator does, he finds his desk in the Senate and declares for president.” And you know, there’s some truth in that. There’s a modicum of truth in the way it operates today. It’s just a different institution.

Smith: Going back to ’76, what was the perception of weakness in the agricultural belt that, in fact, mandated Bob Dole’s function?

Knebel: Quite the contrary. I think it was really a reflection of the strength in grain sales at the time and that the country – and you’ve got to remember, California is the third largest agricultural country in the world. Reagan had beaten Ford in the primary in early June; in the meantime we lost a counter movement against Jerry Brown’s Prop 14. Jerry was the governor at the time and Caesar Chavez wanted to go on. We got the Farm Bureau going on that thing and if we hadn’t had the strong agricultural presence on the ticket, I don’t know that we would have. It turned out with California – I think Carter won it by a fraction, I don’t recall. But it was a much closer election than it would have, could have, should have been in that regard.

Smith: Tell us about Earl Butz.

Knebel: Earl Butz was an extraordinary human being. I didn’t replace him, I succeeded him. I was his general counsel, I was his undersecretary, I was his deputy secretary. I was, I guess like a son. I sat with him the night before he resigned. Hubert Humphrey came down the hall from their apartment house. Now there’s a good example of the bipartisanship, of how that works. Hubert came down and we all sat there and had a drink. The press was like jackals gathered below at his apartment house.

Smith: Was it like a wake?

Knebel: Yeah, bunch of lights and stuff. So we all went out through the laundry then and Hubert said to me, “You want to sleep at my place tonight?” And I said, “No, no, I’ll go home.” Hubert made a speech for me for my confirmation as undersecretary. And I guess the contrast, the comparison of what it is today – if you can imagine John Kerry making a speech for somebody being appointed by a Republican. It just wouldn’t happen.

Smith: I think it was in October of ’76, when Humphrey is in the hospital and the President went to visit him. And the story is that Humphrey said, with a grin, “You’re getting some votes out of the Humphrey household.”

Knebel: Right. You were asking about Butz, and Butz used to josh with Hubert. He said, “The only way to keep the Metrodome up is they have to have Hubert come over every week and talk in there for fifteen minutes and he can keep the Metrodome up for two weeks.” But the fact is that Butz knew these guys and he could deal with them. We used to go up and see Herman Talmadge every Tuesday morning at 6:30 to go over what it was that the department needed and what his committee was doing on the Senate Ag Committee. Earl was very shrewd. He knew that after about ten o’clock in the morning, you weren’t going to get any of Herman’s good time, because there just wasn’t any. And it was very interesting the way he could deal.

I saw him get crosswise one time when Ed Muskie, during the Nixon impoundments – do you remember the impoundments of the federal funds? We had some FAA money and it had been impounded. Muskie had a hearing as to why it was impounded and I, of course as general counsel, had rendered an opinion that it was wise and sufficient exercise of legal judgment to do that. And so we went up and Muskie, as he was want to do, was ranting and raving and TV cameras were running and his ears turned red and his face turned red and it was probably unfortunate, but it was shortly after William Loeb had chastised Muskie’s wife – the Manchester Union Leader. Butz says, “You know, I wouldn’t cry over it, Senator.”

But he did have a way of getting crosswise with his vocabulary from time to time. In fact, I’ll never forget his dear wife Mary Emma said, “Earl lives by the tongue and he’s going to die by the tongue.” And she was very prophetic on that, it turned out. God rest his soul, she was right.

Smith: What were his strengths?
Knebel: I tell you, I had three bosses in government, Tom Kleppe, when I was at Small Business Administration off of the Hill, Earl Butz at Agriculture, and President Ford. And they all had the same common denominator – strength. You never had to question anything they told you. Everything that anyone of them ever said to me was always right on. And believe me, when you are somebody’s counsel, it’s nice to know you are getting it straight. And that was always the case with President Ford, with Earl Butz and with Tom Kleppe.

Smith: We’ll get back to Butz, but tell us about Tom Kleppe.

Knebel: Kleppe was a remarkable guy. He was on the House Ag Committee, ran for the Senate. Nixon appointed him to be administrator of Small Business Administration and I went down with Tom to be his general counsel. I left the House Ag Committee to be his general counsel. Tom had been mayor of Bismarck at a very young age, made a fortune. He invented Glass Wax, marketed Glass Wax. Tremendous guy. He was in the House, they had two seats, he and Mark Andrews. I think by the ’70 census they’d lost a seat, so that’s when Tom ran for the Senate. He ultimately ended up as Ford’s secretary of interior. Ironically, he read me my oath of office as secretary. Delightful person.

I, along with President Bush, Sr., served as his pallbearer a year ago February. Very great competitor. I used to play tennis with he and George Bush, Sr. and they were fierce games. Phil Rupee from Michigan was always in that game. I was counsel so he could just pull me out and say, “Let’s go,” and we’d go. The interesting thing about all those guys is that they all had more money than God, and I don’t think any one of them every bought a can of tennis balls.

Smith: You can tell the rich. They are different from the rest of us.

Knebel: Kleppe, in particular, self-educated person and very driven. But, as I say, he shared that trait with President Ford and Earl Butz and just a very, very straight, honest person.

Smith: And all workaholics? I don’t mean that as a pejorative.
Knebel: Not in the sense that hours were the big deal. Kleppe was a neat-desk guy, in there early in the morning, out early in the afternoon. Didn’t go to a bunch of socializing. Butz was pretty much the same way.

Smith: Tell me, because these guys were “conservatives,” and that’s a term that’s come to be redefined in a number of ways; post-Reagan and post-Gingrich, and as we speak. What kind of conservatives were they? Not least of all in their attitude toward the federal government?

Knebel: Well, I think that the common thread of all those fellows for whom I worked, and I think I’d put Dick Cheney in this, too. Many of us just didn’t think the government had to do everything. And didn’t want government to do everything. It wasn’t that they were anti-government, it was just that the old story was: it’s a liberal if you throw it a lifeline and it’s too far and the liberal forgets why he threw the lifeline. But it’s a conservative if it’s thrown out there and it’s not far enough and you’ve got to swim halfway to get there. That’s probably something of a bad cliché, but I just don’t think that anybody with whom I’ve been associated in government - and that’s why it’s so different today - really ever felt that government was the panacea. The Southern chairman, Bob Pogue, I member those fellows railing against the start of the food stamp program. “We don’t need to do that.”

Smith: You don’t think race was a factor?

Knebel: Oh, clearly it was subliminally, but there were a lot of ways that were ingrained in Eastland, Talmadge, Ellender, Spencer(?) Holland.

Smith: Boy, there is a name I haven’t heard.

Knebel: That were just different than George Akin of Vermont. Jerry Ford. Now that’s maybe a divide. I don’t know if it’s a distinguishing divide, or how you do that.

Smith: Well, it brings up a fascinating thing. I remember we talked to Walter Mondale about this. We talked to Ted Kennedy about this. The fact is, forty years ago, when you first arrived in town, a member of either body, you found yourself in an institution where there were two parties that actually had wings.
There is no doubt the Republicans were more conservative, the Democrats were more liberal, but that’s not to say that there was a totally conservative and a totally liberal party. So for example, Bob Dole says, he was told by his predecessor, when you go to Senate, “Spend some time with Senator Eastland.”

Knebel: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Ted Kennedy said he was told, “Spend some time with Dick Russell.”

Smith: But the fact is, within your caucus, if you were going to get something done, you first of all had to master the art of working with people who were not your ideological twins. Who represented a fairly diverse set of viewpoints within the party. And in some ways that was preparation for success in the larger body. That diversity is largely missing today.

Knebel: Well, we had George McGovern on the Senate Ag Committee and we were doing the conference on food stamps. George asked, as a point of personal privilege, if the conference could not meet on the next day, which was Saturday morning. And Al Ellender says, “Well, we’ve got to get this done before Christmas,” and he said, “Well, I going to give away my daughter, she’s getting married tomorrow.” And the eyes kind of rolled, and the big thing was that everybody wanted to roll McGovern. But you know, he pushed back and we said, “Okay, we’ll start at noon.” And McGovern came in with his top hat and tails and sat in the conference Saturday afternoon. But I don’t know if that would happen today. Maybe it would, perhaps. But it goes to show you how they bent backwards more.

Smith: Well, presumably as Minority Leader, Ford had to deal effectively with not only what passed for the right wing of his party…

Smith: But John Lindsay or Charlie Goodell – there were liberal Republicans in those days.
Knebel: Yeah.

Smith: And you think that prepared him for the presidency?

Knebel: I don’t know if you ever prepare for the presidency. I think it takes the measure of the man the minute he walks in. Ford was a creature of the House; made no beans about it. He passed up the opportunity to run for the Senate, I guess. He loved what he was doing. And as you quite aptly said, his goal in life was to be Speaker. That didn’t happen. I don’t know, maybe it’s just the basic man. A very decent human being. A lot of people said, oh he wasn’t the greatest idealist, he didn’t have a lot of stuff. But you’ve got to remember the time at which he became president, he had a very short time in which he had to make a decision as to Nixon, whether he would run, what to do with everything else on the scene, he brings Rockefeller in. I mean, this was a tough time.

Smith: No transition.

Knebel: Absolutely none. You were barely out of the era of John Dunlop and price controls. Something the other day that I had even forgotten about was the flu scare. I had totally forgotten that. When you’re in there, and I guess this is the point, things are going so fast. You talk to Dick Cheney about being chief of staff and how that came about. It is amazing. It is an incredible story. But when Ford found out, or I guess when Al Haig came to him and talked about the “deal” Ford gets his trip cancelled to Hawaii and all of a sudden he’s there. That’s almost as severe as Lyndon Johnson reading the oath on the airplane in Dallas. These are cataclysmic and I don’t believe that anything prepares you for it. I think it’s the measure of the man. We’ve been blessed as a country. There’s a theory in the House that the chairmanships of the House committees had always kind of dodged the bullet, so to speak, on avoiding people who should have been chairman.

Smith: Despite seniority.

Knebel: And I think that’s kind of broken down in the past few years. The iron forge of democracy is no longer a true and prevailing story.
Smith: One way of assessing the Ford presidency is that he came into office very much a man of the House, and in a sense, had to learn to be an executive - without forsaking the contacts and the qualities that he had exercised in the House. There is a reason that we don’t elect legislators to the office; for lack of a better word, the persuasive aspects of the job, the kind of broader political elements of the job. And there are people, Dick Cheney is one of them, who say – Don Rumsfeld told us – every day he [Ford] became better. He really became an executive. And in fact, the tragedy of 1976 was, just as he really mastered the job, he lost it.

Knebel: Yeah.

Smith: Could you see that, for lack of a better word, growth? Did he become more comfortable in the position?

Knebel: It’s hard for me – what’s the old saying – if you’re not the lead dog, the scenery never changes; and when you’re just a member of the Cabinet and that young fellow trying to come into something himself. I was very comfortable in my role as general counsel because I knew the statutes. When I became undersecretary I got budget responsibility and then all of a sudden I got the executive responsibility. So you’ve got your head down running so hard that it’s very, very difficult to assess “Oh my boss is doing a good job.” Far be it from me to suggest that anybody I worked for was doing a good job or bad job. I was just trying to do my job.

Smith: What were the main agricultural issues that the Ford administration dealt with?

Knebel: Well, one of the most outstanding was in ’74 when the Russians had a crop failure and Dobrynin came into see Butz one night and Butz wanted me there just so he’d have a witness. I was still in general counsel at the time. And the ambassador says to Secretary Butz, “We would like to buy X tons of grain.” We’d done our crop analysis and we knew what the carry forward was, and Dobrynin said, “From such and such a company.” Butz said, “Fine.” What he didn’t tell us was he was going to buy the exact same amount of grain from all five of the major U.S. grain companies, which put us in serious short supply.
Scoop Jackson had a head, the Senate Oversight Committee, it’s the only time I ever made the front page of the Washington Post like this, and the CEOs of the five grain companies were there. And then we went down afterwards and the President asked the companies to cut across the contracts, which they did, and that was averted. So that was a very interesting thing.

Smith: But was that portrayed as a grain embargo?

Knebel: No, the grain embargo was when the Ayatollah was trading and they cut across the grain contracts to Iran because of the Ayatollah on fuel. That was in ’73. This was in ’74 when the Soviets had a grain failure, a crop failure, which we knew about because of our satellites and they didn’t even have as good a monitoring system as we had of them. In fact, Dobrynin, I shall never forget says, “Well, now, tell me, what is it? How bad are we?” And I never will forget Butz kind of winking at me and saying, “You want to tell him or not?” And I said, “We’ll talk about that. We’ll let that one on the hanger.”

Smith: So the consequences of this was what, in terms of the farm belt? That you did not make as large a sale to the Soviets?

Knebel: We sold everything that we could and just kept a natural reserve going forward. As I said, the crop report that I filed, which was the ensuing year, the barns were painted, there was all new farm equipment out there, there was no carryover and everything was clearing the market so there were no payments. That was probably the central issue. We had, back in ’73 under price controls, we had the Australians trying to dump meat in, in the meat in port law. So we had some issues.

Smith: Let me just ask you because there was a sense that the relationship between the President and Secretary Schlesinger involved bad chemistry - that there was, for lack of a better word, perhaps a professorial manner about Schlesinger that some took to be condescending. Now, it’s interesting because we’ve talked to people who said, “Well, he talked to everyone like that.” He wasn’t just talking to the President like that, that’s just the way Jim Schlesinger talks to people. Did you sense a personality issue?
Knebel: Well, I really am not close enough to have evaluated that from a personal standpoint. But bits and pieces and dribs and drabs and, like I said, when you’re just doing a job, and you’re trying to make sure it gets done, you don’t sit around, unless you’re a gadfly. And I never shall forget when Butz was secretary he used to get upset with some of our folks who waited until he left town to issue press releases in their name. It was something. So there are lessons there.

Smith: Did you ever see Ford display a temper?

Knebel: No. In ’76 when we went out to Vail after the convention, it was pretty relaxed. We were having sessions and they’d gone to Russell, Kansas, to Bob’s hometown and then went up to Vail and we kind of retreated up there for a week or so. Susan was sixteen or eighteen at the time and she said, “Can you get some Forest Service horses so we can go on a horseback ride?” I said, “Sure.” So I got on the phone and I think we had every horse that the Forest Service owned in the five-state area trucked in overnight. And we had probably twenty members of the press, a dozen Secret Service, Susan and a couple of her friends and were going to do this trail ride the next day. Secretly, we were hoping that the horses would take the press out, which they didn’t do because none of them could ride. But the President got word from Susan that she had done this and he was a little irked. He calls and he says, “What the heck are you guys doing?” I said, “Mr. President, we are trying to have a good time and help Susan. She wanted to do that.” He says, “Well, is that right?” And I said, “Well, horses need exercise.” That’s as close as I ever saw him to ever being upset on anything.

Smith: But it also is very revealing about his sense of ethics.

Knebel: And then I said, “The rangers that trailered these horses in, they need a little rest so they are going to stay overnight and we’ll do this again tomorrow and then they’ll take them back.” He says, “Okay.” But that was a measure of the guy. You know, he was so decent.

Smith: And actually, he got along with the press very well.
Knebel: Oh, he was wonderful. Some of the photography, the skiing crap – pardon me – some of the photography, bumped his head on the airplane – I was with him out in Iowa with Bob Ray when he was dedicating the Iowa State Veterinary School and he spoke to the student body. This was in October, “I’m glad to be here at Iowa,” and of course, the crowd just went crazy because we were at Iowa State. He had a couple of those.

We had a whistle stop tour during the campaign of ’76. I don’t know if you ever got into that one. The train out of Chicago – it was he and Mrs. Ford’s thirty-fifth or fortieth anniversary, so Bob Michel who was on the train went out and bought a cake for the President and Mrs. Ford. We were going to have this cake, and of course, the Secret Service disheveled the cake before we could get it through to them. But he was a grand spirit in that regard.

Smith: He loved campaigning, didn’t he?

Knebel: He really did. We had Chuck Conner from the Rifleman. Tom Kleppe was on that train, I was on that train, Bob Michel, Bob Madigan who later also served as secretary of agriculture, a congressman from Springfield was also on that train. We had lunch in Springfield and then we went on to St. Louis and ended there. Kit Bond was the governor at the time, about to stand for re-election and he had his own problems and didn’t make it. That was quite a thing. He really did do that.

Then a couple weeks later we had a trip – actually it was on that trip to Iowa for the dedication – we picked up the editorial board of the Des Moines Register and they were going to have an interview with the President going back to Chicago. So we get on and sitting up in the presidential cabin on Air Force One, the President asked me to sit in for details, and I thought for sure we had the editorial board vote and that they would endorse the President, because that the only statewide paper in the country, the only single paper on a Sunday, in any state. And they came out for Carter the next day. He was crestfallen on that. The campaign, we went through tough times. Of course, Butz was gone and he’d been a very, very, very strong speaker and I picked up his schedule and mine as well, and it was pretty hectic.
Smith: How would you characterize Ford’s agricultural policies? I mean, market oriented?

Knebel: Absolutely.

Smith: And yet accepting…

Knebel: Well, you’ve got to remember that Michigan had been a very big dairy state. That was a very rigorous price support feature of the agriculture program. But as to grains, free market - big on export. We used to very much ballyhoo the agricultural trade surplus that we had. And it was very real.

Smith: And, difficult as it may be, describe what happened to Earl Butz.

Knebel: At the end of the convention in Kansas City he got on an airplane to fly to Los Angeles to visit his son Tom who was a divinity student. He was on an airplane – Earl worked an airplane like Hubert Humphrey did. He didn’t just go to the men’s room, he’d walk up and down the aisle and kind of glad handed everybody. He got about halfway up and Pat Boone stopped him. Pat Boone had been a delegate, a Republican delegate from California. Like Butz, pledged to Reagan on the first ballot. And Pat Boone, _________ in November. And Earl said, “I think we have a problem with the black vote.” And he said, and I must tell you, Pat Boone sitting on the aisle, John Dean was sitting by the window, and he had been at the convention as a Rolling Stones reporter. He didn’t say a word. He was not in the convention. Earl acknowledged John, “How are you, nice to see you,” sort of thing, but was speaking strictly to Pat Boone. And he said an old alderman in Chicago told me thirty years ago, and when John Dean did his story in Rolling Stones, he ascribed his thoughts on the forthcoming election that a very senior Republican, perhaps summarized it best when he said why the Republicans would lose the election and he spelled it out. And that story in Rolling Stones went unnoticed.

It came out in August and in late September I got a phone call, I was down in Mississippi from Ron Nessen, who was the press secretary. He said, “Jack, is this Earl?” and he read me the quote. I said, “I’ve been with Earl for five years and I’ve never heard him tell a racist story in my life. Barnyard humor?
He was the king of it. But never anything racial.” And I said, “I don’t know, but I put him on an airplane and he went to Los Angeles to visit Tom and I went to Tulsa and then I went on up to Vail.” He says, “You’d better get home.” So I caught the next plane back and sure enough, when they talked to Butz he confirmed the fact that that was his story, John Dean reported it correctly, albeit without identification, and he did not want to become a blemish on the Ford re-election campaign. So he wanted to get out. And that was an agonizing weekend we spent. Bryce Harlow was very much in counsel with the President on that. Bill Timmons, who you are going to see was in counsel on that. So Earl left and then as I recanted earlier, I told you that story when I was at Marysville, Ohio doing Earl’s speaking that day, and I got a call from the President and that was that. That was on October the 4th, my fortieth birthday.

Smith: How difficult was it for Ford to make the break with Butz? Presumably it was seen as a political necessity.

Knebel: Absolutely. He was very fond of Earl. As indeed, was Nixon. He and Nixon were very close. Earl went out and did very, very well on the speaking tour. You couldn’t have told that he wasn’t secretary. We had a party here for him, it was really pretty amusing. About two weeks after the election he was still in town and I got his chief of staff to edit all of his speeches, for what I call his ribald humor. And we made him sit in the middle of the floor down in our basement and listen to himself for forty minutes on the tape recorder. And it was just one of those great celebrations of a bad event that you ever have. And he left knowing that his staff was very close to him.

Smith: Was he dogged by that in later years?

Knebel: Not really. He was an academic. He went back to Perdue. We had a White House fellow named Jim Bostick, who was a black who had been student body president at Clemson, and he got up and he dispelled any notion that Earl Butz was a racist right off. I know the next morning I was up in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania and the Today show came and interviewed and said, “What do you think of Earl Butz?” and I said, “I think he’s a patriot.” And that was the end of that. I don’t believe that ever haunted him. In fact, very few people event recognized the source of the affliction and the fact that John Dean was in it and what a calamity it was that Dean is a Rolling Stones reporter, the holier than thou counsel to the President.

Smith: What are your memories of the convention in Kansas City?

Knebel: ’76 convention?

Smith: Was it a bitter convention?

Knebel: It was an interesting convention. It was contentious, but not bitter. Reagan’s troops were marshaled by John Sears, who was a very, very dear friend of ours, and John did a masterful job. They had beaten us two to one in North Carolina in early primaries. They beat us two to one in June in California, June 2nd. John was a great strategist and it was the first time I ever saw the religious right brought into politics. And they were very, very well marshaled and very effectively done. And very honestly, the Ford campaign was so new – we really didn’t have much more than some of those House Republicans that he had gone out to speak for and they had a local staff and we could use that. But what we were running into was the phenomenal organization that the Reagan people had done.

Smith: Going into that convention, was there a degree of uncertainty?

Knebel: That’s a question which could really best be answered by President Ford. I don’t know that he truly wanted to run; I think he felt he should run. I know that he was comfortable as a president, and I thought he was extraordinarily able to do that job, but I’m not sure that he was comfortable as a national campaigner because there were so many handlers. There was so much stuff going on that he didn’t have the day to day that he probably would have liked.

Smith: There is a wonderful story that Stu Spencer tells. And you can hear Stu saying it. It says volumes about Stu, but it says more about Ford. Early on, when things were really going badly, post-North Carolina, Stu had reluctantly agreed to come onboard to help with the campaign. And it was a very awkward position that they had these polls, the President would go out and campaign, and the numbers would go down. Stu had to find some kind of euphemism to get him off the campaign trail. Well, the President loved to campaign.

Knebel: He did love to campaign.

Smith: So, it’s a Friday afternoon, wet, rainy, dismal afternoon. There are three people in the Oval Office; the President, Dick Cheney, and Stu Spencer. And Stu is not getting anywhere. The President is not getting it, or choosing not to get his message. So finally, Stu says, “You know Mr. President, you’re a great President, but you are a fucking lousy campaigner.” But it’s the sequel that makes the story. Because that story appeared in Witcover-Germond’s book about the ’76 campaign. And Stu was livid. He called Dick Cheney to chew him out and on and on and so on. And finally Dick sort of lets him run down and he says, “There was a third person in that room.” And the fact that: one, he could say it to Ford and keep his job, and two, that Ford would then tell it on himself to a reporter.

Knebel: Yeah, he was very self-effacing in that regard. And I don’t know that I had that many times that I was with him in such limited company that there was ever any stuff like that I saw. I remember Butz telling me when he went over to tell the President that Phil Campbell had had a heart attack and that he wanted to bring me back, that he was very animated in getting involved and got right on the phone.

Smith: Were you in Cabinet meetings?

Knebel: Oh yes.

Smith: How were they run? How did he use the Cabinet?

Knebel: Well, the first Cabinet meeting I went to, I never will forget John Warner was the Bicentennial chairman. Now Butz was out of town, I was undersecretary, and Ford looked at his watch and he said, “John, we’ve got a Bicentennial coming up in about eight months. Are we going to have to reset the clock? Are you going to get it done?” And John Warner kind of all blustering and all that, it was pretty funny. But there was some levity. Ed Levi, the attorney. general, used to get into it with Bill Coleman, who thought he was the attorney general.

Smith: Two very impressive minds.

Knebel: Oh, absolutely, world class and really great guys. But it was interesting and then actually when I became secretary, which was October 4th, only a month before the election, there were very few Cabinet meetings between and the time we left. But we did have one on the last day of our office. Our chairs had already been removed and we just had coffee around the Cabinet table. President Ford was wishing everybody good luck and Godspeed and Betty came in that day. It was quite something.

Smith: Was it emotional?

Knebel: Yes, yes, but not tearful. Heartfelt. I remember Carla and Rod Hills were both there, even though Rod was at the SEC, I think, Carla was HUD secretary. It was interesting. Henry Kissinger, Nelson was in fine fettle that morning.

Smith: Really? What was he like?

Knebel: Nelson was a great big bear. I ran into him in November in ’77 in Tehran, I was over there on a case and he was there to bring his African art collection to lend it to the Shah. And of course, the embassy was overrun a few months later and the art collection and the Shah – all of it – were never seen again. A few months later, I guess a year later, Nelson was no longer with us. But I had dinner with him in Trahan and he was just living life.

Smith: Was he? Did he seem in good spirits?

Knebel: Oh, I never saw him when he wasn’t happy.

Smith: Really? Because there were times.

Knebel: I didn’t know him that well.

Smith: No, but clearly, being dumped from the ticket was a traumatic experience. But by all accounts, he was a good soldier.
Knebel: He was a marvelous soldier because this is eight months after we had left office, and he wasn’t philosophical, saying, “Well, we could have run if I was in it,” or anything like that. It never even came up. He was just talking about what he was going to do and all this stuff. I came away with the regard for him that I always had. Very nice guy.

Smith: There is a school that anyone who goes through the incredible emotional experience of a campaign and all your hopes are up and you close the gap and then just fall short – that it took a while for Ford to kind of regain his balance.

Knebel: First of all, the night of the election returns we were all at the White House and it was like a morgue. Nobody had a voice. I didn’t have a voice, I had given as many as ten-twelve speeches a day, and the guys who were scheduling me were on the Committee to Re-Elect, Manny Mopus and Dick Ling, they’d get on the phone and call me at four o’clock. “You’re going to Springfield, Illinois,” and give me three more stops. I’d say, “Wait, wait.” “And then you’re doing eleven o’clock news in Wheeling, West Virginia.” And this is how it was. “By the way, your plane is wheels up at six o’clock tomorrow at National.” So basically, you’d get home at midnight. You’d come in, take a shower, get a clean shirt, go back to the airport, and that was it. And this campaign was something that I’ll never forget.

Smith: Did you think at the end you might have actually pulled it out?

Knebel: You know, it was pretty interesting because, and Jimmy Carter fired me several times as secretary. He didn’t want no lawyer, he wanted a peanut farmer to be secretary. And this was big in the South. So I was doing a lot of speaking down there. I’ll tell you what it was - it was in Terra Haute, Indiana. I was campaigning for a new congressman named Dan Quayle, a guy who was running for Congress. And Miss Lillian, President Carter’s mother, she got into his speech about firing me and the press asked me about it. And I said, “Well, the last time I checked, she’s not running for anything, except to get him out of town.” I don’t know if they would have pulled it off. Another week, another ten days, I’ve heard a lot of conjecture both ways. Sometimes those things tend to close and they never quite get there. They are kind of like your belt after a big dinner.
Smith: Do you think the pardon in the end was the biggest factor? Or is that symbolic?

Knebel: Yeah, as I say, I think it was symptomatic that the body-politic had to cleanse itself of the last vestige of Watergate. And that’s how I’ve always attributed it. Was Carter ready for the presidency? Again, it takes the measure of the man. History will read what it is.

Smith: A couple of things and we’ll let you go. Tell us about Bob Hartmann.

Knebel: SOB.

Smith: Yeah.

Knebel: Same old Bob.

Smith: He was a polarizing figure, wasn’t he?

Knebel: I don’t know if anybody was at the other end of the pole. Bob wrote probably the greatest phrase, this national nightmare…but the interesting thing about Bob, and I always respected him for it, his total devotion to Jerry Ford. He was the perfect loyal person. Jack Marsh came along, Dick Cheney came along, Rummy had been in the House with the President, but Bob had been his staff and he was his staff. And he was an extension of the President. He was kind of the rough personality side that you never saw in Ford coming out. In some respects, I don’t know if Bob ever smiled at me and said, “Gee, thanks for all the stuff you’ve given me,” when I was doing stuff for him. (Hartmann clearing throat) “I’ll show it to the old man.” And I’d see Ford and he’d say, “Hey, thanks a lot; that was good stuff.”

Smith: Where does loyalty shade over into a kind of possessiveness that may not be healthy?

Knebel: I think you have to look at the flip side of that and ask yourself, if you saw something inherently wrong that your senior is doing, are you so blinded that you can’t either withdraw or speak to him in private, or do you just roll with it? And then that’s not loyalty, that’s subsuming your personality.
Smith: Right. And I take it to be implicit in what you say, that Hartmann did not hesitate to frankly confront his boss.

Knebel: Oh, he shut the door and ranted and raved and just the same way that he would – he treated the President with a great deal of deference and respect, but also knew his role, and his role was to counsel. And he did extraordinarily well.

Smith: You obviously saw the President in later years.

Knebel: Oh yes, in Colorado, in California a couple of times. And when he came back here for his dinners.

Smith: They loved Colorado, didn’t they?

Knebel: You know the interesting thing about that last Cabinet meeting I mentioned to you? In ’76 he told me, well, actually, it was before that, in ’74, when I came back in to be undersecretary, he said, “You know, I’ve got my eye on a piece of property at Beaver Creek.” And I said, “Let me see if I can get the environmental impact statement through the Forest Service so that we’ll have it for you.” And when we went to the last Cabinet meeting, I had a roll of papers under my arm and I gave him the environmental impact statement for Beaver Creek. And he said, “You are a man of your word.”

Smith: Clearly they loved it, and by all accounts, they were adored.

Knebel: They actually were.

Smith: They were more than the first citizens.

Knebel: Yeah, Marty Head, who is a very dear friend of ours from Aspen, has been on several different community boards where the President served. She would be a person who could speak to that directly. I haven’t spent enough time up there to be able to say.

Smith: Is she in Vail?

Knebel: Yes.

Smith: Great. We’ll make a note of that.
Knebel: Marty Head who was married to the fellow who – Head – Marty Head. Remember the Head tennis racquet?

Smith: Oh sure.

Knebel: Head skis. That’s Marty. She has a skiing house there on the slopes. So make sure you go in the winter.

Smith: And before I forget. Is John Sears still downtown? How would we get hold of him?

Knebel: I haven’t seen or heard from John. I know his wife, his former wife, is up in New Hampshire because he always speaks to her on her birthday. And their kids were contemporaries of our kids and everything.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw the President?

Knebel: Yes, it was when he came in for his last dinner here, and told us, as he and Betty stood in the reception line, they had kind of bar-height chairs, that this was going to be his last trip.

Smith: Was that the dinner in Statuary Hall?

Knebel: Yes, it was. And they gave Rumsfeld and Cheney the Presidential Medals.

Smith: Was it gratifying to see, with the passage of time – I think of Senator Kennedy, the Profiles in Courage Award that the Kennedy Library bestowed on him was in some ways a transforming event. He used to say, “For twenty years, everywhere I go, people asked the same question. They don’t ask anymore.” It’s almost as if that crystallized this larger movement where American public opinion, if you can speak of such an enormous and diverse thing, accepted not only his rationale for the pardon, but the political courage that he displayed. Poor Lyndon Johnson, who died days before the Vietnam peace agreement. Gerald Ford lived long enough to see that shift.

Knebel: I like the theory, but in point of fact, I’m not sure that enough people understand the history to really make it viable. Here’s why: if you look at the people today, they are talking about having an education program for the kids who don’t even know what 9/11 was. What percentage of our electorate voted for JFK in 1960? The country, and again, you eluded to it earlier, C-SPAN, 24 hour cable news, what is the story today? It’s not history. And I’m a person who doesn’t believe in reading these chronicles of today because there is so much kind of verbiage in them that’s just acrimonious and doesn’t really tell a story. I think your theory is going to be well accepted as historians really begin to write about the period that we were in. Jim Cannon got it right in his book. Of course, I would hope he would. But it’s going to take some more passage of time. I think passage of time will treat Ford well. I really do.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Knebel: Well, I’ve always characterized him as a good and decent human being. I supposed, who well served his country, both in the House and as president. He got us through a very tough time and he was a grateful man.

Kratsas: I am here with former Grand Rapids Mayor John Logie. Mayor, why don’t you start out by giving us your personal history; where you were born, schooling, etc.

Logie: Thank you Jim, I am looking forward to this.

I will start back far enough but brief enough. Three of my great grandfathers showed up in Grand Rapids in the 19th Century so my roots are down here pretty hard. My grandpa Logie was born here in 1881, my father, Dr. Jim Logie, was born here in 1911 and he was teaching at the University of Michigan Medical School where he had finished his surgical residency in the 1930s. My brother Jimmy and I were born in Ann Arbor although we have always considered Grand Rapids our hometown because of that lengthy history. In 1942, my Dad, who had contracted tuberculosis and gotten drummed out of the Army Medical Corp, because this was before penicillin was developed during the war. After recovering, he came back here [Grand Rapids] to private practice as a doctor. I grew up here and went to East Grand Rapids High School, started at Williams College and then transferred to Ann Arbor, where I finished. This was in the Cold War Era and so if you were healthy and you got deferments to go to college but if you were single and healthy you were going to be a Buck Private in the Army. So, I elected to go to OCS and get a chance for a commission in the Navy. I did and served on two destroyers in the Pacific. Then the Navy invited me to go teach surface tactics to the senior mid-shipmen at Annapolis in 1964. My claim to fame is that I taught Roger Staubach everything that he ever knew about surface tactics. He won the Heisman Trophy in his junior year. After five years active duty, I left Annapolis and I went back to Ann Arbor. Under the Soldiers and Sailors Relief Act I was able to go to Law School as an in-state student even though I hadn’t lived here for six years. So, it was an easy choice to go back to Ann Arbor. Along the way I picked up a Master’s Degree while I was teaching at Annapolis from George Washington University. I sat on their Board of Advisors for several years while I was Mayor [Grand Rapids]. I have two Honorary Degrees; one from Central Michigan University and the other from Ferris State University. So that’s my background. I discovered my wife in California. Her name was Susan Duerr and I should have met her long before. She had graduated from Michigan State University. She and three of her sorority sisters from the teaching program there went to San Diego to teach. So we met in California and will be celebrating our 50th Anniversary this August. We have three children. Our son John is a tenured professor at the University of Minnesota; we have a Korean daughter, Susannah, whom we adopted when she was four, she is now forty-four and lives here with her husband and two children; and our youngest daughter, Maggie, lives in Oakland, California. So that’s basically my background. I ran for Mayor in 1991 and was elected for three four-year terms, so I served twelve years, which at the moment, am the longest serving mayor in the city’s 164 year history. I joined Warner, Norcross, and Judd when I got out of law school. It was the biggest law firm in Grand Rapids. I was the 19th lawyer at work at that time, when I showed up in the late 1960s. We had one floor in the Old Kent, now 5/3 Bank Building, on the 9th floor. We were the only tenant with a whole floor. We couldn’t fill it up. It was only about half full. Now fast forward to today, it still has floor 9 but also 8, 7, 6, 5, and 4. It’s the second largest law firm in Michigan based on the number of Michigan lawyers. There are about 225 lawyers in 7 cities. Two and a half years ago I fully retired having been Of Counsel for a number of years. I successfully tried my last case in my early 70s; I am kind of proud of that! That’s my history.

Kratsas: Alright, with that being said, you were working for Warner, Norcross in 1974?

Logie: I was the newest partner; having been an Associate for 5 years.
Kratsas: Newest partner? Young for a partner!

Logie: Not really, because of the 5 years that I spent with the Navy. I think I was the 3rd or 4th oldest law student at the University of Michigan out of 375 or so students.

Kratsas: Did you know Gerald Ford before he became President?

Logie: I met Jerry Ford at my Grandma and Grandpa Logie’s house on Benjamin in Eastown [Grand Rapids]. She was serving Christmas Dinner. One of my connections to Ford is that my dad had one sister. She was Betty Logie. Betty Ford [Betty Bloomer] had an older brother named Bill Bloomer who was 8-9 years older than she. He married my Aunt Betty [Logie]. They used to bring young unmarried Betty [Bloomer] with them after they were married and moved to Grand Rapids. They spent most of their lives in Minneapolis. At that time they were all from Grand Rapids. They used to come see us because Grandma Logie was a great cook. They would bring young Betty [Bloomer] along and I met her when I was 10, and she was maybe 20, and I said to her “What should I call you?” She said “What do you call your dad’s sister who is married to my brother?” I said “I call her Aunt Betty”. She said “Well then you better call me Aunt Betty too”. So…I did, all her life, right up to the last time I saw her which was not that long ago. I called her Aunt Betty all her life. So, there were two Aunt Betty’s back then, it was confusing. People have asked me well, “what did you call him?” I said “well I started calling him Congressman, and then I called him Mr. Vice President, and then I called him Mr. President”. Not that he was a stuffed shirt, because he wasn’t, but because that’s the way I was brought up; if somebody has a title, you use it.

Before World War II, Jerry Ford began a law partnership with Phil Buchen, who was my Godfather. I called him “Uncle Phil.” He had polio as a child, and needed crutches to get around. Jerry went to war, and Uncle Phil joined another firm. They stayed friends the rest of their lives. When Ford became Vice President, he rated his own lawyer, and asked Uncle Phil to come to Washington as VP Counsel. So my godfather became his house lawyer in Washington.
Now let’s talk about the pardon. As a young partner, I was working on a Friday afternoon, not very long after Ford had been sworn in as President. Phil Buchen had called Hal Sawyer earlier that day. Hal was a senior partner at Warner, Norcross, and Judd. He went on to four terms in Congress, filling Jerry’s [Ford] seat. He was the Chairman and the lead trial lawyer in the firm. You will never know too many people anymore that have tried 100 cases to judgment, actually not settled, you either go to a jury or judge. I tried over a hundred of those. He was the best trial lawyer that I ever saw. But anyway, Phil Buchen called him and he said to Hal “I need some research done over this weekend and I need it now. I don’t need anything in writing; in fact I don’t want anything in writing”. This is Sawyer’s story to us. As best as I remember, there were 5 of us that got together on this project. We were all in the office on that late Friday morning. We met in the afternoon. Phil [Buchen] had said, “What I want from you on Monday is an oral report on what is the actual scope of the pardon power.

Kratsas: For the President?

Logie: Yes. Phil told Hal, “Now you understand why I am not going to talk to any of the big law firms here in Washington”. He had been there now for a while. And he said to Hal “that they are all leaky sieves”. He wanted to do this as quietly as it could be done. Which is one of the reasons why, unfortunately, we don’t have any paper records because we all worked over the weekend and we met Sunday afternoon. We kind of divided up the pie among us to do some research to try and find out what the judicial precedent was. Turns out that most of that judicial precedent had to do with federal judges who were accused of taking a bribe or something else like that. There is some case law there. And, we approached it this way and I think it’s probably one of the more important aspects of what we did. We decided to work backwards at that first meeting on Friday. What that meant was, we know that the President of the United States has the power to pardon almost anybody he wants to pardon and he doesn’t have to give the reason. So if you have got a heinous murderer, killing someone on federal territory, or whatever, who has been languishing for 60 years in prison and he’s 89 years old and if the President wants to pardon him so he can go home to die, it’s clear he can do that.

So that’s what I mean by backwards: crime, tried, convicted, sentenced, and served a lengthy sentence. Could he exercise that act of clemency on that basis? Answer: Yes. Now we are going to start to move it forward in time. Now, maybe he’s just as heinous but he’s only served 3 years of a life mandatory without benefit of parole type sentence. Can the President step in and give him a full free pardon, walks out the door and doesn’t have to look back? Answer: Yes. Ok… what happens if he has been convicted but he has not been sentenced, can the President step in? The answer was yes. Alright…what if the trial is going on and it hasn’t even been decided that he’s guilty, Answer: yes. Now let me bring in Leon Jaworski.

Kratsas: Let me back up for one moment.

Logie: Sure.

Kratsas: You were going on judicial precedent?

Logie: Case law. We were lawyers; we were trained to go into the books and read established case results to guide what we were looking for - justification for issuing a pardon to Nixon now! We were assigned to find precedent so that if somebody wants to challenge President Ford once he has done what it sounds like he was going to do, or intending to do, based on our advice, that he has the full power to do it. That was the real heart of the question that we were being asked to answer.

Calvaruso: Before I forget, because it might be interesting for historical purposes, who were the five attorneys in the room?

Logie: I am quite sure they were Hal Sawyer and myself, plus Lew Engman, Joe Neath, and Tom McNamara. They are all dead now. I was the youngest, both from the point of service and in age, I believe. These are more experienced trial lawyers than I was although I had tried a lot of cases during my five years with the firm. We all did separate research. We really only met twice, I believe. Once on Friday afternoon when we took the assignment and then once on Sunday afternoon when we sat down and decided what Hal was going to say to Uncle Phil [Buchen].

Ultimately, we had a third gathering when Guy Vander Jagt, who was then the shoreline Congressman and had been an Associate at Warner, Norcross, became President Ford’s messenger. He [Vander Jagt] was never going to be a good lawyer; he figured that out himself, but he was a good congressman, and good friend to all of us at the law firm, all of his life. His wife Carol was also a good friend. Anyway, he came, and this is really part of the story, but it is out of order. I like to tell people that we got paid for research that we did for the President of the United States. He [Ford] had been a member of the Peninsular Club, now defunct, in Grand Rapids, when he was a young lawyer, before the war, and after the war when he was at the firm. Remember he and Phil [Buchen] were lawyer partners before the war. And Phil was practicing law when I came back. He did a lot to get Grand Valley State University up and running, that was one of his personal projects; he was general counsel for the planning and implementing of that.

So, talking backwards, it was clear that the President had the power to pardon somebody even before he had been convicted of anything. But…Leon Jaworski who was the second Watergate counsel knew Nixon was smart. Nixon never met with Haldeman and Ehrlichman together, because if more than two people plot together, it’s a conspiracy. He knew that. He [Nixon] was a smart lawyer too. So he would meet with Haldeman or he would meet with Ehrlichman, but not together, because the tape machine was running under the desk and all of that stuff. What Jaworski did to get at Haldeman and Ehrlichman, and he got them, and he got them convicted, was he named Nixon as an “unindicted co-conspirator”. That’s a nice technical phrase but what that meant was that he could either force them to talk or suffer the penalties for refusing to talk because he had that lever, which I thought was brilliant.

The next point, I think, was one of the key points in this; Nixon had never been accused of anything. Even after the “smoking gun”, even after he resigned, nobody had even begun to prosecute him. Could a President step in… and the answer to that question was Yes! As near as we could tell, the President’s power working backwards in time, and there’s only two people who know (the perpetrator and the President) that a crime had been committed, and the President wants to pardon him, he can. And that was the answer to Buchen’s question to Warner, Norcross, and Judd. How far back can you go because they didn’t want to give a pardon and then find out…No, we can still prosecute him over here. [President] Ford wanted to put Nixon on the sidelines.

In later years, he and I discussed this. He knew I was one of the guys that had participated in the project. When he came back to Grand Rapids, I would often see him. As Mayor, he and I cut the ribbon on the public museum together.

Anyway…that was our conclusion and Hal [Sawyer] did call Buchen on Monday morning and gave him that advice. But there is a little side story.

Uncle Phil [Buchen] was a long-time member and actually wrote a history of Fountain Street Church, which is an independent non-denominational church in downtown Grand Rapids. I didn’t even know this fact, because of my mother’s early demise, but my name is John Hoult Logie and there is a beautiful stained window in this church, as you are facing the pulpit that was given by the Hoult family there, given by my mother’s family. The then Head Minister, Duncan Littlefair, was in full flower at that time as the minister of Fountain Street Church, a very liberal non-denomination church, then and now. He ended up on the Today Show and going to New York. He had his own statue. Well, according to Littlefair, and I talked to Uncle Phil [Buchen] long after the fact. Buchen thought it might help Jerry [Ford] make the right decision to meet and talk with Duncan [Littlefair] because Duncan was very much in favor of a pardon. His reasoning, at the time, was get him [Nixon] off-stage. If we put him in the dock he’s going to be making nasty news for God knows how many years. It would look like a capital murder case…27 years on death row and they still wouldn’t be able to solve it. That was his thinking.
Littlefair snuck down to Washington and met with President Ford and Buchen, who was his long-time friend at the church. He came back and he delivered a sermon not too long after all had become public, but after it was over, from our pulpit and I was madder than hell at that point because I didn’t think he [Nixon] should have been pardoned. I was angry at him going back to 1962. It’s a little-known fact now, but I was a young officer in San Diego in 1962 when Nixon, having lost to Kennedy in 1960, ran for Governor of California against Pat Brown, the father of the current Governor, who is in his second time around. He was in his 40s and now he is in his 70s. The Democratic Party of California got so mad at the dirty tricks that Nixon’s people were playing that they sued them in State Court for breaking campaign rules. The Nixon team was good enough to prevent that coming to a head before the election. And everybody sort of assumed after that, that the Democrats having won, they’d just let it go. No! They got a judgment against Nixon personally and a guy named Haldeman personally that they ended up paying. I kept waiting through Watergate to see that come to life again. And I don’t believe it ever did and I don’t quite understand that because I was living in San Diego in the fall of ’62, and it never came to light, but I saw it happen. Anyway, you guys can tell me just how long after that conversation, it took Jerry, not very long, to issue a full and unconditional pardon. I remember talking to him [Ford] and Uncle Phil [Buchen] which was my actual nice name for him, my Godfather, and he, Buchen, told me that he had given orders to the guys that were going to go out and try to broker the deal with Nixon out in California that they had to get something in writing from him and not come home without it. The short answer is they came home without it, which opened the door for Nixon to try and rehabilitate his image for the rest of his life, which is what he actually did.

Kratsas: So, let me back up a little bit here. How soon after Ford was sworn in as President were you contacted at the firm, or was the firm contacted?

Logie: Somewhat educated guess…it wasn’t very long, I would say it would be less than a month, might have been a couple weeks.
Kratsas: The pardon was issued a month after he was sworn in, so it would have to be in that time frame.

Logie: Yes, I don’t think they waited long after they got our advice. It was on a Friday, that much I know, if I had to put a timeline on it, less than 2 weeks after he had become President.

Kratsas: And it would have been after his first press conference when Ford went to the press conference and all anybody wanted to ask was …What are you going to do with Nixon? Are you thinking of pardoning him? And President Ford wanted to talk about inflation, or the economy.

Logie: He didn’t want to answer that question. Well, it may have been that he didn’t have all those pieces in place. He didn’t have us at that point.

I think that was, after the fact Uncle Phil [Buchen] said that we were concerned that if we made this move this fast, he knew it would create a huge fallout, but Ford was hard-wired to get this thing done. And it wasn’t because he made any deal. Anybody who knew Jerry Ford knew he would never have made any “deal”. Nixon was a bad-enough guy to try to do that, and I have heard third-hand that Nixon did try through one of his henchmen.

Kratsas: I know Al Haig had brought it up to Ford.

Logie: It was Haig that I was thinking of. He’s dead now too isn’t he?

Kratsas: Yes. But it was President Ford’s speechwriter, Bob Hartmann. I know Hartmann told Ford to back away as soon as Haig would want to talk to him and so on about a possible deal.

Logie: Well, you know, I have to tell this story. When Ford was being vetted to be Vice President after Spiro T. Agnew, Agnew was the Baltimore County Executive when I was teaching at Annapolis. Everybody already knew he was on the take with the road builders. It was cash dealings. The reputation of Maryland’s state government was not great. His predecessor had a huge yacht that he spent most of his time on, called the J. Millard Tawes, (his own name) and all he did was bring parties and liquor on his big boat. I left the Navy in August 1966. Agnew was elected in November, 1966. By that time I was a law student back at the University of Michigan. But Agnew’s taking payments from the Maryland road builders was an open secret. So the Baltimore County Executive was kind of like the guy in Oakland County, strong leader kind of thing. But then he became Governor and he had the road builders come right into his office with cash and then he became Vice President and they went right into the Vice President’s office with cash and the FBI caught them. Wired, sent them in to make the transaction and talk about it on the tape. The first thing the guy said as they were waiting for him… “I just bribed the Vice President of the United States right on the tape”. So they said to Agnew, you don’t get to go through impeachment; we can put you in the slammer. He quickly and quietly resigned.

Kratsas: You weren’t privy to what Hal Sawyer told Buchen?

Logie: No, it was one-on-one.

Kratsas: Can you recall anything that you stated orally to Hal Sawyer that actually got incorporated into the pardon itself.

Logie: No, but Hal knew that I thought a pardon was a bad idea. I wasn’t the only one that felt like that. And if he had been convicted it would have divided the country by people who didn’t think he did anything wrong and the people that did. Ford was smart enough to know that. I wasn’t, but time has proved that President Ford was right.

Kratsas: He was a lot smarter than the rest of us. It was only a shame that the White House, the Press, (and this might have been the problem of Jerry terHorst leaving right away) that they had not made it clear that when Nixon accepted the pardon that he confessed his guilt and that’s all I think the majority of the American people wanted -- was to find him guilty and him to say “I’m guilty” was good enough. The acceptance of the pardon is most often seen as an admission of guilt.

Logie: I thought it was bad for the country to let him off the hook. But as you say that was 40 years ago and I was only 35 years old.
Kratsas: You said that Phil Buchen did not contact any other law firms in Grand Rapids. Had you heard or did you know if Phil Buchen had called others outside of Grand Rapids?

Logie: There was another issue. I think it was about the Nixon records. Roger Clark from our firm told me, he was a couple years ahead of me, but he said, he was not on the team that I was on, but he was on a more publicized group of lawyers from three different firms that were all bunched together and Roger was part of that team. But that was a separate issue about the legalities dealing with Nixon’s papers.

I remember that and I think that issue went right up to the Supreme Court and I think the decision of the Supreme Court was unanimous that these are “our” records not yours. I think somebody has a copy of the newspaper article about that. I don’t but somebody does.

Calvaruso: Was Law Weathers, Buchen and Richardson ever involved in any of that?

Logie: I don’t think so.

Calvaruso: Was Law Weathers at that time a fairly small firm?

Logie: No…it was Law Buchen before it was Law Weathers. When Uncle Phil became White House Counsel, his name came off. The firm of Ford and Buchen was dissolved by the war and Phil Buchen went into what is now Law Weathers. After the war ended, Jerry [Ford] joined Phil’s [Buchen] firm. Julius Amberg was its leader. He was Jerry’s mentor in his race for Congress because he was well connected to Republican politics.

Calvaruso: Was it Dick VanderVeen?

Logie: Dick VanderVeen… no. Dick ran against Ford in 1958 and he also is the one Democrat to have been elected to our seat in 100 years. There was a bi-election to fill the remainder of the term and Sawyer and I both helped Dick VanderVeen, who was a friend to both of us, win that seat against the Republican and then 9 months later he won a full 2-year term. Then Hal Sawyer came to my office, because I helped people get elected to public office(s), and he said he wanted to run for the seat even though he also helped support Dick. We were all angry about Nixon as a lawyer and a crook. I told Hal, I said “Why do you want to do that, you don’t even like to meet and greet people”. Most of the people I help win public office around here like to do that. He said, “Yeah you are right, you need people like that”. It was interesting because Ford won comfortably in the high 60s and maybe occasionally in the low 70s. Sawyer won all four of his elections, 51.2%, 52.1%. It wasn’t that he was a bad Congressman; he simply did not, could not put himself out to people. If you are going to be an elected politician you have to like shaking hands and talking to people. So, they were all skin-of-the-teeth wins, but he won four elections in a row. His health went to pot.

He [Sawyer] was on the second Warren Commission; he was the most experienced lawyer in Congress. He had more actual real law experience than any of the other 534 people in the Senate and in the House. They recognized him, finally, in his 3rd or 4th term. When Paul Henry (Sawyer’s successor) died, I was still a pretty new Mayor. Some of my Republican friends wanted me to run for that job. I said, I had just taken a contract here a couple of years ago to be the Mayor of this city for 4 years and I don’t think I should leave. I have been given an opportunity by the people to really help shape and mold this community and this was in the 90’s where you can look out some of these windows and see. I would love to take credit for it but I became Mayor in good economic times. Here is the problem, I helped Sawyer win that job and he was the most seasoned lawyer in the whole place and they walked in and because of the seniority system basically gave him toilets to clean the entire 8 years that he was there. He finally got to be the number-two guy in some subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. I said I’ve got more muscle than that right here in Grand Rapids. It’s a bad trade for me. I respect Congress and the importance of the job, but I am staying home.

Calvaruso: When you split up the research duties on the pardon, what was your expertise, what part of the law?

Logie: It wasn’t about expertise; it was about experience in court. We made a list of the things that we thought we ought to have answers to. I honestly don’t remember at this point what my specific piece was. There were 5 of us counting Sawyer. I don’t think he did much research, but the rest of us did. We cut it up into different bites and then we went to go find case law that supported outcomes on that issue so that we could find precedent, lawyers need to find precedents to hang their hats on, to reach a conclusion. Most often, I remember reading a couple of cases, where Federal Judges, not necessarily Supreme Court Justices, but lifetime appointee Federal Judges who were on the take, or something like that, or lied under oath or whatever and they could be gotten to. There were other cases too. I was working on the judge issue which is why I remember this and what could we do with these judges that had lifetime appointments.

Calvaruso: I know people weren’t happy that President Ford pardoned Nixon, but at the time was there any legal challenge to the pardon?

Kratsas: There was the attempt by Congress to hold hearings about it. That’s when President Ford went to Congress to discuss. He was the only President since, I believe, since Lincoln that went before Congress to testify and he went up there. The amazing part is Ford went up there, no notes, no advisor, nothing. He sat down and they said we want to know if there was a deal on this. He said there was no deal for the pardon, that’s it, next question. It was one of the shortest meetings of all time. But I know Buchen, Hartmann, and every one of them said to him “do not go up there alone” and some said not to even go. Ford said “No, I’m going”. And he did.

Logie: Yes. That’s a great story. You know, a couple of other Ford stories: When Ford was being vetted for Vice President, the steely-eyed guys with badges on their lapel were all over Grand Rapids trying to find dirt on Ford. And Lloyd Lievency was a tailor here in Grand Rapids, who made suits for gentlemen from scratch, and it was called Lloyd’s, very well-known, and civilians liked his suits. The steely-eyed guys got wind that Ford supposedly got two new suits every year he was in Congress made by Lloyd. I heard this story from Lloyd who is dead now, and they came calling. They said to him “We understand that you make two suits a year for Congressman Ford”. They said “Do you keep records of how they are paid for?”…looking to see if some booster was bank-rolling him or whatever they were looking for. Lloyd said “Yes, I do.” They said, “Would you mind if we take a look”. And of course, they were all paid for by Ford, personally.

And my other story, which I eluded to earlier, a little more personal to what I got involved in. We got paid for our research. Our pay was a dinner at the Peninsular Club where Ford was now an honorary member after he went to Congress. With membership you get privileges. Guy Vander Jagt came and told us, called ahead, and was deputized by Ford to hold a dinner for the group of us that had worked on the pardon issue at the Peninsular Club and I found out after the fact that that dinner was paid for with a personal check from President Ford. He paid for our dinner. So trying to find dirt on…you look at all of the bad guys with the wife problems, Clinton, everybody else like that. Ford was there for 25 years and when the steely-eyed guys were done with their investigation to vet him as Vice President he was so clean they couldn’t believe there wasn’t some dirt there somewhere.

Kratsas: There was even the story that they talked to somebody he played football with, against in high school that Ford had tackled late and got a flag on the play. The gentleman was asked if he thought Ford was a dirty player and he said no, he didn’t hear the whistle, and I didn’t hear the whistle either.

Well, I have gone through all the questions that I have for you.

I did think of one last question for you. Did you know Benton Becker at this time?

Logie: I didn’t and I don’t know him now. He’s around my age and he was a young lawyer. I was very; very unhappy when it came out that whoever went out there got a verbal we’ll-take-care-of-that and they danced on him perfectly.

Kratsas: Thank you.

Smith: First of all, I want to talk a little bit your life before your path ever crossed with Gerald Ford. It’s been extraordinarily colorful, eventful life. At the age of seven you met Amelia Earhart and Charles Lindbergh, about the same time?

Stevens: It was about the same time – a little later. Amelia Earhart was at the banquet of the opening of the Stevens Hotel. She was the principle speaker there. It was a weeknight and my folks took me to that event and introduced me to her after her talk. Her comment was, “You’re out awfully late on a school night, young man.” It was probably 7:30 – I don’t know.

Smith: You got a gift from Charles Lindbergh?

Stevens: Well, yes. I remember my dad taking me to the room during his tour of the country after he came back from Paris. He took me up to his room in the Stevens Hotel. The room – a suite – was just filled with gifts of one kind or another. He showed us this dove in a cage and I remember him saying to me, “What do I do with this?” I don’t know what the conversation was, but he ended up giving it to us. So we took it up to Michigan where my dad had a summer home and, unfortunately, it found its freedom up there. It only stayed with us for a couple of weeks.

Smith: You also, at a very young age – went to the 1932 Democratic convention.

Stevens: Right.

Smith: How did that come about?

Stevens: I don’t know just what he did, but even though my dad was a Republican, somehow or the other he had friends who gave him a couple of tickets to the afternoon session, as I remember it, when Franklin Roosevelt accepted the nomination. I just remember being there, of course. I can’t remember much of what was being said, but the memory does stay with me.

Smith: Finally, you were also connected with Babe Ruth at Wrigley Field.

Stevens: I was one of several million people who claimed to be in the stands that day, but I actually was and he did indeed, point at the center field bleachers before he hit the ball out of the park in that event.

Smith: Your World War II experiences. It is interesting, obviously your part of a whole generation - Gerald Ford’s generation - and a number of people who have written about your career in the court suggest that it not only shaped your life, but in some ways, shaped your approach to the law. Do you think there is anything to that?

Stevens: Well, I’m sure there is. I don’t know that you could say it shaped it, exactly, but I’m sure it had a significant influence on everything that’s happened since. One can’t go through…

Smith: People, for example, have talked about the Greatest Generation’s sense of patriotism. They want to put a label on you – and either put you in the liberal wing or the civil libertarian wing. Then they run up against the flag burning decision...

Stevens: I think I was dead right in that case. I really think that there are people today who do not appreciate and understand the power that the symbol of the flag really can carry and did carry. It really was a symbol of a lot that’s very wonderful about our country. I think that every now and then there is sort of a – you get over-enthusiastic about the value of the first amendment – but prohibiting flag burning really didn’t prevent anybody from communicating any idea they wanted to communicate. I think that – and I’m not suggesting that we should change the law. It’s part of our law now, that’s well settled – but I think the only real significance and tangible events of the decisions was, nobody burns flags anymore.
Smith: It’s also been suggested, for example, that since you were awarded for your work as a cryptographer, perhaps your attitude about the death penalty has something to do with Admiral Yamamoto being targeted as he was.

Stevens: Well, in a very remote way, it does because I do remember the occasion very well. I was on duty when we got word that the operation had been successful. And the difference between having some unnamed person in some other location lose his life or be killed is quite different from the reaction you have to a particular individual who is singled out for that treatment. It is something I’ve often thought about. As I understand it, I think the decision to carry out the operation was only made after getting the approval of the president, of Franklin Roosevelt.

Smith: You had not originally intended to go into the law.

Stevens: That’s correct.

Smith: What did you envision after the war – what your career path might be?

Stevens: Well, my original expectation was to try and teach English. There was a lot of vacillation back and forth. But two or three things influenced me during the war, and one of the things was the GI Bill, very frankly. Being able to afford it. One of my older brothers, who was already a lawyer, was very influential in my decision.

Smith: Obviously, it was the right decision. You scored the highest gpa in the history of the law school.

Stevens: Well, I’ve been told that – as of that time in Northwestern Law School. I’ve been told that that was true at the time. I can’t verify it, though.

Smith: Then was that followed by your clerkship with Justice Rutledge?

Stevens: Yeah. I was down here for a year working for him.

Smith: It’s funny, I was trying to put myself in Gerald Ford’s shoes when he saw he had a vacancy in the court – you really have had a remarkably varied career, in the sense that you were in private practice, but you also had some Capitol Hill experience.
Stevens: Yes, I did and really, that was terribly important to me. I was the associate counsel appointed by the senior Republican, Chauncey Reed, on the sub-committee to study monopoly power of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. A long title. But actually, I was sort of co-counsel because the work was not of a very partisan nature, as it developed, although some of the preliminaries thought it might be. But we had some very interesting investigations, one of which was of organized baseball. I learned a lot about baseball during that tenure. And I met people like Branch Rickey, Ty Cobb, Mickey Mantle, Ford Frick, and that helped maintain my interest in the game.

Smith: I’m curious – I have to wonder – this is the early 1950’s, I think 1951 actually. At that point Gerald Ford was a young Congressman. Do ever remember whether your paths ever crossed?

Stevens: No, I’m quite sure they never did cross until shortly before I was appointed.

Smith: Then you came back to Chicago, you formed your own law firm.

Stevens: Yes

Smith: You taught and wrote very extensively, especially on anti-trust matters. You were a litigator, and then, were at least on the periphery Illinois politics with the Greenburg Commission. What was the Greenburg Commission?

Stevens: There was a gentleman by the name of Sherman Skolnick who had some kind of – today it would on the internet of some kind – but he communicated with the press and with people generally complaining about the integrity of the judiciary in all sorts of ways. And he brought litigation against the city of Chicago – against all sorts of defendants. And every now and then he came up with something that made a lot of sense. Most of what he did was regarded as irresponsible and off the reservation, and so forth. But he suspected that some members of the Illinois Supreme Court had improperly received some benefits from Ted Isaacs, who was the Director of Revenue of Illinois and who was indicted on a conflict of interest charge. Eventually he was exonerated by the Illinois Supreme Court, and there was a suspicion that his relationship with two or three members of the court might have affected the case.
And so, although most of Skolnick’s charges were often thought to be unfounded and so forth, there was enough smoke here so that the Illinois Supreme Court appointed the president of the Chicago Bar Association and the president of the Illinois Bar Association, Henry Pitts - the Pitts-Greenburg Commission. They were to form a commission to investigate the integrity of the judgment in the Isaacs case. They asked me to serve as General Counsel of the investigation, which I agreed to do in a brief telephone call, and found myself involved in a very interesting and difficult public inquiry for a matter of several weeks.

Smith: The outcome of that was?

Stevens: Well, the outcome of that was that we wrote a report which concluded that they had been guilty of an appearance of impropriety because one of two justices had been given an opportunity to buy stock in a bank that Isaacs had formed at a bargain rate, and the other one had received shares in the bank as what was described to be a campaign contribution, but then it turned out to be a gift to his grandchildren. There were equivocal facts there, but the net result was that they decided to resign after we published our report. We had public hearings – it was kind of a long story.

Smith: What I’m getting at – you had a lot of, for lack of a better cliche, what would be called “real world” experience…

Stevens: Well, I guess that’s true. Yes.

Smith: - long before you came to the Court. The popular notion of this as a cloister of people who move from one hushed chamber to a higher hushed chamber is not borne out in your case.

Stevens: No, I was fortunate to have a very diverse private practice. Our firm was diverse, we had a Catholic, a Jew and a Protestant. We had a Northsider, a Westsider and a Southsider, and we represented plaintiffs and defendants. We had small matters and we had important matters that we worked on.

Smith: Then in 1970 President Nixon appointed you to the Seventh Circuit. I don’t know how to ask you this – in Rome there are what are called papabili – potential popes - and I think in the latter stages of the pontificate they all know who they are, or who they think they are. I’m not asking about you in particular, but is there a similar phenomenon on the bench? Where there are judges who, accurately or not, I’m not saying they’re campaigning for the court - but or perceive themselves as potential justices?

Stevens: Well, I don’t know, but my appointment really came out of the blue. Senator Percy, at that time, I’m not as familiar with what the process is today as compared to what was then, but, in 1970 the Senator pretty much controlled the appointment – judges are appointed with the advise and consent of the Senate – and that basically means that the Senator is given the right to veto – and at that time the Illinois Senator could veto the President’s appointment of the senator. So it was Senator Percy who was making judicial appointments in Illinois, and that, of course included the vacancy on the court of appeals.

I had known Senator Percy in college – we were classmates in college. I hadn’t seen him for a good many years, but one day he called me up – sort of out of the blue – and said he wanted to have a visit with me and could I meet him? I met him at the Ambassador Hotel on a Saturday or Sunday, I think, and he said he wanted to get my advice about the vacancies and we talked about some people and then he asked me whether I’d be interested. That’s the first suggestion that came up. I told him, I thought probably not because I had couple of rather important pieces of litigation that were very much alive then and my practice was just getting to the point where it was important to practice law rather than do something else. Anyway, our conversation developed into his suggestion that he would appoint me if I would accept the job. I thought it over and decided to accept it.

Smith: And then, of course, five years later comes the call. First of all, did you know Justice Douglas – did you have any kind of relationship with him?

Stevens: Well, yes and no. I had met him when I was a law clerk and he had a reputation as friendly Bill Douglas, and I guess he was very much liked by a large number of people, but among the law clerks he was regarded as a rather stern taskmaster, generally. As I said, I had met him and spoken to him, but I can’t say that we had a friendly relationship, by any means. And then I did meet him after I was appointed. He retained his chambers and I spent some time talking to him then. But that’s about the extent of our connection.

Smith: There is story about one of the Douglas law clerks who was fired for going away on his honeymoon – I think he went for a weekend honeymoon. And then supposedly there was a corner of the law clerks’ library that was set aside for all of Justice Douglas’ fired clerks who were waiting to be rehired when the Justice’s mood lightened.

Stevens: I hadn’t heard that story but it is consistent with the stories that I have heard.

Smith: How was the first approach made with you that led eventually to your appointment? First, tell us about Ed Levi.

Stevens: Well, he was a contemporary of one of my older brothers and I had known him – just known him. I wouldn’t say we were close friends or anything of that nature – but when I was in practice, on two or three different occasions he had sent me business and for people who had called him and asked for recommendations and he had suggested my name and I got some very interesting work as a result of that. So we had contacts. And then shortly after we started our firm, he asked me take his anti-trust course at the University of Chicago Law School on a temporary basis because he had assumed additional responsibilities as Dean of the Law School. So I did that and I taught a course in competition and monopoly with Aaron Director, who was a very fine economist. I probably learned more in that course than in most of the courses I had during law school. Then he asked me also to teach another course in patents and anti-trust at the law school. I had seen him in professional occasions, and so forth and I would regard him definitely as a friend, but I was always a great fan of his. He had a great reputation as a scholar and everybody admired him. But we were not – we didn’t go out to lunch every day or anything like that.

Smith: Was he the person who recommended your name to President Ford?

Stevens: I think so. I know he participated in the process and I think also that he arranged the occasion when I first met President Ford and that was I think during the few days after Douglas resigned. They had a dinner at the White House, at which they invited the chief federal judges from all the different circuits and several judges in Washington and a few other judges – it just seemed to be sort of a spontaneous entertainment of federal judges at the White House. But there were several people there, some of whom I then knew and have since learned were under consideration to fill the vacancy. It was at that dinner that I first met President Ford.

Smith: Was Justice Douglas attending?

Stevens: No, I’m quite sure he was not. But some members of the court were, and I just don’t remember for sure which ones were there – I think probably Potter Stewart was there, but I really don’t remember just exactly who all was there.

Smith: Did you have any other rivals – for lack of a better word – on the Seventh Circuit? Were there other judges being considered?

Stevens: Yes, my very good friend Phil Tone. He was a very fine judge and he clerked for Wiley Rutledge the year after I did. He was reading the newspapers, reading the Tribune when we learned that we were among the group that was being considered. Have I told you the story about our conversation about this? I did mention it in Grand Rapids, I think. But in any event, we met one afternoon, we were talking about the problems. It’s kind of a distraction from your regular work when you know that the lightning might strike.

We had agreed that if either of us heard anything from Washington, we’d tell the other one, so we would know what happened. When President Ford called me, he asked me - he said he wanted to be sure I’d accept the nomination, which of course, I was honored and delighted to do. He called me in the morning – it was the day after Thanksgiving, I think, and at the end of our conversation he said, “We’re not going to announce this until late this afternoon, so I would like you not to tell anybody until then.” I said, “Well, Mr. President, it puts me in an awkward position.” I explained our agreement, and of course he knew about Judge Tone. He said, “Well, I’m sure if you explained…” and I said, “I would like to tell him,” and he said, “Well, I’m sure if you explain later why you didn’t do it, he’ll understand.” And so I did not talk to Judge Tone, but at about 4:30 in the afternoon, if I remember correctly, maybe 4:30 eastern time, I got a call from somebody in the White House. I don’t know for sure who it was. I think it may have been Phil Buchen in retrospect. He said that the President asked him to call me to tell me I could tell Judge Tone now. Which I thought kind of shows you what kind of a person the president was to be that thoughtful about a personal relationship. So I hung up the phone and I got up to go to see Phil and he walked in my door. He’d already heard the rumor. So the whole thing didn’t matter. But I remember that very well because I thought it gives you an insight about the kind of man that President Ford was.

Smith: Now in between those two events I assume you met with the President for a job interview?

Stevens: Only at the dinner that I described.

Smith: Really?

Stevens: And I did not meet, and I had no conversation whatsoever with Ed Levi or anybody else in the White House.

Smith: No one talked to you about your judicial philosophy?

Stevens: No. But the interesting thing I learned later is that, and the President said this, among others, that a lot of people read all of my opinions. I think he said he read either all or most of them. I know that the senator from Nebraska, who said we’ve got to appoint an average person once in a while…

Smith: Oh “mediocre”…Senator Hruska?

Stevens: He read a good many of my opinions. I don’t think he was quite as mediocre a man as people described him. He was really a very knowledgeable and intelligent senator. I had some conversations with him. He read my opinions. The judgment, as far as I can tell was made basically on the record that I had made in my opinions on the court of appeals.

Smith: That’s extraordinary – in light of how the process has evolved – some would say degenerated – or certainly been politicized since. First of all, you were confirmed 98-0.
Stevens: I was confirmed fairly promptly, yeah.

Smith: Yeah, by a vote 98-0. Were you the last justice to be confirmed unanimously?

Stevens: No, I think – I’m not positive – I think Stephen Breyer was confirmed – I think it may have been 100-0. Mine was only 98-0.

Smith: It seems like a turning point in the process. Obviously I don’t want to cast aspersions on your successors, but that a president would choose a justice with so little seeming regard for politics/ideology – as opposed to sheer judicial excellence – however that’s defined.

Stevens: Well, I’ve been told that part of the president’s motivation was to pick someone who would not be too controversial, because he was still in the process of getting the country back on track after Watergate. So I think that it was not totally apolitical in that sense. I think he thought about other factors.

Smith: Did anyone, at that time, ask your opinion on abortion, for example?

Stevens: No, and it is interesting. I’d like to just tell you – you might be interested in one side of it. That was not a controversial issue at the time – at least in terms of the nomination process. Nobody asked a question about it at the hearings. There was no discussion about it generally in the press, or anything. The big question was the death penalty, which was very controversial and the Court had decided Furman only two or three years earlier and held that the penalty – the then existing statutes unconstitutional – but that’s about the time that Justice Thomas was in law school, if I’m not mistaken. When he went through the process, a lot of people did not believe that he was not engaged in bull sessions about Roe against Wade over and over again. But in fact, at that time, it had not yet become the kind of controversial issue that it has since become. See, because the decision was 7-2 and was regarded as the substantive due process decision that kind of fell in line with the earlier decision in Griswold and it didn’t become the debatable question that it has since.

Smith: By the way, in my notes, I noticed Barry Goldwater urged Ford to appoint Robert Bork to the Court and Mrs. Ford wanted him to choose a woman.
Stevens: Yes, I think that’s right. I think the thing that worked against Bob Bork was the fact that he had done what the job required him to do during the Saturday Night Massacre – and he would have been a fine appointment – no doubt about it.

Smith: Ford himself wrote later – in terms of explaining your appointment, “I endorse his Constitutional views on the secular character of the establishment clause and the free exercise clause, while securing procedural safeguards in criminal cases and on the Constitution’s broad grant of regulatory authority to Congress.” And I know from conversations I had with him, he took – to the end of his life – great pride in your selection.

Stevens: That’s good to hear.

Smith: He was very proud of that appointment.

Stevens: Well, I’m proud to have been appointed by him, I can assure you.

Smith: There must have been stories around this place about the not-so-old days, when presidents had continuing relationships with members of this court. I mean, people like Abe Fortas and Lyndon Johnson and even, I guess, Frankfurter and Roosevelt and all that. Presumably that was a thing of the past by the time you got there.

Stevens: As far as I know. I’ve heard the same stories that others have – but can’t either confirm nor deny.

Smith: You’re a pilot, and you once said your secret ambition was to get Jerry Ford to take a ride in your airplane – “Any plane that contains the President becomes Air Force One, so I would be able to call the tower and say ‘This is Air Force One.’”

Stevens: That’s exactly right – I didn’t know I’d acknowledged that publicly, but it’s certainly a thought that went through my mind many, many times. I never had the guts to ask him. I think he would have had the sense to turn me down, too.

Smith: When did you take up piloting?
Stevens: I think in the 1960’s somewhere – when I was in my forties. I had a place, at that time, in southern Michigan, in Lakeside in Berrien County and I planned to learn to fly so I could fly to Meigs Field and back during the summer, when I had my family in Michigan. I was then able to get a small plane and go back and forth that way.

Smith: It’s customary in this town to put a label on people. At the time of your appointment you were described by many as a moderate-conservative. I’m not sure what that means – then or now – but you’ve said more recently that you still think of yourself, in many ways, as a judicial conservative.

Stevens: Oh definitely.

Smith: Explain that.

Stevens: Well, I believe the law is the law and a judge’s duty is to follow the law. And I really think that is what I do, and I think some of my colleagues are less conservative than I am. It’s not a matter of whether the case involves a political outcome that liberals or conservatives favor – that’s not what the law is all about. My good friend, Bill Bauer, was former chief judge on the Seventh Circuit and he showed me an article when I was in Chicago a couple of weeks ago that somebody had written about the fact that he described me as the only conservative on the court.

Smith: Really?

Stevens: Yeah. It was a case or cases about decisions involving the SEC and securities matters.

Smith: One reason why maybe people called you a moderate-conservative, I think you’d been quoted as saying that you had a judicial hero. Obviously you greatly admired Justice Rutledge – but you mentioned Potter Stewart’s name as someone you greatly admired.

Stevens: That’s exactly right.

Smith: And there’s your quintessential centrist – Eisenhower, Ford…
Stevens: That’s absolutely true. In fact, when I came down to the court, the papers sometimes described me as never having been reversed by the court of appeals - remember by the Supreme Court, in the opinions I’d written on the court of appeals. In a technical sense that was true, but there were several cases in which I’d taken a position that the court later disagreed with. And so, in a sense, I was wrong. But the Supreme Court decides what was right. But in all the cases on which I had written and which the Supreme Court also wrote later, I’d always agreed with Potter Stewart. I don’t argue with him, or he agreed with me. But it struck me when I came down here that he was the one who seemed most often to coincide with my own. And I still have extraordinary admiration for him. Of course the death penalty jurisprudence is always very controversial, but my views are pretty much, just almost identical with his on that whole issue.

Smith: What are the qualities that make a ‘judge’s judge”? If Potter Stewart is an example?

Stevens: I don’t know. It is just to try to do the best you can with the rules that are out there and not trying to decide everything yourself – but trying to recognize that there are a lot of other decision makers in society that have to be respected.

Smith: Let’s go back to the ’99 visit when you came to Grand Rapids. I remember asking President Ford – I think that morning I said, “Now when was the last time you talked with the Justice?” And he said, “When I appointed him.” Did you have contact at all in between those years?

Stevens: Well, it’s not quite accurate, because I did go to one or two White House dinners – and you have a very brief chance to talk with the President. I don’t remember any specifically, but I think we had that kind of contact. But it was always very brief.

Smith: Then in 1999, you were good enough to come to Grand Rapids. Correct me if I’m wrong, I’d heard through the grapevine that you’d always wanted to play golf with the man who appointed you. How did that come to pass?
Stevens: Well, there is a bankruptcy judge in Grand Rapids named Jim Gregg, whom I’d gotten to know and become friends with through the Sixth Circuit judicial conferences, and he is an avid golfer. Somehow or other he made the arrangement, I don’t know the details, but when he suggested it to me, I was delighted with the idea and the President was willing to do it and we did share a golf cart for a round of golf. It was one of the best days of my life. He was a very, very delightful companion, and that was a very special day. But I wish we would have been doing that for many years before, but, in fact, he hadn’t.

Smith: He came all the way from California to introduce you that day.

Stevens: I didn’t know that.

Smith: He did. He came all the way from California, which again is one more bit of evidence, needless to say, just how much he valued your service and prided himself on his good judgment. Do you remember – was that just kind of a social conversation on the golf course.

Stevens: Oh, for the most part, yes. I don’t remember the details other than we had a good time together. And I know that on the last hole I sank a long curling putt to tie the score in our match. We were opponents, actually. We rode together in the cart, but in the foursome we were opponents. We had a good time.

Smith: Was that the last time you had any real contact with him?

Stevens: I think so.

Smith: Let me ask you one other thing, because, again I trust you’ll let me know if I’m treading on thin ice here. I ask it in the context of his influence, real or imagined. I don’t know if you’ve read Jeffrey Toobin’s book on the Court, but Toobin has a chapter on affirmative action. The President wrote in 1999 an Op Ed piece that appeared in the New York Times.

Stevens: I think I read it.

Smith: Which described the Michigan situation in very personal terms. The fact that his best friend had been a black football player/teammate, so on and so on. And it caused a good deal of stir, and some criticism as you might imagine.
But anyway, the thing that struck me in the book, I think there was also some effort that grew out of it [the Op-Ed piece] to call attention to the service academies and how they dealt with these issues. Toobin cited this and attributed it as a factor, at least, in, for example, Justice O’Connor’s reconsideration of the issue. I’m not trying to pry, but I’m asking – do you take notice of things like that? Is something like that a factor?

Stevens: I think what you’re more directly referring to is the fact that I think that I’ve been told that President Ford was influential in having the amicus brief prepared on behalf of the Armed Services. A brief that was written by Carter Phillips, if I remember correctly. It was a very strong brief and I think, although it doesn’t often work this way, I think it was an amicus brief that was very influential in the consideration of the case. So, whether it affected Justice O’Connor’s vote or not, I really don’t know. But just my general recollection of the case is that it did highlight an important aspect of the whole issue that we all paid special attention to.

Smith: And your own views on affirmative action have evolved, haven’t they, over time? Or how would you describe it?

Stevens: That’s probably a longer story than we have time for, but there are some awfully important distinctions that are not often focused on in talking about affirmative action generally.

Smith: It’s a roving term, isn’t it?

Stevens: It’s a roving term and there’s a vast difference between action to create remedies for past wrongs, on the one hand, and actions that you think will benefit society on the other hand. I think I may have been the first member on the Court to emphasize that particular distinction in the case arising out of, I think Michigan, if I’m not mistaken, involving school teachers. There is also a vast difference between affirmative action in connection with building highways and concrete blocks, on the one hand, and educating people on the other hand. These cases are not fungible. And so, what seems, sometimes seems to be changes in one’s views, actually is application of the same basic view to a very different situation. And so I’ll just leave it at that.
Smith: That’s fine. Couple of quick things and I’ll let you go.

When the President died, I guess the whole Court was in attendance –at the State funeral up at the cathedral?

Stevens: Yes, indeed.

Smith: You must have felt a particular closeness on that day.

Stevens: I did. I flew up from Florida. I was in Florida then – to attend the services.

Smith: And then, of course, earlier this year you were honored at the annual meeting of the Ford Foundation.

Stevens: Yes.

Smith: What was the story of that?

Stevens: They asked me to attend and, of course, I was honored to do that. I actually attended that in preference to an affair here at the Court, I don’t remember what it was. It was very gratifying to be invited to that event.

Smith: Last thing. Apart from the unique and historic relationship that you had, just as someone who has been around this town a long time, how do you think people should remember Gerald Ford?

Stevens: Oh, I think they should remember he was a really great president. A man with really good judgment and with the courage of his convictions. One thing I’ll brag about – I’m kind of proud of it. When he pardoned President Nixon, I was on the Seventh Circuit. I remember going to lunch with my colleagues and, of course, that was the topic of conversation. And with two exceptions, my colleagues were dead set against what was done. Bill Bauer and I, I can still remember, said, no, it makes an awful lot of sense in the long run, think about…In fact, people have said that that’s what cost Ford the election. I think that may have actually improved his status in the election because it made the country better, so much better off, to put this all behind us. That he may actually have not directly recognized the causal connection, but I think it actually enhanced his strength in the country.
Smith: That’s fascinating because we’ll never know what the state of the country would have been if we’d spent two years with Richard Nixon on trial.

Stevens: That’s right.

Smith: You just can’t imagine.

Stevens: I think it was a very important decision and one that was dead right.

Smith: Well, on that note, I can’t thank you enough. This has been great.

Stevens: I’ve enjoyed it very much.

Smith: You started the golf tournament here. How did that come about?

Purcell: I had a tournament before that called the Eagle County Scholarship Fund Tournament and I had met the President on the first tee probably in the early 70’s, ’71 or ’72, at the Vail course. And he filled in with us.

Smith: This was before he was president?

Purcell: Yes, before. I remember asking him what he did because he filled in our usual foursome when one didn’t show. He said, “I’m a congressman.” And I said, “Oh are you? Where?” “Michigan.” And I said, “That’s great. Come on, we’ve got a game here.” And then he started coming to my restaurant.

Smith: What’s the name of that?

Purcell: Purcell’s. Its Montauk’s now, but was Purcell’s.

Smith: And this is in Vail?

Purcell: Well, actually, it’s in Lion’s Head. But anyways, when he was president, he called me. I was running this tournament and he called and asked if he could come and bring somebody. I said, “Sure!” It was Lee Elder, the golf pro, and the African-American who became a friend of mine. And he came out and played. So, we’re sitting around, having a cocktail then and I came up with the idea that, “Next year, why don’t we call it the Gerald Ford?” “Go ahead, John. Do what you like.” And we did and the tournament it went through the roof. I’ve played in the Bob Hope. I’ve played in the Bing Crosby and all those tournaments and we had as many celebrities here in those days. So, that’s how we all got started and that’s how I met him.

Smith: What’d he talk about on the golf course?

Purcell: Oh, we didn’t talk too much about anything. Winning and gambling. It was golf, golf.
Smith: I guess golf is an opportunity to clear your head of all that other stuff.

Purcell: I think that’s a good way to put it. So, I’ve had some great times with the man and a lot of people don’t know that.

Smith: Well, we’ve been told from very good authority: a) he thought the world of you, and b) most of the time he really appreciated your sense of humor. That’s an important thing in getting a sense of anyone - what they will or won’t laugh at. Tell me about his sense of humor and how you took advantage of it.

Purcell: I think you know more than you’re coming off with here. Well, I’ll back up, if I may.

Smith: Absolutely.

Purcell: A few months before he passed on, he wanted to see me, so I flew down to Palm Springs. I was supposed to have fifteen minutes with him according to Penny Circle, just because he’s not feeling well and everything. So, I went in there.

Smith: Was this at the home?

Purcell: At the home. And, actually, it was at his home office.

Smith: The study in the house.

Purcell: Yeah. And I walked in and saluted him and he always kidded me about that. He said, “It was about time you saluted me. I was the Commander-in-Chief.” And then it started. We sat down and I kept an eye on my watch and all he wanted to talk about was the old times and things that I did to him or pulled on him as a joke. The fifteen minutes cut off and I got up and said, “Well, Mr. President, I guess I’ve got to leave. It was nice to—” “Where are you going?” “Well, you’ve got things to do.” “No, I don’t. Sit down. We’ve got to talk.” So, an hour and a half later, I’m still there with him laughing at me about some of the jokes I pulled and what happened. And, if I may, my favorite - and this one’s hard to believe - but fortunately I have a witness to the fact that this happened. Have you run into Major Bob Barrett?
Smith: Oh, I’ve known Bob for years. We did great of interview with Bob.

Purcell: He lives near me in Jupiter, Florida. In fact, I just talked to him last week. He was a Major then, a Major in the Army, and he was President Ford’s military aide. So, President Ford asked if I wanted to fly with him around. He was going to campaign at that time. And so I thought, “Wow, that’d be great.” So he picked me up in Air Force One somewhere. I think I met him somewhere in Chicago or something like that. Then we flew to Portland and we had some laughs there. And then, flying out of Portland, we went to Medford, Oregon. And then out of Medford, Oregon, we were going to fly to El Toro Marine Base.

I was sitting up with the pilots in the jump seat and the co-pilot got up to do something. The head guy, the pilot, said, “John, sit down,” so I sat down. I’m a private pilot, not with many hours, but I have my own little plane. He asked me if I wanted to fly it and I said, “Yeah, that’d be great.” That isn’t to say he was asleep. He had his hand on the controls and I was making turns and changed altitude. Then we got close to San Diego and he wrote down on papers and handed me these papers.

At that time, I was calling the approach control and Bob Barrett came into the cockpit. He looked, he was standing there and I’m like that and he leaves. Then he goes back in and tells the President, “You know, Purcell’s flying the plane.” “Okay.” So, I get out of the seat and the co-pilot gets in. We land and the co-pilot gets out and opens the door and I sit back in his seat. I’m sitting here like this and I put the Colonel’s hat on. I’ve got a pink and white golf shirt on and I’ve got this big helmet, a Colonel hat on. And I’m sitting and he’s shutting her down and all of a sudden, the cockpit door opens and it’s President Ford. He walks in and then looks at me and says, “John, great landing.” And the Colonel, the pilot, I look over at him and he goes like this, like ‘Oh, my God, what’s this guy know?’

So, he laughed about that one. Of course, people, when I tell this story, say, “Come on, you weren’t.” “I was, but if you don’t believe this, ask Bob Barrett.” But those things and other things the President let me get away with because I did a lot of stupid things and he laughed at them.
Again, if I can continue, fast forward. He ended up calling me one time when they came into Vail. I was down at my restaurant and he said, “John, how about dinner tonight? Betty is at a social event, so why don’t you and I have dinner?” “Oh, okay, I’ll pick you up at 6:30” or something. “Alright.” And so, I hung up and then I did my usual 10, 9, 8, 7, 6, 5, 4, 3, – ring. It’s the Secret Service. “John.” “Yeah.” I don’t think it was Larry Buendorf, but it could’ve been Larry and those guys because he was there on his detail. He said, “Where are you taking him?” So, I thought a minute and I said, “Well, first of all, I think I’ll take him to Donovan’s Copper Bar,” which was not a bar. And he said, “You’re not going to take the President there.” “Oh, he’ll love it.” The President comes down and picks me up and we go right across from the Red Lion - a friend of mine owned it.

We walk in and it’s packed. It’s in the summer time where the good old boys with the cigarettes rolled up in their sleeves and the hard hats. He strolls up to the bar and he looks at the bartender and everything quiets down and it’s packed. And he goes, “Bartender, buy the house a round.” I’m behind him and right at the barstool, he’s wedged in between two guys. One of the guys right to his right keeps looking up at him, keeps looking at him, and I watch him. He’s going to, you know, and pretty soon, he’s wearing a yellow hard hat on his head and he touches the President and the President says, “Yes, can I help you, son?” “Would you sign my hard hat?” And he signed the hard hat and I would suggest today that hard hat is hanging somewhere. But it was funny the way he just went in there.

Smith: I tell you, it’s a real counter to his reputation as someone who was fiscally conservative.

Purcell: Yes.

Smith: Not a big tipper as a rule.

Purcell: Yeah, but he was a lot of laughs and we had a lot of fun together and it was just amazing. My biggest thrill, when we were there, was not the “I’m-with-the-President” type of attitude, but it was people that never had an opportunity, and I’d say, “You got a minute?” And, “Joe here’s Mr. President Ford.” “Really?!!” And so that’s the thing I got out of it, but there was some others. He came to me one time and said, “John, it’s come to my attention that my daughter Susan has been drinking in your bar.” Well, I kind of knew it. She was 16 then and a friend would buy a margarita and then she’d take a drink. Well, the Secret Service were there and they probably said, “Well, hey, look.” And, I’ll never forget it. I was there and I was trying to keep from laughing, but I said, “You know, Mr. President, I’m going to check into that. I don’t know!” But I knew and then I go and said, “Susan, you’re getting my butt reamed.” And pretty soon, we stopped that.

I remember on my 45th birthday, he was involved in a surprise birthday party and it was at the Marriott and a friend of mine owned that, Kaiser Morcus. A friend was at my bar and said, “Gee, nobody’s here. Let’s go and have a drink at the Marriott.” And as I was walking down the corridor, there he was standing out in front. I go, “Hi, Mr. President. How are you doing?” “I’m doing okay. What are you doing?” “I’m over here with Dick.” “Well, you can’t come in here. This is a private party.” I go, “No, I’m not trying to do that.” He really got me because I was really taken. Then he looked at me and got me in a hold around the neck. He yanks me into the room and there’s 50, 60 people singing happy birthday. But he pulled it off. It was something stupid I would do, but he got me up on that one.

Smith: I also understand that you and Bob Barrett have experience in domestic service.

Purcell: Domestic service? Uh oh.

Smith: Dressing up, perhaps, as maids?

Purcell: Oh, God. Yes. I don’t really remember that too much. But yeah.

Smith: Was this at the White House?

Purcell: Uhm, yeah, we did that at the White House. We did some funny things at the White House. I tell you what was in my memory. I was in the Oval Office, sitting there. There was a coffee table and a big sofa and then his desk was up there. I remember being there and he was on the phone with Brent Scowcroft, General Scowcroft, and Kissinger and, oh, I’ve forgotten the other name. In fact, he’s been in the news the last couple of years.

Smith: Rumsfeld?

Purcell: Rumsfeld, or as the President would call him, Rummy. And this is what was going down. I remember sitting there listening to him. He was saying about the Mayaguez incident, when the Cambodians captured the ship. He’s on the phone, they had a conference call, and I’m sitting there listening to it and he goes, “I want those B-52s in the air. And I ain’t coming back empty-handed, Rummy. And you guys-” He’s just really on them and he’s saying “I’m going in there and getting them.” I’m looking down on the coffee table now and I’m doing this trying not to look. It said ‘Top Secret.’ I’m going “Whoops”, so I was getting up and thinking, “I’d better get out of here.” And he took a break and said, “John, sit down.” So, I’m sitting down like this and the joke was “I got to get out to the press room.” “Okay, guys, give me a little dough and I’ll tell you what’s going on.” But it was exciting to be there. Just by accident, I’m sitting in the Oval Office and I remember being in there with my feet up on the desk and had a cigar. I don’t smoke. And to have my feet up in the Oval Office and sitting back and he came in.

But, you know, he let me get away with all that and most of it is somewhat unbelievable, I guess. Some people might say, “Come on.” There was one little episode that we had in Sun Valley. We played in a tournament there, I forget the name of it, but a baseball player, Ralph Harding, I think. No, Ralph Harding was a congressman. I was there with Tip O’Neill and Bob Barrett, President Ford. So, we’re sitting in the carts, our cart and the President with Tip O’Neill. And Tip O’Neill is from Boston. I’ve got to watch myself – I’m starting to talk like this is about me, but it just shows some of the funny things that he let me get away with. And I sat there and I was looking. I looked down in the golf cart - where they put these drinks was five or six cigars. I’m sitting there and I say, “Mr. President” and he said, “Oh, those are Tip’s.” “Oh, okay.” So, anyway, Tip is out there and Ford gets up to do it and I grab the cigars and take the cigars. We get further on the second hole and he’s talking to President Ford and he says, “God dang it, Jerry. God. I left my cigars in the room. Aw damn.” I come in and I go, “Oh, Mr. Speaker, have one of mine.” Well, I did that for about three holes and Barrett tipped him off. And, on the last cigar, Tip O’Neill was telling about how great guys we are from Boston, Irish and everything. “Oh, yeah.” “Yeah, we stick together, kid.” And I look over and President Ford’s got his hand on his face and he’s shaking his head and he brought that up on my last meeting about that. The cigar trick, you know. “Oh, have one of mine,” and I’d stolen them.

Smith: He and Tip were clearly very close.

Purcell: Oh, as a matter of fact, Tip was sitting there talking like that and he was saying what kind of good friends they were and he said, “But, you know, when I get down in Congress, I’ll kick his ass just like anybody else. But he’s a good pal of mine, John.” And they were. It was a great relationship that they had.

Smith: Clearly, a relationship built on trust.

Purcell: Yeah.

Smith: Which is seemingly missing today. It’s not so much ideological differences as people just don’t trust each other.

Purcell: I know it. It seems that way, doesn’t it?

Smith: Let me ask you one thing because one of the banes of his existence - and I’m sure it’s true for any celebrity, certainly for former Presidents - was autograph seekers.

Purcell: Yes.

Smith: And my sense was he was very good about it most of the time, except when he saw the professionals, the collectors. And he could spot those, how did he handle his celebrity?

Purcell: Well, you know, I’m trying to think of any type of incident that happened when I was with him and the Secret Service were standing off. If I’d seen it and my relation grew to a point where I felt that I had the right to do it, “Excuse me, sir. Not now. He’s playing golf.” Or “No, sir, he’s having a drink or having dinner.” He’d be in my restaurant and I made sure no one bothered him, but he was really a generous guy on that. I mean, I don’t see any incident that he sloughed people off.

Smith: We talked to people who said one of the wonderful things about Vail – generally, this area - was that the locals tended to leave him alone.

Purcell: That’s a true story. That is true. They did. But, you know, I’ll sit there trying to think of some of the other funny things that he did and I’m drawing a blank.

Smith: Over those years, among other things, you saw he became friends with Jimmy Carter. That was something that no one could’ve predicted in ’76. There’s the famous incident when Bill Clinton came out and golfed here. Did he talk about Richard Nixon?

Purcell: You know, I guess I’ve got to be careful here, but I would tell you this and everybody would say remember, “Oh God, he pardoned Richard Nixon. God, that was awful.” And his whole philosophy was it was good for the whole country. My opinion - I don’t think he liked Richard Nixon. That’s the way I perceived it. So, when people would start bad rapping him for it, he didn’t like Richard Nixon, so that was no sweetheart deal.

Smith: You’re not the first person to say that. I’m wondering, because President Ford has reputed to have said in later years that Richard Nixon never thanked him for the pardon. That’s a revealing comment and Ford was such an honest guy, he was genuinely shocked that Nixon lied to him.

Purcell: Yeah. I couldn’t comment on whether he said that, but I think you’re right on some of the part there.

Smith: I’ve often thought whether in a curious sort of way, maybe one of the things that brought him and Jimmy Carter together was they’d both run against Ronald Reagan.

Purcell: Yeah.

Smith: They had that in common.
Purcell: He had a nephew that used to come out and had some liaison between him named Hugh Carter. And I got to know him a little bit. You know, it was an interesting relationship because at the funeral, Jimmy Carter was there and he spoke. And I sat there and it was quite nice what he said, you know. I mean, to take the time, because a lot of other people didn’t show up, but he did. That was interesting.

Smith: I can’t let you go without at least asking about the maids story.

Purcell: I don’t recall too much about that.

Smith: Okay.

Purcell: I don’t.

Smith: Does Barrett have these brainstorms or was it mutual spontaneous combustion?

Purcell: Yes! It was Barrett’s fault! Yes, I think that occurred at Bass House. I don’t remember. Oh, God. But, if I could stray just a second, again, I want to apologize for talking about myself and Barrett, but just to show you how ridiculous some of the stuff was. Bill Gulley, did that name ever come up to you?

Smith: Yes.

Purcell: He was the head of all the Air Force One and he was a Sergeant Marine and had his office at the White House. So, Barrett and I were always kind of playing funny jokes on him and Ford was always laughing, you know, are we going to get Gulley? I said, “Yeah.” So, we went in. Now, people you didn’t want, we found a ladder and we got up into the ceiling of the White House. It was this big and they had a little ramp down there, a walkway, so we walked down and figured out where Gulley was sitting back with his feet up on the desk watching a Notre Dame game. So, the ceiling was about, I’m going to guess, twelve feet and we found where his office was and pulled out the tile. Bob had me by the feet and I was hanging down through. Now, President Ford’s version of this is a little different. So, I’m hanging down and I go, “What’s the score?” Gulley looks around like this, “Notre Dame’s getting killed!” Looks up and goes, “Jesus! What are you doing?” And we pulled back.

Smith: Hi jinks.

Purcell: I mean, we acted like teenagers. You know, we’d just run around the place and then Ford invited me to a state dinner. Now, that’s the joke, you know. I mean, me at a state dinner? I remember him calling me and saying, “You want to come back for the Prime Minister of Ireland?” “Me? Okay!” So, I go back and I stayed with them, but the table he put me at - I’m sitting with the Kennedys.

Smith: Really?

Purcell: Yeah, I go, “How’d I get in here?” But, he took care of me like that. With Teddy and Caroline and a couple other guys, but it was a big thrill to say, “Well, I’ve been to a state dinner.” But it was only because of Ford. Why would he go out of his way to do it? But he was always trying to pull the wool over my eyes, too.

Smith: Really?

Purcell: Well, yeah, in a lot of things. I mean, it’s been so long that I forget some of them.

Smith: I guess, a better idea of his sense of humor, because his reputation was of someone who wasn’t a natural joke teller. But he would laugh at someone else’s joke.

Purcell: Yeah. Yeah, he would. It was just fun, the things we did. And we raised a lot of money for all those charities that we had and everything.

Smith: And then he decided after, I guess, twenty years to end it.

Purcell: Yes, I left after twelve and Bob Barrett took it over and he ran it. You know, it ran its course. It’s just a great time. I took a lot of my time and traveled talking to the pros and stuff. Jack Nicklaus was a big help to me.

Smith: They were really friends, weren’t they?
Purcell: Yeah, they became friends through the Ford tournament. Jack and I still play a little golf. He lives near me. In fact, I’m going July 24th to his 50th anniversary. Have you talked to Nicklaus?

Smith: We have not, no. That’s someone we should talk to.

Purcell: You should, because every time I call him, well, he moved here because of it. He had a home right here, a big log home. And I could call him on President Ford and he’d say, “Oh, yeah, I’m there.” In fact, to show you what kind of a good friend he is, he called, and with Ford, I had, I guess, the privilege of him calling me when I was going to the funeral and he said, “If you want, you can ride up with me.” I was making my reservations to fly up to the funeral and I rode up in Jack’s Gulfstream, which was nice. And he was a pall bearer. But he’s got some stories and I know if you’d call him, he’d be an interesting guy to talk to. If you have any trouble, I’ll talk to him. And if you have the time, he’s in Palm Beach, but he’s a very accommodating person.

Smith: That’s great.

Purcell: And it’d be some nice stuff to come out of there, I think.

Smith: Now, tell me, you must’ve gotten to know Mrs. Ford during this period as well.

Purcell: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Was there anything about her that surprised you as you first made her acquaintance?

Purcell: No, the great picture I sent back and the Secret Service went bonkers over it. She came down to the restaurant and I had a little motorcycle. I said, “Do you want to go ride the motorcycle?” She got on the back and I’m driving around on the motorcycle where they’re in the Secret Service. And she did that. But the one great statement that came out of Betty Ford was because of the Betty Ford Center and her knowing me, “You know, John, there’ll always be a bed for you at the Betty Ford Center.” So, I never took her up on it.

Smith: She had a great sense of humor.
Purcell: Oh, yeah. I mean, to hop on and she’s got a dress on and she’s riding on the back of my motorcycle and I’m going through Lion’s Head.

Smith: It’s funny because it’s a classic opposites attract. I mean, he was such a punctual guy, a stickler for it. And, of course, she was exactly the opposite.

Purcell: Yeah, I would say that seems to be a good analogy of them. I had some great times and, you know, when I come back to Vail now and naturally nothing ever stays the same. It’s got big buildings, big traffic problems. Then it was just a frontier town when we were here and we just did everything.

Smith: My sense is that they were very visible, very active, very much participants in the community.

Purcell: Oh yeah, there was never anything that “I can’t go there.” It was “We’re going to go to Pepe’s and sit on the porch and have a couple of drinks.” It was “Alright. I’ll meet you there.” And, a matter of fact, during the Ford tournament, I asked them if we could have one of the parties at his house, at the Bass House. “Sure!” So, we had 200 players. Here we go. And everybody’s at the Bass House and he’s hosting the thing. So, you know, it was just a great thrill.

Smith: Tell me about the house that they built, because we haven’t been there.

Purcell: Mitch Hoyt was the contractor. He built four homes there. Leonard Firestone’s, President Ford’s, Dee Keaton, and Kaiser Morcus, who I talked to last week. He lives in Palm Springs now.

Smith: Yes, we’ve talked to Kaiser.

Purcell: Did you? Yes, he’s a character and Ford had a lot of fun making fun of him. We put a little name on him. He’s about 5’4” and looks like Tattoo from Fantasy Island. You know, “The plane! The plane!” And even Ford was doing that to him, which was funny. But those four houses were built by Mitch Hoyt and they were big homes. They’re right here, as you know. It was neat to go there.

Smith: Did they do a lot of entertaining?
Purcell: You know, I can’t recall if they did.

Smith: For example, the World Forum, when that took place here, presumably there would be entertaining. And that’s another thing. You talk about opposites. I mean, politically, Jim Callaghan, who’s an old line from the Socialist Labor Party; Giscard, who’s kind of lofty and aristocratic and French; Helmut Schmidt who’s certainly far to the left of Ford politically and yet, they seemed to absolutely bond.

Purcell: You know, I couldn’t comment on that because, you know, I stayed away at certain events like that. That’s not me. “I’ll see you on the golf course.” I didn’t do that.

Smith: Was he sensitive to the whole caricature, the Chevy Chase thing? I mean, a guy who was such a natural athlete - did it bother him?

Purcell: I don’t think it did. You know, who was the Texan that was the vice president?

Smith: LBJ was the vice president under Kennedy.

Purcell: That’s right. He took a shot at him, too. I’ll never forget that, but here’s the fact of what kind of athlete he was. You couldn’t touch him off the tee when he was hitting it. It was always like as they kid ‘long and wrong’, but he could smack it. I mean, I got people that are good players that were going, “Sheesh.” His putter was his weak point.

Smith: Did he ever get a hole in one?

Purcell: I was with him when he did. He made a hole in one and I can’t recall, it might’ve been in Palm Springs. I can’t recall where it was, but it went left and hit a branch and kicked it right and it went in the hole. Needless to say, being the jerk I am, he had to buy the drinks. We didn’t let him off.

Smith: What was his reaction?

Purcell: Oh, God. At first he was kind of in shock. And then he started laughing. I go, “Thank God for that tree!” But I was with him. That was a lot of fun.
Smith: Did you see him around his kids?

Purcell: Yeah, he was a good dad. Susan and I became very good friends. In fact, I’ve seen her not too long ago and we talked. She moved from Albuquerque and now she’s living in, seems like, not Kentucky, but—

Smith: Oklahoma.

Purcell: Oklahoma. That’s right. And we talked about that, she had some health issues that were scary. But she was a lot of fun, too. I knew Mike and Jack, but Steve and I played a little golf. I remember we were down in Florida at Jupiter. And Barrett’s with me and Steve’s there and we’re in some bar right on the ocean and we decide to call his mother. And he calls and he says, “Mom, guess who I’m with?” and he hands me the phone. She says, “Oh, my God, my son’s with you and Barrett’s there?” “Yep.” “Oh, my God, not you two again!” That was one of the last things.

Smith: Have you had any contact with her since the President died?

Purcell: Nope.

Smith: Have you talked with her at all?

Purcell: I did at the funeral, but I was very standoffish. I came up and did my thing and backed off. I was more depressed than anybody at the thing. I just couldn’t handle it. I couldn’t handle it.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of public reaction that there was? You know, he’d been out of the public eye for awhile and yet, it almost seemed to build as the week went on.

Purcell: You know, I don’t know. I have to say because I was prejudiced and I’d expect that.

Smith: But it must’ve been nice to hear all the nice things that were said.

Purcell: Yes. You know, there was one thing I forgot to tell you about Jack Nicklaus on Gerald Ford. When Gerald Ford lost, you know, he’d lost Ohio by that much. And I’d seen Jack and he was visibly upset and he’s mad. And he said, “John, all I had to do was throw those golf clubs aside for thirty days and we would’ve won Ohio.” He was upset about not doing that. That really caught me because you don’t see Jack mad too much and he was mad.

Smith: That’s a great story. That last meeting you had with him, did you know that was going to be your last meeting?

Purcell: I walked out the door and I started thinking and I think I stood there and my wife was with me and I was upset. I was upset and she drove. I couldn’t drive. So, it looked not good to me. I kept saying, “You know, you always look back at things and say, ‘This will be the last time I’ll ever see this place’ or ‘This is the last time I’ll see them.’” You know, when you walk out of, like, Dee Keaton, you never heard of him, but I’ll tell you this and I would challenge anybody that would say it. Dee Keaton was President Ford’s hero and mine. This guy was one of the four, but he ran the Ford tournament and there was a lot about this man that was unbelievable.

Smith: Tell us about him.

Purcell: He’s passed on.

Smith: Yeah. Who was he and why was he significant?

Purcell: He was a guy that Ford got to know and he helped President Ford on many things. Politically, I don’t know, but I know that Dee Keaton knew Richard Nixon and helped him on his campaign. He wasn’t a political guy, but he was a very close friend to Leonard Firestone. And then he was an oil guy, became an oil guy, and he won the AT&T, the Bing Crosby in 1974 with Hale Irwin and he was a golfer and everything. But he was one of the most influential guys of my life and I think I can say that about the President what he thought about him. If it’s a problem “Let’s call Dee.” “Let Dee do that.” “Call Dee” on anything and Dee was there.

Smith: That’s interesting. Who were his friends?

Purcell: Uhm, who was his friends? Gosh, I can just say Dee and Leonard Firestone. He liked Kaiser and, of course, Bob worked for him. God, I’m trying to think. The Bass boys, he knew them. He had a couple in town like the Gramschammers, he liked Pepe and Shieka and Bill Hanlon and he just knew those guys.

Smith: Did you ever hear him disparage anyone? Obviously, he had contact with an awful lot of people, political folks and others. Were there people he really—

Purcell: He never talked to me about them. I mean, I might have heard a God damn, but, you know, I never talked like that.

Smith: He was basically a very positive person, wasn’t he?

Purcell: Yeah, he was. And, you know, what can I say? Look at me, I always say “Where did you live in Massachusetts?” when people ask me. And I said, “Well, my address was 101 Tobacco Road” because we were Tobacco Roaders and now very poor people. One other thing, he and Betty invited my mom to the White House. She came down and went through and everything. It was the biggest thrill of her life. She’d never been out of Boston and then to get what this guy did for me, I mean, I’m in Air Force One. I’m at the White House. I mean, “Excuse me. What are you doing here?” You know, it was just wild. Great experience. And, so, I walked down three or four days ago and I walked by and I know where his house at the lodge was and then, you know, where he stayed. It was just yesterday, I walked down the street and it was just memories. I don’t know a lot. I know the Gramshammers. I know a lot of people, but you think, “Oh God, remember what…?” And it was funny how it comes and gets me. Walk by the Bass House and I’d sit there and I’d think, “God dang it” and now everything’s gone. But nothing’s forever.

Smith: But think of the memories you have. That’s pretty precious.

Purcell: Oh, boy, you know, it’s that famous song by Tommy Edwards “It’s only the good times we remember.”

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Purcell: Oh, God, I mean, I’d have to say as a man that brought a lot of laughs, a lot of enjoyment to a lot of people. And he was not a cheapskate. He wouldn’t be running around. I can say and I worked for Clint Eastwood for twelve years, he was a friend of mine, and there’s very few Hollywood guys that I haven’t met and politicians and athletes because of my Carmel connections and everything, I know them all, and here’s my one thing. If you like them on the screen, don’t meet them. But, with Gerald Ford, there was a guy that “John, you’re not picking up this tab. Step aside. I got the tab.” Where, the Hollywoodies in most cases, you pick up the tab for the right to hang out with me. And I learned that. So, him, no. And if he’d seen me doing something, he’d get a little testy with me if he thought I was spending money that I shouldn’t have been on him.

Smith: And how do you think she should be remembered?

Purcell: You know, I just think of her at the Betty Ford Center and how kind and sincere. She was sincere. It wasn’t, you know, like celebrities can get, “Hi, how you doing?” No, she would focus on people and “Now, what happened?” you know. And that’s what she was. And, to me, she always said, “Hi, John!” And she sent a great picture to my mom with her and Betty and my mother’s name was Betty. And she just was always concerned. “How’s your mom?” You know, so it wasn’t, “Me, me, me”. It was, “John…” I’ve seen it with other people. “How’s she?” and in town and everything. So, she was and is a nice lady now and long in her years and everything and stuff. I see one thing where I missed the boat. I was down at his house when I was down there and he asked me because he was a swimmer and I’m a swimmer, he said, “John, do you have—” and I had to go. And I said I should have stayed. “John, The doctors said I can’t swim without somebody. Would you swim with me?” And I was the last one to swim with him. He did the laps on the pool. I missed the boat.

Smith: This is perfect. Thank you so much.

Smith: First thing, and most obvious, I guess, is, how and when did your paths, in a professional way first cross?

Nunn: Well, I was first involved in the Ford campaign in 1976. I worked for the Kent County Republican Committee then, and I was part of a group which has become known as Scatter Blitzers. We went out to Kansas City for the convention, but prior to the convention we flew or drove to four or five states, with upwards of sixty to a hundred people and campaigned on President Ford’s behalf. So when the opportunity became available, we went out to Kansas City and campaigned there for him as well.

Smith: When you went out, were you confident that he had the nomination, or was it still, in fact, somewhat up in the air?

Nunn: Oh, it was still very much up in the air, especially during convention with the Reagan delegates and the Reagans themselves. [I] remember the Reagans coming to the convention late, holding up the proceedings, with either the intentional or unintentional consequence of it not making prime time out on the East Coast. So, even as a young man, I was very aware of the politics being played at the national convention level.

Smith: Was there bitterness at that convention?

Nunn: I think there was bitterness on the part of his supporters. I can’t speak for President Ford and the rest of his staff – they always seemed upbeat. I worked in the administrative office there during the convention. But I think there was disappointment on the part, especially of young people – that this was their first engagement in a national political race, and for somebody that they felt very strongly about because of the relationship.

Smith: Have you always been interested in politics?
Nunn: Pretty much so.

Smith: And it survived Watergate?

Nunn: Yes. Certainly.

Smith: I suppose it helps when you have a hometown boy who is in the White House.

Nunn: And when you have somebody that’s as admirable and as respectable as he was. I think there was never any doubt within our community, those people that knew him even in his Congressional days, of what he really stood for and what he represented in terms of West Michigan values and in terms of our personal kinds of values. What was right, what was fair, what was good. That translated throughout his years in office, Congressional and presidential. But even after that, the way he looked at, as he’d say to me often, politics, in general - how much politics had changed because of the disrespect. That you can be disagreeable without being disrespectful.

Smith: Tell us something about him that might surprise people, generally.

Nunn: I’ll go back to Grand Rapids. Even after leaving the White House, even after moving to California and Vail, how much he still cared about knowing what was going on in Grand Rapids. He took the Grand Rapids Press. But every trip home here that he’d make when I was traveling with him, if I was upstairs in the suite with him, he’d be grilling me on, “What’s this new building over here?”, “What’s going on with so and so?”, “What have you heard about so and so?” So, to him, this was always home, even though he didn’t live here permanently after he retired, this was always home in his heart. Frequently we’d end up taking routes that weren’t planned. He drove the agents nuts. I’d be in the room and he’d say, “Let’s drive by the house that I grew up in,” or, “Let’s drive by South High School.” The agents were very accommodating, of course, but that was just his curiosity. That was his true interest in Grand Rapids.

Smith: It was almost like he was still a Congressman. That level of interest.

Nunn: And he followed politics here locally. He knew what was going on. He had a keen interest in his community.
Jon Nunn

August 7, 2008

Smith: So then, how did you become more formally associated?

Nunn: After losing the election and after moving to California, he started making periodic visits back to Grand Rapids.

Smith: By the way, let me interrupt for a second because we talked to a couple of people about this. I take it there were locals who resented the fact that he didn’t come back here – that he went to California.

Nunn: I think there were some comments, if I remember, letters to the editor, and there were comments in general. But, I think it’s very understandable why he did – a lot to do with Mrs. Ford’s health and it being easier for her. But if you look at the history, some of which I’ve provided you, of the number of trips he made back to Grand Rapids since I started being involved in those trips, about 1982, there’s well over, I think, eighty plus trips, if not more. It’s really interesting.

Smith: And was there a kind of a routine - a set routine to these trips? Were there things that you could, almost like clockwork, count on happening? Did he stay at the same place?

Nunn: Stayed at the Amway Grand Plaza Hotel, always stayed up on the twelfth floor suite, which became known as the President and Mrs. Ford’s Suite. One thing that was always routine was there was always butter-pecan ice cream in the freezer for him. Unless Mrs. Ford was here, and even then sometimes, he’d always say, “I’ll bet there is a little ice cream in the fridge, isn’t there Jon?” And so before he would make his phone call, that was routine – every night, if I was the only person traveling with him, if Lee wasn’t here, or some other staff person, or Mrs. Ford, I’d usually be the first person to see him in the morning and the last person at night. And when we got back to the suite, I’d get his ice cream ready, and before I’d leave, I’d kind of review what we were going to do tomorrow, but he’d always say, “Get my bride on the phone. Get Mrs. Ford on the phone.” He’d refer to her as many different things, but always endearing, obviously a lot of affection. So that was very routine for him.
Smith: When she was here with him, did she frown upon ice cream, or did she watch his diet?

Nunn: Mrs. Ford watched his diet, yes. But he was very conscientious about his diet. President Ford was not somebody who snacked a lot between meals. He believed in having a big breakfast, a very hearty breakfast. He got up very early, he wouldn’t go to bed until quite late, considering his days. Rarely was he back in the suite before eleven o’clock at night and then he’d be making phone calls to her, watching the news. And then he’d ask for a wakeup call of like six-thirty the next morning. The papers were always requested to be outside his door, and I’d order his breakfast. He was conscientious about what he ate, and very healthy. He stopped eating eggs in the mid-80s and that was for health reasons, I think. He would eat oatmeal, fresh fruit, toast – buttered, prunes – so I think he was very conscientious. He didn’t snack between meals.

Smith: Multiple newspapers?

Nunn: Multiple newspapers – anything we could get our hands on.

Smith: He loved newspapers, didn’t he?

Nunn: He sure did. Well, I think he felt it was – he was obviously interested – but he felt it was kind of, in part, his responsibility as a leader to be aware of what issues were going on. And I think that was very admirable of him.

Smith: Were there friends that he would stop in – obviously, at the beginning there was still family around here – would he visit old friends, family members?

Nunn: He always wanted to see his brother – both brothers when the younger one was alive.

Smith: That would be Dick and Jim.

Nunn: Frequently, if there was time permitting, there would be a family dinner or family and friends out at Kent. He liked going out to Kent Country Club, where he had been a member. He’d always stop in to the bar area, and there is a gentleman that had been there for forty years, I can’t remember his name, but he’d always stop and say hello to him. He was everyone’s friend. It was Jerry.

Smith: Was it difficult at all to be in public, to go to a restaurant, just because in the best sense of the word – what you just said – but then the autograph seekers and the celebrity hounds. Let’s face it, they follow in the wake.

Nunn: Sure. If I was making arrangements, and depending on the restaurant, the hotel staff or the restaurant staff were always very cooperative. I’d talk to them about that so that he would be able to enjoy himself when he was out. Periodically, somebody would come up and approach him, and I’d be watching from afar and if I thought it was going to be a problem or something, or an inappropriate time, what I would try to do usually, is just intercede in the situation and ask the person if they would give it to me and I would get it signed and get it back to them at an appropriate time. That’s usually how I tried to handle things.

Smith: Ann Arbor – tell us about the visits there, which were frequent.

Nunn: Which were frequent. Well, that was like going home for him again, also. We’d be riding in from the airport, and he’d be reminiscing about fraternity row, about working in the cafeteria, about his days on the football team there. He truly loved – Ann Arbor was his second home. Grand Rapids was his first, but Ann Arbor was truly his second. Regardless of what activity we were there for, whether it was on the schedule, free schedule or not, there would be a trip to see the football team. And that was usually, I’m sure for him, for me or for anybody, other staff that was traveling with him, the highlight of the whole trip.

Smith: Tell me, because I’ve been told by others who were there, when he got up to give a pep talk, he was eloquent, forceful, powerful, more so than in conventional speechmaking. It was almost like flipping a switch. There was something about that place and those players.

Nunn: Exactly. You could just see the inspiration that the players had. I was fortunate to be in those rooms or on the field with him, and there was a hush, there wasn’t one sound and every players eyes were glued on him and every word he said. And he followed U of M football. He knew every game. He could reference the past three or four games and what this particular quarterback did. And he frequently asked Lloyd Carr, “Where’s so and so?”, and have the young man stand up and talk to him about his play. He always had to throw in a little history of himself about when they played football with no helmets, or pigskin helmets kind of thing, to get a chuckle. But it was a transformation when he went in. It was just different. And he would never leave the field or the room without personally greeting and shaking the hands of every player as they filed by.

Smith: It must have been a thrill for the kids.

Nunn: Oh, it was tremendous. And I remember once, I want to think it was Mike Ford or Steve Ford, was in town, and I suggested, not that they wouldn’t have done it already, but suggested, “You really need to see this,” and Penny came along and they were just in awe afterwards. It really brought tears to your eyes to see the charisma and his really heartfelt devotion to that institution and the game of football.

Smith: And by all accounts, he had a very special relationship with Bo Schembechler?

Nunn: Yes.

Smith: It’s interesting because when we interviewed Peter Pocklington earlier this year, [he said] the President did a pep talk every year for the Edmonton Oilers. Peter brought the whole team down to California once a year and the President would meet with them. He obviously could have been a motivational speaker – at least where athletes were concerned.

Nunn: Well, an interesting story, not University of Michigan, but Notre Dame. He was invited down there to receive their Sports Blazer Award. I don’t remember the particular title of it. Marty Allen went along. But it was a really big event. I believe they were playing Brown University and up to that point Notre Dame had not won a game, or maybe they’d only won one out of five, I can’t remember. President Ford addressed the team and I remember that morning there was a breakfast. He went back to the suite because Michigan, Michigan State was playing and he watched that for a while before he headed over to the stadium. He sat up in the president’s box and I think it was with Father Malloy, and Notre Dame ended up winning the game and Father Malloy gave him great credit and asked if he’d come back on a periodic basis to just give that same pep talk to the team.

Smith: Well, as I recall, I think they went on to have a very successful season.

Nunn: Yes. But he was very particular when it came to football games and whether he was watching them at home, which I wasn’t present when he was doing that, but if I was with him when we were out of town, Notre Dame, or whatever, he’d always ask that I make sure that I surrounded him with people that would not talk to him during the game. And not even during the game, but in between plays. I mean, he was focused on that game and he wasn’t there to chit chat and to socialize. He was there for the game.

Smith: The retirement of his jersey – that must have been a very emotional moment for everyone.

Nunn: It was, it was obviously at the big house. He had talked to the team. I believe it was the day before. And I remember the retirement came at half-time. The whole family was there. We were on the far side of the stadium and had to come through the main tunnel where the players come in, and I’d only once before experienced being on the floor of a field – of a stadium when it was full, and that was in Notre Dame – but this is a much larger stadium. This is the stadium in the country as far as President Ford is concerned. And so we put President and Mrs. Ford on a golf cart because it was a very long way around the field and they couldn’t walk across the field. And the minute they entered, and the crowd saw them, all the way around the field, the cheers and roars and the applause was just thunderous. It was unbelievable. I think it probably was, of all the trips I was able to participate in, one of the highlights, and I know it was for him. It was just a great ceremony, very meaningful.

Smith: Speaking of meaningful ceremonies, I remember vividly the dedication of the staircase – the Saigon Embassy staircase. Which, to this day, I suspect Henry Kissinger is still scratching his head over why in the world would you want to include that, or to remind people of that. And of course, I saw it from the angle – there were 150 members of the Vietnamese community from West Michigan. It was a very bitter-sweet occasion. What was it like for him?

Nunn: Well, I think it was very emotional. But I think it was very reinforcing for him and the decision he made. If you remember, at that time, many in the Congress and many in the military were advocating the withdrawal of our troops and our troops only. President Ford was adamant that we do everything we could, as a government, to help as many of our allies as possible escape and not be left behind. And so when he issued that evacuation order for eighteen hours, they continued to evacuate as many – all the American troops, but as many of the Vietnamese allies of ours.

The day before, you and he had made a tour of the exhibit here, and the History Channel wanted to do an interview of him about that time in history and about that evacuation. I was in the room, in the back of the room with the videographer and the interviewer, and the person interviewing President Ford happened to be Vietnamese. He asked President Ford a series of questions and to document the history on that. President Ford did, and told the pros and the cons and that he felt strongly and still does to this day that that was the very right decision. When he finished that statement, the gentleman said, “Mr.
Ford, I was one of those that you evacuated.” It was so emotional I had to leave the room at that point. And I know it brought tears to President Ford’s eye.

Smith: The ninetieth birthday celebration – both the White House and here in Grand Rapids. Tell us about the White House event.

Nunn: Well, the White House event was just phenomenal. It was another highlight, I think, for him, and it was a highlight for the family. The entire family attended. I believe it was in the East Room. It was a beautiful event. We spent a couple of days in D.C. The event in Grand Rapids, the homecoming – the one in D.C., I believe was July 16th, his birthday is actually on July 14th. Two weeks later, he came to Grand Rapids and Susan accompanied him. There were between seven and eight thousand people on the lawn at the Ford Museum to celebrate his birthday. Again, it was great homecoming for him.
Smith: Of course, the house he always regarded as home in D.C. was at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. So in addition to the White House dinner, I think you said he had actually visited Capitol Hill that day or the day before.

Nunn: The day before. He wanted to make a visit up to the Hill, and the Hill wanted him to make a visit up there. So first he went to Speaker Hastert’s office. Then he walked clear across to Congress, which is quite a hike, over to the Senate for Senator Frist. And then our plan was that he make his way onto the floor of the Congress. Well, to do so, he wanted to go through the Congressional Cloakroom.

There happened to be an eighty-some year old woman who he wanted to greet, who started working in the cloakroom with her father when she was thirteen years old. So, again, I think it’s little things like that, that show a lot about the personality of this person who’s been with kings and queens and leaders and millionaires, and captains of industry. But he still remembered lesser known people in his life that were very, very important to him.

So, after he greeted her, our Congressman, the district congressman, was from President Ford’s district from Grand Rapids, Vern Ehlers, took him onto the floor of House, from the side, in the back, unannounced, and they slowly started making their way as members were making speeches and mingling around the floor. As more and more people started paying attention and noticing, all of a sudden the entire Congress started coming towards him, embracing him, many old friends. They broke into chorus singing, Happy Birthday, Mr. President. From what I understand, it was totally unprecedented and singing was forbidden in the House. Very emotional for him, very, very emotional.

Smith: Must have been. That must have been a homecoming, too.

Nunn: Oh, certainly. The House of Representatives and his years there – his many friendships there.

Smith: The Reagan funeral in 2004, that must have been doubly emotional in the sense that they were of a similar age. Obviously, they had been rivals and adversaries and all that, but that had been pretty much forgotten and relegated to the past. But I wonder if he sat there in the midst of all this pageantry sort of as a preview of coming attractions.

Nunn: I know that Mrs. Ford was there with him and I did that trip with him. They commented a couple of times in the suite in Willard about some of the ironies of people they had recently lost, as friends or acquaintances. I think there was definitely a reflection between themselves on the immediacy in the sense of their mortality. They took everything in really good stride, but I think it was very hard, even though as you say, there were some rivalries and some past bitteresses there, possibly. But it was, I think, a very emotional thing for him to be there under those circumstances, in a sense to recognize that this was an actual mirror of what was going to happen for him and/or Mrs. Ford someday.

I remember the motorcade going up to the cathedral and I was just overwhelmed on the number of other motorcades. I guess I hadn’t really ever experienced that or anticipated it. But within like a thirteen or fifteen block radius, all the streets were shut off, and there were motorcades stacked on motorcades, stacked on motorcades. I remember we took a different entrance into the cathedral, because at the main entrance, there were at least thirty or forty steps, and at that point his knees were bothering a little bit. So we took a side entrance, and I referred to it, and I remember Mrs. Ford winked at me or something, and I said, “We’re just doing the side entrance, or ramp entrance.” I’d never refer to it (handicap) as anything other than we’re just taking the ramp entrance, because we had a holding room there. I explained to him that we’d go to hold until the others arrived and he and Mrs. Ford would then walk out.

Smith: Did you see him in the presence of his fellow presidents?

Nunn: Yes, I walked President and Mrs. Ford, along with the lead agent, up to the section where all the former presidents were seated high ranking officials. They were all very happy to see him and Mrs. Ford, especially the Carters. They always seemed to have a very good relationship, especially considering the ’76 campaign. It always amazed me, but again, it shouldn’t have because it’s a reflection of the kind of person that President Ford was. But, obviously, President Carter defeated him, but it didn’t take long for them to become, I think, friends in a lesser capacity, but then over time, friends in a very close capacity.

Smith: They really enjoyed each other’s company, didn’t they?

Nunn: Yes. I think they had a lot of respect for each other – a great deal of respect. And then again, that goes back to President Ford. I mean, President Ford was all about respect. Another one that they were very close to was Lady Bird Johnson.

Smith: Which again, I think might surprise some people.

Nunn: But it doesn’t, again, when you reflect back on President Ford. Tip O’Neill was one of his and Mrs. Ford’s very, very best friends. They were challenging rivals in the Congress. But they would go out afterwards and play a game of golf and have dinner together. So there was always that mutual respect for the other person and the other person’s right to have a different opinion. That they – both he and Mrs. Ford – expressed on many occasions.

Smith: How much do you think she influenced his politics? And I say that in this sense: when he was in the White House, he was considered the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge, but long before he died, he was almost marooned. I mean, the party had gone over here, and he and Mrs. Ford were here, and I’m not sure how much he changed, or the party changed, or what, but he was certainly in a minority within his own party. How did he feel about that? And where did that come from?

Nunn: Well, I don’t know what influence she really had on his politics, especially during the White House period, because I wasn’t there, but they shared very similar opinions on politics. They expressed more privately than publicly, their disappointment with the Republican Party, with some of its candidates, especially some of the potential ultra conservative candidates and nominees. They were very, very much middle of the road. They were very, very much moderates. They were very, very much pro-choice, which was not popular with a lot of the conservatives in the party.
Smith: That was his viewpoint, that wasn’t something that he inherited from her? Do you think she influenced him at all? I realize it is speculative.

Nunn: Well, I think she, obviously, had some influence on him – on everything he did and thought, to some degree. But there was such mutual respect between them. But as long as I’ve known him, that has been their position. In fact, we were at a tribute dinner here for Rich DeVos and another community leader – boy, I think it may have been in memoriam, I can’t remember. It was a huge, huge dinner, and some of the media asked if President Ford would be available for an interview. I walked over and asked him and he said sure, so we walked over to this designated area, and I thought they were just general questions about the dinner and Rich DeVos and their relationships, and the next thing I hear is the word, “choice, abortion,” coming up and I thought, oh my gosh, what have we gotten ourselves into – this is going to be in Grand Rapids – the story of the night. Not his comments about the honorees… and that’s what it ended up being. But again, he was unabashed in not wavering about things that he felt strong about, but also at the same time respecting the right for opposing points of view.

Smith: They went to convention after convention, and you wonder, every four years he felt a little bit more out of touch with “mainstream” of the party as it was developing in the 80s and the 90s and beyond.

Nunn: I think part of that was his loyalty to people. His loyalty to the party, his loyalty to people. In his case, his loyalty to the Bushes.

Smith: That’s true. There was a very close relationship with that family, wasn’t there? Between the Fords and the Bushes.

Nunn: Right. And I think that, I’m not so sure had it not been for Herbert Walker, that he would have gone to the last convention. I don’t think he shared a lot of the views with the current Bushy – that’s just my speculation - of this administration.

Smith: It must have been somewhat awkward for him to have so many of his old alumni in really critical positions, and obviously their performance was criticized and the subject of much controversy. One sensed that the personal relationships never suffered.

Nunn: Right.

Smith: Certainly with people like Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld, but you wonder whether some of the political judgments were called into question.

Nunn: Well, some of the Op-Ed pieces that he submitted, that were critical of certain administration policies, and one that he and Jimmy Carter jointly submitted, I believe, and I don’t remember the specific issues. But, again, he was not afraid to express his opinion and say what he thought was right.

Smith: Did you ever hear him talk about Nixon?

Nunn: Not really.

Smith: One sensed that he – if it was anyone else, we’d say, how could you be that naïve? – but in his case, I think it was very sincere. He was genuinely shocked that Nixon lied to him. That just wouldn’t occur to him.

Nunn: Well, I think that goes back again to his personality and his character traits, that because of his honesty, his straightforwardness, he expects that and expected that in everyone else. And I think he was truly shocked and hugely disappointed.

Smith: I only heard him, personally, criticize two people. And the worst thing he could say was “That’s a bad man.” One was Gordon Liddy, and one was John Dean. Were there others?

Nunn: There were others I know whose opinions he didn’t agree with, or the way they went about doing things. Mrs. Ford was equally expressive, I think, at times.

Smith: Tell me about her sense of humor.

Nunn: Oh, she had a great sense of humor, and she always liked poking fun at him. And he just took it in great stride. It was wonderful to see. One of the things – and I’m blessed in so many ways, opportunities I’ve had, events I’ve attended — but was really having an inside glimpse of them and what they really stood for, and I think few people, most people assume, but few people really get a glimpse and know how truly in love they were every day of their life. Every day.

Smith: How did that manifest itself?

Nunn: Just in the way they would refer to each other, in their courtesies toward each other, and the fact that, to ask me to get his bride on the phone, well, she’s been his bride for many years ago. You could see it in the way they looked at each other — in the way they cared about each other. It was unbelievable.

Smith: Do you think he felt any degree of guilt that, in the early years, when he was climbing the ladder in the House, ambitious, on the road a lot, and really, the burden of raising the kids fell on her. Whether some of her problems were grounded — who knows? Do you think he sort of consciously made an effort to make up for that in the later years when they were together maybe more than they had been earlier? When he was with the kids more?

Nunn: I can’t really comment on that, again in the sense that I really did not know them that well then. But to see the affection they had for each other, even though he may have not been around as much, he was out doing speaking engagements and that. That’s nothing that was just manifested or re-manifested. I think it always was there.

Smith: And he loved to campaign.

Nunn: Loved to campaign.

Smith: When you start to think, in 1976, the Reagan challenge, and it can be argued both ways — there is a school of thought that it made him a better candidate. There is a school of thought that, yeah, maybe it made him a better candidate, but in the end, it undermined his position. And yet, by 1980, he was out there campaigning as hard for Ronald Reagan as he had for himself. And he just loved campaigning, didn’t he?
Nunn: Well, there were many that wished that Ronald Reagan had been out there campaigning as hard for him in ’76 as he did for Ronald Reagan. But, yes, he loved people.

Smith: Was he interested in people?

Nunn: He was truly interested in people. He came back to Grand Rapids several times campaigning. Appeared here a week before the election with Ronald Reagan. Appeared here a week before the election with George Bush – actually was a surprise guest at the rally with Lee Greenwood.

Smith: This is where Dole began his final hundred hours. Remember him, President Bush and David Brinkley were here?

Nunn: Yes. The big, final, hundred hour rally, the bus tour.

Smith: What did he enjoy about campaigning?

Nunn: I think it was just the opportunity to get out and be with people. And support a cause he believed in. I think he became very selective. I know he did as he got older in terms of which campaigns he would accept the invitation from and which ones he wouldn’t. Some of that may have been because of the politics, and some of it, I think, to some degree, as he was getting older, he was slowing down and the staff and Mrs. Ford were telling him he had to slow down.

Smith: My sense was, it seemed like his health was really almost phenomenal, right up until around his ninetieth birthday. Which was also right about the time when, in effect, he couldn’t travel. And I thought, when his doctors deprived him of travel, that it was like part of his life was over.

Nunn: I think that one of the biggest disappointments for him, and for anybody that had the opportunity to know him, to work for him, was the fact that he could not go back to Ann Arbor that final time, for the dedication of the Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy. That meant a lot to him. That legacy, every time there was a trip that I was with him on to Ann Arbor, again, it was his second home, he loved to walk around campus. He’d say let’s not take the motorcade, let’s walk.
Smith: Would he be recognized?

Nunn: Well, when you’re traveling with a group of like six or eight people around you and they’re all in suits, it’s pretty hard to go unnoticed.

Smith: But what I’m thinking are the kids – the undergraduates…

Nunn: A lot of them, no. Or they’d pass and then you’d see their heads turn around or they would lean over to each other. But if someone said “Hi” or made eye contact he’d always say, “Hi, how are you?” “Back to the dedication of the School of Public Policy – I think it was a huge disappointment for him. That’s one thing I wish that he could have done. I think we all wish that he could have. That would have meant a lot to him.

Smith: Now, he was there for the ceremony announcing the name, and he was there for the groundbreaking. So he was very much a part of – and his good friend Sandy Weill – that was a very special relationship, wasn’t it?

Nunn: Yes. They were very, very close. He was there for the dedication of the building which has Mr. Weill’s name on it, as well. I believe that was one of the last times he was in Ann Arbor. But he was really looking forward to that building being built.

Smith: I’m just looking through this list, which is phenomenal, that you’ve prepared of all his trips that you have worked, and there is really a cluster, I notice, in ’98 and ’99, and I remember a lot of these. But we did some great conferences at the library and he would be very actively involved in those. I remember, we did the CIA conference, we did the Women in Politics conference, among others, and he always seemed to be – not only a participant – but very much a roll up his sleeves and learn. He was very much a part of the discussion that was going on. It wasn’t about him – it was about, even then, what he could learn, say about the CIA. In fact, he and George Tenet became friendly after that. So when we did the next big conference for the 25th anniversary of the fall of Saigon, we wanted to open a lot of papers. And, of course, the National Security apparatus didn’t want to open a lot of papers. So he wrote to George Tenant, went to the top, and Tenant, to his credit, leaned on those beneath him and we were able to open 25,000 pages that day. But I will never forget, what other president would have a conference observing the low point of his presidency? Show up to share those memories? I’ll never forget as long as I live, him and Eugene McCarthy, sitting together – it was just a pretty incongruous sight. But my sense was, he really enjoyed those programs.

Nunn: I think it was part of his continual learning process. President Ford never stopped learning. As I mentioned earlier, he devoured newspapers, all day long, when there’d be downtime, in the motorcade if he hadn’t read this particular paper, and he’d read it from cover to cover. He was always very current on every issue, and he wanted to remain current. And I think that, in addition to his active schedule, it kept him as healthy and kept him as young and vibrant as he was, right up to the end. But believing you’re right, the inability in the last couple of years to travel, I think had an effect on his overall slowing down. But he was always mentally sharp; he was always interested in learning and being current.

Smith: I remember he came back here to light the Christmas tree, remember? I think he came to a couple, as long as he was physically up to it, he’d come here to light the Christmas tree.

Nunn: You have to like Grand Rapids to come back here in December, right?

Smith: Which is pretty impressive. But then that year, 1999, which was the 25th anniversary of the inauguration, were you on the trip where he got the Medal of Freedom at the White House?

Nunn: In the Congress? The Congressional… the Medal of Freedom? No.

Smith: That year was like the trifecta – he got the Congressional Gold Medal, he got the Medal of Freedom, and something else.

Nunn: I did the Congressional Gold Medal, not the other one.

Smith: That was the year we had Alan Greenspan and Justice Stevens and Billy Graham. And he came back for all three.

Nunn: And the Gifford’s. Kathy Lee and Frank Gifford.

Smith: Yes, his good friends from Vail. What do you remember about those events?
Nunn: You know, there are so many incredible events that I’ve been able to participate in, but that was a very special one because I had never met Reverend Billy Graham. Out of all the people I’ve met through President Ford, I’ve never been more impressed with anyone. It was just overwhelming. Probably one of the most personally emotional experiences I’ve ever had. What truly a wonderful, wonderful man.

Smith: What were the two of them like together?

Nunn: Oh – very close. Very respectful of each other. They’ve known each other, obviously, along with Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Graham, since the White House. Just great, great respect. And it was fun to see kind of the mixture to add Kathy Lee Gifford and her husband, who are also very good friends of Reverend Graham. Kathy Lee is a huge admirer of Rev. Graham and of President Ford, and they were both here in tribute to President Ford. It was an incredible ceremony, as you remember.

Smith: And I know there were people who thought, what an incongruous pairing, but in fact, as you know, they were all friends.

Nunn: Very, very close. And I did not know, I had never even watched the Regis and Kathy Lee Show, so I knew her by name, but she is a very, very spiritual person. She’s very devout in her religion and her respect for President Ford and Rev. Graham. That was nice to find out, and that then put the whole relationships together between the three of them.

Smith: And Justice Stevens – I remember asking the President, “When was the last time you saw Justice Stevens?” and he said, “When I appointed him.” And I guess all those years that it had been Justice Stevens’ dream of playing golf with the man who put him on the Court. And that day they got to do it.

Nunn: They got to play golf. Well, you hosted the conference here also with Madeleine Albright – and all the former secretaries of state. And a lot of that has to do with your genius, obviously, Richard. But it also has to do with the fact that when you are doing something on behalf of President Ford, or at the suggestion or the request of President Ford, again, partisan politics are just put aside. It’s out of respect for the man that they come together.
Smith: I found, to my astonishment, over and over again, when I would approach people, I would find out that he had never asked them for anything. This was the first time anyone ever asked them, and they were, in most cases, delighted to be asked. And the fact that he would be here himself, well, that was frosting on the cake.

Nunn: I don’t think he liked imposing on people. He felt he was imposing on people, when, in fact…

Smith: Is that because he got imposed on so often? Let’s face it, he got asked. I assume there were people, we don’t have to name names, I’m sure there were people in the community who presumed just a little bit on their real or imagined relationship to ask for favors.

Nunn: He had a lot of good friends in the community. [smile]

Smith: Did he get sick of signing autographs?

Nunn: Yes. He didn’t really mind, but the concern was, once he signed one going through a crowd, suddenly I would see people grabbing napkins or packs of matches, or whatever, and so, part of my responsibility was to try to see that in advance, see somebody coming and just politely walk over and say that he wasn’t going to sign any autographs today. I’d offer them a card with the address of the office out in Beaver Creek, or California, they could send it in. In some cases, even if it was somebody that was a good friend of his, it was just much easier for me to say, would you give it to me and I’ll take it upstairs, I’ll make sure he signs it, and I’ll get it back to you in an hour, or at the dinner tonight, or whatever. He always tried to be accommodating, especially to those people he knew were trying to take care of him – police officers, hotel staff.

I remember one time one of the agents asked if I would have him sign a baseball. He hated signing baseballs. The reason being, he said to me one time when I asked him the first time, he said, “I never played baseball. Why do they want me to sign a baseball?” So, he signed it. I told him it was for the agent, but that’s kind of a cute side story.
Smith: Were you in Philadelphia at the convention in 2000?

Nunn: Yes.

Smith: What do you remember about that, because it must have been frightening.

Nunn: I was actually working on the convention staff for Bush Family and Friends. I was working logistics for members of the immediate family, and Calvin McDowell was doing the advance on that trip for President and Mrs. Ford. Penny, of course, was there. As well as Norma, I believe with Mrs. Ford. The day the Fords were to attend convention I’d been invited to be their guest and to travel to convention with them. Penny had asked that I come along with the staff as part of the staff entourage.

The Fords were not aware I was traveling with them. When we arrived at the convention center the Fords saw me and came over. Mrs. Ford gave me a hug, and shook my hand and said what a nice surprise. And I said, “I’m your guest whether you knew it or not.” And they said, “Well, that’s great,” and they then thanked Penny for thinking to include me. We went into the Green Room with them and then we went out. I was assisting Calvin on some of the logistics. I went up in the presidential box to see where they were sitting. As the convention started, he came out with Mrs. Ford. He was doing a number of interviews, and finally those were cut off and he went up into the box.

I had the schedule with me, and he originally was scheduled to leave after a certain point in a certain speech. Well, typical President Ford, he didn’t want to be discourteous, I think, to anyone. I remember, Penny and I were in the tunnel and I walked out on the floor below him, trying to get his attention because I usually had pretty good eye language, or body language with him, I could tell, having been…

Smith: Did you have signals prearranged?

Nunn: I had some signals, even as far as if we were in a crowd, if I’d tap his elbow he’d know it was me. I would be like an opportunity either like, we’re ready to go, or do you want to get out of this situation? Also our eye communication was pretty good. Back to the convention, I was starting to get concerned because it was really, really hot in the convention hall. I could see he was very, very uncomfortable. I kept thinking, I wanted to get his attention to see “Do you want to go?”, but it would have been awkward, to some degree, because he’s in the middle of the box, seated next to the Bushes.

So, finally convention broke and he came down the stairs with Mrs. Ford. He was noticeably shaking a little bit, and he was noticeably uncomfortable and hot. We took him right to the Green Room where Calvin had the unfortunate task of telling him that his motorcade wasn’t [ready]. He wanted to go right then and there. He knew he wasn’t feeling well, it was obvious, his color and everything. Calvin had the unenviable job of telling him that Mrs. Reagan’s motorcade was scheduled before his. Which I don’t think set too well at that point in time, especially just because he was not feeling well.

Calvin instructed the staff to immediately board the motorcade we would all go with him at once – we immediately went and got in our cars in position in the motorcade so that when the golf cart brought him out, we were immediately ready to depart. When we got back to the hotel, I remember going up to the floor where their suites and the staff offices were located. Sitting in the office there, I knew something was wrong. Then I remember Penny coming out of the room and coming down to the office. She said, “Jon, we’re going to have to take him to the hospital.” That was just - for the entire staff - just unbelievable. After they left for the hospital, I remember we went downstairs and sat in a bar. We were just waiting. Penny, of course, because of that very, very special relationship, was very visibly upset. I remember her pacing, and I remember the phone ringing, and her walking over to the door of the lounge and looking at us. I think I was with Norma. It was just an awful experience to go through thinking, he might die right at that point in time. Fortunately he didn’t and he survived, but it was a very, very dark period for all of us who knew him and loved him.

Smith: It must have thrown a bit of a pall over the convention, too.

Nunn: Yeah.
Smith: I know Governor Bush visited him in the hospital. I think Larry King would have if he could have gotten a camera into the room.

How was he with the media?

Nunn: Oh, I think he was very, very fair with the media.

Smith: Very accessible?

Nunn: Very, very accessible. Had a lot of respect for them, and I think, as a result, they had a lot of respect for him as well. I know locally here, Rick Albin, who is one of our locals reporters did a lengthy interview with President Ford. President Ford was very, very impressed. He had not known Rick before, but he said he could have been right up there with any of the nationals – he said he was very impressed with this local talent. So I made sure that Rick knew that, which was a huge compliment to him.

But it was funny, we were doing a press conference on one trip and Lee was here with him. Peter Secchia was involved in some way, and I knew what our schedule was and I said - normally, if you were the press person, you’d just say, “Ladies and gentlemen, one more question” – well, I knew President Ford well enough, so I think we told Peter that day, I said, “Peter, we really, really have to get going.” Peter stepped forward and said, “Ladies and gentlemen, one more question.” President Ford responded, “Come on, Peter, we can take a little more time.” It was like he pretty much knew when he wanted to conclude things.

Let me tell you about the Reagan funeral. Interesting thing is, Penny called me two days before the Reagan funeral. She and I had been talking about it and scheduling. I used to help with scheduling a lot, helped Judy. I think I was even doing some scheduling on that, and she calls me, actually the day before, I think it was, and said, “Jon, I don’t know what I’m thinking. President and Mrs. Ford can’t make this trip alone. Lee can’t help. You have to go to Washington with them and be there with them.” I said to her, “I mean this is a great honor, but it’s literally like tomorrow.” She said, “I know. Can you do it?” And I said, “Of course I can do it.”
So I got thrown into the thick of things. Got there the next morning. The agents picked me up and briefed me and then went out to the airport for the arrival. Later that afternoon I met up with a liaison from the White House.

The White House had assigned a liaison officer to each of the former presidents’ families, and traveling staff. Ours met with me and went over all the protocol and itinerary for the funeral I was reviewing the seating for the next day, and when he told me the seating arrangements, I thought, this is very, very strange, because they had President Ford and Mrs. Ford in the row behind President Clinton.

I called Penny and I said, “It’s my understanding, according to MDW protocol,” - and I actually got on the phone with Mike Wagner [MDW], who was in a awkward position. He knew either the Bush White House, or Mrs. Reagan, was making the call. If I remember the seating correctly, it was the president, the vice president, President and Mrs. Clinton in the first row. Second row was former President Bush, President and Mrs. Carter, President and Mrs. Ford. I knew that was not according to protocol, I didn’t know who was calling the shots. I wasn’t at a staff level to make that kind of decision, but I knew, at least myself and Penny, were totally aware that was not right, according to protocol and the MDW knew it wasn’t as well.

The next day before we left for the funeral, I briefed them about what we’re going to be doing. Who’s going to be there greeting them – things that they probably know, but just to refresh their memory. And I went over the seating, and I remember President Ford saying, “Why are we seated behind the Clintons?” I had to scramble to try to come up with some explanation. And Mrs. Ford just says, “It’s probably the order of presidencies.” She looked to get me off the hook, but she knew and he knew. Again, never being a presumptuous individual, but he knew – why would that be the order of seating?

Smith: It is implicit in everything we’ve been talking about, but give us a capsule description of what you did and the things you did, and was there anyone else doing it? My sense is that there was a very small…
It was a small group that worked together. I was never on paid staff. I was always reimbursed for my travel, and that’s the way I wanted it. I had my other full time job, and each of my jobs, when I was the executive director for eleven years of the Kent County Republican Committee, when I went to work for Dick and Betsy DeVos, when I went to work subsequently, for Grand Action, it’s always been with the understanding that I need the flexibility to be able to do things on behalf of the Fords. That was because of my great respect for them, and the joy of working with the staff.

So as an example: a trip to Grand Rapids is scheduled, or there’s something going on at the museum. I begin working on the initial schedule, sketching it out, time-wise, adding in events, dress codes, particulars for each event. Then I submit the initial schedule back to Judi Risk, who is the scheduler in California. Both of us work jointly and collaboratively. If it was a trip to Ann Arbor, then Judy and I worked via phone until I got there. Then, depending on the trip, Lee Simmons or Dick Garbarino might be traveling with President Ford.

My role was significantly different when nobody was traveling with him, because I was not only doing advance work, but was really also serving as personal assistant, making sure that he was taken care of, that his accommodations were correct, that those newspapers were there, that he had the assortment of soft drinks that he wanted. Make sure he has butter-pecan ice cream in the refrigerator. And then travel with him from event to event, and again, brief him before we leave, “we’re going to be doing this,” or if there is a schedule change, working in that capacity. There would be times when both he and Mrs. Ford traveled together, then it would be more likely that there would be a travel assistant with both of them. There was always a travel assistant with Mrs. Ford. I would serve just more as the liaison and advance capacity.

Tell me about his relationship with the Secret Service – both of them, for that matter – the relationship that exists.

They were very respectful of the Secret Service, and in the Service there is a lot of turnover. I don’t know what it is – eight years or something – and they usually shift on eight or ten years, so he’d known a number of agent…I, over ten years have known at least four of his lead agents, if not five. But he’s always had a very good relationship with the agents. He’s never in any way been abusive to them and he’s never really taken advantage of them, in any way.

I remember there was a 60 Minutes article, they must have been following President Ford, and it was a trip to Grand Rapids that I was doing with him, and they were trying to make the case how former presidents have all this extra staff and Secret Service. And, in fact, the Secret Service does more than just protect them. That they assist in carrying their luggage and on and on. As an example of agents carrying bags, they showed a clip of, who else but me, walking next to President Ford, carrying his briefcase and his overcoat. So they had to do a retraction the following Sunday because Mike Wallace actually called and spoke with me and I had to explain to him that I was not a member of the Secret Service, that I was an advance person and a traveling staff.

Smith: Did that feel good?

Nunn: Yes. It was kind of a get back at them a little bit, because anyone that knows President Ford, knows that he would not do anything that was out of line – that was inappropriate. That’s just not him.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Nunn: I think the last time I saw him was a combination of a funeral planning meeting and a Ford Foundation dinner in Palm Springs with Vice President Cheney.

Smith: Was that the dinner where he announced that he was Deep Throat?

Nunn: Yes.

Smith: Tell the story.

Nunn: You can fill that in. I believe that was the last time that I ever saw President and Mrs. Ford. I remember there was a Foundation board meeting that next morning, and it had been a long night due to the Ford Foundation Dinner. President Ford, even though he was always conscious of his health, he liked a good time, he liked a party. He liked people around him. He didn’t drink, he hasn’t drank since the mid-80s, the last I knew, but he liked people – and especially those Foundation dinners where there were so many people from his former administration, so many close friends that he truly cared about.

During the Foundation meeting I had stepped into the room. I was waiting for Mrs. Ford to arrive because she was arriving a little bit later, and Marty was speaking and Penny was in the back of the room, and I was standing with his lead agent. Marty, all of a sudden stopped the meeting and introduced the back of the room, indicating who we were – just for many of the board members that didn’t know us. They had seen me around, a lot of them, on many occasions. Marty welcomed Penny, the agent, and then Marty affectionately referred to me, and he said, “This is Jon Nunn, he takes care of President Ford, similar to Lee when Lee’s not around, but he’s also become like part of the family.” President Ford shook his head in acknowledgement. That was a great honor.

I remember then going out and Mrs. Ford had arrived, the agents told me, so I went out to escort her. I remember, especially, how particularly beautiful she looked that day. I mean, she always looked nice, but in my memory, I don’t think I’ve ever seen her look more beautiful. What she was wearing – it was just perfect for her. And she’s so gracious, she came in and then we went to a luncheon next door. Prior to that President Ford had, and you were there, Richard…

Smith: I wasn’t there.

Nunn: At that?

Smith: No.

Nunn: Oh, okay. Prior to the end of the meeting, President Ford had to stand up and sit down a couple of times. It was obviously challenging. There was a plaque that was presented to him, and he rose, started responding to the tribute, but it was apparent that he became disoriented. I remember looking over at Penny, our eyes connected and just like in terror, “what is happening?” It was obvious to everybody on the board, and he then sat down. There was a rule that he was never supposed to stand up too quickly. Mrs. Ford would tell him, and this is kind of a point of humor: Mrs. Ford would say, “Now, what are you supposed to do?” And he would say, “Count to ten.” She would say, “Okay.” And he’d say, “Ten,” and stand right up.

But on this particular day, at that event, it was obvious that there was something going on. That he had become a little bit disoriented, there was dizziness involved, and so I remember staying behind with him in the room. Everybody went to the dining room and then he was pretty good. I took him over there, but it was just sometimes that, I think a blood pressure thing or something – getting up and getting down. But that was very difficult, I think, for everybody around that day.

Smith: Including, I suspect, himself. He was a proud man, immaculate, great natural athlete, really took care of himself, and the indignities of aging which eventually affect everyone, it must have been a trial.

Nunn: He was becoming aware of it. He’d make comments. I remember, I think it was one of the Press Club things, it was actually the last Press Club event that President Ford spoke at in D.C. And you and I were there, and Penny was there. He stumbled over a word, as I remember. He was such a perfectionist, and I know that bothered him the rest of the evening, because he brought it up to Penny and me when he got back to the suite. He said, “Gol durn it,” he said – he was just mad with himself. That was hard to see, because you know, who else, at his age, could not only accomplish everything he had, but was still accomplishing and going like he did.

Smith: And then there were the big events where I’d write something, and then Penny was my co-conspirator, and she would make sure that he would rehearse, sometimes for days. But it paid off.

Nunn: Wasn’t it the first time he had to say, megabytes, or gigabytes, or whatever? And I remember when he was giving that speech, and that was another Press Club event, I think. Penny was just like on the edge of her chair, and he got through it and she says, “Great.” Because a lot of his computer vocabulary, and many mechanical things were totally unfamiliar to him. If we were in a hotel room and there was phone with push buttons on it, multiple lines, he had no comprehension, or to charge a credit card number to the phone — no idea how to do it.

Smith: He did learn solitaire on the computer. But that must have been about the level of his computer skills.

Nunn: I think so.

Smith: I’m sure his grandchildren were much more computer literate — but I’m sure that’s true of lots of folks of that generation.

Did he watch television?

Nunn: News and sports, that was pretty much it — and new shows. I remember Ann Cullen and I sitting up in the suite for some news program after President and Mrs. Ford got home one evening because she was highlighted. What a treat for somebody like me — here I’m sitting there eating butter-pecan ice cream with them, and they are sitting in their pajamas and Ann and I are sitting and watching TV with them — I mean, it doesn’t get much more special than that.

Smith: Were you surprised by the turnout at the funeral?

Nunn: No. This community, he always considered this community home and I think that was a reflection of how widely known that was in this community. And he maintained relationships over all the years. Again, he read the paper. I think one of the saddest responsibilities I and Marty and others had was every time a friend would pass away in Grand Rapids, having to send the obituary out to him or out to Penny.

And again, you mentioned the Reagan funeral and his recognizing his own mortality, I think that had gone on for a long time because they virtually, all of his and her contemporaries from Grand Rapids were gone. Then, with the passing of his younger brother, there were unpleasant things that we had to do just to keep him informed. But he wanted to be informed. These were people he had known from the past, and he’d always reminisce, he’d always talk about the Red Flannel Days up in Cedar Springs. And he remembered the names, he was amazing with names.

Smith: He must have been very pleased with the impact that this museum had in terms of – as a catalyst for downtown and the whole renewal of downtown.

Nunn: He was very proud of it, and he was proud of, not only the dedication, but the re-dedication. That was a highlight, and you orchestrated that. That was a cold day, but…

Smith: Remember Mrs. Johnson sitting out there? And Caroline in here.

Nunn: And Caroline Kennedy sitting up here because she had that cold, strep throat or something.

Smith: Yeah, but what does it tell you about – you saw the people who came. Who would have expected Caroline – not many people would have expected Lady Bird.

Nunn: No. But it was the kind of respect and the Kennedy medal that he received, I wasn’t there but I know from comments he made and comments others made, that probably was one of the most significant recognitions that he’d ever received. Because it was a validation that he didn’t need, but it was validation that was needed – that history needed. When Ted Kennedy said, “Mr. President, you were right and I was wrong.”

Smith: He said after that, “You know, after that, people stopped asking the question.” Which must have been a nice – all those years, everywhere he went, people would ask him. And they stopped.

What have we left out? We’ve covered a lot of territory and a lot of trips.

Erik: Do you remember the time he had gotten in a day early, and he was putting on a suit and he had brought the wrong suit and [Mrs. Ford] noticed it and she said, “Well, you’re not wearing that.”

Nunn: No. Okay. Ann Cullen was with us on this trip and I don’t think Lee, in fact, I’m pretty sure Lee wasn’t on this trip. But he had put on a particular suit, and he put on some shirt that either had started fraying on the collar or something like that. He had a separate activity, so I’m getting ready to leave the suite with him. Mrs. Ford and Ann are sitting there and Mrs. Ford says, “You’re not wearing that.” He says, “Well, what’s wrong with it?” “You’re not wearing that shirt or suit.” So a minor argument started and Ann and I, and I think Erik was up there, politely just walked around the corner and I went “Whew.” And I know one of the things that Mrs. Ford said to me afterward, “Just lose that suit, or I’m going to tell Lee to lose that suit the next time we pack.” It was just things like that.

Smith: What was his clothes sense? I assume he was pretty frugal, I assume he kept things.

Nunn: I’d say to Lee, “This suit looks like something that I saw in photographs – from his White House days.”

Smith: And he was probably proud.

Nunn: Yes, but he was always meticulous about the way he was dressed. And he meticulous about how his tie was tied. It was very – before going out in public, before going into an interview – he would always say, “How’s my tie look? Make sure it’s straight.”

Smith: Did he talk about his parents?

Nunn: Briefly, sometimes on a visit to his boyhood home. A couple of times that he made visits there. But not to any extent.

Smith: That’s great. Thank you.

Smith: It’s interesting. Thirty or forty years ago, there was very little out at Rancho Mirage, I’m told.

Staufer: Hardly anything there. Then you go out to Indian Wells and there was nothing. Recently, I was out there just for a visit. I couldn’t believe it. It was just one solid Palm Springs all the way out to Bermuda Dunes.

Smith: And the whole Vail Valley is a relatively recent creation.

Staufer: It’s the same thing.

Smith: How did it come about?

Staufer: I have a picture in my office of Vail in 1964. There’s nothing. And then we came in ’62, I mean, there was nothing. Vail Village Inn had fifty rooms. A little highway motel and the lodge at Vail had sixty rooms.

Smith: Is that where he had a condo when he was congressman?

Staufer: He had a condo in the Village Inn Plaza. It’s a building I built and he bought the penthouse there.

Smith: Is that still standing?

Staufer: Oh, yeah, it’s still there. A Mexican owns it now. First a California man bought it from Ford and then a Mexican national bought it from that guy. And the penthouse is still there, a four bedroom, four and a half bath.

Smith: I want you to describe it, but, first of all, how did your paths first cross with Gerald Ford?

Staufer: Well, it was very simple, you know. He was President of the United States and he came out here. That was his summer White House. And I was mayor pro-tem of the Vail town council. We gave a cocktail party for the President in the mayor’s house and that’s how we met. And we have been in touch all along.

Smith: So, you had not had any contact with him before he became president, though he was out here?

Staufer: No, I had not. Yes, we met out here and, of course, Betty and my wife, Annie, you may know she had a store over there called Annie’s and they became pretty good friends and saw each other, not frequently, but they had lunch once in awhile.

Smith: Tell me again about where, before they built the house, they had the condo. Where was that?

Staufer: They had a condo at the Village Inn Plaza, which was a development over at the Vail Village Inn. We had the hotel there and then we developed it. First we built the commercial building and then we built condominiums and then we had a penthouse there.

Smith: And how large was the penthouse?

Staufer: Four bedrooms, four and a half baths. But it’s funny, at the same time, they were already building the house in Beaver Creek, so they really never stayed. They gave it to the family and friends, but they never stayed at the Plaza. And he loaned it to King Hussein when King Hussein was here.

Smith: And what is the Bass House, because we’re told they stayed there?

Staufer: Well, the Bass House is right behind here. And they stayed there because he wanted to swim and the neighbor had a swimming pool. So, they would stay back at the Bass House. Dick Bass offered it to them for staying there in the winter.

Smith: And the whole family would come out here for Christmas.

Staufer: Oh, yes, they were all here.

Smith: Would local people leave them alone?
Staufer: Yes, I think. There were some autograph hunters, you know; they’re everywhere, but the local people - other than saying “Mr. President. Good morning” - they left them alone.

Smith: Were there places here that they particularly enjoyed going? Restaurants? Shops?

Staufer: They enjoyed going to The Left Bank, and, of course, he was a hell of a golfer. He just loved golf. And they came quite a bit here to Pepi’s, you know, the Gramshammers, for their meals.

Smith: Did you ever golf with him?

Staufer: I have only been on the golf course once in my life and that was when there was the first Jerry Ford Invitational Golf Tournament. It was a Pro-Am and I happened to be the treasurer of the Mountain School at that time, and that was organizing the mountain school kids to pick up trash. And that was it. That was my only performance on the golf course.

Smith: What was the Mountain School?

Staufer: Mountain School is a little private school in East Vail. It started originally in somebody’s home, in their living room, and now I think they have about 200 kids there, maybe more. I don’t know. It’s become quite a bit.

Smith: Did you see his sense of humor?

Staufer: Sense of humor? Yeah, I think, personally, he was such a kind man. And I’ll give you one example, which nobody believes but, it happened. We were having a cocktail party in the mayor’s house.

Smith: You were mayor?

Staufer: No, I was mayor pro-tem. So, next door on the golf course is my brother’s house. And my parents from Austria were here staying with my brother. And I said, “Mr. President, my parents are next door. Could I bring them over?” And he said, “Sure, bring them in!” And they told the Secret Service men, “Joe is going to bring his parents over. It’s okay.” And I went over to the house and they had gone for a walk, so I couldn’t find them. So I went back to the cocktail party a little later. He had a memory like an elephant, he never forgot a name, and he never forgot anything. He said, “Joe, where are your parents? I was looking forward to meeting them.” I said, “So sorry, but they went out for a walk and I can’t find them anywhere.” He said, “Where are they staying?” I said, “Right next door here.”

Next morning, he was playing golf. He stopped the game. Had simply walked in, got my parents out, had pictures taken with them. He was just that kind of a guy. He was so kind to people. As far as I’m concerned, he was a true Republican, not like the Tea Baggers nowadays, he was a true Republican. And then, of course, now when people say “country first” that’s a political slogan. He meant country first because he knew damn well that pardoning Nixon would cost him the election, but it was good for the country and he did it.

Smith: Did he ever talk about the pardon?

Staufer: We talked about it and he said, “Joe, what do you think would’ve happened? A President of the United States being on trial and the whole world watching? What would’ve happened?” And he was right. It would’ve been very, very bad for the country. He really meant ‘country first’.

Smith: It’s interesting you talk about the Republicans of the Tea Party and all of that. Most of us, as we get older, tend to become a little more conservative. And with the Fords it was almost the opposite. I mean, one sensed that maybe the Party went so far to the right.

Staufer: Yeah, I think that he was feeling the fanatics are taking over the party. And that’s what happened. Rush Limbaugh, you know.

Smith: Yes, exactly. But you wonder how much she influenced his views, because it wasn’t just the abortion issue, but gay rights and other things that you don’t associate with a ‘conservative Republican’. But then, of course, he had children and grandchildren and they tend to sort of expose you to a youthful outlook Staufer: They kept him young and changed his thinking.

Smith: And the other thing I wonder, having gone through the intervention with Mrs. Ford and then the creation of the Betty Ford Center; having had his eyes opened to the weaknesses that even good people experience – and the compassion that they showed. Whether all that might have affected him as well.

Staufer: Imperfection of the human species. I mean, we all have faults. And I think that he understood that. And that was another reason, I think, that he was sympathetic with Nixon. I mean, there’s a President of the United States that had done so many good things, you know, when you think about the contact with China and how things were coming along internationally. And then the things like that happened. You know, I think he was sympathetic to that kind of downfall that a man of that stature had.

Smith: Did he talk politics?

Staufer: Not very often and not very specifically. Sometimes, he gave his opinion on some issue, but I don’t think he’d like to go into big discussions about politics.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

Staufer: No, I’ve not.

Smith: Did you know it existed?

Staufer: I heard about it.

Smith: Who were some of his friends?

Staufer: In Vail here? Well, you had some locals that were just fun people, like John Purcell who had a restaurant here, who just made him laugh. And then he had other people like the Kendalls and the Hanlons and the Gramshammers. They had a lot of friends, yeah. Everybody just thought very highly of him and everybody loved the man.

Smith: We’ve been told that they probably did as much as anyone to put this place on the map as a summer destination. It had always been a winter resort.
Staufer: The first golf tournament, Jerry Ford’s first Invitational, put Vail on the map as a summer resort. You know, it would’ve taken us years to get there, but that put us on the map. In the winter, the first time we were really on the map, was the Championships, the International Skiing Championships back in ’89. I used to go to Austria and say, “I’m from Vail” and “Oh, is that near Aspen?” After the Championship, “Oh, Vail!”

Smith: To people who don’t know, what’s the difference between Vail and Aspen?

Staufer: I would say that Aspen is more of the glitzy, movie star crowd. And Vail is the more serious businessman crowd. You know, the captains of business are here.

Smith: Is it safe to say that Vail is more Republican and Aspen’s more Democratic?

Staufer: It’s fair to say. I would think that, if you say all the Democrats live in Aspen and all the Republicans live in Vail, it’s not quite that bad, but there’s more Republicans here than Democrats.

Smith: Are there names that would be recognizable in terms of business types who would be here when the Fords were here?

Staufer: Well, of the first people that came here, there was John Murchison, the Texan, who was involved in starting Vail. And then you had Watson, IBM.

Smith: Oh, Thomas Watson.

Staufer: Tom Watson was here from day one. And quite a few people.

Smith: You know, this is speculative, but in today’s climate - regulatory and otherwise could you create Vail today?

Staufer: I don’t think so. It’s a one-time happening. Look how many people tried to do it. You know, people had money to spend and they had longer vacations, so they went on a summer vacation and a winter vacation. And the economic climate was just right. And, mind you, we almost didn’t make it in the beginning.

Smith: Really?
Staufer: Oh God.

Smith: How tough was it?

Staufer: It was tough the first few years. I’ll give you one example. I was working for Vail Associates. They had somebody come out and Pete Seibert told me, “You really take good care of those people because they live a banker’s life.” And Vail Associates was $500,000 short. And John Murchison (?) offered them $500,000 for two percent of gross in perpetuity. And those people stayed at the lodge. I was running the lodge that summer, the summer of 1963, and we really took care of them. You know, we took them up on the mountain on a picnic with champagne and they made the loan. It was one of the senior vice presidents and his wife. So they made the loan and they didn’t have to borrow from John Murchison.

Many, many times, it was touch and go. Into the 70s and then, of course, they started Lion’s Head and they were back in problems again. And then they started Beaver Creek, hoping we would get the Olympics. And then the voters of Colorado voted it down. So they started Beaver Creek, hoping for all those funds from the state and federal government, and nothing was forthcoming. And that was another time when VA was very close to going broke again.

Smith: That’s fascinating, because within that context you can begin to understand how important it was to have the Fords up here.

Staufer: Oh yes. Yes.

Smith: Free advertising.

Staufer: Yeah, we’d be out everyday in the news. Vail, Colorado. You can’t buy that.

Smith: We were told there were Secret Service agents who almost competed to be on the detail to be out here, and reporters who loved to come out here.

Staufer: Yeah, it’s amazing. And then, of course, you started lots of other things like the international conference that he had.

Staufer: Yeah, he started that and that brought leaders from all over the world here. And, again, that’s when we were in the chips. And he put us there.

Smith: Tell me about Mrs. Ford, because you must’ve gotten to know her.

Staufer: Yeah, she was a very kind lady.

Smith: Did she ski?

Staufer: No. I don’t think so. I shouldn’t say no. The kids skied and he skied, but I don’t think she ever skied. But she loved the summer here.

Smith: And the Alpine Garden, she was obviously involved with that.

Staufer: Yeah, she was very much involved in getting that started. And, of course, Ford Park, when we originally got the property, we condemned the property to create the park. And the money to do something with the park was only because of Ford. I mean, the people gave money because it was Ford Park and they were close to Ford. That’s how the money came to build the stage.

Smith: And both the chapel here and the one at Beaver Creek.

Staufer: The chapel here I think he helped start, but that was way, way back. But the Beaver Creek chapel, definitely. So he was a great benefactor to this town and the whole valley, actually.

Smith: Were they very visible around town, even into their later years?

Staufer: They went out for dinner, they went out for lunch, and people saw them. But, you know, the family skied together, the kids skied, and other than that, you know, I guess he still kept pretty busy being involved in helping politically some people.

Smith: Do you know what kind of skier he was? Is there a consensus?

Staufer: I’ve never seen him ski, so I can’t say.

Smith: I’m interested, because you’re from Austria originally, right?

Staufer: I’m originally Austrian, yeah.
Smith: And Pepi is from Austria.

Staufer: And, Pepi, of course, is Austrian, yeah.

Smith: When did you come to this country?

Staufer: When did I come here? I came here the first winter.

Smith: Was that an accident? Why so many Austrians in Vail, Colorado?

Staufer: Well, I lived in Bermuda for seven years and we decided to leave Bermuda because you can’t get unlisted(?) Bermuda, you can’t own a business there. Even if you put all the money up and do all the work, a Bermudian has to have 51% of the interest in the business. So, we thought, “Okay, let’s go to the United States.” We had a shop lined up in California in Santa Barbara. And, about eleven o’clock at night, the next day I was leaving Bermuda, somebody told me about Vail, Colorado and I thought, “Well, why not look at it?” So we flew to Denver and rented a car to come to Vail. And I said to Hertz, you know, “I want to rent a car to come to Vail.” “There’s no Vail.” She pulled out a map to prove that there was Vail Pass and there was Frisco, Minturn, Avon, but no Vail. And I said, “Oh God, what did we do?”

So I started driving and it was bitter cold. In Bermuda, we left and it was in the 80s. We come up here and it was, I think, the first time it was 30 below zero. And my wife, you know, “Where does this road go?” “There was no interstate, there was just US 6. And she said, “Does that go to California?” and I said, “Yeah, I think it does.” “How long can we keep the car?” “As long as you want to pay for it.” She said, “Okay, let’s go tomorrow morning.” I still had the people that told me to come here, and then Pete Seibert took me up the mountain and I came back. My wife said, “Are we ready to go?” I said, “No, we’re going to stay.” I’d never seen a mountain like it.

Smith: What was special about it?

Staufer: The way it was laid out. I mean, there was as much of a mountain as there is now, but the bowls were there. The two big bowls and it was just an incredible mountain.
Smith: So, you saw enormous potential.

Staufer: Yeah, I thought, “If anything makes it, this is going to make it and I want to be part of it.”

Smith: That’s interesting. Someone has described Vail-Beaver Creek as “the last resort.” The last “from scratch development.”

Staufer: Right. And I don’t see anything coming up, either.

Smith: Were there other prototypes? I mean, for example, Sun Valley had been created almost out of nothing.

Staufer: Sun Valley had the train.

Smith: That’s right. Averill Harriman.

Staufer: And a lot of people from Sun Valley were partners here just at the start. They all skied in Sun Valley and they all came here to Vail. Yeah, that’s how they met and that’s how they decided to come here.

Smith: So, I guess, you’ve survived not getting the Olympics just fine.

Staufer: Oh yeah, we survived. As a matter of fact, in the long run, we were better off. Ford was better for us than the Olympics.

Smith: That’s very well put.

Staufer: It didn’t cost anything! We got paid for it!

Smith: That reminds me. He was a real fiscal conservative.

Staufer: Yeah, right.

Smith: And he had a reputation for not being the best tipper in the world. Did you ever see that?

Staufer: I never heard that.

Smith: You never heard that?
Staufer: No. I think that most of the time he went out, there were other people paying the bill anyway.

Smith: But they were clearly generous in their involvement with the community and various activities.

Staufer: Oh yes, they were.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Staufer: I think it was the Fourth of July here at Pepi’s terrace when Sheika gave a little lunch for him. That’s the last time I think I saw him.

Smith: Was that in the last couple of years of his life?

Staufer: Everything seems a couple years ago to me.

Smith: He passed away in December of 2006. They did come up here that summer, but went home early.

Staufer: Yeah, I think that it might have been that summer because he was helped by people walking. So it may have been that summer or the summer before. I think that’s the last time I saw him.

Smith: And the Fourth of July.

Staufer: It was the Fourth of July.

Smith: They reviewed the parade, is that right?

Staufer: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Tell me about the parade.

Staufer: We were standing on the balcony seeing the parade go by and then we went down on the terrace for lunch.

Smith: And it's just a classic sort of small town Fourth of July parade?

Staufer: Oh, yeah, Fourth of July parade. A few too many cars, everybody that has an antique wants to go in the parade and show off his car. But they normally get a pretty good parade together. Beats the old times when we had maybe half a dozen and one was the fire truck and one was the police car and the sheriff’s car.

Smith: I’m told that every year, he would also turn on the lights on the Christmas tree.

Staufer: Yes, that was a happening. All the people came just to see the lights.

Smith: Where was the tree located?

Staufer: Right where the children’s fountain is now.

Smith: Anything else? Any other stories or anything that you can recall?

Staufer: Well, I’m sure after I leave I can think of all kinds of things and I’ll give you a call at three o’clock in the morning.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Staufer: I remember him as the most generous, honest man I’ve ever met in my life other than my father. He was generous in terms of spirit and I will say he wasn’t tipping very well, I don’t know that, but he was a generous man. And he was a politician whose word I would trust and I don’t trust too many politicians. You know, he was just the most honest man you could have.

Smith: Not a bad way to be remembered.

Thank you.

Smith: First of all, thank you very much for doing this.

Morcus: It’s my pleasure.

Smith: I have to ask you what your reaction is on being back in this room.

Morcus: It’s completely in tears, actually, and really of joy that I’ve been here with the man, that I know him for so long and I just can’t believe it. It’s still the same. The only thing, that chair, I always sat right there and he sat over there.

Smith: When did you first meet?

Morcus: Probably ’68. He was a Congressman. In Vail, Colorado. He was staying at the Manor Vail, Manor Vail condominiums. You can stay there for the skiing. We had a grocery store in Vail, Colorado and he came there. I was an owner, not a working guy. He knew I was there and he came down to the meat counter and said, “What kind of meat shall I buy today?” And I showed him, because I’m a butcher by trade, and I did and that’s the first time I saw him.

Smith: So you were a butcher and he was a Congressman?

Morcus: I owned supermarkets. I had a chain of supermarkets going and I was in the store, just visiting to see because I had an operation manager partner. I wasn’t working, I didn’t work in the store, but I was there checking on them and he was there and he kind of knew that I was in there. And said, “What kind of piece of meat should I get?” I showed him the steaks and he got some meat, and they went. That’s the first time, so a couple times probably, until occasionally even socializing or whatever. Just not really much until he became vice president. When he became vice president – no, no – he bought a condominium in the lodge in Vail.

Smith: And what was that like?
Morcus: It was, I think, a two-bedroom condominium on the second floor. But across the street from it, in ’69, I built a lodge of about 75-80 rooms, with a penthouse on the top and a restaurant and shops on the bottom and underground parking. So, he bought the condominium across the street. So the only thing – he was on the second floor, I am on the fourth floor, I’m looking right into his living room – you could wave from the distance and whatever. And still, at the time, just “hello” and “how are you?” All of a sudden he became vice president. But in the meantime he was coming, I owned the Left Bank Restaurant, which is across the street, I’m sure you’ve been in it.

Smith: I’ve heard of it. I’ve never been to Vail.

Morcus: You’ve never been to Vail?

Smith: You’ll have to describe it for us.

Morcus: The Left Bank Restaurant was a restaurant – I got a Frenchman - his wife was British from South Africa – and I put him in business just to run a restaurant in the place that became vacant from people who went broke. I was looking for somebody and he didn’t have money to buy something, so I put him in business and gave him an interest in the business. So it was a very popular restaurant, so the Fords came there for dinner when they were in town.

Then, all of a sudden he became vice president, and he was across the street from me and they [Secret Service] came down and in front of my lodge they parked this god-awful, what do you call it – trailer? What is it – the one you drive instead of being a trailer? RV. And they put this huge big RV, and then the Secret Service were there and everybody was there and then I find out that’s when he became vice president. He’s driven there and that was the command post.

So we got to know the Secret Service people. There were some events that happened in his honor and we were there for the celebrations and whatever. One day, I remember talking to one of the Secret Service people and I said, “You guys are stupid.” They got to know me - they said, “What do you mean stupid?” I said, “Well, you know, here I am, he’s the vice president, and I’m up there in my room. I could just aim at him anytime I want to, and I could see him and whatever, and you guys never even bother to check me – whatever it is.” He said, “What do you want to know about yourself? He said, “We know everything, all about you and we know every move you’re making” and so on and so forth. So, that’s the relationship.

So naturally when he became president, he was completely moved out of there and rented a place and they put him there – the Bass house, which was on the east side of Vail, right by – almost Manor Vail where he used to rent when he used to come to the Vail area. And the rest of it – when he became president – was history. And I got to know him really, really well.

Smith: Now how, when he became first vice president, and then president, how did that impact Vail?

Morus: Oh, tremendously. It was a tremendous, tremendous thing. It was the whole thing. When he became president I was building another lodge, which turned out to be a big resort 400-500 room resort-hotel. And they needed, the Secret Service, they became very much all of the entourage, I think when he became president – was it in ’74? And that fall, ’74, happened in the summer, and what’s his name – his detail guy that used to be there? Bald-headed guy, God love him. He said, “Kaiser, we need to book your hotel for the Secret Service.” I said, “Well, I am building it now. I just broke ground a couple or three months ago.” He said, “Well, I’m sure you are going to get it.” I said, “Well, okay, I’m going to get it done in December, for Christmas.” It was the biggest tool in my hands, ever for the general contractors and everybody to get the place ready for Jerry Ford, the President of the United States, the Secret Service coming to the town. I was able to deliver it on time, and have all of the Secret Service and we became the headquarters for them, all throughout the times.

So what happened with the president, as far as impact, when he became, when he went for re-election and he was campaigning with Bob Dole, I threw a benefit for him in the resort in Vail, Colorado. I probably raised $150,000 those days because everybody in Vail showed up and put money just to come to shake their hands and everything else. I still have all of the pictures and everything with Elizabeth Dole and Bob Dole and the president and all the rest of them. So we became kind of a more and more – even when he was president – I had the great privilege and honor and the scared you-know-what about playing golf with him when he was the president of the United States.

Smith: And where did you play golf?

Morcus: We played at Eagle Vail golf course. There must have been several thousand people there and whatever, and helicopters hovering and every policeman in the county came over just to be there, and Secret Service galore. Here we are and I stand on the first tee and I’m trying to hit the ball and I’m shaking, shaking, like this. And I said to myself, “What will my mother say if she knew I was here – I’m an immigrant from Lebanon. I came from Lebanon in 1956 – and to be with the President of the United States.” To play golf with him and all of these people, it was phenomenal.

Then I am riding in the golf cart with him, with two other people. So we get to play golf, so I went there and I’m shaking and I hit the ball and I’ll be darned if it didn’t go over 225 yards – right down the middle of the straight – which I don’t usually do that. And it took the pressure off until we got to the fourth or fifth hole, and we are playing golf and the Secret Service is just kind of moving around, moving around the golf course with him as he rotates. They were all sheltering him, all a shield, and on the fourth hole I saw a golf cart coming with a canvas. I went to the Secret Service guy who I knew – I got to know them all because they are all staying in my resort, eating in my resort, spending money in my resort, and I came to know them.

So I said, “What’s in that cart?” He said, “You don’t want to know.” I went there about ten, fifteen minutes later and said, “You going to tell me what’s in that cart?” He said, “You don’t want to know.” I said, “Well, tell me.” He said, “Well, there is enough stuff in there to burn this area in two mile squares. You understand now? Get off my back.” And naturally, and I am riding with him, I was so scared the rest of the day the golf game went to hell. That was fun and that was a tough golf course. So, anyway, that’s the story and we finished playing golf and then it was later on that I gave him, I think, the campaigning and everything else, and unfortunately, it didn’t happen.
In the new year, for instance, I remember this one time – it was forty-five below zero – the chill factor in Vail, Colorado. New Year’s Day – Betty was out of town and we were all to be at his house at eight o’clock in the morning on New Year’s Day to go – no, no – at nine o’clock to go there and watch the football games and whatever. And it was he and I, Bob Barrett, John Purcell(?), a few of the gang from there – about four or five of us. I got down to the parking lot, couldn’t start my car – nobody could start a car – it froze. So we walked about the equivalent of two city blocks, and I remember stepping on that snow and it crunching and squeaking like a piece of music, rhythmic. Your nose froze, whatever. So we went over there and we watched the football game all the time and that evening we had dinner there at the house and after the football game – like seven-eight-nine o’clock, we decided to go on the town and he wanted to go with us. We went to the bar – a Mexican restaurant, Los Amigos, ordered drinks, and he says, “I want to buy for this.” You know, that’s the kind of a guy he was. I wouldn’t have paid for this, because nobody was going to pay for this, because the owner of the restaurant was with us walking over there. So we spent the night – we went to a couple of bars and those times he was having a drink or so, and we ended up going home. It was the New Year – I think ’75 or ’76, then the election was after that.

So we spent a lot of times in Vail, golf when he was president, I played golf with him that one time, which was an honor and fear at the same time. It was something else.

Smith: What was he like to watch a football game with? Very focused on the game?

Morus: Oh, very, very intense, especially if it was a Michigan. I watched the games many times with him later on, because the story comes later – we became next door neighbors in Beaver Creek and all of that stuff. So, he was very intense and he liked to bet five dollars on a game or something like that.

Smith: But I assume you didn’t chit chat during the game.

Morus: Oh, no – he was seriously involved with the game. He was really seriously involved with the game and, naturally, with commercials and stuff and we’d talk or whatever. It was different because when we watched the games, Betty wasn’t around so it was a freewheeling bunch of guys and it got loud.

Smith: Now, you got to know Mrs. Ford.

Morus: Oh, very well. Yeah.

Smith: Tell me about her in those days.

Morus: She was everything – she was the greatest for us, with us. We became comfortable and got to know her really well when we all moved to Beaver Creek. Before we really didn’t get to know her that much, other than “hi” and “how are you?” and knew who we were. Until we moved to Beaver Creek, my relationship was, all of that time, with the president. With Mrs. Ford at several events, naturally she was there and we talked and just the normal things would be, until we decided actually one day, he and I were talking and he said, “Well, I’d like to go to Beaver Creek. I want to build a home in Beaver Creek.” And I said, “Okay.”

Then we got with Leonard Firestone and Dee Keaton, Darius Keaton his name was. Dee Keaton and myself and we just put the deal together and got four lots. His lot was – the Vail Associates were very much receptive to the idea – he had to get the lot just to get in there, and we got one architect and we got one contractor and we got four interior designers, each one had their own interior designer, and we started designing our homes. We found out the wives were kind of talking with each other and all of a sudden, I have four bathrooms, no I have five bathrooms, no I have six bathrooms, and the sizes of the houses ended up being – his house was eleven or twelve thousand, my house was eleven thousand square feet, Dee Keaton was at ten-five, and the richest man of us all, Leonard Firestone, the smart-alec was at eight thousand square feet because he had the common sense of controlling whatever, just to show you.

So anyway, we got to know each other naturally, with my wife and her and after we moved in. I had the privilege and the honor to host New Year’s Eve in Vail, Colorado for a number of years – maybe fifteen, twenty years, and I would say most New Year’s the president and Betty were there. Sometimes, maybe once or twice, she wasn’t feeling good or something, but we had it all done. Especially when we moved to Beaver Creek, every New Year they were there and Christmases and kids and whatever. Just like next door neighbors.

Smith: One difference, most next door neighbors don’t have Secret Service agents hanging around. I’m trying to visualize how remote or accessible this area was. Did you have tourists or rubbernecking people?

Morus: There was a command post with an area where the Secret Service – there was no gate – there was a cul-de-sac, there were four homes, before the cul-de-sac ends on the left hand side, there was a house. On the other side there were two or three empty lots, so there was no…there were the four homes, really, that you consider next to each other. So the Secret Service would know who is coming and whatever. The tourists would come in and circle and go. If somebody stops, then the Secret Service…there was very, very much control.
It was very comfortable, and naturally for us, it was so safe for us that the Secret Service…

Smith: Were there often tourists?

Morus: There was. It wasn’t really overly done. But, it was a lot of people came and gone to his house. And whenever he had guests – that overflow from the house ended up being in my house.

Smith: Really?

Morus: Oh, yeah.

Smith: Didn’t they entertain President Clinton at one point? Didn’t they play golf?

Morus: I wasn’t there. I was gone, I think, after that. I left Vail in 1989-90. The Clintons were after that. My days were Macmillan.

Smith: Really? Harold Macmillan?

Morus: Macmillan used to come a couple, three times to the symposium that the president sponsored.

Morus: The World Form, right. And it was always done at my resort because it had the biggest meeting facilities and all of that stuff. And then Macmillan was staying at the president’s house and he and his wife used to come for tea every afternoon to our house because my house manager was a very, very delightfully New Zealand-British kind of speaking girl - that kind of really with pizzazz and everything else - and she put the tea and all of that service which took us – she knew more about it than we did.

Smith: Now let me ask you – was that Macmillan or was that Callaghan?

Morus: Callaghan. I’m sorry. Callaghan and his wife and then Giscard d’Estaing was there, too. Frazier from Australia was our houseguest for a couple of times – stayed in the house for all the time. And many other people. All of them from Greenspan to Scowcroft, who were just like out partying every night, practically, they would end up. Because I had a lot of stuff happening in Vail, and I had one of the most famous nightclub and resort and dining rooms - complete resort – and everybody in town went there one way or another. We used to have a lot of parties over there.

Smith: Let me ask you because I’m trying to get the chronology: Mrs. Ford, of course, had her intervention in 1978, I believe it was.

Morus: Right. That was before we built the homes – after the intervention, I’m sorry to interrupt – in ’79 the planning of the houses was done. Around ’80 when we start construction, and we moved in ’81.

Smith: Okay. Were you aware of her problem?

Morus: Absolutely.

Smith: How apparent was it?

Morus: Well, not really too much apparent, but you know, like if she didn’t show up for a reason or another, we kind of…we never talked about it, never said anything about it. I was very close to Leonard Firestone, as well. Leonard Firestone was very – I spent a lot of months and days with him, with Leonard Firestone.
Smith: And he had a serious problem?

Morus: He had a serious problem, and I remember one day when he came over to the restaurant, we had a golf tournament and we were having dinner or something in one of my restaurants in there, and he took the glass of wine and he said, “Screw it,” more or less, and he takes a drink – a couple of sips out of it. But the man controlled it. After that he didn’t touch it. He said, “I’m not going to worry about it, I know how to ____________ it,” because we all looked at him – how could you do that? This is before Mrs. Ford was intervened with. And after that, after the intervention, it wasn’t something to talk about, other than to know what’s going on and hope and pray that things will work out, which it did work out.

Smith: But in later years, did they talk about it? She obviously, and Leonard Firestone…

Morus: Oh, she talked about it very openly. She even was very influential for one of my own children. I have my number three son who was having problems and unbeknown to me, he goes to her and asks to see her and talk to her at the house in Beaver Creek. And without her discussing it with me, or with my wife, or with anybody, she helped him arrange for, not here at the Betty Ford Center, but someplace in Aspen, Colorado, and she got him down in there and he’s been sober for twenty-one, twenty-two years, and he is still sober. She helped him with everything and she never said when I confronted her, not confronted, but she said, “That’s none of your business, this is the way we do business.” And she helped him out and that’s the way it was.

Smith: She saved a lot of lives.

Morus: A lot. And she was very open about it, and unashamed, and she saved a lot of lives and helped a lot of people. Maybe at times she was overly anxious to help people, too, sometimes. Some people say, well, maybe ____________, but very few people didn’t appreciate it.

Smith: I take it they were very visible around Vail.
Morcus: Oh, absolutely. Very visible around Vail. They were very visible around here. Many, many, many a time, we’d go out and play golf. I mean, golf was like once or twice a week, even after he retired. He is the reason I am in this area, because after he lost the election and I called here and talked to Bob Barrett, and he said, “Well, come on.” At that time I knew Penny fairly well and everything. No – that time Penny wasn’t around. Bob Barrett. Penny didn’t come until ’76.

I came here and we went out and played golf at Indian Wells Country Club, and I came here and I loved the area and across the street called the Springs Club. It was a brand new club, one of the best new country clubs in the area. I walked across the street, I picked up a lot that was under construction. I bought it sight unseen, signed for it and I bought a house across the street – only because I knew, even though I had a home in Newport Beach, I said, well, this is going to be less crowded because at that time there was nobody here. Nobody here.

Smith: Really? How was it different then?

Morcus: Well, it was just a small town. You go five miles to go find a restaurant. There was nothing. This, across street area, Morningside over here, was all sand. The Morning Springs was under construction. The hospital was one-third of what it is today, maybe one-fourth. All of the buildings – you want to go to a restaurant, probably go three or four miles to find a restaurant. It’s all vacant land and quiet and I used to have a second home because I got sick of the snow and cold weather and in the mud season I got out of town for a month or two and go enjoy myself. And Newport Beach got so crowded, and here was so pleasantly whatever.

I kept the house in Newport Beach, after ten years I go there only once or twice a year. I ended up selling and started living here completely. So I was here. He is the reason I came to visit, see and play golf with he and I and Bob and whatever, and I became a part-time resident here, and eventually a full time resident. It’s a very interesting story.
Smith: I know their names are attached to places at Vail. The amphitheater and the garden.

Morus: Oh, sure. I remember when we had the grand opening for the amphitheater. I was there. Was there when it was starting [to be] built. The amphitheater, as well. There is the Jerry Ford Street, the Jerry Ford Elementary School and on and on.

Smith: Since 1968, I assume Vail has exploded.

Morus: Maybe eight times more. I haven’t been in Vail since, when was it? Sometimes in the 90s, when they had their 85th birthday or whatever. There was a big party in Vail, Colorado, and we were invited and we flew from over in Carmel, because I had a home in Pebble Beach. We flew there to that event for about three or four days and it was held at the lodge in Vail.

That was the last time I was in Vail because that trip I was there for three days, four days and three nights, I think I slept two and half hours because of the high altitude, and I’d been gone for a long time. And without dropping any names, we flew with Clint Eastwood and his wife, and Dee Keaton and his wife and myself from Carmel. Clint got his jet and we flew over there with them, and then we came back to Carmel. When we arrived in Carmel I knew I’d never come back to Vail, so I went and bought a place in Pebble Beach. The same thing, I bought a place here because I knew I’d never go back to Vail because of the altitude.

Smith: That’s interesting you say that because, certainly the last summer of his life, and maybe before that…

Morus: And I have a couple of stories about that, go ahead, please.

Smith: I was going to say, all of their friends were urging them not to come back, for that exact reason. And, of course, Mrs. Ford would say, “At our point in life, we’ve had the quantity of life, we want the quality of life.” And they obviously loved Beaver Creek - to the point where they would be willing to risk their health to come back.

Morus: May I give you a couple of stories about that?
Smith: Yes.

Morus: Before that, I’m trying to put a parallel into people’s lives and how it works. I was having dinner one night with Dee Keaton, with the wife, with the neighborhood, and Firestone and myself. It was in June. Leonard Firestone was leaving for Vail, Colorado that following morning. The three of us sitting in a corner in one of my restaurants here in Palm Desert, having dinner and I said to Leonard Firestone, “Leonard, I wish you would come to your senses and not to go to Vail because that climate, that weather, is going to hurt you. Is going to kill you.” And he unloaded on me so bad. That really was hard. “Why don’t you mind your own business and telling people what to do,” and Leonard is a lot older than me. And I said, “Okay, I’m sorry. I am sorry. I should have minded my own business. Let’s enjoy our dinner. Have fun.”

That fall, actually in September, or maybe even in August, Leonard was forced to come back, because of his health. And he came here to Palm Springs. He called me and I came to see him. And then Leonard Firestone apologized, he said, “I am sorry that I jumped down your throat. You were right.” Leonard Firestone passed on that year. On December 23rd.

Now, two years ago I said the same thing to Jerry. I said, “Mr. President, you know, it’s getting…” and he said, “Mind your own business.” Because I lost a lot of friends. Another dear friend in Colorado Springs ended up the same thing with the high altitude, so I know how I felt when I went to Vail. I’m not a wise man, but you care about your friends and you start the conversation, but he put me in my place.” He said, “It’s none of your business.” I said, “Okay, Mr. President.” And he told that to everybody that told him, because I know a lot of people who told him. He didn’t want to hear it. I think the last couple of years, Mrs. Ford was on the oxygen when they went to Vail.

Smith: Don’t you think, in part, he didn’t want to hear it because he didn’t want to acknowledge to himself that he shouldn’t be there?

Morus: Probably.

Smith: That he’d gotten to the point physically that…
Morus: It could be that he doesn’t want to admit that, and it could be a part of his independent way of doing things. You don’t tell him anything, you don’t tell him anything.

Smith: He was a stubborn man.

Morus: Oh, tell me about it. Oh, yeah. Oh, how well I knew that, and, I went through, for some reason my life with him wasn’t a politician with politician. Someone that needed to accomplish anything – my relationship was together, whatever it is at the moment, and there was no demands on it whatsoever. There was no demands, whatsoever. I didn’t expect anything and I lived for the moment and whatever it is.

And that is why, like when he had his knee surgery, the first knee surgery. I came here to see him after he got out of the hospital. And then we went to Vail in the summer. He comes to Vail on July 4th, he calls me next door. He says, “I feel like I’m going to be able to play golf.” “Okay,” that’s wonderful. He said, “Well, we’ll pick you up, we’ll all go in my car. The Secret Service will drive us.” So we loaded the clubs and we go to the Country Club in the Rockies, which I’m a member there. And we go to the range and take the bags to the range, he lifts up the club and we go to hit balls. Instead of my going to hit balls, I was standing there - I want to watch him. I figure he might collapse, his knee is going to collapse. I just wanted to be there. I don’t want to be involved with my golf game. He pulls the four iron out of his bag and he hits it 225-250 yards right down the middle. And we go play nine holes of golf, just he and I.

Ironic enough, the second time, when he had the second surgery with his leg, a few years later was here in Palm Springs when he called me and said, “Let’s go play golf. Steve is here, my son.” I told him I’d bring my son, so his son and my son and he and I went to play golf because most of the golf courses were closed – it was in the fall. And we went to Mission Hills and we played a round of golf, his first round after his second knee surgery. And he and I took on the boys and we kicked their butts. That’s the competitive – he was so damn competitive.
Smith: Was he very competitive?

Morus: He wanted to beat the hell out of you, man. He wanted to win everything. He doesn’t want to lose, he hated to lose. And you know, this is the kind of relationship – and this is the simplicity of the man was so unbelievable – the simplicity and his being a commoner. One Christmas, Christmas morning about eight, nine o’clock, we’re still in pajamas and somebody at the door. So I come down to the door and it’s him. He, himself, coming in, “Here, we got you this one in here, for…” I looked at him and I said, “Mr. President,” it was almost a quart or a half of gallon of caviar, Beluga caviar. Beluga caviar – that’s a thousand dollars! “Mr. President…” “Oh, yeah, we have some more, but we thought you would enjoy it.”

We went and ate caviar. But that’s the way – to be honest with you – he didn’t even probably know the value. And if he did, it didn’t matter, because that’s the kind of a man he was. And we had all kinds of stories. We could go on and on and on. And my life was very fulfilled. I never asked him to do anything for me, nor did he ask me. We’d all go down for dinner, we’d go out, we’d entertained, we’d play golf.

Smith: You were probably one of the few people who didn’t ask him for things.

Morus: I would just have to say, probably, yes.

Smith: Let’s face it. He was surrounded by people who, often with good intentions, and I assume you must have seen, one of the things that probably drove him up the wall after a while were the autograph seekers. People who wanted autographs.

Morus: Oh, yeah. Oh my God. We used to kind of protect him. Like in the restaurants, keep people away and stuff when he’d come over to the restaurants. Just say, keep them away from him, whatever. Sometimes he was annoyed. Other times he was just whatever, he’ll do it. I had the same problems with Clint Eastwood. I spent a lot of years around him and he was one time stampeded at Indian Wells country club – and to the point that they probably would have run over him because the autograph seekers can take it and sell it for $25 a shot.
But yeah, we protected him without him knowing. Without him knowing as far as around the public, and naturally there was always the Secret Service. Especially when he was president, every time there was an event you had to submit your name and get a clearance, no matter whether you were cleared before or not. You got to get your clearance again. You go to the party, and there is fifty people or sixty people in the party, there is twenty Secret Service and everybody, no matter where he is, piercing you with their eyes. Watching every move you make. It was to the point of almost uncomfortable. But the Secret Service were to protect him.

Smith: And as someone who had been the target of two assassination attempts, he had to be conscious of security.

Morus: Oh, yes. Two assassinations that didn’t succeed. Did she get – she was going to be pardoned, Fromme, whatever, but I think they refused her.

Smith: That’s right. They have refused.

Morus: Just recently, a few months ago.

Morus: Oh, we talked politics for what’s happening in the day. The Republican Party – what’s going to happen, what’s happening in the Middle East, we shared a lot of conversation because he knew I was from Lebanon and all of that stuff. But not really deeply in politics. As I said, my relationship with him was purely – it didn’t matter – whatever is comfortable. You want to come for dinner? The office would call, the president is coming for dinner. Fine, we’ll make arrangements. And every time he came to the restaurant, I’d try to leave him alone and there is ninety-nine times out of a hundred, “Sit down and talk to us.” He wanted to sit down and catch up with all of the stuff. We talked a lot about other things. Politics – only when elections – opinions – what's happening, but never deeply enough that he…Maybe he’d tell some stories about certain things that happened that’s not secret or whatever at the White House. I miss him, really miss him.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?
Morcus: Yeah, I came to see him here in the office, probably nine months ago. Nine months before…

Smith: So he was still in the office?

Morcus: Could be a year I came here to see him – over a year. Maybe longer, I don’t know. When he took ill and I knew he was ill, I stayed away. I communicated stuff with Penny and with Richard Casenbach(?). When he became ill, no, I didn’t see him. I saw him before. I came down here to visit. He was sitting there and I was sitting here. No, I think I came once to the house, too, after that. I’m trying to remember. I don’t know. Probably.

Smith: But you never saw him ill?

Morcus: No, not really ill, no. I did not see him ill. And thank God I didn’t.

Smith: He was a workaholic, wasn’t he?

Morcus: Oh my God. Never stops. Never stops – always on the go. I told him one time, I said, “Mr. President, when you going to slow down?” This is a few years back. He said, “Why slow down? I’m feeling good, I’m enjoying myself and I’m making money.”

Smith: He took some grief about making money.

Morcus: He took a lot of grief, unfairly so. Unlike Clinton, he made hundreds of millions of dollars and they criticized him, but not to the extreme that they criticized him.

Smith: Because he did a lot of charity work – President Ford. And of course, he had to raise that money to build that library-museum back in Michigan, which seemed like an awful lot of money.

Morcus: I was there for the grand opening. I was there when they had the whole dignitaries. As a matter of fact, we were his personal guests. We went there and spent about three or four days. It was raining like – whatever.

Smith: What do you remember from the funeral? Because you were in Grand Rapids for the funeral?
Morus: No, no, no. I’m sorry. I wasn’t in Grand Rapids, I was in Washington. I didn’t go to Grand Rapids. I saw you speaking someplace else.

Smith: Were you surprised when you heard of his death?

Morus: Not really. We thought we knew it was coming. I was constantly communicating and knowing what’s happening all the time.

Smith: For someone who never knew him like you did – it’s a name in a textbook, or an old film clip – what should people know about Gerald Ford that maybe they don’t know?

Morus: That he was probably the truest human being that’s ever lived. The most honest man that ever lived. His honesty and integrity was so unbelievable that he was unwavering and he treated everybody the same. He was so phenomenally that way – at least this is my experience with him all along. He didn’t have to pretend. He didn’t have whatever – he was truly the man that he was. He was right there with the humility, with a really simplistic way of doing things – he wasn’t pretentious, he was all of the above. He was truly a great man because he was a great man.

Smith: Do you miss him?

Morus: Oh, yeah. Often times I think about it. We talk about it and I say many times, I’m the only one left out of the crowd. Seriously, because there was Jerry Ford, there was Leonard Firestone, Dee Keaton, the foursome. We were there all the time, we done a lot of things together, we used to bring a golf teacher together, the four of us and go play and take lessons for a couple, three days. And I say, all my friends are gone. I am the only one still.

Smith: But how lucky you are to have had those experiences.

Morus: How could you describe that? How could you describe that, especially a kid that came from the old country that was penniless and homeless and couldn’t even speak hardly any English? To come to this country and ended up being to that level, is beyond…and for me to be there and to continue to be there, is something that I cannot – I can’t describe the feeling about it. It was unbelievable. How did I do that? Why did I do that? Why did it happen to me? Why did I have that experience? Lucky, I guess.

Smith: I don’t think it was just luck. That’s perfect, that’s a perfect rap. Thank you.
Smith: I guess the obvious place to begin is, how did you find yourself in the Ford White House?

Lazarus: At that time, most of the young Republican lawyers in the city were discredited, as you know.

Smith: By Watergate?

Lazarus: Yeah. So, I was approached by three fellows who were assigned the task of finding some lawyers to work with Phil Buchen. That was Jerry Morgan, who worked in the Eisenhower administration, Ed McCabe, who also worked there, and Bryce Harlow.

Smith: Legendary figure.

Lazarus: But I talked to McCabe and Jerry Morgan. Jerry Morgan was, I think, the first legal counsel to President Eisenhower and then after Sherman Adams, everybody got bumped up and then, I think, McCabe became legal counsel. So, they recruited me.

Smith: Do you know where they got their authority?

Lazarus: I believe they were on assignment from the president, basically. He had some sort of informal group put together to take care of staff and they were part of it.

Smith: It’s interesting that he would go back to Eisenhower people. Harlow was, as I say, a legendary figure. Ford has been described as Eisenhower without the medals. So, you came into the White House when?

Lazarus: Almost immediately after President Nixon’s resignation, which I think was August 9th.

Smith: That’s right.
Lazarus: Shortly after that. I was, at that time, chief counsel to Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee. And very shortly after that, I spoke with Ed McCabe and was then put in touch with Phil Buchen. I worked with him briefly before I went on to the White House staff. And I think I went on to the White House staff in September.

Smith: Tell me about Phil Buchen.

Lazarus: Phil was a fine man and a good lawyer, but he had no background in Washington. He was basically, I think, a trust lawyer transposed into Washington. So, he had good legal analytical skills, but he had no background or training experience in all the kinds of issues that come up here.

Smith: It’s interesting you characterize it that way, because there is this school of thought, maybe caricature, that Ford brought with him all of these Capitol Hill and Grand Rapids types - that was said with a certain degree of condescension - but clearly they were people he trusted and had worked with for some period of time. Buchen being at the top of the list. I detect, from what you say, Buchen had the skill, the raw talent, and he had the instincts or the character or whatever the job called for, but he didn’t have experience in this town that is uniquely valuable if you're going to be in the White House.

Lazarus: That’s right. And, also, Phil didn’t have any of the gangster about him. He was so close to the President at the outset that he could’ve preempted substantial segments of the White House operation, but never did so. He wasn’t interested in that. He was more interested in working with the President one on one in deciding matters, so he didn’t go out and do a lot of work, analytical work, or anything relevant to the questions that came up. Other people would tend to do that and then he would sit with the President and talk them through.

Smith: Was he a sounding board for the President?

Lazarus: I think the President trusted his instincts.

Smith: One of the recurring issues that we’ve encountered in the course of this project is that among the challenges Ford confronted was providing the right mix of change and continuity. In terms of just administrating the White House, deciding what to do with the Nixon holdovers. Clearly most of them had nothing to do with Watergate. and our sense is that he wanted to be fair to them. Many of them were very talented and he needed that talent to keep the place running. At the same time, Rumsfeld has said, and others have confirmed, he was strongly urging Ford to clean house early for the symbolic value. Did you sense tension between, for lack of a better word, the holdovers and the newcomers?

Lazarus: I think you described it very well. I think, in terms of the tension that existed, the President, as you know, is a very fair man and went out of his way to be decent with people. I sensed the frustration on the part of Rumsfeld and other people with getting rid of the old people. Several of the Nixon people did stay over and became central to Ford’s White House operation. I’m thinking of Mike Duvall, Jerry Jones, they all stayed over.

Smith: Terry O’Donnell.

Lazarus: Well, I don’t know what he did in the Nixon administration, but the other people, certainly Mike Duvall, was an active member of the Nixon administration. He wasn’t the very top level, but he eventually became quite close to the President.

Smith: While Ford was vice president, clearly there were those in the White House who questioned whether he was up to the job. Was there any of that, again, for lack of a better word, condescension detectable in any of the holdovers, people whose loyalty to Richard Nixon was such that they questioned Gerald Ford’s capacity or even legitimacy?

Lazarus: I don’t think so. If it did exist, I think it was there in absolute minimum. Obviously, a lot of those people who felt an allegiance to President Nixon were upset by the circumstances and that might’ve been reflected in their thinking and their actions. But I don’t think that was any part of it. When you work up close with a person, you see the real person. When President Ford came into office, he looked more like a congressman from Michigan than a President of the United States. He had not gone through the crucible of primaries and obtained that patina that presidents have. He obtained it later.

Smith: The trajectory of the Ford presidency is of someone coming into the office, in many ways unprepared, and learning how to be an executive as opposed to a congressman without ever jettisoning, totally, his congressional instincts. The first day that they’re actually living in the house, he’s walking up to the West Wing and – classic Congressman Ford – the Marine opens the door and the President walks over and sticks out his hand and says, “Hi. I’m Jerry Ford. I’m going to be living here. What’s your name?” Now, that’s a congressman speaking.

Lazarus: There’s also, in the beginning and throughout his term, that he suffered fools far too much.

Smith: What do you mean?

Lazarus: He would let people go on and discuss things after he had decided them, just because he was polite and he didn’t want to shut people off. So he would listen to them.

Smith: In what kind of context?

Lazarus: I can remember one example.

Smith: Sure.

Lazarus: Ford decided that he wanted a swimming pool at the White House and we had endless meetings on this topic. They were all trying to disabuse him of this pool because these were difficult economic times. But this was a very modest cost and I think it was being funded by minor contributions from children or some such. And Ford sat through three or four meetings where a number of people tried to talk him out of this, said this wasn’t anything more than a backyard pool. And before, he used more colorful language, but then he finally said, “Let’s go ahead and do this.”

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?
Ken Lazarus
July 14, 2010

Lazarus: That was the only time I ever saw him get angry with anybody. Mind you, I was a very young man at that point in time, so Ford was the same age as my father. So I wasn’t chummy with the President. I saw him frequently, but I wasn’t chummy with him.

Smith: Were you there when the pardon occurred?

Lazarus: No, I was there afterwards, but I wrote the President’s testimony, at least the drafts. And briefed him on the pardon power and did his testimony before the House Judiciary Committee and things related to that. So, I came to understand what had occurred, I think.

Smith: Was there an internal debate about the wisdom of breaking that historical precedent and going up on the Hill as he did to testify before the House?

Lazarus: I think there was, but I wasn’t privy to that. I know, myself, I commented to several people, probably Jack Marsh and Phil Buchen, that I thought that they allowed too much time up there for questioning. I thought it was too drawn out and they seemed to agree with that kind of stuff. And I wouldn’t have been surprised if people had tried to talk him out of that, but he felt very comfortable doing that.

Smith: Is that, again, part of the transition from the congressman to the President? I mean, that was his backyard.

Lazarus: I think it was just his open nature. He felt he had nothing to hide and he had done the honorable thing and he wasn’t afraid to go and talk about it.

Smith: Did you have a personal opinion about the pardon?

Lazarus: I thought it was the wise thing to do when it was done and I continue my view today. Mind you, I had worked on the Hill and I participated in the Saturday Night Massacre hearings and all that kind of stuff and I had seen some of the ugliness underlying the President’s resignation. So, I readily agreed that things had gone on too long.

Smith: It’s hard to make people today in this instant, 24/7 news cycle - can you imagine Watergate going on for, what, two years?
Lazarus: Right. No, I think a lot of it was a result of the personalities involved and a lot of other factors as well. I couldn’t see it occurring again.

Smith: When you went in there, how was the counsel’s office organized. Was it re-organized as a result of Ford’s becoming president?

Lazarus: When I was approached by McCabe and Morgan, they originally described to me an office that was different than what I saw. They advised me that Phil was going to be the counsel to the president and told me about his relationship with the president. Phil Areda was to be deputy counsel to the president and my understanding was that he had been given assurance that he would take over the Domestic Council in that capacity as deputy counsel to the president. I would be the associate counsel to the president and I would be relied upon to provide assistance relevant to Constitutional types of issues that I had worked on the Hill, legislative enactments, and all that sort of stuff. When I got in there, I don’t recall a lot of discussion about that. Events took over. Vice President Rockefeller, in effect, was given the domestic counselor’s staff and things changed. Phil Areda left. So, things changed in terms of what my original understanding was.

Smith: It’s our sense that Areda left, in effect, was driven away by Rockefeller. It’s not altogether clear whether that simply was musical chairs - that Rockefeller had been promised a role in domestic policy not dissimilar to what Henry Kissinger played in foreign policy, which also planted the seeds for all kinds of problems down the road. Again, is very much a congressman splitting the baby. Did you know Areda?

Lazarus: Yeah, I worked very closely with Phil when I was there. It wasn’t a long time. And then, periodically, throughout Ford’s presidency, on a regular, maybe bi-monthly basis, Phil would come through town and he usually would come to see me.

Smith: Tell us about him because I know very little about him aside from this apparent tug of war.

Lazarus: Areda, as I understand it, had the job that I had in the Ford White House in the Eisenhower White House. He was the young guy who was supposed to do the paperwork and the analysis and that kind of stuff. He was very, very bright.
Rumor has it, I don’t know if it’s true or not, that Phil had the highest grade point average ever at Harvard Law School and that remains the case to this day, I’m told. He was very bright, a very good student. His expertise was in economic areas and anti-trust, as you know, but he also had very high standards. He was very likeable and decent. I thought he was absolutely first rate and I was sad to see a really first rate guy leave.

Smith: Did he make it clear that he was leaving because of the Domestic Council?

Lazarus: No sour grapes or anything like that. I think once his understanding of the position changed, he just left in a very pleasant way.

Smith: We talked to Bobby Kilberg. How was the office organized at that point?
Who did what? And, did it evolve over the two and a half years?

Lazarus: Yeah, well, it evolved in terms of people leaving over a period of time.

Smith: Were some of those Nixon folks?

Lazarus: No, no. Well, when I came in, it was my understanding, as I’ve told you, that it was going to be Phil Buchen, Phil Areda and myself and maybe a couple of people who weren’t presidential appointees.

Smith: Would that be the typical size of the counsel’s office?

Lazarus: A half dozen or so?

Smith: Yeah.

Lazarus: It’s certainly not the case any longer, but that’s about what was needed, I think. Half a dozen, maybe ten. And Bill Casselman had been the president’s counsel when he was vice president and Bill was going to leave and go out into private practice. He stayed on for a short period of time. So, he was transitional, sort of.

Smith: Is he still around?

Lazarus: Bill Castleman is still around, I think. I think he’s out in Middleburg. I kept in touch with him until about a year or two years ago. Bobby Kilberg came in later. I don’t remember exactly when. And Bobby handled a number of assignments but I didn’t see Bobby’s work as sort of day-in, day-out kind of work. It was more project-oriented.

Smith: Was she the first woman in the Counsel’s office?

Lazarus: I don’t know. I don’t know of any other woman who worked there, but she might well have been. There was another fellow there named Jim Wilderotter who worked exclusively on the Watergate stuff. And then there were a whole succession of people who went into the sort of number two slot after Phil left.
Not a whole succession, but Rod Hills and then Ed Schmultz.

Smith: So, there was a, for lack of a better word, Watergate hangover? I mean, a continuing need to deal with Watergate related issues?

Lazarus: Well, dealing with the tapes was pretty much Wilderotter’s work. He reported to Phil on it to the extent he needed guidance. But I don’t think it was any hangover to speak of. Basically, the tapes were there and they needed to be reviewed from time to time for various purposes.

Smith: Maybe this doesn’t fall under your domain, but I’m confused over the process whereby ultimately the tapes became the property of the federal government.

Lazarus: Yeah, I don’t really know. I mean, there was some legal analysis that led to that. I don’t recall what it was at the moment, if I knew at the time.

Smith: So, what kinds of things would you be working on?

Lazarus: The things that were the most fun that I worked on and those that stay with me is the appearance before the House Judiciary Committee and everything associated with that.

Smith: That was sort of high drama.

Lazarus: I think Ford did a bang up job on that. If you’ve looked at it or recall it, I think Elizabeth Holtzman was the one who went after him the most. I don’t think she succeeded. I think he did quite well. As a matter of fact, I remember him bouncing in the polls at the time by about five or ten points after his appearance. I liked that. I handled the nomination of John Stevens to the Supreme Court.

Smith: It’s funny because we talked to Justice Stevens, and there are so many things that are amazing in light of what we’re going through right now. The fact that the President never interviewed him.

Lazarus: I might say I wasn’t involved in his selection. I did have the lead in terms of handling his nomination. As I understand it, I remember Ed Levi saying that the President wanted to find the best person for the job. That’s what he told Levi. And Levi told the President that he had read all of Stevens’ opinions and that each of them was like an individual pearl in a necklace of excellence. That’s how he put it. I think he sold Ford with that idea. I know, originally, I’d heard when the vacancy first occurred, the President mentioned favorably that he thought Barbara Jordan would make a great Supreme Court Justice. He said that, but just said it in passing. I’m not aware of any further review of that as a possibility. But he mentioned that originally. As far as I know, it came down to Arlen Adams, who was a judge on the court of appeals in Philadelphia at the time, and Stevens. And Levi recommended Stevens and the President went with it.

Smith: It’s also fascinating that in his confirmation hearings, nobody asked him about Roe v. Wade.

Lazarus: I didn’t remember that.

Smith: No doubt that’s the last time that will happen.

Lazarus: I think he was approved unanimously and he had a fairly easy go of it.

Smith: In later years, people assumed – given the story line of Presidents being surprised by their appointees - that somehow the President was disappointed. To the contrary, he was very proud of that appointment.

Lazarus: Yeah, and I think rightly so.

Smith: It’s really one of the last appointments made for sheer talent, sheer ability, apart from ideological considerations.
Lazarus: Well, Stevens, I thought, was the best writer on the Supreme Court. He had superb analytical abilities and he was no doubt the most knowledgeable in terms of anti-trust and other economic and business areas. And, even in dissent, I think it was his dissent in Hallorby (?) case recently - I think Scalia wrote the majority - and you read his dissent, I don’t think it indicates that he’s a screaming liberal or anything like that. I mean, any good lawyer is a conservative lawyer in that he looks for a reason to put further gloss on the law if necessary and his analysis is solid, conservative analysis.

Smith: My sense is, he’s always felt a little bit surprised that people label him as a liberal, because he doesn’t think of himself as a liberal.

Lazarus: He doesn’t think he’s changed he thinks the rest of the world has and I tend to agree with that. Some of the other areas I enjoyed, I’ve been teaching for a number of years at Georgetown. The course I’ve been teaching in recent years is called Constitutional Aspects in Foreign Policy. It’s basically a separation of powers course. And Ford was, I think, a first rate defender of the presidency in terms of separation of powers. And, so, he often would stay the course with things like legislative vetoes. He laid the groundwork, really, for the Chada case that came later in the Supreme Court.

Smith: Which is…?

Lazarus: Legislative vetoes are a way in which Congress used to enact law where they would keep the string on the law afterwards. For example, what you would find is Congress would write a law and implore an agency to do good and avoid evil and give them some general guidance. But then they would say that regulations, for example, wouldn’t take effect until they were proposed, laid before the Congress. The Congress would have the chance to veto them and all that sort of things, where they would try to keep controls and extend their control over what was normally executive authority.

Smith: The administrative realm.

Lazarus: Yeah. And the Chada case in the Supreme Court changed that and knocked out legislative vetoes which had been in practice in thousands of pieces of legislation. Every time a legislative veto came up, Ford would speak against it and indicate that he was fighting against it every chance he had. It wasn’t until sometime later, I think it was during Reagan’s presidency, that the Supreme Court held it. Another thing he did was in the area of foreign affairs. I think it was Congressman Dingle at the time and a number of other people on the Hill wanted to dictate to the President whether he should use treaties or executive agreements in certain situations. They wanted to prescribe which situations in which you’d use executive agreement and the other where you’d use treaties. By law, it’s the president’s choice. They’re fungible. You can use either one. And Ford fought against that. Whenever a principle basis of presidential power came up by my perception, he was Johnny on the spot.

Smith: It’s ironic because, here you have someone who was a child of the Hill, who suddenly finds himself pitch forked into this office that he never aspired to and forced to defend its prerogatives against his former colleagues. The War Powers Act - my sense is that he and those around him (and indeed, I suspect, other presidents as well), strongly questioned its constitutionality, but did not want to test the issue.

Lazarus: It’s funny. I have another little funny anecdote about the War Powers Act. You’re absolutely right in what you said. Phil Buchen could never remember how the War Powers Act worked. It required you to notify certain people in the leadership. Now, Ford, you’re absolutely right, questioned, challenged, the constitutionality of the War Powers Act, and he was right. The War Powers Act is and was unconstitutional. But Ford used to observe the notice requirements in the statute which required you, upon the shifting of substantial numbers of troops, to advise certain leadership people on the Hill. He would do that, but they couldn’t keep straight who you had to advise and what the nature of the thing was and the section number and that sort of thing. So, I could always tell when something was cooking. For example, Mayaguez and these other things. Phil Buchen would tell me to make sure to be around or by the phone at home or whatever. He put me on alert, so to speak. He wouldn’t say what was cooking, but he would let me know so I would guess that there was something going on that they might want to alert Congress about.
Smith: What was the mood around the White House that April when Saigon was falling?

Lazarus: Very sad.

Smith: Did it just permeate the place?

Lazarus: I think so, yeah. It was very sad. Now, I don’t mean everybody was in a funk for a long period of time, but from the President on down, everybody was very sad about that.

Smith: We’ve been told that when it came to budget issues, but others as well, he liked to have differing viewpoints, liked to hear people argue out an issue. Which is not something, for example, that one would associate with, say, Richard Nixon, who I think tended to be much more isolated. Did you see that or take part in that?

Lazarus: Again, I think the best way I can describe it is to give you an example. I remember one weekend day, I don’t remember if it was a Saturday or Sunday, but the subject of no-fault insurance came up. Secretary Coleman had to go to the Hill to testify on the subject the following Monday or Tuesday, so we’re meeting on the subject. Ford had never addressed his position on no-fault insurance. And there was a big legal aspect of the discussion because this would’ve compelled states to perform, to enact certain laws. Not the normal carrot and stick of ‘if you don’t enact this, you lose this subsidy’ or whatever, but to just compel them to try and force the states to do something by executive fiat. Secretary Coleman thought it was constitutional and there were a number of other people on the other side. I remember Levi being there, Don Baker from the anti-trust division, there were perhaps six or seven people there and it was a Saturday. The President, after half an hour or so of the discussion, was pretty clear that he didn’t want to support it. But we stayed there for another 2 or 3 hours giving everybody a chance to come back at him as many times as they wanted to. Eventually, Secretary Coleman ran out of arguments to make. He had a chance to make every single one and he wasn’t getting anyplace with the President. Finally, he said, “Well, Mr. President, I realize that I’ve lost this and maybe if you buy me a beer, we’ll call it quits.” But he ended it. President Ford was willing to sit and talk with him as long as he wanted to.

Smith: Did he ask questions?

Lazarus: Oh, yeah, he was involved. He wasn’t just sitting there. He was participating in the discussion.

Smith: That’s wonderful. Secretary Coleman told us that he weighed in at the time of the Boston bussing issue and as he recounted it the President’s position was,
“You know, Bill, I’m just opposed to bussing any kid further than they can walk to school.” A view grounded in his own experience of the neighborhood school. What kind of conservative was Gerald Ford?

Lazarus: I think he’s what we used to call a ‘country club conservative’. He was basically moderate, perhaps somewhat liberal on social issues.

Smith: Including civil rights.

Lazarus: Yes. And his instincts all went in that direction. And very frugal in terms of money. And strong national defense and very much an internationalist.

Smith: Pretty much a product of the war in that sense. It’s a double-consensus. You have a consensus of the generation that fought in the war, and then found itself in the Cold War.

Lazarus: Exactly.

Smith: Do you think the combination of those things contributed in any way to a kind of maybe unnatural consensus? I mean, people look at politics today and it’s ugly and divisive and yet there is a debate as to whether maybe it’s not more typical of the broad sweep of American politics than the ‘50s and ‘60s consensus that people remember fondly. I wonder whether looking back, the ‘50s and the ‘60s were not in some ways aberrational. You had these preexisting conditions, both the common experience of fighting World War II and before that, the Depression, and then the unifying reality of the Cold War.

Lazarus: I think you put your finger on something, but I think also that the fly in the ointment as I see it is that today there is no incentive for politicians to appeal to the reasonable nature of the population as a whole. And that the real fly in the ointment is the redistricting. People are more and more concerned about creating safe districts, so that you have districts that are 75% conservative or 75% liberal. And the only way people get beat is the conservative gets attacked from his right and the liberal gets attacked from his left. So, consequently, there’s no reason to pitch the reasonable man and that leads to all this exaggerated rhetoric.

Smith: Of course. And the media pouring kerosene on the fire because they need confrontation, and the 24/7 news cycle demands a new story line every day. When he was in office, Gerald Ford was described as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge. Then in very short order, he became this liberal marooned in his own party because Reagan conservatism redefined the party. At the same time, Ford was the last president willing to use whatever political capital he had, plus the veto pen, to try to restrain federal spending.

Lazarus: That’s right. He certainly used it, didn’t he?

Smith: Frank Carlucci told us a wonderful story about going in to see the President. There was something he wanted to talk to him about, this bill. And Carlucci said, “It’s a terrible idea, but I guarantee you it’s politically popular and if you were to veto it, it would be overridden in a minute.” And Ford said, “Well, that’s alright, if it’s the right thing to do.” So he did veto it and, of course, it was overridden in a minute.

Lazarus: Yeah, as I say, he just had a very nice – he tried to do the right thing. I don’t think he gave a moment’s thought to what was political, necessarily.

Smith: Did that hurt him? There is a school of thought that the White House was very slow to anticipate the Reagan challenge. Either to believe that he would run, or to take him as seriously as he warranted. I realize you were presumably insulated from politics. But you were also in the middle of it. Did you ever sense that this was an apolitical White House long after it should’ve been if they wanted to get reelected?

Lazarus: Well, you know, the White House reflected the boss and he was the boss. I don’t think it was a-political, but I don’t think that they focused on the election until they were in the midst of it. I don’t know if that would’ve changed anything in terms of the significant things that Ford decided.

Smith: Do you think that’s in part a reflection of what we talked about earlier? This learning process?

Lazarus: Yeah, I do.

Smith: Plus he had such an incredibly full plate.

Lazarus: Right. And I think when he came into office the furthest thing from his mind was election. I’m quite confident that that’s the case. As he grew in the job and he thought he was pretty good at it, figured he ought to stay around, it was in the country’s best interest to do that. And he went after it. But I don’t think he ever went in there with the idea of getting elected and continuing in office.

Smith: How would you describe/define his growth in office? You say ‘as he grew in office.’ What did you see that leads you to that?

Lazarus: Well, you could see it in all ways. I mean, if you just took pictures of him in the early days and then took pictures of him later on, you’d see the difference. Better turned out, better groomed.

Smith: More relaxed?

Lazarus: More polished presentation in all respects. His delivery improved considerably. And a lot of it was, just as I say, going through the crucible, combat. Political combat improves your situation and he went through that.

Smith: Do you think in the process, he discovered, “Hey, guess what? I can do this job.”

Lazarus: Right. “I’m pretty good at that.” And he was always interested in substance and he was pretty good at the substance and going through all of the combat that the President goes through, political combat. He became better at it.

Smith: I think the Hill would have given him, if he didn’t already have, a very thick skin. We were talking to someone who was not very politically sophisticated, a young staffer who had gone into the White House. The President had just met with Tip O’Neill in the Oval Office and had had a great meeting. And then Tip went out and beat his brains out on the north lawn for the cameras. And this guy only saw the sequel. Anyway, he told the President, “Tip O’Neill’s saying all these horrible things about you.” The President was sort of rocking back and forth, pipe in hand. He said, “Oh, that just politics.”

Lazarus: Well, I always thought the President got a bum wrap in people trying to trivialize his abilities. I’ve been around a lot of big league politicians. Ford was a bright man. A brighter man than Tip O’Neill. And I don’t think that O’Neill ever saw anything political that Ford didn’t see coming either. Ford was a more generous spirit, I think, and just tended not to get down there. He was a very charitable man, you know, all those Midwestern values and everything else are true.

Smith: I spent a lot of time in the Midwest. And my sense is there is a bias against Midwesterners or a caricature, maybe, because some of them talk slow; the assumption is, they must think slow.

Lazarus: Exactly. I understand that on a personal level. I grew up in the New York area and when I came down to Washington, it took me a long time to transition in my speech and otherwise from the New York style to the D.C. style. Ford not only had it stylistically, but that reflected his essence, too. That’s who he was. A very decent, fair-minded person.

Smith: And yet, the least self-dramatizing.

Lazarus: Right.

Smith: Which, in some ways, is the part of the presidency that he never mastered. The theater of the job.

Lazarus: I think that’s right.

Smith: Which tells you more about us than it does about him.

Lazarus: I think that’s right.
Smith: A couple quick things. Deregulation. Were you involved at all in that? Because, clearly, that was a significant policy initiative of the administration.

Lazarus: I was involved in it to some extent, but I wasn’t at the core thing. If you’re talking about deregulation of the airline in particular, which took a substantial amount of time in our office, Ed Schmaltz did most of that and he was assisted by Dudley Chapman, who was another lawyer in the office.

Smith: Are they around?

Lazarus: I think Dudley’s deceased and I think Ed Schmaltz is retired and living in Maine, I think. Ed was deputy attorney general in the Reagan administration.

Smith: Oh, sure, that’s where I recognize the name. You went through more than one attorney general. Would Saxbe have been attorney general when you started?

Lazarus: Yeah, I also handled the nomination of Ed Levi.

Smith: Tell us about Levi because he is to some degree an unsung hero in all of this. Presumably, Ford had a very keen awareness of the need to restore confidence in the Justice Department. Where did Saxbe fit into all of that?

Lazarus: I don’t think Saxbe ever really fit into the office. When I first got out of law school, I went into the honors program at Justice for four years. I enjoyed it very much because it was like an extension of law school. You got to go out and talk with people about all kinds of legal matters that went on, a lot of the young fellows and some seasoned people and whatnot. Saxbe just didn’t fit, especially given the times after Watergate. Levi was perfect because what he was, the dean of this law school now at the Justice Department, (where) you don’t need to supervise people on every little task that goes on, but you need to set the tone and all that sort of thing. And Levi was just perfect at that time. Couldn’t have found anyone better.

Smith: Was he a Rumsfeld recommendation?

Lazarus: I never saw the selection process of Levi. I know that Buchen supported him. My guess is that Rumsfeld selected him and, if so, it was a very good selection.
Smith: Classy.

Lazarus: I worked on his nomination. I worked with him. He tried to recruit me to the department. And the fellow who was my assistant on the Hill became his chief of staff. So, I worked very closely with him. I really liked him and I admired him. He was a fine person.

Smith: We’ve been told initially he had some problems with Eastland and - would Hruska had been the ranking Republican?

Lazarus: Yeah.

Smith: Eastland referred to him as ‘The Bow Tie’. He thought a bow tie was a dangerous liberal affectation.

Lazarus: Well, what happened was, when his nomination went forth, normally you let people know a day or two in advance just so that they can feel like they’re part of the insiders group or whatnot. And that hadn’t been done properly with Eastland and Hruska and some of the older fellows on the committee at that time. Another part of the problem was, Levi in his youth had been a member of something called the Lawyers Guild. And that always raised a problem with the old guys because a lot of the people in the Lawyers Guild went on to become members of the Communist Party back in the early days, et cetera, et cetera. Although, a lot of very bright, young academicians also participated and never went in that direction. Nonetheless, it tar brushed them to some extent. So it was really a mismanagement of the nomination when it was first announced that led to that problem. He had no problems with people on the Hill after that. As a matter of fact, we had breakfast with Chairman Eastman. Do you know who Tom Korologos is?

Smith: Yes.

Lazarus: Tom and I went up there with Levi and I remember that Korologos did something that was really funny. We were having breakfast and Eastland served grits to everybody, including Levi. And Eastland went out to take a phone call during our breakfast and Levi had been pushing these grits around the plate and he turned to Korologos and said, “Do I have to eat these things?”
And Korologos said, “You want to be attorney general?” Levi ate a couple spoons of it.

Smith: My sense has always been this was not a job Levi particularly coveted. I mean, he had a very distinguished career going out at the University of Chicago. Did he have to be persuaded?

Lazarus: I don’t know. He was a very taciturn person. I don’t know if you know him at all, but he would never let on how he was feeling. He was just very much his own man.

Smith: Was he intimidating?

Lazarus: He was never intimidating to me. He had a first rate intellect, of course, but no, he wouldn’t push people around. He wouldn’t do that and didn’t work that way. He had a wry sense of humor and was a very laid back kind of person. I remember one time he criticized somebody at a meeting with the President and the way he criticized them was he said to the fellow, “I don’t understand how a person as obviously bright as you could reach a conclusion like that.” But that was as rough as he got. Ford assumed that Levi knew all law, almost, so at a cabinet meeting every once in awhile, he would say to Levi, “Ed, didn’t the Supreme Court of Michigan decide something on that issue?” And Levi was “Darn it. He got me again.” He liked the President and the President liked him, but they were very, very different types of personalities. Levi was a very private person and Ford was a very public man.

Smith: It tells you a lot about Ford, that he was comfortable with high-power intellects, high-power egos in some cases. He seemed to be completely comfortable.

Lazarus: And Levi was very comfortable with him, too. They communicated effectively.

Smith: I know he had enormous respect for Levi. What haven’t we covered?

Lazarus: I don’t know. I think you’ve pretty much covered everything.
Smith: Again, I realize you were not part of the campaign, but did you think at the end of the ’76 campaign that he’d caught up? Did you think that your lease might be renewed?

Lazarus: I didn’t think we were going to make it, but I was hopeful that we would. I remember being very disappointed when we lost. But, I was still always proud. There’s one other thing I’d like to say. I was always proud of being part of President Ford’s White House staff and I was so happy that he lived long enough, to understand that the American people took pride in him as well.

Smith: Time was good to him. He lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon and, in fact, honored him for the political courage that it took.

Lazarus: His whole life was outstanding. He was an Eagle Scout. Wouldn’t you have loved to have a son like that? You know?

Smith: Lots of people were saying I wish he was my next door neighbor.

Lazarus: Exactly.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Lazarus: I think the last time I saw him was at some golf tournament. I was in the audience. I think it was in Ohio. I went to some golf tournament and I was walking around and he was playing in this tournament and I went up to him and saw him at the tee and said ‘hi’ to him and he said ‘hi’ to me and asked me how I was doing and stuff like that. The last time I had any involvement with the presidency was when I went out to the University of Michigan a couple of years ago when they dedicated a building in his honor. And, earlier, his funeral here in town. As I say, I was never the President’s buddy. I was a young guy and I did legal work there. But I always admired him.

Smith: What a great experience to have, particularly early in your career.

Lazarus: Yeah, I remember the first time you go into the Oval Office. You know, he would let the legal staff use Camp David and took people on Air Force One when he had a chance and stuff like that. He was really very generous to people.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Lazarus: I think as a very decent and honorable man who rose to the challenge.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Smith: Thank you so much for doing this. How did your lives, professional, personal, intersect?

Buendorf: Well, I was a naval officer and when I got out of the Navy and was looking for a job somebody said, “You ought to go into the Secret Service or the FBI.”

Smith: And this was when?

Buendorf: This was back in the 70s. And I threw my hat in both rings; got accepted by both of them on the same day, and took the Secret Service job. I started out in Chicago in 1970.

Smith: And those were tumultuous times.

Buendorf: Pretty much.

Smith: With student radicals and campus unrest.

Buendorf: Well, yeah, there were a lot of demonstrations. So, my beat was in the Chicago office initially, but because I was a little bit older coming out of the military, they sent me to the president’s detail in D.C. So, I got the last part of Nixon.

Smith: Is that the most prestigious assignment in the Secret Service?

Buendorf: Naturally, I would think so.

Smith: But, to an outsider?

Buendorf: It is. For a career pattern, it’s really good to have the president’s detail behind you. When I went there, I had the last part of Nixon, all of Ford, and about half of Carter. From there I was transferred to Denver, back to criminal work. But because I’d headed up President Ford’s ski team, I was assigned to the western slope area and so when any protectee came into Colorado, I would be assigned to go up and ski. I put a lot of miles on the skis my few years.

After a little over four years in Denver, I was promoted as the agent in charge of Nebraska and Iowa. I went to Omaha. They told me it was a promotion and I went along with it. So, I spent just one year in Omaha. I had a call from our assistant director who said, “President Ford’s having a little trouble with his detail out there. They’re not doing the job the way they should and we know that you had a good rapport with him. We’d like to have you take over that detail.” I said, “Well, I just got to the fields and I really kind of like the criminal work. I have my own office and it really feels good.” So they said, “Okay.” The next day, I got the call basically saying, “You know, you could leave Omaha and your next office could be the assistant agent in charge of New York.” I go, “You know, maybe it’s a good idea that I take over the Ford detail.” And it was the right move.

I went out to California in 1983, took over President and Mrs. Ford’s detail and just loved it. They were both special people in my heart and I managed to put the detail in good order.

Smith: Again, I don’t want to point fingers on this, but it’s interesting that there was some level of dissatisfaction.

Buendorf: Some of the things?

Smith: Yeah, what are the kinds of things that would lead a former president into express some dissatisfaction?

Buendorf: A former president’s detail can test everyone to really focus on what their job is all about, and if you get lackadaisical in really doing your job and you don’t pay due respect to the person that you are responsible for, it can become a vacation type detail. And when the detail, in President Ford’s case, was seven months in Palm Springs, five months in Vail, you begin to believe that you belong in the country club atmosphere. And you work hard at driving through the agents that, first of all, you’ve got to maintain what you’re trained to do. You have to keep our reputation within the Secret Service at the highest level. and you only do that by doing your job the right way and doing it without thinking that you belong in that type of atmosphere. Maybe some could afford it, maybe some couldn’t. But they didn’t want to leave, they wanted to stay there because it was not a bad deal. So, there was some fine tuning that had to be done. You had to remind them that, as I was reminded, your next assignment could be New York City. So, you want to make sure that you’re minding your Ps and Qs.

Smith: Let me ask you about that unique relationship. You’re omnipresent, you’re responsible, ultimately, for their safety. I would think in some ways you’re almost treated like members of the family. Yet I assume excessive familiarity is also something you want to avoid. How do you strike that balance? And is that something that is in some ways redefined with each presidential family?

Buendorf: Well, it is. You know, I got very close to the family after going through Sacramento, both with President and Mrs. Ford. But at the same time, you have a professional responsibility to maintain that fine line. There are times that I went from Palm Springs to New York City in the limo, to L.A., from L.A. to New York City, board meetings, back to the airport, fly back to L.A. and drive back to Palm Springs and never say a word and I sat right next to him all the time. It was just the matter of giving him the space. If he wanted to talk to me, I would talk, but I wasn’t going to sit there and hold a discussion about world events, because, first of all, I just wouldn’t do that.

But, at the same time, there’s a respect that he has for you and a respect that you have for him. There are times when you need to be close. You know, on a golf course, he had a bad set of knees before he had them operated on, and sometimes he would get in the little bunker at the Bob Hope Classic or something and a lot of people were around and you knew he was going to have trouble. So that’s when I would ease up to him to “talk,” but really basically letting him lean on me as we’re going up the hill and never create any attention to the fact that he might have needed somebody to put a hand on. Because he did not like someone to reach out and assist noticeably.

Smith: A proud man.
Buendorf: A very proud man, very proud, and rightfully so. He knows when the cameras are running and he doesn’t like to make an error. He wants every shot to be the best shot ever.

Smith: In regards to the Chevy Chase imitations and how the media fostered the image that it did - as that something that bothered him?

Buendorf: He went along with that, but I think deep down that he wanted people to understand what an athlete he really was. As I said, I headed up his ski team. The media were always on him because he paid attention to others around him. He’d be looking at the people yelling at him or waving ‘hi’ or whatever and not paying attention to what he’s doing. That was my job. My job was to make sure that he didn’t trip over his own skis or let the chair hit him, whatever. But the media would be all over it if they’d catch him falling down or something. I told him one day, “You know, you ought to bring the media up here on the mountain and let them see you ski.” And we did and there were an awful lot of media and snow and he never fell. So, we sent the message clearly.

Smith: That puts a whole new twist on it. He was obviously enough of a celebrity that, even while he was on the slopes he didn’t have the luxury of concentrating because there were so many people trying to get his attention.

Buendorf: It usually came at the lift lines. When he entered the lift line, he’d be looking and waving and everything. The line keeps moving and people are in front of you and on the side, so he’d get distracted. That’s when you are kind of doing the nudging and the “This way, Mr. President.” And always respectful, never make it noticeable, just a kind of guiding.

Smith: Is it something that every agent has to learn - that kind of virtual invisibility? Is it harder for some than it is for others?

Buendorf: I think probably some find it a little difficult because cameras seem to be attractive and they want to be seen by Mom and Dad back home and be on the front page. But 90% of the time - and probably higher than that - they’re out there working. They’re doing the job the way they should be doing it and you just can’t get distracted. You’ve got to be focused all the time.
Smith: We talked to Rex Scouten who told us one fascinating thing. Of course, Rex had been Vice President Nixon’s agent and became really close. In fact, the family in California had a room for him whenever he was out there. But he said, “One day on the plane, sort of out of the blue, but obviously something he had been thinking about, Nixon started pounding his fist and he said, ‘You know, I’m just not tough enough. I’ve got to make myself tougher.’” A fascinating window into this man who, by his own acknowledgment, once famously said, “I’m an introvert in an extrovert’s profession.” Tell us something about Richard Nixon that might surprise people.

Buendorf: Well, you know, Bebe Rebozo was a very good friend of his and I was a boot(?) agent. I went out to California several times when they flew out there and he liked to have that private time where he didn’t want anybody else in the limo with him. They’d go take a drive and we’d all follow along behind him. We’d stop at a sandwich place or something and he’d pick up a sandwich. You’ve probably heard of stories. But he’d take a swim in the ocean. I was one of the assigned swimmers that would go out as shark bait, go further out than the President and swim along.

Smith: Was he shy?

Buendorf: Very shy. He would greet you, he’d acknowledge that you were there, but you could see that he was pretty much focused on a lot of other things as a president probably should be. Some presidents acknowledge their agents all the time; others are tied up with other things. You find a former president tends to be quite close. He knows all of the agents’ names and he knows their families, a little bit about their families. That usually comes from staff. The staff fills him in. Penny was very good at keeping him apprised of who’s who and what they do and who their family is.

Smith: As Watergate began to unfold with all of this unprecedented history going on, and you’re in the middle of it, was there speculation? Were there discussions?

Buendorf: I was such a new agent at that time that I was pretty far removed from the day-to-day close in activities that the agent in charge and the assistant agent in charge would do. They’d probably have a better feel for how he was reacting to everything and how it all began to come down. You’d hear a lot of rumors about who on the staff was a hard-nose and who wasn’t.

Smith: Did you have any contact with Gerald Ford while he was vice president?

Buendorf: Limited, just limited. I mean, I was not on his detail. I was strictly on the President’s detail and when he came over, then, of course, then we picked him up.

Smith: How did you learn that there was going to be a resignation?

Buendorf: That day. That day.

Smith: Were you told by your superiors?

Buendorf: Yeah, the agent in charge came out with a notice. It was quite a shocking thing. I don’t know if you talked to Steve Bull.

Smith: No.

Buendorf: Steve was the appointment secretary for President Nixon.

Smith: Right.

Buendorf: And subsequently came to the U.S. Olympic committee, worked in our D.C. area as a liaison, and is now retired. But he was right there putting people in and out of the Oval Office and had a pretty good idea of what was going on. You might want to talk to him.

Smith: Is he in the D.C. area?

Buendorf: He’s in the D.C. area. I’ll get that.

Smith: So, on the 9th of August, when you have President Nixon’s farewell in the East Room followed a couple hours by the swearing in. Were you present for both of those?

Buendorf: I wasn’t present then.

Smith: Okay.
When did you first encounter, then President Ford?

Buendorf: Probably the next day when he was sitting in the office and my shift came on. Business as usual; you protect the President. You don’t know what his last name is.

Smith: No introductions?

Buendorf: No, he knows you’re out there. He deals with the agent in charge and some of the shift leaders on occasion, but usually when you’re brand new, you’re not at that front. You’re outside, south grounds, Rose Garden, entrance to the Oval Office, and then back around again.

Smith: That said, though, there must have been kind of a palpable change of mood around the place.

Buendorf: Well, there was. I sensed a lot of turmoil and most of it was coming from the media side of the house, so there were a lot of requests for press conferences. The head of media was Ron—

Smith: Ron Nessen. Originally there was Jerry terHorst who resigned.

Buendorf: Right. And then Ron came over. So, it was a pretty busy time, but you had a lot of people coming and going. Again, I was not the agent in charge, so I could stand afar and watch it.

Smith: Did you ever have any contact with Bob Hartman?

Buendorf: No. You’d see him come and go, but no.

Smith: When the pardon came, was it a surprise?

Buendorf: Yeah, but, you know, the question had come up oftentimes for President Ford when he gave speeches and you could almost invariably hear “Why did you pardon him?” And he had a very good answer; he had other things on his desk. And at that time, a great deal of it all referred to Nixon, and he said it was time to get on with running the country and “I put that aside” and said, “Let’s get on with running the country.” So, he stands pretty firm that it was the right decision and I agree with him. Of course, when you’re with the President as long as I was, from 1983 to 1993, he tends to influence your thinking in one way or another.

Smith: Gerald Ford lived long enough to know the country had basically come around. And then of course, the Kennedys gave him the Profile in Courage award. I heard him say, “For all these years, everyone asked the same question.” After that award was announced, he said, “They don’t ask the question anymore.”

Buendorf: He was so good at fielding these questions anyhow. The man was so well-read. We’d get in that limo to go to L.A. and there’d be a stack of newspapers beside him that was two feet high and he’d read those papers like a machine. The backseat of that car would be full of read papers.

Smith: He worked very hard at staying abreast of whatever was going on.

Buendorf: Oh, yes. Absolutely. He could pick that phone up and make calls and talk about any subject that was out there in the media and talk well about it.

Smith: Your great brush with history occurred in California in ’75. Was it an accident that you were where you were at that point, or was that a natural progression over the previous year?

Buendorf: Well, at that time, I had been moved as one of the leaders on the shift, so when he came out of the hotel in Sacramento and decided to walk instead of ride the limo which was right outside, my position was right at his shoulder.

Smith: Let’s back up. He was travelling quite a bit. Did the trip have a particular purpose?

Buendorf: He was addressing the state legislature in California in Sacramento. As I seem to recall, there was something about gun control. So, we arrived the night before and stayed in a hotel right by the park in view of the capitol building. That’s why when he got up and saw such a beautiful morning, he decided to walk instead of ride.

Smith: Now, would a president today have that latitude?
Buendorf: Oh, yeah, they do. If they decide they’re going to stop the motorcade and get out and greet somebody, you’ve got to adjust quickly. And sometimes those spontaneous things are less of a threat than something that’s well-planned.

Smith: So, how large would the detail physically accompanying him be?

Buendorf: There were probably ten of us right within close proximity.

Smith: And what’s your job?

Buendorf: Well, mine at that time was right at his shoulder and I would’ve been in what they called the “number one position” in the follow-up car, closest to the President other than the shift leader, which is the first one to be right next to him. So, walking, I’m right at his shoulder, you’ve got the shift leader that’s walking behind him. So, we’re at his back.

Smith: Was there a crowd?

Buendorf: Oh, yeah, the crowd was there because they knew he was at the hotel. So they were across the park and he just bolted across the street with the media hustling and bustling. I mean, it was just chaos.

Smith: To work the crowd?

Buendorf: Yeah, and so the agents that got out in front moved the people to the side of the sidewalk, so when he walked along, he was just shaking hands. And as he was shaking hands, obviously, I was right at his shoulder making sure people didn’t grab his watch or hold on too long, break a hold and whatever. So I’m looking down. Squeaky was back in the crowd, maybe one person back and she had an ankle holster on with a 45. That’s a big gun to have on your ankle. So, when it came up, it came up low and I happened to be looking in that direction. I see it coming and I step in front of him, not sure what it was other than that it was coming up pretty fast, and yelled out “Gun!” When I yelled out “Gun!” I popped that 45 out of her hand. Agents hear this, they covered the President and they’re gone. So now you’ve got this guy in a suit with this big 45 wrestling with this little girl. I got a hold of her fingers and she’s screaming, the crowd is screaming, and I’m thinking I don’t have a vest on, I don’t know where the next shot is coming from, and that I don’t think she’s alone. All of this is going on while I’m trying to control her. She turns around and I pulled her arm back and dropped her to the ground and agents and police come from the back of the crowd.

Smith: Did she say anything intelligible?

Buendorf: Well, yeah. She’s screaming, “It didn’t go off!” You know, “It’s okay, don’t be rough!”

Smith: But you had no doubt what her intent was.

Buendorf: I had it in my hand. I knew what she was doing, she was pulling back on the slide, and I hit the slide before she could chamber a round. If she’d had a round chambered, I couldn’t have been there in time. It would’ve gone through me and the President. So, when I had her down and the agents came by, I handed the gun over to one of the agents, cuffed her and I went back to work because we were one down on the shift.

Smith: And the President went on to see Governor Brown?

Buendorf: Oh, yeah, and when he got back to the plane - you’ve probably heard this before - he starts getting on the plane and Mrs. Ford, who had been off doing her thing, - and he tells the story because I wasn’t there, I was being interviewed by the Bureau at that time - but he said he approached the plane and Mrs. Ford goes, “So, how was your day?”

Smith: Now, was that the San Francisco story or Sacramento?

Buendorf: Sacramento.

Smith: Okay. ‘How was your day?’ I assume he wanted to tell her very gently. I mean, how do you answer that?

Buendorf: By then it had hit the papers and it was all over the news, because from the incident to the time he finished his address to the legislature, it was out everywhere.

Smith: What I’ve always found fascinating about that is, by all accounts, he never told Governor Brown what happened. Brown found out later on.
Buendorf: Yeah, that’s what I heard, too.

Smith: That this had happened in his front yard and the President never mentioned it. And he was quoted somewhere as saying when someone asked him about this, “Well, I really didn’t think it’d be very polite to say someone tried to shoot me outside your capitol.”

Buendorf: Well, it came down so fast that she was not on our radar screen anywhere. The family, the Manson family, wasn’t part of an intelligence group, if you will, that was on the watch list. So I’m pretty sure it was a spontaneous thing on her part. She’s now been released. I guess a life term doesn’t mean you get life.

Smith: How do you feel about that?

Buendorf: Well, I think I’d be more interested in how President Ford felt about it.

Smith: When I saw The Today Show interview with Sarah Jane Moore, I thought it was bizarre that no one was asking about the Ford family. It was all about Sarah Jane Moore.

Buendorf: I agree. They had a lot of media at the time at the incident and they get a lot of media later in their life. It had a definite effect on the Ford family. The kids were happy, if you will, about the outcome, but you could tell there was a lot of concern. Susan, I think, was probably at the top of the list of being most concerned.

Smith: It’s personal, but how did he thank you?

Buendorf: It was personal. He took me aside.

Smith: I mean, how do you thank someone for saving your life?

Buendorf: He brought it up many times in his speech when he’d talk and he’d mention me by name. So, I mean, I got my thanks out of that. For me, it was about being confronted with something and doing the right thing. If I had missed, then I’d be the buffoon.
Smith: But think of it. You still hear about these agents in Dallas who all these years later, fairly or not, blame themselves or feel some kind of guilt. You were able to do what they couldn't do.

Buendorf: Well, it’s the right place at the right time. I mean, you go and look back at the Kennedy assassination and is there guilt with a lot of those agents? Yeah, I think so, because they weren’t in the right place at the right time. They reacted after the fact.

Smith: You said there were about ten people in that detail. Could anyone else have done what you did?

Buendorf: Oh, absolutely. Absolutely.

Smith: But, I mean, were they in the position to see it?

Buendorf: Oh, they were not in the position.

Smith: That’s what I mean.

Buendorf: Yeah, we would’ve been too late. I was the only one that close that could’ve reached her. The other one on the other side of him had already passed. The one behind him could only grab him and move him out of the way.

Smith: Did you see the gun before you saw her face?

Buendorf: Oh, yes. All I saw was the hand coming up, so it wasn’t until I broke through the crowd with her hand in mine that I realized who it was. I didn’t know if it was a kid or what.

Smith: With all of these happy, smiling people wanting to shake hands and so on - she wasn’t pretending to be, in effect, one of them? I mean, she didn’t have her hand out to shake hands?

Buendorf: She was hooded. She had a dress with a hood on and so if we’d had enough time to scan the crowd as we’re going through, an agent would’ve noticed that hood and would’ve had somebody take a look because that’s a little unusual - to be hooded.

Smith: And it was a fairly warm day.
Buendorf: Yeah, it was typical California, typical for Sacramento. But it was one of those things that, given time, someone might have spotted that earlier as a suspicious person in the park.

Smith: Then, of course, a month later, history almost repeats itself.

Buendorf: Yes. I had dropped off to testify in Sacramento or I would’ve been up in San Francisco.

Smith: Which of the two were the more serious?

Buendorf: Well, when you get rounds off, that obviously changes the whole scenario.

Smith: And it was someone in the crowd who deflected her?

Buendorf: It was a Marine that was out in the crowd that grabbed her and pulled the gun away from her.

Smith: In effect played the role that you had played in Sacramento.

Buendorf: Yeah.

Smith: What was his reaction? And, what was Mrs. Ford’s?

Buendorf: Well, you know, they’re a very unique couple. They were. And she was the one who could really pull his chain every now and then. And she’d get in the car sometimes and give him the business. I’d get up in the front and kind of see him and he’d always go, “Buendorf, what’re you laughing at?” “Oh, nothing. I was just talking to the driver.” “Yeah, yeah.” He knew.

Smith: She has a sharp sense of humor.

Buendorf: Oh, boy, she could. And he’d snort a little bit, but he knew he’d been had. So, they had a lot of fun together. He was really dedicated to his family, very much so.

Smith: Did security change as a result of those incidents?

Buendorf: Every time we had an incident within the Secret Service, you change your modus operandi. You had things you’d look at, your mistakes. You’d see what could’ve been done. What happened there was, there were no mistakes.
Everybody did what they were supposed to do. So, that particular scenario was added to the training out at Beltsdale. It changes how people think and how fast it happens and how they react.

Smith: He was quoted as saying that he was not going to let those incidents keep him from interacting with the American people.

Buendorf: And that’s when you go to your agents and you go, “Tune it up, boys, because we’ve got a job to do and we cannot fail.”

Smith: Did he wear a bulletproof vest?

Buendorf: There were occasions, yes. Now it’s pretty common. If he decides he doesn’t want to, and there were occasions when President Ford insisted on having things his way, then you could only advise and then move on with things.

Smith: Did you detect a certain Dutch willfulness at times?

Buendorf: Just a tad, but being from Minnesota and coming out of the Midwest, I’m a little bit familiar with that approach. Maybe that’s why we got along so well. But he could make it very clear when he needed something done and needed it done yesterday.

Smith: He was a very self-disciplined guy in all sorts of ways. Did you see his temper?

Buendorf: Oh, yeah. You could see it coming and that’s when you’d beat a retreat. Give him a little room.

Smith: What kinds of things would…

Buendorf: Well, there were a few things that he did not like. Not being on time was a big factor for him. I’ve heard him dress down campaigners that he’d gone out to campaign for and had them in the back seat of that limo and lectured them about timeliness, because he was a man that went by the clock.

Smith: Which, of course, is the great irony being married to a woman for whom the clock was her enemy.
Buendorf: Yeah. And that’s where you get to it all the time because he’d get in the limo in Vail and go, “Okay, go on to Denver. That’s an hour and ten minutes. Let’s see if we can break the record.” And I’d be going, “Who’s going to pay the ticket?” “Well, I know you can go 67 in a 60. Seven miles over.” And I’d go, “Who’s giving you this advice?” There’d be one of those exchanges in the car. “Ah, you always go by the book.” Then it’d be Buendorf, it wouldn’t be Larry. It’d be “Buendorf, you’re always going by the book.” “I’m keeping you out of trouble. I don’t want you getting a taxi cab.” But Mrs. Ford could put that on him, too. When he started that stuff, she’d do a little tuning on him, too. I never felt his anger against me. I could see when he was upset about something that was going on around him and to kind of defuse him at times was part of being able to recognize what was happening. But he was very careful about it. He didn’t blow up. He could blow up in his office at times.

Smith: He was such a workaholic. He would’ve been in there Sunday if he could get anyone else. I’ve heard wonderful stories from Penny and other folks - of course, you would’ve been gone by then, but you certainly would’ve recognized it after 9/11 and the anthrax scare, someone had to explain to him why he isn’t getting mail on Saturday. He literally had staffers putting on these anthrax suits to go through the mail.

Buendorf: I did not know that.

Smith: So he could have his mail.

Buendorf: Well, he spent that time in the office and he would go in there, except if Steve was on TV.

Smith: Really?

Buendorf: Oh, yes. Then you don’t bother him, you don’t call him, and you don’t go knock on his door, because he’s watching Steve on TV.

Smith: The soap opera.

Buendorf: Soap opera. That was one time you didn’t want to go in there.
Smith: And Mrs. Ford, too?

Buendorf: Yeah, I think she watched it at the house. She occasionally would come in to the office and watch. That was kind of always an interesting time.

Smith: That is funny. And I’ve been told when he was at the White House, Saturdays, he’d watch football if he could. On one hand, you didn’t interrupt him, but on the other, he’d get the butlers in and say, “Come on in. Sit down. Watch the game.” We’ve been told that the permanent staff was really very fond of the Fords. That they treated them very well.

Buendorf: There was nothing phony about them and still, to this day, Mrs. Ford was hands-on with Betty Ford Center. I mean, she’d go there daily and it wasn’t a distant show of face. She was in there helping, doing her thing.

Smith: He was so proud of her. They’d have their annual alumni event or whatever it was and there are stories of him cooking hot dogs as one of the troops - she was the general.

Buendorf: That was really him. And when she gave up drinking, he gave up drinking. And he didn’t cheat because we’d be on the road and they’d come out with a toast on something, he’d make sure that I’d made sure that that was not alcohol.

Smith: Really?

Buendorf: Yeah. And when he wanted Susan to give up smoking, he gave up smoking. I asked her every day, that pipe would light up because he couldn’t smoke at the house, so he’d get in that limo and light up that pipe and the inside of the limo would be full of smoke and I’d roll down the window a little bit up front and he’d go, “Uh, Larry, could you roll that window up?” And I’d go, “Could you put out that pipe?” But he sacrificed for his family. He loved them all dearly and Mrs. Ford was his angel. No doubt about it.

Smith: Let’s back up. He loved to travel, didn’t he? One sensed that when he was in Congress, that was part of the problem - that he was on the road as much as he was. Did he feel any guilt about that? Because, we hear stories, touching stories, a day wouldn’t begin or end without a call to her.
Buendorf: That’s a good question for Mrs. Ford or their family because I’m not really certain how they handled that, but they all seemed to accept it. I never heard any negative things about it.

Smith: He took heat, you know, after leaving office, for ‘commercializing the presidency.’ People didn’t pay attention to the charity work that he did and the college campuses that he visited. Plus, he had to raise the money to build the museum and library. For someone who never spent much money in his campaigns, that must have been pretty daunting.

Buendorf: Well, you take a look at other former presidents, they didn’t have to go through what he had to go. He didn’t come out a multi-millionaire. And he didn’t live in the fanciest house in Washington, D.C. prior to moving into the big house. So, I think he remembers his life in Michigan and how it was, you know, real Midwestern, small town.

Smith: He went back to Grand Rapids (office) often.

Buendorf: He did. Grass roots. I think that he remembers that life, what Michigan did, he was very proud of his college.

Smith: Yeah. Oh, yeah, that was his second home.

Buendorf: Yeah, absolutely.

Smith: Did he ever talk about his football days?

Buendorf: Oh, every now and then, but I never really heard him talk about how good he was. He just talked about the team and the successes of the team. He never talked about ‘me’ and ‘I did this’ and ‘I did that.’ It wasn’t his style.

Smith: This may be an awkward question. One senses, perhaps unavoidably, that after the pardon the relationship with Nixon could never be quite the same. Did you ever see him with Nixon?

Buendorf: I know that they talked and I think he had a concern about his health and how he was handling everything, because he’s a compassionate person. But, it was a discussion that I’m sure was only with his closest friends or within the house.
Smith: Who were his close friends? Leonard Firestone clearly was.

Buendorf: Right. Firestone was very close. Bob Hope was very close to him. Bob Hope could try those jokes on him so often and you’ve probably heard them all. We’d hear them, and President Ford would go give a speech and we could tell which joke was coming up. You know, “Here we go. This is going to be another Bob Hope joke.” Some of them he didn’t get straight for awhile, you know, he had to get a little help on them.

Smith: He wasn’t a natural joke teller.

Buendorf: He was not, which made it even funnier for us because we’re out biting our lips so that no one sees that we’re about to burst into laughter, but he stumbled a little bit about a joke or get two jokes mixed up.

Smith: It was also known that Mrs. Ford has a somewhat ribald sense of humor and that would usually go over his head.

Buendorf: That is a fact. Which, like I said, made it even more fun. It wasn’t laughing at him, it was a laughing about him, because it was so typical of him being focused on critical things that ‘this is not important,’ ‘this joke is not important,’ but he’d always kind of open up his speeches with something about, you know, that he was the only person that could play three golf courses simultaneously. So, it was always kind of fun to hear him over and over.

Smith: I thought that he got better as a speaker over time.

Buendorf: Well, he did, but you know some of the speech cards were getting a little dog-tailed after awhile. But he did extemporaneous - type speaking a lot better. The Q & A’s, he really performed quite well.

Smith: Did you see him with young people at college campuses and that sort of thing? Was he comfortable?

Buendorf: Yeah, he had three or four kids that were right there keeping him tuned up.

Smith: When the Squeaky Fromme incident took place, they briefed Nelson Rockefeller on what happened. And his question was, “What’s a ‘Manson “gang’?” Which is just emblematic of the fact that most politicians are not particularly tuned in to the popular culture. I mean, they’ve got their own preoccupations.

Buendorf: Absolutely. They don’t get into that. They don’t know who the rock stars are.

Smith: But I assume in his case, having teenaged children probably addressed some of that.

Buendorf: Well, I think probably Mrs. Ford got it and tried to explain it to him. So, that’s the way I would picture it happening because I think that his reaction would be, being a good naval officer - I was a naval officer, so I understood some of his thinking about how certain things have got to be this way and then she probably explained, “Well, it doesn’t have to be that way.”

Smith: That brings up a big question. Most of us, as we get older, we tend to get a little more conservative. They were exceptions. Did he change? Did she influence that? Did the children have an impact?

Buendorf: I don’t think he changed a bit from what he was when he left office until the day that he passed away, because I think that he had the ability to analyze things that other people rush through. And he didn’t rush through these things.

Smith: That’s interesting.

Buendorf: He had a better grasp, I think, on what was happening economically and he recognized some of the mistakes that were being made by the various presidents at various times. He spoke, not often, but sometimes, he would send the message that maybe they could’ve done something a little differently.

Smith: Tell me about his intelligence. I lived in the Midwest long enough to conclude that there’s a bias against Midwesterners. It’s thought that because they talk slow, they think slow. How did his mind work?
Buendorf: He was a thinker. He absorbed a lot of information and stored it and could draw upon it at the damnedest times. I mean, out of somewhere, something he’d read years ago, he could pull that out someplace and present it in some type of dialogue with somebody or give it in a speech. But he was so up-to-date on current events that it’d be difficult to debate him because he was just so on top of stuff. I think that the young candidates that came running for office at various times that he’d go out to support…I just had to smile at because they couldn’t hold a candle to him when they got into a discussion. He had great retention and a great analytical mind, but you almost see him start thinking about how to express himself and do it in the right way to win the argument, if there was an argument, or to make his point.

Smith: Certainly those years, ’83 to ’93, coincided with the period of his unlikely friendship with Jimmy Carter. Were you surprised initially?

Buendorf: Yeah, because I think that I don’t know who swayed who over, but I have a feeling that President Ford swayed Jimmy to his way of thinking. And I think he won him over because Carter actually began to realize just how smart and how lucky he was to have won over this man. And I think that probably drew them together in discussions. I knew that they talked a lot on the telephone. He paid visits.

Smith: And they seemed to be perfectly comfortable together?

Buendorf: Yeah.

Smith: And the wives, too.

Buendorf: Yeah. Like I said, I think that Carter probably realized that he was pretty lucky.

Smith: It’s interesting. Two things come to mind. One is, I’ve often thought one of the things that may have brought them together was that they both ran against Ronald Reagan.

Buendorf: Probably.
Smith: I will never forget being on Air Force One, going back to Michigan, and the sight of President Carter walking up and down the aisle of the plane with Gerald Ford’s youngest great grandchild on his shoulder. I mean, if people could only see that image. You wonder why is it that we have to have elder statesmen. Why can’t we just have statesmen?

Buendorf: Well, when you become a former president, I think the pressure is off in a lot of ways and you do things differently, perhaps become more yourself, instead of having to be under the magnifying glass all the time. I think that changes.

Smith: Tell me about Vail. What it meant to them and what they meant to the place.

Buendorf: Well, you know, when I first came to the detail, headed up his ski team, we stayed at the Bass House, which is right in town, not too far from the lift. Again, I was on the clock and couldn’t ski at ten o’clock. At ten o’clock, you’d better be there because he was on the clock. But he really enjoyed getting on those skis and, by the time I took over his detail and they had moved to the big house in Beaver Creek, he was no longer skiing. But he had a routine up in Vail that was, again, predictable. We’d do the mail run every day at a specific time. He knew what time the mail was being delivered at the post office, so we made sure we were there. Loved to play golf; loved his golf. And he could play. He could hit that ball a long ways. Shank every now and then. Don’t we all? But that was his day. Get up in the morning, he’d swim. He’d go to his office and do his paperwork, whatever it was. He’d go get the mail. He’d have his lunch. He’d go play golf.

Smith: And he was pretty accessible to the press.

Buendorf: Oh, yeah. And I mean they were very social there. They had a lot of good friends in Vail that you’ll meet. So, he spent a lot of time with them.

Smith: One senses that they got in on from the ground floor.

Buendorf: Yeah, they really made Vail. They brought Vail from being just a little sleepy town like some that still exist in Colorado, to this raging resort. They both played a role in that. He’d be on the slopes. Mrs. Ford with her garden. They brought some culture to the city. They did a lot.
Smith: And, of course, there was the annual AEI event. The World Forum.

Buendorf: I forgot about that. First of all, they’d started out with the Jerry Ford Golf Tournament and that drew a lot of celebrities and a lot of people from the front range area up to Vail. Then you had the World Forum that he brought. I think Vail used them a bit to help them along and he was happy to do it because he felt he had a special relationship with Vail.

Smith: We talked about his daily routine in Vail. What did she do up there?

Buendorf: Well, you know, her days were kind of spent socializing with others. She didn’t play the golf, but she’d go to lunches and she loved to have the family up there. She spent time with the grandchildren, with her own children. So, she enjoyed the house. She liked being there, but she’d go out and do her own thing, go into Vail and visit her friends. But usually the evenings were together or with friends.

Smith: Where were their favorite restaurants that they’d go to?

Buendorf: Yeah, usually they’d go to Pepe’s. Gramshammers were very good friends and they usually went there several times. But they had other places that they like to go to.

Smith: One of the most poignant stories we were told came from Lorraine, the family cook. Talk about being treated like a member of the family – she’d never seen snow, she’d never been in an airplane. She was scared to death the first time she got in the plane and the President had the pilot explain everything to her and the engines, et cetera, all this. And when they got up to Vail he took her almost by the hand to the ski school and they got her clothes.

Buendorf: And they had those that were practically part of the family. At the White House, Benji was at the White House and he was a very big favorite of President Ford’s.

Smith: Now, who is he?

Buendorf: Benji Ramos.

Smith: Was he a steward?
Buendorf: Yeah. And I think Benji came out. Penny would have to verify that. I think, initially, when he left office, that Benji was with him. I just don’t recall. But they had their friends within the staff.

Smith: Were the kids there frequently?

Buendorf: Yeah, at Christmastime, of course, they’d all show up and then during the summer, they kind of did it in shifts. They’d come up at different times so they could each one have their individual personal time.

Smith: And how was he as a grandfather?

Buendorf: I think he was actually pretty good. He spent time with the kids. He couldn’t go skiing with them, but in the summertime, he’d take them to wherever they wanted to go. I don’t know what it was like inside the house, but it seemed to me that he was quite close.

Smith: I’m told that the Fords distinguished themselves by trying, for example, at Christmastime not to schedule events, so that the agents could have some kind of holiday of their own.

Buendorf: That’s true. Well, they knew that we liked Vail, so they would go to Vail at Christmastime because everybody would bring up their family, their friends, or whatever and make it a two week vacation. And I rotated the shifts so that everybody got their fair share of midnights and daytimes and four to twelves. So they were pretty thoughtful about that.

Smith: Another thing that might surprise some people was just how strong their faith was. Did you see that?

Buendorf: Yeah. It was not a false faith. They practiced good Christianity. That’s to say, that they were both compassionate, they cared about others, obviously. Take a look at the Betty Ford Center. I mean, she took this on because she saw a need and he supported her all the way. Firestone played a big role in that. And it became very successful. It was not for show. It was all work. Long hours for the agents that had to go to the Betty Ford Center and not go in because we gave her that; she did not want agents standing on top of her.
Smith: Does that change over time? For example, Susan, as a teenager, probably had an attitude about not wanting to be followed.

Buendorf: Probably.

Smith: As people get older, does that relationship evolve?

Buendorf: Yeah, you know, it becomes a convenience in a lot of ways and you walk into the house and the car is there and you get in the car and you go into the restaurant and you walk in and there’s a table there waiting for you and you get up and the car is waiting for you and you go back home. I don’t have that luxury here.

Smith: That’s interesting because there are two sides of the street here. On the one hand, you don’t want the agents taking for granted pretty nice digs. I suppose you don’t want to be taken for granted either.

Buendorf: And they were very careful about that. President Ford knew what we were required to do and what we were not required to do. When he had his bad knees and we flew commercial and he always wanted to carry his own hang-up baggage; carried everything in the house, so you could see that he’s having trouble with it and I told the agents, “Here’s the deal. We don’t carry bags. I will carry their bag and when I do, I’m out. The job is yours. I’m out of the play. I can’t do anything.” So, with that understanding, I’d get off and I’d go, “I’ll take that, Mr. President.” “Oh, okay. Give it to me.” I’d fall back. The agents would take over and we continued to do our job the way it should be done.

Smith: In later years, after you’d gone, the issue arose as their health began to decline…what’s the role? The Secret Service are not medical providers. How did he deal with aging?

Buendorf: I don’t think he ever felt that he was aging. I think he felt he was just as strong as ever, could keep up with anyone, and I think that he proved it. I mean, he’d get out there, could he walk the golf course? No. But he got in and out of that cart and he hit the ball a mile and he did his swimming. He recognized that his knees were not the best.
Smith: I assumed he always watched his diet.

Buendorf: Yeah, he did. They did. He loved his ice cream, though.

Smith: Especially butter pecan.

Buendorf: Yeah. Yeah, he did like his ice cream. He could pass up deserts all day long until you put that ice cream in front of him, disaster.

Erik: I remember seeing his arm in a sling. He hurt his rotator cuff or broke his arm at some point?

Buendorf: I think he had a rotator cuff problem, but I don’t know when that occurred.

Erik: They told him he couldn’t swim for six months or something and he was irritated.

Buendorf: Yeah, that would be putting it mildly. When he had his knees replaced, poor Penny, she was under the gun all the time. At that time, we moved our perimeter further out. We gave him all of the room he needed.

Smith: She didn’t have that option.

Buendorf: No, she didn’t have the option. She was in and out there all of the time. Poor her.

Smith: He doesn’t strike me as someone who would’ve been a very good invalid.

Buendorf: No, he didn’t like, you know, heaven forbid, you put him in a wheelchair. Oh, no, no way. No, that wasn’t going to happen. I gave him a lot of credit for trying to do. I think a lot of us males are that way, you know, we’re not sick. We can still climb ladders and leap over buildings and do all of those things. But there comes a time where maybe you ought to slow down a little bit. I never got the impression that he really wanted to slow down at all.

Smith: It’s funny you say that because I sense he was really in extraordinary health until right about his 90th birthday and right about then, I think, the doctors basically told him you really can’t travel anymore. And I think for him that was a little death of sorts. I mean, not to be able to do what he loved doing had to have been a disappointment.
Buendorf: Well, he was on a lot of boards and anyone who thought that they put him on a board for just using his name were in for a very rude awakening because when he went in, it was about knowing the business, knowing what to discuss, having input, and in a lot of cases, taking charge. I wasn’t in the board meeting, but I was close enough to know that he wasn’t going to be sitting back there waiting for them to say, “It’s good having you here.”

Smith: He was never a figurehead.

Buendorf: No. No. That was, again, his lifestyle, the way he was brought up.

Smith: They enjoyed New York, didn’t they? Before Christmas they’d go and see shows and she’d shop and that was something they looked forward to every year.

Buendorf: He had agreed with Mrs. Ford that this was a week or two week vacation and was good for all of us. I saw more shows than I probably ever would’ve seen if I’d gone by myself.

Smith: We heard that they saw The Lion King and they also saw The Producers.

Buendorf: And she did shop.

Smith: Was she an impulse buyer?

Buendorf: No. She usually went on a mission.

Smith: Was it clothes that she was shopping for?

Buendorf: Clothes and things for the grandchildren. When I first came to the detail, she cornered me pretty early on and said, “You know, Larry, we don’t have any women on our detail.” I go, “Well, what does that mean?” She goes, “I think that you could find some.” “Let me see what I can do, but I’ll tell you this. If we get women on the detail, they’re not going to be assigned to you.” I said, “They’re going to be assigned according to needs of the detail. So it might be with the President, some might be with you. It’s not going to be, you get the women, he gets the men.” “I agree.” So I went out and recruited and got women to come mainly because I said, “You come to my detail and give me two years and I’ll get you to whatever office you want with the director, of course.”

Smith: There’s a famous story while she was in the White House, and her male agents gave her a flag for the car, the bloomer flag - because the President had a flag. Is that a true story?

Buendorf: Yeah. Well, I’d heard it, but I don’t know if they flew it or not. I think they might have presented it to her. But she’d get out there and go in shopping, I’d make sure that maybe one female agent and then the other two would be males.

Smith: New Yorkers are famously indifferent, but I assumed she’d be recognized.

Buendorf: Oh, yeah.

Smith: How did that work? How’d she handle it?

Buendorf: Well, of course you’d have enough people, you’d probably have four or five agents that were with her at any time and just gently asking people to give her a little space, she’s out shopping, too. Not hands-on. I said, “Don’t take anybody down because they want to get her autograph, but try to be polite and courteous.”

Smith: Did she handle it well?

Buendorf: Yeah.

Smith: People are nice most of the time.

Buendorf: Yeah, she’d usually be very busy, try to stay very busy and that way nobody would interrupt her because they’d have to wait until she wasn’t busy.

Smith: Did you go with him overseas?

Buendorf: Yes.

Smith: Was there a lot of business-related travel?
Buendorf: For the most part, it was all business-related, you know, some conference or something that he attended. But they’d take personal time, too. When we went to Paris and she’d go shopping and he’d go to his meetings.

Smith: We talk about opposites attracting - on the surface, the thought of Gerald Ford and James Callaghan who was an old-line Labor socialist, Helmut Schmidt, German socialist and Giscard who, for all of his fine qualities, has a certain top-lofty aspect to him. He’s not Grand Rapids. And yet they all seemed to hit it off famously.

Buendorf: You know, he had that affect on people. It’s the ability to change gears when you meet people. Meet their level, and he could click it up to the highest level or he can be the Michigan boy out there and talk to the boys about football. He was good in the international scene. He really was. I think he was well-respected. They acknowledged his expertise. He was effective.

Smith: I was in Rome in December for Christmas. Did he ever go to the Vatican?

Buendorf: Yes, he did.

Smith: Was John Paul II then the Pope?

Buendorf: I think, yes.

Smith: So, they had an audience?

Buendorf: Yeah. And I forget who went in there. I didn’t go in because I had some Catholic agents on the detail. One was a female and one was a male. I sent those two in. I figured it was safer for me to be on the outside rather than on the inside.

Smith: Are there places overseas that he enjoyed especially visiting?

Buendorf: I can’t think of any particular place. I think that he really enjoyed Paris the time we were there. He hit the weather right. It was nice.

Smith: You left the detail in ’93?

Buendorf: Yes.
Smith: What were the circumstances surrounding that?

Buendorf: Well, this job came up. They came up to interview me and said, “Would you be interested?” I was eligible to retire, so I thought, “Well, a bird in the hand,” and it sounded like something I would really enjoy. I had an opportunity to go to New York. One of the corporations where President Ford was a board member wanted me to come.

Smith: In a security role?

Buendorf: Yeah. So, New York City, Colorado Springs… It was Colorado Springs.

Smith: Did you discuss it with him?

Buendorf: Yeah, and he knew what I was going to do. He attended my retirement party from the detail.

Smith: Was it awkward at all?

Buendorf: No, he was very encouraging. He said, “There comes a time in our career when we move on to something else. I think that this would be good.” He said, “You’ve done a great job with the detail. You’ve brought it to the level I would like to have it remain at and I’m sure that he’s passed that word on to those that took over.”

Smith: You’d more than validated his phone call to you ten years earlier.

Buendorf: Yes.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Buendorf: It was up in Vail. I drove up specifically to say hello. It was maybe one year before he passed away. Had a half hour with him in his office and talked about times, a few laughs, told me I was looking a little bit older, my hair was turning gray. I said, “No, it’s pewter. It’s not gray.”

Smith: Did you sense that was going to be the last time you saw him?

Buendorf: I did. Penny was kind of keeping me apprised of what was happening, so I knew I wanted to make a trip to see him. As a matter of fact, it came up one time after that and Penny said, “I don’t think you want to see him.” So, I didn’t.

Smith: Have you seen her (Mrs. Ford) at all since?

Buendorf: No, I haven’t. Not since the funeral. But I communicate with Susan every now and then just to see how she’s doing. Penny, of course, is right on top of it, so I talk to Penny all the time. Our friendship goes back.

Smith: Were you surprised at all at the extent of the public reaction when he died? I wonder whether part of it was there was a whole generation being introduced to him for the first time. They were seeing these old film clips and comparing that with the ugliness of the contemporary political scene. And he looked awfully good.

Buendorf: He did, didn’t he?

Smith: I know.

Buendorf: But it’s kind of surprising how years passed and you become a better statesman than you were when you were a statesman. I think that history will show and continue to show that he was a good President.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered historically? And how do you remember him?

Buendorf: I think given the way the world was at the time of the election dictated a loss for President Ford and a loss for the American public because they were not wise enough in my opinion to see what value he could’ve brought as a voted in president. So, I think we missed it. We missed it.

Smith: And on a personal level?

Buendorf: Well, he’s pretty special.

Smith: Thanks, again, for doing this. A couple of things, if you could sort of sketch in the broader relationship as you saw it that President Ford had with the University. And then maybe zero in on the particular issue of Affirmative Action.

Bollinger: I started out as president of Michigan in ’97, and I think one of the things I felt about Michigan, and I said it in many different contexts, was that it was an institution like many public institutions that did not claim its history. And part of that was not recognizing that Robert Frost had been at Michigan in the early 1920s and had written some wonderful poems there. And so there are places other than the New England area that can make that claim. Well, I also felt the same about President Ford. And at that time, as you know, there was an odd sense about his presidency. A sense that it was a presidency, obviously, that did very important things, but also a sense that it wasn’t a presidency because of the ways it had happened and then the defeat. And my feeling was, he was President of the United States and a graduate of the University. A wonderful human being by everybody’s account and had done very admirable things in this world, and of course, beforehand. And so the University should really identify with him, and visa versa.

And I sort of set in motion the idea that the School of Public Policy, which had moved, I think, from a program to an institute to a school. But it really didn’t have the sort of trappings of a school – its own building and general faculty. I thought that should really be developed, and simultaneously, I thought that making the school identified with President Ford was a great combination of several things that were of enormous importance to the University. And so that idea, of course, bore fruit as the Ford School of Public Policy, and a wonderful building right on the entrance to the campus. And I’m very, very proud of that and pursued that idea with him and he was very, very eager to have that happen. I was moved by how much it meant to him.
Smith: When you met him and sort of worked with him, was there anything that surprised you?

Bollinger: Well, I like to think that I spent a fair amount of time with him on and off over those five years, but actually, if you added up the hours it probably was not that many. But the feeling of being with him was so powerful that I think it magnifies the time I spent. I think there was this wonderful formality and friendliness with him. He struck me as a person who out of World War II – I mean, there is something about the grownup qualities of people who went through that experience. I think of my father, the same kind of demeanor and rectitude, and decency. And a personable-ness that I was really quite…

Smith: That’s an interesting combination.

Bollinger: Yes, that’s right. And then I found it a wonderful personal education to listen to him talk about his time. I remember, and I know you know, Richard, all these stories so well, but to me they were significant because they were so fresh. But he would say something like, “I had no idea who Levi’s – I didn’t know what his party affiliation was, I just knew he was a really, really respected jurist, and I wanted a great person to head up the Justice Department.” And it was comments like that and then the loyalty of the people like yourself and others who had been with him in service, was a testament to – everybody likes to be associated with a President, that’s, I think, a given – but there was a real bond to every single relationship. And I think it was built around – my own sense was – it was built around character. He was a much smarter person than probably his general reputation. Highly intelligent. Highly astute, I think, very good reading of certain situations. But somehow the stereotype sort of played off of different edges.

Smith: Probably Chevy Chase. The stereotype, caricature.

Bollinger: That’s right. And so it’s always interesting how those things can stick.

Smith: Did he reminisce about the University? Did he talk at all about his memories of the University?
Bollinger: Yes, and certainly in the sense of the University being very important to him. That’s takes me to the Affirmative Action thing, which I think was probably – I can’t remember precisely – but I think that may have been my sort of opening encounters with him. When I started in January in ’97, I was told very quickly that Michigan was going to be the next target of the anti-Affirmative Action movement that had been building force in the United States.

Smith: And was that within the state – those that were targeting it? Or was it part of a national?

Bollinger: Nationally. And the Center for Individual Rights, I think it was called – it’s been a long time since I’ve uttered the name – had been very successful in challenging the University of Texas law school, and had won in the Fifth Circuit. And I had been an “expert witness” on behalf of the law school in that case. So I was somewhat familiar with it. Of course I knew the constitutional issues. So they’d won there, and then there was Prop 209 in California, and that had been quite successful. And now, obviously, this group and others who were of that viewpoint, really wanted to try to get to the Supreme Court to overturn Bakke. And so I was told, I can’t remember how I found out, but I was told, “They are going to come at you, they are going to come at Michigan,” and me personally. So I began really thinking about this as one of my central goals, defending Affirmative Action at Michigan, which was no different from every other university. I mean, the policies were no different. So it was really a matter of defending higher education’s policies of Affirmative Action. In order to do that, you had to get other universities to be allies with you. And that, actually, is very hard to do because there is nothing more isolating than being a defendant in a major law suit. Everybody wants to say we’re different from them, and so on. So that was the first thing. But the main thing was, it had to expand the support, because higher education is actually not that popular when it comes to its own policies. People would just say this is just the liberal sector of America doing some social engineering. And the key to that, I thought, was to get someone of enormous stature in the country, who was not Democrat, not Republican for these purposes. And I thought that was President Ford. And so I made contact with him and he agreed right away to do this. And the idea was, he would make a public statement, he would make it in the form of an Op-Ed, and I thought this was a very, very good idea. I did not think he would agree to do it. And he agreed to do it with alacrity. And then when we gave him a draft, thinking that’s the way – change it – but we would do that service, he threw it out completely and I don’t know that he personally – you were probably involved in this so you know a good deal – but the story was personal. And the story – I can’t remember the name of his teammate…

Smith: Willis Ward.

Bollinger: Willis Ward, who played a tackle or a center or something, and there is just nothing more powerful than a Republican President of the United States saying, “When I was on a football team at this public university my teammate couldn’t play because we were playing a southern team…”

Smith: Georgia Tech.

Bollinger: Georgia Tech, “that would refuse to play us if we had a black player.” And then he didn’t play. And the game went ahead. And to say that was a mistake and it should never happen again, and we’re still not done with that problem, and I think this is a reasonable way to approach it, it was taking a position that was fulsome and personal and national and all those qualities. And I really, really was impressed by that. Of all the things I’ve encountered with people in life, that ranks right up there as a very – he didn’t have to do this. And that really led to several interactions as I said. That bolstered my feeling that naming the School of Public Policy after the President would be a great idea.

Smith: The interesting thing – several things – one, that game against Georgia Tech was the only game they won all year. The only game they won, it was 6-0, or something like that. Fast forward seventy years, and there is an effort underway, which is about to be approved to put a statue of President Ford in the Capitol Rotunda, which entails replacing Zachariah Chandler’s statue. When the initial effort was launched, there were two or three western Michigan strongly conservative Republican state senators, who threw sand in the works, and who managed to, at the very least, delay this and perhaps defeat it. And the governor indicated she would sign it, but I don’t think she was going to get very involved. So anyway, lo and behold, literally it’s a Frank Capra movie – the last day of the session in the state senate this thing comes up and a member of the Detroit delegation, African-American, gets up – Willis Ward’s grandson – who proceeds to tell everyone the story. And to shame these people who basically were Reaganites from ’76 and had never forgiven Ford. But my sense is, he took a lot of heat for that from the right.
But the other side of the coin was, it coincided with, what appeared in the New York Times, the day before the twenty-fifth anniversary of his swearing in. And on that anniversary, the very next day he was in the East Room of the White House receiving the Medal of Freedom. The Clinton administration had a number of people, including him, but because of the story, he became the center of it all. So in the Clinton White House he was surrounded by people who were thrilled, but when he went outside a lot of Republicans…

Bollinger: That’s really interesting. And I have to say that I thought he was more courageous and bolder than the Clinton administration. Because I think President Clinton, he was in this sort of mend it, don’t end it, and it was clearly a political strategy from my point of view, that this was a very unpopular thing – Affirmative Action – and obviously we’re in favor of it, but we can’t take the strong position. And so we’ll sort of play this middle road – let’s change it, but let’s not end it. But the way that translated, I knew this right from the start – this litigation, I knew was Supreme Court bound, as it, of course, turned out to be. And its initial sort of playing – the way it played out in the press, made the policy even more unpopular and made people who supported Affirmative Action want even more to distance themselves from it.
I could not get the Clinton administration to support the University. So it was mend it, don’t end it, but we’re not going to support you. Now, ultimately, the Justice Department did support it. But the President wouldn’t speak out on it.
So for Ford to do this – in fact, he was the only political leader in the country.
Because I met with some other political leaders at the time – ultimately Senator Kennedy was very strong, I think he brought along Tom Daschle, I don’t know quite how Daschle got there. But it was amazing how difficult it was to get a political person to support, not just Affirmative Action, but the litigation. And this was where the action was going to be. So it made it all the more impressive to me.

Smith: Jeffrey Toobin’s book The Nine makes a passing reference to Ford’s intervention. Apparently, Justice O’Connor brought it up. Does that ring a bell at all?

Bollinger: It’s been some time since I read Toobin’s book, so it doesn’t. What does follow from this though, is that I really strongly believe that it was Ford, it was his Op-Ed and his public commitment that unlocked other – made it possible for other people to do it, and I met David Halberstam for a lunch on Nantucket that summer where he was staying. Of course, he had a house. And I wanted to try to get advice from people about who politically and so on we could get to support this. And he suggested, and now I am forgetting – a good friend of yours, good friend of Ford’s, wrote a book on Ford.

Smith: Jim Cannon.

Bollinger: Jim, suggested Jim. A dear, dear man. And so I had lunch with Jim at the President’s House at Michigan, and it was through that conversation that we ended up with the military brief. Because Jim was sitting on the board, I think, of the Naval Academy or something, and I felt that trying to widen the sectors – my idea was what higher education had done in Affirmative Action was simply one of many institutions in the society that had tried to take positive steps to implement Brown v. Board of Education’s ground goal of an integrated society. You go to corporations, you go to the churches, you go to cultural institutions, you go even to the military, the academies, and the military services. They knew that they had to have a diverse integrated armed forces. And Jim jumped on this and said that he could help establish contact with people and that led to the military brief. And many people would say that it was the military brief that really persuaded O’Connor.

Smith: That’s right. And I remember subsequently asking, Justice Stevens, who cited it as a significant factor. But you are right about the fact that the service academies, in particular, took the position that they did.
Bollinger: And I think it was President Ford that, again, made all that possible. And then the same made it possible for GM - I met with the head of General Motors and they were prepared to lead a brief of business interests and we ended up with multiple. So we had amicus briefs from the business sector and we had statements from President Ford and the military and lots of others. And it was that wider kind of consensus - look, if you throw out this and the military and higher education, you’re going to unravel several decades of efforts by the society in every sector to try to grapple with the fact of a couple hundred years of segregation and discrimination. And it was that case.

Smith: And how was affirmative action applied at Michigan? I mean, presumably there was not a uniform formula.

Bollinger: That’s right. Because the University of Michigan, like every university, is very decentralized, so the law school had its own policy and the medical school had its policy and the LSA, the Arts and Sciences of Michigan, had its own policy. And what happened in the litigation was, there were two law suits. One against the Arts and Sciences, both against the individuals, myself and some others, but also against the University. And they identified the policies in LSA, and the policy in the law school. The policy in the law school, I was significantly responsible for it because I was dean. It was the late ‘80s. I could see the world was changing in attitudes about this, and I could see some need for greater attention. We set up a committee, we developed a policy, etc. LSA did this independently of the law school and had its own, and they were very different in their structure – opposite actually.

So the law school was the gestalt. We take into account race is one of many factors…we want a diverse population, we want people from all backgrounds and experiences and capacities. And we kind of just put it together. And LSA policy was, we’re going to be much more specific and concrete. So if you are at this grade point average, you get these points; if you got this SAT score, you get these points; if you’ve got these kind of references, you get this point; and if you are African-American or in an under-represented minority, you get these points. So they actually gave points. Now, that was called a grid that listed these factors and points for them. And that was uncovered through discover. And it was that, that was pasted on the front pages of the press and the New York Times, in particular, and made it seem scandalous that just because of your skin color you would get these points in an application process where the outcome was highly coveted. And my feeling, in all candor, was that this was not – you could defend this by saying, “Look, you say you want specificity, you don’t want this kind of hide the ball,” and here it is. On the other hand, it looked – the formulated quality of it resonated with the sense of invidious discrimination, even though the purpose was fine and noble.

And my feeling was, keep both cases going. Don’t give in on one, certainly don’t give in on both. And actually, you’d be better off in the courts and the courts can say, “This one, we really don’t like. This one is fine.” And of course, that’s the way it ended up in the Supreme Court. The grid – that form – was rejected as unconstitutional, and the law school policy was upheld. But I felt it was better to keep one that was likely to lose.

Smith: That’s interesting. At the time when that outcome emerged, did you hear from Ford? Did you have contact with him?

Bollinger: On the outcome of the case?

Smith: Yeah, once this was resolved.

Bollinger: Yes, I did talk with him. I can’t remember the details, but yes. And he was very happy about it.

Smith: It may be unfair to ask you to speculate, but I will. In my eulogy in Grand Rapids, I talked about the fact that most of us tend to get a little conservative as we get older. And in his case it seemed to be the opposite. My sense is on a number of issues - Affirmative Action being one, clearly abortion is another. He is, I believe, the only former president to put his name on a petition for gay rights.

Bollinger: Is that right?

Smith: Someone told us he said ten years before he died that gay marriage was coming and you might as well get used to it.
Bollinger: Isn’t that wonderful?

Smith: And I’m wondering, it is pure speculation, whether she [Mrs. Ford] was a factor in this. Whether having kids or grandkids factored in. It’s more than just the party went so far to the right and he stayed where he was. Because he was clearly more “liberal” and outspoken than he had been during his political career.

Bollinger: Well, that’s interesting, Richard. As you are talking – I’ll come back to that – but I want to say something going back to where we were just a moment ago, which again is revealing about him and the ways you are asking and talking about yourself. I am now recalling that I think the first time I actually saw him – this has to be checked because my memory may be flawed, and of course it would be highly embarrassing if what I’m going to say turns out not to be true, a figment of my imagination - but if you will recall, we had a reception at the White House, a dinner in honor of Ford, and I was in the receiving line, like everybody was, going through and Ford and George Bush were standing there and I think their wives were seated, if I remember correctly. What would have been the occasion?

Smith: Ford’s 90th birthday.

Bollinger: 90th birthday, yes.

Smith: And the Bushes had a dinner for him.

Bollinger: And the interesting thing here was this was the first time I had seen him after the Supreme Court victories, I believe. And I’m nothing in the world of George Bush, but when I left Michigan to come here, the case was in its final months before the Supreme Court, and George Bush had never said anything about the case. In January or February, I think it was, he suddenly came out and said, “This was a terrible policy at the University of Michigan. It was a quota and the Supreme Court should strike it down.” And I felt this was a Condoleezza Rice idea, because she comes from the university world and she told him. That was my interpretation. So I’d just returned, I think, from a trip to India and I’m suddenly confronted with this, that the case is just a quota, the policies. I had never felt the power of a presidential statement that’s against you. And boy, was it something. And I went on a number of talk shows, interviews, and said it’s just not right, and I made some statements and they were quoted in the New York Times that the President is wrong, that it’s not a quota, and he doesn’t understand, and so on. And it was sometime, maybe you will remember the month perhaps, but I remember as I got there to where they were standing, President Ford said, “Lee, we won!” And George Bush is right by him, and I remember this kind of – I mean, he had lots of reasons not to want to be highly friendly to me, but I thought it was an unusually unfriendly shaking of hands. But it was Ford’s irrepressible, “We won!” That was great.

Now, on these other qualities that you said, I always interpreted him as having real personal – this goes back to the oddity of the formality of the man – I just feel like this Willis Ward, Betty, his children, these are the things that shaped his views. When you know people and you like them, or love them, and things happen to them, that’s where you get your political views from.

Smith: Plus, he had gone through the intervention with her, and he’d become in his own way as involved in the work of the Center as she was. And I think, as a spur to compassion - seeing people, including personal friends, people in his circle who were good people, decent people, who happened to have a weakness. You wonder - the cumulative impact of that.

Bollinger: I also wonder, and again, you’ll know more about this, I wonder if this is an example of somebody who in later life, rather than being more conservative, is actually more human. Because one of the things I remember him saying now that you’ve just said that is, didn’t they go on a campaign tour for their honeymoon, or something? And there was that sense that this was a very self-absorbed - somebody who is after his own career and wasn’t around the kids as much. And then maybe in the latter years, it was human beings that mattered most to him. And he felt that he had not done that before.

Smith: I think that’s very shrewd. How do you think he should be remembered?

Bollinger: For all these things, I think, we’re a nation who seems to be desperate for leaders who are authentic and rooted in human relationships and not taking positions for some kind of ideological advantage. And, I mean, he just stands out, doesn’t he, in this kind of way? I think the kind of self-sacrificing public servant who realizes he is going to pay a price, but he’s doing this for other people.

Smith: Were you, at the time of the pardon, when you first heard about the pardon, were you opposed?

Bollinger: You know, that’s a good question. I can’t remember. I bet I thought it was the right thing to do. You just have to forgive and move on. I’m almost positive that’s what I would have thought.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Bollinger: I don’t remember exactly the last time. It may have been one of our meetings. I have a personal letter from him about the Ford School, accepting and thanking me for that. I keep that up in my study.

Smith: It was dedicated a month before he died.

Bollinger: Yeah.

Smith: And he really intended to be there. There was nothing that made him more upset than his inability to be there. If there was any way he could have, he would have.

Bollinger: As I said before, I was really impressed by how much it meant to him. And I don’t know what went through his mind about this sort of issue: am I a real president, or was I just a fill in for a while? Can I really act like I was a former President of the United States? I never got a sense of whether that was an issue for him or not.

Smith: When we were planning the funeral, the Military District of Washington tends to see this as their doing, and they are heavily involved. But the one thing he was adamant about, he did not want a caisson down the streets of Washington. And a very ill-advised representative of the military tried to change him by saying, “Now, Mr. President, you wouldn’t want people to think that you were a second rate president.” Needless to say, that argument did not carry. I don’t think he harbored any doubts about his legitimacy. But the pomp was not his thing.

Bollinger: That’s really interesting. I also remember, and I used it in a graduation speech at Michigan, it was one of my better speeches at graduation, which are very hard to give, as you know, especially in a football stadium. But I remember walking from the President’s House over to the Union where the Regents were meeting. And this proposal of having the Ford School created – he would be there to accept applause and make a statement. And as we were walking from the President’s House over – of course, there’s State Street – and I remember being struck by the fact that we’re walking along, he’s talking to me, and I’ve got a picture of it upstairs, and he never looked this way or that way to cross the street. He just walked across the street, and I thought, boy, that’s one perk of having been a president. You never have to look as you cross streets.

Smith: Was there any opposition, even sub rosa, to the idea of putting his name on the school?

Bollinger: Yeah, there was.

Smith: Was it political or ideological?

Bollinger: It was both those things, it was also “this is not a real president.” And there was also a “didn’t do anything” kind of perspective. You’ve got the glorification of the Kennedy School, the Kennedys, and there’s always the feeling of well, it’s everybody just trying to latch on, this is as good as we can do. There’s always going to be reticence about identifying with a particular public figure and political figure, but in this case, there was this sort of residue. So, yes, I had to push very hard for it, actually. It was not easy.

Smith: And was that on the Board of Regents, or the faculty?

Bollinger: It was every place.

Smith: Okay.
Bollinger: It was in the Regents, it was every place. At the end of the day, everybody thinks it was a great idea. I don’t mean to say it was my great idea, but everybody thinks it’s really great to have. His reputation actually was going up, as I could sense it. And part of that was the dignity and the character issues and the lack of partisanship.

Smith: Well, you speak of the Kennedys. When they gave him the Profiles in Courage Award, it was the ultimate imprimatur. He said, for twenty years, everywhere he went people asked the same question. And after he received that award, he said they don’t ask the question anymore.

Bollinger: Isn’t that amazing.

Smith: The power of the Kennedys.

Bollinger: That’s very interesting. I remember, again, just a little tidbit, maybe many people felt this way, but I remember, as a Democrat, watching the debates, and after the debates I said to my wife, Jean, “Ford is a better person. I like him better, I admire him more, but I don’t think I can vote for him.” But that stuck with me.

Smith: In October of ’76, he went to visit Hubert Humphrey in the hospital. And Humphrey told him he was getting votes in the Humphrey family. And Bess Truman voted for him.

Bollinger: Is that right?

Smith: She wanted him to be sure to know. Listen, this is wonderful. Thank you so much.

Bollinger: It was a pleasure to remember all this.

Hamilton: ‘65 was the year he took on Halleck, wasn’t it?

Smith: That’s right. Now, were you elected in the Johnson landslide?

Hamilton: Right.

Smith: Had it been a Republican district?

Hamilton: Yeah, for 24 years. That was really my first exposure to an internal fight, which are very common of course, but my first exposure in the House. Halleck was from Indiana. I knew him quite well even though there was quite a gap in our ages. Ford took him on. I remember that quite well. Charlie Goodell and Ford and Bob Griffin up in Michigan. Rumsfeld was in that group, wasn’t he?

Smith: And Bob Dole.

Hamilton: And Bob Dole was in that group, yeah. Well, fire away.

Smith: Well, let me ask you, did Halleck ever talk to you about that? Did he voice his unhappiness?

Hamilton: I think Charlie Halleck was deeply disappointed that Ford took him on as the Minority Leader. Halleck had quite a bit of national exposure. He and Ev Dirksen from the Senate were kind of shocked that a young upstart or a relatively young upstart like Jerry Ford would take him on and beat him. After that event, it was all downhill for Charlie Halleck. He was deeply disappointed.

Smith: The older I get, the more I begin to suspect that as important as ideological factors are, that politics is more generational than anything else.
Hamilton: Well, it’s a very large component of it. You remember Joe Martin had been the Speaker. A lot of the Republican younger members had taken him on and defeated him, I guess, as Minority Leader; and then they set their eye on Charlie Halleck. They wanted to take control on the Republican side. They won it eventually, of course, with Jerry Ford in as Speaker. Jerry Ford always said his ambition was to be Speaker of the House and he worked doggedly to achieve that, travelling all over the country, speaking at every chicken dinner in the country, and every Republican gathering in order to try to increase that Republican majority. Jerry Ford had a deceptively low-key approach to things. He was ambitious, no question about that, I think. But he cloaked it nicely. He was very popular in the House on both sides of the aisle. You couldn’t really dislike Jerry Ford. Straight arrow. Lack of pretention. Down-to-earth Midwestern values, from my point of view at least. And that personal popularity stood him in good stead, and in a sense, was why he was chosen by Nixon for Vice President.

Smith: Let me ask you, when you say ‘Midwestern values,’ what do you mean by that phrase?

Hamilton: Decent, honest, without ego, friendly, down-to-earth. Jerry Ford had core values that he believed in very deeply. I’m not just sure where they came from, I don’t know that much about his background. But he was a very stable person, very confident within his own skin, and a very appealing person overall.

Smith: It is an interesting thing when you talk about his ambition because that, in some ways, goes against the grain of the popular image. But I think it’s a shrewd observation. I’ve often wondered whether in some ways Ford used his reputation as a nice guy, maybe an unsophisticated guy, and put that to work for him.

Hamilton: Well, I think without a doubt, he did. It’s not uncommon in Washington, incidentally, to cloak ambition. People don’t like ambitious people who are blatantly obviously ambitious. Washington’s full of ambitious people, but the ones I think that are more likely to succeed are those who are able to hide it, cloak it. Ford had a very outgoing manner to him. He got along well with his colleagues. He had a natural ability to deal well with people. It interested me that he was chosen as a leader of the Young Turks. He probably wasn’t the brightest guy in that group, the others were hard-driving, more obviously ambitious, I think; but they settled on Jerry Ford as their leader, the person most likely to be able to overcome Charlie Halleck.

Smith: And I assume a significant factor in that change was the Goldwater rout. That young members in particular thought, “We’re about as low as we can go. We’ve got to try something different.”

Hamilton: I think that’s correct. They saw a need to rebuild the party after the Goldwater defeat and they were determined to start in the House.

Smith: Did he ever campaign against you?

Hamilton: I don’t think so. In those days, it was fairly rare for a sitting member of Congress to go into the district of another sitting member of Congress and campaign against him. Indeed, it kind of ran against the ethics of the House. Nothing in writing, but it was understood. Now that’s very different today, of course.

Smith: Anything you can share with us that will give us a sense of how different the climate was in this town, on the Hill, and particularly in the House that Ford was so much a part of?

Hamilton: Well, I’ll give you a very personal story. As a very young member of Congress, I made a big parliamentary mistake on the floor; didn’t even know I’d made it. I knew so little about the rules. Ford was the Minority Leader. Either at his instigation or at least with his consent, I never knew which, he sent over an Indiana Republican member of Congress, Bill Bray, to me and Bill said, “Lee, you just made a mistake. Here’s the way you correct it.” And I did on a bill neither he nor Ford liked. Now, it wasn’t a major piece of legislation, pretty small, but an extraordinary act by the Minority Leader and by Congressman Bray to help this newcomer Democrat not make a fool of himself. And I cannot imagine that kind of thing happening in today’s climate.
Smith: Plus, going back to what you said earlier, it was also smart on his part.

Hamilton: I think so. He understood down the road he could block the bill if he wanted to. I understood it, too. But the important thing from my point of view is that he was sufficiently sympathetic towards a new member of Congress, so he didn’t want that new member of Congress pulling a bonehead play.

Smith: We’ve been told among other things that members of Congress in both houses socialized much more with each other in those days. That many more of them actually brought their families with them to town, which is an enormous factor in integrating yourself into the culture. Is that all true?

Hamilton: Very definitely true. The amenities are important in politics as, I guess, in the rest of life. It’s very hard to get mad at somebody if you know them well. And in those days, members knew each other pretty well. To meet a member in committee or on the floor, both of which are rather confrontational settings, did that back then, too, but the difference is that back then, in the mid-60’s, you socialized with them a lot. You knew their spouses. You knew their family. In Jerry Ford’s case, he lived only a few blocks from my wife and me and Betty Ford and my wife became quite good friends. She often had the use of the Minority Leader’s car, so she’d pick up my wife and take her to social events to which the spouses had been invited. And my wife and Betty Ford became good friends. My wife had an enormous admiration for Betty Ford. Those are the kinds of personal ties that make a big difference.

Smith: What did she admire about Mrs. Ford?

Hamilton: Well, she was very outspoken, very friendly. She had many of the Midwestern values that Jerry Ford had. She was quite unpretentious. Didn’t hesitate, incidentally, to disagree with her husband.

Smith: Did you see that?

Hamilton: Oh, yes. The big example, of course, I remember is on Roe vs. Wade, when she just came out and said that’s a wonderful decision or words to that effect and, of course, that was appalling to Jerry Ford and to the Republican Party. But Betty Ford had that spunkiness about her that was very, very attractive.
And she was a very gracious woman. She had been a model and obviously she and Jerry Ford were very devoted to one another. It was a strong marriage.

Smith: Did you or your wife sense any problems that Mrs. Ford might have been having in those early days, any unhappiness?

Hamilton: Well, I certainly did not and I don’t recall, because I didn’t have that much contact with Betty Ford, but I don’t recall my wife ever indicating that.

Smith: I just wonder, in the larger sense, she’s become almost a stand-in for the political wife who, 40 years ago had a tough road to hoe.

Hamilton: Well, I guess she did and she had, as I understand it, an alcohol problem that developed at some point. I never saw any evidence of that, but neither was I around her very much.

Smith: Sure.

Another thing about the parties. Forty years ago I remember talking to Walter Mondale about this - whether it was the Senate or the House, you came to Washington and you joined a party that had diversity. I mean, each party had wings. And so a northern liberal would have to take account of the fact that up to a point, there was a considerable number of southern conservatives within the party that you had to deal with. And presumably, learning to forge compromises and personal relationships within your party with people who were your ideological opposite must have had some impact in how you operated in the larger legislative arena. That, I assume, is largely gone today.

Hamilton: Well, I think it is. I think the political parties used to be part of the consensus building mechanism in America, as you were talking about. There was diversity in the Democratic Party. Howard Smith was head of the Rules Committee - was about as conservative guy as ever served in the Congress, and in one of the most powerful positions the Democratic Party could provide. So, in the party conventions and the party itself and the caucuses and the House, you could see the party making compromises to build a consensus. Today, that’s much less true because there’s a lot more ideological purity, if you would. Democrats tend to be more uniformly liberal and Republicans more uniformly conservative. And so, we have lost, and this is the principle point, one of the principle consensus building mechanisms in America of the political party.

Smith: Indeed the very word consensus is seen as offensive to those on the extremes.

Hamilton: Unfortunately, that’s the case, but from my point of view, I think that the task of the Congress is to build consensus behind a solution to a problem.

Smith: And clearly Ford was very much a part of that.

Hamilton: He was indeed. Now, Ford was a very loyal Republican, extremely loyal. And he saw the world through Republican eyes. On the foreign policy side, he was an internationalist. He was what you’d call a hawk on Vietnam, even though later on in his presidency, he played a role in getting us out of Vietnam. He was on the military appropriations subcommittee. That’s a powerful position. He was a ranking member, I believe, and he was very strong on defense, national security matters. But one of the things I appreciated about Jerry Ford was he was not the least bit vindictive. I, for example, offered on the floor of the House, one of the early amendments to reduce our commitment in Vietnam and didn’t win the vote, but we got more votes than anybody anticipated and that began to change the dynamics in the House, I think, considerably. Ford argued vigorously against that amendment, but never took it out on me personally. He had that ability of friendship that went beyond the party lines.

Smith: It’s interesting. There are stories of him and Hale Boggs going down to the National Press Club. They would drive down together; decide what they were going to debate that day on the way to the club. They’d go down. They’d have their debate. Go have a drink and lunch, and go back to work. It sounds almost unbelievable contrasted with today’s climate.

Hamilton: Well, it was a very, very different approach. I’ve seen it so many times when the speakers of those days would sit down with Minority Leader Ford. The Speaker would say, McCormick or someone, Albert, “We’re going to bring up this bill” and Ford would say, “We don’t like that bill.” And Albert or McCormick would say, “How many votes are you Republicans going to give us?” And Ford would give them an estimate, not an off the cuff estimate, one that he had been whipping. And, likewise, they’d talk about key amendments. Ford would not like the bill, the Speaker would like the bill, and they’d bring it to the floor. They both knew how it was going to come out, knew what the votes were. They would each go into the well and give a ringing speech for or against the bill and then forget about it. And they were friends. But the point is, the civility of when they were calculating the votes, it was an honest exchange. Ford would say, “You’re not going to get more than 15 votes from the Republicans on this bill.” And the Speaker would say, “Well, I need 20.” And then the Speaker would have to make up his mind whether or not to bring the bill forward, hoping he could pick up the 5 votes somewhere. But never vindictiveness, never anger, but both very passionate, very strong in their conviction about the bill. But they didn’t let that interfere with doing business.

Smith: A couple of things. He had a temper and it was very well concealed, but something he struggled with all his life to contain. I wondered if you ever saw that.

Hamilton: I did not.

Smith: Never did.

I’d be fascinated if you could tell us about the strengths of the speakers with whom you worked. I mean particularly John McCormick, Carl Albert, and Tip O’Neill. What did they each bring to the job?

Hamilton: Well, McCormick was a slashing debater. He really was more of a Majority Leader than he was Speaker and you could see John McCormick sitting up there in that chair when a debate was going on just chomping at the bit to get into the debate. He was a debater and a good one. And he found the Speaker’s role uncomfortable.

Smith: Constricting?
Hamilton: Sitting up there in that chair. He was an advocate. He was a very, very able advocate.

Smith: And I assume a sort of a classic New Deal Democrat.

Hamilton: Roosevelt Democrat all the way, New Deal, liberal and social programs.
Internationalists supported going into the war, World War II. And a very fine decent man. I never really knew him very well. He was too far above me.
As a matter of fact, one of my recollections is when Mo Udall challenged him for Democratic Speaker in the Congress, I supported Mo. It’s that generational gap you were talking about. The night before the vote, I got a call from Speaker McCormick and Speaker McCormick said, “Lee, I’ve got a contest tomorrow night. I hope I can have your support.” I don’t think he knew who he was talking to. I doubt if he could identify me personally at that point. I said, “Well, Mr. Speaker, I’m going to support Mr. Udall.” Whammy! The phone went down. I kind of shook for a few minutes after that, but John McCormick never held it against me and never held back. He was a gentleman.

Carl Albert, a stem-winding speaker, a little giant from Oklahoma; likewise, a New Deal liberal. A progressive, we’d say these days, and extremely able.
The curious thing about Carl Albert to me, I think, is he wanted to be Speaker all his life and when he got there, he wasn’t quite sure what to do. He was kind of an uncertain leader, uncertain trumpet, if you would.

Tip O’Neill was as popular as Jerry Ford. You just could not dislike Tip O’Neill. He had that Irish Catholic warm friendly approach. I recall a lot of people getting mad at Tip O’Neill, but never holding it. He would overcome it. And I think a good Speaker over all, a strong Speaker. He was one of the early people to oppose the Vietnam War against his party at the time. But Tip was a committed Democrat and I think turned out to be quite a strong Speaker.

Smith: Let me ask you one thing about the House and we’ll move on. Because Ford clearly was very proud of his service in the House, I think he regarded it as his real home in Washington. There’s no evidence that he ever wanted to go to the Senate, although he’d been approached more than once. What is it about the House, and I’m not putting down the Senate, but what is it about the House that inspires such loyalty?

Hamilton: It’s a more collegial body. I didn’t know much about the Michigan politics of the day, but Ford had I think fairly easy re-elections and he enjoyed travelling the country, making the Republican case. He was quite good at it. He really enjoyed his friends.

Smith: On both sides of the aisle?

Hamilton: Oh, no question about it. And I think he felt very much at home. He described himself as a man of the House and there’s that great story about him. After he stepped away from the presidency, he took a helicopter tour and he asked them to swing around the Capitol. “This is my home.” He’d been in the White House for however long it had been, a couple years, but he very much considered himself a man of the House and I don’t think ever felt otherwise, even as President.

Smith: Now, that raises a large question. Because you can also look at the two and a half years of his presidency as learning the difference between a legislator’s function and the executive function.

Hamilton: Yeah.

Smith: And he is said to have observed that the great frustration to losing in ’76 was he’d just felt that he’d mastered the job and he lost it.

What would he bring from the Hill to the White House and what might he have to unlearn?

Hamilton: Well, what he brought surely was personality. He knew the people. That’s hugely important in politics and he had their respect. When Nixon asked him to be vice president, a principle reason for that request was Nixon knew he could be confirmed overwhelmingly. Nixon was not in a strong position at that point and he had to have a good strong vice president who could work with the House and the Senate. So, Jerry Ford knew the House, very, very well; knew the legislative process intimately. That’s a big strength. On the negative side, presidents instinctively expand the power of the presidency and I think Ford had to learn that a little bit. He was very much a legislative person, had deep respect for the separation of powers and the Constitution and I think it took him awhile to get accustomed to exercising the power of the presidency.

Smith: I heard him say, “If I had my life to do over again, probably the one thing I would’ve done was spend more time learning mass communications.” In the House and the Senate, the communication of leadership can often be one on one, often behind closed doors. Or it’s a kind of lingo that people don’t understand outside the beltway - you know, incomplete sentences, grunts… and a president’s communications are totally different.

Hamilton: But part of it is the period of time when Jerry Ford started in politics; television was a minor factor and you tended to meet in smaller groups. You didn’t very often address big groups. And as he served in the presidency, national media, not just television, but the print media, picked up in intensity and presence and coverage, so a politician of Ford’s age and generation had to learn media was changing.

Smith: On the job. I mean, literally, the rules were changing all around.

Hamilton: Now, you fast forward to Ronald Reagan who mastered television partly because of his background but that gave him kind of a leg up later on.

Smith: On balance, do you think television has been good for Congress?

Hamilton: I think good and bad. It’s marvelous that people can flip in and watch a debate. My constituents made me think at times that if I didn’t do it on television, I didn’t do it. There isn’t any doubt at all that television is where people get their information. The good part of that is it exposes them to a lot of things. The bad part of that is that it’s so terribly superficial. So, I have a kind of a love-hate attitude towards television. It’s a very mixed blessing and there’s nothing more frustrating for a legislator than to work six months on a bill and then go before the cameras and they get impatient once you run past 30 seconds in describing a very complicated piece of legislation. It’s maddening. It’s frustrating. And so many times I’ve sat for television interviews beginning to launch on what I thought was a lot of wisdom and they’d be giving me this signal to wind it down, wind it down, you’re talking too long.

Smith: Was there a moment when you decided or your colleagues decided that the Nixon presidency was doomed? President Ford, who had something of the Boy Scout in him, he couldn’t believe that Nixon lied to him. I think he was shocked by the language that he heard on the tapes, which I think again goes to that sense of Midwestern decency that you referred to. For people who didn’t go through all of that, can you convey a time when the unthinkable seemed unavoidable?

Hamilton: Well, it built. It was a step-by-step process. Ford, of course, was very, very loyal to Nixon and he was very, very loyal to the Republican Party. He had a tough time thinking that John Mitchell would lie to him as he did, or Spiro Agnew would lie to him as he did, and Richard Nixon. That’s natural enough. I don’t know if there was a time. It just seemed to me that the case kept building and building and building and I guess the tapes became the crucial thing. But it was clearly moving in that direction.

Smith: It’s said that Nixon actually looked upon Ford as his insurance which seems like a total misreading of Congress’ attitude.

Hamilton: Nixon, I think, used Ford to his advantage, both prior to his resignation and maybe even long before that. Nixon had a respect for Ford and an appreciation of his friendship, but I think he used him. And I think one of the disappointing aspects of Ford’s career was the extraordinary energy he brought to the task of defending Nixon when he was Vice President, when the evidence was just stacking up strongly against him. I don’t know if this is fair to Ford or not, but from my point of view, Ford seemed to kind of close his mind to the activities of the Nixon White House and defended it all over the country over and over again.

Smith: Did you have any contact with him during his vice presidency?

Hamilton: Some, but not very much. I had more contact with him when he was President. I think he was a Nixon loyalist as vice president, as I guess you’re expected to be as vice president, and he was in a terribly difficult situation, a really difficult situation. I kind of concluded that Jerry Ford just kind of closed his mind to the evidence and set his course.

Smith: You’re certainly not alone in saying that. The interesting thing is that there were people in the Nixon White House who thought he wasn’t loyal enough, who resented the fact that he was out of town as much as he was.

Hamilton: Is that right? Well, he went on the road and he was all over the country defending Nixon - every whipstitch town, he was there.

Smith: When he becomes president, it must have been a transforming moment in the mood of this town. Having lived through something that no one ever wanted to experience, the resignation of the President - but before the pardon - what was that first month like?

Hamilton: There was a varied sigh of relief. I think Ford’s great statement “The long national nightmare is over,” was a perfect pitch, exactly where the American people were. And everybody recognized Ford to be a very decent man. Everybody had that impression of him, and an honest man. So, I think my chief recollection of his taking the presidency was just a big sigh of relief that a good man was in the office the presidency.

Smith: It’s also interesting because in that first week he was in office, he brought in the Congressional Black Caucus and George Meany, and a whole bunch of people who hadn’t been in the White House for a long time.

Hamilton: Well, Ford’s presidency was marked by his evenhandedness. John Paul Stevens, he was very proud of that appointment to the Supreme Court. And his Attorney General-

Smith: Ed Levi.

Hamilton: Yeah, Ed Levi, he set the mark for Attorney General. Ford, in his appointments, showed an evenhandedness. He did not push a strong ideological line in his appointments. And that, too, sets that presidency quite apart because now, of course, presidents tend not to do that. But he had an evenhandedness; a steadiness in his approach that I think is quite commendable.

Smith: Let me ask you. Mel Laird. He had a plan to take care of the pardon. And he’s still angry - I mean he loved Ford - but he’s still angry that Ford didn’t let him carry out his scheme. And his idea later is that he was going to get a bipartisan delegation from the Hill to go down to the White House to ask the President to pardon Nixon. Now, my question is, given the supercharged political climate of this town at that time, is it realistic to believe that you could’ve floated a trial balloon without it being shot down before it reached the tree level?

Hamilton: Oh, I don’t know that I know the answer to that. I didn’t know about Laird’s initiative. Ford had been in office how long before the pardon?

Smith: A month.

Hamilton: A month. I remember I was appalled by that decision. I guess in retrospect, most people think it was the right decision. I’m not sure I do, but I think he’s been widely praised for that decision.

Smith: We’d be interested in knowing why you still harbor some real reservations.

Hamilton: I’m sure it’s my partisan sensibilities in part; a very strong belief that presidents are not above the law. And, in this case, I thought it was an abuse of the pardon power because what Ford did, in effect, was pardon Nixon before he was convicted of anything, no matter what the evidence might have been. I thought, at the very least, it was a premature act. I don’t think I ever thought there was a deal, as he was widely accused of. I don’t think Ford would’ve done that. I really don’t. And I had no doubt at all that he was utterly sincere in his wish to put it all behind us. I think overall, the country has concluded it was a good judgment. I guess I have a hard time. I’m still wrestling with that.

Smith: Two points: not to defend him, but the context. They were being told as we understand it from Judge Sirica it would be two years before Nixon would be brought …
Hamilton: Yeah, it would drag out for a long time…I don’t think he ever regretted the decision. He was asked about it after he was president frequently. It had a dramatic adverse affect on his political standing. The country, I don’t know what the figures were, but they were very opposed to the pardon at the time. But that was partly just because Nixon had disgraced the presidency and people were really upset with Nixon.

Smith: Do you find it frustrating with the passage of time that now we have, not only Vietnam revisionists, but also Watergate revisionists who suggest that this wasn’t such a big deal after all? Why was it important for Richard Nixon to resign?

Hamilton: Well, I think that he lied may be the principle reason, but he supported a dastardly deed to burglarize the offices in Watergate. Had Nixon just said, “Look, I made a horrible mistake. I should never have done that. It was a period of bad judgment,” I think he would’ve survived his presidency. But it’s this long period of cover-up and denial that I think it was very clear to me despite, I guess, my partisan sensibilities on it, he simply could not function as president. He had lost the ability to have any credibility on anything.

Smith: Is it fair to say he basically squandered the moral authority of the office?

Hamilton: Sure, no question about it. He really did. And it took him awhile, I think, to understand that, but eventually, he did understand it and he did the right thing when he stepped aside.

Smith: And, of course, in November of 1974, in no small measure because of the pardon, Republicans are routed and this whole group of what became as the Watergate babies came in, I assume the House changed as a result of that.

Hamilton: I think it did. You had a lot of reformers come in, and beginning in 1974, you had quite a few changes in the internal procedures of the House, more open. I’m not sure when television came in, but that would’ve been consistent at least with the attitude then.

Smith: Also, wasn’t there much more aggressive legislative versus executive - the War Power Acts being a classic example.
Hamilton: The War Powers Act is a good illustration, a pretty ineffective piece of legislation, but certainly an illustration of what you’re saying. Too much power in the executive branch. So we had to do something about it, the critical question of war powers.

Smith: And, indeed, jumping ahead 35 years, there is this school of thought that the Dick Cheney evolution can be explained as someone whose views were shaped during the Ford presidency, Cheney came to believe that Congress posed a threat to the Executive.

Hamilton: Yeah, I think that’s right. Dick Cheney has been very consistent throughout his career in support of executive power. And he felt that Vietnam, Watergate, Iran-Contra were seminal events in the history of the country in which the presidency, the executive branch, lost power. Indeed, his dissenting views in Iran-Contra - I was involved in that myself - probably is as clear a statement of his fundamental philosophy a statement on executive power as you can find.

Smith: When we get to the fall of Saigon, and another Mel Laird scheme. Laird is still blaming Ford for not getting last minute aid to prop up Saigon. And again, I’m asking, as someone who was there, is that a realistic reading of the mood of Congress at that point? Was there anything in April of 1975 that a president could have said that would have persuaded Congress to appropriate those funds?

Hamilton: I think Ford accurately read the mood of the country. If we had pumped a lot more military effort at that point, we’d have tipped the needle our way for a period of time, but not permanently.

Smith: Do you think the South Vietnamese government was doomed?

Hamilton: I do. And I think, more importantly, from the American political standpoint, the American people had figured it out. Look, they strongly supported the war and then over a period of 5, maybe 7 years, they turned against the war. And they did not just turned against it, they turned against it strongly. And they’d had enough of the bombing. They’d had enough of the killing. They’d had enough of the incompetence of the South Vietnamese government. Sure, we could’ have bombed more, we could’ have put more men in. We could’ have hit that and we could have hit this and we could have had a marginal impact. The big argument there was from the people who wanted victory in Vietnam and those that said, “Look, this nightmare has got to come to a stop.” The interesting thing here is Ford, by his history, you would think he would come down on the side of the hawks. He didn’t. And I think the reason he didn’t, defying Kissinger and a lot of other respected voices, he said, “Look, we’ve got to cut our losses here and get out of here, short of victory.” And I think personally he made the right judgment, but that’s not important. What is important I think, he accurately read the opinion of the American people at that point.

Smith: And then there’s this coda because after Saigon falls, there is a kind of recoil on Capitol Hill and in particular, money that was to have been spent to bring refugees is in effect pulled off the table. And Ford puts together this sort of crazy quilt coalition, the American-Jewish Congress and George Meany and others who argue that America has a responsibility, a moral responsibility.

Hamilton: And I think this is real leadership on his part. If I recall, he gave amnesty to American draft dodgers. He insisted that many Vietnamese come into this country. He recognized our responsibilities and he stood up for them and I don’t think those things were popular. And I think Ford deserves credit for that.

Smith: Was there a desire on the Hill at that point to just wash our hands of this whole misadventure?

Hamilton: I think so. You’ve got to remember that a member of Congress was voting time after time for pouring money and money and money in there. And our casualties - I don’t recall the exact figures, 50-55,000 dead. And a deep sense of discouragement on the side of the South Vietnamese government. And American officials over a period of time beginning with Johnson, McNamara, Rusk, that was back in ’64, and the Nixon period in ‘68, they had kept telling us how well things were going in Vietnam. And the people just turned it off. The people said, “Look, we’ve got problems here at home. We’ve got other things to do. We did the best we could. We gave them an opportunity. It’s time to get out.” That feeling was very strong.

Smith: In retrospect, is it surprising how little lasting damage was done to American influence? I mean, literally within months, you had Kissinger talking to the Israelis and Egyptians. It’s almost as if everyone had assumed that when America loses a war, it would have had a crippling effect.

Hamilton: I never bought that argument. I didn’t think it was the alpha and omega of American prestige. I began to be very suspicious about the domino theory, and we got so focused on the domino theory that we lost all perspective and we kind of lost confidence in ourselves as a nation. We took it on the chin in Vietnam. It wasn’t an utter defeat, there were some good things that came out of it, but I did not think that the result there would influence our position elsewhere in the world. There were just too many things going for us in the economy and in the military power that we had, even though we suffered a setback there. No, I didn’t buy that.

Smith: You said you had some contact with him during the presidency. Can you describe that?

Hamilton: Well, Helsinki.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Hamilton: I think that, from my point of view, this would be the strongest achievement of the Ford presidency. You could argue, I guess that getting out of Vietnam in the way he did was a major accomplishment. I think it was. But in terms of long lasting impact, Helsinki was a major accomplishment.

Smith: And the fascinating thing is, at the time, it was highly unpopular.

Hamilton: Well, people didn’t understand it. It took me a while to understand it. I didn’t quite understand what the Soviets had signed on to there and I was being briefed on it every day. Ford was dead right about that.

Smith: Describe what Helsinki is.
Hamilton: With the Helsinki Accords, basically we were negotiating with the Soviets and others there, and what we did in effect was put human rights on the agenda among nations. And all of the leading nations agreed to conduct themselves in a way that was respectful of human rights. That became the Helsinki Accords. The Soviets signed on to it, a club for us to use against them. And we reminded the Soviets of their misbehavior hundreds of times after that, and began to swing world opinion against the Soviet Union. The Helsinki Accords were the beginning of the Soviet downfall and I did not recognize the potential of the Helsinki Accords initially, but I think Ford saw it much more clearly than I did.

Smith: His relationship with Secretary Schlesinger. I realize you weren’t in the room.

Hamilton: Schlesinger?

Smith: Jim Schlesinger. But I wonder, you mentioned, he’d been all those years on the military appropriations committee. He knew the feds. And I’m wondering if there just was a chemistry that --

Hamilton: I can’t help you there. I don’t know. He let Jim go as Defense Secretary. He shook up things, didn’t he? Put Rumsfeld in. Cheney came into the White House.

Smith: The same time Rockefeller was dumped.

Hamilton: Incidentally, I do have a clear recollection about that. Ford regretted that he did not defend Rockefeller more. I think he looked upon that as one of his major mistakes, if I’m not mistaken, because when he was gearing up to run in ’76, the Republicans didn’t like Rockefeller for a lot of different reasons, but Ford did. Most people would say, including me, that Rockefeller had been a very good vice president. But that didn’t matter. He ran against the core of the Republican Party and Ford kind of ran away from him and didn’t stick up for him and ended up appointing Bob Dole.

Smith: Did you have contact with him at all after he left the presidency?
Hamilton: I ran into him on a couple of occasions at meetings and found him always very, very cordial. He appreciated that House tie and the fact that Betty Ford and my wife Nancy were good friends added something to it. But the really good qualities, personal qualities, of President Ford came out again in his post-presidency years. And remarkable about that was his lack of bitterness. That was quite a crushing defeat with Jimmy Carter and he had that famous statement about Soviet domination in Eastern Europe that hurt him badly in the election. As I recall, he started way behind in that election. Is that right?

Smith: Yeah, 30 points.

Hamilton: 30 points, I knew he was behind. But it turned out to be a horse race – a close one. He was deeply, deeply disappointed that he lost the election, but he was never bitter. It was a good quality.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Hamilton: Oh, I think without any doubt as a healer. Look, he took a presidency that was in the pits and when he left office, he had elevated it. Even though people didn’t vote for him, they knew what he had done.

Smith: Well, with the Bicentennial, people actually celebrated the Bicentennial.

Hamilton: That’s right, in ’76. So his great overwhelming accomplishment was that he healed the nation at a time when it was deeply divided. I think he’ll be remembered for being just a very decent man in the presidency. He didn’t have to go through the ordeal of getting to the presidency, where you create great friends and great enemies. I think he’ll be remembered as a president who brought the nation together at a very critical time in its history. He wasn’t in long enough to have too much of a judgment about his presidency, but on the whole, he’ll be remembered very, very positively.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. I have to ask you before we get into your story and then the larger story, how does it feel to be in this room again?

Simmons: How do I feel?

Smith: Obviously this is President Ford’s office here at Rancho Mirage.

Simmons: Now that you ask me about it, all of the sudden, I got chills. I think about the number of hours that I have been in here with President Ford preparing for a trip or just preparing for every day activities for him. Now that we think about it, it gives me...well, actually a tremendous amount of pleasure to know that I had the opportunity to work for such a great man. And he was, as far as I’m concerned, one of the greatest politicians that I’ve had the opportunity to work with.

Smith: Tell us something about him that might surprise people.

Simmons: He was a kind man. Very kind, very appreciative of everything you did for him. He would always say, thank you very much. Thank you. He never would not remember to do that if you did something for him. But what I liked about him was his high integrity. He was just one of the most outstanding moral men you’d ever want to meet. I was with him for thirty-three years, thirty-three and half years before he died, and I tell you, he was always above board in everything that he did as we traveled.

Smith: Give us an illustration of that.

Simmons: Okay. I’ll give you a real good one. President Ford used to drink. He and Mrs. Ford used to have a cocktail and as we traveled around the world, these people knew that. They knew that he liked to have a little Jack Daniels before going to bed, and a little martini, or whatever before dinner. And wherever we traveled, all of the bars would be already there prepared for him, as well as butter-pecan ice cream. This will always be there and it would be for us to take home with us or leave it there, or do whatever we wanted to. And we used to bring it home. I’m happy to tell you that, we would bring it home.

Not only did they have it in his room, they would have it in my room, so I got an opportunity to bring some Jack Daniels home, or some good liquor home with us. Well, he stopped drinking and one day he told me, he said, “Lee, you know, I don’t drink anymore. Why don’t you just tell them not to put this in our rooms anymore.” This was at the Waldorf. Well, I thought that was very noble of him. I wasn’t drinking either, but I like bringing that home. But he told me not to have them put that in the room. That’s one of the things. I mean, we could have brought that home forever if we had wanted to, but he decided that since he did not drink anymore, then they should not put that in his room. That was one example.

And the other example was that when we would travel, and people would help us out with the baggage and that kind of stuff, and he would always ask me, “Lee, did you tip him? Did you take care of him? Here’s some money.” So he was very kind in that way.

Smith: But he was a fiscal conservative, wasn’t he?

Simmons: Absolutely. He’s not going to give them a fistful of money, but he did want them to know that he appreciated their help. The maids in the hotels, he would always give me some money – we’d put it in an envelope and leave it for them. He was a kind person and, regardless of what people think about him, I thought he was one of the most outstanding men in that regard.

I want to tell you this, Richard, I have fifty-five years of military and government service, and, as a matter of fact, I like to say that I’ve traveled the world over with these dignitaries from afar. Of course, I wasn’t one of their top staff people, I was there in support status, but I’ve met all the presidents from General Eisenhower - President Eisenhower, through the current presidents and I’ve had a kind of a support status – whether with them or with President Ford. So I’ve had opportunities to observe and be around these people, although I would say I was not as close as I was with President Ford and President Nixon and President Johnson. Those were the three presidents that I was very close with. But my association with President Ford was beyond anything that you can imagine, because I thoroughly enjoyed the way he carried himself, and the way that we did things.

Smith: He must have been a very different personality from Lyndon Johnson.

Simmons: Absolutely. President Ford never was a bully, not that I’m saying that President Johnson was. I think his staff was. They wanted to make sure that he, President Johnson, was taken of wherever he went. Things that they anticipated he wanted or anticipated his move, it was always there. I remember when I was flying on the airplane with him as a flight attendant, they always anticipated that he might want this, he might want that, or he may want to go here or go there, so consequently, things were always in disarray. But President Ford was always on time – when you got his schedule, you knew where you were going to go, where you were going to be for the next three or four days. But that was not so in some of the other administrations. He was, by far, one of the presidents that kept on time and expected you to, as well.

Smith: It is interesting because it was no secret that he had temper, and he spent a lifetime – he wrote about as a boy and the efforts his mother made. The famous incident, I guess, where she gave him the Rudyard Kipling poem. And from my observations and talking to other people, he did a pretty good job of mastering that. Was it something that stayed with him?

Simmons: Absolutely, he had a temper. Absolutely, he was able to mask that. But President Ford didn’t belittle anyone around him. He had his shortcomings as far as mechanical things. He would get upset at things that really were not his doing. If the telephone didn’t work, or if the airplane wasn’t able to fly because of weather, he could not stand those kind of things. If he wanted to go, if he was ready to go, he wanted to go at that time. Sometimes those things would upset him the most, and I would be sitting beside him on the airplane when some of these things would happen and he would say, “Lee, what’s the hold up?” We’d be waiting to get to the gate or be waiting to take off because of weather. Those kind of things peeved him. Kind of upset him a little bit because he could not control those things. But he wasn’t upset at you.
He might use a little profanity and everything and want to know what’s going here, but he never would let that hang over. He would get over that. Even if you made a mistake, he might tell me, he’d say, “Well, let’s not let that happen again.” But he would not bring that up again. I never have heard him to give me a hard time about anything. He would correct me, tell me, “Well, let’s do it this way, do it that way,” but never would he let that linger.

Smith: And is it true, did he late in life learn to use a computer?

Simmons: As a matter of fact, when I retired, President Ford told his audience – I had about a hundred and fifty people there when I retired full time from here – he told them how grateful he was that I was around because he was not too much mechanically inclined. He said, “Lee would always bail me out by coming over to the house and setting the clocks, or setting my watch or those kind of things.” He appreciated having me around because he knew his shortcomings there. As a matter of fact, when we were in hotels someplace and he wanted to call Mrs. Ford, he would always call me to come in and make the phone call for him, because he could not get all these numbers and things straight in his mind. He had other things on his mind. I can understand that, I appreciate that.

One day – this is a prime example of this – we were at the Waldorf, and all of a sudden I heard this tirade and I thought maybe he had cut himself or something, so I go running in there and he said, “This so and so telephone is not working. I can’t get out on it.” I said, “Okay, sir. I’ll take care of it.” But those are some of the things. But as far as being intelligent, I thought he was a very smart man, and he worked very hard at all times. A lot people didn’t know that about him. I hate to hear people say things about him that were not true - about his ability and all that, because he was a very smart man. He graduated tenth in his class in law school, I believe, or something like that. And he was a great football player. Gee whiz.

Smith: It’s interesting, one of the things we’ve heard from more than one person was, it’s a form of intelligence, actually, that he was much shrewder than some people assumed. And that, in fact, people thought of him as kind of an innocent, and that he used that sometimes. That he sort of played that role as a means of getting more information. It’s a very interesting observation – that he was, not Machiavellian, but he was much shrewder. He understood how people saw him and he sometimes made that work for him.

Simmons: Oh, yes. Absolutely. I would say that as we traveled around the world, he made sure that his image was always up to par. A lot of people would say things that were strictly not true. But he had a way of dealing with those kinds of situations and I’ve never known him to ever get in a situation where he couldn’t explain them, or where he could not be presidential.

Smith: Did it hurt him – the whole Chevy Chase business? Here was a guy who was probably one of the best athletes who was ever president. And yet, television as a medium, an image can take hold. Publicly, I know, he sort of laughed it off. Do you think in private it hurt him?

Simmons: I think so. Yes, Richard, I think that bothered him a lot. But he was the kind of man that could roll with those punches. He understood the situations, the news, and the comedians did this as a way of making a living – although it was at his dispense. But he knew that he was above all of that so he let it roll right off his back and kept going.

Smith: There is a wonderful story - I think I got it from a photographer, Kennerly. The famous picture, I think it was in Vienna, when he stumbled on the steps. It was raining, they were rain slick. They had the umbrella for Mrs. Ford and he stumbled, and of course, the sycophants around him were all denouncing the photographers. And he said, “Well, of course they took the picture. If they hadn’t they would have been fired,” which is an extraordinarily generous reaction.

Simmons: Well, Richard, I was on that trip and I was with him. As a matter of fact, I had his briefcase walking down the steps behind him when that happened. And I think the first thing he said was, “Well, I just stumbled into you,” or something of that sort. He laughed it off. And, yeah, those things kind of bothered him. And when we were traveling on the airplane, sometimes because of his legs, his football injury, things like that, would buckle a little bit and he may stumble just a little bit. But, believe you me, I agree with you, he was one of the top presidential athletes ever to be in this office. He could play golf, he swam, he was a boxer and he was very good at all those things. He knew that he was above all of those things that people were saying, so I don’t think it bothered him as much as it bothered me. I’m the one that really didn’t appreciate that.

I can tell you a little story. Once we were down in Memphis, Tennessee where he had his hole in one, and he played great golf. He could hit that ball as far as some of those pros, and much better than a lot of amateurs that he played with. I’m driving his golf cart, so I’m standing off to the side and here this lady said something like, “Look at him, look at him. He’s in this lie, he doesn’t even know where he’s at.” That bothered the heck out of me. I hate for someone to say that when they don’t know what they’re talking about. Those kind of things bothered me, but I don’t think it bothered him as much.

Smith: How was he when he got his hole in one?

Simmons: He was playing with Bob Hope, of course, at that time. Yeah, he was playing with Bob Hope. Bob Hope got a lot of mileage out of that hole in one. It was in Memphis, and Bob Hope, that night at one of the galas after the golf tournament, he said, “Well, the President hit a great shot on Number 13, and it hit a tree and bounced off the hole, bounced of the tree and rolled in the cup and President Ford walked up and reached down in the hole to pick the ball up and missed.”

Smith: Were they close?

Simmons: They were very close. Yeah. As a matter of fact, they could almost be a team – you know, him the straight man and Bob Hope. Yeah, we traveled a lot with Bob Hope to various golf tournaments and things like that.

Smith: It must have been rough, though, in the last years – I mean, Hope was really not in very good shape physically.

Simmons: No, he wasn’t.
Smith: And, I remember, maybe it was Penny who told me, the President – talk about friendship – the call would come and say, “Bob would like to play golf today.” And the President would go out and they would play maybe a hole or two.

Simmons: Two or three holes.

Smith: And then Hope would want to rest. That sort of thing. Is that true?

Simmons: Yeah, that’s quite true. They were good friends. They were great friends. We were in Florida once for a tournament, trying to think of the name of the tournament, but we stayed at the same villa in Jacksonville, Florida and Bob Hope was supposed to ride out with President Ford the next morning. We had breakfast, he was supposed to have breakfast with us but he didn’t show up. So finally President Ford said, “Lee, would you go check and see if Bob is going to ride out with us?” So I went and knocked on his door, and I heard him say, “Yeah?” I said, “Sir, President Ford would like to know if you are going to ride out with us this morning?” He said, “What time is it?” I said, “Well, it’s ten-fifteen.” He said, “My God, it’s in the middle of the night!” He said, “No, tell the President to go on ahead and I’ll join him.”

Smith: Was he funny?

Simmons: All the time. He was. But he was a great guy to be around. He always thought that I was a Secret Service agent.

Smith: How did you first come to have this extraordinary exposure to all of these presidents? How did you wind up on Air Force One?

Simmons: Well, I sort of was at the right place at the right time. First of all, I ended up in the presidential squadron at Washington National Airport in 1953, so that’s when I became a support person during the Eisenhower administration. And after being there for about eight years, I had met a lot of my friends that were traveling, going to different places overseas. I was single at the time so I thought it would be nice if I could travel to Paris or London and some of those places. They would come back and tell me about all those stories.
I inquired about it because I had been in the organization about ten years, knew a lot of the officers, I had worked with a lot of them and they knew who I was. I guess my reputation was pretty good. At that time there were no African Americans flying in the squadron at all – not on flying status. We had a lot of support people, but none flying on the airplanes. And, of course, that’s back in the Sixties. The segregation in various hotels and things like that were probably a problem. They were looking at that because we didn’t want to embarrass the dignitaries that we were traveling with. If you go to Little Rock, or someplace like that, and the crews couldn’t stay together, or whatever.

Some of those things were in people’s minds at that time. But I inquired about it, and he told me, he said, “Listen, do you think that you can deal with this kind of situation?” I said, “Absolutely.” And they said, “Well, what about if you’re traveling with the crew and maybe you would not be able to stay with the crew. Or maybe we would not assign you to a trip because of it?” I said, “I can understand that.” Anyway, a few days later, I was assigned directly to the flying squadron and I was in the administrative field. Normally, in order to become a crew member on one of those airplanes, you have to have so many hours in your crew duty. You have to be well-experienced.

Smith: Now, when we’re talking about airplanes, we’re talking about presidential aircraft.

Simmons: That’s the way I got in. Presidential squadron, where you fly other dignitaries. Not necessarily the president, but other dignitaries. But after being there for a while, I filled in for some of the crew members in the Kennedy administration when they needed an extra body to fly. I did support missions, and I did some trips with him before he was assassinated. And after he was assassinated, I flew a lot with President Johnson.

Smith: What was your sense of President Kennedy?

Simmons: President Kennedy? I didn’t get to know him very well. I was just like – I can remember myself feeling like, “Wow, this is like going to the movies,” to see the President and Mrs. Kennedy. Because they were like a king and queen, or movie stars or something like that. So the only thing I wanted to do was get to see them, get to be around them. But, of course, because I was very new to flying at that time, I did not have the opportunity to serve them onboard the airplane. As a matter of fact, I served the crew and someone else served them. But I did get a chance to see them and be up with them and I was just like a starry-eyed kid.

Smith: At that point, were there other African Americans on those planes?

Simmons: No, none at all.

Smith: So you were unique?

Simmons: I was the first African American to be assigned as a crew member. There were other African Americans flying on the airplanes in other capacities – White House staff or whatever. Or even maintenance people – some African Americans were in the maintenance squadron, and security. But as a crew member, which are wings, I was the first one.

Smith: Were you welcomed?

Simmons: Absolutely.

Smith: Did you feel comfortable?

Simmons: I felt very welcome. I felt very comfortable. Of course, there were times when I knew that I should not be going to dinner with these guys in certain parts of the country – we’d go down in Texas. When they went to these hillbilly joints at night – I don’t want to say hillbilly, I’m sorry. Or go to the country and western restaurant to eat, I figured, ah, maybe I ought to skip that and stay at the hotel. But mostly the crews treated me nice. I was, for about ten years, the only African American on the crews whenever we flew overseas or stateside.

Smith: You weren’t in Dallas by any chance at the time of the assassination?

Simmons: Well, I was on the backup airplane, I was not on the primary airplane. I did assist then when we got back to Washington and offloading people – and assisting in any way I could on the ground after we arrived back in Andrews Air Force Base.
Smith: What do you remember of that day?

Simmons: Oh – well, it was unbelievable. People were crying and the crews were very upset – couldn’t believe it. Because this man was so popular at that time, especially with the military, and with the crews, it was unbelievable how popular he was. We were very hurt. As a matter of fact, you know that this whole country was very upset about what happened when he was assassinated.

Smith: Did you have any doubts about – now here’s this new president – he’s a Southerner – he’s from Texas. Just as an African American, did you have any reservations at first? The contrast between John F. Kennedy, who belatedly, but nevertheless embraced the civil rights movement – and now, all of a sudden, this unknown Southern commodity…

Simmons: Well, I will say this: yes, I was concerned about working with him on the airplane, but I kind of knew his reputation. I knew to stay out of his way, do what you’re supposed to do, and I made several trips with him when he was vice president. So I knew how to deal with him.

Smith: Was he mercurial?

Simmons: I think he was. There again, anticipating what he’d want – remember, I mentioned that earlier. He enjoyed getting on people, chewing them out, and that kind of stuff. I remember an incident on the airplane. He was president this time. We were coming back from Texas from his home. He had been down there for the week and I was working the front of the airplane – had gone in the back to pick up something to take up to the front to feed the crew and also, at that time, the press. The press was up front at that time. So we had to feed the press and the crew. So they sent me in the back to pick up something. Well, President Johnson was standing in the aisle, with his foot propped up on one of the seats, and I stood there with this tray in my hand for like ten minutes, and one of the Secret Service agents said to me, “Lee, tell him to move.” I said, “You tell him to move.” I wasn’t going to tell him to move. We knew how to deal with him. As a military person, you have training and you know how to treat dignitaries on a plane. Protocol was one of the things that we were taught. You know how to handle those situations and you deal with it because you were there to support them, not for them to support you.

Smith: But the other side of mercurial is that people say he was also capable of great acts of kindness and spontaneous generosity. Did you ever see that side of Johnson?

Simmons: Well, I read about it. I know that he met with Martin Luther King, he met with other African Americans and I know that he sent the troops down in Arkansas to integrate the schools. He did some great things for African Americans, and I was aware of that and very proud of it. Although when he got on the airplane he didn’t act like that to me. But he did a lot of things for African Americans.

Smith: But everyone loved Mrs. Johnson.

Simmons: Oh, yes. She was a sweetheart. The family was, too. The first ladies seemed to be a little bit more kind, a little bit more understanding than the presidents. I guess because they had more dealings with us than the presidents because they were always busy on the airplane. They were always writing or talking to the staff and doing things like that. But I loved the first ladies. Mrs. Nixon was one that I thoroughly enjoyed being around. She was a very kind lady.

Smith: The public never really knew that side of her, did they?

Simmons: Right. But I had the opportunity to travel a lot with her. As a matter of fact, I was stationed in Germany when Nixon became president. I was asked to come back to fly on his airplane by the presidential pilot, Colonel Ralph Albertazzi. After coming back, of course, all of a sudden here is this little African American guy’s going to be put on the airplane, and some of the crew members didn’t know me, so it was a little strange with them that Colonel Albertazzi brought me back.

Smith: What was different? You were now permanently assigned to Air Force One?

Simmons: Air Force One, right. But what was different was that we have three airplanes.
We had the two 707s and also we had the Jetstar, so a lot of the support missions were on those two airplanes rather than primary airplane. So I flew those backup airplanes. I flew with Mrs. Nixon – that’s where they made the mistake – they let me fly with Mrs. Nixon and the girls, so we got to be friends. And then occasionally I would get to fly on the main airplane, on Air Force One itself, instead of the backup – occasionally. Well, anyway, Mrs. Nixon saw me one day, she said, “Oh, there’s my friend, Lee.” From then on, later on, I was assigned as his personal steward on Air Force One – President Nixon. And he would tell me whenever there was a trip that Mrs. Nixon didn’t go with him, when she would represent the United States to inaugurations and to other functions for the government, he would tell me personally, he would say, “Lee, I want you to go with Mrs. Nixon. She’s going to Africa.” And I went to Africa with her.

Smith: It’s funny, we just did an interview with her social secretary, and one of the things that came through was, she had a marvelous sense of humor.

Simmons: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: That people didn’t see. And she was clearly much warmer.

Simmons: Oh, yeah. She was.

Smith: Tell us about that and was she uncomfortable doing this job? You sense, later on, she was glad to be out of the public eye.

Simmons: Yeah, well, I think the press made them nervous because the press had been pretty tough on them during the years. That’s my personal opinion. They said some things about her husband that she didn’t like. Even when we were flying on the airplane, she knew the press could be very, very tough on him. So if they would like to come up on board the airplane and interview her when we were on trips, she would make sure that everything was taken care of. Every once in a while she may have, some people didn’t notice, she may have a smoke every once in a while. She didn’t want any cigarettes or anything around when they came up there.

Smith: That’s right. People didn’t know that she smoked.

Simmons: No, no. But we had special cigarettes that we would keep on board for her – what she liked – drinks and that kind of stuff. Not a big one, but she would do them occasionally. But she would make sure that everything was cleaned up before the press came up.

I’ll tell you a little story. I made a trip with her to Liberia – Monrovia, Liberia – President Nixon asked me to go with her on that trip. We were staying in a guest house, one on the palace there, and I went in with her – into the hotel to take of and to monitor her food requirements, because I knew what she liked and everything. So they asked me to do that. The airport was fifty or sixty miles from where the town was, so I got on the airplane with her – they had another airplane that would take us on in, or I stayed at the hotel with them. While there, they assigned me a white Mercedes, air conditioned Mercedes, where her staff was using embassy cars, which had no air conditioning in them. So, on our way home, some of the staff told Mrs. Nixon, “Lee was assigned a Mercedes with air conditioning and we had the old black staff cars from the embassy”. She said, “Boy, was he really treated nice.” And I said, “Well, what did you expect? That was my country.” This was in Africa. So that went over very well. She laughed about that and kind of patted me on the shoulder, and kind of said, “Good for you, Lee.”

And then, to follow that up, about a year or so later, Tolbert, President Tolbert who she went to his inauguration in Africa, we were on our way down to Key Biscayne and she said, “Lee, our old friend is coming to town for a state visit. I want you and your wife to come.” I thought that was the greatest thing that ever happened to me in my military career. So my wife and I went to a state dinner at the White House because Mrs. Nixon asked that Rosemary Woods send us an invitation to come and we went. So the next day after the dinner, it came out in the Washington Post society page that among the other dignitaries attending the dinner was Mr. and Mrs. Lee F. Simmons. So I got a big kick out of that. I thought that was great. But that was her kindness. That was the way she was. A lot of people didn’t see that part of her, but I did.

Smith: Was she shy?

Simmons: She was shy. Yes, indeed. I thought so. As a matter of fact, when we left and went to take them back to California for the last time when he resigned, I didn’t understand this trip because everybody was crying and carrying on. I didn’t know how to handle this personally. I had been with them for seven and a half years, serving them, taking care of them on the airplane, and what was I going to say to them, or what were they going to say to me? I was very much concerned about that. I wanted to make sure that I had the opportunity to say something to her. But she was in her compartment just about all the time, she was with her daughter and her husband.

President Nixon was up front, and they didn’t really get together on that particular trip. She was served in her compartment and he was served in his and I was wondering what they were going to say to me, or what was I going to say to them. But, to make a long story short, when I went into there for the last time in President Nixon’s compartment – he had asked me early, before President Ford was sworn in, to bring him in a little cocktail and asked Ron Ziegler to come up, so they both had a little cocktail, and had lunch. He said, when I brought the cocktail in there, he said, “Lee, I’m going to miss you. You did a fine job and I want you to know how much I appreciate it.” And I said, “Sir, I am so sorry.” And he said, “Well, don’t worry about it, the world will continue. Everything is going to be fine. You take care of your family and you enjoy your life.” That’s what he said.

Mrs. Nixon had not said anything to me. She didn’t say anything to me until she was getting off the airplane and I was standing outside her door when she came out. She didn’t say very much. She just hugged me. And that was it. I didn’t see her again until later on at the dedication of the museum. But she was kind of shy, so she didn’t say a lot to me, but I knew she cared.

Smith: Was he shy?

Simmons: He was very much shy, yeah.

Smith: Because, he once said, very candidly, he said, “I’m an introvert in an extrovert’s profession.”

Simmons: Yeah, I agree with that. Now, I thought both of them were very loose and very accommodating around people they know. People that they had a confidence in, they’d been around them, they were very open, they were very kind, and they spoke to those people in great tones and everything. I think the press and other people that they didn’t have much respect for, or that they thought were out to get them, so to speak – that’s my own personal opinion, I’m not saying that I heard that from anybody – I think they were shy about that.

Now President Ford, that’s a different story. He was always open, he was always kind. He enjoyed being around people. He was just a joy to be around. I think that anybody that got to meet him – because they all felt as I did – that he was just like your next door neighbor. He was a guy that you felt very comfortable around after you met him. And I’m sure a lot of other people felt the same way.

Smith: What was your first contact with him?

Simmons: My first contact with him was when he flew on Air Force One going to Miami to the convention. He was a keynote speaker at the convention in Miami?

Smith: I think he was the permanent chairman – in ’72 – the convention that re-nominated Nixon.

Simmons: I didn’t know much about him. I hadn’t heard much about – I hadn’t even seen him, as a matter of fact, I don’t think. But he was on the airplane and I’m so pleased to say that he remembered meeting me on that airplane on that trip. So that was my first encounter with him. And I didn’t see him anymore until he became president. I didn’t see him during the time he was vice president.

Smith: What did you expect? You obviously had become close to the Nixons.

Simmons: Absolutely.

Smith: And their departure represented a loss for you, as well as a historic event for the country. What did you expect the rest of your life was going to be on August 8th, 1974?

Simmons: It was August 9th, 1974.

Smith: But the resignation came on the 8th. You’re right, of course, on the 9th came the actual transfer.
Simmons: I was very sad. Very disappointed. I had heard these rumors that he might leave. But because of my relationship with him and his wife on board the airplane and I was their personal steward, I was not the chief steward on the airplane, but I was their chief steward, because wherever they went, I was there. Their requirements on the airplane, I managed all of that. So this was a great thing for me. I came from the woods, the sticks in Alabama and I end up on Air Force One, being requested by the President of the United States to be their personal steward on board the airplane. That was great.

Smith: Did you feel comfortable around them as an African American?

Simmons: Absolutely. I felt very comfortable. I felt very comfortable and very at ease. The thing is, Richard, you have to be there to serve them. You have to know what they want and be there to take care of them, just like if they were a guest in your home. So, I had that ability to do that, and my personnel that helped me to accomplish that. So I was very comfortable around them. And I think they were very comfortable around me. And if I hadn’t been, they would not have requested that I be there. Same thing with President Ford. If they didn’t enjoy my personality and had confidence in me that I could do the job, I would have never been there. I would have been gone many years ago.

Smith: Among other things, I would think a successful steward needs a little bit of a sixth sense. It’s almost a psychological intuition about particular individuals, almost knowing in advance what they might want and anticipating?

Simmons: Well, let me just say this about President and Mrs. Ford. Of course, I didn’t know them very well when he first became president. We were only there for two and a half years. So I didn’t get to know them very much in the two and half years when he was president, but they asked me to come to California with them.

Smith: How did that happen?

Simmons: I think maybe Bob Barrett had asked me if I would like to come on the transition team. And of course, he said, “I’ll get back with you – let me speak with the president about this.” I think he had a talk with President and Mrs. Ford, and mentioned asking me to come to California with them. I went down to the White House and met them and talked to them and they said they were very pleased that I would be coming to California with them. And that’s what happened. I left – I was still assigned to Air Force One, and I came out here on January the 20th, 1977, and I was still in the Air Force for two months out here. I should have been back there flying with President Carter, but I was out here with him.

Smith: That’s interesting because you said, yourself, that you didn’t get to know them that well during the White House years, but obviously they, at least, thought they knew you well enough to make that very personal decision.

Simmons: Right, I think you’re right, there. And I would hope to credit that – because of the way that I held myself on board the airplane, and the way that I took care of them. But after we came out here and I started traveling with him on the airplane, taking care of him in hotels and being with him, we became much closer. As a matter of fact, President Ford would tell people, “This is my friend, Lee Simmons, who has been with me since the days I was in the White House.” And he would also tell them that Lee Simmons used to run Air Force One, “How many years, Lee? Twenty – twenty-five years?” I would not dispute him on that. I would just say, “Yes, sir.”

So, of course, we spent many, many hours together traveling. And in hotels across the country, and a lot of times, if he had no guests that he had to have dinner with, he would ask me to come in and have dinner with him. We would have breakfast together, we would have lunches, and whatever. He would say, “Lee, you got anything to do today or for dinner tonight?” And I would say, “No, sir.” I never had anything to do if the president wanted me to have dinner with him or lunch. I’m always available.

Smith: Does that suggest that he didn’t like to eat alone?

Simmons: Well, no. I think he didn’t mind. But he knew I was there. He and I – we left here together in the car – and so he’s just being kind. Asking me, “If you’re not doing anything, why don’t we just eat together.” Sometimes he would say, “Why don’t you find a restaurant – ask the Secret Service to find a restaurant close by someplace and let’s just go out and have dinner.” It would just be he and I. Of course, I ate that up. I thought that was great. Here I am sitting in the corner with President Ford having dinner and I’m sure the public is looking there and seeing this African American guy over here saying, ummm, wonder who that is? Must be the ambassador from Africa or somewhere – some diplomat.

So, of course, I enjoyed that. But he was that kind. He always was very thoughtful. I’d have dinner with him, if we were at some function that he was going to make a speech, regardless of where it was at, he would always introduce me. He would tell people, “This is Lee Simmons, who has been on my staff for x number of years,” and that kind of thing.

Smith: I get the impression that he and Mrs. Ford really enjoyed New York.

Simmons: Yes, oh yes. Of course, Mrs. Ford had some experience in New York before they got married. So, yeah, they enjoyed New York. They liked to shop – Mrs. Ford did, and President Ford bought a few suits up there. They had a lot of friends there, of course – a lot of people from his Cabinet.

Smith: He never threw away a suit, though, did he?

Simmons: No, no. He kept a lot of them. Once in a while he would get rid of something. As a matter of fact, I just sent some suits out to the museum here recently. I don’t know if you are aware of that, that he had when he was still a congressman in Grand Rapids. That was made in Grand Rapids.

Smith: My impression was, on more than one occasion he would appear dressed for an event and Mrs. Ford would say, “You’re not going to wear that.”

Simmons: Yeah, she had an influence on him. He would like to go in and say, “Betty, how you like this tie? How you like this?” And she would nod – but, on the whole, though, he was a pretty good dresser. He knew how to put his things together. The only thing is, he was always presidential. He never knew how to dress down. I remember getting a call from Marty Allen and telling me, “Lee, make sure the president has some casual clothes on when he arrives, because we are going directly to a baseball game at the White Caps.” Anyway, he wanted him to have on a sports coat or no tie. So I told him that the day before we left. I said, “Marty Allen would like for you to dress casual when you go in.” So the next morning I went over to pick him up and he had a suit on. I said, “Sir, they wanted you to wear a sports coat or some kind of casual, open collar.” He said, “Well, this is an old suit.” So that was his casual dress.

Smith: Probably made in Grand Rapids, too.

Simmons: He was that kind of guy. He was always presidential. When we flew on commercial airplanes, going to New York, arrive at the airport and go into the hotel and go to bed and the next day was going to get up and go to his function. I really wanted him to wear a coat, a sports coat and a tie because I always did – a sports coat and a tie, sweater. You always wore a sweater on the airplane to keep comfortable. But he always wore a suit and tie most of the time. Very seldom, occasionally when we were on a private airplane, he might wear something else.

Smith: I think people are surprised – and I’ll tell you very candidly because we’ll edit this out, because I was astonished, frankly, how long he flew commercial, long after he should have been flying commercial, and we pulled some strings and got that addressed. That said, how did people react on a commercial flight when Gerald Ford appeared? It must have been a shocker.

Simmons: Well, I tell you, I enjoyed that the most. I’d be sitting beside him, and then close to President Ford would tune them out when they got on board the airplane. He would be sitting there with his papers, of course, he was always busy on the airplane – reading the paper, or going over his speech, or whatever. He would just tune them out and people would get on board and then you could look at them punching one another and pointing to him. He would just continue to read his newspaper. Then occasionally they would ask Secret Service or someone if they could just shake his hand. Of course, they would always come up and ask me first. I had that privilege to say, “Sir, we have some people that would like to come up and shake up your hand. They know you from such and such a place.” He’d say, “Alright. Maybe one or two, I don’t want everybody on the airplane coming up.” Sometimes he’d say, “Well, I’m busy,” or whatever. And then he’d say, “Lee, tell that person to come on up.” He always wanted to be nice and kind to everyone.
But I enjoyed it the most, not him, that these people recognized him, and wanted to speak to him, and wanted to say hello to him. And then sometimes he didn’t want to be bothered. One thing he didn’t want them to do, he didn’t want them to be taking his picture, or disturbing other people on the airplane. He was concerned about the other people. Not so much that he didn’t want this to happen, but he didn’t want to disturb people on the airplane. He just wanted to read his newspaper and get to where he was going.

Smith: And one of the banes of the existence of former presidents is autograph seekers. I suspect they could spend a day a week doing nothing but signing their name.

Simmons: You know, I think that was one thing that bothered him the most. When he was in the public, that people would come up and ask for his autograph. He knew that if he’d give one person an autograph, then everybody and their brother would come up and ask for an autograph. And he would tell me when we were traveling, he would say, “Now, we will keep these autographs down to a minimum, if we can. We will try to.” But he would never hurt anybody’s feelings. He might try to stay away from it by being busy, but if it came down to whether or not he would disappoint a person, he would sign that autograph. But if he could stay out of it and not be involved in it, he would certainly do that.

Smith: Isn’t part of that because he knew there were also dealers? That this wasn’t just spontaneous – that in fact, there were people out there who were making money off of dealing his signature.

Simmons: Absolutely. And of course, that was one of my jobs. I handled autographs in books and things here in the office, and I had met autograph collectors and they told me how some people would get autographs out of them and take them and use them for something else – like, for instance, the signing of the pardon. He only did that once. But there are a lot of pardons out there for sale. People made a lot of money off of it. He knew about that because people told him about it. A lot of letters that he personally wrote to people ended up being sold. He was aware of them and that really upset him. He didn’t like that. So he had a thing about giving out autographs. It was okay if it was kids or someone that he thought was really deserving of one. But some of these people, collectors were one, and he could spot them because they were there with a handful of stuff, wanting you to autograph them. He was aware of that.

Smith: Baseballs?

Simmons: Baseballs, books, oh, absolutely. Oh, he was aware of that. That kind of drove him up a wall sometimes.

Smith: I saw President Reagan, it was fascinating to watch what he did. It was sort of counterintuitive. But one way he had of getting around this was, he would insist on personalizing the autograph, which actually diminishes the value if you’re selling.

Simmons: That was one way that he got out of it, too. But, Richard, he enjoyed doing things for people. He would do it, but he was aware that a lot of people were making money off of these autographs and that is not what he had intended for this to happen. He was a little cautious about that.

Smith: We were talking about the weather. That must have been one of the things that attracted the Fords to come out here.

Simmons: Yes, you’re right on that, Richard. I was told that one reason that they liked this place here is because of the dryness, because Mrs. Ford had some problem with her arthritis or whatever. That’s just what I was told. They considered Carmel. They had friends living up there – the Firestones had a home up there and they had a home down here. But I think they decided on this place because of the dry heat here, the weather, and of course, the nice golf course out here. President Ford liked to play a little bit of golf, so it was a good thing that he did because I, myself, enjoy playing a little golf.

Smith: Let me ask you, because, obviously she’s written about it at great length – has been very candid about it. What was your perception of her health when they moved out here? It has been written about - that by then her kids were grown up – it’s not an unusual situation, particularly for political wives, and he was as busy as ever. He was on the road a lot. He never really retired. Which left her, and that’s a difficult situation. What was your sense of that period?
Simmons: You mentioned her health. I never knew she had a health problem when I was around her. I knew they had sociable drinks occasionally – I never knew that was a problem until they addressed it. I did know a couple of times when we were scheduled to leave, go on a trip maybe, she had a little bit of a problem being on time, but I never attributed that to any drinking or anything. As a matter of fact, I’ll tell you this: when finally she did go to the Center – the Navy place.

Smith: In Long Beach.

Simmons: Long Beach – for this problem. She was there for a while. I went with her. I went down there and President Ford also went, so we all went down and she was there for whatever length of time she was. And then after it was all over, she was so candid about talking about it. She’d be talking to me about it and she said that was the greatest thing that ever happened to her. She said she never thought she had a problem until the kids and her husband got together and had this intervention. And I told her, and this is a true story and my own personal opinion about her, I said, “Ma’am, I never thought you had a drinking problem.” I said, “If you had a drinking problem, then I’ve a whole lot of friends that need to go to the Betty Ford Center right now.”

I think President Ford, when he traveled was concerned about her health, concerned about that problem. That’s the reason why, whenever we had the opportunity to come back here, maybe with one day, one night, he would come back home. He would be here with Mrs. Ford, and we would have to turn right around and fly back to Grand Rapids. Say we were in New York and the next day, he had an event in Grand Rapids or wherever back east, he would come home and be home with Mrs. Ford, and then he would take off and go back.

They were very close and a loveable family. He never went to bed at night when we were traveling without calling and talking to Mrs. Ford. The only time that ever happened was if we could not catch up with her. But usually we’d know where she was at. We could, of course, find out where she was because she had Secret Service agents. Maybe she would not have been able to speak to him at that time. If she wasn’t available he would say, “Lee, wake me up at such and such a time, because I want to call Mrs. Ford.” He would always call her, and in the conversation would say, how you been and whatever, and the last words he would say, “I love you, I can’t wait to get home.” Those kind of things. So they were very close. I think it had to do with probably he figured she needed him there, and he was gone for so much. He probably felt a little guilty about that and that’s the reason why he would fly home and turn around the next day and fly back east. But if he had the opportunity to spend it home with Mrs. Ford, he would certainly do that.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that, because I wonder – the earlier years, when he was coming up the ladder and just becoming a national figure in Congress, Republican leader and that sort of thing – and he was on the road so much of the time. He was pretty candid about saying, in fact, he really left the raising of the kids to Mrs. Ford. And I wonder if he felt, not guilt necessarily, but obviously he was aware of that…one sensed that he spent more time and more quality time, with the kids than perhaps he had when they were growing up.

Simmons: Oh, yeah. I think that’s quite true. As a matter of fact, I think that was one reason why he didn’t want to be president or run for office, because he had planned to retire, as you probably know, rather than run for any other political office. He had planned to retire so he could spend his time with his wife and family. I remember Mrs. Ford telling me that there was a lot of times on weekends when he was a Congressman, in order to spend some time with him, she had to go down to the office and spend time with him because he was gone so much. I’m sure she was aware of that, and I’m sure he felt that it was his responsibility to spend as much time as he could with her.

We could be in Australia or in China, or wherever, if Mrs. Ford was not with us, he would always make that phone call, and be able to say, “Betty, how are you doing? I love you and I miss you and I can’t wait to get back home to you.” Those are some of the things I heard. Maybe I’m not supposed to say those things, but…

Smith: That’s exactly what we’re looking for. And with the kids, I knew by that time they all had lives of their own, but I’d heard in particular that he spent a lot of time with Steve. That they would play golf together.
Simmons: Yes.

Smith: Particularly in the later years. I’m sure that was true with each of the kids, but I’d heard that in particular.

Simmons: Well, I think Steve was available. He was single. He would be around the president more than the other kids. I don’t think there was any choice there that he was making because he cared for one more for the other. I don’t believe so, personally. But he did spend a lot of time with Steve. He played a lot of golf with Steve, where he didn’t have the opportunity to do that with Jack and Mike, because they were not around as much. Of course, Susan was the love of his life.

Smith: Tell me about that relationship.

Simmons: Susan was more like her mom, I think. I think they had a very close relationship. She loved her daddy, I could see that. I remember Susan when she was like sixteen years old in the airplane, throwing spitballs at Secret Service agents. But she was there with her dad, and she was Susan.

Smith: Plus, they’d all been through that ordeal of Mrs. Ford’s cancer surgery – in the White House. Do you remember anything from that period – when Mrs. Ford had her cancer surgery and the family had to decide, do we make this public?

Simmons: The only thing I know about it is what I read in the paper, because I was on the airplane, of course. I was not in the White House with them when this all went down. So the only knowledge I had about that is what I heard later in life. I’ve heard them make comments about that. But, no, I was not too privileged of that going on in the White House.

Smith: But it’s funny how quickly kids grow up, because it was right at that time that Susan, who before they moved into the White House had said, “I’m not going if I have to give up my blue jeans,” put on an evening dress and gloves, white gloves and stood in for her mother. Overnight – the transformation.

Simmons: Susan traveled with us a lot when he was President, on a lot of trips overseas. And she was a kid.
Smith: She met Chairman Mao.

Simmons: Yes. She sure did. It was interesting to see her – her father being president and she’s on the airplane traveling around with him. It was great to see that. I’ve known her ever since she was sixteen years old.

Smith: And as grandparents, how did they deal with that?

Simmons: Well, they talked about that a lot because, I have grandkids, and we often talked about their grandkids. They loved their grandkids. They enjoyed having them around. I think that was some of the greatest times they had, when they’d come visit – and still do at this time with Mrs. Ford. When her grandkids and her great-grandkids now come around – that’s all new. When I met them, there was only one of them who was married, and had no kids at that time – Mike. So the kids have been a very great, and I believe, one of the great things for them - they thoroughly enjoyed mostly - is having their kids around them when they could.

Of course, with them living here and the kids living elsewhere, it was kind of difficult, but that’s why they enjoyed going to Beaver Creek. Because they always made it a point to get together in Beaver Creek, to be together either at Christmas time, or during the summer time. They made time for those kids there. They didn’t spend too much time here with them, but in Beaver Creek, at Christmastime, and then during the summer months when they were up there for summer, all the kids were there as much as possible.

Smith: When he was here in the office, take us through a typical day.

Simmons: On a typical day, President Ford would come over to the office about nine, nine-thirty, ten o’clock. He would come in the office and go over his mail, whatever we put on his desk - he would go through that. Maybe he would have Penny come in. He would deal with her with certain things that had to be done – whatever her responsibility was to him. The appointment secretary, schedule person would come in and go over whatever the schedule is and whatever he is dealing with to make the arrangements when he arrived to a particular function that he had to go to. And then Shelley, who was his personal secretary, to deal with personal stuff. She would come in and deal with him.

And then if he needed me for whatever – if he wanted me to run errands, or to deal with things that are going on at the museum, if I had to send stuff out there, or find out about the book count, or whatever – he would occasionally have me. I was in and out of here more than most of them because I had a lot of other little things to do, because we were traveling together all of the time.

He would be here until about one o’clock, and then he would go over and have lunch, and then about two o’clock he would come back over and stay here until we leave. As a matter of fact, sometimes he would be in the office here, still going over his papers, or reading his papers, and having a little smoke when he smoked. And then on Saturdays – he worked on Saturdays, boy – we had to have the office open on Saturdays, as well. Although no banks were open, but the mail probably was not going to go out because nobody was here but him. But one of us, or somebody had to come in and go over the mail and make sure he got his newspapers and his magazines. Maybe we didn’t have to spend all day here, but we would come in because he was always here. I understand, on Sundays, he would come back over and spend some time here between breakfast and lunch.

A typical day with him is, he’d spend at least six or seven hours here in the office and then he would go back home.

Smith: And he did that as long as he was physically able.

Simmons: Right. He certainly did. Holidays, he said to me once – I said, “You know, sir, tomorrow is a holiday.” He’d say, “Well, I didn’t vote for it.” So he wanted us here on holidays, too, as well. But we understood him. We were government workers, and government supposedly has the holidays off, but we were working not for the government, we were working for President Ford.

Smith: The taxpayer got their money’s worth in this office.

Simmons: That’s right! What a great guy – what a wonderful person to work for. I will always be grateful for that opportunity.
Smith: My sense is that, up until his ninetieth birthday, he was still traveling extensively. And that whenever – I don’t know if there was a time when the doctor said, you really have got to stop traveling – or whether it was less dramatic than that – that that really marked the turning point. He loved travel, didn’t he?

Simmons: He loved traveling. He enjoyed it. I don’t know when it tapered off. The last couple years of his life, there were only one or two trips. One of them was when his granddaughter got married down in Texas. We went to that. Other than that, he didn’t do much traveling any more after that. But, boy, we were gone a lot when he was able to travel.

Smith: Do you remember the ninetieth birthday party at the White House?

Simmons: Oh, yes.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Simmons: I wasn’t on that trip, as a matter of fact, because I was here and they left Beaver Creek and went to – so I’m not privileged on what happened on his ninetieth birthday party – although I was with him in most things we went to the White House. But that one escaped me.

Smith: Tell us about a typical day in Beaver Creek and how that would be different, or if it was different from a typical day here.

Simmons: It was the same routine as if he was here. The same thing. He had his schedule. His schedule was laid out from the time he got up in the morning until he went to bed at night, and the various little trips when he was in Beaver Creek to go to when there was no out of town trip. If he had to leave to go to New York to board meetings, or wherever, of course, those were still maintained as it was if he were here.

Smith: And where would you fly into? Where was the nearest airport for Beaver Creek?

Simmons: Beaver Creek? At Avon. They had an airport at Avon. Avon was closer. Then we had another airport. That’s something that’s escaping me at the moment, I can’t think of the name of it. But sometimes if the weather was inclement, we would have to drive two and a half hours down to Denver to go out of Denver. But there was another airport there.

Smith: And I suspect he probably didn’t enjoy that.

Simmons: Well, President Ford entertained himself because he would have all those stacks of newspapers that he had to get rid of. So he’d sit in the back of the limo and read his newspapers. So it didn’t bother him.

Smith: He really was a newspaper junkie, wasn’t he?

Simmons: He was. He read about six newspapers, and then the thing about him: you saying a junkie, if we were in New York, and he had the New York Times, those papers would be here when he got back, he would keep a record of it. If we were in Washington, D.C., he would keep a record of the newspapers that he had read and he would give me that slip and tell me, when we would get back, I’d know what to do – go get those newspapers and throw them out so he wouldn’t have to deal with them. But he would read every newspaper, the Grand Rapids Press, of course we got the Wall Street Journal everywhere we went, he read all the newspapers.

Smith: And what about exercise? There is this pool out back here, he made use of that, didn’t he?

Simmons: Yeah, but the pool over at the house, not the one here at the office, but the one over at the house. He had a lap pool over there and he used to swim sometimes in the morning and sometimes in the evening when his health allowed him to do that. He had a couple of little exercise things in his dressing room that he would exercise. He stayed fit, and he watched his diet all the time.

Smith: He was very disciplined, wasn’t he?

Simmons: He certainly was. He loved butter-pecan ice cream and, as you probably know, and he loved chocolate ice cream. But he always watched his weight. As a matter of fact, I think he told me that his weight never varied too much from his playing weight when he was in college – 198 pounds or something like that. He loved to brag about that – that he was still in shape.

Smith: You saw him around President Carter. They clearly developed a very good friendship. Can you describe that relationship?

Simmons: Oh yeah, I can. I think, personally – now this is my own personal opinion – at first, maybe there was some distance there between the two of them. I always felt President Carter was very friendly and very nice. I was wondering about President Ford. This is my own opinion now, I was wondering if he didn’t still, maybe have some kind of resentment because of the defeat and because of some of the things that were said. But they did, eventually, become close friends, and they did travel together occasionally and on the same airplane together. They had lunch together. They had dinner together. Of course, I was there. As a matter of fact, I made arrangements for both of them.

Smith: Were you there on the trip to the Sadat funeral?

Simmons: I didn’t go on that trip.

Smith: Supposedly that’s where they broke the ice.

Simmons: As a matter of fact, President Carter told me about a month ago, that’s when they became good friends. I had the opportunity to speak to President Carter’s Political Item Collectors. There is a group of people from twenty-one years that have called themselves President Carter’s Political Items Collectors, and they asked me to speak to that group about a month ago down in Plains, Georgia. And I had the opportunity to meet with President and Mrs. Carter while down there. As a matter of fact, they came to the event and sat at the head table with me and my wife, which was a great opportunity for me to get to see them again and say hello to them again. And he told me at that time, as a matter of fact, I had said in my speech that they became good friends and we traveled a lot together in my introduction to my speech.

I mentioned some of the places that we had gone – Tip O’Neill’s funeral, down to the Panama Canal Zone, and various other trips, to the Carter Center and also out at the Museum and Library. They were there on several occasions. I just mentioned that and I said they became good friends. I said, as a matter of fact, I didn’t know – I wasn’t sure President Carter knew who I was. I’d been traveling around with him, so I went up to him one day, although I had met him and shook hands with him, but I wasn’t sure if he knew who I was. I was thinking maybe he thought I was a Secret Service agent. I wanted to make sure he knew I was President Ford’s assistant, so I went up and shook hands and said, “How you doing, President Carter? It’s good to see you again. I’m Lee Simmons, President Ford’s assistant.” And he said to me, “Lee, I know who you are.” And I said, from that day on he became my buddy, too.

He got up after I finished speaking and made comments, and he said that he and President Ford became very good friends at Anwar Sadat’s funeral trip – that’s when we really got to become good friends.

Smith: You stop to think about it, as unlikely as it seems in the abstract, they had a lot of shared values. They had a lot of what you would call traditional values, strong religious convictions, family men – they had a lot that would bond them once you get past that very large fact that they’d run against each other for president. And it tells you a lot about both of them that they were able to get past that.

Simmons: Absolutely. I think that is quite true. They both were family men, they loved their family and their kids. They were ordinary people. They came from ordinary backgrounds. As you know, President Carter was a peanut farmer, President Ford’s family was not well off. He worked for whatever he got. So, yeah, they were almost like your next door neighbor, so to speak.

Smith: Plus, they both ran against Ronald Reagan.

Simmons: Yes. That’s true, too.

Smith: That was something else that bonded them.

Simmons: That’s true. So, I think they became good friends and I think they had a lot in common, as well.

Smith: There clearly was a close relationship with the Bush family.
Simmons: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: That went back really to President Bush ‘41’s dad – who I guess had been in Congress when Gerald Ford was there.

Simmons: Yes, absolutely. And they played golf together at various places around. We played golf with him in Texas at a tournament there. They played here at the Annenberg estate – they played golf there together.

Smith: Tell me about that relationship with the Annenbergs, because that was a very close friendship, wasn’t it?

Simmons: It was. Maybe some other staff people might have more insight on that because when they visited the Annenberg estate, or the Annenberg’s came here, I was not too much involved in that. I didn’t have to be with him on those kind of occasions, so I didn’t get to know a lot about what was going on. I just know that they had a good, close relationship with the Annenberg’s. We made two or three trips with the Annenberg’s. President Ford went to the Annenberg School back in Pennsylvania. I was on that trip with him. And so I was around them, but not as much as when they were here.

Smith: And I remember, because I worked on the eulogy, one of President Ford’s last trips was to speak at Ambassador Annenberg’s memorial service. It must have been one of his last trips.

Simmons: Probably was. Close to it, I’m not sure, but I think it was. They were good friends and they liked one another very much. They often had lunch or dinner there when they had other dignitaries in, even when Ronald Reagan used to come out when he was president. He used to come here for a New Year’s dinner and the Fords were always invited and they were always there. So they were very close.

Smith: How did you sense, just from your observation, the relationship with the Reagans?

Simmons: The Reagans? I think they were friendly, but I don’t think they were as close as they were with other friends of theirs. They did not get together that much. Occasionally, for various functions when they were there, they were very cordial towards one another and everything. I think the relationship was fine – was okay, but I, personally, would not say that it was on the top of their list for social functions.

Smith: Let me ask you something, and this may be totally speculative and you don’t have to answer this, but clearly an attempt was made when President Ford died - there were the stories that Bob Woodward and others who wrote, quoting or taking out of context, depending on however you see it - some of the things that he’d said, for example, about the Iraq war. Questions about some of his people who had been involved in the current administration. Did you have a sense of how he felt about all that? Particularly the current war and the role that some of his cabinet officers played in the current administration.

Simmons: I think he was very much aware of what was going on, and I think he was very proud of the former cabinet members who were on his cabinet were there. He supported them wholeheartedly. He always defended them. He thought they were good people and he thought they were doing a great job. He always supported them and I don’t think he was disappointed in what was going on. He thought they were making a great contribution. I heard him say that. Dick Cheney and all the other people who were on there. He thought they were doing a great job. He had utmost respect for all of those people and their capability in handling the situation. So he was very, very pleased about that situation.

Smith: Did he have much contact with Richard Nixon after leaving the White House?

Simmons: No, not a lot. We only saw Richard Nixon when we went to a couple functions that he was there. One of them was in Washington, D.C. and I don’t remember what the function was. And it was the first time that I had seen President Nixon after I had been working with him, and I was so pleased to be there – to be able to go up and say hello to him. I’ll never forget, President Nixon looked at me and said, “Where’d you get that thing from?” – talking about my mustache. When I worked with him I didn’t have a mustache on. I was very happy about that – that he recognized me and knew who I was.
They did call one another occasionally – birthdays and that kind of stuff. Occasionally, they did talk. I know they did have a personal relationship, but it wasn’t as outgoing as it probably could have been, if it hadn’t been for political reasons.

Smith: When Nixon died – what were your feelings? I think a lot of people were surprised that the country reacted the way that it did – that there was really such an outpouring of genuine emotional response.

Simmons: Yes, I was pleased to see that and I think President Ford was, too. He was happy to be able to go to the funeral and pay his respects. I know I was. I thought that it was overdue. I believed the man was trying to, when he did what he did, he did it because he thought that was the right thing to do for his staff. He may have made a mistake, and I think he eventually admitted that. And I know President Ford probably thought the same thing – that he’d made a mistake when he didn’t…whoever was responsible, he should have just went ahead and got rid of him and then he probably would have been fine.

Then again, if that would have happened, he probably would have never become president. And I would probably have never ended up out here in this good weather. I’m very happy to see the outpouring of love and affection for President Nixon as well as I was for President Ford when he died. I thought it was well overdue. I think when he died, and we went back to Washington and to Grand Rapids, all the people that showed up and showed their affection, “My Jerry,” and all of that. That was heartwarming, and I was so pleased to be a part of that.

Smith: It’s interesting because I was wearing two hats that week. The first half of the week I was with ABC and then, of course, was with the family the second half. I can tell you, from my observation inside the media cocoon, the media was surprised at the amount of public response. And one of the things in particular, in D.C., the number of young people who you would see in the crowds, and in many cases, African-Americans. A lot of people were being introduced to him for the first time. They weren’t even alive when he was in the White House, but they were seeing this man, these old clips, and they were comparing him, contrasting him, with what had happened to politics, and they liked what they saw. I think that was part of the response, don’t you?

Simmons: Yeah, I do, too. And what I noticed a whole lot, and I’m sure it was due to the fact that he was a Boy Scout himself, as we traveled, all the Boy Scouts were there, all over the place. Everywhere you went, signs ups, troops, and that was gratifying to see because even after he left the White House and came out here, we got tons of letters – Boy Scouts that had become Eagle Scouts and President Ford was one – and he wrote letters to all these people and they were there. I bet you maybe a hundred thousand of them were Boy Scouts who had received a letter from President Ford from this office right here, congratulating them.

Smith: And another constituency he had, which very poignantly appeared out of nowhere at that point, were Vietnamese Americans. Vietnamese who had been rescued and their children. Operation Baby Lift, that was an extraordinary and very little known part of his story.

Simmons: Yes, that is true, Richard, but I think President Ford was aware of it. It was very gratifying to see this outpouring of love from even those people, too.

Smith: The last years – tough?

Simmons: Tough for all of us. Very tough, because we knew how active he had always been. It was tough for me to see him when he needed help to do anything, because he was such a private and such a gentleman that he wanted to be able to function on his own. Although I had been with him all these many years, it became a time when he couldn’t tie his necktie, when I would have to come over. He would say, “Lee, I hate to ask you to do this,” and I’d say, “Sir, don’t worry about it, anytime you need me, I’m here.” So I would go home – I wasn’t working full time, I was just part time, but whenever he needed me, I would be there. And grateful, very happy to do that. I’d go tie his necktie, or help him to get dressed. I was very pleased to do that because I think he was the nicest, kindest person that you’d ever want to meet.

Smith: It was just basically a heart problem, wasn’t it? A weakening heart contributed to a general…
Simmons: What I read in the paper, yes, I think that had something to do with it. He became weak where he couldn’t get around as much as he’d like. That was very sad for me to see, because I knew that he was always a man that wanted to go out and exercise, he wanted to go for a walk, and all of a sudden he couldn’t do those things. I know that he was miserable. I know if he had anything to do with it, it would not be that way. But, unfortunately, that’s the way life is. It’s going to happen to all of us one of these days.

Smith: Do you remember 9/11?

Simmons: Absolutely. Yes.

Smith: What was that like around here?

Simmons: We were in New York when that happened. President Ford and I were at the Waldorf. No, no, no. I’m sorry – back up. We were here. That was something else that happened in New York. I remember being in the Waldorf – I think it’s when the spaceship was blown up – that’s where we were. I’m sorry, we were here. I correct that.

Well, I remember coming in and talking to him about it and he asked me, “Did you see that?” We talked about it a little bit. I think he was very sad about it and he watched the news in here, in this office, and heard about it when it was going on. There were some phone calls made to him. He was involved in it.

Smith: I remember he did a – because we had an event in Grand Rapids and he did a phone call and spoke and compared it to Pearl Harbor. For his generation, it must have brought back painful, but ultimately triumphant memories. Pearl Harbor ushered in a war that nobody wanted, but in the end couldn’t be avoided.

Simmons: I agree with you there. That was a hard time for all of us – not only for President and Mrs. Ford, but for staff as well. We got a lot of calls, people were calling, trying to get in touch with him during that period of time.

Smith: He was very proud of his Navy service, wasn’t he?
Simmons: Oh yeah. Yes, proud of his military service. We often talked about the Navy and the Air Force. I was in the Air Force – that’s how we became good friends as well. Talk about my military career, he was proud of my military career. We would talk about that – about the boats and the ships and that kind of stuff. He was proud of it.

Smith: Another controversy that I know, because I was involved with him, of course, was the whole Clinton impeachment business. And I’m sure he got a lot of calls and a lot of angry messages when he wrote the OpEd piece in the Times that proposed, in effect, a formal rebuke in a joint session of Congress, nationally televised, which, when you stop to think now, I bet you both sides wished they’d had the smarts to take. Because it would have been a dignified end to this mess and the country could have gotten on with its business.

How did he feel about it? You must have seen him together with President Clinton.

Simmons: Oh, yeah, I had. On several occasions I was with him at the White House and other events. I think maybe one of the other staff persons could probably answer how his true feeling was better than I can at that time. I know that he was concerned about this and he made his comments, which I was not as privileged to them as some of the other staff people would probably be.

Smith: But in doing so, he was also willing, frankly, to take on the right wing of his own party. At that point everything had become so polarized, and he was the one person who was out there trying to sort of point out there was a moderate, dignified way to bring this to a conclusion. Not only that, but remember, he and Mrs. Ford were outspokenly pro-choice when it came to abortion. They were supportive of gay rights at a time when you didn’t hear a lot of that from conservative Republicans. Did they feel at all isolated within their own party – the party that he’d spent his whole lifetime in?

Simmons: I don’t think so. I think they spoke their mind, whatever they thought about it, they spoke up. He wrote about it, he talked about it. So, I don’t think they felt isolated. I think they did what they thought was right and they spoke their mind when it was necessary. Absolutely, I do believe that.
Smith: What was Christmas like? They would go up to Vail every year?

Simmons: Yes. They always went to Vail until the last two years of his life. They didn’t go the last couple of years. They always went to Vail. As I said earlier, that was a time that they got together for family. The whole family was able to get together and they skied together, when they were able to ski together. And now the grandkids were skiing. He made sure that they got lessons, because that was one of his passions. I understand Mrs. Ford used to ski, too. But in the later years neither one of them skied when we used to go up there. For the last thirty years they very seldom skied. But that was a great time for them. They used to have all those ski tournaments and he always participated in that because that was one of their passions. They thoroughly enjoyed that. That was a great time for them to get together as family members and enjoy one another. Because with his traveling and her doing her thing, they didn’t get together too much down here, but up there, they did have the opportunity.

Smith: He was very proud of her work with the Betty Ford Center, wasn’t he?

Simmons: Absolutely, very proud of her.

Smith: And he was involved with that, wasn’t he?

Simmons: That’s right. As a matter of fact, he would always come back and say, “Betty, all your fans were looking for you. They wanted to know why you weren’t there. They were more concerned about you than they were about me.” He loved to come back and tell her that. And I think that’s true. I think she was very popular as his wife, and she had her fans out there as well. People respected her for what she contributed, and even to this day.

Smith: I’ve heard stories – I guess every year they would have a sort of an alumni reunion and it would not be surprising to find the president cooking hot dogs and serving hot dogs. That sort of thing. That kind of hands-on involvement.

Simmons: Absolutely. I went through the program. As a matter of fact, a lot of our staff people went through the Betty Ford program – they had support for family members and that kind of stuff, not for who had a problem – drug or alcohol problem. But family support groups. They had a lot of those classes over there and I went to two of them. I got a chance to go to those and those alumni association lunches and dinners and enjoyed the heck out of it. They did, too. They enjoyed being there. People enjoyed having them there. That’s my joy, seeing them being worshipped by these people, showing their appreciation for the things that they have done for this country.

Smith: That’s interesting because here and in Vail, one sensed that they were really first-citizens.

Simmons: I think that people realized that the Fords made a difference in Vail, and they made a difference here. Of course, President Ford was very active in support of the local communities here - Boys & Girls Club – because I was on the board, and still am on the board of Boys & Girls Club. He always supported the Boys & Girls Club, not only with funds, but also with items – auction items and card drawings and that kind of thing – he always participated in that. I’m happy to say that Mrs. Ford told me, “Oh, yeah, I know how you come in and bang on his door to help support the Boys & Girls Club. We will continue that trend. We will continue to support those groups.” And so she is still doing that to this day, the Boys & Girls Club.

I’m also in the Optimist Club in Palm Desert, and we support the high school students and some of the junior colleges around here with essays and oratoricals, and he was always willing to support those groups whenever I came in and talked to him. Sometimes he would even go out and meet some of these people for me. He was just a nice guy and a caring person for his community. And I guess he always has been. He told me he was on the Optimist Club back in Grand Rapids. I didn’t know that until I joined and he told me, “I was an Optimist.” So he was an all around general nice man. Beautiful person.

Smith: Let me ask you something, because I sort of hinted at it earlier. But in terms of, for lack of a better word, racial politics, you felt totally comfortable around the Fords as an African American.

Simmons: Oh, I never – unless I looked down and saw my skin, I wouldn’t have known I was black. I felt very comfortable and I know President Ford was very comfortable around African Americans. Of course, you all know about his association and his affection for one of his football players.

Smith: Willis Ward.

Simmons: Willis Ward. He told me about him, many times. I got a sense that he had passion for African American people. I don’t know any other people that he was close with.

Smith: Pearl Bailey was a real friend.

Simmons: Pearl Bailey was, yeah. As a matter of fact, when we moved here the first time, Pearl Bailey came from Arizona and brought loads of food over here for the Fords and maintained her relationship with them until she died.

Yeah, he would always say nice things about some of the people that he knew who were African Americans. As a matter of fact, I’ll never forget the gentleman that became – the first African American to become the president and CEO of American Express – Chenault, I don’t know if you know him. I remember we were at a board meeting there. Henry Kissinger was there. And I saw this gentleman there, it was kind of strange for me to see an African American on the board there, and I was kind of surprised when I saw him. I asked President Ford who he was. Let me tell you, he went to great length to tell me about this gentleman, who he was, and what he thought of him. And let me tell you what he said. He said, “One day I think he will probably be the CEO of American Express.” Sure enough, it happened. So, I think President Ford was a very caring person when it came to racial relations. I think he contributed as much as any other president would have.

Smith: A couple of things and I’ll let you go. One is, he took some grief, particularly early on for “commercializing” the ex-presidency. And I’m not pointing fingers, or anything else, but he did, he took some grief.

Simmons: Absolutely.

Smith: How did he handle that? I don’t mean to answer my own question, but of course, what didn’t get the publicity, were all of the charity events and all the campus visits and everything else that he did. That said, how did handle that?
Simmons: I think he handled it very well. He knew what he was doing. He knew it was an honest job. Nobody was giving him anything. He was making a contribution to those companies that he spoke to, and those groups that he was on the boards with.

Smith: He took those board directorships very seriously.

Simmons: Very serious. And he went to every one of them. There was very few times where he didn’t make the board meeting when he was supposed to be there. He went, he contributed. I was there, I saw this. I think he was very comfortable with that. He knew that he was contributing to other areas, not only to the boards. As I mentioned, here in Coachella Valley, he was very visible, he did a lot of things for the library here, and also the post office was recently named after him. He was very comfortable. He knew he was making his contribution to mankind. There were a lot of people criticize him for doing a lot of things, but he didn’t feel he was doing anything wrong.

Smith: And the other thing – one of the things that I think brought Ford and Carter together was, neither one was prepared for that fact that as an ex-president they had to raise millions of dollars to build their presidential library. And I know President Ford was quoted as saying, “It’s the toughest thing I ever did.” And in those days it was like nine million dollars – you can imagine today. But a lot of those speaking fees went directly to the Foundation.

Simmons: Yeah. Oh, absolutely. He’d donate a lot of that. And he had a problem with – he knew that he had friends that made contributions to his Foundation, and a lot of people were after him to ask him to make contributions to theirs, and he didn’t feel like it was right for him to solicit them for his endeavor and then to ask them to go and go do things for other people. He felt a little uncomfortable in doing that. Of course, he did do that in some occasions, but I think that he had a problem with soliciting funds for other endeavors, for other people because he was very appreciative for what they had done for him and Mrs. Ford and the Betty Ford Center and the Foundation. And he just didn’t want to overdo it because he is a compassionate person, that’s why I think he had a problem with that.
Smith: Do you remember his last days? Were you around during his last days?

Simmons: I was there the day that he died, yes. Saw him, came in and looked at him. Of course, I was always around him.

Smith: Did he just fade away?

Simmons: Yes. He just went to sleep, peaceful.

Smith: Now, some of the family had been here for Christmas.

Simmons: Yes. Jack and his family were here. Steve was here. A couple of granddaughters were here that live out here – Mike’s two daughters that live here in California. They were here. Those are the ones that were here for Thanksgiving.

Smith: Was he aware that they were around?

Simmons: I think so, yeah. He was alert. I think so, yeah.

Smith: Because you’d heard, it’s speculated that, at some level, he knew it was Christmas and he didn’t want to die on Christmas. He wanted to postpone it.

Simmons: Oh, Christmas Day, I’m not so sure he was that alert, but I don’t know for sure. But, I don’t think he was too alert at that time.

Smith: Do you remember your last conversation with him?

Simmons: Yes, of course. I went in there and asked him, “How you doing, sir?” He looked up at me and said, “Very good,” in a very weak voice, “Doing pretty good.” I said, “Good,” and I told him about there was something that was in the newspaper concerning Michigan and I mentioned something to him about that. He just kind of nodded, not too much conversation about it. But those are the last things that I said to him.

Smith: How rough has it been for her?

Simmons: On my personal opinion, looking at her I think it has been very, very difficult for her. And the reason I say that is because, of course though, she is ninety years old, she doesn’t seem to be getting out as much as I think that she probably could if she wanted to. She doesn’t see a lot of people. Very seldom does she see anyone at this time. But I’m happy to say that I can go over there and sit down and talk to her anytime. She will always say, “Hi, Lee,” and ask me about my family and how you doing, or what’s going on for Christmas or Thanksgiving – that kind of stuff. But I don’t think she really enjoys being there by herself anymore.

Smith: I think a lot of people didn’t realize, they’d been married fifty-eight years, and it was a great love match.

Simmons: It was, I think.

Smith: And, you don’t get over that.

Simmons: It doesn’t end. I have great respect for her to endure this. She held up so wonderfully during the funeral. I thought she did a marvelous job of getting through that.

Smith: It was extraordinary.

Simmons: Because she was sick herself.

Smith: We were told, and I assume the other networks, starting at St. Margaret’s, we had been told, don’t be surprised if you see Mrs. Ford in a wheelchair. Well, of course, we never saw her…

Simmons: She was determined not to do that. A lot of people wanted her to be in a wheelchair because they thought she was just that sick. But she was such a trooper, she decided she was going to walk to her husband’s funeral, and she did so. And I’m so proud of that.

Smith: Someone said, afterwards, that they had remarked to her along those lines, and her response was, “Well, that’s what my husband would have wanted.”

Simmons: Absolutely. They both would have been strong for one another. They would have went the last mile for one another because they cared so much for one another. I know that why she stuck it out. I know that she probably didn’t want to be there, she would have rather been home in bed in her housecoat, but this was a duty that’s she had to perform and, thank God, she was able to do it. And I think she needs to be commended about that above anything – that she did that for her husband, who had this great love affair.

Smith: She must be pleased to know – how many people found an institution and know in their own lifetime that it’s been handed on to someone that they really, obviously can trust. In her case, to Susan, with the Betty Ford Center.
That must be a source of some satisfaction, to know that it will not only “endure after I’m gone,” but it will be in the hands of someone who will cherish it as much she has.

Simmons: Oh, yeah. She’s very pleased about that, I think. This is my own opinion, I never talked to her about that, but I can tell that she is very pleased that Susan is doing an excellent job. And it’s been in the paper. A lot of stories about what a great job she is doing. And I know she has got to be very, very proud.
We have not talked about this personally, but I think she is very pleased.

Smith: One last thing. When you look back at the funeral, in all the places that it took place, the crowds and everything else – is there something that you can distill out of that. Is there one scene, one incident, one story, or something that you really take with you? Something that almost sums it all up?

Simmons: Well, I hate to say - that’s because I had the opportunity to be there with them, that I was treated like part of the family, that was a great thing that I will always remember. That I had the opportunity to fly with President Ford, with his body on Air Force One, an airplane that I flew when he was president, back to Washington, D.C., and all the way over to Grand Rapids.
That was a great pride of mine and to have my wife with me, as well. Now as far as President Ford goes, I thought he was well deserving of all those accolades, of those folks who turned out.

Smith: Think he would have been surprised?

Simmons: No, no. I think he knew that he was deserving of this. I don’t think he would have been surprised. He would have expected those people to show up, because he was a compassionate person. He was a dignified man.
Smith: But one of the real satisfactions must have been knowing, long before he died, that people would come around to his way of thinking on the pardon.

Simmons: Oh, absolutely. Yes. The Kennedys for one. That was a big, great relief for him, I think, when we went up there and he received that award at the museum in Massachusetts – the Kennedy Museum, when they gave him that award and put it around…he felt almost like he was vindicated – is that a good word? Because the Kennedys came out for him in support of the pardon. I think that was absolutely a thrill for him. Yes, sir! And I was there to witness it!

Smith: And the senator could not have been more gracious – Senator Kennedy. Basically, saying I was wrong and he was right. And Caroline – that was an amazing day.

Simmons: That was an amazing day and I’m pleased to say that I was there to witness it, yes, sir.

Smith: Lee, thank you. This has been wonderful.

Simmons: You’re welcome. It was my pleasure.

Smith: Well, first of all, thank you for doing this. Tell us how your paths originally crossed with Gerald and Betty Ford.

Parma: In 1958 a very dear friend of mine, Bob Wilson, having been elected when Eisenhower was elected in ’52, as a member of Congress from San Diego, asked me if I would come back and be his chief of staff. I was on a fast track in management with a significant company in San Diego. I said, Bob, that’s going me to take me off this track. Ed Terrar been with him for five years and wanted to come home. Earlier Bob had actually hired me out of San Diego State to be the executive manager of the San Diego Junior Chamber of Commerce, of which he was president. We established a nice relationship during that time. I eventually said, Bob, I’ll go back for a year. And he said, fine. He said, I just think you ought to have this exposure – it’s a terrific experience. I ended up staying five years. It was so interesting. I would get on the red-eye right now and fly back do it again in a whisper. It was the most enjoyable five years I’ve ever spent. It affected my whole life in many ways.

Significantly, during that time, Bob Wilson became part of the leadership. He was chairman of the Republican National Congressional Committee, which was the elective side of the House –to elect members of Congress. Being in leadership, my path crossed with other leaders. The ’58 Congressional elections were a debacle for us. We lost a lot of seats. The Young Turks, Bob Wilson, Mel Laird, were members of a little group called SOS. Every class that goes into Washington, 10-15 members of each party may meet once a week, and they select from different committees and get a briefing on thousands of bills that are in, and try to find out what is happening on legislation. That’s the way they keep in touch. This was a responsible group of men and they got together. I’m just reading Mel Laird’s book With Honor now, and Mel spends considerable time on this, on how they had to change leadership.

In 1958, Joe Martin, the former speaker, the minority leader. Sam Rayburn and Joe had dinner together every night at the Occidental Hotel. You could always tell what they had for dinner because Joe had it on his tie. He always wore the same tie and it was thick. Sam pretty well got what he wanted from Joe. The Republican members were concerned that they were being led around, and obviously, they weren’t winning back the House. So Bob Wilson had a meeting in our office, of probably five or six members. This was November, after the election. A lot of members had not returned to the capital. Everyone was deeply concerned so they said, let’s meet tomorrow and get more members in. They got more members in, and Bob said, better get over to the Congressional Hotel and get a room over there. The end result was that they settled on, first, that Jerry Ford should be the replacement for Joe Martin. And so there was a meeting in Jerry Ford’s office and he said I’m not going to seek the office, I’ll take it, if you offer it. If it’s available, but I’m not going to…

Smith: Let me interrupt you because I’m confused, because I know Charley Halleck...

Parma: That was later.

Smith: Okay.

Parma: What happened was that they went to Ford. He’d shown his skills. He was not quite the old-timer guy, and he was a little older than these Young Turks. He’d come in 1948. So at that meeting he said I’m not going to fight for it, I’ll take it if it is available. Les Arends and those fellows found out about it. So the old foxes got together, they controlled the committee placements, and they started to point out realities to these Young Turks. If you guys lose, hope you enjoy being on the district committee. And things like that. The result is that they switched from Ford, obviously they didn’t have the votes, and Halleck got the job. Then there was another revolution later. Halleck was replaced somebody else. But at any rate, in the course of that, I met Jerry Ford.

Our paths would cross the five years that we were there. As Bob’s leadership stature grew, so did the chief of staff’s. Being close friends, he took me to a lot of meetings that normally a staff guy wouldn’t be in. As an example, the first day on the job, he did two things. Number one, he had The New York Times, The Post, LA Times, and the San Diego paper, and he said, “Look at the bylines on all of these.” Washington, Washington, New York, something else, Washington. Washington dominated on almost every newspaper. He said, this is where it is happening. I said, yeah, okay, I follow you. And the other thing he did was to say I need to go down and see Jerry Persons at the White House. I said, you want me to call General Jerry Persons, chief of staff to Dwight D. Eisenhower? And he says, yes, just call him up. He’s a nice guy.

So I called down there. “I’d like to speak to General Persons, please.” I identified myself as being with Bob. Persons got on the phone and said, “Hi, Leon. How are you? This is Jerry Persons. What can I do for you?”

“My boss wants to come down and see you.”

He said, “Fine, what time is convenient for you? You tell me when the Congressman wants to come down and I’ll be available.” And I said, “Okay,” and we agreed on a time. “You coming down, too?” and I said, no, I don’t think I’ll be down.

“Well, you ought to come down with him. Be nice to meet you.”

I didn’t go, but the end result was, no matter who the man was, you could talk to him. It held good throughout the time. But it was an interesting little byplay that Bob had. I often accused him of setting it up with Persons. No, I didn’t set it up, but he actually played the role very well.

Smith: Why do you think Ford didn’t go in ’58?

Parma: I think he saw that these fellows had the capability of organizing themselves and winning. And I don’t think he wanted to be a loser. He became the winner. He replaced Halleck, that’s how it happened.

Smith: Tell me about that combat, because there is some uncertainty as to how eager he was to jump into that fray.

Parma: I think that he wasn’t dragged kicking and screaming into it, but Charlie’s effectiveness waned, primarily because he was a heavy drinker, I think. There used to be Charlie’s Seminar’s – a meeting that he would have every day in the late afternoon. They would sit in there and he would bring young guys in and have a tutorial.

Smith: Was the alcohol more a part of the lifestyle then than in later years?
Parma: I would say that there was a lot of drinking. Every meeting he ever had, particularly in the evening. I didn’t see a lot of it at noon time, but if you went downtown, it was a martini, or two martini deal.

Smith: People tend to romanticize, Rayburn, the board of education and all that. From the days of Harry Truman on. You wonder if there is a little more to it.

Parma: They had a poker club. I’m using up my own time here, but I went with the President one time on a trip, I was never a part of anything, I was on the transition committee. Phil Buchen told me that Ford wanted me to be on the transition committee. So I was on that and I’d come back…

Smith: This was after he became president, or before he became president?

Parma: After he became president. I got the call a day before Nixon resigned. Bob Hartmann called me and he said, “The boss said you ought to get on an airplane and get back here, things are going to happen.” A sidebar to that, the vice president had been in San Diego to make a speech early August, first or second, a few days before all of this happened. We were in a Town and Country hotel, I’d gone down, that’s near my home. Whenever he was in town, we’d go down and get together. I was up in the suite with him and he said, I need to take a shower, so he went in the shower. The phone rang. It was Al Haig. He asked if the vice president was there and I said yes he is, he’s taking a shower. “I need to talk to him.” I said, “You want me to get him out of the shower?” He said, “No, when he gets out, please have him call me right away.” Ford got out of the shower and I told him Al had called and he said, okay, get him on the phone. So I picked up red phone and said, “Get Al Haig on the phone.” Al came on and I said, “Just a minute,” and I put Ford on. They talked briefly and all I heard was Ford’s side. “Well now,” he said, “I’m going back as soon as I finish this speech – I’m getting on the airplane and going back. I’ll be in my office at eight o’clock tomorrow.” He hung up and Ford looked at me and said, “I think this is it.” And it was. It was when the smoking gun story was told to him the next day, I think.

Smith: Was he surprised?

Parma: No.

Smith: Do he come to expect it?
Parma: Yes. There was no question in his mind that it probably would happen. There’s too much pressure going on. Barry Goldwater taking a group down to the White House. You need to resign – you can’t go through this. We don’t want you to go through it. We want you out of here, in effect.

Smith: Clearly from the day he became vice president there were people in this town who thought that that was the inevitable sequel. Tom DeFrank in his book makes a big deal out of this alleged slip of the tongue. Did you ever hear anything like that?

Parma: No. Not really. We would talk. I tried to be the non-political, non-government friend. We’d talk football. Not too many years ago we played golf and were sitting down talking afterwards and he said, “You know, we’ve played a lot of golf together.” I said, “Yes, we have.” He said, “How many rounds do you think we played?” So we went back and started pulling together something between 250-300 rounds of golf.

I started to tell you, he’d come out to San Diego to make this speech for Clare Borgener Afterwards we went over to the desert. Red Blake, the old Army coach, had asked him to come over and play golf. So Ford invited me to come over and play golf. My wife has deep roots in Palm Springs. Her great grandfather was, in effect, the first white man in Palm Springs. He later became the Indian agent. So we spent part of our lives down there. My dad had worked down there in the Thirties as a deputy sheriff, so I lived there for two years in the Thirties year ‘round. It was hotter than hell. Anyway, we went down and we played golf. Red’s regular golf partner was Frank Capra, the old movie director. The four of us played golf practically every day for a week. Ford said, “This was really fun. We ought to do this next year.” I said, “Fine, we’d love to do that.” He always called me around Christmas-New Year’s. “Do you have things set up on the desert?” he’d call. “Yeah, I’ll get a place for us to live.” And he said, “And we’ll pay half of it!” I said, “Okay, I’ll send you half the bill.” I went out and rented a house – we played at Eldorado, and I rented one of the bungalows. Betty and he would come out, and Barbara and I would share our house. That was around ’63-’64. We did it every spring. It was during the spring recess. He’d come out and we’d play golf for a week. Our partners were Frank and Red Blake. Bob Hope found out we were down there. And Ford being on the appropriations committee, Bob was always tuned into making sure that he got the military planes and all for his trips. He needed friends like Ford on appropriations who wouldn’t complain about the money it was costing to send him out to these trips. Bob made it a business. He’d come back and he’d have a show of “My Visit to Wherever.” So, Bob started playing with us.

Smith: What was the chemistry between the two of them?

Parma: Very good. Absolutely perfect.

Smith: Was Hope funny?

Parma: Always. His mannerisms, his language, he played a good game of golf. He’d hum going up to hit the ball. But his relationship with Ford was extraordinary. All through the whole time they knew each other and Ford was his foil. He had a hundred stories. Ford used to collect the stories he’d tell on him, and he’d always open his speech with one or two of the Hope stories.

Smith: Similar to the role he played with Ev Dirksen, on the Ev and Jerry Show.

Parma: It had been the Charlie and Ev Show. And then Ford replaced him.

Smith: How did Dirksen feel about losing Halleck and having this new guy?

Parma: I don’t know, personally. But it seemed the transition was very good. Two guys from the Midwest and Charlie Halleck being from Indiana – there wasn’t much change.

Smith: Seemingly opposites. Dirksen was the most theatrical, satirizing ham.

Parma: Beautiful voice. But Ford credited us for being the reason he was on the desert.

Smith: What is your sense of Mrs. Ford at that time?

Parma: My responsibility when we came out was to fix up the rack on the bed. She would sleep in this collar that went back to this rack and had a weight on it. When she went to bed at night, she had this collar on, with this thing stretching her out because she had a terrible back pain. Now how the heck do you do this, Betty? Isn’t there some way to get around having to use this? She was obviously taking some medication to ease the pain. She had this back problem and actually slept with tension on her neck (pinches nerve in neck).
We always would have a martini or two before we’d go to dinner. She never schmoosed during the day, to my knowledge. Barbara didn’t drink at all.

Ford and I would leave in the morning and come back after we played eighteen, sometimes thirty-six holes. Barb and Betty would lay out by the pool, go shopping, do the girl things that they would find time to do. It wasn’t very noticeable to me. It became more so later, where she had difficulty getting to places on time. Early on there was not a lot of evidence of it.

They had a wonderful relationship. When they left White House and came out, he built a house on the thirteenth hole of Thunderbird. He kept telling me, you need to get a house down there. I said, I don’t need a house. When we come down, we can stay with Barbara’s Aunt Pearl. We don’t have a problem, we have a house. One day he called up and said, “I’m looking at the house you’ve got to buy.” And I said, “I don’t want to buy a house down there.” He said, “I’m looking at it right now, it’s over about the hundred and fifty yard mark of the 12th hole. I can see it. Think about it, if you are there I can call out and say, look, I’ve got an hour and a half, why don’t you come over and I’ll meet you at the thirteenth tee, we’ll play the backside.”

So I finally sent a guy over and told him to buy the house. It was in an estate sale in court.

Smith: Was there ever any doubt about where they would go after leaving the White House?

Parma: I think there was a lot of discussion that they should go back to Grand Rapids. They loved the desert and they were immediately accepted, obviously, within the desert community – what we call Down Desert. We were ten or fifteen miles away from Palm Springs, in the area recently developed – recent being the last thirty-forty years. Away from Palm Springs proper.

Smith: Which had its share of celebrities.

Parma: Oh, yeah. On Thunderbird Bing Crosby was member, Bob Hope, Randy Scott, Hogie Carmichael, Phil Harris, Desi Arnaz - some of them were members. He never interfaced with them. I remember we had a 90th birthday party for Phil Harris. It was the only golf course in town, early on, built in the early Fifties.
Smith: There are those who thought, when he lost the 1976 election, that it took a while for him to bounce back.

Parma: He came so close. He asked me to take care of California. He kept calling me, he’d say, “Are we all right?” I’d say, “You’re going to win California, don’t worry about it.” Not in the primary, but in the general election. In the primary we knew Reagan would take it, but we put an energized effort on just to keep Reagan coming back to California to make sure he wasn’t losing. I was able to get a couple of people out of his so-called kitchen cabinet, Henry Salvatori, principally, to come over for Ford. But, Reagan was strong in California. We weren’t going to beat the former governor of California. But we carried it in the general.

A couple of things that hurt him: the pardon was the key factor. People couldn’t forget and they couldn’t believe that there was no deal or something else. And obviously the opposition played on that. Another one was the debate in San Francisco. Which, I understood what he said, and it didn’t offend me. I think Henry understood, because Henry called him. There was a partner in a principle law firm in San Francisco, and we’d gone over there after the debate. Henry got him there and told him what a great debate it was and how well he’d done. The Polish reference, that they were not under the domination of the Soviets, he’d been there. From Helsinki he had gone over and they were a million people lined up throwing flowers and the rest of it. What he was saying was, “There might be there, but not up in their heads and hearts.” And I don’t know why they couldn’t get that message back to the press.

Smith: If only he’d said that. I went back and checked. In fact, on that trip he had visited Poland, he had visited Romania, and one other Communist bloc country. I think he mentioned all three in his response, but he just left out the key words, “I’ve been there, I’ve seen it myself.”

Parma: That’s right. “I had million people lining the streets watching me.”

Smith: That’s when he got stubborn.

Parma: We went down to USC from San Francisco. We flew down on Air Force One, to USC where he made a speech. The press was all over him. The first question was, “How can you say this?” And then he got really stubborn. I’ve never gone back to see the transcripts of it, but he stiffened up good. He was not going to yield on it. They even had the head of the Polish Federation in America come out and visit him. Then later at Glendale or someplace, I remember he was standing in a parking lot doing a press conference and he kind of put it to bed then, I think. I’ve never seen that transcript.

Smith: I have. I think it was Stu Spencer or someone else, got to him.

Parma: Stu was beside himself, because they knew the impact of this thing. Carter was making a fool out of him with this statement. It was a terrible thing.

Smith: What about that stubbornness?

Parma: That was it.

Smith: That was part of his character:

Parma: I would see him on the golf course. He wouldn’t yield on something. “Don’t hit the wood. Maybe you ought to hit the wedge or something to get out of this thing.” No he’d go for the fairway wood. He did have a stubborn streak. I don’t know what caused it.

Smith: Was he able to move beyond that loss? Particularly in the first few months?

Parma: He did not dwell on it. I knew that he was hurt. Give me nine thousand votes election night and he’s president. That’s how close it was. Just selectively. And the other part of it was that, had Reagan helped him – Reagan refused to help – Reagan never mentioned the President by name, nor did he mention the President, per se, in any speech in 1976. Lyn Nofziger was a good friend of mine, we’d come to Washington on the same day and ended up at the same banquet – the California Society banquet with Bob Wilson. Lyn covered our office for the San Diego Evening Tribune. After the election, I told them, if you guys had worked a little bit, done a little bit for us in Louisiana and couple of other states, we would have won this thing. “Oh, I don’t know that you would have, that’s the luck.” I said, “I’ll give you a thousand bucks for anytime, over three times, including the third one, that Reagan mentioned Ford, if you’ll give me a thousand dollars for the first two that he did mention him.” He wouldn’t take the bet. But he never mentioned him by name. I could have said, with any time beginning with first two. He might have mentioned him once some place.
Smith: Do you think that led to a coolness in later years between the two?

Parma: It was. The convention in Kansas City was very contentious. It was very close, right down to Wyoming, just a couple of states before. Reagan was so disappointed, that he never got over losing that. During that convention William French Smith came to me and said, “The Governor would like to have an access to the President, other than through Sears or anybody else who is working on this campaign. Do you think President Ford would do that?” I said, “Well, I’ll ask him.” So I asked Ford, I said, “Reagan wants to have some way of contacting you, kind of through the back door, and I think Bill Smith will probably be his guy. What are you thinking?” He said, “I don’t know why we need that.” I said, “Well, I don’t either, but that’s what he’s asking. So tell me yes or no.” He said, “Okay, well, we’ll do it. You tell Smith to contact you.” So Smith and I would meet practically every day.

Smith: This is during the convention?

Parma: During the convention. I asked Evelle Younger, who was the attorney general of California, to join me in those meetings because I wanted to make sure that I wasn’t hoodwinked on some deal, and Evelle was an old political guy, so he sat in on the meetings. We’d generally meet in my room – sit on the bed and talk. Nothing substantive came from it until the last day when Bill said, “The Governor wants to be sure that the President doesn’t ask him to be the vice president.” He was very adamant about it. “He doesn’t want to say no to the President. And he’d rather not have that question posed to him.” At the same time Sears was telling that to Cheney, that when he comes over, we don’t ask him that question. So I relayed that to the President, and he said, “Tell him not to worry.” I said, okay. So I told Smith later in the day, the question won’t be asked. He said, well, that’s fine, he’ll probably go ahead with it.

Smith: Ironic, isn’t it, because in later years there was at least a kind of a wink and nod in an attempt to suggest that, ‘oh, well, if Ford had asked, Reagan wouldn’t have had any choice but to say yes.’

Parma: Absolutely. There are two instances that occurred. The President was making a speech in Sacramento. It was before the one that Squeaky Fromme tried to get him. Justin Dart was waiting for us to come in. Outside this hall in Sacramento he nailed me. He said, “I need to talk to you,” and he pulled this letter out of his pocket and said, “I sent this letter to the President and I told him to ask Ronnie to be the vice president.” I said, “I never saw the letter, that was contrary to everything that we were told.” He said, “Well, I felt we had him primed to take it,” and I said, “Well, who was going to take care of Nancy?” Because she was very dominant, I think, in that decision. He said, “We were going to take care of Nancy.” I said, “Is she going to be out of the room? Is that it? What were you going to do?” He said, “Well, that’s it – it’s all over now of course, but I had to just make my point that the President should have asked him.”

During the campaign we had a meeting at one of the hotels near LAX on Century Blvd going down to the airport. We were waiting for Dole to come in. Ford wasn’t there. I was sitting with Holmes Tuttle and all of his entourage that were part of the Reagan cabinet. Margaret Brock was there and I forget who else. I was sitting next to Holmes Tuttle, who was Reagan’s key guy, supporter. Holmes said, “You guys really screwed it up when he didn’t ask Reagan to be the vice president.” I said, “Holmes, we were told, in no uncertain terms, that he was not to be the vice president.” And he said, “The other thing was, you didn’t make the call.” I said, “What call?” Holmes said, “Well, after the election, Ford never called Ronnie.”

Smith: After the nomination?

Parma: After the nomination leading up to the election. I said, “We were specifically told,” and this was another thing that Smith came to me and said, “You cannot let the President call Reagan, because he won’t take the call.” I said, “You’ve got to be kidding me. If the President calls Reagan, he won’t take the call?” “No,” he said, “I’ve never seen anybody so hurt in all my life as Reagan and Nancy, the disappointment that he lost this election in the convention. But, you absolutely can’t let him make the call.”

I said, “Do you know how extraordinary it is to say that?” He said, “Well, he’s not going to take the call.” I went to Ford and told him that, and he said, “Well, if that’s what he wants, that’s what he wants,” not thinking much about what’s to follow. I have notes on this. In fact, I asked Bill Smith if he would serve on this little select committee that we had with Rogers, Morton, Rockefeller’s guy, and couple of other people. We had about five or six guys. I asked Ford, “Just until we have some continuity with Reagan, so he knows what we’re doing, let’s put Bill Smith on this

So he said fine. We’d meet at the Mayflower and Smith would come in, and each time he came in, I’d say, “Time to call him?” Smith would say, “No.” I was telling Holmes Tuttle this at that hotel near the airport, and Holmes says, “That didn’t happen. You weren’t told that.” He actually said it was a lie. I said, “Don’t tell me I’m telling you a lie, Holmes. This is what happened.” About that time Bill Smith walked in the room. So I said, “Bill, come over here,” and I grabbed Holmes by the arm and I said, “Now Holmes, don’t say a word. I’m just going to ask him one question and you listen.” Margaret Brock and these other people were all listening to this. Bill walked over and I said, “Bill, will you tell me, right now, will you tell Holmes, what you told me with respect to Ford calling Ronald Reagan after the convention.” Smith said, “Oh, yeah. He said not to call him, that he wouldn’t take the call.” Holmes Tuttle jumped up, grabbed him by the arm and took him over in the corner and was just lambasting him. We could all hear it. “Don’t you ever say that again!” But Bill Smith confirmed that this was the word.

Finally, we’re at a meeting at the Mayflower and I said, “You know this has gone on too far.” Smith said, “Well, maybe now’s the time.” I said, “Okay.” I called Cheney up and I said, “We need to come over and see the President. I’ve got Bill Smith and this is in respect to Ford calling Ronald Reagan after the

So we went over, waited around until the party was over. Ford gave us a sign and we went up to the residence. Bill Smith said, “I think it’s time to call the Governor.”
Ford said, “Fine, I’ll give him a call tomorrow.” And that’s how it developed. But this whole time, I don’t know if Reagan was sitting pouting, or what he was doing, but it was a serious element in the whole effort.

Smith: And I assume the story behind the story as well, is that the families were involved. In particular, the wives were not hastening a reproach more.

Parma: Nancy, in particular. I don’t know that Betty…things kind of rolled off of Betty a little bit. I don’t know how much emphasis she put on it. He called me around Christmas time, and he said, “Do you have a place for us for next spring?” I said, “Mr. President I didn’t know you’d be coming out here.” This was in 1975. I said I’ll find a place for us. So I ended up getting Fred Wilson’s house, which is above Thunderbird, a big house, and Fred had a big suite in his bedroom. I asked Fred, he said, “Fine, yeah, have him come.” It was over Easter. “Have him come and he can have that bedroom suite right next to me.” I said, “No, Fred. I’m doing this as a courtesy because you’re going to get him.” (Fred was the kind of guy that would say, “why didn’t you ask me.”) I said, “I’m just doing this as a courtesy so you won’t nail me later, ‘Why didn’t I ask you about it.’” I said, “You’re going to have to move out.”

“Oh, god, it’s over Easter,” he said. And I said, “I know that, but as I said, I’m doing you a favor, just let you know about it so you can’t nail me later that you would have done it.” He said, “Oh, I can’t do that.” Well Fred thought about it over night. Fred was an insurance salesman extraordinaire and had all the big clients, Teamsters, Kerkorian was his closest friend. Fred called me the next day and he said, “I’ve made arrangements with Vonnie (his wife). We’ll take another house and you and the President can stay in my house.” Barbara and I took a back bedroom in his guest quarters, and we set up the bedroom he wanted to assign him as his office. At that time word came through that Reagan wanted to meet with Ford. Ford, as he always does, said, “What do you think?” I said, “Well, he wants to try you on. I don’t think he wants to do anymore than find out what you’re made of,” because they hadn’t ever spent a whole lot of time together. So Reagan came over and Ford invited Rummy, and I think Joyce came too, for the reception. He said, you guys disappear and just Betty and I will have dinner with him and Nancy.

So during cocktails the men stood and made small talk, Ford, Reagan, Rumsfeld, and Parma, the girls were in the living room and the four men were standing up. I’ve got a great picture of this thing, Kennerly must have been there taking pictures. We were talking generally about things. Pretty soon Ford said, “Well, I guess it is time to sit down for dinner.” So we excused ourselves. Secret Service let Rummy know when the party was over, so Barbara and I went back up to the house. So I walked in and he was still up. I said, “Well, how did it go?” “Fine, we had a very nice dinner.” “Well, what did you talk about?” “Oh, a lot of football,” he said. I asked, “Didn’t you talk about any issues or anything?” He said, “No, no. He didn’t bring anything up. No, he wanted the meeting. It was his agenda, so I was waiting for him to bring something up, and he didn’t do it. We just had a small talk all through dinner, and that was it.” It was a size up. I think Reagan went away from there saying, well, you know this is a big old guy from the Midwest, we can push him over, or something. I don’t know. But he became a candidate later. But it was an interesting little byplay.

Parma: I have something – I put down kind of memorable times.

Smith: Perfect. We’ll do it first to make sure we’ve got it.

Parma: There were some special times that occurred after we had these sojourns during spring break from the Congress. When he lost the election he came out and stayed in Leonard Firestone’s house, which was right next door to where he eventually built. Ginger Rogers’ house became the Secret Service command post and the office. Leonard owned the lot next to that. Leonard, somehow, was able to get Ginger into an escrow. I guess she had indicated she wanted to sell. So they bought the house, Leonard did. I think he gifted it to USC. So USC really owns that house and they’ve set up a contract, long term, obviously, with the government for it. Ford didn’t have anything to do with that because that the government doing it. But, then Ford subsequently had Ginger come to the party in Leonard’s house after the election, after Leonard had consummated the deal. To kind of atone for it all. At that dinner was Ginger and Cary Grant, which was interesting. Cary brought his little girl who was about twelve or thirteen years old. But it was an interesting byplay.

The point I was going to say is that we stopped going to the desert, we were already there. And so a year or so later he said, “You know, I miss the trips, we don’t have a trip.” I said, well, why don’t we go abroad? So we made three or four trips where we took cruises. There were a couple of instances that were memorable.

One time we were in Athens. We had just arrived, and the director of the government historic sites was escorting him around. We went to the Acropolis and we started walking up the broken cement and stone, and as we started into the area where the palace was that has the maidens on it, to the left, you could hear just a little clap. Not much. And as he ascended up to the Parthenon, it grew. In fact, my wife grabbed me by the arm and she said, “Do you hear that?” This small clapping was getting louder and louder. When we got up to the top all these hundreds of people were clapping that he had come up. It was a beautiful, beautiful thing. And he felt so good about that. He mentioned it later. “Can you believe all those people doing that?”
He always was humbled that people would recognize him and do things like that. That was a very touching thing. I think on that same trip, prior to that, we’d gone into a little town, or island, called Hvar, above Dubrovik. They had been taken up to see a church. When we went back to the motor launch that had taken us off the boat, to the shore, a lot of people gathered around. What happened was that some guy in shorts, probably sixty or seventy years old, started yelling at Ford, “You did this to me!” He was all scarred up. Later, I found out from the agents that he had been wounded by American bombs or something, and he was German, I believe. He was accusing us of his problem. I remember the President, later on, when the agents told us about it, said, “I wonder if he ever heard of Hitler. He started this thing, not us.” That was an insightful thing.

Smith: He loved to travel.

Parma: Oh, he did.

Smith: His health was so robust up until he was about ninety, I often thought that he only really began to age when it dawned on him that he really couldn’t travel the way he had. Did he talk about getting old?

Parma: Not really. I got a couple of other little vignettes. On another trip we were in Paris and he had gone in a day earlier so he could get together with Giscard d'Estaing. They had become fast friends. He’d come out to Vail.

Smith: Which is another case of opposites attract.

Parma: That’s all so true. So he had lunch with Betty and the President. Prior to going over, in trying to decide where to go, one of the options was to go to Normandy, or go to Rambouillet, where they’d had the group of six meeting. He said, “I’ve had enough war, I’d like to go to Rambouillet and renew that experience.” We went to Rambouillet, which was maybe twenty or thirty miles out of Paris and it was a tremendous experience for him and Betty. We went from room to room and he’d say, this happened here. His room was in a turret and it had a bed that was about the size large twin bed. It wasn’t as big as a double bed. Betty says, “My, that’s a small bed.” And he said, “My dear, there was only one of us sleeping in it.” She said, “I hope so!” It was a grand experience for him. He relived that time and it was so much better for him than going to Normandy. He was revitalized when he went through that.
We had another trip. We went to Rome. Peter Secchia was the ambassador then. Peter set a meeting up with the Pope.

Smith: This would be John Paul II?

Parma: John Paul II. When we got into the Vatican, they asked Ford to go in first. He went in and had a meeting with John Paul II. Then he came out and got us. Two things happened that were of interest. From the time that we all went in to see the Pope, Betty and Barbara and myself, and we had Patty and Frank Lynch with us, I saw two photographers taking pictures. We walked into the door to the Pope’s office, the reception area. Ford introduced each of us to the Pope as we walked in. Larry Buendorf was the lead agent, and he had told the two women agents, you’re the only Catholics, you go in, but leave your arms with us. So they took their guns out and left them in the car or something and they slipped into the door. The Pope saw it out of the corner of his eyes, “and them?” He hadn’t been introduced to them. And Ford said, “Yes, your Holiness, they’re my security.” “Security? Women?” and he’s shuffling along and with his white sweat socks on, and he says, “Women, security?” And Ford says, “Yes, your Holiness. They’re very, very good.” And the Pope said, “Women. Security.” He kept looking back at them. All of this we have on a tape. After the small talk and all, he poses for a picture. The waiter brings out medallions for the men and special rosaries for the women, and he sends the guy away and he comes back with a tray and he goes over to the two women and gives them both a rosary. It was a priceless thing when you see it on the tape. I gave a copy to Ford.

We later met with the leader of Italy. The guy sitting across from me was an Archbishop of some sort. His name was Foley. I said, “Where you from, Philly or Boston?” He said, “I’m from Philly.” I said, “There was one thing that happened in there, I saw a third guy doing something. I didn’t have any impression other than, I knew there was a third man in the room with the photographers. He might have been filming this in some way.” He said, “That could have been. They do that a lot.” I said, “If you can, can you get it for me?” Long story short, I ended up with this film of our whole meeting with the Pope. The sequence about the girls was significant.

Smith: That’s wonderful. I want to ask you, do you remember the last time you saw him?
Parma: Yeah. After Thanksgiving, during a Michigan-Ohio State game, I went over to the house and sat with him and Jim, an old friend of theirs that lives on the desert, and Betty. He was in the hospital bed in the den watching the game. We watched the game and he critiqued the game. He was obviously not well. A lot of coughing, calling for the nurse to come help him. But he did very well. But he was tired, you would tell. It was really sad for me, frankly. I felt it wasn’t going to be long. And he died a month later.

Smith: That trip to the Mayo Clinic which the public never knew about, didn’t turn out the way it was supposed to. He told someone before going that he didn’t want to die, but he didn’t want to live the way he was living. My sense was the Mayo Clinic led him to believe, I’m not saying they led him on, but they led him to believe that, notwithstanding his age, there were these new surgical techniques that made him a very good candidate. I think he went believing that he was going to get a new lease on life. It didn’t happen.

Parma: I think the operation would have been worse than not doing it. He was not much interested in doing it. I think what you said, he said to me in a way. If I can’t enjoy my life, it’s difficult. He never said he wanted to die.

Smith: It’s funny, something Peter said earlier today, that he really was the ultimate optimist.

Parma: Absolutely. He was very confident in himself and his ability. I never really experienced doubts about things. He was decisive, positive, he was always going to make the good shot. He was going to take the good shot, every time.

Smith: And Mrs. Ford? Obviously it’s been a tough period.

Parma: She’s had a time. She caught this cold, or whatever it was, at the funeral. Barbara did, too. Barbara got over it in four or five weeks. Never has left Betty. Right now she has a bronchial condition I think going back to that time. She just never has been able to lose it and she’s not strong right now.

Smith: If you were talking to young people who didn’t know him at all, or worse, only knew him through a textbook or whatever. Tell them something that would be surprising about Gerald Ford.
Parma: Probably the most enlightening thing would be that he was the same man the day he died that he was the day I met him. He was unaffected by the fact that he had gained high office, or operated as a leader of the world. He never changed his demeanor or the way he talked with you. He never lorded it. He was in the best sense, a common man who was humbled and straightforward and compassionate. I think that could be a lesson in life for all of us. Never over think how good you are, or how big you are. If you can stay on a level plane as he did, you’ll have a fulfilled life.

Smith: It is interesting that you used the word compassionate. The party moved so far to the right, particularly on social issues, and I don’t believe that he moved to the left, or whether he stayed where he was.

Parma: He stayed in place.

Smith: Obviously, he and Mrs. Ford were very outspokenly pro-choice, but beyond that, he’s the only president in the history of the United States to put his name on a petition for gay rights. That is not what you expect from a former Republican president. Was that always there?

Parma: We never talked about those issues. I think he just had a lot of compassion for people. He understood, to the depths of the complexity of the issue, that some people were different. As I say, we didn’t talk about it, but I know that his thought processes were to even things out. He didn’t categorize and departmentalize people.

Smith: Also, I think he is of a generation, particularly Midwestern conservative, who first of all, define their conservatism in economic terms, who had a very healthy skepticism about what the government could accomplish, particularly when it set to worry about Utopia, and who consistently wanted the government out of the boardroom, out of the classroom, out of the bedroom. There were a whole range of issues that were so intimate, so personal, you didn’t discuss them. It wasn’t the stuff of public policy. It was a decent reticence.

Parma: Real quick example: first time that I came back when he was President, he wanted to play golf at Burning Tree. I met him out there. We played, and then we were in the locker room getting ready to leave and he said, “How you getting home?” And I said, “I’m getting a cab to take me home.” He said, “Well, I’ll take you home,” and he said to Dick Kaiser, who was his lead agent, “Any problem taking Leon home?” “No, Mr. President.”

We got in the limousine, I put the clubs in back of the car and I closed it up. We got in the car and drove into the Madison Hotel where I was staying. I got out of the car and went around and opened the trunk, I got my clubs out, went over and stood on the curb and said (we were playing the next day), “I’ll see you tomorrow,” and with that twenty cars drive by. He took the whole motorcade into the Madison Hotel, looped into town, and went back to the White House. The next day, the Washington Post has a little story. “President delivers golf partner (didn’t name me) to the hotel.” He called me up that night and said, “Tomorrow come over to the White House, we’ll go from here.” Obviously, he had sensed what he had done too late and Kaiser, god bless him, should have said, “you know we have the whole motorcade, Mr. President.” If he had said that, he would said, “Oh no, we can’t do that, I’ll see you in the morning. I’ll meet you out here.”

Smith: But to him it was the most natural thing in the world.

Parma: Yeah, “I’ll take you back.” That was it.

Smith: This is wonderful. The problem is, it whets your appetite. Where are you based now?

Parma: I’m in San Diego.

Smith: I suspect either sometime this summer or certainly this fall, we’re going to be scheduling a trip there because we know there’s a number of folks in the area. Thank you very much. This is great. And I suspect there is a lot more where this came from.

Smith: There are a couple of years I’d like to go back because, specifically, we were talking about your early days with Congressman Wilson. And earlier than I’ve know, or most people have known, the desire on at least part of his colleagues to get Ford to run against Joe Martin for the Minority Leadership, which he didn’t do.

It wasn’t clear to me, did you stay in Washington?

Parma: Right. I went to Washington in 1958 with Congressman Bob Wilson – in January of ’58, and stayed five years. That year, that fall, the Republicans were handed the empty plate. They really took it bad. And so we were in Washington. Bob Wilson and I returned to Washington right after the November 1958 election. A day or so later, Bob said, “See if you can find Mel Laird and others in the SOS group” they belonged to. All SOS members were elected in ’52 with Eisenhower. As you probably know, every freshman class forms little clubs or groups in order to educate themselves, actually, with their respective committee assignments. They select members who are on key committees and that’s how they keep abreast of legislation. They meet once a week.

So Bob said, “See how many SOS members are here.” I called Laird and Lipscomb, and a few others and we got five into the office. They met in Bob’s office, they said, “We must do something. We can’t continue this way without better leadership from our side. Sam Rayburn is handing Joe Martin his lunch every day.” Martin and Rayburn were having breakfast together and they were having dinner together. They both lived at the Occidental Hotel in separate suites. Sam used him; Sam Rayburn just plain old used Joe Martin.
Smith: Tell us about it, because I know Rayburn is a legendary figure. Why? Tell us about Rayburn and what would someone like Ford watching someone like Rayburn learn?

Parma: I don’t know if he learned any of Sam’s devious habits, but Sam Rayburn ran that House with an iron hand. What he asked for, he got.

Smith: What allowed him to do that?

Parma: Well, he had a majority, which was primary. But he was a strong leader, and he was an effective leader. They rallied around him. He stayed there, they named a building after him, and the rest of it.

Smith: I assume the rules must have been different in those days that concentrated more power in the hands of the Speaker.

Parma: Oh, I think the Speaker had a lot of power then; much more than now, probably. Ford was on the periphery, having been elected in ’48. He was watching all this; he’d been there for ten years. Sam Rayburn was very effectively using Joe Martin to get people to support the issues he wanted to support. These were the days when I was there that Eisenhower was there, and I remember the Federal Aid to Education, the Common Situs picketing, all of these different things that the liberal element of the Democratic party wanted. Sam Rayburn, being from Texas, was willing to help them. I guess you could say he was one of them. I guess he fell into the program.

Smith: Was Joe Martin past his prime? Was that part of the problem?

Parma: Joe had become old. I want to be fair to him, he was older and obviously Sam Rayburn had great influence over Joe Martin. But the Young Turks – the class elected in ’52 wanted to do something about it. At the first meeting and on everybody was unanimous. “We must do something about the Minority Leader, let’s meet tomorrow. See who else is in town.”

Then at the next meeting we had about thirteen or fourteen in Bob’s office. So they said, “Okay, this is moving.” Then Bob said, “Get a room over in the Congressional Hotel and we’ll meet there tomorrow.” So they met the next day and there were more in town. Everybody saying, we have to do something. Everybody wanted to protect Joe Martin. So they finally decided they should ask Joe to step aside and let new leadership come in. And so they talked to Joe and said, “You can keep your office, keep the limousine, hold all the emoluments of office, and the rest of it.” And he said, “No.”

So their first choice was Jerry Ford to be the new leader. And they went to Ford and he said, “I’ll take the job if it is there to be had, but I’m not going to campaign for it. I’ll accept the job, but I’m not going to campaign to throw Joe Martin out.”

Smith: That must have been frustrating.

Parma: Yeah, it was. Jerry Ford was right in between. He’d been there in the Congress four years before they arrived, and they said, “Well, let’s see what we can do.” They were rallying behind Ford and the hope was that they would come up with enough votes that it would be fait d’accompli. Les Arends found out about the meetings. Les Arends was the Whip, and he said, “You young whippersnappers, I’m going to take you apart.” And so they started rallying their side, the older group of members, and they came up with Charlie Halleck. So, they went to Ford and said, “We think we have the votes,” and the rest of it – and Ford said, “Well, I’m not asking for the job. If it is offered to me and if it’s there, I’ll take it.” That’s my recollection of it. I was fairly close and I was in some of the meetings.

Smith: Let me understand, though. You mentioned Arends’ name. So there seems to be a consensus that Martin needs to be replaced. It’s just a question of whether it’s one of his generation, or the older guard versus the Young Turks.

Parma: The older guard saw there was a revolution in play, absolute revolution. So their thought processes were, let’s get our guy in there. And Charlie was their guy. So, they came down on Charlie and it was no contest. Ford didn’t want his name put in, as I recall, and Charlie was elected the leader. I guess Joe – I don’t know if he kept his office and limousine and all that. But they took care of Joe. He’d been there a long time, been out of Massachusetts, and he was replaced. And Charlie came in, and there was born the Ev and Charlie Show.

Smith: Is that when it started? There hadn’t been an Ev and Joe Show?

Parma: No, Ev and Charlie began when Halleck was the Minority Leader of the House and Dirksen was Minority Leader of the Senate. I thought, at the time, the press treated their press conference as a joke, thus the title Ev and Charlie Show.

Smith: And was that part of this feeling that we needed to do more in terms of projecting our message, post ’58?

Parma: And ’60 was right on top of them. Obviously, Nixon was going to run, and Kennedy was coming along with Johnson and other people. But ’60 was their year to try to do something.

Smith: You stop and think, it’s not that long ago, until you stop and think about the nature of the Republican Party in the late ‘50s – pre-Civil Rights Act ’64, there’s really no Southern party. It’s still a Northeastern/Midwestern party. Today people wouldn’t understand it. It’s almost the reverse of what we have today. Describe what kind of party it was in those days and where Ford fit into the spectrum.

Parma: My boss, Bob Wilson, about that time became the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee - the committee that is supposed to go out and elect Republicans to the House. It was a constant battle. They had us outnumbered; they were able to get their legislation through and the rest of it. There was a lot of futility, they just were unhappy. This had built up, I guess, when Eisenhower went in and we had a Republican Congress. I think we lost it in ’54 - ’56. Eisenhower didn’t resolve a war, didn’t have a war, the economy was perking along pretty good, it was a very passive, non-exciting eight years, but went very well. When history is recorded it will show that those were eight great years as far as the United States was concerned. And then Nixon was probably going to be the next president. Everybody was feeling good about Nixon. Kennedy came in and they did a good job. That was an interesting play, as well.

Smith: It was the “conservative party” but it seems not the conservative party in the sense that we would use the term today. In large part, because there really was not a Southern contingent. It was sort of economically conservative, but it was still Northeastern and Midwestern – obviously, you had strength in the West. It was a much more pragmatic – was that a fair word to use?

Parma: They wanted government out of their lives, at least federal government, to keep everything under control at the state level and rule accordingly.

Smith: And Ford fit very much within that context.

Parma: Yes, he was very comfortable with that.

Smith: And, needless to say, he was a real fiscal conservative.

Parma: Absolutely. No question about that.

Smith: Then along comes the Civil Rights revolution. And one senses he, at least, made peace with that. He was, again, what we used to say, of the fiscally conservative and socially liberal formula.

Parma: Yeah.

Smith: Which is, again, something that I don’t a lot of folks today recognize or appreciate.

Parma: He was a liberal when it came to social policy like that. I think even as president, he was criticized by Reagan as being too liberal. But, relative to black v white, he had a teammate who was black.

Smith: Willis Ward.

Parma: And he would always cite his teammate, what a great person he was and all that. These people were wrong that had these bad feelings down south. It bothered him. His teammate kept coming up a lot. Even when he became the Minority Leader, the teammate would come up.
Smith: So it was very personalized – the issue. But at the same time you also had – by the early Sixties and certainly with Goldwater – you’ve got this, almost overnight, this infusion of Southerners. Many of them frankly racist, into the party calling themselves conservative. How did you handle that?

Parma: Well, they were conservative on economic issues, [that] would be the rationale. When I worked in the Congress, the relationship we had with the other side of the aisle was non-adversarial. It was a very cooperative thing. We interfaced with the other side of the aisle.

Smith: What’s the difference between Joe Martin being snookered, and your non-adversarial relationship? Where do you draw the line? How do you define contention where necessary, unavoidable?

Parma: I found it just in the demeanor of people. Those were nice days; people were nice to each other. The press people that would come in to visit us, and we used to have Bob in and the leadership like it was, we’d see a lot of the press. They were there, helping you to write the story. Our local representative, Lyn Nofziger, in particular, and fellow by the name of Frank McCumber, we’d plot legislation. We’d say, “Okay, we’re going to introduce the bill today, Bob will give a speech tomorrow, he’ll talk to the chairman. Two weeks from now get it up – we planned the program on a key piece of legislation effecting dredging the harbor in San Diego, or something like that. Very friendly attitude.

If I had an issue – and when I was there the chairman was always a Democrat – I’d go to my friend who worked for the chairman on an issue that involved San Diego, and nine times out of ten, they would say, “Yeah, we can help you on that.” If they had an armed services issue and came to us, and generally those issues were non-partisan, we’d help them. And that was the way it was on the floor and the rest of it. The member interfaced with the others and it wasn’t like today where I see hate when I look at the floor of the House and the Senate. And the talk – Harry Reid says things that no one would have said in those days. Lyndon Johnson wouldn’t have said it. He might have said it in his office, but he didn’t say it in public.
Smith: Is it true that after six o’clock, basically, people called a truce and went out and had a drink together?

Parma: Oh yeah, everybody. It was a common story that Gerald Ford and Tip O’Neill would finish fighting like cats and dogs on the floor on some issue, and they’d adjourn the House, and they’d go arm in arm and have a drink someplace or go have dinner. It was common.

Smith: Now, what that raises is fascinating. I’m wondering how much of that really is less ideological and more generational. Because it seems to be, after a while, the next generation is always pointing a finger at those in power and saying, “You’re not confrontational enough.” You could almost trace this. And subsequently – Gingrich’s criticism of Bob Michel, was, “You’re rolling over. We need to be more confrontational.” And presumably, that went back to the Ford era; that you’ve accepted minority status. How do you deal with that? Presumably he had not accepted minority status.

Parma: No, they didn’t accept it and they were out fighting tooth and nail to raise money and organize districts that were vulnerable to Republican winning. I know Bob Wilson worked very hard, and I think he had that job for eight or ten years. He was there a long time, and put a lot of time into it. And Jerry Ford – I remember one year he said he traveled 267 days, or something like that. I would tell him, “I don’t know if you can keep this up.” This is after I’d come home and we’d play golf, and he was just so relaxed playing golf, and said, “Oh, I wish I could do this more often and be able to relax like this. I’ve got to go out there and win those seats so I can be the Speaker.” He was determined he was going to be the Speaker.

Smith: You also wonder what the consequences of that were at home.

Parma: Tough. Every morning he would make a call home and every evening would make a call home. “Mother, how’s everything? How are the kids doing?” And then he’d talk to the kids. I cannot remember a time that we were together that he didn’t place a call in the morning and the evening. That was as president, vice president, Minority Leader, and before he became the Minority Leader. It was interesting.

Smith: How long were you in Washington?

Parma: I was there five years.

Smith: Until?

Parma: I came in January of ’58 and left the end of December ’62. The last three years of Eisenhower and just two years in the Kennedy administration. We had a little group we called the Inner Circle composed of 15 or so assistants to key Republicans on the Hill, House and Senate. Most of our members were in the leadership as well as VP Nixon’s assistant. A colleague by the name of Jack Caukins was our leader, you may have met him along the line. We would meet once a week, just like our members would, and discuss legislative matters. We always had a guest we’d bring up from downtown. Due to the stature of our bosses, we were able to get members of Ike’s Cabinet, Secretaries from the Cabinet to come up and visit with us. When Kennedy was elected in 1960, we said, “Well, what are we going to do now?” Well, Caukins said, “Well, let’s get Bobby. If we can get Bobby Kennedy, the attorney general, we can get them all.” And so we said, “Okay, Jack, that’s your job. Go get him.”

And I’ll be darned, he called there and he said, “We’d like to have the General.” He described our group and who our bosses were. “We’d really love to have the General come up and visit with us.” And his Chief of Staff said, “Well, we can probably arrange that. Let me talk to him.” He called back within a day and he said, “Yeah, we’ll do that.” Picked a date, and we set it up, and the day it was going to happen, the day before, I guess, the assistant to the AG calls up and tells Jack, “We want to meet down here in our office.” Jack says, “Oh, we can’t do that, we have drinks, bring food in.” He said, “We can handle that down here. Don’t worry about that. We’ll meet in the General’s office.”
So we went down and met with Bobby Kennedy. He was sitting at his desk, a big desk like this, and of course, they have those huge offices. That was the period of time when they were writing stories about Bobby having pictures his kids had painted or drawn in crayon and a football sitting on the mantel. He’s sitting back of this big desk with his sleeves rolled up and tie askance, and his feet up on the chair and holding his knees like this. And we went - for two hours we talked to him. He said, “You guys will never get into office. You’ll never get there again.” And we said, “Why?” And he said, “We’re going to organize this thing and you won’t be able to do it. What do you think the Peace Corps is for and all these other things? We’re just bringing them back…”

I mean, he was that frank and that cocky. He was absolutely positive that they were going to be so structured, so organized that we’d never get back into office. It was a wonderful talk – I’d loved to have taped it. You would have loved it, as a historian. And we asked him questions like, “Why did you put Ted Kennedy out to run California? And so and so to run in Illinois?” They digressed from the normal plan of getting the Republican leader or the Democratic leader of the state to be the chairman of the state. They put high powered guys in representing Kennedy. Ted Kennedy out in California. And he said, “We avoided a lot of fights. We put our guy in there and the others reported to him.” It was a wonderful strategy, and it paid off.

Smith: Do you remember – would Ford have been in on this meeting?

Parma: No, those meetings were of our staff members. Ford didn’t have a staff man in the group. Frank, I think was busy. He had a fellow named Frank – I can’t think of him now. But Mildred Leonard was a key player in his office.

Smith: Let me ask you, because much would later be made of the notion that he tried to reproduce the Congressional mindset, whatever that is, organizational structure – simply move it from Capitol Hill to the White House. And then it didn’t work, it couldn’t work. There are all sorts of things. What are the strengths and what are the weaknesses of the Congressional structure, if you will, or outlook – transplanted to an executive position?
Parma: Well, I guess primarily, when you get into the executive position, you have one man calling the shots. In the House, in particular, it’s like herding cats. You get all of these different views and different sectors of the country responding to leadership, but no dictatorial leadership, per se. I felt, looking back right now, that certainly on great issues they get together. They lose people along the way sometimes through pressures from home, labor unions, and other people that put pressure on our numbers. Members who are in marginal districts are always protecting themselves, trying to protect themselves.

Barry Goldwater made a profound statement one time. At the time that Bob was the chairman, Barry was also the chairman of the Senatorial Campaign Committee. We’d go over and sit down with Barry. Barry happened to be a fraternity brother of mine from Arizona. We were years apart in age, but we always passed the grip and called each other brother and things like that. I asked him one day, there was one seat where a Republican was running, and he was obviously a very liberal Republican, and I asked him, “Barry how can you support that man and put all this money into that race?” He said, “Leon, all I want is one vote. When we organize the Senate, that’s when I want his vote. I’ll worry about the rest of it later. Let’s organize the Senate and control the Senate. We’ll have the chairman and we’ll take care of his liberal bent as we come along.”

I’ll never forget that - that one vote was critical. No one appreciates it, even today, when they criticize a candidate for being a liberal or too conservative. One vote controls the Senate. He could have controlled the Senate with just one vote.

Smith: It’s interesting, and I ask, parenthetically, your opinion; as someone who was there then, of course the whole Kennedy aura – post-assassination – presumably is very different from while the president was alive.

Parma: Yeah. I think if Kennedy had gone on, that the ’64 election would have been then, a very interesting election. Because there were a lot of things that occurred that rankled the masses – the Bay of Pigs. I recall Admiral Burke, Chief of Naval Operations. But when he retired, he paid his respects to Bob Wilson. Bob asked him (my office was actually situated in Bob Wilson’s office. He put a partition up and I was on the other side of that with a little desk. He and I had been friends for years. So he was very comfortable having an atypical office set up. So he invited me to sit down with them. Bob asked him, “Admiral, what happened at the Bay of Pigs?” And he said, “Well, I’ll tell you, those young men down there had never had to make a decision to commit another man’s life. And that was necessary. We had our ships offshore and we were all ready to do things, they did not commit because some Americans might get killed, and they went down.” Somebody wrote, a fine newspaperman wrote it, wrote a long essay in Fortune magazine that really documented all of it. The Bay of Pigs was a military fiasco. But there were issues like that, that would come to the fore.

Smith: You assume Goldwater would have been the nominee?

Parma: I don’t know. Rockefeller took a good run at him. And the conservative movement was coming up and it was all happening, a lot of it, because of the Kennedys. They were iron-handed. They were dictatorial downtown. They were tough.

Smith: But if you factor in the Civil Rights bill, and let’s face it, most of Goldwater’s support, certainly in the South, the old, solid South, was based on race. Almost overnight the Republican Party is redefining itself in ways that must have made some people uncomfortable.

Smith: Let me ask you one thing about staff, because I heard President Ford talk about – being the fiscal conservative that he was – he thought that it was really unfortunate, for a lot of reasons, that Congressional staffs had gotten as large as they had. Characteristically, a congressman like him, what would his staff have numbered in those days?
Parma: Minimal, actually, compared to today. He walked in his office and he had a lot of secretary-types who were doing all the casework. They still involved themselves – the leadership was involved in servicing his district. And this was their bent. Bob Hartmann was kind of the outside guy.

Smith: Where did he come from?

Parma: Bob came out of Los Angeles. He had been with the LA Times. Then they made him the Washington rep for the Los Angeles Times. I remember my first or second night in Washington going to a California State Society meeting. Bob and Jeannie Wilson picked Barb and me up and we went together to this dinner. And Hartmann came up and was lobbying Bob about the next chairman of the California State Society. I said, “You guys can’t get away from this stuff, can you?” But that’s the first time I met Bob Hartmann.

Smith: Hartmann was clearly a kind of lightning rod within the Ford office.

Parma: Yeah.

Smith: And at first blush, he seems like an unusual guy for Ford to repose so much trust in.

Parma: Bob Hartmann was just totally loyal to Ford. He had one interest, and that interest was what’s good for Jerry Ford. And he was that way right through the White House. His biggest concern in the White House, and I guess I was one of the few guys that we’d come into Washington, we’d have lunch together. And he let it all come out – these guys are leaking stuff and doing stuff – things they shouldn’t do. He was a strong advocate, in my mind, of cleaning out the Nixon people.

Smith: And that raises a question. Ford, everyone agrees that he was a nice guy; perhaps in some ways, too nice a guy. And I would imagine someone like Hartmann would take heat, out of his loyalty, for in a way compensating for Ford’s being so trusting and so reluctant to clean house.

Parma: Yeah. Bob would see things happening, and he would, as subtle as he could, try to explain to the President, “This guy is not doing what he should be doing.” The good thing about Bob Hartmann, he told him just exactly what he felt. Ford would kind of shoo him off sometimes, and other times he’d listen to him.

Smith: Well, that’s got to be an invaluable trait, because presidents are surrounded by people who don’t do that.

Parma: I think he kept him on track and would get him off of things. There is more than one issue that Bob would say, “Maybe we’d better do it this way.” They criticized his speechwriting, but he had things that he put in there that was a Fordism – that became a Fordism-type of thing. But I was always pleased that Bob was there. There was a little power play initially – the little office that adjoins the Oval Office – Bob wanted to be in that office. And the President said, “Historically that office has been a kind of hideaway office.” - which Bill Clinton used effectively. And so Hartmann ended up in Henry’s office. He had the big office. Rummy had the corner office, which was traditionally the chief of staff’s.

Smith: And how did Rumsfeld’s appointment come about?

Parma: It just happened, I think. An interesting byplay here was that I received a call from Hartmann a day or two before the President became president. He said, “Your friend wants you and Barbara to be back here. That’s all I can say. Get here as fast as you can.” And we took the earliest plane out the next morning.

Smith: And I assume you interpreted that as…

Parma: Yeah – I’ll tell you what happened once, gave substance to it. The Vice President, at the time, was in San Diego. He was going to make a speech that night, and I forget where he’d been, but they’d flown in and I was up in the suite visiting with him. He said, “I’ve got to take a shower.” I said, “Okay.” He said, “Wait there and we’ll go down together.” And he goes in and takes a shower. The phone rings – the red phone. So I picked it up and it’s Al Haig. He said, “Where’s the Vice President - is he there?” And I said, “Yeah, Al, he is. He’s taking a shower.” He says, “I’ve got to talk to him.” I said, “You want me to get him out of the shower?” He says, “No, don’t do that. But as soon as he gets out, have him call me.”

He came out of the shower within a couple of minutes and I said, “Al Haig just called.” He kind of looked at me and he said, “Okay, get him on the phone.” So I picked it up and said, “Get Haig on the phone.” He came right on and I said, “Just a minute,” and I handed it to him, and he says, “Yeah, I’m making a speech. I’m leaving as soon as I make the speech. We’re going to the airplane, I’m flying back. I’ll be in my office at eight o’clock. I’ll see you at eight o’clock. Thank you, Al.” That was it. And he looked at me and he said, “It’s getting close. Something is happening.” That was the first part of August and then it started rolling.

Smith: So you get the call, “Come to DC.”

Parma: Then I get the call to go to DC. I like to stay at the Hay-Adams, so I told them I want the suite that looks at the White House. Barb and I sat in that suite looking at the White House and the television was just to the right of the window when Nixon gave his speech that he was going to resign. Then I received a call from Hartmann. He said, “Be here at eleven o’clock tomorrow.” Eleven o’clock came and Barb and I took a cab over to the South Entrance, and walked in and there was Senator Bob Griffin and Marg, and Congressman John Rhodes and Elizabeth. And so we three couples went up the stairs and walked into the East Room. It was packed, absolutely packed.

What had happened was all the Nixon people who’d been there for the farewell speech for Nixon, appreciating that they were going to be, could be a part of history, when they said, “Clear out,” they didn’t clear out. So when the Ford entourage got there, there were no seats. Griffin was the Minority Leader of the Senate, and here was Johnny Rhodes who succeeded Ford as the Minority Leader. Jack Ford happened to turn around and he looked back and saw us. So he gets up and he’s telling his sister and brothers to get up. I said, “No, no, no.” Finally an usher comes up and I said, “Don’t bother about me, but these two are the leaders of the House and Senate Republicans. Find them a place to sit up front.” Well, he left and came back and he said, “I can’t find anything, but I’ve got six seats right over in front of the cameras.” So they put us over there.
Leon Parma   December 1, 2008

Smith: This is fascinating because in so many ways it seems emblematic of the problems that would recur -the Nixon people refusing to leave.

Parma: Well, actually, following his being sworn in as president, a little reception line formed and he and Betty were in the line, I don’t know if anybody else was there. But I know the two of them were there. And then we passed over into the State Dining Room where they had a little hors d'oeuvre table set up, and most of the Nixon people just left. It was another aspect because there were very few of us in the State Dining Room; enough that we were comfortable, and didn’t have a lot of people pushing around. The whole East Room was full, if you think about it. All the Nixon people left, and just the Ford people went through the receiving line.

The leadership of the House and the Senate, Ford had asked them to come up, and they met in the Red or Blue Room, one of those rooms, and then the rest of us were over in the State Dining Room. Pretty soon Susan came in and said, “Mother wants you.” So we walked with her over to the first room, the Blue Room, right after the State Dining Room, and there’s Betty. Betty said, “Just wait a minute. He’s going to be out here in a minute.” We didn’t know why we were there. So we waited and pretty soon he comes out and he says, “Let’s go.” And so we went to the elevator and got on the elevator and went down and walked across and walked him into the Oval Office. Betty and the President walked in and Barb and I were right in back of them. First time he’d been President. I should have that picture on the wall here – the President and Betty with the Bible sitting on the table.

And so we went over and stood by the fireplace and they were taking pictures of Betty and the President and the kids and all that. He says, “Don’t you want to get in the picture?” And I said, “Of course. We’d love to.” So Barb and I went over and stood with Betty and the President and had a great picture taken of us. Then we visited a little bit and then I said, “Well, you’ve got a country to run, Mr. President. We’re going to leave you alone.” And he said, “Now, you’re coming over to the house tonight.” I said, “Thank you, we will be there.” And he said, “Just wear your golf shirt, it’s going to be real informal, going to be another two or three couples. That’s all.” I said, “Okay.” I wore a suit to the house. He had on a golf shirt and just looked at me but didn’t say a word about my not wearing a golf shirt. He knew there was a new protocol in place.

Smith: Now, when he said “the house,” he meant the house in Alexandria.

Parma: They were still living in the Alexandria house – they’d taken the garage and made it a Secret Service command post and put bullet-proof glass all through the house. But, then he said, you come over to the house and wear the golf shirt and he says to an aide that was standing there, one of the Nixon staff, he said, “Do you think you could arrange for Mr. and Mrs. Parma to have a car take them over there?” The man says, “Yes, Mr. President, we’ll take care of that.” So, with that we went back to the hotel.

At five o’clock that afternoon, I met with the President’s old law school buddy, Phil Buchen. Phil Buchen and I had visited after the swearing in. I’d gone over to Phil to say hello to Phil and I had something to give him. And he said, “Come to the meeting in the Cabinet Room at five o’clock, it’s going to be the Transition Committee; all of us involved in the transition, and you’ve got to be involved in this thing. So be there at five o’clock.” Okay, so at five o’clock I’m at the west entrance and told the receptionist I was supposed to be at the five o’clock meeting with the President, thank you. And I sat down and waited, and nobody came. I said, “What about this meeting?” It was about five after five. About that time Bob Griffin comes in and I said, “Are you in the five o’clock meeting?” And he says, “Yeah, come on.” So we walked in the meeting.

The meeting had already started and we walked in and Bob, obviously, had a seat someplace, so I was going to go around and sit on the side there. The President said, “Sit there, sit right next to Al Haig.” It was at the big Cabinet table. So I sat down next to Al Haig. I have a piece of paper at home – the White House tablet – I wrote down all the names of the men who were in the meeting. Rummy was there. He’d flown in. In the course of that meeting, the President said, “I don’t want a wholesale movement here of the Nixon people. We’ll take care of that in due time, if we need to do any changes. But, we don’t want the White House emptied.” Mind you, Obama is going through how many months – two months or plus of the transition – this was less than 24 hours that this thing was coming down.

Smith: I think it was Jack Marsh who said something also about that. He said he didn’t want to taint the vast majority of Nixon folks who had honorably done their jobs by tossing them out. By gradually, incrementally, replacing them, they could then go out into the job market, having worked in the Ford White House with all that that implied.

Parma: I think he thought the process was, you can’t move this functioning government out of the way, because we don’t have anybody in place, practically speaking. And he said, “I don’t want resignations coming out of any of the Nixon people.” And Rummy says, “I already sent you my letter of resignation.” And Ford says, “I didn’t get it. And you’re not going to resign.” So that was the first indication to me – and Rummy had already moved into place. Ford had told him to set this thing up. I felt that was a fait d’accompli there.

Smith: And what was it in their relationship that led Ford to repose such trust in Rumsfeld?

Parma: I think that through a long period of time that he worked at the White House and all, that he’d held good jobs and he was ambassador to NATO at the time. I remember there was a tie that I found someplace that had the seal, the eagle on it. It wasn’t really a good silk tie, but I purchased several of these things. And Ford saw it and said, “I’d like one of those.” So I bought him all the colors of that tie and sent them to him. And I saw Rummy one time, and he was still ambassador to NATO, and so he said, “I want one of those.” Okay, so I sent him six different colors of it. Rummy sent me a NATO tie, and I still have it in my drawer in the plastic.
Anyway, I think he saw in Rumsfeld a solid guy who had some background on the Hill at the time.

Smith: Also, a guy who could say no?

Parma: Yeah. And kind of steel. Grabbed onto things in a hurry. He and Hartmann were like this. And Rummy ran a tight shop.

Smith: I wonder if that’s why – as you know, I’m doing this Rockefeller book – my sense is that Hartmann formed an alliance with Rumsfeld. Bill Seidman was part of that group, too. And clearly, the one thing they all had in common was they all, in their own minds, had reason to see Rumsfeld as an adversary.

Parma: Possibly. I don’t know. I know that generally I thought that Nelson Rockefeller was well received, other than the Reagan people who dumped on him.

Smith: There’s a classic Ford story. It tells you so much about the man on multiple levels. All these people said Rockefeller moved to the right, tactically maybe, but it was never convincing, which was the problem. He saw the energy crisis, so he came up with this characteristically immense government program, the Energy Independence Corporation, $100 billion, which was going to be funded with bonds – New York State government on a larger scale. And there was a discussion in the Cabinet. It was very clear that Rockefeller was alone in supporting this. Bill Simon was particularly pointed in his criticisms, some of which bordered on the personal. And the president came down on Rockefeller’s side. When the meeting ended, Simon – and it just reveals so much about Ford and Simon – continued the argument. The President said, “You and I both know Congress is never going to pass that legislation, but I’m not going to humiliate Nelson in front of the Cabinet.” Now, that tells you so much about Ford’s, for lack of a better word, emotional intelligence – understanding better than a brainy guy like Bill Simon, how things work. But it also does raise questions about the Congressional mindset, as opposed to the more ruthless executive mindset.
Parma: I think that Jerry Ford always lamented the fact that he didn’t take Rockefeller as the vice president, it probably made a difference. Actually, he could have had – if he had taken Reagan, it would have made a difference. It would have been a slam dunk with Reagan, I think. An interesting byplay took place at the convention. I never had any formal standing any place, few people even knew who I was or why, other than he’s the guy who plays golf with the President. That’s about the size of it.

The first day we were there, Bill Smith, William French Smith, Reagan’s lawyer went out of his way to find me and visit. It was a nice conversation, nothing came out of it. About a day later, the next morning, Smith found me again and he said, “Reagan would like to have an interface with President Ford. I’m going to be Reagan’s guy, and he would like Ford to name somebody.” I said, “Okay, I’ll go to him and see if we can get a person for you.” So I went to Ford and Ford said, “I don’t know what that’s all about.” I said, “Well, I think they just want to be comfortable that they have some way that they can reach you, knowing that it’s not going through all your whole organization.”

He said, “Okay. You do it.” “Okay, I’ll do it.” And so the attorney general of California at the time, and had been our state co-chairman with me, was Evelle Younger. So I got hold of Evelle Younger and I said, “I don’t know what Bill Smith and these guys are up to, but…” I told him about it. I said, “I want you in the meeting whenever we have these meetings.” And we met a couple of times a day during the convention. Nothing extraordinary happened. When it came time for the vote, Bill got hold of me and he said, “If Ford wins, Reagan does not want to be the vice president. He’s very strong on it and he doesn’t want to have the meeting if he thinks he’s going to have to tell the President no. He doesn’t want to do that.” So I went to Ford and told him that. “It’s up to you.” In the meantime he’s talking to everybody, Bob Dole, and others. So he said, “You tell him that if I’m the nominee that would be the case.” If nominated, the President was going to have the meeting that night with Reagan. And so, when the time came, Sears got hold of Cheney, told him the same thing – that this is the condition of the meeting - that he’s not to be asked. So Ford said to assure him that we won’t ask him. So that took place.

A little sidebar to that was in September, after the convention we had a meeting in Sacramento. There is a breakfast meeting in Sacramento. Justin Dart came up to me and he says, “I got a letter here you’ve got to give to the President. I don’t know why it never got to him at the convention.” And he said, “I laid it out here why Reagan should have been the vice president nominee. He didn’t take him.” And I said, “Well, I was told by William French Smith and Sears told Cheney, that this was the case. All these conditions were laid out.” He said, “I had it all set up.” I said, “And what were you going to do with Nancy?” He said, “We were going to get her out of the room.” And that was how it was going to work. But he wanted him to ask him to be vice president. And he was kind of the leader of the Reagan Kitchen Cabinet with Holmes Tuttle.

Smith: The Kitchen Cabinet.

Parma: Yeah, the famous Kitchen Cabinet, who were going to take over Blair House. I don’t know if you’ve ever heard that story. They will deny it to this day, but the plan was that the Kitchen Cabinet would have Blair House, and they would be there to help Ronnie. Some guy said, “You can’t have Blair House, that’s a government facility, you know. We use that for visiting dignitaries and the rest of it.” But that was the thought process that they had. It would have been a different election, probably.

Smith: Did Ford have a Kitchen Cabinet?

Parma: Closest he had was his Transition Committee, and I think – another part I wanted to tell you about. That five o’clock meeting, I think was the first realization that the President had that he was President of the United States. At the time of our meeting, the ambassador corps was coming to the White House and presenting their credentials. They had them set up in the Roosevelt Room, and so Terry would come in and whisper to the President, he said, “Okay.” And the President would stand up and we’d all stand up. “Sit down, sit down. SIT DOWN.” We’d just remain standing and he’d leave the room. This happened twice. The third time – oh I guess he came back from the second one and we all stood up. He said, “Sit down! How many times do I have to tell you to sit down?” And Congressman Johnny Byrns of Wisconsin says, “Mr. President, we’re not standing up because you’re Jerry Ford; we’re standing up because you’re the President of the United States of America.” Ford kind of looked at him and kind of looked around at us, and sat down. And I think that moment was the exact time that he knew things were going to be different.

Smith: I want to go back, just briefly. That California primary in ’76 must have gotten pretty ugly, the Ford-Reagan contest.

Parma: It was and it wasn’t. That primary was very difficult. I had California – he told me, “You’ve got to deliver California.” And so I got Evelle Younger to be the state chairman and then right away had a problem with Evelle because he was putting all his people into key jobs. And so I had Stu Spencer come to the LA airport. Had Evelle fly into the LA airport and then I had a guy who worked for me by the name of Ron Fuller come in and we had a meeting. The meeting was to tell Evelle, “You’re not to set up your governor’s campaign on our account. We don’t want to get your race in the way of whoever the other candidate is going to be.” They had a good candidate that was getting ready to run against Evelle. Evelle didn’t get it.

Smith: Houston Flournoy.

Parma: Yeah, I guess it was Flournoy. And so he kind of challenged me. “How can you do this?” I said, “Well, I’m doing it. Do you want me to have somebody else tell you what I’ve just told you? Be happy to call him right now.” And Evelle said, “No, that’s fine.” You can ask Stu Spencer about this question. But at that point we settled it – it was going to be a Ford campaign not a Younger campaign.
Smith: Let me ask you, and this may be unfair, if you were in my position and you had six hours to ask Stu anything, at this point in history, is there anything you don’t know about that race that you would ask Stu?

Parma: About the…?

Smith: About the ’76 campaign?

Parma: The ’76 campaign? Well, I’d ask him, why couldn’t you get Reagan to say something about Ford?

Smith: In the fall?

Parma: In the fall. Now the other part of this – there are a whole series of things that happened. Following Reagan’s loss at the convention, Smith sought me out again and he said, “Please tell the President not to call Reagan.” I said, “You’ve got to be kidding me. You don’t want the President to call the Governor?” “I think it would be better that he didn’t.” And I said, “Why?” And he said, “I’m not sure he’d take the call.” That was not Reagan, to me. It just didn’t sound like Reagan.

Smith: But it also suggests that there was a real lingering bitterness.

Parma: Yes, there was. There was absolute bitterness.

Smith: And it probably wasn’t limited to the Governor.

Parma: And it was his staff as well. And so Ford had a little campaign committee – I think Dick Herman was on it, Rockefeller put a guy on it that was an executive vice president of one of his companies, or something – a lawyer. A nice guy, can’t think of his name. And Thurston Morton was there, Ford would attend meetings, I was there. So I asked Ford, in order to maintain some relationship with the Reagan people, why don’t we put William French Smith onto this thing? You’ve got Rockefeller’s guy – and he said, “That’s fine.” So I called Smith and asked him if he’d come to the next meeting.

In each one of those meetings – and I have notes about this – I’d say, “It’s time that these two talked.” “Nope, it’s not time, I will tell you when it’s time.” So it was just a very, very bitter feeling that exists. It wasn’t until we were into the campaign six weeks or more we had a meeting at the Mayflower of the group, and he got me aside and he said, “It’s time.” I said, “Okay.” I called Cheney over at the White House and I said, “I’ve got Bill Smith with me and we need to talk to the President tonight about calling Reagan.” And he said, “Okay, he’s at a reception at the White House, over in the main floor of the White House. Why don’t you come over, I’ll clear you through, come to that reception. Then when he goes upstairs you and Smith follow him.” I said, okay. So we went up after he’d done his thing and we went upstairs into what was their living room at the time. I said, “Tell the President what you have to say.” And he said, “It’s time now. You can call Reagan.” He said, “Okay, I’ll do it tomorrow.” Was not going to do it right now – three hours difference – it was still early in California.

So he did it the next day and had a nice conversation, he said. But as a result of that, I think – I don’t know that Reagan ever knew this. I don’t know. The reason I say that, we were at a meeting later during the campaign at the Marriott Hotel at LAX, one of those big hotels going down to the airport. And we had all the Reagan people there. I was sitting next to Holmes Tuttle. Holmes Tuttle says to me, or he made the statement before Margaret Brock and all these people who were sitting there, “Ford didn’t even call Reagan after the campaign.” I said, “Holmes, we were directed not to call him.” “That’s a lie!” I said, “You’re telling me I’m lying to you?” And he said, “Yes.” I said, “No,” and I told him the story. Bill Smith told me this and we waited. About that time Bill Smith walks up. I put my hand on Holmes’ arm and I said, “Holmes, don’t you say a word, I’m going to ask Bill a question, and you wait for the answer.” And I turned to Bill and I said, “Bill, would you tell Holmes what you were telling and I was passing to the President about calling Reagan?” And he repeated verbatim what I’d just told him. Holmes shot out of his seat, grabbed Smith by the arm, took him over in the corner, and I could hear him, “Don’t you ever tell that story again.” I mean, it was a rant. But, that led me to believe, someplace communications had broken down.
In a way, Ford was the victim, because Reagan did not – I offered Lynn Nofziger a thousand dollars – I said, “I’ll give you a thousand dollars, Nofziger,” and he was a dear, dear, friend and covered us when I was working in the Congress. “I’ll give you a thousand dollars for every time Reagan mentions Ford over twice in a speech, if you’ll give me a thousand dollars if he doesn’t mention him in the speech.” He wouldn’t take the bet. And I’ve never gone back to check the speeches because I know they are all doctored. But I don’t think ever, I never heard it, that he ever mentioned President Ford, by name, or as president.

Smith: Were you in DC on election night?

Parma: Yes, I flew in. In fact, I took an airplane out of LAX election morning, flew to Logan, Utah, picked up Jack Ford, and we flew cross-country to the White House. Not a cloud in the sky. I said, “There’s got to be a cloud there, Jack. Someplace, it’s got to be raining!” Like Michigan or someplace.

Smith: Was Jack upbeat?

Parma: Yeah, he felt good about it. He’s a junior in college or something like that. Oh yeah, he’d had a fun campaign, and all that. We had a nice time. We flew into Washington and the little Learjet – I guess we refueled in Utah, we were able to make it from there right on in. But then we went right to the White House. Joe Garagiola did a great job during the campaign – everything Stu would ask for, I guess, Joe did. So the President asked Joe and his wife to come over. Well, Joe brought his wife and I don’t know how many kids were there, and it was an interesting group. Jake Javits was there. Pearl Bailey was there.

Smith: The Doles were there.

Parma: Dole? I don’t think Dole was there. It was an interesting group. Kennerly had a bunch of pictures. I was kind of the scorekeeper. I had a copy of Newsweek magazine that had an excellent layout on the states and the delegate votes. So I was keeping score. The President kept saying, “Leon, what is it?” So I’d show him. I’d circle the states that were still coming in. It was not good.
Smith: Were you watching TV?

Parma: We were watching the television, but it was difficult to keep the score sheet and knowing the states we had to win. And I guess it was like two o’clock in the morning, or something like that; Cheney came in and told us how dire it was. Once the President asked, “Where you staying? You staying here?” I said, “No, I don’t know where I’m staying, frankly.” “Well, why don’t you stay here?” And I think Betty overheard him or something, and somebody said, “Mr. President, there aren’t any bedrooms.” All of Joe’s kids were in the bedrooms. And so I said, “Oh, don’t worry about it. I’ll bunk out with somebody else downtown.” I said, “I want to be back here in the morning when you do your thing.” He’d lost his voice and I was concerned.

Smith: That night, was he able to speak?

Parma: Not much, he’d lost it in Grand Rapids. It was his last stop, I think, before he came into Washington, he’d gone to Grand Rapids. And that’s where it finally gave out. Next morning, he didn’t have a voice. And there was a debate amongst the family, who should read the statement. Have Jack read it, have Susan. He said, “Betty will read the statement.” Just the four kids and Betty and me, we were in the Oval Office. So, with that we walked into the press room. I walked into the press secretary’s room to watch the television. I wished I’d gone into the other room, I could have seen everything. I was more interested in how Betty was going to do.

Smith: And remember Ohio, which was so close. Did it take him a while to get over the loss?

Parma: Oh, I don’t know that he ever really got over it. Give me 9,000, he’d be president. I figured that out one time. It was that close. And the pardon thing took him down. The Polish thing was a big deal. I think that cost him votes.

Smith: People tend to forget about this, but the last weekend before the election, there was some new economic numbers, which, at the very least, suggested that the comeback that they were trumpeting had stalled out. It wasn’t as robust a recovery as it had appeared to be.
Parma: Well, the debate in San Francisco – after the debate we went out to this Suitros (?) home. This lawyer from one of the big law firms in San Francisco. And Henry got him there. Henry told him what a great debate it was and how well he’d done. Didn’t mention the Polish thing.

Smith: Was that characteristic of Kissinger?

Parma: Yeah. But the next day we flew down to USC, and there was a big meeting and was not in the meeting for some reason. Stu was in the meeting and can tell you what happened there. And Ford was very stubborn about it. “I didn’t make a mistake.” Ford had been, I think after Helsinki, had gone into Poland. A million people lined the place and were throwing roses at him and everything else. And he saw that, and he felt it. They were not minions of the Soviets, and this was what he was trying to say.

Smith: If he had put it in those personal terms, no one would have thought twice.

Parma: Oh, the next day or that night, or if anybody had said, “You didn’t look into the eyes of the Polish people when I was driven through their streets and they were throwing roses at us. They were not controlled by the Soviets. Yes, they were occupied, but they had not caved.” Even the head of the American Polish Society flew out to meet with him, saying how wrong he was. No one sensed this. And it never came out like I just said it, to my mind. It never came out.

Smith: What does it tell you about – frankly, it’s not up to the President to come up with a formulation like that? Were there people around him who could have?

Parma: Yeah, I don’t know why they didn’t feed it in. I said it. I didn’t say it to the press, they didn’t know who the hell I was. I asked somebody, I said, “Don’t they understand what he said? I mean, he saw the people.” He was standing in a parking lot, or something like that, and the press had him cornered and he tried to explain his way out of the deal. And Carter kept hammering away on it. It was an interesting time.

Smith: Did he ever talk about it in later years?
Parma: Yeah, a little bit. He said they didn’t understand what I was saying. It was a shame.

Smith: What’s it feel like to come back to this room?

Parma: I felt, from the first time we walked in the Oval Office, I couldn’t believe that this friend, this golfing partner, who we’d been on so many vacations with and all that, was, indeed, the President of the United States. If you go to that door, you can look out across and see a house on the 150 yard marker, of the 12th fairway, this is 13. He called me up one day and he said, “I found a house for you. You’ve got to come.” I said, “Mr. President, I don’t need a house in Palm Springs. Barbara’s aunt has a house, we’ll stay there whenever we go down.” “No, you’ve got to buy this house. I can see it right from here.” I bought the house.

He’d call me up – I’d let him know when I was in town – and his thing was, “We can tee off on 13, then we’d come around and play 12. You go home, then I’m right here.” And this was it. We’d play the nine holes. We wouldn’t play the eighteen. We did this quite often.

It was that kind of a warm relationship. And I’m always in awe. I never addressed him as anything but Mr. President. Very few times did I, when we were really alone, did I say Jerry. But it offended me whenever I heard anybody call him…he had a bunch of New York guys that were hanging around. Loved to be Jerry. I just couldn’t understand – it was Mr. President.

We talked a lot of football.

Smith: College and pro?

Parma: Well, he could have been a pro. I was a half-assed quarterback at San Diego State, so we knew the lingo and talked about it.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him in here?

Parma: We just had a nice little chat. I sat there and we talked about something. He had some pictures he was showing me. The last time I saw him was the day of the – I guess it was the Ohio State-Michigan game – and he was in his hospital bed sitting in the study. He was right there. Right to the end, he thought he’d win the game. They lost. He thought that they’d win the game. We had a coach down at my University of San Diego State, Steve Fisher, who had been the assistant coach the year that they were going to the Final Four. Fish took them to the Final Four. I think they won. The Fab Five, I think they called it. Ford knew him and he was always telling me, “Say hello to Fish.”

We went to Ann Arbor one time for something. It was after he was President. They’d always take him down to the locker room. In ’77, we had the major league all star game at San Diego. And Bowie Kuhn, Baseball Commission, had invited him to the game, so he invited me to go with him. He loved to go into the locker rooms. We went into both locker rooms. Bowie had his box right on the first base – right opposite the first baseman and we sat there and watched the game. But he loved that; he just absolutely loved those things. He was a good jock.

Barbara and I accompanied Betty aboard Air Force One from Palm Springs to Washington, Grand Rapids and back to Palm Springs. It was a great moment for me during the funeral services, flying from Washington to Grand Rapids aboard Air Force One. And when we passed over Detroit, we were told the pilot was going to do something over Michigan stadium, it was going to be on the left side, so I was sitting on the left side and I sat, going to Washington with Betty and going from Grand Rapids with him. Just had the feeling that he shouldn’t be there by himself. Whenever I saw no one was there, I sat down. When we went over Detroit, the pilot started letting that airplane down, and he took it down, had the full flaps down, he had the wheels down. Everything was down in that airplane, I swear, and there was an Air Force officer came to me and says, “I’ve never seen one of these airplanes go this slow.” But he brought that airplane down, a thousand feet or so, he was low. He dipped the wings in salute and just throttled slowly back up to altitude towards Grand Rapids. When we were over the stadium I was hitting the casket, and I said, “We’re over the stadium!” I just totally lost it. And Marty Allen had walked in about that time, I know he thought I was going crazy. And I had this heavy ring on so I was hitting the top of the casket. I had restrained myself the whole time. That did it. The old jock received the ultimate accolade on his trip home – he was given a low level flyover Michigan Stadium where he had so many fond memories. I know this would be one of the most special events of all that were held that week.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Smith: Several people told me you’re Mrs. Ford’s closest and oldest friend.

Fisher: 82 years.

Smith: 82 years. I think that qualifies on both counts. Where did you first meet?

Fisher: We met in dancing school. I think I’ve told this story before, but we met in Calla Travis’ School of Dance a Thursday afternoon and started dancing classes.

Smith: Was that in Grand Rapids?

Fisher: In Grand Rapids on Fulton Street. The building’s still there.

Smith: Really?

Fisher: And my mother sent me because I was a tomboy with three brothers and she wanted me to be graceful and lower my voice. So, I was sent to aesthetic dancing class and there I met my friend. She was very, very graceful.

Smith: Was she?

Fisher: Yes. She could kick much higher and she was in the right place to carry on.

Smith: She was Betty Bloomer.

Fisher: She was Betty Bloomer, yes. And she lived in town. We lived out in the country, so we used to come in town to do all kinds of things. It was three miles one way.

Smith: What was Grand Rapids like then?

Fisher: Well, there were streetcars and there was the main street, Monroe Avenue. There were some nice stores and a big hotel.

Smith: The Pantlind?
Lilian Fisher

Fisher: The Pantlind. The Pantlind family were part of our group; some of their children were our contemporaries. And, what else? Well, my grandmother and grandfather lived on Fulton Street and this is near where some of my friends lived. Out in the country, I really felt very lonely. I didn’t have any sidewalks to skate on. I had animals to play with and dolls and a brook and a lot of country things that my parents thought were great for a family of six children. And we had a wonderful life out there. But as soon as we were teenagers and all, we spent more time in town. Although, we started early, as I say, eight years old in the dancing class.

Smith: What was she like as a child?

Fisher: What was she like?

Smith: Yeah.

Fisher: She was pretty. She had a Dutch cut. That’s what we had with bangs. Pretty, just pretty. I always thought, “Oh my, she’s pretty and she’s not too tall and she can kick.” She could pirouette and do all these crazy things.

Smith: Did she have personality?

Fisher: Yes, you just sort of knew she was there in a quiet way. You were always aware that she was part of the group. She was more mature, I think, than some of the rest of us.

Smith: What about her family?

Fisher: Well, she had two older brothers, Bill and Bob. And they were quite a lot older. They were even older than my older brothers, so I didn’t really know them well at all. I met them over the years, but never really knew them. They weren’t in Grand Rapids for lots of time as I recall, but her mother was a lovely lady and I had met her father a couple of times. He was always away during the week because he traveled.

Smith: What did he do? Was he a salesman?

Fisher: I’m not just sure. I think I read about it. But he just wasn’t there. He was a salesman or a factory representative or some such. I don’t think he was in the furniture business. Many people were. But we spent from that time together, and then as time went on there were birthday parties and things that our paths crossed. We were always aware of each other as friends. When we began to be closer was when I came in to go to Central High School.

Smith: Now what was the difference between Central High School and South High?

Fisher: Location.

Smith: Okay. Was that the only difference? Because traditionally, you know, they’re portrayed as being was sort of the upper crust school and one was the more diverse or down scale in some ways.

Fisher: I would say that perhaps more of the young people who went to Central went away to boy’s school or went east to college. That pretty much tells the tale. Their parents were in a position and that was important for them. South was very wholesome. It would’ve been much closer for me to go to South, but my brothers went to Central, my father had graduated from Central in the class with Arthur Vandenberg. That was his claim to fame. So, we drove in. My brothers could drive when they were fourteen in Grand Rapids. They wanted all the children to be able to drive tractors to help on the farms. I came in seventh grade and that was junior high, Central. And we got to know each other and we were sort of in the same gang and the same group or in the same bunch. And had many of the same friends - we talk about them today. And then we went and started high school together and were in a sorority that they had then. There’s a picture.

Smith: What was the name of it?

Fisher: It was called Gamma Delta Tau, but it was affectionately known as the Good Cheers. And Betty, just mentioned this when I was talking to her over the weekend. She said, “I love that picture of the Good Cheers.” I think the original I have I sent to the museum. She’s sitting down in the front row and I’m standing in the back row. She was very, very popular with the girls and the boys. We were always telling the girls to wait and see what boys were going to ask Betty for dates on Friday and Saturday to see who’s going to be left over for the rest of us, if we got anybody. And then we went to boy-girl dancing school, ballroom dancing school, together. Now, overnights and just a lot of good times. I think we would think about just about everything that these kids today can think about, but there was Prohibition and there was a Depression – that made a big impact on our lives.

Smith: How so?

Fisher: I mean, the furniture business collapsed and fathers didn’t have jobs and fathers were committing suicide after the crash.

Smith: Really? Did you know any of them?

Fisher: Oh, yes, I can think of two. My father’s friends. And those were serious times. None of us will ever forget those. And we went on, of course, to the war times, but even today this extravagance and the children who have everything, it bothers me a lot about where values are. But that’s the way it was and it was a wonderful, wonderful place to grow up because there were great winter sports, sledding and skiing and when I was little, we had a pony with a little sleigh. In the summertime, we were near Lake Michigan and we went to Cape Cod as children. As we grew older and the time of the Depression started, we started going back to the Cape in the summer and stay at the house where my grandfather was born. But, before that, we went out on the beach where my father had gone when he was young. Betty told me that’s where she first saw Jerry. She didn’t meet him, but she saw him out on the beach. The name of this little colony on Lake Michigan near Holland, Michigan, you know. [Ottawa Beach]

Smith: Sure, sure. She apparently liked what she saw.

Fisher: Yeah, I won’t tell you what she said.

Smith: Why?

Fisher: But she didn’t meet him then, you know, and they were young. He was five years older.

Smith: Did that take place when you were still quite young?

Okay. From what you said, it sounds like she had a number of boyfriends.

Yes, everybody loved her. To this day and I’ve said this before, of all the times I’ve spent with her over the years and all the places we’ve been, I’ve never heard one person say an unkind thing about Betty. I think I said that to Geoff Mason when he was questioning me about our friendship. But that’s the way it was and it stayed that way.

When did the idea of becoming a professional dancer - how did that evolve?

Well, then there was this period when I went away to school when I was sixteen. When I came back “I was a teenage college dropout,” and I wasn’t in Grand Rapids for some of those later teen years when she was graduating. I remember she was a Herpolsheimer's Personal Shopper.

What was that?

Herpolsheimer's was a department store a lovely, lovely fine department store. Sort of a Grand Rapids substitute for Marshall Field’s. And she had a job there. She was a model and she was also a personal shopper to help them select.

So, all this was someone who had taste from a very early age.

Oh, yes, a very graceful womanly figure, well-turned out, everything like that. She went on with her dancing Calla Travis had this advanced program. One went through certain steps and you graduated just like you did in any school. I didn’t. I wasn’t eligible for that. I went away to school and I got to be the goalie on the soccer team. Anyway, during that period, she stayed there and she danced and she taught dance. My younger sister – eleven years younger – went to one of Betty’s dancing classes.

The Martha Graham period.

By then I was married and lived in Pittsburg.

Okay.

I was married in 1939 and Betty married Bill Warren sometime after that.
Smith: Now, who was Bill Warren?

Fisher: Well, he was a nice guy. Very handsome and very quiet. He sort of scared me. Older and handsome and well turned out. I never got to know him very well, but I certainly knew who he was and saw him around a lot. He was a couple of years older than she was and at that time, you see, when Betty and I got together, we were sticking pretty much with our own age. It makes a big difference when you’re a teen. So, I never really knew him very well.

Smith: He was from Grand Rapids?

Fisher: He was from Grand Rapids. She’s written about him in her books, so I won’t get into that. But they were married for about five years and then she stayed on and soon met Jerry after the war.

Smith: That’s right. And, I guess, was still in the process of getting the divorce when he first asked her out and so she was kind of reluctant to say yes.

Fisher: Yes, he is five years older and he was a football star. We used to go to our football games on Saturday afternoons, our group, the Good Cheers, and a whole bunch of others and sit there and cheer for Central. And the greatest rival was South. The last year, when Jerry was a senior in high school, we saw him play, but I don’t remember who won.

Smith: Who did you cheer for?

Fisher: Oh, we cheered for Central. Then it was shortly after that she saw him as I remember it. She said she heard he was going to the University of Michigan.

Smith: Well, he was sort of a big man on campus.

Fisher: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. He had a presence, you know. He had posture and commanded respect and he was very warm and friendly.

Smith: And yet, it’s well known that he had a temper.

Fisher: When we’d get together, just he, Betty and I, up until the time he became very ill, we’d talk about Grand Rapids. We’d talk about all these things there was nobody else to talk to about. I remember sitting in Vail and Rancho Mirage and we’d laugh and carry on about the old days. My brother was two years younger than he was and they didn’t know each other closely, but they got to know each other later when Jerry was at Yale in the law school when my brother was a Yale undergraduate. Then, my brother [“Marc” – Rev. Marcus B. Hall, Jr.] went into the ministry and had a church in Stowe, Vermont. He loved to ski. And he built an ecumenical mountain chapel halfway up Mt. Mansfield. He asked Jerry to be on the board with him.

Smith: Really?

Fisher: Yes.

Smith: That’s great.

Fisher: Jerry’s son Mike was in the clergy by then. He lived in (inaudible) and Pittsburgh for a couple of years. His oldest child was born in Pittsburgh.

Smith: That’s right. Religious faith was a significant part of the Ford family.

Fisher: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. I mean, have you ever seen a brave man who didn’t have some religious faith?

Smith: Did you know his parents?

Fisher: No, I didn’t. He has a brother who lives in Naples.

Smith: Yes, I’m going to see him tomorrow.

Fisher: I haven’t seen him for a long, long time. I saw him at a distance at the funeral, but I know when Betty was here visiting me when I lived down on Gin Lane, I had some people for dinner and he came with his wife. I haven’t seen him since.

Smith: After the war, when they began seriously dating, were you still in touch with her during that period?

Fisher: No, by then I went to Pittsburgh and then she went to Washington. And she had four children and I had four children and we really didn’t stay in touch. But when she had breast cancer, I had had breast cancer four years before her and I had kept it a secret. And I thought, “I’ve got to get some words to my friend and tell her everything will be alright.”

Smith: How did you do that?

Fisher: I knew she was at the naval hospital. Since then, well, I think she thought she had fifty thousand letters, but I had a friend who was a retired navy admiral, a good close friend, their son is my godchild, so I asked him if I wrote a letter to Betty if he would deliver it by hand to her. So, she got it. His name was Lawson P. Ramage and had won a Congressional medal. But, anyway, then I heard from her, and one thing lead to another and it just drew us right close together as if we were magnetized.

Smith: Now, you heard from her, was that a thank you for your letter?

Fisher: Yes. And then after that, I became active in the Cancer Society as a Reach to Recovery volunteer. It’s a support group for people who have had mastectomies. And we visited only at the doctor’s request to help others who had it. We were trained to do this. I remember how much help I received when a volunteer came. The first question is, “How long ago did you have it?” She said, “Five years.” I thought, “Yay, I have five years.” So, I went into that. I felt that I’d recovered enough that maybe I could help somebody else.

Smith: Did she have questions for you?

Fisher: No, she didn’t. She didn’t. By then, we didn’t really get back together until she was through with her chemo and things settled down for her. Because, after all, it takes awhile to just get over the shock.

Smith: Did she talk about that period?

Fisher: We talked about it, yes, because then she had asked me to go with her several times and several places year after year after year which were breast cancer related. The Susan Komen Foundation. We went to that annual lunch until they stopped having it, it got to be so big. And she sent me a couple of letters that she’d received and said, “Maybe you can help these people and try to get in touch with them.”
It’s hard to imagine. I mean, one of the worst elements is feeling alone and not knowing what’s next. Is it that informational vacuum that you find yourself in? Do you feel particularly bereft?

Well, you see it was different then. Of course, we’re talking about 42 years ago. Total shock and then I think we were blessed in a way not to have to wait and have to make all these decisions and make these choices of this or that or the other and my cancer was discovered by a mammogram. One of the first five in Pittsburgh by this new machine. The doctor said, “At your age, we have this new test.” And there it was. So, that was on a Monday. By Tuesday, I’d been to a surgeon and he’d reconfirmed it. By Thursday they said, “If it's malignant, you’re going to have a mastectomy and if it’s not, you’re going to go home tomorrow.” So, I woke up and I knew. So, that was Monday to Thursday. I was numb.

And it was better that way. Like I said, when you have to discuss it with your family and your friends and you have to wait and have the tests – oh my goodness. It just (inaudible) there.

Imagine then about the First Lady of the United States going through this horror and waking up and the whole world wanting to know.

She woke up and she told the world what happened to her. Now, I didn’t have any compunction about talking about it because people asked her, “Well, can you tell us how it was?” When I woke up, I was surrounded in my bed by helpers and dear friends and a couple of nurses and everybody looked so downcast that I thought, “Wait, I’d better smile because they’re waiting to see what I’m going to do.” So, I smiled and they all smiled back at me. A good smile is your best weapon. So, when my friends wanted to talk about it, I would say, “Oh, I didn’t like, but it’s over. Let’s talk about something else.” And they couldn’t tell which side it was on. I was told nobody’s going to know unless you tell them.

She said, it was at the first event at the White House, she was coming downstairs, and they were wondering which side it was on.
Fisher: They look for it, they don’t look in your eyes. They look right at you. Oh, dear, well this is something we never even would’ve talked about. But it’s everywhere and it’s facing the way life is.

Smith: Again, you’re absolutely right. People who weren’t around then probably find it hard to imagine. How much of a difference did she make by going public?

Fisher: Oh, a world of difference. I mean, she just brought it right out in the open. Well, I’ve had that, too! I’m just like Betty Ford, God love her!

Smith: And then there’s Happy Rockefeller.

Fisher: Yes. Shortly after. And then also Nancy Reagan. One of the Susan G. Komen luncheons brought Nancy Reagan out in Dallas and there was Nancy Reagan and there was Lady Bird Johnson. But Nancy Brinker had a brilliant idea when she started this foundation in memory of her sister and she gave her Betty Ford award. Every year she asked Betty if she’d be there to present it. And that’s when people just came like flies on sugar. It just got bigger and bigger and bigger.

Smith: Did you visit the White House?

Fisher: No, I didn’t visit the White House and I have a great regret that I didn’t. The time I was invited to go there was at the time of decorating the Christmas tree and my stepfather’s funeral was that very same day. And as I look back on it now, I thought, “Golly, my mother would’ve probably understood.” “Oh, mother, I have to be at the White House!” But I didn’t. I didn’t.

Smith: Of course, we know now from what Mrs. Ford herself has written, you know, that long before that, she had some real problems, which I think frankly a lot of women had at that time. Here’s someone who was going to have a career of her own and who was very happily married and very successful mother, but who was sort of losing herself in all of this.

Fisher: Yes. I think the first time that I ever was really aware of it was when I went out with a friend from Grand Rapids to visit her in Vail and it was early on, it was right after they’d left the White House and they were renting the Bass House. They hadn’t built their house yet. We knew that she was in a lot of pain and that her neck was bothering her. I had watched her broadcast from the Russian ballet and that’s the first time I thought, “Oh, dear, what’s the matter?” She must be terrified or something is the matter.” But I didn’t realize what it was.

Smith: Was her it voice or her manner?

Fisher: It was her speech. Probably that’s on record. Somewhere they have films of it and within a minute or two you can tell by her speech.

Smith: Yeah.

Fisher: Then just being there with her, she had to take a lot of pills to be out of pain. By the same token, she was entertaining us, having her friends for lunch, we were going out for dinner, and we were just having a lovely time. Susan was there. I remember Susan, she was staying a month with her mother’s friend. But she wasn’t around much at the time.

Smith: Did they seem happy? I mean, the Fords obviously would’ve liked to have won the election, but did they seem happy to be back there?

Fisher: All the things I saw, she has written about in her book - about how Jerry said she was always late and these little things. I mean, she’s come right out and thrown it right out there for everybody to read.

Smith: Right.

Fisher: Not for one instant ever did I see anything but the most loving relationship between those two.

Smith: They were in their new life outside of politics. Of course, she was kind of nudging him to leave politics anyway.

Fisher: It was mixed emotions, you know. She really wanted him to leave, but when she saw how hard it was for him, how close he’d come to winning, she didn’t anticipate the hurt of it all.

Smith: Did it take awhile to get over that?
Fisher: You know, time is a great healer and he found another life for himself, speaking, teaching, very much in demand to run on boards – busy, busy, busy. I remember a couple of times being out there with them and he was off to New York from California at four in the morning with agents.

Smith: Did you ever see anyone who liked to travel more or who had more energy? I mean, it was phenomenal really up until very late in life.

Fisher: He didn’t slow down. He loved to swim. He took good care of himself, very good care of himself. He was in good shape.

Smith: What was it that they loved about Vail? I know that they loved to ski. Did she ski?

Fisher: She did, but not for very long. I think when they went out there from Washington with their children for Christmastime, I think I didn’t see her standing up dressed for the part swearing how to put the skis on her feet. I don’t have any recollection.

Smith: So, what was it about Vail that they enjoyed so much?

Fisher: Well, they chose that place, I think, while he was a congressman and they had some very dear friends from Grand Rapids who’d sort of discovered Vail. The skiing was bigger and better than it was in northern Michigan at that time. The Stiles, I think were the ones, Jack Stiles, if I remember. They were the ones that maybe started them going to Vail.

Smith: Yeah.

Fisher: But it became a big part of their life with the Betty Ford Garden and everything else.

Smith: I’m told they were loved in Vail. The people in Vail really took them to their hearts.

Fisher: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. And they thought a lot of the people and their interests. Betty had sponsored a summer ballet school.

Smith: Really?
Lilian Fisher

Fisher: Some little Russian girls came over. We went to see them one year I was out there in the summertime. They stayed out there and studied. It was reciprocal, maybe some American children went over to Russia. I remember them definitely flying to this recital for this ballet.

Smith: Describe their house in Beaver Creek [Vail].

Fisher: Well, it was spacious and it was contemporary. I was just right. It was sort of backed up against the mountain and there was the tram or the t-bar that ran behind their house. You went in on the ground level and there wasn’t much of any living space. I think the agents had their command post there. So, they were there on the ground floor, but then there’s an elevator up to the main floor. A lovely living room. Very comfortable. Very tasteful. Very low-key. It was nice. Very welcoming feeling.

Smith: Did she like to decorate?

Fisher: I think she knew what she liked. She had some good help.

Smith: How would you characterize her style?

Fisher: Tailored. She’s casual. She and I liked the same kind of dress. I mean, she was kind of country, chintzy. That’s the way it was.

Smith: There’s a story about them when they were at the White House. There’s a family dining room on the second floor and Mrs. Kennedy had found some 19th century French wallpaper that showed scenes from the American Revolution and Mrs. Ford had it removed because, she said, “It’s really very difficult to sit there eating and watching all these people shooting each other and bleeding.” So, she had it scaled down.

Fisher: Exactly. Unappetizing wallpaper for a dining room. I’m surprised Mrs. Kennedy didn’t know better. Somebody sold her a bill of goods. She did a beautiful job at the White House, but she had a different feel than Betty Ford. Let’s face it. Lovely lady, but different feel.

Smith: And were the kids there much in Vail?
The kids were all sort of scattered around when I would be with them. Maybe one or two of them would be coming and going, but, by then, when Mike and Gail were married or about to be married and the boys were in California and Susan was at home. She lived at home.

Was there a sort of special relationship between Susan and her mother?

Yes. Yes. It was so wonderful. It is a wonderful relationship. She just told me recently how thankful she was that she’d given this responsibility of running the Center to Susan when she did. Because, you know, we know all of a sudden I can’t do what I used to do. This is a hard thing to accept as you grow older. Stay the age you are.

So few people who create something that really is an expression of themselves have the satisfaction of knowing that it can be entrusted to somebody.

Yes, I feel that way about my children. How are they going to know if they don’t have the experience of doing things the way I hoped they would do? It’s interesting to watch, but, you know, the apple doesn’t fall far from the tree. They came with certain characteristics that they just came with.

Did they [the Fords] enjoy grandparenting?

Yes. Yes. They did. They did. And they had all those little girls first. Five little girls when finally the two little boys – remember at that funeral? Who would ever forget them? I was sitting right smack besides them. The littlest one was sitting on his mother’s lap and he let go of her and then he’d go to sleep. And then his brother got up and read. Yes. It was beautiful. When we came from the library, we came all the way out Fulton and Lake Drive. We went right past Calla Travis Studio of Dance. She taught my father ballroom dancing. She had dyed hair, brown hair. The first person that I ever knew who had dyed hair. My mother said, “Yes, she dyes her hair.”

That’s not very Dutch.

No. Travis is English, isn’t it?
Smith: I think so. When did you know about Mrs. Ford’s intervention and all that flowed out of that?

Fisher: I will tell you, it was very dramatic because I had asked her – I was active, as I say, on the Cancer Society and they ran their big fundraiser for the Society in Pittsburgh with a ball. A Cancer Ball at the William Penn Hotel. My cronies asked me if I would be on the committee and if I would help. I said, “Oh, I’d be glad to.” And I said, “Maybe Betty Ford would like to come.” And they said, “What did you say?!” Well, I mean, she’s had cancer and she goes everywhere and this is a beautiful place and it would be wonderful to have her. She could only say ‘no’.” So, I asked her and she said yes, she’d love to come. Well, as soon as we worked that out, the publicity started for the party (tickets were being sold). A week before the party, she sent me a telegram and she said, “I am very sorry to say” – practically the day I read about it in the paper was when the telegram came saying could she come back next year? And she didn’t come and they got me to stand up at this crowd of a thousand people or whatever to read the telegram. And the next year, she came back. I have some pictures of us from the next year when she came back for the next cancer ball. It was wonderful.

Smith: And, obviously, her life had turned around during the interim. This was a year after the intervention?

Fisher: Yes, and she had been to Long Beach and she had a face lift and she was a new Betty!

Smith: Did she talk about the face lift?

Fisher: Well, she sent me some pictures right away, yeah. I have a great big picture of her that I don’t have hanging. I had my file drawer. You know, I lost two of our children – but the oldest and the youngest are thirteen years apart and they’re girls. So, they didn’t know each other really when they were growing up because Peggy went away to school and college. Two years they were home together. But they’re very, very close now. I lost my train of thought.

Smith: Well, you mentioned the facelift and the photo of Mrs. Ford.
Lilian Fisher

Fisher: Oh, I said to my girls within the past year or so, “I’m getting all these things – these letters and all of these things to do with the Fords. I saved them and I just wonder how to handle it or what to do with them.” And Peggy, the oldest one said, “Just have them all in one place.” So, I have this metal file drawer and they’re all in one place. They’re not in any order.

Smith: That’s great.

Fisher: But, from time to time, when somebody wants something like a picture of the Good Cheers. What’s-her-name, Green, who just called, she had said when I met her out in November at the birthday celebration in California, she said she’d like to have some pictures of me with Betty. And she typed a note where some of these places were in Grand Rapids and nobody seemed to know where this one or that one had been. So, I said, “Well, send me a map, send me a list and I’ll mark on the map.”

Smith: That’s great.

Fisher: So that’s what I did. And I said, “You be sure and send these pictures back because they’re very precious.” And she did.

Smith: Did she talk to you or did you ever talk about that part of her life which is obviously a whole new beginning in many ways - but it had to have been pretty dark before the dawn.

Fisher: Oh, yes, she talked about it and she said, so indebted to the Firestone’s. I mean, when I was with her and I was out there at the Center with her, she was so happy and so proud of it all. She wanted me to see what she was doing and how she was doing it. And John Schwarzlose, I’ve known him from day one, I think.

Smith: She was very hand’s on, wasn’t she?

Fisher: Oh, absolutely, she was very much hands on. Very much. She went every week over there. She signed autographs. Every Big Book for every person when they left. I mean, she was right in it all with her whole heart and soul. She came later to Pittsburgh – she came several times to Pittsburgh. She came on the anniversary of a youth program for drugs. She raised a lot of money by Lilian Fisher speaking and coming to these events. Of course it was all given to the Center, every penny.

Smith: There used to be a sort of a gag; supposedly they had a deal. The president could raise money east of the Mississippi and she raised money west of the Mississippi.

Fisher: That would figure.

Smith: Clearly she always had a sense of humor.

Fisher: Yes, she did. She’s lots of fun. Still is. We were together out there the anniversary of the Center - the people with us were watching, listening, because we were comparing our canes. Her cane is much prettier than my cane. And, these people, I don’t know, the nurses or whoever, were laughing at us.

Smith: She can laugh about growing older?

Fisher: Oh, yes, because we have so many of the same things happen to each other at the same time. It’s a support group.

Smith: My sense was it was very difficult for her to accept his illness or aging. I know friends of theirs the last several years urged them not to go to Vail and she said, “You know, at this point in life, we’ve had the quantity of life. Now we want the quality of life.” Obviously they loved Vail, and they were showing that they could still go to Vail.

Fisher: Well, the last year, I remembers he said, “We’re going and I know the altitude is not the place for us, but if we can’t stay, we’ll come home. But, we’re going.”

Smith: And I know, towards the end, again there were friends who were sort of suggesting, “You need some nursing help.”

Fisher: Let me tell you this as an old person to a young person: we just have to be ready to make these decisions. We have to be ready and it’s a matter of control, no matter what you say or do. We’re not stubborn, we just want to feel comfortable about it.
Smith: I sense that she really wanted almost up until the end she wanted to be the one nursing him.

Fisher: Yes, she said that.

Smith: To you?

Fisher: Yes, she wanted to live to be 90 years old. She would admit to that. So, she did. But she’s a gutsy lady. She always did what she said she was going to do. That doesn’t come as a surprise to me.

Smith: I think he felt a little bit of guilt for all those years when he was out traveling and so on. And in the later years, he was able to spend more time with the children…

Fisher: And he was so affectionate with her. He always called her Mother. He always called her Mother.

Smith: I heard a story that at one point they were sitting around, a small group at dinner, and he was reminiscing and at one point he was dating, was it Mary Pew of the Steelcase family?

Fisher: Oh, yes, Mary Itema.

Smith: And was going on and on about how he’d dated her and she listened to him and then she said, “Well now, Jerry, just think, if you’d married Mary Pew, you could’ve been the president of Steelcase instead of president of the United States.” Touché.

Fisher: That’s the way she was. She had a great wit, a great sense of humor and, believe me, you have to have that to go through some of the things.

Smith: He appreciated it, obviously.

Fisher: Yes. She wouldn’t let him get too stale. Oh, my goodness, yes.

Smith: There’s the story of the time when the Pantlind was renovated. Of course, it was built the year the president was born and they were going on about how it had just been. And she turned to him and said, “Maybe you could use a little renovation, too.” And he laughed. I mean, he genuinely laughed. He didn’t have a pretentious bone in his body.

Fisher: She softened him. She didn’t let him take himself too seriously.

Smith: That’s interesting you say that. How she softened him, you say.

Fisher: Yes.

Smith: It sounds like maybe every politician should have a wife like Betty Ford.

Fisher: Yes. I’m just finishing reading a book called Alice about Alice Roosevelt Longworth. Have you read that book?

Smith: I have it, but I haven’t read it yet.

Fisher: Oh, my goodness, it is something else.

Smith: She was a character.

Fisher: She was something.

Smith: And had a difficult life.

Fisher: And the people she “hung out” with [associated], I mean, think of Washington today and think about Washington then. But, anyway, she knew where she was going and so did Betty, bless her heart, and she had a really strong faith, a fighting faith.

Smith: Let me ask you, is faith a significant part of her life?

Fisher: Of course, how could it not be?

Smith: She expects to be reunited with him?

Fisher: Well, we haven’t talked about that, but I expect to be reunited with my beloved of 48 years. I hope to.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Fisher: Jerry?
Lilian Fisher

Smith: Yes.

Fisher: Yes, it was the year before he died. I went out there with my friend Elsie Hillman from Pittsburgh. Elsie was a very active person in politics.

Smith: Right. I know the name.

Fisher: You know the name?

Smith: I know the name.

Fisher: A close, close friend of mine. What did we go out for? Well, we had been out to the twentieth anniversary together, but then we went this later time. In fact, she was going to California to see her doctor and I was going out to see the Fords and I said, “Let’s go and not postpone it.” She had said, “I’d like to go with you the next time you go.” So we went. We stayed there at the Marriott and we had lunch with them and Betty’s very dear friend Lee Annenberg.

Smith: Yes.

Fisher: He was so sick now. But we had the nicest kind of a time. But then he was unsteady. He had a nurse with him and I remember their saying, “Now, when you stand up, just wait a minute.” But clear, oh yeah. Sat at the front of the table and carried on conversation all during lunch. But that was the year before. Elsie said, “I have a ball cap that’s been signed by four presidents and I’d like to get the fifth president’s signature on it. Do you think I could send it to Jerry?” This was after that. I said, “Try it.” And so he signed it and she got it back.

Smith: I assume you talked to Mrs. Ford after that. I mean, did you keep in touch during that last year?

Fisher: Oh, we talk about every two weeks.

Smith: Yeah.

Fisher: We talk often, yes.

Smith: I mean, during that last year?
Lilian Fisher

Fisher: Yes, and she called me that Tuesday morning and she said, “Jerry doesn’t know me anymore. He’s very, very sick.” And before the day was over, he was gone. So that’s how I heard about it. And the children have been just very dear and considerate and Susan and Vaden - what a nice guy – and all of her children, so nice and dear. They’re like my own children.

Smith: Has it been hard for her?

Fisher: Very hard for her. I know she’s grieving deeply, God love her. I understand that part of it, too. I’ve been there.

Smith: It must be frustrating. I mean, it must add to your frustration if you think there are people out there who wonder, “Well, six months have gone by or a year has gone by, why haven’t you bounced back?” Unless you’ve gone through that, you can’t explain it.

Fisher: I think now she has her physical situation to cope with. Whereas when I lost my husband, I was only 68 years old and I was very healthy and active and I didn’t bounce back, but there again it was like coming out in the recovery room after the cancer. I thought, “I’ve got to smile at people. They’re waiting to see what I’m going to do before they know what to do.” And I felt I have to make the effort to get out there and do things and I’m a single parent. So, it’s a different situation because there’s many years difference makes a great deal of difference.

Smith: Obviously there are lots of people who would love to see her out in public.

Fisher: Oh, yes. At that twenty-fifth anniversary that Friday night, they were so glad to see her. And she was shaking hands with everybody and finally the nurse came up and said, “Here, let me spray your hands. You’ve been shaking hands with everyone.” Her immune system, I think. Yes, I wish I could be closer to her because I think maybe we could get out and around.

Smith: Let’s be frank. At her age, there’s probably a finite number of her contemporaries who are still around who are able to get out.

Fisher: That’s right. Her friend Lee Annenberg, she’s at Mayo’s and Delores Hope is about 96 and her other friends – some of them are mutual friends – she has a very close friend in Denver who was a classmate of mine at school. And, I don’t know. I guess it’s true. If she had some girlfriends. That’s one of the things about being here. Somebody once told me the most important thing you could do for yourself is to make younger friends.

Smith: It’s funny you say that because my sense was and I think one reason why we became so close – the times I was out there, I noticed they liked to surround themselves with younger people. They were very comfortable around younger people and I think in some ways maybe it did exactly what you said.

Fisher: it’s a defense mechanism. But here in Naples, my goodness, there’s all ages.
They’re from all over. They come down, they go back, they come down, they go back. It’s a very dynamic place to be.

Smith: Has she ever visited you here?

Fisher: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. She’s never been to the apartment, but she visited me in my house. She came one time to speak over in Ft. Lauderdale at a secondary school and it so happened that the daughter of my next door neighbor, this little girl I saw grow up and got her graduate degree in marine biology and she married the admissions director of the school over there. Anyway, they wanted Betty to come and speak about her use and the drug problem, so of course Betty came. And I said, “Go ahead and write her. She would love to come.” So, I went over to hear her and she came back with me. Actually, I came back. She had to come with the agents. And she spent the whole day here. And that’s when we saw Dick Ford. And she and Jerry came to the Cape and visited.

Smith: Really?

Fisher: Yeah. That was funny because the agents called several days ahead and said, “You know, we’re going to come over and we’re going to put in a phone line and when the Fords arrive, we’ll have to hitch this up so everything will be there.” I said, “Fine.” They looked the place over. So, the day that they were to arrive, I heard my neighbors next door, they were having the trees pruned.
Anyhow, the agents arrive and they plug in their phone. It was dead! So, the agent said, “I will call and get a repair service man.” And I could hear him say, “Oh no, you won’t wait five days. I’m very sorry.” The tree people cut the phone wire!

_Fisher – additional comment added after interview: The Fords stayed with me while Jerry placed in a golf tournament with Tip O’Neil, his dear friend._

Smith: Did you ever sense what their relationship was with the agents? Because they really did become part of the family almost.

Fisher: But, you know, you weren’t conscious of their being there.

Smith: Really?

Fisher: No, no, no, no. I mean, when they were at my house – two times at my house – my house down here, they stayed in the garage. And we had beverages and snacks and things, but that’s where their command post was. That was the best we could do. And they came in the house once and looked around to see where she was going to be sleeping. Then, at the Cape, they came inside, but at the Cape, the house is on three levels and built on the side of a hill. And the beach level was sort of an independent little unit of it’s own with a little galley and bedrooms and a sitting room and we used it out of season, but the shutters were on the top part. So the agents were down there and we were up above and we never knew that they were there. I mean, unless it was time to go someplace, we’d step out the front door and there’d be the car to go. It’s not hard to adjust to. It’s not my usual treatment. But these are the things that really - our friendship has been such a blessing to me and it’s given me experiences and taken me places that I never otherwise could’ve been. You just can’t believe it.

Smith: Do you think she’s doing better now? I mean, is she – I hate to use the word ‘adjusted’ – but do you think she’s adjusting?

Fisher: Well, I hope so. She’s going to get her hair done and I think it’s when she’s ready. When she feels like it, she’d going to do it. Aren’t we all that way? I mean, have you ever told somebody to do something and sat there and watched them do it? They don’t do it.
Smith: I’ll tell you a story someone told me who was out there recently visiting with her. There’s an olive tree out in front of the house and she had white lights in it for Christmas and they’re still there. She turns them on every night so he knows that she’s okay.

Fisher: That’s good.

Smith: That says a lot, doesn’t it?

Fisher: Well, now, tell me about your plans. Why did you come to see me?

Smith: Okay, well, we’re putting together for the Ford Library/Museum an oral history collection.

Fisher: History.

Smith: Yeah, and we’re talking to friends of both the Fords and people who were in the administration and some of the few people who are still around from Grand Rapids and basically these will all be typed up and transcribed and you’ll have a chance to look at the transcription. Eventually, they’ll be housed at the library and will be available to scholars and researchers and people who are doing research. You know, this day and age, people don’t write letters, they don’t keep diaries, Lord knows, and people in the White House don’t keep a lot of the documents that they used to in part because of special prosecutors and all that. So, oral history is absolutely invaluable at filling a lot of the gaps.

Fisher: This is the side about these libraries that’s new to me and it’s so true. So true.

Smith: I mean, the irony and the paradox is that there’s more paper than ever before, but people don’t put their thoughts on paper in the way that they were accustomed to, so oral history is a way, imperfect, like any science, but oral history is a way of getting particularly the warmer, you know, the kinds of things that don’t get put on paper - the personal stories, the observations, the insights. So, you know, it’s just invaluable.

Fisher: It’s history.

Smith: It is history.
And it’s important for those who follow us.

Absolutely.

Yeah, I was thinking about that when I was reading about Alice. I mean, my goodness. What a gal.

What a life. Mrs. Ford is often described as a free spirit. Do you think that’s true or does it not go far enough in describing her?

Well, it’s true but it’s overused.

How so?

Something fresher. A lot of people, I mean, movie stars are called free spirits.

What adjective would be more appropriate?

That’s a good question.

She doesn’t wear any obvious label.

She was a perfect First Lady.

Did she enjoy her time in the White House?

Oh, I’m sure she did.

Imagine, though, being sort of tossed into that.

And with such suddenness and the children, they say their lives were just thrown in turmoil overnight. But, you know, when we were young, we would go down to this tea room on Monroe Street and have our tea leaves read. This is in her book about how she had the tea leaves read and was told she was going to dine with kings and queens. You just never know. Well, I certainly didn’t know when she was my friend that our lives were going to become so entwined and for what reasons – whoever would’ve told us when we were little girls that we were both going to have life-threatening disease and you’re going to have this friendship no matter where you are.

I can’t thank you enough. This is fun. I mean, it’s very fun.
Lilian Fisher

Fisher: I hope it’s been helpful.

Smith: Oh, it has been.

Fisher: You know, I feel that perhaps I’m going to be repeating myself because I have been asked a couple of times.

Smith: I’m not surprised you were asked.

Fisher: I’m very complimented that you would trust what I have to say.

Smith: You clearly have a very special place in her story and in her life and you’ll probably talk to her before I do.

Fisher: She has a prettier cane than mine.

Smith: Describe her cane. What makes it prettier than yours?

Fisher: It has a silver handle. Mine just came from the medical supply store.

Smith: She always sees joy in art, doesn’t she?

Fisher: Well, she had a style, yes. She liked clothes. She liked decorating. She liked art. She was creative, I would say. I don’t know that she ever put a brush in some paint, but lots of creativity.

Smith: Before I forget and I think she’s written about this, too, as we know now, alcoholism is a disease and it’s often genetic. Was her dad an alcoholic?

Fisher: Well, I’ve seen it printed. I think she’s said that. She didn’t realize it at the time, but I think she said that, yeah. Her mother was a very dignified lady.

Smith: Regal?

Fisher: Oh, yes. I mean, regal, that’s the word I wanted. Regal. I mean, you stood up when she walked into the room.

Smith: Really?

Fisher: Yes, a lovely lady. I can just see their house. I used to go there and spend the night Friday nights.
Smith: What was the house like?
Fisher: It’s still there.
Smith: On what street?
Fisher: Fountain Street. 717 Fountain Street. If I remember, it had a little front porch. Very Dutch. You know Grand Rapids. It’s further up Fountain from Central High. Is Central High still there? It’s not on the map.
Smith: I don’t think so.
Fisher: But Fountain Street School where she went to grade school is still there. I was amazed at that. It’s on the map that Kay Uptemaim sent me. She got a road map. But it was very detailed. It had Kent Country Club and it had all the places. Grace Church. I hadn’t realized when I went out to that funeral until my younger sister told me that there was a new Grace Church. I wasn’t going down to Lafayette Street.
Smith: I know they were married in Grace Church, but was it the old Grace Church they were married at?
Fisher: Yes. We were married at St. Mark’s Church.
Smith: An amazing story, it was the new church, remember President Ford’s mother, when she died in church one Sunday morning.
Fisher: In Grand Rapids.
Smith: Yes, and they went back to her house and characteristically they found her appointment books were filled for the next month. Now you know where the president gets his energy and his work ethic. I mean, I think he seemed to always want to be busy.
Fisher: He had a lot of energy. He was an athlete and if you take that energy off the football field, it has to go some place. Yes.
Smith: He loved campaigning.
Fisher: Yes, was very good at it. What would he be thinking about today? Well, I thought that book that was written After I Die was revealing. He wouldn’t be so surprised today because he thought that that was the path we’re on.

Smith: Yeah. This is perfect. Thank you.

Fisher: You're very welcome.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this.

Burba: It’s my pleasure.

Smith: When I talked to your dad, I was struck by a number of things. But I guess maybe, most of all, by the fact that he said, “You may find this strange, Richard, but I really made a point when I was around Jerry not to talk politics.”

Burba: Absolutely true.

Smith: Because everyone around Jerry wanted to talk politics. Most of them wanted something. He said he’d seen people follow him into the water at the lake. And so he almost created a politics-free zone.

Burba: Absolutely. To add to that, and to emphasize that, when Jerry was president, two weeks after he pardoned Nixon, we had already been invited to spend the weekend at the White House; my mother, my father, my husband, myself, and my sister and my brother. The pardon was so fresh, and I had a lot of questions. I didn’t understand it because he’d enjoyed such great popularity, and we were so thrilled, and then suddenly he was being lambasted. I so distinctly remember as if it were yesterday, Dad saying to us on the way out to the airport, “Nobody is to ask your uncle about the pardon.” And I remember saying, “But, Dad, you know, why can’t we do that? It’s just family.” And he said, “Because that is his house, and you don’t walk into somebody’s house and ask them about something that has to do with their business, anymore than I would expect somebody to walk into my house and inquire about a business decision I made.”

I can remember sitting in the family quarters dining room, and to the right of my Uncle Jerry. Uncle Jerry was at the head and Aunt Betty was at the head, and Dad was right across from me. Somehow, somebody, at the table, very innocently brought up politics in a general sense. And I can remember my father just glaring at me, unspoken, “Don’t say a word.” And we never did, but that stuck with me.

I know that they talked golf. I was present when Dad would be in Florida and Jerry would be in Vail, or whatever, and they would talk on the phone and never, ever, was there any discussion about politics. It was golf. And when Dad was still running Ford Paint and Varnish, Jerry never asked him how business was going.

Smith: Really?

Burba: They talked about things that they had in common, be it friends, golf certainly was a passion, family, but that is very, very clear in my mind.

Smith: Am I correct in assuming that that applied to the other brothers as well?

Burba: I don’t know.

Smith: Okay.

Burba: I truly don’t know. I believe in my heart that my dad and my Uncle Jerry were the closest of the four. Even though, for a period of time Tom lived in town and Jim lived in town, certainly until his death. It’s not to say that Dad didn’t love all of his brothers, but the similarities between the two, the facial expressions, their sense of moral compass, they just were very, very close. And I don’t know if that closeness existed throughout their lives, I don’t know. But certainly I saw that after Tom died, I saw the closeness more; and then even more so after Jim died. But I always saw the similarities between the two.

Smith: Let me go back. Did you know your grandparents?

Burba: Oh, yes. I live two houses away from the house.

Smith: Tell me about them.
Burba: I just adored my Grandfather Ford, I absolutely adored him. My Grandmother Ford was a very stern, stoic woman. She was not as approachable as my grandfather, so I think therein lies my feeling of being closer to him.

Smith: Was she driven? You hear the stories about when she died they found the calendar book was full for however many…

Burba: She did an incredible amount of volunteer work. Now, I wasn’t necessarily cognizant of that at the time growing up. I certainly learned about that later. And as I read more about her - it wasn’t discussed that she had left her first husband because he beat her. We didn’t know about that. You didn’t talk about that.

Smith: How did you find out about that?

Burba: Oh, I think reading it in a book. I certainly was never told. I do remember that she made holidays, Christmas, especially, fabulous. And she took great pride in making sure that the family was altogether for Christmas. Always setting the table beautifully, and making sure that everybody – the girls, especially, not the boys because I didn’t really pay attention to the boy cousins, but the girls always had something that they had requested from Santa underneath the tree. So, it’s her approachability to me that was a little bit standoffish, and that could be through a child’s eyes. If I met her as an adult I might not have had that same impression.

Smith: And when I say driven, I guess that’s a poor choice of words…

Burba: Very strong.

Smith: …but you get a sense of someone who was incredibly organized, and always active.

Burba: Very. Absolutely, no question about that.

Smith: And you wonder whether some of that was passed onto…
Burba: Absolutely. I think she was the stronger of the two in the family sense. I think my grandfather deferred to her, that’s the impression I had. He was just this warm, fuzzy person.

Smith: Almost a role reversal.

Burba: Exactly. Now, when he spoke, and if he was upset, one listened immediately, and one never repeated, perhaps, something that they had done wrong. They had a little parakeet, and if you accidently, without thought, opened a door and the parakeet had been flying around, you were told never, in no uncertain terms, to ever do that again. And you listened and you remembered, and you didn’t do it again. So, it wasn’t as if he was a Casper Milquetoast, but he left the running of the house to her. But I do have a cute story about him. It’s just a personal story.

To this day, I hate rhubarb. And I can thank him for that because I can remember the house on San Lucia, walking into the backdoor, which is by the driveway. You’d walk into the laundry area, then you’d walk straight into the kitchen-breakfast area. I walked in one day, I was probably nine or ten, and my Grandfather Ford was sitting in a chair and he was munching on what I thought looked like a stalk of celery. So I walked over to him and I said, “Grandpa, can I have a taste?” And he said, “Oh, you don’t want this.” I said, “Well, yes, I do.” “No, you don’t.” “Yes, I do.” So he said, “Okay, fine. Here, but if you take it, if you take a bite, you’re going to have to swallow it and eat it. You cannot spit it out.” Well, I did, and I later learned that it was uncooked rhubarb. And to this day, I don’t…I mean, somebody will say, “Well, it’s a really sweet pie,” and I’ll go, “No, no, no. I don’t care to have any rhubarb at all.” So that is as if it were yesterday, I remember that about him. I always remember him smiling.

Smith: Happy man?

Burba: Oh, yes. That’s my recollection of him, absolutely.

Smith: Now, were they both active in church?
Burba: You know, I don’t know that.

Smith: One senses that she was.

Burba: I think that she was involved in guilds, I think he was involved as far as being present on Sunday, with the collection plate – that kind of thing.

Smith: But they were both churchgoers.

Burba: And certainly very involved in Grace Episcopal Church. That’s my recollection because that’s where I was baptized, that’s where I grew up, that’s where my parents were married, etc., etc. The roots ran deep.

Smith: The influence of the Calvinist tradition in West Michigan – clearly, your family was raised with a lot of conservative tenets, individual responsibility, fiscal conservatism, just a whole lot of [unintelligible]. How did that compare with the values or the enforcement, if you will, of the values from the Dutch Reformed? I’m trying to get a sense of – are there two sort of streams here, flowing along next to each other – or are they really one and the same? The Sabbath, for example, the very strict Sabbatarian elements of Dutch Reformed…

Burba: I was going to say that I can’t relate to that because we didn’t have those types of restrictions. We were allowed to go to movies, we learned how to dance, we could do what we wanted on Sunday. You certainly went to church on Sunday. But, you know, there weren’t those kinds of restrictions. I would say that the similarity was the Ten Commandments. That, to me, that was how I was raised. The fact that some of those involved churchgoing, that the parallel to me between those who were raised in Hudsonville, for example, and those of us who were raised in East Grand Rapids, the parallel is the Ten Commandments.

Smith: Okay, that’s perfect.

And the old line about: work hard, tell the truth, and come to dinner on time, is absolutely valid?
Burba: Standard. That’s how I was raised. Yes. The consequences for not telling the truth, and also accountability – accountability, giving back if you were lucky enough to be blessed with - whether it was a talent or financial blessings – that you gave back to the community in some manner.

Smith: How was this communicated? Verbally, by precept, by example, by some combination?

Burba: All. All of the above. For my father, he was very involved in Kiwanis Club, Boys Club, Lions - I think it was the Lions Club - I think that’s what it was called. But all of us at Christmas time, my sister, my brother, myself, at different times in our lives, at Christmas time we had to accompany my father when he would go out and deliver things to people who were underprivileged, so that we could gain a sense of, not everybody is as fortunate.

My first job: there was a store, at that time a very expensive, elitist store in East Grand Rapids, and it was two doors down from the high school. Everybody shopped there – everybody shopped there – and there was a sweater there that I coveted. At that time it was forty dollars. This was back in the Sixties, and I said to Dad, “I’d really like that sweater,” and he said, “Well, do you have forty dollars?” I said, “No.” He said, “Well, then you go find a way to earn it.” I said, “Dad, there’s nothing – I’m not sixteen yet, I can’t drive…” He said, “Well, I’ll tell you what I’ll do. Every Saturday morning I’ll take you over to the plant and we’ll find something for you to do and you can earn the money for the sweater.” I said, “Okay.”

And I’m thinking, oh well, what can I do at the plant, this will be a piece of cake – I’ll do bookwork or something. He had me clean the toilets at Ford Paint and Varnish to recognize how hard people have to work for their money, and then, by the time I got the forty dollars, I still wanted the sweater, but it meant more. So he led by example, and I know that that’s how my uncle, I know that’s how my cousins were raised, too. So that message was obviously set either verbally or by example, or both, to all the brothers.
Smith: Great story. Tell me, I’m confused because I was talking to your dad and I was trying to piece together the sequence of events, and it’s always been a little bit fuzzy to me in terms of when the Depression came along, and the business was just opening and struggling, obviously.

Burba: Oh, very much so.

Smith: Did they lose their house and move to another, more modest house? I’m trying to get a sense of the sequence.

Burba: I don’t know whether they lost the house that they were living in at that time. Dad would have been so young, too.

Smith: That’s right.

Burba: He really would have been.

Smith: Were they in East Grand Rapids and then moved?

Burba: No. I know that they were in the city of Grand Rapids. I don’t know which house at that time. My first recollection of knowing how that all transpired, was in reading about it. Specifically in conjunction when Jerry found out he was adopted. That Leslie King drove in from Detroit in the big Cadillac and where Jerry was working at the time was the little restaurant that we used to go down to for breakfast. So, suddenly it all was like, click, click, click.

Smith: It had not been discussed in the family?

Burba: No. Never, never. I think, and I’ve never asked Dad why, I don’t think it was discussed with them. I truly don’t. I’m assuming that, but to us finding out…he had my grandfather’s name. He looked like my grandparents. So there would be no reason to tell any children growing up, “Well, he’s our stepbrother.” I don’t think any of the brothers ever considered Jerry anything but a full brother. I really don’t. He had their father’s name and I think my grandfather adopted my uncle when he was around two years old, he was quite young. He never really knew his biological father. And the times were such, very little was ever discussed in front of children.
Smith: I’m sure.

Burba: But I never grew up knowing, knowing that he was not their brother.

Smith: And the conditions surrounding Dorothy’s decision to leave Omaha, I’m sure would have been kept under wraps.

Burba: Exactly. Very much so. Because at the time, that would have been shameful, as opposed to being courageous.

Smith: So you never heard her discuss any of that?

Burba: Never. It would have been fascinating. I truly wish the times would have allowed for that, for all of us to have known, because I would have loved to have asked her about it. I think that is a fascinating story in the sense of the amount of courage that it took for her to do that at that time. There are women today that don’t do it. She was ahead of her time in many ways.

Smith: I always thought it gave the president – most people never knew it – and in today’s political climate, frankly, it could have been exploited. But, I think it did give him some kind of insight into other people who have had problems in their early lives, often through no fault of their own. An empathy.

Burba: Absolutely.

Smith: It is always associated with the kind of conservative that he was.

Burba: Exactly, and I always thought of him as a conservative as far as spending, but a moderate otherwise. I think the empathy factor probably – the insight as to what his mother had gone through, probably he, as a male and that generation, that probably gave him more empathy.

Smith: You know, that’s interesting, because he clearly had, and part of it found expression in, I think, a lifelong contempt for his birth father.

Burba: Yes.
Smith: And the fact that - and some of it was legalistic - the fact that Leslie King didn’t pay what the court told him to pay. But behind that was a burning resentment.

Burba: Oh, yes. And as with my father, you were taught, truly, if you didn’t have something nice to say about anybody, you were better served to say nothing.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that, because that’s one of the things that set Ford apart. Politicians, as a class, love to gossip.

Burba: Mean-spirited, too.

Smith: And it’s not just political gossip, they just will gossip. And he stood out. It took a while, but I noticed he had a very deft way of changing the subject if people started talking about personalities, and it often could get mean or ugly. He would find a way to veer off in another direction. I’ve had this confirmed from Penny and other people who made it clear that, particularly in an office full of women, he just didn’t want it.

Burba: I can remember when the museum was dedicated and the entire city of Washington was here. It was a security nightmare because you had the president, the vice president, you had the secretary of state, you had the head of the Senate. At the time, I wasn’t really thinking about it, until you looked around and saw them all there, in one spot, at one point, in hindsight, it’s frightening. And I can remember going to some restaurant downtown here that has since gone out of business, I can’t even remember the name of it. Tip O’Neill was sitting at a table by himself and I said to my cousins - I had this program from the ceremony - I said, “You know, I really want his autograph.” And they said, “You can’t go over there and bother him.” And I said, “You know what? I’m going to go over and introduce myself. I’m not going to ask for his autograph, and I’m going to thank him for coming. And depending upon how I’m received, if he wants to be alone, then I’ll leave.”

So they all sat there and I kind of discretely put my program behind me and I walked over and introduced myself. He was one of the most gracious men – he stood up and thanked me for introducing myself, and proceeded to tell me how fond he was of my uncle, etc., etc. At that time there wasn’t, besides Ted Kennedy, there wasn’t a more liberal Democrat. He was Speaker of the House at the time, I believe, and I’ll never forget this. He had all these accolades to say about my uncle, and he said, “Your uncle and I may be adversaries Monday through Friday, but we have never been enemies, and on Saturday morning at nine o’clock, we’re at the first tee at Burning Tree for golf.” And I’ve never forgotten it.

I’ve looked back on that and thought, so many times, that’s the two party system. That’s how they work together. It was just more insight. I knew the good things about him. I knew the things he tried to do. I knew his moral compass, I knew where he came from. But to hear that from the Speaker of the House who was so highly respected, was just very enlightening to me.

Smith: And it’s a bygone culture.

Burba: Yes.

Smith: He used to, when he was in the House, he and Hale Boggs would debate each other at the National Press Club. They’d get in the car, they’d drive down together to the Press Club and decide along the way what they were going to debate that day. And they’d have their debate and then they’d go have a drink and lunch and go back to lunch. It was just a much more civilized culture.

Burba: Absolutely. When I went to Washington in 1965 with a girlfriend of mine, and of course, we didn’t go alone; Dad took us. We didn’t stay at Betty and Jerry’s house. At that time he was Minority Leader of the House, and he had arranged for us to have a tour of the Senate while it was in session, which at that time, it was very, very special. Then we took a tour of Mt. Vernon, etc., etc. And he, as House Minority Leader, had a car that was provided to him. Now I didn’t know that. I thought he’d just arranged for this limo and this driver to take us around. Well, he did, but it was his. I can remember thinking, well, this is really special, this is really nice. But I do remember it being just so civil there.
And then going to their house in Alexandria for dinner one night, and it’s a faint recollection, that we were talking about our day and what we had seen and what we had done, da da. And, of course, it was old hat to my cousins, and we were pointing out things that we had done, etc., and he had this huge grin on his face because we were seeing it for the first time, and we were old enough, we were fifteen, sixteen years old, so we were old enough to really get a grasp of what we were experiencing. And I remember him saying that, at that time, that all he aspired to – it was the first time I’d ever heard it stated – all I ever want to be is Speaker of the House. That’s the only time I think I ever heard him mention politics. And I don’t remember in what context, just in general conversation.

Smith: Can you describe the house in Alexandria?

Burba: I remember walking in the front door and there being what I would call a great room today. It was a living room, but not a formal living room. It was a family room, if you will. But there was an eating area over at the end and a fireplace on the right. Very cozy, very comfortable. Not huge in comparison to the home I lived in here, just a different style. Warm, comfortable. I never went upstairs, I don’t think we went upstairs. I remember the dining room. That was formal, but then we had a formal dining room, so…A pretty backyard. But we spent most of the time in the family room, sitting and talking.

Smith: Tell me about your aunt at that point. What was she like?

Burba: Oh, golly. Gracious, very gracious. She was gracious when we visited the White House, she was always very gracious anytime, anytime that we were around her alone, or when she was with my uncle. They never forgot names. I was always impressed by that, with the hundreds and thousands of people, I never, ever saw either one of them forget names. I have to honestly say that every time I saw her I never, ever knew that she had a problem. Which was extremely surprising to me, especially spending three days at the White House. I would have thought I would have picked up on it, I was in my twenties then. I never picked up on it. I was surprised.
Smith: When her breast cancer surgery took place, and again, it’s hard to convey to this generation or future generations who will see this stuff, the extent to which in those days, that was kept under wraps.

Burba: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: Treated almost as a shameful thing.

Burba: Oh, yes. She’s an extremely courageous woman. And I wonder if that’s what attracted her to my uncle, in hindsight. Maybe he saw that courage in her, that was exemplified later for all of us to see. I mean, she thought nothing of disagreeing with my uncle on ERA – publicly. Well, with all due respect, he has his opinions, and I also have mine. She was admired for that. I don’t know about everybody, or if there is a segment that thought she should just be quiet.

Smith: Did she take any heat back here for being so outspoken on some issues that were seen as liberal?

Burba: Probably, but I’m unaware of them. But I’m sure she did. There would have to be ultraconservative groups in the early 70s, even though the country was changing, that certainly would have frowned on her stand, number one. And secondly, that she would have even expressed it.

Smith: Right.

Burba: But I wasn’t cognizant of that.

Smith: The famous Sixty Minutes interview brought a fascinating reaction, because initially there was a ton of mail, much of it very hostile.

Burba: Oh, yes.

Smith: But in short order, the polls showed, her popularity soared.

Burba: And her comments about Susan. I watched the interview. I remember her comments about Susan.

Smith: Were you surprised about what you were seeing?
Burba: No. No, I really wasn’t. I was scared of the reaction. I thought, oh, is the country ready for this? Is the world ready for this? But, no. Again, I think of her as a very strong, courageous, forthright, truthful woman.

Smith: And clearly, with a sense of humor.

Burba: Oh, absolutely with a sense of humor; and a sense of grace, elegance. Truly the whole package.

Smith: She loved clothes.

Burba: Oh, yes.

Smith: And looked great in whatever she wore.

Burba: But I never put her – and I hesitate to say this – it wasn’t important to her who the designer was, as it has been so important to other first ladies.

Smith: Understood. Yeah.

Burba: She looked good, regardless.

Smith: But there are wonderful stories about – some of them after the White House days – some during – where she would not hesitate to sort of deflate him a little bit with humor. The story about when they were at the re-dedication of the Pantlind, and they were going on about this hotel and it was built in 1913, which was the year the president was born, and how it had gone through all of this renovation and so on. And she turns to him and said, “You could use a little renovation yourself.” That sort of thing. And he laughed.

Burba: See, yes, he shared a wonderful sense of humor. Now, I always thought he was born in 1914. Thirteen – you’re right, because my second son was born on the day that he turned 70. And that was 7/14/73, so, yes. I remember. I had to stop and think for a second.

When we would go out to Vail for the charity golf tournaments, none of us – that was their tournament – they were being very generous in having us out there, including us in things that we would not otherwise have had the opportunity to have participated in, been exposed to. And they always made a point of making sure that all the family was invited, and some things – tickets, etc., for events were already taken care of by donors or whatever – so they were both very generous in that respect. We would never have assumed by going out there that we should go to their house, and yet, that house – I have pictures I was just looking at last night before I came down here – wonderful pictures of the house in Vail where we were all together. It was when Jim was still alive. Barb was gone, but Jim was remarried and it was just…

Smith: The house that they built in Vail?

Smith: Was it?

Burba: It was beautiful, absolutely beautiful. But he worked hard for it, you know?

Smith: By all accounts, they were beloved in Vail.

Burba: I’m sure that’s true. I think their loyalty to that city, they embraced that city as – it was never Grand Rapids – it would never be Grand Rapids – but it was their summer home, eventually. He used to go out there and ski all the time, but obviously as his health became an issue…

Smith: It’s so funny, you talk about the work ethic, and of course, they all worked on Saturdays, because for the old Congressman the day was defined by answering the mail. And in Vail, he would walk to the post office.

Burba: Oh, I could see him doing that. Absolutely.

Smith: If he didn’t have the mail, he was reading the six newspapers every morning.
It’s funny, after 9/11 and the anthrax scare, the postal service stopped making Saturday deliveries and no one could make him understand why they didn’t have mail on Saturday. So they actually had members of the staff who put on these spaceman outfits, literally, and went through the mail.

Burba: Oh, that’s hysterical.
Smith: Isn’t that something?

Burba: I had no idea about that.

Smith: And that’s obviously very late in life.

Burba: Yes, exactly.

Smith: But that’s an almost ferocious work ethic.

Burba: I just thought of another story and it was when we were at the White House, but it had followed – no – it was preceding, I believe…I can’t remember if it preceded or followed the assassination attempts, or it could have been another visit. But I do remember standing in the Oval Office with him, and being so surprised at the thickness of the glass in the Oval Office. Because you’d need an armored tank and five thousand other pieces of equipment before you’d even get to the front door, and to stand there in that Oval Office and see that thickness, and I can remember remarking on it, “Why is this glass so thick?” Because it just seemed like this is part of the house and nobody is going to get up here. And I think this was preceding the assassination attempts, he made the comment, “You know, I don’t know why they have this, because if somebody really wants to get you, they will. And there’s nothing anybody can do about it.”

Smith: Of course, he’d been on the Warren Commission.

Burba: His feeling was, that the Secret Service does a wonderful job, he thought so highly of them…

Smith: They seemed to have a very special relationship.

Burba: Oh, he really did. He absolutely did. And I can also remember the staff at the White House when we were visiting. We were sitting in the solarium, my husband and I, which was called the solarium at the time. I don’t know what it is called now – this big room that was decorated in yellow.

Smith: Mrs. Coolidge called it her sky parlor.
Burba: Beautiful view. And somebody came in and asked us if we wanted something to drink. I said, “Oh, yeah. I’d love a Coke,” and I don’t remember what my husband said. The next thing we know, somebody came up and they had this elaborate silver tray and the Coke and the flower. Both of us were so embarrassed, we just wanted to shrink into a chair. Well, when we got done, we took the tray back to the kitchen and the people downstairs said, “Ah! You don’t have to do that.” And I just looked at them and said, “You know, I am so embarrassed that you brought this to us. We’re perfectly capable of coming down. If you tell us where – we’ll just go get.” “Oh, well…”

And see, I think that was the relationship – they didn’t think of them as staff. They didn’t think of the Secret Service, my impression is, they didn’t think of the Secret Service – it was an extended part of their family.

Smith: Unlike some other presidents who shall remain nameless…at Christmas time, they made absolutely certain not to have events going on, so the agents could spend…

Burba: Could be with their families.

Smith: Exactly.

Burba: It goes right back to their roots, goes back to family, and I think that truly was the most important thing.

Smith: Can you describe, briefly, the dynamic with the four brothers?

Burba: Oh, golly. I think all three brothers, idolized their older brother. But there was eleven years difference between my father and my Uncle Jerry. There had to have been close to sixteen or fifteen years difference between my Uncle Jim and my Uncle Jerry. And I don’t know about my Uncle Tom – maybe six, but I’m guessing. So their growing up years, by the time they were growing up, certainly my father and my Uncle Jim grew up in a house directly across the street from where I live. That’s where they grew up. Jerry was already at law school, he might have even been in the Navy at that time. So he was only coming home – quick visits coming home. So as far as growing up, I don’t know. I know that they were a close family, and I know that they idolized their older brother. But there was a real sense – as I got older and long after Jerry left the White House – I had a real sense that each one of those brothers respected the profession that each of them had chosen. And it wouldn’t occur to any of them to question the other’s decisions relating to their business or chosen field.

Smith: Mrs. Eisenhower was asked a perfectly understandable question – you must be very proud of your son – and she said, “Which one? All of my sons I’m proud of.”

Burba: I really think there certainly would be a little bit more sense of pride if your son managed to be president of the United States, but I think that would have been a comment made by both my grandparents. There was no separation there. I don’t think Jerry was ever treated differently – ever.

Smith: Was it Tom who went into politics?

Burba: For a short time. I believe he was a lobbyist in Lansing. My world was, what’s happening this weekend, where’s the dance? That kind of thing. But certainly I recall him being in Lansing, as a lobbyist, I remember when he was defeated when he ran again for something, but I couldn’t tell you what it was.

Smith: And then what was his career path?

Burba: After that, I don’t know what my Uncle Tom did because they moved soon after that, from EGR and they moved to South Carolina – an island – I’m trying to think of the name of it and I can’t now. And I think he was retired, basically. I think he still did, I believe I’m correct, that he still did reserve duty with the Navy, to some extent. But then he retired.

Smith: And your Uncle Jim?

Burba: Well, Uncle Jim was the optometrist, and he really worked until the Parkinson’s didn’t allow him to work anymore. But certainly that was what he did. And I think about this, when Jerry was running, it’s interesting because Jerry asked all three of his brothers to campaign for him, and they’d always remained in the background. When the whole thing was going on with Nixon, …no comment, no comment, no comment…I can remember phone calls coming into the house from reporters offering my father money and he turned it down. And I remember the amount, and I remember thinking, “Are you crazy?” Because it was a lot of money back then. Absolutely no comment. Just nothing.

Smith: What were they after?

Burba: Any information. Any stories, anything. Back then they were relentless. When Jerry was president, my dad used to have to fly a lot for business, and he, at that time, you could do this, he would fly under an assumed name.

Smith: Really?

Burba: Yes, because he didn’t want anybody making the connection. He didn’t want to be asked, and yet when Jerry ran for the office, he asked every single one of his brothers to campaign for him – outside this state – to go to other states, individually, and with him. And they all – they did it in a second. So that showed me, or illustrates to me how much respect they had for him, how much they believed in him, and how much they wanted him to win.

Smith: Were they at the convention?

Burba: My father was at Kansas City – that was ’76. My mother and dad, Barb and Jim, I believe they all were there. I’m not sure – I think maybe Barb was still alive then, so I think they were all there.

Smith: Was there resentment, locally, over their decision to move to California?

Burba: Well, again, none that I would hear. Was it said behind our backs? Perhaps, probably. I certainly didn’t blame him, for health reasons. For his health, for her health, anymore than I blame my father for leaving for six months. As he said, “I didn’t work for sixty years to spend another miserable winter in Michigan.” And they are miserable, and they’ve always been miserable. They are just getting longer. So, I’m sure there were some people, but nobody would ever say that to me, directly.
Smith: He certainly came back often.

Burba: This was his home.

Smith: Yeah.

Burba: Truly.

Smith: And putting this place here - obviously your dad had a huge role in the creation of this institution.

Burba: Yeah, he turned to my dad a lot during that time, as far as ideas. I have correspondence that Dad’s given me. It was when Jordan Shepherd was very involved in designing and before the ground was even broken. Jerry was busy, and so if there were things that needed taken care of here, he would ask Dad. To me, there would have been greater resentment had this not been here. No question. But I don’t think it ever would have occurred to him for it to be anywhere else. Again, I just go back to – I’m being repetitive, but it’s nothing you probably haven’t heard before – his roots went so deep to this city and to the people. I think it was also to his parents. I just don’t think it ever occurred to him to have it anywhere else.

Smith: Remember, on election morning, ’76, when they dedicated that mural out at the airport, clearly it was the memory of his parents that caused him to choke up.

Burba: Absolutely. I have one of those in my dining room, and because the picture of the four brothers with the pony – I have that as a photo. So the first time I saw that in that mural was – wow. And then, selfishly, I thought, someday my children, my grandchildren, are going to come through this airport and they’re not only going to see their grandfather, they are going to see their grandfather’s brother. It was surreal.

Smith: When he came back, I understand if there was time, he would get together with the family.
Burba: Absolutely. He and dad would go play golf at Kent. Often times it was usually an in and out trip. A day and a night and then gone. But we’d have dinner together when he came in, even in the later years, and there was always one of the kids traveling with him when he would come. That was the one condition that Betty had set up. It was after Philadelphia – if you are going to be traveling now, one of the kids is going to go with you. We would still see them. We would see them for dinner and it was great – it was wonderful. I appreciated the fact that we would do that because a lot of those trips earlier on, every single minute of his day was spoken for. You didn’t want to intrude, so if something was arranged, it was because he wanted it. Again, it was at his request, then we were all grateful.

Smith: It must have been very special – the ninetieth birthday celebration.

Burba: Oh yes. That was very, very emotional.

Smith: Did you have a sense that this might be his last trip back?

Burba: Oh, absolutely, health-wise. Primarily because the family, my father, we were privy to more information that Jerry and Betty’s children were sharing with my dad, than anybody else. Maybe some close people later on, but I knew the Thanksgiving before he died. That Thanksgiving I can remember my cousin calling my father down in Florida and saying, “You know, Uncle Dick, I don’t think he’s going to make it until Christmas, and I want you to be able to talk to him.” So, when he was here for his ninetieth, his health was starting to fail a little, I didn’t think he’d be back for his ninety-fifth, which is what he talked about.

Smith: Did he?

Burba: Yeah. I really didn’t think so. But, having said that, ninety was good.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Burba: It had to have been – he died December 26 – I want to say probably, I’d have to go back and look on my calendars – if not the preceding summer, the summer before that, when he came into town. Whenever the last time was he came into town, was when I saw him. Because when he came into town for museum business or something, to meet with Marty, to see Dad, and then we would have dinner out at Kent. In fact, definitely that was the last time.

Smith: Do you wonder if he ever – I know that she did at one point say to Marty…she wanted to see where they were going to buried. She said, “I want to see where people are going to dance on my grave.” But you wonder whether he ever walked out there.

Burba: If I had to guess, I’d say yes. A guess, purely a guess. Yes, I think his eye for detail – okay I just want to make sure that this is all taken care of – it looks good – and that would have been enough.

Smith: It’s such a beautiful spot.

Burba: It’s gorgeous.

Smith: It’s interesting – you may have heard this. When Presidents Clinton and Bush ’43 came by, each had the same reaction, which was: this is Jerry Ford. Calm in the middle of the city.

Burba: Absolutely. It’s extraordinary. I’ve been down there many times. Even during the winter time, I’ll drive down because it’s so close. And that’s the only place I go. I don’t necessarily come in here, into the museum, but I’ll go there. It’s almost – I’m here, they’re not – my cousins are not. So if it is a special time, I feel like it is something I can do. Nobody knows who I am when I’m down there.

Smith: Do you remember how you learned of his death?

Burba: Oh, yes, very distinctly. I was in Atlanta, at our son’s house for Christmas and my husband drove down, and I flew down. My husband left, early, early, early, like 3:00 a.m. on December 26th to drive back. I slept in because I wasn’t leaving until the 27th. I came out of the bedroom and I have two little granddaughters - at that time, four and two, three and one? I can’t remember. But I came out of the bedroom and they had all of these gates up. Adults had to go over the gates. But I noticed right away that the TV was on, and my son never had that particular TV on. This was eight o’clock in the morning. I came around the corner and I didn’t look at it, I just saw that it was on, but the girls were right there, so there was my attention. And he said, “Mom,” and I said, “Yes?” And he said, “There was a message on my cell phone last night from Grandma.” He said, “Uncle Jerry died this morning.”

I was not surprised, but I just felt such a sense of loss. It was just staggering and I couldn’t really wrap my head around it at the time, and I didn’t want the girls to see my cry. So I turned to my son and I said, “I’m just going into the bedroom for a minute. Just tell the girls I have to wash my hands or something.” And as I went to put my leg over gate, and they have hardwood floors, I wasn’t paying close enough attention, and I fell and broke the bone in my arm. And so, at the funeral, nobody could see that I had my arm in a sling, I had a big black furry thing strung over it because I didn’t want anybody to ask and I didn’t want to draw attention to it, and it was a hairline fracture.

But flying home the next day was not easy because Scott said, “Mom, do you want to go to the hospital here?” I said, “No, I can’t do that. I’ve just got to get ready, my flight leaves tomorrow.” He said, “Well, do you want to go home now?” I said, “Nothing that I can do now,” but then I started checking my cell phone and there were things that I had to do here, working with Chip Emery, as soon as I got back.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction, local and beyond?

Burba: The numbers were staggering to me. And the calmness, the quiet, the orderliness without being told. I expected this city to show its respects, but when people who were interviewed who had driven from out east, or from Ohio, I was stunned. Absolutely stunned. And I thought what comfort to the family - my aunt and my cousins.

Smith: I was with ABC early in the week and we’d been told don’t be surprised if you see Mrs. Ford in a wheelchair. And, of course, we never did until the very end, and even then, she insisted on walking all that way and later on someone remarked on that to her. And she said, “Well, that’s what my husband would have wanted.”

Burba: I worried about my father, too, because it was very difficult for him because he had just had surgery at Thanksgiving. And the cane, and standing out in that cold, cold air – and yet the day of the funeral here in Grand Rapids, in January, to have those temperatures and no snow – somebody was talking to somebody, because there could have been accidents and cars ending up in snow drifts and older people slipping on steps. It would have been a nightmare traffic-wise. Truly, I don’t remember a day in January before or since, where we haven’t been knee high to a tall Indian in snow.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: What were you doing before the Fords came into your lives? That’s also part of the story of the creation and evolution of Vail, which is an interesting story in and of itself.

Luc Meyer: Well, in 1970 at Thanksgiving, we came and opened a restaurant called the Left Bank Restaurant, which became the favorite restaurant of President Ford. And that’s how we started in Vail.

Smith: This is before he’s president?

Luc Meyer: Yes.

Smith: He was Minority Leader and then vice president. So he was coming to your restaurant…

Luc Meyer: As Minority Leader, as vice president, and as president.

Liz Meyer: When he was a congressman, he would come to the restaurant because he lived in Vail right across the street at The Lodge and it was very convenient for him. I don’t know how he heard about us. I didn’t know who he was. I was running the dining room. I remember specifically one occasion - and it was probably the occasion when – oh my gosh, this man is in American government. He’s quite important. And that was the first knowledge. He used to come with one or two of the children who were probably teenagers at that time, and that was before we remodeled the restaurant. And then things changed after that when we remodeled in 1978.

Smith: So now, they had a condo at The Lodge. Is that right? And what else was there in Vail at that point? It was much, much smaller than it is today.

Luc Meyer: Sure. Vail was basically Gore Creek Drive and Bridge Street, which went up to the gondola and Chair I.
Smith: One lift?

Luc Meyer: No, but that was the main lift. And the river was pretty much a border. Across from the river there was very little when we came. We came in 1970, so Vail was a fraction, of course there was no Lion’s Head. There was very little in Vail. We lived in Sandstone 70, which was across the highway. The highway was already a highway at that time. But when you looked across, there was nothing.

Smith: Was it harder to get to Vail then, as well?

Luc Meyer: Well, yeah. Because you had to go over the Pass on US 6. You didn’t have the highway. So it was only a two-lane road and that could be very tricky. In the summer it was alright, but in the winter with snow and the ice and trucks and everything, it was quite a dangerous road.

Liz Meyer: See, between Denver and here, the highway started at East Vail, i.e I70, and ended at the Minturn exit. So it was only a small stretch, and it was probably four or five miles or something. And then you went over Vail Pass. We lived in a house right on U.S. 6, and I’ll tell you, every time a truck came by I thought he was going to hit the house. And then all the way to Denver, it used to take us two and a half hours to Denver and three hours to the airport.

Smith: I would think that one of the things that you would have to take into consideration is the possibility of forest fires. Has that ever been a problem?

Luc Meyer: No, only recently with the pine beetle. The danger of forest fire now has only been a recent occurrence because of the pine beetle. Before this, our forest was green; plus, don’t forget, when you are thirty years or thirty-five years old, you don’t think of these things – you have your business, family, children, you have other priorities.

Smith: I’m thinking of their condo at The Lodge. That must have been awfully small. If the whole family came out, for example, for Christmas, it must have been pretty congested.

Luc Meyer: Well, I don’t know. We never actually saw the condominium physically.
Smith: And is that building still there?

Luc Meyer: Oh, yeah.

Liz Meyer: Exactly the same as it was. I’m sure it’s been remodeled by each owner.

Smith: Tell me, at your restaurant, what were his preferences? What did he like?

Luc Meyer: Liver and trout. In 1970, being a Frenchman and a chef, and coming to Vail, I was kind of an entrepreneur in many, many things as far as food is concerned. You have to realize, in 1970, in Colorado, you couldn’t find anything fresh. People didn’t know what a leek was. People didn’t know what tarragon and chervil were fresh herbs in general. You couldn’t find a fresh chicken. For me, having been trained in some of the finest restaurants in France, when I came here, I had to fight and finally get, these things for me. You had to have fresh fish, you have to start getting us access to fresh herbs to cook. There were a lot of things.

But we came here; we were immigrants – first generation – we were legal, by the way. And we came here; we knew very few people in Vail, but we just had a child. We were living before in the Virgin Islands, and we didn’t want to stay there because of the future for our children’s education and everything. We felt it was not what we wanted. We always loved the mountains because of our backgrounds. And we came to Vail, and it was the place where we wanted to be.

I had never any doubt that I would be successful. I had to start with little, we didn’t have very much money, you know? As long as we are living in Vail, the kids – we had this vision that that’s where we wanted to be. That’s where we felt happy.

Smith: Did you feel you were in on the ground floor of something that would, over time, become much more than it was?

Luc Meyer: Oh yes. Well, of course. But we never realized how far we would go. When we started working in the first four years, we worked seven days a week. That’s how hard it was just to survive. But we loved Vail, we loved the customers. In the early days there was another spirit in Vail. We met a lot very famous people – one of them, of course, was President Ford. And it was different. Now, it’s not the same. The valley has grown so much, you have Beaver Creek, you have “down valley.”

Smith: President Ford was a workaholic. He had an incredible work ethic and he also had great, great respect for self-made people. Having been through the Depression himself. I’m sure he loved your food, but I suspect he also admired your example as well. What you had created and the spirit that you brought with you to this place.

Liz Meyer: Well, I think at the beginning, suddenly this man, this congressman, became vice president. We were at a friend’s house in Denver when that whole business happened, and I was saying, “Oh my gosh, this is one of our customers,” because I really didn’t know him. Being an old-fashioned European, I called everybody by their title. I never called them by their first name until I was told to. And so, he was just this customer. And then he became vice president, and then suddenly he became president. Wow. That was a big thing in our lives. I think that was about 1975?

Smith: August of ’74.

Liz Meyer: ’74, okay. And then ’76 I believe, he started the golf tournament.

Smith: In ’76 the golf tournament.

Luc Meyer: In ’75 he came as president in the summer to Vail.

Liz Meyer: That’s right.

Luc Meyer: And then the first time he came to our restaurant as president, at that time Bob Barrett was his assistant.

Liz Meyer: His ADC.

Luc Meyer: ADC.

Smith: And a bit of a character.

Luc Meyer: That’s right. I believe it was in July and I was in my kitchen preparing for the night. I was alone and it was about maybe one o’clock, the phone rang. On the house phone this voice said, “I’m Bob Barrett, can you open up, we’d like to talk to you?” So I went in the front and opened and later Bob became a friend.
He said, “Well, the President would like to have dinner tonight at your restaurant.” So, “Oh, yes.” I asked questions and everything, and then left. I called Liz and said, “Guess what? The President is coming tonight!” So it was very, very exciting, of course.

Liz Meyer: So I went into the garden and picked flowers. Our restaurant was very personal. I was there all the time in front and Luc was always there in the back, and he would come into the dining room. So I always had flowers on the table from the garden, not bought flowers. And also, I always placed him in the room, and this was with the guidance of the Secret Service of which we got to know Joel Glenn and Dale Wunderlich became personal friends as well.
And they were in charge of things with him there. And so with their guidance, I put him on a certain table in a curtained part of the room which was often by the window because I’m not sure if they checked - if they had people outside across the stream looking there or what. He would have to walk all the way through the room, but they felt that a corner place would be better for him.
Then, what I did, I put only customers I knew in the vicinity of his table.

Luc Meyer: Without telling them.

Liz Meyer: Oh, yeah.

Luc Meyer: Privacy was very important.

Liz Meyer: Because I felt they would be discrete, which, of course, they were.

Luc Meyer: It was our life, don’t forget. We came as immigrants, I couldn’t speak any English. In 1975, we were five years in business, we had two small children.
At that time Vail was struggling. President Ford put Vail on the map, especially for the summer.

Smith: Because at that point, I assume, everyone thought of it exclusively as a winter resort.

Luc Meyer: That’s right. The summers were very hard. We were working for very, very little. President Ford came in 1975 as president, and then in ’76 there was the golf tournament and all that exploded. The whole experience, not only because of financial said of the benefit from it, but just the whole exchange for me - as a person who came to this country, couldn’t speak English, brought a wife with me, had two children who are Americans.

And now I’m an American myself because of President Ford, because when he needed to be re-elected he told me every vote would count. And I went to Pepi Gramshammer, who is a person you are probably going to meet, or you’ve met, and he said, “Everybody counts.” And we ran and got our citizenships so we could vote. And yet the President didn’t make it. So that was part of the history of our relationship with President Ford. And then you know, of course, he came with Kissinger.

A little funny story you might want to know: in 1970 we opened the restaurant; we were a young couple, we had a child, we had no money. I worked for somebody else, and we made good money. We had saved a little money, but we did not have credit cards. We came from the Virgin Islands. We didn’t have credit cards, we didn’t have a bank account. So we came here and when I wanted to open the Left Bank, of course, I went to the bank, to the credit card company to try to get the credit card. Who was I? I didn’t have credit and they wouldn’t allow me to take a credit card.

So in 1975, when President Ford came, I was on national TV and all this, suddenly American Express, MasterCard, Visa came, and said, well, you should take credit cards. And I said, “Well, for the five years I survived without you. Now I will never take credit cards.” And in the thirty-six years we have been in business, we’ve never took credit cards because of that.

Smith: That’s a great story.

Luc Meyer: And President Ford, he had a charge account at the left Bank. We always felt, again, because of values coming from Europe, you know, we always felt the most elegant way to come to a restaurant is to be able to sit down and bring your guests, and never see a bill on your table. You don’t have to pull out the credit card or cash or check – nothing.
Smith: That brings to mind - when the World Forums were here. And this kind of motley group of people. Politically you wouldn’t think of them as being kindred spirits. Jim Callaghan, who was a kind of an old line Socialist, and Helmut Schmidt who was certainly to the left of Ford, but then of course, Giscard, who for all his many fine qualities, is not exactly a hail fellow, well met. He’s rather a lofty figure. And yet they clearly all hit it off. And I’m wondering – did he ever bring Giscard to your restaurant?

Liz Meyer: Yes.

Luc Meyer: Of course. We had all these people.

Liz Meyer: We have a wonderful guestbook, which we started. Gerald Ford was one of the early ones. That’s about the time when we started it. He brought Jackie Gleason and Bob Hope and those people, because of the Ford Tournament. And I remember Jackie Gleason didn’t even turn a page of the book, he just opened the cover and just signed it right on the inside cover.

Smith: He was the Great One.

Liz Meyer: It’s amazing, his signature. But then he brought the World Forum leaders into the restaurant and I have a page in our guest book with Callaghan and Giscard and Pierre Trudeau, and Schmidt. Who else was there? But I have their signatures. Of, yes, Frazier, he was there. And I remember, because I was raised in Zimbabwe, and Mr. Callaghan was joking with me saying, “Hello, Miss Zimbabwe.” I don’t know how he found out.

Smith: Did they surprise you at all – any of them? Their personalities or temperaments?

Luc Meyer: I, as a Frenchman, with other French people in the valley organized a party for Giscard d’Estaing. So I provided the food and it was at Fitzhugh Scott’s house, who was an old time Vailite. The house was right on Mill Creek Circle, next to the house where President Ford used to stay when he was President. And the interesting story about Giscard d’Estaing is this: I was born in 1942 in the town of Clermont Ferrand. Below us lived a family which was Giscard’s parents. Now he must have been about fifteen years older than me, I would guess. My older brother, just by coincidence, was here that summer when we had this party. I told my brother Christian, who was here with his wife and children that they had to come. So he came, and we, as a family, came to Giscard and introduced ourselves and said, “Do you remember the Alsatian family (because we were refugees) who lived above you in Clermont Ferrand?” He said, “Sure.” We said, “That was us.” The funny story is that Giscard d’Estaing has a bald head, he has no hair. Well, when I was a tiny little boy, in the summer, because we lived there until 1945, my mother would put me on the balcony – there was a tiny little balcony. And one day I was doing what was natural for a little boy to do, but Giscard was walking under the balcony. And my mother, of course, was terribly apologetic. But this story stayed in the family. So we reminded him of that and he was wonderful.

Smith: Was he?

Luc Meyer: Yeah, he had a good day. His wife is not that approachable. He has a sense of humor and he’s open.

Smith: By all accounts, he really enjoyed himself here.

Luc Meyer: Yes, he loved it.

Liz Meyer: And Callaghan, he was very, very relaxed with me, I suppose both being English.

Luc Meyer: So Giscard used to come after, and used to come privately to the Left Bank, because when the Ford Forum moved here, then it got diluted. Well, less people from the community were asked to host one night this, so we need to do catering. But then they had the night off and I remember Giscard used to come to the Left Bank.

Smith: And you obviously got to know Mrs. Ford.

Luc Meyer: Oh, of course.

Liz Meyer: Oh, yes.

Smith: Tell us about her.
Liz Meyer: Well, you know, she started the Betty Ford Alpine Gardens with Helen Fritch. And I don’t know if you are interviewing them as well, they own the Sitzmark Lodge, in which the restaurant is located. And they are still there. Helen was an avid gardener, and I would go to her for advice all the time. I don’t know how the two of them met, but Betty Ford and Helen were the founders of this garden. And I’ve always believed in it because it is such a unique thing at this altitude. And of course, it’s taken a long time to take flight. But what Betty has done also, in her own little way for the community here is tremendous. And she is so loved, and she’s not a walkover, I mean, I knew where my place was, but in a gentle way, as far as running the restaurant. He was a little more relaxed, I think, and I think that’s normal because of his position in life. And she’s the wife and she always has to sort of be in the background.

Smith: Interesting observation.

Liz Meyer: Yeah, but I felt she was – I have a lot of respect for her.

Luc Meyer: You see, don’t forget: we knew her when she had her problem with drinking.

Liz Meyer: About food: Luc mentioned about the liver and the trout – he [Ford] loved desserts, as well.

Smith: He did have a sweet tooth.

Liz Meyer: He had a sweet tooth – most definitely. And being from Michigan, and we being foreigners here, we are learning as we go along about American stuff. And then we learned that the blueberries come from Michigan. So Luc would get blueberries and he would make a blueberry tart for him. He would make this torte tart for him that day and present it to him at the table and Luc would serve it up. And we did some other desserts.

Luc used to bicycle to work in the summer, and he was bicycling and he was thinking – he thinks so much about food, he thinks about food and wine just about all the time. And he’s thinking there must be a dessert I can do. I love to eat sour cream. He just eats it by the spoonful. So he figured out a recipe, which is unique. Most chefs, they never invent anything. They get an idea from someone and they change it around. In this case – I give him credit for really inventing something. He made this ice cream with sour cream and cream and lemon zest. And then he decided that with the lemon zest it was very nice, it wasn’t sweet, but it wasn’t sour, but then to put a sauce. So he did a raspberry sauce, a fresh raspberry sauce on top. Then we couldn’t get a name for it. We had to call it something. The Left Bank Special didn’t make it. So President Ford came to dinner and Mrs. Ford was not there because I think it was Susan who was having her first baby. No, the first child was from one of the sons – I think it was Sara. And the second child was Tyne.

Smith: That’s right.

Liz Meyer: So, Mrs. Ford was away, and we presented him with this ice cream and we said, “Mr. President, we have a new creation of Luc’s, we’d love you to try it.
You’re the first to try this ice cream. But we don’t have a name for it. We thought of maybe Red and White Mountain.” And he said, “You know, Betty’s not here because Susan has just had her baby, Tyne.” He said, “You know, I have two granddaughters – Sarah and Tyne.” And I said, “That’s it.
We’re going to call the ice cream Sarah Tyne ice cream.” And, until this day, people come to the restaurant and ask – Jean Michel, our chef who has now taken over the restaurant since we sold it to him has to make Sarah Tyne ice cream.

Smith: That’s a wonderful story.

Liz Meyer: And it’s a wonderful ice cream.

Luc Meyer: Going back to Mrs. Ford, I would really like to say this: we have known that she had a problem with alcohol. And at that time, of course, she would drink.
But she would hardly eat. It was a little frustrating for me. I was always trying to find out what she liked to present her. And she would have literally one bite, and not eat the rest. And I was always feeling, oh maybe I didn’t do it right, maybe she didn’t enjoy it. And it was nothing to do with it.

Smith: Is that a function of the drinking, that it dulls the appetite?

Luc Meyer: Well, not only dulls it, you don’t have any appetite. I remember one day she wanted sole – she thought she would eat sole. So I ordered some fresh sole and I made the fillet – she liked it with the cream sauce, with the grapes and everything. Again, she ate just one. And then we saw the evolution of her going off and then her coming back, because, you know, President Ford did come every year for his birthday, which was the 14th of July, that I remember because it’s Bastille Day in France. Until the year before he died, he was still in the restaurant, coming on the 14th of July. And many years we were invited to his party, but running a restaurant, sometimes we couldn’t go there. But anyway, we saw the evolution and then later on, when Mrs. Ford got over her problem, she became a regular eater again. She would eat normally, and it was wonderful because President Ford enjoyed his cocktail, and his wine with dinner. But after this he quit drinking just to support Mrs. Ford. I as a wine lover I think this is a tremendous achievement, to have this kind of discipline to stop something you like to do.

Smith: And I imagine they probably were a good influence on other people’s lives. Clearly, she had an enormous impact.

Liz Meyer: Oh, yes, because she has the Betty Ford Center in California. I mean, it is tremendous what that place is doing for people. It’s like the garden, which is a happy thing, it’s a whole different thing.

Luc Meyer: You should see the garden.

Smith: We saw it yesterday.

Luc Meyer: Oh you did?

Smith: Yeah, it’s beautiful, and larger than I had pictured it. And of course, the proximity to the Amphitheater, which is very impressive.

Luc Meyer: We’re going tonight, for Yo Yo Ma

Smith: Oh wonderful. He was a classmate of mine at Harvard. Class of 1975.

Liz Meyer: I just read that yesterday.

Luc Meyer: Yeah, you told me. You said he went to Harvard.

Smith: Yeah, same year. We just had our 35th reunion.
Luc Meyer: You talk about the Fords. We have so many wonderful souvenirs, because first he came with a lot of very important people to the restaurant. He created an energy in this town. When he came people would line up. And we were very discrete. We never were the kind of restaurateur who wanted to have their picture taken. All the pictures we had, he had them taken of us.

And then when he came at Christmas, of course, it was a gathering of old friends and we would do a lot of the catering. So at the Kindel’s house at Christmas, we would do his Christmas party. So here I had a restaurant – you can believe how busy we are – 24th of December. And here a house in Vail I would say ten minutes away, there would be his dinner party. Well, I had to cook the goose for Christmas. Because I would do a traditional French Christmas dinner with the goose and the chestnuts, and all this. And I will have to go (because we will have two seatings) in between the seatings at The Left Bank and take the goose and everything to the house. Then the Secret Service were there saying, “Hey, where you going?” I would say, “Don’t wait – the goose is getting cold.” And I remember once this guy blocking the steps going up to the back door to this kitchen, and I handed him a goose and I said, “Here, do something.” And the guy grabbed the goose and said, “Wait a moment” and I said “Don’t worry about it.” So it wasn’t Washington – Vail is Vail.

Smith: Now, had they built the house?

Luc Meyer: Oh no.

Liz Meyer: They were in Dick Bass’s house on Mill Creek Circle. And the reason that the Secret Service chose that house – there was only one way in and one way out. It was a circle.

Luc Meyer: Where we did the Christmas party was not at that house. That was at Ted Kindel’s house at the time. So anyway, I would go in the kitchen. I had my staff already there. I had the goose and I would put it on a nice silver tray and prepare it. Then I would open the door and I would come and present it to Mr. President and Mrs. Ford. Go back in the kitchen and start slicing. And in the meantime, (because I’m a working chef, I’m not a celebrity chef) in the restaurant dining room, while losing the chef at the second seating, she (Liz) had to go and say to the people, “Excuse me, can there be a little delay in your food, Luc had to deliver the goose to the President.” And everybody was just so happy.

Smith: My sense was that they were very visible in this community and very hands on in their involvement.

Luc Meyer: Of course, they would do the lights at Christmas. They would do so many things, you know? They would be involved in so many charity events, the golfing.

Smith: I have to ask you, because we know he was a real fiscal conservative. And there is something of a debate over what kind of tipper he was.

Liz Meyer: I think he was nothing extraordinary that I would say, “Oh what a cheap president we have.” No, not at all.

Luc Meyer: He was twenty percent, but he was not a big spender. He loved liver. Well, liver was not an expensive item on the menu. Or trout.

Liz Meyer: He didn’t have expensive wines or anything like that. He was very fair on that.

Smith: I wonder, as he got older, whether the diet changed at all I had just a couple of occasions to eat with him, and there was a lot of fish – the kinds of healthy things that you would associate with an older person.

Liz Meyer: He had a sweet tooth. Let me add a little story. Well, the President of the United States comes to my restaurant; I’m not going to buy him a drink, right? I mean, we have a little more class than this. You cannot buy him something – if I presented him a new dessert, I could make it complimentary. But, one thing I did was, years ago before he became president, my mother used to make the most wonderful jam in the summer. Now, when you are in Europe, in France, and in the summer when it is the season of the blueberry, we would go collect this fruit in the wild and Mother would make jam. Well, when my mother got too old to make jam, one day she sent me a beautiful copper pot in which she made jam. So here I got this copper pot and I said, “Well, that’s my memory of my youth, making jam. So I’m going to make jam.”

Now, Colorado is famous for apricots this week, in two weeks from now, it’s going to start peaches. These are the two fruits that Colorado is very famous for. So what I did was to start making apricot and peach jam with the local fruit that I bought from the local market and from local people. Well, when President Ford came, what I would do is take a little pack and put two little jars of my jam as a little present. That’s personal to give, something that I made that I sent to him. Well, first time I did, the next time he came for dinner he said, “Hum, may I have these wonderful jams of yours.” So I gave him one and of course, it became a custom.

And then one day he came, and I don’t know why, I was joking and I said, “Mr. President, I will make you all the jam, but you will have to bring back the jars because I recycle them.” And do you know that from that day, every time he would come for dinner, Secret Service would bring me the empty jar of jam. And the 14th of July when I did not have time to see him I would make a box of jam and I would drive it all the way from here to Beaver Creek, and stop by, “For the President.” So I would provide him with his jam for the rest of his life, so I’m very proud of that.

Liz Meyer: I have another little story about him, too. We met a man, who is a book publisher, and he used to publish cookbooks – Dining Out in Los Angeles, Dining Out..., and he was doing a cookbook for a chef in Aspen and this was in about ’79-’80, somewhere around then – the late ‘70s. So Elliott came here and he told us about these things, and he said, “I think you should write a cookbook.” And Luc was saying, “I don’t know – my English is so bad I can’t do anything like that.” He said, “No, I can’t possibly do something like that.”

Luc Meyer: My reaction was more that so many cookbooks were being published. He said, “You have the most important person in this world in your restaurant who comes on a regular basis. What about if President Ford would write a foreword to your cookbook?” And I looked at him and I said, “What a presumption to think that I can ask the President of the United States to write a foreword!” He said, “Have you thought about it? Look, it would cost you just a stamp.” So he came that night for dinner and he said, “Just think about what a stamp would cost you, just write a letter.” So, I wrote a letter and less than a month later I had the foreword of my cookbook, but I hadn’t written the cookbook. So here I had the foreword and had to write the book. So I called this Elliott guy who is the publisher and I said, “I have a foreword.” He said, “I will help you.” Because he has special people who can help. So we went through the process in the off season, writing recipes and everything. That was the worst time we had together because it…

Liz Meyer: Our marriage was very fragile.

Luc Meyer: It was so hard because I can cook, I can make you a hollandaise in five minutes, but to put it down on paper and in the right order and in ounces – when I’m used to grams and everything.

Liz Meyer: Then we had to think of a title. And so with the collaboration of this man, Elliott, he said you get so many famous people in this restaurant – and we had showed him that time our guestbook – he said, “Let’s call it the Left Bank Celebrity Cookbook.” And so we took a page of a celebrity…

Luc Meyer: Like President Ford.

Liz Meyer: Like Ford.

Luc Meyer: And what I served him – so it was a cookbook of recipes, but all with menus. So we would make a menu for every celebrity who came. But there was always a story of what happened when this celebrity came, when Robert Redford came, what happened with him, President Ford or Bob Hope.

Liz Meyer: Andy Warhol.

Luc Meyer: Andy Warhol.

Liz Meyer: That was first published in ’82. We had three printings. Then, the second one, we added another chapter. And, you see, a chapter consisted of a menu. So it might be six courses or something, just to make it a little different. Instead of doing a cookbook where you have all appetizers here and all fish here – so it was all jumbled up and you could find everything. And then he did a Christmas in Vail, for the Christmas that he did for President Ford at the private house where he was staying.

Luc Meyer: And the profit of this book we gave to the Betty Ford Alpine Garden.

Smith: That’s wonderful.

Luc Meyer: It was so wonderful to do it. It was not for the purpose of making money. It was more something for me a challenge, of course, publishing a book. And it was just something new, something exciting. In the old time we did so much, without us thinking of the bottom line, you know. That was the wonderful spirit of cooking, of wanting to grow, my herbs in my back garden so I could bring zucchini flowers, all the chive flowers and fresh chives and this kind of thing. Every morning you would see me on my bike – with my taragon and chives and some basil and thyme and everything in my basket that I just picked from the garden to cook. Because I’m an artist. Cooking is my life, I’ve been cooking for fifty years.

When President Ford died, we went to Rancho Mirage. We were invited to his private wake. We knew a lot of people from Vail, so we went there with a lot of different people. But when we got the invitation to go to the official funeral in Washington, I said, “What do I belong with these thousands of people who have come from around the country, the world. What have we done? Yes, he’s been a customer. He has never eaten for free in my restaurant because that’s one thing that President Ford would have never accepted.” He had his free jam, he never had a free meal in my restaurant.

Smith: What was the reaction in Vail, generally when he passed away?

Luc Meyer: Well, you know, President Ford was so close to all of us. He had done so much, but in a fatherly way, that for us, missing him, not seeing him, not seeing Mrs. Ford, and remembering all that he did for us – now our generation remembers this. A lot of the younger people you see today in Vail don’t realize what President Ford has done for us. It was all about his position as president. That’s why I think he liked Vail so much, because he mixed with people like us. We never talked politics. We never asked for any favors from President Ford.
Smith: And I’m told one of the things that they both really enjoyed about this place was that basically, people would leave them alone. People did not bother them for autographs and pictures – you know, the whole celebrity thing.

Luc Meyer: That’s right. Not at all.

Liz Meyer: Well, you know, he would have to walk through the restaurant, and this was even after he was no longer the president. And I would see them get up with a pen and so on, and I’d say, “Excuse me, do you want President Ford’s signature? I will get it for you.” And so when he walked by in the restaurant – of course, everybody clapped.

Luc Meyer: You have to see like Christmas, now. You figure out our restaurant – a hundred people seated, it’s full. And suddenly you are eating there and we wouldn’t tell anybody – now, people knew that President Ford was in town, of course. But suddenly you look and you see the President of the United States walking in. He would come in, people would stop eating. And he would go, and very graciously say hello because he knew so many people, you know. And then he would sit down and have his dinner. But it was so elegant. Today I open the New York Times and I saw President Obama having a hamburger with the president of Russia. I think this is wonderful. This could not happen in Russia. See what I mean? So that was the spirit that President Ford just loved.

Smith: Did you ever see them with the grandchildren?

Luc Meyer: Oh, yeah. At his birthday.

Liz Meyer: At his house. But you know, when they would come here, I think it was much more of a private time. I think Sheika is the only one that’s really that close. I mean, she was just out in California for Betty’s birthday and so on. I’ve never called her Betty. I’ve always called her Mrs. Ford. And just getting back to the reaction of when he died. For me, personally, it was an emptiness in the future. There was a sort of void. Even though he was in California and he didn’t come here quite so much in the last year maybe, we always think about him, because Vail is what it is because of him. And I think if he saw Vail now, with those big buildings back there which you have not seen, he would probably be a little sad. Because when he started off in the Lodge at Vail, which is still the same. But, I mean, all these other places that have changed.

Luc Meyer:  Main Street is still the same.

Smith:  But you mean some of these over the top mansions that are a little bit garish?

Liz Meyer:  Yes. It’s sort of changing the…

Luc Meyer:  It was a very comfortable relationship because I don’t think that many of the people in Vail wanted to really be involved or asking for special favors. And I think that is what the wonderful thing was.

Smith:  Did you see his sense of humor?

Liz Meyer:  He was always very gentle, warm.

Smith:  Upbeat?

Liz Meyer:  I couldn’t joke with him; but on the other hand, it’s not my position to joke with the president.

Smith:  Understood.

Liz Meyer:  Yes, he would laugh – like with the Sarah-Tyne, naming the Sarah-Tyne ice cream. Now, that tickled him. He thought, wow, that’s a great idea.

Luc Meyer:  And after we had to serve it and I had to make it for the grandchildren. Talking about the grandchildren once he called me and he said, “You know the grandchildren are coming, I would love you to make some ice cream for them.” I make a bucket of ice cream, the Sarah-Tyne. We were invited to the White House. We never saw him when he was in there because they were busy, but we were invited to _________ with Bob Barrett to the White House. He was a very thoughtful man.

I’ll give you an example. I remember this dinner for Christmas. Of course there was a person taking pictures there. And President Ford would always, when I gave him jam, write me a little note, by hand, never typed, and sign it. And I have so many of these notes that I keep and I cherish. And Liz says, “Do we have to keep all these notes?” And I say, “Of course, everyone is important to me.” It was incredible, the President of the United States has the time to say thank you for two little jars of jam. You know this, a lot of people, you do a lot more and you never get a thank you. But anyway, we didn’t do it for the thank you, we did it because we appreciated it. And that was where President Ford was so special. And we did this dinner and they took pictures. And then after President Ford asked us for the name of each of our waiters because he had a picture taken with them, and he sent us a picture to give to each waiter that he had personally signed. And I thought that was so thoughtful. We are doing our job, but that was President Ford – the detail. And I think, unfortunately, that that’s why he wasn’t re-elected president – he was too much of a human being, and not enough, maybe, politician. For us, we never got involved in politics.

Smith: That’s probably one reason he enjoyed it because he could switch off, and just be himself.

Luc Meyer: Well, you have to realize when you come as an immigrant your priorities are your family, your children, running a business, making some money to pay for the education of your children. And politics, Republicans or Democrats, were nothing. I didn’t even know what President Ford was, kind of until later on. And now, of course, having lived in America for so long it’s a little different.

Smith: He did come up here that last summer before he passed away. There were lots of folks who were almost begging him not to for reasons of health. But they were determined. He was stubborn, And they loved this place. Did you see them at all during that time?

Luc Meyer: He came for the 14th of July.

Smith: He did? On his last birthday?

Luc Meyer: Next to last.

Smith: Which would be 2005.

Luc Meyer: Right.
Liz Meyer: We got out of the restaurant 2006.

Luc Meyer: He didn’t come anymore.

Smith: And frankly, by that point, he might not have been able to come down here.

Luc Meyer: Yes.

Smith: And he was enjoying himself?

Liz Meyer: It will be in my diary. I write a diary every day and it will be in there. He didn’t come for his 90\textsuperscript{th} – it was his 92\textsuperscript{nd}. And he died?

Smith: He was 93.

Luc Meyer: And he came for his 92\textsuperscript{nd} birthday.

Liz Meyer: His 92\textsuperscript{nd} was his last one.

Smith: And he had the trout?

Luc Meyer: And he had the trout. Well, plus the liver – I always get it fresh, so it’s not an item we keep that long – we don’t have it all the time. If I know the President is coming, I would order it. If he did not have the liver, then he would have the trout. By the time you get to his age, you don’t eat big meals anymore.

Liz Meyer: I remember his 60\textsuperscript{th} birthday specifically on the 14\textsuperscript{th} of July. They had a surprise birthday party for him at the golf course because he was playing golf. And so they arranged for the guests – did you go? (asking me) I went because it was during the day and we were at the golf course and there was a wall and everybody had to hide behind the wall. And when he came to the eighteenth hole, we all leapt up and shouted “Happy Birthday!” to him and he was like a little boy. It was so wonderful – the surprise of the whole thing, and, of course, he knew everybody. And of course we felt so honored to be invited to that. That must have been in the late ’70s?

Smith: That would be ’73. He was born in 1913, so his 60\textsuperscript{th} birthday would be 1973. Maybe 65?

Liz Meyer: It must have been a little later.
Smith: Let me ask you because we’re about out of tape. How do you think, from your own experiences, how do you think he should be remembered?

Luc Meyer: As a politician or as a man?

Smith: Both.

Luc Meyer: Well, as a politician, I would say he was a very, very decent man. When you see today, politics - let me say this as an immigrant - I sometimes feel I am more American than the Americans, because we love this country a different way. Because we weren’t born here, but we are Americans by choice – you are an American by birth. You didn’t have this choice. So I take this very seriously – I wanted to become an American. I wanted my wife to become American, and I’m glad that my children are Americans. So that’s one thing – as an immigrant, it was very important. He was a man of great decency. Today, when you see politicians – let’s not go into that.

Smith: I know what you mean.

Luc Meyer: As a man, as far as a man, he was a family man, he was just a wonderful, warm individual who never abused his power or his stature. He always tried to bring people up. He gave you this wonderful, wonderful feeling. We have met a lot of very important people, but you know, President Ford is certainly up there with one of the most…and I don’t think it’s because of the camera. This is very personal, we are sincere people. We have nothing to gain. Do you have something to add?

Liz Meyer: He was always so kind to us when he used to come into the restaurant. He seemed to have such a warmth about him. He really enjoyed it.

Smith: He had a good life. And Vail was a large part of that. Growing up in the Depression in Michigan, he could never have imagined the life that he would lead. Not just the offices that he held, but the opportunities and the friends that were made.

Liz Meyer: And I think that when he probably thought back on his life, that he was adopted, that he came from the most humble of beginnings, and where he got, he still kept that humbleness about him which was so wonderful. Because I couldn’t imagine meeting ever meeting any of the other presidents if we would have had the same repartee. I doubt it.

Smith: Well put.

Luc Meyer: And as I said, at the time we met him we were humble people trying to make a living, bring up a family in a wonderful place called Vail. And thanks to him.

Smith: Perfect.

Smith: Thank you so much for doing this. Have you been in this office before?

Carr: I have not.

Smith: I have to ask, just because I regret never having seen it for myself, but having heard about it from others, and you would know much better because you were there. He loved his school and he loved his team, and frequently he would make a point of being here before the Ohio game delivering a pep talk to the team. Were you present for any of those?

Carr: Yes, I was. I was there. Coach Schembechler hired me in 1980, so I was there through a couple of years ago. I can remember during Bo’s tenure during the ‘80s and Gary Moeller, the first five years of the ‘90s, that every time President Ford came to Ann Arbor it was pretty much understood that some way, somehow, he was going to get over to meet with the team and talk with the team. So I was there for all of those.

The Ohio State game that I remember, and really, I think my greatest memory of the President was in the 1997 season. We’d won our first ten games and we were going into the Ohio State game undefeated and ranked number one in the nation. Ohio State was coming to Ann Arbor with a great team. And what I had tried to do during the course of the week, particularly Sunday and Monday, was to convince our team that this game was not only of importance, but our preparation had to be the same. I tried to relieve some of the pressure that I knew everybody felt. So on Monday I got a call from the President’s office and they said President Ford was going to be in town on Wednesday and he wanted to come over for practice that afternoon. And, of course, Wednesday is probably the most important day of the week.

Smith: And why is that?
Carr: Well, because you put your game plan in on Tuesday, and Tuesday night you decide if there is anything you are going to take out, or if there is anything you might occasionally add at that part of the week. And what you really want is you want to feel confident coming off the field on Wednesday that everybody knows exactly what the plan is and what is expected.

So, of course, when the President comes, he doesn’t come by himself. He’s got an entourage of assistants and Secret Service agents. But I also knew that this would be a tremendous thing for our team and for our players, and a tremendous experience - something they would never forget for the rest of their lives.

So I got a call and the President arrived part way through practice. It was a cold November day, and finally I was talking with him and I said, “Now, you let me know when you are ready to speak to the team.” So finally we interrupt our practice and get everybody together.

Smith: Did the team know that this was…?

Carr: Yeah. Before practice we always have a meeting and I told them that he was going to be there and I was sure he would have something important to say to them. When I had talked to the President as we stood watching practice, I said to him, “What I’ve tried to do, I’ve tried to relieve the pressure because there aren’t many times you are number one in the nation going into this game with a chance to win a national championship.” So when we got everybody together, all the coaches and players took a knee and he told them how glad he was to be in Ann Arbor and to see them. And that he had come to wish them luck this week.

Then he said, “You know, I saw a lot of your games. I saw that great comeback win against Notre Dame early in the season. And I saw that great win over Iowa in the middle of the season when you were down ______ to 7 at the half. I watched that magnificent game, one of the finest performances I’ve ever seen a Michigan team, have against Penn State down in Happy Valley.” He said, “But you know, this Saturday you are going to play the most important game in the history of Michigan football.”
So much for relieving the pressure. Every time I think about that speech, I think, he knew exactly what he was doing, because he wanted them to know how much this game meant and how much it would mean to Michigan and all those people who supported the university for this team to win a national championship. So, I’ll certainly never forget that afternoon.

Smith: Just to get it on the record, who won the game?

Carr: Well, and of course, it was a great football game. It went right down to the last few minutes and we won the game. And of course, that gave us the opportunity to go to Rose Bowl and play in a game that if we won, which we did, to become the first team to win a national championship at Michigan since 1948 – it was fifty years. I think he certainly made his contribution, and certainly that memory for all of us was really special.

Smith: He knew everyone on the roster. He knew the team, he watched the game. But then he basically knew who did what.

Carr: What I remember most vividly is the meetings. Most of the meetings we had, some of them were on the field, but for the most part, as coaches we wanted to have him speak to our team in our whole team meeting room. It’s an auditorium style room and we just felt they could hear better. And what always struck me is when he talked to these kids, he’d talk about his own experiences in Michigan - how he had to work in the student union to help pay his tuition, and the people who helped him come to Michigan; who gave him the kind of support that helped him make it through Michigan. He always talked about how appreciative he was, because the opportunity to go to school and to play football at Michigan, was one of the greatest opportunities he ever had. And he would talk about how it prepared him for all the things that he was going to face in his life and ultimately to be the President of the United States.

But in those meetings, he would never fail to call out a number or call out a guy by name, say, “Where are you?” And he’d say, “You know, I really like the way you play.” And he always wanted to know any of the guys from Grand Rapids. I can remember David Brandt, a great center on one of our teams, a guard, he played both. But he always knew the guys from that part of the state, so it was always a special time.

Smith: And what was the effect on the kids?

Carr: Well, I think if you asked them, the thing they would most remember was that he never failed to talk about his love for the University of Michigan and his emphasis that, “Look, every guy in this room – I can’t emphasize to you enough – the importance of finishing your degree. And finishing your education, because the game – we only can play for a limited time - but that education, especially an education here at Michigan, is going to serve you the rest of your life.”

Smith: Did he ever mention the story – which is relatively well-known – the story of Willis Ward, the African-American teammate that he had? Did he ever talk about that?

Carr: I’ve read the comments a great deal about it, some of the articles that were written at the time, but I know that – and I can’t honestly remember whether he told this to the team or he told it to me – how much that experience focused him on what Willis Ward went through. And I think he had great regret for the decision that was made not to play Willis. Of course, recently, the other player from Georgia Tech – it ended up being a horrible experience for him as well because the deal they agreed upon was that Willis wouldn’t be allowed to play and the Georgia Tech player who played the same position wouldn’t be able to play either. And I think President Ford down through the years spoke out about that incident and it certainly was not the best of Michigan football.

Smith: And that was the one game they won that year?

Carr: Yeah, it was the only game they won, 1934, I think it was. And, of course, he was All-American, selected as All-American after that season. But I think it was an experience that he took with him that he learned from.

Smith: Let me ask you something because that raises the broader question - because the people who haven’t played sports at that level don’t understand it, or can’t imagine it. What is it about the game that, for lack of a better cliché, builds character? What is it about the game that prepares one for whatever comes next?

Carr: I think it’s a game that requires so many things if you’re going to win and if you’re going to try to be the best, and that has always been the tradition at Michigan. I think the coaches job is to convince his players that you cannot be the best, you cannot be the best that you are capable of being, you cannot be a team that all of these Michigan people are going to be proud of, unless you work together. It all begins with – obviously you have to have talented people – but if you don’t have people who will work together, who are willing to play their role to do their job, regardless of what it might be…

A lot of times that entails being the guy who practices hard, but never gets to play the game. All those things. The guy who is the backup; if he’s not ready, then somebody gets hurt; then your chances to win are out the window. So, I think it all begins with an understanding that it is the ultimate team game. And it’s also a game that no matter who you are, you’re going to get knocked down and you’re going to, at times, want to stay down. You’re not always going to feel like you want to get up, because sometimes it’s awfully hard to. And the game will humble every man who plays it. It is a game that, regardless of how skilled you are, some plays the other guy is going to win. He’s going to knock you down. And so it takes a toughness, you know, a mental attitude that “I understand that I’m going to get knocked down, but I’m always going to get up. Nothing will keep me down. I’m going to fight like hell. I’m going to get off the ground and I’m going to beat you next play. I’m going to win the next play.”

And I think the other thing the game teaches is to never give up. Regardless of what the score is, you always have a chance. Or, in those few situations where maybe you don’t, you learn that it’s about how you finish, it’s about understanding that if you respect the game, you’re never going to give anything but your best effort. And if you can do those things, in my judgment, you’re going to learn a lot of valuable lessons as you go forward. And certainly, understanding the term that it’s a team game means that in that huddle, and in that locker room, and as you travel across the country and you get a chance to play in the greatest of all stadiums – the _______ Stadium – that there’s all kinds of differences amongst you and your teammates. And the game teaches you to respect the man for his differences; that if you can learn to understand that people believe differently, look at the world differently, they see things differently from you, I think that’s the single greatest thing you can get from the game.

I think if you look at American sports, in so many instances down through our history, sports have led to reconciliation and changing of barriers, of knocking down barriers. So, that’s why I think a coach and the guys who play the game, I think so many people feel a real love for. Not just for the fun of playing the game, but for all the things you learn from it.

Smith: One of the things that comes to mind - President Ford said that he learned things on the football field that stood him in good stead later on, and one of which is to let unjust criticism slide off your back. Being booed by a 100,000 fans in a football stadium is a lot worse than reading a negative editorial or seeing a cartoon - that it gave him a sense of perspective. As long as you know you’ve done your best, it doesn’t matter what 100,000 rabid football fans in the heat of the moment might say.

Carr: I was reading a quote the other day from Coach Yost who coached at Michigan from 1901 to 1926, and I guess most people would consider him the father of Michigan football. He said, “One of the things you learn playing football at Michigan is that even when you win the big game, there’s a lot of people unhappy because they don’t like the way the team performed.” And he said, “There is such a high expectation here,” and that kind of surprised me because I know that’s the case today and it’s been the case since I’ve been at Michigan. But it surprised me a little bit that that early in the century, coaches and players felt that same reserve about, unless you play absolutely outstanding football.

Smith: Is there something unique or defining or distinctive about the position of center? Is there something that you need to be a great center?
Carr: Well, I think ______________ view is if you just take the degree of difficulty – I, after spending most of my life in the game, think the toughest position to play in today’s game is quarterback. I think the second most difficult is center. Imagine a guy that may weigh 25 or 30, 40 pounds more than you are, is every bit as strong as you are, and is lined up about that far from the football that you have your hand on, and now you have to know that there’s a certain cadence that the quarterback is going to call and you must snap that ball exactly when he has told you in the huddle that he’s going to snap it. If you snap it too soon, then your line is not ready to go and the quarterback is not ready to get the ball, so you have a bad offensive play. If you’re late, your team is off sides and they are going to penalize. That’s before the ball is snapped. Now, when the ball is snapped, you have got to take that ball and pass it back through your legs and still block a man who may be bigger, every bit as strong as you are. And to do that takes an outstanding athlete, the agility that’s required and the intelligence that’s required, because imagine this: your back is to the man who is calling the plays, you’re bent over, and there’s often all kinds of crowd noise where you can hardly hear the quarterback cadence. So it takes great poise, great concentration, I think great intelligence and great athletic ability. And I think if you look back at the great teams, the centers are all pretty extraordinary people.

Smith: Do you think he got a bum rap? The stereotype of Chevy Chase about stumbling and hitting – the irony is that he is probably one of the most athletically gifted presidents we ever had, but the media had this image of a klutz.

Carr: I think we all know there’s nothing further from the truth. But that, again, was the world that they live in, in politics. Unfortunately, as president, there’s never a moment of the day, except maybe when you’re in bed, that you’re out of the scrutiny of other people. And I think it was unfair, absolutely, but he always handled it so well. I mean, I don’t ever remember seeing him show anger when a lot of people would, because he knew he was a great athlete. He handled it like he handled everything else, in my opinion.

Smith: Were he and Bo Schembechler very close?
Carr: Very close. Bo talked to him rather frequently, and especially, I think, as Bo got out of coaching and came back to Michigan because the President such a great ambassador for the university and I know we don’t know half of what he did for this university. But I think they really enjoyed each other’s company. And Bo, of course, was a staunch Republican, and had a great interest. One of the things that made Bo so much fun to coach for was our staff meetings. He’d read the paper and he’d come in there and he’d be ranting and raving about this and that. So, he had a great interest in politics and of course, President Ford had a great interest in football.

Smith: A match made in heaven. What was the year that Nebraska sort of nosed you out at the very tail end of the season?

Carr: They didn’t nose us out.

Smith: Or was it a tie? It was a tie.

Carr: There are two polls, and we won the Associated Press poll, and Nebraska won the Coaching poll. That was 1997. And that’s when really the writers proved that they were a lot smarter than coaches.

Smith: Well, I’ll tell you a story. I was director of the Library at the time, and we’d become pretty close, and I was a Nebraska fan. And I was careful how far to go, because I know he and Marty Allen every year had a bet on the Notre Dame game and it was five dollars and you’d better pay up if you lost. But to show you how thoughtful he was, that year for Christmas, which is what all this is building up to, he called the Nebraska coach.

Carr: Tom Osborne

Smith: He called Tom Osborne and said, “I’ve got this young friend, he’s a big Nebraska fan.” So Coach Osborne sent me a Nebraska sweater, which I cherish, as you can imagine, to this day. Now, besides thanking for him for that, I didn’t bring up the subject after Christmas. But that’s generous.

Do you remember the last time you saw him?
Carr: Yes I did. The last time I saw him, one of his great friends, a couple of them, Bob Brown and Howard Wykle(?), and I and my wife, Lori, flew to Palm Springs to play golf for a couple of days and we had a dinner and he came down even though he was not feeling well at all. But he had told us he would be there and he did come down and you could tell that he was not feeling well. But he still was – what a presence, and what a gentleman – and he got up and spoke and said how glad he was to see everybody. That’s the last time I saw him.

Smith: People were often surprised when they saw him that he was bigger than expected.

Carr: The first time I met him, he was very, very fit, at least. You looked at him and said, “My goodness, he really takes good care of himself.”

Smith: Very disciplined. Swam twice a day.

Carr: I didn’t know that.

Smith: Yeah, swam twice a day. And, talk about self-discipline, one day long after he was out of the White House, he was needling Susan about cigarettes, telling her she really ought to quit because he had quit years before. And so she said some smart assed thing about his pipes. So he gathered up every pipe in the office and the house, every pipe, and dumped them in a box and never smoked a pipe again.

Carr: He wanted to set the right example.

Smith: Exactly. And basically he made a deal with her, I’ll quit if you quit. That’s discipline.

Carr: Yes, it is.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered? Let me ask you first of all: how is he remembered around here?

Carr: Well, with great reverence. Anybody who knew him – there was a special reverence not only for the fact that he was the President of the United States. I think it was as much as anything else for the kind of man he was. I can remember reading a book by Gergen on presidential leadership, and what I remember that he wrote was, he wrote about this man’s character and that he would be remembered for making a decision that he was willing to make, even though he knew that politically he would pay a price for pardoning President Nixon. The truth is, at least what I’ve read in recent years, is that everybody, I shouldn’t say everybody, but the great majority of people certainly believe that he made the right decision. And to me, that’s what leadership is. He was willing to do what he thought was best for our country in spite of the fact that it was not the popular thing to do at the time.

Smith: And do you think football in its own way, contributed to some of that character?

Carr: You know, I believe this: I don’t think football builds character, I think it reveals character. And you have an opportunity in a game to show what you’re made of in a lot of different ways. And so I think there are some lessons, certainly, but the character issue I think was there.

Smith: Last question, we’ve sort of come full circle because I never had the opportunity to see one of these. He himself said if he could do things over, he would have spent more time studying communications. He wasn’t a natural orator. But, I’m told that in this setting – here and around those kids - that on those occasions, it is almost as if he had a silver tongue. He spoke with a passion, and even an eloquence that wasn’t always there in conventional speechmaking.

Carr: You know, I agree with him based on the times that I saw him speak publicly in relation to seeing him up close in front of 150 players and coaches. I think, first of all, he was very relaxed because he had something in common with every guy in that room, and he had a great love for the game and values, and the university. And so I think it came from his heart, and he didn’t have to worry about nuance and all the things that a leader has to worry about when he gives a speech that is going to be seen by everybody in the world. And so, yeah, I found him to be very sincere and able to communicate his love for Michigan and Michigan football.
Smith: Last question. We all know famously Richard Nixon would send in plays to Coach Allen. Did President Ford ever suggest a play?

Carr: Not to my knowledge. He did not with me. I think he had too much respect for the game. I just think that was him.

Smith: How did your paths cross?

Ornelas: I was working at the Marriott Desert Springs. I was a chef there and they came in a couple of times to have a dinner. Prior to that I knew a mutual friend, Rosalee, who happened to be the cook, or the chef at the Betty Ford Center. You know how chefs all know each other in the Valley and kind of help each other out – that’s kind of how it was. She gave Mrs. Ford my name and number when they were looking for a chef or cook, and they had had my food at Tuscany’s, which I worked at, at that time at the Marriott. That’s how she knew who I was and it was a funny story because Mrs. Ford called me and my roommate said, “It’s Betty Ford for you on the phone,” and I said, “Shut up, you know, quit messing around.” And he goes, “No, it’s really Betty Ford.” And I said, “Why would she be calling me?” and that’s how – she wanted to know if I’d be interested in a job, or interviewing for a job for them as a personal chef. That’s how it all started.

Smith: And that would have been about when?

Ornelas: This was maybe twelve years ago? Maybe longer.

Smith: Yeah. I’m thinking…

Ornelas: Twelve or thirteen years ago, I didn’t really do the math, but it was a while back.

Smith: I’m wondering because I remember…

Ornelas: Maybe longer.

Smith: And you were with them for how long?

Ornelas: Almost seven years, and I was twenty-eight or twenty-nine when I went to work for them.
Smith: We must have met because I remember before I took the job at the library, and this would have been the end of '95 – I came out here and had lunch with him at the house. What was that like – the interview with her?

Ornelas: Well, when she asked if I would be interested in the interview I said, sure. And I didn’t think anything of it – not that I didn’t know who Betty and Gerald Ford were, but I mostly knew about her because I went to the Betty Ford Center – but she did not know it at the time. So, of course, you know who Betty Ford is – anyone in the desert knows who Betty Ford is. So I didn’t think much of it and maybe my arrogance, or being young, I was twenty-something years old, I was like, “Okay, sure, I’ll go on an interview.”

And then as I told people about it and when I went to work and told them that I was going to interview for this job, everybody got so excited about it. People at work, other chefs were jealous of it, and it started to – I started to realize what a big deal this was. And then I started to get nervous, so I had some friends of mine kind of coach me. I’d never really went on an interview this important before. I went out and bought a whole new suit, because I knew Mrs. Ford is into fashion, so I wanted to look presentable. I bought a briefcase and I remember walking into the office and just the feel of it, I knew this was going to be something different.

Smith: How so – something different?

Ornelas: Well, I had only worked in restaurants since I was like seventeen years old. The hustle and bustle, it’s the night life. I’d recently went to the Betty Ford Center, so I was only nine months sober when I got the interview.

Smith: And you’d not met her while you were there?

Ornelas: When you go to the Center, you see her because she does a lecture. I remember everyone going up to her and thanking her and I didn’t. Let’s say, getting sober for me wasn’t what I wanted to do. An intervention is how I got there. So I didn’t do it by choice, I did it by force. The Marriott where I worked did an intervention on me and that saved my job, to go to the Betty Ford Center. So, against my will, if you can imagine, I went there. So I wasn’t very happy to be there and I really didn’t care who Mrs. Ford was at that time, and this is why this is such an amazing story, I think that I have, because what in turn happened, was amazing - the fact that I ended up working for them and being part of their family. At that time in my life I was pretty much lost and broken, I had a broken spirit. When I walked into this interview I felt that I had hope. When she walked into the interview room, she just has this graceful stride to her and she introduced herself, we sat down, and she was very kind, and formal at the same time.

Smith: Business-like?

Ornelas: Yeah, business-like, but charming and I found myself at ease with her. And then she talked to me most of the time. Then she said, “You’ll be meeting my husband after the interview.” So, that’s what we did. We got up, walked into this office where I shook Mr. Ford’s hand for the first time. I liked him from the minute I met him. Something about him - just his whole demeanor to me.
He shook my hand, he’s polite, asked me a couple of questions and then that was it and went out. I said goodbye and I didn’t hear from her for like two weeks. I thought, oh I didn’t get the job, so I just went on. Then two weeks later she called and said, “Would you like to work for us?” And I said, “Sure.”
I didn’t hesitate. And that’s how it all started.

Smith: A couple of things: in this initial interview, presumably she talked about their tastes, their preferences, in food? What sorts of things…

Ornelas: Yeah, I just remember she saying they had a big family and she kind of gave me the lowdown on the traveling – that they did go to Beaver Creek, Colorado – their kids, they named them all. I didn’t remember at the interview hardly any of this because as we went along, I was like, I don’t remember her saying this, but I think I was kind of – there was a lot to absorb, I guess.

Smith: Yeah.

Ornelas: The kind of food they like – the first thing I remember is her telling me that they didn’t like Mexican food, spicy food, and that they like simple meals, and they liked to eat healthy. And that’s my specialty, so it worked.
Smith: And he was – and of course, she, too, but he was very self-disciplined, wasn’t he? They both really took care of themselves.

Ornelas: That’s one of the biggest things I learned from him. I was thinking when I was on my way over here, about that and the discipline. I learned a lot about discipline from Mr. Ford. I think he had a lot of discipline and I think that’s why I felt secure. There was a sense of security for me because he had such discipline and he was a great example to me – somebody who was so undisciplined. The only discipline I ever had was to go to [the Betty Ford] Center and get sober, and I didn’t have a clue. I fell into this job by word-of-mouth from someone who knew someone, who gave her a number and she contacted me.

There are no coincidences – I believe that very much. From the first time I came into the family, they told me the things they liked and didn’t like – it was kind of a short list, but nothing major. They seemed very friendly and easy going. Ann Cullen was Mrs. Ford’s secretary at the time, who kind of gave me the bigger picture of how they liked the service and when they ate, the times and the schedules and things like that.

Smith: Was he a workaholic?

Ornelas: He enjoyed working – I believe he was, yes.

Smith: Borderline.

Ornelas: But I understand that. When you have a passion for something – like I cook, bake and do stuff 24/7.

Smith: Now is that something you’ve always loved?

Ornelas: I think I’ve had a natural talent since I was young. It was just something that comes natural to me. And to this day, I have a restaurant, I am hands-on in there. They can’t keep me out. And then if I’m not there, I’m somewhere baking because I love to bake. They loved my desserts.

Smith: Really? Did he have a sweet tooth?

Ornelas: Yeah.
Smith: What desserts in particular?

Ornelas: Anything, but I think cookies and pies – just the good stuff – the down home, homemade things, were probably the favorite. He loved ice cream. I was trying to think of his favorite food – he loved sea bass. She liked desserts, too, but Mrs. Ford watched her figure more than he did. But he had great discipline. If he would gain a pound, he would cut back and he would tell me, only serve me half, or he would only eat – I don’t know too many people who could have a big, juicy piece of pie with ice cream and stop themselves at half. Mrs. Ford could do that also.

Smith: Plus, of course, he swam a couple of times a day.

Ornelas: Yes, he was very active.

Smith: You were in the house – what was your daily schedule like?

Ornelas: Well, I’ll just tell you when I first started working for them, it was very different – the whole pace – everything from the restaurant world I was used to. Also, my own thing with being sober – just getting sober and being…I told Mrs. Ford, I think after she offered the job, I had to let her know that I was newly sober, and she had no hesitation to hire me. It’s not easy getting sober and it’s not easy having someone newly sober in your life, so I wasn’t sure if they were going to be…but in retrospect, when I think about it, the Betty Ford Center is the reason why – it exists because of her.

Smith: He had cut out his drinking, too, when she did.

Ornelas: Yes, that’s when he would tell me stories. He would tell me stories and I would be in awe of his discipline, or his ability to just say something and do it. He said they used to have Jack Daniels Silver – I don’t know what that is – every night and he used to smoke a pipe, and they would have cocktails. When she got sober he said he just stopped. I said, “Just like that?” and he said, “Just like that, I stopped.” Because their cocktail I used to serve them – they would have a cocktail and then I would serve them an appetizer, and at 7:30 they ate their dinner. The cocktail was just club soda with a lime, and he would come in the kitchen every day, every evening and I would have it ready there for him and he would pour it and then he would take it out to the living room, where I would take them their meals.

But those are the times when he and I had our time alone together. Or if Mrs. Ford was out on a trip or something, which was rare, but she would be out doing something with the Betty Ford Center or something. I just remember he used to call me Pal a lot. He would walk in and say, “How you doing, Pal, this evening?” and then we would have a small conversation – talk about something and then he’d go off and then I would bring them their meal. Breakfast – they would do their own breakfast, I would just leave grapefruits and everything ready for them and they would do it themselves. They were very self-sufficient and on the nights that I wasn’t cooking, I would leave them things and they would fix dinner for each other. I always thought that was very unique, because I know other people who would always go out or have people come in. Mrs. Ford wanted to do it. I would leave them something.

Smith: They were incredibly close, weren’t they?

Ornelas: Yes, they were partners. Whenever I would ask them something, if I had a request or something, he would say, “I’ll talk to Mrs. Ford about it,” and she would always say, “I’ll talk to Mr. Ford about it.” And then, I believe that they would. They would have a discussion and then they would tell me the outcome.

That’s another thing they showed me. I really have to say this when I first came to them and worked for them, I thought it was just going to be another job. They invited me into their family. They told me, “You’re going to be part of this family. You’re going to work for us, but you’re going to be part of this family.” And I thought to myself, well that’s a nice gesture to say, but I will be your employee. The first time we ever went to Vail, Colorado – I don’t like to fly, and I’d never flown in a Lear jet before – and that’s the way they used to travel. It’s small and confined and Lear jets go kind of fast, I mean, they go straight up. And Mrs. Ford would be so kind and nice and reassuring that nothing is going to happen. Mr. Ford went and got the pilot. This is what I loved about him – whenever I had doubts or fears, he took me to talk to the pilot so that they could explain to me how and what was going to happen, and how the plane worked, and that there was nothing that could happen, and that they have extra special cargo - meaning Mr. and Mrs. Ford - and they weren’t going to let anything happen to them, so that I didn’t have to worry.

Get in the plane, we take off, this thing goes straight up in the air and I would be sitting facing Mrs. Ford, and Mr. Ford would be in the seat there, and then the two Secret Service, and the two pilots. I would bring the lunch on and we would fly from Palm Springs to Eagle Creek, which is Colorado, to go to Beaver Creek.

Smith: How long a flight was that?

Ornelas: I believe it was like an hour and half – maybe not even that long. But I remember being so scared my very first time, and she just kept talking and reassuring me all the way, never got irritated and he just kept talking conversation. He even fell asleep, and I thought for a minute that if he took a nap he must be obviously really comfortable and feel safe if he’s sleeping. It was dark when we got to Colorado. I had no idea where I was. I’ve only flown one other time in my whole life. We were driving, we had to drive from Eagle to Beaver Creek – it was about 45 minutes to an hour, and I’ve never seen and never felt so much snow in my life. When I got off that plane I was like in shock. Mrs. Ford kept reassuring me, make sure I buttoned up, make sure I had a thing around my neck.

Smith: You’d always lived in the desert?

Ornelas: Yes – no, I’m from San Francisco, but I had lived in the desert for like, five years or so. I’m accustomed to it – the warm weather – I love it. So there I am, not having a clue, and this place is magnificently beautiful. I think they had the most snow they had in Colorado in ten years that time that we went; it was for Christmas.

Smith: What was their house like?
Ornelas: When I first saw it, I thought it was gigantic. I’ve never seen anything like it. But it was a nice, I think it was a three-story house in the mountains in Beaver Creek. Did you ever go?

Smith: No, never saw it.

Ornelas: It was in a circle in a cul de sac on the top of the mountain, which was very nice, and there were other houses around it. It was beautiful.

Smith: I’ve been told there is a deck where sometimes they’d have parties, I guess during the warm weather. With a view.

Ornelas: Yeah, the kitchen, the deck, the view was beautiful. Mrs. Ford, in her bathroom, her big tub, there was a view out to the mountains which was magnificent. It was just beautiful. That was my first time ever seeing anything like that. I just went along and I didn’t really know what to expect. I knew I was going to work. The whole family was going to be there. I think that’s the first time I met all the kids and the grandkids.

Also, I remember a story and I’m going to tell it. It is Mr. Ford and skiing and being part of the Ford family. He said, “You need to learn to ski.” And I never skied. Those mountains are big. He said to me, “You’ve never skied?” And I said, “No, I’ve never skied.” “Have you ever drove in snow?” “No, I never drove in snow.” “Okay.” They called Dick Garbarino, who looked after their house – called him up, “Teach her how to drive in the snow.” So I had the house car which was like a Jeep Cherokee or something. So Dick teaches me how to drive in ice and the snow, by Mr. Ford’s wishes.

Then Mr. Ford said, “Tomorrow morning you and I are going to go down to the ski school.” I had no idea what ski school was. “And we’re going to enroll you.” I’m like, okay, I’ve never skied before, I don’t have – Ann Cullen had loaned me a bunch of sweaters because I’m from the desert. I had flip flops and tank t-shirts and jeans. She lent me a pile of sweaters, she gave them to me and said, “Here, take jeans, take warm socks and hats.” So that’s what I did. I didn’t have anything to ski in – what do you ski in? Mrs. Ford’s like, “You need a ski outfit.” I’m like, “I don’t have a ski outfit.” She goes, “Well, you use mine.” I’m like, I couldn’t believe that she would lend me her – Betty Ford’s going to lend me her ski outfit to learn to ski and Mr. Ford’s going to drive me down to ski school. I was like, “Okay, this is great.” I’m always up for an adventure. So we get up the next morning, we have breakfast, I go down to meet him in the hallway, get Mrs. Ford’s – she geared me up – she gave me goggles, she gave me everything – head to toe.

Me and Mr. Ford go, with the Secret Service in the car, sitting side by side, driving down to ski school, which is right down the mountain like a quarter mile. Drives me in. I thought he was just going to open the door – you know – he walks me all the way to ski school. Here I am walking with Gerald Ford, people are looking because, of course, he’s a big deal in Beaver Creek, Colorado, and Secret Service, and we’re walking to go to the ski school. We go in there, he wants to see the ski instructor. They run up, “Yes, Mr. Ford, what can I do for you?” “This is Lorraine, she works for us now. She needs to learn how to ski, make sure she doesn’t get hurt.” He leaves me and I go to ski school. And I’m not really one for the cold. I liked the snow as long as I’m somewhere warm with a fireplace.

Smith: It’s nice to look at, rather than be in.

Ornelas: Yeah. I learned to ski, though. I learned to ski pretty good actually. I surprised myself and it’s one thing I’m grateful for – I don’t know if I would have ever done it. Who could say Gerald Ford took them to ski school, dropped them off – and that’s how I learned to ski. All the kids, Susan and Michael, Steven and Jack are all tremendous skiers. They took me out skiing once, and this is another story.

Mrs. Ford, I remember after the fact, told Susan, “Why did you take her with you?” Because I was just a new skier and they were sixteen years into skiing. Well, I had a fall because, not because I was trying to keep up, but I just was inexperienced. Thank God I didn’t break anything, but with Mr. and Mrs. Ford, I always felt like they were, of course they don’t want me to get hurt, but they were always looking out for me. I remember Mrs. Ford saying to Susan, “How could you take her with you guys? You guys are so much better skiers.” She was keeping up until I had that little fall but I remember Mr. Ford always telling me I needed to continue. I think I went up to all these levels, I think I went up to level five, because he didn’t want me to stop. Didn’t want me to get hurt – he wanted me to go have fun and learn how to do it right. And I did and I’m grateful for that, because I see people out there skiing now and I can tell the ones that went to ski school and the ones who didn’t. I’m grateful for that experience.

Smith: I take it that they were as visible around Vail as they were here in the desert, and beloved up there. There is celebrity, and then there is something much deeper than that.

Ornelas: I think in Vail, because it was smaller than Beaver Creek, it seemed like they could get closer or it was closer knit. So wherever I would go people would know that I worked for the Fords in Beaver Creek. I remember they took me – I did a lot of things – I look back – did a lot of things with them. They took me to a show, we went to see Apollo 13. The whole family went because it was Christmas time. Mr. Ford, Mrs. Ford, the kids – I think it was Susan and the girls – myself, and I felt like a celebrity because they roped off the whole thing and they waited for us to come in and the Secret Service – they have to go ahead and a car comes and we all go and we watched the movie. It was a great movie to see with him. He really liked it a lot.

Smith: He was really interested in the space program.

Ornelas: Very much so. They took me out to dinner from time to time. I think we did a lot of things in Colorado, when we were in Beaver Creek, because it was mostly at Christmas time. They cooked for me from time to time. I remember two times during the Christmas season they all turned the tables and cooked for me.

Smith: So Mrs. Ford could cook?

Ornelas: Mrs. Ford could cook, yeah. She cooked before she became the First Lady and he became the President.

Smith: There is a wonderful story. The night that he was sworn in. Of course the Nixon’s left so quickly that it took a week to pack all their things. So every night the Fords stayed at their house in Alexandria, and he would commute to work for that first week. So on the night of August 9th, the night he was sworn in, they are back at the house in Alexandria and she’s in the kitchen with a pan of lasagna and she says, “Jerry, there is something wrong with this picture. You’re President of the United States and I’m still cooking.”

(chuckle)

Ornelas: Yeah. Well, she still cooked. Like I said, she would cook on my nights off and Susan – what I loved about them – they were just like normal people. I don’t know what you’d classify as normal, but they were regular people, genuine people. He just happened to be President, she just happened to be the founder of the Betty Ford Center. I learned so much. Like I said, I was in my late twenties when I went to work for them. I left when 35 or 36, so I had that kind of important growing up time, especially for me, because I had just gotten sober and it’s like starting over.

I learned about family through the Fords, I guess that I learned about discipline, because Mr. Ford was very disciplined, and very goal-oriented and I have that now and I have that because of him. Mrs. Ford, she had spunk. I have to tell you, it wasn’t always smooth sailing, let’s say. Like I said, I was young and arrogant sometimes, and I would just blurt out things and I remember her always coming with a comeback. I remember one day they went out and the next day they were in the paper on the front page of the Desert Sun. And I don’t know what got into me, but she said, “Oh, look Lorraine,” and I said – because they seemed to be in the paper a lot – and I would say crazy stuff, and I said, “Oh, wow, it must have not had anything else to put in the front page of the paper?” And she looked at me and she elbowed me so hard, which I deserved, and she said, “You know, there was a time when I was young and I learned eventually to think before I speak.”

Which, to this day, I think about that and I think about it because she helped me a lot to not be so abrupt. You know, when you’re young and you don’t think, but I think about that situation all the time now, when I want to say something of whatever, and I now know a different way to say things.

But, because of their kindness, I never remember their saying they didn’t like anything I ever cooked. A couple of times I know they didn’t like it, but how they would put it would be in such a delicate way, in a nice way, that I got the message, so we wouldn’t ever have that again. But it taught me that there are different ways to treat people, there are different ways to be treated. There’s a finesse to Mrs. Ford – she had this finesse about her. She could make her point very strongly, but tactfully, and you learned something.

Smith: Did she ever talk about entertaining in the White House?

Ornelas: She told me a few stories.

Smith: Did she tell you the story about Queen Elizabeth’s visit? The famous thing was the screw up with the Marine Band. The visit went beautifully and it came time – they were all in the East Room – and they were going to dance. So the President takes Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip was with Mrs. Ford, and the Marine Band breaks into The Lady is a Tramp. To this day, the Marine Band’s playlist is checked very carefully before they perform.

Ornelas: Oh my God, that’s great. She loved to entertain – Mrs. Ford, I think. She liked to keep things also simple, but it was very important to her. She had these plates she loved to use, the Rothschild pattern. I didn’t know anything about patterns and silver and plates until I met Mrs. Ford. She taught me a lot about that.

Actually, people are still impressed about what I know about service because of her. Linens and chargers and all these things. I used to think, “This is a lot of stuff…” but she loved it. It was the art of entertaining that she loved and she was a very classy lady. Like I said, I learned a lot. Mr. Ford, every morning and every evening would swim in Vail and in Palm Springs.

Smith: So he had a pool in Vail as well?

Ornelas: Yeah, in Vail it was enclosed because it’s cold out and snowy and he would go out there and I was welcome to use the pool. I was welcome to use – they had a little workout room, there too, where everybody used it – the kids, myself.

Smith: You know, its one thing about her…we all want to put a label – look at Washington, everyone wants to put somebody in a pigeonhole. And she doesn’t fit in a pigeonhole. On some levels she is the most feminine, and traditionalist of figures. And yet she is a revolutionary figure in a whole lot of ways. Transformed how women see themselves, shattered all these old taboos and barriers. So she doesn’t fit into any convenient pigeonhole.

Ornelas: What I liked about Mrs. Ford is that you could tell her anything, and we had some intimate, private conversations, and she was never shocked. She was very open-minded about everything. I relapsed while I was working for them and she sat me down, I remember, on the couch in the room in the house, and I expected her to fire me. I had been having a little bit of a difficult time in the beginning, and I think it was because I couldn’t really believe that they were as good people as they seemed to be and I was waiting for the bomb to drop or something.

The first two weeks I took Mrs. Ford aside and said because I felt like I wasn’t getting it, “I don’t think this is the job for me.” And she said, “Let’s just wait two more weeks and see.” Two more weeks turned into about six and half, maybe seven years. And then I relapsed and that’s a hard thing. I told her I relapsed and if she wanted to fire me, then she could do so. She said she wasn’t going to do that. She sat me down and talked and we talked about the program and she talked about meetings, she talked about her own addiction – I mean, one on one with Betty Ford.

Smith: Pretty powerful.

Ornelas: Very powerful. The fact that she didn’t fire me and was going to give me another chance and told me to hang on – I just never could imagine that. I’m sure Mr. and Mrs. Ford had the discussion about that, but I still was employed and we continued on from there and I could always discuss things as I got to know them.

I’m very dyslexic, so whenever I would want to write, like if I wanted certain days off, or a week off, or a vacation or something, I’d write Mr. Ford a note. And I loved that – the first time he did it, I was kind of like – I wasn’t annoyed, but I was kind of like – I wrote something – I wanted to go to I think Santa Fe, New Mexico, I was going to go for a week, I had a vacation coming to me. And I wrote him this little note about it, telling him the days and all this. I submitted it to him and then he brought it back to me and he had corrected in red ink, my phonetically and my misspellings. I’m very dyslexic so I do everything phonetically. And he didn’t do it – after I thought about it – he didn’t do it for any other reason than to help me. And that’s just the way he was.

He would tell me time and time, if I ever needed help with something, his doors were always open in his office. And he would always tell me stories about his friends who never graduated from high school, because I never graduated from high school, and they became these big lawyers or famous people. He told me a story about Charles Schwab, who is very dyslexic. So he would constantly be reaffirming and telling me that you can do anything because this person did it and he has dyslexia and this person never graduated from high school and he’s now famous, or he’s successful.

Smith: He was the consummate optimist, wasn’t he?

Ornelas: Exactly. He was very much so. And I learned about being impartial from him also. He was the fairest person. He never took sides that I saw, and even sometimes Mrs. Ford and I would be on disagreements, he would always assess both sides, and then he would make a decision. But I always felt like it was a fair deal if he said that no, you can’t have this because we made this deal, I was okay with that because he was very fair about it.

Smith: Everyone talks about his judgment. He took this rap about his intelligence – his IQ, because he wasn’t as glib, I think, as a lot of folks, but his was a special kind of intelligence. An emotional intelligence, among other things, and an integrity that goes into judgment. Pretty clearly, he had those.

Ornelas: Very much. I learned that from both of them. He, especially. I just remember him being so fair, and always, if I had a problem, first I’d run it by Penny and then Penny would make me an appointment.

Smith: Tell me about Penny’s role in this whole operation.
Ornelas: Penny was great. They had a closeness – you could tell she knew him very, very well. And so Penny was the one I always ran things by because she was always running around here, taking care of things. I liked Penny a lot. That’s a reflection of them. They all had great staff people, also – every one of them was wonderful. I think Penny just knew him so well, she was perfect for him and he respected her. He respected everybody, but he respected Penny. I think they had a trust and a mutual thing for one another.

Smith: It is interesting, too, because clearly his mother was a very significant part of his life, but he was sort of on that cusp, but unusually for so “conservative Republican” from West Michigan. He was very comfortable with the women’s movement. I’m sure being married to Betty Ford indoctrinated him to some degree. But, in the Republican Party they were increasingly isolated in their support for a woman’s right to choose and they were supportive of gay rights, and a whole host of things that didn’t make a lot of friends in the party as it was evolving. And yet they seemed perfectly comfortable in their positions.

Ornelas: They were very comfortable, and that’s why I’m blessed and grateful I got to see this first hand. People always ask me, what were they like? And it’s almost hard for me to articulate it because it comes a lot from my heart how I felt about them, how they accepted me into their family. I didn’t graduate from high school, I’m a very talented chef, but I didn’t have, but I do have a high school diploma now, and a big part of it is because he showed me that you set a goal and you do it day after day, in and out. I just saw such discipline from him and how he did it was, he just did it and he did it with integrity and he did everything.

Smith: There must have been some celebrated people who came through this house and dined here. I know Bob Hope – they were friends. Did you see folks?

Ornelas: My favorite, and the one I was closest with, was Leonard Firestone. He was a little buddy of mine – we would meet at Pavilions Market and have Danish and coffee. I’d be shopping for the Fords. Mrs. Ford, of course, introduced me to him.
Smith: I’m told she saved his life.

Ornelas: Yeah, and he was the nicest guy – we had a little bond because we were both Gemini’s and he once told me, “Everything you touch will turn to gold.” And I remember that and people tease me because I’ve had a lot of success with businesses and business ventures since I left the Fords. Leonard Firestone and I would run into each other. He was like already in his nineties, I think. He was still driving around, but he would just drive to Pavilions – he loved sweets, so we had this sweet – he would say we had a love-sweet affair, but we were talking about desserts. I would be shopping and he would run into me at Pavilions and we would sit down and have a Danish and coffee and just talk a little bit. He was also their neighbor here and in Beaver Creek. That’s like the only one – but I’ve met people through the Fords who, of course, came to dinner a lot. Bob Hope, Delores Hope, there’s numerous ones.

Smith: Sure. Now, they were aging – you left around 2003? You worked for seven years, around then.

Ornelas: Probably earlier than that, actually, because I opened my first restaurant 2002-2003.

Smith: But he’d be in his late 80s at that point, and he was still very active. Still traveling. How did they deal with getting older? And I’ll preface that – I sensed that they liked to have younger people around them. That they actually made an effort to sort of keep in touch with…

Ornelas: Mrs. Ford is probably going to probably elbow me for saying this, but when I came to them I thought they were old already. I mean they were in their 80s and late 70s and I was like 29 or something. I would always call my mom and tell her that, “Man, you’re not going to believe how active they are.” And my mom would always say, “Well, of course. They are Betty Ford and Gerald Ford.” But I would always tell my friends also that they are so active - him especially - and she walked a lot, too. But mentally – sharp – she had one over on me most of the time because she was always on it. She was the chairman of the board still then when I worked for them. And he was on all kinds of boards and he would fly here and there, and he’d have a schedule. I’d get their schedules, and they would do more things than I would do, and I was so much younger.

Smith: How did it come to pass that you left?

Ornelas: My family lives up north towards the Bay area, that’s where I’m from, and he [grandfather] had colon cancer, so I wanted to be freer to go and visit and be there for my family. I think I needed to be where I was with the Fords and this job to teach me discipline, to help me grow, and it was time for me to leave. Of course, they hated to see me leave, but they didn’t fight it and they were totally understanding. And I think that’s part of who they are. That when it’s time to move on, they actually were happy that I could go do that.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him? Did you have contact after?

Ornelas: Yeah. I can’t remember if it was the Betty Ford reunion, I saw him last – the whole family. I saw her recently at the last year’s one, of course. I had come to visit them a couple of times after – from time to time I would come and just say hi. I think it was a few years back, last time I saw him – in ‘05, probably.

Smith: When he passed away, were you surprised by the reaction? I was working for ABC, part of the week and then I was with the family the rest of the week. I can tell you, in the media, people were surprised at how much reaction there was because he’d been out of the public eye for quite a while, in terms of the country.

Ornelas: I wasn’t surprised, but I tell you, I felt so good inside because I felt like he got what he deserved and finally everybody could see what a wonderful man that I know he was and I used to talk about. They got to feel that. I had a friend come up to me, my chiropractor, actually. After the funeral, they ran a Gerald Ford biography over and over again on A&E. And he came up to me – a couple people in my restaurant – I have a picture of him in my restaurant and people would often ask me, “Why do you have that picture of Jerry Ford in here? He was a good guy and all, but…” and I said, “Because he was a wonderful person and I loved him. I worked for them.” But my chiropractor came up to me and said, “I saw the biography of Gerald Ford,” and he also saw part of the service on TV and he was like, he couldn’t believe it. All this time he didn’t know what a wonderful person he was. I said to him, “I’ve always known what a wonderful person he was, I was just waiting for everyone else to catch up with it.”

People would say only things that they saw in the media, which I used to get very defensive about sometimes, because it was very unfair. And Mrs. Ford, also – I saw this program about her. It was about women who are heroes, she was one of them. And I always feel so proud, like I’m beaming when I see things about them on TV because I actually got to be a part of this, and they are part of my life – a huge part of my life. I think about it – 28 years old – being in their presence and learning things just by watching them and seeing how they do things with family and problems – we didn’t always have easy times. Just the way they handled themselves. I was telling Mrs. Ford when I went to see her at the service they had at St. Margaret’s - that Mr. Ford was a hero to me.

I really looked up to him and we had a bond, a special bond and we would have conversations. I would ask him stuff and he would always answer. It’s funny, a couple of things I asked him, was one of the all-time – probably he’s been asked this a million times, like why did he pardon Nixon? And he took me in his office and we had this long conversation about it and I thought, “He’s brilliant.” He was really a brilliant man and nobody knew it, really, got to know it until after he was gone. I also asked him another question about UFOs and the space program. When he was president I think I was twelve or ten or something and I heard that he knew about UFOs and he was hiding it. I asked him about it and he answered me that it was military propaganda and we had a discussion about that. I would ask him about all sorts of little things and I was always surprised that he would just take the time to answer and talk to me about it. I felt very special.

Mrs. Ford would always take the time also, if I ever needed anything to talk about she was always there. It was like one big family and I felt really a part of that because I spent most of my holidays for six and a half years with them – Thanksgiving, Christmas, Easter, all of them and they always would take me out to dinner, have a present or whatever. It was nice, I really loved the way they celebrated with the whole family and the tree and just everything.

Smith: It made it kind of rough for him to pass the day after Christmas.

Ornelas: I think Mrs. Ford said to me that it was just like him to do that. He knew how much they all loved Christmas and he waited until the day after, because he was always thinking of others.

Smith: That’s perfect. Listen, this is wonderful.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. You mentioned that you were covering Congress in the late Sixties and early Seventies. Lots of people in this town are pretty nostalgic about then, compared to now. Is that justified?

Cannon: I think so. You have to say it’s justified and put this big asterisk up there, because there were a lot of congressmen who got investigated. There were a few that went to jail. There were arguably a few who didn’t go to jail that should have. But if you are looking at it, as one of my editors at The Washington Post used to say, “with a lot of altitude,” from high up, you have to say that the Congress of that period was not only collegial – it was at times, and it wasn’t – but it did get things done.

Smith: It was constructive.

Cannon: It was constructive and worked across the aisle. You just look at the bills, everything from civil rights to tax reform and Medicare, all these things that got passed. Sure, the presidents deserved a lot of credit or blame if you don’t like what they did, but Congress was a functioning organism. It was a vital part of government. It both initiated and it reacted. Now some things Congress couldn’t do. I used to say that if I had a dollar for every speech I’d heard opposing the Vietnam War, I would be rich and retired. But no Congress in any period of time has been very good in stopping wars. That’s really not a congressional function. So if you are going to say, is the Congress of a particular epic good, or not good, or functional or not functional, what are you talking about? I think what you’re talking about is partly their investigative role, but mostly the legislative role. And I think the legislative role of Congress in the Sixties and the Seventies was pretty impressive.

Smith: I remember hearing President Ford talk about the prevailing rules of engagement: you fought for your side, but at the end of the day the political incentives were that you produced something. Forty years later it’s the exact opposite. The political incentives are to keep things from happening. Then you can go home and you can tell your base that you’ve prevented disaster. But consensus was not a dirty word. The notion of finding a medium that a critical mass of people could accept, if not rally around enthusiastically, was a guiding principle. That’s how you measured the democratic process.

Cannon: I agreed with that and I think that one of the ways to look at it is the way the parties dealt with what we would now call their base, although that wasn’t part of the terminology. I knew of various people in Congress who were pretty liberal and pretty conservative. Wiggins, the guy who was the smoking gun guy from California, Don Edwards, on the same committee, very liberal. Phil Burton – people like that. A lot of the liberals, people who were definable liberals in Congress, figured out ways to get their base to accept something that didn’t sound so liberal. And a lot of the conservatives did the same thing.

One of the things about Jerry Ford that is interesting on this, is that it made him vulnerable to Reagan. He could not accept the notion – Ford just couldn’t get it through his head and I don’t think he did until the day he died – that anybody could consider him not conservative enough. In the House context, he was the guy – you know the history of him better than I do – he was this Young Turk who had rebelled against the old guard. He’d been an internationalist. He’d supported Vandenberg, his hero. They did the Marshall Plan and a lot of other things. He really did sort of believe that politics stopped at the water’s edge. And the notion that he could be portrayed as being out of step with conservative Republicans, he just couldn’t get it through his head.

And that was because he was a creature of a Congress in which the words conservative and liberal didn’t have that kind of power. They described something, but they were not the most important – the most important thing about Gerald Ford or Tip O’Neill or Mike Mansfield, or any of these people of this era – I want to say great, I don’t want to romanticize them, but they seemed pretty neat to me in retrospect – was accomplishment, getting things done, achievement.
Smith: Wasn’t it also true that they were part of a Cold War consensus. The older I get, the more I suspect that the most important thing in politics is not ideology, but generational change. And you’re right, Ford was a Young Turk who not only took on an isolationist incumbent in the Forties, but then takes on Charlie Halleck after Goldwater.

Cannon: Well, most of these guys were not only part of a consensus that came out of World War II, they were veterans. Ford was a veteran, but most of these guys, most of the people at one time – was it like two-thirds of the members of Congress or something that served?

Smith: Do you think that gave them a shared background – almost like a shared language in some ways?

Cannon: Adlai Stevenson had a good thing about patriotism – it was something about not the showy display, but the ingrained moments, habits of a lifetime. This is what they were. They were patriots in that sense. Now, I don’t want to get too carried away, because one of the things that happened in the Cold War was the demonization of people as Communist or Crypto-Communist or something. And it’s also true of that Congress in which Joe McCarthy served – all of these people knew he was a bad man and they didn’t stop him. It was really Robert Welch and Dwight Eisenhower who stopped him.

Smith: And Ed Murrow.

Cannon: And some help from Ed Murrow. But Eisenhower had a clear view of – we know this now from the memoirs and all the things – Eisenhower had a clear view from the beginning that McCarthy was a know-nothing at best, and dangerous at worst. And you can argue that he should have stepped in when he attacked Marshall. I take Eisenhower’s side on that. But what one is criticizing if one takes that view is his tactics, not his principles.

I was seventeen years old in 1950. I came here as a member of Boys’ Nation in Nevada. You cannot imagine the thrill of this and I remember two things. I remember meeting Robert Taft who was a big deal to me. And Taft introduced me to McCarthy. And I thought afterward, I thought, well this is like being introduced to a member of the mob by the most respected citizen in town.

I remember the name of only one other boy, other than the one from Nevada, and this is the reason I remember him. We all got to meet the president of the United States – you cannot imagine what it was like for a seventeen year old to meet the president of the United States and the guy behind me – because we filed in alphabetical order – was named Bill Capitan. He was from Michigan. He was rotund, he was a wrestler, and he said, “I’m going to say something to the president of the United States.” And I remember we all said, “You’re going to speak to…?” Everybody else is sort of mechanically shaking hands, and Bill was right behind me. So he says, “Hello, Mr. President. I’m from Owosso, Michigan, Tom Dewey’s hometown.” And Truman, who is mechanically shaking hands, looks up and gives the biggest grin I’ve ever seen in my life and shakes his hand and says, “You’ve got a good start, boy.”

But we all held Bill in awe because he had spoken to the president of the United States. Now, this is 1950. Truman isn’t that popular. In our household, which was New Deal Democrat, Truman couldn’t compare to FDR. Who could? But meeting the president of the United States… I told one thing in a speech to the National Council of Legislators, legislative leaders, I told one story which deals about civil discourse. We had a wonderful civics teacher and we had free rein and there was, in this class – I was a senior that year in high school – and this one boy who criticizes Truman for a number of things and did it in a fashion that we wouldn’t have considered tempered for the time, the teacher didn’t say anything. She didn’t have to because another boy, who had the same political views said, “That’s not the right way to talk about the president of the United States. You have to have respect for the office, even if you don’t value the man.” I remembered that. I was in the Army and that was often said in the Army, because Truman’s war was not popular. But that was a different time. We thought differently about institutions. We thought differently about the leaders of these institutions. If you were Catholic, you didn’t take the pope’s name in vain, either.

Smith: And you ate fish on Friday.
Cannon: You certainly didn’t denigrate the institution. That wasn’t all good. If there had been less veneration perhaps they would have removed MacArthur before he got so many people killed. But I don’t know that. But Ford was a part of this. He was a big part of that generation. He thought like that generation. He thought in terms of public service. And I think in Ford’s case, I’ve always had the theory, it’s the gratitude of adopted children, that he had a lot of that anyway. As an adopted kid he’d been treated very well. He had this great gratitude towards the person who was his stepfather. So he had a lot of that in him, plus I think that Midwestern culture just breeds that.

Smith: He said, as a fairly young man and later – I can hear him saying it – he decided early on that most people were mostly good, and he was going to find the good in everyone. That’s what he was going to focus on. It’s a great formula for life. You wonder if, at times, it breeds a kind of naïveté at the presidential level.

Cannon: I think Ford was naïve as a president. I think it was an advantage in some ways. I think that Ford – the most controversial decision, the decision I think that prevented him from being elected in his own right – was the pardon. And Ford gave a lot of different reasons for that pardon. When I pressed him on it he said, “Well I was reading in your writing what shape Nixon was in,” and stuff and that was a fair point. And I certainly probably overwrote that. But I overwrote it because Nixon was over a little bit mad. But I think that what Ford really did – the basic reason why – we don’t want to drag the nation through a trial – is that he saw some good in it. He saw some good in Nixon, he saw some redemptive value in what he was doing.

Ford would never talk about himself in religious terms, but Ford believed in the gospel of redemption. Ford really did. If Ford had been on the bench, he would not have been a hanging judge. He did believe in the goodness – now I think it really hurt him on a number of things. I think it hurt him on being tough enough, particularly on the economic issues. You know, that Whip Inflation Now. A person who had a little more sophistication would have realized that that sounded pretty silly. And there is a story – have you interviewed Don Rumsfeld, or you will.
Smith: We have.

Cannon: Did Don Rumsfeld tell you this story about Ford? If he didn’t – because it’s his story and he’ll tell it better – but Rumsfeld told me this story when I was covering the White House and he was chief of staff. And the story was this: He was tired of hearing from all of his fellow businessmen in Illinois and stuff about how the president was screwing up this and screwing up that, and Rumsfeld scheduled an hour. “Well, here, you’ve got an hour with him. Don’t tell me. Tell the president of the United States. You’ve got this hour this afternoon.” These guys go in and talk to Ford. Afterwards Rumsfeld asked Ford, what did they say? He said, “They told me what a wonderful job I’m doing.” And, of course, the thing is that Ford believed them. And a guy who was tougher and who was more skeptical – Lyndon Johnson as an example – would have asked in a very crude way, what do you really think?

Smith: Two things specifically: when I talk about naïve, for example. It’s hard to get your arms around this. A guy who has been in Washington for twenty-five years. I’ve always believed the pardon was triggered by the first press conference, which was the 28th of August. We talked to people who prepared him and they had a debate beforehand. Ford believed that people were going to want to talk about Cyprus and Turkey and inflation. He literally did believe that.

Cannon: Yes, I know that.

Smith: And people wanted to talk about Nixon. And he came out angry at himself, I think on multiple levels. First, because he hadn’t handled it very well. When he saw the transcript he got angrier. Secondly, because he had been naïve enough to believe all of that. But I also think that that’s what triggered - in some ways it was an emotional decision – that okay, I’ve just been through this evidence that people are obsessed with this man, and it’s not going to go away unless I make it go away. But it raises the question: how could you spend twenty-five years in this town and be around reporters as much as he had, and make such a fundamental misjudgment as to what is news value?
Cannon: Well, I wouldn’t be that hard on Ford on that first press conference. I know what you’re saying is right. I had a discussion with him about, too. But I think it was pretty overwhelming – no matter how long you’ve been in this town – to go from being good old Jerry Ford to being the president of the United States in such a relatively short period. I thought Ford showed a lot of balance. We were talking about Ben Bradlee before. One of the things that happened to me, because I was the White House correspondent for the Washington Post, and we were just shut out by Nixon, so one of the ways in which Ford, very literally figured, I had more access than I needed really. You could see that The Washington Post had been shut out so we’re going to talk to The Washington Post all the time.

And at one of the first interviews I did with Ford – I did several interviews in his short presidency - the fall of Richard Nixon coincided for no reason other than coincidence with an advertising campaign that The Washington Post was running about how I got my job through The Washington Post. And so Ben had one of these mock-ups of this campaign in the office and he wanted me to get Ford to sign it. I was mortified. This was the president of the United States and I shouldn’t be taking this over. I tried to talk Ben out of it, but if Ben got something in his head you couldn’t talk him out of it. So okay, I’ll do it. And I was very embarrassed. And Ford loved it. Ford just loved it. He signed it, he wrote some note to Ben. Ben framed it. I thought these guys were both a little carried away, to put it mildly. But I was just happy that he wasn’t angry at me.

But I think that Ford suffered from something – I don’t think naiveté quite captures it. Lyndon Johnson suffered this in a way, too. And Lyndon Johnson campaigned for the presidency and wanted to be president, that this mode of working to get things done, legislatively - and Tip and Reagan after six, you know, it’s always after six for Tip - and all that stuff, does not lend itself to – there is a congressional mindset: to be successful as a leader in Congress requires a different skill set than to be successful as a president. As a president, you have to be ruthless in a way that if you were that way in Congress, you couldn’t function, you couldn’t exist. And we all knew, those of us in the press corps, when Ford brought some of his own people over, and it was like a coalition government there for a while because you had Nixon people and Ford people.

I hate to say this, I didn’t like to say it then, and since I value Ford so much more than I do Richard Nixon in any way than you can possibly imagine, I hate to say it now, but some of the Nixon people were better than some of the Ford people. Because, first of all, the Nixon people who were there were not part of the criminal conspiracy, but secondly, they were part of the White House and the staff and the presidency and they were used to getting things done. And the Congress – they just simply weren’t. You had people like Hartmann and Rumsfeld could barely tolerate one another, but Ford just simply wasn’t, in my view, an effective executive, but he also didn’t have an executive staff because the people who came over with him had worked in Congress all their lives.

Smith: It’s fascinating you say that because there is a story line, and we’re not trying to write one narrative or another, but a number of people have suggested that the story line of the Ford presidency is that effort to morph, over time, from someone who was clearly of congressional mindset, into an executive. And it has been suggested that Don Rumsfeld, whatever his other shortcomings, was a very good coach. That said, Rumsfeld said, and others have confirmed it, going back to this notion of all the Nixon people, Rumsfeld wanted Ford sooner, rather than later, to clean house. Ford wouldn’t do it.

Cannon: That’s exactly right.

Smith: And Ford wouldn’t do it, in part, because he thought it was unfair to the majority of Nixon people who had nothing to do with Watergate. He, in effect, didn’t want to tar them all with this stigma. And Rumsfeld tried, un成功fully, to suggest to him that you have to look beyond the decent thing to do.

Cannon: It wasn’t just Rumsfeld. Rumsfeld was replaced – it was Rummy’s doing – by Dick Cheney. Dick Cheney, the people who see this, if this clip survives, had better put out of their minds everything they think they know about Dick Cheney. Because Dick Cheney was, I thought he was very good to me, personally, but he was a very good chief of staff. And he was very effective, and he was very effective with the press, and he was very rational and moderate, and soft-spoken, and just think the opposite of what all those things you’ve been thinking about Cheney recently. And Cheney also saw that.

Cheney was somewhat less abrasive than Rumsfeld and more low-key. But he saw many of the same things that Rumsfeld did and he wasn’t any more successful than Rumsfeld was in getting Ford to make changes. Ford simply did not want to – it was more than just not wanting to fire people. I always hate when they say President X doesn’t like to fire people. I’ve never met anybody who liked to fire people, and if I meet him I would hope that he wouldn’t be in a high office anywhere in this land, or any other. But it was more that he didn’t conceive the executive nature of the office. He didn’t conceive of the notion that if you embarrass the office of the presidency, you’ve got to get out of there because there is more at stake than your feelings or this guy’s feelings. What’s at stake is I’m running the country. I don’t think he ever saw himself as really running the country.

Smith: A kind of constructive ruthlessness.

Cannon: Yeah. Well, what it is that Marty Anderson wrote about Reagan: he’s warmly ruthless? I think that that’s what he lacked.

Smith: Although Stockman didn’t get fired.

Cannon: No. But if you look at the way all of the Ford people, and this includes Cheney, I had gone away on a short leave to write a book that came out a long time later. I was in Aspen; I came back and this is in the fall of ’75, and I guess it was from the summer to the fall. And I came back and I remember Dick Cheney asking me, “Do you think Reagan is going to run?” I said, “Dick, this guy has been running, he’s been running for months. He’s got a campaign committee and he’s probably ready to appoint his Cabinet. What do you mean is he running? Of course, he’s running.” And that whole attitude – in a way Ford suffered from the worst of both worlds. He wasn’t the commanding executive president, but he also believed in the notion that you can’t run against a sitting president of the United States. Ronald Reagan – now I’m talking about the content of his message, I’m talking about - he was very radical in the sense that he saw you could run against a president of the United States.

Smith: How did he reconcile that with the Eleventh Commandment?

Cannon: He didn’t. I’ve always said that he simply ignored it. He found faults in Ford that he’d never found in any other leader, because deep down, and he not only didn’t wear his ambition on his sleeve, he’d hid it from everybody, including himself, but he was ambitious to become president. I think it made him a better president than he would have been if he hadn’t been. Ford was not ambitious to become president. Ford’s ambition was to become Majority Leader of the House.

The interesting question about Ford, and I wonder about this and I don’t have the answer, but the question is: Lyndon Johnson, who was a more effective president than Ford – yes Lyndon was undone by the Vietnam War, but he got a lot of things done domestically, and I think the longer we are away from that presidency, the more we see. Lyndon Johnson was Majority Leader. Ford was a Minority Leader. And I’ve always wondered what would have been different if Ford had been Tip O’Neill. If the Republicans had somehow won the House…He had not realized his ambition. He was put on the ticket – he was vice president because the Democrats were afraid of John Connally. They wanted somebody they weren’t afraid of. Jerry Ford was somebody they weren’t afraid of. But the truth was, nobody was afraid of him. And he became president and he accepted what was sort of the prevailing, conventional wisdom.

One of the parts of the conventional wisdom at the time was you couldn’t run against a sitting president. It wasn’t just Reagan, it wasn’t just the notion that they underestimated Reagan. Of course, they did, but everybody underestimated him. Pat Brown did and Jimmy Carter did after Ford, and so Ford is hardly alone in that. Conceptually, they didn’t understand that a person who had been in every state in the country and campaigned for Republicans could certainly be an effective candidate against a person who had represented a single congressional district for all those years. And Ford just did not see that.

Smith: Let me ask you, because there is this sense that Reagan also – consistent with what you say – the Republican Party has traditionally been a more hierarchical party, and that Reagan had convinced himself that after Nixon, he was the natural successor.

Cannon: Well, he’d also convinced himself that Ford wasn’t up to the job. And you needed both of those things in place. And I think Ford was up to job, despite my criticisms of what he did. I think that Ford, as he showed in the Mayaguez. Ford was certainly not a guy you’d have to ask, “Would he do the right thing at three o’clock in the morning?” And I think Ford was learning, and who knows what would have happened if he’d been elected? He would have been elected if he hadn’t pardoned Nixon. I think it was quite clear. He was very, very close to being elected, anyway.

Smith: But counterintuitive history – had you spent those intervening two years with Nixon facing a trial, and Nixon remaining at the center of the American discussion.

Cannon: Well, you don’t really know, but I think – because there are too many variables in that. You don’t know when Nixon would have been tried. What kind of a judge he would have had. Whether he would have… I would have found it hard to think that he would have gone to prison, but who knows?

Smith: Stu Spencer said something really interesting. Very interesting. Stu is convinced in February of ’76, on the eve of the New Hampshire primary, with Ford fighting for his life, Nixon lets it be known that he’s going to China. And Stu, who I don’t think of as a bitter person…

Cannon: He’s not.

Smith: Nevertheless [he] is utterly convinced that Nixon knew exactly what he was doing and that he let the chips fall where they may as far as his successor goes.

Cannon: Well, he went to China in ’74.
Smith: Nixon went in ’76. Right about the time of the New Hampshire primary. Nixon is out of office and he goes back to China and he chooses, literally, the week of the New Hampshire primary to do it.

Cannon: Yeah, I’ve talked to Stu about that. I don’t know. I think Nixon never cared for anybody but himself. The question is: was Nixon trying to hurt Ford? My guess is that he didn’t give a damn. Nixon didn’t have the emotion of gratitude. He should have been so grateful for that pardon that he would have done anything – that he could have found out through an intermediary – he couldn’t have talked to Ford directly, but it would have been easy for Nixon to have found out “Do you want me to go to China?”

Smith: And my sense is from Stu and other people that Nixon didn’t only didn’t feel gratitude, that part of Nixon really resented Ford.

Cannon: Of course you would. Think about it. Here you’ve overcome all these demons and you’ve won the presidency, and you’re Nixon and you always feel – Nixon always felt uncomfortable with athletic people, who everybody liked. You can’t imagine two people that are more opposite than Nixon and Ford. They say Reagan was comfortable in his own skin, he certainly was. Nobody that I’ve ever known in politics was more comfortable with who he was than Gerald Ford. Did he ever have a doubt, was he up nights thinking should I do this or not? I doubt it. He knew who he was and he liked who he was and I liked who he was, and almost everybody who met him did. Nixon didn’t like himself, and most people didn’t like him. And all of a sudden this big lug is in the White House and I’m one step from the penitentiary. How could he possibly have liked him?

Smith: Did you ever talk then or in later years – did you get a feel of how Ford felt toward Nixon?

Cannon: I talked to him about it. I did obits for him/with him and I don’t remember the exact language to be truthful, but I felt that he felt sorry for Nixon. That’s what I think. He felt sorry that it had come to this; that anybody had done what he did. Ford had no doubt that Nixon had done everything that he was accused of and probably more beside, but I think it’s probably the right attitude to have. He had a better attitude about it than I do. His attitude was not that this crook has got his comeuppance; his attitude was: it’s really pretty sad that the president of the United States would – and I know he expressed this to me about Agnew, and what I remember was sort of in the same sentence. We went from Agnew to Nixon – these two guys, they’re in power, why would you do that? I don’t think that Ford understood quite why Nixon had done what he did, and there is a certain mystery to it that we don’t like to admit to ourselves because it’s easy to say…the thing that I’ve always felt that is most convincing to me about Nixon, and the view that I came to about why he kept those tapes, was that he really didn’t believe that anybody else could write history about his own history but him. And I’m quite convinced of that. But I don’t think Ford really – I think he felt it was sort of terrible that somebody that he knew and worked with, and a Republican, and had become president and he just…

Smith: Naïve is such a pejorative, but he sure as hell did a convincing imitation. When we talked he said he was genuinely taken aback that Nixon lied to him.

Cannon: Yes. Oh there is no question about that. He felt there was a sense of betrayal in that, that he felt Nixon had lied to him. But beyond it, we’re talking second thoughts. I noticed that the last time that I – what year was it that Gerald Ford died?

Smith: 2006.

Cannon: So the last time I interviewed him would have been, I think it was 2004. I went up to Beaver Creek, and I had co-written an obituary in The Washington Post on him that didn’t turn out particularly well, but I had done an earlier interview when he was in California when I was a bureau chief for the Post out there and I seen him several times and I thought it was really out of date and I thought that I needed to edit. And I felt in 2004, where the earlier one was twenty years removed, that he had become more magnanimous toward Nixon. That the sense of betrayal wasn’t fresh and he felt more sorry for him as the years went by. I think, if you know Ford as you do, that that would be what you would expect. Right? Because Gerald Ford was not one to hold grudges.
By the way, you’re going to ask me this, so I’m going to say it here, because there was one thing I had resolved to say to you, and I think we have it in the obituary, but it’s the part of the obituary that ran down somewhere among the truss ads and it’s way buried in the thing and I would have made a bigger deal of it if I were kind. And that is, I asked about the Vietnam War, and about his decision and he said that if he had known more, he would have pulled the plug earlier. And I thought that we should have withdrawn before…because at the time, and this is 2004, it’s sort of been building up ever since – there’s this theory how we – even Newsweek did it – how we could have won the Vietnam War. Sure. And I could have climbed Mt. Everest if I was taller and stronger and had more oxygen.

But at the time it was just sort of beginning what I guess would be the conservative, although it isn’t all conservative, second guessing on the war. Had we, instead of pulling the plug, had we sent troops back in, had we done a whole number of things that were impossible. Ford, as he reflected on it, thought what we should have done was get out sooner. And he said something about how he wasn’t politically able to do that. And he knew, by the way, by that time that he had been weakened by the Nixon pardon.

You can get a hundred opinions, of a hundred people in Washington of that day as to whether Ford would have been a good president if he’d been elected in his own right. But I think the strongest argument that I would make in favor that he might have been is that he kept thinking about what it was it had done. He was not a boob, he was a much brighter person than most people realized. He mastered things and I think he would have mastered the office of the presidency, given a chance. But it’s interesting to me that when he thought about the Vietnam War he had reached almost exactly the opposite conclusion of most of the revisionist thinking that was then beginning to take place.

I happen to think he was right. I agreed with Ford’s revisionism that we would have saved lives, and angst and a lot of other things, and maybe even honor if we had withdrawn sooner. Now Mel Laird, who was his closest friend, and Mel Laird takes the exact opposite view of that.
Smith: We talked to Laird. Talk about revisionism. Mel Laird, who loves Ford, but still blames him. Mel Laird has got it in his head that Ford should have gotten that money out of Congress in April, 1975. Laird also has it in his head that he had the solution to the pardon problem. If his friend Jerry hadn’t been so bull-headed, Mel was going to bring members of Congress from both parties to the White House and petition the president to pardon Nixon. The problem with that is, I once spent two and a half hours in a Grand Rapids hotel room war gaming the pardon with Ford. And I went in a skeptic, not about the pardon itself, but about the timing – there must have been a more adroit way to do it. And I came away pretty well convinced that given the poisonous climate of the time, I don’t know how you could have had a trial balloon. It would have been shot down before it reached the trees. Maybe there were alternative ways to do it, maybe Laird’s right, but I don’t know in that climate that rational action was possible.

Cannon: Here’s the thing. Think of the pardon as the equivalent of a wartime decision. Lots of decisions made in war turn out to be the kinds of decisions – you would have gone up this hill, or would you have invaded on this day, or would you have dropped those bombs – and in rational hindsight you can say, yeah, there was a lot better way to do that and we could have lost a hell of a lot fewer people than we lost in Normandy. But that’s imposing hindsight and I think, with all due respect to Mel Laird, who I respect, if he thought that at the time, if he proposed it to Ford at the time, then it seems to me he has a right to make that argument. But I think the whole Nixon thing was so traumatic for the country and everybody involved.

I remember this. I was a White House correspondent and I remember in the last few days I hated going over to the White House. I just hated it. I just felt being a White House correspondent and also being an American and was so damn depressing. I never felt that way any other time in all the years that I worked as a reporter and I’ve been to some terrible catastrophes, plane crashes, the Oakland fires, where people were killed and everything – I never felt – I was in Vietnam briefly – I never felt this except about the White House at that time, that this is a hell of thing.
People like to think – one review of the book that we did after the fall of Nixon compared the people at the Post to a bunch of Indians going around doing a war dance around the fire. That was not the attitude at all at the Post. I don’t recall anybody happy about – yeah, we were happy that we’d been proven right and that Kay Graham, particularly, had been vindicated but I don’t think we were – we weren’t happy that the president of the United States was forced to resign. And I think that it was a sort of national trauma.
And I think that Ford, if you go beyond the “he said, she said,” we could’ve done this, we could’ve done that, that Ford was seeking to heal that trauma.
He did perceive that this was a traumatic event for America. He was the president of the United States. He thought he could heal it in a moment.

Smith: By the way, I’ve always believed that the VFW speech and the Vietnam amnesty, which came two weeks before the pardon, was part of the same plan.
That they are almost inseparable.

Cannon: That’s exactly right. You’re exactly right in thinking that. He was trying to say: “Let’s heal America.” That was what he was trying to do. Now, here’s the argument for why he shouldn’t be elected. I think that Ford did heal America.
You see, I think that Gerald Ford did this so effortlessly that people don’t realize even today – and didn’t at the time realize at all what an achievement it was. Within a few months, we were talking about what we should have been talking about. Yeah, maybe we shouldn’t have been wearing stupid WIN buttons, but we were talking about inflation.

Smith: And you were also writing stories about how dull this presidency was.

Cannon: And yeah, and we were talking about Vietnam, which had to be lanced. We had to withdraw from Vietnam. There was no other way to do it. Whether that was the right time to do, we had to do it. And we were talking about the next president of the United States and it wasn’t too long and we were talking about Reagan and Carter. And I think that Ford brought us back to normalcy.
That he, more than any other person, did that. And I’m not sure that anybody else could have done it that well.
So, yeah, Ford could have done this, he could have done that, we could have done differently. I should have covered him better than I did, but I think that Ford was quite genuine in what he saw. And I think what he saw – he’s not a skilled president, and he’s not a particularly good executive - but there’s a larger part of being president than being an executive. The larger part of president is that you have to be what Harold Laski saw in the presidency. The many sidedness. You’re the tribune of the nation, is I think, Laski’s phrase. And I think he was the tribune of the nation. The nation wanted this healed and those of us who didn’t care for Nixon wanted to heal just as much as the diminishing number of people who really adored Nixon, if there were such – I’m sure there were.

Smith: Broder said he was the most normal person to be president in his lifetime. But he also said something later on, many years after. He said, looking back, Ford, in many ways, at least embodied many of the qualities that people say they want in a president, but perhaps don’t appreciate at the time.

Cannon: Ford is the good American. He’s not only what we say we want in a president, it’s what we say we want in each other. We want people who are responsible, we want people who are honest, we want people who are prepared to make hard decisions and stick by them. We want people who are loyal to their friends. Ford is all of these things and more. Ford is: who do you want for your neighbor? I always used to say the person in the Senate that I most wanted for my neighbor was Scoop Jackson. And I actually got to talk to Scoop Jackson’s neighbor, and it turned out I was right. I think that the guy that I want for my neighbor, if it wasn’t Scoop Jackson, would be Gerald Ford. And this is a guy who did a big thing and he did it in a Ford way, which means it was a clumsy way, but it was authentic. He was the authentic – that was the authentic representative of the people. And I think that history is going to remember Gerald Ford very kindly. I know I do.

Smith: He liked reporters.

Cannon: I think so. I liked him and he liked me. You know, Ford liked people.

Smith: Is that what set him apart from Nixon?
Cannon: Yeah, it set it apart from Nixon. But the thing that set Ford apart from other Republicans, particularly, but also a lot of Democrats, with reporters, is that Ford really didn’t – yeah, he knew what we did for a living – but Ford didn’t make a distinction. It was “reporters are people, too.” Reporters were people. I mean, he treated us the same way he treated you or anybody else. He didn’t have a standard for treating kings and commoners and reporters and non-reporters in different ways. And I think that’s another way in which he was this genuine American.

Smith: In planning his funeral, we wanted to send a couple of messages. One was that one of the eulogists would be a journalist at the cathedral. And, of course, originally it was going to be Hugh Sidey until Hugh passed away, and then it was going to be Tom Brokaw. But we deliberately wanted to send that signal that there was a time, not so very long ago in town, while respecting the adversarial relationship, presidents also respected reporters. And actually enjoyed their company. And the other was, of course, in Grand Rapids, that one of the eulogists would be Jimmy Carter. Which would send its own signal. I’ve often thought that one thing that brought Ford and Carter together was a shared antipathy toward Reagan.

Cannon: Well, that may be. But I remember asking Ford – it was still a most amazing thing to me, campaigning in Michigan in ’80, near the end of the campaign. I remember Bob Hope was on the plane, and I asked Ford, “How can you campaign so enthusiastically for this guy after what he did to you?” And Ford said, “Well, he’s better than Carter.” Don’t forget, Carter – later in life we all hug and kiss and make up – but that misery index of Carter’s, which was really absurd, and then Carter, to this day hasn’t acknowledged the fact that his own misery index was much worse than this thing he invented for Ford. [The “misery index” was a combination of the inflation and unemployment rates.]

But I think that ex-presidents are such an exclusive club, that it’s rare that they don’t find some common ground. I have friends who dislike Carter who say that if the fact that Ford came to like Carter just proves to you that he can like anybody. But I don’t know that that’s true.
I think that the single thing about Ford, and we’ve used this word, and you’ve used this word, is the authenticity of the guy. He’s an authentic American. We’re supposed to forgive grudges, right? And a lot of us don’t, but Ford did. Here’s one other thing about Ford, I hope there is a minute more on this – Ford was willing to do something that most American politicians never do, admit mistakes.

I mean, Ford told me, and I’m sure he told you this, that he made a mistake in dumping Nelson Rockefeller from the ticket, which he certainly did, in my view. And Ford admitted mistakes. He admitted even saying things like we should have gotten out of Vietnam earlier. I can’t imagine – talk about all these other presidents, Carter, Reagan, any Bush – the number of times all of them cubed admitted a mistake is less than Gerald Ford would do in two sentences.

Smith: Was Rumsfeld the architect? Rockefeller went to his grave believing that Rumsfeld was the architect of his departure. Certainly Bush being deep-sixed, in effect, at the CIA and…

Cannon: I think that Rumsfeld was – it depends in the sense in which you say architect. If you say architect – would it have happened without Rumsfeld? Yes. If Rumsfeld had been removed from the ticket because of the conservative movement and the great underestimation of Reagan by Ford. You can’t say he’s so wonderful and then pawn off all of his mistakes on his subordinate. It was Ford’s mistake. First they underestimated Reagan, and then when they got around to it, they panicked, and sacrificing Rockefeller was the result of the panic. Yeah, Rumsfeld wanted to get him off the ticket, but I blame Gerald Ford for that.

Smith: Yeah. Was he more unhappy than the average vice president, from your observation?

Cannon: Oh, I don’t know. I don’t know how to answer that. I think that that office was designed cleverly by the framers to be worthless, as you know. It’s in one of your books, and boy, they succeeded in making it worthless beyond their wildest expectations.
Smith: One of the things that surprised us is how many people close to Ford during that period volunteered the observation of how unhappy he was as vice president, and suggest that that initially fed some of the promises that were made to Rockefeller. That he was, first of all, put in an impossible position of defending Nixon, and at the same time, keeping his own integrity. But even quite apart from that, he was really wasn’t – he didn’t enjoy the vice presidency.

Cannon: How could you? If you look at the people who get to be vice president, if they’ve done anything important, and being minority leader was an important job. If you’ve done something – everyday in the House there was a semi-important decision to make, and in the vice presidency there’s not any important decision to make. You inquire solicitously on the health of the president and preside over the Senate, or in reverse order, but that’s what that job was. And I can’t imagine, even if he didn’t have to dodge the “be loyal to the party and defend Nixon,” but not go overboard, even if he didn’t have that problem, which would drive anybody mad. That office – there’s just nothing there for a man like Gerald Ford, or for any person.

Smith: He and Mrs. Ford would come back to the convention every four years, and they were pro-choice. He is, to this day, I think the only president to actually sign his name to a pro-gay rights petition. The question is: did he change? Did he consciously move left in some way, particularly on social issues, maybe under her influence? I don’t know. Or, did he just stay where he was and the party went so far to the right? Or a combination of the two?

Cannon: I don’t think left/right does it. The Republican Party was, for most of the twentieth century, a libertarian party. We didn’t have the term pro-choice and pro-right, but Barry Goldwater was pro-choice. The bromide that the government should stay out of the bedroom and boardroom was believed as an article of faith by most Republicans and by a lot of people who weren’t Republicans. The greatest agony that Ronald Reagan ever had in office, which he told me and which I described in a lot of detail, was the 1967 abortion rights bill which he signed. And he was being tugged different ways by Stu Spencer and Bill Roberts, and Nancy Reagan and his own Cabinet. His Cabinet – imagine this – you’re the governor of the state of California and you’ve got this abortion rights bill and the Cabinet – your Cabinet – splits on religious lines. So the people who are Catholic are arguing with you to veto the bill and the people who aren’t….you know, thanks a lot guys. Give me some help.

Smith: Where did Mrs. Reagan come down?

Cannon: She lobbied people on stem cell.

Smith: Well, as a matter of fact, one of the people she lobbied was Gerald Ford. And he did a piece. He did an op-ed piece very sympathetic to her position.

Cannon: Deaver had the last word on that, as far as I’m concerned. A conservative said to him, “She said, ‘Ronald Reagan wouldn’t have done that,’” and Dever said, “Well, Ronald Reagan didn’t have to care for Ronald Reagan.”

Nancy Reagan was the daughter of a doctor. Look – all the Republican view, it’s useful to look at the 1967 abortion rights bill that was passed in California because that really is, still at a time when the Republican Party was a permissive party. The Republicans are much more overwhelming in favor of that bill than the Democrats are.

Smith: Because of the Catholic Church?

Cannon: Because it’s split on religious lines, and there are many more Catholic Democrats. And the head of the Judiciary Committee, a very smart man named Donald Grunsky, he said, “Let’s do this now so we can get this over with.” What changed the Republican Party on this issue was Roe v Wade. I’m one of those people who, while being sympathetic to the pro-choice point of view, always felt that Roe v Wade was wrong, and that the right thing was for this thing to have found itself through the legislature so we could have solved, and we could have come to some view. Instead, we cut the people out of it. Roe v Wade just becomes – from then on, the people who want to argue the case are arguing for the courts. And they are arguing for this very elite minority. But if you looked at Ford, he is a product of this same period.
When Goldwater and Reagan and everybody else was a libertarian, and that your differences – and the differences that you had – I think it was better actually - the difference tended to be on religion. You were not saying to a Republican candidate that you’ve got to take this particular view on abortion, or on any issue in order to get the Republican nomination. It was more like the – what’s the parliamentary equivalent – a free vote, where you can vote your conscience in parliament. On abortion and those issues you vote on your conscience. I think that was a much healthier situation. It certainly was a healthier situation for the Republican and Democratic parties. Today we are trying to weed people out of the Democratic Party because they are pro-life. And the Republican Party, we’re making a litmus test in the nominating process.

Smith: John Paul Stevens told us no one asked him at his confirmation hearings…

Cannon: No, he wouldn’t have been asked. But we’re getting this sea-change going on in American politics where social issues that have not previously been a part of party platforms, which were largely a matter of conscience and choice, and so you could have Democrats and Republicans – you had differences that went across party lines – are becoming part of a political catechism, and Ford is caught up in this. Ford is a sort of an early victim.

Now, the other thing, to give the guy I write about, Ronald Reagan, some credit and to give Ford a little more credit, is Ronald Reagan was not a garden variety, Orange County, conservative. Ronald Reagan was the most effective political communicator, arguably, of the twentieth century. So Ford wasn’t up against chopped liver. And the truth is, if some other conservative like John Ashbrook or somebody had been the guy who challenged Ford, Ford would have demolished him. So it’s important to keep in perspective the fact that the guy that almost beat Ford was Reagan, and if you’ve read my books, you know I argue that he made Ford a better candidate.

Smith: I’d like to hear you expound on that.

Cannon: Ford was an utterly inarticulate candidate when he started in ’76. I remember a thing, I think it was somewhere in the Midwest, I think it was in Wisconsin, might have been Minnesota. And they had written in Ford’s speech, because he was giving these very dull, terrible speeches, and they had started to write this in the speech and the sentence was: “and I say to you, this is nonsense.” And it said in the speech “with emphasis” and Ford read it, “And I say to you, this is nonsense with emphasis.” He’s standing next to Cheney and Cheney says, “Well, that’s another thing we can’t do – write instructions in the speech text.”

Ford was a really bad candidate. He’d have gotten clobbered. He’d have gotten clobbered by Carter or anybody else. And at the end of the race, by the time – Reagan really sharpens this guy – and I think if you hear Ford, this inarticulate, dull, in parenthesis, Gerald Ford – in the later stages of the ’76 campaign, he clobbered Carter in the first debate. It was only his damn stubbornness that he refused to admit he’d made a mistake about the Soviet domination of Poland. Scowcroft after the debate gave a briefing, and I asked the first quest. I asked, “How many divisions does the Soviet Union have in Poland?” And stud and Cheney tried for three or four days to get Ford to back down and he wouldn’t.” Ford knew what he meant – that you haven’t conquered the spirit of the Polish people. And in later years, he joked that the had liberated Poland prematurely.

Smith: And he’d been to Poland.

Cannon: He’d been to Poland. And unlike Carter, he didn’t say he had lust for the Polish people because the translation was so bad. Ford really was a completely better campaigner in October in ’76 than he would have been. I just don’t see how he could have – now in an ideal world, he’d have disposed of the Reagan challenge sooner than he did. I think that by the time of the convention, when I think we all knew in Kansas City that if there had been a secret ballot, Reagan would have won and been the nominee. By that time it had begun to hurt him. And I think Reagan hurt him. But he carried California.

Smith: Yes he did.
Cannon: He carried California, so how much more was Reagan…Reagan wasn’t going to win Mississippi for him.

Cannon: I don’t want to say it here, because I think I looked at the number and I think in my revised President Reagan: The Role of a Lifetime, I have the exact number. As you know as a historian, it’s one of these unsatisfying resolutions. He campaigned more than Ford and his people remembered, and less than Reagan and his people remembered. The question is, I think, would Ford have won the election if Reagan had campaigned more for him? I think that’s very hard to argue. The one state that he might have carried if Reagan had gone in tooth and nail, but Reagan didn’t campaign tooth and nail for anybody, even for himself, arguably, was Mississippi.

But I think that the bigger thing working in Mississippi was Carter. Carter was, for some Southerners, what John F. Kennedy was to me. John F. Kennedy proved that a Catholic could win the White House. And Carter proved that a Southerner could win the White House, and in ’76, was a fresh face. We didn’t know what a disastrous president he was going to be, and certainly the good people of Mississippi didn’t have a clue. And I think that Carter won Mississippi. I don’t think Ford lost it. And I don’t think Reagan could have carried it for him.

Smith: Two last things. One thing, Mrs. Ford. What was her impact? One senses, this is a town where everyone likes to fight the last war, and so when the famous Sixty Minutes interview came out there were lots of people in the White House who reflexively said, “Oh my God, what has she done?” And then it took a while, for some polling data to come in, and probably she didn’t help where Reagan was appealing, but that the country had changed, and that in a country that was looking for authenticity, plain speaking candor, that she struck a chord.

Cannon: I think that’s exactly right. And I think something else is important to add. Gerald Ford was known for truthfulness. She went on Sixty Minutes and she knew what she was going to say, but she was also being asked questions. If Betty Ford had lied instead of telling the truth, which she did, I don’t think that would have helped her husband. I don’t think it would have helped the Ford image. The Ford image was one of this guy is an honest guy, she’s an honest woman. I don’t even think that’s a close question. I think that there’s no question that she touched a chord. I don’t know of anybody, even people who didn’t like Ford, or didn’t like him either because they preferred Reagan or because they preferred a Democrat, who was critical of Betty Ford. Everybody that I knew of said she was honest and she was open about it. It seemed to me that it was a plus, but it wasn’t a plus because it was a calculated plus. It was a plus because she was telling the truth.

Smith: Did you know, did other people in the press know that she had a problem?

Cannon: I don’t know what others knew. I had heard that she had had a problem. I’d heard that she had a drinking problem. But in those days, that was off limits to report what spouses or children did. And it still is as far as I’m concerned. I don’t write about a president’s children, or about their spouse. That’s a very old-fashioned virtue, and I know there are people who will hear this among my colleagues who don’t consider it a virtue at all, but I would never dream of it. It’s one thing if you get drunk and fall down in public; it’s another thing if your spouse does.

Smith: Last thing: how do you think he should be remembered? To people who see his name in a textbook, or maybe some grainy film – what is it about Ford that people ought to know?

Cannon: Our country has a way – what is it my father used to say: God looks after drunks, little children, and the United States of America – our country has had a way of thrusting up people who were the right people for the moment. Abraham Lincoln being the supreme example of this, but also I would argue in their own ways, Teddy and Woodrow Wilson and certainly Franklin Roosevelt, and I would say Dwight Eisenhower, who to me is the most underrated president in history. Well, I think that Ford was one of those people. I don’t think you’re going to see very many history books that are going to put Ford in the same paragraph, let alone sentence, of the people I just named, but I think that Ford deserves to be for one reason. And that is that he healed the country at a time that it was desperately in need of healing and was really at a loss. Because our president is so much more important to us because he is always a many-sided person, we’re not prepared for…you know, Truman made this notation that nobody has dishonored this house.
Well, Nixon had dishonored the house. And he dishonored the nation, and we had no clue, really, any of us, no matter what our view was of Mr. Nixon, of how to deal with this. And I think Ford did. And he didn’t do it in a way that was particularly deft, or exhilarating, but he did it in an honest and straightforward way, and I think he’s going to be remembered as a honest man who rescued the United States of America in a moment of need.

Smith: That’s great. Thank you.

Smith: Around the time of the President’s death, what do you think people learned that they maybe should of known, but that they didn’t know?

Downs: Oh, my.

Smith: If you think they learned anything.

Downs: Oh, yes, yes, yes. And it just all happened so naturally, I think it was just a combination of seeing the family and how they conducted themselves, even at the Capitol; having the family there to receive people. That was all pure Mrs. Ford – thinking of doing things like that. I think, though, it happened gradually, Richard. I don’t think it just happened because of the funeral, although that was a great part of it. But it happened gradually as people had time to think. History doesn’t happen, as you know better than anyone, in a short period. And I think enough time had passed for this to happen. The sad part of it is that he’s not here to participate or to see what people are thinking of him now.

Smith: On the other hand, you stop and think – poor Lyndon Johnson, who only lived four years after leaving office. By contrast, President Ford lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his viewpoint on the pardon. Particularly, if you want to pick a moment in time, when the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles in Courage Award.

Downs: Right.

Smith: He said, for twenty-five years, everywhere he went, people asked the same question, and after that event, he said, “They stopped asking questions.” So he had that satisfaction.

Downs: One time, I forget where it was, I was carping at him about something, and he said, “Maria, Maria, the longer it goes, the better we look.” The better we look is what he meant. So, in his own mind, he was beginning to understand that people had completely changed in their views.

Smith: The fascinating thing – because you mentioned about Mrs. Ford – I got dragged in – just on the sideline – I got a call. Originally, he wasn’t going to go to the Kennedy Library. I think in part because he didn’t have the usual politician’s ego, it didn’t hit him how important it was. And I remember getting a call from Ken Duberstein saying what can we do to change his mind? Well, I think in the end it was Mrs. Ford who explained to him what a big deal this was. And, of course, once they went, they had the time of their lives and spoke about it many, many times thereafter.

It’s almost as if she had to be the one looking out for his reputation and vindication and all those sorts of things. He didn’t spend much time worrying about that.

Downs: Well, he never did worry about it – about anything along those lines. I guess I shouldn’t say this, but I will. This was one of the things I carped at him about a few times. I would become so unhappy when I would see how great he was concerning President Carter, and yet you would see President Carter step forward, hold a press conference, take all the credit for whatever they were working on together and not even include President Ford in the press conference. Now that galled me, Richard, for many years. And one night at one of the foundation dinners, I complained to him about this. I said, “You know, President Ford, I have to tell you,” and he said, “Maria, Maria, the important thing is that it gets done. It doesn’t matter who gets the credit for it.” And I thought, oh my lord, you’re a saint. I’m sorry, but I continue to feel strongly that in many instances he was not given the credit deserved.

Smith: Let me ask you about that, because there is a quality in him – there’s the Eagle Scout, which was always there, and the desire to think well of people, which was lifelong. Which are wonderful qualities, hugely admirable qualities. You wonder, though, whether you can be too nice to be president. The historic example of this is, in August of ’74, right after he becomes president, his first press conference at the end of the month, which we now know was a real milestone on the way to the pardon. Because he went into there believing, I think naively believing, that everyone would want to talk about Cyprus and Turkey and inflation and unemployment and the economy, all the things that he was immersed in. And of course, the only thing they wanted to talk about was Richard Nixon – his tapes and his papers and his legal prospects. And Ford didn’t handle it very well. He left angry, mostly at himself, but I think also at the press. And we now know that that was a milestone, as I say, in his decision that if everyone is going to be obsessed with this - plus the Jaworski office was telling the White House that it would be two years before there could be any trial.

Well, the rest is history. How do you explain that quality? How do you describe it as other than naiveté? For someone who had been in this town as long as he had, to go into a roomful of reporters and think what he thought.

Downs: I’m not sure what his relationship was with the media when he was a Congressman. I think he had a fairly decent relationship with them.

Smith: I know he had a reputation for being very accessible.

Downs: Yes. So he probably was shocked to have them turn on him like vipers, really. They took out a lot of their hatred of Richard Nixon on him.

Smith: He had grown accustomed to the press corps that he knew on Capitol Hill, and with whom he had very good personal and professional relations. It’s not surprising that maybe he transferred that…

Downs: To his thinking of what it was going to be like at the White House. In his mind, he felt, “I’m straight with them. I’m a straight shooter. I’ve made myself accessible.” What’s good for the goose is good for the gander. It just wasn’t that way. I don’t think there was any naiveté there at all. There was a gentleman who may have been very calm and cool and collected, but he always knew what was going on – knew more about what was going on than most people.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that because there is also a school of thought, from more than one person that we’ve talked to, who thought that he sort of made his innocence work for him. In other words, he understood how some people looked upon him, and he actually put it to work – leaving the impression that maybe he didn’t know as much as he actually knew. Which can be a very useful device in some circumstances.

Downs: Well, don’t you learn that up on Capitol Hill, Richard? Going back to when he and Ev Dirksen were so close, you go back to some of those little duets that they had. He was a showman in a very nice, low key way. He knew what was going on.

Smith: Where were you in the summer of ’74?

Downs: Summer of ’74? When the Watergate took place?

Smith: As we approach the transition.

Downs: I was still in the West Wing. Anne Armstrong was President Nixon’s counselor. Anne had decided to return to Texas and I was wrapping up some details in our offices. But we were there during the entire period - when President Nixon resigned and had the farewell in the East Room

Smith: What was the mood like in the West Wing during those days? Can you think of a moment when you thought, “He’s not going to make it?” Try to take people back in time – people who weren’t around this town at that point, and give us a sense. Was it a surreal atmosphere in the White House, or was it business as usual – or what was it? And I would imagine when the tapes came out, that must have been a very significant milestone in terms of survivability.

Downs: We were in the West Wing, our offices were in the West Wing, and our neighbors were Dean Burel, Mel Laird, George Schultz, and Bryce Harlow were there.

Smith: Tell us about Bryce Harlow, because he’s a legendary figure.

Downs: He was just a magnificent person. An anchor for everyone.

Smith: Wise Man?
Downs: Very, very wise. And a lovely person. I know Ann and he became close friends, and I recall a couple of tragedies that happened when she was in the West Wing – personal ones – and I remember the first person I would run to would be Bryce, to get his advice as to what to do and how to handle things. He was probably one of the shrewdest people around. But if you were his friend, that was it. He was just marvelous. I think they completely lost the mold after him.

Dean Burch was always there for us. When you asked about what was the mood like? I don’t know. I think a lot of those people realized when the tapes came out, what was ahead.

Smith: Were people surprised by the language on the tapes? That’s what we keep hearing. It’s almost less the content, but that people were surprised by the language that the President used.

Downs: I don’t think that group up there was. I don’t think he ever used language like that around Anne, or any time I was around. He was very charming, he really was.

Smith: Really? Now tell us about that. That’s interesting.

Downs: Many times when he was headed over to his office in the EOB, he used a little staircase going between the second floor and down to the first floor and over to the EOB. For some reason I kept running into him on that staircase, and I’d back off to let him pass and he’d say, “After you, ladies first.” He was very considerate. Every time I was around and something happened – I think I mentioned this to you before, Richard, that we were with him in New Orleans when there was an assassination attempt, and I don’t think it was ever publicized.

Smith: No. What?

Downs: I was there with Anne, I don’t recall the event, and she was giving a press briefing and the Secret Service came to the briefing and said, “Maria, you and Anne have to get out of here.” The agent said, “Come on down to the car.” And I said, “But we’ve got our things at the hotel.” And he said, “No, no, you’re going out to the plane.” We were scheduled to go to San Clemente from New Orleans with the President. And he said, “We’ll take care of your things. We’ll get your luggage and other things for you.” And they whisked us out to the airport. Everybody was out there. We got on the plane and left for San Clemente. So apparently, it was a very serious threat. If there was something reported about it, I didn’t know. I was out in San Clemente then and maybe they didn’t cover it, or who knows what.

When we got on the airplane, there was a door between the President’s cabin and the first part of the staff cabin, and the press section was behind us. And the door kept opening. I didn’t see one of the stewards so I remember putting my foot out so the door wouldn’t open and the press could look into his cabin. Someone kept trying to open the door, and I kept putting my foot up again and again. And all of a sudden I thought, “Maybe it’s somebody who wants in here.” And it was President Nixon. And he said, “They’ve got to fix that door.” And then he said, “How is everybody? Is everybody alright?” And he walked around, just around the staff cabin, and he asked again, “Is everybody okay?” Then he turned and went back into his cabin and I think he just kind of waved at the press a little, but he turned around and went back into his cabin.

Smith: Do you think he was a shy man?

Downs: In some ways, yes, I believe so. I’m sorry that I never did get to know him a lot better. But what I did know of him was very kind and very considerate.

Smith: Now on the morning of August 9th, his departure and the President’s swearing in – were you in the East Room for those events?

Downs: Yes.

Smith: What was the mood like when the Nixon’s came in?

Downs: It was awful. It was just so sad, Richard, it really was almost unbearable. I remember looking a couple of rows ahead of me, and I saw Dean Burch sitting there - Bryce was there in the same row. I was with the counselors. I don’t remember Anne being there, to be honest with you. I think she was back... in Texas. But I remember Dean Burch had his hands up and his head down. It was too much to bear. And Rog Morton, all of his senior people, were numb.

Smith: The tension must have been like the cliché “thick enough to cut with a knife.” Nothing like this had ever happened before. You were an eyewitness to a unique event in American history, and hopefully something that will never be repeated. Was it a real palpable sense of history in that, was it more at a personal level?

Downs: More at the personal level, as far as I was concerned. I think many of the people in that room felt that way. I remember when we left the East Room and walked out towards the helicopter, and Rog Morton, I remember him racing towards the helicopter as it took off, with tears streaming down his face. It was just extremely sad. We weren’t thinking of anything historic or what had happened before.

Smith: You can understand in that very personal context, why Mrs. Ford would say later that it was the worst day of her life.

Downs: Yes, I believe it was.

Smith: Something else though. We’ve heard from several people, and it’s perfectly understandable. People who were in the East Room for the swearing in, and I think afterwards there was a receiving line and a reception in the State Dining Room. People were invited to that. And some have indicated, more than one, that you could see the Nixon people sort of peel off and go back to their offices. Which, again, under the circumstances, is understandable.

But it raises the larger question: how much a challenge was it for the new president and his people to be integrated with the existing staff? And to decide, okay, how do we provide change and continuity? The President apparently made it clear that the vast majority of these people had nothing to do with Watergate. They shouldn’t be tarred with guilt by association. Which, again, is a generous response on his part. But it might not be necessarily the politically and most advantageous. What was your sense of the different camps, for lack of a better word? As someone who traversed that divide – were there tensions between some of the Nixon people and the incoming Ford people.

Downs: Yes, that’s human nature. But I guess it was later because it was when I was social secretary, one of the things that Mrs. Ford insisted that I do was to attend the senior staff meetings every morning. She said, “You’re my representative.” I don’t think, at that time, there were many of the old Nixon people left. There were a few – not many. The emotions at the time you’re talking of, were just so raw. And I’m sure that they – the very senior staff – probably got directives to be a little more cooperative. That was just understood.

Smith: Was there any sense – we talked to Al Haig, which was a fascinating experience in itself. Talk about friction. He and Hartmann, from day one, it was almost as if they were put on the planet to annoy each other. And they succeeded. Was that something that you were aware of?

Downs: You mean as far as Haig was concerned?

Smith: Yeah. Was that kind of in the air around the West Wing at that point? That there was this tension surrounding Haig and the newcomers. And Haig’s desire to stay on.

Downs: I was much more involved with General Haig just prior to that time, and it was such a different atmosphere. Everybody knew we were in trouble, but everybody still hadn’t given up. And you were more or less cooperating with everybody, and working together. And that went for General Haig, too. But afterwards you get into a competitive mode and the survival thing, and Anne had left by then, so I wasn’t privy to a lot of that. I came back into the picture with Mrs. Ford.

Smith: Now, how did that happen? Anne leaves, did you have something set when she left?

Downs: No, one of our responsibilities had been the Bicentennial, and I’d done a great deal of work on the various programs comprising the celebration. I was working with Milt Mitler to acquaint him of those programs. American’s birthday was around the corner and Americans and people worldwide wanted to come to our country and wish us a happy birthday. During that time one of the senior people called me and said, “Oh, Maria, you know, Mrs. Ford is looking for a social secretary.” I said, “No, but okay,” I knew Lucy Winchester stayed over to assist Mrs. Ford when she first came to the White House. Afterwards I heard that it wasn’t working out with Nancy Rowe, so it didn’t surprise me that they were making a change. I said, “Okay, if you’ll let me think about it, I’ll give you a call back with recommendations.” And this person said, “No, no, I’m talking about you.” And I said, “Oh, no, not me.” As you know, Richard, none of us think we’re capable of doing the job. And he said, “Oh, that’s too bad. Your name is in the hopper, so you have no choice.” So that’s how it started.

Smith: Do you know who put your name in the hopper?

Downs: Yes, a couple of people.

Smith: Okay. Without your knowledge?

Downs: Yes.

Smith: So is this the first meeting with Mrs. Ford, when you sat down and talked about the job? Had you ever met her before?

Downs: I had met her when I was at the Republican National Committee (RNC) working with Anne Armstrong, you might remember, Richard. She was very interested in the programs that we were involved with. I knew her, but did not have a very close relationship. But enough so that she knew my name and always came to visit and talk about our programs.

Smith: So, then, how did you land the job?

Downs: Three interviews and nine hours of interviewing later.

Smith: Three interviews?

Downs: Three different interviews. Mrs. Ford knew exactly what she was looking for, and the last interview she asked if I would map out a State Dinner. She said, “Choose whomever you would like, but give me all of the details. Go into the Smith: It is an interesting request. It suggests a certain sophistication and experience. Of course, she’d been around town for a long time, and presumably been to a lot of these affairs. It takes someone who had really thought about the internals.

Downs: I think she enjoyed that part of it. She told me once that she thought that I had the best job in the White House. And I said, “I think the President does, Mrs. Ford.” And she laughed and she said, “No, you do.”

Smith: Do you think maybe she was a frustrated social secretary herself?

Downs: Not frustrated, just interested. She got involved in every little detail about the House.

Smith: What was the standard, the interest that she…

Downs: Well, you must remember, between the time that her social secretary left and I came onboard, she had a little State Dinner take place. It was for the Emperor and Empress of Japan. If you talk about really having a trial by fire, this was it. We usually used round dinner tables at State Dinners, but this dinner had the very formal e table, and everything that went with it. And she just ate it up.

Smith: Really?

Downs: She really did. We talked a lot about it during the interviews. She had told me that this dinner was coming up and said, “I don’t think that there’s going to be any way that you’ll be onboard on time,” but we discussed it. She called me the day of the dinner and said, “Be sure you go down to the State Dining Room and look at everything and let me know if you see anything that not’s right, or whatever.” And when I went on the State floor, nobody knew she had chosen me, and Rex came out of his office – Rex Scouten, the chief usher – and kind of looked at me strangely – a ‘what are you doing here?’ type thing. And when I told him Mrs. Ford had asked me to look in, Rex gave me free rein. I went around and looked at everything but said and did nothing. Mrs. Ford had done this dinner completely by herself.

Smith: Really?

Downs: Yes.

Smith: That’s very interesting. Do you know whether there were any other candidates for the job?

Downs: For my job?

Smith: Yeah.

Downs: Yes, quite a few.

Smith: She was interviewing other people?

Downs: She interviewed other people. I said quite a few, but maybe three or four others.

Smith: Did she ever tell you why she chose you? What it was about you or your experience in the interviews that did the trick?

Downs: Not really. I guess we just hit it off together.

Smith: I’m sure it’s a job where chemistry is critical, personal chemistry.

Downs: Very much so, because there she is, all by herself in this tower, and after being burned a few times by things she had said to friends in confidence. I think she learned it was a different ballgame. She had a lot of friends and a lot of things going when he was in Congress. And I think she talked and did things there with other Congressional wives, and other administration wives. But it’s different when you’re a First Lady. Particularly when she found out a few times, that it comes back and bites you. So she was very careful, and at times she needed a confidant, and she needed somebody that could turn to her and say, “Well, that’s not right. That’s not the way it should be done,” but do it with a little finesse – do it with friendship.
Smith: It’s interesting that you say that because Rex said, of course, he was a great admirer of Mrs. Ford, he just really likes her a lot. He said that – obviously she saw more of the President because his office was a few hundred feet away – it wasn’t like during those Congressional years when he was on the road so much - but even then, Rex said that many times she just wanted someone to talk to. And she’d get him down there for something and then just want to talk.

Downs: Yes.

Smith: And he sensed someone who was lonely.

Downs: Yes that’s true. I remember one day when she was quite angry and I said, “What’s wrong?” There was the Washington Star on the table and she said, “Look, they are even picking on Liberty!” They had a picture of Liberty and her five pups and the story was that they were selling the pups. Well, that was nothing further from the truth. They gave one of the pups to the Seeing-eye Dog Foundation and the others went to friends. But she was really incensed because they were picking on Liberty. And the President was the same way about Liberty. You can mess with me but not my dog.

Smith: Or my kids…

Downs: Yes, but the dog was really off bounds…the kids, too.

Smith: Was it difficult for any of the kids? Susan had her prom there. For a family that was in so many ways normal, and is suddenly tossed into this very abnormal environment, with constant scrutiny and the Secret Service and everything else. Did you see kind a transition? Did they ever get completely used to it? Was it difficult, challenging, fun? How would you assess it?

Downs: Well, I think the kids, after a while, got accustomed to it. Susan, maybe enjoyed…that isn’t the right word, but she took to the responsibility. And as she has done throughout life, has made the best of it. She was great, particularly when Mrs. Ford became ill and she had to represent her.

Smith: That’s a great story, isn’t it? Susan said, before they went in, she didn’t want to move into the White House. And one reason was, she thought she couldn’t wear jeans anymore. The irony of this girl who says, “I’ll go, but I’m going to keep my jeans,” putting on this evening gown and gloves…

Downs: I always will remember Susan fondly – the exuberant one, I called her and the most helpful and willing to do whatever needed doing.

Smith: Now, were you in the job when that happened?

Downs: No. Given that we were in that proximity there, you always would see them. There’s just one thing about the Fords as a couple that came across strongly all during the time I was serving them – I know that Mrs. Ford had some very lonely times there, but she also had some grand times particularly when she was working on the social events. I remember she and the President used to take a guest list for a State Dinner, and would go over it together and when it was returned to me their personal notations were priceless.

Let me walk you through the routine. First, we compiled the guest lists from input from various senior staff and State Department. I’d go over it with Mrs. Ford in great detail, and she’d ask, “Why is this person on the list, and why is this one on the list?” They were that much into the detail of it, and then Dick would go over it with the President before, and then the two of them would get together and add, delete, do whatever they chose. But the President always kept his little notebook with a list of people he would like included. They were never pushy about “this person has to be included.” They would recommend the people that they thought would be the best match to whoever was coming to dinner. I remember a couple of times thinking that the people who were picked out as being the stars of the dinner, not because they were celebrities, but were people of interest were the ones that they had suggested.

Smith: Really? It’s interesting, the stories early on, the symbolism of making sure the White House was once again open to everyone. Inviting George McGovern to a stag dinner, and bringing the Congressional Black Caucus into the Oval Office, and George Meany, people like that. Did that continue on into the administration?

Downs: Oh yes, they were very aware and were very involved – we silently had our categories of people. Not the obvious Congressional, etc., just the little niches of people. During the primaries, elections and other campaigns, the President always wanted to make sure that the Democrats were represented.

Smith: I assume Tip O'Neill was a frequent [visitor].

Downs: Oh, yes. But we also had fun with the guest lists. Once I said to the President, “You had a corner on baseball catchers.” I looked back over my guest lists and he had suggested Joe Garagiola, Johnny Bench, Yogi Barra, about four or five baseball catchers. I said, “You must have a thing about catchers.” He said, “They are very important, Maria.” He would take out his little lists every once in a while and feed me these treats.

Smith: Did he like athletes, especially? As a category, making sure they were invited to events?

Downs: Yes. Not make sure, he would just say it would be nice…and you wanted to make these events as pleasant for him – and her – as you possibly could, so you tried to surround them with people they enjoyed.

Smith: We know about her interests in the arts, how did that express itself? Particularly, for example, in the selection of entertainers and the like?

Downs: I kidded her once, saying, “Everybody else here reads the Nation or The Economist. You and I read Variety and Billboard.” And she said, “Well, it’s the best way to stay on top of what all these celebrity-types are doing.” She was very attuned to being ahead of what was happened, as far as that segment of society.

Smith: She knew that politicians got so wrapped up in their lives that they often are totally cut off from what you and I would call popular culture. My sense was that she was much more attuned to everyday life.

Downs: Yes, she very, very much was. And she also knew who was the right admixture. She wouldn’t go overboard. One time – who was it that I asked her if it would be alright to propose for the guest list? I mentioned Jack Nicholson and she said, “I don’t think so, Maria.” But he was the only one that she ever hesitated over.
Smith: Was Chevy Chase ever invited?

Downs: I think he was, Richard. I’m not sure, but I think he was. But there were a lot of people that were surprised to receive invitations, let’s say.

Smith: You talked about her and the paper and the dog, did she ever say anything regarding, not exactly Chevy Chase, but the comics and their lampooning of the President and his athletic abilities? That must have been a sore point.

Downs: I would imagine it was a sore point to the President.

Smith: The dichotomy between this extraordinarily gifted athlete, and the caricature that some in the press and the pop culture put out, that must have been a source of frustration or anger for the Fords – Mrs. Ford, the kids.

Downs: Yes, well, particularly – obviously the President – I’m sure that really cut him more than anybody will ever know. Betty Ford would take everything in stride, and I’m sure she would kid him about it a lot, herself. But deep down, it hurt, the kids and everybody. But you go with the flow, Richard.

Smith: We were talking about the pop culture. You think of the Ford presidency and you think of – in part because of Jack – but George Harrison was here, Andy Warhol was here. Do you remember any of those?

Downs: Yes, and Bianca Jagger. That was one of the most famous, Richard.

Smith: What was that like? Did the President know who those people were?

Downs: I imagine he did. That’s the way they were. That’s family life.

Smith: What did Mrs. Ford enjoy the most about living in the White House?

Downs: I think she got to enjoy almost everything after a while. The unfortunate thing about her White House years were that she was in so much pain during so much of the time she was there.

Smith: Tell us about that.

Downs: I got to see quite a bit of that whenever we had an event on the State Floor, which was often – she used to appear at all receptions and events. I would usually go up to the family quarters brief her before the event and ride down in the elevator with her. Many times she would be in the bathroom putting on her makeup and I’d sit on the edge of the tub there and we’d talk. And when, we’d get in the elevator to go downstairs, you knew she was hurting, sometimes she’s even put a pack on her neck. But the minute the door of the elevator would open, she’d throw her shoulders back and she’d smile and it was like nothing hurt. It had to take its toll on you.

Smith: Willpower.

Downs: Willpower, exactly. She was on stage, really, at that point. But I don’t think people realized. And the other thing was that we had so much going on all the time, Richard, she couldn’t – I don’t think she had a chance to sit back and really enjoy a lot of the things she should have. Just that last year in the White House, as you’ll remember, we had the primaries, she was so involved with the ERA, we had the convention, we had the Bicentennial, and then we had the election. And if you had one or two of those, it would have been more than enough. And if you were in 100% condition, it would have been fine. But she kept going on and on. She never missed anything that I know of, and she just always was on top of things. It was tough. It was a very, very difficult time for her, let’s say, physically.

Smith: It’s interesting you say they weren’t pushy about guests for dinners, which is not to say that people outside the White House weren’t pushy. I think particularly of the famous dinner for the Queen in 1976. Tell us about that event – the preparations and the event itself. Was that the most memorable Bicentennial event?

Downs: Of the Bicentennial dinners? We had so many. I think it started with Emperor Hirohito. He was at the very, very early part of the celebration. And then Anwar Sadat was a big deal because we had not had an Egyptian leader since Nassar.

Smith: And clearly, Sadat and Ford just hit it off. Everyone associates Sadat with Jimmy Carter, but before that, there clearly was a very special relationship between Presidents Sadat and Ford.
Downs: And it opened up the door to a lot of what happened, I think. Mrs. Ford would drop hints that they were really getting into some discussions that would just be wonderful for the country and the world if they come to fruition.

Smith: And wasn’t that the event where Pearl Bailey got the President to dance?

Downs: Yes. She did.

Smith: Which, I guess, is politically sensitive where he comes from.

Downs: I would say it was. We got our briefing from the State Department and, of course, it had no for religious reasons, no this, no that or the other.

Smith: Including alcohol?

Downs: Yes, there was wine served, but not to them. They didn’t drink. But I remember saying to Pearl - I knew her fairly well – and I said, “Pearly, you know President Sadat isn’t supposed to dance.” And she said, “Oh, okay,” and smiled. The entire evening was really very spontaneous, Pearl got Omar Sharif up on stage and I think she planned to twirl him around a few times. Sharif wouldn’t dance. He stood there and let her sing Lara’s Theme from Zhivago to him, but when she tried to maneuver him into the dancing, and that didn’t work. And he was kind of shy in his own way, and got off the stage quickly. In fact he wasn’t actually on the stage – just the peripheral of it.

I saw Pearl kind of look around and get that mischievous look on her face and she walked over and began singing to President Sadat. She knew him from Egypt. She had been awarded the highest honor given by the Egyptian government by him. It had been presented to her the year before. So she knew him, and she knew all the customs. But anyway, she sashayed around and just kind of wrapped an arm around him and before he knew it he was up on his feet, and it wasn’t actually dancing, it was more going around and around. Of course President Ford was sitting there and he said, “Well, here’s Mrs. Sadat sitting here,” so he thought the gentlemanly thing to do was to get her up on the dance floor. And he went a few twirls around the floor with her.

I remember looking at Henry Catto, our chief of patrol, and when he was ready to escort them back to Blair House, I said, “Oh, Henry, please test the waters and let me know what kind of apology we need to send or what we need to do. I’ll wait to hear from you.” He returned with this big smile of his face and he said, “Not to worry, Maria. I mentioned to President Sadat that we hadn’t planned to have you dance.” And he said, “I never learned to dance when I was a young man. I never had the opportunity or the money. So I’m really not comfortable dancing.” But he said this was amongst friends. Henry was happy. No apologies necessary.

Smith: And what was it about Pearl Bailey? Where did that relationship come from? Because it lasted as long as she was alive, I take it.

Downs: Oh, yes. Oh they had been friends, they apparently knew each other from the Congressional days. They became very close friends. In fact, they called each other sister. Mrs. Ford spoke with her often on the phone, and when Pearl moved to Washington, to return to school at one point, they saw more of each other. She loved Pearl like a sister. Pearl was a very unusual woman, a very deep woman. And I remember that Mrs. Ford felt very close to her and to Louie, her husband. In those days, interracial marriage was not a common thing. But it just never entered into the picture with them, although I know Mrs. Ford mentioned several times, that you could tell when Pearl was not happy – not that she complained or anything, but she just wasn’t Pearl. I asked, “What’s happening with Pearl?” And she would say, “It’s her children. She’s having some problems with them.” I say that because that’s how close the relationship was.

Smith: And it extended to President Ford as well.

Downs: Very much so, yes. They were friends.

Smith: She actually was on the election eve broadcast they taped, I think, on Air Force One - Joe Garagiola and Pearl Bailey.

Downs: Mrs. Ford said that after they realized that they had lost the election and everybody was just beside themselves, Joe started to cry. She said, “But, Maria, I mean he was crying uncontrollably. “We thought they were there to console us, Jerry and me, and we were the ones that had to in turn, help them.” I thought that was the story of their life, actually. She was always helping somebody else – an omen of whether life was to be.

But getting back to the Queen’s dinner; that was a dinner and a half, as they say. There was a terrible storm shortly before the dinner was to start that caused the loss of four or five trees on the grounds. We planned dinner in a tent in the Rose Garden, primarily because Mrs. Ford didn’t want to close the House down to public tours during all the Bicentennial for dinner preparations. When the storm hit and I had visions of ending up on grounds of the monument. Dear Dick Cheney, realized what was happening he sent the troops down. He said, “Go out and see if Maria needs some help out there in the tent.” So people came out from the West Wing and we literally battened down the hatches.

The storm subsided as the Fords were waiting to greet the Queen and Phillip. They got into the elevator to go up to the Yellow Oval Room for an aperitif. The elevator door opened and there stood Jack Ford: bare feet, and bare chest in search of studs for his dress shirt. Mrs. Ford said to me later, “I wanted to die. Here’s the Queen with her tiara and Jerry and I and everybody, white tie, and here’s Jack standing there big as life.” And she said, “Your Majesty, I am so sorry, I’m so embarrassed.” And the Queen laughed and said, “Don’t worry about it, I have one just like it at home.”

But all through those state dinners President Ford had the primaries going on and lot of them and he was very close – he may have been there physically, but mentally his mind was on what was happening in the political arena. Fortunately, he had won quite a few of them at that point. I don’t remember which primary was going on at the Queen’s dinner, but he excused himself at one point to go upstairs and find out what was happening, to get briefed on what was happening.

Smith: Maybe it’s an urban legend, but the story has grown over the years, that there was a disproportionate number of uncommitted Republican delegates who were invited to the Queen’s dinner.

Erik: Could Maria tell us about the gift exchange?
Downs: Well, part of the day of the Queen’s dinner was a private luncheon for the Queen, Phillip and the President and Mrs. Ford. No other staff, just them and that was the time that they took to exchange gifts. Mrs. Ford had been very thoughtful and very careful in the selection of gifts for the Queen. The official gift was a beautiful bronze equestrian statue, I forget the name of the artist now, a very well-known western artist.

Smith: Remington?

Downs: No, it wasn’t a Remington. We had Remingtons all around the house that were lent to us, but this was more contemporary. He is a very fine artist, I’ll think of it later. But when it arrived they had it on a turnstile going round and round. When we placed it upstairs for the presentation at the luncheon, we looked at it and felt it was kind of hokey going round and round while they are having lunch, so I asked the butler to unplug it. Well, in the briefing that Mrs. Ford had, it was stated that it was supposed to rotate.

So when the President and Phillip looked at the gift the President said, “That’s supposed to go around and around,” and they are standing there looking at it, and then the two of them got down on their hands and knees looking for the place to plug in the statue.

The butler came running downstairs saying, “Boy are you in for it now.” “You know that unplugging?” he said. “They plugged it back in finally. But, it took a while for them to find it.” But all gifts Mrs. Ford chose for the children were really magnificent, but they were not expensive. She chose American Indian silver jewelry that we had the Interior Department find for us from the different reservations and one of Susan’s photographs was framed and Princess Anne was given a silver belt buckle for her riding pants. Mrs. Ford put a lot time and effort into the gifts.

Smith: Tell me about the Fords relations with their staff – the people who were there administration after administration.

Downs: Very good, very, very nice. After they left the White House I remember asking Mrs. Ford what she missed the most, and she said Rex and his people. Rex and his people were the butlers and the maids and the domestic staff. I remember a gentleman that helped me on my staff, Fred Jefferson, who came to the White House with President Eisenhower. He had been with him overseas when he was the Supreme Commander. When Mrs. Eisenhower was First Lady, Jeff would take the mail upstairs to her and she would sit with her coffee, and tell Jeff how she wanted letters answered, and he’d go on down to the secretaries and said, “Mrs. Eisenhower wants to tell these ….”

Jeff was like family with us. He drove for us, but he’d also get things ready for parties. He helped me with whatever came up. He was kind of a man for all seasons. One of the nights that Jeff was butlering a private party, I forget what the occasion was, but it was also during the World Series, and President Ford wanted to get away to go watch the game. Jeff looked in on him to see if there was anything he wanted before he left and the President said, “Yes, sit down and watch the game with me.” And Jeff said he felt kind of funny and tried to leave several times. The President would say, “Sit down, you’re finished,” he said, “Sit down and enjoy the game.” So Jeff stayed as long as he felt he could. But that was the way that they were with the staff.

I remember Mrs. Ford telling the seamstress how she wanted something fixed - she’d always remember, go back and check, and she’d say, “This is better than when it was new.” Mrs. Ford was that way about many of her personal things. I guess when you grow up without a lot of money, it’s very difficult to change. I know that from a personal background. You don’t all of a sudden start casting things aside because you’re the First Lady. She was quite frugal.

Smith: And clothes mattered to her, didn’t they?

Downs: Yes, very much so. One of the maids was an excellent seamstress and she would help her with things. But they just liked those people. I think someone told me that during the Nixon years the staff - I think it was Rex - that the staff had been told to be very low key and not to get into it too much with the family. It was just their way. It’s not to say it was right or wrong. The Fords were completely the opposite, they would talk with them and have them sit down. But it was this way with all the staff.
Mrs. Ford was her own chief of staff. She didn’t choose to have a chief of staff. So many times I would see staff go to her with personal problems and I just felt that we were here to serve her and besides she had enough on her plate, and here they are telling about this and the other. One time I made a very flippant remark to Mrs. Ford about it. I said, “We’re here to take care of you, it’s not supposed to be visa versa sometimes.” And she said, “Oh, Maria, there’s room and there’s time for everything.” That was from the very early days. But look what it led to, Richard, with the Betty Ford Center.

Smith: Well, that’s true. How did people in the White House first view the famous Sixty Minutes interview? The conventional narrative is that the political types are always fighting the last war – they saw the down side. They didn’t anticipate the polls coming in, or the second wave of mail as a lot of people found it very refreshing. What was your sense? Did she ever regret it?

Downs: She did so to me.

Smith: She did?

Downs: Yes. She didn’t make a big thing out of it, saying it was awful - but she said, “I really wish many times that I had not done that interview.” But she was put in a very awkward position by her press secretary. In those days, you could lay ground rules, particularly about a President and First Lady, with the press. And either they agree with you or you didn’t do the interview. I used to do that with Anne Armstrong during the Nixon administration. In those days some things were just off limits and if they wanted the interview badly enough, they would go along.

But you protected them, which wasn’t done in her case by her press secretary. But I think that Mrs. Ford being put in that position wouldn’t sit there and lie about it. It was a very natural thing for her to respond in the way she did. I think that she and the President felt that way, perhaps the people the President had around him saw the dark side of it more than the other. But it was bound to turn out well because she was very sincere in what she said, and very honest.
Smith: Well, in retrospect it became the personification of his attempt as President to clean the place up and restore trust and be candid with people. She had her own agenda of openness.

Downs: Yes, she did, very much so.

Smith: I assume she took some heat for it though, too.

Downs: It’s an unknown fact there that some of the people in the West Wing were a bit afraid of Mrs. Ford. And I saw that with respect. In one of the long interviews we had before she chose me, she went into depth about the West Wing and how we would work with them. She was very cognizant of the situation and how it had been under most administrations. She said, “I realize that you know all these people because you and Anne worked in the West Wing. And she asked questions like, “Could you go to bat against them?” And I thought isn’t that strange that she should focus so on the West Wing. She later said, “Well, I have to tell you the reason that I’m asking you all these questions is that during the time when I was without a social secretary, certain people felt that they should have control of the guest lists and moved very actively to gain it and had made inroads. And in my mind I could see what our State Dinners would turn into, Maria,” and she said, “They wouldn’t be what the President wants or I want. It’s very important to me that we continue to hold our own in that area.”

Smith: That’s fascinating.

Downs: She never told me who the players were. During one of the conventions and I suggested to Bill Timmons who was ____________ Mrs. Ford could and would help him. “Why don’t you just talk to Mrs. Ford about it? She likes you.” She did like Bill very much. And I said, “Just level with her and we’ll get it solved.” And he said, “Oh, no. Oh, no.” He wouldn’t touch it with ten foot pole. Several other people in the West Wing, high up in the administration, always kind of pussyfooted around up there. And that may be, it may just have been feeling that she is the First Lady.

Smith: The bosses’ wife.
Downs: Exactly.

Smith: But, also there were those unfortunate stories about how badly in some ways, Mrs. Nixon had been treated. And obviously that must have been out - it was known to people around and…

Downs: And Mrs. Ford was cognizant of Mrs. Nixon’s treatment. There was a couple of times I think she was talking about some of the State Department people, and she said, “They’re not going to lead me around like they did Pat.” So, that harkens back to the time when she was a congressional wife and the wives all talked about it.

Smith: Do you know about the Ford-Nixon relationship after August of ’74? - did she try to maintain any kind of friendship or relationship with Mrs. Nixon? Any kind of back and forth?

Downs: I don’t know. I imagine knowing Mrs. Ford, there probably was. But I just never heard of it – not that I didn’t think of it, but I just felt that was private.

Smith: We know that she and Mrs. Johnson were very good friends.

Downs: Very close friends. Yes. But it was just a bond, most of them do. Very few First Ladies don’t fall into that mold.

Smith: Was Mamie ever around the White House during the Ford years? She was around until ’79, and I think was in reasonably good health.

Downs: I don’t recall seeing her. Now the Eisenhowers were. The elder son, David, with Julie. But I think with the Nixons after he stepped down, it was just still too close and too raw.

Smith: Perfectly understandable. We also know that Mrs. Ford befriended Bess Truman.

Downs: Yes.

Smith: In fact, I believe they were told, I think Bess indicated that she was voting for President Ford in 1976.
Downs: There were buttons that we were given saying: Vote for Betty’s Husband for President. I remember her in the elevator one day when her polls were just skyrocketing, and his were down, her saying, “Oh, Maria, what I would give to change polls with Jerry.”

Smith: Were you at the convention?

Downs: Yes.

Smith: How bitter?

Downs: It was very bitter. It was a tug of war and the two ladies added to it immeasurably. But I think Mrs. Ford, she enjoyed the convention. I really do.

Smith: It’s easier to enjoy it if you’re winning.

Downs: If you’re winning and if you’ve got Cary Grant there.

Smith: Now tell me about that. Now where did that come from?

Downs: That was all her own doing. She never would say how that came about, but, oh how she loved it.

Smith: They became friends.

Downs: They became very good friends. I think probably what was underlying that too was that Cary Grant was going through a very difficult divorce. I believe he ended up with custody of their daughter in the divorce. It had to be a very bad situation. Next to Fred Astaire, I think Cary Grant was her biggest coup. And she did just enjoyed both.

Smith: She was friends with Fred Astaire, too?

Downs: Yes. I think she had the opportunity to become closer to Cary Grant.

Smith: Right. Do you think it had anything to do with her background as a dancer?

Downs: I think so.

Smith: Now, that leads to Vicki Carr. With whom she didn’t become friends.

Downs: You’ve forgotten about Tony Orlando.
Smith: Well, I’ll get to Tony Orlando. Tell us about Vicki Carr.

Downs: Fortunately, I wasn’t there that night. Well, I mean, the President is an all-American male.

Smith: He complimented her.

Downs: Yes.

Smith: And that was within earshot of Mrs. Ford? Or did it just get back to her? Because Vicki Carr was not invited back.

Downs: She probably would have been invited back, if they were in the White House longer.

Smith: And you mentioned Tony Orlando.

Downs: They both liked Tony. I don’t know whether it was the chemistry, and remember, he was flying very high at that time. He had his own TV show and he was just the epitome of whatever. And a very, very nice person. It’s just too bad about the narcotics – now people don’t think that much of it, but in those days it was a big deal. But they just hit it off. He came to me one day and he said, “You know, Maria, what I’d like to do and I don’t know if I’m speaking out of turn now or not, but you know, I can spend a couple of hours with the President and teach him how to use his body language so that he will come across in a different way. Not a better way, he comes across fine. He just needs some tricks like that.” I remember telling Mrs. Ford. But telling, “Tony, I don’t think that’s going to fly.” When I did go to Mrs. Ford and tell her about him. And she said, “Oh, Maria, he’d kill us both.”

Smith: She was perfectly satisfied with his body language.

Downs: Very much so. No problem there.

Smith: What do you remember about election night of ’76?

Downs: Not too much because I was not upstairs personal guests and I considered it personal. I tried to keep it as limited to the people they were told to be with.
They had their ideas who they wanted. I don’t think you saw much staff in the private quarters.

Smith: Before I forget, we’ve heard from a number of people that the mood of the place was different when Rumsfeld was in charge than when Cheney was in charge. Dorothy Dowton told us that Rumsfeld actually tried to get her fired - he had someone to replace her. It’s not so much people criticizing Rumsfeld, but contrasting what they think about Cheney and his current image.

Downs: Well, to go back to what you asked earlier, about having people in all positions of importance, then settling in and helping him get the job done. That was probably part of it, too. But apparently Don didn’t know the closeness to the president. But he [Cheney] was the youngest chief of staff ever, I guess at the time. And he was so accessible and so nice and so down to earth, I think that’s one of the – and I’m not speaking out of turn now about Dick, because that’s one of the very sad things about this past administration and how they martyred him. I mean, the man was trying to do what he was brought in there to do. It may be naïve, but I think – I just feel badly about the way most people consider Dick now. He was kind of the glue that held everybody together. And didn’t do it in a dictatorial was at all.

Smith: And we are told he didn’t have an agenda of his own. Wanted to make sure that different viewpoints were presented.

Downs: He was very, very above board with everything. I remember getting back a guest list – from the President and First Lady with names scratched off. But there was one in particular who was a very, very, heavyweight business type executive with a lot of support in the West Wing. I was surprised when the name was off, but I didn’t think anything of it.

But when the invitations went out, it was a different story. I remember Dick calling and saying, “You know, Maria, I know you’ve gotten quite a few calls about this. Fill me in on it.” So I told him exactly what happened, and he said, “Okay, let me talk to the President about it.” And that’s the only time he’s ever questioned me about the guest lists. It ended up the businessman was put back on the list but was never invited after that to another White House event.
When I thanked Dick for getting everybody off my neck and it was the first time I’d been through the experience, he said, “Look,” we had this conversation afterwards, “you did a good job. That’s what you were hired to do, and you were within your realm to question it and take him off.”

Smith: Were you surprised by the lengths some people would go to try to get into White House events?

Downs: It was awful. It really was terrible.

Smith: Were the Fords surprised?

Downs: No, Mrs. Ford wasn’t. Neither was the President. She called me just before she made the announcement of my appointment, and said I would be the first social secretary that was a commissioned person, a presidential appointment. I did not use the term “The Honorable Maria Downs” often. But that was, in essence, a way to bring the position up to the level that Mrs. Ford wanted the women in the Ford administration to be considered. The President probably knew more about the extent to which some people went to get on the guest list. As I said, he knew what was going on more than most people gave him credit for.

Smith: Two things and we’ll be done. One is this large issue which you just raised about the significance that Mrs. Ford attached to raising and expanding opportunities for women. Particularly in the administration.

Downs: Very important.

Smith: Did you talk about that?

Downs: Oh, yes, all the time. I was looking for an image for our website the other day and came across a picture of Mrs. Ford with the President in the Oval Office, signing the International Year of the Woman legislation that was enacted on his watch. And Pat Hutar was his representative to the U.N. and in charge of the conference that year. In addition to the ERA, there was a lot of other commissions and opportunities enacted during the Ford year.

Smith: Well, Title IX was enacted, I believe, on the Ford watch.
Downs: Yes, there were a lot of things other than legislation that helped, too. For example, we invited many women to the dinners and events at the White House. They were invited because of who they were and the positions they held, rather than their husband’s positions. I remember so clearly, Sally Quinn was still the terror of the Washington Post at that time, she called me shortly after I had taken office, and started asking questions about how did I put the guest lists together and how do we do the seating of a dinner. Well, I loved to do the seating because it was like musical chairs. My staff marveled when I did all the seating just prior to the dinner. I would close the doors and I had my charts and I would put different people together. I knew many of these people, and I would go the extra mile to make it interesting for them at the dinner. Make the tables such that the people would enjoy it and get to know new people. I had a little secret weapon. Whenever I had a difficult table, I would seat General Scowcroft right in the midst of all of the trouble.

Smith: Did he ever catch on?

Downs: Oh, yes. We had a couple of women at the dinner for the French president, that engaged in a battle royal. The jewels that the woman from Paris was wearing rivaled the Queen’s, quite honestly. The other woman was with somebody with Washington Post connections who called me wanting to know why her rival had been included in the guest list. Of course I wasn’t about to tell.

That night at the dinner, I seated General Scowcroft between, the Washington Post person and the bejeweled American from Paris and watched the sparks fly. The General came up after the dinner and he said, “Thanks, buddy.” Those were his only words. I said, “General, it was interesting, wasn’t it?” And he said, “Yes, it was. Very interesting.” “Well, she usually sits next to Dr. Kissinger,” I said.

Smith: We were talking to David Broder yesterday, who said that Mrs. Graham liked the Fords very much. There was apparently a real relationship there.
Downs: Yes, very much so. They were very above board with all of these people, even if they abhorred some of the things that were going on politically at the papers. That was just their nature.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Downs: Yes, very well. It was at the dinner that the Ford Foundation gave during their annual meeting. They would always invite their former senior staff. It was the last dinner that the President and Mrs. Ford attended. The President was half-seated and she was standing next to him. Anne Armstrong was at that dinner and Anne and I arrived together, waiting to be received. When he looked up and saw us his face lit up and he said, “There are my girls! There are my girls!” And he put his arms out and when we got close enough, he put his arms around both of us and it was very poignant. Very, very nice. And I think that dinner will always stay with me because it was the last time that they were together at a dinner like that.

Smith: They were probably aware that that might, in fact, be the last time.

Downs: Yes, probably so. It was a very special night.

Smith: I thought one of the most poignant things when he died; of course he insisted no caissons in the streets of Washington, and yet – I was up at the cathedral with ABC on the morning of the service so I didn’t get to ride with the family until later – but by all accounts, there were large crowds of people that turned out on the streets of Washington, even though there wasn’t a caisson to say goodbye.

Downs: Yes.

Smith: And I thought one of the most poignant moments involved the White House staff – in front of the White House – the domestic staff, which must have included some people who were there when they were there…

Downs: I’m sure there were still quite a few.

Smith: I mean, that was very, very touching.
Downs: That and the World War II Memorial stop. That just stays in your mind forever. That was just very special, too.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of public reaction? Because he’d been out of the public eye for quite a while. Yet it seemed to build as the week went by.

Downs: I think that the number of people who really didn’t know that much about him were finally realizing what he was, who he was, what he’d done. And I believe it was their way of showing their respect. I don’t think it was to be at a president’s farewell. I live near the Washington Cathedral – and I remember a lot of people just walking down the street towards the Cathedral at that time and waiting in front of the cathedral, just to see the family and to watch the President arrive. It wasn’t a media event. It was very solemn and very respectful for all these people.

Smith: And Mrs. Ford really did herself proud that week.

Downs: Yes. It was unbelievable how she held up through it all. The entire family was very special.

Smith: How do you think each one of them should be remembered?

Downs: We were very fortunate to have had those two very loving, decent people in the White House. And I think as the years go by the President’s legacy will speak for itself. Mrs. Ford is always going to be loved. There is just something about her that everybody – I have yet to meet a person when you mention Mrs. Ford, who just doesn’t have something positive to say about her. She is very beloved and that didn’t happen by accident. I think that inner beauty and goodness come though. People are not stupid, they can see through the façade that many people in public office put on. The Fords were different.

Smith: Someone said, maybe it was David Broder, because he’d known them in the congressional days and how much he went out of his way to emphasize how important she was to his success even then. He emphasized their partnership. I said, “What was it about her that connected?” Now this was long before they were in the White House. And he mentioned two things, and one of them was: “Well, there was a hint of vulnerability about her which I think people responded to and almost wanted to protect her.”

Downs: Both of them continued to be friends through the years, even after the White House days. I still keep in touch with Mrs. Ford.

Smith: Clearly, they both had a relationship with the press that is virtually unique among modern presidents.

Downs: I think so. It’s telling - she just didn’t have contact with the press that much before she became First Lady. She participated in public events and all that. But it was a transformation in the White House. She just likes people, to begin with, so that was a good thing and it came through.

Smith: You can’t fake that.

Downs: No. And she had a genuine interest, it wasn’t like she turned it on and off.

Smith: Do you think she was proud of the role that she had played in alerting women to the dangers of breast cancer?

Downs: Oh, yes. Very much so although she rarely tooted her own horn. In a strange way, I think she took pride in everything she did as a First Lady. I believe she holds that in her heart as having succeeded in helping a lot of people in many ways.

Smith: Were you surprised by the intervention?

Downs: Very surprised. Maybe I lived in a sheltered world, but I just didn’t know about interventions. And so between that and not knowing her dependency had progressed to that level…yes, I was surprised. But we were talking about the press earlier – some of the press was just God-awful at that time. There’s a thing about the media – they are so competitive, obviously. And a few just thought they deserved – had the right to know she’d had this problem, and this coming out being sprung on them. Really hit a raw nerve. It was awful. Here everybody was concerned about her, and they were concerned about being scooped.
Smith: Here is a First Lady whose greatest historical impact may very well have been after she was First Lady. And who affected millions of people in ways that presidents don’t always manage to do.

Downs: Yes. That’s very true. As I said earlier about President Ford’s legacy – Mrs. Ford’s legacy will continue to speak for itself, and will be ongoing.

Smith: Perfect.

It’s hard to know where to begin. Before we get into the chronology, tell us something about Gerald Ford that might surprise people.

Well, I think it’s probably not necessarily so surprising, but if you had the experience with him, things like humility and all those type of things based on encounters that I had with him on things really comes to be true. I’ve always said, and I don’t how many times he said it to me, he used this phrase, “What’s the fuss all about?” I think one time I kidded him - I said, “Would you like that on your epitaph?” because he cherished the office of the presidency. But because of the way it came to him, he never quite put himself of as elected president. And for that reason he was surprised, And I’ll give you a couple of examples.

When we had the first or second annual dinner, he was surprised that all the administration came back, and other people he’d asked. He said it to me. He got up and he got a little teary-eyed as we went up the elevator and saw everybody in the room. He said, “My gosh, I can’t believe it.” That was the first time I said to him out of many times, “Well, you have to remember you’re the 38th President of the United States and these are your best friends and they’re extremely loyal to you.”

To the point where we had the funeral here and it was an extension of it. He would have said, “What’s the fuss all about?” But this time the whole community came out and did the same thing as friends, for the same reason. He was the 38th President of the United States, and they had a sense of feelings about him, but he never showed it. He never was comfortable using the presidential seal or Hail to the Chief, or anything like that in his post presidency.
We were sitting here in his office and there are two presidential seals in here. One of them is on the door behind me, which I thought he was almost going to have us remove, which were part of the original museum. But the chair behind the desk is a great story of the man. He had this chair in his office out in California that you’d swear when he sat down, he was going to go right to the floor. The springs had to be broken, probably came out of Washington, one of those chairs – I don’t know. Jim Hackett, who was the head of Steelcase, saw it and said, “We’ve got to get him a chair.” So Jim called me and he said, “I just did a chair for the governor of Michigan with the State of Michigan seal on it, I’ll put the presidential seal on it.” I said, “Naw, you’ve got to let me call him, I’d hate to have you go through all that.”

So I called him. I said, “They’re going to build a beautiful chair,” and he said, “I really appreciate that.” I said, “Now, there’s one little thing. Discretely, there is going be the presidential seal.” He hesitated and he said, “Oh, I don’t think I can do that.” I said, “Well, let’s do it this way. Let’s have them make it. If it doesn’t work out for you, it would be something nice that could be utilized in the museum one way or the other.” He said, “Fine, okay go ahead.”

After the chair arrived a few weeks later, he calls and he says, “You know, I kind of like that chair with the seal on it, do you think they could do one for Colorado and Michigan?” But he was so hesitant and that sort of typifies what I found out about the man that was a confirmation, really. But not all people probably hear how humble he was and probably never had the opportunity to see that. That stands out to me.

The other thing is, as a part of the character, all the people that he’s met in his lifetime, and I was kind of with him twenty-one years. And out of the twenty-one years, how he just didn’t hold things against people. He would show his temper once in a while, but he had a couple of things he would say. He would say, “Now, Marty, that’s a bad guy.” That’s as far as he’d go, and it started with G. Gordon Liddy out in the museum. Every time he passed that picture he’d point at it, “Now, Marty, that’s a bad guy.” But he said that about some other people, some here in Grand Rapids. That’s as far as he’d go with that. He wouldn’t go any further.
Smith: You mentioned his temper because he famously, like Dwight Eisenhower, had a temper, particularly as a young man. One gets the impression he spent a lifetime pretty successfully controlling it.

Allen: But he still had it.

Smith: Yeah.

Allen: Probably never to the degree, but he did have a temper. You know the great story about how his mother controlled that by having him memorize the poem If. But I would encounter that in a couple different ways. I would encounter it in frustration, for example, not being able to use a telephone and that made him just go ballistic. He didn’t know how to place a telephone call. And if he had to, he couldn’t do it right, and he wouldn’t realize that he really had made a call and I was on the other end. So it was the little things. On the golf course, his competitive nature took over a little on occasions and he would get extremely angry. He was known on a few occasions to throw a golf club. I played golf with him – the last time I played golf with him, which was with Justice Stevens, and we played nine holes. He got in a sand trap once and all of a sudden the ball didn’t come out, but the club came out. So he controlled it to the extent that I’m sure a lot of things really irritated him more publicly, but he wouldn’t show it. But behind the scene, you could just see the sense of that…

Smith: That’s interesting, because two things I want to explore: one of the Stevens’ visit, and the other about the phone. There is this famous story about Ike the day he left office. In those days there was no Secret Service protection, so as a special courtesy, Kennedy had let these Secret Service agents drive them back to Gettysburg. He gets out of the car, he’s excited to be home, and runs into to the barn to see his cattle and then goes into the house and picks up the phone. Now he hasn’t made a phone call in twenty years. He waits for the operator and he hears this buzzing sound and says, “What in the hell is wrong with this?” Someone has to explain to him, “Mr. President, that’s…” So I’m wonder if part of it was: you get in this cocoon, almost unknowingly and - you’re right about the modesty - but you’re still in this cocoon. I wonder whether part of it was technology had moved on and he just wasn’t part of that.

Allen: Oh, it was. There’s two great stories about technology, beyond the telephone, but not in our lives, it’s just a normal part of our lives. One of them was, the night before they were retiring his jersey at University of Michigan – his football jersey – the president of the university had a small dinner at his house, including Bo Schembechler and a few athletic people and the president of the university, who was an engineer, and got into his wine a little bit too much and at the end he stood up and gave a little dissertation about the technology in his office and how he could communicate with various parts of the campus offices. Whatever he wanted, he could do through technology – videos and a variety of things. He got up and I was looking down the table and I saw Schembechler was practically asleep and President Ford was looking at his watch.

The next thing I knew the president of the university said, “Now, Mr. President, tell me about the technology in your office.” He said, “Well, I use a legal pad and a pen. And I think Betty and I have to go home now.” The rest of them were just totally trying to control themselves. It sobered up the university’s president quite quickly.

The other classic was with his great assistant, Penny Circle. He did an interview with students via internet. They would ask the questions and he started answering them like they were there. He was animated; he was faster than poor Penny could type the answers back to them. He didn’t quite get it that they weren’t getting it directly. The technology had completely passed him by.

Smith: Is it true, I think Penny told me, I guess he taught himself, or she taught him, to play solitaire on the computer.

Allen: Yes. I think that’s true. I heard the same story. That was about all he could do on it was play solitaire on it. So he did have technology pass him by. I’m sure some people would say it shows a lack of intelligence, but it wasn’t. He did live in a cocoon – in the biggest cocoon in the world. It has to be hard, at times, to operate in a vacuum, and therefore he had great reliance on people. More than most would.

Kissinger told me once, he said, he didn’t worry about how bright his Cabinet was or his vice president because he wanted to learn and listen to them very carefully. Not all people are that way. So he at least broke through to the point where at that level he had some people that he really did trust. The last time I was with Paul O’Neill, Paul was telling me that last time they did the budget – and Paul knew it inside and out – but he knew the president knew it inside and out, they had a public press conference on it. He said President Ford asked him a question and Paul said he [Ford] knew the answer to the question he asked, but as a courtesy to one of the senior staff people, he wanted them to feel he was a part of it. An amazing story.

Smith: The courtesy aspect – when Rockefeller had come up with this Energy Independence Corporation and Bill Simon, very literal, incredibly bright, but without all the people skills or the diplomacy that you’d associate with a real pol. There was a very heated debate in the Cabinet. It got fairly nasty and Simon could be cutting. He said something to the effect that, Mr. President, don’t let him do to the country what he did to New York. Before the meeting ended – it was very clear, there was virtual unanimity opposing this idea – but the president made it clear that he was going to support it. Simon, of course, wouldn’t let it drop, so he got the president, waylaid him, because Simon goes back over all the intellectual arguments. And Ford said, “Bill, I know, I know, but look, you and I both know Congress is never going to enact this, and I’m not going to embarrass Nelson.”

Allen: Not going to offend him, no. You know what’s funny about that story, and this is on such a much smaller scale. The first time I chaired the Foundation, I think the Foundation became for him just a little bit of the presidency on a far lesser scale, but it had the same sense, because a lot of the same people were involved, a lot of the Cabinet. One of the first meetings I was conducting, Bill Simon – we were on investments – made some very profound statements on how terrible our investments were and if he were on it we’d get sixteen percent. Well, then Bill Seidman got into it, and Paul O’Neill and Frank Zarb, and they were having a debate at the board meeting. I leaned over to the president and I asked, “Should I break this up.” He said, “No, don’t break it up. This is just like the Cabinet. We would have these intellectual arguments, but by the time they were finished, they realized they’d used up their ego, and they were all in agreement with each other, and it was a done thing. I’d listened and accepted it and that’s the way they operate.”

Smith: In many ways, shrewd, generous, and easily overlooked by the public. It’s not the stuff of swashbuckling, presidential leadership. It is a very congressional kind of insight.

Allen: Yeah, it was really his congressional experience that came out so much in that. I agree.

Smith: You mentioned Justice Stevens, and I’d love to talk about that because I know, obviously that was part of that twenty-fifth anniversary lecture series that we did, and it was remarkable that the president would come all the way from California, basically to introduce Justice Stevens. I remember asking him, you may very well have been present, when the last time was that he saw the justice or talked to him or had any contact with him. He said, “When I appointed him.”

Justice Stevens is considerably to the left in terms of his jurisprudence, and yet there was a real, not only bond, but one sensed a real pride on the part of the president. It may have been the last time a Supreme Court nominee was chosen with almost no regard for ideology, for simple intellectual brilliance. I assume that was similar to the Levy nomination - trying to restore faith in the judicial system. And you wonder if it had been a different political culture whether Ford would have had more latitude to go in pursuit of a more conservative – who knows?

Allen: The only comment that he ever made to me on that subject, and we didn’t talk a lot of politics, he did because we were going to play golf and he did it with a smile on his face, which was a little unusual. He smiles, “Well, you know, he didn’t come out quite the way I expected him to, but I really liked my choice.” Some people would be angered by it, or defensive about it. But he wasn’t, he just said, “He’s a great justice.” That’s all, that’s the way he operated. So we went out and played golf and they were like old friends for nine holes. They just had a marvelous time together, the two of them did.

Smith: What did they talk about?

Allen: They were in one golf cart, I was with Dick Ford in the other, so I didn’t hear a lot, but I could tell they were very animated, very talkative and enjoying themselves. It was kind of quick and over with, so I didn’t have a chance to really…

Smith: Remember, I think the purpose of that was Justice Stevens had always wanted to play?

Allen: He did, you are absolutely right. He always wanted to play golf with him. He had the opportunity and the president, obviously, was just delighted to do it. He used sports an awful lot to his good. He liked to do that. He got people very comfortable with him that way. But that was a nice session with Justice Stevens. I didn’t hear that much of the conversation, but he did say to me, made that statement that didn’t quite, maybe come out the way exactly he thought, but he was a great justice.

Smith: He made a lot appointments that people have forgotten today, but that were prestigious choices. I remember him saying once about Dan Borstein, Daniel Borstein, very distinguished historian, named him librarian of Congress… “That was one of the best appointments I ever made.” You look at some of the people that Ford appointed, and he obviously was very proud of the quality.

Allen: He was. He was really proud of his appointments. I go back to Kissinger again. Kissinger told me, he said, he just surrounded himself with such good people and it didn’t make any difference to him whether they might upstage him with their egos and everything – he just picked the right people. He did enjoy it. I think Roger Porter wrote one of the best articles about that Cabinet and some of the senior people. You see where those people have gone and where they are and how history has looked at them – they were all really great choices. There was a couple of them he had to remove, but other than that he stayed with those people and it would have been amazing to see how that Cabinet would have operated for another four years.

Smith: Did you ever hear him talk about Jim Schlesinger?

Allen: Never did. Never did hear him talk Schlesinger, and I knew the circumstances, but he never said anything about it.

Smith: Let’s go back to the beginning. Fill us in on how you became acquainted, what you were doing at the time?

Allen: It’s a question that’s asked of me all the time because I sort of, particularly with the funeral, got an awful lot of visibility. And people just are curious. I have to say, I was a typical Grand Rapids person as it relates to Gerald R. Ford. He was the ultimate congressman, knew his district well, was in his district a lot, did more things than more congressman do, including the annual Red Cedar Flannel Parade which he was in, or the Hollyhock July 4th little parade in an alley over in the south side of town. So everybody got to know him and so people weren’t name dropping later on when he became president. They’d say, “Did you know him?” and everybody said, “Yeah, I knew him,” and they did know.

They knew him because he was around, and that’s how I knew him. I knew him because of the activities that were going around the community. I was with a bank that was very active in the community, I got to know him that way. I got to know him a little bit more for a short period of time because he asked to become a director of Old Kent Bank. Now the reasoning behind that in his mind was that was the largest bank in town. Most of the directors of that bank were leaders in the community. He felt once a month it would be a good thing for him to be on it. Well, he lasted about a month. A congressman from Texas – Gonzalez would it be?

Smith: Henry Gonzalez.

Allen: He must have been turned down for a loan at a bank some time in his life. Because he was literally almost waiting for Ford to get back to Washington when he had been elected as a director of Old Kent Bank, and told him, “If you don’t get off that board, you’re going to have real difficulty getting passage of some things you like.” Jerry Ford said, “Gee, that’s why I did it.” That didn’t do any good, he said he just weighed the two and said I’ve got to get off the board.

Smith: This is speculative. Do you think in the back of his mind, presumably even then, he assumed that when his career in Congress was over, he was going to come back here and practice law? And presumably, it would be a very useful thing to have been on the board.

Allen: It would be. I think, though, his motive primarily was to learn about his district from a business standpoint. But there’s no question that these are people who really did know him at the time. Knew him better, probably, than I did. What happened after that is, I would run into him, we were on a first-name basis. That was it. But that was true of almost anybody in the community that was active.

But when I got appointed, I should get the letter out and the date – I got appointed to something called the National Alliance of Businesses. I think it was created by Nixon and it was in August and it had to be awfully close to the time that he resigned that I got this appointment, or whatever you call it, a commission or whatever. And then all of a sudden within days he was no longer the president and this National Alliance of Businesses continued and the next time I was there was in the White House when Ford was president and we were in the state dining room, just for a reception. I looked around and there were heads of industry and everything I could recognize from the automotive – I was sort of standing off, I didn’t really know anybody, so I was standing off to the side.

All of a sudden he walked in the room and he didn’t go to a mic or anything, he just was kind of talking and looking around, all of a sudden his voice booms out and he says, “Where’s Marty Allen?” Everybody was like, who’s Marty Allen? He said, “He’s one of my constituents in Grand Rapids. I want him to come up here and have a martini with me.” You know, that was just typical of him. From that point, then nothing happened until he lost the election. I was with him election day when the mural at the airport was dedicated, when he broke down a little bit about his parents and I remember leaning over to a friend of mine and said, “It’s just too bad that that didn’t happen sooner.”

I was later to find out, because his staff would not allow them to put anything about his mother and father in because they knew he would get emotional. I walked out, I was responsible as the greeting party and the exit party, so I walked out to Air Force One with him and the best picture I’ve got, the one I treasure the most, is standing with him, shaking his hands as he going to get on Air Force One and head back to Washington. He looked at me, and he was quite hoarse at that time, he said, “Marty, I’ve done everything I can. I did it the best I could.” I almost felt he was giving me a message that down deep he might have known how close it might have been. But then, to kind of catch it up…

Smith: By the way, wasn’t there an event out in front of the Pantland as well?

Allen: There was. There was a big rally, a big outdoor rally. I was in the distance, but I was there. It was a big outdoor, typical old-fashioned rally that took place that night. It was really, again, Grand Rapids responding to their favorite son and their favorite son at the airport, kind of the way they knew him. They knew he had a sensitivity about his mother and father and how important that was to him. Unfortunately, it was all just within twenty-four hours of the loss of the election.

Smith: Let me diverge. Did you know his parents?

Allen: I did not. Never met his parents at all. I got to start knowing his brothers because I played golf with Dick and Jim, and I knew Tom because he was in the Michigan legislature – so I knew them pretty well. Never met the parents.

Smith: Tom was in the legislature?

Allen: Yes, he was.

Smith: So there was more than one politician in the family?

Allen: There was more than one politician. Tom was a politician. He passed away. He was very active in the legislature here in Michigan.
Smith: How would you characterize the brothers?

Allen: A great deal of similarity to President Ford. Not overbearing, not outlandish, not standoutish in a crowd type people. When he became president, that’s the way they preferred it. They stayed in the background as opposed to some other presidents who had problems – they were always in the background. So they had a lot of the same tendencies. You could tell they were brought up pretty much the same by their parents. But I never had the pleasure to meet the parents. I certainly heard many stories from him and from the brothers about their parents and how much they treasured them.

Smith: I feel like I know more about his mother than I do about his father in some ways, and yet he’s been quoted as saying - the president said - that he thought the person who was the biggest influence in his life was his stepfather.

Allen: Yeah, I think he was. I think when you go back in history and the Depression and even before that, I think he was highly influenced and respected him so much. I’ve sat in this office so many times with him and watched him look over at the picture of his parents and he never talked about referred to him as his stepfather, he always talked about him as his father. That was his father, that’s the way felt about it and that’s the way it was. You could tell he had tremendous respect for him. He must have been quite a man, the way he handled the Depression – putting personal things aside to keep his business going. It’s kind of like President Ford, take care of the country before I take care of myself. The type of thing that he must have learned at an early age.

Let me just go back to when I did meet him. When they started the museum plan, I was not part of the planning committee.

Smith: So, he comes out of office – were there people here in town miffed or surprised, or whatever, that they decided to go to Rancho Mirage?

Allen: Yeah, there was a lot of that. There was a lot of misunderstanding and I think there is still some of it – not nearly – I think the funeral probably took care of it. But over a period of time, there’s just no question about it. There were letters to the editor and various things, that he gave up his hometown, which he didn’t, but they thought he had. There were good reasons he went out there, and a lot of it had to do with Mrs. Ford’s health.

Smith: And one senses that decision was not made on the spur of the moment.

Allen: No, because they had planned to come back to Grand Rapids, that was their original plan, and it got changed during the course of events. A lot of people just didn’t accept whatever the reason was – they just didn’t want to listen to
it. They just said, “Hey, he abandoned us to be with other kinds of people, other than Grand Rapids.” Well, he didn’t ever fuss about that. I don’t know that he was ever offended by that, but he just kept coming home. And he kept calling it home. That’s all he could do.

Smith: There’s a story, it’s in this issue of Grand Rapids Press, where I think Maury DeJonge is the source. He was out there visiting him. It was almost sunset; the sun was setting over the mountains, and they came off the golf course or something and the president just said, “Now do you see why we decided to live out here?” If anyone had that experience, then they would understand.

Allen: Really it was the right environment for him at that time. But you are absolutely right, there was a lot of discontent about the fact that he had gone from here.

Smith: Did that affect the decision about putting a museum here? Was there ever any debate about a single facility? Was it a fete accompli that the library was going to be in Ann Arbor because he’d been sending papers there? And the whole decision of where to put the museum in the context of revitalization and so on.

Allen: As to the split, the museum and library being split geographically, there was a meeting in Ann Arbor at the president of the university’s house and he and a couple of the senior vice presidents from the university were to meet with Bob Barrett, who was his military aide that had come in and was his chief of staff here. Bill Seidman was supposed to be there to represent the Grand Rapids side. I got a call from Bill Seidman in desperation. He missed a flight or couldn’t get out, asked me if I’d get in the car and drive to Ann Arbor and just represent. I’d no background on what had transpired, so I went into this meeting and it was very clear to me, despite some things that have been written since by the university, it was very clear to me that it was the wish, which is almost understandable, that the University of Michigan have both the library and museum as one unit.

I spoke, I don’t think eloquently, but I just spoke to the fact that I knew that there was a great deal of interest in Grand Rapids, his home, to have his museum here, if not his library, but at least the museum. President Ford seemed, as I was watching him, he seemed to be nodding his approval and the meeting was over. And the next thing I knew that decision had been made to split them. Now, I’m not saying that because I presented something. I just think that he was torn. He had two great loves here. He had hometown and he had his university, and he saw it as the absolute best solution.

Years went by and we would bring the same subject up again over time, and he’d look at me and said, “Marty, at the time, we made the right decision.” I said, “I’m not questioning that, but times have changed, and I don’t know that you’d make that same decision now.” He never responded. So it happened and it happened, probably, so easily, I can just visualize him after that meeting saying, “Hey, here’s the solution. We’re going to have the museum in Grand Rapids, we’ll have the library….

Smith: Isn’t that exactly what a congressman would do?

Allen: Absolutely.

Smith: Solomon, you split the baby and come up with a perfect straddle. You resolve the problem without contemplating what the needs might be twenty years from now.

Allen: He was a decisive man. He was a great listener on a variety of subjects and he would, at the conclusion, have a very comfortable time making a decision.

Smith: He’s been quoted as say, “Raising the money was the toughest thing.” In fact, I think it is one of the things that brought he and Jimmy Carter together, because they were both presidents who were not re-elected, who suddenly found themselves saddled with an obligation to raise millions of dollars to build a library. People talk about all the perks of the ex-presidency, and no one focuses on the fact that the first thing they have to do, whether they want to or not, is to raise all this money. And I think then, even more than now, it was not something you thought about. First of all, you didn’t think you were going to lose. No one wanted to contemplate that, and I’m sure, given his frugality, and given what he was accustomed to spending in campaigns, when someone came to him and said we need nine million dollars or twelve million dollars to build this facility, it must have been an absolute shock.

Allen: To him, it was. He wasn’t quite used to have that kind of money spent on him per se. Dick Ford can really fill you in on an awful lot of the story. But there was a very wealthy man from the east that was sort of head of the fundraising, who apparently did nothing. It was the local people here and the people at the university that, together, really did put that together. Some of it was foreign money, too. There was some money from Taiwan and other places that were fairly significant - that were, in a sense, probably as far as he would ever go to use his self.

You think back, he had time after he lost the election. It wasn’t the best of times, but he still had time to utilize the resources he had, but he’d never do that. LBJ, on the other hand, although he’d resigned, or said he wasn’t going to run again, they told me the next day, he was raising money from the White House. Well, Ford would have never done that. But he was always surprised at the magnitude of money. He never personally had money, he knew how to appropriate money if he had it, he did that in Congress, he did that well. But he never really had to raise money. His campaigns here for Congress were minimal.

He always told me about how little they’d raise and how little staff he had and all that. It was a shock to him, but went really well. I think Dick Ford can fill you in. He was really close to the local head, which was Carl Morgenstern, who has passed away, who really did raise the money. He coordinated with the University of Michigan. Michigan was the accounting side of all the funds, but it was smoother than he even thought. His thoughts were, “My gosh, this is a lot of money

When I did get involved with them it was just on the dedication event. Not the planning of the building, but the dedication. We were in this office, he had an alphabetic list that he brought with him of who he wanted to invite. The first name, I still remember, is Carl Albert, alphabetically, the first person on the list. We sat here, this committee, and he said, “Now I want to explain to you, there are people on there that will not come, but I owe them an invitation,” and Carl Albert was the first on the list.

When the invitations were out, he said Carl’s not well. When invitations went out, the first call (they just had to send a card back), but a telephone call came from Carl Albert. He said, “I have already had a plane provided to me, I will be there.” And that whole thing mushroomed from that. This small list that he had just kept growing and growing. But again, he never saw the magnitude of his impact. He never understood the magnitude of dollars, but because of his appropriations, [committee experience] when I was running the foundation, John Baab and I would, as soon as he would get the statement, he could go through that thing like – he could understand the utilization. So, big money, lots of people, it’s back to that phrase, “What’s the fuss all about?” He never comprehended what the fuss was really about.

Smith: Tell me about his frugality.

Allen: Well, he was pretty tight. I experienced it directly. He and I had an annual bet on the Notre Dame–Michigan football game, and he would initiate the call to me. I just knew it was going to come the week before the game and he would say, “We’ve got to make a bet on game.” I said, “Yeah, we do.” It used to be rather simple, we’d just bet the game. But then it got more complicated because he wasn’t, at that time, winning very many bets. So he upped the ante a little bit. For a gambler, absolutely the wrong thing to do is double your bet. But he thought maybe he could make up what he’d lost and then he decided that we had to look at the odds and we would discuss that. And it wasn’t just one conversation, this would take two or three conversations. We’d finally make the bet. If he lost, I didn’t see my money very fast, so I would write him a letter and said, “I think it probably slipped your mind, but you owe me ten dollars.” And then it would finally come.
There were a couple of other bets he’d make – one was with Max Fisher for the Ohio State game and one was with Pete Secchia for the Michigan State game. Those were the three games he’d bet on, and they all experienced quite the same thing. So we had to remind him of it. It got to the point where when he would win, and I wouldn’t send the money, he’d call me and say, “You know, I haven’t gotten the money.” And I’d say, “I’ll tell you what, I decided to take the ten dollars and put it in the church basket in your name.” He said, “Send me the money.” And then one time I had to tell him, “Listen, you know, we’re doing this betting over – you’ve probably got a government phone – I’ve got a government phone here – and we’re betting over the public lines, I don’t know that I’d want to pay you off.” And he said, “Send me the money.”

When he would play golf, and Dick probably could share golf stories, but he was known not to be able to pay his bets off quite as quickly as he should, and he never carried any money with him. That was another part of his cocoon. What would he ever carry money for? He just wouldn’t do it. I played golf with him, he and two of his really good friends out in Palm Springs once, and they were awfully nice guys. Obviously, very wealthy, just delightful people, and I asked President Ford a question, we were waiting to tee off on a hole, and I said, I’d heard about a club in Palm Springs which they said was the most expensive club in the country or something. I mentioned it to him and I said, “How much would it cost to become a member of that club?” He looked at me quite quizzically and the other two started laughing. They said, why would you ask him that question? I said, I just figured – they said, he has no comprehension of the cost of being a member of any club, any place in the United States, because as far as he’s concerned, he’s a member of them all. It’s free. So there’s a lot of stories. He was pretty frugal.

Smith: Do you think that was the product of his upbringing and what he went through to go to college, which people don’t realize?

Allen: Oh, yeah, I don’t think there is any question. Plus the Depression, the combination. But what he had to do at the University of Michigan to get through college, to do dishes in sororities or fraternities, wherever he did it, but he just…

Smith: Sell blood.

Allen: Yeah, and I bet he hitchhiked back and forth a little bit from Grand Rapids here. There was a train that went by because he told me he’d take the train once in a while. But he didn’t have any money at that time at all. If you really think about his life, and the time he was living, the things he appreciated most was his family and sports. It was almost like his reward because he didn’t have any money. The day his father, his real father, arrived in Grand Rapids, he was working in a restaurant. Here was a high school kid working in a restaurant. So he goes through that stage of his life. He didn’t make a lot of money in those days as a congressman, and he was going to come out of that with a nice pension, but he had to go back to work. We used to kid him a little bit that he then ended up with a congressional pension of the vice president, president, and military, which added up. But he’d just smile at that.

Smith: That raises a delicate subject, but it’s an important subject. He took some heat, particularly in those early days after leaving the White House, for “commercializing” the office. Now, it was going to happen. The reason Nixon didn’t take speaking fees was because Nixon was in the business of rehabilitating himself and he wasn’t giving many speeches. I always say, we have this civic religion in this country, we like to think that the office makes the man and people go into the presidency a mere human being and they inevitably grow and they become this kind of icon. The fact of the matter is, they come out pretty much what they were when they went in. You can predict what kind of ex-president they are going to be.

You knew that Richard Nixon, as long as he drew breath, was going to be rehabilitating himself – whatever that took. You could have predicted Jimmy Carter would spend the rest of his life pursuing humanitarian and other causes that were important to him. And you knew that Gerald Ford would go to chicken dinners and speak for Republican candidates, the things he loved to do, and play golf when he could, and so on. But he did take some heat for it.
Did he ever talk about it? Do you think there was ever any - I don’t want to say guilt - because he could be stubborn?

Allen: He could be very stubborn. I remember having a couple of discussions with him about it when a lot of that was going on and he seemed to be very comfortable with the decision. He used to say that he never had the opportunity to do for his family what he might have done, and a lot of that was family-oriented. He said he wanted to put himself in a position to help other people and he was very generous with charities and various things.

So I think he looked at it as an opportunity, not to take care of himself so much, as the family and other things that he might be able to do and he did them well.

Smith: Plus, isn’t it also true that he was one of, if not the biggest single donor to the Foundation?

Allen: He was. After he passed away there was a large amount that came our way that way, and there is still probably more to come later on. So he was very generous with his money, very generous with his time. He was funny about it. He kept raising money, also, for the Foundation. When he would do these things, sometimes he would speak, he would send part of his money. But he always used to tell me that we couldn’t cross the Mississippi, that Mrs. Ford – that was her side of the Mississippi to raise money for the Betty Ford Center, which he was so proud of. The other side was ours, so we had to be real careful about where we raised money. I can see why people are that way, I guess, but knowing him, I don’t think he was looking for a lot of personal things for himself.

He lived a very good life. He had beautiful homes with help from Leonard Firestone. He lived a very nice life, which he enjoyed. But I still think his motivation was primarily to take good care of his family – that he didn’t think he could do based on what he had.

Smith: Now I think there would be much less criticism. He took the brunt because, in some ways, he was the first.

Allen: He was.
Smith: That said, I don’t think even then people would have criticized speaking fees, per se. I think there were a couple of things, and again my sense is, and we can always edit this out if you want, but that Bob Barrett, as his first chief of staff, was on the lookout for commercial ventures. And it was some of those. I think there was a hook up with the Franklin Mint, or something – there were a couple of those things that were very easy to go after and that was…

Allen: Yeah, and I’m sure there were certain things that he did like the Franklin Mint and a few others that, in retrospect, he might have not done, that he didn’t, at the time, see that as a wrong thing. He was being given advice, which he accepted, and did it. But I’m sure there are a few of those things that he wouldn’t have done over again.

Smith: I also wonder how much of that - at that point, because that’s ’77, ’78, ’79, against the background of, “Gee, I’ve got to raise ten millions dollars to build this museum.” How much of that is factored into it?

Allen: I think that was part of it, but I don’t really know because I didn’t have an awful lot of conversations. I really just had the feeling that it wasn’t so much he knew that he was a different person than he was before in terms of where he was as a former president, versus a former congressman. He just saw it as an opportunity without offending anybody – he didn’t think he was going to offend anybody – that he had some goals in mind that he wanted to take of. Whether it was money for the museum, his family, or some other things he wanted to do. He was very generous. He did it in other ways – he did it with his golf tournament in Vail, and all the money that was raised out of that went to the Vail Valley Foundation. So he did a lot of those kind of things.

Smith: One thing that people don’t realize is the extent to which he spoke on college campuses. Usually for free. He would go into classrooms, talking to and listening to kids.

Allen: If you look historically, he had really a great interest in the youth. When he built this museum, when he said he didn’t want it to be a memorial. When he talked about a growing history – he was really talking about the young people. I’m always impressed by the fact that Father Hesburgh, who was then president of Notre Dame - there had not been a sitting president that went to a college campus since the Vietnam war. They didn’t want to go on campuses. Father Hesburgh called President Ford to come on campus, And it still was an issue. He didn’t hesitate. He said, “When do you want me there? I’ll be there.” Father Hesburgh was surprised and knew that at Notre Dame or any other place, the students were going to probably take exception.

But he came and he did his thing and he enjoyed that – he enjoyed talking to students. He was always disturbed, I think, about things like Oliver Stone providing education his way and not the right way. I went back and read as many of his speeches to colleges, whether it be commencement addresses or other. And they are fascinating to read. You could really sense that he really had his heart into talking to those students, and he just enjoyed it.

Smith: Let me go back to the Hesburgh relationship. Was this after Hesburgh had agreed to be on the — the clemency board? Because that was pretty early in the administration.

Allen: Yes. I think that it was. In fact, Father Hesburgh is somebody you should talk to. He talks a lot about the amnesty, the pardon, about the courage of Ford. He always was very impressed, but he was most impressed with the fact that he came back, he was the first president to come back to a college campus, after Vietnam regardless of where it was.

Smith: Had they had any relationship before he went on the clemency board?

Allen: I don’t know whether he had any in the civil rights issues or not when Nixon appointed him to the civil rights [commission], and eventually fired him from that commission. I don’t know. I don’t think so. That was probably the first time they had any kind of — he certainly didn’t as a congressman, I know that. But they did afterwards and it was an interesting experience to be with the two of them, which I had the privilege to do that one time here at a small dinner. Father Hesburgh would get up and give this five minute dissertation on President Ford in such a way that I looked over to President Ford and he was a bit teary eyed at that, too.

If you remember when Billy Graham came here, we had Father Hesburgh on video here because of his feelings. He just had a liking for students. I would often call him after different groups had been into the museum and he was always fascinated, but he was always most interested in school children and up through college. That age group. If you look at the amnesty, his comment after the amnesty was that these were young people and they had to pay a little bit, but they needed to be brought back, because they had value. That’s the way he saw it. That was a terrible political decision, but it was absolutely a great decision and he based it on the fact that they were young people that had made a mistake, that they had a right to come back.

Smith: You almost wonder, how much of that was grounded in his own upbringing – going back to the Ford household and the rules and the values.

Allen: Forgiveness, a lot of things, I’m sure.

Smith: But you pay a price, you’re forgiven, you move on.

Allen: You pay a price. I agree. There is so much that goes back to his childhood. It’s just amazing. This little prayer that we have from the Proverbs out on the burial site, he learned that on his mother’s knee. He used that the night that he met his real father and he cried himself to sleep with that. When he was going over the side of the Monterey, in a typhoon he said that prayer, the night before he became president. That all goes back to this mother and father who must have been absolutely marvelous with those kids.

When the real relationship started I was named the trustee of the Foundation, but five years later, I get a telephone call from President Ford. Bob Griffin, Senator Griffin, was the chairman and President Ford called me and asked me if I’d be chairman and I hesitated for a minute and I said, “Now, I have to remind you of something.” He said, “Yes, what’s that?” I said, “Well, I did my undergraduate work at Notre Dame, did my graduate work at Michigan State, and I’m replacing a University of Michigan man and I don’t know how that’s going be perceived.” And just like that, he said to me, “I knew all that. But I also knew you got wiser in life and married Sue, who was a University of Michigan graduate.” And that, I think, was the beginning of a long, personal relationship that I had with him.
Smith: That’s a great place to break because there are a couple of big things I want to get into.

Smith: Let me ask you a large question about Ford and religion. Some people have asked me, was the president religious? My sense is that it was something very important to both of them, but there was a kind of Midwest reticence that characterizes them in a lot of ways. They weren’t about to parade it, much less risk even appearing to exploit it.

Allen: I have to tell you, as well as I knew him, I was surprised. I really didn’t become aware of how really deep their religion was until they got into the tail end of the funeral planning, not even the front end. The front end was a lot of military, and, as you and I know, we went and talked more about the “coming home” aspect of it. I was really surprised how deep their religion was. He certainly didn’t wear it on his sleeve. In private conversations with him he said all the right things that might have been relative to religion, but he never talked about his religion.

Then come to find out how deep it really was, even now more associated with some of the children, one gets the sense that there was so much of it there. Just like the proverbs that I mentioned in some of the parts of the funeral that were used. But, boy, you go back and read and study and there was one commencement that he did, I think, for Mike when he was practicing to become a minister. There was some really strong religious tones in that, that I just couldn’t find in any personal things that I had with him, or things he wrote or he said. But later it became very obvious he was very deeply religious. I didn’t realize it. It was a surprise to me.

Smith: What are your memories about the Billy Graham visit?

Allen: I was trying to remember a couple of years ago when I was thinking of Father Hesburgh, and I always sort of had this feeling. I really, really respect Billy Graham, but I really had this feeling with presidents, he sort of became the presidential chaplain, if you will. So I didn’t see, in my mind, anything distinguishing again about Billy Graham being here for that. I really didn’t. I thought he had this relationship with him. But I just never saw evidence of it. He lived a life that was exemplary, but not necessarily showed the religious side of him. I don’t remember, it might very well be that he didn’t like to be away on weekends, but I don’t remember being in Grand Rapids on a Sunday and going to church – I don’t know how much he went to church at Grace Episcopal when he was growing up – I just don’t know.

Smith: It’s interesting because I sense on the one hand a kind of live and let live attitude. When you get him talking about Congress in the old days, it was very clear there was a certain amount of misbehavior going on. There was a lot of drinking going on. There was more than a little womanizing going on. And you have this sense that Ford had kind of chuckled at the frailties of his fellow men. But at the same time, he’d never preach. It goes back again to this Midwestern, and that generation, too. It found expression in his politics – the fact that he was conservative. He was an economic conservative, he was in the traditional sense, a social conservative in that there were things that were personal, that were intimate, that were left to the individual, that were not part of the political process and certainly not something for government to intervene on. And his career straddles this period when all that changed.

Allen: I think you’re right. He just lived this exemplary life that, however he was brought up, he would look at those misdoings of different people and didn’t accept them - to the point that he wouldn’t feel that he had to call them the bad guys and him the good guy - but that he would continue to live his life.
But he liked to observe all that, and he didn’t like what he saw, but he liked to observe. It’s not that he was the gossipy type, but that he kind of liked to know what was going on. And yet, he just wouldn’t become part of it. Those guys would go out to have a drink practically every day after they were in Congress – Democrats and Republicans together – and he would be a party to that, he went out with them. But I doubt that he ever came home late, or…

Smith: A lot of this, in my observation, was evident in his attitude about Clinton.

Allen: Yeah.

Smith: Which was a complicated…

Allen: Yeah, that’s the first time he really kind of openly came out, and I guess he didn’t directly say anything about the kinds of things he was doing, but he just felt that in that office he had to pay the price and he felt obligated to do that. In conversations I had with him, the only thing he would say to me about Clinton was, “You know, since Truman, when I became active in Washington, I’ve never seen anybody that can communicate like Bill Clinton. And he can do it regardless of who the audience is. But his management style in his management of his life was very, very poor.”

The other thing he told me was that when he had dinner with Hillary and Bill Clinton out in Colorado, he said, “I couldn’t believe how smart she was. She is one smart person.” So I don’t know whether he was meaning like Bill might not have been as smart, but he had all that street knowledge that he needed. But he was intrigued with them. When they went out and played golf with Jack Nicklaus in Colorado, in a sense Bill Clinton cheated at golf. He [Ford] was just beyond himself, as was Jack Nicklaus, to the point that they didn’t want to play with him anymore. The guy was cheating, and cheating to him was not a good thing.

Smith: Did he talk about Nixon?

Allen: Never heard him talk about Nixon at all – other than the only thing I ever did was, he and Betty both talked about their close, personal relationship with him and what a disaster it was that happened. That’s the only thing he ever talked to me about as far as Nixon.

Smith: We were talking about his judgment about people. Obviously anyone in that position is going to have a lot of friends and a lot of would-be friends, and some people with mixed motives. Let’s face it, it just goes with the territory. Celebrity-hood. How did he cope with that?

Allen: I know that he knew the kind of degrees you just went through. People were just good friends, people that were friends, but also had favors, and those that just wanted favors. He had a difficult time saying no to anybody, regardless how they fit into those categories, other than when they got in that bottom tier and they irritated him. Then he didn’t want anything to do with them. I can’t imagine there were a lot of people like that. He just hid his feelings about people trying to use him. It is interesting, later in life, as he learned how autograph seekers were liable to put something on to make some money off of – but it was interesting, you’d walk with him and somebody would want an autograph. He’d see a little kid and autograph and he’d see somebody and he’d would just avoid them. I’d say later, “I noticed you avoided him,” and he’d say, “I just knew what he was up to. I knew what he was going do and I don’t want to favor them with any of that.” So, probably throughout his lifetime he probably had some of those kind of people.

Smith: One thing that no one knows is how much time he and the other former presidents spend signing their name.

Allen: Oh, Lord, yes. They got pretty wise as a group when they would sign something when they were together. They would make an agreement that they would only do fifty, and then they would use those for personal friends. But a tremendous amount of that came across their desks at times. We had enough of it here where we’d make some judgments and send them out to him. He’d always say yes, but they were coming from all over and how much time they’d do that.

This is a little bit different subject, but it’s similar. What really concerned me in his latter years – he needed a literary doorkeeper. He was saying yes to things, he was not taking his usual care that he had used all through his life – how careful he was – just almost by his own nature he was that way. He had lost that near the end, and it was hard to see some of the things that came out - the guy who wrote the foreword to the Warren Commission. That whole incident never should have happened. There were just a lot of things going on that I was just amazed. He went outside of his own boundaries, he didn’t even put any restrictions on it. He didn’t say, “Hey, talk about this five years after I’m gone” or anything and right afterwards stuff just started spilling out that I felt was really unfortunate.

I never could figure out how big the impact was, comments that came out from Mike Lloyd or DeFrank, or Woodward. I never bump into those people on the street that say, jeez, how could he ever do that kind of thing?

Smith: But I wonder if some of that is, and it’s the other side of this Boy Scout quality, there was a kind of almost naiveté about him. On the one hand, you’re right, he could sense when people were obviously using him. On the other hand, part of it you also wonder – here you are, you’re out of Washington, you’re out of the picture. Bob Woodward wants to come spend time with you, which is flattering. He wants to talk to you about all these things, and he just didn’t put any restrictions on it.

Allen: You’re right. Particularly in those later years when he wasn’t traveling anymore. He was very alert at that time, but he just wasn’t traveling, wasn’t giving speeches. But he missed that life. So anybody, I didn’t talk to media people, but it is amazing to me that people, be it Don Rumsfeld or Bo Schembechler would say to me, how’s he doing? I miss him, I would really like to talk – I’d say, “Call him.” He loved that. But people would feel they were imposing, so I can see him doing that and I can see him just having a enjoyable conversation. But he didn’t put any restrictions on it. Writers are writers.

Smith: Now, that raises an interesting thing, because one senses that Mrs. Ford, in particular, was upset, not that some of these things appeared, but they appeared as soon as they did. Would she have known that this was an ongoing thing – or would she have anticipated– or would anyone have anticipated? Frankly someone should have.

Allen: That’s my point. There was no doorkeeper there. I respected Penny, his chief of staff, an awful lot, but she wasn’t the right person to do that. If you’re going to have a Woodward, DeFrank and a Mike Lloyd there, you’d think somebody would be sitting there with him…

Smith: Almost protecting him from himself.

Allen: Yeah, right. We see that in other people all the time, but he didn’t. He had nobody to protect him, so I don’t think the family, until it came in print, knew what he had said. I mean, my understanding with the Mike Lloyd and the, I think, Maury DeJonge preceded Mike in those meetings out there, maybe I was naive, too, but it was about the obituary. The official obituary, which I was pleased was coming out of the Grand Rapids paper. What I didn’t know, and maybe it started out to be that, and maybe President Ford started getting it – it went way beyond an obituary. It became what he thought about former presidents and everything – had nothing to do with his obituary. And I can see him sitting there talking about it.

Smith: Everyone brings their own outlook. I remember reading the series in the Grand Rapids Press and I thought, “Is this what you came up with after twenty years of visits.”

Allen: It was terrible. It was awful.

Smith: It was really very thin.

Allen: Especially the first Mike Lloyd article, which was the main article. I think it was just a reaction to Woodward. It was poorly written and Mike’s not that bad a writer, but it was done in a hurry and it just didn’t flow very well, it just wasn’t good writing. It was almost like, “I’ve got to get something in the paper right away.” It was very poorly done. I’ve often wondered when he had those kind of meetings, whether it was his naïve sense of value, that he trusted people, that they would use good judgment. I wonder if he sat there said, “I’ll say anything I want, but these people, I’m giving the privilege to these people to sit with me…” I wonder if he sat there and said, “Well, they’ll never put this in,” and therefore never said don’t write anything about it for five years or something. I just never could figure that out, other than his age. He had that loneliness that he was missing a part of life that had been – his whole life he was sitting out there and he just loved to talk to people.

Smith: This is purely speculative, but you wonder how he would have reacted to the DeFrank book.

Allen: Oh, I think he’d have been upset. I really do. Tom was a friend he respected…there again, I don’t know whether because of that and because that’s what he would think of him, that he would just write a different kind of book. That part did hurt Mrs. Ford, and I can see, because she became a little bit of a doorkeeper there in the house at the very end. Although she wasn’t in the room all the time with Tom and I would guess she’d said, “Boy, I wish I’d never” – you know – it was too personal.

Smith: I have to believe she played some role – remember when the Profiles in Courage Award was announced and I know because I got a call from Ken Duberstein saying, “Can you help?” I said, “What do you mean?” Because President Ford wasn’t going to go. And what makes me think about this is, I remember the Newsweek story, and I saw Jon Meacham not long ago, and I said, “I thought that was a really good story, but there was one thing in it that really kind of jumped off the page at me, and I thought was kind of inaccurate. It was more than a hint that Ford had consciously, deliberately, met with these historians and reporters in an effort to shape his historical legacy.”

I said, “I can’t think of anyone who spent less time plotting and scheming about how history would see him than Gerald Ford.” The classic evidence of that is if you were making a movie about Gerald Ford’s life, you’d end it with the Profiles in Courage Award, because that really was – it had come full circle and it was just – you couldn’t have scripted it. But he had so little sense of self-dramatization. That’s what was totally missing. To some people it was naïveté, some people thought it was innocence. He simply wasn’t the sort of person - it goes back to what you said, “What’s the fuss all about?” He wasn’t going to go to Boston.

Allen: I didn’t know that, but that doesn’t surprise me.

Smith: He wasn’t going to go! Initially, and I have to believe that Mrs. Ford was part of the process that brought him around. Clearly she understood, instinctively, the meaning of this event. This wasn’t just another award.

Allen: I don’t think he did. I really don’t think he did. You may be right, somebody influenced him. Whether you did or somebody else, but after the fact he would talk to me a lot about that. He’d say, “You know, that was the best thing I ever did. I never worked so hard at practicing,” I know you had written it – “I’d never worked so hard practicing my delivery for that. I am just stunned at the impact…that the question is over with about the pardon. It’s done!” I don’t think he saw that from the front end.

Smith: He didn’t see it in advance. Which raises this larger issue…

Allen: I saw some things, some awards, there were some really neat athletic awards – big time that they wanted to give him, and they wanted him to be there. One of them was in LA or something, and he just wouldn’t go. I’d try and convince him and say, “It really is worth it to you.” But he never perceived that. The NCAA made a wonderful award in his name, but by that time it may have been questionable about whether he could have gone. He had one of his sons go, but even then he struggled with, why are they doing this, what’s the fuss? I’m just the guy that was put into a position. I wasn’t elected, I was put in a position, I loved what I was doing, I wish I could have continued, but I didn’t and that’s the way it is. I think that’s classic and I didn’t know that, but it doesn’t surprise me.

Smith: It was an amazing day. Part of it was, Ted Kennedy got up and said - he can be the most charming, almost deferential, and it was a remarkable day. One sensed that it was left to his friends to think about things like vindication. I don’t think he thought in those terms.

Allen: No, absolutely not. He’d just get angry about it. He’d get angry – he’d say, “I’ve told them that so many times.” But the questions never stopped. He couldn’t stop it, they were going to ask those same questions every time, until something like this happened to stop the questions. It’s over. And it was amazing to him. It was really a highlight of his life. I’ve got to tell you, that was one of the major highlights of his life – he talked about it so often. That and the Congressional Medal of Freedom were two awards that – he joked about the Medal of Freedom – that meant a lot to him – but he always joked because Betty got it before him.

Smith: You wonder why he didn’t get it at the same time. And it was a Republican president. The story about the Clinton thing… I was working with Skip Rutherford, behind the scenes. It was ten months after the op-ed piece which the White House seized upon at the time, understandably. There was no quid pro quo, but I think Skip was the guy who went and said, “You know, you really ought to do this.” It was the twenty-fifth anniversary. Then, I’ll never forget, the day before was another op-ed piece in the Times about affirmative action. And the Willis Ward story. I was a little bit miffed, Clinton should have done just Ford. But you know how that White House works, they get eight or nine people and something for every political group. Ford became the center of attention, not so much because he was getting the award, but because all these people wanted to thank him for the piece on affirmative action.

Allen: Isn’t that interesting – I didn’t know that…But even that, he used to joke about the fact, and he wasn’t offended at all, he’d joke about the fact that his wife got a Medal of Freedom and he didn’t. But he never saw himself getting the Medal of Freedom, even. He just didn’t. And the Congressional Gold Medal became such a delight to him because they did it jointly – it was the first time it was ever done for a husband and wife and I think he was prouder of the fact that she was getting it than he was getting it himself. But it was home to him again – Congress. But did he ever have any expectations for that? No way.

The conversation that I had with Congressman Vern Ehlers about was it a possibility and then the discussion got around, well, you know, they both have achieved so much. But do you think he’d ever even, ever, ever, on any kind of award, named after him or whatever, say, “Wonder why they haven’t done that for me?” He wouldn’t think about that. He just wouldn’t think that about that. When it was done, then he really appreciated it. Something as small as that presidential seal – when it was done – he thought, well that is pretty nice.

Smith: Tell me about ‘them.’ I know that’s a huge subject, but he clearly was so proud of her.

Allen: Oh, yeah.

Smith: And what she had done. And what she was accomplishing. The stories about him at their annual event or whatever, cooking hot dogs. Taking this sort of back of the house role.

Allen: It was a great love story to start out with, but it was a love story that was based on what she had achieved versus what he did. It meant so much to him, whatever she was into. Small things like, we were at the hotel and they dedicated that room, the Ford Room downstairs, which is an elegant room. And right at the dedication he said it would do him a big favor if it was the Jerry and Betty Ford Room.
When I’d travel with him or when he was here, he was just on the telephone to her all the time. This whole thing with what she achieved with her overcoming her problems was – it was so big to him. I can tell you in a very private discussion with him, when I had a problem in my family, I was in a hotel room with him in Ann Arbor having breakfast and he said to me, “You’re not yourself, Marty. Something’s bothering you.” And I kind of let it out. I’d never seen it before, but Secret Service came to tell me it was time to go and he said, “No, I’m not going any place. I’ve got to take care of this.” But then it was immediately transferred to Betty. Betty called me and he was so proud of those kind of things, so proud of the Center, he would do anything for that Center. He would do anything for her.

I tell you, it was just one of the marvelous love stories. And it was a two way story. I will, for this purpose, tell one story that I haven’t made public. I went to see her about three or four months ago and we had a great afternoon. The two of us sat and talked about a variety of things and she said how hard it is, and I said that I had not lost a spouse, so I don’t know, but I assume it’s very hard. I said, “It’s harder, I think, for you because you both lived a long time together and spent good years together for longer than most people, so then when the parting comes it’s got to be even tougher.” She said, “You’re absolutely right.” And that’s when she smiled at me and then got a stern look without saying, and said, “You know, if I’d known I was going to live this long, I would behaved myself a little better in my earlier life.” But she said, “Marty,” and she had this great grin, and she said, “but I had so much fun.”

When we left she was going to get up and I said, “No, I know where the door is, you sit and relax and I’ll go on.” She said, “No, I want to go to the door with you.” So we went to the door and there was an olive tree outside their door. It’s a pretty good sized tree, and she said, “You know, I never took the Christmas lights off that tree, they’re white lights, not colored. All white, beautiful tree. And I turn it on every night so he knows I’m okay.” This was after he passed away. Well you just know, she’s always worrying about him. She knows how he just took care of her and he was with her all the time. It was so sincere, it was just amazing.

Smith: It’s been tough for her, hasn’t it?
Allen: Very tough. I think that, as I said to her that day, I said, “One of the hard things is…” she said, “I don’t get out.” I said, “Well you should get out.” She said, “Well, I’ll get out with my friends.” I said, “I know the difficulty because you are outliving your friends like the President did. You don’t have the people to go with that you had in the past.” She said, “That’s part of it,” but she’s never really wanted to go back out, I don’t think. She used some excuses, I think, and people accept them. Why not? I tell you, it’s a love story that I really observed, it was just a classical love story. The decisions he would make, he said, “I like to stay in the hotel, rather than a private home because I can order butter pecan ice cream from the kitchen and she doesn’t know it.” But that kind of stuff – like early romantic stuff that was going on when he was ninety.

Smith: One thing I sensed about them, and I think maybe a lot of older people do it, one sensed that they particularly liked to be around younger people. That they made an effort to sort of cultivate younger people. Maybe it was just lucky timing or something, I was just one example of that. But I think it was almost a kind of renewal that went on.

Allen: I think they did and she was, you take a look at her kind of culture and her spirit, it’s really quite different than his. He was, as we’ve described him, quite quiet, and just very unassuming. But she was just kind of the opposite. She was a dancer. She liked excitement and I think as they grew older, I think they just would go back mentally to all the things they did as young people and enjoyed it so much. It’s just like you’re saying that to me. And I know what she was saying, but she said, “I really had fun.” She had the whimsical part of her that I loved.

Smith: Do you think he felt any degree of guilt about those early years when his political career really took off in the House and as Minority Leader, and he was on the road all the time, and really left her to raise the kids? Some of her problems, which may not have been directly related to that…if I were going to write a book about Ford, I’d write a book about the Fords, because I think the two of them, the two stories cover so much more territory. She really is representative of a whole generation of women who struggled to find their identity and their role, who certainly didn’t reject their traditional role, but who in many ways were prevented by cultural norms from doing more. Whatever price, psychological or other that she paid for that – did he understand that?

Allen: I think he did. I don’t know that for sure. I really think he understood that he had – he thought he was doing the right thing, and he was doing the right thing, politically and in his job, if you will. But I think he probably didn’t realize that he was really putting her under the almost total role of raising a family. She had other talents, but she could never use them, and I don’t think he realized that until later in life and realized what had happened to her. I’m sure he had to look back and say, gee - because he always would talk about taking care of the children, afterwards.

I didn’t see the relationship with the children in my position with him at all until late in life. They would tell me stories about how he began to realize that he had not been there for her. I think he did, he never said that to me, but I just think he did. He realized that in doing the things that he was – and that happens to people – happens to business leaders, they get so obsessed with running a company they forget about their families and it causes problems.

Smith: I think maybe more of that generation than later generations.

Allen: Oh, absolutely. But at the same time, you saw the spirit of her. The Sixty Minutes interview, can you imagine being in the White House after that, people turned upside down, “What do we do?” and everything. He’s sitting there saying, “That’s Betty. May have lost a few votes, but that’s the way it is.”

Smith: One senses that she blossomed in the White House.

Allen: I think she did.

Smith: It’s as if she had this stage and she could explore a lot of her interests. I was telling someone for this PBS special the other day, her interest in culture and clothes matched Jackie Kennedy’s.

Allen: Yeah, very much so. I never thought of it in that comparison, but she did. And that was her life; that was how she grew up. She was a dancer and I guess you know the great photograph Kennerly took of her on the last day in the White House is on top of the Cabinet table, just to me told the whole story. It took her right back in her dancing pose – this beautiful lady. And she did in the White House - she had an opportunity. But you think about it in terms of Congress, yes, she was in some of the aid-type things with the wives, but that wasn’t her. She watched him closely, by the way. Not the Nancy Reagan type with the President, but she watched him closely.

Smith: Remember the famous Vikki Carr story?

Allen: Well, I don’t know the story. You probably know the story well, but I mean, referring to her as a Hot Tamale, he got lectured about that.

Smith: What was your favorite Mexican dish? He said, “You.”

Allen: Yeah. I’ll tell you a great story about that. I think Dick Ford was there. We were at, we being my wife and I and the Ford brothers and their wives, and I think there was one other couple there, at dinner out in Colorado around the golf tournament. We were talking and somehow the subject of Steelcase came up. Well, he jumped on it and said, “Well, you know, I dated Mary Idema,” who was in the Steelcase family. And he kept going on quite extensively about it. All of a sudden she interrupted, she said, “Well, Jerry, did you ever think that if you’d married her you would have been president of Steelcase?” And that was the end of the conversation. She had her way of kind of stopping…it was so funny to watch her do that.

Smith: I think you told me the story at the rededication of Pantland.

Allen: Oh, yeah. That’s on tape - that reference to the 1913 Room that they had to redo.

Smith: The renovation.

Allen: Renovation and she said something to the effect that, “You could go through a bit of a renovation yourself.” I forget the lines, but I was there, and we have it on tape someplace, I think. She had a tremendous wit about her. She was a strong person, a very strong person. In some ways, probably, stronger than him in certain characteristics. If she had been a gatekeeper, I think he might not have done some things, and some of them might not have even been outlandish. But she watched him very carefully. He didn’t resent it, he appreciated it.

Smith: I know, at the time, she told him that dropping Rockefeller was a dumb thing to do.

Allen: Oh, I didn’t know that.

Smith: That’s not after the fact, that’s at the time, she told him.

Allen: See that’s the point I make, in a way, in saying that she brought him back to his own strength, because he didn’t do those kind of things, he didn’t do things for the best interest of politics. He would have never, probably, done that, and from that day forward he knew he’d made the worst mistake that he ever made and he was very open about that.

Smith: I wonder - the old line about men marrying their mothers - but the fact is, he clearly was accustomed to strong women. One gathers that Dorothy Ford, just by what she went through and what she did in life, had to have been a pretty impressive figure in her own right.

Allen: And in particularly as it got later in life, he never openly talked about the abuse of his mother, but it was almost like saying, Betty stepped forward after her abuse of herself, and I’ve been through it this way – there’s some parallels in that life, that he saw his mother and his wife go through some real severe problems. It had to affect him. I bet he did compare himself a lot to her.

Smith: Tell me the story about the merry-go-round on one of his visits back home.

Allen: Well, at the public museum when they dedicated that, again, he was very good when he was healthy, to come back for events like he used to come back as a congressman. And that was one of them, the dedication. It was a black tie affair and it was very late and they had rebuilt this merry-go-round. It was a very ornate type of room overlooking the river that the merry-go-round was in, and so they took the major guests in the room to ride the horses on the merry-go-round. They put him on a horse and I’ve never seen such a disgusted look on his face. And he’d look at the Secret Service men and say, “Tell them to stop this thing. I want to get off this horse.” The great photograph is, again, it shows her whimsical and his kind of ‘keep things straight.’

She had a picture taken for their Christmas card on a Harley Davidson motorcycle. A big red motorcycle. She sitting on the motorcycle, he’s there in a black leather jacket and you could almost tell he’s like “What am I doing?” and “Betty asked me to do it, so I’d better do it.” So they get the picture and it’s the only time I heard him refer to himself in a presidential manner. He said, “This isn’t very presidential, me standing in a black leather jacket next to a Harley Davidson with my wife on it. With ho-ho-ho written on the bottom of it.” She negotiated with him. She said, “Can I have sixty of them to send to my sixty best friends?” So they did and it’s my favorite picture of the two of them. It is just a marvelous picture because it tells so much about both of them.

Smith: It’s a perfect microcosm of what was attractive about each of them, and what attracted each of them to each other. The classic opposites attracting, in many ways, and it was greater than the sum of its parts. It’s almost like – you think of Burns and Allen – two people with very fixed personae and part of the charm was that kind of creative friction between this free spirit and this traditionalist. Some of that came out in the White House, but it was so politicized. Is the First Lady overstepping her bounds and all of this. You almost wish, if there had been some skilled presentational people, you could have taken that relationship and…

Allen: …that relationship and the relationship with his mother and stepfather. Not a sob story, but a sincere story of a man who was so influenced by his mother and stepfather. And so influenced by his wife.

Smith: The more people knew about Ford, the more impressed they were. But, for lots of reasons, they didn’t get to know them. In a curious sort of way, it’s almost as though they got to know him more when he died than when he was in the White House.

Allen: Oh, I think they did. I don’t think there is any question about that. I do think that the funeral was thought out the way you wished that people on the staff’ would have thought about when he was living in the presidency. Because there was so many aspects of that funeral that stood out in people’s minds. The stop at the World War II thing was just so meaningful to veterans, and the use of the Capitol Building.

Smith: And validate, so I’m not a liar here, when we went out there and talked about, the one thing he was adamant about, remember?

Allen: “I’m not going to have that damn riderless horse going down Constitution Avenue.” He just didn’t want to do it. I went back, as you remember - well that’s his choice. But at the same time, I think there was some history behind us, so I went to the Military District of Washington and they wrote a letter about the history of the horse and everything. That didn’t make any difference to him at all. “I don’t want the horse.” He wanted it simple, he wanted it focused on his second home, which was the Capitol Building and his home in Grand Rapids when he came back. We had to bring that out of him.

The military had set the plan for burying a Commander in Chief, which is rightfully so, but it was lacking in some of the real personal things to him, because he had a hard time addressing it himself. He just didn’t want to address it. So we had that day with him and I think that turned his thought process around and he seemed to – and I’m sure she probably had some very good conversations with him afterwards. They were a little upset because – the family was – he kind of let the military go with it. He probably thought that’s the way they do it, and the family hardly had any input whatsoever, until quite a bit later, then they had input into it. It became more him than it did the military.

Smith: Let me ask you something – in our next conversation I want to get into detail about all that, but let me ask you, because that raises something. And it is difficult to phrase. I always sensed, maybe passivity is the wrong word, but it’s almost an offshoot of modesty. He could be very stubborn, he could be assertive, but he could also yield, defer is maybe a better word. I wonder if part of the problem in the early phase in the presidency especially was, coming out of the congressional experience. Learning to be president, is, in fact, a very different thing. That quality of inviting input from a lot of people, and then making a decision…I’ll give you an example. Letting the re-election campaign go as long as it did. It slid for a long time.

Allen: The campaign?

Smith: Yeah. Assuming that Reagan wouldn’t run, assuming that Reagan could be bought off, in effect. Lyndon Johnson is the other extreme, but somewhere there is a happy medium of having all these fine qualities, but at the same time looking out for his own interests and being a little more anticipatory and assertive.

Allen: You’ve used the phrase quite often about it, how he acted in Congress and he really didn’t have to do all that when he was in Congress. But when he became president, he was a chief executive officer versus a congressman and a chief executive officer has a balance of being a good manager and being a micro manager. And the idea is to fall someplace in the middle, but he tended, as I watched him, he became a sort of after the fact. He would listen a lot and then take a position. But if he took positions himself early and then listened - he probably did - but it wasn’t noticeable. He tended more, as he had said to me that day, when I was running that meeting. He said when I was there I would listen to him and know that they would come to a conclusion that was acceptable to me or I would do something about it. It wasn’t that he was leading that and I think when they opened the papers on Vietnam, at the conclusion of that, you saw some of his assertiveness. He made some very firm decisions, but it was made, and never noticeable publicly that he ever did that. LBJ wouldn’t have let that get away.

Smith: It put a greater burden on key staff around him to compensate for that. I don’t mean to pick on Barrett or anyone in particular, but when some of these offers came along, that you just kind of uncritically accepted. Where, if there had been in place a process that asked really tough questions, I wonder whether he would have been better served – because he was such a trusting guy himself – he was someone who needed a Haldeman. That’s the irony. The irony is that Nixon needed the opposite.

Allen: Yeah, if you had a leader that was that trustworthy, almost with a Boy Scout attitude, that he just trusted everybody, that’s almost when you’ve got to kind of guard him and protect him because he has so much faith that it works most of the time. But when it doesn’t work, it doesn’t work well. That’s why I always wondered whether when he talked openly to people, he just had faith in them. They were people that he trusted; that’s why he had them in front of him. And I never could quite get a handle myself on how that staff operated within the White House, other than I was disappointed at the end when I found out that they kept personal things out of his speeches and things like that, that were not good decisions. I don’t know who made that decision, I have no idea, but you wonder whether that kind of thing was happening in the White House. And he, rather than be assertive, he would listen and trust them and then do something. It’s a tough one.

Smith: That’s a great one on which to end. We’ve had two solid hours, and we’ll have no trouble filling the next two.

August 6

Allen: Let me go back to the question you posed to me about some of the unique things about the man that may not be known to the public. One of the things that is really amazing is the loyalty both ways about the man: his loyalty to other people, and the loyalty of other people. I often am again reminded, Kissinger told me two things. He told me that what distinguished him was his Cabinet, for one thing, because he selected people that he wasn’t afraid of their egos. He said, “Look at me, I’m the perfect example, but there were many others.” But he enjoyed that part of it and he enjoyed it a great deal to have those intellectual people talk to him and he listened carefully, but made his own decisions, and he earned that respect. But he said the other thing that is unique to Ford was his long standing relationship after he got out of office with heads of states. Particularly three: d’Estaing, Schmidt, and Lord Callaghan. I thought about that after we’d started the interview, and all three of those came to Grand Rapids.

Smith: And all three are at the other end of the spectrum, either politically or temperamentally. Giscard is not exactly a homegrown Midwestern type, and both Callaghan and Schmidt, Callaghan an Old Labor socialist in the British tradition, and Schmidt is a socialist from Germany.
Allen: That added to it. But they came here, of course they met every year in Colorado at the AEI World Affairs meeting, but when Lord Callaghan came here, Lord Callaghan came by himself for one occasion. And he said to me, “The reason I really wanted to come so badly was that I wanted to find out why we trusted him so much. The only way I was ever going to find out, and I needed to find out, was, I had to talk to the people he talked to. I had to go and walk the ways he walked.” In fact, in his suit, he asked to be driven out to Lake Michigan because he’d heard the president talk about it. Took his shoes and socks off, rolled his pants up and waded into Lake Michigan. But he gave a talk that, unfortunately, it was never transcribed here that night. A small dinner group. He said, “Now I know why I’ve trusted him. I know more about his background. I know that he was a Boy Scout, but more importantly, I just talked to the people that he did and I have a sense about the man.”

I think that’s really quite a unique trait of his, and he, President Ford, was just the same way to other people. He, for example, would not let Kissinger come to Grand Rapids unless he was here. And there were others, too. There were people like that, he said, “Marty, if those kind of people come to my hometown, I’ve got to be there.” The last time Kissinger came was the fall before the president passed away, and he didn’t come, and he wrote a letter for me to read, and I had a terrible time reading it. It was a very personal letter about the fact that he wanted to be there. Kissinger gave his talk and we went out to the airport and he started getting on the private plane, started going up the steps and turned around and came back down. He was crying, he said, “I know I’m not going to see him in Grand Rapids again under the circumstances.” And he turned around and went back up to the plane.

I had a lot of unusual experiences for somebody who never, ever expected to with a lot of people of the caliber of Bill Simon, Paul O’Neill - all those people had the same feeling about him. Carla Hill, you heard Carla’s comments when she got the Ford medal, you could just tell it was coming from her heart. This cross loyalty among them is just amazing and he always, as I think I mentioned, he was always amazed that people came back for that annual dinner. He always was surprised. He didn’t understand why they would all come back and that’s when we’d always have to tell him why. But it’s just a side of him that I remember Kissinger and others bringing up that I thought was worth talking about. He has this amazing personality.

I’ll tell you the other thing. He made people so comfortable. People ask me how in the world did he get up and talk at the White House, at a dinner, or how do you get up and do these things. I said, “You know, it’s not normal for me to do that. I can’t talk about my own family without getting moved someplace about them, but because he made you so comfortable, you kind of did things you wouldn’t have even expected that you could do.”

Smith: Tell us about the ninetieth birthday, both at the White House and here in Grand Rapids.

Allen: Well, it was very thoughtful of the incumbent President Bush to offer the White House and it was fun planning it because they both had a lot of similarities. They didn’t like formality and it was going to be in the State Dining Room. First of all, they didn’t want tux, they wanted business suits. Bush was known for not liking any kind of parties in the White House of any kind, it was a struggle for him. But that night turned out to be a fun night. It was a fun night for a lot of reasons. As you know, the remark was made by the president that we had one thing in common, and that was our lack of vocabulary. I happened to be sitting at the table with President Bush’s mother. I thought his mother was going to just roll off the chair laughing about it.

So it took on that tenor, and the other rule they set ahead of time – let’s not make this a late evening, which of course, both of them loved that. It was a wonderful night, it was a night where the two of them, an incumbent president, whoever it would be, but in this case was President Bush was very down to earth and President Ford said it was a fun night – the entertainment was fun.

Smith: Was there interaction between, for example, Betty Ford and Laura Bush?

Allen: No, because they were at separate tables. I’m not sure, I could be wrong about that, they may have been at the table with President Ford. You know how they split everybody up. I happened to be at the table with President Bush and his mother. The exchange between them was absolutely – she was on him something terrible – this was shortly after he was playing his western role in going over to get them dead or alive and she was saying, don’t ever say that again. She was punching him and he’d kind of wink at you. It was an interesting table because Happy Rockefeller was at that table, Jim Cannon was at that table. It was a very interesting table. I think all the tables were. My wife ended up sitting next to Tobin Armstrong and that was interesting. Anne Armstrong was there, too.

Smith: I saw where she just died.

Allen: Yeah. He really had serious feelings about her playing a very active role either as Cabinet or vice president. She was always a very generous lady to us. So it was just a wonderful evening and at the stroke of about nine-thirty, it was funny to watch because you could tell that the staff was working against time to get the food – it was moving in and out – if you didn’t eat your main course pretty quick it was gone. The birthday cake was wheeled out as a whole cake, wheeled back in, but then another cake, all cut, came out. And the two of them disappeared, but they left the bar open in one of the rooms and we had a very nice night.

The party in Grand Rapids was incredible. The estimates were that ten or fifteen thousand people were here with a lot of children. He was very moved by it. Here again, it took a light note because Governor Granholm was active in his campaign in ’76 as one of the young Republican “Scatter Blitzers.” So she was relating that and Vern Ehlers, who has a sense of humor but he doesn’t know how to express it - had a clever way of trying to invite her back into the party at that particular time. The music was great. He was terribly moved by it and they did a great thing. I don’t remember whose idea, I think it was Ambassador Secchia’s, but they got all the children together with just him. They’re on that hill out there and there is just a sea of children’s faces.
And he was just absolutely delighted. He many times expressed that. That was the last time he came to Grand Rapids, of course.

Smith: Do you think he knew it was going to be the last time?

Allen: I think so. Let me tell you why I think so. He had a way about him to anticipate what might be coming. Let me give you a couple of examples. His golf tournament. He loved that golf tournament in Vail. It went on for twenty years or so, but three years before the last year it was going to be, he announced the last time would be three years. And he said privately to some of us, “I just don’t want to be wheeled out in a cart like Bob Hope does his tournament. I want to be playing golf, I want to be with the people.”

I heard him say that to me in the back of the car after a National Press Club speech he had just given. The content was great, but he was having a little trouble delivering it. He knew it though. He got in the car and not necessarily in his temper-type thing, he said to me, “That’s the last time I’ll speak at the Press Club. I’ve got to begin to look at not speaking anymore.” And the last time, I think – I could be wrong on this, you may know – but the last time I think he might have really given a public speech was when he gave the Ford Medal to Rumsfeld and Cheney. It was memorable because he had a difficult time physically – we had the podium really bolted down so that just in case he leaned against it or something, it didn’t end up in Cheney’s lap. But he struggled in his delivery and you could tell he was really struggling. But at the end, he stood between Rumsfeld and Cheney, and like a referee at a boxing match was holding their hands, because they were helping him. But he raised their hands and he said, “These are my boys.” He was great until he got off stage – he went into a room in the Capitol and he did lose his temper. He said, “Don’t ever allow me, ever, ever to do that again. Ever. I don’t want to ever put myself in the position to make a fool out of myself.” He sort of had that sense about him.

Smith: The only time I ever saw him display temper, it was really directed at himself.

Allen: Yes, and this was.

Smith: It was probably a couple years – well, I was still here, and I don’t remember what the event was. I’d written some remarks and he spoke in the auditorium, and it wasn’t bad. But part of the thing was, the lighting, or the angle of the podium – and, of course, he never put on glasses.

Allen: No.
Smith: So, the result was – he probably hadn’t practiced as he did for really major events - Penny was a co-conspirator in making sure…obviously the Kennedy – but a number of these things. The one where he really practiced the most was the White House dinner.

Allen: Oh really? I thought you were going to say the Kennedy Profile in Courage.

Smith: The Kennedy was a big deal, but in some ways that was easier because it came after the White House dinner. You remember in November of 2000, it was three days after the disputed election, no one knew who was going to be president. They had all the former presidents and first ladies back to the White House for the 200th anniversary of the White House. He had, if I do say so myself, really good remarks, and Penny made sure he really practiced. When I say this, you know what I’m saying, he benefited from low expectations.

Allen: Yes.

Smith: Because he wasn’t an orator. And a lot of these folks, they were just glad to see him. They hadn’t seen him in twenty or twenty-five years. Well, anyway, he got up there and he really delivered it well, and the jokes and everything. There’s this appeal to unity which didn’t specifically refer, but was in the back of everyone’s mind. The history recurred. This is the man who, in times of national crisis, brings us together. That was the subtext for the event. Hugh Sidey wrote afterwards that he hit it out of the park, so on and so on. That was a great evening.

Allen: This isn’t a praise Richard type thing, but let me tell you something about what a lot of people have said over time. I remember you telling me years ago, because I was just curious and it really had to do with the Dole speech at the Nixon funeral – how you don’t try and write for yourself, you try and understand the person and write for them.

What you really did for President Ford in so many occasions was not create a different Gerald Ford, you just created a way for him to express himself that nobody had ever helped him do before. It was so noticeable to many of us, not that he was a different man, but he was saying things – and we all said to ourselves – he needed somebody like that during the campaign and he would have probably won. But he had this anticipation that, just something about that he knew. The last conversation that I had with him was about the ship, the USS Gerald R. Ford (CUN-76). I had just been at some kind of meeting about it. Maybe it was the ship naming, I don’t know, but it was getting close to the end. I called him and I said, “Lt. Commander Ford, this is Lt. Commander Allen calling.” And he kind of stopped for a second, and I said, “Well, I just wanted you to know they named a ship after a Lt. Commander, I was a Lt. Commander, too.” And he hesitated, and then he said, “Commander, let me ask you a question.” I said, “Yes, sir.” He said, “Tell me about your wartime duty.” And of course, I didn’t even have one battle ribbon, I was a peace time lt. commander. But he had that wit about him. But then he said something, he said “Would you like to come aboard my ship, Commander?” I said, “Yes, sir.” He said, “Will you be there for my ship?” I said, “Yes, sir.” “Then you have my permission to go on board.” That was the last conversation I had and I cried.

Smith: He was very proud of his naval service, wasn’t he?

Allen: Oh, was he! Yes, he really was. He was proud, very proud of his naval service, talked a lot about it, we’d walk by the model of the Monterey out there and he’d stop me every time. It wasn’t that he’d forgot that he told me, he just wanted to talk about it again. He’d show me on the ship where, when the typhoon hit, he slid across the deck, where he grabbed the guy line. He did, he had a tremendous pride in his military and I think he used that a lot to his advantage when he was in office. I really do, both as a congressman and as a president. He used his pride in the military extensively. But he was that way about football. He just had a tremendous pride in having been on that Michigan football team, and he talked about it so many times.

Smith: That brings up, and here’s a classic instance where there was no speechwriter involved - tell us about the pep talks.

Allen: I went to one of the pep talks. I think I was there most often when he was there, but I didn’t go into the pep talks. You’ve never seen somebody so completely relaxed and articulate talking to a football team. He just had a sense about him, and the interesting thing – he would always call me, he knew about my football relationship at Notre Dame, we had a mutual relationship with Lou Holtz, so we just had this football thing.

He’d always call me and he would say, “I need your advice.” I’d say, “What would you like my advice about?” He said, “Do you think I’ll impose, when I go to Ann Arbor, if I would impose by asking Coach Schembechler or Coach Carr if I could talk to the team?” I said, “Mr. President, you’ve got to be kidding me.” “No, I’m not kidding you. I could impose on people, I don’t want to disrupt…” and of course they loved him. He would always go and do it. He loved it. He would almost schedule events in the fall in Ann Arbor so he could get there to be at football.

Smith: And it was often before the Ohio game?

Allen: Not necessarily. But I will tell you about a very unusual pep talk he gave. The University of Notre Dame decided to give him an honorary varsity letter. He had done so much for intercollegiate football and supported it and been a spokesman about it, just as he was about the Navy. That’s the way he was. So they wanted to give him a letter. He was honored, delighted, and he went to Notre Dame on a weekend, it was a Boston College game and he talked to the Notre Dame team the night before the game. Now the ones at Michigan were practice sessions, this was the night before the game. This was Friday night. The full football team is assembled there, all in coat and ties, he walks into the locker room, he kind of looks around, and he says, “I’ve got to tell you guys something. This is the first time I've been back in a locker room the night before a college game. I almost have the same feeling I used to have and I want to talk to you about it.”

Notre Dame had only won one game up to that time. They were like one and five, a terrible start. He said, “You know something? I want to tell you guys something. When I was a junior we won the national championship, when I was a senior, we won one game. That’s it.” He said, “I could hear the boos, I couldn’t make out the remarks, but I said to myself at that time, ‘How do those people know anything about it? How do those eighty thousand – hundred thousand people know what it’s like to play a football game and to be tackled or to break up a pass or be in a critical situation – every play of the game.’” And he said, “That lasted my lifetime. Politically, as I went through politics and I knew I was going to be criticized, I always went back mentally to that – they don’t know what they’re talking about – I do. And I’ve got to live with it.”

So he made this speech to the team, which I thought was great, and at the end he said, “I’ll bet you guys would like to have a picture taken with me.” And individually he went through every one of them and had a picture taken with them. The next day is the game, he walks out with me to present the flag to the Irish Guard, and as we were walking around the band was playing America the Beautiful, and he sees these six guys, who were over six feet tall coming in kilts, he says to me, “This has got to be one of the neatest things I’ve ever done in my life!”

And he did it. Notre Dame won. Notre Dame won the rest of the games that year. Notre Dame went to a bowl game. Notre Dame opens with Michigan the next year. He calls me, he said, “You don’t think that will come up, do you? That I gave them this pep talk and now they’ve got this string of victories and they’re playing my alma mater.” I said, “No, I don’t think that will come up.” But he just loved the things he did.

Smith: He could have been a motivational speaker. I had no idea: Peter Pocklington told us that every year he’d give a pep talk to the Edmonton Oilers. Peter would bring the team down to Rancho Mirage. And every year he’d spend time with them, and he’d give them a pep talk.

Allen: As I’ve said, I saw it twice and he was as good as anybody I ever heard do that. In fact, when he’d go out to practice in Michigan, he’d go out there and he’d stand next to Bo while they were practicing and he would say, “Hey, Coach, would you mind getting your center?” The center was like six-five, 300 pounds, and he’d get up next to him and he’d talk to this guy and he’d say, now, I don’t know how to ever handle him, and yet he played in all star games.

Smith: It’s implicit in what you’ve said, but the relationship with Schemblecher was pretty special.
Allen: Very special. Extremely special. They just had a good sense, feeling about him. Bo was a tough guy. President Ford just kind of respected his toughness and his discipline. He just liked it. And of course, the results always were good, but again, late again in life, I sat with Bo – we were on the advisory board of the Ford School of Public Policy, and he said to me, “I miss talking to him.” I said, “Why don’t you talk to him?” and he said, “I’d be imposing on him.” I said, “No, you won’t.” I knew the number by heart. I said, “I’m going to write it on a piece of paper – call him.” I later found out that he called and Penny said they must have talked for an hour. I said, you can call him every day and he’ll be happy. This was when he wasn’t traveling and he just loved it. And Bo just loved that relationship with him.

Now Woody Hayes is probably even the greater story. Here is the greatest nemesis of the University of Michigan. Woody Hayes was the icon of that hatred, and he expressed it, he never referred to the state of Michigan. But President Ford, particularly when he was campaigning, he just liked football, it didn’t make any difference. It’s just like politics, it didn’t make any difference who he was talking with – Democrat or whoever it was, if it was Lord Callaghan who was a Labor person, that didn’t make any difference. He just respected – he respected Woody because of his knowledge of history – he was a great historian.

So when the dedication of the Ford Museum came in 1981, he was on the invitation list. I can remember it like it happened yesterday. As people were sort of – not parading, but there was only one route because of security – when Woody came, people saw him and there was some booing and some of that, and Woody was just smiling and everything – he was used to that, too. But afterwards, after the dedication, there was a small reception, mostly for out of town people, mostly for Cabinet level people, and I walked in and President Ford looked at me and he said, “Where’s Woody?” I said, “I don’t know, I don’t think he was invited.” He said, “See if he’s still in the hotel.” I went and got a phone, he was in the hotel. I said to Woody, “I’m calling for President Ford, he’d like you to come down.” Woody said, “You’ve got to be kidding me.” I said, “No, he wants you to come down.” He came down. Ford gave him a big bear hug, and Woody was crying. It’s that unusual relationship that he had that was so special.

Smith: And which the public never saw.

Allen: Never saw, never saw that. The public never saw very much, the relationship with three heads of state.

Smith: Right. It’s just unfortunate that in the White House, he never became a vivid personality.

Allen: No, he didn’t.

Smith: In some ways, she became more so.

Allen: She sure did, yeah.

Smith: Talk about Mrs. Ford a little bit, how she adapted to life after the White House. Obviously there’s a before and after intervention.

Allen: The before is, obviously, she came out and she had the chemical dependency, and they had an intervention session and that’s well-known. It was a typical intervention where she was very bitter and angry about it, but the family…

Smith: Was that something – I’ve heard over the years – was that something anyone in particular spearheaded? I’ve heard Susan’s name mentioned.

Allen: If I had to guess, I would guess Susan. I could almost see a conversation going on where Susan…and they were all very active in the intervention, but I think Susan more than any of them. So they got through that ordeal and it was very difficult and she went and she’s very proud to tell me, every time she talks to me she remembers exactly how many years she’s been sober – that’s what she’ll say. “You know, Marty, I’ve been sober now for thirty-some years.” She knows when it is and she goes to the AA meetings, and she was up until maybe just recently, her health maybe not allowed it, and the loss of her husband. But she went to it.

Smith: Tell us about Leonard Firestone and his role in the whole story.
Allen: Leonard had a worse problem almost, than she did, in terms of dependency. As I understand it, it was really close to reaching the point where he was going to lose his life. She interceded on his behalf and he became a recovering alcoholic and then they became extremely close friends, not only because he was generous with the Betty Ford Center, but he resided next to them both in Ranch Mirage and in Vail.

Smith: And didn’t he have something to do with their being there?

Allen: Yes, I think there was some land that he had and he was in that compound in Rancho Mirage before they ever got there, and the same way in Vail. He was so close to them that he helped arrange for that. He was a perfect neighbor for them. They loved him.

Smith: Did they build that house?

Allen: They built both houses. They were not in existence – the house in Rancho Mirage, the compound was made up of three houses. Leonard Firestones’, the house that the Fords built, and the Ginger Rogers’ house that really had been donated, I believe, to the University of Southern California, in some kind of a leasing arrangement. That became the office and the Secret Service headquarters. At Vail, Leonard had the house and they built their house next to Leonard’s out there. And, again, I think it was on land that Leonard had secured. In fact, Leonard was such a great guy, I said to him once, I was walking in the compound and there were all kinds of cars there all the time, and I said, “Leonard, does this drive you kind of crazy – all this traffic and all this security?” He said, “No, this is the greatest thing in the world. I’ve got Secret Service guarding me, I can’t have it any better than this. They’re at the gate, and I come into my gate and there they are to let me in.” They were very close.

But she went through that part of her life where – and I had one experience with her – it was the Easter Sunday after the loss of the election. I think it was that first Easter Sunday after that. They came to Grand Rapids and stayed in a private home, Bob Browne’s home. They came for the purpose – there was some preliminary discussion about the museum, some kind of slides they wanted to show them, and she showed the effects of the problem that she had.
In fact, when they turned the lights down to show the slides, when the lights were up, she was asleep. As gently as he could – with twenty or thirty people there, he got up and very gently woke her up and escorted her out of the room and never said another word about it. So I think that was the peak time, maybe, right around there. Then after that it took place.

So my next exposure to her, really was as we got into the dedication of the museum and then, quite frequently after that. She wasn’t kept abreast of all the things like the burial site and the funeral plans that came to light – it kind of came to me because I think they thought I had created the plan. Up to that point, as you know, they had been created by the military and then we interceded a little bit at that time. But I do remember walking across this bridge out here, the Gillett Bridge, walking with Mrs. Ford across to the hotel and she stopped me in the middle of the bridge, she looked back at the museum, she said, “Now, tell me, where am I going to be buried? Because I know there’ll be dancing on my grave,” with this big smile. I said, “Nobody’s told you yet?” “Nope, nobody’s told me yet.” So I said, “When we go back I’ll show you.” At that time, the wonderful fence that you were responsible for that just made the site – it wasn’t there yet, so it was kind of out there, and now it’s well-defined by this beautiful fencing and the children’s tree that’s out there. But we took her and showed her where she’s going to be buried.

She’s a grand lady. She’s looks so fragile – and maybe she is on the outside – but she isn’t on the inside. She’s a strong, strong lady.

Smith: Was she ill the week of the funeral?

Allen: Well, I found out during that time that she had a bad cold, which eventually was diagnosed when she got back as pneumonia, but she didn’t want to take any antibiotics because she felt that she would miss the sense of what she was to be there for. So she struggled through that week. And a lot of people commented very politely about it, that this poor lady was grieving – which she was, but she also was not healthy. I’ll tell you something, she wouldn’t get in that wheelchair. We had it at all the places for her and the last place was when they were going to do the procession down the walk to the internment site, and she just waved it off. I heard her say one time, “I just want to be as close to the casket as I can be.” The next morning the family came over to pay their last respects before they got on the plane to fly back to California, and then she got in the wheelchair. She got to the gate of the fence – got out of the wheelchair and walked into that site and the family sat together out there. When she came out she said to me, “I forgot how beautiful this site is.” And that was the last thing she said before she went back. From that time on we’ve had a number of reasons to talk, and we’ve talked a lot.

Smith: Tell me about the bet.

Allen: Oh, the bet? Well, I think I mentioned to you that President Ford and I always had this bet and it was just not one telephone call. It was a highly negotiable thing – to the point where she had come to the conclusion, despite his being quite frugal, that we were betting for quite a bit of money. That we wouldn’t go through this process that we were going through and she said something to him about it. She said how much money, and she eventually told me. She said, “I always believed it wasn’t over five dollars.” And I said, “You know your husband well enough, you should have known we were going to negotiate over five dollars as well as five thousand. It didn’t make any difference – he wouldn’t have bet five thousand.”

When he passed away, that Michigan-Notre Dame game, afterwards, I called her and I told her I missed him – that I’d always planned to get that call and it didn’t come. But she and I then started laughing. She said, “Marty, I thought about this. Can you imagine that he’s up in heaven with Bo Schembechler, and they’re watching the Michigan-Appalachian State game, and do you think there’s any language that’s ever been used in heaven like that?” We just started laughing.

The great end to the story was, the next morning I get a call from Jan Hart, her chief of staff. “Mrs. Ford would like to bet you five dollars on the Notre Dame game,” which meant a lot to me. It meant almost more to me that Notre Dame lost so that I could send her the five dollars. But I hope sometime it gets reversed so she’s got to send me the five, ‘cause I can really use that on her. “Now, come on. Your husband was that way, I never knew you were that way.” That kind of stuff makes it all worth while.

Smith: She, obviously, didn’t come back as often as he did.
Allen: No. She really didn’t. The type of events that he would do, quite often he would be going to New York for a board meeting and pick up an event. So it was a lot of traffic and it wasn’t any dislike. In fact, when she really wanted to start coming, her health wouldn’t permit it. Quite often then, Susan would participate for her – like the ninetieth birthday – she was very, very disappointed in that. She was all set to come, but her health – she had this bronchial problem that would just pop up, and so when she really wanted to travel – it was like this ninety-fifth birthday this year, she really wanted to be here. I think she will come back. I think when she does, I don’t think it will be for any event, though. I think she needs to make her first visit back pretty much on the QT, understandably. It’s been difficult for the children when they’ve come back for the first time, and more than the first time. But it’s tough enough that he’s gone, this soon, and the difference in the geography also creates a problem for them.

Smith: You saw him around his grandkids, and then eventually great-grandchildren. Talk about that.

Allen: He was more fatherly than I would have thought he would be. I didn’t see him as much I did see him in that situation. I talked to him, I talked to the kids about him. It was very, very clear that he really did treasure his children and grandchildren. And I say children because, I never could quite figure out how close the relationship…I knew they were…but because he was traveling and because he wasn’t at home much and they were in the growing up age, just how much contact he really had with them. And even afterwards, and this is not being critical of the children, but they weren’t active in the Foundation. They would sometimes come to meetings, sometimes not. It was really when they knew that their father was not as visible that they began to play a more active role. But he did talk to his children a lot. I think he treasured those moments. I think he treasured the moments even more so with his children at the end.

I think of Steve. Steve’s the bachelor. Steve really gave up pretty much the last six months of the president’s time. He gave up his life to be with him. Steve got so bonded to him, the last time President Ford ever played golf was with Steve. Steve had to really convince him to do it again because he didn’t want to go out and embarrass himself. Steve said, “Let’s just go out and get out on the course, play three holes and come home.” And that’s what they did. He came home and he looked at Steve and - I think Steve struggled more during the funeral – they all struggled – but not as much as Steve did. If you look at any of the photographs, I think that last six months, the closeness that he was with his father really had a big impact. But I think the children, the grandchildren, the great grandchildren were just that – those of us who have got grandchildren – they give you a great fix when you need it. You can have the worst problems in the world and you just sit around with your grandchildren and just chat with them. You don’t visualize him doing it, but he did it, he did it a lot. He wanted to be near them.

Smith: One of the banes that we talked about a little bit the other day, even here you’d see it – is autograph seekers. Everyone wants something. I don’t mean to be cynical, but let’s face it. There’s a lot of people who are drawn toward celebrity, and there are lots of people who want things. I assume that if word got out that he was in town, or was going to be in town, there must have been a deluge of – some with the best of intentions, and others with their own agenda. How did you deal with that, how did you filter it?

Allen: He was very accommodating when a request would come into the office and some judgment was made – he was very accommodating. He loved to write personal notes to friends, but I think he had a reluctance to do it just in general – because he sensed that there were people out there that were not doing it in their own personal best interest. He got to the point where he could see somebody he knew, didn’t have to be in a Boy Scout uniform, but it could be a young person that he just knew, but he’d look at another person, and he’d say something like, “I think I saw that same person.” He was pretty astute at that. I didn’t notice it, but he’d just say, “No, I don’t do that.” He’d be very abrupt about it. He did like writing the notes.

The most personal he got was when he had a death in the family. To my knowledge, he only attended two funerals where he actually participated, as you know. One was Secretary Levi and the other was Bill Simon. Again, those eulogies that he was assisted with by you, but still was him talking. Those two families have told me many times that it was the most special – not because, necessarily who he was, but what he said about their father or husband. Because he told me, he said, “You know, I hope people aren’t offended because I don’t go to funerals, but there’s a reason for that. I don’t want to take anything away from the family.” Now that’s the way he thought.

Now, there are other people who would probably like to be seen – but he just didn’t do it. But he would personally, he would call people. He would, right away when I would let him know about deaths, or Penny would, his mind would start working – who can I talk to? And he did it. He did it frequently.

Mike Lloyd, who is head editor of the Grand Rapids Press, his wife was killed tragically in an automobile accident, and when I went to the wake and I got up to Mike and I was standing in line, and I expressed my sympathy and he looked at me and he had tears in his eyes, and he said, “I don’t know what you had to do with it, but I got a call that I’ll never forget from the President.” I said, “If I had anything to do with it, it simply was to inform him that you’d lost Judy.” That’s about as far as I’d ever…I would never suggest anything to him. He just did it. He had these different sides to him. Autographing was not one of his favorite things to do. He would get a little grumpy about it.

Smith: You wish someone would put together a manual for ex-presidents, because they have no idea of what actually goes with the territory. From having to raise all this money to build these buildings, to putting up with the autograph seekers.

Allen: The only thing the former presidents did with any kind of discipline was when they were photographed together, they would agree to sign a certain number of them and that’s all, they wouldn’t do any more. He didn’t know how to use a computer, but somehow he found out that one of the ones he gave, and I think he knew who it was, had put it on eBay. That just killed him to think he had done that – it would kill me, too, to think of somebody doing that. They had that agreement. But like I told you about a literary gatekeeper, they needed an autograph gatekeeper.

Smith: Penny tells this story, and I’m sure they probably told it among themselves. That fraternity didn’t meet very often. It tended to be at funerals and library dedications, or somber events of state – which didn’t prevent people, who weren’t very bright, from trying to go to one office and claim that, “Well, President Carter’s going to do this,” not even realizing that there were people in President Ford’s office that talked to people in President Carter’s office and checked it out.

Allen: I think Penny was pretty good at that kind of gate keeping, she was pretty good. I’ll tell you my classic story on myself. I have a picture from the Ronald Reagan Museum dedication that he did send me. I was very fortunate – he sent a very nice letter. He [Ford] one time said, we’ve got to start paying you, and I said, “Listen, I get too many rewards, I don’t need to be paid. This is beyond my scope of things.” Even these photographs of me are more valuable than money, but I get this one and it’s signed by all the presidents, and I have it properly framed and the right kind of glass put in it, and I put it, not in a very public room in the house, but a nice hallway where it’s a little dark, and it’s up there for a year or two, and one of the kids walked by and said, “Why didn’t President Nixon sign this?” I said, “What do you mean? He signed it.” I looked and it was gone – I mean, there wasn’t a trace of it.

I took it to the Secret Service here in town. I said, “Can you look at this and see if there is a residue of any ink on here?” And they took all their gear and they said it looks like something was there. So I called Penny. I said, “I’m just sick, the signature is gone. I’d even be willing to go to the Nixon people and use the machine to put it back on there – at least to have it on there and have four written on it.” Well, the machine gets destroyed the day he died. The Secret Service told me, and they were smiling when they said it, I think he knew exactly what he was doing. I think he knew – those particular pictures - he said he didn’t want to join the group in signing, and he did it reluctantly. He said, I think he knew what he was doing. He probably absolutely just delighted…

Smith: Used disappearing ink. What a metaphor for Nixon’s controlling personality.

Allen: And mine wasn’t the only one. Some of them that have been kept really in isolation still have it, but that’s always tickled me.
Smith: We talked the other day a little bit about Nixon, but one thing that would surprise people was to know about the relationship that he had with the Johnson family.

Allen: Yeah, he had a great relationship with them. I don’t know – I’m sure it started in Congress, because I’m sure they had a lot… But there was just no question that when he was out of office, even early on when we had conferences here, if Lady Bird herself wasn’t here with Harry Middleton, the children were here for something. And that turned around out at the LBJ, too. They had President Ford out there, and there was a tremendously strong, very fond relationship beyond the normal first family. It was very close, you could tell that. I can remember Mrs. Johnson being here with Harry when they came back from the re-dedication of the permanent exhibits. She, along with the others created quite a stir because they were so impressed with the new exhibits. I can remember Mrs. Johnson, “Get Harry in here. Get Harry in here. Come look at this. It’s so different than what we have.” But they really were close.

Smith: Talk about a trouper. Remember her sitting out there in her fur coat, with Barbara Bush mothering her. She wasn’t going to miss it.

Allen: No, and the funny thing was, Caroline Kennedy stayed in. She stayed right in this office and she looked and she said, “I feel terrible. They’re out there but I’m going to freeze out there.” Oh, yeah. She was a trouper.

Smith: It surprised people that Caroline Kennedy would come to the Ford Library.

Allen: I will tell you that there was a close relationship between Caroline and President Ford. She knew about the relationship they had as congressmen, and having offices across, so she knew he knew her father. They had a lot in common. They were both naval officers and they had a lot in common and they had a lot not in common - but they had a tremendous and close relationship. So I had encouraged President Ford, she had talked to me, she was on the advisory committee for the presidential libraries, and I had a chance to meet her. She was very quiet and very guarded which is understandable, and she would talk about President Ford, how much she would like to talk to him. So I think they did have a conversation, at least one, if not more.
Smith: And her brother interviewed him for _George_ magazine.

Allen: That’s right. He just felt very strongly about Kennedy, he didn’t want to accept LBJ’s request that he be on the Warren Commission because of his friendship with him. It was just more than he thought he could handle. Of course then you get right back to the Profile in Courage Award and how much it meant to her, and she was there. But I’ve kept in contact with her and when the President passed away. I wrote her when her brother was killed in the plane accident. She wrote a very nice note. There was just something about those two, and so she came back here on occasions and I think they saw each other. I would have loved to have heard those conversations.

Smith: The dinner the night before the re-dedication. Were you at the table with the presidents and first ladies?

Allen: I don’t think I was.

Smith: Because we had the Fords, the Carters, the Bushes, and Caroline. And Lady Bird. So that would fill up the table.

Allen: They were in kind of a center, more rectangular shape so that they all could be together. That had to be a great thing. Whenever they get together that way, I gather there is something about the comfort level, because they took a group picture of them, and there’s Bush ’41 behind Barbara with his fingers like rabbit ears behind her. I saw so much of that. Now, I wasn’t with them that much, but when I was it just seemed to be a lightness about them, and maybe it’s the reunion of them. I don’t know what it is.

Smith: I think, just the chemistry of those people. And I think here they were made to feel completely at home.

Allen: Yeah, they were very comfortable. It was a very elegant night. It was beautiful. It was as close to a White House dinner as you could make it. The furniture, the music and everything, was just marvelous.

Smith: And Alvie Powell.

Allen: Alvie Powell has become a member of the family. Alvie Powell, Master Sergeant, I believe, who has been with the Army Chorus, left the Army Chorus for a while, and went on his own singing and came back. The Army Chorus itself is like President and Mrs. Ford’s chorus. For so many events, on every event in Washington, out at Vail for every golf tournament they were there. We’ve had them here at least a half a dozen times, and they have this tremendous respect for him. They feel part of the family and he makes them feel that way. There was always a couple of requests that he made. One was What I Did for Love from Chorus Line. Until he got tired of it, that became their song. Then after a while they suggested to me and others that maybe there was some other music they could play. But he always liked Old Man River from Showboat. It got to a point where we wondered whether, in this day and age, there might be some sensitivity about it, but he wanted Old Man River and he’d get the biggest smile. He [Alvie] loved to sing it for him.

Smith: As long as their health permitted, they would go to New York and do a lot of shows. They loved the theater, would she shop?

Allen: I don’t know that part.

Smith: Stay at the Waldorf.

Allen: I think they probably, they weren’t long trips, I would expect they just got together with some of their friends and go to the show.

Smith: I remember they loved the Lion King.

Allen: Oh, yeah, loved that.

Smith: And Chorus Line.

Allen: Loved Chorus Line. That’s where that song, just kind of…and if you listen to the words of it, it fits the tune – What I Did for Love.

Smith: And it’s also such a product of the Seventies.

Allen: He enjoyed going to shows. I think that was something, even back in California with the McCarter Theatre and everything. I think he really did enjoy going out and seeing that type of entertainment. He enjoyed entertainment very much, he really did. And Alvie sang at the funeral. I adlibbed when I did my arrival remarks, with the Army Chorus behind me.
and I was looking down at the family and I said, “You know, I can almost feel Alvie Powell behind me because he’s part of the family.” It just came out because that’s the way he always was. He’s now invited to all the Foundation annual dinners, he’s a guest at the dinners, his wife is a delightful person. It’s again one of those things that happens.

Smith: What about their lives in Vail? Because that last summer, when everyone told them they shouldn’t go, they were adamant.

Allen: They enjoyed the life in Vail. I think they enjoyed it in a different social context. It was more relaxed, it was more outdoorish. They obviously escaped the desert heat and they enjoyed that. It was dry heat, so that was very helpful to her, and yet they were very informal and very casual out there. He loved to go to the post office himself. And I’d sometimes get these things that would come back to me and the envelope would be torn and the pages inside would be scotch taped together. I’d say, what kind of a post office do they have out there? She’d say, “That’s him opening up the mail, he doesn’t do that very often.” But he liked that out there. He just loved to walk to the post office – can you imagine that? You go to the post office to mail a letter and you look and there’s the president standing in line to get his mail. But that was the kind of thing he liked out there. He liked the golf, he liked the golf tournament, he liked the annual conference out there, the AEI conferences, he just loved that kind of stuff.

Smith: And there was an amphitheater named for him?

Allen: There was a great amphitheater, the garden was named for her, they unveiled a beautiful statue in there – I can’t remember of what in that place, but it was basically their place. And when he had the golf tournament, the big night was, all the entertainers, and a lot of entertainers played in the golf tournament, would entertain that night. People like – I have to think of the western singers – Vince Gill – is that right? He would get up there and get Mrs. Ford up there to dance on stage because he was a recovering through her. So there is just this great atmosphere. Bob Hope would come out and entertain. The last year was just such a sad thing, but they’d come out – he got out there and somebody was trying to lead him. And he’s cussing, “What the hell, I can find a place to sit.” And he’s on the stage – you know, that’s the part that was sad. But President Ford told me he would go to dinner with he and Dolores as many times as he could, even though it was a terribly uncomfortable thing to do because he wasn’t well. But he just felt that he needed to be with Bob Hope.

Smith: I remember the story – talk about putting yourself out – toward the end when, where Bob wants to play golf, he was almost blind, and could hardly move, but they’d play two holes. And then Bob would want to take a nap, so the President would come back to the office, and then, “His nap’s over, he wants you to come back and play some more golf.”

Allen: I’d forgotten that story. That’s true.

Smith: Then he’d go back – talk about friendship.

Allen: He just felt so badly…

Smith: But it must also have been, as you’ve suggested, a cautionary lesson seeing what happens when…

Allen: And he related to Bob Hope. He thought it was just too bad that they did that. Literally, when he’d go out and play his golf tournament, even before he reached the two-hole stage, the guy would go out and put the tee in the ground, put the ball on it – and he’d take a swat at it and the tournament would start. But I saw him at those tournaments when he was healthy, and he was a lot of fun. When Bob Hope came here for the dedication and did one of his NBC shows, we had a parade and he was the grand marshal of the parade. He liked it so much, when the lead car finished he got in the car and went to ride the back end of the parade – typical of Bob Hope for a repeat performance. And he was that way through most of the tournaments that I saw up there. There was a lot of great entertainment and the Army Chorus was always there for it.

Smith: What was the charity that was benefitted?

Allen: It was the Vail Valley Charities. It was a group of charities that they did out there and he was responsible for a lot of it, because when you think about when he started going to Vail as a young congressman in his condo out there, there was hardly anything there. So he was involved very much in the development and was very supportive of the development. There was the chapel there, which he was very much involved in. A variety of things. So it was really a second home to him, but a more casual home. At the times I was out there, it was just entirely different than Rancho Mirage.

Smith: Penny would say the office facilities were not the best.

Allen: The office facilities were not good. They were in the house, sort of a triple-decker, and they were down at the bottom, which wasn’t a full floor, it was very close.

Smith: I think it was likened to the Black Hole of Calcutta.

Allen: It was. There was not privacy among the people that were there, and it was tough. I think she enjoyed the activity outside, but she was anxious to get back to her office in California.

Smith: People think of this notion of the imperial ex-presidency – they make all this money and they have all these staff. In fact, it was a very small staff.

Allen: It was. He had a small staff.

Smith: He supplemented their salaries.

Allen: He supplemented their salaries. The Foundation helped with one salary because we got a lot of help out of Penny and so we supplemented that. He had a very small staff. I don’t think he was demanding, in the sense that he wanted things done when he wanted them done. But I don’t think there was a lot that he wanted done. I think he was that kind of a person. He wasn’t out selling things, he wasn’t out like Carter or somebody is constantly on the move or Clinton now. He was pretty well in there and he did not do a lot of outside speaking – so he didn’t have as great a need for the staff. He liked the quarters, they were kind of close out there. They were nice quarters. I know you’ve told the story, and I have a very similar story, when we were out there one time planning the funeral and we used the conference room next to his office and one of the staff had stuck their head in the door and said, “The President wants to see you.” I went in, and I don’t know how long we met, and said to me, “Well, tell me, have you buried me yet?” And I said, “Yeah, we’re even thinking about talking about burying your wife.” And he laughed. Boy, he had taken a bad fall that day before. A really bad fall. He showed me the stitches and that was some of the first signs that his age was really affecting him.

Smith: Was it a circulatory problem in part?

Allen: Whatever you get with old age. I think it was partly that, certainly part of it. Eventually it was required by his doctors, when he got on his feet to count to ten before he’d walk. Well, you can imagine telling him to count to ten. He’d go: one, five, ten, and start moving. He wasn’t going to do that. But I think they were doing it so he’d get his bearings before he moved. He’d taken a couple of falls.

Smith: And I know Mrs. Ford was resistant to the idea of bringing in outside help.

Allen: Yeah, she really was. She just didn’t want to do it. She wanted to be the caretaker and it’s part of the love story. That’s part of the deal.

Smith: Also, I think part of it was a reluctance to acknowledge that it was necessary.

Allen: Yeah, I’m sure it was that, too. I’m sure that’s part of it, but she did have a great deal of reluctance. Finally, she gave in. As I was telling you about the last visit I had out there, I always, as I was walking through the living room there was a very attractive card table – it was really more of a game table that was in that window overlooking the golf course, where I think they played a little cards or whatever they did there. And I looked over at it because I knew they liked it, and there on the table was the casket flag, folded, in a case, sitting in the middle of the table. She wasn’t going to let that be far away from her.

Smith: Did they watch much television?

Allen: I think they watched quite a bit of television. I really do. I think they liked game shows and things like that – I think they really did. And of course, he loved sports, so he had sports on all the time. Of course, he watched the soap opers when Steve was in the soap operas. I understand he would close the door, almost so nobody would see him, and turn the TV on so he could watch Steve in the soap operas.

Smith: I think he watched C-Span a fair amount, too.

Allen: I think he did, too. He liked that type of show, so I expect they would watch it quite a bit. Contrary to the current president, who apparently doesn’t read papers or like television.

Smith: Did you know that President Bush was going to stop for a visit there that last year – remember, when he was out in California?

Allen: I did not know. I had heard that maybe he was, and that somebody said it was a wise thing. And it was, it was a good thing. I think the president appreciated
it. He was going through some really difficult times, but it meant a lot to him.
He was lonely, in a sense, because he had had such an active life and traveled so much. And then people always had the feeling they would be imposing on him. Either telephone calls or visits were very important. I think when Secretary Rumsfeld went out there on Thanksgiving Day and presented him his Navy hat for his carrier, it was just huge to him. He just missed that – so visitors were really important to him. Very important to him.

Smith: In terms of the development of this place, this first draft – back in ’81, how was that put together – the content? Did he have any input on that?

Allen: As I said, I was not a member of the planning committee, I became involved in the dedication. It was my understanding that he had a lot of involvement originally and I don’t think they saw what this was going to come to be. It really was a museum, quiet, sedate, and there was an attitude of the committee that if we build it, they will come. Three million dollars is an awful lot of money to have in the kitty to do what you’ve got to do. And, for doing nothing, that was a lot of money. But he was proud of it and it was attractive, it served its purpose very well for a good time, but it changed dramatically after that. I think he had a lot of input, he certainly had a lot of input into the selection of the location. He was always so pleased…it was Dick Gillett who was so close to him. Dick was the chairman of Old Kent and he was recognized as sort a visionary in the community and a lot of what happened in Grand Rapids over time. Dick told me there was only one place for the museum, it’s right downtown.

64

Smith: What had been on this site?

Allen: Old factories and parking lots. There was an old schoolhouse. It created probably one of the worst relationships he ever had with one of the property owners here. Bob Sullivan owned a good chunk of the property – he had a furniture store and a bar and he held them up pretty good financially. He never forgot that. He’d bring that up to me. There were certain things he’d bring up quite frequently to me and that was one of them.

Smith: Such as?

Allen: Well, there were people, as I mentioned that he thought were too aggressive or who were bad guys and he would not let me forget who they were, just in case I had forgotten. He would let me know that. There weren’t a lot of them and he was so guarded in doing it, he didn’t want to call them really nasty names, but he just…

Smith: I remember when we took him the first time through the revamped museum. I think he was a little uncomfortable with the disco. It was Mrs. Ford who came to our rescue, and she said, “It’s so fresh and original.” Which may have been a euphemism, but she ‘got it.’ And because she got it, eventually he probably got it.

Allen: He was on the verge of that – Is this presidential or not? – in his own mind, and she took him back. Although, if you remember, there was one thing that she said we could not have. We discussed a hologram of the president in his office – and he didn’t know what a hologram was when we were sitting at this table, and they were going over some of the changes that you had made, and she was there, too. There was the beginning of something really different for him. So we talked to him about that, and I could tell he didn’t know. I knew he’d been to Disneyland several times – he liked it. I said, “Did you ever go to the Haunted House?” That was the worst mistake I ever made. I said, “Oh, yeah. Remember those ghosts that were floating around?” “That’s a hologram.” “Oh, that’s kind of neat.”

All of a sudden I looked over at Mrs. Ford, she said, “No ghosts of President Ford in the museum.” I said, “Okay.” But that was the only thing she didn’t authorize. But I think she knew she was going to be responsible to get him comfortable.

Smith: Put it this way – she would be the interpreter of popular culture.

Allen: She’d know about a discotheque. He may not quite know what a discotheque was.

Smith: She has a marvelous sense of humor. Sometimes salty.

The following section in italics is closed until the death of Mrs. Ford:

Allen: Sometimes salty – she does. I heard some of that, I might have already mentioned – on the last visit when we were talking about being that old and she said, “If I’d known I was going to be this old, I’d have behaved better.” She said it quite seriously, and then she broke into that big smile and said, “But boy, I had fun.” The dancing on the table in the Cabinet Room, and the motorcycle thing, and the conversation at that – “If you’d married her you might have been the president of Steelcase.” She just had that way about her. She had a way about kind of poking it to him at dinner settings and everything – “Oh, Jerry, come on.” You could see him respond to her right away.

Smith: The famous line was - remember at the dedication at Pantland?

Allen: The renovation of the 1913 Room, she said, “You could use a little renovation yourself.” And he used that line a lot after that. It was a great line. You wonder how many lines she might have had over the course of time that the kids probably know, too, that have just got to be classics. She does have a tremendous spark to her.

Smith: That’s well put.

Allen: She’s never lost that. Even at this stage in her life – even in her mourning, she’ll pop up with some pretty Betty Ford-type statements.
Smith: It must have been terribly frustrating to outlive their friends.

Allen: Well, that was a discussion that I had with her. I know, personally, that quite often there would be events that President Ford would ask me to put together an invitation list. I’d put together this list and he would look at it and say, “Gosh, Marty, there’s got to be a lot of names missing.” I said, “Well, I feel badly if there was.” And he’d start – then all of a sudden he look and he’d say, “They’re all gone.” I said, “Yes, sir, you’ve outlived them.” And I think the difficulty that Betty’s having is the same thing. She’s ninety years old and she’s in the desert and some of the people who are her friends in the desert don’t stay in the desert. But even the ones that do, it was very difficult – difficult enough for her to break out and to be with friends. But there aren’t that many. Mrs. Annenberg’s not well – and I think it’s very difficult.

I think that’s why they were so close at the end. This romance kind of got relit, if you will. I just read something in, I don’t know if it was Time or, I don’t know, but it’s a great article by Kirk Douglas growing old. He said, “I really got romantic when I got ninety.” In a way, their closeness, they just have each other so much and they are so close together, then to lose one is terribly difficult. He always told me he was going to go first. She would survive him. He talked that way in different conversations we had, planning things. He’d always say, “Make sure the Foundation takes care of her, she’ll be the person there and she won’t be that active, but just make sure she’s taken care of.” I said, “Don’t worry, she’ll be well taken care of.”

Smith: Do you think part of that was because he couldn’t contemplate the reverse? He could not have imagined having her gone?

Allen: Yeah, it would have been even harder for him. As so often happens in relationships like that, when somebody passes, the other passes away. I always thought to myself, I wonder if he really would have been able to survive. He got so close and so dependent on her and that happens in marriages. It is quite often the wife who becomes the strength of it. It’s not unique. When you’re watching a football game and they put a camera on a guy, he always says, “Hi, Mom.” He never says, “Hi, Dad.” He always says, “Hi, Mom.” It’s that motherhood strength that’s there.
Smith: Were there things about the funeral that surprised you?

Allen: The biggest surprise to me and the most emotional part for me…not giving arrival remarks. It was what I call ‘going home.’ When we got on Air Force One at Andrews and the music struck up Going Home, my first reaction - my God, I’ve got to give a little talk here pretty quick. But it disappeared kind of quick. And then we had that kind of University of Michigan drop, and we came down to the ground and saw the Michigan band.

But I rode with Dick Ford in the car, and I was absolutely amazed at the turnout. And I’ve lived here all my life. It moved Dick who had lived here all his life and myself, it really just moved us how many – we knew there’d be crowds – we’d planned on crowds – we planned right down to how many people we could get in the front door of this place per hour, because we knew how many hours it was going to be, and we exceeded it by twenty thousand people. And I know there would have been even more, but the word kind of got out that this is the end. So that, more than anything, was probably the most moving part of it.

The other parts were, again, the reaction of those people in his Cabinet. People at that level, how they suffered the loss, visibly. Kissinger had a little reception for them in Washington, and they all came. It was kind of their wake, if you will. I went to that and I just really kind of stood off to the side and watched them. You could feel the closeness of them, and that was a very strong part in my estimation.

Smith: Were you in Blair House at all during those days when she…tell us about it.

Allen: Well, she was in Blair House. The family was there and she had different groups that would come in – the diplomatic corps, of course – and then President Bush came in, I think – Clinton maybe came in. Then some of the close friends who were really the honorary pallbearers and a few of the people giving tribute. She was certainly alert, but she was certainly struggling. There just was no question about it. Susan was close by. The other kids were. It was a very tough time.

Smith: The Nixon family came, the Johnson girls came.
Allen: All the presidents’ families came, yeah. So that was quite an occasion to see that. To be in the heart of an event like that. I always remember Rich DeVos. Here’s Rich DeVos, one of the richest people in the country. He’s an honorary pallbearer, we’re standing outside the Capitol steps, waiting for the remains to come and then march up the steps. Rich leaned to me and he said, “I never thought, ever in my lifetime, I would be standing doing what I am today.” Now here’s a man who is everything. But he was just extremely moved by it, and he was a little bit physically shaken, but the military is amazing. Somebody spotted that and all of a sudden there was a full uniformed Army guy saying, “Mr. DeVos, we’ll take you in another way.” “No, I want you to take me up the steps, I want to go up the steps.” So a lot of those things that just stick with you. Then of course, the crowds that night.

I went out and walked the crowds for a long time. The police chief came to me afterwards, the chief of police asked to see me. He came to thank me, and thank the Ford family for his officers participating. I said, “Wait a minute. We’ve got to turn that around, you did a magnificent…” They didn’t have anything to do. He said, “I got very concerned with this huge line curling around down here. It’s night and it’s cold. These people don’t know each other. I called the squad.” I said, “You’d better go out and check the line.” They went and they got to the end of the line and called him back. “They’re singing Christmas carols, they’re singing patriotic songs. They’re just greeting each other.” So the chief said, “Do one other thing, stay at the end of the line, just so people that are coming know that they’ve got five hours wait, but you’ll be there to protect them.” Those kind of things are just…you could tell a hundred stories, I guess. We probably should have written a book about it, it’s such an amazing story.

Smith: A couple of things. Subsequent to that, you greeted a couple of presidents.

Allen: Yes. President Bush came here. There’s an acronym, OTR, Off The Record visit. He came, I met him at the back, we came around the front. He had a military person with a bouquet of flowers. He was quite conversant. Went into the site, spent some time there, came out and he was very quiet. I think it had moved him that he was standing at the site of the president. He came out and he said to me, “I just marvel at this site and this location – here in the middle of a city, on a river, what a marvelous place. It is just so much Jerry Ford.” Then he said his goodbye’s and walked to the car.

Clinton came. Clinton didn’t come quite as prepared. He was giving a speech across the river, but then his staff said, “Can you get him something?” I said, “What?” “A nice bouquet of flowers.” And he started talking to me out of the car. It’s kind of the same mood as Bush was. He spent a long time at the site, a long time. Came out, made the same, similar remark, “This is Jerry Ford.” It’s just peaceful in a busy setting, it’s just peaceful. He started asking me, “Did you have to get state and city approval to bury him?” I said, “No, it’s a federal site.” It’s not a city or state site, so they didn’t have to get approval. He was talking about the river again, he said, “You know, we’re on the river…”

The end of that story is kind of interesting. He didn’t go back and get in his car. I was reminded of President Ford saying to me, “This guy is an amazing communicator, a terrible manager of his life and other things, but he’s just an amazing communicator.” He looked at me and he said, “Why don’t you and I take a walk?” I’ve never met the guy in my life. He kind of looked at his staff guy and he said, “How much time do we have?” He said, “You’ve got time.” So, instead of getting in his car, we walked in the front. He asked me a lot of questions about the museum, which I answered, and then we started walking across the bridge and there were people on the bridge that didn’t realize that they were going to see Bill Clinton here in a second.

His Secret Service were leading him and there was an elderly African-American man coming across and they kind of politely asked, and he spotted him and he told the Secret Service, “Radio that guy and tell him to leave that man alone. I want to talk to him.” So he goes over and talks – typical of Clinton. Gets up to the top of the bridge and there’s a family sitting there, just looking at the river, and he goes over to them. They don’t even see him coming and all of a sudden he’s there and he’s talking to them.

In the meantime, across the windows over at the building where he was supposed to speak, there’s a reception he’s supposed to be at and all these people have got their noses against the window and he’s talking to these people as he’s going across. He gets on the other side and he thanks me and he starts walking to the building. Then he turns around and comes back. “Oh, there’s something I want to tell you. I want to tell you without even knowing how valuable you are to President Ford and have been to President Ford through his lifetime. I need that now, I need to have somebody that I can trust.”

My wheels are turning, I think, “I can hear President Ford say, ‘He’s conning you Marty, he’s saying all the right things to you.’” And I think he was half sincere, but it was vintage Clinton. He took advantage of every situation he could to make himself – and he gave a marvelous speech. Here’s he in one of the most conservative cities in Grand Rapids, got a packed house and he spoke to them like he was a conservative.

Smith: You saw a pro at work.

Allen: Yeah, he’s a pro. He’s absolutely a pro. And they wrote a little article in the paper about him, because they were so amazed he came over and talked to me. I didn’t tell them everything I told here, but he is a pro.

Smith: I also think, as much as he can be, I think Clinton was grateful for the lifeline that Ford threw him at a time when there were no other Republicans who were willing to…

Allen: That had to mean a lot to him. This cool character, he had to be desperate at that time and to have somebody give him that lifeline had to be extremely valuable. But he spoke very highly of him, as you’d expect, but it was a very interesting experience. It was interesting how long he stayed there. I guess he is a religious man, and you could tell he was pretty serious in there.

We’ve had other guests, the one that was most awkward was the Attorney General [Gonzalez], just before he was fired. He was here and we treated him the same way. He went in and paid his respects. But he had a little extra time so he wanted to go into the exhibit and so we skipped the discotheque and went right to Watergate. Of course, the part came on about the attorney general, and I thought, my God this guy is about ready to be canned and he’s sitting here looking…thinking what kind of a guy is this that’s showing me this exhibit.

Yeah, we’ve had a lot of interesting guests here and the public, I guess it’s more surprising to me than to you because you’ve studied burial sites and tombs and graves of presidents, but I’m just really amazed at the number of people that go there, in a very dignified way. I’ve gone out there on a number of occasions just to talk to them. It is very moving for people to go to a site like this.

Smith: It transforms the site.

Allen: Oh, yeah, it does. And I have to tell you, I’ve not been to all the sites. You have, but there is something about that site – the wrought iron fence around it and the children’s tree that they gave their parents on their 45th wedding anniversary, and how we now decorate that, and always had planned to because they loved Christmas and I told Mrs. Ford we would do that. We would decorate that tree, which meant a lot to her. And she added a dimension to the site – she called me the first time she’d gone there - she told me it needed more flowers, and we took care of that. But after she’d gotten back after the funeral, she said, “We need a couple of benches out there where people can sit down for meditation.”

That was a great move, not only for the public, but for the kids when they go in there. They sit there a long time. And I’m always glad that I suggested to her, for her consideration to put their favorite prayer, Proverbs, in between those two benches, which a lot of people ask about, because it’s a great thing to tell them the meaning of those proverbs to the president and Mrs. Ford.

Smith: That’s a good note on which to end.

Smith: First of all, thank you for doing this. Being in this room must bring back a lot of memories.

DeWinter: Yes.

Smith: How did it all start?

DeWinter: It started by me getting a call from Paul Newhof, (who was a structural engineer), at 12:30 one Friday afternoon. I had a small architectural office of four people, and he asked if I was going to try to get the Ford Museum project. I said that it will probably go to some New York architect. To which he replied, President Ford stated they are going to select an architect from his district. I knew all the architects in his district so I thought that I would throw my hat in the ring and see what happens. So from 12:30 on that Friday (it was due at five o’clock that day), I threw things together showing some of the work that I’d done in the past, and said I’d like to be the architect. From that they narrowed down to seven architects who were invited to be interviewed by a committee of three. From that they narrowed it down to three architects to be interviewed by the full committee – a committee of about twenty-five people.

Smith: Now, this site had already been selected?

DeWinter: This site on the River had been selected, thanks to Mary Ann Keeler. Fred Meijer had a site where the Meijer Gardens are now, and he wanted to have the site out there. Mary Ann said, “It’s got to be downtown.” Later Fred said to me, “Mary Ann was right. It had to be downtown. It’s a stunning place.” I think what really helped get the job was showing them some examples of work that were never built. Based upon the presentation, they selected me as the architect, and then said, “What do we do next?”
I said, “First of all, I’d like you to give me about three people to talk to instead of trying to talk to twenty-five people.” Subsequently Jordan Sheperd was appointed as the chairman together with Dave LaClaire and Fred Meijer. That’s how I got acquainted with Fred. I’d known David and Jordan for a long time. Also, I stated that I would like to talk to President Ford if we’re going to design a building to commemorate his Presidency.

Smith: Let me back up for just a moment. Presumably, was he involved? He obviously had to be notified, but was he involved at all in the selection process?

DeWinter: No. President Ford was not involved at all in the selection process. Arrangements were made for me to meet President Ford in Vail in the summer of 1977. I met with him in his condo at Vail and he was the consummate gentleman. Betty was there at the time, but she was not well.

Smith: Was that discernable?

DeWinter: Oh, very much so. She came from one room into our room. It was just President Ford and me, and he very graciously got up and introduced me to her and escorted her back into the private quarters and we went on with our discussion. I said, “President Ford, what would you like this museum to say?” He responded that there were three things: “I’d like to memorialize some of my quotes.” Statements that he made, and these quotes are now reflected engraved in the marble wall at the building’s entrance. Another thing he wanted was to have a part of the museum which celebrated the First Lady. Because the First Lady received many gifts or memorabilia so we established a part of the museum for their display. The third thing that President Ford wanted was a full-size Oval Office. I say full-size because the Truman Library has an abbreviated size. So that was kind of fun. I went to Washington to visit the Oval Office. There were no drawings of it, so we had to measure and create our own drawings for an exact replica which we have here. I then made some trips around – I don’t know if you want me to tell you how I conceived of the design.
Smith: Sure. Let me step back a minute because you talk about the message that he wanted the museum to send and that is obviously critical. But then there is the whole other issue of what he wanted the building to look like. Or what message he wanted the building to send.

DeWinter: He never spoke to me about what the building should look like. He was an ideal client, meaning he didn’t have preconceived ideas about the design. He said he’d like those quotation remarks, a place for Betty, and the Oval Office. Those three things were his only stipulation.

I traveled to Abilene for the Eisenhower Museum, and Independence for Truman’s library. I also went to Washington. At that time the Kennedy Museum was not under construction, but all the drawings were finished and I had the opportunity to look at what they were doing, etc. One of my earliest memories was going through the process of visiting the Eisenhower Museum. There was a windowless room, in which you sat on folding chairs, waiting for the show to start. All I could see was the bald head of the guy right in front of me. It was kind of a depressing entry into the Museum. In talking about the concept, the site that was chosen consisted of three city blocks and if you recall, this site was full of factories.

Smith: And the little red schoolhouse.

DeWinter: Oh, yes, the little red schoolhouse is a story in itself, isn’t it? It mysteriously burned down one night. But getting back to the Design, the chosen site had a beautiful view of the the skyline of the city with an elevated expressway behind us. Would you like me to talk about the concept?

Smith: Absolutely.

DeWinter: Okay, we established that the building was going to be around 40,000 square feet. The Eisenhower Museum was all on one floor. A one story building would have had no presence at all competing against the elevated expressway behind the site. I felt it had to be at least two stories, so we put about 20,000 square feet on the floor, roughly. I started with this idea and then I wanted to expand the riverfront elevation, and shrink the exposure to the expressway. Finally we arrived at the minimal exposure to the expressway as a point, and we radiated out and so it kind of evolved into a triangular expression and the second thing that I wanted was to have a glass wall exposed to the river. This was never done before and I had all kinds of opposition from Will Jones who was appointed as a consultant to the museum committee. We talked about it. He said we couldn’t do that because we have all these presidential exhibits and the solar radiation, of ultra violet light.

Smith: Yes, the light issues with the artifacts and documents.

DeWinter: I said, “Okay, one way to do that is to have a big overhang.” First of all that’s east, not west, so we have an eastern sun, and the production facility and so on is down below. All the exhibits are up here. And so I picked this corner for administrative offices to block out the sun. And the wall adjacent to the stairway was designed as a non-bearing wall. There is only one bearing point at the end of it. Again, it was to shield the exhibits, and I did everything I could to finally satisfied him that we could have a wall of glass on the river.

Smith: Is the point of the glass wall to, in effect, reflect the city? Which Jerry Ford reflects so many ways?

DeWinter: Oh because it’s mirror glass, yes. And from across the river, it reflects the city. That was by design, as is the fountain and the pool, Would you like to hear about this?

Smith: Yes, we’d love to hear the origins.

DeWinter: See all the serpentine steps walking up to the pool – I wanted to have a reflecting pool in front of the Museum and originally I had a grass bank on the east side of the reflecting pool. We were under construction and one of the committee members, Mary Ann Keeler was walking on the sidewalk and she couldn’t see the pool. She talks to Fred, Fred said, “Mary Ann can’t see that pool, we have to take that pool out.” We already had half the pool built. “I said, “Wait a minute, maybe if I tried something else.” And I did some abstract sketching, and I said, “You know, we’re centered on that little patio out there which is used as a band [stand].” And so I created this, sort of, as bleacher seats for special events when we’re having a concert and, in effect, to give Mary Ann a way to walk up and see the pool. She said she was satisfied, everybody was satisfied, and that’s a little serendipity because it adds to the design.

Smith: It’s become a real community gathering space. And the fountain – was it your initiative? Did other people want a fountain?

DeWinter: Originally, it was my initiative, the fountain came about because at the time there were factories over the west side of the River. The university wasn’t here. And even that bridge that spans the river had only a dirt floor. I reasoned that everybody is attracted to fountains, so let’s put a fountain on the west side of the river. I wanted it to go as high as the building (about forty feet high) as an attraction for people over on the east side of the river to come to the west side. The sort of stepped rapids is kind of an echo of the Grand Rapids, so I wanted to create this pool and rapids. It worked out very well. [The original design did not include that spaceman out there. That came later.]

Smith: Well, it’s become such a signature piece, attraction. It’s almost the equivalent on this side of the river of the Calder on the other side of the river.

DeWinter: Yes, it is!

Smith: It's a real landmark. Clearly, it’s a defining landmark for Grand Rapids. And, by the way, isn’t it ironic that Gerald Ford, who was not – as attentive as he was as a congressman to his local district – he was never really known as the ‘bring home the bacon’ kind of guy. You don’t have military bases in this district; and yet, the one obvious thing for which he secured funding was the Calder, which you don’t automatically think of as a Gerald Ford kind of piece.

DeWinter: I did not know that. Did President Ford secure the funding when he was our Representative?

Smith: National Endowment for the Arts.

DeWinter: I didn’t know that.

Smith: And you mentioned the spaceman. Because, of course, he didn’t want a statue of himself, and the only advice he gave them – he was delighted with the spaceman – but he said, “Whatever you do, make sure it’s representational art.” He would get the money for the Calder, but he didn’t really want one of his own.

And that brings us to this building, which is fascinating in so many ways because this is a pretty conservative town and I can imagine people at first blush looking at what you had in mind - it’s not avant garde, but it is pushing the envelope in some ways.

DeWinter: Yes.

Smith: What was the initial reaction? What was the reaction within the group, the planning group, and did it evolve or was pretty much your original vision as you sketched it out, built?

DeWinter: Oh, yes, exactly. I don’t think I had any compromises. I didn’t feel I had to make any compromises. Jordon Sheperd was a very – did you know Jordon?

Smith: I did not as well as I wish I had.

DeWinter: He was a delightful gentleman. And Fred Meijer, of course you know him, and Dave LaClaire, just perfect. David is always interested in the arts and Fred was the businessman. And I’ll tell you a little anecdote about Fred. The fact that we read presidential museums now cost $80 million or $100 million, something like that. We had hardly any money. President Ford had his library in Ann Arbor, he wanted to have a museum in his home district – the first one that split the library and museum.

Smith: And it will never happen again.

DeWinter: I’m glad we have the museum over here. But anyway, raising the money was something. We were just starting construction and the money was not coming in. Fred said to the committee, “Look, if we don’t start, we’re not going to finish. So we’ve got to get started and if we don’t have enough money to finish, well, we’ll just have to truck it out.” He said, “I remember the first time I built a warehouse in Lansing. I had enough money to buy the steel and put it up and I didn’t have enough money to finish the building. We put plywood panels on the thing until I got more money to finish it. And there were big articles in the paper about Meijer’s going broke. But he found more money and finished construction. His point was if we don’t start construction, we’re never going to finish it.” That’s Fred’s philosophy, you know.

Smith: Well, it sounds like Fred was a very significant factor in this.

DeWinter: Oh, he was. For example, when they narrowed it down to three architects, there were three firms, I had the smallest firm – only a four-man firm. There was a medium sized firm about twenty people. And then a large firm, Daverman, which had a hundred people. And so we met at Fred’s office over on Walker Avenue. He said, “Well, now we’ve got you three architects, how do we select one of you? Do we have you come around with ideas that we can look at?” I said, “I have a suggestion, why don’t you set aside an afternoon, give each of the three of us, an hour to tell you why you should hire us to be your architect? We don’t even know what the problems are, how can we propose a solution?” So Fred said, “It seems like a reasonable idea.” A few weeks later at an appointed time we went in and put on our dog and pony show and I was fortunate enough to be the selected architect.

Smith: When you came up with the building design, at some point obviously the group reacted, approved it. At that point, was the President involved?

DeWinter: I don’t recall the President being involved until I was selected and then Fred said, “Well, what do we do now?” I said, “I’d like to have a meeting with President Ford.” (I’d met him years before, just in passing, when he was a representative.) So arrangements were made a few months later to meet with President Ford. To my knowledge, President Ford did not try to manage the design process.

Smith: Right. Do you remember – at some point he saw your model, your design for the first time. He obviously approved of what you’d done.

DeWinter: Yeah, very diplomatically. He didn’t say, “Oh, that’s too modernistic, or that’s…” I can’t say enough about this person as a man. He made a significant move by getting us out of the war, Vietnam, and letting Nixon go free. That’s all part of the history.
Smith: Then, I assume you found yourself working with the exhibit designers. How was the original storyline, for lack of a better word, and the exhibits themselves developed? Was there input from the committee? Was there kind of a give and take, were you consulted? How did that develop? Because obviously there is a symbiotic relationship between the architect and the storytellers.

DeWinter: We worked very well. Staples and Charles were the interior exhibit designers. We worked closely together. When I designed the building I had, thanks to Will Jones, a program that quantified how much space should be used on exhibits and how much space should be allocated for production facilities. I had identified that and, included the grand stairway leading to the second floor. This was an intentional design. I did not want to bring all the people upstairs by way of an elevator. I didn’t feel that it was really necessary because people in a wheelchair had an elevator to take care of them. There is nothing wrong with walking up one flight, if there is an elevator available.

Smith: In terms of the story itself, how that was developed, the exhibits - was it in part from members of the committee?

DeWinter: Jerry Ford ran for Congress in the late 40s and his first office was a Quonset hut. Will Jones was quite instrumental, having a background in exhibits in presidential museums and I don’t think that the committee, Jordan Sheperd, LaClaire and Fred, really got involved in the exhibit design. I know, for example, Will Jones said, he wanted to have all lighting no higher than twelve feet above the floor.

If we have a space frame we can put the lighting at the lower cord of the structure which is twelve feet above the floor. That’s where we have all the lighting. I didn’t want to have a ceiling at that level because it would be only twelve foot high. Consequently, I put the space frame in there which is eight feet deep so we have essentially a twenty foot ceiling but with a lighting grid twelve feet high.

These are some of the things that came about in my interaction with Will Jones and the exhibit. I mentioned the theater on the first floor and the outside glass wall was intentionally designed with an operational curtain. When people are seated waiting for the video to come on, they can enjoy the river and surroundings. Then when the show starts, a motorized track goes back, covering the glass wall with a lightproof curtain. All that was designed with the exhibit designer and me.

Smith: And, in fact, it’s kind of a theatrical element with the curtain.

DeWinter: Yes.

Smith: The Grand Rapids skyline is almost part of the exhibit.

DeWinter: Exactly. All part of the building and exhibit design.

Smith: When the building, the model, was unveiled and drawings appeared, what kind of local reaction did you get?

DeWinter: I don’t know, but President Ford came during the construction process. He came quite often, every few months. I would greet him and we would walk through the construction project wearing hard hats. Even before we broke ground, however, we had a meeting with the three committee members and President Ford. We had built a model of the building which incidentally, is from this corner to the other corner, 300 feet long.

Smith: Really?

DeWinter: This façade. Symbolism. Football field is 300 feet long.

Smith: Perfect.

DeWinter: It’s a right triangle with the hypotenuse glass wall facing the river.

Smith: This office space, which is clearly an office for him - but was this always intended as Foundation space?

DeWinter: No. The Foundation had nothing to do with this office. This office was for the administrative offices for the museum. And the Foundation, I think, was born out of the need to raise money for the museum.

Smith: But you always intended to have an office for him in the building?
DeWinter: Absolutely. The committee wanted to have an office for him in the building. I think this is about the most spectacular setting for a presidential office anywhere. I’m looking at the picture of President Ford, on the desk, of him beneath the presidential seal. That seal was not part of the program. I built a model of the stairway and that solid corduroy wall needed a focal point. I decided that a ten foot diameter circle of the presidential seal was appropriate and proposed it to the committee. It was carved in place. The seal consists of four five-foot square limestone blocks put together and that represents the ten-foot diameter circle. A marvelous carver was up there on scaffolding – I think it took him the better part of a month with a chisel, laying it out and carving it in place.

Smith: I had no idea. Well, and it turned out to be the perfect and moving backdrop for the lying in state.

DeWinter: Yes. Oh, that reminds me of the memorial garden I visited of the Eisenhower Museum.

Smith: Yeah, what do you think of the chapel, the Place of Meditation? What was your opinion of the little chapel where he is buried?

DeWinter: At Eisenhower? Well, it was okay, but it just didn’t seem to tie into the museum at all.

Smith: Yeah.

DeWinter: That was interesting and I said to the Ford committee, “Should I design a memorial gardens or a burial site for the President and his wife?” “Why?” “Well, because Eisenhower has it, Truman has it, there at the museum. They said, “Yes, but how do you talk to the President about something like that?” I said, “It’s part of my job. I’ll talk to him.” So I asked the President the next time I had a meeting with him and he said, “Well, let me talk to Betty about that and I’ll get back to you.” He did talk to Betty and then said, “Yes, that’ll be fine.” I thought that was a good location for the memorial gardens. You probably know that when President Ford died, all they had to do was lift this slab up – the crypt had already been in place for thirty years, all set, ready to go. I was very pleased with how this came out.
Smith: Was that hill always there? Or was that created?

DeWinter: It was created. It was a flat site and we constructed a concrete wall like a portion of an orange peel, and created the mound behind it and planted pine trees on that. That was all part of the design concept. And it worked out fine for him.

How is Betty’s health?

Smith: Physically, she’s doing okay.

DeWinter: She’s okay?

Smith: Yeah, she’s okay. I think she is pretty reclusive, she tells people she’s retired. But I think she’s never gotten over his loss. I think that that weighs pretty heavily.

DeWinter: Yes, I can appreciate that.

Smith: And of course Marty tells the story about them being on the bridge one day and she’d never seen the burial site. And she said something to him about, “Don’t you think I ought to see where people are going to dance on my grave?”

DeWinter: She was a dancer, wasn’t she?

Smith: She was. So she was very impressed. Well, Bill Clinton – I don’t know if you’ve heard this or not – but when Bill Clinton dropped by, he stopped by the gravesite and just looked around and said, “This is so Jerry Ford. This is perfect Jerry Ford.” Calm, peaceful, understated.

DeWinter: That was it.

Smith: Yeah. They got the place built. Do you have memories about the opening, the dedication?

DeWinter: Oh yes, that was a show, wasn’t it? Were you here?

Smith: I wasn’t here for the original, no.
DeWinter: You’ve probably seen the photograph of all of the dignitaries who attended the dedication.

Smith: Yeah.

DeWinter: And everybody who was anybody came to that dedication. It was incredible! I remember coming across over here and Teddy Kennedy – (thirty years younger then) – was trying to catch a ride from here over to the hotel. The Pantlind was done at the time, and so Bob Hope along with other celebrities was present at the opening. I guess that kind of reflected how he was loved by so many people.

Smith: Was it difficult for you – it’s your baby – when they felt the need for additional space?

DeWinter: The answer is yes.

Smith: But I have to tell you it’s invisible to the vast majority of people. It doesn’t do violence to the original design DeWinter: I was disappointed that I wasn’t asked to be involved in the addition. The only thing I questioned about it was, “Does that outdoor table and chairs ever get used?”

Smith: I don’t think so.

DeWinter: I wouldn’t think so either, and would have handled it differently.

Smith: What would you have done differently?

DeWinter: It’s a logical place for an addition, but I wouldn’t have tried to compete with the main design and would have made it more subordinate to the original structure.

Smith: Still, this has got to be a source of real pride.

DeWinter: Of course, I think back thirty years ago and the two icons of my architectural practice are right here – the hotel across the river and this Museum. That thirty story hotel across the river was quite a monument to a couple of local boys.
Smith: And a risk.

DeWinter: Oh, yeah.

Smith: It had to have been a leap of faith when it was built.

DeWinter: They didn’t know they wanted to get in the hotel business. Actually, I went to them with an idea.

Smith: Actually the two are in some ways inseparable, because one senses that collectively, they are a catalyst for what’s followed.

DeWinter: No question about that. When the hotel was built, to my knowledge, there was only one restaurant outside of the hotel in downtown. It was across the street, called Churchhill’s. That, together with the renovation of the Pantlind Hotel, really stemmed the tide of decay which did surround an awful lot of Midwestern cities at the time. The genesis of that was that the city decided they needed a convention hall. Dick Gillette, chairman of the board of Old Kent Bank, and Rich DeVos, president of Amway were asked to raise the funds to build a symphony hall and exhibit hall. I was talking to another architect one day and said, “Isn’t that something? The city’s going to build a symphony hall and an exhibit hall, and all we have is a tired old rundown Pantlind Hotel to support it.” So I came up with an idea of a hotel, the tower, and I shared it with Rich DeVos, who was a friend of mine, and kind of convinced him that they ought to come into the city from the little town of Ada east of here. Consequently, Rich DeVos and Jay Van Andel have made an enormous impact in Grand Rapids.

Smith: And was that really the time when the city sort of rediscovered the river? One senses that the river was an afterthought before.

DeWinter: Industrial buildings occupied most of the west side of the River. Front Street ran alongside of the river in the location which is now the reflecting pool. There was a major city sewer under a street that originally was where the museum has been built. The original site for the museum was 150 feet to the south; however, that site was behind Indian Mounds and an abandoned street car bridge. Even though the cost of moving city utilities was about $150,000, it was the right thing to do; that is, centering the building on a park that was already there and out from behind the Indian Mounds and the bridge.

Smith: That raises a cultural question, because we all know the stories about the Dutch influence in this area – the Dutch thrift and all of that. That prevailing culture - what challenges did that present, and how do you deal with that?

DeWinter: My parents and grandparents are Dutch.

Smith: So you had your bona fides in terms of cost-consciousness?

DeWinter: My father and mother never went to college, or even finished high school. He was a farmer, truck farm – raised vegetables, all that sort of thing. And I didn’t want to get dirt under my fingernails and continue to work on the farm so I decided to go to college. I am kind of an accidental architect. After I graduated from high school I started to work in construction. A few months later I decided that maybe there is more to life than just doing this grunt work so I went to the local junior college and enrolled in an engineering course. During my first year I met a couple of guys who were in pre-architecture. That sounded more interesting than an engineering career. So I switched to that and then went to the University of Michigan and became an architect.

Smith: And I assume the “Dutch influence” is less today than fifty years ago?

DeWinter: Oh, very much so.

Smith: People didn’t read Sunday papers?

DeWinter: Oh, no, no. My parents were quite liberal. I could play ball and ride a bike on Sunday. My wife’s parents would not allow her to ride a bicycle or even ride in a car. The family walked to church for services two times every Sunday.

Smith: I used to say the litmus test of how Grand Rapids had changed – remember when the arena was new? – can you imagine Elton John performing in Grand Rapids? Selling out eleven thousand seats! That just wouldn’t happen. That encapsulates it.

DeWinter: I know that Rich and Jay, when they decided to get into the hotel business, were confronted with the issue of being open on Sundays. At that time, the Dutch Calvinistic tradition felt that Sunday was a day of rest and worship, and people should not be engaged in commercial activities on that day. Well, people get over it. The right fringe of thirty years ago is no longer in Grand Rapids. It’s much more of a cosmopolitan city today.

What a beautiful setting, isn’t it? Look at all those people out there.

Smith: He was so proud of this place.

DeWinter: President Ford?

Smith: President Ford. He obviously felt very good about what you had done. Do you remember the last time you saw him?

DeWinter: No, I don’t. I saw him many times during the construction and the dedication. I don’t remember the last time I saw him.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction when he died?

DeWinter: No. One of the things I do remember is I was across the river when those twenty-one jets came racing down the river. And the last one went right straight up. Remember that? Were you there?

Smith: Yeah.

DeWinter: That was incredible.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

DeWinter: Well, I’d say he was a great man. I wish we had a Congress which had more of the Jerry Fords in it today. He had enormous principles – I guess because he was born in this community and grew up here. He had firm convictions, including one to pardon Nixon for the benefit of the country, not for his benefit. He knew that it would go against him personally for doing that; nevertheless, it didn’t matter. It was the right thing to do for the country. And I think that historians have subsequently stated that.

Smith: I think he had the satisfaction of knowing before he died that most people had come around to that viewpoint.
DeWinter: I visited him on one occasion in his home in Palm Springs and was very fond of him and had a nice talk with Susan about a year ago. She was in Grand Rapids giving a talk and I told her some little anecdotes that she didn’t know about her father.

Smith: Is there anything about this place in retrospect that you wish you’d done differently?

DeWinter: Oh sure. For example, like one of the things that bothers me is – not the conceptual design – but the material of the floor downstairs. It’s a fabricated, manufactured marble floor. I originally specified granite because it will never wear out. I had an inch and an eighth granite specified, but it would have cost an extra few hundred thousand dollars, so we put this in, which is thin – about a half inch thick instead of an inch and an eighth thick of granite. That always bothered me a little bit. I like the way the glass has functioned. All the exterior around the glass is stainless steel and it’s just a bright finish. It looks good today. I’m happy with it. I’m not happy with those little lights along the top and not happy with the huge eight foot high Ford Presidential Museum letters across the fascia – that offends me a little bit.

Smith: I understand. But the building, your concept has certainly been more than vindicated. The whole package – it seems natural. It seems like, “Of course,” and that’s the ultimate measure of success in some ways.

DeWinter: When Amway built the elliptical Marriott across the river - they selected a number of architects. I no longer had an architectural office at the time, but I was a consultant to it. They interviewed a lot of architects, including Venoly. He looked at Grand Rapids and said he thought that the Ford Museum was one of the most outstanding pieces of architecture in town. I thought that was kind of a nice complement.

Smith: That’s a very nice complement, and it’s the perfect note on which to end. Thank you.

Smith: First of all, tell us about your dad and then the relationship that he had with President Ford.

Fisher: Well, I actually met President Ford because of my father, and it’s amazing. They are both Michigan people. Dad was born in Ohio, and went to Ohio State. But they had a very special relationship and I supposed it’s because of their Midwestern upbringing and their ability to be honest with each other. I think that Dad was a person who would always tell the truth. If you really didn’t want to know the truth, you wouldn’t want to ask him because he would tell it to you. But he didn’t talk a lot. He listened better than he spoke. He always spoke well, but I mean he was a good listener and he would let you sort of hang yourself before he would answer a question.

Smith: I’ve thought of this about President Ford – that there is a bit of cultural and geographical condescension toward Midwesterners. And in particular now because I’ve lived in a number of places and the way I phrase it is, people think because you talk slow, that means you think slow. And there is not necessarily a correlation between the two.

Fisher: No, I agree with you. I think of it as being someone who is very thoughtful, and who is thinking while they are talking. And they want to hold their ability to make a judgment.

Smith: No rush to judgment.

Fisher: Exactly. I believe that my father was very much like that, too. I know that he was there for the president all the time. Just for example, and I’m not going to be able to remember all the names, but he would come to Washington and meet with the president. I wouldn’t even know he was here. I’d run into him – my father. It was like we were totally separate people. This was his thing, but then my relationship with the president was different. But my father was always a behind the scenes person. He was very intent on energy issues, and Israel, of course, but always energy issues. He used to say that a lot of what is happening now was going to happen. That’s interesting to me.

I think my father was very much a Republican, but I think he was a Jerry Ford Republican.

Smith: How would you define that?

Fisher: A Jerry Ford Republican would be a more moderate Republican - a fiscally conservative Republican. Values. But not the way it’s gone to the right with the family value kind of stuff. It’s more about the human being and not about the rhetoric.

Smith: When the president died there was a use of the word decency, in an almost condescending way. He was “incredibly decent” – as if that’s a substitute for bright, sophisticated - fill in the blank. And I think that probably also happens sometimes to Midwesterners. They get branded.

Fisher: That’s probably right. Many of the ones that I respect are not quick to talk.
They are not quick to jump in. They want to hear what you have to say and then they’ll tear it apart. But I don’t think decency and integrity and all of those things are bad things to have. When the president died, I was, besides being overwhelmed with emotion, I was grateful that people finally knew what I knew.

Smith: I wore two hats that week because I was with ABC the first half of the week and then with the family the second half. It was fascinating to watch inside the media bubble, the degree to which they were surprised by the response and how it grew day by day. And I think part of it was a reaction to the current political climate. But I also think there was a whole generation of people who were being introduced to him for the first time through those old grainy clips.
And it looked awfully good compared to what we have today.
Fisher: Right. Exactly. I exactly agree with you. And I also think that they saw a regular person. I think they saw somebody, not just because he was from the Midwest, he’d been in Washington – but it had never kind of corrupted him.

Smith: Would you say authenticity?

Fisher: Authenticity, absolutely. But sincerity along with it. Just getting back to this one little story that was always fun because Dad went to Ohio State, and the president went to Michigan and I went to Michigan. So we always had this kind of thing. But they always had a bet and every time Dad would introduce him, he would talk about this. It’s in my book that they had this bet - that he’d become the president, but Dad would become rich on the bet that they had between Ohio State and Michigan football. And when Daddy died, the president had given him $5 – it was always $5 – and he’d signed it, which is defacing the money and all of that sort of stuff. But Dad had framed it and put it in his office, and when Dad died and then I went to see Betty and the President out in Beaver Creek, I took it to him. I took that back to him, and I think he was really very touched by that.

So they had a very special relationship - the kind of thing where he would say, “Max, call me Jerry,” and he would say, “No, not as long as you are sitting in that chair. When you’re gone from there, we’ll go back.” They very much respected each other, and they talked all the time.

Smith: How did your paths cross with the Fords?

Fisher: I was living in New York and this was all at the change of the administration. There was a huge event, Michigan Salutes Milliken – Bill Milliken was our governor – and Nixon was supposed to be the keynote speaker. And then, of course, everything happened with Nixon, and so they didn’t have their keynote speaker and they had five thousand people coming to Colball(?) Hall. So my father called me and said, “Would you come?” And I just read this again in the book. I’m going to give you the book so you’ll have it so you can see some of the stuff. But he said, “Would you come and organize this because we’ve sold tickets.” I said, because I had told him I’m not good at selling the tickets, I haven’t been living in Michigan, don’t ask me to do that part. He said, “No, no, no. We just need to organize the event.” Well, that was like a piece of cake for me and I had a great time. I was the key contact for the White House, and so the advance team came, but they weren’t a cohesive advance team, obviously. There were some leftover Nixon people and there were some people that were just there to help. But there was Secret Service – all the different communications things.

So I rallied the troops kind of thing in Michigan to get the table settings and do this and put the walls up and I think Ray Bolger was the musical entertainment. It was right after Betty had had her breast cancer surgery, and so they weren’t sure then that he was going to come. But he had agreed to this and I met him afterwards – because Dad introduced – all of my siblings were there – so Dad introduced us and I had told the White House people that I worked with, “This is great. Anytime you need me…”

If there had been a job description in those days for this, I think organizational – trying to put things together like events – they didn’t have event planners then and all these other little jobs that they talk about now. So that was perfect for me because I was good at that. And I loved doing it. So I volunteered for a while and helped him, and then sort of – I lobbied – but I was offered the job. My father was intent on not helping me. I remember because Len Garment was still at the White House and people that I knew were still here [Washington, D.C.] I knew through my father. Because Dad had been involved with Nixon, as well.

So I was offered the job and I was the first woman, really in the history of the United States, to be an advance man for a president. Did you know that?

Smith: No.

Fisher: I was the first one. It’s interesting because since then if I’ve run into presidents and the advance people come up to me, the women will come and say, “Thanks.” You know, I didn’t do it for that reason. But there were bunches of hurdles to get over because I was a woman. It was tough, it was really tough. They didn’t pay me the same, they didn’t do anything…but my thing was, I think, I wanted the president to be happy. That was the only reason I was there. Now, others are there for – and I understand this – the career movement and all of that, but I was doing what I loved to do and I was making him happy.

Smith: Let me ask you – back up a bit, because one of the recurring themes of this project – Leon Parma sort of encapsulates this, because he was shoehorned into the East Room on the morning of August 9th for the swearing in. And afterwards there was a receiving line and then a reception in the dining room. He said, and this has led to this conversation with a number of people, he said you could see the Nixon people just peel off, go back to their offices. Which under the circumstances you can understand. My question is: did you detect tension between them and us? The Nixon people and the Ford people?

Fisher: Absolutely. Well, for me, watching it was – how to explain this – Nixon ran his White House differently than Ford ran his White House. Two totally different men. That advance group had to deal with a lot of demonstrators. If they wanted to be in a hotel, they would call the hotel and they would say get them out, get people out of there. Jerry Ford would never want to do that. We would go to a different hotel. So there was some of that tension there because some said, “but you’re working for the president, you can do whatever you want.” No, that’s not the way he wanted us to act. So there was a difference, and that’s the tension that I felt.

Smith: There is a wonderful story in a book I remember. They went to some hotel and of course they put him up in the best suite. It was literally called the Emperor’s Suite. And [he] felt distinctly uncomfortable about that. And someone wrote a handwritten sign that said, “Jerry Ford’s Room,” and put it on the door. And he thought that was fine. But that goes to what you say.

Fisher: Absolutely. Unless he was upset about something, unless he was having a moment, which we all have.

Smith: Now tell us, because it’s not a secret that he had a temper.
Fisher: Yes, he did. Two times I can tell you that I encountered his temper. It was my first trip out of town for him, and it was to Atlanta at the Hyatt Regency Hotel, and it was a mess of a trip. All the advance men, every one of them, they were all the chiefs and I was the Indian and they kept me up all night. I think they were trying to kill me. It was a pretty awful experience and at the end of the trip, I was just like, please let them go out of town, let them leave, let them leave, let the motorcade go, please.

They are all in the cars and I’m standing there with the agent who did the hotel, who should never have done hotels. His name is Smitty, Dick Smith. I mean, he had pulled a gun on me during this trip. It was an awful trip. So, I was standing there with him and we were both going, “Please leave. Please leave.” And the cars wouldn’t move. Dick Kaiser got out of the car and said there were no newspapers, and the president was really angry. Now, normally, if there hadn’t been something else going on – there was probably something else going on – he would have just driven off and he would have gotten his papers.

I know that he had the papers in the room in the morning, because I did that. But he didn’t have them in the car, and I didn’t know that was my responsibility. So Smitty is looking at me and Kaiser is looking at Smitty, and they all of us take off to try and find papers. Now, I know he’s fuming, he’s fuming, and the motorcade’s not moving. This was one of those times when it was just awful. Went into the gift shop, and I said, “I don’t have any money.” I didn’t carry any money because I didn’t carry my purse, and said, “I need a paper, it’s for the president.” She said, “Someone was just in here and tried that,” because Smitty had been in there before me. So he had gone, apparently, into the men’s room and found a paper and put it back together again and…oh God.

Smith: In those days there were afternoon papers.

Fisher: Right. But this was morning, and there was nothing. It was awful. He was very upset.
Smith: Plus, he was a newspaper junkie.

Fisher: Yes, and he was very upset. I learned my lesson. That was a silly situation, but…and the other time I saw him have anger was when I told him I was HIV positive. And that’s a whole other story, but he was furious.

Smith: What happened?

Fisher: When I was diagnosed with HIV, it was in 1991, and at that point in my life, the President and Mrs. Ford were godparents to my children, my two boys and they were little. We talked all the time and we were very close, and I had become very close with Betty. So, I knew I needed to tell them and that was even almost harder than telling my own mom and dad. But I went to Beaver Creek and we spent the day there. I took the boys with me, and the president was playing with the boys and I went in to talk with Betty and this was a moment in my life that I remember so vividly. We cried, I told her, we cried. She was like, “Okay. You’re going to help women, aren’t you?” And I said, “I can’t even think about it, I don’t know if I’m going to be alive, I’m never going to see my children…” She said, “Well, you’re not going to be thinking about you.” She was crying. I was crying. We were laughing; we were crying.

She said, “We have to go tell Jerry.” I said, “Well, I think maybe you should tell him. I’ll be there.” And she’s holding my hand and tapping my hand and everything. We went into that little office there, it’s right at the top of the steps at Beaver Creek, and I just broke down. It was almost as if I – I don’t know why. He was like a dad in some respects. I was letting him down; there was something wrong with this. It was a bad thing. And he just – I could see him – his face got red, he said, “What about your dad? What about your father?” And I told him, I said, “You know, he could use a call from you because they’re not talking about this.” And I hadn’t gone public or anything, so this was all very quiet and I hadn’t even decided what I was going to do.

And the president was so angry about Brian, my husband. I’d never seen him like this. He was furious and it almost made me feel like – very safe- because he said, “Aren’t you angry?” And I go, “I, I don’t know. I don’t have time. I have two children, I don’t know what I’m doing.” He was holding my hand and we were crying, and he was just walking and then he started pacing and then he lit up his pipe, and then he was…he was furious. He was absolutely furious. There was something so wonderful about that when I look back on it because it wasn’t an easy thing for them to understand. Because, just like my dad, it’s the generation of people that said, “Well, we can fix this.” Well, we can’t fix this. I am still here today, and this is an amazing thing. But in those days, we weren’t sure. At that point I probably had about five more years to live, and little children and this whole stigma. And the president was just beyond – he was very angry – which I loved him for it. It was just very special, really.

Smith: And they were outspoken in subsequent years, both in their support of you and the cause, at a time when that was not politically fashionable.

Fisher: He was very supportive of me – both of them. And they helped me during that period of time, that July when I was diagnosed in ’91 and I think I saw them in August, and then into January, when I went public. I was on the phone with her all the time, the president was on the phone with my father, Betty was talking to my mother. Her biggest thing to me was: be really sure, because you can’t take it back. Once you say something publicly like that, you can’t take it back. And she is so outspoken, anyway.

So, she’s been my mentor on this whole thing all the time, and the president was there for me. Between my father agreeing that I could use him and the president agreeing that I could use him – I mean, there were times when I asked the president, “Won’t you please do this?” And he would go, “No, I can’t do that.” There were things he wouldn’t do, like my father wouldn’t do, either. They just wouldn’t use up their political chits, I think. Which, okay, I’ll do it, I’ll do it anyway, it’s all right. So Betty and I would have those conversations; how are we going to get this done, how am I going to get this done. But they were there for me in that personal way that says how to handle yourself, even though you may not know, you’ll never really know if you’ve affected anybody.
Smith: Then when you gave your speech to the convention, were they there?

Fisher: Yes. It was amazing. I had asked Betty because they wanted to know who did I want to introduce me. And I had asked her if she would. She said that obviously she would want to, but she was coming to this convention and not talking to anybody. Because this was – was it abortion in those days? It was something else, equal rights for women….and she didn’t want to say anything to anybody. So she wasn’t going to overshadow - that she was coming. So they were there in the president’s box with my mother and father. I could see them in the box – and my brother. They were amazing, they were just amazing.

Smith: It’s interesting because maybe you’ve begun to answer one of the questions I’ve always had. Clearly the party moved over here in their later years, and I’ve often wondered, did they simply stay where they were and by contrast with party appeared to be more “liberal,” or, in fact, did they themselves also evolve through experiences like this? I know for a fact that he’s the only president ever to have put his name on a pro-gay rights organization, for example. And that’s surprising, if you accept the caricature of West Michigan, conservative congressman, vanilla.

Fisher: When you look at the people from West Michigan actually.

Smith: And you just wonder, how do you think they evolved? Because I think of them as a partnership. Did she move him in some ways, do you think?

Fisher: Oh, I absolutely think. I think she moved him all the time.

Smith: But he was moveable.

Fisher: He was moveable, which is amazing, when you think about it.

Smith: Let’s face it, most people get more conservative with age. I remember in the eulogy I said, “Our attitudes harden along with our arteries,” but Gerald Ford seemed to be just the opposite.
Fisher: It’s almost as if he could take a deep breath and say, “What’s humanity? What’s being human?” And I think a lot of these things were about being human, and so he didn’t move to the right with the party, as I saw it.

Smith: First of all there was the pro-choice issue. They had clearly nailed their banner to that mast and weren’t going to change their minds.

Fisher: And what about ERA? Do you remember that?

Smith: Yeah.

Fisher: And I think that that was a lot of the reason that she would be quiet, she wouldn’t talk or she wouldn’t say things to upset the apple cart, rather than say something that would be against a sitting president or something like that. She was very respectful of that stuff, and she followed her husband that way. There are many times when I think, yes, she led him; but I do think there were times when she would have loved to have said things, but she wouldn’t do it because it might embarrass. And she wouldn’t want to do that.

Those are different kinds of values. And your question being the party – you know, Richard, I remember when President Bush ’41, when we were talking about – I used to come to Washington and sit with his speechwriters and try to give them language for him – because every time he spoke out on AIDS, he said the wrong thing. He couldn’t get it. And I felt so bad, because it wasn’t as if he and Barbara were not wanting to get it; they really wanted to be a part of the community and to help. It was just like...

Smith: Just tone deaf?

Fisher: Maybe.

Smith: Not insensitive, but just not...

Fisher: It’s like this being shoved at you at a time when there was so much other stuff going on, but also shoved at you and you need to learn what words to use and what words to not use. It’s almost like a different language kind of thing. And everybody was very sensitive to that. The party went even further. I would sit with President Ford and Betty at their home and I would ask questions and they would go, “Well, we’re just going to let that go. We’re just going to let it be.” You could see sometimes that they would be riled up about something. I had a hard time, myself, working for him when the election came around and Reagan promising that he would “I’m going to be there for you – and all my people are going to be working for you,” and then it was like going out in the field, we were fighting Carter and Reagan.

Smith: Really?

Fisher: It was just awful.

Smith: Describe that.

Fisher: It was awful. It’s one thing to be fighting against the Democrats if you’re a Republican, but it’s another to be fighting against your own party. His people were very adamant and they didn’t want Jerry Ford in there. I think that there was just a lot of…

Smith: Do you think what he had in mind was 1980?

Fisher: I felt so strongly about him and it was very difficult for me to be in this campaign. It was different than just taking him and doing trips for him. You’re in a world – well, you know what the campaigns are like – they’re awful. But to be fighting against all odds – that’s why I don’t think it was just the Nixon pardon that did it.

Smith: Yeah. Right.

Fisher: I think it was the lack of support from the Republican Party that didn’t push him there for that election.

Smith: Were you at the convention? We keep hearing how nasty the atmosphere was.

Fisher: Which one was this?

Smith: In ’76 – the Ford-Reagan. That it was very personal and often bitter.

Fisher: In Kansas City?
Smith: Yes. What do you recall?

Fisher: I recall it being bitter, and I recall it being angry. And yet, I just needed to do my job. But I also recall that being a time when Betty was going through a lot of stuff.

Smith: You were aware of her problems?

Fisher: Yeah. Well, there are some things I think I just don’t want to say. But, yes, I was aware of her problem. But in those days it was a little different. You had a drink, but even the president – I don’t know if he ever knew this but – I would water down his drinks because it’s not a matter of – in those days people just drank to drink. It wasn’t…

Smith: It really was a different culture.

Fisher: It was a different culture. And then when she was facing her problems, he didn’t do it – he stopped. He was amazing that way, so supportive. I felt, watching him do that, it says a lot.

Smith: His self-discipline is something that people comment on. He was a remarkably disciplined man.

Fisher: Unbelievable. And that’s why I always – you know they always show that thing of him sliding down the steps and Chevy Chase and all of this – but he’s the most athletic president we had had until some of these younger ones. He swam every day, twice a day.

Smith: Maybe it’s not a euphemism, people just talk about, well, Mrs. Ford was late a lot. That’s how they sort of described…some people read something into that, other people figured she was just not punctual. Was it something you had to take into account in planning and organizing events?

Fisher: Well, I worked for him, so the only time I got to spend time with her in those days was when she went on a trip with him. And then I would make it my business to sit with her a little bit because she was sometimes, in those days, a little bit left out. It was about the president, and so forth.
Smith: How did she handle that?

Fisher: Because I think that was during the time she was drinking and having pain in her neck, and all of that stuff, I felt there was a lot of sadness in her. And facing your own mortality with the breast cancer, there is not anybody…I totally get that, I totally understand that. And I think that there is just something that just sits right back here all the time, and it just changes the way you relate to people and the way you relate to your life. There seemed to me that before the intervention and before all that stuff, that there was some sadness. Looking back and it’s always 20/20, obviously, but it seemed like there was a lot of sadness there. That was my sense.

Smith: That’s an interesting description. And presumably that lifted in later years.

Fisher: Absolutely. Once Betty went through Long Beach and sort of got her life back, and her family and her friends and moved into the world of “I’m going to make it a better place” part, you couldn’t stop her.

Smith: Do you remember when you went to work in the White House?

Fisher: Well, I was a volunteer. That was in the fall of ’74, and I did a trip in Grand Rapids, and one in Scottsdale. But I think that I went on full time maybe in ’75. But I was a volunteer at the end of that year, or something like that.

Smith: Were you surprised by the pardon?

Fisher: No. My father would have done that.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction to the pardon?

Fisher: Yes. But I was also young and I was not looking historically. I just didn’t want people to be upset with him. I wouldn’t say I was politically savvy. I was a Republican, I grew up in a Republican home, and there was no reason for them to be upset with him, because this was important. And think about what he was trying to do for the country. I mean, I felt very strongly about it, but I wasn’t a political pundit. I’m still not a political pundit.
Smith: Who did you report to? How was the White House organized in a way that your function…

Fisher: My job was under Red Cavaney, and if he wasn’t there, our direct boss was Don Rumsfeld or Dick Cheney.

Smith: And it’s interesting because we picked up from a number of people, differences between – people tend to equate the two now.

Fisher: What, Rumsfeld and Cheney?

Smith: Rumsfeld and Cheney, as if they were one person. But one senses that in fact, the atmosphere in the Ford White House was different under each one.

Fisher: Definitely, I think so.

Smith: How would you describe it?

Fisher: I was the woman on the team. I didn’t have a family – of course, I had a family – but I was considered not to have a family, so I was gone almost every week. And I always had the last trip. I had the last trip of the week. I would come back on Air Force One with the president and I was exhausted because I would then get the call the next morning on Sunday because the president had gotten some sleep. Now he wanted to go to the Washington Hilton because a friend of his was having an event. And it wasn’t planned and who would they call? Me. So I never, like, got a day off. It was very difficult for me. And I didn’t really get to see, except on trips, Rumsfeld and Cheney. And then I’d sit with them all the time. That’s how I know all of the Cabinet and everybody, because on trips I would take care of them. You know what I mean. I would arrange for them; if they needed something, I would get them something, whatever it was; but that’s how I knew all of the men. There were no women. At President Ford’s ninetieth birthday I was like, this is just amazing to me because I know all of the men; I had never met a lot of the wives. It was interesting.

So, Rumsfeld and Cheney: Rumsfeld is a different personality, I think, totally, than Cheney. Cheney was different then than he is now. A lot different.
Cheney was in that same morality that Gerald Ford was in. He was from the West a little bit, but he was still of that same kind of…

Smith: It’s interesting, even people who are very critical of Cheney today, go out of their way to say why they thought he was one of the best chiefs of staff because he, at least, did not appear to have an agenda of his own. And he made sure that diverse viewpoints were presented for the president’s consideration, which is maybe one of the most important things any chief of staff can do.

Fisher: It wasn’t about him. It never felt like it was about him, it always felt like what would be the right thing to do. And, like you say, diverse. I wasn’t ever at that level, but I know that he was so totally different than you hear and see him talking now. [He was] very much in the background on trips and stuff. He wasn’t like, “Do it this way…” He was very much like, however you’re doing it, don’t worry about me, I’ll find my way. Rumsfeld’s a little more demanding. Cheney was never really demanding.

Smith: Well, that’s totally consistent with what we’ve been told.

Fisher: And he was very gentle. I really, really adored him.

Smith: Dorothy Dowton, who was the president’s personal secretary, first of all, drew a sharp contrast – and by her own acknowledgement, she’s critical of Rumsfeld. He tried to get her fired. He tried to replace the president’s personal secretary. And she said it was night and day when Cheney took over. You relaxed, you still worked hard, but it was almost as if you felt no longer under Big Brother.

Fisher: Right. I think a lot of that is probably true. But Rumsfeld was also there in the very beginning, so there was a sense of “We need to pull this together quickly.” So there may have been a little bit more, to give him the benefit of the doubt, there may have been a little bit more pressure and stress on that.

I need to just tell you a quick story about the president. The way he thought of his people. Two stories: He always knew when I was on a trip with him, or if I was doing his trip. So, I can’t remember exactly where we were, it might have been Portland, could have been anywhere. I’d walk him into the hotel and there would be the agents – this was in the beginning – there would be the agents and communications and all these people, and the press and everybody, and I’d go this way and the agents would say, “This way, Mr. President.” And he’d say, “No, I’m going on Mary’s elevator.” He was very aware of the people around him.

Smith: Which is by no means universally the case with political figures.

Fisher: No, because, it just happens. But he was very aware and he knew I was being – I mean, I went to my father, I went to Dick Cheney, and I went to all these men and I said, “Don’t you think that you could talk to Red, because I should be getting paid the same amount. I’m training all these guys.” In those days, Richard, we’re talking the ’70s, I would never have done anything to embarrass the president, so would I have sued? They knew I wouldn’t do that. And the whole thing was, “You don’t need it.” That’s just not good. But [it was] their way of getting back at me.

But the president knew I was sort of being run down because he’d see me everywhere. He’d come back from a long trip and then he’d see me the next day in Washington and then the next day. I mean, I was always there. One time we were on Air Force One and Terry O’Donnell said – my memory is a little fading - but we landed at Andrews and he brought me back and said, “The president wants to see you.” Because we would all go off the back and he’d go off the front and that was before the 747, so I never saw that one. We were on 27000 and he handed me a corsage which somebody had probably given him for Betty or whatever, and he just said, “I just hope this makes you feel better. I know it’s been a rough trip.” Now, that was a little silly thing, but it meant a lot to me, and it was like, I know that he understands. His character was very much about the people, and for me that always meant a lot.

Smith: That’s a wonderful story.
Fisher: It really was a very special – he was very special. So that’s why I always gave him his – he always had a board under his mattress wherever we went. He always had ice cream, even if the doctor said, don’t give him ice cream. Because I always took care of him like I was a mother, I just wanted him to be comfortable. And then I know there is a funny story here because I did walk in on him one time when he didn’t have his clothes on and that was awful. That was just awful. There were lots of things that happened that mostly were funny and that everybody would laugh at today. I actually told that story in a speech: the one about taking him into the ladies room. Did I ever tell you that story?

We were somewhere and he was in the Green Room and he said, before I go on I want to go to the men’s room and I said, oh yeah, absolutely. And the agents – I don’t know about now, but then the agents always had a bathroom that was going to be his, whether it was a ladies room or a men’s room. It had been swept, and it was clean and he could go in there and nobody was in there. So, I must have just been thinking about too many things, and I knew he had to be on at a certain time, I said, come with me, and I walked him right into a ladies room, and I stood there and the door closed – and they let me do this. There were ten agents standing there and I saw the ladies’ thing and then I heard this scream inside and it was, “Oh my God.” And all the agents were laughing. They thought this was so funny; I’d taken the president to the ladies’ room – I mean, you just don’t think, it was habit. I never went into a men’s room. It was very much a habit. So things like that are the kinds of things that happened.

Smith: How did he respond when he walked out?

Fisher: He was not angry. He was very…I can’t actually remember exactly what he said, but I kept saying, “I’m so sorry, I’m so sorry.” He knew that I would never do something like that on purpose. It just happens.

Smith: Were you on either of the trips with the assassination attempts out in California?
Fisher: I was in the plane. Luckily it wasn’t my trip. I can’t tell you whose trip it was, but it wasn’t my trip. I was in the plane because I had done Monterrey, and we were going to San Francisco. Betty Ford was on the plane, and so when we had landed in San Francisco, I was on the plane because we were all going back when Sarah Jane Moore…I was not there for Sacramento. It doesn’t matter. It’s like: you’re there when those things happen; then you think, I’m standing around here, I’m walking in front of all these big guys, I don’t have a gun. What am I doing? How stupid am I?

Smith: How did Mrs. Ford react to the news?

Fisher: Well, I didn’t see because we didn’t know what happened. They took her, and I think there was another plane. I can’t quite remember, but I remember them coming into the airport so fast with all the cars screeching. It happened pretty quickly.

Smith: Did you get to know the kids at all during that period?

Fisher: I did Susan. She was on trips a lot. And then she was taking pictures for a while, and I got to know…the problem was that if they went to Vail to ski or something, I always got Milwaukee on the way in or the way out. So I never really [got] what you would say the “good trips,” where the family would be, because I was the girl. I got Milwaukee. I was really good in Milwaukee, I can’t tell you how many times I did Milwaukee.

Smith: Did you go on any foreign trips?

Fisher: I did Bucharest, Romania.

Smith: With Ceausescu.

Fisher: With Ceausescu. And although it was my trip, they had to send Jon D______, who was a volunteer from Chicago, who was a great guy, because the Ceausescu people would not negotiate with a woman. So I would do the work, I would do the schedule. But that’s very interesting when you go to a Communist country and you realize that you can’t do it the way you normally do it. But, yes.
There’s a great story about Kissinger in there, because he was on that trip. It was very fun because when Kissinger traveled, we always had the State Department/White House thing. Who’s going to get the better office, and who’s going to…shouldn’t it be the president, not the State Department? Well, they give you these homes and you have to work with State because you’re out of the country. I’m sure it’s much different now, but then it was, “Who’s more important, the president or the secretary of state?” Well, the secretary of state thought he was more important and the president was just the president, who was the president. So it was my job on that trip to get all the staff, which would include the secretary of state. He was considered staff. He didn’t like that very much. So I was always moving him and telling him to go somewhere. He wanted to know, “Who was she, who is she?”

Then he told me I should go to Belgrade with him. He thought that would be a great thing. So I’m calling my father, I’m going, “You know, your friend,” because he was friends, used to talk to him like all the time on the phone, “is coming on pretty strong.” He didn’t know I was Max’s daughter and it was a little funny. He was always, his agents would come to me and say, “The secretary needs to see you now,” and I knew he didn’t need to see me, but there I was. I was the only woman on the trip, so it was that kind of stuff.

Smith: Tito was still around then, wasn’t he? Yugoslavia.

Fisher: I didn’t do Yugoslavia. I had to go to Fort Smith, Arkansas. I did Ceausescu, but we were…

Smith: Didn’t do China?

Fisher: I was supposed to go to China, but I was the one advanceman they left behind. So I was up twenty-four hours a day because I was doing the schedule from here, and that’s when I met and worked with a lot of the senior staff because there wasn’t anybody else here.

Smith: Were you in Helsinki?

Fisher: Just on the way to Bucharest.
Smith: Then of course, he went to Japan and saw the emperor.

Fisher: Yeah, but I didn’t get to do that, either. You know, it’s funny because I was supposed to go to China. This has nothing to do with… But just a month ago I was supposed to go, and they denied me my visa because I’m HIV positive.

Smith: Really? Wow. What does that tell you about their claims to be a great power?

Fisher: Well, America does that. I’ve been working since 1982 to try and change that. Not that I can do anything about it, but it’s really an awful policy.

Smith: I guess it’s fair to assume that you really got to know them better after the White House years.

Fisher: Absolutely. Yeah, because I went and spent time with them, and I did trips for him. I remember doing the University of Michigan for him, or when they would call. I didn’t go work for him – I was burned out.

Smith: You mentioned Ann Arbor. It clearly had a special place in his heart.

Fisher: In his heart, and they had for him, too. It’s both. Really, both.

Smith: I’ve heard it from a number of people – we talked at the very beginning about talking slow. Apparently, it was almost like you flipped a switch. Every year he tried to go out and give a pep talk to the Michigan team before the big game. And it was a different man. It was someone who was eloquent, and just overwhelming, and knew every player and knew everything about every player. And brought them all into it, and it was just an extraordinary experience. People who had the chance to observe it, they never forgot it.

Fisher: I never observed it. I would have loved to. I always thought that he was, in many ways, better off the cuff. I remember thinking to myself, remember there was a communications department when I was at the White House, and…

Smith: Bob Hartmann, who was kind of a lightning rod, and still is.

Fisher: Is he?
Smith: Well, he’s gone, but he remains a lightning rod, sort of polarizing. Some people thought he was just very protective, some people thought possessive.

Fisher: I think both, actually. I think he was. But I’m talking Bob Mead, [he] was the communications director. I think it was Bob. Anyway, television. A lot of the time, since I had been in television, when we would do trips, I would be able to do a lot of the press advance because I knew what to do. I had been in the media. But I would have to say that those were the beginning of the days of the media, and I don’t think that he was a television president. He wasn’t what you would consider on television, charismatic. He hadn’t grown up that way.

Smith: He got better.

Fisher: Much better. Decency might be the word you said before, but a humanist is really regular, and that’s not a bad thing.

Smith: Particularly in the bubble of the presidency.

Fisher: Especially since he wasn’t even out there to get it. He was about to retire. He wanted to be Speaker of the House, didn’t he?

Smith: Yeah.

Fisher: That was what I understood it to be – and then he was going to retire that year.

Smith: There is a school of thought that says Reagan, by pushing for the nomination, actually made him a better candidate.

Fisher: Made Ford a better candidate?

Smith: Yeah. Think of the acceptance speech he gave. It’s probably one of the best speeches he ever gave. He really, really, worked at it, and he was pushed to do things at a level that he hadn’t…

Fisher: …ever done before.

Smith: Yeah.
Fisher: He hadn’t aspired to it. I don’t know if it was Reagan pushing him, or whether it was because he felt he could do the best job for the country. I have a tendency to believe that nobody could push him. He could make you think that you were pushing him, but in my heart of hearts, I think that he felt he would do the best job for the country.

Smith: In the campaign you have the debates and of course, the famous Polish gaffe – where were you that night?

Fisher: I don’t know. I know I wasn’t on that trip. It so reminded me of Romney and the brainwashing thing.

Smith: You knew instantly that it was a real problem.

Fisher: There were too many problems. There were really too many problems. And, like I say, I don’t think of him as – not that Carter was so great on television, but, President Ford was coming into his own. Give him another few years; he would have been a great orator.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that because he said to people that the hardest thing about losing was that he felt he had done a good job. He had to unlearn in some ways, being a Congressman. He had to evolve from that role into the role of executive, which was very different.

Fisher: But that’s why I think that nobody pushed him. I think that he felt that he was there now, and he could move now, and “give me my chance” kind of thing. Because this was all a learning curve that he hadn’t planned on.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Fisher: I think the last time I saw him was after my father died and I gave him his signed five dollar bill. I think that was the last time I saw him.

Smith: And that was out at Beaver Creek?

Fisher: Yeah. He was fragile. And I had just gone through this with Dad, so you can tell. And yet, you know, they were always so close, Betty and the president, and it’s like when I was there and we had dinner together, we didn’t always eat in the dining room. Sometimes we’d eat in the den, and in Palm Springs, too. And they called each other Mom and Dad kind of thing. They were very relaxed and comfortable and easy going. I remember having lunch that day with them in Beaver Creek, and his memory of my father, and things that went on years ago, long term. It was amazing, and she was helping him with the short term stuff. Then it was time for them to both rest. He was worried about her and she was worried about him. They were just the best together.

Smith: I think that was also part of the dynamic when he died; that people, first of all had not seen her in a while, they hadn’t seen the kids in a long while, and I think they were, perhaps, surprised at how close the family was, and in particular, how close the marriage was.

Fisher: Well, as close as the marriage was, and it was really close, and the children – you say children – we’re talking adults – my age and stuff, too. But if you could be proud of somebody, I was so proud of all of them for the way they handled themselves during the Washington time and the Grand Rapids time, and being up there at the Rotunda. I mean, these are human people, and they were trying to say, this is what my dad would have wanted us to do.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story which sort of sums it all up. We’d been told at ABC at the beginning of the week, out at St. Margaret’s, don’t be surprised if you see Mrs. Ford in wheelchair. Well, of course, we didn’t, until at the very end, briefly, outside the museum. But she walked that long distance to the gravesite. The following week someone commented on that to her, in terms of admiration and surprise. And she said, “Well, that’s what my husband would have wanted.” As simple as that, she was doing it for him.

Fisher: Absolutely. That’s the way she thought, and she still thinks that way.

Smith: Do you keep in touch with her?

Fisher: I do. It’s been hard this last bit of time.

Smith: Since his passing?

Fisher: No, just in this last year.
Smith: One senses that she is still grieving.

Fisher: Yeah, that’s true.

Smith: And she’s told people, “I’m retired.” That’s her characterization. On the one hand, she must be enormously proud and gratified to know that the Betty Ford Center is in Susan’s hands.

Fisher: Right. Oh, she’s very proud of her.

Smith: How many people create something and then, in fact, have a succession in their own lifetime that they can be completely comfortable with? So that’s on the plus side. But one senses that she is somewhat reclusive.

Fisher: She’s not somewhat; she is. And I also think that she’s frail, she’s fragile. And my concern, obviously, is that I have to now talk with Jan to get to her because she’s not answering her phone anymore like she used to. And maybe she’s not getting the messages, and there’s a lot of stuff going on with nurses and this, that, and the other thing. So, for me, I feel like I’ve – and I don’t know why – but maybe it’s just because they’re keeping…you know how when you get older your circle gets much smaller. I watched it happen with my dad. And I think the family has sort of made it be like that. I haven’t talked to her – I’ve talked around her, but not with her – in quite a while. Maybe nine months. For me, it’s very sad. She’s so much a part of my life. Of course she’s proud, but she misses him terribly. This is not easy.

Smith: Growing old is not easy, under the best of circumstances. But one tiny metaphor: I don’t think people realize, in the best sense of the word, how much he was her goad. He would complain about it, but every week, disciplined as he was, he would do it. I think it was Tuesday. He would sit down, you know there was that huge table in the conference room, and once a week everything he had to autograph was stacked up in front of him, and he’d do it manfully – get it out of the way – and he’d say, “Now, come on Mother, you’ve got to do yours.” And that’s not there anymore.

Fisher: No.
Smith: That friendly persuasion.

Fisher: I don’t think she feels that she has to. I think that she feels like she’s done it. I know she feels like she’s just waiting, in some respects.

Smith: She has said to people, “I don’t know why I’m still here.”

Fisher: Right. Yeah.

Smith: This sort of brings up the fact, another one of those things that I don’t think people realize because they are accustomed to more obvious displays, but how important faith was to both of them. It wasn’t, to use the cliché, worn on their sleeve. But it was clearly a very significant part of their lives.

Fisher: Yes, and it’s interesting because I think that’s another reason that they respected my dad and us for being Jewish, and they had a sense of what that meant. She has a spirituality. She’s spiritual as well as having faith, I think. Has a lot of “this is happening for a reason,” kind of thing, and we do these things because…based in some inner strength.

Smith: You hope – I don’t mean to sound saccharine, but – you have to hope that she believes that when the times comes, that they’d be reunited.

Fisher: Well, I think they probably will. I think she thinks that. And, yeah, but see that’s – now you get me going, Richard. I was going through my book and reading because I was trying to remember some of the stories and stuff, and I cry when I think about him, and her. They were such a part of my life for so many years, and it’s like, I miss him. I miss him.

Smith: For people who didn’t know them, or just know them as names in a textbook – what would you tell them? Is there something that would surprise people about either Gerald or Betty Ford?

Fisher: I think that the closeness that they had would surprise people. They called each other Mother and Dad, and their closeness and how they looked out for each other in so many respects. You talk about him goading her; she used to goad him pretty good, too.
Smith: She could zing.

Fisher: Absolutely. But I watched my mom do that with my father, and they were the only ones that could do that, by the way. So I think that that would surprise people as how really close they are. They knew how each other was thinking.

Smith: You wonder – it’s purely speculative – whether he felt any degree of guilt over all those years when he was coming up the ladder and he was on the road as much as he was. And she was already beginning to experience some problems. Not unlike a lot of American women in her generation. In some ways she is such a representative figure.

Fisher: Unbelievable. So much so that my mother’s situation, and my mother’s alcoholism, was very similar. So, I grew up with that in my home. I really do know how Susan…but hers was so public, my mother’s wasn’t so public, and I think that, yes, she was representative of a generation of women. She used to stand up for ERA. I’ll never forget that choice.

Smith: Remember the famous Sixty Minutes interview.

Fisher: Oh!

Smith: When you look at the transcript of that interview – I said years later, “Hillary Clinton could not say this today in the White House, what Betty Ford said a generation ago.”

Fisher: Well, and also because it wasn’t a twenty-four hour news cycle where you heard it over and over and over and over again. She was very outspoken, and maybe part of that was…I think that that kept – I look at my mother doing stuff like that, too. And it kept my father very interested. I think that there is a piece of “you know, I know how to say this, and I’m going to keep…” That was part of their relationship. To me, watching them was just as much fun.

Smith: Well, and clearly, he was so proud of her.

Fisher: Oh, no question.
Smith: The stories about every year the Betty Ford Center would have a big alumni weekend, and he’d be there cooking hot dogs – just part of the scene. She got the Medal of Freedom years before he got the Medal of Freedom. Well, again, he was just so willing to, in some ways, submerge his own identity, celebrity, whatever, in her causes.

Fisher: Oh, absolutely. There’s no question that this was about her, a lot of it was about her. And that’s where I thought they were so – you don’t want to say a President and a First Lady were cute – it was adorable. It was heartwarming. And you say: is there anything that you would want to say that people wouldn’t understand, or wouldn’t know about them? I think that’s one of the things that people wouldn’t know about them, is that incredible heart connection.

Smith: Last thing, how do you think each one of them should be remembered?

Fisher: Oh, I’m grateful that he’s being remembered as having done the right thing, to me. And Betty, oh, well, as affecting the disease of alcoholism and women and breast cancer - but for me, personally, her legacy is large. She took risks - that perhaps being a president, he took a risk, obviously, with the pardon and things like that – but she took risks on a social level, on a personal level, on a family level. And so, to me, I always talk about her when I’m giving speeches. She’s my mentor and I always think, what would she tell me about this? How should I handle this? Because she was the one that really pulled me along to help me make a difference in the world. And so, for her, her legacy is very large for me and my life. I can’t even think about her being gone. I don’t want to think of it. Sorry.

Smith: No, you just wonder, again though, in the last few years – I don’t know if you’ve seen it – one of the best things Ken Burns ever did was his documentary about Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton. It’s called, “Not for Ourselves Alone,” and it’s very moving. In fact, I gave it to her for Christmas last year.
Elizabeth Cady Stanton, in the last years of her life, had actually been repudiated by the National Women’s Organization that she had founded because she had written the Women’s Bible, which was a characteristically audacious, bold, editing of the Bible to remove some of the patriarchy. And Susan B. Anthony was put in this impossible position where she defended her friend, but it wasn’t enough to keep her from being censured by the organization. Anyway, in the last years of her life, she really withdrew, but the last speech she gave, she wrote this extraordinary thing. If you’ve not seen it, you should read it. It’s called the Solitude of Self, in which she talks about particularly, women in their later years. And that in the end, whatever one’s gender, and however much we might like to sentimentalize to the contrary, each one of us is alone. Each one of is on his or her own. And it’s clearly about aging, and aging well. But anyway, it’s a remarkable essay, and I thought about it in connection with Mrs. Ford.

Fisher: And it’s an essay?

Smith: It’s an essay by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, it’s a speech, called The Solitude of Self.

Fisher: Okay. Interesting.

Smith: Anything else that we haven’t…we’ve covered a lot.

Fisher: Well, you know the regular kind of people that it looks like we have president and first lady? That’s the kind of regular person Jerry Ford was. It’s interesting to me to kind of – I know history will draw this and I won’t be around, but there’s a lot about this president that is very much like Jerry Ford.

Smith: I also thought there was a connection. Again, when the president died, and the reaction – and some of it was “the country needed to feel good about itself at that point.” But a lot of it also reinforced what I think Obama had already caught on to, which was: contrary to conventional thinking, we weren’t a 50-50 country. There was a large center, there was a very large number of Americans, if not a majority, who wanted to get serious, who didn’t care about ideology as much as about practical problem solving, who wanted civility restored to the public square, all of those things that President Ford represented, and for which he sometimes took heat from the increasingly strident right wing.

I will never forget, at the time of the Monica Lewinski madness, we collaborated, I worked with him on it, an OpEd piece that appeared in the New York Times in which he proposed, short of impeachment, as he put it, a unique punishment for a unique offense. The idea was to have the president appear before a joint session of Congress, nationally televised, stand in the well of the House; be formally rebuked by both houses of Congress; not say anything; and then the country could get back to business. And people would have felt that, you know what, Congress rose to the occasion instead of sinking to the occasion. The president accepted it manfully.

It would have been a dignified way out of a very undignified situation. And he took more heat for that from the right wing, especially. But of course, subsequently, I learned that when it first appeared the White House was willing to grab it like manna from Heaven, and the Republicans in the House committee didn’t want to go along. Well, then a month later came along the mid-term elections in which, of course, the Republicans lost, and all of a sudden they wanted to dust off Jerry Ford’s proposal. At that point the White House was feeling its oats. But it’s a classic case of, if only people had been able to look beyond their immediate emotional, partisan, irrationality, and thought about what was good, not only for the country, but frankly what was good for them in the long run, instead of just playing to the base.

Fisher: But that’s how he always thought. Look, it’s the same thing with the pardon. Actually, it’s the same.

Smith: It’s exactly the same. Putting your country first, even if you take a hit.

Fisher: Right.

Smith: This has been wonderful. Thank you.

Fisher: Thank you.

Smith: One name that is a legend locally, for better or worse, is Frank McKay. Who was Frank McKay?

DeJonge: Frank McKay started his political career as the circuit court assignment clerk in the old County Building. Frank made a lot of friends from local attorneys – big attorneys. In the course of time these people owed Frank favors. Frank just used that office as a stepping stone to form his own political organization. One of the guys that he not only promoted, but saw elected was Bartel Jonkman, known locally as Barney Jonkman. Barney Jonkman served in Congress for a number of years. When the war ended it was Jerry Ford, who I had never met, Jerry Ford was backed by the Home Front group: Paul Goebel, former mayor, as you know, of Grand Rapids - wonderful person; Doc Ver Meulen, a local dentist – these guys are all dead. The ones who really got behind Jerry Ford.

Smith: The Home Front - I’m trying to make this connection between the opposition to the MacKay organization – was that part of this?

DeJonge: Absolutely, and they worked hard to take the power away from Frank MacKay and his representative in Washington, Barney Jonkman.

Smith: How much power did MacKay have?

DeJonge: A lot. Frank MacKay was on trial in the Detroit area, I believe, for murder. The story is that he hired the Purple Gang out of Detroit to murder a state senator – I can’t remember his name – who was to testify before a grand jury. The day before he was called to testify, he was on his way to Detroit and he was shot and killed. They felt that - nobody was able to prove it – that Frank MacKay was behind that murder and that he had been in contact with the Purple Gang to conduct the murder. So they were totally in opposition to Frank MacKay. These people that I mentioned, Paul Goebel and Doc Ver Meulen, these were persons who, in Grand Rapids, were highly respected, who hated the fact that MacKay had taken control of the Republican party in Kent County and beyond. Frank MacKay, the story is – and I’m sure it’s true, got a kickback from every sack of cement that went into that bridge in Port Huron – and became a very wealthy man.

I even got a threatening letter one time from him. He had a county supervisor in Plainfield Township who was under his thumb. I heard that this person had zoned all of Frank MacKay’s land in Plainfield Township – now the city of Walker. He zoned it agriculture and it was residential. Frank MacKay paid about ten dollars a year in taxes. I heard about that and I wrote a series of two stories. Jay Smith was the name of the supervisor. I exposed it in the paper and I got a letter from Frank MacKay and I have one regret – that I didn’t save the letter. There was a veiled threat that if I didn’t lay off – blah blah blah – which I didn’t take seriously and I tossed the letter. I wish I’d kept it. So, anyway, that’s how strong he was.

Smith: Did he hold court? MacKay Tower – was that his office?

DeJonge: Yeah. One of the deskmen at the Grand Rapids Press, Fred Baker, at the time was the business reporter, went to see Frank MacKay. He wanted a car – this was during the war – and MacKay said, “What kind do you want?” He was interested in an Oldsmobile. This was on a Saturday. Frank MacKay called the Oldsmobile plant and he said, “There will be a man by the name of Fred Baker at such and such a gate on Saturday. Have a car ready for him.” The car was there. There was no mention of cost, but Fred was an honest man and did pay for that car. But I mean, that’s how much power – these cars were rationed – you couldn’t buy a car, as you know during World War II. I had to wait until I got back from overseas – I had my name in two places for a car – I waited two years. Frank MacKay got it within a matter of a few days.

Smith: What was the source of his power?

DeJonge: Looking back, it had to be that so many people were indebted to him for favors that he did over the years.
Smith: Now when did Vandenberg fit into all this, because he’d been a newspaperman and apparently enjoyed the support of the organization early on. Of course, by ’48, when Ford ran for Congress, I assume that he’d broken – I mean Vandenberg supported Ford against Jonkman.

DeJonge: Oh yeah. Well, Vandenberg was with the group of Paul Goebel and Doc Ver Meulen and would naturally have been supportive of Jerry Ford’s efforts. Let me backtrack. I said Fred Baker wanted the car – while Fred was talking to MacKay in his office, the phone rang, and it was a friend. The friend, Fred said “I could only hear one voice – MacKay’s” – he said, “You need a car?” “Yes,” and then it was the car that MacKay got for this friend of his, while Fred Baker was sitting there listening to the conversation, with no mention made of cost.

Smith: That’s power.

DeJonge: Yeah.

Smith: Tell me, when Ford came back from the war – what had his father’s role been in the local political scene? He apparently was quite active.

DeJonge: Yes, he was. I knew him only for a short time because I joined the paper when I graduated from the Calvin College in June of ’50. At that time, my first year at the Press, I was assigned to cover the Grand Rapids Board of Education and the Kent Intermediate School District. I did that for one year and then the person who was covering politics was moved over to city hall and the city editor and the managing editor and the editor appointed me to cover politics starting in 1951, August. I covered that until just about the day I left the Press to become Kent County Clerk and Register of Deeds. That was in with the death of Jack Bronkema, who was the Clerk Registrar and that was 1979, November.

Smith: Tell us about Jerry Ford, Sr. What was he like? It has become clear talking to people and reading what the President himself had to say, that his father was the biggest single influence in his life.
Maury DeJonge  August 8, 2008

DeJonge: Jerry Ford, Sr., if you didn’t know who his son was, and later met Jerry Ford, Jr. – you would think that was his natural father - his biological father, because they were so similar. Jerry Ford, Sr. was well respected all through Kent County. He was chairman at the time I started covering politics of the Kent County Republican Committee - for a short time, possibly a year, or not more than two. Then I lost track of Senior and my introduction to Jerry Ford, Jr. began.

Smith: Did you know his mother at all - Dorothy?

DeJonge: Yes, I did. I met her, really, only one time, but it was memorable because Jerry had been elected Minority Leader of the House. He defeated Charley Halleck from Indiana. He was in town to visit his mother – he had a local office, too – and I heard that Jerry was going to have breakfast with his mother in the Waters Building, which is on Fulton. I got in touch with Jerry and I said, “Jerry, can I bring a camera to your mother’s apartment and have breakfast with you?” He said, “Oh, absolutely, Maury.” And so I came with our photographer Ralph Truax, who is dead now. His mother was like a mother hen over Jerry. Here he was now, the Minority Leader of the House of Representatives and she said to him, “Now Jerry, don’t work too hard.” And he said, “I won’t, Mother.” Just that simple exchange. She was, in my impression, a very kind person – a person who was just in love with her natural son and it was a good relationship – very strong – you could feel it.

Smith: This may be speculative, so I preface it with that. In ’48 he took on Jonkman and that was also the year that he first proposed to and then married Betty. And over the years – it’s a little murky – the sequence of events where he proposed to her but said he couldn’t set a date, and he couldn’t really say why he couldn’t set a date. The story was – the public story was – he wanted to take Jonkman by surprise, and so he couldn’t tell her what his political plans were. The alternate story is – and we’ve heard it from a number of people – given the sort of cultural conservatism of this area – he probably thought twice about letting it be known that he was going to marry a divorcee before the Republican primary. Is that something that could have, in fact, turned off some voters?
DeJonge: Yes, it could have, because – and times have changed – but back in ’48 I was a junior in college and if you were divorced, you were almost without a name, particularly in the Dutch Reform churches. And Catholics weren’t fond of divorce, either. But divorce was rare with many of the Dutch voters and church members in Grand Rapids. The churches’ rules were pretty stiff on that.

Smith: For the people who don’t know Michigan and they hear about the Dutch – explain who the Dutch were and what their impact was on the local culture and politics.

DeJonge: It was considerable although the Dutch kind of stayed away from politics. Politics – it wasn’t dirty – but it wasn’t real nice. So they kind of stayed away from it. But their influence was great because the ones that came to this area of west Michigan were hard working. Many of them farmers. Many of them skilled factory workers. The Dutch had a thing that if your father was a baker, you would be a baker. If your father was a farmer, you would be a farmer. I remember in my sociology class, my sociology professor said the most clannish people in the world are Jews. Next, right behind are the Dutch. If you weren’t Dutch, they didn’t warm up to you right away.

Smith: I assume the impact would show itself - there was nothing open on a Sunday in this town.

DeJonge: No, and they didn’t buy the Sunday paper. The one they should have not bought was Monday’s because that was being printed on Sunday. I knew a former commissioner from the city of Wyoming who would go to the drugstore on Saturday night, buy a Sunday paper and have them put it in a brown paper bag as he walked home. But that has all changed and there are people who still feel the Dutch are that conservative yet, but it’s not true. We have, I would say, a dozen or more divorced persons in my Christian Reformed Church. And we just had a nice sermon Sunday on Sunday observance. Far different than when I was growing up. I had a friend, we were at a cottage on Silver Lake up by Hart, and his kids were with him and my two children – a girl and a boy. We let them swim on Sunday. His kids – four boys – asked if they could go swimming. His dad said, “You can go up to your knees, but don’t splash.” True story.

Smith: That’s wonderful. That’s local color. Ford was a real fiscal conservative, there’s no doubt about that. But it is interesting, because at one point I believe the story is true: there were people in and around Grand Rapids, when he was on the House Appropriations Committee - in particular the Defense sub-committee - and they wanted to get a military base for this area. Thought it would be a great boon for their community and – what’s the point of having a Congressman on those committees – and he strongly discouraged that, because he thought it was not a stable base for the area economy. Just too subject to boom and bust and all of that. That shows some courage, to say no to your friends who come to you asking for what seems to them perfectly logical.

DeJonge: They brought a weather school in. A weather school, but the numbers were almost insignificant. But some of those guys, the soldiers who were assigned to the weather school, met and married nice Dutch girls. But the numbers were not significant. But you talk about courage – that’s Ford’s middle name. Look at the courage he showed when he pardoned Nixon.

Smith: What was the local reaction when that happened?

DeJonge: There were many against it, there were many for it. I would say, probably, more at the time were against that pardon. As a newspaper person, I favored it – it was time. And I have had several interviews with Ford on that subject.

Smith: You know, it is interesting - he said, everywhere he went, that was always the first question people asked, until November, 2001, when the Kennedy Library gave him the Profiles of Courage Award for the pardon. And he said, after that, people didn’t ask the question. It was almost as if the page had been turned.

DeJonge: Is that right? Well, look what’s happened now. People who never spoke kindly about President Ford, and I’m talking about the national media, now they say, it was a great move that took a lot of courage. Ford, in his death, has risen in the eyes of the national media.
Smith: It is interesting – that week I was wearing two hats. I was working for ABC for most of the week and then I was back here with the family, and it was very clear that the media was taken aback by the reaction, and it seemed to grow as the week went along. My theory, in part was, you had a lot of young people who were being introduced to Ford for the first time. It is sort of like when Harry Truman died, and they were contrasting what they were seeing with what they had come to expect in the last couple of presidencies and they liked what they saw. I think that fed into this kind of instant reassessment of Ford – what kind of man he was – what kind of president he was – and all of a sudden, he seemed awfully attractive as an alternative to the kind of ugly partisanship that pervades politics today.

DeJonge: You know, I’m not sure we ever had a Congressman before Ford like Ford, and I’m not sure we ever will have another.

Smith: What kind of Congressman was he?

DeJonge: He was a guy, if he met you one time, he would never forget your name. So you felt a kinship with this guy. Jerry and I had a close relationship. Very close. It was this relationship he carried on even with persons he was meeting for the first time. By the time they finished talking with Jerry, they felt they had a friend, and he would never forget their name. I said to him one time, this was after he was president, I said, “Jerry, how in the world can you keep up a schedule like this and still be very lucid and everything about you is very calm.” He said, “I have the ability – I can tell my staff, even if I’m on Air Force One, I’m going to take a fifteen minute nap. Wake me up.” He said, “I can go to sleep, in fifteen minutes wake me up – I’m ready to go.” That’s not me – no way.

Smith: He liked people – you can’t fake it. You can’t fake a career - liking and caring about other people.

DeJonge: In the years that I covered politics I met more phonies in my life and there are more phonies than there are genuine people. Jerry was genuine, you felt it the first time you met him and it never faded. This guy was so real it’s unbelievable. I tell you, when Jerry died I shed tears. When I retired I got as many letters from Democrats complimenting me for having a decent attitude toward both parties. As a matter of fact, when I was appointed county clerk by the Sixth Circuit Court judges, because I had covered county government as well, the secretary of the Michigan Republicans came in my office – Hank Fuhs. He said, “Maury, I’m going to have to ask you a question. You’ve covered politics all these years and the judges have appointed you. As a party, I have to ask you, are you a Republican or a Democrat?” I said, “Henry, you have just paid me the ultimate compliment if you had to ask what I am.” I have been a closet Republican all my life, and it goes back to my dad and his dad. But I considered that a compliment.

Smith: Very complimentary. Ford as a young man had a temper and worked very hard, with the help of his mother, to overcome it. Did you ever see his temper?

DeJonge: I asked him that. I said, “Jerry, have you ever really been angry since you have been in Congress?” He said, “One time. A guy came in my office and Anna Kampstra, who you are going to be interviewing, Anna Kampstra sent him in, and [he] was offering me a bribe.” He said, “Immediately – my temper soared, I said you’ve got fifteen seconds to get out of my office and never come back - that’s the only time I had anger.” Ford always said he could disagree with his opponents in the House without becoming disagreeable, and that’s what he achieved.

Smith: Clearly, very early – almost from his arrival – in the House, say by contrast with people like Jack Kennedy or Richard Nixon, it was pretty clear their ambitions were elsewhere and it seemed pretty clear Ford wanted to make his career in the House. That was going to be his venue and the old Bulls who ran the place pretty quickly took notice of this young guy who wasn’t flashy, wasn’t eloquent, but who did his homework – who worked harder than anyone else, who asked smarter questions than anyone else – and then they began singling him out for choice assignments within a few years of his arrival in DC.

DeJonge: No question. I observed him – my wife and my two children were with me – and he was Minority Leader and the people in Grand Rapids didn’t - I don’t think they realized how much power Ford had. Not wicked power – good, honest to goodness power. And when he entered the floor of the Chamber, the Congressmen just huddled around him to get their marching orders. And that opened my eyes. I knew Ford, but when I saw the respect that his peers were giving him once he called the meeting to order there on the House floor, it was something to see.

Smith: That raises a sensitive issue – the whole question of his intelligence. There were the gags about him bumbling and stumbling and all that sort of thing. Tell me about his mind, not his IQ. Tell me about his smarts.

DeJonge: He was so much smarter than what he was given credit for or he would have never gone as far as he did. Even to the appointment of vice president. I was there that night when Ford was in his home – there was a light rain falling – and the neighbors had gathered around his house. He came out and he spoke to them in the same way he would speak to you or me, in such a humble way.

I had given a speech to public administrators of the country from the big corporations. They were going to get Stewart Alsop, but Alsop died and so someone told this group about me and my relationship with Ford and they contacted me and I went and I took my son. When I finished my speech I had made arrangements with Ford to meet him in the Vice Presidential office, which was very impressive because his office in Grand Rapids was small.

Smith: Where was his office?

DeJonge: In Grand Rapids? It was on Cherry, on the north side of Cherry where it takes a bend to go on toward downtown. Small office. There was a Marine guard at the first floor. I told him I had an appointment with Vice President Ford, so he ushered me upstairs, and his secretary served me a cup of coffee on Vice Presidential china and I thought, “Hot Dog!” In a matter of five minutes she said, “you may go in Mr. DeJonge.” I went in and Jerry was sitting at his great big desk a mile and a half away, and he said, “Maury, welcome.” I said, “Jerry, this is scary,” and he says, “Why?” I said, “It’s all so different. You’re Vice President, you’re in this huge office.” He said, “Maury, nothing has changed – remember that.” That was Ford – didn’t change when he became president. It kind of surprised me. I knew Nixon was a friend, and Ford was a friend of Nixon, but I didn’t realize that they were so close that Nixon would appoint him in his retirement or vacancy.

I was there when he was sworn in – heard his inaugural speech. Went in – I wasn’t supposed to go in the room – but these high rollers from Congress and Senate didn’t know me, and so when they went into this big room for a little reception, I went in like I was one of them. I had an interview with Chief Justice Berger. I told him who I was, I was a reporter for the Grand Rapids Press, and he looked at me and he said, “I usually don’t give interviews to reporters, but since you’re from the new president’s hometown I’ll make an exception.” So I had a nice interview with him.

Smith: This was right after the swearing in?

DeJonge: Right after the swearing in.

Smith: What was Berger’s mood?

DeJonge: He sounded very, very happy that Nixon was gone and Ford was in. It didn’t take long for people to realize – those who really studied this guy – to appreciate who he was, how honest he was. I have yet to hear, other than Democrats who didn’t vote for him, say well, he’s a lousy speaker and – and he was not a spellbinder. Just like this guy we’re dealing with now, Obama. You know, he makes McCain look kind of sick. McCain was looking down at his notes all the time and Obama was free as a bird in his speeches. But it didn’t take long for people to really come to, not only appreciate, but to love Jerry Ford.

Smith: And yet the public didn’t ‘get it’ in those two and half years, and going back to what you said earlier, it wasn’t until his death that people got this more vivid sense of who he really was. David Broder wrote, it was too late for the American people to finally realize, this was the kind of guy we want, we say we want, for president, but we didn’t know it at the time. We didn’t appreciate it.
DeJonge: That’s right. I sat next to David Broder when Ford made his announcement that he had chosen Bob Dole. Before he came out on the platform, Broder said to me, “You’re from Grand Rapids?” I said, “Yeah.” He said, “Do you have any idea who is he going to appoint?” I said no, absolutely not. It was a surprise to everyone when he picked Bob Dole, because you know the reputation Bob Dole had. I asked Ford that question in one of my interviews with him at his home in Rancho Mirage. If you will just give me a second because that question, I think – here it is.

“What was your reasoning in selecting Senator Dole as your running mate in 1976?” This interview was January, 1979. “Had you asked others before going to Dole?” Answer: “We had gone through a rather extensive process in putting together a list of about ten or twelve names. We had our polling people, as I recall, take about fifteen names. We had an in depth poll nationwide. After those results came back, we whittled it down and we then checked and double-checked with party leaders, with other individuals in and out of the White House. When we got down to the night after my nomination in Kansas City, as I recall, we had about five names and we talked and discussed the pluses and minuses of the five people. The next morning, bright and early, we went over the list again, and on the basis of that process, I selected Bob Dole. It wasn’t an easy job, and we tried to do it as objectively as possible. When we concluded the campaign, I think Bob Dole did for the ticket what I felt had to be done.” I said, “Were you ever sorry over the choice?” Answer: “I never regretted the choice. I think Bob Dole’s part on the ticket, which was aimed at helping to get the southern team, western states, he achieved that result. We did it with the exception of one state, Texas.”

Smith: You said you were at the ’76 convention Talk about the ’76 convention. Going into that convention, was it still uncertain as to the outcome?

DeJonge: You bet. Practically until the last state was called we were not sure that Reagan wouldn’t be the – and we had guys from Kent County who were supportive of Reagan.

Smith: Talk about that.
DeJonge: One of them worked with a stocks and bonds outfit in the Waterville Building. I used to argue with him. I said, what in the world, why are you for Reagan, who is running against Ford from Grand Rapids, who is the vice president – now president? He said, I just think Reagan would be a better man – and he voted that way at the convention. So there were some Kent County supporters for Reagan and it wasn’t until that last state, and I can’t recall, that we were absolutely sure. Nancy Reagan tried to steal the show by going into a dance – and the delegates thought that was wonderful. Betty decided, oh no, she’s not getting away with that. Betty got up and she was a pro dancer, and Betty outdid her and everybody clapped longer. It didn’t hurt.

Smith: Tell me, did you get to know Mrs. Ford?

DeJonge: Oh man, did I know Betty.

Smith: Tell us about Betty Ford – because they would seem to be opposites attracting.

DeJonge: Let me show you a couple of pictures that will tell you. There’s me and Betty and Sheila Weidenfeld, her secretary. Here was the day before the election in ’76, Ford gave a farewell speech at the airport in which he broke down. I have that on tape, which I did not bring. He said, “All that I am, I owe to my father, Gerald R. Ford, Sr., and my mother Dorothy Ford.” And then he broke down. I’m telling you, just about everybody in there – it was a good crowd there – just about everybody cried.

Smith: That’s when they were dedicating the mural.

DeJonge: Yeah. See, I was in Vail when Paul Collins did the painting. Paul Collins, while I was interviewing Ford in the chalet where he was staying, was doing drawings. Then when he got back to Grand Rapids, he finished those drawings as you see now. But, you asked about Betty.

Smith: Yeah. Tell us, because she would seem to be something of a free spirit.

DeJonge: Yeah, she was good for Ford.

Smith: Tell us about that.
DeJonge: I started to tell you, this was at the tarmac at Kent County Airport the day before the election – or the day of the election in ’76. Ford was saying goodbye and this picture, this also of Ford and Betty.

Smith: They look to be in very good spirits. Do you have a sense of what their mood was about the prospects for the election?

DeJonge: I think Ford had closed the gap so fast at the end and it is just a turkey’s shame that he wasn’t elected. He would have made a fine president.

Smith: Do you have a sense of what his mood really was at that point, in terms of their expectations?

DeJonge: I don’t think that Ford was surprised he lost. He felt it deeply, no question about that. And he did a very kind thing for me. The day he left the White House to go to California with Betty, he called me from the White House and I wrote a story on his reaction. He said it hurts to lose. Ford just wasn’t used to losing – whether he played football or whether he was in politics, he wasn’t used to losing, but he was gracious in his defeat. As you know, he and Carter became close friends.

Smith: Let’s go back – I really would love to hear you talk about Betty. Tell us about Betty Ford.

DeJonge: Ford always credited Betty. In his failure to be present when the kids were growing up, he always said, “That job fell on Betty and I’m sorry for that – I was gone most of the time.” Betty accepted that role because she was so in love with the guy. I don’t think she had a bitter moment in her relationship and marriage with Jerry Ford. I really feel that. I got to know Betty and stuff like this wouldn’t happen.

Smith: She was very unlike him, wasn’t she?

DeJonge: She came from a modeling career – she came from a professional dancing career. Ford was none of these. Ford was just such a downright, likeable, honest person – the words fail you – the guy – we won’t see him again.
Smith: She also had – it’s sort of legendary – she had a sense of humor that she didn’t hesitate to poke fun at him.

DeJonge: Yeah, I can’t say I ever heard her poke fun of Jerry. When he came to Grand Rapids, if Betty was not with him, he would always say, “Betty sends her love.” It got to be kind of a joke between myself and a reporter from the Grand Rapids Herald, Jim Mudge, who later worked for Ford. I’d say, “Betty sends her love,” and pretty soon Jerry would say, “Betty sends her love.” It got to be kind of a joke, but that’s how much these two people thought of each other. She was beautiful.

Smith: Her interest in clothes and her interest in the arts were on a level with Jackie Kennedy’s. Unlike Mrs. Kennedy, she’d actually had a career – she had been a dancer. Martha Graham was her teacher and you can’t get much more involved in the arts than that. This must have been a bit of shock to the Dutch Calvinists - the Calder sculpture. How did that burst upon the scene?

DeJonge: There was a county commissioner, a friend of mine by the name of Bob Blandford. Bob was a city commissioner and because he held that office he was a member of the Board of Supervisors, which at that time was seventy-seven members. Bob Blandford was a guy who never kept his mouth shut and I think on his second meeting on the Board of Supervisors he stood up and made a speech. Old John Collins, who ruled the roost on the board, never fully stood up, he would half-stand up and he said, “Mr. Blandford, you have to be a member of this board for two years before you’re allowed to say a word.” But that didn’t shut Bob up. Blandford was the guy who fought that Calder and he gave me lots of stories in his criticism of the Calder. But Stuart Hoffius, who was the senior circuit court judge and who asked me to become county clerk. Stuart Hoffius and a very beautiful blond lady – now I won’t be able to remember her name - I think Alexander Calder fell in love with her because she was very pretty – she pushed it and Stuart Hoffius also was impressed with this lovely lady. They won out and Blandford kept up his attack for all it was worth. They had to cover $25,000 worth of plumbing – they were going to have a fountain in the plaza and the plumbing was in and covered with concrete. They had to dig it all up to put the Calder in. But the community has accepted it because there are visitors who come to see the Calder.

Smith: The Calder was funded with federal funds – the National Endowment for the Arts and Humanities?

DeJonge: Yeah, and that was Blandford’s opposition - that it could be spent more wisely. Oh he had all sorts of names for it – piece of junk - and then the art lovers in Grand Rapids and Kent County were mad at Bob Blandford for the names he called it.

Smith: I think Ford himself didn’t know what Calder was, but he since grew to appreciate it. In fact, Sandy Calder posthumously received the Medal of Freedom from the Ford White House.

DeJonge: I have to admit, I had never heard of Alexander Calder in my life, either. Got to meet him because he would come often to see how the work was progressing. The thing is painted Calder red – they named a special color after him. But it was a tough time – many were opposed to it, many wanted the fountain, but Blandford lost and Stuart Hoffius and this pretty lady succeeded.

Smith: Is Stuart Hoffius still around?

DeJonge: I asked that same question about a week ago and someone told me they think is, but he might have Alzheimer’s.

Smith: One thing to give a backdrop to Ford’s political career - tell us about the time when Grand Rapids had more than one newspaper.

DeJonge: We had the Grand Rapids Herald. It always was second-best to the Press, I think, and this is only my thought. The Herald had a Sunday paper. A lot of the conservatives, many of the Dutch, did not subscribe to the Herald daily, because they had a Sunday paper. The Herald slowly saw their circulation die down until finally Booth Newspapers, owner of the Press, Saganon News, Bay City News, Muskegon, bought them out. We hired some of their best people in the newsroom. Werner Veit became not only the editor, he became publisher of Booth Newspapers. We got the good ones. Bill Bolls, our city editor, he came aboard – nicer guy never lived. Jim Mudge went with Ford for a short time. He was a good guy. We hired John Hormuth. John Hormuth was a fighter pilot in World War II. Wonderful, wonderful person. He was our Sunday editor. The Press was pretty fussy about who they hired. I remember I applied as soon as I came back from Italy and I didn’t have a suit of clothes. You couldn’t buy a suit. In my uniform, I went to see Mr. Woodruff. He said how much education? I said high school. He said you have to be a college grad to work for the Press. He said you go get your college degree, come back and see me. He didn’t think he’d see me. I went to college on the GI Bill, got my degree and I was hired. Not by Mr. Woodruff, but by Mr. Kesterson who was the managing editor. Very English in his appearance – nice, nice guy. And I had some of the best assignments of any reporter. They sent me to the Netherlands for the dedication of the airport at Amsterdam Schiphol – and covered local, state, and national conventions. I say to my wife, “Really I had a great career at the paper.”

Smith: What was the local reaction when he left office and went out to California? Were there people here who were upset about that?

DeJonge: Yeah. They said, here he lived in Grand Rapids most of his life, except in his infancy, and now that he’s been president…and I brought that up to Ford in one of my interviews out there with him and he said, “Well, Maury, I know that some people are upset,” he said, “but I did it for a couple of reasons. Number one, for Betty’s health.” He said, “That’s important.” And he said he liked California. We were walking to his home from his office which was the former home of the dancer, Ginger Rogers, and we stopped. The sun was going down behind the mountains. He said, “Maury, do you get an idea now why we moved to California?” I said, “Jerry, you don’t have to apologize to me. I understand.” Then we went in the house and Betty was sitting at her desk. She was on the telephone, and she nodded. He then showed me through his house – his weight room and his swimming pool and stuff.

I had given a speech on Ford to the Breakfast Club of Grand Rapids, and I sent a copy of that speech to Ford. He called me and said, “Maury, the next time you are in the desert,” – he always called it the desert – “you and Theta stop in for coffee or for breakfast.” We go there in February. So I called him up after about three days and said, “Jerry, we are in Palm Springs.” He said, “Ah, good. What are you doing tomorrow?” I said, “Waiting for your phone call.” When I got there Bob Barrett, his go-to man, and his secretary Penny Circle, were there. She said, “Maury, Jerry had to go to the hospital to get a shot – he did something to his hip.” So I said, “We’ll wait.” She said, “He’s expected anytime.”

We waited about fifteen minutes. He came in the door and he said, “Maury, I’m so sorry, but I must have rolled over in bed wrong last night and I did something to my hip and we went to the Eisenhower Hospital and they gave me a shot of cortisone.” I said, “Jerry, you don’t have to apologize to me.” So then we went in his office.

He liked to visit with old friends and talk about people he knew and knows yet – in the past. An hour went by and we were just coffee drinking and talking and I said, “Jerry, we’ve been here an hour and taking way too much of your time.” He said, “Maury, I like to meet with old friends.” I said, “But we are leaving now.” But that’s how gracious he was. I can’t say enough about that guy.

Smith: Did you see him at other times in the White House during his presidency? You mentioned the day he became president.

DeJonge: The only time I saw him in the White House was at his inauguration. I called him when I had a suspicion that he was going to be named the vice president. I said, “Jerry, I would like to come to Washington to interview you.” He let the cat out of the bag, really. He said, “Maury, you know in Cedar Springs they always have this Red Flannel Parade.” He said, “I’m going to be in Cedar Springs tomorrow for the parade – come see me there.” And I thought, why is he coming to Cedar Springs, is he going to be the vice president? It was going through my mind – and that’s what happened. Our county treasurer, John Damstra, had a real fancy sports car convertible and John liked to show it off. He was in the parade and he said to Ford – “Ride with me!” Ford said, “No, I’m walking this parade.” He walked the whole parade with me at his side and then we went into, I call it a barn, and we had a chicken dinner together and I got my interview with him.
Smith: And this was the day after he had been nominated for the vice presidency?

DeJonge: I wrote a story on that. Cedar Springs never saw so many people. They were hanging out of the windows. I think I remember that town had 6,100 people – that was its population. In the article I said nobody knows how many people were there – they were in the thousands. Because here was Ford now, no longer their Congressman, now their vice president. He had a red vest on instead of red flannel. And oh, they went nuts.

Smith: But he was unchanged.

DeJonge: Unchanged. Never changed. Like I say, we visited him in Vail.

Smith: Tell me about that.

DeJonge: That’s where Paul did his drawings. Paul Collins. Paul sat up here, up on a stoop and Jerry had the worst looking – oops – I’d better not say it.

Smith: That jacket? That plaid jacket. Tell me about it.

DeJonge: With plaid pants! And they were double-knit and everybody who – I had that picture in here and everybody who I showed that to, they say, “Look at the way he’s dressed!” But anyway, we had a great interview. He was so kind and Susan came walking down the way or she was on a bike. But I’m going to show you that picture. You will really – but he looked putz – Ford always looked putz.

Smith: Where did he get his fashion sense? Not from Betty.

DeJonge: No – he had a – here is Bill Simon – remember him?

Smith: Yup.

DeJonge: He came to Grand Rapids. He and I went swimming together at the convention. Okay – here it is.

Smith: The proverbial picture worth ten thousand words. Now, that couldn’t have been Betty’s fashion sense.
DeJonge: No, he used a local tailor whose office was on Ottawa and Lyon and he was a well-known tailor in Grand Rapids. But Jerry had his own style and I remember he made a sport coat for him – it was terrible, but Jerry liked it so he made it. One of our photographers, Jay Abbott and I, we snuck a note in the inside pocket of his new sport coat.

Smith: What did the note say?

DeJonge: Something about the coat – I don’t remember.

Smith: Not complimentary.

DeJonge: No and he answered, jokingly. I could never make him mad. Very few people could.

Smith: How much of that was the 70’s and how much of that was Jerry Ford’s sense of fashion. Because, let’s face it, people who look back now, we’re all embarrassed at what people wore in the 70’s.

DeJonge: Oh, I am, too, the stuff I remember.

Smith: Leisure suits.

DeJonge: And everything was double-knit because it didn’t wrinkle and they were homely, ugly stuff. I had a pair of black and white shoes - oh terrible – oh everyone dressed terribly back then. Jerry didn’t have a corner on poor dress.

Smith: One senses Mrs. Ford kind of looked out for him in later years. “You’re not going to wear that suit.”

DeJonge: I’m sure, because when they dedicated this place, Bill Gill, who was the news director for WOTV and myself were appointed the people to welcome the visiting journalists from all over – Japan, China, Germany. We had to credential every one of them. It was a big, big job. We did it and we got compliments from Ford on it. The picture that was taken, the Prime Minister of Canada, Ronald Reagan, George Bush, Sr., down the line, beautiful picture. I’ve saved that.

Smith: Is Bill Gill still around?
Maury DeJonge  August 8, 2008

DeJonge: I saw Bill about a year ago. One of the guys from our paper died and I went to the funeral chapel and saw Bill for the first time in many years. Bill and I were always close. We were competitors in a way, but newspapers can’t compete with television, which can give you instant news, but we can do a better job. You can go back tomorrow and read it again. You can’t do that with television or radio. Still, newspapers are losing readers – even the Times.

I’ve got to tell this, when Ford was appointed vice president there came the media – New York Times, Boston Globe, Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune, and all of them were told by Republican headquarters, “Go see Maury.” And so there they’d come to the Press. I’d treat them to coffee on the third floor. They were all looking for junk – all looking for the worst thing they could find on Jerry Ford. I’ll never forget the guy from CBS, I can’t remember his name – he’s no longer with them, his parting words to me were, “This guy couldn’t have been an Eagle Scout all his life.” I said to him, “If you find anything on Jerry Ford, you come back and tell me.” And he walked out.

They all left empty-handed – every one of them. Nobody found a thing. Even the FBI was in here and they hid in the closet when I walked into Republican headquarters, as I did routinely, just to make myself known and available. The secretary said, “Oh here comes Maury, don’t let him see you.” The FBI hid in the closet. I found that out from her later. But they all had garbage on their mind. Never found it.

Smith: The kids, of course, didn’t grow up here – this wasn’t their home. In fact, I think it means more to them now when they come back. Obviously there is a special kind of bond.

DeJonge: Yeah, we really didn’t know the kids. I remember Pete Secchia had a suite at the Kansas City convention – Pete and I are friends. We fight, but we’re friends. He had arranged for an interview in his suite with Jack Ford and Tony Orlando. He said, be there at 6:30. I said, I’ll be there. I had first gone to this Nelson Rockefeller reception, went to Pete’s suite, got there at exactly twenty-five after and had my interviews with Jack Ford and Tony Orlando separately, in the bedroom. That night, I got back from the convention and Pete’s waiting at the entrance to the hotel – Hallmark Hotel I guess – and it’s around eleven thirty at night. He said to me, “You embarrassed me today.” I said, “I embarrassed you? How’s that?” He said, “I told you to be in my suite at six o’clock.” I said, “Peter, you said six-thirty and I was there and I got my interviews.” He said, “I said six.”

And a crowd started to gather, we’re arguing now. I said, “Peter, I’m not going to argue with you out here with all these people around, but I’m looking you up tomorrow.” The next morning I thought he’d be at the pool – he had a broken leg at the time and he was in the wheelchair and had his own private nurse - and I thought he’d be sitting at the pool. I had my bathing suit on and Joanie was there. I said, “Joanie, where’s Peter?” She said, “Maury, he’s sorry.” I said, “I want Peter to tell me he is sorry.” She said, “No, let’s go swimming.” So the two of us went in the pool. By this time my temper is back down and Peter and I stayed friends. When he was ambassador he wanted me to come to Italy, but I didn’t have time. Good guy.

Smith: Tell me about this place and the impact that it made on the city. When it was decided that there was going to be a Ford museum, I guess he was offered several sites, including some on the outskirts of town. But the decision was made to put it here and presumably that was one of the catalysts, along with the hotel obviously, and all that that began the turnaround.

DeJonge: Well, you know, in one of the interviews, I broke the story that Ford and Betty were going to be buried here. I said, “You’re coming back to Grand Rapids to be buried?” and he said yes. And he said it will be just north of the museum. And it happened. I haven’t seen it yet. I brought my camera – I said to Theta, my wife, “I’m going to try to take a picture of that, I still feel bad.”

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him or spoke to him?

DeJonge: Let’s see, it was January, ’79. You mentioned Mike Lloyd. Mike and I are not friends. I had called Ford and I said, “Jerry, sometime, if it’s okay with you, I would like to do an interview asking you every question I can think of.” He said, “Maury, it will happen and I’ll call you.” That was January of ’79, he said, come to my office and we’ll have that interview. At that time he said the only other paper I’m doing this for is the New York Times. So I had my interview and I put it on tape and later Mike met with Jerry in Chicago and he did an interview. Mike chose to run his interview and not mine. He mentioned in his first of a series of two or three, that it started with Maury DeJonge in January of ’79. That’s it.

I said to Mike, at least give me credit for having one of the first interviews and he did. Then Grand Rapids Magazine called me and they said Maury, we understand that you have a copy of that tape. I said, “You bet.” They said, “We would like to run that story.” I said, “Well, before I’ll say yes, I want to check with Mike Lloyd to see if he will approve.” I called Mike and he said, “Absolutely not. That’s Press property. You were employed by the Press when you made the tape. We have it in our safe, and I chose to run my interview.” I said, “Well, Mike I have a copy.” And so I got a letter from a New York lawyer, ordering me to turn that tape over to the Press immediately, and I said three words. I had Roger Boor as my lawyer, and Roger said, “Don’t let them have that.”

That’s a keepsake – I treasure that thing. I was so careful with it, not even my wife heard it. I transcribed it myself, so nobody has ever seen or heard that tape except me. But I got it and I will keep it. I suppose Mike’s got a point, but he ordered the chief editorial writer, who also edits the public policy column - he says, accept no more letters from Maury DeJonge. So I called – that was at the time – it was the guy who was in the accident with Pete and Joanie – such a nice guy. I said, “Have you gotten the word?” and he says, “Yeah, Maury, I hate to tell you, but Mike has said, ‘No more letters from Maury’.” To me that is very small because I had many people who would read my letters on different subjects.

Smith: Were you surprised by the response – the funeral? Obviously, it was the biggest event in Grand Rapids history.

DeJonge: I was so surprised. I knew it would be big, I never saw such a crowd. They were across the bridge. They were south. I couldn’t believe it and anybody’s estimate on crowd would strictly be a guess. I think sixty-seventy thousand, what do I know? I never saw a crowd like that.
Jack Kennedy, when he came to town, he was a senator at that time, running for president. It was huge crowd in Campau Square. I rode in the motorcade back to Nelson and Kalamazoo Avenue where his train was waiting. We were in the second car. Kennedy got out of his car and I walked with him. I walked with him and I said, “Senator, would you believe this is a Republican town?” He said, “Not today, it isn’t.” I sent him a couple of pictures that our photographer took. And he sent me a handwritten note thanking me. I kept that, too.

They were lined up all down Division Avenue. When they got to Catholic Central High School, the mob blocked the street. So we had to get out, climbed on the roof of the car, said a few words, back in the car to Burton, Burton to Nelson, Nelson to the railroad station.

Then Nixon came to town. I was traveling with Al Bentley, who was a Congressman who was running for the Senate against Pat McNamara. He was a multi-millionaire, about two hundred million, original GM stock – that way. He was the guy that got shot in the Chamber by that Puerto Rican – remember that? It goes way back. And he used that suit, with the bullet hole in it in his campaign, which I thought was so corny. I lived with him for three weeks in his home in Owosso and we traveled all over by his airplane as he made his stops. He threw a big party in Detroit about two days before the election for a different nationalities. A big dinner, and all, and there was maybe two or three thousand people at Cobo Hall. Bentley was caught up in that mob and he got up there and he sounded like Jesus. He said, “Lo, I will be with you always.” And I thought, oh no. So we went back to his house – we flew back to Owosso. He said, “Maury, do you think I’m going to win?” I said, “No, Al. You’re going to lose.” McNamara cleaned his clock.

Smith: Owosso was also the home of Thomas E. Dewey.

DeJonge: Right across the street – slightly at an angle to the left was – and he pointed it out to me. I’ll never forget - I slept at his home - he had carpeting about that thick. I’d go home and my carpeting was about like this. He had the money and he was quite certain he was going to be elected to the Senate. But he lost big.
Remember T. John Lesinski? He was a lieutenant governor under Williams. T. John, in Hamtramck, was debating Al Bentley. You know what Hamtramck is like – all Democrats. Bentley made a comment, kidding T. John about his weight. When it was all over T. John walked up to Bentley and said, “I could have knocked you out making fun of my weight.” Oh he was livid, he was so mad. And Bentley said, “I was just kidding, John. I was just kidding.” He didn’t take it as kidding.

Smith: Tell me, was George Romney in over his head as a presidential candidate?

DeJonge: Senior?

Smith: Yeah.

DeJonge: I wish he would have been elected – nominated and elected. This guy was a great governor in the state of Michigan. I didn’t cover him much, but he spoke at Calvin College one night that I covered and he used a couple damn and hells in his speech. I thought, that’s not going to go over very big with this Calvin College crowd, but he was such a success with American Motors. He was talking about gas guzzling dinosaurs way ahead of his time and he was right. When he came back from, Vietnam or Korea, I can’t remember, he said we were brainwashed, and he was right! We were brainwashed by Lyndon Johnson – that it was a war we were winning. They used that against George Romney to this day and it is false. He was right.

Bud Vestal covered George Romney when I was covering Al Bentley for all the Booth papers. He ran Bud Vestal’s legs off. When the three weeks were over, I called Vestal and I said, boy, I was tired, Bud. He said, “Did you hear what happened to me?” I said, “No.” He said when it was all over, “I went home laid on the davenport and I passed out. I fell on the floor. I had to take a week off.” He said, “Romney just drove me crazy.” That’s the kind of guy he was. When he played golf, he jogged. He didn’t walk, he jogged. That doesn’t make him president, but I still think he would have been a good one.

Smith: Tell us, sort of wrapping up, if you were describing Ford to a generation who never knew him, or to people who thought they knew him – something they didn’t know about Ford – something they ought to know about him – something that goes to the heart of who he was.

DeJonge: Boy, that is so tough without my fingers on a computer, but number one: intelligence; number two: right up there with number one, so trustworthy, so humble, so competent in everything. Well you know what he inherited from – good grief, we had interest rates going nuts, our inflation was horrible, just terrible and Ford was bringing that down in that short period of time. I think he would have been a total success and achieved great things had he been elected. But, no, it’s so tough to describe this guy – it’s something you have to feel.

Smith: Television wasn’t his friend, was it? He wasn’t a television president.

DeJonge: No. No way. He started it and it narrowed it considerably, but he was like what – fourteen, eighteen points behind this peanut farmer? I didn’t think – I interviewed Carter’s son and he told me his dad announced at a Thanksgiving dinner I’m going to run for president and I’m going to win. And he did.

Smith: And wasn’t it extraordinary – to bring this story full circle – I remember at the church – the funeral – when I was up there, I think I was in a fog – you don’t really notice things, but I read afterwards that Roslyn Carter was weeping in her pew. Who would have predicted in 1976 that’s how the story would end.

DeJonge: I know. The guy next door –

Smith: Marty.

DeJonge: He spent ten minutes apologizing to me because I was not invited. But I hold no grudge against that – I said, “Marty, forget it.” But tell me this, I heard that after, or during the funeral, an eagle flew over. Is that true?

Smith: I’ve heard that, too. I don’t know. I can’t tell you that, but I’ve heard that as well.

DeJonge: And the day was unbelievably beautiful – the sun was out – not a cloud in the sky – and if that’s a true story, it ought to be told. Someone who was there said, and I thought they said it was on television. I don’t know. But that would be a godsend if that was true – because that’s where that guy is.

Smith: Thank you.

DeJonge: You’re welcome.

Smith: This is great – and fun.

Smith: First of all, thanks so much for doing this. We really appreciate it, on this gorgeous mid-winter day. Is this typical?

Friedersdorf: I’d say this time of year it’s typical, around eighty degrees. We had cold days in January, but February and March are really beautiful months.

Smith: I’m interested in your life before Gerald Ford. How did your path lead to Washington and ultimately to the Ford White House?

Friedersdorf: I came to Washington in 1961 after the ’60 election with a freshman congressman from Indiana, Richard L. Roudebush, 6th Indiana district. Congressman Ford, of course, was a power in the Republican house delegation and I met many of his staffers, including Bob Hartmann and became friends. I was involved somewhat negatively with President Ford at first because when he ran against Charlie Halleck from Indiana I was working the phones for Charlie Halleck and the Republican delegation from Indiana. But we lost and President Ford never held it against any of the Indiana delegation.

Smith: What was the beef against Halleck? Was it in some ways almost a repeat of the complaint against Joe Martin back in ’58?

Friedersdorf: It’s a combination of the age thing and minority status, and Halleck had a drinking problem. That was pretty well known. And then you had a group of Young Turks like Gerald R. Ford and Melvin Laird and Donald Rumsfeld and Bob Griffin, and they were up and coming. It was a generational difference and it was after the ’64 election which was such a debacle. We lost a lot of seats in the Goldwater election. The house members felt it was time for Charlie to go.

Smith: How was Halleck treated after that by the winners, in effect?
Friedersdorf: He was treated with respect and honor and I think that in his heart of hearts he knew that his time was over. I never saw any resentment or any vengeance or any indication that there was bad blood.

Smith: What was it that people saw in Ford at that point that would lead them to make him the Republican Leader? What were the qualities that they saw?

Friedersdorf: Halleck was a very inspired Minority Leader in his heyday.

Smith: Halleck was. I’m interested in what it was Halleck had, but then I’m wondering about Ford.

Friedersdorf: Well, Halleck had been a very, very effective Leader for a number of years and I think that, as we said, his time had come. But, getting to President Ford, there were a lot of possibilities in the House side at that time, but Ford seemed to have a more broad base of support. He was a very vigorous, energetic, attractive, intelligent type of person that Republicans just seemed to naturally gravitate towards. He’s sort of a natural Leader, which he had been all his life in every pursuit. And I think it was just the cream coming to the top.

Smith: And the party, as we said, in those days really was sort of grounded in the Midwest, wasn’t it?

Friedersdorf: Right.

Smith: I mean, you had your Northeastern wing. You had a growing Southern wing. You had, certainly, Goldwater support in the Rocky Mountains states.

Friedersdorf: Right.

Smith: But the Midwest was still the heart of it.

Friedersdorf: It was the heart of the Republican Party: Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota.

Smith: What did it mean to be a conservative in the Jerry Ford sense of the word?

Friedersdorf: Well, it was an entirely different conservative than now. When I think about President Ford, I think about how he would have reacted to the Republican party’s record during the last eight or ten years on big spending and an aggressive, almost combative, foreign policy that was just the opposite of what we thought [as of] conservatism. We were the Walter Judd type conservatives: reduce spending, lower taxes, strong foreign policy, but not an adventurous, hostile foreign policy. I think that’s what it stood for.

Smith: And yet clearly having to some degree, at least, accommodate yourself to the electoral realities. This was the height of the Great Society, ’64 and the landslide for Johnson. It wasn’t enough simply to say, “No. We’re against this.” Presumably, there was some attempt to come up with a conservative alternative, a more constructive opposition, if you will.

Friedersdorf: Well, I think we talked about balanced budgets and these programs, I think if you go back and check the record, most of those programs have turned out to be really successful, like Medicare and Medicaid. Probably the majority of Republicans voted against them. In hindsight, I think we were wrong. I think now even those members who voted during that era against those programs would say they were worthwhile.

Smith: For example, Bob Dole.

Friedersdorf: Right.

Smith: Who was also a member of this…

Friedersdorf: Well, he was a member. I omitted him, but he was a solid member of that group.

Smith: And, in fact, played a key role in Ford’s victory over Charlie Halleck.

Friedersdorf: That’s right.

Smith: Clearly there was a change from the Ev and Charlie Show to the Ev and Jerry Show. When we talked with Mel Laird yesterday, one had a sense that Dirksen tended to be very accommodationist with LBJ. Whether it was Vietnam or whatever, that there was a relationship between Dirksen and Johnson, and that Dirksen was easily flattered, at least in Mel’s viewpoint. And that, in some ways it fell to the House Republicans of lift the banner of opposition a little more than in the Senate.
Friedersdorf: I think that’s true. I think the Senate was – it’s just the nature of the Senate to be club-like and accommodating. They seem to all be part of one fraternity over there. Where, in the House, it’s a much more partisan atmosphere.

Smith: Even then it was?

Friedersdorf: I think so, I think so.

Smith: What is it about being a Congressman, because clearly – I don’t mean to jump ahead – but the criticism was voiced of Ford when he became president that it took too long for him to shift gears from being on Capitol Hill to the White House. What is it about being in the House for twenty-five years that would define someone, shape their Leadership?

Friedersdorf: Well, I think a Congressman, as a House member, is much closer to the issues because he has to run every two years. In fact he was always running. Back in those days, it wasn’t nearly as expensive, but he still was always raising money. And I think they visited the districts more often. I know the House member that I worked for ten years, he went back to Indiana every single weekend. So you were practically, you were in touch with your constituency constantly. And I know Senators, some of them probably go home every six months, the ones that had just been elected.

So I think the House is much closer to the public and I think that President Ford, coming in after having been Leader, was very sensitized to the requests of the House members. He was constantly pounded on every day on the floor.
You could just see them lining up, as soon as he came down the aisle. They would be lined up at the Leadership desk about this project and that project and “Can you come here?” , “Can you do that?” And it was a hard transition from becoming a member of the House to being vice president and president.
Very hard transition.

Smith: He always thought, and I don’t think it was just a line, he believed genuinely that he had adversaries, but no enemies. Now, that may be stretching it, but how would you describe his relations with members in both parties, particularly in the House?
Friedersdorf: I never heard a Democrat or Republican ever say anything critical or mean or vicious about President Ford when he was House Leader. He had the respect of everybody in the House. Members would violently disagree with him on the issues, but he was one of those individuals that absolutely seemed to have a personality that was not abrasive. He could tell you “No”. He could tell you “I can’t do that” in a way that there was no offense taken and there was no bitterness. Of course, that’s why he became president, because he was a person that could be confirmed, he had that many friends in both the House and Senate. I don’t think you can say that about many Leaders over the years that don’t have really, really bitter enemies. Personal enemies. And Ford just didn’t generate enemies.

Smith: The relationship with Tip O’Neill was very close?

Friedersdorf: Yes, extremely close. They played golf together. They had cocktails together occasionally after work. They socialized. They fought like cats and dogs on the floor, but after five o’clock, six o’clock, they were friends.

Smith: There are stories of him and Hale Boggs, who I guess used to debate down at the National Press Club. They would drive down together, decide on the way what they would debate that day. They’d go down to the Press Club, they’d have their debate, and then they’d go off and have lunch or drink and resume the battle. It’s sounds so unlike today.

Friedersdorf: It’s just such an incredible atmosphere that it’s hard for me to imagine working up there now, [the way] the atmosphere is. I never had any hesitation going in and talking to the Speaker about something that President Ford wanted to bring up. He was always accommodating. He might not agree with it, but it was a very congenial atmosphere.

Smith: Now, how did you get into the business of congressional relations?

Friedersdorf: I was working on the Hill and my boss ran for the Senate against Vance Hartke in 1968. Anyway, I was hired by Don Rumsfeld at OEO to run congressional relations. And then when Rumsfeld and Cheney went over to the White House under Nixon to take over the Office of Price Control, I got an offer to go over and be on the congressional relations staff at the White House, as assistant to the president for congressional relations working the House side. Jerry Ford was the Minority Leader, so I was in and out of his office every day, practically, and got to know him much better than my real boss, President Nixon. And the day that Nixon resigned and President Ford was sworn in, President Ford had a receiving line in the White House, and as I went through the line, he said, “I want you to stay. I’m going to need all the help I can get.” And I was very pleased to hear that. So I stayed on during his administration.

Smith: I take it that he was an easier man to know than Richard Nixon.

Friedersdorf: Well, I felt like Jerry Ford was a big brother. I’d traveled with him when he was Minority Leader. We would have these trips – him and Rumsfeld and Laird and Bob Griffin and a lot of the Young Turks in the Republican party -

Smith: Charlie Goodell?

Friedersdorf: Charlie Goodell. We would go around the country during recess and speak in Democrat districts where we had hopes to elect a Republican. So, I did travel with Ford. I got to know him quite well. I had a very, let’s say unpleasant experience. One time, we were in Indiana around Kokomo or Muncie. He’d given a speech the night before and we were staying in a private home. I was in the same bedroom with Ford, twin beds, and he said, “I’m a heavy sleeper. I want to get up at six. There’s a plane that’s going to take me to Indianapolis.” So, my alarm didn’t go off and we overslept an hour and I have never been chewed out like Ford could do it. So I run out and got him a cup of coffee. I brought the cup of coffee back and he’d calmed down a little, but by the time we got to the airport, on the way to the airport, he said, “That’s okay, Max. The plane will wait on me.” He got real mad. He could fly off the handle.

Smith: He had a temper.

Friedersdorf: Yeah, he did.

Smith: And apparently spent a lifetime trying to control it.
Friedersdorf: But I woke up and it was seven o’clock instead of six and I thought, “How am I going to wake him up?” So, I went over and I took his shoulder and I said, “Mr. Leader. Mr. Leader.” He woke up, he said, “What time is it?” I said, “It’s seven o’clock.” He said, “Augh!” And he was a big guy, I mean, strong as a bull. I know he would never hit me, but I remember he was all-American center on Michigan. But that’s the kind of guy he was.

Smith: Yeah. He really wanted to be Speaker of the House, didn’t he?

Friedersdorf: Yeah, he told me he did. That was the height of his goal. I think he would rather be Speaker than President.

Smith: When you were in and out of his office doing congressional relations for the Nixon White House - clearly that gets us into the whole Watergate period. Do you remember where you were when you first heard about the break in?

Friedersdorf: I was out on Highway 123 in Fairfax County. I’d been down to the country club in Fairfax that morning playing golf. It was on a Saturday and I was driving down. I had the radio on and it was just a small announcement that there’d been a burglary at the Democratic National headquarters in Watergate. And I didn’t think too much about it. I thought, “Why would somebody break in there?” and so on and so forth. But as the thing developed and it became the horrible scandal it was, I thanked my lucky stars, because that spring, I’d gotten a call from John Mitchell over at CREEP, Committee to Reelect. He’d wanted me to come over to CREEP, to take a leave of absence from the White House and come over, and work on the Committee to Reelect and do some speechwriting and advance work. He wasn’t specific.

I hung up the phone. I ran over to the West wing. I went into Bill Timmons office and I said, “Bill, Mitchell wants me to come over to CREEP. I took this job to work congressional relations in the White House. I do not want to go to the Committee. That is not my cup of tea.” He said, “Don’t worry about it. I’ll call Mitchell and tell him you cannot.” He got me out of that and I thought, “Ugh.” Many, many of the guys I know that were working in the White House that were drafted and went over there got into trouble and some of them went to prison, some of them served time.
Smith: Do you think Mitchell took secrets with him to the grave?

Friedersdorf: My theory on that has always been that they had too much money to spend over there. We were ahead 43 to 29 in the polls. Guys like Liddy and those guys were trying to impress Mitchell. Or they were freelancing. Or they were too active for the situation. And when they did this and they got caught and things blew up, John Mitchell was probably briefed or privy to most of it. And President Nixon was trying to protect John Mitchell, his former law partner and best friend. I’ve always thought that’s how it developed and that Nixon, for all his faults, he was extremely loyal to people and I don’t think he would have ever done anything that would implicate or reflect on John Mitchell. And I think that was the heart of his problem, the heart of his motivation, let’s say.

Section Not Released

Smith: Were you surprised by the taping system?

Friedersdorf: Yes, I had no idea that was in there. You just didn’t think about it, you know. But in retrospect, maybe I should’ve, but I was not alone.

Smith: During this period, is Ford asking you, as, in effect, the White House representative, “What’s going on?” or “Can you explain this Watergate business to me?” Was there a growing alarm on the Hill among Republicans?

Friedersdorf: It was sort of like an ink blot spreading. I think people at first thought it would go away and it was kind of like slow death or torture by drips. Each day, there’d be something else come out and it seemed like House Leader Ford and the Republican Leadership didn’t know any more about it than we did at the White House. It was all kept within a very tight circle, [text embargoed] Haldeman and Erlichman and the president and Colson. I don’t think it went much beyond that.

Smith: We were talking about Mel Laird. When he went back to the White House, it’s now revealed that Fred Buzhardt told him within a month or so that in fact Nixon was involved in the cover up at the very least, based upon Buzhardt’s listening to the tapes. But apparently Laird kept that to himself.
Friedersdorf: That didn’t get very far. I doubt President Ford knew that. Perhaps he did if Laird shared that with him, but he didn’t share it with the White House staff. I was convinced up until a couple days before they finally came up with the smoking gun, which was just a few days before, we were all convinced that it would go away. But we started counting votes on impeachment pretty early, because we could see that was coming in the House. And we were keeping a list and checking Congressmen on how they would vote on a bill of impeachment and also the Senate, too. So we were wary of it.

Smith: For example, the Saturday Night Massacre - did that significantly advance the calls for impeachment in the house? When Cox was fired, remember that? And Richardson refused to quit and…

Friedersdorf: Oh yeah, the Saturday Night Massacre? Oh, that was a major, major blow. Because Ruckelshaus was considered part of the Nixon team. We weren’t that much surprised at Elliot Richardson, he was kind of a weak reed, but when Ruckelshaus went along with it then the whole thing I think was a major blow.

Smith: Plus, by that time, Agnew had resigned.

Friedersdorf: It was a real distraction at the time. I think at the time it might have been just a bit helpful, not helpful in the long-term, but it took your mind off of Watergate for a day or two.

Smith: I’ll tell you something extraordinary. We talked to Jerry Jones, who worked with Haig later on. Just before Haldeman left, whenever it was, April, May of ’73, Haldeman had Jones reorganizing the personnel office. He called him one day and he said, “How many jobs report to the vice president?” Jones did some figuring and he said, “About 50.” Haldeman said, “Good. I want letters of resignation.” Now this is in April of ’73., Jones at least thinks they knew as early as then that Agnew was going to be in trouble. What was it like to come into work, day after day after day?

Friedersdorf: It was tough and a lot of my friends resigned and went to other jobs. Most of the guys on the congressional relations staff left. And Dick Cook and Gene Cowan and Ken Deliciu and Bill Timmons, who were hardcore Nixon. These guys were quitting and taking private sector jobs. I had made up my mind that I was going to stay until the thing was over, until the last day. And I did. President Nixon gave that emotional address in the East Room the day that he resigned, and then that evening – no, that was the day he did resign - but the evening before, he asked us to bring down the remaining supporters from the House and Senate. We had less than forty votes, counting House and Senate. That’s how extreme we were. Guys like Senator Eastland, Senator Stennis, Joe Waggoner, John Rhodes, Les Arends, the hardcore of the hardcore. And we assembled them in the Cabinet Room about 6:00 p.m. and we waited on the president, waited on the president. Some of the guys were getting restless, they had things to go to, but everybody stayed.

He finally came in and he said, “I’m going on television tonight and I’m going to announce my resignation. I’m going to resign tomorrow at noon.” Everybody was kind of anticipating it, but there were a lot of tears in the room. And Nixon kind of broke down, he was starting to tear up and he laid his head down on the desk and you could see his shoulders heaving. And we, everybody in the room, was just – just the drama of that. And he finally raised up and he said, “I’m sorry I let you down.” And he got up and he sort of ran out of the room back into the Oval Office. It was one of the most painful, depressing things I’ve ever seen. The President of the United States.

And, of course, the next day, he spoke in the East Room. If you remember that speech, he got into his mother and there wasn’t a dry eye in that room. Then he went out and got in the helicopter. That’s when President Ford; it was like a new day. It was like the sun coming up over Mount Everest. Nixon was gone and Ford was there. It was almost like a celebration. They lifted a weight off our shoulders. But I stayed until that day and I thought President Ford would want an entirely new team. But I had stayed and I felt like I would like to work for him if he wanted me. But I didn’t say a word. He just said, “Max, I want you to stay right here.”

Smith: You know, it’s fascinating, people who were there have told us, following the swearing in, there was a receiving line and then people were invited into the State Dining Room for a reception. Someone said, “You could watch the Nixon people just strip away and go back to their offices”. How much of a problem was that for a while, at least, the White House was basically staffed with Nixon loyalists?

Friedersdorf: Well, you know, it played out in a strange way because I was on Nixon’s staff, but I was so close to Ford, I considered myself a Ford person. I’d spent more time with Ford, a hundred times more than I had with Nixon. But there were people like Bob Hartmann who were very vindictive. They wanted to get rid of every single Nixon person. If you had [the] Nixon stain on you, Bob wanted that person gone. Then there were guys like Jack Marsh, they were thinking about Ford’s administration and not whether you were Nixon person or a Ford. They wanted to keep the people that could do the job. And Jack was a big, big influence on President Ford. President Ford respected Jack’s judgment, which we all did. Jack was a steady hand at that time and I think that his attitude toward the Nixon people was that they did their job. They didn’t throw them all out. They had kept some of them.

Smith: Hartmann was almost a polarizing figure, wasn’t he?

Friedersdorf: Yes, he was. And a good friend of mine. I got along with him, but he had a lot of enemies. Guys like Rumsfeld and him, they just clashed all the time.

Smith: What contributed to that?

Friedersdorf: Well, you know Hartmann as well as I do, probably, and he was an irascible guy. And he was tremendously loyal to Ford.

Smith: Possessive of Ford, though, too.

Friedersdorf: Yes, that’s the word ‘possessive.’ He didn’t want anybody else. And he started writing his speeches after he became president. He’d been writing his speeches for years. Well, Rumsfeld wanted to vet those speeches and we had a committee that would go over those speeches, but if you’d change one word, Hartmann would go ballistic. He couldn’t accept the fact that this former Congressman, who he was his right arm for years and years, did all of his writing, all of his PR, he was his campaign manager, he was everything - that suddenly this man was President of the United States, and he had a big staff and a lot of responsibility to different constituents. And this was hard for Bob to accept.

Smith: As someone who had spent twenty-five years on the Hill, how did that affect your job doing congressional relations? Because part of the irony, the paradox, of the Ford presidency is, post-Nixon, there’s this huge backlash from the Hill. Worse after ’74. With the elections going as badly as they did, how did you do your job?

Friedersdorf: Well, President Ford was very perceptive to that and he understood that naturally all the Congressmen, they would want to see him personally. And he realized he couldn’t see all of them personally every day that wanted to see him. It wasn’t like he was Minority Leader again and that they could all just come up and vent their problems on him. He had to run the country. So, he made it clear that the congressional relations guys – he would take their calls, but he would say, “Well, Max or some of the staff will come up and see you. Give them the information and I’ll look over it.” He was very helpful in getting us involved and not trying to play Mr. Congressional Relations any longer. We had a good staff and we gradually weaned them off of that.

One of the things that’s hard to do is, they were so familiar with him, they would call him Jerry. He’d come up to give the State of the Union and they’d say Jerry. And Bob Griffin used to just go bananas. Bob would say, “Damn it, that is Mr. President. That is not Jerry!” It was a hard thing to do.

Smith: I assume Ford wasn’t offended by them calling him Jerry.

Friedersdorf: No, no, not at all. And some of them never did change. Al Cederberg, we would go over to those Ford dinners when the president was living and he would call him Jerry. I don’t think I ever heard Al Cederberg in his life call him Mr. President. Chuck Chamberlain called him Jerry. Bill Broomfield called him Jerry. They were part of the Michigan delegation, they’d been with him for years, so you’re not going to change those guys. But he did, on business, try to make them understand that the congressional relations staff were the persons to deal with. And Marsh was very instrumental in that, too, having been a former House member.
Smith: Let me ask you, because you have this honeymoon and it’s very short-lived. During that month before the pardon: were you getting advice, were people in the Congress telling the president how to handle Nixon?

Friedersdorf: Yeah, that’s all they talked about. Watergate was still in their mind. I think that they were wanting to see closure, but they weren’t certain what kind of closure. It’s hard for even a partisan Democrat to imagine putting a former president on trial. When he had resigned, they got their pound of flesh. And I think it was beginning to die down. It was really beginning to die down by the time the pardon came. Of course that just re-opened all those wounds.

Smith: How bad was it?

Friedersdorf: Horrible!

Smith: What’d you hear?

Friedersdorf: When Nixon resigned and right after President Ford took office, was sworn in, I got a call from Fulbright, Senator Fulbright and Hubert Humphrey, and [they] said, “President Nixon had designated us as a delegation to go to China.” This was a third trip to China. It was a very important delegation. It had senators and a lot of members from the House foreign relations. A high level delegation. “Is that trip still on?” I went to see President Ford. I said, “You know, Nixon had laid on this trip and these guys during recess in August want to know if this trip is still on.” And he said, “Absolutely. I’ll get them one of the Air Force planes,” and so on. So, anyway, it went on and he said, “I want you to go with them. You’ll be in recess.” And I said, “Okay, I will.”

So, we had a really good delegation. Barbara Jordan was on it. Hubert Humphrey was the chairman. Fulbright. It was a powerful delegation. And we were down in central China, miles from anywhere, and one of the Air Force guys came in when we were having a meeting and told me to come out. He said, “You know, we just got communication from home that President Ford has pardoned Richard Nixon and they wanted you to let the delegation know.” So I went back in and when the meeting broke up, I asked Senator Humphrey if we could all stay there a few minutes. We’d been meeting with the Chinese. He said, “Sure, we’ll hang around. I’ll keep them here.” I told them and Barbara Jordan got so upset, she said, “Senator Humphrey, I think we should all go out to the airport and get on a plane and go home. Where we should be is in Washington, D.C. This is just terrible! We’ve got to do something about this.” And Humphrey said, “No, we’ve got a program. We’ve got a mission here. We’ve got a few more days of meetings. We’ll go home when we’re scheduled to go home.” And she just threw a fit.

Smith: Really?

Friedersdorf: Oh! And some of the others on the delegation, too, Democrats, threw a fit. But Fulbright and Humphrey said, “No, we’re going to finish this trip.” And it was Humphrey’s call.

Smith: Humphrey had a pretty good relationship with President Ford, didn’t he?

Friedersdorf: He did and I spent a lot of time with Humphrey on that trip. I’m a great admirer of Hubert Humphrey.

Smith: There’s a wonderful story in ’76, when Humphrey was in the hospital, I think it was up in New York, not long before the election, and President Ford went to visit him. Humphrey said, “You’re going to get some votes out of the Humphrey household.” And of course Bess Truman voted for him in ’76. I guess it was a big shocker, after the president died, when George McGovern told Larry King that he’d voted for Ford in ’76 - then found out that his wife had, too, after the fact. So, it was interesting, those people who, ideologically, you wouldn’t voting for Ford. It had to have been something personal.

Friedersdorf: Yeah, I never knew what the relationship was, but Humphrey was very, very fond of President Ford. And he told Barbara Jordan, “We were sent over here by the president.” This is only the third trip to China in the last twenty or thirty years and we’re supposed to meet with some Leaders of the country. He said, “We’re not going to bail out of here.” He calmed her down real quick.

Smith: Do you think the pardon was the single biggest factor that lead to Ford’s defeat in ’76?
Friedersdorf: I do. Tragedy, the way that it turned out, because Ford deserved a second term. He had a bob-tailed first term and I think things would’ve been a lot different. Carter, you know, we don’t have to go into the Carter administration, but the way that turned out, I think President Ford would’ve had a great second term.

Smith: Well, you know, there is this argument. He, himself, is said to have believed that just when he learned how to be president, he lost it.

Friedersdorf: Right. He was just gaining momentum.

Smith: The economy was turning around.

Friedersdorf: Right. And his popularity, you know. Without the pardon, there were other factors. I know that, even with the pardon, that election was extremely close, except for a few votes in southern Ohio. I think six counties in Ohio would have switched Ohio and then if he’d had carried that and, I believe it was Hawaii, he didn’t need too much. I’d talked to Laird about that and Laird said that they wanted Ford to go back to Ohio that last weekend. I can’t remember what the issue was in southern Ohio, there was something that was really hurting the GOP. And they thought they would take Ford out there for the final push and that would put him over. It was close anyway, but he had made a commitment to somewhere in Minnesota or someplace else that was already locked up, one of those upper Midwest states. Laird said, “You know how Jerry was. He made a commitment, he was going to go.” And he said, “That may have cost him the election.”

Smith: The whole fight with Reagan, that must’ve affected the race. The criticism has been made that Ford was late in really getting into the ’76 campaign and perhaps a little naïve in underestimating Reagan.

Friedersdorf: I think it was a combination of that. I felt that many of us in the White House from the president on down underestimated Reagan. You know, he couldn’t beat an incumbent. We were so overconfident and then after we started in, he was doing good. Even then there was still overconfidence.
Smith: Someone told me, for example, in terms of the retail politics that were being played at the end - thank God for the Bicentennial. You had the Queen’s visit and the State Dinner. And someone said, “It’s a good thing the Queen never saw the guest list, because it was bloated with Republican delegates and their families, people whose votes you had to have in Kansas City.”

Friedersdorf: President Ford, he had the right guy in the right place. Jim Baker was magnificent. He saved that presidency. Without him, I don’t think it would’ve happened. He pulled every stop out you can think of.

Smith: Stu Spencer tells a wonderful story. Stu says, it’s a Friday night and Stu, you know, was stewing. The president loved to campaign. They had these polls that showed that if you go out there and give some Bob Hartmann speech that wasn’t very good, his numbers would go down. Well, how do you tell a president not to campaign? They’re in the Oval Office, just the three of them, him, Cheney, and the president. It’s a Friday night and he’s kind of fed up anyway and the president’s not getting it, so he finally says, “You know, Mr. President, you’re a great president, but you’re a fucking lousy campaigner.”

Friedersdorf: Stu told him that?

Smith: Yes. And Ford didn’t take it personally. But the sequel is what makes the story. That story appeared in Germond and Witcover’s book the following year and Stu went ballistic. And he called Cheney to chew him out for careless-Friedersdorf: What book was this?

Smith: Germond and Witcover’s. And so he’s going on and yelling at Dick for breaking the confidence and Cheney said, “Stu, there was a third person in that room.” Ford told the story on himself!

Friedersdorf: I’ll be darned.

Smith: Which tells you volumes.
Friedersdorf: Yeah, I can see him doing that. Something like that wouldn’t offend him. He knew he had trouble speaking and he wasn’t the greatest Speaker that ever came down the pike.

Smith: There is this argument that actually the Reagan challenge made him a better candidate.

Friedersdorf: It did and, you know, by the end of the campaign, his speaking performances were much improved. He was not stumbling over words, he was giving the right emphasis and the speech he gave at the convention, I thought was a magnificent speech. The best speech I ever heard him give. He was just high that night. But, getting that Mississippi delegation there…

Smith: How did he get that? Because Clarke Reed has a reputation for being purchase-able or at least someone who can be bought. Though he doesn’t always stay bought. What was the story around Mississippi?

Friedersdorf: I don’t know. I don’t know how they finally got that. I know that the whole thing hung in balance and, I guess, Jim Baker or Jack Marsh or Stu Spencer could tell you, but we had to have them and we got them.

Smith: It really, literally, did go right down to the line.

Friedersdorf: It did. I think just a handful of less than twelve delegates decided that.

Smith: What could you offer delegates?

Friedersdorf: I don’t know.

Smith: What about up on the Hill? Obviously, Reagan had some support from the Jesse Helms’s of the world.

Friedersdorf: Well, they had me working on Jesse Helms and the North Carolina delegation. Jesse Helms, I called him and he wanted Ford to come down there for something. And he went down there and I don’t know whether that turned some of North Carolina. But, I had a really good relationship with Helms and I can’t remember if it was Ford or Stu or Baker who’d asked me to call him and find out what would really make him happy and that was a trip down there. And Ford did it. And we got a few more of those North Carolinians.

Smith: You just never got Helms.

Friedersdorf: No, no, no. And I don’t know whether he backed off or if it made a difference, but we were working those guys. But I don’t know about the Mississippi. If I did know, I’ve forgotten.

Smith: Let me back up to the spring of ’75 and the fall of Saigon. What are your memories around that time?

Friedersdorf: The guy scrambling off the roof. My memories around that time--

Smith: Well, let me interrupt because Mel Laird is still convinced that the president and Congress let the South go. I understand it, but I find it hard to believe. You were on the Hill. What was the mood at that point in terms of additional funding for the South?

Friedersdorf: Well, we were getting those end the war resolutions and amendments constantly. Mike Mansfield in the Senate and Tip O’Neill and his crowd in the House and they were passing. We just couldn’t sustain it. And they were smart. They were starting to cut the money off, not so much the troops. They finally realized that to cut the money off was the way to stop the war. But my recollection of it after all these years is one of tremendous relief. I know it was an embarrassing, humiliating way to leave, but most of us, including myself, had for a long time lost faith in that war. I supported it strongly when Nixon was in there. And, you know, Laird gives himself credit in the book for them starting the withdrawals. He did, and that was very encouraging, but Nixon let it go on too long. That thing was so sour by the time he came in, but he tried to win it. And I think Kissinger and the military were convincing it him could be won. But by the time Ford got in there, I think it was way, way past time it could ever be won.

Smith: There’s nothing Ford could’ve said on Capital Hill that could’ve reversed that move.
Friedersdorf: No. I think when Ford came in it was a given that that thing was going to peter out. I don’t know in what manner it would peter out, but certainly the way it played out was ugly.

Smith: What was the toughest part of those years during the Ford presidency?

Friedersdorf: I think after the pardon, we caught a lot of flack on that every day and between then and the election and trying to overcome that.

Smith: I assume the Republicans who were up for reelection were pretty upset by that. Did you hear from them?

Friedersdorf: Oh, yes. Yes, they were livid. They were absolutely livid and they said, “We weren’t consulted,” “It’s going to kill the Republican party,” “We’re all going to lose.” I think it was in August, he did that, and you know the campaign was under way right after Labor Day, so they didn’t have much time to recover. It was wonderful before the pardon because Ford could do no wrong for those first months, but after that, it was difficult.

Smith: What does it tell you about Ford the man that he goes out to California, right before the election, and Nixon’s in the hospital, close to death. And everyone said, “Don’t go near him.” And, what does he do? He goes to visit Nixon.

Friedersdorf: Yeah, I have to admire him for that. That was the kind of man he was.

Smith: The other thing was, of course, you had these huge fights over foreign policy. And here, Jerry Ford, the child of Capitol Hill, spends his presidency trying to fend off Congress.

Friedersdorf: Well, we had incredible legislative problems because the Democrats adopted a strategy that any program the president would support, like emergency medical services, programs that were very, very appealing in their name and in what they did, he would send the legislation up and the budget to accompany it. The Democrats then would raise the ante so much that it would be a budget buster and it would force him to veto it. And I think in just the short time he was in, he had over 62, 64 vetoes. And our time was consumed with trying to sustain his vetoes. And I think Ford sustained a vast majority of those which was pretty incredible considering the Democrats had a big majority. Which I think speaks very well for Ford legislatively.

Smith: It could be argued he was the last president who was willing to spend his capital in an effort to hold the line on spending. He really was a conservative when it came to federal spending.

Friedersdorf: Right. His political philosophy was fiscal responsibility and preserving the budget. He’s probably the only president in the history of the country that presented his own budget program to the Congress and to the press. You know, he’d come out of the Congress on the appropriations committee and defense subcommittee. He could read a budget. He knew what was in there. Probably the best educated president we have ever had on the actual fiscal workings of the budget.

Smith: Did you know Mrs. Ford during that period? Did you spend much time around her?

Friedersdorf: Yes, at social things. I got to know her better after Ford left office. President Reagan appointed me to consul general in Bermuda. And Priscilla and I were in Bermuda and President Ford and Mrs. Ford used to come out to stay in Bermuda and we would play golf together and have dinner with them.

Smith: President Ford and Mrs. Ford.

Friedersdorf: Yeah, what did I say?

Smith: You said President Ford and Mrs. Reagan.

Friedersdorf: No, no, I take that back.

Smith: For many reasons, that would be an unlikely couple.

Friedersdorf: President and Mrs. Ford. Those were wonderful times. We could be very casual.

Smith: Now was that after she’d taken care of her problem?

Friedersdorf: She was just recovering and I remember very, very vividly, we were on the elevator in the Hamilton Princess Hotel one evening. We had come back from dinner and we were going up to the Ford’s suite for a nightcap. And the four of us got on the elevator and some other guy jumped in the elevator and he took a double take and saw this was President Ford and Mrs. Ford and he said to Mrs. Ford, “How’s your drinking problem?” And, you know, it was embarrassing. And she said, “Oh, I’m doing fine.” You know, without any glimmer of resentment or shock. I was totally, totally impressed by her presence of mind. And President Ford didn’t bat an eye either, so that’s the kind of people they were.

Smith: Unflappable.

Friedersdorf: Yeah, unflappable. That’s the word. But he used to come out there fairly often. He was on the board of American Express, I believe, at that time. And they had their board meetings in Bermuda and he would always invite Priscilla and I to dinner and we would play golf together. We had a lot of great times. One time, we were playing and he was my partner and we were playing Sandy Weil and Jim Robinson who were the big muckety-mucks in American Express and President Ford and I, by the way, we beat them, but President Ford was to my left about thirty yards and a little bit in front and I heeled a golf shot and hit him right in the fanny, just square in the fanny. I was mortified. I threw down my golf club and I ran over there and I said, “Are you alright, Mr. President?” He turned around and laughed and said, “I wish you’d work on that shot a little more.” It didn’t hurt him, but he thought it was funny. But I was so embarrassed.

Smith: He was usually the one who was being criticized for -

Friedersdorf: He never got credit for the athlete he was, you know. Here’s a guy who was all-American football player. He coached football and went to Yale law school full-time. He was an excellent skier. He was an excellent swimmer. He was a tremendous athlete and thanks to Chevy Chase, they made out like he was some awkward person. It was unfortunate.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?
Friedersdorf: I think at the Ford banquet, probably. And then the next year, they didn’t come. They had a video. He wasn’t feeling well. You remember that one at the Archives?

Smith: Yes. Yes.

Friedersdorf: That’s the last time I saw him on film, but I think the year before he had been there and I talked to him a little bit, but I think that was the last time.

Smith: He really was in extraordinary good health up until his ninetieth birthday and then I think things caught up with him. When the doctors said, “You really shouldn’t travel,” I think that was rough because he loved to travel. He loved rubber chicken, he loved talking politics.

Friedersdorf: Well, I think that was one of the things that caused Mrs. Ford’s problem was he was gone so much. The last thing I would do in the evening when I was Congressional Relations and he was Leader, I always went by his office to check before I’d go back to the White House and see what was coming up the next day and just see if there was anything I could do, what was going on. We’d sit in there and talk about what had happened during the day.

I remember one evening he got a call from Mrs. Ford and he had to go catch a damn plane and go somewhere that evening to make a speech. And she was not feeling well. She said, “Why don’t you cancel that and come home?” But he said, “Betty, I’ve made a commitment”. You know, he was torn and it was a sad situation. It was so wonderful when he got to be president because he could spend more time with Mrs. Ford and he didn’t have to go on the road all the time and when he did, he could take her. But he was running around to these fundraisers all over the country that all the Congressmen wanted him, that it was difficult for her to be home alone all that time.

Smith: How do you think he should be remembered?

Friedersdorf: Well, I think it’s a cliché to say this, but a unifier and a president who was the right person at the right time. I can’t think of any politician that could’ve filled that slot like he did when we were in such terrible, terrible political shape. The country was just torn apart. People were thinking that maybe the Union would not last. It was really a serious, serious time. I think one of the most dangerous times since the Civil War. The country was falling apart, but he put it back together. And I think he’ll be remembered as a very, very good president.

Smith: When did you first meet Gerald Ford?

Laird: I first met Jerry Ford in the Navy. He was in the same task group as I, and we met on a little island in Magaw(?), where we had a couple of beers. I’d known him through Glenn Davis and Johnny Burns. I’d been out to visit them in Washington and I’d met him at that time. And then I spent some with him when I was a state senator, before I came to Congress in 1952.

Smith: He was already in the House.

Laird: He was already in the House and he’d been in for two terms. He came to Congress with Glenn Davis and Johnny Burns had already been in the Congress for about six years. When I went out to Washington as a United States Senator, I spent time with Jerry and Glenn because they were all members of a little group called the Chowder and Marches Society.

Smith: Tell us about that group.

Laird: Well, it’s a group in which we took in two members – they took in two members each year. They tried to get them on so the group represented all committees in the House of Representatives. We would meet on Wednesday night and get a report what was going on in the Executive Session in each of those committees. We had meetings on Wednesday in our offices, and we’d rotate offices. Then we had a Tuesday morning breakfast and discussed what was going on in Congress so we’d be well prepared for each of the committees that made up the Congress.

Smith: Now you were elected in ’52.

Laird: I was elected in ’52.

Smith: So you had the experience, you were in the one majority Republican House.
Laird: I was in that.

Smith: And then that was the last time you were in the majority.

Laird: Right. And there was an interesting experience. I’d been in the state senate prior to that time, and going to the House of Representatives was a stepping stone from the state senate. But the state senate in Wisconsin was a very revered group.

Smith: Did you sense, even then, that Ford was ambitious?

Laird: I knew he was ambitious – that he felt that he had an opportunity. He thought perhaps he would be first senator at one time.

Smith: Really?

Laird: But that really never developed. Vandenberg had been his idol in the Senate from Michigan and it just never developed. He was on a fast track in the House of Representatives and he decided to forego the Senate and to go, perhaps, for Speaker.

Smith: Did he ever indicate to you an interest in the presidency during his Congressional days?

Laird: Yes, he did indicate he felt that he was qualified to be president. He always felt that there was nothing in his way from doing a good job as President of the United States.

Smith: The House in those days was clearly a very different institution from what it is today.

Laird: Much different. We had, of course, Speaker Rayburn who was a very unusual person. I remember the time that Speaker Rayburn called me aside after the debate about the HEW appropriation bill, and the ranking Democrat was John Fogarty from Rhode Island. Rayburn called me over and he said, “Mel, that was a tremendous job you and John Fogarty did on that HEW bill. You are getting along very well in the House. As a matter of fact, I want you to have a new office. I’ve been talking with John McCormick, and we’re going to give you a private dining room just outside the dining room itself, but very near the Speaker’s dining room.” See, that wouldn’t happen today.

Smith: What led him to do that? He was singling out promising young talent?

Laird: Trying to encourage me.

Smith: On both sides of the aisle?

Laird: Well, he was encouraging me. I don’t think he encouraged any other Republican that I know of.

Smith: I remember hearing President Ford talk about an old bull who told him to be outside this room at ten o’clock on Wednesday morning. No real additional instructions. What it was basically, is that they were bringing him in this small group that had oversight of the CIA and other intelligence operations.

Laird: Well, that’s on the appropriations committee. That was George Mahon. Then George Mahon appointed the intelligence committee, and that was the only intelligence committee we had. They handled everything and did a great job. There were five members on that committee. I was not on it as soon as Ford went on it, but I went on it a little later on.

Smith: And what were the qualities you think that Mahon and others, presumably, sought in Ford that led them to…

Laird: Well, I think they thought he was very trustworthy, and they also felt that he was a person that put the country first at all times.

Smith: I assume, then as later, that there were show horses and there were work horses.

Laird: Yes.

Smith: And he, presumably, was a work horse.

Laird: He was a work horse. I always told him he wasn’t as good a work horse as I was, but that he was learning.

Smith: Did you have friends across the aisle?
Laird: Yes, we had a lot of friends across the aisle and we saw them quite often.

Smith: By that time Jack Kennedy had gone to the Senate, but in his early days they had offices across the hall from each other.

Laird: Right. Johnny Burns did, too. They were on that same floor and they got along very well.

Smith: Joe Martin – there is in effect, a coup, isn’t there – to replace Joe Martin?

Laird: Right.

Smith: What fed into that, what was the background of that?

Laird: Well, the coup was organized by really, two people: Glenn Lipscomb, the chairman of the California delegation, and myself. We had a group of about fifteen people we got together and we decided to take a poll of all the members of the House to see how close we were to electing a new Speaker, or a new leader, as it was, because we had no majority at that time. The people that worked the hardest on that were Glenn Lipscomb, who was a tremendous man, he was chair of the California delegation – and they had the biggest delegation of Republicans in the Congress. Bob Griffin from Michigan. We had Johnny Burns and Glenn Davis.

We finally put out a poll to see who could get the most votes as far as the Republican leadership. The polls showed that the person that could get the most votes was Johnny Burns. But Johnny Burns was not actively pursuing this, whereas Ford agreed to actively pursue it. And you had to have a person who would spend a lot of time, a lot of effort in order to win that race against the incumbent, people who had been around there for a long time. And so we chose, this little group, we chose Jerry – not because he had the most votes – but because he said he wouldn’t get out of the race.

Smith: Now this is against Charlie Halleck.

Laird: Yeah.

Smith: Oh, I’m sorry – before Charlie Halleck there was Joe Martin, who was ousted.
Laird: That was a different coup.

Smith: Was Ford involved with that at all?

Laird: Oh yeah. Ford was involved and so was I. We were called the Young Turks, so was Glenn Lipscomb. I thought you were asking about the Ford…

Smith: Just because Martin was a preview of Halleck.

Laird: We won that – very close, a very close vote. We had a close vote with Jerry – a very close vote. But it only takes a majority of one, or a plurality of one, to elect somebody and we won both of those. And they were short campaigns.

Smith: The thing I want to nail down, because I’ve heard different things; that when you obviously settled on Halleck to replace Joe Martin, was Ford considered at that point?

Laird: Yes, Ford was the second choice.

Smith: And was he not interested in doing it?

Laird: He was not interested in getting into that kind of fight. You see, you’ve got to be willing to get into a fight. Now, he was willing the second time to get into it. As a matter of fact, John Burns had more votes to become the leader, but Jerry, at that time, wouldn’t get out of it.

Smith: And was the complaint against Martin was that he had just sort of gotten old and…

Laird: Yes, he wasn’t making a good challenge.

Smith: Not aggressive enough.

Laird: Yeah. We loved Joe Martin. He was a fine person, but he wasn’t aggressive enough to take care of the new young people coming up in the Republican Party.

Smith: And then in between, in ’62, there’s this contest – a preview of the Halleck fight – against Charlie Hoeven for the number three job.
Laird: Charlie Hoeven, from Iowa. That’s a job – conference chairman – and we elected Ford to that at that time. That’s when Ford first came into the leadership role, and the conference oversees all the business of the Republicans in the House.

Smith: At that point, of course, Kennedy is still in the White House. He’s this very telegenic, charismatic figure. Was there a concern among Republicans on the Hill that you needed fresh blood – someone who could…particularly on television be a little bit more…

Laird: Yeah, we felt that we had to have - and, just between us, Charlie wasn’t taking as good care of himself…

Smith: Well, I know in the book it says – and I’ve heard this because I wrote a book about Tom Dewey, and I knew about how Halleck had an alcohol problem.

Laird: Well, we could not put up with that and have him come to the floor under any condition like that. That’s underlying.

Smith: Was that a problem in those days – more of a problem than later on? Was it part of the culture?

Laird: I don’t think so. I think we have the same thing. You go all the way back to Bob LaFollette. He turned into an alcoholic. There is something about Washington that kind of gets some people to turn. It’s too bad, but they do.

Smith: So after the Goldwater defeat, and you put this campaign together, Don Rumsfeld is involved?

Laird: Yes.

Smith: Bob Dole and the Kansas delegation is involved. It’s almost a training ground for a whole generation of leaders.

Laird: We had a good group. But it was a lot of work.

Smith: What would have happened to you if you had lost?

Laird: If we’d lost? Well, Halleck would have continued.
Smith: Would there have been revenge taken?

Laird: They might have taken some revenge. We weren’t in a position to…

Smith: Do you think, at that point, does Ford see himself as a potential Speaker of the House? That’s his ambition?

Laird: Yes.

Smith: With this new job, he is on the road constantly. I don’t know if you knew Betty in those days.

Laird: Oh, yeah. Sure. Betty was very close. We always took our vacations together. On July 4th we went down to a golf club in Virginia, I remember, and we couldn’t get an extra room, so we had to all bunk together. We were very close. Betty was very fine and we had great times with her.

Smith: Did you sense that she was unhappy at all? We now know that he was away a lot and…

Laird: She was somewhat unhappy. Most of our wives get a little unhappy. If you are out speaking around the country and really doing your job, they are in the house, it’s not the best place for a wife.

Smith: Now Ford had been, at least, on the list of vice presidential candidates. Nixon had considered him in ’60. In fact, you go back then, in ’64 Eisenhower gave a list of names to reporters – eleven candidates who he could support in ’64 for president. Your name was on the list and Jerry Ford’s name was on the list, among others. And Richard Nixon’s was not on the list.

Laird: Richard Nixon was not. That’s the part of the story that happened at that time. People kept putting out the fact that Ike left him off.

Smith: The Ev and Charlie Show turns into the Ev and Jerry Show. And I gather that Dirksen was more willing to go along with LBJ, whether it was the war or whatever, than perhaps you and the House were.

Laird: No, we pulled Dirksen back on that somewhat.

Smith: Describe that relationship.
Laird: Jerry was cool about the war, you know.

Smith: While still in the House.

Laird: While still in the House. And we came out with a White Paper, which I was chairman of on Vietnam. Jerry signed it, Charlie Goodell signed it, and we pointed out the discrepancies of the policy in Vietnam and where it had gone wrong.

Smith: What was wrong in Vietnam? Was it that we weren’t aggressive enough?

Laird: What was wrong was that you can’t get in a war in that area of the world and not give all out to it. The real mistake that was made in Vietnam was when Kennedy changed the combat role. Ike was never for a combat role. As a matter of fact, he was very critical of that change. We pointed that out in the White Paper. We pointed out the tremendous growth of military people year after year after year, with no real program in mind as far as termination was concerned. Or in fact, any program to withdraw from Vietnam. There was nothing there and our White Paper pointed that out. That White Paper was signed by Ford, and that had a tremendous effect on Dirksen. Dirksen and Ford had a kind of falling out about that. The paper was signed by Charlie Goodell, by myself, and by Jerry Ford. I was chairman of the House Conference at the time – Republican Conference. And so we did point out the shortfalls in that paper. Have you ever seen that paper?

Smith: I have not, but I will. What’s interesting, I sense that Dirksen, for whatever reason, was just much more willing to go along with Johnson, whatever it was.

Laird: Oh, yes. Dirksen was taken by Johnson’s flattery, and he was flattered by Johnson almost on a daily basis. And that has an effect on some people.

Smith: And I take it that was not the case with you or Ford.

Laird: Oh, no. We questioned him. As a matter of fact, you’ll read some of the exchanges in the White House tapes. You probably have – where Ford was confronted on several occasions – “You’ve got to do something about Laird – you got to muzzle him.” You probably noticed that. Well, Ford never tried to muzzle me. As a matter of fact, he was very encouraging.

Smith: What do you think his relationship with Johnson really was?

Laird: Well, I think it was fairly good. He was disappointed in Johnson. He was disappointed in some of the things he did about acquiring those radio stations and TV stations. I don’t think that Jerry was one of Johnson’s greatest admirers.

Smith: The term has been used so many times that Ford was a Boy Scout, and sometimes people use it condescendingly, and sometimes they use it admiringly.

Laird: Well, I think Johnson used that once or twice. Johnson made some other cracks about Jerry that weren’t very nice.

Smith: Yeah. Did Ford take those things personally?

Laird: Yes, he did. He took them personally. You always had to keep going, sitting down to him and say, “Jerry, that’s the way it’s going to be. You got to be willing to take those. Those are small hits.” The fact that he couldn’t chew gum and walk straight…

Smith: Later on in the White House there was the stumble-bum image, but that was an offshoot of questions about his intelligence.

Laird: Well, yeah, but the real problem was there that he did have a problem – with his knees. Very serious problem and it was rather an unfair criticism that they should bring that out.

Smith: Tell me about his intelligence.

Laird: Very intelligent. There was no question about his intelligence. There was sometimes a question about his judgment, but he was very intelligent. I mean, I will never forgive him for the manner in which he handled the pardon. Jeez, we had worked out…
Smith: Tell us about that, because he always said – he had this press conference on the 28th of August and he went in there – I think he can also be criticized for naiveté. Because he goes into this press conference believing, in that atmosphere, that people are going to ask about Cyprus and Turkey and inflation, and of course, all they want to talk about is Nixon. And he came out of that press conference angry, and…

Laird: And he thought that was all they were ever going to be interested in, as far as my term of president. And I want to put that aside – I’m going to put it aside. But he put it aside the wrong way. He should have gone along with Harlow and my scheme.

Smith: And tell us your scheme.

Laird: Well, our scheme was to bring about thirty to thirty-five members of the Senate and House and go down and have a nice little meeting with him.

Smith: Members of both parties?

Laird: Both parties. And Senator Stennis was one who agreed to do it. We had several others. We had quietly worked on this and I told Jerry about that – what we were doing. As a matter of fact, I could have talked to him the day before he pardoned. I didn’t realize it was that far along in the White House staff. I knew who was for and who was against. I knew that. But there were quite a few very important people for, including Kissinger, including Haig, including Buchanan – you know who they are. I don’t need to go through the whole thing. But they continued to urge Ford – the only way you are going to have any more press conferences where they talk to you about issues, if you get rid of the Nixon issue. They were wrong. We could still have pardoned him, but you’d pardon because there was a great popular demand to get that thing over with. And to permit Ford and the Congress and Washington to move forward with problems of the nation and not keep that fire burning on the pardon. You’d have gotten rid of it.

Smith: But he didn’t do that.
Laird: No, he didn’t. And that’s because he’d agreed with his people Sunday morning, bright and early. They talked about it Saturday night, too. It was a shame because I thought I had him convinced the other way.

Smith: And you saw him that day?

Laird: Saw him? I played eighteen holes of golf with him, and I had lunch with him.

Smith: What was his mood?

Laird: His mood was fine. The next day, when we were out on the first tee, he asked me, “What do you think about that pardon?” I said, “Jerry, you know what I think about the way that was handled. If you don’t, you’re blind, deaf, and dumb, because I’ve talked to you about that.” And I said, “Now, listen, we’ve got a chance to win this tournament, we’re only two shots behind. I’ll talk to you about the pardon, what happened today, after this golf game.”

Smith: In the book, the extraordinary revelation is, at least the claim is made, that the pardon was unnecessary.

Laird: That is correct.

Smith: What is the background of that?

Laird: Well, you know, I had a lot to do with putting together Leon Jaworski. You probably knew that.

Smith: Now, this is after Archibald Cox is fired, and a search is on for another special prosecutor.

Laird: A search, and I had the responsibility to get a prosecutor and get it fast. So I called Freddy Vinson, the son of the former Chief Justice. I was having dinner with him at the Shoreham Hotel. It was a crippled children’s ball. My wife and I always went with the Vinson’s and a few other people that were old time Washington people. And I said, “Charley, I just got back from the White House. I was called away from the dinner and was told that the attorney general was not going to be cooperative on getting – he’d gone back over – he had told us he was going to fire Cox.” And he agreed to that at the White House that Saturday about two o’clock. He called me, and I was getting ready for this dance/party, and he said, “Mel, I can’t do it.” And I said, “Jeez, I’ve been working on a new person. We’ve got a hell of a guy for this.” I’d talked to the Congressman from Houston, who lived in the same building complex as Jaworski. Jaworski was also recommended to me by Vinson, and he was very friendly with Vinson. But he said, “He’s ____________ bar association, he’s got a hell of a reputation, you’ll have no problem with him as special prosecutor.”

I thought everything was worked out that afternoon. I went back over there and there was a gol-dern explosion in the Justice Department and the whole deal was off. But it finally worked out, you know, and Jaworski was appointed and he was a great man for that job. I don’t think Jaworski would ever have recommended that there be someone else appointed. He would have just suggested somebody else, but in a nice way. As a matter of fact, you can talk to his Congressman, who still is very much alive, and he’s a good man. But anyway, this would have been working out a while. I also got involved in naming the council for the impeachment committee.

A man from Wisconsin, for whom I had great respect and admiration. And he was a good council.

Smith: John Doar.

Laird: Yes, John Doar. John Doar was from up in River Falls, Wisconsin, and I’d tried to get him to run for Congress, but he declined. He was a Republican – you know that? A long Republican family.

Smith: But my understanding was, at some point after the pardon takes place, Jaworski indicated that he had no intention of indicting Nixon?

Laird: I think that’s true. If you’ll talk to his Congressman, he’ll tell you the same thing.

Smith: Which would, in effect, render the pardon unnecessary.

Laird: Yeah, but that’s another story entirely. Ford went the other way. You understand.
Smith: Yeah. Back up, because you had left the Defense Department and then you had come, somewhat reluctantly, back into the Nixon White House.

Laird: I came back in, yeah.

Smith: When you first heard about the Watergate break in, what was your reaction?

Laird: Well, I didn’t think the president probably had anything to do with it. That was my first reaction.

Smith: Right. Did you discuss it with Ford?

Laird: Yeah. But then I got other information. You know where I got the information?

Smith: From Fred Buzhardt?

Laird: Yeah. He was my general counsel for four years, in Defense. He came out to my house and he said, “Mel, you’re getting caught out on a limb here. I want you to know that Nixon is in this thing up to his neck.” And he said, “I shouldn’t be telling you this because I am counsel for President Nixon.” But he said, “I was your counsel for four years over in Defense, and I’ve always tried to protect you. I’ve gone over all the tapes, and he’s guilty.” That was a shocker to me. I went and told Bryce Harlow, and I felt that I had to tell Bryce.

Smith: Who was also on the White House staff at that point – troubleshooter. What was his reaction?

Laird: He said, “Mel, we’ve got to go.” So that next day I told Nixon I was leaving, that I couldn’t go for somebody that had lied to me.

Smith: Did he ask you what had led you to believe that he had lied to you? You obviously didn’t give Buzhardt’s…

Laird: No, I didn’t tell him…I said I’ve talked to someone who has listened to the tapes. I didn’t tell him. He knew who it was, because they always kind of worried about my relationship with Fred, anyway.

Smith: When you told him that, what was his reaction?
Laird: I said, “I can’t stay with you any longer.” He said, “Mel, I wish you would reconsider that. I would like you to stay.” I said, “I can’t, somebody that lied to me.” That’s it. So I resigned.

Smith: Ford said much of the same thing. It goes back to this Boy Scout image.

Laird: But Ford never got the word from Fred. I tried to tell Ford.

Smith: What did you tell him?

Laird: I told him, “I know that he’s guilty.”

Smith: And is this before Ford is vice president, when he was still on the Hill?

Laird: No, no, no.

Smith: Oh, this was during his vice presidency?

Laird: Yeah.

Smith: You played an integral role in Ford being selected for the vice presidency.

Laird: He wouldn’t have been selected if I wasn’t up there. I guarantee you that. Because Nixon came in the morning before Ford was appointed and he told Harlow and me that he was going to appoint John Connally. And we said, “Well, that’s a mistake. Will you give us twenty-four hours? We’d like to get some people from the Hill down here to talk with you, because that is a bad, bad mistake. It is wrong person at this time.” I have nothing against Connally, I have great respect and admiration for him, but he should not be in that position now. We had just gone through a lot of things in which really, he had been accused of various things, and I thought you had to make a real clean appointment as vice president. And I did recommend Rockefeller.

Smith: And what was Nixon’s reaction to that?

Laird: I’m talking to you now about the appointment of Rockefeller during Ford.

Smith: Oh, I see. Okay.

Laird: I mean, I was for Ford in the first time, but this time it had to do with…
Smith: When Ford needed a vice president.

Laird: Yeah. We get a little bit ahead of ourselves.

Smith: Let me go back to the Ford selection. Nixon wants Connally. He sees Connally as his successor.

Laird: Well, he loved Connally.

Smith: What was it about Connally that he…

Laird: Well, he thought he was a flamboyant, sort of a wonderful guy – that kind of guy that he would have loved to have been. He would have loved to have been a John Connally.

Smith: That self-assurance?

Laird: Yeah.

Smith: The Texas swagger?

Laird: Oh, yeah. He wanted that. He was his hero. That’s right. You’re making fun of me, but…

Smith: No, no, no, listen, I know exactly what you are saying.

Laird: It’s true, I’m telling you.

Smith: My question then is: there is a story – and I don’t know whether it’s true or not, but I’ve heard it from more than one source – supposedly Nixon said to Rockefeller at one point there in the Oval Office about this time, and Nixon says, “Can you imagine Jerry Ford in that chair?” Nixon thought Ford was his insurance against impeachment. Which was a total misreading of the reality of the situation. That actually, Ford may have made it more likely that Nixon would have been impeached.

Laird: Right.

Smith: You, then, must have discussed with Ford – over the years there has been this notion that there was no transition, no planning for a transition, that everything happened…
Laird: Oh, yeah, we had a transition. We had a good transition.

Smith: When he became vice president, did you think the odds were that he would become president?

Laird: Yes.

Smith: You did?

Laird: I thought we ought to plan for it.

Smith: And how did you discuss that with him?

Laird: Well, I discussed it with him on several occasions – that this thing was getting out of hand, and that he would become president.

Smith: What was his response?

Laird: He always said, “Oh, I’m not sure.” I said, “Jerry, just prepare for it.”

Smith: And how did you prepare for it?

Laird: Well, first you tried to give some thought into who would be your vice president. Secondly, you’d get into your cabinet and you’d have to make a change of at least half the cabinet – immediately.

Smith: Which he didn’t do.

Laird: No. Which he should have done.

Smith: Was that ‘Good Old Jerry’?

Laird: Good Old Jerry. He loved people and he never wanted to disappoint them.

Smith: Is that a weakness in a president?

Laird: I think it’s a weakness. I think you’ve got to be somewhat of a SOB sometimes, as a president. Or else have somebody real good that will play that part for you.

Smith: Before the smoking gun tape came out, do you think Ford, at some point in that period, began to believe, himself, that he might be president?
Laird: I think so.

Smith: He’s in an impossible position, isn’t he?

Laird: Yeah. He couldn’t show that because that would have been harmful to him.

Smith: He had to be loyal to Nixon, but he couldn’t be so loyal as to…

Laird: No, but you don’t have to.

Smith: Is that why he got on a plane and flew around the country?

Laird: You can finesse that. He’s busy.

Smith: Do you think that’s why he spent so much time out of Washington?

Laird: Oh, yeah. Sure. I think it was a good idea, too.

Smith: I take it you were genuinely surprised when Nixon lied to you. Do you think he was, as well?

Laird: I don’t know because I really didn’t really want to believe Nixon lied to me. I really didn’t, and I imagine he felt the same way. When Fred Buzhardt came out to my home, that was a sad day for me. I just had always hoped that he hadn’t been involved.

Smith: Before I forget – I heard him say, you were the person who tipped him off to the impending Agnew problem.

Laird: Yes, I did.

Smith: What was the background? I guess it was right at the time that Haldeman and Ehrlichman had been fired.

Laird: Well, how I heard about it will probably embarrass somebody, and I don’t want to embarrass anybody. But a very good friend came to me and told me about the proceedings in Maryland. And I tipped off several people in the Hill. I went to John Anderson, who was a friend of mine. I went to Jerry Ford. Jerry knew it in that period.

Smith: But he heard it first from you?
Laird: From me. You see the problem is, I couldn’t really tell how I knew because, although Buzhardt had been my general counsel for four years, and had a loyalty to me, it was not proper as general counsel to the president, probably, to talk to me. It wasn’t my problem, but it was Fred’s problem. Do you understand?

Smith: Yes. Sure.

Laird: And I protected that.

Smith: Was Ford surprised?

Laird: Yeah.

Smith: I take it there was never any real relationship between them, was there – between Ford and Agnew?

Laird: No, no, no. No relationship at all. But, of course, Ford was disappointed that this was going to break this way. He wanted to make sure that I was right, and I told him, I let him know how I heard. I said, “You know, it’s going to come out sometime, but I don’t want to embarrass Fred Buzhardt.” Fred Buzhardt was with me always and I made him general counsel of the Department of Defense and no one could have been loyaler than Fred Buzhardt.

Smith: By the way, just as an aside, did people speculate about the identity of Deep Throat?

Laird: Oh yes, sure.

Smith: Were there obvious suspects? Was there anything like a consensus about who it might be?

Laird: No, there was no consensus. He was one of the men who was talked about.

Smith: Mark Felt?

Laird: Yeah.

Smith: You were, on August 7, 1974, in a prayer meeting. Tell us about that group of people.
Laird: The prayer meeting.

Smith: Yeah.

Laird: I was leading the prayer meeting.

Smith: Tell us about that group, and Ford’s association with it. I think it might surprise people.

Laird: Now, you’re talking about two different prayer meetings. Ford and I had a group – you understand that?

Smith: Tell us about that.

Laird: Well, we met on Wednesdays and we went to the prayer room just off the rotunda. You probably don’t know where it is – it’s an interesting little room. It’s got stained glass windows and not many chairs in it. But we would meet there Wednesdays. We started out with Al Quie, who later became the governor of Minnesota, Jerry Ford, myself, and Charlie Goodell – there were only four of us. And then we filled in a few people later on. But for two years it was only the four of us. And even when Jerry became president, he kept up with his relationship with us. We had a couple of them down in the White House.

Smith: I know he said he didn’t wear his religion on his sleeve.

Laird: No, he didn’t.

Smith: But I take it, it was an important part of his life.

Laird: Yes, it was a very important part. I thought you were first talking about the big prayer meeting, in which I was...

Smith: I’m told he was called away, he was called down to the White House – that’s the particular event I’m getting at – on the eve of Nixon’s resignation. Can you describe that?

Laird: Well, that was a different deal at all. He was called down there, but that had to do with Billy Graham and a few others. Our prayer group was not connected with Billy Graham or any other people. You realize that?
Mel Laird   February 27, 2009

Smith:   Okay. But he was called…

Laird:   I was in charge of the big prayer meeting on the ’74, but that’s a different thing. Don’t get those confused – the little, small prayer group that we had on Wednesdays.

Smith:   Was there a time when you sat down with Richard Nixon, and to his face, told him he ought to resign?

Laird:   I told him that he had lied, and that I could not work for anybody that had made such a large lie, as far as our government was concerned. Now, you might have thought that I told him I couldn’t work and that I didn’t think a president of the United States was fit to be president after they lied. But that’s a different thing. I wasn’t out singing from the rooftops, that sort of thing. And I never embarrassed Fred Buzhardt. Never – until after he had died, and his wife gave me his papers, and she thought it was time to talk a little. That’s the only time.

Smith:   The day Nixon resigned, and then the next day when Ford comes in office, did you talk to Ford on either of those days?

Laird:   Yes.

Smith:   I mean, the day that Nixon resigned, did you have any contact with him?

Laird:   I had contact with him, and I had contact with him the next day. And I went out to his home, and we had kind of a light snack and sat around on the floor, just as we did after he was sworn in.

Smith:   Were the kids there? Was the family there?

Laird:   Yeah, kids were all there. And Ford was trying to take care of seating, taking sandwiches to people that night.

Smith:   And what was the mood?

Laird:   The mood was very good. We were happy it had come to an end.

Smith:   And that included Mrs. Ford?
Laird: Yeah. She had become involved in the last few weeks there, but she was glad everything was over.

Smith: Do you think she knew, at some point during those few weeks, that she was going to live in the White House?

Laird: Yeah, I think so.

Smith: Did you know about her problem at that point?

Laird: Yes. I knew about her problem, yeah. But I didn’t know exactly what it was. I thought it was – I didn’t realize it was drugs. I thought it was probably just too much booze at that time. Because we used to go down to the White House quite often, and we’d go upstairs and have a few drinks. I always had my Manhattans and she was drinking. I thought she was drinking. Now some people say that she was taking some sort of drugs that affected her. I don’t know. I knew her doctor well, though, and I can’t believe…I sent him over to the White House and he married one of my – Bill Broody – who was one of them in my office – he married Bill Broody’s secretary. As a matter of fact, I brought Bill Broody’s secretary home when I was over on one of my trips to Spain, and Bill was looking for a secretary and I said, “Bill, you’re not making any search for a secretary. I brought one back last week from Spain.” And this was a good gal.

Smith: One last thing and the minute I ask you about it, you’ll agree, I think. You were very candid in the criticism that you made about the fall of Saigon, about the last days of Vietnam, and, in some ways, because you were such a close friend of President Ford’s, I think it’s even more important to get that on the record. What was the nature of your criticism of how things were handled? And, given the political climate of that time, how might have things been handled differently?

Laird: Well, first, that was not Ford’s fault, and we’d gotten everybody out of there. There were a lot of stragglers, the people that looked like Americans on the helicopter, most of them weren’t Americans. No. You understand that?

Smith: Sure.
Laird: I thought we had prepared pretty well. They’d have a clean slate, but there were a lot of Vietnamese that wanted to get out of there and we ran several big _______________. The people that were on the helicopter thing in those bad pictures should have been avoided.

Smith: But the larger strategy – you criticized Congress for, in effect, pulling the plug.

Laird: I have always criticized them.

Smith: Describe that.

Laird: Well, you know, the Russians were pouring in tremendous amounts of money. As a matter of fact, in that last twelve months, they put in well over $2.8 billion, which was a sizable amount. We were trying to get $140 million out of the Congress, and I’ve always blamed Ford, Kissinger, and the secretary of defense at the time, Jim Schlessinger, for not pursuing that $140 million that was needed to make for a clean break there.

Smith: Given the political climate at that time, could they have gotten that money out of Congress?

Laird: Yes. I’ve always said that on national security issues, I never lost a single vote on anything. And that could have been handled, but you had to do it, the president had to do it, the secretary had to do it. Schlessinger really wasn’t for it, you know. You have to have leadership. For $140 million we let the whole thing end up in a fiasco. We could have had enough support and planned that exit in a much different way. And I blame the secretary, I blame Kissinger, and I blame Ford.

Smith: Did you discuss it with him?

Laird: Yes.

Smith: And what was his rejoinder?

Laird: He didn’t think it was worthwhile fighting over Vietnam anymore. But you weren’t fighting over Vietnam, you were fighting over what had been contributed and the sacrifices that had been made and now it came out in a different way. I could have shot that damned helicopter out of the sky, because that wasn’t a helicopter evacuating major players in that thing.

Smith: How should President Ford be remembered?

Laird: He should be remembered as the man that saved the country at a very important time after a great disappointment. As far as Nixon is concerned we could have completely lost faith in our system. We didn’t because of Jerry Ford.

Smith: That says it all. That’s perfect. Thank you.
Smith: Could you begin by explaining what the Military District of Washington is, and what it does?

Wagner: I'll give you a two part answer. The Military District of Washington is an Army two-star command in Washington, D.C. that is responsible for all Army and Joint Service ceremonial support to the federal government. Ceremonies at the White House, State Department, Pentagon, and then elsewhere in the National Capitol Region as directed. That includes responsibility for very large events like the inauguration of a president, DOD support to the inauguration of a president, state funerals, military support for summits – those kinds of events. It also includes things like day-to-day ceremonies in Arlington National Cemetery, retirements, promotions, color guards for community organizations, and everything in between. Since 9/11, when the U.S. Northern Command was established, that is the responsibility for homeland defense throughout the continental United States. That same time or roughly at that same time in 2003, a separate command was established here in Washington, D.C., which is the Joint Force Headquarters National Capitol Region and that essentially uses the MDW and some augmentation from other services to create a security homeland defense focused headquarters in the National Capitol Region. It also has responsibility for some of those larger events to include state funerals.

Smith: So is it, for lack of a better word, a kind of enhanced security component to your normal functions?

Wagner: That’s correct.

Smith: Auxiliary?

Wagner: In general terms, any military support in terms of homeland defense, in terms of disaster relief, any of those things, that is authorized in the United States is only at the request of local authorities. So, military support to an event like the inauguration or like a state funeral or for a nuclear security summit, as we saw recently here in the Washington, D.C. area, is essentially support that is requested by Secret Service or requested by the Congress of the United States, or requested by the District of Columbia, the city government, to provide capabilities that they don’t have.

Smith: Now, this may be splitting hairs, but I think there are people who would appreciate knowing what makes a state funeral a state funeral. I’ll qualify that by pointing out that Richard Nixon chose not to have a Washington component in his funeral. Harry Truman for very different reasons planned on such a component, and then in the end did not have it. There’s some confusion, at least in my mind, as to whether the Nixon funeral was a state funeral or not. Could you clarify that?

Wagner: Certainly. In the broadest historical sense, a state funeral is the funeral for a nation’s leader. As we see in Shakespeare, we see a king stand up and say “I am England.” He very literally means that he is the personality that holds the nation together. And so, in that way, when we talk about a state funeral, we talk about a national leader. A state funeral is more narrowly defined in military regulation as being a funeral for an incumbent president, former president, a president-elect, or another person designated by the president of the United States to receive a state funeral. The wording of a presidential proclamation that initiates a state funeral is not terrifically clear. It doesn’t traditionally use the words “state funeral,” though it may. It traditionally uses something that says “Speaking as the president, I therefore direct that the military forces or the armed forces of the United States will provide such courtesies as are appropriate to the station of President Ford,” for instance.

Smith: So, geography is not a factor, per se. The fact that a former president, for example, doesn’t lie in state in the Capitol, that his services take place entirely outside the city of Washington, that would not, per se, keep it from being a state funeral?

Wagner: That’s correct.
Smith: Using your own experience, how does one prepare for this job? And maybe you could give us a capsule description of what your job is.

Wagner: Fair enough. My title is Chief of State Funeral Plans and Operations at Joint Force Headquarters National Capitol Region. What that essentially means - I think of the job as being about equal thirds. It’s about one third liaison to the former First Family, to use the most typical example. About one third liaison to the family for development of the funeral plan, for discovering their desires, and for communicating those intentions to the other supporting members of the federal government and state and local communities as well. So, it’s about a third family liaison. It’s about a third military planning, how you get the right people in the right place, fed, watered, with a place to sleep, trained appropriately to conduct the ceremonies. And it’s about a third inter-agency liaison, if you will, such as talking to a local chief of police in a state, chief of police or police commander, and all the various inter-agency components that need to collaborate in order to make an event of this magnitude flow smoothly.

Smith: And how does one prepare – or does one prepare? Is there an obvious route to what you’re doing now?

Wagner: There’s not an obvious route. It feels a little bit as if it’s one of those things that, for me at least, a responsibility that I’ve fallen into and grown into, if you will.

Smith: How long have you been in that position?

Wagner: I’ve been responsible for planning funerals largely since 2000, so for ten years, with the primary responsibility really coming since about 2004.

Smith: Let me ask you, because obviously everyone’s different, everyone’s unique, every president, every presidential family, every First Lady – by the way, I think it’s safe to say there’s never been a state funeral for a former First Lady.

Wagner: That’s correct.

Smith: We don’t want to intrude on either state secrets or the legitimate realm of family privacy, but it would be very helpful if you could walk us through how you first got involved with the Ford family and the process leading up to the Ford funeral.

Wagner: Starting back in probably 1993 I was a member of The U.S. Army Band, (Pershing’s Own) here in Washington, D.C., and one of my responsibilities was to ensure that musical organizations across the country that might be called on in the case of a funeral for a former president, bands that were stationed in proximity to their homes, if you will, to the former president’s homes, were prepared to execute the ceremonies if necessary. In about 1993, that became a part of my responsibility and I began to work with Colorado National Guard Band and the Air Force Academy Band in the event that President Ford passed away in residence in Vail in the Beaver Creek area. Began to work with bands in the Midwest, including the Michigan National Guard Band there in Grand Rapids or Wyoming, Michigan and to periodically train them and train with them and ensure that they had the kind of assistance that they needed to be sure that they were properly outfitted in terms of uniforms and equipment and then to work the bands here in the Washington, D.C. area. Over time, that responsibility expanded. I got pulled in more and more questions of musical choices of liturgy and how those things fit together and I think started being invited along by my predecessor to talk about some of those things in meetings with family and senior staff.

Smith: How awkward was that, particularly early on?

Wagner: Well, it’s hard to go to anybody and say, “I’m here to talk with you about your funeral.” But it’s easy to talk with almost anyone about what’s important to them, about how they would like to be remembered, and about how they would like to see their legacy perpetuated. We all like to feel that we’ve made a difference. The individuals who’ve led this country are certainly no exception to that. They’ve definitely, each of them in their own unique ways, made significant differences in the world. And how that is thought of and how their story is told to a new generation is of great interest to them and to their family. One of the things that I find useful is not to go in and sit down and say, “Let’s plan a funeral,” but to really start the conversation with, “What’s important to you?” - “What places are important to you?” - “What parts of your story do you think are important to remember, maybe other than the White House years?”

Smith: Sure.

Wagner: The situation like that is what evolved into, for instance, in the course of President Ford’s funeral, really a chronological telling through the funeral of his World War II service, of his service in the House, and then as the Vice President and the President of the Senate before moving into the White House. That sequential storytelling really became the focus more than thinking about ‘How do we do a funeral?’

Smith: Let me ask you, because my sense is that, before you reached that phase of personalizing the ceremonies, there is a ceremonial plan. There’s some question over how much input the Fords had in what, for lack of a better word, I’ll call the “first draft.” I knew before the Reagan funeral there was a plan and it was in many ways an offshoot of the Eisenhower plan. The fact that now we have presidents on the west coast, clearly changes logistical planning. At one time, it was thought to require the overnight at Bethlehem Chapel on the grounds of Washington National Cathedral. And I know that was originally in the Reagan plan, and it was decided to dispense with that given the expected crowds. They wanted to go right to the Rotunda. Do you initially say the equivalent of. ‘Here’s a basic chassis. You customize this model to fit your desires’?

Wagner: That’s a fair question. When my predecessor twice removed, Paul Miller, who was responsible for the conduct of President Kennedy’s funeral, was called to the White House to implement that funeral plan, there was no consolidated plan. There were some general customs; there were some general notions that a cordon for a living president was twenty-one service members with the same symbolism as a twenty-one gun salute. And if the president had passed away and we were in fact carrying the casket to a cordon that it should be twenty-one members, as well.

Smith: The fact is, in November of 1963, there had not been a presidential funeral since Franklin Roosevelt’s.
Wagner: Correct.

Smith: So, a whole generation had passed.

Wagner: A whole generation and really no planning. And, even the Roosevelt funeral - the planning was definitely influenced by the fact that it was war time. There was much less of a public observance.

Smith: Ironic, given his historical and emotional connection to the American people.

Wagner: Exactly.

Smith: Is that why, for example, there was no lying in state at the Capitol - which has always struck me as bizarre?

Wagner: Yes. Right. And the records that I’ve read indicate that to be the case. That there was a sense that what was perceived as prolonged national mourning was in fact giving aid and comfort to the enemy and there was no interest in that. Interesting how our perspectives have changed.

Smith: Of course, it’s ironic, because after the fact, they found his wishes. And a lot of what was done in fact turned out, by accident, to have reflected his desire for a very simple service.

Wagner: To be precisely what he asked for. Sure. But, to get back to Kennedy, there really was no plan for the Kennedy funeral. And, after the Kennedy funeral—

Smith: By the way, what was done? I mean, the legend is Mrs. Kennedy wanted it patterned after the Lincoln funeral. And it’s astonishing what was done was done in the course of that weekend. But people went and did their research at the archives or wherever they did and came back and complied with her wishes.

Wagner: There was a lot of make it up one evening and execute it the next day during the course of the Kennedy funeral and some startling anomalies - the presence of soldiers of the Irish Republic at the gravesite in Arlington Cemetery. He’d been to Ireland recently and there was that heritage, but it was really kind of an odd thing when you think about it. He’d been many places in the world and why that? Timing. This contingent happened to be in the states, those kinds of things.

But, after the Kennedy funeral, the Department of Defense closed the barn door after the horses were gone and said, “There really ought to be a generic plan for a state funeral.” And it looks about like this: arrival at a location out of town, a church or a library or a public building, movement by air or by train to the nation’s capital, understanding the Bethlehem Chapel component, understanding that it’s difficult to do large scale ceremonies in the darkness, and then the procession to the Capitol for the lying in state, a church here in the nation’s capital for a funeral service, and then movement to an interment location. So, that framework is encapsulated in a document that was a Department of the Army pamphlet 1-1, published in 1965 and concurrently published as a Navy regulation, as an Air Force manual, as a Coast Guard regulation. We didn’t do Department of Defense directives in those days. The services all published the same thing with their own number on the front and that became the template, if you will.

Smith: By the way, one of the things that also resulted was a much longer series of ceremonies. It’s remarkable President Kennedy was assassinated on a Friday and buried on a Monday. That would not be the case presumably today.

Wagner: Right. But, if we look at that template being built and President Eisenhower being the first president to die after that, then the first public execution of that plan would’ve been in 1969 for President Eisenhower.

Smith: In between you had both Herbert Hoover and Douglas MacArthur who had state funerals.

Wagner: Right. And it’s interesting because, when I talk to incoming commanders, when I talk to individuals who will be key in some way to the state funeral planning process and kind of walk them through the history and authorizations and those things, I have a slide that says, “Who’s authorized a state funeral?” and in the lower right-hand corner, there’s that category “Other Individuals Authorized by the President of the United States.” That always occasions a great deal of nervousness because that implies that there’s really not advance planning. So, the question becomes ‘How often do we do that?’ And the answer, really, is that within the last fifty years, we’ve done it once.

Smith:  MacArthur.

Wagner:  For MacArthur and not really without planning, but by prior arrangement at the invitation of President Kennedy.

Smith:  Oh, okay. I didn’t realize that it had originated under Kennedy.

Wagner:  Kennedy actually wrote each of the World War II era five stars a personal letter and offered to them on behalf of the nation a state funeral. They were the heroes of his young adulthood clearly and he made that offer. General Eisenhower had already been president. Most of the rest of that group is a pretty self-effacing group of individuals and didn’t do it.

Smith:  Omar Bradley.

Wagner:  Omar Bradley, Chester Nimitz, Hap Arnold – I’m going to do this upside down and backwards - but that group.

Smith:  Everyone but MacArthur.

Wagner:  But MacArthur said, “Why, yes, thank you.” And if the camera wasn’t running, I’d say maybe he thought, “Well, if Truman got one then maybe I should get one, too.”

Smith:  It’s interesting. He’d established this unlikely friendship with Kennedy.

Wagner:  Sure.

Smith:  Kennedy had expected a blowhard and was, in fact, mesmerized by MacArthur at his most mesmerizing.

Wagner:  So MacArthur did receive a state funeral. He died at the Waldorf Astoria the old Walter Reed Army Hospital and returned to New York. Departure from New York Penn Station. Whenever I think I’m having a bad day, I imagine what it must’ve been like to stage a departure on 7th Avenue.

Smith:  At the Armory.
Wagner: And then movement, exactly. Just can’t imagine it. But then came by train to Washington and then onto Norfolk where he’s buried. The interesting thing is that when you talk to people who remember the Kennedy assassination, they don’t remember the Hoover funeral and they don’t remember the MacArthur funeral, both of which happened soon after and really in the shadow of the Kennedy funeral.

Smith: I remember them vividly.

Wagner: Well, you’re like me, you’re a buff. You’re a student of this. But no one ever says, “Oh, yes, of course, I remember the MacArthur funeral as well.”

Smith: Bobby Kennedy. Did he have a state funeral?

Wagner: He did not.

Smith: Okay.

Wagner: There are a few individuals over time that have received what DOD has chosen to call ‘funerals without classification’.

Smith: Earl Warren, for example. Would he be in that side?

Wagner: A Chief Justice would be authorized an official funeral which is just a step down, really. It involves almost the same forces as a state funeral.

Smith: So, Chief Justice Rehnquist, for example, who died on the job.

Wagner: Died on the job. Was authorized an official funeral. The call was made from the White House to the family, making that offer. The family chose to celebrate his life in a more private way, if you will, to involve the Court community, to involve his church community, and, beyond that, to be very, very private.

Smith: Yeah. Again, that goes to the heart of the fact that every family has its own unique characteristics, its own pattern, and there needs have to be superimposed on—

Smith: Of course you weren’t around, but the Truman funeral was famous. Elaborate services were planned and he is said to have observed, “It’s going to be a great show. Too bad I’m not going to be around to enjoy it.” And then, of course, he lived long enough it was December and Mrs. Truman, I guess, the feeling was she really wasn’t up to the whole Washington end of things. And so that was cancelled. And, in some ways, it became more poignant being restricted to Independence because that was so evocative of Truman the man. And then, Nixon, on his own, decided not to have a Washington component.

Wagner: Absolutely. So, it had been a very long time since a funeral with a Washington component when President Reagan died in June of 2004.

Smith: Thirty-one years.

Wagner: Since President Johnson in January of ’73.

Smith: It’s obviously a little bit off the story, but it goes to the process. I knew there was a plan, a quite elaborate plan, but my sense was the old gang got together, the team that had presented Reagan and they had their input. There were changes made along the way.

Wagner: Well, I think it’s fair to say that that community that had been closely involved with the Reagan White House in terms of advance was involved to a considerable extent for years, that President Reagan had had conversations with a number of those individuals over time and shared intent with them. And that, in fact, there was a detailed plan that changed very little after execution. There’s always a question when you lay out a plan with a family about the desired sequence of events and how you build in rest, and how a plan might need to be different in December than it is in June just because of the number of hours of daylight that are available.

Smith: At one point, the idea was that the final service would take place in the courtyard as opposed to moving it out with the spectacular view of the mountains and the ocean beyond. And I remember at one point suggesting, “Ronald Reagan was a great communicator. There’s a whole generation that’s as mesmerized by his voice as FDR’s radio audiences were. Somewhere in this service, his voice should be heard.” I still think it would’ve been dynamite. And Mrs. Reagan thought about it and said, “I couldn’t get through it.” Well, jump ahead and, of course, the idea resurfaced in the Ford funeral.

Wagner: Yes, it did.

Smith: And we had this remarkable clip from his farewell address to Congress. He didn’t have an Eisenhower TV farewell address. His address appropriately was on Capitol Hill. And at the end, he had this very poignant prayer for the American people, powerful stuff.

Wagner: Absolutely.

Smith: And it was incorporated in the plan. And it didn’t happen. I assume for similar reasons, the decision was made to have Father Certain read that prayer.

Wagner: Yes, the decision was made the night before the service in Grace at the family’s request that his voice not fill that church on that last day.

Smith: Do things like that happen? I mean, are there last minute changes?

Wagner: Always. Always. There are last minute changes due to health of family members. There are last minute changes due to what’s going on in the world. When President Reagan died in June of 2004, the incumbent president, President Bush, was in Florence, Italy, en route to Normandy for the 60th Anniversary of D-Day observance, en route to Sea Island, Georgia for an economic summit. In fact, there were a number of world leaders already gathered on Sea Island. Not only was the White House concerned about how they could interrupt the flow of those world events, but the Reagan family and staff were sensitive to the timing of those events and the importance that they would’ve held for President Reagan. So, adjustments were made in time schedule in the frantic first day or first half day of trying to put a schedule together for the conduct of that funeral. Changes were made about the timing of events in order to deal with who needed to be where, when, when aircraft to get people could be made available, to move the family, those kinds of things.
Smith: That brings up something. When President Ford died - the first service in the Rotunda that Saturday night where Dick Cheney, in effect, spoke for the country. There was some comment about the fact that the President wasn’t there. The President was at his ranch. But the plan always had been - because of the Capitol Hill component - that the vice president would be the chief eulogist that evening.

Wagner: Well, the situation there was different. In the cases of both the Reagan and Ford funerals, Mr. Cheney delivered the eulogy on Capitol Hill. The reason behind it was different. During the course of the Reagan funeral, because of President Bush’s commitments to the economic summit in Sea Island, the options essentially were offered to the family about whether it was preferable to wait until the incumbent president could be there or to allow the vice president to offer the eulogy in the Rotunda. And the decision was made to proceed and have Mr. Cheney offer the remarks there. Then President Bush was in fact back in the city, paid his respects, while President Reagan lay in state and escorted Mrs. Reagan in the National Cathedral. In the case of the Fords, because of the close personal relationship between Vice President Cheney and President Ford and the Ford family, the request had been placed before the funeral from the family to the White House that Mr. Cheney be allowed to speak for the administration, that the incumbent president defer to him, which the Bush administration was happy to do.

Smith: Knowing that President Bush would be speaking for the nation at the Cathedral.

Wagner: Exactly.

Smith: How did the Ford plan change over the years? My experience - I talked about it a little bit – was that the one thing he was adamant about was that he did not want a caisson through the streets of Washington. I wonder if you had that conversation or other people, your associates, had that conversation. There are some legends about what may or may not have been said. It’s a revealing request.
Wagner: It is. As I came to the Ford plan in terms of contact with those on the staff who were really involved in shepherding the plan over the years, if you will. There was a choice of what I would call stage one of the area of demise - whether there would be services in Vail and Beaver Creek to start with, or whether the services would initially be in Palm Springs where they were in residence. There was always the intent of going home to the museum in Grand Rapids for interment. The Nation’s Capital was always very important to the Fords, not only because of his service, but I think because the Washington, D.C. area is where the family grew up, the children grew up. There was active discussion for many years between my predecessors and the Fords, including the President, about whether or not there would be a main funeral procession on Constitution Avenue. I think that you were one of the people who were asked by President Ford at one point to offer your thoughts on that subject. And, in fact, as I became more directly involved with the funeral in the fall of 2004, early November of 2004—

Smith: So, post-Reagan funeral.

Wagner: Post-Reagan funeral and I think that’s critical. Post-Reagan funeral, most of the individuals that I would call my clients took that opportunity to reflect on what they might like their own funeral to be like. And the Fords, as they called their team together to entertain those discussions, were quick to express the fact that in their mind the Reagan funeral, the sequence of the conduct of the ceremonies, was perfect for President Reagan and perfect for that family. That it addressed their needs, it addressed his legacy. But that it didn’t feel like them, like the Ford family. They were anxious to think about ways in which President Ford’s funeral could be not different for different’s sake, but different in ways that told the story of a different man.

Smith: Exactly. I wrote him a memo – I don’t know if you ever saw it or heard about it –

Wagner: I tried not to quote it just a moment ago.

Smith: It started out by saying, “Your funeral has to be Truman-esque, not Reagan-esque,” simply making the point that, “This is the most personal decision.
you’ll make, but it is a story and that your story is your story. It’s not a reflection on any other president. Each one of these is unique.” I remember in 2000, the first time when Marty and I went out there and had the conversation with him, both of them. And, needless to say, subsequently the plans were much changed. I would say much improved. But he was adamant at that point. So, that was not a seed that anyone else planted. And, before the Reagan funeral, he felt pretty strongly about it. Which, again, just goes to show that every one of these is as personalized as a fingerprint.

Wagner: Absolutely.

Smith: It’s awkward. If you think that maybe something should be revisited, if you think that perhaps some ceremonial is being overlooked, can you have that conversation? Can you invite reconsideration of decisions or do you just sort of salute and say ‘whatever you want’.

Wagner: Well, you can invite reconsideration. Obviously, you have to sense the room, you have to sense people, you have to sense a time when they’re open to such discussions. And families and staffs work differently.

Smith: Did you find the Fords and those around them to be fairly comfortable to deal with?

Wagner: The meetings, particularly in Palm Springs, starting on November 4th of 2004, and moving forward until just a few months before his death, were remarkable collaborative staff exercises that I was privileged to be a part of. Family friends like Ann Cullen, trusted advisors like Greg Willard; the professional staff, Penny Circle, certainly the Secret Service was always with us, and the children, increasingly with Jack especially. You were involved in many of those and people representing the Foundation.

Smith: Is there anything unconventional about the process that this went through?

Wagner: Well, everybody approaches the subject differently. My sense is, and I probably of all the people in the room for those meetings, had less direct experience of working with President Ford than anyone else. But that series of meetings rang true with my understanding. Essentially there would be memos and there would be updated plans and updated proposals and people would make their arguments in writing. And then that group would come together and spend the mornings thrashing them out. And then we’d all have lunch. We’d come back after lunch. President and Mrs. Ford would sit at the head of the table. We’d brief what we thought the best answers were. And we’d get the crooked finger of the President’s that said, ‘Yes, that part was good and that part was not so good.

Smith: Were there things that were rejected?

Wagner: There were many things that were talked about and that evolved over time. And it became both a planning effort and in many ways a story-telling. Really a remarkable time.

Smith: Yeah. The fact that they wanted to have a journalist among the eulogists - originally to be Hugh Sidey until he passed away - is part of that story.

Wagner: Absolutely.

Smith: And the fact that they wanted Jimmy Carter is a significant part of that story.

Wagner: Absolutely.

Smith: For the message that it sent. It’s interesting. When you’re up there and you’re doing that, you’re in a fog and you’re trying to hold yourself together and the Fords are sitting right in front of you.

Wagner: When you’re eulogizing.

Smith: Yeah. But for some reason it sticks in my memory, I remember I heard this sound and I looked over and Rosalyn Carter was weeping. I thought to myself, “Who would’ve thought thirty years ago that this is how the story ends?” Only in America. You know? I’ll never forget. On Air Force One, going back to Grand Rapids, President Carter had Gerald Ford’s youngest great-grandchild on his shoulder and was walking up and down the aisle. Did you see that?

Wagner: I did. I have a copy of that picture in my office.
Smith: I mean, what an extraordinary sight. Do you have memories of things that stick out in your mind of that trip? Were you prepared for the public response, which I know, many colleagues in the media, found surprising.

Wagner: Places where I was stunned by the response – and I’ve been in a lot of funeral motorcades, including the last trip with President Reagan from Point Mugu to the library, which was astonishing, just astonishing. But the congregation in the Cathedral on a day when most of Washington didn’t have to be there, didn’t even have to be in the city - the full Cathedral there, the arrival in Grand Rapids - and pretty much everything in Grand Rapids, that evening, going out and there being just tens of thousands of people standing in the cold—

Smith: On a January night. The weather, of course, was perfect, though.

Wagner: It was better than we had any right to expect. Far better than we had any right to expect.

Smith: Yes. Certainly, the odds were not in our favor. I know a few members of the family and I think Mrs. Ford in particular were surprised that Saturday when they flew back to Andrews and drove through Alexandria. She was astonished that night at the crowds on the streets. Obviously, they hadn’t lived in the neighborhood in a long time; I just don’t think they were prepared for what they saw.

Wagner: At some point in that drive, we were in Redskins football game traffic leaving Andrews on the Beltway and eight, ten lanes of traffic just stopped, got out of the car and stood.

Smith: Really?

Wagner: Coming through Alexandria in the dark with a hundred and twenty-some car motorcade including the incumbent vice president during war time and we’re on Alexandria streets that were designed for horse and buggies to pass at the wide spots.

Smith: They’re designed for George Washington’s funeral.
Wagner: There you go. And I’m just thinking, “My goodness, what are we in the midst of here?” And yet, the turnout in the dark in the drizzle was quite remarkable.

Smith: And, clearly the family was blown away by what they were saying.

Wagner: Terrifically.

Smith: And the stop at the World War II Memorial which turned out to be much more than a photo op. The little things. Again, the decision to go into the Capitol, not up the main staircase, as is done ordinarily, but through the House, presumably reflecting his long service there.

Wagner: Right. And we talked about that early in the planning process, early in the conversation about the possibility of doing that. The word ‘unprecedented’ arrival up some steps other than the main central rotunda steps came up, and we had a hallway conversation during a break. Actually, because the Johnson funeral was within days of an inauguration at that point, it was conducted on the East side and the swearing in platform was in fact still over the center steps during the Johnson funeral in January of ’73. It is in fact true that within recent memory, other steps have been used at the Capitol on the East side, but never the House steps and then proceeding to the House Chamber. That tribute on the House side makes the story of President Ford’s funeral even more powerful. But we need use the right words, or we’ll get a call from the Johnson girls with a gentle reminder on the East side of the Capitol generally.

Smith: Music, scripture, all of those things had to be chosen or re-chosen, as the case may be.

Wagner: Yes. Music, as it evolved over time, highlighting always the close relationship of the Fords with the Army Chorus over the years.

Smith: And especially Alvy Powell.

Wagner: And especially Alvy Powell. Highlighting his Navy service in “Eternal Father,” and I wish I had a nickel for every email that we wrote over the years concerning the use of “Hail the Victors” in a funeral and how to do that appropriately. And I think one of the great adventures – you talked about how the funeral changed in process – well, it had been long been a request of President Ford that the University of Michigan band welcome him back to Michigan. And we had a little problem because the University of Michigan was in the Rose Bowl.

Smith: For which he would’ve been the loudest cheerleader.

Wagner: Which would’ve definitely been fine with him. Wherever he was, it was fine with him. That wasn’t the issue at all. But the issue was how to get the band back or if it was possible to get the band back.

Smith: The band wanted to participate.

Wagner: The band wanted very much to participate, but the timing of the Rose Parade and the game was such that it essentially meant that the band had to leave immediately after the game, go to the airport, get on a charter aircraft, come to Grand Rapids, have breakfast, change clothes, and play the arrival ceremony. The University of Michigan did have planes chartered to move the band. They had planes chartered to move the University leadership and trustees and on about the third or fourth loop, to get around to moving the band. And there were long conversations about how they really needed to consider what was most important on that overnight flight. In fact, the first folks that came home were not the big donors, or the university trustees. It was the band. The rest of the University of Michigan community spent an extra day in California and waited for the plane to come back for them. And we were able to have the band welcome the President home.

Smith: Did anything go wrong? That’s not a fair question to ask, but I can’t resist because, if it did, I should preface, no one noticed. I’ll give you an example. Even the fact that we were running a little bit late turned out to be a blessing because the interment and those planes and the sunset were synchronized.

Wagner: I’d like to take credit for that, but at that point, we were hours off schedule, but it didn’t matter. It didn’t matter. Greg Willard and I had a conversation early in that last day and decided that essentially it was going to take as long as it took and that Mrs. Ford was going to move at her speed and we weren’t going to be concerned.
Smith: As I recall, the original plan was that the museum would close a little bit earlier than it did, but that the lines were so long - did you sort of bump up against the latest possible time?

Wagner: We built some extra time in. We had a little bit of flex there.

Smith: And I noticed the line was moving a lot faster at the end than it was at the beginning.

Wagner: It was. We reengineered a few things in the middle of the night, too. It's an interesting building. It's not a building that's designed to have large numbers of people go through the lobby.

Smith: 60,000 people overnight.

Wagner: Overnight.

Smith: Phenomenal.

Wagner: In the winter, all wearing heavy coats.

Smith: Yeah. A two-mile line at one point and extraordinary camaraderie. I don't think there was an arrest that night.

Wagner: If there was, I never heard about it.

Smith: Did anything go wrong?

Wagner: You did come back to that question, didn't you?

Smith: I recall a couple times when it seemed like we were waiting.

Wagner: Well, and that's what I would say. There are places and the one that comes to mind is leaving the United States Capitol on the way to the Cathedral service. Would I have wished that family and honorary pallbearers had less of a wait before the casket and the four children came down the steps? Yes, absolutely. It was plenty cold that morning.

Smith: Yeah.
Wagner: That was a long, cold stand. But my abiding image of that, until the casket came down the steps, was just a beautiful picture on that early winter morning - was a sailor at the end of the cordon, bottom of the cordon, and the wind was blowing and that Dixie cup hat came off. The two people standing closest to the sailor were Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Cheney and they bent down, picked up the hat, and put it back on the head. It blew off again and they did it again.

Smith: I had been up at the cathedral with ABC that morning, but I was told by people afterwards that one of the things that surprised them – and, again, particularly after no caisson, et cetera, et cetera – that there were a surprising number of people who were out on the street of Washington that morning to pay their respects.

Wagner: Including the White House house staff on the North side who passed by. Including the Blair House staff, who’d become quite close to the family in those few days.

Smith: Really? That’s very touching.

Wagner: It was something.

Smith: We talked a little bit about the Cathedral service. My sense was that the first President Bush who is sensitive to the fact that he tears up really easily was consciously trying not to get too emotional. Came close a couple of times. I think this was just a few days after he had teared up – there was a scene where he was introducing Jeb in Florida to the legislature or something and he got very emotional. And he was probably embarrassed by that fact. But it was an interesting choice of speakers. I think most people were surprised Mrs. Reagan was there. I don’t think they knew in advance. At least that’s what I heard later, that they did not know that she was going to be there. It was obviously pretty gracious on her part to make that effort.

Wagner: Sure.

Smith: Did you know that she was going?

Wagner: I knew she’d be there.
Smith: And then, it’s so funny, a friend of mine who’d been in the Johnson administration after watching Mrs. Ford go all the way down the aisle, said, “She’s got a dancer’s legs.” It’s complimentary, but that must’ve been quite an ordeal. I don’t think her health was perfect that week and it must’ve exacted a real toll.

Wagner: Well, we - family and Greg Willard and certainly General Guy Swan who was her escort – we were all very protective of her throughout the week and making sure many times that there was a second person on her other arm. And she was a trooper. And getting out of the car and up the steps into the Cathedral was one person and walking down the aisle was a very self-possessed woman.

Smith: It’s interesting you say that. The following week, when she was at home, someone commented to her on how impressed they were, particularly at that long walk at the very end in Grand Rapids. We’d been told at ABC, “Don’t be surprised if you see her in a wheelchair.” Of course, we never did until the very end and then she got out and I think she was on Steve’s arm and walked all the way down to the interment.

Wagner: Right, there was a General on one side and Steve on the right.

Smith: And this person complimented her and said, “I don’t know how you did it.” And in a sort of matter of fact way, she said, “I just did what my husband would want me to do.” Says volumes.

Wagner: Exactly.

Smith: The kids impressed a lot of people. A lot of people hadn’t seen them, of course, in years. Their gesture of going down to the Capitol and greeting people, which they then repeated in Grand Rapids, drew a lot of favorable comment.

Wagner: It was interesting. Remarkable. Again, I think very genuine, very much in character with his family. When I think about that – I’m trying to get my days straight – it would’ve been, I think, Sunday evening. We arrived at the Capitol on Saturday late in the day. Sunday evening, Mrs. Ford’s children and their spouses, a few close friends and staff came up from Blair House to the Capitol around dinner time. It was dark. I don’t remember how late in the evening it was, but it was dark. Their intent was to just go and sit inside the circle for awhile. And we came in on the House side through the door under the House steps and Betty and the grandchildren and the girls were there. I had been busy all day getting ready for the next week’s events, for the 2nd and the 3rd and hadn’t watched the news. And we came in through the door and the girls, the grandchildren, met Mrs. Ford in the hallway down just inside the door and proceeded to tell her all about their day, speaking with people in the Rotunda who’d come to pay their respects. I was done. It was remarkable - this sharing moment. Maybe it snuck up on me because I hadn’t been watching it on the news. I’d been too busy. But it was a moment, very much a Ford family moment.

Smith: How much of a problem did the New Year’s holiday create? Did it require significant changes in the planning or in the plan?

Wagner: Not really.

Smith: I mean, did you just add a day in D.C.?

Wagner: We just added another day in Blair House, another day in the Capitol. It didn’t create a problem. The kind of behind the scenes piece of that is that, because it was over the New Year in the year of a cycle of an off-year election, we carried in with the Republican Party in control of both houses of Congress and we carried out three days later with the Democratic Party in control of both houses of Congress.

Smith: By the way, there really did seem to be genuine bipartisan feeling surrounding these events in D.C., more than pro forma, more than the purely ceremonial kinds of reactions that you get sometimes.

Wagner: Absolutely. Absolutely. But it was interesting just from a staff perspective of ‘here’s the staff of the Speaker’s office, the Majority Leader’s office, all the political appointees who were associated with rules and those committees that are very important to the conduct of an event like this on the Hill. And everybody has their office in a box under their arm and they’re in the process of moving and they’re bringing their life with them into the meeting. And it’s sitting on the conference table in front of them as we’re collaborating to make the plan for events up there. I think that part was seamless. I don’t think anybody outside of those staff meetings saw it, but it was an interesting time.

Smith: I remember walking up there and the thought - on the first day of the year - a line of people waiting to get inside the Capitol to pay their respects. Speaking of unprecedented.

Wagner: Right. Absolutely.

Smith: How did the family express themselves to you and your colleagues?

Wagner: They were remarkably warm and genuine to everyone who supported the event. They made a point of speaking to body bearers, to individuals standing guard of honor. It was very personal to them. Very personal.

Smith: I’ve heard rumors, only rumors, that other first families, were moved by what they felt to be the intimacy, the family feeling, for lack of a better word, that accompanied the pomp and the official aspects. It felt like a family funeral.

Wagner: Sure.

Smith: And that they took that into consideration in some of their own plans. I understand that the Johnson girls revisited their plans. What impact do you think it had?

Wagner: Well, I think the impact is in terms of how other First Families look at state funerals. I think the impact is actually a combined impact of the Reagan and Ford funerals occurring in reasonable proximity and being very different events with very different feelings. Each perfect in their own way. Each perfect for the family. And each in that way that we don’t necessarily understand, I think, perfect for the Nation at that time and that moment.

Smith: That does raise the question of creative tension between the state aspects and the personal ones. There’s always going to be a little bit of back and forth in terms of striking the balance.

Wagner: Well, there’s an art and a science to it.
Smith: So, you necessarily re-invent the wheel in some ways with each.

Wagner: In some ways.

Smith: Again, they both in their own way influenced what follows.

Wagner: Sure, and I think if other families take away lessons, to use the example of the Fords and Carters as a remarkable example of families and individuals who have been in that unique position of being President of the United States and who find common ground whatever their differences may have been. The families do talk, the staffs do talk, and I think the message that they’ve taken away is one that they do have an opportunity to work with the host of people who will support the funeral to build an event. And ‘event’ sometimes sounds like a harsh word, but not really. To tell the story once again in a way that is meaningful for them and meaningful for the nation.

Smith: Is there an awareness that this is in fact a national event? That, however intense the personal grief is in the family and among close friends, there is inevitably a national component.

Wagner: There is. These are families who have lived – many of them almost half of their lives and many of their children, most of their cognizant lives in the spotlight, if you will, of being on the national stage. They do have an awareness of that. They also have the remarkable gift of each of the individuals who I have known that has been President of the United States - that when you are with them, you have a sense of your complete engagement and their complete engagement and involvement. A very strong sense of presence and of connections. It’s a great thing, makes great successful politicians, but it also means that there are many thousands of people who feel a genuine, very real for them, personal connection. And, I think families recognize that they also need to have an opportunity to grieve and celebrate.

Smith: Where there people surprised that Jimmy Carter was giving a eulogy for Gerald Ford Wagner: There may have been people during the funeral who had an opportunity to hear what the gallery was whispering. I certainly wasn’t one of them.

Smith: But in terms of the general public, you wonder whether – a lot of people didn’t know that they’d become friends.

Wagner: But a lot of people also didn’t remember where things stood or where things seemed to stand in 1977 either. And I think it may be only for those of us who remember the one can understand or begin to understand how remarkable that friendship really is.

Smith: Yeah. Last thing, and I don’t know how to phrase this, given the subject at hand. In any other line of work, when it’s all over, you can go out and have a beer and say, “Geez, we really did a bang-up job.” What’s the equivalent in your line of work? How do you, for lack of a better word, engage in self-congratulation? How do you know you’ve pulled it off and acknowledge that fact?

Wagner: Well, with the military, we have lots of ways to recognize jobs well done and to recognize the important contribution of every individual. And making sure that the people who played key roles are recognized in ways that reflect their effort, reflect their work, reflect their service, reflect their care, is important.

Smith: But just at the visceral level—

Wagner: The people who understand this know. And, I guess, what I would say is where you know is the people like, for me personally, you do a ceremony in subsequent years in support of for example, a Senator Kennedy’s funeral, Senator Byrd’s funeral recently, Lady Bird Johnson’s funeral. Out of nowhere you get a three word text from someone you’d been in the foxhole with in a prior intense funeral setting - a Greg Willard, a Susan Ford. And right then, hearing from someone like them, you know – job well done, very well done.

Smith: Yeah. Does it take you time to decompress?

Wagner: Absolutely. Absolutely. It certainly is a period of time when going through a funeral, being that ‘on’, being that focused, is what people around the military, I guess, in a way would call that kind of a foxhole experience. It’s the being under fire together in a way which is very different. And I don’t say that in a way that in any way says that planning a funeral is like being under fire. It’s not. But that intense shared experience, whether it’s being on a championship sports team or being a part of any focused effort like that, and you get to the end and it takes you awhile to take a deep breath and to kind of settle down and come back up to be ready to engage and have the energy again.

Smith: I think people would be interested to know - clearly there’s a different role, different magnitude in terms of the First Ladies services. Can you explain the difference and, maybe, where there isn’t a difference in terms of the planning process?

Wagner: The former First Ladies have no authorization in regulation or in public law for military support for their funerals. Certainly not for the kind of planning and support on a large-scale that is part of a state funeral, part of our tradition of a state funeral. Traditionally, the military extends to a former First Lady the same courtesy that we extend to a dependent in Arlington National Cemetery. We carry the casket, provide a chaplain if asked. We’ll advise, we’ll assist in those kinds of ways, but the ceremonial requirements or the ceremonial traditions are much less public. Generally there’s not a Washington component or if there is, it’s a memorial service, a later event, but a very different tradition.

Smith: Anything we haven’t covered? Anything that you take away that really sticks with you?

Wagner: I don’t know if I can tell this story or if I can get through this story, but I’ll try. The way we do events in the National Capitol Region, the collaboration of all the various protocol, agencies, all the various military support, all the security and law enforcement support, for years, up to and including the Reagan funeral, were handled pretty much on the basis of unofficial collaboration, coordination, between the organizations. As part of the same reorganization of DOD and of the Department of Homeland Security and changing roles post-9/11, the Department of Homeland Security decided to designate certain events as national special security events and to put Secret Service in charge of planning those events.
Smith: Planning the security aspects?

Wagner: In essentially planning the security aspect of those events, which was a significant cultural change for Secret Service from a focus on when their protectees were at an event to responsibility for large-scale public events, whether or not their protectee was present or any protectees were present. Very different focus for them. And, particularly here in the Washington, D.C. area, a terrific challenge to get their arms around and change the relationships and bring the literally hundreds of law enforcement and other inter-agency partners together. Prior to the Ford funeral, about eighteen months beforehand, when that effort began, not specifically directed toward the Ford funeral, but certainly realizing that President Ford was in failing health or declining health is probably a better word, a Secret Service agent named Stacy Bauerschmidt, who was the assistant to the special agent in charge of the Washington field office of the Secret Service, which generally means you become the project person for the boss, got handed the job to figure out how to make this work, figure out how to make all these people play nice together, figure out how to make all these people do the coordination. She got handed the job and set about it.

Deep breath. Stacy was the daughter of a couple who lived in western Michigan. He was a veteran. I would guess a veteran of the Korean War, who came home and had a newborn daughter named Stacy and had some trouble with veteran’s benefits. And, as Stacy told the story, her parents – excuse me, sorry, I do this – were on the edge of eviction because a check hadn’t come and because somehow in the system things were held up. And in desperation, they called their Representative’s office and said, “We’ve got this problem. We don’t know what to do.” Of course, we know what district they were in. They were in President Ford’s district, Congressman Ford’s district, and the check arrived and they kept the house. Now, I don’t know the details. You could probably go back and find the details. Bauerschmidt is not that common a name. But it was very real to her. It was a story she grew up with and, to her, she had a chance to pay a man back. She did just that. I don’t think anybody knows that story but me and Stacy.
Smith: It’s a great story. That’s why we do oral history projects.

Wagner: It’s a very Ford story.

Smith: It is a Ford story. That’s perfect.

Smith: Thank you very much for doing this. You obviously have a remarkable story in your own right. How did your path cross with that of Betty Ford.

Brinker: Well, you know, after my sister died, or as we went through the journey of her very unsuccessful end with breast cancer—

Smith: How long was she ill?

Brinker: She was diagnosed in 1977 at the end of the year, I think it was, and she died in 1980 at the age of 36. I’ll never forget it. In a lot of ways, it was as if it were yesterday. In fact, I just wrote a book about it, Promise Me, which has a picture of Mrs. Ford in it. So, you know, in those days, cancer was “The Big C,” it was spoken of in whispers. People crossed the streets sometimes when they saw my sister. We lived in Peoria, Illinois and we know there was cancer there, being in hospitals. Still it was nothing like it is today. People were much less willing to address these issues out loud.

Smith: Was there even more of the stigma, if that’s the word, attached to breast cancer?

Brinker: Yes, of course, even though it was “The Big C,” that was usually lung cancer or maybe an intestinal cancer. But when it came to breast cancer, it was even worse. It was more hidden in the shadows. You couldn’t print the word ‘breast’ in most newspapers or magazines and certainly couldn’t use the words on TV or radio. So, in fact, when we started Susan G. Komen for the Cure a few years after my sister died, many people advised me to make it be Susan G. Komen Foundation for Women’s Cancers. But, aside from that, when Susan was going through her care and treatment, and we finally got her to M.D. Anderson, it was far too late. But, she used to always say, “If Betty Ford could take her chemotherapy and have it and be like she was, so brave and always looked good and always had a very positive demeanor, so can I.”
So, she was a role model for untold hundreds and thousands of people who didn’t have a voice.

Smith: Did she know Mrs. Ford?

Brinker: No.

Smith: Was it just that Betty Ford was a public figure?

Brinker: That Betty Ford was a public figure. She was the First Lady and she talked about it, so Susie knew that she had chemotherapy and, therefore, if she could do it, it was like it was alright. It was like what you should do. And when I think of those pictures of Betty, they’re apocryphal now, throwing the football, the President talking about her disease - we just went through all those videos the other day because we’re doing some archival work at Susan G. Komen - and the pictures of him at the press conference announcing that Betty had breast cancer. Then everything about it changed. You know, everything about the disease and the acculturation of it began to change and I think people know it. But I think that the full credit for what Betty did in those days will have a voice itself for hundreds and hundreds of years, because it just wasn’t done. People didn’t talk about disease. Look at President Franklin Roosevelt. He couldn’t even talk about the infantile paralysis he had and there was a great staging going on in the films. You didn’t discuss disease because you knew you’d be disadvantaged. You knew you could lose your job. It usually meant death. People were more afraid of cancer than they were of the treatment because, or maybe it was both. They thought if you had cancer, you die.

Smith: Let me ask you to try to take people in this culture back thirty or forty years and make them understand what, on the surface, seems incredible. Did women discuss it among themselves? Was it something that they talked about, shared their fears, their concerns?

Brinker: You know, no. There was no patient support or there were very few. Maybe there was one patient support group, but it wasn’t really entrenched where women were. It was more for aftercare. So there wasn’t really an opportunity. There was no patient advocacy. There were no 1-800 numbers.
No cell phones. No internet. No outreach to people. Certainly you didn’t talk about this at school. And, in your doctor’s office, when you walked in, you never saw a breast self-exam card, or ‘Have you had a mammogram?’ even after they developed mammography. So, you were beginning to see some discussion of it in doctors’ offices. Maybe your gynecologist did a breast self-exam, but honestly it was not discussed openly like it is today. Not even close.

Smith: Is it logical to assume that it is part of a general relaxation of popular attitudes about sex and sexual attractiveness?

Brinker: I honestly think that, in those days, there was the great fear of being mutilated because the surgery was so huge. If there was a discussion of it, there was so much fear and almost running away. Remember how teenage girls ran away when they were pregnant and they were hidden. It was almost like that. However, I think as you went farther down the demographic chain, the sexual part and the mutilation and the fear about all that got worse in any event.

But what most people began to realize is that it was happening a lot more often. A) People were aging, but b) it was just happening more often. People were living longer and many people died of this without ever knowing what they died of years and years ago and centuries ago. So, you had to be very brave to confront a disease like breast cancer and to be public about it. I don’t know of anyone else like that was that public about it. I really don’t. I grew up in a rather empowered household and was very aware that President Nixon signed the national cancer act. Very aware of people who led the cancer movement in this country. But there was no talk about breast cancer and certainly no actresses, no public spokesperson, because it would ruin your career. You know, they would a) think you were going to die and b) you would be considered mutilated and not fit for prime time.

So, it was more, I think with women, than even a sexual concern. It was a fear of life and everything about it and the very, very severe treatment. You know, the Halstead radical mastectomy was the only option offered. Most people from after the turn of the century until about 1960, in the late 60s, and in some places in the country earlier than that - my aunt had had that terribly debilitating [procedure] where, literally, half of your body was removed from your waist up.

Smith: And you did not know necessarily going into the operating room?

Brinker: No, you did not know and you were not given a choice. So, you could wake up and have half your body missing, practically, and not know what you were waking up to and all the adjustment that went with it. It was terrible. And if you were given a cobalt therapy or rather rudimentary therapy, it was burning all over. I mean, it was really brutal. But, to have Betty talk about it, Betty Ford, our First Lady, talk about it the way she did. It was her spirit more than anything that enlightened people and the rate of mammography, of course, went up significantly after that. It then dipped a little bit, but she was always in the forefront of this movement. Always. And I sought to meet her immediately. I had married a man from Texas called Norm Brinker, who was a wonderful man, since passed away. And he was friendly with Trammell Crow, who was one of his very good friends. When I started the foundation, we were going to do a big luncheon and I thought in my mind, “Who could we give an award to?” And these are the days before there were award luncheons for every disease and every body part. Ours was really one of the first. So, I said to Norman one night, “I would do anything if I could get even a phone call to Mrs. Ford because I have a feeling that maybe she would understand how important this would be”, especially in Texas, to do this in Dallas, Texas, at that time, where possibly women were even a little more unempowered about things in those days. So, he said, “Well, let me call Trammell Crow.” I knew they were great friends. I went to see Trammell and he picked up the phone and I’ll never forget it - she took the call. She was fabulous about it and I said to her, “You know, Mrs. Ford, we really need you here because I don’t have anyone to speak on my sister’s behalf. I don’t have anyone to speak on behalf of this disease and I feel we can do something important here. We can begin to really amplify this issue, but we really need you here. We need you to come.” And she sort of joked - the first event we were going to do was going to be at Norman’s polo club and we were going to have a little dinner out there and a little demonstration - and she says, “Well, I’ll be happy to come as long as I don’t have to ride a horse.” And she just said that and she has that great sense of humor. I said, “No, no, you won’t have to ride a horse.”

Smith: And this was your first contact with her?

Brinker: Yes, it was my first contact. And when she came, in fact, there’s a picture of her arriving for the very first event in my new book, Promise Me. My son, who now is thirty-five, he was just a little boy, he was only eight years old, standing there with a bouquet of roses to hand her as she got off the plane. And she came every single year as long as we had that event for years. I think it must’ve been fifteen or twenty years and then [she] came to Washington when we had other events. But, she spoke out about this. And then, of course, right shortly after that, her position on substance abuse – again, leading edge – who does that? You know, at the time, you thought, “Who does that? Who would talk about that?” We were all hiding. Everybody was hiding whether they had a drink too many or whether they were taking pills or whatever. And she was the vanguard of that sort of ability to be frank and to be open and it set people free. It literally was an emancipation of people who were completely bound by secrecy, shame, and fear. And that’s why I think she probably was one of the greatest First Ladies that this country has ever known.

Smith: She’s unique in that her real historical impact is probably greater after she left the White House. It’s interesting. If you think about how ordinary people live their lives, she’s probably had more impact than many presidents.

Brinker: Right. Oh, yes. And actually, I think, besides all of the patients and women and people through her activism, she opened their hearts and minds. Also, would say that the whole discussion of disease in this society changed or evolved. Disease became more personalized. People used to talk about disease like it was a control science project or someone landing on the moon. It was never personalized. She put a name and a face on issues that opened up an entire dialogue for forever more.

Smith: I’ve often wondered – actually I mentioned this in the eulogy – most of us, as we get older, the cliché is that we tend to become more conservative. And, they seemed more open, more compassionate. I’ve often wondered how much of it was her influence on him or having kids who were still relatively young, and grandchildren.

Brinker: Great children.

Smith: And maybe most nebulous was the experience of going through the intervention and the continuing work with the Betty Ford Center where they saw people who you might not at first blush ever expect to see there. To see good people, decent people, accomplished people, who had a problem, a weakness, and whether all of that came together. Obviously, they were quite outspoken in their views about choice, but, you know, he signed a gay rights petition. I mean, he did a lot of things that you don’t ordinarily associate with a conservative Republican president.

Brinker: Right. And I think that he was, in a way, the quintessential moderate. I really don’t think of him as a dyed in the wool conservative, because, though he was fiscally conservative in his beliefs, I think if you took an honest poll in America, you’d find their beliefs lined up pretty much with what most people thought. And I think that’s why they’re so revered as a couple and as a presidency. You know, I mean, I think it was very, very important that they spoke out on the issues they did. It resonated and it continues to resonate. And she was very outspoken about all that. You know, going to the Republican meetings and endorsing candidates that the rest of the Republican Party didn’t feel were acceptable. And the truth will out. That’s how a lot of people feel, that they don’t want those kinds of issues to become part of a political dialogue.

There are a lot of people in this country who feel that gender orientation has no place or gender preference doesn’t have any place in a political discussion in America. So, I think they led with such dignity and such a wise and credible set of beliefs that I think, again, the respect for them will grow and grow and grow as times move on. And particularly, if we elect people who are highly partisan, I think that it shows what it should be rather than exercising every bit of your partisanship. I think President Ford understood and was a master negotiator himself and a leader. You know what he did in the Republican Party alone and in Congress, and all of the jobs that he held before then prepared him for that kind of public presence and persona, I think.

Smith: You saw them together. Tell us about your sense of their relationship.

Brinker: Yeah. You know what? They were really, really loving, attractive, and I hate to use the word ‘cute’ together, but they were. They were easy. They could joke with each other. He used to tease, “Well, you know Betty did this,” or “Betty said that.” He always quoted her all the time and she always quoted him all the time. You know, she was a wonderful dancer and loved to dance when she was young. And they loved to dance together, as you know. So, I used to love to watch the pictures of them dancing at the White House because they were so in step with each other. It was like they were in harmony with each other.

Smith: In some ways it’s a case of opposites attracting. He was famously punctual.

Brinker: Right.

Smith: And she never made a deadline probably in her life. And, with some couples, that would be an issue.—

Brinker: I think he just adored her and I think she was, you know, even with her substance issues later that came to bear, I think she was a wonderful mother and he knew that. And he also knew that she loved him very much.

Smith: I’ve often wondered- we’re talking with the kids now - whether he felt any kind of guilt. The fact is, like lots of men in his generation and lots of men in this town, when he was climbing the professional ladder, he’d been away a lot on the road.

Brinker: Yeah, sure. And so, she was left with the burden of the children and the public persona and everything. I’m sure the gratitude for that grew more and more. You know, I didn’t observe them so much in public, but kind of remember just seeing pictures. You could get a sense of people’s chemistry. And they just seemed so comfortable with each other.
Smith: Yeah. I think that’s part of the problem now. She says she misses her boyfriend.

Brinker: Oh, yeah, sure. I mean, it has to be really hard. They were together so many years. Their best years, probably they would’ve both said, were after he left the White House, after getting out of all that. They loved their house in Vail and they loved wherever they were. They really enjoyed it in California. They really loved that. I can remember visiting them in the desert and how much they loved that experience and his golf. And, you know, when he was younger and skiing, how much they loved that. Norman and I visited them several times in their house in Vail and we used to go skiing there. And we would see them in the summer if we came to the desert and they just always were the same. Hospitable, charismatic, and very comfortable.

Smith: When was the last time you saw or talked to her?

Brinker: You know what? I’ve tried to call several times but we couldn’t connect. I do talk to Vaden and I talk to Susan. Susan did a wonderful piece for our thirtieth year honoring the promise and she did a video on behalf of her mother. And I’ve sent several messages to her and I saw her, of course, at the funeral, which, you know, was quite awhile ago, but I was just stunned.

Smith: Were you surprised by the amount of reaction? Because, you know, he’d been out of the public eye a while. I was with ABC the first half of the week and then with the family the second half. I can tell you, journalists, particularly younger journalists, were surprised. There was a whole generation that was being introduced to him for the first time. They were seeing these clippings and they were contrasting it with the ugliness of our current politics. And he looked awfully good.

Brinker: Well, this is what I mean. I think that their image and their ease on the dance floor, so to speak, is something in their leadership style - because he always reached out. He was always friendly. He had an ability to talk to anyone and so did she. And that’s just not what you see today. We seem to have people who are in corners, you know, who don’t reach out to each other easily, who don’t go out and have dinner together, who don’t live here, really. So, as a result, you have such a fractured political system now. And I’m sad about it. We just don’t have the style and the outreach for people to feel included and inclusive. Times have been very difficult the last few years and I think that’s created even more distance between people and their politicians.

Smith: He and Hale Boggs, his Democratic counterpart, would have debates at the National Press Club. They would drive down together to the club and decide what they were going to debate that day. They’d go to the club and they’d have their debate and go have a drink and lunch and then go back to the Hill. It’s not as if the ‘60s were an era of good feelings, but institutionally, you had people who were rewarded for getting things done. Now they’re rewarded for keeping things from getting done.

Brinker: From getting done and also, you know, we don’t have a political class anymore. It used to be that a lot of politicians had a gravitas, a sort of respect, and now it’s as if we just dislike all of them. The civility has just gone out of it. And I think all of those fellows and, you know, Tip O’Neill and Ronald Reagan, when you look at the camaraderie there, I feel like we’ll never see that again. I hope that’s not true.

Smith: I understand your feelings. I think the media had a lot to do with it.

Brinker: Yeah, of course, on every issue.

Smith: Cable TV and the internet have coarsened and polarized—

Brinker: And scripted.

Smith: And scripted.

Brinker: So that no one can really say how they feel. No one’s free to say anything and there’s so much media that, you know, if someone blinks a certain way, it’s a story and it’s so sensational and tabloid. So, that’s a problem.

Smith: How do you think she should be remembered?

Brinker: I think she should be remembered as a woman who really did it all. You know, she not only was a great wife and a great mother and figured out how to do it all, even with the steps along the way and the difficulty she personally had, but she was a leader in a time that wasn’t easy to be a leader. In other words, she didn’t have the option, as many people do today, to act almost any way you want to as a woman. Things were very scripted and prescribed for women. And Betty had a way of transitioning from the classic First Lady role into the role of a leader. And that kind of leadership, as you said, will go on for generations and generations because she broke ceilings and walls in the nicest possible way and by example - other than preaching, teaching, shouting. It was always by example. And I think she will be seen as a very important First Lady as time goes on who served at a difficult juncture of history.

Smith: I also wonder if you look at her in the ‘60s, she’s almost representative of a generation of women. She was a dancer. She was an accomplished, creative individual who was very happily married and who loved being a mother, but who also sensed that there was more potentially to life than that. She saw a psychiatrist at one point, which she was very candid about. You get a sense of a whole generation of women who were on the cusp of great change.

Brinker: Exactly.

Smith: They were unknowingly, in some ways, they were pioneers.

Brinker: Unknowingly evolutionary. She was evolutionary in being able to do the things that she did. And, you know, it isn’t just so much the disease part, it’s the living your life in public. Because even after that, she had to become much more public in a way and people were watching very carefully all the time, watching for signs.

Smith: That’s interesting because she typically made a joke about the first state dinner – “everyone was watching, which one.” But I assume, as often is the case, humor hides something very serious.

Brinker: Right, it does. And also you learn to live with it. And once you’re a breast cancer survivor, it doesn’t matter who you are, you always wonder, “Is it going to come back?”, “Is it going to?”, “When?”, “How?”, “If.” She had a husband in the White House. She was still fairly on the young side.
Smith: But she had a relatively advanced case.

Brinker: Yeah, and she did chemotherapy and I’m sure she had doubts and fears in her own mind which also one didn’t deal with openly. Yet she managed to always be able to talk about it, even if somebody asked her. I do know that. Friends of mine in the cancer community would ask her “Are you okay?” and “Have you had any fears about it?” and she was always open about it. And that, in itself, is a whole other set of issues that survivors deal with aside from the diagnosis. And the now you’re in public and this isn’t spoken about and now everyone’s looking at you to see if you’re sick and you’re going to die or how you’re going to look or how you’re going to act or if you act different or if there’s something about you that’s different. Especially a disease like breast cancer in those days.

Smith: And there’s not a more visible position in the world than the one she was in.

Brinker: No, every garment inspected, every image looked at carefully. “Does she fit in her clothes?” “How does that look?” “How must that be?” “What’s her husband thinking about all that?” “Are they going to break up over it?” I mean, there’s lots of that.

Smith: That’s a large issue. She obviously was a leader. He, less obviously, it seems to me, was a leader. I mean, leading by example. Showing other men this is how you’re supposed to react.

Brinker: This is how you do it. And you go to the press conference and you speak out loud about it. “My Betty has been diagnosed” to the public. And then resuming your playful life right afterwards. That was the cue that was so important to people. Another cue that was very important to people, because, you know, I keep saying about the throwing the football, that may be one of the most important pictures ever in history, that and out on the White House lawn. Because it’s a resumption of a life. It’s a presumption that you can live with cancer and that you live beyond these things.

Smith: And it’s a loving life.
Brinker: And it’s a loving one. And in those days, you have to remember, Richard, you were dealing with a subject that was as taboo as almost anything I can think of and they got through this. And I just loved him because there was just a certain masculinity about him that was not macho at all. He was a very gentle person inside. He was a kind person. And you could tell that. And, so, his kindness helped her and together they even grew more as a couple. And he is a leader. You know, when he had his political issues, I think they just really sailed through a lot of those kinds of things because they were so in tune and they had such a great afterlife. You know, he loved golf. They loved being in that house in Vail. They loved having their children there. They loved living that kind of life. They were doing sports.

Smith: Time was good to the Fords.

Brinker: Yeah, very good. And they were invited everywhere and they were admired and then she did her Betty Ford work.

Smith: He lived long enough to know that most people had come around to his way of thinking on the pardon.

Brinker: That’s right.

Smith: And he said when the Kennedys gave him the Profiles in Courage award it was just an extraordinary turning point. He said, “People don’t ask the question anymore. For twenty-five years, people asked the pardon question.”

Brinker: That’s right. And he took such a strong position on that and I think history would’ve judged him right at that point. It was very, very interesting, all that, but he did the right thing and he lived, as you say, long enough to see it, which was a great blessing for both of them, I think, and for their children. You know, it was nice that their children have a legacy in the rest of the world that sometimes, you see, today, people don’t understand how long things take to do. People always think that things should happen instantly. And if you do something, you should be immediately rewarded for it or it should immediately turn around. Young people, particularly, don’t understand that. So, this was a man who lived with a set of principles, did what he thought was right, and lived through it. Didn’t whine. Didn’t complain. Didn’t say, “Oh, gee, I was hounded.” And that’s a difference today that you see a lot of.
People playing the blame game, blaming someone else.

Smith: And Susan now has stepped into her mother’s shoes?

Brinker: Yeah, she stepped into her shoes and I owe her a call because I want to keep up with what she’s doing. She’s such a great woman and she’s worked very hard. She’s had some of her own challenges, you know, and she’s just great. She’ll do a great job there. Susan’s a hard worker and she knew what her mom wanted to accomplish and that’s really important to keep the Center the way it is. And she cares a lot about her brothers. They’re very close. So, that’s very nice and it’s nice for everybody to keep in touch with them, too.

Smith: That’s perfect.

Smith: Thanks so much for doing this. I appreciate it.

Buchanan: I’m delighted.

Smith: Let me ask you. First of all, what was the attitude in the Nixon White House toward the Republican Congressional leadership, and Ford in particular, during that first term?

Buchanan: Well, for the first couple of years, Nixon had one of his speechwriters at all the cabinet meetings, congressional leadership and others, and I was in all the congressional leadership meetings. I think the attitude was very respectful, but I don’t think there was a sense that this was a very powerful, competent, and really able force that we had on Capitol Hill. Nixon was the first time since Zachary Taylor that we had a president with both Houses of the Congress in opposition to him and I don’t think that Nixon felt that these fellows were up to his level of the game.

Smith: Would you distinguish at all, not necessarily in terms of competence, but in terms of loyalty, between a Jerry Ford and a Hugh Scott?

Buchanan: I know what you’re going to say. Everybody in the White House distinguished between the two. Jerry Ford was a friend of Richard Nixon. Nixon liked him. I’d been out with Nixon for Jerry Ford in Michigan and Romney in Michigan, out there in 1996. Jerry Ford was a friend and a buddy of Nixon’s and I think they genuinely liked each other. I think Hugh Scott was looked upon as on the other side of the party. He was certainly looked upon by me and the other conservatives as that. Hugh Scott is the one who famously said, “Don’t worry. They get the rhetoric and we get the action.” That meant ‘They’ were conservatives and ‘we’ are the liberals.

Smith: I don’t know about Ford, but you hear stories about Scott constantly leaking to his advantage and not necessarily to the White House’s.
Buchanan: I think that was the feeling, that Scott was in business for himself and that Gerald Ford was part of the team and he was the leader of the team in the House, and Hugh Scott probably would not have been Richard Nixon’s choice for a Senate Minority Leader.

Smith: Correct me if I’m wrong, but I think Scott voted against both Haynesworth and Carswell. I know he voted against Carswell.

Buchanan: Carswell got about forty-five votes.

Smith: Forty-five votes, that’s right.

Buchanan: And, you know, I worked on the Carswell account, if you will, when he was nominated and I kept calling the judge. I’d done this for Burger, I’d gotten materials on Burger and we wanted to get them out early to the press room. First impression, right to the press, they’d have to run with it. Burger had written this wonderful piece on law and order for U.S. News & World Report in ’67 and we put it out. So, I called Judge Carswell and I said, “Judge, are there any law review articles you’ve written you’re particularly proud of and you’d like to have represent your point of view?” “No, I haven’t written much of that.” “Are there any articles that you’ve written that represent your views?” “No, I can’t think of any of that.” And I said, “Well, Judge, tell me a little more about your war record.” And so we went to talking about his war record in the Pacific. But the Judge had no real academic credentials and I guess you have to fault John Mitchell for that.

Smith: Presumably, there’s a real qualitative difference between Haynesworth and Carswell.

Buchanan: Oh, Haynesworth was Chief Judge of the 4th Circuit and should’ve been confirmed. It was an appalling atrocity. I think he had a speech defect, Judge Haynesworth did, but he was just vilified and viciously attacked as some kind of racist. It was all a pack of lies. But, I will say this: when Carswell was rejected, I’m sure it was Carswell; I was called by Haldeman and told to write a statement on that which I assumed would be for Ziegler to deliver and I was told he wanted it very tough. So, I wrote this statement that said this was an act of regional discrimination against the South and was really rough. I went over and went into the Oval Office and I gave it to Nixon and Nixon looked at it and then he walked past me straight for the pressroom where he delivered it. It was a very powerful, effective statement, but I had no idea it was for the President of the United States.

Smith: And there was no filter.

Buchanan: No filter.

Smith: Were you surprised by what happened to Spiro Agnew? Let me preface that. One of the people we talked with is Jerry Jones. He had been reorganizing the personnel office for Haldeman. He got a call, so it had to be before April of ’73, Haldeman was still there. And Haldeman wanted to know how many people worked for the vice president. Jones came up with a number and Haldeman said, “Fine. I want undated letters of resignation from all of them.” Now, it raises a couple of possibilities.

Buchanan: Now, wait a minute. See, he got the undated letters of resignation from all of us as I recall the day after the election.

Smith: And that’s the first thing that it raises. Is it possible that this was belated, that in fact they didn’t have letters from the vice president’s staff?

Buchanan: It’d be hard for me to believe, because I think the vice president’s chief of staff sat in the senior staff meeting, and I’m sure he had people in the meeting where Haldeman came in where Nixon came in and spoke - the exhaustible volcanoes speech, as everybody remembers it. And everybody’s to go back and say what you’ve done, what you would like to do in the second administration, and send in your letter of resignation, which cast a bit of a pall over our victory party. Sweet Old Bob, as he called himself, the initials fit. So, what I’m saying is that I’m sure that the chief of staff to the vice president - became a federal judge and he’s since died - I’m sure he was in the meeting and it would’ve applied to him as well.

Smith: It certainly would not have been an effort by the vice president to resist that.

Buchanan: Oh, no, I don’t think so. Well, that’s an excellent question. I don’t know. I don’t think at that point the vice president would’ve defied an order for all the senior staff, of whom the vice president’s chief of staff was considered one, to send in their letters of resignation. But you raise a very interesting point. These were the vice president’s hires, they weren’t the president’s.

Smith: It raises the larger question. Would the Oval Office have known about the Maryland investigation? Remember, the Wall Street Journal, I think it was in August, went public with their story. This would be several months before that. Is it reasonable to believe that the Justice Department and through the Justice Department the Oval Office would’ve known that there was at least something afoot in Maryland?

Buchanan: Yes. Now, I came in on this fairly late, I will admit. I went to the press conference that Agnew had, and this was fairly late on where he talked about, I believe, “damn lies,” and was really defiant. James Reston was there and wrote a terrific column saying Agnew denied everything. I went back to my office and I either called or memo’d over there and said, “Why are we not standing behind the vice president? And Al Haig said, “Come on over.” And I came on over and he said, “The vice president’s been taking envelopes in the basement.” And I was just jolted completely by that. I had not known it, but the sense I got of all of this and even of the Saturday Night Massacre was that Elliot Richardson was communicating much more closely with the White House than folks were led to believe.

Smith: Speaking of the Saturday Night Massacre, to this day, it’s unclear. We talked to Judge Bork, we talked to other people who were in the Justice Department, and one senses that the President believed he had an understanding with Richardson.

Buchanan: He did.

Smith: And Richardson, for lack of a better word, double crossed him.

Buchanan: That’s exactly right. I was called and I’m not sure by whom, maybe it was Haig, but this was during the week and I was called and they said they wanted to get rid of Cox. And I said, “Is Richardson aboard?” And they said, “Yeah.” So I said, “Do it.” And apparently, Richardson reneged on the back course, backed off and so Ruckelshaus and Bork had to do it. I wrote Nixon a memo, I think, to this effect because I was in the Oval Office with Nixon and he was talking about Brezhnev and he was talking about the Middle East and all that time - basically around the time of that war - we were talking for a long period of time. I had recommended, I think, that he had to fire Richardson, to get rid of him. And Richardson was coming in. And I said, “Well, I’ll go out the other door.” And I went out the door that I didn’t think they were coming in and they were coming in. And here was Richardson with sort of a strange grin on his face and Al Haig was grimacing. But Richardson was walking in to get fired. This was Saturday.

Smith: So, the signal had been sent to the Oval Office that, in effect, the deal was off.

Buchanan: Oh, yeah, Nixon told me basically, “Look, I don’t have any choice.” There were no tapes running then. But basically he was saying, “You’ve got Brezhnev and the Russians are pushing me on the Middle East. If I’ve got my own attorney general backing me down and I can’t do anything about it, who’s going to believe you in the world?” And he very much saw it in those terms, that, look, it was them or him. So, he went ahead and did it. But he felt very much that it had an effect on foreign policy. That’s what we’re talking about. So, as I say of Richardson, I’ll never forget his expression. It looked like one of these fellows who’s taken to be hanged but somehow didn’t realize it. It was a funny expression on his face.

Smith: Bork is not the only one in that department who has expressed the view that Richardson was very ambitious, politically. That Richardson saw himself as a future president.

Buchanan: Oh, sure, Elliot did. Later in life, I talked to Elliot and, you know, I liked Elliot and I talked to him. He’d had four cabinet seats. I think he had four chairs or four of those plaques.

Smith: Apparently, he did not want to be attorney general.

Buchanan: Well, it was a ________, but right. I talked to him and I said, I forget which election it was, but I said, “Why don’t you go up there? Walk in there and be governor of Massachusetts?” And he said, “Pat, I’ve got things I care about in my life and it’s towards the end of my life and I don’t want to be deciding sewer contracts. What I care about is the Law of the Sea Treaty.” He was a globalist and he believed in this. He wanted to focus on that and I respected that. He was a nice fellow. He used to come over on Crossfire. He’d come over late at night and I had this lovely gal there and she said, “Elliot Richardson? The famous Elliot Richardson?” And I said, “Yeah, he’ll be here.” And she came out into my office with this panicked look on her face and I said, “Don’t worry. He’ll do just fine when the camera goes on.” A lot of those fellows came at 11:30 at night that way.

Smith: When Agnew resigned, I believe I read you wrote the President a memo suggesting that he pick Ford for vice president.

Buchanan: Yeah, it was not only that I wrote him a memo - there is a memo in the Ford files and I wrote it to the President - but it was very, very close to the date of selection, very close. And I gave the reasons, the arguments for and against, and I said, “Overall, I think Ford is your best choice.” I think George H.W.
Bush was being pushed by a lot of congressmen and I said Ford is most acceptable to both parties and all these things he could do for you. And I sent it over there and I got a phone call from Al. He said, “The old man wants Connally.” I said, “Well, if the old man wants Connally, take Connally. But I’m sending you a memo with the reasons why I think Ford would be the better choice. But if the old man wants him, take him.”

Smith: Was confirmability the dominant factor?

Buchanan: I have to think that was it because the old man wanted Connally. He really did. He loved John Connally. He thought Connally was phenomenal.

Smith: I don’t know if you heard Robert Byrd told Tom Korologos, who told us, when he went up there and [Byrd] pointed down and he said, “If you send down Connally’s name, there’ll be blood on that floor.”

Buchanan: Well, I think that was what convinced the president that he couldn’t get it through. And Ford would get through and only had a little problem with the $200 in cash, I guess, for the year, whatever he’d taken out in checks and stuff. If you read the testimony, I think there was a problem there.
Smith: Would you call it a reluctant choice on Nixon’s part?

Buchanan: No, Connally was his preferred choice. Clearly, if he wasn’t going to get his preferred choice, Jerry Ford’s the one he would’ve liked to have taken. He was Chowder & Marching, he was a friend, and he would be consistent with Nixon’s foreign policy. What was it that Nixon said to Rockefeller? Did he talk about Bush?

Smith: Now, there’s a famous scene and I believe it’s true because I’ve had reason to check into it.

Buchanan: “Can you imagine seeing Jerry Ford in this chair?”

Smith: Yeah.

Buchanan: No, wait a minute now. You say Jerry Ford.

Smith: Yeah, that’s the story and it got back to Ford.

Buchanan: Now, I heard that story, but it might’ve been that I heard it about Bush. I’m not sure because I didn’t get it firsthand, but I’ve heard this story. You might be right. It might’ve been “Can you imagine Jerry Ford sitting in this chair?”

Smith: To me, that’s just Nixon stroking Nelson’s ego.

Buchanan: Right. Nixon stroking Nixon’s, too.

Smith: Yeah.

Buchanan: That you and I are big players.

Smith: Well, remember when he said, “There are three or four people who understand the use of power - me, John Connally, and, I guess, Nelson.”

Buchanan: Right. What did he call Connally? He used the term ‘big’, of course he mentioned the ‘big play’, and he always mentioned that. But there was another term about Connally was these people were larger than these other people.

Smith: Someone was directed to go to the Treasury Department with a personal message that there’s some meeting the next day and the president would really like to have the secretary there. And they thought it was pretty nice that he was sending a personal invitation. And Connally says, “You’re very nice gentleman and it’s nice to meet you, but you just tell the president when he wants me to attend a meeting, he can call me.” I wonder if that kind of brass plated self-assurance was one of the things that really appealed to Nixon.

Buchanan: It really is. It’s undeniable. John Connally was the ‘Big Man’. Connally had delivered Texas for Humphrey. He’d been Secretary of the Navy and Governor of Texas for three terms and he was a big, independent tough man.
And this is one thing I really admired about Nixon. Nixon constantly looked for people who were bigger than him in the areas they knew. He once told me, “Pat, I want a national security advisor who can teach me something. Not one I have to teach something.” And I think that was why Henry Kissinger was picked. He had no problems bringing in Pat Moynihan. Irving Kristol was a terrific fellow and he had him in for dinner. And Connally was a big player. He wanted all those big people around him which was the sign of a strong man, I think. And it was said of John Connally that he not only surrounded himself with smaller people, but little people, physically. My friend, Mickey Gardiner, I grew up with, was about five feet high. He didn’t have the big folks around him.

Smith: Let me ask you. There’s always friction between presidents and vice presidents or more specifically between their staffs. There is built in resentment. And Ford is put in this unique position; in many ways, he’s walking a tightrope. And he spends a lot of time out of town. What were the views that people held inside the White House, particularly as it became more and more embattled, toward the vice president and his defense of the president?

Buchanan: I think they felt Ford was loyal and Ford was supportive of the president and he was out there defending the president, quite frankly, when it was getting tougher and tougher to be out there and to be credibly defending the president.
So, I didn’t get that. I got that Ford was a loyal soldier up until the final days when it was impossible to go out and say certain things and where their interests clearly parted. But I’ve always thought Ford was a loyal guy. I mean, his staff was something else.

Smith: Are we talking about Hartmann in particular?

Buchanan: Hartmann in particular.

Smith: What was it about Hartmann that was so polarizing?

Buchanan: Well, Hartmann was considered a leaker. He was considered someone who had lines to the press. And he was someone who was considered a well-poisoner.

Smith: At what point does the line between being protective of your boss cross over into being possessive of your boss, because that became a real issue?

Buchanan: I don’t know about his relationship with Ford. But Bill Moyers interviewed me and he asked me on the show what did I think of Gerald Ford as a potential president. I said, “Well, Gerald Ford’s a good man, solid man” stuff like that, “but nobody can match Richard Nixon for his knowledge of foreign policy.” So that was taken and Brokaw used it and [it was] taken as dumping on Ford. And it was all up in the networks and I felt badly because I liked Ford. So it was at that point I said, “You know, Mr. Vice President, I want to send you a copy of the memo I sent to the president” which was the memo recommending Ford for V.P. So, to heal the breach that was inadvertent - I was just trying to praise the old man in saying the old man was indispensible, not that Ford wasn’t. But I’ve always looked upon Hartmann as a well-poisoner.

Smith: Can you pinpoint a moment when you concluded that it was over?

Buchanan: Sure. I was at Camp David that Sunday. I went up there, was called up there, and it’s in the Woodward-Bernstein second book.

Smith: Had the Supreme Court ruled on the tapes?

Buchanan: Oh, the tapes had gone, as a matter of fact, the House had been voting. What that was, the last week, the beginning of the final week when you knew it was over. I’d assumed we were going to go down the road to the Senate vote and we would lose, quite frankly. I assumed it. But, the certain sign of death was when(?) went up to Camp David with Al Haig and Pat Buchanan and Jim St. Clair and Ray Price and Ron Ziegler and Steve Bull was back in the White House. It had to do with tapes, we wanted Bull to check a tape and it was the tape of June 23rd. Nixon had asked for it and heard it and then sent the tape back and said, “We’re not giving up any more tapes.” And, we got the tape of the 23rd. That was the one where it looked like Nixon had knowledge early on, and we knew when that hit that would be fatal.

So, we had to decide what to do and the decision was taken up there and something I sort of urged was, “Look, this tape, we don’t want the old man resigning right now. What to do is you just drop the tape. Boom. And the tape will blow a hole in the bottom of the ship and we’ll be gone by the end of the week.” And that’s what we did. On Monday, we dropped the tape. I remember, Al Haig asked me to brief him, he sent me around to brief and talk to a lot of people. And I went into Dean Burch’s office and Timmons was there and a couple other guys and I related what I’m relaying to you at much greater length and when I finished, Dean Burch looked at me and said, “Jesus Christ. Get the scotch.”

Smith: What other response can he give?

Buchanan: And we started drinking.

Smith: But, presumably - to back up - when the Court ruled on the tapes, that set in motion this irreversible—

Buchanan: This is why the firing of Archie Cox, and what I urged him to do was basically fire Archibald Cox, burn the tapes, get rid of all the tapes except the subpoenaed tapes, the seven of them at the time, whatever it is, those tapes, get rid of all those except your Brezhnev tapes and all your national security tapes that are important for your memoirs and all that and for the foreign policy. Get rid of that - in effect, cut your arm off, let it go and then get up and away from this whole thing. Then let them go and do what they want to do, but don’t give them any more. And this is what has always, always bothered me and bothers me to this day. The old man could be so decisive…that he was not decisive there to just do it. And, I think if he’d have done it, sure we would’ve taken a hit, but at least it might’ve been the last firestorm. Instead, you had one after another after another and you kept bleeding and bleeding and bleeding. So, that’s what we took eighteen months.

Smith: It’s incredible. Can you imagine in today’s media climate Watergate going on for two years?

Buchanan: No, you can’t. Because all you had were the networks then. But I will say there were a lot of White House limos outside the Mayflower Hotel at 10:30 getting a Washington Post.

Smith: You may be in a better position to answer this question than anyone else, because one of the things we’ve come back to over and over again in this series is the transition and how difficult it was on both sides. Frankly, for the Nixon White House folks who stayed around to be meshed - first of all, to go through this experience. After the Ford swearing in, there’s a receiving line and a reception down in the State Dining Room and people say that you could see the Nixon people just kind of peel off. Again, it’s perfectly understandable.

Buchanan: I don’t even remember going to it.

Smith: Okay.

Buchanan: I wasn’t there.

Smith: You were obviously at the President’s farewell.

Buchanan: I was at the farewell, but I didn’t go in and get a chair. Everybody went in early. I was standing, I think, right behind the cameras focused on Nixon, but I saw the whole thing. And I went outside and saw him go off in the helicopter. And a nice lady from the Washington Star as I was walking back to my office said, “How do you feel?” But it was very tough. I don’t recall going to the function. I might’ve been there, but I just don’t recall it.
Smith: I assume there were lots of people wondering “Am I going to have a job next week?”

Buchanan: Well, I went to Al Haig and said, “I want to leave.” I said, “You know, look. I’m tired. I’ve had eight and a half years with the old man and it’s time for me to go.” And he said, “Stick around for awhile.”

Smith: Did Al Haig intend to stick around for awhile?

Buchanan: Well, I think he did. He did say we can teach the Ford people a few things and I was amenable to that.

Smith: What did you want to teach them?

Buchanan: Well, frankly, I was not fond of the staff, in particular, Hartmann. So, I stayed around. I did a briefing book for him and a briefing book or two for Ford. They’ve probably got them up at the Library. One of them, I think, I wrote about he should take a hard line on New York City on the Bailout which didn’t work out that well.

Smith: It did initially.

Buchanan: And we sort of knew the pardon was coming. You know, let me tell you a story. I didn’t have it hard, but I was over talking to Jerry terHorst and I said, “Look, this amnesty thing for the Vietnam thing,” I said, “is a terrible mistake the President’s making.” It’d divide the country and the whole thing and heck, the war wasn’t even over, I mean, for the Vietnamese. And terHorst said something which tends to undercut his stance later where he resigned. He said to me in almost direct terms, “Well, we’ve got to do this one before we do the other one.” I took that to mean they were going to do the amnesty before we pardoned Nixon, but this was in late August, because I was up in Canada when the pardon came down. I was on one of these American Council of Young Political Leaders meetings, you know, with Canadian parliamentarians and all of that. So, that told me that it was in the works.

Smith: Mel Laird—

Buchanan: Right. He’s still with us, isn’t he?
Smith: Mel Laird, of course, loves Ford, but Mel had his own way of taking care of the pardon. He was going to get a bipartisan congressional delegation to go down to the White House and, in effect, petition the president to do this. Now, the question I have is—

Buchanan: To do what?

Smith: To pardon Nixon.

Buchanan: Oh, he was? Okay.

Smith: The question I have is, in the supercharged political climate at that point, wouldn’t any trial balloon have been shot down before it got above the trees? I mean, was there any way to prepare the country for this?

Buchanan: I don’t think so. You could’ve had a big discussion of it over a long period of time, but I think the president did it the right way. I remember telling him as I was leaving that, “History’s going to vindicate the decision you’ve made in pardoning the old man.”

Smith: Really?

Buchanan: I did. I told him that right there. And by that time, of course, he wanted me and he wanted us all out after the pardon. It was a free fire zone on the Nixon people in there, you know, because he really wanted them out. Haig was moved out. Hartmann was moved in and then Hartmann was gone and Rumsfeld came in. And we laughed, we said, “We’ve got to keep McLaughlin here because after him, us.”

Smith: That’s interesting because, Rumsfeld, before he actually took the job, right at the transition, he came back from Belgium or wherever he was. His advice to Ford was “clean house,” that you have to establish a break and so on. Ford was reluctant to do that for a number of reasons, including the fact that you needed some continuity; there were a lot of very talented people in the Nixon White House. And he thought it was unfair to tar everyone with the Watergate brush.

Buchanan: Right.
Smith: Which raises the question, can you be too nice to be president?

Buchanan: Well, Richard Nixon said, and he quoted Asquith’s famous quote, “A Prime Minister’s got to be a good butcher.” Asquith told Churchill this when Churchill became the First Lord of the Admiralty. And he said, “There are several who must be pole axed now” and Asquith went and did it. I think Nixon attributed it to Disraeli or someone. It may have been Disraeli first, but it was certainly Asquith. I agree with that, but let me say - this is not because Nixon had the most competent White House staff I’ve ever seen, especially a lot of guys in the first term who were out of there. But even in the second term, it was far more – I mean, we’d gone through national campaigns. We’d run the White House. We’d had national experience. Ford’s guys were basically Hill staff; they weren’t national staff. So, his decision was probably right, but there were some good people he should’ve kept on. Other people were too visibly connected with Nixon like me, and, by then, probably Al Haig, and so that would’ve been the wise thing.

But to transition, a fairly rapid transition, but not a butchering. I think a butchery would be a terrible mistake because, you’re right, a lot of us would’ve felt, “Look, he didn’t win this presidency. We did. We won it twice and who are these guys that are here and saying, ‘Get out of your offices’?” And there was a feeling of that. I remember that Korologos came in the day after the pardon. The pardon was on a Sunday, I believe, and on Monday, Ford had been at 75% with what was called ‘the toasted English muffin’ phase of his presidency. All of a sudden, this gigantic firestorm - all over the country, every reporter, columnist, and journalist. “This is unprecedented. This is a ‘deal’.” And Korologos came into the senior staff meeting and said, “Hey, you Ford people, welcome to the NFL!”

Smith: I can hear him say it. Can’t you also hear Rumsfeld telling him to fire everyone?

Buchanan: Let me tell you a story about Rumsfeld. I went over there. Rumsfeld and I had been buddies and friends. I was one guy that got along with him, had no rivalry, no competition or competitiveness which he had with a lot of other people. I went over to him and told him, “Look, I don’t’ want to stay here. I really don’t. I’ve worked for the old man. I’ve been working every weekend. I’m really beat. So, I’ll tell you what. What about me going off the premises November 15th and off the payroll December 15th?” In other words, I’d have four weeks of vacation. And he said, “What about off the premises October 15th and off the payroll November 15th?” I said, “Okay.”

Smith: Where you going to be the ambassador to South Africa?

Buchanan: Well, let me tell you about that. Haig called me over. And, again, as I say, I was willing to work with Al because Al was a buddy of mine and we’d been together. I’d worked with him and “Look, whatever you want to do, Al. Okay. But I’m not long-term here.” And so, he called me over then and I said, “I’m going.” And he said, “Would you like an embassy?” I said, “An embassy?” I’d always wanted to be an ambassador to NATO. Never got it in my life, even under Reagan. But I said, “Gee, that sounds interesting.” And I think he had three embassies. He said, “Okay, what about Vienna?” I said, “Al, Vienna’s a fairly expensive place. I’d been a newspaperman and I’d been a staff guy and I can’t afford Vienna. I can’t do it.” And he said, “What about South Africa?” And I’d been studying South Africa, writing about it in St. Louis, the whole apartheid thing. That was exciting and interesting and I knew the South Africans. So, I said, “I’ll take South Africa.” And what he did was, Haig took it in and ran it through and Ford signed off. Alright? So, we’re up in Canada and the pardon hits on Sunday. And Monday morning, Spencer Oliver, who’s a friend of mine, who’s the guy who was wiretapped in Watergate, a guy I grew up with, a Democrat, you know, head of the Democratic Governor’s Conference Association. Spencer comes to me on a bus because it’s a joint thing. He and I were co-chairs of this little delegation. He says, “Hey, I understand you’re going to be ambassador to South Africa.” I said, “What?” He said, “It’s in Evans and Novak.” This is the day after the pardon. Shelley was with me and so, I say, “Shelley, get off the bus and get to the airport and get back home.” And Novak had a column in there that said something like “bloody-nosed, gut-fighter Buchanan to get embassy,” “diplomats appalled” and all this stuff. And it had been dumped out by Hartmann. He put it out there right in the firestorm of the pardon. It was just abolished, the whole idea. And I was glad it was because some of them like Peter Flanagan had been made ambassador to Spain, I think. You can check that out. And some of the others had sort of gone forward, but this finished it off. The pardon finished it off and it was after that, you could see that the Ford people’s whole idea was ‘get rid of all of them’. After the pardon, they were under fire for the pardon, the Nixon connection, the press were after him. “Why is he still here?” And I think the Ford people were in something of a panic then to get us out.

Smith: Haig told us he had a confrontation with the President. He’d gone to the President to tell him the Secret Service had told him about Hartmann and misbehavior. We’ll leave it at that.

Buchanan: Holy smokes.

Smith: What’s that?

Buchanan: Holy smokes. I hadn’t heard that.

Smith: Yeah. Clearly, Al Haig and Robert Hartmann were put on the planet to piss each other off. I mean, to just annoy the hell out of each other.

Buchanan: Right. Let me tell you a story I’d forgot. After I think the Novak column hit and it blamed it all on Haig doing this, Novak said that he was home and Haig called him. Haig said, “I’m going to sue you for five million dollars.” And Novak said, “Al, I’m sorry. I don’t have five million dollars.”

Smith: Novak blamed Haig for the story?

Buchanan: No, Haig blamed Novak, but I knew in a second that Hartmann was behind it. But Haig called Novak. That would ensure that Haig knows exactly where this was coming from.

Smith: And, basically, Haig told us that these agents had come to him with complaints about Hartmann’s drinking and more.

Buchanan: Right. Hartmann was a heavy drinker.

Smith: And he goes to the President and he says, “Look, I’ve seen how a president can be brought down by staff.” Almost a sort of ‘it’s you or me’. And I can see Ford saying, “Al, you have to let me handle this.” And the way Haig constructs the conversation, he then said, “Well, I know now. That’s an answer. I know you don’t want me to stay.”

Buchanan: Al said that?

Smith: Yeah.

Buchanan: In other words, it was the choice between the two of them?

Smith: In effect.

Buchanan: Yeah. Well, you know, let me go back. Hartmann was one of the individuals when I went to work with Nixon up there in ’66, ’67, and ’68, he would tell me to go see people in Washington and meet with them. Hartmann lived, didn’t he, off Massachusetts Avenue just down the hill inside Maryland? Because, I think I went to his house and spent several hours with him. A sort of caustic, rough character and he drank and we were drinking in the afternoon, I think, on a Sunday or something. But, clearly, Nixon then had respect for him and, you know, I didn’t feel any hostility to him. He was another one of these characters that Nixon told me I really ought to get to know.

Smith: That’s fascinating.

Buchanan: Yeah, but when he got in there, I don’t know what it was about Hartmann, but it clearly was a mistake on my part in that Moyers interview. Moyers fed it to Brokaw to make it look like I’m trashing the vice president of the United States.

Smith: Hartmann saw enemies everywhere. I think Hartmann felt he had to compensate for a boss who saw no enemies anywhere. Again, it fed into that protective possessiveness.

Buchanan: Right.

Smith: Do you think Haig had it as a goal before leaving - whenever he left - to secure a pardon?
Buchanan: You know, it wouldn’t be based on hard information, but I would certainly say yeah.

Smith: I’ve often wondered if the real story of the pardon is not what anyone said, but what they didn’t say, that kind of non-verbal language that politicians have.

Buchanan: I’m sure it’s not certitude based on fact, or that I’ve got a piece of paper, but I am sure that Al Haig wanted to make sure Richard Nixon was pardoned and he would do what he could to bring that about and he would work assiduously to bring it about.

Smith: Beyond that, it’d be sheer speculation as to whether that originated with the President himself.

Buchanan: Richard Nixon?

Smith: Right or whether it was something that was done by Haig on his own.

Buchanan: I think Haig would certainly do it on his own and my guess is he and the old man were in touch, too. But I don’t know any knowledge of that at all.

Smith: It’s very interesting. Haig told us he never listened to the smoking gun tape or the other tapes.

Buchanan: No, we heard them. Well, we got word from Steve Bull. We were at Camp David and we said, “Bull, what does it say?” and things like that. We had enough to conclude. And what the conclusion was that a) Nixon had heard the tape, b) he had shot down sending the tape on to Jaworski after having heard the tape, and c) for months after that, all of us were stating what we were told was the truth, which was that Nixon had no knowledge of this thing before a certain period, whereas the tape suggested he did, which was destructive of the President’s credibility. And that’s what happened when you dropped the tape. Everybody said he lied. And that was the thing that dropped the bottom out of his 30% support or 25 or whatever he had.

Smith: It seems like all roads lead back to Fred Buzhardt. Laird said Buzhardt, who’d been his counsel at the Pentagon—
Pat Buchanan

Buchanan: Fred Buzhardt was at West Point with Haig in ’46.

Smith: Laird somewhat reluctantly comes back into the White House as part of this larger defense effort. He’s there about a month, and he gets a call from Buzhardt who’s been listening to the tapes. And, basically, warns Laird, “Be careful what you say because the president’s in it up to his neck.” That’s Laird’s version. Laird wrestled with his conscience and decided to stay on. Subsequently, when we talked to Haig he says, “Oh, no, I never listened to any tapes.” He said, “Fred Buzhardt gave me some very good advice, which was ‘Don’t ever be alone in the room with a tape’.” Presumably, that’s the throwback to the missing 18 ½ minutes. Do you have a theory about the missing 18 ½ tapes?

Buchanan: Well, you know, I have theories, but I shouldn’t use them. I’ve joked around with Bernstein about it in a bar and I was kidding around about it and he put it in the book and it probably hurt Rose Mary Woods, the joke did. And I had no knowledge of it and it’s one of the things I really regret because she was a great buddy of mine and a great loyalist of the old man’s. So, no, I really don’t know how it happened. I don’t.

Smith: You left the White House when?

Buchanan: I was off the premises, I think, November 15th. Oh, no, I was off the premises October 15th. I’m sorry.

Smith: October 15th.

Buchanan: Right.

Smith: Per Rumsfeld’s suggestion.

Buchanan: Right. And I told the story when I was talking to Cheney and he said, “Yeah, that would be Don.”

Smith: Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that it was Rumsfeld that did him in. Remember who deep-sixed George Bush at the CIA at the same time that the vice president was replaced and all of that?
Buchanan: But didn’t Rumsfeld get rid of Schlesinger and then get himself in Defense and all of that?

Smith: Rumsfeld insists that he didn’t want to go to the Defense Department at all. I remember asking Cheney, “Did Ford find it difficult to fire people?” and he said, “Not Schlesinger.” Colby came in and Colby was a gentleman about the whole thing. Ford offered him an embassy and he thanked the president very profusely. Didn’t take it, but he took it in a classy way.

Buchanan: Can I tell you a quick interrupting story?

Smith: Yeah.

Buchanan: I left the White House and I was going to write a book that was about conservative votes, liberal victories. I got a little contract of fifteen grand for it. And I was going to start writing a column. So, I went out to this store. It was a store in Bethesda where you bought supplies. You know, you get all these supplies like you’re going to school. You get all your papers and things where you’re going to be working on your own. And in there was Bill Colby and he was doing the same thing. He went out at the same time from the CIA.

Smith: I’ll tell you a footnote. There was a real streak of paranoia in Rockefeller. He literally believed that Bill Colby was a Soviet agent.

Buchanan: _______ the guy was some CIA cadre thing. They took care of my friend Angleton.

Smith: In the Reagan challenge in ’76, Nixon goes to China the week of the New Hampshire primary.

Buchanan: Right.

Smith: Do you have any sense of what the Nixon-Ford relationship was after the pardon?

Buchanan: When I went to see Nixon around Labor Day, it probably would’ve been after. What day was the pardon?

Smith: September 8th.
Buchanan: Okay, I wonder if it was before then, but sometime around then, I went out there to talk to Nixon and he was in terrible, terrible shape.

Smith: Both physically and emotionally?

Buchanan: Not physically then. That’s before the phlebitis. But emotionally he was. We had dinner with him and the Mrs. and Shelley and I were up there in that room of his, but he was in terrible shape. I don’t recall him saying anything derogatory about Gerald Ford then. This might’ve been before the pardon. But, anyhow, Nixon wanted me to get involved writing his book and stuff and I didn’t want to do it. So, no, but I want to get this in about the break with Ford. I went to see Ford and he told me something like, “I think you ought to go out to the private sector.” It wasn’t a fight, but it was quite clear that he felt I should be moving along that path. I’d intended to, so it didn’t make any difference to me and I think that’s the time that I told him that he’d done a great thing with the pardon and that history would vindicate him. But, he called me back in, I guess it was a year later. I was a journalist, a columnist and it was right after John Paul Stevens had been nominated and Stevens got a unanimous vote, I think.

Smith: He was never asked about abortion.

Buchanan: Yes. And he got a unanimous vote and Ford had a meeting with columnists and I was one of them then. I came in and we each got to ask him one question. And I’m sure there’s a transcription of it, but he said there that John Paul Stevens was the kind of appointee that he would be making if he ran again and were president again. And I said to myself, “Did we come all the way up the Hill for this?” And, at that point, I went out of the meeting and I called Sears and said, basically, “I’m with your guy. I’m with Reagan.” Even though I liked Reagan, admired him, and conservatively much closer to him naturally. I was not with him because I liked Ford.(?) Ford was a good guy. He was a good man. I thought he was doing a good job as best he could, but I’ll never forget when he had that statement, “I don’t want a honeymoon, I want a long, happy marriage with the Congress.” And the Congress of the United States is ripping everything apart, and he wants a good, long marriage.
Smith: In some ways you can trace the trajectory of the Ford presidency as two and a half years of unlearning some of his congressional instincts or, at least, learning the difference between Congress and being an executive - above all, occupying the Oval Office. He said what really hurt about the ’76 election was he felt he’d just mastered the job when he lost it.

Buchanan: Right.

Smith: Did Reagan make him a better candidate on balance?

Buchanan: Sure. Sure. The Reagan challenge really woke them up. I mean, I think Reagan made some big mistakes. They oversold New Hampshire. They’re going to win it. For Heaven’s sakes, they should’ve said, “We’re going to do the best we can coming in to New Hampshire against the sitting president.” But Reagan ran a dead heat. It was considered a loss and he collapsed in Florida, but that’s another story. That was a good campaign. Eventually, it was, but I think there’s no doubt that Gerald Ford was a better candidate. I was at the convention with the Reagan folks. I was up there. They didn’t pay my way or anything, but I was sitting up there pretty much in front of Reagan. And I do think when Ford waved him down and Reagan came down there and stole that convention, a lot of folks said, “We nominated the wrong guy.” And, of course, Reagan would not take that VP.

Smith: To this day, you hear all these versions, but I am convinced because Cheney has said it, a number of other people have said it, people close to Reagan have said it, they’ve quoted William French Smith as saying it at the time - “Make it crystal clear we will meet afterwards, but the precondition for that meeting is that the vice presidency not be raised.”

Buchanan: This is what I’ve heard. I’ve heard that Reagan said, “I don’t want to meet with him, because he’ll offer me the vice presidency and I’ll probably take it.” And he didn’t want to meet with him and he didn’t want the vice presidency. And you almost had to have Reagan on that ticket. I mean, given the way Reagan ran, the closeness of it, it was a natural. It was almost like an Obama-Hillary ticket.
Smith: There are Reagan people, to this day, who say, “Well, if Ford had only offered him the vice presidency…” Other Reagan people say he made it clear he didn’t want the vice presidency.

Buchanan: Reagan didn’t want it. He did not want it. Everything I’ve heard, he did not want it. He was just afraid he was such a pushover that he would take it. Ronald Reagan is a very nice guy. That’s one of his problems - if you asked him, “Can you do this for the cause?”

Smith: During the Reagan years, did you hear from the president anything about Ford? Derogatory or otherwise?

Buchanan: I shouldn’t say. It was pretty funny. Ford had the reputation from falling down the stairs. We were at Geneva for the first summit. We were at an early breakfast with the President and the staff were talking to him and saying, “Here’s what you do, sir.” But he just wanted to be with the boys before he headed over there. He, of course, did magnificently with no coat in zero degrees - Gorbachev with this 1950’s fedora on and overcoat. And we were in a house and when you went to go down the stairs, the second floor was awfully low in terms of the stairs. You’d have to duck your head coming down from the second floor to the first floor. So, we had a sign right on the overhang that said, ‘Watch your head, Jerry Ford’.

Smith: The funny thing is, Ford probably would’ve laughed at that.

Buchanan: He would’ve laughed at it. But I don’t think Reagan bore any animosity toward Gerald Ford. He certainly didn’t by the time I got there. I think there was contention, I think, between the First Lady and Betty. I think that was there. But, by the time I got there, it was Reagan’s second term. Basically when I went into the White House, no, they bore no animosity. I wouldn’t hear anything. I would be surprised to hear it. Gerald Ford had been a pretty good guy, a pretty good president. He beat Reagan fair and square. There were unforced errors on Reagan’s part. Otherwise, he would’ve won the nomination. Reagan was probably better off not having won the nomination. Carter set him up and I think the country was ready to change and Carter had a good strong hold in the south. He beat Ford in ten out of eleven states there, didn’t he, except in Virginia. So, by then, I bet Reagan would say, “I’m glad I lost that and I’m glad I lost ’68, too!”

Smith: What does it feel like to be back in this room?

Jenkins: It’s a wonderful feeling in a way, you know, my memories. I’m ambivalent. I’m sorry, but what comes to all of us. And he was a big part of my life for a relatively short period of time. Always the kindest person, thoughtful. My wife and I always said, “Wouldn’t you like to have them for next door neighbors?”

Smith: How did you become acquainted?

Jenkins: Well, I was active in the golf world and I was paired with him the first time he played in the Bob Hope Classic. In fact, I would take Bob’s place for one or two days. So we played Bermuda Dunes and that’s the first time I met him.

Smith: Now, was that after his presidency?

Jenkins: Yes. After his presidency, he came out and he played the Crosby tournament. Then he came down here and played in the Hope. He was a great competitor. He didn’t frolic around. He wanted to make all the putts.

Smith: Did his language reflect his occasional frustration on the course?

Jenkins: Oh, I’ve seen some explosive tendencies, which we all have from time to time.

Smith: Did you know he had a temper? And he had spent a lot of effort controlling it. Tell me about it.

Jenkins: The one I remember most vividly was down in Mazatlan, Mexico. The Betty Ford Center was establishing a unit down there at the behest of a very wealthy Mexican who had had his wife and his children in the Betty Ford Center up here. We went out to play golf and I had brought a friend of mine, Glenn Davis, the old Army halfback. Jerry Ford loved football and so they got along famously. We got out on the course and he didn’t play well. And the paparazzi in Mexico, we found, was just unbelievable. He finally lost his temper, but he got over it right away.
Smith: Did he have a sense of humor?

Jenkins: Yeah, he did, he had a good sense of humor, I always thought. Particularly if you were on a subject like golf or sports. He loved to recount his Navy days.

Smith: Really? What did he talk about?

Jenkins: Well, the story he told over again - near the end of his life - we’d go to lunch maybe once a month with him – he was a young ensign on a fleet carrier and they got caught in a typhoon. If you recall it, there was a book called Halsey’s Typhoon. And he came out from the officer’s quarters at midnight and they were in the midst of this typhoon and he almost washed overboard. A young member of the crew, you know how you get metal, he grabbed that and the crew member threw him back on board. He said, “I came pretty close to losing it all right there.” And he got a big kick out of Bob Hope, which everybody did.

Smith: Was Hope funny?

Jenkins: Yeah, people ask me that all the time. I had a thirty year relationship with him and I think of times – we’re now going to have the 50th anniversary of the Ryder Cup matches at our course down here. Well, there are only four courses west of the Mississippi that ever hosted the Ryder Cup. Bob was the non-playing captain of the American team. Lord Brabazon was the non-playing captain of the British team. So they both got up to say a few words and Brabazon said something about hiring unemployed comedians. And Bob said, “Yes, it’s true, I was born in England, but I left in a very short time as soon as I realized I had little chance to become king.”

Reagan would call him and ask him to get his writers to send him jokes that would be appropriate for some function.

Smith: I wonder what the president thought watching Hope in the last years which were -

Jenkins: Very sad. It was awful. And I think they learned a lesson. It was just not good.

Smith: Was it that he just couldn’t quit the stage?

Jenkins: Oh no, he was gone by then. He mentally was not functioning. He didn’t know where he was or who he was. And he was paraded around by people around him and some of his old friends thought it was a tragic error, including this one. He knew.

Smith: There’s a story – I think Penny, it must have been Penny – someone told me this story that tells you a lot about the both of them. That, before the very end, Hope would decide he’d want to play golf and call the president. The president would go out and they’d play one or two holes and then Hope would lie down. And the president would come back and then he would go back and get him when Hope was ready. Does that ring a bell at all?

Jenkins: Yeah, he had a nurse, a male nurse, with him most of that time and the nurse would say, “Well, let’s go have a drink.” And Bob, he hadn’t had a regular drink in twenty years and they’d go in and he’d have the bartender mix a little chocolate something and hand it to Bob and that satisfied him. He was placid. And he’d been so sharp, you know, so many times. I was a young stock broker and I was fortunate enough to get Bob’s account. There was a picture taken and he was standing - he was at a party - I was seated. He had his arm around me and I said, “Would you autograph this for my office?” So it came back and it said, “It’s like hugging my money.” There were just lots of little things like that.

Smith: Go back not that long ago, maybe the 80s, when the Fords sort of were new in town. For people who haven’t been here, I mean, you think about who was around – Sinatra and Hope and obviously a lot of old Hollywood-types - Alice Faye - even Spiro Agnew – was out here. What was the place like when they first arrived?

Jenkins: Well, I can’t say I can compare it to any place like that. I mean, it seems odd to say that, but it blossomed from an arid, virtually abandoned – our family came here in 1934 when there weren’t a lot of paved roads. And it just became a haven for some of the movie crowd. They would come down here. There were gambling establishments that were illegal, but were open here – half a dozen of them. So it was a playground for them and they’d come down and get away. Then people didn’t pay a lot of attention to their hijinks, you know. But later on when the Fords came in the 80s, that was not the case. It had gotten a lot more sophisticated. But the impression I had, it was so just mind-boggling as how they plunged into every charitable thing down here. They didn’t miss anything. Hope said at one of the occasions, he says, “Jerry and Betty Ford would go to the opening of a refrigerator door if they think it’ll help the community.”

Smith: What sorts of things for example?

Jenkins: Well, the Living Desert, they would come to dinner, which is a little wildlife…and the Hope Classic Ball, they were always there. We had a lot of different ones. They didn’t miss any of them.

Smith: Is there a season when a lot of these charitable events are concentrated?

Jenkins: Oh yeah, it starts after the first of the year, ends at Easter. It’s now _________, much more so, but for years, that was the season. Nobody came before Christmas. You stayed home at Christmas and came out after Christmas and everything exploded. The Hope Classic put it on the national scene and has been a wonderful contributor to charity.

Smith: I remember being surprised at the number of folks, when the president died, who overnight went through St. Margaret’s Church. There were close to 60,000 people who went through there. It brought home how deep the roots were that they had sunk in this area. That they were more than just celebrities you read about...

Jenkins: Well, yeah. You know, this is not original to me, but the people would constantly say to me, “They’re just so unassuming.” We would look forward to the occasions when they would ask us to the house for dinner. We would ask them for dinner. On one occasion, and this is illustrative of my point, they didn’t respond right away which they ordinarily did, so we became concerned. But there was no need for it because Betty picked up the phone and said, “We have a new puppy and we can’t housebreak her. We don’t want to leave the house. You come over here.”

Smith: Tell me about Mrs. Ford. You must have gotten to know her well.

Jenkins: I had great admiration for her because we sort of went through the birth of the Betty Ford Center together.

Smith: Tell me about that.

Jenkins: When they first embarked on that, obviously there’s always some doubters about the location and people, it had a certain stigma to it, which she erased fortunately, quickly. She brought Dr. Pursch, who was her guiding light, as you know. He kicked it off with a wonderful speech I’ll never forget. He said, “Trying to send an alcoholic to a psychiatrist is like sending a jellyfish to an orthopedic surgeon.” Anyway, Dr. West was another marvelous person, and he developed the curriculum along with John Schwartzlose. I was liaison because I’d been at the Eisenhower Medical Center since its beginning and we wanted to be sure that they didn’t make any egregious errors that would affect both of us, and they didn’t. And Betty would listen. She would listen to the people John sent and the people in leadership capacity and learn and do it. She never asked for any credit for that, but we all sensed that. We knew that we were very fortunate to have that kind of leadership.

Smith: She was never just a name on the door.

Jenkins: No, no.

Smith: And one sensed he was so proud of her for what she had achieved.

Jenkins: Oh yeah. And he quit drinking. Oh, he was, definitely.

Smith: There are stories I have been told. I guess there was an alumni event…It was not unusual for him to be on the grill cooking hotdogs in that kind of behind the scenes involvement in her center.

Jenkins: He was very conscious of everything that went on over there. I’m from a farm family and we used to say, “The best fertilizer is the owner’s shadow.” And that’s what Jerry Ford was at the Betty Ford Center.

Smith: That’s a great line.

Did he talk politics?

Jenkins: He did, but he never instigated that kind of a talk. The majority of our conversations – he told a story about, which I’d often seen him refer to was when he played in the East-West All-Star game. He was not the starting center, but the starting center got hurt in the first five minutes of the game, so he played the rest of the game. Then they paid for his trip back on the train and they sent him to Los Angeles and he got to go through a Hollywood movie set. And when he got back to Michigan, Arch Ward, who sponsored the college all-star game, said, “I’d like for you to play.”
Now, he got paid $150 for each of those, which he saved for his first year in law school, Yale. He really needed that money. He was most proud of his football ability. He told me a story about playing in a driving rainstorm at the time and at the end, he said, “I was totally exhausted sitting in the locker room and Fielding H. Yost, who was an icon in football.” “Hurry up” Yost was the coach at Michigan- he came in, and he had retired, but he came in and put his arm around Jerry and said, “That’s the best game I’ve ever seen a center play.” He loved that.

Smith: That’s great. I’d not heard that.

Did he have a lot of friends?

Jenkins: Oh yeah. Pretty hard not to like Jerry Ford. Or else you got to believe in Santa Claus. Yeah, he had a lot of friends and I frankly don’t know his political friendships and enemies where he spent a lifetime. I would not be an authority on that. But in the local community, they were just idolized because they just never turned anything down.

Smith: How often did he play golf?

Jenkins: Well, he played two or three times a week. Quite a bit. Played in the afternoon, played nine holes a lot of the time. You know, when he first came down, and he hit the ball a long way. He had a bad reputation that was undeserved. His short game was not particularly good. If you can make those short games work, you can make a watch. That’s the part of the game that’s so frustrating, I think, for all of us.

Smith: It’s funny, I just saw yesterday, Golf Digest came out ranking the presidents as golfers. There were fifteen presidents who were golfers. The top three in their estimation were JFK, Ike, and Ford.

Jenkins: You know, I never played with JFK. I played with Nixon and I played with Ford and I played with Reagan. That’s not much of a judgment, but I know Bob Hope always said JFK was the best and you never saw anything in the press about him playing golf.

Smith: No, you didn’t. Well, because I think by that time, think how many Democrats had tried to make it into an issue with Eisenhower.
Jenkins: Oh yeah, they beat up on Eisenhower for having a putting green.

Smith: Now, Ike came out here in the winter, didn’t he?

Jenkins: Oh yeah, I was fortunate enough to be president of the club that he stayed at. He and Mamie were very gracious, they were wonderful to us. We were considerably younger, but they’d invite us over and he would barbecue in the backyard.

Smith: I often thought that Eisenhower was Ford’s kind of president.

Jenkins: Yeah, I think so.

Smith: Someone for whom really blatant partisanship was a – he didn’t have any time for that.

Jenkins: No, he didn’t.

Smith: Pragmatist.

Jenkins: And you know, one time Lyndon Johnson came out to visit Ike and Ike was getting in pretty bad shape so we were playing a little 3-par course over in Palm Springs. In fact, he’d played the day before and gotten a hole-in-one with Lyndon Johnson. So we were driving over to play it. Freeman Gosden, I was telling over at Amos(?), “Mr. President, would you mind telling us what you told Lyndon?” And Ike said, “No, not at all. He never did a damn thing I told him to do.”

Smith: President Ford took some heat particularly early on after he left the White House for going on boards and “commercializing” the presidency. What’s your take on all of that?

Jenkins: My general feeling is he paid his dues. I think it’s just almost silliness, for instance, for the three major automobile corporations’ heads to catch hell because they came down in a jet. I mean, do you want some guy that can’t afford the train to be running General Motors and Ford? These guys have proven their worth and in particular our presidents have. Now, to give an example that just makes my blood boil even now, I went to high school with a young fellow down here whose mother was a Cherokee Indian and his father was a Tobacco Road guy. We played football together and he got in the Naval V-12 unit and, he wasn’t a student, but he got his degree from USC and he went into the Navy and seen ships. Forty years later, he says, “Paul, this is Bill McGonagle.” I says, “Gee, Bill.” He said, “I’m retired from the Navy and I’d like to come over and play golf with ya.” I said, “Great. We’ll have some lunch.” Well, he walked into the room and I looked and there was a little…and I said, “Is that what I think it is, a Medal of Honor?” And he said, “Yeah.” He’d been captain of an intelligence ship, badly wounded, and saved the ship, go back to Malta, and the story goes on and on. But I said, “What do you get for that?” He said, “Four hundred dollars a month.” Now, you know, when I look at Madonna and Britney Spears and Bill McGonagle…

Smith: Your point is well taken.

Tell me about Ford - comedy about him stumbling and being clumsy, whereas in fact as we know, he was a real natural athlete.

Jenkins: Probably the best that ever served as a president, because he was versatile, for one thing. He could ski and… No, he kind of tossed it off every time. He just considered the source. But he had a pretty good relationship with the press, generally.

Smith: He liked reporters.

Jenkins: M-hmm. Yeah, he wasn’t afraid of the give and take like some of his predecessors.

Smith: And I assume here he was pretty accessible to journalists.

Jenkins: Oh, yes. A number of times I remember him mentioning that he had to stay because he had to do an interview with Brokaw or one of those ilk.

Smith: In his later years, did he play as often?

Jenkins: No, he became very frail and weak and he was very cognizant that he shouldn’t. He had one bad scene with the, oh, he was over at the private course and he passed out. It was a hot day and playing with Jimmy Greenbaum and a couple of others. That was a warning to him, I think.

Smith: How tough was it for him to acknowledge physical limitations? Because he was, as you say, he was a very athletic guy. He loved to travel. And I often thought, around his ninetieth birthday, I think when the doctors really advised him to cut back on the travel, that that must have been rough on him.
Jenkins: I’m sure it was, but he took it pretty well. I can recall a couple of times when I said, “How are you?” and he said, “Well, I’m old!” “Oh, well, I meant how do you feel?” He said, “I feel okay, but I’m old!” Occasionally we would be at a dinner party where someone could come up to him – case in point, a society lady at the house here started badgering him a little bit at dinner about the Warren Commission. And he tolerated that pretty well and then he finally got a little tired of it and said, “Listen, we were very capable. We did our homework. We’re utterly, totally convinced, unless you have some material evidence that’s different from ours, that we made the right decision.” And she put her napkin up and… It was pretty...

Smith: I think Oliver Stone was not one of his favorite people.

Jenkins: Oh, yeah. No, no.

Smith: I only heard him disparage two people and the worst thing he could say about someone was, “He’s a bad man.”

Jenkins: Yeah.

Smith: And one of them was Gordon Liddy and the other was John Dean. And, you know, when you stop to think about it, you can understand where he was coming from.

Jenkins: I recall, now that you mention that, one time we were playing golf and I know Jimmy Carter had done something and I was irate and he said, “He’s a good man, Paul. Breathe through your nose.”

Smith: They really did become friends, didn’t they?

Jenkins: Yes, they did.

Smith: Unlikely friendship in some ways.

Jenkins: Yeah, I thought it was. But they traveled, as you said, to distant places together and those were momentous occasions.

Smith: They’d also both run against Ronald Reagan.

Jenkins: I don’t want to touch that.

Smith: I mean, that was one of the things they had in common.
Jenkins: You might’ve put a third name in there.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Jenkins: Yes. We had lunch at Eldorado Country Club and I think Jim Greenbaum was with us. He stayed with him pretty much, they had a standing date for lunch. I was obviously struck by how frail he was, but he was mentally lucid. He hadn’t lost a peg there.

Boy, I miss him.

Smith: What do you miss?

Jenkins: He always came with an air of fun and, you know, I was not involved in anything serious with him, so we’d talk about our kids and our dogs and football. For awhile we had a standard ten dollar bet every time Michigan went to USC, the University of Spoiled Children. But I had a lot of ten dollar bills I collected for a while there.

Smith: Did he pay up with good grace?

Jenkins: Oh, we were at a formal dinner one time, he got up and “Where was I?”, he was asking the Secret Service. He wanted to pay me the ten dollars he’d lost New Year’s Day.

Smith: It’s funny, I never saw it but people who did testify. He wasn’t thought of as an eloquent man, but he would go back most years to Michigan for the Ohio game and he would find a way to go back and give a pep talk to the team. And it’s like someone flipped a switch. A whole different voice. And people who were there, not once but multiple times, said it was extraordinary. The kids ate it up, but obviously he tapped in to something. It was a real passion.

Jenkins: In relation to that, I have to say, you asked me earlier how did I feel about his stipends from lectures afterwards. He worked at that. He became much better as time went on. It wasn’t a situation where he was just showing up to be there, he had something to say and he put it very well. He got better all the time. So, and I talk to people, I didn’t serve on any boards with him of any consequence, but he always had his homework done and he walked in there with questions and answers that he wanted to have. It’s often given a Midwestern _______, but it’s more equivalent to, in my opinion, successful people. He had a work ethic.

Smith: He bordered on being a workaholic.

Jenkins: Yeah, he did.

Smith: I mean, you talk to people here, they worked Saturdays. He was in here part of the day Sunday as well.

Jenkins: Well, I’m sure he was probably that way in the White House, too. We had a caddy over at the club and we called him Freddy the Foot because if he liked you and you hit the ball out of bounds, he’d kick your ball back in bounds. So President Ford hit one out of bounds, we were playing over there and I saw Freddy go up and kick it. I said, “That the longest field goal you ever made?” and Freddy said, “Against the wind, it is.”

Smith: The president was willing to accept that?

Jenkins: Oh, the president knew what he was doing, yeah.

Smith: You know, there are wonderful stories about, I think up at Vail, early in the Clinton administration. President Clinton had, in fact, invited himself to play golf with the president and Arnold Palmer, who, I guess, is sort of cantankerous.

Jenkins: Can be.

Smith: Yeah. And, of course, being Bill Clinton, he played according to his own rules. And they played the whole day with lots of mulligans and Arnold Palmer was getting pretty steamed up over this. And at the end of the day, President Clinton said, “This is great. Let’s play again tomorrow.” And President Ford said, “Okay, but only if you play by the rules.”

Jenkins: And he never did that! He came out here and it was the same story. He had some hang-up that he had to shoot the low score. And, you know, Ike had a brother, Edgar, who was over at La Quinta, and Edgar was a better golfer than Ike. That preyed on Ike’s mind and Ike had a temper just like Jerry did, particularly on the golf course. He was mad at himself, but it got pretty quiet sometimes.
Smith: No clubs wrapped around trees or anything?

Jenkins: Oh no, nothing like that. In fact, they had a little thing at Eldorado Country Club. You’d make a bet for two dollars and on the ninth hole, there was a rock on the edge of the lake. And we would bet fifty dollars closest to the rock because Ike’s drive would always go right out by the rock.

Smith: To someone who’s never played the game, what is it about golf that has such appeal to people, particularly to hard-driving, hard-charging professional types?

Jenkins: I think, for one thing, it’s not a team sport, it’s all in you. And, it’s a game where you can play with one who’s not proficient. You know, do you put Pete Sampras with Charlie Parkenfarker(?) on the tennis court? Charlie’s going to wish he’d never seen him. But he could play golf and give him four strokes a side and it’s neck and neck. And it’s unique in that respect. The other area it’s unique in is, and I hope they never lose this, it’s traditionally your responsibility to play the game fairly and honestly. Instead of being an NFL lineman that said, “I didn’t do it!” Those are reasons, there are more reasons.

Smith: Is it relaxing?

Jenkins: I think so because to play well, you have to get your mind, you can’t play with any of these distractions in you. And I’ve spent a lifetime doing that.

Smith: Do you think that’s one of the reasons Ford found it so enjoyable?

Jenkins: Yeah, because, first of all, the challenge of getting better. The harder you try, the worse you do quite often in golf. It’s not a matter of trying. Everything has to click. You could look terrible in a practice and go out and play a good round of golf.

Smith: He did, on at least one occasion didn’t he, get a hole-in-one? It might not have been here, but…

Jenkins: Well, I’m sure he must have. It’d be rare to play as much as he did and not get a hole-in-one.

Smith: I see a picture of he and Steve. They played a lot in his later years, didn’t they?
Jenkins: I don’t know. I didn’t see Steve very often down here. When I did, obviously, they would go out, it was on Christmas holiday or something like that.

Smith: Did you see any of the other kids around?

Jenkins: Well, yeah, Susan all the time. Of course, she’s doing a wonderful job and I’m sure Betty’s very proud of that.

Smith: That must be, for someone to build something with your name on it in which you’ve invested so much passion, then to know the secession is taken care of in a way that you can relax.

Jenkins: Well, I’m sure, you know, she’s a worrier like all of us. She wanted to protect what she built and the ideal person was Susan. So, I think we’ve just seen the beginning of the institution.

Smith: How long were you involved with the Center? Or the Institute?

Jenkins: Well, gosh, I’m 81 years old as of Monday, so I probably got off when I was 72 or 3. From the very beginning, I was.

Smith: I’ve been told, by the way, that by more than one person that she, in effect, saved Leonard Firestone’s life.

Jenkins: Oh, no question about that in my mind. Leonard started drinking when he was fourteen years old. The gate guards to the Firestone estate would give him wine. Whew, boy, I think a part of the disease, if you want to call it that, is people have a tendency to fall off, fall back. I think it’s a part of it, sometimes. But, you know, Alcoholics Anonymous do a wonderful job. It’s interesting to me, just as a casual observer, that a very large percentage of the patients, and I saw a lot of them, are sensitive people and bright, which just enhances the tragedy of it.

Smith: And how did they react to her?

Jenkins: The patients loved her. Oh, man, you know, they couldn’t believe she’s over there working with both hands eight hours a day. Maybe that’s where Jerry got it.

Smith: I’ve been told that it was not unusual for a woman of a certain age to arrive there, resistant to being there and people at the Center would call Mrs. Ford, and whatever the time of day she would drop whatever she was doing and go over there and sort of sit on her bed and hold her hand and walk her through her own experience.

Jenkins: It was a remarkable experience. And I’m glad I got to go through it the way I did. I went in - they have a Professional In Residence program - and I went in and Betty said, “If you’re going to be a good trustee, you’ve got to go through this and get a feel for what it’s like.” And one of the requirements is that the group has to accept you. So, I did and the group accepted me and it was an eye-opener to me, a revelation.

Smith: In what way?

Jenkins: Well, I think one of the things, for instance, was an assignment that they had to write a letter to the person that they thought was either the one they loved the most or they felt was a causative factor in them being there. And then they’d sit there with the counselor in a roundtable atmosphere and read these letters. There’s not a dry eye in the house. There was a celebrity patient in my group, and I won’t mention the name for obvious reasons, and, boy, it just tore you up. It was a football player and he sent a letter to his father, “Why didn’t you love me?”

Smith: Were the celebrities treated like everyone else by everyone else?

Jenkins: Well, first of all, there weren’t that many of them. And, yeah, they were treated like everybody else, maybe a little worse if anything, because, you know, they were a little more difficult to handle as you could well imagine.

Smith: Shame must be a part of the thing that must be overcome, I assume. The stigma, even now…

Jenkins: Oh yeah, and I’m sure that’s true in cancer, maybe to a lesser degree. That’s part of our civilization, I think, that you fight that stigma if you have one of these diseases.

Smith: You stop and think what she has accomplished, not just as First Lady. In many ways her influence is greater since leaving the White House. When you stop to think in terms of affecting ordinary people, families, actually live their lives, she’s had more impact than a lot of presidents.
Jenkins: Oh, you can take breast cancer, we haven’t even mentioned. And there’re some of our presidents that haven’t had that much effect, you’re right.

Smith: Is it really true that back then people just didn’t talk about it?

Jenkins: Oh no, they didn’t talk about it. They always had an uncle that was upstairs and nobody… I’ll tell you a cute story. We were at a dinner party, this certain fellow who had been a US ambassador to a foreign country was talking about his adult life and he had a raging affair with County Smirnoff(?). And he said, “I lived in Colorado for awhile, but” he said, “the altitude began to get to my liver.”

Smith: Did you ever see them in Vail?

Jenkins: I played in the tournament.

Smith: Oh, you did?

Jenkins: I played one time with Weiskopf and the fellow from Golf Digest and then the great Celtic basketball player John…

Smith: Havlicek.

Jenkins: Havlicek. And John had just taken up golf. But you know what, when it got down to a twelve foot putt we had to have, John made it. And it didn’t surprise any of us either. Talk about a competitor. But it was a wonderful tournament. We had a lot of fun. They had a show afterwards that Bob would always come up and do.

Smith: And the house in Vail, were you in the house?

Jenkins: Yes.

Smith: Describe that.

Jenkins: Well, it would fit in Architectural Digest, it was a beautiful home up in the pine trees there. Pretty special.

Smith: You’ve heard about the parties out there, I guess there was a deck? There were parties outside?

Jenkins: Yes.
Smith: With a view, I assume.

Jenkins: Oh, you looked down over the valley. They loved it up there. That was a big part of their life. When they came here, they definitely built a relationship with that community as well.

Smith: They were, I guess, as active in events there and causes as they were here.

Jenkins: Yes.

Smith: You know, in the last few years, their friends all urged them not to go to Vail.

Jenkins: Yes. Well, the doctors, yeah.

Smith: A number of people urged them not to go.

Jenkins: Well, you know, Jimmy Greenbaum tried to talk them out of it and he lived there right next to them. And they said, “No, it’s a big part of our lives and we understand the risk we’re taking and we still want to go.” It was a lovely place, nice parlay, here and there.

Smith: One last thing. If you were telling something to people who didn’t know him, who never knew him, or only as a name in a history book or an old grainy film clip, what should people know about Gerald Ford?

Jenkins: Well, you know, the thing I think he probably was most proud of in the long run was his ability to rally the country after the Nixon debacle. And it cost him the presidency without a shadow of a doubt and I think Jerry Ford always knew that and he took that stand.

Smith: Political courage, personal courage.

Jenkins: Yeah, courage would be a by-word.

Smith: That’s great.

When you saw him the last time, how long was that before…? Was it a few months or…do you have any idea?

Jenkins: I don’t have any idea. I think I would guess a little over a month, but it was in the spring.
Smith: When was the last time you saw Mrs. Ford?

Jenkins: At the funeral. I haven’t seen her since then.

Smith: One senses she’s still grieving.

Jenkins: Oh, I think so. They were really close. But, boy, she doesn’t have to take a back seat to anyone for her career.

Smith: It is an extraordinary story. When you think of all the things she’s confronted and overcome. And really became the source of inspiration to so many people.

Jenkins: Absolutely. And, what do I long for? I long for our country to get the kind of relationship with Obama that they had with Tip O’Neill and Jerry. Tip O’Neill, boy, what a character.

Smith: Did you see them together?

Jenkins: Oh, yeah, they played golf in the Hope tournament several times and we would come over here when he was here and he was very fond of Tip. There was nothing false.

Smith: And they obviously were fond of each other.

Jenkins: Oh, yeah. And Tip would bring out a congressman named Marty Rousseau(?) a few times. I don’t know that he brought out anyone other than Marty on a regular basis.

Smith: Opposites attracting?

Jenkins: Yes. But Marty was an NBA caliber basketball player and younger.

Smith: He really hit it off well with younger people, didn’t he?

Jenkins: Oh, yeah, I think he did.

Smith: I almost sensed that they liked to have younger people around them, almost deliberately as a way of staying young.

Jenkins: I think they did, yeah. Now, Susan was the one they saw the most of. Jack was over on the coast and she went over there, I guess, this summer for awhile. We have a place over there, but we didn’t bother her. I just don’t know that I… I cry at stop signs.

Smith: Listen, thank you, very much. This has been great.

Jenkins: Oh, sure.

Smith: Thank you for doing this. Tell us about your life before Gerald Ford.

O’Neill: I was born into a military family; my father was in the infantry and then morphed into the Air Force. He was in the service for thirty-seven years; then went to law school and practiced public service law the rest of his life. But I grew up as a military kid, which means I moved around. I was born in St. Louis and then we moved to Illinois and Hawaii and New Mexico and California and Alaska, went to different places. Then I went to school in northern California, first in Fresno and then at Claremont Graduate School. Then I got recruited into the government in 1961 in something called the Management Intern Program which doesn’t exist anymore, where they hired about three hundred people a year into the middle management ranks of the government. They had a written test and an oral test.

Smith: Now those obviously were the Kennedy years.

O’Neill: Actually, I started work on July 3, 1961, and part of the reason I decided to give up my doctoral studies in economics was, first of all, it was painful to try to go to school on a $2100 a year fellowship with a wife and two kids; but also because I was really intrigued with the notion that if you want to make a difference, come to Washington. So I did. I got recruited; I had a job.

Smith: Was that part of the Kennedy appeal?

O’Neill: Absolutely. And it sounds corny I suppose, to young people especially, to say the highest calling is to go do something that benefits the whole society.

Smith: I was going to ask you: how do you communicate that? I’m old enough to remember, too, the extraordinary aura that that administration generated. The Peace Corps being a tangible example, but the program you referred to likewise. How do you communicate that to today’s young people?
O’Neill: It was an interesting time and it’s probably too easy to get romantic about it, but there was a sense in the country that any problem we could define, we could solve. It was the American way. And yes, we have problems in our cities and yes, our education system isn’t working right and health care, but we can fix it.

Smith: Don’t you think a little of that was a hangover from the war and the Depression? We had beaten the Depression, won World War II. The Fifties, which are fashionable to mock – in many ways represent the apogee of American confidence and power; and so it’s not surprising.

O’Neill: I think that’s right. And I think there is also something, for me anyway, to the personality of John Kennedy. Having spent a lot of time as an undergraduate and in graduate school thinking about policy and political figures, when he would have press conferences, I would listen to the press conferences because they were full of content and humor. He was a person who was really extraordinary at the quick quip that kind of captured the essence of an issue. And I was proud to be part of that kind of administration where, when we made a mistake in Cuba, the President stood up and said we did. He dealt with the crisis in a way that turned out to be correct more than incorrect; even though he’d launched into something he shouldn’t have, obviously.

Smith: But what does it tell you about the American people that in the wake of the Bay of Pigs, his numbers went up?

O’Neill: Absolutely. People got great confidence. I remember being at a meeting someplace here in Washington when the crisis was unfolding, and on a noon break in the conference, a friend and I went over to the Coast Guard to find out what we needed to do to see about signing up if we were needed. It wasn’t just me – it was that kind of a feeling that if our country needs us, we are here for them. It was really extraordinary.

Smith: What do you think destroyed that? Was it the assassination and the whole litany of Vietnam and Watergate?

O’Neill: I actually think that most people have gotten the Johnson years wrong because they focus on Vietnam. In effect, after the transfer from this elegant person to this earthy, let me show you my gallbladder scar, kind of a president. It was really extraordinary what he was able to legislate – civil rights and the whole panoply of things that I actually think were not only well intended, but they were good ideas, because I believe this: that Lyndon Johnson’s idea about government was to try things, and if they worked, then expand them and if they didn’t work, scrap them.

Smith: Rooseveltian, in some ways – FDR’s.

O’Neill: Exactly. So he knew urban renewal. People don’t even know what this means anymore, but urban renewal was a disaster because it cleaned out whole communities and erected monumental, colossal, Soviet kind of public housing blocks and stuff. So Lyndon Johnson’s answer to that was Model Cities. And when he started with the idea of Model Cities, I was here then and working in the administration. By then I was in the Bureau of the Budget. The idea of Model Cities - the way Lyndon Johnson first fashioned it - was seven cities so that we could do something on a big enough scale, concentrate funds, so that we could demonstrate we could really cure the problems that were growing in urban centers. By the time the legislation was enacted, there were 150 Model Cities, which meant the funds got distributed everywhere. And the reason there were 150 is because at that time these legislators had to be bought off by having their city designated in order to pass the legislation. So, in a way, that experiment never had a chance because it was a bureaucratic nightmare by the time it was enacted.

But I think Johnson’s initial idea was right; similar to his idea about neighborhood health care centers. We ought to try neighborhood health care centers and see if it’s a way that we can provide care to the underserved and dense populations areas by having a place people can go instead of the emergency room. So I think there were probably too many initiatives, but there were lots of good ideas and I think Lyndon Johnson would have scrapped the ones that didn’t work well.

Smith: It’s interesting that you say that because you can look at the last forty years of American political history as a reaction to the Great Society.
O’Neill: I agree with you.

Smith: That said, though, how many of the Great Society programs have been repealed? Not many.

O’Neill: Exactly.

Smith: You don’t hear a lot of talk about getting rid of Medicare or Head Start. It’s a dichotomy that there is this consensus, somewhat of a consensus, that government tried to do too much; that conventional thinking, underlay the Nixon and Reagan and even our own era, in some ways. But when you get to the operational – you know, the old line, the American people are philosophically conservative and operationally liberal.

O’Neill: Right. I’ll tell you one parting thought on that. I actually like aspirational goals because I think people respond really well to aspirational goals. And the phrase, The Great Society, always appealed to me because it seemed to me aspirational. If you apply that notion of a Great Society to the entire society, it’s not about the government, it’s about we the people aspiring to be a great society.

Smith: It requires a communal sense of identity, which everything about today’s culture tends to work against. Richard Nixon - what kind of contact did you have with him?

O’Neill: It’s interesting, I went to the Bureau of the Budget in January of 1967. My first assignment – this again because of a Lyndon Johnson initiative – during the Johnson administration Bob McNamara was the secretary of defense, and had been appointed by Kennedy. But he (McNamara) was there until 1967 and a half, maybe. McNamara brought with him a bunch of tools associated with the whiz kids, which means operations research and systems thinking ideas, and was busily applying them to the activity of national defense. And Lyndon Johnson liked the order of that so much that he called in Charlie Schultz, who was then the director of the Bureau of the Budget, and told him, “Charlie, I want you to hire people into the Bureau of the Budget and bring these ideas that McNamara is applying to national defense to all the domestic activities of government, because we need to think more concretely and more clearly and more systematically about the domestic activities of the government. So I want you to hire a bunch of people in OMB.” I was one of the people they hired to do that. My first assignments were to work on health and medical care. And so when President Nixon was elected, I was a grade 16, which meant I was a kind of upper middle part of the Civil Service.

I worked for an assistant director who was a political appointee and after about six months I got really deeply involved in the topic of the day which was welfare reform; and the buzz word in those days was the negative income tax. There had been some work done in New Jersey during the Johnson administration, actually testing the idea of giving low income people money, related to their lack of wealth accumulation or income inversely to where they were on the income spectrum. And so with my background in economics and operational research, this was a really nice fit for me. I became the go-to numbers guy on the distributional implications of different levels of income support and phase out of financial support for President Nixon’s largest first year initiatives.

It’s interesting, my co-conspirator in this was Jodie Allen, who later became the editorial page editor for the Sunday Outlook section for the Washington Post. But in those days she was a computer programming expert and she worked at HEW. And so the two of us would go down – the government didn’t have, except for the Defense Department – the domestic government didn’t have computers big enough to do these simulation studies. So Jodie Allen and I would go down to a place called CDC that had this mammoth computer, and generate these data sets so that we could answer President Nixon’s questions about how the money would be distributed by income class, by state, by county, all that kind of thing because obviously there were political questions about all of this.

And I think maybe it was in June or July of 1969, President Nixon went to Romania and he had his entourage with him, Bob Haldeman, whoever from the State Department, and John Erlichman. So John Erlichman called me from Air Force One as they were leaving Romania to get the latest data on the distributional implications of the Family Assistance Program.
Smith: That’s right.

O’Neill: And that was my beginning of really substantial involvement with the inner circle during the Nixon administration. It was all about substantive things. On February 18, 1971 President Nixon sent the most systematic message about health and medical care to the Congress that has ever been written by any president in history, including this one. It still is a document that stands the test of time.

Smith: It’s interesting because what you say sort of runs counter to the popular notion of Nixon as a president who was not only disengaged from, but almost contemptuous of, domestic policy.

O’Neill: Absolutely not. You know, the Family Assistance Program was the domestic equivalent of going to China.

Smith: Yeah.

O’Neill: It was absolutely antithetical to most people in his party to think that the federal government ought to actually collect money and hand it out willy-nilly to people, based on the fact that they didn’t have much or any income at all. The initiative that was launched on August 8, 1969 included the Family Assistance Program, revenue sharing, and reform of the Office of Economic Opportunity. The interesting philosophical thing in revenue sharing was the idea that the federal tax system from a societal point of view, is arguably the most equitable. But Nixon believed collecting taxes and then having the federal government make the decision was not directionally correct, and so he believed we distribute some of that money to state and local governments so that people at that level could make their own decisions about what were the high priorities in their jurisdictions.

It started as a moderate program, I think $5 billion, but the idea was to sequentially move forward with getting rid of federal decision making about domestic priorities and letting people in their own communities decide how best to allocate resources. And the point it illustrated to me about Nixon was that he was really a pretty deep thinker about the subject of government and federalism. And if you think about it, the idea of revenue sharing was really antithetical to political Washington because it passed the power to other people and members of Congress did not believe they would get any credit for it.

Smith: In the press releases.

O’Neill: This reminds me of an episode from my time with President Ford when I said to him, I think maybe in early 1975, “There is no support for revenue sharing in the Congress. And as soon as they have a chance, they are going to kill it.” And he was blown away. He said, “I don’t think that’s right, Paul.” But it turned out to be right. The Congress got rid of revenue sharing. But President Ford was a strong supporter of the idea and thought that it sufficiently entrenched it would stay in place.

Smith: Let me ask you a large question about him, I want to be careful how I phrase this, I don’t want to make it sound like a pejorative. On the one hand, he did tend to believe the best of people, which is exactly what you want, obviously, in a president, and particularly at that time. On the other hand, the classic example is his first press conference as president at the end of August. Which I always thought was the tipping point that led to the pardon. Because he went into that press conference honestly believing that the press corps would want to talk to him about Greece and Turkey and Cyprus.

O’Neill: Right, important…

Smith: The business that he was trying to get his arms around as a new president. He’d been forewarned that that was not likely to be the case, but he believed otherwise. And he left that press conference unhappy, mostly with himself. He didn’t think he’d handled the flood of Nixon questions terribly well. But I think he was also angry that he had been subjected to this flood of Nixon questions. And two weeks later came the pardon. Was he naïve in some ways? For someone who had been in Washington for twenty-five years…

O’Neill: I’m going to tell you a companion story that relates to what you are saying. I go back to what you said earlier. President Ford was a person who started with a presumption everyone was on the up and up, and until proved otherwise, that’s how he viewed you. He gave everybody and everything the benefit of the doubt, and so there was something I had the privilege to watch because I was here for fifteen years during that time from Kennedy through the end of the Ford administration. I was privileged enough to be high enough up that I could see this in person - that people really didn’t understand significant things like what you are suggesting about what the media could really be like. I think the media has grown more ferocious over the decades, but I think he miscalibrated that he would be treated in a respectful way and they would not spend all of their time wanting to relive the Nixon thing, which in a way the media loved because it was soap opera every day from late 1972 until Nixon left. I think they truly didn’t want to give that up, it was too much fun. I suppose it got them customers.

But there is another example of that kind of thing, and remember, he was vice president for a time and so he was even closer to what it was like to be president. But in September of 1974 (the month after he became President) he went to Ohio to give a speech at, I think, Ohio State. And so he gave the speech and the theme of it was the federal government is going to take a stronger, more useful role in providing for the transition from the world of school to the world of work. And so during the Nixon administration, as I went up in the ranks, actually even beginning with the Family Assistance program I believe the speechwriting department never released a speech without it crossing over my desk to make sure that there were no inaccuracies, both in facts or in tone or presentation, and mostly they took my edits. There was a woman there named Agnes Waldren who was magical about getting facts right, and I was a part of her support network. And so President Ford went in September of 1974, a month after he’d become president, to give this speech at Ohio State, and I think even before he finished delivering the speech - they released an advance text - my phone was ringing off the hook from people in the media saying we’re traveling with the President, he’s made this speech about strengthening the role of the federal government and the transition from academe to work and we want to know how much money is going to be spent on this, how will it be distributed.

After I got four or five of these calls, I called the chief of staff and said, “What is this about? I don’t know anything about this.” They had not run this by me, so that’s why I didn’t know anything about it. Milton Friedman, not the economist, but the speechwriter was there answered the phone. I said, “Milt, something has gone wrong. The President’s made this speech. I never saw it, I don’t know what it’s all about.” And he said, “Oh, well, for God’s sake Paul, it’s just a speech.” And I think President Ford would have said the same thing, “It’s just a speech. I give speeches all the time.”

Smith: Is that the congressional mind set? As opposed to the presidential mind set?

O’Neill: Yes. It’s a learned mind set. If you give speeches and you’re in the Congress for twenty-five years, and then you’re vice president, and basically, people don’t pay any attention to what you say, then you think speeches are speeches. I don’t have to be accountable for this. And I think President Ford didn’t get that right away. It only took a few encounters for him to realize, “Oh, my God.” So they instituted the process so I saw everything. I must tell you, it was really jarring when I was secretary of the Treasury for Bush ’43, I never saw anything before it was delivered and they made some horrible gaffs because I didn’t get a chance to look at what they were going to say about my area of responsibility; because they didn’t know what they were talking about.

Smith: That raises a huge question. If you look at the trajectory of the Ford presidency, it seems to me one way of looking at it is as someone who came into office with essentially a congressional outlook, who, in a relatively short period of time, under the pressure of events, was forced to learn how to be an executive, how to be a president. Those are two very different kinds of roles.

O’Neill: I would separate those. I would say he was already good at being an executive before he became president. He didn’t understand, I think, but he learned quickly the public personae thing about being president. So I’ll give you a vignette on the other end of this: in January of 1976, (I’m a student of public policy making and of the operating of the Executive Office of the President), so I knew from reviewing the history that the last president to be able to do his own press conference with an open press on the annual budget was Harry Truman. And he really did it. If you go back and listen to some of the tapes and read the transcript, Harry Truman knew everything about the budget that he presented to the Congress and was delighted to go meet with the media at the time of release so he could demonstrate to them he owned everything in that book. He was not representing somebody else’s creation; it was Harry Truman’s stamp. And those of us who worked in the executive office on economic things believed that the real expression of an administration policy is in the budget documents. It may be dry and boring to some people, but to people who are insiders, they know that’s where the priorities are set.

Smith: Do you think that was - I presume like Ford - was that a function of the time that Truman had spent in the Senate?

O’Neill: Both had a proclivity to want to know, not just to float on top of the government apparatus; but to run the government apparatus and to make personal decisions about everything; “I believe as President, these are the right things where we should be allocating resources or not.” So knowing all this, I said in the fall of 1975 to President Ford, “Harry Truman was the last president to defend his budget. You should have an open meeting with the media and present your budget because you know this budget so well, you don’t need any of the rest of us.” And the reason he had this knowledge is that he spent days and weeks going through everything in the budget with the experts, making conscious decisions about where we ought to allocate what resources. At the time I thought I knew more about the inner workings of how we allocated resources and why they were allocated, than anyone else. But President Ford was right up there in his own command of the material. I’ll never forget one night in the Oval Office, it must have been about ten o’clock and we were finishing up weeks of going through five inch binders where there is something really important on every page, and we got to a line item for retired military care. It was a line item; I think it was maybe $15 million (in a $40 billion budget). And President Ford said, “Tell me about this one, Paul.” And I just had this blank look. He was so tickled that I didn’t know what that was. But I think it showed the level of detail that he looked at, and how much he thought that was his responsibility.

Smith: It’s fascinating you say that because, of course, that is in many ways at odds with the way the modern presidency has evolved. I’ve often said he was the least self-dramatizing of presidents, which didn’t serve him well in the increasingly theatrical nature of the job.

O’Neill: Yeah, show business.

Smith: Something Rod Hills said to us...“You know, the older I get, the more experience I have, the more I think about all this, the more it seems to me the acid test of a successful presidency is the ability to make the government work.” And again, that’s not a bumper sticker – no one will make a campaign commercial about it. But when it doesn’t happen, you can be sure people are unhappy.

O’Neill: There are consequences. Exactly. So, anyway, he had this press conference in 1976 to present his budget – he decided he was going to do it. And it was interesting, he held the press conference at the State Department auditorium, which is a big place, it holds hundreds of people.

Smith: Where Jack Kennedy held his press conferences.

O’Neill: There must have been 350 journalists there and it was open season. And President Ford had a bunch of us - there were probably ten or so people up on the stage with him. He didn’t need any of us. He honestly didn’t need any of us. We were a prop. But I’ll tell you, he was so generous that somebody asked him a question about Medicare and he answered it, and then he said, “But I think Paul O’Neill down there can give you a more detailed answer.” And I think it was his deliberate intent to give me some spotlight time. He didn’t need to do it; his answer was sufficient, but he was like that. You know what I mean? He really cared about people a lot.

Smith: Did you ever see his temper?

O’Neill: One time I saw his temper when I thought maybe he was going to bite through his pipe. Jim Schlesinger sent him a memo – you probably know about this – Jim Schlesinger sent him a memo and basically told President Ford, I’ve forgotten what the issue was, but that if President Ford did what he was proposing to do, that it would severely threaten the security of the United States. No one in the world knew more about the ins and outs of national defense and resource allocations and their implications than President Ford. And he was so furious at getting what he considered to be an affront to his intelligence from his defense secretary telling him something he believed to be completely untrue, he was furious.

So I was in a meeting with the President when he got this memo, sitting there at his desk as we often did. There was a Cabinet meeting the next day, I think, and while people were assembling I stood in the Cabinet room next to Jim Schlesinger and said to him, “Jim, you ought to apologize to the President because he’s furious about that memo you sent him.” Jim was puffing on his pipe and said something like, “We’ll see.” I think it was in that week he got fired.

Smith: Was that relationship just doomed? One senses really bad chemistry.

O’Neill: I think Schlesinger really underestimated President Ford. A lot of people underestimated President Ford. They didn’t understand that this guy had a first class brain, and he was a student of everything about government. He didn’t wear it on his sleeve, and he didn’t go out of his way to let people know that he had all this stuff going on in his head about rights and wrongs, and allocations. But it was going on all the time. I think he really was not willing to tolerate someone telling him something he believed to be factually wrong. And I think he probably believed that Schlesinger knew it wasn’t right, which was a bad thing. If it had been some innocent – but Schlesinger had been studying defense policy for two or three decades himself. So I think President Ford felt like, I can’t have somebody around me who, first of all doesn’t understand what I know; and then would knowingly mislead me. If I were not as equipped as I am to do this job, this advice would be disastrous for the country.

Smith: And putting it on paper.

O’Neill: It was way over the top.

Smith: Ford was, among other things, a shrewder student of the people around him than he was often credited with.
O’Neill: I agree with that.

Smith: I wonder whether at times he used that reputation – a bit of an innocent, a bit naïve - almost using that persona in some ways.

O’Neill: Cagey.

Smith: Exactly.

O’Neill: He was. I think that’s right. He kept his own counsel when he thought there wasn’t was any particular value in letting people know what was going on in his brain.

Smith: As a young congressman, he’d been put on the CIA oversight committee because clearly the Old Bulls had decided this was someone who we could trust.

O’Neill: Exactly.

Smith: And he never betrayed that. You wonder whether he took some secrets with him to the grave.

O’Neill: I don’t know. It’s easy to speculate. I think he was a lot more complicated person than people give him credit for.

Smith: How so? That’s an interesting observation.

O’Neill: I think in the way that he posted people. I think people thought he made Carla Hills his secretary of Housing and Urban Development because she was a woman. I don’t think that’s right; I think he had an enormous respect for her intellect. It was not about, “Hey, this is a woman – that will make Betty happy.” That’s a superficial thing; but it was a quality thing. He was about quality. People who were reverential about him were people like Cederberg, who had worked with him for decades. You don’t find that kind of personal fealty in much of Washington, but there were people like that – Lud Ashley, the congressman from Ohio.

Smith: Right.
O’Neill: There were people like that who would do whatever President Ford said, just because they believed he’d figured it out better than they had. He had a lot of people like that who thought, “If Jerry Ford thinks it’s right, it’s got to be right.”

Smith: And clearly a lot of friends on both sides of the aisle.

O’Neill: Absolutely. I think his friendship with Tip was real. Very real.

Smith: There is a wonderful story; Don Penny told us a story showing his own naiveté. One day the President and O’Neill had met in the Oval Office, had a great meeting, and Tip went out on the driveway and proceeded to unload, on him. Penny saw this and was appalled. He went back in and said, “Mr. President, you won’t believe what Tip’s out there saying,” and he retold all of this, and the President sat smoking his pipe and said, “Oh, Don, that’s just politics.” Which is very revealing. You wish we could recapture some of that.

O’Neill: Absolutely. It was a better place than where we are now.

Smith: As Vice President, he was in a very awkward situation. In your contacts with him, did you ever hear or discern anything that led you to believe that he was consciously preparing to be president.

O’Neill: During the time he was vice president, in a way I was his relief valve. When he wanted to talk about something in policy, he’d call me in and we’d talk about the economic effects of building cloverleaves in the highway in Michigan to create economic development. Honest to God, we’d have that kind of a conversation. “Well, look, if we built this cloverleaf over here at I84, or whatever it is, it will have the effect of creating opportunity for gas stations and restaurants.” And he was really interested in those substantive things. What do government actions do on the community level? And when he was president, after he’d been there, I think, for three or four months, he said, “You know, Paul, there’s a lot of really interesting stuff in the local papers. I’ll make sure that after I finish the Grand Rapids Press, I’ll have it sent over to you. So you can read the Grand Rapids Press and you can see how this stuff plays on the local level.” We’re up here talking way up here, “because it will help you to have a different perspective if you see what this means when it gets down there.”

Smith: That’s fascinating.

O’Neill: So we had those kinds of conversations.

Smith: Did he ever talk about Watergate?

O’Neill: Nope. Not with me. I’m sure he must have, but he never drew me into that. And I was thankful for that. In reminiscing about these times, during the time from when Erlichman and Haldeman left from April 30, 1973, and when Nixon resigned in August of 1974, every recommendation I sent to the White House about all the things that I was responsible for was approved. Everything. And increasingly, that really made me uncomfortable because it meant I was the decision maker. And so there was a great relief the day, maybe two or three days after President Ford became president, I sent over a recommendation and he sent it back unapproved. I had this sigh of relief, “My God, I’m so glad I’m not making the decisions anymore.” Because there was that time when Haig was working on trying to manage the Watergate situation and I think he [Nixon] was actively involved, still, in international affairs, but that the domestic stuff was mine. That was a really intimidating realization.

Smith: Let me ask you, because it gets back in some ways to what we were talking about earlier, both the congressional outlook, his loyalty to friends. The whole situation around Bob Hartmann and the speechwriting operation - in some corners there was condescension toward the new President who brought in his “Grand Rapids” crowd. And some were maybe more successful than others. But the fact that the President of the United States would, over time, tolerate or adapt himself to dual speechwriting operations, which is what it evolved into, is hard to fathom.

O’Neill: I think so, but if you look at the substance, I don’t think it is too hard to reconcile. I think Bob Hartmann probably wrote most of the speech the President gave in the East Room when he was sworn in. And it was a wonderful speech. And so on substantive grounds, I think Hartmann had a role. He was a thorny, prickly personality.
Smith: And why was he a polarizing figure?

O’Neill: He didn’t go out of his way to make friends, let me say that. He was arrogant, I guess. And he didn’t believe anyone could write better than he could, so there was a lot of that about him. But it also led to some mistakes. And I don’t know who owned the Whip [Inflation Now] thing, whoever owned it should have been whipped, because it was such a bad idea. And that may have been Hartmann’s doing.

Smith: It originated in the speechwriting operation.

O’Neill: And again, within that same time period, when speeches are just speeches, it was a carryover – “We’re going to be held accountable for this. Oh, my God, make sure this is exactly what we want to say.”

Smith: Right. They were still making first impressions. One can understand Hartmann in the sense of feeling protective about his boss. But you wonder at what point being protective shades over into being possessive in an unhealthy way?

O’Neill: I think there was a certain amount of that. And I think the President tolerated it, because he didn’t see the prickliness and the internal warfare and all of that stuff that was going on.

Smith: Because there was the ’75 State of the Union Address, where literally at the last minute, I guess he had two drafts and he himself spent a day trying to…did you witness any of that?

O’Neill: Yeah, kind of second hand. Another thing, the director of OMB was Jim Lynn, and I think in that process - I’m pretty sure it was the ’75 process - there were several people who went to Williamsburg to work on the speech. I guess they thought they would get inspiration or something. So it was that kind of red team and green team of people, and as I recall, I haven’t read it for a long time, it ended up being kind of a mishmash. It had the one memorable thing about things are not good.

Smith: Which no president before or since has ever attempted.
O’Neill: Exactly right. But if he had said otherwise, the country would have said, “He’s not telling us the truth.” And so he did tell the truth. You know, he was really big on telling the truth.

Smith: A funny story which we were told by Jack Marsh. Anyone else, when he decided on the Vietnam amnesty program, would have put out a press release on Friday afternoon and headed to Camp David. But what does he do? He goes to Chicago to tell the VFW, knowing there is not going to be any applause. The day before he leaves, Jack Marsh walks into the Oval Office and says, “I’ve got some bad news.” He says, “What’s that?” Steve, on his eighteenth birthday, never registered for the draft. He said, “He looked gobsmacked.” Before the day was over they had it all taken care of. The press never caught on. I’m not sure that would happen today.

O’Neill: There were a couple of times during his presidency when he called me in and said, “Look, what I’m going to do is going to be very controversial. And I need for the implementation to be as close to perfect as possible, and you need to be responsible for implementation.” So one was about the people who had gone to Canada to avoid the draft, and he brought Charlie Goodell in, remember Charlie?

Smith: Yeah.

O’Neill: His son is now head of the NFL. But he brought Charlie in and got us to organize a process so that we could keep the process from being a negative that would give people ammunition. The other time he called me in and said, “This has got to work right.” It’s when he decided to bring in refugees from Vietnam, including Hmong and thirty thousand people. We moved an enormous number of people into Indian Gap, Pennsylvania and some place in Arkansas, and got them settled without a big furor in the country. Actually, he called me and I got Julia Vadala Taft who was Will Taft’s wife, who had been a White House fellow and was at the State Department. She subsequently made a career out of refugee resettlement. But we made that work right so that it worked in the community. It did not create a big furor, the people were welcomed and they were distributed through the country.
Smith: I’ve often thought that was his finest hour, because immediately after the fall of Saigon, Congress’s reaction was “Let’s pull the plug. Let’s pretend we were never there, and to hell with the refugees.” And he put together this coalition with George Meany and the American Jewish Congress and others to shame Congress.

O’Neill: It was the right thing to do. It would have been easy to look the other way. He thought it was the right thing to do. But he wanted it to go well, so the back end was the implementation needs to be perfect, you need to be sure this works okay because I’m really putting a lot at risk here for a good reason.

Smith: That’s fascinating because in this town we always hear about initiatives, but there is not a whole lot of attention paid to execution. I wonder whether some of that was the congressional experience – that oversight of programs.

O’Neill: I think he knew that you had to pay attention to the implementation side. Otherwise value-based propositions could get torpedoed or ridiculed forever if they were not properly executed. It reminds me of one other vignette. Sitting in my office, I was a deputy director of OMB and it was during the time when we were relocating the Vietnam refugees, and there was a young brigadier general whose name was Sharp. He had been sent over from the Pentagon to tell me that Secretary Schlesinger had directed him to tell me that the Defense Department and the military services were not going to participate in this relocation of the Vietnamese refugees.

Smith: Did he offer a rationale?

O’Neill: Because it would deplete the resources we need for national defense. We can’t do this, that’s not the military’s job, get somebody else to do it. So I said to him, “Okay, General Sharp, let me get the phone here. I want you to know I’m going to call the President and I want you to tell him you’re not going to do what he wants you to do.” And he said, “That won’t really be necessary.” That was the last I heard of it. And he went back and told Schlesinger, “O’Neill told me we’ve got to do this and he threatened me with the President.” So a lot of times I didn’t have to use the President, I just had to threaten to use him.
Smith: Did you ever share that story with him?

O’Neill: Oh, yeah, absolutely. I told him there’s this young brigadier general over here, you may hear about this because I threatened that you were going to give him the order if he wasn’t going to take it from me. But the President told me, “Do whatever you need to do.” So I had great confidence I would get backed.

Smith: Let me ask you, because we’ve lost Jim Lynn, and he was clearly a very important part of this administration. Tell us about Lynn, how he operated and what his significance was in the Ford presidency.

O’Neill: I first got to know him when he was an undersecretary of Commerce. He had this kind of robotic penguin figure, very energetic and with a great seriousness of purpose. During the ’73 shakeup after the election in ’72, he was designated as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. So I got to know him really well there because he was pushing a so-called Section 8 housing program, which I thought was a disastrous idea, because they were going to create a whole lot of subsidized housing and the costs were going to be enormous and greater than what was being alleged.

And so we had pitched battles over all that, and President Nixon put the legislation forward. What was said by the President was really important about these things, and he understood that - Lynn would come over to the Executive Office and he would stay around until two o’clock in the morning, basically until everyone else went home, to make sure that what he wanted in the President’s remarks was not changed by me or anyone else in the Executive Office of the President. So I got to know Jim really well because we were at odds over what we had to do.

And it’s ironic that the first piece of legislation that President Ford signed as president was a Section 8 housing legislation. So that was a big success for Jim. And somebody else could better tell you the story than I can. Fred Malek left the Nixon administration in September and they indicated to me that they were making me the deputy director. Under the 1974 budget act, there was a provision requiring for the first time Senate confirmation of the director of OMB and the deputy director of OMB. And so Roy Ash was the director, and when Fred Malek left as a deputy director, the Nixon administration said we’re going to appoint you deputy director. In anticipation of Fred’s leaving. And when President Ford came in, he sent the nomination for me to be the deputy director and then – I’ve forgotten how much later it was – he appointed Carla and brought Jim over to be the director when Roy Ash left. I guess Roy left in January or February of 1975, and Jim came in as the director when I’d been confirmed then. Actually on my birthday in 1974 as deputy director. And so Jim came and he was a learner. He wanted to learn about the details. And where he’d been at Commerce and where he had been at HUD, gave him particular knowledge about those two places. But he didn’t really know anything much of substance. So most of the time he was at OMB, because he came in January or February of 1975, and we left together in January of 1977, he was learning. One innovation while he was there was to create a booklet called ‘76 Issues, which was kind of a turn on the fact that it was 1976, and he got the OMB people, with consultation with departments and agencies to write policy analysis papers to explain the major decisions in the President’s budget. That was a Jim Lynn innovation.

Smith: Carla told us her experiences, and those of others, of people who sat in the Oval Office and the President, Solomon-like, would hear their case, OMB’s case, and make a decision. You must have sat in on some of those?

O’Neill: I sat in on a whole lot of those, and I remember especially the ones that we had involving Jim and Carla because he is the former HUD secretary and thought he knew better what should be done at HUD than Carla would ever know. I think, in probably every dispute Jim and Carla had, the President resolved in Carla’s favor; and Jim – nobody else will tell you this – Jim would say, “It’s because she has better legs than I do.” It was that kind of a relationship.

Smith: Was she a charmer?

O’Neill: She was, but she was smart as hell. She mastered her brief – she was really good. But it got to a point where they didn’t talk to each other. All the business between the Executive Office and HUD was done between Carla and I.
Smith: Yeah, it’s an awkward relationship.

O’Neill: It was difficult.

Smith: One senses from what some people have told us that he did less of that over time, that he found that perhaps it wasn’t the best use of his time.

O’Neill: I don’t remember that. And what comes to my mind is that let’s say it’s March, 1976 or February of 1976 when we had the identification of seven Swine Flu cases at Fort Dix in New Jersey. And over a couple of month’s time, that all played out. There is a book about that. It’s called Swine Flu Affair, it was written by the guy who wrote the landmark book about the presidency at Harvard.

Smith: Neustadt.

O’Neill: Yeah, Richard Neustadt. And the co-author was Harvey Fineberg, who is the president of the National Academy of Sciences. They wrote a book about that time and the reason it comes to mind when you raised this issue about President Ford changing his style – that would have really complicated the issue. And the book lays out the whole story. But the President was really concerned about getting the decision right about what to do about the Swine Flu, and so he personally met with the people who were at HEW who were responsible for this area, with the CDC director, with the assistant secretary who was responsible for public health issues – repeatedly - to get a sense.

This was a really interesting decision making case because I said to the President, “I think we really ought to get leading virologists and epidemiologists from all over the country in here and get them to sit around the Cabinet table (there were twenty-three of them, I think), and get them to tell you their personal, individual views about what to do about this issue.” They all came in, including Salk and Sabin, who hated each other through their whole careers, who developed different ways of doing polio vaccination. And all of these pre-eminent scientists sitting around the table and President Ford said, “Here’s what it looks like. Here’s what I have as a recommendation, that we should vaccinate the whole population. I want to hear it from you all; should we do this?” And it took a couple of hours, but they all said absolutely, there’s no question, you should do this. So at the end of the meeting, the President stood up and said, “I’m going to my office and I’m going to be there for the next half hour for any of you who want an individual meeting because you have a view that you are not willing or feel threatened to express in front of this larger group. Come through this little door here into the secretary’s office and she’ll tell me you’re waiting for me and I’ll see you individually.” Nobody came.

So an hour later he went down to the White House press briefing and said we’re going to vaccinate the whole population. And it turned out it had this horrible side effect of creating facial paralysis for forty or forty-five thousand people, and the Swine Flu never developed. We never had a spread of cases. But it’s an illustration of a continuation into the spring of 1976 of the President taking personal accountability and responsibility. Not doing it all himself, but marshalling the best advice that was available to make a presidential decision. I would say the outcome was not everything you would like, but the decision process was everything you would want in a president.

Smith: It brings you to the kind of conservative he was and the decision that was made pretty early in the presidency to publicly announce that the administration would not be proposing new domestic programs - presumably until we got a handle on the budget and the like. I’ve been working for years on this biography of Nelson Rockefeller, and at least one individual has indicated that a contributing factor to that public announcement was Rockefeller’s inclination every week at their lunch to come in with a big new program. And he was not consulted about this decision. Jim Cannon informed him after the fact and he was bewildered because in New York that’s how you win elections.

O’Neill: A new program every week.

Smith: Exactly. It raises this larger issue: first of all, if you recall that, what was behind it? And it gets to this larger question, what kind of conservative was Gerald Ford? Because while he was in office, he was regularly described as the most conservative president since Calvin Coolidge; and then, of course, post-Reagan, it’s all been redefined.
O’Neill: I honestly don’t think this was an illustration of conservatism; it was an illustration of intellectual consistency. But first I’m going to tell you a story about Rockefeller and the energy initiative that he mounted. You know, it seems laughable in today’s terms, but Rockefeller had this idea that we should set up a new hundred billion dollar energy authority.

Smith: The Energy Independence Corporation.

O’Neill: One hundred billion dollars. Which I believed was crazy and dishonest in a way; because it was going to try to do off-budget accounting for one hundred billion dollars and you know…

Smith: Like what he had done in New York.

O’Neill: Exactly. So, early on I said to the President, “I’ve been through this, and I don’t think this makes any sense at all.” And President Ford said, “But Paul, every vice president is entitled to his initiative ideas. This is not going to pass, so just calm down. Don’t get excited about it. It will be okay.” So in that instant President Ford was letting the Vice President have his initiative idea, even though he, President Ford, knew it was a good(?) idea and knew that it wouldn’t go anywhere. But I don’t think that the domestic freeze was aimed at Nelson Rockefeller. I saw it as an intellectual consistency with facts that existed on the ground.

It’s been a long time, so don’t hold me to this, but the federal budget, if you can believe it, as we were preparing it that year, was going to be four hundred and twelve billion dollars and President Ford believed that we needed to reduce spending by twenty-eight billion dollars. I think those are the numbers. And he didn’t think it was appropriate to be proposing new things to pay for at the same time he was demanding of the Congress, “Don’t add on anything to what we already have in the budget, and help me get this twenty-eight billion dollars that we need to get in order to restore some semblance of fiscal sanity to the federal government.” So to me the domestic thing was not really aimed at the Vice President. He may have been splashed by it, but I think it was a signal to everybody, “This is true for everybody. There are not going to be any domestic spending programs until we solve this budget problem.” And I think he really did believe that there’s an importance to fiscal responsibility. I never talked to him about it directly in his later life, but I think he must have cringed when he saw the quote about Dick Cheney telling me the federal budget deficits don’t matter. Because I know he didn’t believe that.

Smith: He was a child of the Depression.

O’Neill: Absolutely.

Smith: Seared for life.

O’Neill: Absolutely. But I also think it was not only that, Richard, it was his understanding of how things are coupled together in the world. So it’s not really true that there are no consequences to having a huge and growing and unbelievably large federal budget deficit. There are ultimately consequences that are really unfortunate for the society.

Smith: Or adding new huge entitlements without paying for them.

O’Neill: He never said anything to me about it, but I’m sure he must have cringed when we passed an eight trillion dollar new entitlement program for Medicaid/Medicare drugs without one penny of revenue to pay for it. Eight trillion dollars.

Smith: Let me ask you, because this may or may not be awkward, but I am curious as to whether in those later years, he must have been in a somewhat awkward position himself, given that so many of his people were in the second Bush presidency, responsible for policies that he may or may not have agreed with. How did he handle that? And did you have conversations about your own experiences. Did he talk about the war? Brent Scowcroft just told us, for example, they had conversations in which he made known his dissatisfaction with…

O’Neill: He felt a strong sense that former presidents should keep their own counsel about most things about the government – which he did in his later years after he left the presidency. He didn’t get into the business of being a critic or someone who knew better than the sitting president. And I think after I got fired from the Bush administration, and was saying publicly later in the book that Suskind published that there was never any evidence of weapons of mass destruction, you could see him clench his jaw about things like that. I think that if he had been president during that time, he might have chosen to go to Iraq, but he would have said we have suspicions that they have weapons, but we don’t have any evidence.

Smith: Yeah.

O’Neill: From the very beginning of the administration, I kept saying there is no evidence of weapons. There is a theory about weapons and there are people like Chalabi, who have their own agenda, who say they are seeing weapons, but there’s no credible evidence of weapons of mass destruction. And Bush ’43 obviously didn’t want to hear it, and neither did Cheney and Rumsfeld, because it didn’t promote what they wanted to do. So by resting on the assumption that the suspicions were correct, they were able to go forward and say, “We’re doing this in good faith.” And I think President Ford never would have done that.

Smith: Did you hear from him?

O’Neill: I would get great notes from him and he sent me things. So, I’ve got signed autographs of the times all the other living presidents were there, they all signed a photograph for me. But President Ford is the one who made sure I got it. So he was like that; he was ever thoughtful. I think he really appreciated me helping to quickly secure the money so we could build the Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy building in Ann Arbor. I was determined we would get it done before he died, which we did. But he wasn’t able to go to the dedication ceremony, which I think he would have been willing to risk dying on the plane, he so much wanted to be a part of that.

Smith: Tell me your role in getting the money for it.

O’Neill: I was co-chair of the fundraising. We raised $33 million in six months, because we were in a hurry to get it done. So we called out all the people.
Sandy Weill gave us $5 million just like that. But you know, those later years, he would call me and ask me about budget issues and what I thought about what was going on with budgets. But I don’t recall him ever criticizing another president. Actually, he became friends with Jimmy Carter.

Smith: Good friends.

O’Neill: Really good friends. So I’ll tell you a story about that. This was in 1988. I got a call from him saying, “President Carter and I believe we could do something useful if we assembled a group of people to write a series of position papers about the important issues before the country. We’d like for you to be the co-author, President Carter has decided his rep ought to be Alice Rivlin and we’d like for you to do our part in this – to write the paper on the economy and on federal budget policy.”

Smith: This was the America Agenda Project?

O’Neill: Yeah. And the reason to do it is because there wasn’t a sitting president running for office. So it was going to be – it turned out later – George Bush and Mondale, or whoever he was running against. So, this was in the spirit of bipartisanship; we don’t know who is going to be president, and we ought to write something that’s good for whoever becomes president. Oh, boy did that ever appeal to me. So we had the organizational meeting in Atlanta at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, and there was a reception and a dinner.

I was still carrying not happy feelings about Carter because I thought he partly won because he misrepresented things in the 1976 election. He made a big point out of how many government commissions and agencies and stuff there were, and it was a substantial misrepresentation in the way that he did it. And it was not the only thing; I thought he’d done a lot of things that were beyond the pale and so I thought this is a really bad guy and I was not sorry when he was a one-term president.

So anyway, I waltz into this organizing reception and dinner in Atlanta and I walked in. I think President Ford hadn’t arrived yet; there’s Jimmy Carter. And he said, “I am really glad to see you. I’ve thought for so long what a great contributor to public policy you’ve been.” I thought, “Wow, this is really different.” So, when President Ford came in, I said to him, “You know, maybe President Carter is not such a bad guy after all.” I told him the story.
And he’d long before decided Jimmy Carter was not a bad guy and formed their friendship and worked together on a bunch of things.

Smith: You wonder how much that friendship was eased by the fact that they both had run against Ronald Reagan.

O’Neill: That could be.

Smith: They had that in common.

O’Neill: But I think they truly were friends. And I thought the papers we produced were really quite good. I’m not sure anybody really ever looked at them after we wrote them, but they were really quite good.

Smith: The ’76 campaign – I realize you weren’t in the political operation.

O’Neill: I wasn’t, actually. President Ford really protected me from all that. Except – you might think this is really political – he asked me to come to the convention in Kansas City, which I really couldn’t afford to do. I’d saved up a little money for my daughter to go to college and I had to borrow some of that money so I could go as a non-civil servant to Kansas City before we had the elaborate rules that we have now. To pay my own way to Kansas City. And the reason he wanted me to go was so that if there were substantive issues, I would be there and I could deal with the substantive issues. But then, after he selected Bob Dole, he made me the connection with Bob Dole to make sure that Bob Dole didn’t create any faux pas about federal policy out of ignorance or lack of understanding.

Smith: How did that happen?

O’Neill: He just called me in and said, “You know, Bob Dole has been announced as the vice presidential candidate and I want you to be available to him at all times so that if he is going to give a speech, or he’s going to make representations, you make sure he’s grounded in facts.” That was my assignment.

Smith: Now, did you discuss that with Dole?

O’Neill: No, it’s what President Ford said. He told Dole.
Smith: What was your impression?

O’Neill: I thought he was a really quick study, but I didn’t have to worry too much about substance with him, because he was all about politics. He was up here shooting zingers and stuff, we didn’t have anything to do with policy.

Smith: What was your observation of that convention, just from someone watching it?

O’Neill: It was interesting. I’d gotten to know a lot of these people really well. And we had a control office – Jerry Jones was there and Jim Cavanaugh and Red Cavaney – a whole team of people. And I guess I could refresh my memory and remember, but we were in the control office and we were planning everything to the finest detail. So Reagan was arriving at the Kansas City International Airport, and it was on a late Sunday afternoon, like five or six o’clock. So we spent a couple of days figuring out how we could make sure that President Ford arrived in the same news window so President Ford would dominate the news, and Reagan wouldn’t get any coverage. We were working that level of detail. Bill Timmons was there. You know Bill.

Smith: Yeah.

O’Neill: Bill would remember all the people who were at that convention. But we were working that level of detail and it was really touch and go. Reagan was a force, he really was. It was very close.

Smith: Do you think, in retrospect, that the White House was slow to take Reagan seriously? That he would, in fact, run; and secondly, that he could be as potent a challenger as he turned out to be?

O’Neill: I’m not a good witness for that. I don’t know.

Smith: Tell us about Rumsfeld as chief of staff.

O’Neill: Reflecting back on when I first got to know him was when he was appointed as head of OEO, and that’s when I first got to know Cheney. I thought in that role, Don was a guy with really strong ideas about how to create performance with people and measurement systems, and discipline and all the rest of that. I thought he did a really good job of doing what President Nixon wanted to do, which was substantially dismantle OEO. And I thought he did a reasonably good job; he didn’t get it done; it ended up there under a guy named Arnett after Don and there was a guy after that called Howie Phillips, who was with the ideological unit of all time. Anyway, that’s how I first got to know Don and then he kind of disappeared from my view when he was doing things in the White House. When he went to NATO, he was out of view. So, when I think back, as chief of staff after Al Haig, I thought he kind of combined the Haldeman process and the Haig process. And after he came back, he became a constructive influence, I thought, in making sure that the President’s policy was his, and providing access for everyone who had a legitimate reason to deal with the President. So I thought he did that well. I didn’t like the personal animosity that he was a party to with Hartmann. They really antagonistically disliked each other.

Smith: It’s almost as if they were put on the planet to annoy each other.

O’Neill: And it was like when there would be some silly thing where Rumsfeld thought he’d won the issue, he would revel in that, which I thought was really kind of small ball.

Smith: Nelson Rockefeller went to his grave convinced that Rumsfeld was largely responsible for his being dumped from the ticket.

O’Neill: I think that’s probably true. I thought Rumsfeld thought if he could be a secretary of Defense, maybe he could be the vice presidential candidate. And I think the Bush lockdown at CIA was his doing. He’s an unbelievably ambitious person.

Smith: It would get to the point where the vice president’s staff weren’t given parking places. That level of pettiness. Well, it works two ways. True story, someone who was there swears it’s true. Rockefeller, one day, who got less inhibited with age.

O’Neill: That’s true. Some of the things he did were…
Smith: In some ways, he didn’t age well. The lifelong discipline just sort of relaxed. But he would walk by Rumsfeld’s office first thing in the morning, open the door, and say, “Rummy, you’re never going to be vice president.”

O’Neill: I believe that. I was a great fan of Nelson Rockefeller’s.

Smith: What did you like about him?

O’Neill: I liked the fact that he didn’t have to do anything with his life and he devoted his whole life to trying to make the world a better place. I mean, whether you agreed with the things he did, he was truly an unchained believer in the idea of a great society. And in his own way, that’s what he tried to do in New York. He was flamboyant, but he was a real student of public policy. He went to the depths and details of public policy. I’ll tell you a story about Nelson Rockefeller. This is 1973. Roy Ash is then the director of OMB; George Schultz has gone to be the secretary of the Treasury, so Roy Ash comes in.

This is like in March of 1973, Nelson Rockefeller comes down to meet with people in the White House. Roy Ash’s office was in the White House in those days because he didn’t want to see himself as diminished because George Schultz had had an office in the White House. So Roy Ash had insisted he had to have an office. I’ll never forget, Nelson came in, Roy Ash asked me to come. Nelson was there to plead for an operating subsidy for the New York transit system. So after he made his pitch, Roy said, “Paul, why don’t you tell him what you think?” So I went through this elaborate analysis of why it was a bad idea. “It might be good for New York, but do you understand, Governor, because of the way revenues flow to the government and the way they are then distributed, if we do what you’re wanting to do, we’re going to be taking money from the people in Louisiana and sending it to New York City to subsidize the subway riders and that’s simple inequitable. It’s not something we should consciously do. It’s just wrong federal policy.”

He laughed and he said, “Let me tell you why you’re wrong, Mr. O’Neill. Here’s why you’re wrong. If we have to raise the subway fee,” (and I think it was from thirty-five to fifty cents or something), “we’re not going to get enough votes in New York City as that we can offset upstate the negative votes with positive votes from and we’re all going to get thrown out of office. That’s why we need an operating subsidy.” You know, so he understood it wasn’t the right thing to do, but, by God, we can’t afford to lose our offices. But it was the candor and the honesty of all of that, of saying, I know this is not the right thing to do, but I’ve got to plead this case.

Smith: And this was a guy at the end of fifteen years of the governorship who also knew that he had stretched beyond the limits what a state could do.

O’Neill: Absolutely. Anyway, I liked Nelson Rockefeller. I guess Jim Cannon, or somebody, told me that when Rumsfeld went to Defense, the Vice President went to the President and said, “O’Neill should be the chief of staff, not Cheney.”

Smith: Really? That’s interesting.

O’Neill: Ask Jim about that.

Smith: I will. That’s very interesting. Dorothy Downton, whom Rumsfeld tried to get fired, contrasts the prevailing mood of the White House under Rumsfeld and under Cheney as being, at least relatively speaking, more relaxed. From her perspective it was a more pleasant work environment.

O’Neill: But it was interesting. I remember one time after – no I guess it was when Rumsfeld was still chief of staff – and we were in Jim Lynn’s office in the Old Executive Office Building debating some policy thing, and the secretary came in and said, “Mr. Rumsfeld, Mr. Cheney is on the phone for you.” And so Rumsfeld picked up the phone, put it up to his mouth and said, “Speak.” It was so rude and unnecessary, I was just astounded how somebody could be like that.

Smith: He also struck me as someone of great intellectual gifts, that weren’t quite matched to people skills.

O’Neill: It’s interesting, though. He and I were successive chairmen of the Rand Corporation. Did you know that?

Smith: No, I did not.
O’Neill: Yeah, our paths have intertwined a long time, in a lot of different ways.

Smith: Were you surprised by the pardon?

O’Neill: I would say a different word – rather than being surprised – I guess I was stunned. It was a Sunday morning and the sun was out and it was such a relief to be out from under the awful conditions of the Nixon administration. And those first thirty days were so great working with President Ford because he started right in. You can look at the logs and see I spent more time with him than I did with my wife from August of ’74 until January of ’77.

Smith: What was his mood during that first month?

O’Neill: Energy. We were soaking it up. Get in here and get me briefed about all the things I don’t really know about. Because there were a whole lot of things even – I shouldn’t say even as vice president – his role of vice president was out there doing a lot of speeches and things like that. And now it was substantive time and, wow, was he ever ready for that. And so we hit the ground running with him. We spent endless hours with him in the Cabinet room and the Oval Office briefing every aspect of federal government policy – everything. So here it is, Sunday morning, life is good again, a President who cares about, and is really into, public policy issues, and he announces the pardon. And before the commentators started in, I guess I was close enough to it, I knew, this is the end of the honeymoon already.

While I wasn’t ready to be back in the fire, I was okay with the pardon. I thought getting this out of the way is really an important thing to do, and I guess I didn’t fully understand the political implications of people suspecting that this was a deal. It never occurred to me, Richard, that it was deal. I don’t care what anyone else says, I don’t think President Ford would have done that – it’s not in his character to do that kind of thing. So that never occurred to me, that it was a bargain for the presidency was what it was about. I don’t believe that, I don’t think it’s true. But I knew as soon as I heard the announcement we were back in the fire. And I really was not looking forward to being in the fire quite yet.

Smith: Did you have much contact with Mrs. Ford?
O’Neill: No, not very much. Indirectly, mostly. I talked to people who would speak to her. I just don’t want to bother her – and like people who get older, she has some good ones and some that are not so good.

Smith: But I mean back then, during the White House – obviously you were in different circles, but did you have any contact really aside from social events?

O’Neill: No, not a lot. But the kids were kind of part of the scene. I was in the Oval Office so much that I would frequently see Susan or Jack. Michael was away and he was living in Pittsburgh, I didn’t see too much of him, except at occasions. Steve was not really around much; at least not as visible as Jack and Susan were. Susan was around a lot because she was an acolyte for Kennerly -

Smith: Who was a virtual member of the family.

O’Neill: Absolutely.

Smith: What does that tell you about Ford? Remember when Saigon was falling?

O’Neill: I’ll tell you a story about Kennerly. This is about the Mayaguez incident. So there are a whole bunch of people around the Cabinet room and they are deciding what to do about the Mayaguez, whether we’d have to declare war or send the battleships in. And Kennerly, who was shooting photographs, said something in a pause in the conversation like, “Maybe they didn’t mean it. Maybe it was unintentional.” And it completely changed the conversation. It turned out he was right. But that intervention that really probably changed the course of history around the Mayaguez incident was probably Kennerly’s intervention. If Okamoto or Ollie Atkinson, who was Nixon’s photographer, had done that, they would have been second guessed out of the world. Right? Nixon would never have accepted that.

Smith: When Saigon is about to fall, he sends General Wayland but he sends Kennerly with him because he knows he’ll get an unvarnished report.

O’Neill: Absolutely, from a guy who’s been there and knows what it looks like.

Smith: A very unorthodox presidential representative.
O’Neill: Absolutely.

Smith: Did he have a sense of humor?

O’Neill: Absolutely. I’m trying to think of illustrations. It kind of disappears with time because it’s topical, you know what I mean? It wasn’t Tip and Reagan sitting around telling dirty stories to each other, he didn’t do that. But it was whimsy and it was a little mild tug at the ends of your mouth, not about falling down on the floor rolling in laughter. A kind of quiet humor.

Smith: Did he talk sports? In the winter on weekends, don’t disturb him when he’s watching football.

O’Neill: Yeah, I know he really loved sports. But I don’t really remember – just passing things – again were topical – did you get to see that last night. But not that we’d just sit there and talk about sports.

Smith: Maybe this is off the wall, but one of the things that have always intrigued me, is to the degree to which he was sensitive and/or resentful of the portrayal of him – the Saturday Night Live, Chevy Chase business. The stumbling, bumbling, portrayal, which in turn fed into the whole question about his intelligence.

O’Neill: I think at the time, it’s hard to know without him as a witness, but I think he saw it as a gag and it’s what people on television do. I don’t think he understood how serious it was from the point of view of insolence and people’s opinion. He never could accept the idea that people would – I don’t think the staff ever figured it out either - that when he went skiing he was going to fall once in a while. He was an expert skier, but he was going to fall once in a while and the television would get it. Right? And they would not show him whizzing down the Black Diamond slopes of Vail, they would show him falling down. He never really got that and I think he was such a gifted athlete, he never understood how they could make his missing a step coming down the stairs on Air Force One, or bumping his head on a helicopter, this is what it’s like 24 hours a day with President Ford. He couldn’t get it that people were accepting those vignettes, kind of snapshots, of this is the real President Ford. I don’t think he ever got that, Richard.
Because it wasn’t true.

Smith: And again, as I say he was not self-dramatizing. He wasn’t a PR type; that aspect of the presidency for some reason eluded him.

O’Neill: He was not a theatrical speaker. Probably the best speech he ever gave was the ’76 convention speech. It was really well done and delivered with enthusiasm. I thought it was a great speech.

Smith: By the end of that campaign, did you think he had caught up? Did you think there was a real chance?

O’Neill: I thought it was going to be close, but I thought he had a real shot at it. But if you remember, it was not just about Watergate. It was about the state of the economy.

Smith: The weekend before the election there were economic numbers that came out. Greenspan famously referred to “The Pause” in economic recovery. And I’ve often thought at the very last minute whether that engendered doubt.

O’Neill: It certainly didn’t help. So after that the Congress had hearings. I was still around until January and there were some people on the Hill who believed that the Office of Management and Budget had held back funds so that the economic recovery would not be what it should have been, which was unbelievable to me. But I went up and testified about where the funds are and how they are flowing and all the rest of that and believe it or not, we don’t send money out in wheelbarrows if we don’t owe bills.

Smith: Did it take him a while to bounce back from losing? He said, “I can’t believe I lost to a peanut farmer.” I just wondered if you noticed any change.

O’Neill: He just seemed to me to go on. I’m sure it hurt a hell of a lot, but I never saw it in his behavior or in his interest. Right away he started engaging me in what do you think about the budget documents and are we doing the right thing about public policy? There is something else that occurs to me as I’m telling you this. He got an award at the Lotus Club maybe some place between 1983 and 1985, and I only remember this because I was one of the testimonial givers and I think I’ve got a video tape of that at home with other people talking about President Ford. And he was there. This was to honor him in a very elite, whatever that means, crowd. I’ll have to dig around and see if I can find that for you because it might be helpful.

Smith: That would be great to see.

O’Neill: I saw him then, increasingly with the formation of the Ford Foundation and had reasons to see him on a regular basis. But he spent his energy on other things. I think he was a great contributing board member on the boards he was on.

Smith: Do you think he took a bum rap for serving on boards.

O’Neill: I do, but what the hell, he had knowledge and wisdom and judgment to bring to bear and why not?

Smith: And by all accounts, he took it very seriously.

O’Neill: Absolutely. He was not a free rider, absolutely not. He brought something to the party.

Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

O’Neill: It probably was at the last dinner that he attended.

Smith: For instance, the 90th birthday, they had the dinner at the White House.

O’Neill: I was there. I have pictures from there.

Smith: That must have been a very special occasion.

O’Neill: It was great. It was the first time I had gone back to the White House after I got fired.

Smith: Oh really?

O’Neill: Yeah. Henry Kissinger said to me that night, “Pretty brave of you to be here.”
And I said to him, “I’m here for President Ford, not for President Bush.” But it’s interesting, President Bush kept saying, “God, you look great!” So I said to him, “You know, why not?”
Smith: How do you think President Ford should be remembered?

O’Neill: In the broad sense, as a value-based human being, who cared in every way about his country first and foremost, and about his family, of course. But history may heal this, I think maybe he was one of our most important presidents because he served under unprecedented circumstances and he did it with distinction and honor.

Smith: You said earlier that he never disappointed you.

O’Neill: Absolutely, in anything he did. I never thought this is really small bore for President Ford. I never saw him do anything that I would say didn’t pass muster as the right thing. And that includes his behavior toward people. I never saw small things from him. He never put people down. He never made people feel small. That’s a really important human quality. He never did that to anyone.

Smith: What does it feel like to be back in this room?

Circle: It’s very difficult. I spent so much time in this room with him, and every time I’d walk in after he passed away, I couldn’t stay in here long because I really feel his presence in here.

Smith: He spent a lot of years in this room, didn’t he?

Circle: Yeah, exactly. It is very hard, even when I walked in today.

Smith: How did it all begin for you?

Circle: For me? Through a mutual friend who asked me if I would like to go out with Bob Barrett on a date. I had seen his picture and I said, “No, thank you.” And he said, “Well, you know he works for President Ford.” And I said – and this was only when President Ford was coming back and forth – he was still in office.

Smith: Oh, he was still in the presidency? Okay.

Circle: This was in 1977 – or he had just left in ’77.

Smith: That’s right, the beginning of ’77.

Circle: So it was ’76 that I first had been offered that wonderful opportunity…So I said, “No, no, I don’t care to go out with him.” And at the end of ’76 they came out here and for some reason, I was introduced to Bob Barrett. I was some place and he walked in and I was with my male friend, and he introduced me to Bob. So Bob and I (does all of this get printed?)

Smith: You’ll see a transcript – this will all be printed and you’ll have a chance to look over the whole transcript.

Circle: Will someone see this other than us before I see it again?
Smith: No.

Circle: Okay, because I don’t know if this should be part of it.

Smith: Don’t worry about it because you’ll have an opportunity – within reason, yes – you will have an opportunity.

Circle: So anyway, Bob asked me out and I went out with him for dinner, and he kind of indicated that he’d like to take me out again. He also had talked to me about the job, that possibly in the future I could get a job here, which was right up my alley. So, I said, “I’ll tell you what, the job is going to last longer than a relationship with you would, and I would really prefer to have the job.” And he said okay. So, we’d date from time to time and I met all of his friends and we’d all go out in groups and all of that.

Then a relative died in the San Francisco Bay area, and I went up for the funeral and Bob and all of his friends and President Ford were all going to be at the Bing Crosby Golf Tournament, which is what it was called at the time. So Bob called me and said, “We’re coming up to San Jose, President Ford wants to look at some property he has. We’ll pick you up and bring you down to the Bing Crosby – you were going home today, weren’t you?” I said, “Yes,” so they came and picked me up and took me down to the Bing Crosby, and so I followed President Ford around.

But the night I got there, it was the night of Jimmy Carter’s State of the Union address, and they whooshed me into the house, and sat me down and there was President Ford. I’d never met him before. He stood up and he said, “Hello.” He was very interested in the speech. After that they invited me to dinner, so Bob Barrett pushed me into the car with President Ford.

I had no idea what to talk to him about, I’d never met him, and he was just very friendly and very social and very nice. We went into dinner and I sat there with fifteen men and me and everybody in the whole restaurant – I mean it was an experience I’d never had before. It was very interesting. And that’s how I got to know President Ford. A couple of months later, Bob Barrett called and said, “I’d like to offer you the job.”
Smith: What was the job – the original job?

Circle: As a staff assistant. I would do scheduling. Well, I guess I was doing scheduling – it was with another person.

Smith: And how was the office organized in those days?

Circle: There were about fourteen people in the office at that point. There were about three people in the very front office in the reception area, and then Bob Barrett and Dick Wennekamp were in the office that I acquired. Then the scheduling office was the next office – there were two of us in there. Then Mrs. Ford’s assistant and then President Ford’s personal secretary, who was right here where Shelli is. And then the mailroom had a couple of desks in it – and two desks in the hallway. So there were a lot of people here at that time.

Smith: So, obviously this building was standing before they built the house?

Circle: No. Well, yes, the building was standing. It was Ginger Rogers’ mother’s house. They renovated it into an office, as you can tell. You can tell this had to be a house at one time. While they were building his house, and Leonard Firestone owned this property, and bought this house and then gave it to USC. Then we leased it from USC – the Secret Service and we – through GSA-leased it from USC.

Smith: This property. But their home was separate.

Circle: But their home, President Ford bought from Leonard Firestone. But he figured that we needed an office and a place for Secret Service, and then the gate was put up and that sort of thing. You’ve seen Leonard’s house, right?

Smith: I’m not sure which is Leonard’s house.

Circle: The third one down. Well, when we leave here I’ll drive by there for you.

Smith: Oh, okay. Clearly Leonard is a very important part of this whole story, isn’t he?

Circle: Oh, absolutely.

Smith: Had they been friends before the Fords came out here?
Circle: Oh, yes. Yes, in fact, I think that’s one of the reasons they moved out here. I think Leonard was pretty instrumental in getting them to move out here. They leased a house in Thunderbird Heights while this was being built, and then the office was up the block. In fact, some friends of mine had owned the house, and sold it to Pat Priest, I guess her name was, and then she leased it to whomever – probably GSA for President Ford’s office. Then they came in and the year that I started, I started May 1, 1978, and we moved into this building, probably mid-May. So I originally worked in that building when I started.

Smith: Was it the 20th or the 25th anniversary when he gave you your pardon?

Circle: I have it. It’s going up in my office at home. It was my 20th anniversary, yes. He gave me my pardon. Well, that was very interesting because on my 20th anniversary I wrote a letter to President and Mrs. Ford and told them that, “I know that all these years he thought that I was one of Bob Barrett’s girlfriends,” – but that I really hadn’t been, and I wanted them to finally know that. Because I’m not really sure – I think President Ford, when I started here, he was very, very leery of me. I had to prove myself.

Smith: How so?

Circle: By working twice as hard as everyone else. Because he made a comment, at least Bob Barrett told me that he made a comment. I think it was Bob that told me that, that said, “I don’t want some (he said bimbo, but President Ford never would have used that word) walking around here, tossing her hair around while all these people are working so hard.” But he came to find out that I was probably the hardest worker around here.

Smith: He was a workaholic, wasn’t he?

Circle: He was, absolutely.

Smith: You were in here on Saturdays?

Circle: Not every Saturday, but – when I started here, I probably had a day off in the first five years – I probably had one day off – if that, a week. If that. There were days I worked all the way through – twenty-four hours.
Smith: And what was the volume of work that sustained that?

Circle: He traveled six out of seven days. He traveled Mondays through Saturdays. Sometimes he’d come home on Saturdays. But the travel, we would do scheduling for him at the conference table. We would probably have to do – I can’t remember how many schedules – probably thirty or forty, forty-five – and I would put them all around the table. If there was a mistake or a change to be made mid-schedule, I would have to start typing from the first page if I couldn’t cut and paste and make it work. It was an extraordinary job in those days. It was unbelievable. I just don’t know how we managed with the travel that he did.

Smith: What was that travel for?

Circle: Speeches. Board meetings – no, he didn’t do board meetings until after the ’80 election. But meetings, and mostly speaking engagements, I think. And then, campaigning – he would campaign every year. He campaigned in ’78 and ’80 and that sort of thing.

Smith: That was before his rapprochement with Jimmy Carter.

Circle: Yes. Well, you know, when we went to Detroit for the convention in 1980, you know what happened there. The co-presidency with Reagan.

Smith: What’s your recollection of that, because it’s been reported a number of ways.

Circle: Oh, I remember it well.

Smith: What do you remember?

Circle: We were in the suite, pretty much the whole time. I have pictures of it. We’d sit around and we were kind of bored. Leon Parma was there, Bob Phinney and his wife were there, Leon Parma and his wife, and President Ford and I were sitting at a table and we’d work and do – I really don’t know what kind of work we had, but we had piles of work to do when we were there. We didn’t have mail or anything in Detroit, so I’m not sure what we worked on, but he would sit down with me and we’d work and go through correspondence and that sort of thing. And it was kind of boring. Jack Marsh and all of those people would come in and out.

Now, mind you, I was new then and I was not, I guess my job – I had been promoted by then – so I was second in line after Bob Barrett, but I really wasn’t involved and I didn’t know all the players then. But Stu Spencer and Jack Marsh and all of the heavyweights – Henry Kissinger were in and out of there all the time. Henry Kissinger stayed there a lot of the time because he was in my pictures. Nothing was happening and I don’t think President Ford seriously considered it – at least from my perspective. And we were all saying, I would look at someone and say, what are we going to call him? President Ford, Vice-President, you know, what you call him after he’s been President of the United States. And I think he kind of felt that way, too.

The co-presidency – there’s no way it would be a co-presidency with Reagan – and considering the background, this is from my perspective now, I’m telling you. I can’t imagine that could ever have happened – and I remember sitting there for a long time and nothing was going on and I looked at the television – we were watching the television constantly, and I decided, “Oh, there’s nothing happening, I’m going to go downstairs and change clothes and shower;” and I’d be back because we’d have to go to dinner eventually.

This was quite late – and time for the convention to start, so it was what – seven, eight o’clock. And I went downstairs – I had to go down two elevators. I got in the shower, came out and I had a towel around me and I was trying to figure out what I was going to wear, and Dan Rather said, “The decision’s been made. Ronald Reagan and Gerald Ford are getting into the limousines to go to Convention Hall.” I went, “Oh, my God!” There I was, standing in a towel and I’d been waiting for days and days for this to happen. This isn’t about me – and so I rushed, I got dressed real quick, I got in the elevator, got in the next elevator, ran into the suite, and everybody is still sitting there watching television. I mean, Dan Rather, that was his first big faux pas, it really was, and I mean, more to come…but that was his first big one. And then it was just announced that he had picked Bush, and so it was really kind of unremarkable to me – the whole thing. Behind the scenes, I’m sure there was a lot going on, but President Ford was pretty much in the suite the whole time.

Smith: Barrett left when?

Circle: He left after that. I think he really thought President Ford would become president again in 1980. He thought that they would draft him, he could really get the draft going and all of that. And he didn’t want President Ford to be a board member – that’s why I changed that a little earlier, saying no, he didn’t have boards then. Because that would have been bad if he was going to run for president again. But after all of that happened in Detroit and all of that – I think Bob left that year, or maybe the beginning of ’81 – no, I think he left the end of 1980.

Smith: Now, the president took some heat over “commercializing” the ex-presidency.

Circle: He did.

Smith: Some of that was siphoned off on to Bob. How much of that was fair? I’m asking for a value judgment, I realize. But let’s break it down. The boards, you know, that’s a different category altogether, it seems to me, because he took them seriously and obviously worked at it and what’s wrong with doing that?

Circle: There’s a lot of blame to go around on that. But President Ford is the least to blame, because he was very naïve about all of that when he came out of the White House.

Smith: In what sense?

Circle: Money. And earning money and what anything was worth, and that sort of thing. And he was pretty much brainwashed to think that he should expect and deserve everything. Okay? I saw that happening and, I’m not speaking out of school here, but to make $25,000 for a speech was like “unbelievable” to him, in comparison to now when you look at what Clinton is making. That was unbelievable.
Harry Walker was his speaking agent and he was pretty brutal, too. He was a tough guy. I don’t know if you knew his reputation or knew about him, but he was a really tough guy. He and Bob, together, really got these speaking engagements going and he made a lot of money. The thing is that President Ford was also told that he should expect private planes, and that sort of thing and he was very uncomfortable with that at first. But started to believe that this is what was expected of a former president – or that he should expect that kind of treatment. Did I answer your question?

Smith: Yeah, well, it’s interesting because it seems as if he almost had to learn the job of being an ex-president.

Circle: He did. There was really no precedent for what he was doing before that. Let’s see – Nixon – there really was no precedent, so he had to learn it all.

Smith: Plus, two things. He left office without any money.

Circle: Right.

Smith: Had a family to provide for.

Circle: Right.

Smith: And the other big thing that people don’t take into consideration is, all of a sudden he was told: You have to raise X million dollars to build a library and museum. And I know he was quoted as saying that was the toughest thing he ever did. In those days, again, by comparison – it was like nine million to build a museum and then whatever the library cost. But he had to raise it as a defeated, former president.

Circle: Right.

Smith: And a lot of those speaking fees went to the Foundation.

Circle: Well, and not only that, he worked hard for his money, Richard. I mean, he prepared for those speaking engagements. He really worked hard for that. It wasn’t as if anyone was giving him something for nothing. It wasn’t as if he went on these things and partied all week and went to the spa, and all of that. He worked very hard. So, I don’t begrudge him that, and no one should, except that was the first time it ever happened. And so they accused him. Tom DeFrank is one of the people that said it at that point. He did an article about how much President Ford made.

Smith: Was he sensitive about it?

Circle: Yes, he was – very.

Smith: Of course, another thing that people didn’t take into consideration were all the college campuses and the charity work that he did – which didn’t get the kind of publicity that the paid engagements did.

Circle: Exactly. And that was when anybody would call, I would always use that – the charitable work that he did, the academic work that he did. And he did a great job on raising money for the library and museum. He did, he worked very hard for that. That was his baby, it really was. You know that.

Smith: About the decision to split the facility – that’s what you’d expect a congressman to do.

Circle: I just never understood that.

Smith: Well, because you don’t want to alienate anyone, so, like Solomon, you split the baby.

Circle: I’m telling you, a couple of years ago, when it was brought up again, he said, no, I don’t want to do that. He was adamant about that.

Smith: Yeah. Well, that was the model. He created it. He was comfortable with it. Obviously at that point the Ford School didn’t really exist in the way that it does now. But the university held a very special place in his heart, didn’t it?

Circle: Oh yes, up until the very end, it still did. It is very strange. Sometimes I still think he’s here. I speak about him in the present and it’s been so much a part of my life for so many years, it’s hard to believe it’s over sometimes.

Smith: Someone said, I think today, that he really, in those last months, almost every day would say, I’m going to Ann Arbor for the dedication of the school.
Circle: Oh, he did. Definitely. He really planned to go and he was going to go, except that he had, I can’t remember what happened that week, I believe that he got very ill, I think he might have had pneumonia or something like that, and he couldn’t go. Oh that was the biggest disappointment of his life. He was just devastated by that. And really, he shouldn’t have gone. It was so cold, do you remember?

Smith: I wasn’t there.

Circle: No, I know, but I’m sure you knew.

Smith: Yeah.

Circle: It was so cold he could never have survived that. He was not in good health at all to have survived that.

Smith: Tell me about his sense of humor.

Circle: Well, he had a very odd sense of humor. I know I would sit here - sometimes I could make him laugh. It would just depend upon the mood, or the subject, or whatever. I knew the things that could really make him laugh. But sometimes we’d be going through stuff and I’d make a comment that would just absolutely crack me up. You don’t usually laugh when you say something funny, but it would just crack me up and I’d look at him and he’d just be looking at me like it just went right over his head and I could never understand that. He had a good sense of humor. But there were certain things that made him laugh more than others, which I can’t recall at the moment.

Smith: There were certain TV programs that they watched together. And I know they enjoyed going to New York and to the theater.

Circle: Yes, he used to watch Steve on the Young and the Restless soap opera every day when Steve was on. Yes – did you hear that? Oh, yeah, well Steve was in this soap opera for years and we’d turn it on at eleven o’clock every morning and he would watch him. He’d work, but he would watch him. Football game, he’d sit right there in the chair and watch the Michigan football game.

Smith: And there was no chit chat.
Circle: Don’t talk to him. Don’t ever talk to him when you’re watching. I’d walk in the door and I’d look and I’d close the door and go. I mean, I don’t care how important it was. The world could be coming to an end and he’d yell at me if I said one word to him.

Smith: I think they saw The Producers in New York.

Circle: Yes, they did.

Smith: They enjoyed it?

Circle: Yes, very much. They really enjoyed their trips to New York. They had to stop it after a certain period of time, but they’d go every fall, and she’d do some Christmas shopping, and they really enjoyed that trip.

Smith: Well, I guess they both had happy memories of New York, too, from long ago.

Circle: May I tell you a really nice story – a Mrs. Ford story?

Smith: Yes.

Circle: It’s kind of about me, but it’s a really nice story.

Smith: That’s fine.

Circle: In 1979, I think it was, maybe it was in 1980, we went to New York and she was losing her secretary and she was going to interview some people on the East Coast. She was invited to a party at Halston’s penthouse. I don’t remember the reason for the trip – oh, I guess she did something with Martha Graham, because Martha Graham was there and she and Martha Graham were in a limo together at one point. So I went with her. We stayed at the Waldorf and then we went to Halston’s for dinner. Elizabeth Taylor and Liza Minnelli and a few people came over prior to the dinner and then we all went over to Halston’s and had dinner.

I mean, it was just celebrities from wall to wall, and then we went to Studio 54. There was Mrs. Ford, and she was so attractive, she looked so good, with Elizabeth Taylor and Halston and all these people – Liza Minnelli and a whole group of people. I was with Chris Chase, who wrote their book with her – both books, I believe, with her. We went into the ladies room, and of course there were all the lines of coke in there. I had no idea what that was, because I’d never seen coke before. I’d never been around it. It was just never in that area in my life. Anyway, Mrs. Ford and I laughed about that later. She said, “What did you do?” and I said, “Well, there was powder all over and I just went (blew).” And she said, “Oh! You didn’t do that!” And I said, “No, no, I’m just kidding.”

Anyway, we’re going home and I think it was that night, and it was late, and she said, “You’ve never been to New York before have you?” And I said, “No, I haven’t.” She said, “Let’s go to Fifth Avenue,” and she made the agents go to Fifth Avenue and I remember St. Patrick’s because they drove us there. I think Saks Fifth Avenue, and all these stores were on the other side of the street, and we walked and we window shopped down Fifth Avenue so she could show it to me. She was telling me all about the first time she went there with Martha Graham and all of that. It was really a nice trip. It was really something I’ll never forget.

Smith: Tell us about Phyllis Brown.

Circle: I can’t really tell you about Phyllis Brown.

Smith: Okay. The only reason I asked was, supposedly she, late in life, I guess, contacted the office about dropping by and it was politely suggested that probably…

Circle: I’ll tell you that story. Okay? I mean, she contacted the office quite frequently. Now I don’t know if we should put this in here or not.

Smith: When you see the transcript you can…

Circle: Nobody will see it before I do?

Smith: No one will see it before you do, I guarantee you.

Circle: Okay. She got my name, so she would call me all the time. Which was good, because it’s better nobody else ever knew about this. She would write occasionally, and I don’t know how I ever really found out who she was. Well, Jim Cannon interviewed her for his book, and Jim Cannon talked to me about her a lot, and he talked to her a lot. But she called and told me she was coming out here with her new boyfriend, an attorney from here, I guess. She wanted to see President Ford and he was kind of on the downswing at that time. It was a couple of years before he passed away. So I came in and I told him, and he said, “Well, what does she want?” I said, “Well, she has a boyfriend and she wants to stop by and say hello.” He said, “Oh, of course she does.”

Of course. I mean, this was the biggest thrill of her life – why she ever gave him up – so, he said, “Well, talk to me when you hear from her again.” And I said, “Okay.” And so, I did, and he said, “No.” I said, “Okay,” and I just left – don’t change your mind, you can’t change your mind. So then I told her and she got mad. She said, “I just don’t understand.” I said, “I’m sorry Phyllis, but he just doesn’t have the time today. It’s just a very difficult situation, he has so many people coming in and he’s involved in a project right now and it’s…” and I was just blah-blah – with anything that would come into my head. She bought it but she wasn’t happy. That really worried me because I thought, oh God, what is she going to do now. But she didn’t do anything, thank God.

Smith: Over the years, I guess the staff was reduced in size?

Circle: Yes, gradually.

Smith: Was there a kind of decrescendo in travel over time, or was he just as busy…

Circle: He was always busy, always busy. And the traveling – he always traveled a lot. He stopped doing the six days a week thing, which was really good because Mrs. Ford was so unhappy with him being gone so much.

Smith: You came onboard before the intervention?

Circle: No, right after. It was in April, I started in May.

Smith: Okay. Did he feel guilty at all – being away as much as he was – when they came back from the White House – leaving her in effect on her own…
Circle: I’m sure it did, and the way he treated his children, you knew that he felt guilty that he hadn’t spent the time with them that he should have. But that was his makeup. That was his being. If he felt guilty, he’d make it up with other things.

Smith: Including time, toward the later years. Steve is maybe the most obvious example, they spent a lot of time together?

Circle: Well, not a lot. Not like some families. You know what I mean? But more than he ever had before, okay. Steve would come and they would sit and talk, and spend time together and all of that. But, I’m telling you, as guilty as he may have felt about it, he couldn’t change it. It was just within him and that was his life. And that’s what kept him active, that’s what kept him young, that’s what kept him on top of it. He just had to do that.

Smith: Did you ever see him with Nixon?

Circle: Never.

Smith: Or Reagan?

Circle: No, but I heard about his trip with Reagan. He went over to see him after he’d had Alzheimer’s.

Smith: What did he say?

Circle: He said he didn’t know him. It was very difficult. But I’ve learned so much about their relationship. Before I knew anything about their relationship, I assumed that the reason for the bitterness – this has nothing to do with the Fords, this is just my feeling about it – that they knew he had Alzheimer’s, and they knew that if he was going to be President of the United States, he had to do it when he wanted to do it. And for President Ford to get the nomination, they were too bitter. You know, people are bitter, but there has to be a reason for that deep bitterness that Nancy and Ronald Reagan had – not Ronald Reagan as much as she had. Now maybe I’m totally wrong, but they just didn’t have a warm relationship and they blamed him. Look at the things she’s said since, really, really nasty things about them.
Smith: You read the DeFrank book and you get the sense that the president’s attitude, whatever resentment he may have felt since ’76, sort of was washed away once the Reagan Alzheimer’s diagnosis appeared.

Circle: He never showed any animosity towards them to me. You make little comments from time to time, when you’re talking about something, and he would make little comments, but he never showed any bitterness or bad feelings towards them at all. He was a remarkable man. He really was. I learned so much from him in his acceptance of everyone, no matter who it was. He never held a grudge. You know how he’d get mad? Then it would be over with, and it would be completely forgotten.

Smith: How much of that – because politically you saw that – we talked about this - the Republican Party sort of went over here, and I don’t know whether he changed, whether she influenced him to become in some ways more liberal, particularly on social issues, but, they were who they were and they were quite outspoken. And they seemed to be quite comfortable with where they were and if the rest of the party wanted to go over there, that was okay. How much of that just him being him? Did he change over time?

Circle: No. He’s the most disciplined human being I’ve ever seen in my life. When I quit smoking, I quit cold turkey, and everybody thought it was the most remarkable thing in the world. He did that with everything. He quit smoking, he quit drinking. He loved to have a cocktail and he was funny as can be when I first started here and we’d be places and he would have a couple of drinks and somebody would make him laugh. He had the best laugh. Have you ever heard that laugh? I don’t think you’d hear it very often after that. But he just quit that. Nothing bothered him. He thought that was the thing to do, and he would do it. There are very few people on this earth who have discipline like that. It’s incredible. And for her. He didn’t have a problem with drinking, but because she couldn’t, he didn’t.

Smith: Pro-choice, that was controversial, but it was something that grew out of the ‘70s, and something with which they were long associated. To be as supportive of gay rights, in today’s Republican Party, was a different matter. Did they have friends who were gay?
Circle: I’m sure. I’m sure they did. I’m sure people that have worked for them have been gay. Those things did not bother him. Being pro-choice, gay rights, none of that bothered him. That’s the way – see he was not judgmental at all.

Smith: Different kind of conservative.

Circle: Yeah, he is. But, I tend to be pretty much that way, too. And maybe I even learned a little more from him. He was so equal with everyone. He was so much the same with everyone, including Clinton and Carter. He wasn’t partisan at all. I know too many people that are and the contrast is unbelievable.

Smith: Tell me about the evolution of his relationship with President Carter.

Circle: Oh, it happened on their trip to Sadat’s funeral. It happened on the airplane, and I don’t know – everyone asks about that – no one can understand how they could possibly be friends.

Smith: Well, I’ve often thought one thing that brought them together, was Ronald Reagan.

Circle: Yeah, exactly, that’s true.

Smith: But also, when you peel away the surface you realize in some ways, how similar at least their values were. Their backgrounds, workaholic, kind of rural faith, a mainly traditional, kind of rock ribbed family. They would have a lot in common if you could get beyond the fact that they ran against each other.

Circle: Well, yes, and you know, I kind of think – people would always comment on that relationship and I think President Ford kind of liked that. I think he kind of proved to everybody how magnanimous he really is. I really do, and I think that was just the example that he set to show people. Because he would always get this smile on his face when someone would say something to him about his relationship with Jimmy Carter. Because I think he knows what people think about Jimmy Carter.

Smith: And he had a very good relationship with the first President Bush.
Circle: Oh, yes. He had a pretty rocky relationship, I think, over the years, right? When he went to the CIA – Bush - just from what I’ve read.

Smith: Well, in fact, Bush was being a good soldier. The story was Don Rumsfeld was deep sixing Bush over at the CIA at the same time that he dumped Rockefeller from the ticket. And what it said was, Bush was the ultimate good soldier because the price of his confirmation as CIA director was to publicly renounce any interest in 1976. Which, of course, is exactly what Rumsfeld wanted to hear. So, not a rocky relationship, I think it would be a very good relationship, but to the Bushes, at that point in their lives, it would seem like, at the very least, a dead end. And yet, the president asked him to do it, so he did it.

Circle: I see. Well, I think then, Bush thought he’d never have an opportunity to be president.

Smith: But they’d been in the House together, and of course, President Ford knew his dad, Senator Prescott Bush.

Circle: Right. Bush is a good guy, ’41, a really good guy.

Smith: Was it difficult for him in the last few years dealing with the second Bush administration?

Circle: I think so. Let me tell you, we kept hearing that they were coming out here. Remember when he made the visit out here?

Smith: In the last year of the president’s life.

Circle: Yes. Do you know that I called Cheney’s office and said, “We haven’t heard from the White House. Are they really planning to come out here and not visit President Ford, because he can’t do that?” And she said, “Oh my God, you haven’t heard from anybody? I can’t believe that would happen.” I said, “Please do something, he’s got to come out.” Do you think he would have come out here and not met with President Ford?

Smith: No.

Circle: I mean, I can’t imagine that.
Smith: But when it did happen, by all accounts, it was a very…

Circle: It was very nice. Very warm. I was at the house when they were there with – who’s deputy chief of staff, do you know? I can’t think of his name right now, but he was there.

Smith: Was it Josh Bolton?

Circle: No, no. The other chief of staff – what was his name – Andy?

Smith: Andy Card.

Circle: Andy Card? It was his deputy, and I can’t remember his name, but he was a really nice guy. And we were sitting there and we were talking, and they had really nice visit. Very warm, as I said, and it was good. I don’t think President Ford was real happy with him in many instances, but that would never go any further than his house.

Smith: Was he uncomfortable about the war?

Circle: I don’t know. I could never get a feel for that with him, and I never asked him. I used to, early on, ask him what he thought about certain situations, but in the last few years, I really didn’t. I never went there with him.

Smith: Let’s talk about the Clinton story. Well, first of all, confirm that I guess President Clinton, shortly after becoming president, visited the Fords in Vail. Wasn’t that right? Or in Beaver Creek.

Circle: Right. That was nice.

Smith: And played golf.

Circle: They played golf and he did his normal, what do you call them, Mulligans. Clinton did, everybody in Vail was talking about it. I was in Europe at the time, but when I got back I got filled in quickly.

Smith: Then, when the whole impeachment business began, what did President Ford…
Circle: Oh my God, he was just appalled that Clinton would do what he had done. You know that, Richard. Well, you know how he felt about it, and the whole impeachment thing – he just said, “He has a real problem and he needs help, and he’d better get it.” He was disgusted by that whole thing. And I think it was a respect for the White House, the presidency and all the rest of it, and you know how he felt.

Smith: And yet, when the time came, he went out on a limb to write that Op-ed piece in the Times that proposed a very dignified ending to a pretty sordid situation.

Circle: He loved that. Yeah. That was just the answer for him.

Smith: And what was the response?

Circle: From Clinton?

Smith: Well, no. You took a lot of heat.

Circle: Not really.

Smith: I thought – Tom DeLay wrote you…

Circle: Oh, he wrote President Ford a terrible letter, oh yeah, he did. I forgot about that. Oh I wonder where that letter is. Is it in the library?

Smith: I don’t know.

Circle: It must be. It must be because he must have sent it to the library. Because otherwise I’d have it.

Smith: There were two letters from Tom DeLay, remember? There was the first letter in which he took him to task over why all this was unconstitutional. And then, just a couple weeks later, there was a second letter asking President Ford’s help in getting him into a golf course.

Circle: Oh, exactly. Oh Tom DeLay was a bad guy. He was such a bad guy. Even President Ford thought that. He thought that all along. The guy didn’t show anyone anything. But, no, we didn’t take much heat about that Clinton thing. Actually, most people agreed with him.
Smith: I wondered. Because on talk radio, the Rush Limbaugh’s and all of those folks, were really upset that…

Circle: But he didn’t care about that. Judy used to come in here and say, “You know what Rush Limbaugh said?” And he’d go, “I don’t really care.” Because he didn’t. He was never a conservative to that degree. That’s fanatical – it is. I mean for President Ford that was fanatical.

Smith: Yeah. I wish he’d known – I found out years later – when the article first appeared, there were people in the Clinton White House who thought it was a life preserver thrown to them.

Circle: Oh, yes, to Clinton, I’ve heard.

Smith: And, of course the Republicans on the House committee who were feeling their oats and didn’t see that they were about to go over the cliff, said, “Absolutely no way.” They were the impediment. Then come the mid-term elections where, guess what, Republicans don’t do as well as they expect, and at that point I’ve been told something by Lanny Davis - that at least two members of the Republican House committee, one of them was Lindsey Graham, said, after the election, “You know, maybe we should dust off President Ford’s proposal as a way of bringing this to a close.”

Circle: Really?

Smith: And by that point, the Clinton White House was feeling its oats and figured, hey, these bastards are going to impeach us anyway, let’s play it out. But if the two sides had been able to look beyond their passions.

Circle: I know – there was no other answer. That was the perfect answer. Anyway, he was very happy with that, and I didn’t get any grief from the media or anybody. It doesn’t even remain as a big thing in my mind, except how furious he was at Clinton.

Smith: But then, subsequently, I think the whole story of the impeachment proceeding itself - I was told, Bob Strauss called him at one point, and asked him on behalf of the White House, if he would be their witness in front of the House Judiciary Committee. Asked President Ford. This was after the article appeared and Bob Strauss...there were going to be hearings before the House Judiciary Committee on impeachment and so each side would get to make a presentation. And they thought, we’ll have one witness, and we’ll get President Ford.

Circle: Really? I don’t remember that at all.

Smith: And he said, “Bob, I wrote the article, and when the time comes I’ll make phone calls, but that’s asking too much.” So they went ahead with the hearings and so on. And then subsequent to that, there was a telephone conversation with President Clinton – ending with President Clinton, in a very friendly way, suggesting that this idea is unconstitutional. They can’t do this. There is no precedent for this. As it was reconstructed for me, at that point the president said, “Bill, I spent twenty-five years up there, and in my experience, they can do pretty much anything they want.”

Circle: Really. See, I don’t know any of this. The Bob Strauss call, maybe I was aware that he called, but I don’t remember that. It was unremarkable to me, anything that happened after that. All I remember is that everyone was just so bowled over – especially, what’s her name? – not Yvonna – remember? She called me? What’s her name?

Smith: Arianna Huffington!

Circle: Huffington – I couldn’t think of her name. She called me and goes, “Penny (with Greek accent)” – what is her? – I can’t talk like her.

Smith: Greek – I don’t know – but very foreign.

Circle: Yeah, very foreign, like a phony, affected accent.

Smith: Maria Callas.

Circle: Yeah. “President Ford didn’t really write that OpEd.” And I know she was sitting there with Nancy Reagan, I know she was. I could just see them sitting there together and they are looking at each other – and I’m sitting at my desk and I have this mental image of them. And I said, “Yes, he did.” She said, “Ohhhh, no, he didn’t. Richard Norton Smith wrote it.” And I said, “President Ford wrote it, Richard Norton Smith edited it.” She said, “No, no, no. Richard Norton Smith wrote it.” I said, “Well,” what’s her name again?

Smith: Arianna.

Circle: I can’t stand the woman, Arianna – I said, “Arianna, think whatever you like, President Ford wrote the article. He signed off on it.” And she said, “Oh, well, I know differently.” “Well, good.” I called you and told you that didn’t I? I mean, that woman, I can’t stand her.

Smith: Who were his friends?

Circle: Well, he has lots of different friends. And I think I mentioned this to you, Leonard Firestone was his really close friend. Leonard Firestone loved him dearly and he felt the same. Leonard would come over and sit in my office for hours at a time, and he’d turn his hearing aid off, and I’d be sitting there for an hour trying to talk to him. He would talk about what they’d done in the past, he and President Ford. When he appointed him ambassador to Belgium – Belgium, right? – and he would talk about him. He was a very close, probably his closest friend. People who were irreverent and could say anything. David Kennerly could walk in anytime and say anything he wanted to. But let me see, some of the people like Jim Greenbaum, like – I can’t gossip here because this is an oral history.

Smith: Oh, well…

Circle: And, I mean, Jim Greenbaum was in Vail and here, and so they did things. Jim really cares about President Ford.

Smith: And Bob Hope.

Circle: Oh, yeah, Bob Hope. He loved Bob Hope. But friends with President Ford, this is why I’m having a little trouble, were not the kind of “Come over for dinner, we’ll see you next week,” that sort of thing. A phone conversation, a golf game, maybe a social event where they all went to dinner together with their wives. The people Paul Jenkins, Wayne Hoffman, were fairly close friends. Fred Wilson was a good friend early on in the desert and Kirk Kerkorian is a good friend of Fred Wilson’s and so they would always come to President Ford with business opportunities and that sort of thing, which kind of never came to fruition, or he’d do a speaking engagement for them. But Fred was a good friend early on. The Grand Rapids people – good friends. He had such a loyalty to Grand Rapids. And Sandy Weill was a very good friend.

Smith: Were there people back in Washington that he kept in close touch with?

Circle: Well, Sandy Weill was American Express and Citigroup – he made these two companies and he retired the year President Ford died, I think, in 2006. But he was a very good friend with President Ford.

The Vail people – like Bill Hamlin and, God, there are so many – the Stouffers, and Sheika and Pepi are very good friends. But President Ford never really pursued friendship because he didn’t have to. Do you know what I mean?

Smith: Sure.

Circle: He would never just call somebody out of the blue, or rarely. Marvin Davis was a good friend.

Smith: A number of times this week I’ve asked people to describe – this place in the 80s must have been – when you had Sinatra and Dinah Shore and Ginger Rogers was still around, and Alice Faye – all of these – Spiro Agnew was even out here – but …

Circle: Spiro Agnew and President Ford never got together. Did Lee Simmons mention Spiro Agnew? I think Spiro Agnew said something derogatory once to Lee Simmons – I think he saw him someplace and Spiro Agnew said, “Where do you work?” and he said, “I work for President Ford.” And he said, “Oh, that’s a shame,” or something like that. Spiro Agnew – why would he have a problem with President Ford? He really shouldn’t have, he’s the one that got in trouble. It wasn’t President Ford that made him do it. President Ford had nothing to do with becoming vice president. They never crossed paths, I don’t think – maybe once or twice, but –

Smith: How small a world is this?
Circle: It was smaller in 1980, much smaller. Frank Sinatra was at Susan’s wedding. I believe Bob Hope was there – I know he was invited. But there were a lot of celebrities.

Smith: Another thing – we’ve talked to a couple of your colleagues – seeing Bob Hope in his last years and how he was sort of trundled out, must have made a negative impression on his friends, including the President, and I just wonder whether they took that into account, thinking, God I hope that never happens to me.

Circle: Well, it was really sad because they kept dragging him out to that golf course for the Bob Hope Classic every year. The last year he was there I was making dinner and I turned the TV on, it was a news station, and they were having some Bob Hope thing, and a photographer was following him out. He went out to the golf course, and he was with the guy that was taking care of him, and they were walking and Bob Hope looks at him and says, “Where are we?” He said, “We’re on such and such a course. We’re going to go meet Jerry Ford and…” “Who’s that?” I went, “Oh my God.” I mean, it wasn’t on national news or anything, but I wonder how many people in the desert saw that. He was just gone, the poor man. He should never have been out there. My God, he was what - ninety-nine years old? The last time he went out there and he just couldn’t handle it. That was very sad. That was very hard on President Ford, too, I’m sure.

Smith: There are stories that - talk about generous – the word would come that Bob Hope would like to play golf with him, so they’d go out and play one hole, or maybe two holes…

Circle: Yeah, they did.

Smith: And then Bob Hope would want to lie down and President Ford would come back to the office until the call came that he was ready for the next hole.

Circle: Oh, no, I never heard that.

Smith: Oh, yeah, I heard that.

Circle: No – no, I don’t think so.
Smith: No? Okay.

Circle: No, President Ford didn’t ever go back out. He never would. He’d be too involved in what he was doing at his desk. I could see him going out and playing one or two holes with him, and he did that, I believe. I think it was Bob Hope, it was someone. He’d go over to Morningside and they’d play two holes and then that would be it.

Smith: I assume, once a Congressman, always a Congressman, which meant, the mail had to be answered pronto.

Circle: Oh, God. Within 48 hours. He had a staff meeting when I first started here and he said, “I want a turnaround within 48 hours,” of all the mail that came in. And the mail – piles and piles this high every day, but we did it. I still do that now. I’m still that conscientious about my own mail because I was inundated with mail. But, he would have to work Saturdays because he wanted his mail, and when the anthrax scare came – oh my God – Shelli and her husband, who was a Secret Service agent, put on those suits and went out and sorted the mail.

We didn’t get our mail on Saturdays because it was too much trouble. They would have to put them in a big barrel at the post office – put all the mail in a big barrel that was closed outside, and it was just too much to do it on Saturdays. There was not one Saturday – the week before a Saturday that we didn’t go through absolute hell with President Ford because he wanted to know why we weren’t going to be there Saturday to do the mail. And he couldn’t get that – so, yes, is that a congressional thing? He never got over that.

Smith: Yeah.

Circle: That was just so important to him.

Smith: Did the mail taper off over time?

Circle: Yeah, it did. The last couple of years when he wasn’t working – when he was not well enough to come in and work a lot, it started tapering off. Because people got the message and knew he wasn’t going to travel anymore and do speeches, and once that happened, it started tapering off. Although there was still quite a volume in 2006.

Smith: And he wasn’t the most mechanically inclined of people – is that fair to say?

Circle: No.

Smith: Telephones were a challenge.

Circle: Oh, God! You know my story, don’t you? He’d pick up the phone – I have to do this for you – you don’t have to move…

Circle: He’d pick up the phone – [demonstrates] “I would like you to speak with Penny. Okay, hold on, I’ll get her for you.” [clicking noise] Get up, go down the hall, “Penny, Penny,” he’d say, [clicking noises] “there’s a call for you.” I’d say, “What?” He’d say, “There’s a call for you.” And I’d look down at the phone and there was nothing blinking, so I’d have to come in and hang up the phone and go back and put it on hold, and go back to my desk. Isn’t that funny? He just didn’t get that for the longest time. The last couple of years he finally got it and he learned how to put it on hold. But he could never program a VCR or anything. And had a little trouble remembering how to do this – no he wasn’t mechanically inclined, but he didn’t have to be.

Smith: And computers?

Circle: Oh, yeah. I used to play bridge with him on his computer. And he could get his e-mail with help. But when he first got his computer, to get him to learn how to use it, I would come in here for about an hour, maybe three times, four times a week, and we’d play bridge on the computer and he loved that, because he loved playing bridge. And he really didn’t play bridge much in the years I was here. I don’t think he ever did. But apparently they had played quite a bit before.

Smith: How special was that day at the Kennedy Library in 2001 with the Profiles in Courage Award?

Circle: So special. Weren’t you involved in that? Okay.

Smith: He wasn’t going to go.
Circle: When he got the initial call, he wasn’t going to go. And I came in and told him and he said no. He said, “I’m just not traveling that much anymore.” I said, “President Ford, this is so important.” And he said, “No.” And I knew I wasn’t going to push it right then. I’d come back. When he said no, you don’t argue with him. It just makes it worse. He’s adamant at the moment.

Smith: I got a call from Ken Duberstein.

Circle: And then did you call me? And then we put him on the phone with Kennedy, right - Ted Kennedy?

Smith: Well, I think the strategy was – what is it going to take to impress upon him, and I think we agreed that Mrs. Ford was crucial.

Circle: Really? I thought we had Kennedy call him.

Smith: He may have. I don’t remember. But I do remember the call from Ken and clearly, she might have a more instinctive appreciation. He was so modest – that was part of it, too – that this was – to us – the ultimate vindication. But he wouldn’t see it that way.

Circle: He wasn’t thinking that way – and then once he realized what this was about, then it was no question at all. But I remember you calling me and I said, “Yeah, I talked to him and he said no,” and I said, “but I’ll go back.” And then I thought Kennedy would call him, and when he talked to Ted Kennedy he said, “Oh, sure, I’ll be there.” But, see, he wasn’t processing it. He wasn’t thinking what that was, at all.

Smith: Yeah. And then when it actually happened…

Circle: Oh, he never got over that. That was just total vindication for him.

Smith: Both the Senator and Caroline, they could not have been nicer, and I’m sure he never knew what a controversy it sparked internally in the Kennedy Foundation.

Circle: It did? Oh I didn’t know that. I always wondered about that.
Smith: If you notice, remember, he shared the podium with John Lewis, and that was – which was great, it turned out to be wonderful, but they created this lifetime achievement award to placate the people on the board who were opposed to the Ford selection. And the person who actually persuaded a majority of the board – in the end the board was fine – but the person who drove it through was David McCullough.

Circle: Oh, no kidding.

Smith: And remember, David McCullough had come to the museum.

Circle: Yes.

Smith: And spent some time with the President, and for whatever reason, it paid off.

Circle: Yeah, it did. It was a pivotal moment in his life. I’ll tell you, he never forgot about that and he talked about it frequently.

Smith: And then, of course, there was the re-dedication of the Museum in ’97. He must have been surprised how much money it took. They built the place, and they had a little endowment, and it just grew and the demands grew with it.

Circle: I know it.

Smith: I thought he came back to Grand Rapids frequently – to my way of thinking – at that age, I was delighted that he would come back as often as he did.

Circle: He would have come back more often, I think, had there been a reason to. He loved Grand Rapids. I would ride in the car with him when I’d go with him to Grand Rapids, and he would point out everything in the town, and how it used to look, and how it looked now. He was very, very proud of Grand Rapids. And I really think, Richard, had there been activities or events or something, he would have gone back more often. But then again, he didn’t have any plane, and it was difficult because you had to change planes from here. And no one would provide a plane for him, so it was very difficult getting back there. I’m sorry, but…

Smith: No, no, listen, you won’t get any argument here.
Circle: I’m not talking about you.

Smith: And I tried – I will say this, though, nothing like patting yourself on the back – I think he came back more often when I was there, just because we were doing things.

Circle: He did. Exactly. The Christmas lighting, the Christmas tree lighting – that started with you.

Smith: No, but for example: the twenty-fifth anniversary, I just thought this is too good an opportunity to pass up, so we had Alan Greenspan. He came back and introduced Alan Greenspan. Justice Stevens, he came back and introduced Justice Stevens and then Billy Graham, which was an amazing event.

Circle: Wasn’t it amazing. It was. But, see, a lot happened when you were there. Nothing happened after you left and before you were there. There wasn’t a whole lot happening. Frank Mackamen was good, but he was an academic.

Smith: And he was based in Ann Arbor – at the Library.

Circle: Right, he was. Dennis Daellenbach was in Ann Arbor, too, wasn’t he? And nobody really liked Dennis that much. He didn’t do a lot. After that was Elaine, and that was so late on, so far on in his life that he couldn’t really travel that much. But it was fun when you were there. There was something happening all the time.

Smith: It was so great to see him come back, and it was an event in Grand Rapids whenever he came back. You must have seen this all the time, the autograph seekers.

Circle: Oh my God.

Smith: It had to be a bane of his existence.

Circle: Oh, it was his. He hated that. He really disliked that. He would sit in the conference room and sign and sign and sign and sign. And then there were the people that just kept coming back for more. And you know darn well that they were selling them. That was a bad part of his job because he didn’t like at all.
And it really was funny because he and Mrs. Ford went before Congress for something for the Betty Ford Center, and I was sitting there and every Congressman had a photographer there. President Ford just couldn’t go with that. He just couldn’t believe that because he hated that so much. And he said, “And then they are going to send all those pictures in to be signed.” He couldn’t believe that every Congressman had a photographer. That was just amazing.

Smith: When they went back to Washington, did they stay at the Willard?

Circle: Yes, usually.

Smith: Did they ever use the official guest house?

Circle: Yes. In fact, I was there with him, early on in the 80s. Yes, they did – Jackson Place. But he couldn’t really sleep there, there was no room for him. He’d have to sleep at a hotel, but we used it as much as we could for an office and that sort of thing. Then the year that he went back, he went into the – what is it when they vote? Do you remember when he went back to Washington?

Smith: Yeah, the well of the House.

Circle: And he went into the House, and they were all there and he walked in, and he got a standing…oh my God – I couldn’t go in there. You can’t go in there – you have to be a Congressman, or whatever to go in there. And I walked around and I went to the exits and I could see him and, boy, he was in his glory. Do you remember when he did that?

Smith: Yeah.

Circle: That was not too many years ago.

Smith: Right.

Circle: And everyone turned around and saw him and they stood up and they cheered – oh, it was just amazing. It got me.

Smith: Did they enjoy going back to Washington?

Circle: Yeah, he did.
Smith: Of course, every year there was the event of the Press Club. The journalism prizes that he gave out. And the board meeting. The reunion.

Circle: Yeah, he would look forward to that. He did, he looked forward to that. He looked forward to seeing everybody at the dinner and that sort of thing. He enjoyed the journalism awards, he enjoyed that luncheon.

Smith: By and large, he did like reporters, didn’t he?

Circle: Oh, very much. More so than any other president I’ve ever seen. And he knew them all by name, just like Secret Service agents. It was amazing, he knew them all by name.

Smith: And was he pretty accessible to the press? People wanting to talk to him – call him, that sort of thing?

Circle: Yeah, he was – if there was a reason for it. Not just to chat. And he had his favorites. And he’d always take care of local people. He’d always do that, which is a really nice quality of his – that he would take care of the people that counted.

Smith: Again, I realize that this is sort of asking you to guess, but do you think he knew that Tom DeFrank would write a book?

Circle: He knew. He knew. Every time he was interviewed he knew. But I have to say one thing, he was very accessible to Tom DeFrank. I mean, he was always willing to do it for him once a year. But when they invited Tom to lunch, this is my only regret about that book, my only personal regret about it. I haven’t even read the whole thing yet, but when he came for lunch and he reported on how President Ford looked, that was out of line, totally. That was not part of the agreement, and I’m really mad at Tom about that. I think everybody in the family is.

Smith: He kept pressing and pressing and pressing.

Circle: Oh, later on in life, Tom changed somewhat. He was always very nice and a good friend, but I’m really mad at him about that, because I have to say, and I’m not patting myself on the back, but I protected President Ford and his dignity to the nth degree. No one knew how sick he was, no one. People would call and I would talk to them and I would say, “Oh, he’s going to be fine.” People knew that he wasn’t well, but no one knew to what degree he wasn’t well. And nobody would ever have known had he not written that in that book.

Smith: Tell me about Philadelphia.

Circle: Philadelphia…

Smith: 2000 – you went from Vail…

Circle: Yes, we went from Vail, and I remember Monday morning someone called me as I was loading my car and told me that President Ford had something wrong with his throat and he couldn’t talk right. And it wasn’t his regular doctor, he said he had shingles in his throat. I said, “I’ve never heard of shingles in your throat. That can’t be.” And they said, yeah, that’s what it is, but he’s going to go. And he sounded like he was inebriated. He was slurring – his tongue was swollen. Oh God, that whole trip was just such a nightmare. So we got to Washington and he had all of these interviews scheduled, and so he did the interviews, one by one. You saw them, didn’t you? He sounded like there was something terribly wrong.

Smith: On the C-SPAN program, in particular.

Circle: With Wolf?

Smith: No, C-SPAN, I think with Steve Scully.

Circle: And then there was Wolf Blitzer, but he did it on the floor, and Larry King, and God, I can’t remember who else. Oh my God, it was just awful. And then they went into the booth where they went during the convention and I can remember seeing his hair was all messed up and he was waving and his hair was all messed. We were all in the Green Room. Prior to that McCain and Cindy McCain and Bush ’41 was there, all these people.

The agents called me at six o’clock in the morning, said, “You’ve got to get up here.” I said, “What’s wrong?” He said, “President Ford’s leaving.” I said, “Leaving the hotel?” and I went up and he had his briefcase and he was all dressed and he had his briefcase on his lap, and I knew something was desperately wrong. He said, “Tell the manager I will never stay at this hotel again.” I said, “Okay,” and he said, “I am so unhappy here.”

Well, apparently he hadn’t slept all night and it was just awful. I went in and saw Mrs. Ford and she was getting ready - he thought to go on the plane - but they were taking him to the hospital. That’s when they determined he had a stroke. He had had a stroke. He’d gone the night before because he hadn’t felt well, and they wanted to keep him, but he said no. They should have kept him. They should have said, you have to stay. But nobody did, so then they found out that he’d had two strokes.

I went to see him at the hospital and I sat down and he said, “What do you have for me?” He looked at me, “Penny, we get to work.” I said nothing. I just sat there with him and talked to him. It was such an uncertain time. It was just an awful trip. Then, when they were going to do the operation on his tongue, because they figured it was a virus, they asked every department head in the hospital to give their opinion as to whether they thought they should do it or not, because if it was cancer, it would have spread through his whole body.
They called his doctor here. They called Dr. Mahler, who had been his doctor early on, who was in New York. They called everyone and everyone gave their opinion and they decided to do the surgery. I remember I went and sat in the park and just sat there and prayed and hoped that everything was going to be okay. I got the call and they said that he was fine. Oh God, that was just an awful trip. He had no idea what was happening to him. You never want to see somebody in that position, ever.

Smith: How was Mrs. Ford handling all that?

Circle: Oh, she was just amazing. She was so strong. Everyone calls her frail. She’s the least frail person I’ve ever known in my life. She was just unbelievable.
When I went in that morning - I can still see her standing, looking in the mirror, doing her hair - she said, “We’re going to take him to the hospital.” I said, “That’s good.” She said, “He’s just not going to be able to stand it.” And I said, “He’ll be okay, and you’ll be okay.” She said, “I’m fine, I’m fine.” And all those days in the hospital, she was so strong. She was just amazing.

Smith: And Bush ’43 visited him at the hospital.

Circle: Oh, did he?

Smith: Yeah, during the convention.

Circle: And I think ’41 did, too, didn’t he? ’41 was right above me. He called me – the people that called me every single day from that hotel and from that convention, President Bush called me every single day, Henry Kissinger called me, he would leave messages. I was on the phone in that damn room from six o’clock in the morning until three in the morning. I swear to God my phone wouldn’t stop. I had almost no sleep. Henry Kissinger called every single day – he would call and he left a message the last night, and he said, “I don’t care what time you get in. I don’t care what time you’re available. You call me.” And he did that every single time President Ford was in the hospital, he did that the last year – I swear to God, Henry Kissinger called more than anybody. And Cheney called a lot.

Smith: You know the call I got – in Grand Rapids – as soon as the news was out. Within twenty minutes, I got two calls. One from Tricia Nixon, and one from Julie Eisenhower.

Circle: No kidding. Oh, isn’t that nice.

Smith: Both very concerned, wanted to be remembered.

Circle: Isn’t that nice, really nice. They have always done that. And Lady Bird Johnson was really good about that, too.

Smith: There was a real friendship there, wasn’t there?

Circle: Yeah, she was a darling woman, really. And she had a great staff, too. I really like everyone around her.
Smith: There’s a question, because people are always trying to play divide and conquer with the former presidents – as if they think that you don’t talk to each other.

Circle: Right. Ohhh, yes.

Smith: Explain how that works.

Circle: Oh, it’s wonderful. It’s a wonderful group of people, and we all stay in touch. There is just this little…further away, the Reagan people, they are just a little further away because they are so much better than we are – but they are pretty close with the other presidents. Like Joann Drake – she’s quite close with – Fred Ryan was a great guy. He always stayed in touch and there was never any of that with him. But women are different, I think. But I am so close with Jean Becker, the Johnson people, too. And the Carter people.

Smith: Nancy…

Circle: Nancy Konigsmark. And the one I talk to even more than Nancy was his personal secretary, my God, I can’t remember her name. She retired about 2005, I think she retired. But she was wonderful, and I talked to her a lot. But we all kept in touch and we figured we were all in such a unique situation that we should get together once a year. We never did, but we still stay in touch, and that’s really nice. Everyone always checks in.

Smith: People trying to prey, prey, prey.

Circle: The letters – okay. I would get a letter that said President Bush had agreed to do this, and they were going to contact President Carter, but President Bush had indicated that he would like President Ford to be involved. So I would call Jean and say, “Tell me about this,” and if she didn’t know, she would call me and say, “No, we got the same letter. President Ford’s involved.” People did that all the time. They would write – and Carter. All the former presidents. I never really got – but to some degree I got involved with Clinton’s people after they left. Clinton’s people, Mack McClarty, was the greatest guy in the Clinton administration. I adored him. He was the greatest guy. I worked with him on NAFTA. I worked quite closely with him. He and a couple of other people stay in touch with me all the time – from the Clinton administration. But as far as this sort of thing, and his chief of staff, or whomever - I don’t really know their staff or who is what.

Smith: Speaking about that, because I’ve run into Mack at a couple of things, he knows who you are…

Circle: He does.

Smith: He’s very good on the personal, very good. But remember, it was, you know – let’s be fair – of course, Mrs. Ford got the Medal of Honor during the first Bush presidency. And then it was in the Clinton presidency that President Ford - it was the 25th anniversary and two days before, it was no accident, another Op-ed piece – the one on affirmative action. And Willis Ward, which really made waves.

Circle: Yeah, exactly.

Smith: Because I was told later on – it would have been nicer, frankly, in an ideal world, if they had just honored President Ford – but being the Clinton White House they had eight or nine other people that they were going to include. But he turned out to be the star attraction of the day. And in part, because of that piece, which, again, was so counterintuitive.

Circle: Exactly. Yeah, when we went for that – oh, how much of this should I tell you – Bob Barrett and I walked over with Henry Kissinger to the White House. Bob and I weren’t invited to the reception, so we walked into the room and were seated. The room where he was going to receive the Medal of Freedom.

Smith: The East Room.

Circle: Was that the East Room? Okay. The stage was here, and the seating was in front of the stage, and then back and around we were over here, we were in the last row over here. And it was fine. We could see the stage just fine. We were sitting there waiting while the reception was going on, and Mack McClarty was – well, I recognized him because he and I had been on the phone together for hours and hours over a period of months, but I knew him from his pictures in the paper and on television, but he didn’t know me from Adam. And he came up and he was talking to someone down the row, and I leaned back as he was finishing up and I said, “Mack,” and he came over, and I said, “Penny Circle.” And he went, “Ah! Penny Circle!” and he was just all over me and he was so happy to meet me – I mean, you could tell, and I was so happy to meet him face to face. And he said, “What are you doing here?” and I said, “Well, we’re here for the Medal.” And he said, “Why aren’t you in the reception?” I said, “Well, we weren’t invited.” And he said, “Well, of course you were invited to the reception.” I said, “No, it’s okay,” and he said, “Well, okay,” and he left and then a couple of ushers came up and escorted us into the reception.

We were thrown into the receiving line and I get into the receiving line and President Clinton is right there and he comes up and I said, “Hello, sir.” I’ll just tell you – I wasn’t going to tell you what I thought at the time, I just said, “Hello, sir, I’m Penny Circle, President Ford’s chief of staff.” And then Mrs. Clinton came up and all of that – and it was really nice. Bob Barrett was kind of left a little bit in the background there, because he didn’t know Mack McClarty or anything. So later in the limo Susan said, “So you knew Mack McClarty?” And I said, “Yeah, I worked with him on NAFTA with your father.” And she said, “Oh, because my dad asked Bob how he knew Mack McClarty and he said, ‘Oh, he was doing some business with him in the White House.’” And I said, “He did?” I said, “The only reason we were in there was because he knew me;” and she said, “Yeah, I know.” But, this is how it works in this business.

Smith: NAFTA – there was a classic example of former presidents coming together, across the aisle to support free trade. Were there other instances? Of course later on and more recently you had the tsunami relief effort.

Circle: There was another one, too.

Smith: 9/11, of course, after 9/11.

Circle: 9/11, yeah.

Smith: What do you remember of 9/11? They were in Vail.
Circle: They were. Yeah, I’m getting confused with Reagan’s funeral. They were in Vail and I was coming home on Friday – it was September 11th. I was coming home on Friday, and the Fords – that was 2001, that was a year after his strokes, so he wasn’t completely healthy then. He got much better after that, but that was just a year later and I don’t think he was in great health. I think it was hard for him to travel. But you saw them on television, I’m sure – behind the Clintons, who were sleeping at the time. Remember that picture? That was a good picture.

It was so upsetting. I remember an agent – he’d been swimming in the morning and an agent came and told him and he just couldn’t figure it out. He couldn’t come to terms with it. He came back and he sat down at his breakfast table and read the paper and he turned the television on. It was hard for anyone to realize what really happened. It was like a bad dream. But it was very somber around the house and then they left and I guess I didn’t see them again until they came back at the end of September.

Smith: Remember – talk about one of the last missions – remember when King Hussan of Morocco died? Was it the King of Morocco or King Hussein?

Circle: King Hussein.

Smith: King Hussein died and he went. How exhausting was that?

Circle: It was – it was terribly exhausting. Because we found out like at two or three in the morning. The Air Force called and said, “Okay we have to go.” I was asleep and I called President Ford and woke him up and told him to get ready to go. I ran to the office and I had Judy go to the office, too, just in case he needed anything. He didn’t. But it was very exhausting, especially jumping out of bed. But he was ready to go because they knew it was coming at any minute. I mean, the plane was there and all, so they knew it was imminent. It was an exhausting trip when he got back.

Smith: Because as I remember it also entailed a long procession on foot.

Circle: It did and we were kind of worried about that, but he was fine. He managed okay. But, yeah, that was hard on him.
Smith: Did he ever meet Queen Elizabeth after the ’76 Bicentennial? Did their paths ever cross?

Circle: I think so. I’m not sure. But, I wonder when he was in London if he saw her. Maybe not, maybe not, but he’s very fond of her, or was very fond of her.

Smith: How difficult were the last couple of years?

Circle: I can’t imagine ever going through something like that again. It was terrible. It was so stressful and so – I don’t think I had one easy moment in about two years. And this is not about me. It was for him.

Smith: How obnoxious, for lack of a better word, was the media deathwatch?

Circle: It was terrible. It was God-awful. Every single time he’d sneeze, I’d get a phone call, and I mean they were just vultures. And the cars would pile up – people in this area had to be just sick of it, because the whole front of the hospital was just all media. The minute he would go into the hospital… It was very difficult because there were factions who would tell me the minute he’d go in the hospital, to announce it. But that was just the wrong thing to do because, if we could have twelve hours to prepare for him to go into the hospital – I mean, they find out soon enough. They find out. There is someone at the hospital who reports it.

I’m telling you, they were vultures. They were terrible people. There are only a few that came out unscathed from my perspective, and that I’ll stay friends with – that had consideration and cared about him enough – but most of them were just vultures. Some of the national – I’ll tell you what – the media changed between 1985 and 1990. They were a kinder, gentler group of people before this. Now they don’t care. And they are just nasty and rude and obnoxious.

Smith: He was fond of Hugh Sidey, wasn’t he?

Circle: Very. He wrote an Op-ed piece on him when he died. Remember? It was over Thanksgiving. I can’t remember what year. He was very fond of him. He was very fond of most of his press people that were in the White House when he was there. Most of the group.
Smith: Do you remember the last time you saw him?

Circle: Ah. I do. It was – he died on Monday – I saw him on Friday. He was sleeping and I had gone to see him and I put my hand on his arm and he held my hand and I stood there – and he held my hand for maybe an hour. I wasn’t going to move. It was just a very sad time. He knew it was me. It was a tough time.

Smith: Were you surprised by the reaction? The public reaction over the ensuing week?

Circle: Oh, yes. The people – it was a holiday weekend – and the people in Washington surprised me most of all. I was surprised by the people here, standing on the side of the road when the motorcade went by. There were a lot of people at the airport, but I think the thing that surprised me the most was Washington, D.C. As hard as those people are, there were so many people standing on the sides of the road when we went through. When you got to Alexandria, you can understand that, but that was still overwhelming. My God, that whole town was out. The whole town, I’m sure, out on the streets. And, of course, in Michigan. But Washington, D.C. surprised me the most.

Smith: Remember the day of the service at the cathedral, because I was up at the cathedral for ABC, so I wasn’t in the motorcade. But, remember, he had insisted on no caissons in the streets of Washington?

Circle: Yes, I know.

Smith: And yet, the crowds apparently that turned out as if there had been a caisson.

Circle: I know, I know exactly. Remember, that was in 1990 when you and Marty came out, and I believe that was the first time he said he didn’t want the caisson, wasn’t it? I still have your notes that you wrote. In fact, I don’t think I have them. They are in the funeral files.

Smith: Did they find it distasteful? The Fords, to be involved in this process – the funeral planning?
Circle: It was hard at first, but they got used to it. You know, they did get used to it finally. Because they knew it had to be done. And I think after Reagan died, they realized that they had to do something.

Smith: Do you miss him?

Circle: Oh…yeah. Yeah, more than I can ever say.

Smith: What did you learn from him?

Circle: So many things. What I told you about his not being judgmental, that was such a good lesson for me because he would accept anything anybody believed, and, whether he believed it or not, it was fine with him. He showed that in every part of his life. In his bipartisanship, in his reaction to people, he just never really criticized anyone’s values or thoughts or feelings about anything. He was very, very pragmatic about that. I learned that and that was very good. And his discipline was just beyond belief. What a good example for other people, if they took that example.

Smith: That’s what Lorraine said. She said she learned discipline from him.

Circle: Yeah, absolutely. And if somebody needed to learn discipline, to be around him, boy, that was a good, good lesson. He was a good teacher, and he was such a fine person. People will always say he was a good man. “He wasn’t so smart, but he was a good man.” He was very smart, he was very smart. He was a lot smarter than many people who claimed to be intellectuals, I’ll you that. It was a lesson every day. Not so much in things like having to have your mail on Saturdays or not taking vacations because you have to work.

Smith: And you didn’t get rich working in his office.

Circle: And I didn’t get rich working in his office. Well, that’s another thing I learned. I’m a little more generous than President Ford was, and I make a lot less money. But he was such a good man and I was so fortunate to have the experience and the opportunity to be around him as closely as I was. We had a good relationship. I can’t remember, except for the first day I was in here, where I don’t really think he was mad at me, the very first day when I had the job, when Bob Barrett left. I don’t think he was ever angry at me once for anything. That’s saying something. He never yelled at me.

Smith: He did have a temper.

Circle: Yeah, sure he had a temper, but once it was over, it was over. And I was never the beneficiary of that directly. Which is nice to say.

Smith: Yeah. That’s perfect. Perfect.

Smith: First of all, thank you so much for doing this.

There’s so much I want to talk to you about, including, not only Gerald Ford, but the Congress that obviously was so much a part of his life. When did you come to this neighborhood? When did your paths first cross with the Fords?

Abbruzzese: I left the Army in 1970. I’d only been married a few years. I had a daughter. And when I left and got the job on Capitol Hill, I bought this house in October of ’71. I didn’t focus on him being in the neighborhood because I had some officers down the Hill who were my instructors when I was a cadet. That’s what I really was interested in. One day, the following spring, Betty came over when I was at work with a gift for my son who had just been born and I thought it was a very nice courtesy call. But actually she and my wife, Louise, got to be very friendly and Susan began to babysit for her. I think she was about 16. A wonderful babysitter.

Smith: Really?

Abbruzzese: She was absolutely wonderful. I could even show you a couple of embarrassing pictures that she took later on of the children, especially my youngest, that we don’t show because I don’t want to be arrested.

Smith: What made her a wonderful babysitter?

Abbruzzese: She genuinely loved being around small children. She was affectionate. She was even without any knowledge - I don’t know how much babysitting she did - but she really knew how to take care of them. She was very good in every respect, attentive, never missed a thing.

Smith: Very conscientious.

Abbruzzese: Oh, yeah, and when they went to the White House, I think in Thanksgiving of ’75, she wanted to take the children to the White House for Thanksgiving pumpkins. And when she got home, they’d locked themselves out of the house. We’d gone out that evening and that’s why she was babysitting. When we got home, I found out the Secret Service broke the screen in the upper window to get into the house.

Smith: So she continued to babysit even after they lived in the White House?

Abbruzzese: No, I think slowly that went out. She may have done it, but I don’t know that she did it very often. Essentially, it was while they lived in the neighborhood, which was from ’71 to ’74, about 2 ½ years.

Smith: Describe the neighborhood. What was it like then?

Abbruzzese: Very few young children. I think there were only one or two neighbors that had young children. About a half a dozen military and Colonel Jack Meyer was from, if you don’t mind the parochial thing, was from the West Point Class of ’39. Had built the house down the street and he was a real estate agent. He sold the house to a neighbor across the street. Sold a house to the neighbor two doors away. All classmates. He was a tactical officer when I was a cadet. Another officer up the hill, Dick Lafferly(?) was a math instructor as a plebe. And Ray Marlin(?), a two-star general had been a tactical officer my last two years, for whom I have great thanks.

Smith: So almost a military enclave in some ways.

Abbruzzese: Yeah. It was still more Democratic than most neighborhoods. I would say then it was about 50/50. But most military officers are Republicans. Now it’s even more Democratic, though. We have many more families that are Democrats, although I don’t know what their politics are. We have parties frequently. Every Memorial Day, we close off the street and have a party, so it’s also a very social neighborhood.

Smith: Let’s go back to the Congress because it’s obviously a very different institution today from what it was then.

Abbruzzese: Yeah.
Smith: And everyone talks about Ford being someone who was almost as popular among Democrats as he was among Republicans. What was it like on Capitol Hill then as opposed to later years? And what was it that made Ford the success that he was?

Abbruzzese: It depended on where you worked and to some extent on your own member. Most members, even the conservative ones and the liberal ones, were fairly bipartisan at that time. Members of the different party would meet for lunch occasionally, frequently rather, in the members’ dining room. When I organized my trips, we would always have almost an equal number of Democratic and Republican members, even though in the early 70s, well after Watergate, the Republicans only had about 140 members in the House. But we’d go on a trip, six Republicans, six Democrats. And there was a good reason for that, though. And it was because the Democratic members had subcommittee chairmanships, so they had their own field of operations. And when a recess came and that was the only time we could travel, they had businesses to do. They would do their own hearings in their district or they would do a foreign trip of their own. Of course, on our delegation, it was very pleasant because we went to NATO countries. And who doesn’t want to go to England, Germany, Italy, and Spain? After awhile, everybody loved it. And I recall getting on the plane one time and just before we took off, Wayne Hays stood up and said, “Gentlemen, I only have one thing to say. I want you to enjoy yourself. For anybody who doesn’t go to meetings, plan on buying your own ticket back home.” It worked perfectly.

Smith: So these weren’t junkets. These were working…?

Abbruzzese: We had members who would go on a North Atlantic assembly trip just for the trip. And they loved it. And after that they became regular participants. Another aspect of it was that, if a Republican wanted to participate in the international leadership of the organization, the rest of the delegation supported them. So we had Republicans and Democrats sharing leadership positions in the organization.

Smith: You mentioned, of course, Watergate. It comes along and begins to devour the Nixon presidency. Did you have almost over-the-fence conversations? I mean, what kind of interactions did you have with your neighbor across the street? And would you talk about it?

Abbruzzese: No, when we first began to talk, I said, “Look, I think you ought to know that I work for Wayne Hays.” He said, “I understand everything.”

Smith: What do you think he meant by that?

Abbruzzese: Well, Wayne Hays was a conservative Democrat, but he was not conservative on everything. He was sort of supported by unions. On national security and foreign policies, Republicans and Democrats very largely voted alike. The most important characters to come out of it was in WWII, General Bradley and General Patton didn’t get along. And Bradley was a three-star in North Africa and Patton was a two-star. When Patton got in trouble over slapping a soldier, every once in awhile this would happen, and he was very forward about pushing his unit to go forward and he was really an outstanding tactical leader. And somebody, after the war, said to Bradley, “Well, what do you think about Patton, though?” And he didn’t want to be disloyal and he didn’t want to be dishonest so he said, “He’s really a very strange duck.” And that was what people would say about Wayne Hays, something like that.

The chairman of the committee and he lived, Doc Morgan was the chairman, they lived in adjacent districts. Doc Morgan liked him very much, but he couldn’t protect him when he got in this trouble over Liz Ray. So afterwards, we were chatting one time and he said, “You know, it sure was a shame about Wayne. You know, if it wasn’t the way he dealt with people, he would’ve been Speaker.” Couldn’t avoid insulting another member. He was bad at that, but he was very sharp. He always knew his stuff. He never came into a hearing ignorant of the subject or the issues. Not only the international aspects of it, but the domestic political implications of it. He was really very good at that. And if he got up on the floor and made a statement about something, it was usually because he felt strongly in a non-partisan matter. And he would always carry 20 or 30 votes with him. Always. So he was a very able individual.
Smith: Beyond saying to you “I understand all about that,” is that all he needed to say?

Abbruzzese: Well, after that, we never discussed any issues on the Hill. When they would visit the house, we would have dinner and we would talk about children, the national situation or international situation, but we didn’t get to that stuff. That was more sensitive than our national security.

Smith: I understand.

When Agnew resigns, was there speculation in the neighborhood? Because it all happened very fast.

Abbruzzese: I was surprised. And I was very happy because I thought he would change the atmosphere. And he did. Everywhere he went, he improved the atmosphere, especially with the press. He was just very good.

Smith: I assume you must have had press staked out here at some point. And this was before he becomes President, but during the vice presidency…

Abbruzzese: We would occasionally have press here when something was happening, but it was not like the week of the resignation.

Smith: Let me just back up for one moment. By that time, did you think there was going to be a resignation? Did you believe that your neighbor was…?

Abbruzzese: I thought he was going to go down. I thought he was good. I felt that when Sirica came out, to me that defined it for me. The eighteen minute tape, that’s what helped the Republicans change. It gave them their excuse. Even before that they knew he had to go but they weren’t going to do it because they were loyal. And when that happened, then seven members of the 16 Republicans on the judiciary committee voted for impeachment and all the Democrats. And the only person who was ever unpleasant to Ford on that committee, especially during his hearings and afterwards when he came up once to discuss the pardon, was Elizabeth Holtzman. But she had a very prickly personality. She would not allow Democratic liberal colleagues to be friendly with her on some occasions.
Smith: Really.

Abbruzzese: We had a friend who was the staff director of a joint committee on the workings of the House and he went into her office and asked to see Congressman Holtzman. He wanted to help her to see if she wanted to have any work done to modernize the office. They threw him out.

Smith: Really? So, in some ways, it’s almost a badge of honor to be harassed by…

Abbruzzese: She was from Brooklyn. Her worst enemies were other liberals from Brooklyn. But I think that’s a more common situation than you think.

Smith: And I think it works on the other side of the aisle as well.

Abbruzzese: For instance, upstate, Sherry Boehlert and Jerry Solomon were always at loggerheads. And Sherry Boehlert would say, “God won’t let me get along with him.” Of course, Jerry wanted him to be a good right-wing Republican. I almost got fired over that, too. Among other times, I was really almost officially fired another time, but that’s another story.

Smith: Was it your sense that Ford got along with just about everyone?

Abbruzzese: Oh, yeah. He was never threatening. Never condescending. Never uncivil. And he would never do something even when he was going to run for Majority Leader. At that period, they were not satisfied with the Minority Leadership.

Smith: Charley Halleck.

Abbruzzese: Oh, yeah. Even at that time, he says, “No, I’m not going to do that because I’m not going to do anything in secret.” And afterwards, Halleck said, “Don’t worry about it, Jerry. I understand.” And he was really concerned about the impact on their friendship because he was fond of him.

Smith: Really? That’s interesting.

Abbruzzese: Yeah, he really had a generous heart for other people. Along with Phillip Hart and half a dozen members, he was one a very small group of members that to me took the Thomas Moore attitude on serving your country. Be ambitious. Work hard. Be loyal. And be a man of character. Don’t put your ambition above the country. Which was the problem Thomas Moore had about putting the country before his faith. And Ford was like that and so was Phillip. And there were other members and in every Congress there are members like that.

I think by and large even now, members are largely honest and aboveboard and they really want to do good work. But they get trapped in the partisan system. They get trapped in being forced to raise money to get a subcommittee chairmanship. Leadership calls on them for a favor. You don’t want to be loyal to your district. You don’t want to be loyal to what you believe is the best thing. It’s very difficult to do that nowadays.

Smith: And so much, including the media, drive you in the direction of partisanship.

Abbruzzese: That’s because media can’t work when people are getting along and when they’re all doing the right thing. During the Wayne Hays investigation, I got a call from, I think, Jack Whitman, who was working for Jack Anderson. They’d gone into his funding for a lot of things and there wasn’t anything there. And he asked me a lot of questions about the operation of our delegation. And I said, “There isn’t a dime out of place because everything we do is by check. We can’t even go across the street without writing a check for it, you know. And it’s spent overseas. We do the report when we came home. The only thing we don’t report is the cost of the airplane. And the overtime for people.” And he said, “Well, that’s good news.” And I said, “Why don’t you report that?” He said, “We don’t do that. I’m a muckraker.”

Smith: It says volumes, doesn’t it?

Abbruzzese: Yeah.

Smith: Once he became vice president, I mean, at that moment, was there excitement in the neighborhood? What was the reaction?

Abbruzzese: Oh, yeah. The cars going through the street were terrible. And the Secret Service was out front and, you know, they took out his garage and they put in a reinforced driveway. And while they were doing it, a newspaper wrote, “How much is this going to cost?” So he paid for it himself out of his own pocket. He didn’t need a driveway. He needed a garage for his cars. And when he sold his house, they said, “Boy, he’s going to be rich.” He got an assessment and an assessed value and he sold for exactly that amount of money. He sold it for $137,000, I believe, and he could’ve gotten another $30,000 or $40,000, at least. So he was always taking the heat.

I recall a friend I knew who worked on the judiciary committee, when he was being vetted for the vice presidency, they were going into all his official travel. And he traveled every weekend. They went through every receipt for every trip. And that was about 50 trips for about 33 years. What is that, 400 trips? There was $47 out of place. And they thought they had him so they went to Congressman Brooks. Congressman Brooks was very partisan and he would not let friendship come between him and getting a Republican. And they said, “Well, we’ve got this.” He said, “Anything else?” They said, “Well, we don’t have anything. He’s clean. He’s clean as Caesar’s wife.” He was always that way.

Smith: Tell me about Mrs. Ford in those days. Did you visit back and forth?

Abbruzzese: My wife would go back and forth. They would go back and forth all the time. When the Bishop lived here, he and his wife used to babysit for the children. If ever she had to travel with him, which happened occasionally, the children would stay here. And the kids put plastic things on the showers. They decorated different parts of the house with all sorts of junk which was really quite attractive. And when we had to redo the bathroom up there and put a new shower in, we were not happy, but we had to throw them away. You know, after they sold the house, the fellow who bought the house wanted to keep everything that was in the house that was historic. And at one point, they took out the sink in the kitchen. That sink in the kitchen, that old sink, sat in the back of the den until 3 months ago. These people bought the house and when they put it in, they just took it out.

Smith: Describe the interior of the house, because we’ve heard people say it’s actually quite small.
Abbruzzese: Oh, no, not at all. It’s got nice rooms. It’s got over 3,000 square feet. They have a large living room on the right side which goes to the rear of the house which is about 13 by 20. There’s this den that used to be the garage, so that’s about 20 by 20. And the kitchen and dining space was out in the back and looked on the swimming pool. He swam. He had a heating element in it, so he would swim until November. He would swim 10 or 11 months a year. I guess if it weren’t really freezing, he would swim every day if he could.

Smith: Great exercise.

Abbruzzese: Oh, yeah. And upstairs, they’ve got one, two, three, I think they’ve got 4 or 5 bedrooms upstairs. A lot of space. Really pretty nice.
