Henry Kissinger Speaks in Grand Rapids

The Gerald R. Ford Foundation was honored to have former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger as the second speaker in the William E. Simon Lectures in Public Affairs series on January 31 at the Amway Grand Plaza Hotel in Grand Rapids.

Following a warm introduction by President Ford, in which he recounted his long association with Kissinger and referred to their "unique chemistry," Kissinger captivated the audience of invited guests with his insights into current East-West relations.

Kissinger expressed his appreciation to President Ford for the "calm dignity" he brought to the White House following the Watergate period. He said that trying to conduct foreign policy while the executive authority of the United States was disintegrating was a "nightmarish prospect."

He noted that the changes that have taken place all over eastern Europe in the last year had their origins in the Ford administration. He said that the structure of arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union was established by Ford and Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev at Vladivostok in 1974 and that the Helsinki agreements, for which Ford was vilified at the time, are a "forum and rallying ground" for fighters for democracy in Eastern Europe and "the most significant agreements signed in the last 30 years—there is no longer any dispute."

Kissinger expressed his belief that, on many levels, this is one of the most exciting periods through which anyone can live. It is the culmination of what Americans have wanted since the end of World War II. He warned, however, that this new period calls for a type of foreign policy we have never before had to conduct.

We cannot, according to Kissinger, believe that Gorbachev is the answer to all our problems. It’s important to remember that “states have permanent interests that do not change with personalities.” We have to remain involved in foreign policy in order to “prevent all the resources of Eurasia from being organized by a hostile power.”

We don’t want anything from the Soviet Union, Kissinger said, except that it stay within its boundaries. “They shouldn’t get claustrophobia—they have 11 time zones!”

"States have permanent interests that do not change with personalities."

The former Secretary of State ended on an optimistic note, saying that the whole international environment is changing in the direction of our values. The dangers have been reduced. “We are in a position to work on building a structure of peace in the world that, while it will require a constant vigilance, will be a lot less tense than what we have known for a generation.”

"We are in a position to work on building a structure of peace in the world..."

C-SPAN videotaped the Kissinger speech and broadcast it eight times between February 2nd and 5th. It was also shown on Grand Rapids local access cable television. The speech will air on the “Ford Hall Forum,” a national network radio program hosted by former Congresswoman Barbara Jordan.

Ford: "I Told You So!"

During his second debate with Jimmy Carter in October 1976, President Ford said, "There is no Soviet domination of Eastern Europe." He meant that, while the physical presence of Soviet troops in Eastern Europe was obvious, the "hearts, souls, and spirits" of the people were not dominated. With what Ford later admitted was a certain amount of stubborness, he refused to clarify his statement until after the media had had a field day. Some speculate that his position cost him votes in November's close election.

Partly because of this, Ford watched last fall's events in Eastern Europe with especially keen interest. In an article written for The Washington Post in October he noted, "My mother taught me it is wrong to crow. But former presidents as well as small boys know no greater joy than being able to say: 'I told you so!'" He quoted his friends as saying, "You know, what you said about Poland wasn't so stupid after all!" and described the "Sphinx-like smile" he gave them.

In a more serious vein, Ford wrote, "The encouraging changes in Poland, Hungary, East Germany and, most remarkably, in the Baltic republics and other ethnic regions of the Soviet Union make me prouder than ever to have signed the Helsinki accords."

"My mother taught me it is wrong to crow. But former presidents as well as small boys know no greater joy than being able to say: 'I told you so!'" did not symbolize an American abandoning the hopes and aspirations of the captive nations, as many pundits and some former governors charged at the time. Rather, I acted for 200 million Americans by countesigning the Eastern Europeans' own initial and cautious declarations of independence, with formal Soviet concurrence."

Journalism Awards

Inaugural winners of the journalism prizes were Lou Cannon of The Washington Post and Charles Corddry of the Baltimore Sun, while David Hoffman of The Washington Post and Richard Halloran of The New York Times were selected last year.
The Press and Divided Government

The National Press Club in Washington, D.C., was the setting on December 6, 1989, of a symposium, “The Press and a Divided Government.” The symposium, jointly sponsored by the National Press Foundation and the Gerald R. Ford Library and Museum, brought together representatives from both government and the press to discuss problems related to having a President from one political party and a Congress dominated by the other.

At a luncheon preceding the symposium, President Gerald Ford introduced the topic by recalling when Republicans had a majority in both houses of Congress and a Republican was President. “That was a long, long time ago,” he lamented.

Speaking from the vantage point of one who has spent 34 years as a Republican in a House controlled by Democrats, Robert Michel, Minority Leader of the House of Representatives, delivered keynote remarks.

He stated that “a political scientist might say America has reached a state of natural political equilibrium. With a Republican White House and Democratic Congress, each party has become perfectly adapted to its own special environment, like certain prehistoric beasts just before the Ice Age.” Disagreeing with the theory that this is natural, Michel nonetheless characterized the Democrats in Congress as “political dinosaurs” whose dominance should be ended.

FRITZ: “I think government...is divided because the people want it that way. Americans are naturally suspicious of too much government, and they see divided government as a kind of safeguard.”

Michel went on to place a share of the responsibility for maintaining the Democratic majority in Congress on the press. The day-to-day work of Congress does not produce the drama necessary to attract network news coverage, consequently national television news focuses on the President. “The only time network television news gives the Congress a detailed look is when scandal erupts—or if some committee is holding hearings on some currently hot subject.” He calls this the “coverage gap,” saying that even most newspapers do not give Congress in-depth reporting. This, he says, means that the press does not "document how the Democrat majority fulfills or fails in its responsibility to govern," According to Michel, the "Democrats are in effect getting a free ride in our divided government." He feels that more and better coverage of the House would be in his party's best interest. "I believe that the more the people know about the realities of the Democratic control of the House, the quicker Republicans may very well become a majority.'"

In the symposium that followed Michel's speech, participants from print and broadcast journalism, two members of the House of Representatives, a political consultant, and the assistant to President Bush for communications revealed a diversity of opinions on the subject of divided government and its relationship to the press.

VANDER JAGT: "... because of the way the media treats the subject, I don't think our American people know that we have a divided government..."

There was general agreement that government is not working very well, but not everyone blamed it on the division of power. Andrea Mitchell, former White House correspondent for NBC now covering Congress, expressed the views of several when she said, "There is nothing inherently dysfunctional about divided government." She said the problems result from rigid principles, not party lines. Phil Jones and Helen Thomas, who have both covered the White House, cited the lack of party loyalty as a major problem. Individual agendas keep government from operating smoothly. Robert Squier, Democratic political consultant, said the division is often government versus anti-government, not along party lines.

Representative Guy Vander Jagt reiterated Michel's point about the media's failure to cover Congress effectively, particularly regarding elections. He claims the people are not aware of the national significance of congressional elections because they see only local coverage. If they were made more aware of the national implications, they might tend to vote more along party lines, which he feels would be an improvement.

At the other end of the spectrum is Marty Tolchin of The New York Times who believes that dividing political power in government is good, resulting in more openness. Sarah Fritz of the Los Angeles Times thinks that the people want divided government because they are suspicious of too much power.

C-SPAN broadcast the proceedings throughout December. The Gerald R. Ford Foundation and Ford Motor Company provided funding for the symposium. The National Press Club hosted the event.

SQUIER: "I specifically got something out of this I can use in the campaign in '92. We now have the slogan, 'Help Stamp Out Divided Government: Elect a Democrat to the White House.'"

VANDER JAGT: "And I would conclude, 'Elect a Republican to Congress.'"
"Presidential Pets"

The Gerald R. Ford Museum will present a rare glimpse into the personal lives of U.S. Presidents during a six-month exhibit entitled "Presidential Pets." The exhibit, which runs May 5 through November 4, will explore the relationships between our nation's First Families and their pets.

"Presidential Pets" will use a mixture of artifacts, photographs, and anecdotes to document this private side of life in the White House. The exhibit will range from George Washington and his hunting dogs to George Bush and his English springer spaniel, Millie.

One of the highlights will be a 25-square foot dog house, a replica of the White House, used by Ronald Reagan's dog, Rex. The many other artifacts will include the spurs and harness ornaments used by James Monroe, a collar that belonged to Lyndon Johnson's favorite dog, Yuki, and a red dish and red ball used by Franklin Roosevelt's beloved Scottish terrier, Fala.

The exhibit will also present a number of special one-day events, including a community pet show on opening day.

Science and Technology Guide

Library staff have prepared a guide to archival files on science and technology issues ranging from earthquake prediction to uranium enrichment to the space program. The guide is a spin-off from a Congressional request to identify all National Archives holdings on such issues. Copies of the twenty-page guide are free upon request, as are copies of guides to material on the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe and to the 1976 campaign.
"Research Grants Awarded in November"

The Gerald R. Ford Foundation awarded six research grants in November. The Foundation semi-annually awards grants in support of research at the Library, with September 15 and March 15 application deadlines.

Laura Kalman (University of California - Santa Barbara) began her Ford Library research almost immediately, examining "the 'post-liberal' state to determine how post-liberal it indeed was." Kalman's research follows naturally from her just-published biography of Abe Fortas, which dealt in large part with the strengths and weaknesses of American liberalism in the 1960s. Her photocopy order of nine thousand pages stands as a Library record, she permits us to report.

James Michael Strine [Johns Hopkins University], a doctoral candidate, has already made extensive use of the files of White House advisors Philip Buchen and Ed Schults for insight into "the division of labor on legal matters within the White House and between the White House Counsel and the Department of Justice and agency counsels."

U.S. diplomacy in southern Africa, certainly a timely topic, will be the subject of Thomas Noer's [Carthage College] research. The Library's open material on diplomatic affairs is limited due to security classification restrictions, but open material can be extensive on other aspects of foreign policy issues.

University of Massachusetts political scientist Sheldon Goldman will study the selection of lower Federal court judges, and Calvin College historian Robert Bolt will research religion in the White House.

Kenneth Holland [University of Vermont] won funding to study the effect of the War Powers Resolution on Ford administration behavior.

For details on the grants program, please call grants archivist David Horrocks, [313] 668-2218.

Thomas Nast Cartoons: The Art of Politics

"Thomas Nast Cartoons: The Art of Politics," an exhibition featuring many of Nast's political cartoons, will be on display at the Gerald R. Ford Museum until April 8. The exhibition was organized by the Museum of Our National Heritage in Lexington, Massachusetts, and draws from their extensive collection of Nast cartoons.

Thomas Nast (1840-1902), often considered America's most influential political cartoonist, depicted issues in the 19th century that are still relevant today, such as inflation, political corruption, the separation of church and state, minorities, and militarism. He is probably best remembered for his versions of Uncle Sam and Santa Claus, as well as for his use of the donkey and elephant to represent the Democratic and Republican parties.

The display includes many original cartoons, as well as covers from Harper's Weekly, which featured his work between 1862 and 1886.
President Ford participated in the “Farewell to the Chief” conference on former presidents in West Branch, Iowa, jointly sponsored by the Herbert Hoover Library and the Gerald Ford Library, on October 18, 1989. He is shown here being greeted by an honor guard of 300 Boy Scouts from the West Branch area.
